"It [is] incumbent on the Government to prove that the defendant had a duty to disclose the material facts at the time he was alleged to have concealed them." United States v. Irwin, 654 F.2d 671, 678 (10th Cir. 1981); United States v. Mattox, 689 F.2d 531, 533 (5th Cir. 1982) ("Silence may be falsity when it misleads, particularly if there is a duty to speak."). Under 2 U.S.C. § 192, it is clear that a summoned witness has a duty to disclose facts inquired of in a Congressional hearing.

In the absence of a Congressional summons, it may nevertheless be possible to establish that a duty to disclose exists as to an Executive Branch official testifying in a Congressional oversight hearing by virtue of the official's requirement to report to Congress. For example, the Thrift Depositor Oversight Protection Board, which includes the CEO of the RTC, is required to appear before the House and Senate Banking Committees. 12 U.S.C. § 1441a(k)(6)(A) (requiring semiannual appearance). As such, it may be possible that such a requirement to appear implies a duty to disclose. Additional research is required as to this issue.

[1] One who makes a knowing failure to disclose a material fact is as culpable as one who makes a false statement. See United States v. McCarthy, 422 F.2d 160, 162 (2d Cir. 1970) ("Leaving a blank is equivalent to an answer of 'none' or a statement that there are no facts required to be reported.")

In order to satisfy the "trick, scheme, or device" requirement, it must be shown that there was an "affirmative act" by which means a material fact was concealed. United States v. London, 550 F.2d 206, 212-13 (5th Cir. 1977). "The mere omission of failing truthfully to disclose a material fact, which is simply the negative aspect of the affirmative act of falsely stating the same material fact, does not make out an offense under the conceal or cover up clause of section 1001." Id. at 213-14. "Rather the latter clause of section 1001 requires the government to prove something more [--] that the material fact was affirmatively concealed by ruse or artifice, by scheme or device." Id. at 214.

However, "a person's deliberate failure to disclose to the government material facts, in the face of a duty to disclose such facts, constitutes an 'affirmative act' within the contemplation of the statute." United States v. Dale, 782 F. Supp. 615, 626 (D.D.C. 1991) (Penn, J., citing no authority). Thus, this situation is distinguishable from "passive failure to disclose" or "mere silence in the face of an unasked question." Id. "The case law is clear that the deliberate failure to disclose material facts in the face of a specific duty to disclose such information constitutes a violation of the concealment provision of section 1001." Id.

c. Applicability of Brontson: Whether or Not Nonresponsive Answers Can Constitute Concealment of Material Facts Under Section 1001

The issue here relates to the difference between questioning in a congressional setting versus an adversarial trial setting. In Brontson, a perjury case, the Court held that the perjury statute was to be strictly construed such that if a witness 1) speaks the literal truth or 2) is nonresponsive to a question and thereby succeeds in concealing certain facts, the witness is not culpable for perjury. Brontson v. United States, 409 U.S. 352, 360 (1973). "The burden is on the questioner to pin the witness down to the specific object to the questioner's inquiry." Id. "Unresponsive answers are to be remedied through the 'questioner's acuity' and not by a federal perjury prosecution." Id. at 362.

The Court reasoned that "[i]t is the responsibility of the lawyer to probe; testimonial interrogation, and cross-examination in particular, is a probing, prying, pressing form of inquiry. If a witness evades, it is the lawyer's responsibility to recognize the evasion and bring the witness back to the mark, to flush out the whole truth with the tools of adversary examination." Id. at 358-59. That is so because "[i]t should come as no surprise that a participant in a bankruptcy proceeding may have something to conceal and consciously tries to do so; or that a debtor may be embarrassed at his plight and yield information reluctantly." Id. at 358.

This Brontson line of thought -- that the questioner has a high burden that inures to the benefit of the witness -- has been extended by some courts to section 1001 cases. The issue is whether or not this extension is proper or whether Brontson should be limited to perjury or false statements cases occurring in an adversarial trial context or whether it should be extended to all cases falling within those statutes, including concealment cases.[2]

If Brontson applies not only to the false statements prong of section 1001 but also to the concealment aspect, little would be left of concealment as a separate and distinct offense under section 1001. Substantial additional research must be conducted on this issue.

d. Materiality

The materiality determination is a matter of law to be determined by the courts. United States v. Hansen, 772 F.2d 940, 950 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (Scalia, J.) (concealment case).[3] The test for materiality is whether the statement "has a natural tendency to influence or was capable of influencing, the decision of the tribunal in making a particular determination." Id. at 948. Proof of actual reliance on the statement is not necessary. Id. As such, "a lie influencing the possibility that an investigation might commence" stands in the same posture under section 1001 as "a lie distorting an investigation already in progress." Id.

From the language of the statute, it is clear that the "materiality" element is not repeated in the second and third prongs. However, it is clear that the courts have read the materiality element in to each clause. See United States v. Notarantonio, 758 F.2d 777, 785 (1st Cir. 1985).[4]

[2] The D.C. Circuit accepted the Brontson defense that a literally true response is non-prosecutable in a false statements case. United States v. Milton, 8 F.3d 39, 45 (D.C. Cir. 1993).

[3] Some Circuits hold that materiality is an issue for the jury.

[4] In Swaim, the court couched its language in terms of concealment as well as false statements:

> The charge of materiality requires only that the fraud in question have a natural tendency to influence, or be capable of affecting or influencing, a government function. The alleged concealment or misrepresentation need not have influenced the actions of the government agency, and the government agents need not have been actually deceived.
> The Government does not have to show actual reliance on false statements or documentation. A statement is material even if it is ignored or never read by the agency receiving the misstatement. The concealment must simply have the capacity to impair or pervert the functioning of a government agency.

United States v. Swaim, 757 F.2d 1530, 1533 (5th Cir. 1985).

e. Statements to Congress

The false statement, false writing, or concealed fact must relate to a matter within the jurisdiction of a department of the United States. Although "Congress" does not come squarely within the definition of an "agency" or "department," the Supreme Court has held that the term "department" was meant to describe the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government. United States v. Bramblett, 348 U.S. 503, 509 (1955). As such a congressional committee is a department for section 1001 purposes. United States v. Poindexter, 951 F.2d 369, 387 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (section 1001 applied to false statements made by Poindexter to members of House Intelligence Committee); United States v. Hansen, 772 F.2d 940, 943-44 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (forms submitted by congressman to House Committee as required by Ethics in Government Act involve "matter within the jurisdiction of a department.") In addition, section 1001 is applicable to "statements that were not under oath and were not stenographically transcribed." Poindexter, 951 F.2d at 387-88 (section 1001 applies to private discussions between Poindexter and Congressmen; problems of proof in such situations (one person's word against another) are issues for sufficiency of evidence not substantive law).

In Hubbard, the Supreme Court is currently being asked to limit the reach of section 1001 solely to executive agencies. The outcome of Hubbard would significantly limit the applicability of section 1001 in the context of unsworn Executive testimony before Congressional oversight committees.

Supplement to Memorandum

I. Duty to Disclose Cases

United States v. Irwin, 654 F.2d 671 (10th Cir. 1981)

Defendant enters into contract with City Council to provide assistance in obtaining federal and state funds to finance a project. He was to receive compensation based on amount of grant received. He was then informed that this was illegal, but proceeded to enter into a second contract of the same nature. Defendant submitted grant application to Economic Development Administration (EDA) that was approved. Defendant was then appointed to City Council and was in charge of disbursing funds from EDA grant and approved City Council bills paid by EDA grant. Defendant approved bills that were allegedly performed by the defendant. In statement to EDA , defendant either left blank or claimed that he had received "0" compensation, when in fact he had been paid. Court holds that "the jury is able to find beyond a reasonable doubt that a false statement was made on the grant application concerning the amount of compensation paid by city council to defendant for expediting the application and that defendant knowingly and willfully made the false statement. In respect to the duty to disclose, the Court believes it was incumbent on the Government to prove that defendant had a duty to disclose the material facts at the time he was alleged to have concealed them. The Government in this case failed to show a legal duty to disclose subcontractors bills to City Council the payments made by subcontractor to defendant.

United States v. Hansen, 772 F.2d 940 (D.C. Cir. 1985)

The defendant, a former congressman, was convicted for false statements to a federal agency, here under the Ethics in Government Act (EIGA). Defendant failed to disclose bank loans to his wife, commodities profits, and other personal loans. EIGA requires members of Congress to file annual financial disclosure reports. Defendant challenged the conviction on materiality, jurisdiction, and whether § 1001 has application to EIGA violations. Court says that the statute is one of general applicability..."it's sweeping language clearly embraces the omissions on defendants EIGA forms." Court ruled that House Committee's are federal departments for purposes of § 1001. The subject of forms is also a matter within the jurisdiction of the department since the Supreme Court has held that the phrase should not be given narrow or technical meaning. Affirmed.

United States v. Zalman, 870 F.2d 1047 (6th Cir. 1989)

Defendant was convicted on two counts of aiding and abetting individuals to make false statements to the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS). Defendant assisted individuals in arranging fixed marriages in order to remain in the U.S., therefore misleading the INS. Defendant has charged as error the trial court's failure to instruct the jury as to the government's burden to prove that he or his clients had a duty to disclose the purposes of their marriages. Court holds that the defendant was correct in asserting that to support a concealment case there must be a duty to disclose. However, the defendant's assertion is misplaced because the issue of duty and proof thereof is not a question of fact to be decided by a jury. It is a question of law properly considered and determined by the court. United States v. Tobon-Builes, 706 F.2d 1092 (11th Cir. 1983) Consequently, there was no requirement imposed upon the trial court to instruct the jury as to the issue of duty as an element of the concealment offense. Affirmed.

II. Bronston Issue Cases

United States v. Milton, 8 F.3d 39 (D.C. Cir. 1993)

Defendant was convicted of making materially false statements under § 1001. Defendant was employed as a staff attorney for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). In settlement of a case, defendant was to deposit a $1,000,000 check into an EEOC account to be distributed to job applicants who had been discriminated against. Instead he deposited it into separate account, had claimants submit false claims, gave them money from separate account, and then collected it in cash from false claimants. Defendant stated that statements of claims were literally true. Court states that the defense of literal truth applies to § 1001 prosecutions, but defendant proposed no jury instructions to this effect, raised no objections on instructions given, and did not argue this defense to the court or jury. (However, court rules that defendant preserved objection to literal truth argument in motion of acquittal.) Affirmed.

United States v. Clarridge, 811 F. Supp. 697 (D.D.C. 1992)

Defendant, a senior officer at the CIA, was indicted on seven counts relating to the Iran-Contra affair, six of these as a result of his testimony to a Congressional committees. The basis for the perjury and false statement charges is that defendant lied about when he first learned that the U.S. was shipping arms to Iran. Defendant challenges multiplicity of counts. The Court states that the test for multiplicity is that "each count must set forth a separate lie or false statement, and in the cases where the facts present a close question of whether separate lies exist it is relevant to inquire into the degree in which the second statement impaired the body before which it was made." The Court then addresses separate counts out of appearances before separate committees being multiplicitous. Court states that defendants testimony before different committees on different dates cannot, under any interpretation, constitute the same offense for multiplicity purposes. (Even if they were the exact same lies.) Court holds the same answers to essentially identical questions are multiplicitous. Here the defendant was responding to the same line of questioning by the same person on behalf of the same body on each occasion, and the repetition of the alleged lie did not further impair the operations of the committee. The defendant then moves to dismiss the counts on the grounds that they are literally true. The court holds that the indictment is sufficient if it contains the elements of the offense charged and fairly informs a defendant of the charge against him. The indictment in this case meets this standard, falsity is an element of both § 1001 and § 1621. The possibility that a question or answer may have a number of interpretations does not invalidate the indictment/conviction. Statements where there is one or more arguable constructions, that question is left for the jury. Court reduces charges from seven to five, all other motions denied.

United States v. Poindexter, 951 F.2d 369 (D.C. Cir. 1991)

Defendant was convicted on several charges, including making false statements to Congress. Defendant falsely stated to members of the House Intelligence Committee that he had not learned until January 1986 that missiles had been shipped in November 1985 and that he had not learned until November 1986 that anyone in the U.S. Government might have had prior knowledge of that shipment. Defendant asserts that § 1001 does not apply to a false but unsworn and untranscribed oral statement made by an official in the Executive branch to members of Congress acting in their "legislative capacity." Court has held that a congressional committee is a department for the purposes of § 1001. United States v. Hansen) Defendant attempts to distinguish Hansen, saying that it involved Congress' housekeeping function, not its true legislative function. Defendant also points out that Courts' have recognized a "judicial function" exception, making § 1001 inapplicable to conduct occurring before a court acting in its judicial capacity, and that this rationale equally supports an exception for the "legislative function." The Court does not accept this, "we doubt that traditional trial tactics rationale shields from criminal responsibility a defendant who knowingly makes a material false statement of fact in a judicial proceeding. " (Remanded due to Independent Counsel's inability to carry burden of showing that defendant's compelled testimony was not used against him at trial.)

United States v. Mayer, 775 F.2d 1387 (9th Cir. 1985)

Defendant was convicted under § 1001 with submitting fictitious letters of recommendation to the District Court for consideration when it sentenced him on an unrelated conviction. This circuit had previously recognized that application of § 1001 should be limited to matters arising in judicial proceedings that can be characterized as 'administrative' or 'housekeeping' functions of the court. The Court concludes that the defendant's sentencing hearing constituted a judicial proceeding for purposes of § 1001, and that the district judge's sentencing determination constituted an adjudicative function. The judge's role in sentencing is not a housekeeping or administrative duty, but is an extension of the defendant's trial itself. Therefore, misrepresentations made during a sentencing hearing would not be covered under § 1001. Reversed.

United States v. Abrahams, 604 F.2d 386 (5th Cir. 1979)

In a proceeding in front of a magistrate to determine defendant's bail for another conviction the defendant made false, unsworn statements as to his identity and past criminal record. The Court addresses the question of whether a false statement made in a judicial proceeding is a proper basis for a prosecution under § 1001. Court holds that conviction must be reversed because § 1001 does not apply to the introduction of false documents as evidence in a criminal proceeding.

United States v Harrod, 981 F.2d 1171 (10th Cir. 1992)

Defendant convicted of making a false statement to the Department of Labor Workers Compensation Office. In order to receive benefits for his disability, defendant had to complete a federal form annually. Questions from form that are at issue regard if he was employed, number of hours employed, and rate of pay. In the years of 1988-1990 defendant claimed that he was not employed, only had a hobby, that he worked on it 4-6 hours per week. Defendant also left some questions blank. His "hobby" yielded $5,000 in 1988, $16,000 in 1989, and $34,000 in 1990. Defendant cites Bronston, saying an unresponsive answer cannot be the basis for a perjury prosecution. Court rules that Bronston does not apply here because it was decided under a federal perjury statute, not a § 1001 prosecution. Affirmed.

United States v. Mandanici, 729 F.2d 914 (2nd Cir. 1984)

Defendant convicted for making false statements to Department of Housing and Urban Development(HUD). Defendant made false statements in application, and two contracts with the Government in order to receive subsidies from HUD. Defendant said he would perform work on property that would cost $88,000, well knowing it would not cost this amount. Defendant also made claims in contract that work had already been performed, when in fact it had not, and then signed contract certifying that data contained was true,correct, and complete. Court found no merit in defendant's claim that contract was literally true and further stated that "while a defendant may not be convicted under § 1001 on the basis of a statement that is, although misleading, literally true, the factual premise for application of this principle here is absent." Affirmed.

United States v. Stephenson, 895 F.2d 867 (2nd Cir. 1990)

Defendant was an export licensing officer for the Department of Commerce, convicted for taking bribes in exchange for export licenses. Defendant told applicant that he wanted 5% for the license. Defendant then told another Commerce officer that the applicant offered him a bribe first. Defendant also convicted for making a false statement to a government official when he reported that applicant had offered him a bribe. Defendant argues that statement was literally true. Judge charged jury that it could convict defendant either by finding that he made false statements or that he falsified, concealed his unlawful acts by accusing applicant of offering bribe. Defendant argues that literally true statements cannot be the basis of a § 1001 conviction. Court rules "even if defendant's statement were construed to be literally true , the jury still could have found that he misrepresented and concealed what had occurred. " Affirmed.

MEMORANDUM

TO: Alex Azar

FROM: Monica Molloy

RE: More research regarding 18 U. S. C. § 1001

I. 18 U.S.C. 1001, the false statement statute states:

> Whoever, in any matter within the jurisdiction of any department or agency of the United States knowingly and willfully falsifies, conceals or covers up by any trick, scheme, or device, a material fact, or makes any false, fictitious or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement or entry, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Here is a simple outline of the offenses contained within § 1001, as well as the elements necessary to convict a person under the statute.

A. Concealing a material fact

1. Defendant knowingly concealed a fact by trick, scheme, or device.
2. Defendant acted willfully
3. The fact concealed was material.
4. Subject matter was within the jurisdiction of a department or agency of the United States.
5. Defendant had a legal duty to disclose the facts he concealed.

B. Making a false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement

1. Defendant knowingly made a false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement.
2. Defendant acted willfully
3. Statement was made within the jurisdiction of a department or agency of the United States.
4. The statement was material.

C. Making or Using any false writing or document

1. Defendant knowingly made or used a false writing or document containing a false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement.
2. Defendant acted willfully.
3. The writing or document was material.
4. Subject matter was within the jurisdiction of a department or agency of the United States.

II. Discussion

As you can see, there are three separate offenses contained in Section 1001. The first violation is to knowingly and willfully conceal a material fact; second,the prohibition of making any false or fraudulent statements; and lastly the statute prohibits the making or use of any false writing or document. The three offenses have four elements in common, with the offense of concealing a material fact having one additional element, a legal duty to disclose. Following is a brief synopsis of the case law on each element, followed by a discussion of two defenses that have been claimed § 1001 cases.

The elements that must be proven in order to convict a defendant under 18 U. S. C. 1001 for concealment are: 1) knowingly and willfully; 2) concealing and covering up by trick, scheme, or device; 3) a material fact; 4) in any matter within any jurisdiction of a department or agency with in the United States. United States v. Swaim, 757 F.2d 1530, 1533 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 825 (1985).

The intent of the defendant must be shown to be knowingly and willfully in a concealment of a fact or false statement case. Lange states that " a violation of § 1001 requires proof that the defendant had the specific intent to make a false or fraudulent statement." United States v Lange, 528 F. 2d 1280, 1288 (5th Cir. 1976) "In order to establish fraudulent intent on the part of a person, it must be established that such person knowingly and intentionally attempted to deceive another." United States v Diggs, 613 F.2d 988, 1000 (D.C.Cir. 1979)

The element of materiality in a false representation case must pass the following test : whether the statement "has a natural tendency to influence, or was capable of influencing, the decision of the tribunal in making a particular determination." United States v. Hansen, 772 F.2d 940, 950 (D.C. Cir. 1985) Proof of actual reliance on the statement is not required; the Government need only make a reasonable showing of its potential effects. United States v. Diggs,613 F.2d 988, 998 (D.C. Cir 1979) (It is clear in the D. C. Circuit that the materiality element is a question to be determined by the court. However in both the 9th and 10th Circuits materiality is a question for the jury and must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.) Edward J. Devitt et al., Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, Criminal Section 37.00, at 413 (4th ed 1990).

The element of jurisdiction of a department or agency of the United States is undoubtedly a question for the court. The scope of a department or agency was meant to describe the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of Government. United States v. Bramblett, 348 U.S. 503, 509 (1955). The court held that the House Office and Finance disbursing office was a "department or agency" of the United States within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. § 1001. Id. As evidenced by the case law, the courts have given the jurisdiction phrase of the statute a very broad scope and I have yet to see a case where the offense was dismissed due to lack of jurisdiction. In the situation at hand I do not believe there will be any difficulty in establishing this element.

A "duty to disclose" is only required in a concealment of a material fact offense. "In prosecuting a § 1001 concealment violation it is incumbent on the government to prove that the defendant had a legal duty to disclose the material facts at the time he was alleged to have concealed them. " United States v Anzalone, 766 F. 2d 676, 683 (1st Cir. 1985) However, "...there is no requirement imposed upon the trial court to instruct the jury as to the issue of duty as an element of the concealment offense." United States v Zalman, 870 F.2d 1047, 1055 (10th Cir. 1989) United States v Larson, 796 F.2d 244, 245 (8th Cir. 1986) (Court held that since defendant had no legal duty to disclose he could not be convicted under § 1001) United States v Irwin, 654 F.2d 671,678 (10th Cir. 1981) (Government failed to prove defendant had a legal duty to disclose facts to the Economic Development Agency.) In Hansen, a D.C. Circuit case, duty to disclose is briefly addressed. Defendant was charged with failure to disclose financial reports under the Ethics in Government Act, where there was obviously a legal duty. The indictments were upheld under § 1001.

III. Defenses

Two defenses that have been raised in false statement cases are the "exculpatory no" doctrine and the good faith defense. The "exculpatory no" doctrine is when a person under criminal investigation makes a simple denial of criminal liability to an investigator cannot then be prosecuted for making a false statement because this would violate their 5th Amendment rights. United States v Cogdell, 844 F.2d 179, 182 (9th Cir. 1988) However affirmative measures designed to mislead and thwart a government are not protected by the doctrine. Edward J. Devitt, Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, Criminal, § 37.00 at 414 (4th ed. 1990). Defendant Oliver North attempted to claim the "exculpatory no" doctrine as an excuse for not responding to the allegations against him. The Court responded" This circuit has not adopted the doctrine, but in any event it is not applicable here....Just as private persons cannot claim the "exculpatory no" doctrine in a claim against the government, government officials cannot claim its protection in seeking to maintain their positions. " United States v North, 788 F. Supp. 364, 369 (D.D.C. 1988) Because the doctrine has not been adopted by the D.C. Circuit and the ruling in the North case, it is highly unlikely that this defense would be successful.

The good faith defense was raised in defense of mail fraud and false statement allegations. The Court stated that "good faith constitutes a complete defense to a charge with the defense of which fraudulent intent is an essential element. ...What I have said respecting good faith as a defense in a mail fraud charge is also applicable to false official statement charges." United States v Diggs, 613 F.2d 988,1000 (D.C. Cir. 1979)

IV. The Bronston issue

The issue of whether nonresponsive answers or literally true answers constitute concealment of a material fact has not been decided by the Supreme Court. However, this issue has been decided under the federal perjury statute. In Bronston, the defendant was charged with perjury under 18 U.S.C. § 1621 and the court held that the general federal perjury statute does not reach a witnesses' literally true,or unresponsive answer, even if the witness intends to mislead the questioner by the answer, be it phrased in the negative or the affirmative, is arguably false by implication. Bronston v United States, 409 U.S. 352 (1973). Bronston places the burden of getting the correct answer on the questioner. "It is the responsibility of the lawyer to probe; testimonial interrogation, and cross examination in particular is a probing, prying, pressing form of inquiry. If a witness evades, it is the lawyer's responsibility to recognize the evasion and to bring the witness back to the mark, to flush out the whole truth with the tools of adversary examination." Id. at 358-359.

Milton, a 1993 D.C. circuit case applies the defense of literal truth to § 1001 prosecutions, but fails to distinguish whether this rule applies to both judicial trials and administrative hearings. United States v. Milton, 8 F.3d 39, 45 (D.C. Cir.1993) However a number of courts have actually held that there is a judicial function exception to § 1001. United States v Poindexter, 951 F.2d 369, 386 (D.C. Cir. 1991) United States v Mayer, 775 F.2d 1387, 1388-1392 (9th Cir. 1985) (Section 1001 does not cover submission of fictitious letter of recommendation to sentencing court.); United States v Abrams, 604 F.2d 386, 392-393, (5th Cir. 1979) (Answering magistrate falsely regarding aliases and arrest record at bail hearing not covered by § 1001).

United States v Clarridge, a D.C. District Court case, charges the defendant with offenses under both 18 U.S.C. § 1001, the concealment statute, and 18 U.S.C. § 1621, the federal perjury statute. United States v Clarridge, 811 F. Supp. 697. The defendant requested a motion to dismiss the perjury charges as well as the false statement charges based on the Bronston decision that literally true answers cannot be prosecuted under the statute. Id. at 712. The Court declines to dismiss the Counts on this basis, stating that the defendant "stretched the language" and "may not insulate himself from prosecution by reinterpreting his statements in order to give them a meaning which is literally true." Id. at 712. The court denied the motion in this case, and did not distinguish between § 1001 and § 1621, it only addresses them by saying "the federal perjury statutes." Id. This could be interpreted as either including both sections or only § 1621.

The second circuit has had two cases that have directly addressed this issue of convicting a defendant under § 1001 when statements have been unresponsive, but literally true. United States v Mandanici , where defendant was convicted of making false statements within the jurisdiction of the Department of Urban Housing and Development, states that " a defendant may not be convicted under § 1001 on the basis of a statement that is, although misleading, literally true." United States v Mandanici, 729 F.2d 914, 921 (2nd Cir. 1984) However, the court ruled, in this case, that the factual premise for application of this principle was absent, therefore upholding the conviction under § 1001. Id. The second case, United States v Stephenson, involves making false statements to government agents. United States v Stephenson, 895 F.2d 867 (2nd Cir. 1990) The defendant argued that literally true statements cannot be the basis of a section 1001 conviction, but the jury found that his statements were plainly false. Id. The court said that "even if Stephenson's statement were construed to be literally true, the jury still could have found that he misrepresented and concealed what had occurred." Id. at 874. In Mandanici, it is clear that the Court feels that Bronston is applicable to § 1001 convictions, on the other hand it is also clear from the two cases that there must be a factual premise and that the decision is in the hands of the jury.

The tenth circuit, under the case of United States v Harrod, however disagrees with the second circuit view that Bronston applies to § 1001 cases. United States v Harrod, 981 F.2d 1171, (10th Cir. 1992). Defendant was convicted of making false statements to the Department of Labor's Office of Worker's Compensation. Id. at 1173. The defendant attempted to assert a Bronston defense, stating that an unresponsive answer, if true cannot be the basis of a perjury prosecution even though it may be likely to mislead. Id. The court holds that Bronston does not apply, because it "was decided under the federal perjury statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1621, which implicates significantly different policy concerns than does a prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 1001." Id. at 1175. The court then goes on to explain that the holding in Bronston states how it is the interrogator's job to pin down the witness with skillfully asked questions. "But no such question and answer interplay exists in an 18 U.S.C. § 1001 false statement action. When seeking information outside the adversarial context of trial, the government needs and expects those who answer its inquiries to answer truthfully and precisely. In such cases, the respondent is not readily available for cross-examination, as in a perjury trial." Id. at 1175. This is the reasoning that we would like to have in the D.C. Circuit, the type that plainly states that Bronston is not applicable to § 1001 cases.

V. Legislative History

18 U.S.C. § 1001 is derived from the original 1909 Criminal Code version of the false claims statute. Since then it has been amended several times, with the most significant revision in 1934. The House report contains a letter from the Attorney General to the chairman of the committee which sets out the purpose and the need for the legislation. "The bill proposes to amend the Criminal Code so as to prohibit injury to and depredations against Government property wherever situated.... there are no Federal statutes under which prosecutions may be had for willful injury to property of the United States." H.R. Rep. No. 1463, 73d Cong., 2d Sess. 1 (1934), Sen. Rep. No. 1202, 73d Cong., 2d Sess. 2 (1934)

MEMORANDUM

FROM: Monica Molloy

RE: Research on 18 U.S.C. §162, Perjury generally, and 18 U.S.C. §1623, False declarations before grand jury or court.

The Modern Federal Jury Instructions define perjury as "the willful giving of false testimony, before a competent tribunal while under oath, knowing the testimony is false as to a material matter." This instruction is applicable to both §1621 and §1623 prosecutions because the substantive elements in these perjury statutes are the same. Sand, Siffert, Loughlin, & Reiss, Modern Federal Jury Instructions, Vol. 1A, Ch. 48 at 48-6 (1995). Although this definition of perjury applies to both §1621 and §1623, there are several differences between the two statutes, therefore they will be addressed separately in this memo.

I. 18 U.S.C. §1621 Perjury generally

Whoever:

(1) having taken an oath before a competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any case in which a law of the United States authorizes an oath to be administered, that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly, or that any written testimony, declaration, deposition, or certificate by him subscribed, is true, willfully and contrary to such oath states or subscribes any material matter which he does not believe to be true; or

(2) in any declaration, certificate, verification , or statement under penalty of perjury as permitted under section 1746 of Title 28, United States Code, willfully subscribes as true any material matter which he does not believe to be true; is guilty of perjury and shall, except as otherwise expressly provided by law, be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both. This section is applicable whether the statement or subscription is made within or without the United States.

A. Essential Elements

The following essential elements of a perjury conviction under §1621 must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt:

1) the defendant testified under oath in a proceeding for which a law of the United States authorizes the administration of an oath;

2) the oath was administered by a qualified person;
3) the defendant knowingly made the false material statements detailed in the indictment; and
4) the defendant acted willfully and contrary to the oath that was given.

Two of these four elements are for the jury to decide, whether the defendant knowingly gave false testimony and whether the defendant did so willfully. The trial judge decides the under oath element, whether it was properly administered, whether the person administering it was competent, and in a majority of the circuits, materiality. Edward J. Devitt et al., Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, Criminal, Section 43.00 at 43.03 (4th ed 1990) The elements of the crime of perjury under §1621 are set out in United States v. Debrow as: 1)an oath authorized by law of the United States, 2) taken before a competent tribunal, officer or person, and 3) a false statement willfully made as to facts material to the hearing. United States v. Debrow, 346 U.S. 374 (1953).

"The general test for determining whether a false statement is material is if it has a natural tendency to influence, or is capable of influencing, the decision of the fact finder." United States v. Flowers, 813 F.2d 1320, 1325 (4th Cir. 1987) (This is the same test we saw for 18 U.S.C. §1001cases under United States v. Hansen) The D.C. Circuit has adopted the majority decision that materiality is a question of law to be determined by the trial judge. United States v. Bridges, 717 F.2d 1444, 1448 (D.C. Cir. 1983) Sinclair v. United States is the Supreme Court case that supports the rule that "the materiality of what is falsely sworn, when an element of a crime of perjury, is one for the court", however it is noted that this is only dictum. Sinclair v. United States, 279 U.S. 263 (1929) Federal jury instructions as to materiality state that the "materiality of the matter involved in the alleged false testimony-that is a question of law for me to decide. It is not a question of fact for you, the jury, to determine." Sand, Siffert, Loughlin, & Reiss, Modern Federal Jury Instructions, Vol. 1A, Ch. 48 at 48-10, 49 (1995).

B. "Two Witness Rule"

Under § 1621 there is a requirement of corroboration rule , also known as the "Two witness rule." This is a judge made rule of ancient origin that prevents a defendant from being convicted based solely on the uncorroborated testimony of only one witness. Edward J. Devitt et al., Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, Criminal, Section 43.00 at 43.07 (4th ed 1990). Federal jury instructions explain the two witness rule as requiring that "the falsity of the defendant's two statements must be established either by the testimony of two witnesses whose testimony you, the jury, believe to be true, or by the testimony of one such witness which is corroborated or confirmed by other independent evidence...to substantiate the testimony of one witness." Sand, Siffert, Loughlin, & Reiss, Modern Federal Jury Instructions, Vol. 1A, Ch. 48 at 48-26 (1995). The Supreme Court has also held that "it is the duty of the trial judge, when properly requested, to instruct the jury on this aspect of its function, in order that it may reach a verdict in the exercise of an informed judgment." Weiler v. United States, 323 U.S. 606 (1945).

C. Literal Truth Defense

The literal truth defense is a defense available under both perjury statutes. It is a defense to a charge of perjury if the evidence shows either: 1) the defendant made a statement in response to a question that was ambiguous or capable of being understood in more than one way, and the answer given by the defendant to one reasonable interpretation of the ambiguous question was not false; or 2) the defendant made a statement in response to a question that was c;ear and unambiguous, but the answer to the clear question was ambiguous and capable of being understood in more than one way, and one reasonable interpretation of the answer was not false. Edward J. Devitt et al., Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, Criminal, Section 43.00 at 43.12 (4th ed 1990). The D.C. Circuit approved an instruction on the literal truth defense, based upon Bronston v. United States, that provides "...a statement is not false if it is literally true and technically responsive. If a statement, or a reasonable interpretation of a statement, made by a defendant is narrowly or literally true, there can be no violation of this statute." United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31 (D.C. Cir. 1976), United States v. Bronston, 409 U.S. 352 (1973).

II. 18 U.S.C. §1623 False declarations before grand jury or court

(a) Whoever under oath (or in any declaration, certificate, verification, or statement under penalty of perjury as permitted under section 1746 of title 28, United States Code) in any proceeding before or ancillary to any court or grand jury of the United States knowingly makes any false material declaration or makes or uses any other information , including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, knowing the same to contain any false material declaration, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

A. Essential Elements

Three essential elements must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt in order to prove false declarations:

1) the defendant gave testimony under oath before a federal court or grand jury,
2) the defendant made the false material statement as detailed in the indictment during that testimony, and
3) the defendant knew that the statement was false when he gave the testimony.

Edward J. Devitt et al., Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, Criminal, Section 43.00 at 43.08 (4th ed 1990).

Dunn v. United States concerns the scope of the phrase "ancillary proceeding", more specifically, whether a sworn statement given in an interview at an attorney's office is considered ancillary to a court or grand jury proceeding. Dunn v. United States, 442 U.S. 100 (1979). The government contends that any statement under oath should fall within §1623. The court disagreed and concluded that the statement given in the interview "lacked the degree of formality required by §1623. For the government does not and could not seriously maintain that the interview... constituted a deposition." Id. at 2196.

The state of mind requirement under §1623 differs from that of §1621. The requirement of knowing in §1623 is less stringent than that of wilfulness that is required in §1621. Instruction 48-26-Knowingly states; "If you decide that any of the answers the defendant gave were false , you must then decide whether the defendant gave those answers knowingly. That is, at the time the answers were given, did the defendant know and believe that the answers were false; (and, if so, did the defendant give the answers consciously and in the exercise of his free will.)" Sand, Siffert, Loughlin, & Reiss, Modern Federal Jury Instructions, Vol. 1A, Ch. 48 at 48-54 (1995)

B. §1623(c) Multiple Declarations

§1623 (c)-An indictment or information for violation of this section alleging that, in any proceedings before or ancillary to any court or grand jury of the United States, the defendant under oath has knowingly made two or more declarations, which are inconsistent to the degree that one of them is necessarily false, need not specify which declaration is false if -

(1) each declaration was material to the point in question, and

(2) each declaration was made within the statute of limitations for the offense charged under this section.

In any prosecution under this section, the falsity of a declaration set forth in the indictment or information shall be established sufficient for conviction by proof that the defendant while under oath made irreconcilably contradictory declaration material to the point in question in any proceeding before or ancillary to any court or grand jury. It shall be a defense to an indictment or information made pursuant to the first sentence of this subsection that the defendant at the time he made each declaration believed the declaration was true.

"Statements are irreconcilably contradictory if both were made under oath, if both concerned the same subject and if both are inconsistent with each other to such a degree that one of them must be false. The government is not required to prove which irreconcilably contradictory statement is false." Edward J. Devitt et al., Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, Criminal, Section 43.00 at 43.03 (4th ed 1990).

C. §1623(d) Recantation Defense

§1623 (d) Where, in the same continuous court or grand jury proceeding in which a declaration is made, the person making the declaration admits such declaration to be false, such admission shall bar prosecution under this section if, at the time the admission is made, the declaration has not substantially affected the proceeding, or it has not become manifest that such falsity has been or will be exposed.

This defense, also known as the recantation defense, is not available in §1621 prosecutions. The defense contains three elements:

1) the defendant admitted that the statement originally made was false before the same proceeding that heard the original statement,

2) at the time that the false statement was recanted, the false statement had not substantially affected the proceeding, and

3) at the time the false statement was recanted, it had not become obvious that the falsity of that statement had been exposed or would be exposed.

§1623 (e) Proof beyond a reasonable doubt under this section is sufficient for conviction. It shall not be necessary that such proof be made by any particular number of witnesses or by documentary or other type of evidence.

Section (e) obviously abandons the two witness rule requirement under §1621, proof beyond a reasonable doubt is sufficient. Congress created §1623 because the common law requirements for a perjury prosecution had become exceptionally difficult, hence the abandonment of the two witness rule in §1621. "Congress sought to afford greater assurance than testimony obtained in a grand jury and court proceedings will aid the cause of truth." Dunn v. United States, 442 U.S. 100 (1979).

As a sidenote, a case that I thought might be of interest to you, because of the responses given by the defendant, is Gebhard v. United States, 422 F.2d 281 (9th Cir. 1970). The defendant was charged under §1621. The responses to the questions involved were "I don't recall," "I don't know," or "I don't remember." The court states that "given the nature of these answers it would be difficult to find two witnesses to testify that the defendant did in fact know, believe, or recall a matter which he said he did not." Id. at 287 The court instructed that these charges could be proved by circumstantial evidence. Comment to the Federal Jury Instructions states that "where the responses in issue are answers such as 'I don't know' or 'I don't remember', the governmentmay prove the falsity of the defendant's responses by proof of facts from which the jury may infer that the defendant must have known or remembered that which he denied knowing or remembering while under oath." Sand, Siffert, Loughlin, & Reiss, Modern Federal Jury Instructions, Vol. 1A, Ch. 48 at 48-29 (1995).

A PRIMER ON INCOME TAXES AND THE CANCELLATION OF DEBT

Louisiana State Bar Association

April, 1992

Frederick R. Parker, Jr. [FNa]

It is not uncommon for a creditor to forgive part or all of a debtor's obligation to him. But beware of the income tax consequences.

It is not uncommon, in these financially troubled times, for a creditor to forgive part or all of a debtor's obligation to him. This "forgiveness" may be prompted by business considerations or ordered by the court in a bankruptcy setting. In either event, the cancellation of debt may give rise to certain income tax consequences to the debtor. This article presents an overview of those (often unexpected) consequences.

Circumstances Giving Rise to COD Income

General Rule

The courts have long recognized the principle that a taxpayer may realize taxable income from the cancellation of indebtedness (often referred to by tax practitioners as "COD income"). This result is the natural corollary to the fundamental rule that, because there was no accession to wealth when the debtor initially incurred the liability, the debt did not give rise to taxable income when created. Where the later forgiveness of the debt gives rise to an accession to wealth represented by either a traceable increase in assets or a previous tax benefit, however, the taxpayer will be called to account to the government for the taxes which otherwise would have been due with respect to his economic gain. This rule first was developed by the courts and later was codified as Section 61(a)(12) of the Internal Revenue Code.

The general rule of income recognition applies only when there exists a traceable increase in the debtor's assets or when the debt has given rise to a tax benefit in his favor. The most obvious example of the former is where the debtor received cash in exchange for his promissory note when the loan initially was confected. [FN1] Other circumstances are not so readily apparent. Query whether a taxpayer would realize COD income from the forgiveness of rent due with respect to his apartment or of a liability for some other nondeductible personal expenditure for which he can show no tangible asset, such as legal services. The same issue would be presented where a taxpayer makes a binding pledge to donate a certain sum of money to a charity and later settles the obligation for something less. While these situations may appear to give rise to COD income when considered from the liability side of the balance sheet, the essential element of a traceable increase in assets may be lacking in each. The analysis focuses on whether the taxpayer experienced a traceable increase in his assets as a result of the forgiveness of the original loan rather than on the mere fact that a debt was forgiven. The reduction of a binding obligation, without more, simply should not give rise to COD income. [FN2]

Alternatively, a taxpayer may realize COD income where the liability itself gives rise to a tax benefit as it accrues. For example, an accrual basis taxpayer who claims deductions for office rent as it becomes due must recognize COD income to the extent his liability is later forgiven. While COD income may be realized under the "traceable increase in assets" theory both by accrual and cash basis taxpayers, only accrual basis taxpayers will realize COD income under the pure "tax benefit" theory. This is so even though cash basis taxpayers in effect may receive tax benefits by way of depreciation deductions claimed with respect to property acquired with loan proceeds; such indirect tax benefits are generated from the "traceable increase in assets" engendered by the forgiven loan.

COD Income Versus Gain or Loss from Sale or Exchange

While the foregoing discussion sets forth the general rule that a taxpayer may realize COD income as a result of the cancellation of part or all of a liability, the character of what may appear to constitute ordinary COD income may in fact partially represent gain or loss from the sale of an asset. This result obtains where the taxpayer transfers property in full or partial satisfaction of his liability. The classification of the resulting income is important to the taxpayer for two reasons.

First, COD income is always ordinary income. It is not subject to the rate preferences which otherwise may exist with respect to capital gains, and it may be offset only by a limited amount of capital losses. Gain or loss from the sale or exchange of a capital asset, on the other hand, is capital in nature, with capital gains possibly being taxed at preferential rates and available to absorb capital losses.

The second important distinction between pure COD income and that portion of an exchange which gives rise to exchange gain or loss is that the latter is not excludable from income by taxpayers who are insolvent or in bankruptcy, unlike the COD component of the income which is realized upon a taxpayer's surrender of property in cancellation of his debt.

The determination of the character of income as ordinary COD income or exchange gain or loss depends upon whether the property is given in satisfaction of recourse or nonrecourse debt. COD income clearly will not arise from the transfer of property in satisfaction of either type of debt where the fair market value of the property exceeds the amount of the debt. In this case, the debt simply is paid in full, and the transaction will be treated as if the debtor sold the property at its fair market value and used the proceeds to satisfy his obligation. The exchange therefore will give rise to gain or loss under the general rule of Section 1001 of the Code, measured by the difference between the property's fair market value and its adjusted basis. Accordingly, the character of the gain or loss as ordinary or capital will be determined with reference to the character of the property itself.

A different result obtains, however, when the amount of the outstanding debt exceeds the fair market value of the property given in satisfaction of the debt. In a recourse setting, the transaction is bifurcated into two components: a sale of the property and a forgiveness of the debt. [FN3] The debtor is treated as having sold the property at its fair market value and as having satisfied the debt in full with the proceeds of the deemed sale. He thus will realize a gain or loss on the sale of the property in an amount equal to the difference between the property's fair market value and its adjusted basis. He also will realize COD income to the extent the outstanding balance of the debt exceeds the property's fair market value.

Example

Assume that T transfers securities, purchased several years ago for $1,000 but now valued at $1,800, to C in satisfaction of a $2,000 recourse debt. The value of the securities has been steadily increasing since T acquired them and C is willing to accept them in satisfaction of the debt because of T's shaky financial condition. T will be treated as having sold the securities for $1,800 and as having satisfied his $2,000 liability with that amount of money. Accordingly, T will realize an $800 gain on the deemed sale of the securities (which will be capital in nature if the securities are capital assets), and $200 of COD income. If, on the other hand, the securities are valued at only $800 at the time of the exchange, T will realize a $200 loss on the deemed sale ($800 FMV--$1,000 basis) and $1,200 of COD income ($2,000 debt--$800 deemed payment).

In contrast with the bifurcated analysis of both the asset and liability sides of a transfer of property in satisfaction of a recourse obligation, a transfer in the nonrecourse setting is analyzed only from the asset side. The amount of nonrecourse debt which is discharged as a result of the transfer of the encumbered property is simply included in the amount realized on the exchange for purposes of calculating the transferor's gain or loss. The forgiven nonrecourse debt therefore does not give rise to COD income, even though the debt may exceed the fair market value of the property. [FN4]

Exceptions to Recognition of COD Income

Although logical and theoretically defensible, the general rule that a debtor must recognize income from the cancellation of debt often would, if universally applied, strike taxpayers at a time when they are least able to bear the tax consequences. Recognizing that debt cancellation often is the result of a debtor's weak financial condition, Congress responded to the general jurisprudential rule by enacting Section 108 of the Code.

As originally enacted, Section 108 permitted debtors in the business context to exclude from taxation any COD income at the cost of reducing various tax attributes, such as their basis in depreciable property and the amount of otherwise available loss and credit carryovers. Since Section 108 was intended to provide relief to financially distressed debtors caught in the COD income tax trap, the original version of that provision limited its application to taxpayers in "unsound financial condition." This requirement later was dropped because it became difficult to apply, and the benefits of the Section 108 election thus became available both to debtors in financial trouble and to those who were financially sound. The benefits of Section 108 became quite valuable to the latter in the 1980s when they were able to reacquire their own debt from the public at the lower market values caused by rising interest rates. Congress then responded to this unintended benefit to such debtors in 1986 by amending Section 108 and limiting its application to taxpayers whose debt is discharged in bankruptcy or while they are insolvent (the benefits of Section 108 also apply to the cancellation of certain farm indebtedness). As a result, with certain limited exceptions, solvent taxpayers now are required to recognize COD income in the year the discharge of debt occurs.

Bankrupt or Insolvent Debtors

According to Section 108(a)(1), what otherwise would constitute COD income is not taxable as such when the discharge of debt occurs "in a Title 11 case" or when the taxpayer is "insolvent" (this exclusion from gross income is mandated by statute and is not elective). A debtor will qualify under the Title 11 bankruptcy exception only if he is under the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court and the discharge either is granted by the court or occurs pursuant to a plan approved by the court. [FN5] The insolvency exception, on the other hand, generally applies to taxpayers whose liabilities exceed the fair market value of their assets.

A taxpayer's insolvency is determined with reference to his assets and liabilities immediately before the discharge of debt occurs. [FN6] The jurisprudence indicates that assets such as going concern value and goodwill should be considered when determining whether and to what extent a taxpayer is insolvent. [FN7] Assets exempt from the claims of creditors should not be included in the determination, however, [FN8] nor should the assets of a spouse be taken into account when determining the insolvency of the other spouse. [FN9] All of the taxpayer's liabilities should be taken into consideration when applying the insolvency test and, although it is unclear whether contingent liabilities are to be considered, such liabilities were included in the equation in at least one case under the judicially developed exception which later was codified as part of Section 108. [FN10]

The bankruptcy exception takes precedence over the insolvency exception where both otherwise would apply. [FN11] This coordination of the two exclusionary provisions is significant because, while the bankruptcy exception operates to exclude from gross income all of the income which otherwise would be recognized from the cancellation of debt, the amount of COD income so excluded is limited under the insolvency exception. The insolvency exception excludes COD income only to the extent the taxpayer was insolvent immediately before the discharge. [FN12] A taxpayer therefore will be subject to tax on COD income to the extent the discharge of debt renders him solvent. The ordering rules established by the Code with respect to these exclusions thus broaden the Section 108 exception to the benefit of taxpayers who satisfy both the bankruptcy and insolvency tests.

Example

Assume that T has total liabilities of $1,000, of which he owes $500 to C. If T has total assets with a fair market value of $800, he is insolvent to the extent of $200. If T transfers assets with a fair market value and basis of $200 to C in full satisfaction of his debt, he would be rendered solvent to the extent of $100 and, in the absence of Section 108, would be required to recognize $300 of COD income for tax purposes. Even under Section 108, T would be able to exclude COD income under the insolvency exception only to the extent he was insolvent before the discharge ($200), and would be required to recognize the balance of this COD income ($100) (which amount represents the extent to which the discharge renders the debtor solvent, and its inclusion is consistent with the "freeing up of assets" theory underlying the jurisprudential development of the COD income doctrine). If, however, T is insolvent and is under the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court, under whose order the discharge occurs, the Section 108 ordering rules will invoke the bankruptcy exception and thereby prevent him from having to recognize any of the COD income.

Although COD income is not taxable to the extent a debtor qualifies for either the bankruptcy or insolvency exception provided under Section 108, the exclusion of COD income under those exceptions does not come without a price. The amount so excluded must be applied to reduce certain of the debtor's tax attributes. [FN13] Thus, while the debtor is not required to pay taxes currently as a result of the discharge, he must forego tax benefits which otherwise would flow in the future from tax attributes which he possesses at the end of the year in which the discharge occurs (such as depreciation deductions with respect to depreciable property and various loss or credit carryovers). The taxpayer has the option of electing first to reduce his remaining basis in depreciable property [FN14] or of reducing his tax attributes in the following order:

Any net operating loss (NOL) for the year of the discharge and any NOL carryover to that year;

Any carryover to or from the year of the discharge of an amount representing certain allowable general business credits;

Any net capital loss for the year of the discharge and any such loss carryover to that year;

The basis of certain property held by the taxpayer on the first day of the taxable year following the year of the discharge; and

Any foreign credit carryover to or from the year of the discharge. [FN15]

The reduction in tax attributes is to be made after the determination of tax for the year of the discharge. [FN16] This ordering rule enables taxpayers to obtain the full benefit of their existing tax attributes otherwise available for the year in which the debt is discharged. The reduction of tax attributes is made on a dollar-for-dollar basis, except with respect to credit carryovers, of which 33 1/3 cents are reduced for each dollar of COD income excluded under Section 108(a). [FN17] Any amount of COD income remaining after being applied to reduce the taxpayer's various tax attributes is simply excluded from income under the general exclusion set forth in Section 108(a)(1).

Qualified Farm Indebtedness

In addition to the Title 11 and insolvency exceptions, the Code provides an exception to the recognition of COD income with respect to "qualified farm indebtedness." [FN18] The availability of this exception does not depend upon the debtor being insolvent or in bankruptcy. If the debt is cancelled while the taxpayer in fact is insolvent, the insolvency exception will apply in lieu of the more limited exception for qualified farm indebtedness, however. [FN19] Further, if the discharge occurs while the taxpayer is in bankruptcy, he will be entitled to the broader benefits available under the bankruptcy exception. [FN20]

The qualified farm indebtedness exception is available only with respect to the cancellation of a debt by a creditor who is not related to the taxpayer [FN21] and who is regularly engaged in the business of lending money. [FN22] Further, the cancelled debt qualifies for the exclusion only if it was incurred directly in connection with the business of farming. [FN23] Finally, only taxpayers with gross receipts from the three prior years at least 50 percent of which are attributable to the trade or business of farming may avail themselves of the exclusion. [FN24] The exclusion of COD income with respect to qualified farm indebtedness comes at the same price as the exclusion provided for discharges of debt in Title 11 cases or when the taxpayer is insolvent: the taxpayer is required to reduce certain of his tax attributes. [FN25] In contrast with the Title 11 and insolvency exceptions, however, the qualified farm indebtedness exception applies only to the extent the taxpayer has tax attributes available for reduction; any COD income remaining after reduction of those tax attributes must be recognized as taxable income. [FN26]

Student Loans

Certain student loans may be cancelled without any income tax consequences to the debtor. The exclusion applies to loans made by certain creditors (governmental agencies and certain health or educational organizations) which, under their terms, are cancelled because the debtor fulfilled an obligation to work for a specified period of time in a designated profession. [FN27]

Exceptions to COD Income Treatment

In addition to the specific statutory exclusions from COD income recognition discussed above, Section 108 sets forth a number of other exceptions to the general rule that gross income includes income from the cancellation of debt. [FN28] Rather than simply excluding COD income from recognition, these provisions preclude the initial characterization of certain items as COD income. Some of these statutory exceptions are derived from a long line of jurisprudence, under which they still may find sanction even when the technical requirements for their application are not satisfied. These exceptions to COD income realization are summarized below.

Lost Deductions

First, the Code provides that COD income will not be realized to the extent the debtor would have been entitled to a deduction had he paid the discharged debt. [FN29] For example, a cash basis taxpayer who is discharged from a liability to pay for office supplies which he received and consumed would not be treated as having realized COD income because he would have been entitled to a deduction had he paid the debt. This benefit would not flow to an accrual basis taxpayer, however, who presumably would have claimed a deduction when the supplies were delivered or used.

Purchase Price Reductions

The second exception involves the reduction of a debt due to the seller of property while the debtor is solvent (this exclusion does not apply either in a Title 11 case or while the debtor is insolvent). The courts historically treated such reductions as adjustments to the purchase price of the property, and the Code follows suit. [FN30] The legislative history indicates that the statutory provision does not apply, however, either where the buyer has transferred the property or where the seller has transferred the debt. [FN31] The original judicially created exception may be available even when the statutory exception is not, however. [FN32]

Contributions to Capital

The Code also excepts from treatment as COD income any acquisition by a corporation of its own debt from a shareholder as a contribution to capital. [FN33] This exception applies in cases where the corporation does not issue additional stock in satisfaction of the debt. In such cases, the corporation is treated as having satisfied its obligation with an amount of money equal to the shareholder's basis in the debt. Whether or not the corporation will realize COD income as a result of the discharge thus depends upon whether the forgiving shareholder employs the cash or accrual method of accounting for tax purposes. In either case, the shareholder generally will have a basis in the debt at least equal to its principal amount. The corporation's potential for realizing COD income as a result of the discharge therefore exists only with respect to the interest element of the obligation.

Subject to possible exclusion under other exceptions provided by Section 108 of the Code, COD income will arise with respect to accrued but unpaid interest where the shareholder-creditor employs the cash method of accounting. This is so because a cash basis creditor will not have included as taxable income the accrued but unpaid interest and, accordingly, will have no tax basis in that amount. Since the contribution to capital exception treats the corporation as having satisfied the obligation with an amount of money equal to the shareholder's basis in the debt, any part of the forgiven obligation in excess of that amount (interest) will be treated as COD income under the general rule (if a cash basis corporation would have been entitled to a deduction had it paid the interest, however, the realization of COD income arguably would be avoided under the lost deduction theory discussed above). This potential does not exist with respect to accrual basis shareholders, however, since under their method of accounting their basis in the debt will include the accrued but unpaid interest.

Stock for Debt

The Code also provides an exception to COD income realization in cases where a corporate debtor transfers its stock in satisfaction of a debt. [FN34] In such cases, the corporation is deemed to have sold the stock at its fair market value and used the cash from the sale to satisfy the debt. The corporation therefore will realize COD income only to the extent the amount of the debt exceeds the fair market value of the stock given in the exchange. The statutory stock-for-debt exception does not apply if the debtor-corporation is in a Title 11 case or if the exchange occurs while the corporation is insolvent. [FN35] In that event, the corporation may avail itself of the general exclusion provided by Section 108(a) (subject, of course, to the requirement under Section 108(b) that certain tax attributes be reduced--it is arguable that a bankrupt or insolvent corporation which satisfies the judicially developed stock-for-debt exception may avoid the initial realization of COD income, thereby falling outside the Code treatment of such income and escaping the attribute reduction otherwise called for under the statutory exception). [FN36]

New Debt Instruments

Finally, in a vein similar to the statutory stock-for-debt exception, the Code provides that a debtor who issues a debt instrument in satisfaction of an existing obligation will be treated as having satisfied the debt with an amount of money equal to the issue price of the new instrument. [FN37] In essence, the issue price represents the principal amount of the new obligation as determined under the original issue discount rules of the Code. [FN38] Any excess amount of the existing debt over the issue price of the new debt will be treated as COD income, subject to possible exclusion under the other exceptions set forth in Section 108.

Conclusion

Because of the potentially severe income tax consequences which may attend the cancellation of debt, practitioners should keep the tax aspect of any debt restructuring in mind when helping debtors obtain relief from financial hardship. It is important to consider both the form in which a debt discharge is cast and (because of the statutory insolvency and bankruptcy exceptions to COD income recognition) the timing of the transaction. Finally, the Code and regulations set forth a variety of technical details which are beyond the scope of this article but which may affect taxpayers differently depending upon their individual financial and tax situations. Practitioners therefore should consult with their client's tax adviser before concluding any rearrangement of debt.

FN1. There are both judicial and statutory exceptions to the general rule where the debtor gives his note in exchange for property other than cash; these exceptions will be discussed below.

FN2. For this reason, the forgiveness of a guarantor's secondary obligation to pay a liability with respect to which the primary debtor has defaulted does not give rise to COD income on the part of the guarantor. Since the guarantor did not receive any of the loan proceeds, he realized no traceable increase in assets arising out of the loan. See Hunt v. Comm'r, 57 TCM 919 (1989), PLR 9105042 and Bradford v. Comm'r, 233 F.2d 935 (6th Cir.1956). Nor does COD income result from the compromise of a contingent obligation. Such an "obligation" does not represent an indebtedness until the necessary condition occurs and produces neither a traceable increase in assets nor a tax benefit.

FN3. Danenberg v. Comm'r, 73 TC 370 (1979). This analysis comports with Treas.Reg. § 1.1001-2(a)(2), which provides that the amount realized on the sale or exchange of property subject to a recourse liability does not include COD income. See also Treas.Reg. § 1.1001-2(c) (ex. 8) and Rev.Rul. 90-16, 1990-1 C.B. 12.

FN4. Treas.Reg. § 1.1001-2(a)(1) provides that, except as provided in Paragraphs (2) and (3) thereof, the amount realized from the sale or other disposition of property includes the amount of liabilities from which the transferor is discharged as a result of the exchange. Although Paragraph (2) of this regulation excludes COD income from the amount realized in a recourse setting, no such exclusion is provided in the case of nonrecourse debt. See Comm'r v. Lufts, 461 U.S. 300, 103 S.Ct. 1826, 75 L.Ed.2d 863 (1983); Treas.Reg. § 1.1001-2(c)(2) (ex. 7); and Rev.Rul. 76-111, 1976-1 C.B. 214.

FN6. IRC Section 108(d)(3). The determination of insolvency of either a C or S corporation is made at the corporate level without regard to the assets and liabilities of the shareholders. The determination is made at the partner level with respect to the excludability of COD income realized by a partnership, however. See IRC Section 108(d)(6) and (7).

FN7. Conestoga Transportation Co. v. Comm'r, 17 TC 506 (1951); J.A. Maurer, Inc. v. Comm'r, 30 TC 1273 (1958). On the other hand, the tax court did not include as assets the value of an individual taxpayer's business expertise and business relationships. See Davis v. Comm'r, 69 TC 814 (1978).

INTRODUCTION

A discussion of sales and exchanges of property secured by recourse and nonrecourse debt brings to mind a court's finding of an "optimist's valhalla,"' "'miraculous dreams of a rising phoenix"' and "sophisticated tax legerdemain."' [FN1] The tax consequences inherent in the use of recourse and nonrecourse debt were unsure, became 232 established and are now mixed. This paper will review the tax treatment of the disposition of property which is financed by recourse and nonrecourse financing. The discussion will be mostly chronological and an attempt will be made to discern the tax policy presented by the varying treatment. Examples will be used to demonstratively show the results of the evolution of the tax treatment.

I. PRIOR TO CRANE V. COMMISSIONER

If a taxpayer sold property that was encumbered by a recourse debt, the amount realized or the sales price the taxpayer received was the amount of money received plus the fair market value of property other than money received. [FN2] If the recourse debt was paid, it was considered that the taxpayer received that amount as money. If the recourse debt was assumed by the buyer, it was deemed that such assumption was the equivalent of the receipt of money by the taxpayer equal to the amount of the liability so assumed. [FN3]

Since it was properly assumed that no purchasers would pay more than fair market value for an asset, the note assumed or paid plus any other money and other property received equaled the property's fair market value. The amount of gain was then determined by deducting the adjusted basis of the property [FN4] from the amount realized. This is illustrated as follows (Example 1):

Note	100,000
Fair Market Value	110,000
Sales Price (10,000 + note)	110,000
Adjusted Basis	90,000
Gain/(Loss)	20,000

The tax policy surrounding such treatment appeared sound. The taxpayer, being personally liable on the note, either received the cash to pay the note and thus received money or the note was assumed and the taxpayer was relieved of payment, a situation equal to receipt of money. The amount realized by the taxpayer must include the amount he received and this includes the extinguishment of the obligation he was required by law to pay.

A taxpayer does not have a legal requirement to pay a nonrecourse debt. The lender may look solely to the collateral for satisfaction of the obligation. Upon a sale of property and payment by 233 the purchaser of money or other property to the seller equal to the nonrecourse debt, a seller would have an amount realized equal to the consideration, and tax treatment similar to that of recourse debt would ensue. Confusion arose when the property was sold subject to the nonrecourse debt. It was argued that a taxpayer that was never personally liable on the nonrecourse debt could not and did not receive any benefit or consideration as regards the nonrecourse debt upon a sale that was subject to the debt. [FN5] It was further argued that the basis of such property did not include the nonrecourse debt and upon a sale subject to nonrecourse financing a taxpayer could only sell a "merely equity."' [FN6] Since a taxpayer had no personal obligation to pay the debt it was reasoned that, when the property was sold subject to the debt only, other consideration received would be calculated in the amount realized from a sale. [FN7] In fact, it was determined to be erroneous for the Commissioner to include the amount of a nonrecourse mortgage in the amount realized for a sale. [FN8] The tax consequences of a sale subject to nonrecourse debt, prior to 1947, are illustrated in Example 2:

Note (nonrecourse)	100,000
Fair Market Value	110,000
Sales Price (10,000 cash)	10,000
Adjusted Basis	0
Gain/(Loss)	10,000

The fair market value of the property is irrelevant to the calculation except that it shows what the property would sell for on an all-cash transaction. The tax policy at this time was simply that a nonrecourse debt was entirely different from a recourse debt. A nonrecourse debt did not give basis, and conveyance of the property subject to the debt was not a factor in the amount realized. Since the taxpayer had no liability for payment of the debt, it was disregarded in all calculations. While this certainly resulted in different tax treatment in the use of recourse and nonrecourse debt (see Examples 1 and 2), such a bifurcated approach fully recognized that there indeed exists a real difference between personal liability obligations and ones from which a taxpayer may walk away with impunity. Since nonrecourse debt is not calculated in the basis of an asset, the amount of depreciation a taxpayer may take is limited to 234 the amount of money or other property with which he actually parted. This policy, in fact, seems sound in light of subsequent legislation to limit basis to debt upon which the taxpayer is personally liable. [FN9]

II. CRANE V. COMMISSIONER

In Crane v. Commissioner, [FN10] the taxpayer sold a mortgaged apartment building, which she had inherited, to a third party. She received $3,000 in cash and the buyer agreed to take the property subject to the mortgage. The property had previously been appraised for estate tax purposes at about one-quarter million dollars. [FN11] Mrs. Crane had taken $28,045.10 depreciation on the building. [FN12] Mrs. Crane asserted she had a taxable gain of $2,500 calculated by deducting $500 sales expense from $3,000 received and claiming a zero basis. The IRS asserted Mrs. Crane had a taxable gain of $24,031.45. [FN13]

The Supreme Court determined that Mrs. Crane inherited not the equity but the property's full value. [FN14] The Court then addressed the issue of the amount realized from the sale. First, the Court said, it would be an "absurdity"' to believe that Mrs. Crane sold property valued at $250,000 for only $3,000 in cash unless she sold only the equity and, secondly, that Mrs. Crane was benefited by being relieved from the mortgage. [FN15] The Court noted that such a principle was well established as to recourse debt, [FN16] and made the rule equally applicable to nonrecourse debt having an unpaid balance less than the value of the property:

> [A]n owner of property, mortgaged at a figure less than that at which the property will sell, must and will treat the conditions of the mortgage exactly as if they were his personal obligations. If he transfers subject to the mortgage, the benefit to him is as real and substantial as if the mortgage 235 were discharged, or as if a personal debt in an equal amount had been assumed by another. [FN17]

The nonrecourse debt is now to be calculated in all respects as if it were a recourse debt. This may be illustrated as follows (Example 3):

	Recourse Debt	Nonrecourse Debt
Note	100,000	100,000
Fair Market Value	110,000	110,000
Sales Price (deemed amount realized)	110,000	110,000
Adjusted Basis	90,000	90,000
Gain/(Loss)	20,000	20,000

The Supreme Court determined that, as a matter of tax policy, the taxpayer owns the entire property, not just the equity, when the property is encumbered by nonrecourse debt. Therefore, the taxpayer owes the whole debt. Likewise, it was determined that upon sale of property encumbered by nonrecourse debt, a taxpayer transfers the entire value of the property and receives release from the whole debt. [FN18] The decision was not unanimous by far. Mr. Justice Jackson, joined by Mr. Justice Frankfurter and Mr. Justice Douglas, would have affirmed the tax court. [FN19] They reasoned, as had the tax court, that the taxpayer never became personally liable for the debt, and when the asset was sold subject to the debt the taxpayer was released from no debt. [FN20] The dissent concluded that the debt was simply a subtraction from the value of what she did receive and from what she sold, and this left the taxpayer only the cash she actually received when she sold the property. [FN21] The decision in Crane now allowed a taxpayer to obtain basis in property that would include the debt secured by the property, be it recourse or nonrecourse debt.

While equal treatment of recourse and nonrecourse debt when the sales price (and thus fair market value) is greater than the amount of the debt was mandated by the Court, it was less definitive in the tax treatment afforded upon a disposition of property securing nonrecourse debt when the property's fair market value (thus sales price) is less than the debt. In the now-famous footnote 37, the Court pondered:

> 236 Obviously, if the value of the property is less than the amount of the mortgage, a mortgagor who is not personally liable cannot realize a benefit equal to the mortgage. Consequently, a different problem might be encountered where a mortgagor abandoned the property or transferred it subject to the mortgage without receiving boot. This is not this case (emphasis added). [FN22]

After a pronouncement of the obvious, taxpayers argued that the benefit and amount realized from disposition of property with a fair market value was limited to the property's fair market value. [FN23] Quite as obviously, the Service took the opposite view. [FN24] The post-Crane footnote 37 treatment taken by taxpayers is illustrated as follows (Example 4):

	Recourse Debt	Nonrecourse Debt
Note	100,000	100,000
Fair Market Value	75,000	75,000
Sales Price (deemed amount realized)	100,000	75,000
Adjusted Basis	90,000	90,000
Gain/(Loss)	10,000	(15,000)

The tax policy hereby recognized is that without personal liability the amount realized upon a sale cannot exceed the value of the property when nonrecourse debt is involved, but the amount realized can exceed the value of the property when recourse debt is secured by the property. While this makes some sense, it would seem that either nonrecourse debt should be fully counted in the amount realized or it should be totally disregarded, as was the policy prior to Crane.

III. COMMISSIONER V. TUFTS

Footnote 37 was finally and squarely raised in Commissioner v. Tufts. [FN25] In Tufts, the property had a value substantially less than the nonrecourse mortgage. The partnership financed an apartment house with a nonrecourse loan, the rental market declined, and the partners sold their interest subject to the debt and $250 in cash. [FN26] 237 The partners limited the amount they claimed as realized to the fair market value of the property and thereby claimed a loss. [FN27] The Service, on audit, determined the sale resulted in a partnership capital gain of approximately $400,000. [FN28]

The Court read Crane "to have approved the Commissioner's decision to treat a nonrecourse mortgage in this context as a true loan."' [FN29] The Commissioner had been on record in his position that the excess of nonrecourse indebtedness cancelled over the adjusted basis of the asset transferred, or the excess of the adjusted basis over the nonrecourse indebtedness cancelled, represents gain or loss from the sale of assets under section 1001 of the 1958 Code. [FN30] The Commissioner had decided to afford nonrecourse indebtedness the same treatment as he gives a recourse mortgage. [FN31]

The Commissioner also had chosen not to characterize the transaction as a cancellation of indebtedness. [FN32] It is important to note at this juncture that the IRS had issued Treasury Regulation § 1.1001-2 (Discharge of Liabilities) shortly before this decision. [FN33] The Court expressly withheld opinion or dictum regarding the issues of debt forgiveness. [FN34] The Court did, however, state:

> In the context of a sale or disposition of property under § 1001, the extinguishment of the obligation to repay is not ordinary income; instead, the amount of the canceled debt is included in the amount realized, and enters into the computation of gain or loss on the disposition of property. According to Crane this treatment is no different when the obligation is nonrecourse. [FN35]

Up to this point, one may almost believe that clarity reigns and that "one of the murkiest pools of obscurity in the tax law for the past three decades"' [FN36] has become spring fed. By edict from the high nine on the Potomac, nonrecourse and recourse indebtedness 238 will be treated similarly upon the sale or disposition, and gain or loss will be then easily determined under section 1001 of the Code. Tufts treatment can be analyzed by the following example and, when compared to Example 4, the distinction is apparent (Example 5):

	Recourse Debt	Nonrecourse Debt
Note	100,000	100,000
Fair Market Value	75,000	75,000
Sales Price (deemed amount realized)	100,000	100,000
Adjusted Basis	90,000	90,000
Gain/(Loss)	10,000	10,000

The Tufts decision further established that nonrecourse debt will have all the tax attributes of recourse debt. The fact that recourse and nonrecourse debt are treated significantly differently to all but the taxman is irrelevant and the pre-Crane position of the tax court is fully and completely buried.

IV. VOLUNTARY AND INVOLUNTARY SALES

That a sale is voluntary or forced (foreclosure) does not result in different treatment. [FN37] The term "sale"' may have many meanings depending on the context. [FN38] The Supreme Court stated that they could find no basis in the language of the Act, its purpose or legislative history for saying that losses from sales of capital assets were to be treated any differently whether they result from forced sales or voluntary sales. [FN39] It is the sale, be it voluntary or forced, which finally cuts off the interest of the mortgagor and is the means for determining the amount of deficiency judgment against him and is a means adopted by statute for determining the amount of his capital gain or loss from the sale of the mortgaged property. [FN40]

V. THE AMOUNT REALIZED OR SALES PRICE

Before we explore how the IRS can turn a capital transaction into one generating ordinary income in some instances, we will look at what the sales price really is. Obviously, in a voluntary sale, determination of the sales price, absent chicanery, is not difficult. I will limit this part of the discussion to an involuntary sale of real estate. 239 I will avoid discussion of depreciation recapture, ITC recapture, and the like.

We do not, immediately, need to differentiate between recourse and nonrecourse indebtedness since real estate is excepted from the at-risk requirements. [FN41] Further, whether or not the mortgagor filed for protection under the Bankruptcy Act or whether the mortgagor is solvent, is not in issue as to the amount realized. One way or another, a trustee's sale is held on the first Tuesday of a month and the mortgagor's property is struck off to a third party or to the debt holder. [FN42] The amount received or credited at the trustee's sale will be the sales price and amount realized by the mortgagor. But what if that amount is not the fair market value of the property on the date of sale? A secured party has a fiduciary duty to sell the collateral at the highest possible price, but as a purchaser his interest is to buy the collateral at the lowest price. [FN43] Prior to 1986, the rule in Texas was that a trustee, while having a fiduciary duty to the debtor, could sell or bid on the collateral as long as the price was not grossly inadequate. [FN44] In 1980 the Fifth Circuit decided the Durrett case. [FN45] Durrett was a debtor in possession under Chapter XI of the Bankruptcy Act and sought to set aside and vacate a transfer of real property that was foreclosed on by the insurance company nine days before he filed for protection. Durrett's sole issue on appeal was whether a fair equivalent had been paid at the foreclosure sale. [FN46] The property was sold for 57.7% of its fair market value and the fifth circuit, in voiding the sale, could locate no district court or appellate court decision that dealt with a transfer of real property which had approved the transfer for less than 70% of the market value of the property. [FN47] Thus sprang up the Durrett Rule or the 70% Rule. Lenders embraced it as if it would absolutely apply to all foreclosures. This belief was strengthened in 1985 by the Willis decision 240 in the Southern District of Texas. [FN48] Mr. Willis voided the involuntary sale of his residence. The court looked at four different methodologies in determining what percentage of the fair market value the sales price was. The methodologies resulted in 73%, 18%, 41% and 20% as possible percentages. The court rejected the 73% test, did not decide which of the remaining three methods was correct, and voided the sale. [FN49]

A debtor in bankruptcy could litigate the sales price determined at foreclosure based on these rules. A state court action was still controlled by the grossly inadequate sales price standard of Maxey. [FN50]

In 1986, the Beaumont Court of Appeals decided Sabine Bank. [FN51] While the case dealt with the foreclosure upon and sale of personalty, the court used the case to write upon the law of foreclosure, be it of personalty or realty. The court reasoned that:

> A lender who has secured collateral, whether personalty or realty is under a trust arrangement with the borrower, in the event of foreclosure, to make an honest effort to reduce the loan as much as possible by securing a fair price for the collateral. [FN52]

Noting that the Texas Supreme Court had never spoken precisely on the subject, [FN53] the court held that a borrower may contest the sale if a significant disparity exists between the sales price and the property's fair market value. [FN54] The reasoning of the court is in line with other jurisdictions that have reviewed the issue. [FN55]

Now a taxpayer can at least litigate the sales price that the lender will report to the IRS. A taxpayer may now determine his basis in the real estate that was foreclosed on, accept, negotiate or seek legal recourse of the sales price, go to section 1001 of the Code and determine the amount and recognition of his gain or loss.

241 A distinction between recourse and nonrecourse financing must now be made. If the property secured nonrecourse financing, Crane and Tufts control, and the fair market value of the property is not in issue when the property has a value less than the debt owed. If, however, the financing was recourse, the determination of the sales price becomes critical.

VI. ABANDONMENT VS. SALE OR EXCHANGE

A related issue is the nature of any gain or loss upon an abandonment of property secured by nonrecourse financing. In 1980 the tax court decided Freeland. [FN56] Freeland had purchased real estate for $50,000, put $9,000 cash down and gave the seller a $41,000 note secured by a deed of trust on the property. [FN57] Under the terms of California law, a seller who owner-financed the sale of his property could not seek a deficiency judgment against a purchaser, thus making the note nonrecourse in nature. [FN58] The market value of the property was reduced to $27,000 and Freeland quitclaimed the property back to the seller when the balance of the note was still $41,000. [FN59] Freeland claimed an ordinary loss of $9,188 ($188 sales expense) on his tax return for the year in which he abandoned the property back to the seller by quitclaim deed. [FN60] The amount of the loss was not in dispute, but the Service determined that the loss was deductible only as a loss on the sale or exchange of a capital asset subject to the limitations provided in sections 1211 and 1212. [FN61] The parties framed the issue in terms of abandonment, and both parties implicitly agreed that a loss sustained on abandonment is an ordinary one. [FN62] Freeland stated that the issue to be decided is whether a disposition by abandonment constitutes a sale or exchange. [FN63] The Commissioner, while conceding that abandonment of property is not a disposition by sale or exchange, argued that this disposition was the equivalent of a foreclosure sale rather than an abandonment. 242 [FN64] The court determined that by reconveying the property to the seller. Freeland had accomplished an abandonment under California law. [FN65] "That a disposition, causing gain or loss to be recognized under § 1001 occurs upon a reconveyance of property in satisfaction of a mortgage obligation is well settled."' [FN66] However, not every taxable disposition of property is a sale or exchange. [FN67] The court looked at five factors that were given consideration in other decisions, namely:

(1) whether the transfer was voluntary or involuntary,

(2) whether the mortgage debt was released or not, and whether the transferor received an additional (even minimal) consideration or boot,

(3) whether the transferor-mortgagor was personally liable on the mortgage debt,

(4) whether the transferor-mortgagor received any tax benefits from including the mortgage debt in his basis while he held the property, and

(5) whether the fair market value of the property at the time of reconveyance exceeded or was less than the unpaid balance due on the mortgage debt. [FN68]

The court then analyzed what the result would be if the mortgage was recourse. "'It has been well established that where a taxpayer transfers property to his mortgagee in [satisfaction] of a mortgage obligation for which he is personally liable, any loss sustained by him will be deemed to have resulted from a sale or exchange on the ground that the taxpayer received consideration in return for transferring this property, the consideration being his release from liability."' [FN69] It is important to note that the court, in restating the law as it applied to recourse financing, did not apparently include the concept of debt forgiveness resulting from a reconveyance when the fair market value of the property is less than the outstanding principal balance of the mortgage.

The court reviewed the decision in Hammel wherein the Supreme Court concluded that a foreclosure sale (or involuntary sale) constituted 243 a sale or exchange resulting in a capital loss, [FN70] a reviewed Crane [FN71] and later decisions and decided that they believed that the holdings of Crane, and subsequent cases decided in light of Crane, mandate the conclusion that relief from indebtedness, even though there is no personal liability, is sufficient to support a sale or exchange. [FN72]

In 1984 the fifth circuit decided a case directly on point with Freeland. [FN73] In Yarbro v. Commissioner, the taxpayer formed a joint venture that purchased unimproved real estate. [FN74] The purchase price was $362,132.08; approximately 10% was paid in cash as a down payment and the balance was represented by four nonrecourse promissory notes secured by deeds of trust on the property. The property was subject to a grazing lease and the joint venture continued to rent the property for grazing during its ownership period. Due to an increase in property taxes and decline in the value of the property, the joint venture decided to abandon the property. [FN75] Unlike Freeland, the taxpayer notified the lending institution that he was abandoning the property, would not pay the taxes due on it and would not deed it back in lieu of foreclosure, stating that he "had nothing to convey and would have nothing to do . . . with the property from that point on."' [FN76] The bank subsequently foreclosed on the property.

The taxpayer claimed an ordinary loss of approximately $10,000. [FN77] The Commissioner took the position that the taxpayer's abandonment of the property constituted a sale or exchange within the meaning of sections 1211 and 1212 of the Code. The Commissioner further determined that the taxpayer held the land as an investment and not for use in his trade or business, and concluded that the abandonment was the sale or exchange of a capital asset. [FN78]

The tax court agreed with the Commissioner and, relying on Freeland, held that an abandonment of property constituted a sale or exchange for purposes of Code sections 1211 and 1212. [FN79] Further, 244 the tax court relied on Middleton v. Commissioner, a case which was very similar in material aspects to the instant case. [FN80]

The fifth circuit held the question to be whether a taxpayer can avoid the tax consequences of Hammel by the simple expedient of abandoning the property before the mortgagee can foreclose and stated: "The Freeland court saw no reason, nor do we, to put such a premium on artful timing."' [FN81]

Thus a foreclosure, deed in lieu of foreclosure or simple abandonment of real property secured by a nonrecourse mortgage, will be treated as a sale or exchange and, if held for investment, will create capital gains and losses. If an asset is transferred, the amount realized from disposition is first offset by the adjusted basis of the transferred property in order to determine the transferor's gain or loss from the transaction. [FN82] Qualifying gains or losses [FN83] are subject to the capital gain and loss rules which provide for more stringent limitations on deductibility in the case of a net loss for the year. [FN84] The courts seem to have erased all distinctions between the use of recourse and nonrecourse debt upon the sale or exchange of the asset.

VII. YEAR OF INCLUSION

Assuming a foreclosure or abandonment of property secured by recourse debt and assuming the lender declares a deficiency, which year does the taxpayer take into account in determining his loss and/or income from any debt forgiveness? Ordinarily the taxpayer would account for the transaction on his tax return in the year of foreclosure or abandonment. This is the transaction approach. [FN85] However, if the taxpayer challenges the amount determined by the lender as not being the fair market value, the event could take place in one year and the amounts be determined in a later year. Further, as to any debt forgiveness, the lender has four years from date of default to bring a deficiency action. [FN86] Until the statute of limitations 245 has run or other indicia of forgiveness is apparent, it would seem the taxpayer is free to choose the year of inclusion. [FN87] The taxpayer can elect a year that may be more beneficial from a tax standpoint than others. For instance, in the year of foreclosure the taxpayer may be solvent but in the next year other property declines in value and the taxpayer may now be insolvent in an amount equal to or greater than the claimed deficiency. In year two the taxpayer includes the income on his tax return and may exclude the income that the deficiency has generated. [FN88]

Upon the death of a taxpayer, if the decedent's executor does not intend to satisfy a debt of the decedent and it is apparent either due to the failure to file a claim or otherwise that the creditor is not going to seek to enforce the claim, the decedent's estate will realize debt forgiveness income. [FN89]

VIII. TREASURY REGULATION § 1.1001-2(A)(2) -- DISCHARGE OF INDEBTEDNESS

Up to this point, it would seem that the tax treatment on disposition of an asset encumbered by a recourse or nonrecourse debt will be treated similarly. The amount realized on sale or exchange includes the amount of the debt even if it is nonrecourse and the property has a fair market value less than the debt.

While Tufts pending before the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, the Treasury promulgated Regulation § 1.1001-2(b) which states that the fair market value of an asset at time of sale is not relevant for purposes of determining the amount realized nor the amount of liability from which a taxpayer is discharged. [FN90] Along with that section of the regulation, the Treasury promulgated Regulation § 1.1001-2(a)(2): "Discharge of indebtedness. The amount realized on a sale or other disposition of property that secures a recourse liability does not include amounts that are (or would be if 246 realized and recognized) income from the discharge of indebtedness under § 61(a)(12) . . . ."' [FN91]

The Service was required by the Crane/Tufts reasoning to include the entire amount of the principal debt owed in the amount realized when the debt was nonrecourse. The lesson of these cases seemed to be one of equal treatment for recourse and nonrecourse debt. Now, however, the Service has bifurcated the treatment of recourse and nonrecourse debt when the fair market value of the asset is less than the amount owed. [FN92] Prior to the Treasury taking this approach, the courts had, as a rule, treated income realized by a debtor from the transfer of property in discharge of nonrecourse debt in the same manner as such income from recourse debt -- as gain from the sale of the transferred property. [FN93] Almost uniformly the taxable event has been characterized as a sale of the transferred property resulting in gain to the extent that the liability discharged exceeded the property's adjusted basis. [FN94] The same result was reached even in some cases in which the Service attempted to characterize the transaction as producing cancellation of indebtedness income. [FN95] The problem before Crane and Tufts was the treatment of nonrecourse indebtedness upon a sale or exchange (voluntary or involuntary), not how to treat a sale or exchange of property securing recourse debt. The tax consequences of the latter were well understood:

> If an owner sells property for more than its basis, the assumption that there has been a taxable gain follows almost inevitably. This is as true where the consideration received is property as where it is cash. Sometimes the transaction involves an atypical sort of consideration such as a release of the transferor's indebtedness. That does not prevent the transfer from being a sale or exchange resulting in capital gain or loss. So where an owner pledges his property for a loan, the proceeds of which are greater than his basis, and subsequently succeeds in transferring the property for 247 a cancellation of debt, the excess of what is received over the basis of the property is gain, taxable in the year which the property is disposed of and the debt discharged. [FN96]

In each case the transaction is treated as if the mortgagor had sold the property for cash equivalent to the amount of the debt and had applied the cash to the payment of the debt. [FN97]

As stated above, Regulations § 1.1001-2(a)(2) was promulgated at the time the Supreme Court decided Tufts. A portion of the regulation was cited in the case. [FN98] Further, in discussing the issue that nonrecourse financing gave rise to most tax shelters and that Congress enacted at-risk rules but exempted real estate from them, the Court states in a footnote, "[a]lthough this congressional action may foreshadow a day when nonrecourse and recourse debts will be treated differently, neither Congress nor the Commissioner has sought to alter Crane's rule of including nonrecourse in both basis and amount realized."' [FN99] The Court goes on to state in another footnote:

> In the context of a sale or disposition of property under § 1001, the extinguishment of the obligation to repay is not ordinary income; instead, the amount of the cancelled debt is included in the amount realized, and enters into the computation of gain or loss on the disposition of the property. According to Crane, this treatment is no different when the obligation is nonrecourse: the basis is not reduced as in the cancellation of indebtedness context and the full value of the outstanding liability is included in the amount realized (emphasis added). [FN100]

To be sure, the Supreme Court could have decided Tufts differently. [FN101] Justice O'Connor, is her concurring opinion, indeed bemoaned the fact that she felt compelled to follow the teachings of Crane, "[i]ndeed, were we writing on a clean slate except for the 248 Crane decision, I would take quite a different approach . . . ."' [FN102] The court did not take a different approach but affirmed the Crane reasoning. Does Regulation § 1.1001-2(a)(2) conflict with the Crane/Tufts decisions?

IX. AFTER REGULATION § 1.1001-2(a)(2)

The Service has found no conflict and has applied the two-step analysis set forth in the regulation for treatment of recourse debt upon sale or exchange of the asset. To demonstrate the Treasury's approach to nonrecourse and recourse indebtedness upon a sale or exchange of an asset, the regulation includes two examples. First, nonrecourse debt:

> In 1974 E purchases a herd of cattle for breeding purposes. The purchase price is $20,000, consisting of $1,000 cash and a $19,000 note. E is not personally liable for repayment of the liability and the seller's only recourse in the event of default is to the herd. In 1977 E transfers the herb back to the original seller, thereby satisfying the indebtedness . . . . At the time of the transfer the fair market value of the herd is $15,000 and the remaining principal balance on the note is $19,000. At that time E's adjusted basis in the herb is $16,500 . . . . As a result of the indebtedness being satisfied, E's amount realized is $19,000 . . . . E's realized gain is $2,500 ($19,000-$16,500); [FN103]

Second, recourse debt:

> In 1980, F transfers to a creditor an asset with a fair market value of $6,000 and the creditor discharges $7,500 of indebtedness for which F is personally liable. The amount realized on the disposition of the asset is its fair market value ($6,000). In addition, F has income from the discharge of indebtedness of $1,500 ($7,500-$6,000). [FN104]

Since the promulgation of the regulation, the Service has been consistent in its application of the bifurcated or two-step approach upon a sale or exchange of an asset securing a recourse debt when the fair market value of the asset is less than the amount of the debt. Ordinary income will result from the cancellation of indebtedness. 249 [FN105] Tax treatment after Regulation § 1.1001-2(b) may be further illustrated by the following example:

	Recourse Debt	Nonrecourse Debt
Note	100,000	100,000
Fair Market Value	75,000	75,000
Sales Price (deemed amount realized)	75,000	100,000
Adjusted Basis	90,000	90,000
Gain/(Loss)	(15,000)	10,000
Debt Forgiveness	25,000

The changes in tax treatment are dramatic. The deemed amount realized is now the opposite of what would have been determined under post-Crane footnote 37 treatment. Other examples can show even greater disparity in tax treatment between disposition of property secured by recourse and nonrecourse financing. [FN106]

250 The tax court has adopted the Commissioner's position. In Michaels v. Commissioners, [FN107] the court held that a discount that the taxpayer received on the prepayment of a recourse mortgage that was made in connection with the sale of her residence is not included in the amount realized for purposes of computing gain. The taxpayers included the discount as part of the gain they realized on the sale of their residence which they deferred. [FN108] The court in interpreting Regulation § 1.1001-2(a)(2) stated:

> This Regulation effectively bifurcates the instant transaction by removing the amount of the discount from the computation of the amount realized and recognizing it as a separate income item. [FN109]

While section 108 [FN110] allows a reduction in basis for the reduction of a debt held by the seller, no such allowance is made for reduction in a mortgage held by a third party.

X. DEBT FORGIVENESS

Since a taxpayer may recognize debt forgiveness income, a determination of what is and is not such income is required. A taxpayer realizes and recognizes ordinary income if he is relieved of payment of a debt. [FN111] If, for example, an individual performs services for a creditor, who in consideration thereof cancels the debt, the debtor realizes income in the amount of the debt as compensation. [FN112] A taxpayer does not realize income when money is borrowed due to the corresponding obligation to repay the amount borrowed. [FN113] If, however, the taxpayer is for some reason not required to repay the borrowed money income will result. In 1931, the U.S. Supreme Court held that if a corporation repurchases its own bonds for an amount less than the price for which it sold those bonds, the difference between the sale or issue price and the repurchase price constitutes taxable income to the corporation. [FN114] The Court based its 251 decision on the theory that the reduction in outstanding liabilities (the difference between the issue and repurchase prices) resulted in a freeing of assets and an accession to income. [FN115]

This position is now statutorily embodied in section 61(a)(12) which states, "'[e]xcept as otherwise provided in this subtitle, gross income means all income from whatever source derived, including (but not limited to) the following items: . . . Income from discharge of indebtedness."' [FN116]

In order for a taxpayer to have income from discharge of indebtedness, there must in fact be a debt that is in some manner cancelled. There is no discharge of indebtedness income if there is no obligation to repay the funds that were advanced. In Millar v. Commissioner, [FN117] the taxpayers signed nonrecourse notes and invested the proceeds into the capital of a corporation they owned. Upon default the note holder foreclosed upon the taxpayers' stock in the corporation. The Commissioner took the position that the taxpayers had realized cancellation of indebtedness income on the surrender of their stock in the amount of their discharged nonrecourse obligation. [FN118] The issue as stated by the court was whether the taxpayers had an obligation to repay the funds advanced to them and if not then no cancellation of indebtedness could arise. Not surprisingly, one of the taxpayers took the position that the cash advances made to them were intended as gifts, not loans. [FN119] The court remanded for a factual determination of gift or loan, the tax court found a loan, [FN120] and that finding was affirmed on appeal. [FN121] Without a repayment obligation a transaction cannot be elevated to indebtedness and, therefore, cannot result in discharge of indebtedness income.

The discharge of a debt that is contingent may not result in income. If an obligation is so contingent that it does not constitute a debt of the taxpayer then a discharge of that debt does not give rise to income. [FN122] Mere bookkeeping entries, though of some evidentiary value, are not determinative. They cannot alter the legal effects of transactions, nor create income where none in fact exists. [FN123] 252 If the debt is too contingent at the creation of the debt so as to allow it to be included in an asset's basis for Federal income tax purposes, then the taxpayer cannot realize income upon the release of the obligation to repay. Repayment that is highly contingent, such as upon the discovery of recoverable amounts of oil and gas [FN124] will not allow a nonrecourse note amount to be included in basis, and the forgiveness of such indebtedness will not give rise to income.

Income from discharge of indebtedness requires that the debt be cancelled. The absolute cancellation of a debt, while easy of concept, occurs infrequently. Cancellation of debt also occurs where a creditor accepts property that has a value less than the debt or an amount of money less than the debt in complete satisfaction of that debt. This may occur when the creditor is convinced that the debtor can pay no more than what is being offered or when the debt instrument carries an interest rate significantly below the now prevailing rates. [FN125] However, a cancellation of debt can also occur if the creditor fails to act timely, and his claim is barred by an applicable statute of limitations or other rule of law. [FN126] If there exists a reasonable expectation of repayment of the debt, a cancellation of the debt will not generally be found. If the expectation of repayment vanishes in a subsequent year, then a taxpayer may realize income. [FN127]

The cancellation of a debt may not be, in and of itself, the source of income but may simply be the method by which a creditor makes a payment to the debtor. [FN128] Whether such payment is ordinary income to the debtor depends upon the nature of payment. For example, a discharge of indebtedness may constitute a payment for services [FN129] or a constructive dividend. [FN130] A discharge of indebtedness can also constitute a contribution to capital [FN131] or a gift, [FN132] in which case the forgiveness of indebtedness is not income to the debtor. The discharge of a debt may also represent a payment for property, [FN133] in which case the gain, if any is derived from dealings 253 in property, not the discharge of indebtedness. [FN134] The discharge of indebtedness may also constitute a payment for the settlement of a litigated claim. [FN135] Where a payment is made in settlement of litigation, the nature of the claims involved and the basis of the recovery determine the tax treatment of the settlement proceeds. [FN136] The Senate Finance Report accompanying the passage of section 108 of the Code states that "debt discharge that is only a medium for some other form of payment, such as gift or salary, is treated as the form of payment rather than under the debt discharge rules."' [FN137]

Discharge of debt is not realized where there is a modification of the debt or if the taxpayer substitutes a new obligation for the original debt. [FN138] A taxpayer will, however, recognize income on an exchange of an old obligation for a new debt instrument to the extent that the face amount of the new debt is less than the old. [FN139]

A taxpayer who is primarily liable for a debt may wish to substitute a guarantee agreement for joint and several primary liability on a debt. Under tax law, no immediate tax consequences result from the execution of a guarantee agreement. [FN140] While refinancing of a debt may preclude income realization, the substitution of a guaranty that is contingent and which has no ascertainable value vis-a-vis a true debt is not a substitute for the debt nor is it refinancing of the debt. [FN141] There is no real continuation of the indebtedness when a highly contingent obligation is substituted for a true debt. [FN142] Therefore, upon such a substitution, income is realized to the extend the taxpayer is discharged from the initial indebtedness.

XI. AMOUNT REALIZED AND ACCRUED INTEREST

As we have seen, a sale or exchange of an asset securing a nonrecourse debt that has a fair market value less than the debt will result in the amount realized being the amount of the debt. But when a taxpayer sells or disposes of property encumbered by an obligation 254 involving accrued interest as well as principal, then, assuming the accrued interest was neither previously deducted nor included in basis, the amount realized under section 1001(B) does not include the accrued interest. Only the outstanding principal is included. [FN143] However, if the accrued interest became a part of the principal pursuant to the terms of the mortgage then it is included in the amount realized even though the taxpayer may have previously deducted these amounts. [FN144]

In Allan v. Commissioner, [FN145] the taxpayers were partners in a limited partnership which purchased residential property subject to a mortgage insured by the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). The partnership deducted interest on the accrual basis of accounting. The partnership defaulted and HUD acquired the mortgage. HUD paid the real estate taxes and charged the partnership for interest payments when they fell due on the mortgage. Four years after HUD acquired the mortgage, the partnership transferred the property to HUD in lieu of foreclosure. The amount of the outstanding nonrecourse debt to HUD exceeded the fair market value of the property at the time the deed in lieu of foreclosure was given. The issue presented was whether the partnership was required to recognize ordinary income in an amount equal to the previously deducted interest and taxes. [FN146] The mortgage provided that the advances that HUD made to pay the real estate taxes and interest payments due were to be added to the principal and were subject to the mortgage interest rate. [FN147] As such the Court determined it was required by Tufts to include in the amount realized the full principal amount of the nonrecourse debt which by its own terms included the advances for real estate taxes and interest. [FN148]

XII. SECTION 108

If a taxpayer realizes ordinary income upon the voluntary or involuntary sale of an asset at a price less than the recourse debt owing against it, the nonrecognition provisions of section 108 and the ordering provisions of section

1017 become important. Section 108 provides that if a taxpayer would otherwise recognize discharge of indebtedness income, the income will be excluded under certain circumstances. 255 [FN149] A taxpayer must first realize discharge of indebtedness income in order to qualify for the exclusions allowed in section 108. [FN150] Section 108 applies to indebtedness incurred or assumed either by a corporation or by an individual in connection with property used in a trade or business for which the corporation or individual taxpayer is liable or subject to which the taxpayer holds the property. [FN151]

Income from discharge of indebtedness income will be excluded if the discharge occurs in a Title 11 case or if the discharge occurs when the taxpayer is insolvent. [FN152] A Title 11 exclusion takes precedence over the insolvency exclusion. [FN153]

The Code defines insolvency to mean the excess of liabilities over the fair market value of assets immediately before the discharge of indebtedness occurs. [FN154] Bankruptcy or a Title 11 case means solely that a bankruptcy court has jurisdiction over the taxpayer and that the discharge of indebtedness is granted by the court or pursuant to a plan approved by the court. [FN155]

The debt from which a taxpayer may be discharged includes that for which he is liable (recourse) and that which encumbers his property and for which he is not personally liable. [FN156] Since the Supreme Court has made no distinction between recourse and nonrecourse debt in determining the amount realized, and has considered nonrecourse debt to be real debt for tax purposes, the inclusion of nonrecourse debt in the definition of indebtedness of a taxpayer is mandated.

The Tax Reform Act of 1986 repealed a third category for discharges of indebtedness after December 31, 1986. [FN157] The now-defunct third category provided that cancellation or discharge of indebtedness income would not be recognized if the indebtedness discharge was "qualified business indebtedness."' [FN158] This exception was repealed because Congress believed that the prior law treatment of the discharge of qualified business indebtedness was too 256 generous in that income from such a discharge generally was deferred by reducing the basis of depreciable assets, regardless of the economic ability of the taxpayer to currently pay the tax. Moreover, the exclusion produced disparate results among taxpayers depending upon the makeup of their depreciable assets. [FN159]

The question of whether a debt is discharged in a Title 11 proceeding or not depends solely upon whether the taxpayer has filed for protection under Title 11 and whether the debt has been all or partially discharged pursuant to a court order or pursuant to an approved plan of arrangement under court supervision. [FN160] The Internal Revenue Code provides that a taxpayer who meets these criteria does not have income from the cancellation or discharge of indebtedness. [FN161]

The insolvency exception applies to the extent the taxpayer is insolvent before the debt is discharged and solvent afterwards with income realized to the extent the taxpayer is made solvent. [FN162] Insolvency is defined to mean the excess of a taxpayer's liabilities over the fair market value of the taxpayer's assets. [FN163] The determination of insolvency is made on the basis of the taxpayer's assets and liabilities immediately before the discharge. [FN164]

The insolvency provisions of section 108 are tested at the partnership, not the partner, level, [FN165] and the insolvency exception applies only for discharge of indebtedness income, not for other types of 257 income, such as the cancellation of a wage claim or of rents that are due. [FN166]

The insolvency exception, while a needed provision, only applies to the extent the taxpayer is insolvent before the debt is discharged. Income is realized to the extent the taxpayer is made solvent. [FN167] Further, as stated above, in determining the extent of liabilities, there apparently is no authority for counting contingent or contested liabilities within the scope of the term liability as used to define insolvency in section 108. [FN168]

As with most matters, a taxpayer is rarely given a free lunch. The price of a section 108 exclusion is that the taxpayer's tax attributes will be reduced to the extent the amount of income from discharge of indebtedness is excluded from gross income under section 108(a)(1). [FN169] Thus the exemption is not totally free, but lunch is paid for in a different manner. The taxpayer is given a deferral (except as noted below) on the discharge income by offsetting such amounts against the taxpayer's tax attributes. The taxpayer's tax attributes must be reduced in the following order:

(A) The net operating loss for the taxable year of discharge (if any), and any net operating loss carryover to that year;

(B) Any carryover of the general investment tax credit under Section 38;

(C) Any net capital loss generated in the taxable year of discharge and any capital loss carryover to that year;

	Recourse Debt Paid First	Nonrecourse Debt Paid First
Recourse Note	50,000	50,000
Nonrecourse Note	50,000	50,000
Fair Market Value	75,000	75,000
Sales Price (deemed amount realized)	75,000	100,000
Adjusted Basis	75,000	75,000
Gain/(Loss)	0	25,000
Debt Forgiveness	25,000

258 (D) The basis of the taxpayer's assets (depreciable and nondepreciable); and

(E) Foreign tax credit carryovers. [FN170]

Before application of section 108 attribute reductions, the taxpayer must first determine his tax for the taxable year of the discharge, applying the general rules of the Code. [FN171] The reduction in net operating loss carryovers and capital loss carryovers applies to the loss (if any) for the taxable year of the discharge and then applies to reduce the loss carryovers in the order in which they arose. [FN172] Tax credits are now reduced at the rate of 33 1/3 cents for each dollar of indebtedness discharged. [FN173]

After reduction in operating losses, capital losses, and tax credits, the remainder of the amount of indebtedness that was discharged is applied to the taxpayer's assets (depreciable and nondepreciable). An important note is that the basis of a taxpayer's assets may not be reduced below the amount of the taxpayer's remaining undischarged liabilities. [FN174] Therefore, if the taxpayer sells all of his assets after debt discharge occurs but prior to the end of the tax year in which the debt discharge occurred, for an amount equal to the outstanding and nondischarged liabilities of the taxpayer, no income is recognized by the bankrupt or insolvent taxpayer.

A very important provision found in the Committee Report is the fresh start or free lunch provision. [FN175] That provision states that any amount of debt discharge that is left after the attribute reduction under section 108 is disregarded. Such excess amount of debt discharge is not income nor does it have other tax consequences. By allowing this excess to disappear, the taxpayer has obtained a fresh start and a free lunch.

In a case under Title 11 involving an individual debtor, the attribute reduction required under section 108(b) of the Code applies to the attributes of the bankruptcy estate which succeeded to the tax attributes of the individual debtor. [FN176] The attribute reduction does not apply to the tax attributes of individual taxpayers which were generated after the filing of the bankruptcy petition. [FN177] Property of 259 an individual debtor that is exempt such as a homestead, automobile and furnishings will not be subject to basis reduction rules. [FN178] The Code also provides that a reduction in the basis of assets pursuant to section 108 is not considered a disposition for tax purposes and there is no recapture of investment tax credit. [FN179] The Code specifically states that a taxpayer under Title 11 will not have a basis reduction in exempt property. It is silent as to insolvent taxpayers who do not require bankruptcy court protection. If silence is construed to mean a nonbankrupt taxpayer will be required to reduce his basis in all other property, including exempt property, then a large disparity exists. An insolvent taxpayer may well want to and be able to avoid filing a bankruptcy petition, but may be well advised to do so in order to retain the tax basis on his homestead, automobile and exempt furnishings. For example, if taxpayer A is insolvent in the amount of $500,000 due to a bad real estate investment and has as his sole asset a residence with a basis of $375,000, he would reduce his basis in the residence to zero. A subsequent sale for $500,000 would produce $500,000 of ordinary income (unless a section 121 exclusion is allowed). Taxpayer B, with the same amount of insolvency and the same asset and basis, files for bankruptcy protection. The debt is discharged pursuant to a court- approved plan. A subsequent sale of the residence results in a gain of $125,000 ($500,000 sales price less adjusted basis of $375,000) which may be excluded under section 121 resulting in no gain and no tax. Taxpayer A may have tax to pay of $144,000 ($500,000 x 28%).

Prior case law looked to state law to determine whether a taxpayer's assets were exempt from the claims of creditors. To the extent assets were exempt from creditor claims they were not considered in a determination of whether a taxpayer was solvent. [FN180]

Section 108(d)(10) provides a cross reference to section 1017(c)(1) for a provision which states that no reduction is to be made in the basis of exempt property of an individual debtor. The referenced section, while entitled "'Reduction Not To Be Made In Exempt Property,"' provides that no basis reduction will occur in property which the debtor treats as exempt under the Bankruptcy 260 Code. The section does not state that no basis reduction will occur in property which a taxpayer owns that is exempt from the claims of creditors under applicable state law. The term "debtor"' has a specific definition in bankruptcy law: "[a] person or municipality concerning which a case under this title has been commenced."' [FN181] This construction would overrule prior case law and treat insolvent taxpayers and Title 11 debtors in a very different manner. It should not be the policy of tax law to encourage the filing of bankruptcy petitions in order to obtain more favorable tax treatment, and it would seem the better interpretation is to allow both bankrupt and insolvent taxpayers to retain basis in exempt property and have an equal fresh start.

An alternative to the ordering of the reduction of tax attributes is available to a bankrupt or insolvent taxpayer. In lieu of the normal ordering set forth above, a taxpayer may elect (but only up to the amount of insolvency) to first reduce the basis of depreciable property by all or any portion of the income from discharge of indebtedness excluded under section 108(a)(1). [FN182] The general rule that prohibits a taxpayer from reducing the basis of his depreciable assets below the amount of the taxpayer's remaining undischarged liabilities is not applicable. [FN183] If the taxpayer elects, the Code permits the taxpayer to elect to reduce the entire basis of the taxpayer's depreciable assets, but not below zero. [FN184]

A taxpayer makes an election to reduce basis in depreciable property on his return for the year in which the discharge of indebtedness occurs. [FN185] Once the election is made, the election can be terminated only with the Commissioner's consent. [FN186] Temporary Treasury Regulations provide that the election must be made on a statement attached to a completed Form 982, or on that form itself if the form provides a space for the election. [FN187] Failure to file the basis adjustment form can result in the full amount of the income from debt forgiveness being recognized fully in the year in which the statute of limitations for instituting suit to collect on the taxpayer's notes expires. [FN188]

The operational rules for reducing the basis in assets are contained in section 1017 of the Code, which controls for reducing basis under section 108(b)(2)(D) or under the election in section 108(b)(5). Section 1017(b)(1) states that the order of reduction of the basis of the particular assets will be determined pursuant to Treasury Regulations. The Regulations [FN189] require that basis reduction will first apply only to property used in a trade or business in the following order:

(A) In the case of indebtedness used to purchase a particular asset (other than inventory, notes or accounts receivable) that is discharged, the cost or other basis of such property will be decreased by the amount excluded from gross income under IRC § 108(a) which is attributable to the discharged debt used to purchase that property. This is so even if a lien is placed against the property securing payment of that debt;

(B) In the case of property that has a nonpurchase money lien against it (other than inventory, notes or accounts receivable), the cost or other basis of such property will be decreased by an amount equal to the amount excluded from gross income under IRC § 108(a) and attributable to the discharge of indebtedness secured by such lien;

(C) Any remaining excess will next be applied proportionately to other property of the taxpayer (other than inventory, notes and accounts receivable); and

(D) Any remaining excess will next be applied proportionately to inventory, notes and accounts receivable. [FN190]

If after application of the above, nontaxable income from discharge of indebtedness remains, a taxpayer looks to the basis of property he holds for the production of income. In the case of an individual the cost or other basis in property held for the production of income is reduced on a proportionate basis. [FN191] Any excess nontaxable income from discharge of indebtedness after application of the above is then applied against basis in property other than property used in any trade or business and property held for the production of income, with such reductions also being made on a proportionate basis. [FN192]

262 As can be seen, all the property of a taxpayer can realize a basis reduction. But here the bankrupt taxpayer appears to have the advantage. As stated above, property which is treated by the debtor as exempt in a bankruptcy case will not be subject to the basis reduction rules. [FN193] If the Code gives disparate treatment to debtor and nondebtor insolvent taxpayers in this area, then a bankruptcy filing may serve to save a considerable amount of basis and attendant tax upon disposition of those exempt assets.

XIV. RECAPTURE OF DEPRECIATION

To the extent the taxpayer has had a free lunch of debt forgiveness, the case is closed. To the extent the taxpayer paid for lunch with a postponement via a basis reduction in his property, the taxman waiteth. A taxpayer will report debt forgiveness basis adjustments as ordinary income upon disposition of the asset. The Committee Report states: "This rule operates to ensure that the taxpayer has only obtained a postponement of the recognition of the income and not a complete exemption from recognition."' [FN194] If the basis of property is reduced under the general attribute rule of section 108(b)(2)(D) or the special election under section 108(b)(5), any gain realized on a subsequent sale or disposition of non-sections 1245 and 1250 property will be treated as the recapture of depreciation under section 1245 to the extent of basis reduction under section 108. [FN195] A special rule for section 1250 property applies. [FN196] The recapture rules imposed by section 1017(d) apply to all assets whether depreciable or nondepreciable. Since an insolvent taxpayer who does not file for bankruptcy protection may be treated differently than one who has filed under Title 11, do these rules control over section 1034 dealing with the nontaxable exchange of a residence, and how does a taxpayer treat the over age 55 exemption on sale of a residence? [FN197] The smarter policy, one would hope, would be one of equal tax treatment and preservation of the special treatment afforded a taxpayer on the sale or exchange of a residence.

*263 XV. PURCHASE PRICE ADJUSTMENTS

Not all reductions in indebtedness will activate discharge of indebtedness rules. If a taxpayer purchases property which is financed by the seller of the property and the seller subsequently reduces the amount of the purchase money debt, the reduction will be treated as a purchase price adjustment and not income to the payor if the reduction does not occur in a bankruptcy case or when the purchaser is insolvent. [FN198] Further, the amount of the reduction must otherwise qualify as discharge of indebtedness income. [FN199] Since discharge of indebtedness income cannot arise with use of nonrecourse debt this provision is inapplicable to nonrecourse debt. Section 108(e)(5) will apply only if the seller and buyer have retained the same position vis-a-vis each other (buyer has not conveyed property nor seller assigned note) and section 108(e)(5) will not apply where the debt is reduced other than by a direct agreement between the seller and buyer such as the running of the statute of limitations on a portion of the debt. [FN200] While the other basis reduction rules do not treat the reduction as a disposition, a purchase price adjustment will trigger the recapture of business credits. [FN201]

XVI. SUMMARY

The voluntary or involuntary conveyance of an asset is a sale or exchange of that asset under section 1001. If the asset secured nonrecourse debt the amount realized upon that sale will never be less than the amount of that debt. The amount of the gain will be the difference between the adjusted basis of the property and the debt secured by it. There can be no debt forgiveness.

If, however, the property secures payment of a recourse debt, the fair market value of the property, if less than the debt, enters the equation. The gain is the difference between the adjusted basis in the property and its fair market value. The remaining amount of the debt will be categorized as debt forgiveness and ordinary income.

A taxpayer may litigate the amount of debt forgiveness by putting in issue the amount for which the property was sold or bid on at foreclosure sale in state court.

Since the definition of liabilities for purposes of determining insolvency under section 108 precludes the addition of contingent 264 claims, can a taxpayer include the amount he is being sued for on a deficiency judgment if he contests the entirety of the claim?

The insolvency exception should not be available to exclude gain realized on the disposition of an asset secured by a nonrecourse note if that asset has a fair market value less the debt since a taxpayer will have no change in his net worth after disposition. The exception is limited to cancellation of indebtedness income. The exceptions under section 108 offer a taxpayer some ability to defer the tax on the recognized ordinary income and can even result in the true forgiveness of the debt and attendant tax consequences. The perceived disparity in treatment on exempt assets between a debtor taxpayer and an insolvent taxpayer who does not file for bankruptcy protection can cause very divergent final results.

CONCLUSION

What was confusing and allowed for various theories of tax treatment, namely the manner of treatment of nonrecourse liabilities upon a sale or exchange of an asset, was settled with Tufts. We could then treat nonrecourse and recourse alike for this purpose. What appeared settled before the issuance of Treasury Regulation § 1.1001-2(a)(2), namely treatment of recourse debt on the sale or exchange of an asset with a fair market value less than the debt, is now confusing and may allow for different theories of tax treatment. The inability to get basis in seller-financed nonrecourse indebtedness of real estate due to the change to section 465 means that a greater amount of real estate sales will have attendant recourse loans. A decline in value will leave the solvent taxpayer with the prospect of a large amount of ordinary income if payment on the deficiency has not been made.

The insolvency exception under section 108 and the basis reduction ordering rules under section 1017, while appropriate, seem to offer divergent treatment on the basis reduction of exempt property. This is particularly important in Texas where a residence may be claimed as exempt irrespective of the taxpayer's basis in it. Bankruptcy, in this instance, may give rise to the phoenix rising from the ruins.

The growth of tax shelters and the cost to the taxpayers in policing and legislation related to tax shelters may have been spared had the Supreme Court declined to give nonrecourse debt the status of recourse debt. We would truly have a bifurcated approach but one that has more basis in the realities of the difference in personal liability and nonpersonal liability debt. That Justice O'Connor would 265 like to treat both types of debt again in the identical manner only seems to further distance tax treatment in this area from what the taxpayer perceives to be reality. The present bifurcated approach that can result in ordinary income from debt forgiveness and capital loss by use of recourse financing, but never ordinary income from debt forgiveness (and rarely loss) by use of nonrecourse financing, does not seem justified. The introduction of passive gain and loss and, in particular, section 469(e)(1)(A)(ii) of the 1986 Act will further produce disparate tax treatment regarding the disposition of property securing recourse and nonrecourse debt.

That a judge should accuse tax practitioners of financial fantasies constructed of gossamer wings and of sophisticated tax legerdemain can only mean that he, too, has tried to read the Code and tax cases and failed to comprehend the distinctions without difference that become difference with distinction.

FN101 Professor Wayne G. Barnett, in his Amicus Curiae brief, would have treated the facts in Tufts as if there was a transfer of the property for $1,400,000 (the fair market value), a cancellation of the $1,850,000 mortgage for payment of $1,400,000. The taxpayer then had a capital loss of $50,000 (adjusted basis, $1,450,000, less fair market value, $1,400,000, equals $50,000) and the taxpayer had ordinary income of $450,000 ($1,850,000 debt cancellation less adjusted basis of $1,400,000). This was rejected by the Court but is precisely the Service's position for treatment of Tufts' facts with recourse debt.

FN105 Priv. Ltr. Rul. 87-35-065 (June 4, 1987). Because you are personally liable for the balance of the outstanding debt, and the lending institution has full recourse to your assets in addition to the property proposed to be transferred, we conclude you will realize income from the discharge of indebtedness to the extent the amount of the debt cancelled exceeds the fair market value of the property transferred. See also Priv. Ltr. Rul. 85-04-010, where the taxpayer argued that the entire amount realized over its adjusted basis was discharge of indebtedness and ordinary income.

Tax impact on various types of property:

If a principal residence, the gain is long-term capital gain subject to the maximum tax, of 28% or possibly excludible if reinvested or over 55 years old. Any loss in non-deductible.

If a capital asset (such as land), the gain is long-term capital gain. The loss is a long-term capital loss subject to capital loss limitations (i.e. $3,000 per year).

If the asset is business or rental property (I.R.C. § 1231), the gain is long-term capital gain; however, the loss is an ordinary deduction. Furthermore, if the gain is from a passive activity, it can be offset against losses (current year as well as suspended) from other passive activities.

Which of the above results is most desirable? Of course, the answer depends in part on the following factors:

b. Whether the taxpayer is insolvent or filing for bankruptcy;

*1 TAX ANATOMY OF DEBT RESTRUCTURING

James R. Monroe [FNa]

Consideration of tax consequences is an important element of almost any major personal or business transaction. In particular, the tax implications of debt restructuring merit attention because seemingly subtle differences in the decisions made can create significantly divergent results under the current Internal Revenue Code. The following example illustrates this anomalous result and serves as a conduit for a proposal which would temper that result.

I. FACTUAL PATTERN

As of December 1, 1987, Ezra and Samantha Rich had the following assets and liabilities:

ASSETS	FAIR MARKET VALUE	ADJUSTED BASIS
Land/Building	$400,000	$100,000
Equipment	40,000	30,000
Inventory	100,000	90,000
Stocks	504,000	50,000
Personal Residence	175,000	70,000
Chevrolet	7,000	10,000
	$1,226,000	$350,000
LIABILITIES	PRINCIPAL	INTEREST
Friendly Bank	$ 500,000	$ 75,000
Easy Loan Company	1,000,000	150,000
GM Credit	8,000	500
First Credit Union	300,000	20,000
Asiv Card	10,000	4,000
	$1,818,000	$249,500

Obviously, the Riches are unable to meet their financial commitments and have a negative net worth of $841,500. [FN1] In agonizing *2 over the decision to restructure their financial obligations, they decided to talk with I. M. Slack, their attorney.

Mr. Slack informed the Riches that they may have causes of action against Easy Loan for fraud and misrepresentation and against Friendly Bank for the decrease in value of the Riches' assets, which the bank was managing. [FN2] After reviewing the financial statements of the Riches and considering their threatened legal actions through negotiations with Mr. Slack, Easy Loan is willing to satisfy the Riches' obligation if the Riches transfer their land and building to Easy Loan. Similarly, Friendly Bank agrees to accept $200,000 in cash from the Riches in full satisfaction of the Riches' debt to Friendly Bank. Finally, the Riches contacted their tax adviser regarding the implications of the proposed debt restructuring.

The Riches' situation is a common yet frightening occurrence in many areas of the United States. [FN3] The tax implications of a proposal like the Riches' are initially ignored by *3 many taxpayers and their advisers. However, without proper tax planning the Riches and similarly situated taxpayers will have to live daily with the tax consequences as the tax collector seeks the government's due from the debt restructuring. [FN4]

In order to minimize or avoid altogether the tax effects of debt restructuring, the Riches and their advisers must first be aware of the adverse tax consequences of the restructuring. These consequences are analyzed in Section II of this Article, while Section III provides an explanation of alternatives to avoid or minimize the adverse tax consequences. An amendment to the Internal Revenue Code (Code), [FN5] which would relieve the tax burden of many debtors caused by debt restructuring, is proposed in Section IV. This proposed amendment should add certainty and equity to transactions involving debt restructuring.

II. TAX LAW--DEBT RESTRUCTURING

A. General Rule--The Problem of Debt Discharge Income

The Supreme Court in United States v. Kirby Lumber Co. [FN6] held that a taxpayer which purchased its own bonds for *4 less than the issue price had gross income to the extent that the issue price exceeded the purchase price. Therefore, as a general rule, when a taxpayer has debt reduced by a creditor without payment of full consideration, the taxpayer has cancellation of indebtedness (debt discharge) income (CODI) equal to the excess of the cancelled debt over the amount of consideration paid by the debtor for the cancellation. [FN7] Thus, applying the general rule and ignoring its exceptions, [FN8] the Riches will report debt discharge income (CODI) in the amount of $750,000 [FN9] from the reduction of the Easy Loan obligation and $375,000 [FN10] from the reduction of the Friendly Bank obligation. Obviously, the income resulting from CODI presents tax planning problems for the taxpayer and the tax adviser.

B. Relief--Exceptions to General Rule

1. Background

Long after the Kirby Lumber decision, [FN11] lower courts found exceptions to the general rule of CODI when debt was discharged for less than the full amount owed by the debtor. These courts evidently believed the general rule was too harsh in certain circumstances and formulated various exceptions:

a. Exclusion to the extent that the taxpayer was insolvent before the debt cancellation, but only to the extent *5 of the insolvency. [FN12]

b. Exclusion if cancellation of the taxpayer's debt results in no net gain to the taxpayer. [FN13]

c. Exclusion if the debt cancellation is a purchase price adjustment. [FN14]

d. Exclusion if the debt cancellation is a gift. [FN15]

If the taxpayer could come within one of these exceptions, all or part of the CODI could be excluded from gross income, thereby giving full or partial relief from the general rule of Kirby Lumber.

2. Congressional Response

To clarify the feneral rule of Kirby Lumber, to add certainty to its exceptions, and to adopt tax provisions to replace those repealed by the Bankruptcy Act of 1978, [FN16] Congress in 1980 codified a somewhat modified version of the exceptions. [FN17] Under the codification, CODI is excluded from a taxpayer's *6 gross income if the discharge occurs:

a. While the taxpayer is subject to bankruptcy proceedings and the bankruptcy court either has issued a discharge order concerning the debt or discharge is pursuant to a plan approved by the court; [FN18] or,

b. While the taxpayer is insolvent, but only to the extent of the taxpayer's insolvency; [FN19] or,

c. For interest or other expenses which, if paid, would be deductible by the taxpayer; [FN20] or,

d. When the taxpayer is not subject to bankruptcy and is not insolvent if the debt reduction occurs as a result of a purchase price adjustment with the original seller. [FN21]

In 1986, Congress adopted another CODI exclusion--one for qualified farmers who are solvent at the time of debt discharge. [FN22] Under this provision, CODI is excluded as if the 7 qualified farmer were insolvent. However, this CODI exclusion has been both limited and expanded by the Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act of 1988. [FN23]

The exclusion of the CODI from gross income may affect the debtor/taxpayer's tax attributes--examples of which are net operating losses, capital losses, tax credits, and adjusted basis in assets. [FN24]

Numerous articles have already explored the statutory exceptions to debt discharge income. [FN25] Therefore, except for application of these rules to the Riches' situation, these statutory exceptions will not be analyzed further. However, other planning techniques to avoid adverse tax effects from debt restructuring will be explored. [FN26]

3. Application of Exceptions to Riches

a. Initial Result

If the Riches restructure their debts as proposed, under the general rule of Kirby Lumber and absent application of the statutory exceptions, the Riches must report $1,125,000 [FN27] of income from the debt discharge. A substantial portion of this income, however, can be excluded from the Riches' gross income by invoking the statutory exceptions. [FN28]

8 b. Interest

Because the payments to Friendly Bank and Easy Loan are insufficient to pay the principal, the interest is regarded as cancelled. [FN29] If the Riches are cash basis taxpayers and entitled to deduct the interest if paid, the cancelled interest will be excluded from gross income and will not be classified as CODI. [FN30] The cancelled interest would be includable in gross income if the Riches were accrual basis taxpayers and had deducted the unpaid interest. [FN31]

c. Insolvency

Additionally, because the Riches are insolvent (liabilities of $1,842,500--assuming the interest owed to Friendly Bank and Easy Loan Company is excludable under Code § 108(e)(2)-- [FN31] exceed the fair market value of assets of $1,051,000), [FN33] they can exclude up to the amount of their insolvency ($791,500) from their gross income. [FN34] Thus, the CODI [FN35] in excess of the amount excluded as interest or under the insolvency rule ($108,500) will be included as gross income on the Riches' tax returns subject to the exceptions and planning techniques discussed in Section III.

9 C. Gain

A surprise to taxpayers, in addition to the discharge of indebtedness income, sometimes results when appreciated assets are transferred to satisfy a debt obligation. [FN36] For example, the Riches propose to transfer their land and building to Easy Loan to satisfy their obligation of $1,150,000. [FN37] If the Easy Loan liability is nonrecourse [FN38] (nonpersonal) to the Riches, the Riches will have a gain of $1,050,000 with no CODI to report. [FN39] On the other hand, if the Riches' liability to Easy Loan is recourse [FN40] (personal), the Riches' gain, according to the Treasury Department Regulations, will be $300,000. [FN41] The remainder of the Easy Loan indebtedness ($750,000) in excess of the fair market value of the land and buildings ($400,000) will be CODI and subject to the CODI exception. [FN42]

Originally, the Treasury Department acquiesced in a case holding that no gain resulted from the transfer of appreciated property to a creditor to discharge a debt because the discharge 10 resulted in CODI to the debtor/ taxpayer. [FN43] However, the Treasury Department recently withdrew its acquiescence and currently takes the position that a taxpayer who transfers appreciated property to satisfy a recourse debt has gain rather than CODI to the extent that the lesser of the asset's fair market value or the cancelled debt exceeds the adjusted basis of the asset. [FN44]

Recently, the IRS argued that no loss deduction should be allowed a taxpayer who did not sustain an economic loss. [FN45] Query whether a taxpayer could argue that no gain should be reported where there is no economic gain. This would be the situation if the taxpayer is insolvent both before and after the transfer of property to the creditor.

The importance of this distinction between gain and cancellation of indebtedness income under the current Code, Treasury Regulations, rulings, and case law should not be overlooked. CODI may be excluded from gross income under one of the above exceptions, whereas gain is not subject to these exclusions. [FN46] Thus, gain will be subject to the usual gain-related rules of realization, recognition, capital gains, depreciation recapture, and section 1231 treatment. [FN47]

D. Options

Without utilization of the tax planning techniques discussed in Section III, if the Riches settle their financial obligations as suggested, they may incur substantial federal income tax liability. The relevant factors considered in determining 11 that liability may include the availability of net operating losses, capital losses, and credits to offset the CODI of $108,500; the gain of $300,000; or the tax resulting from the gain or CODI. If the Riches do incur substantial tax liability, their options may be limited to one, or a combination, of the following:

1. Pay the tax liability either at once or under an installment payment agreement. [FN48]

2. File bankruptcy in an attempt to discharge the liability. [FN49]

3. Make an offer in compromise. [FN50]

4. Ignore the liability. [FN51]

Any of these options--except the final one which is unrealistic and too simplistic in most cases--may involve substantial present and future financial hardships to the Riches.

III. TAX PLANNING TECHNIQUES TO AVOID UNDESIRED TAX EFFECTS

A. Overview of the Problem

As the previous discussion illustrates, adverse tax effects of the proposed debt restructuring may force the Riches into further financial hardship and may require bankruptcy [FN52] if 12 they are unable to exclude the CODI or gain from their gross income. However, the Riches should first consider the following methods for excluding CODI from their gross income:

Plan 1. Allocation of some of the CODI to damages suffered by the Riches.

Plan 2. Transfer of property to the spouse with the lower income potential.

Plan 3. Change of the debt from nonrecourse to recourse.

Plan 4. Other less practicable alternatives.

B. Plan 1--Damages

1. General Rules

a. Personal Damages

If a taxpayer receives compensatory damages for personal injuries, these damages are excluded from gross income. [FN53] The IRS formerly took the position that punitive damages arising from a personal injury were also excludable from gross income; [FN54] however, the IRS has recently revised its position and now contends that all punitive damages are included in gross income. [FN55]

A debtor may have numerous causes of action against a creditor arising from a loan. [FN56] If possible, a debtor should structure his or her position (complaint or petition) or settlement to take advantage of the personal damage exclusion. Causes of action which result in personal injuries and are excludable from gross income include libel, [FN57] slander, [FN58] negligence and fraud. [FN59]

b. Capital Recovery

Additional damage recoveries may result in no income if the recovery is for loss or a reduction in value of capital 13 caused by the creditor(s). [FN60] For example, if a creditor is in a fiduciary position or has control of a debtor's assets which decline in value, the debtor's damage recovery due to loss of asset values will not result in gain to the debtor except to the extent that the amount of damages exceeds the debtor's adjusted basis in the asset. [FN61]

c. Allocation

If the judge or jury fails to allocate the damage recovery between those damage items which are excludable from gross income and those items which are includable in gross income, or if the debtor and creditor fail to allocate the damages in their settlement agreement, then the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) will allocate the award or settlement amount according to the damages pled. [FN62] If no damage amount was pled, the allocation is based upon the facts in the case. [FN63]

2. Application to the Riches

a. Personal Recovery

If the Riches have damage claims against Easy Loan and/or Friendly Bank, the Riches and their attorney should consider an allocation of any settlement amount to those damage claims which are excludable from gross income. For instance, assuming the Riches settle their damage dispute with Easy Loan for $150,000 which is allocated for emotional distress to the Riches, the $150,000 is treated as paid to the Riches by Easy Loan and no income is reported. [FN64] In addition, the Riches would be treated as having paid $150,000 to reduce the amount owed to Easy Loan. [FN65] The settlement agreement should be specific in applying the $150,000 to reduce 14 principal or to pay interest, whichever is in the Riches' best interest.

If the Riches and their counsel fail to allocate the settlement amount, the IRS may allocate the settlement amount on the same basis that the amounts were allocated in the Riches' complaint or petition. [FN66] If no complaint or petition was filed, then the IRS may apply the $150,000 to the taxpayer's disadvantage. [FN67] For example, the IRS may allocate all or a portion of the damages to items not excludable from gross income, including wages, punitive damages, contract recovery, and other nonpersonal injuries. [FN68]

b. Capital Recovery

An alternative to the personal damage exclusion would be available if the Riches had grounds to claim that either creditor had breached a fiduciary relationship and that this breach had caused a decline in property values. Any recovery up to the Riches' adjusted basis in their properties, which had declined in value due to the breach, would be a return of capital. Any amount received in excess of the adjusted basis would be gain realized, and perhaps recognized, to the Riches. [FN69]

3. Conclusion

Counsel for taxpayers must be aware of the tax implications of settlement agreements and lawsuits filed. Improper or ill-advised allocations can result in adverse tax effects to debtor/taxpayers who are already in financial trouble. However, properly structured settlements may result in substantial tax savings from less gain and cancellation of indebtedness 15 income. [FN70]

C. Plan 2--Transfer to Spouse

If the Riches transfer their land and building to Easy Loan to satisfy their obligations, the Riches will have a gain to report on their tax return [FN71] and/or CODI which may be wholly or partially excluded from gross income. [FN72] Unless the Riches have net operating losses or capital losses [FN73] to offset the gains and CODI, or, alternatively, credits to offset the resulting taxes, [FN74] the Riches will owe federal income tax as a result of the transfer of assets to their creditor(s).

The assessment, if not paid, will result in collection efforts by the IRS. [FN75] Bankruptcy may not be a viable solution because the Riches will not be able to discharge these taxes until at least three years after the taxes are assessed. [FN76] Thus, the Riches' income for the three year period will be subject to levy by the IRS. Additionally, any acquisition of assets or increase in asset value during the three years will be subject to the tax lien or levy. [FN77]

As an alternative to the Riches' transfer of the land and building to Easy Loan, they should consider transferring the real estate from the spouse who is either earning more income or has more income potential (transferor spouse) to the other spouse (transferee spouse). This transfer will result in no gain 16 or loss to the transferor spouse. [FN78] The transferee spouse will acquire the same adjusted basis in the land and building as did the transferor spouse. [FN79]

Upon transfer of the real estate to Easy Loan, the transferee spouse will have either gain or loss to report, and both the transferee and transferor may have CODI. [FN80] However, both transferee and transferor spouses can attempt to exclude the CODI from gross income under the insolvency exclusion or other applicable exclusions. [FN81]

If the transferee spouse reports gain (which results in the assessment of income tax on that gain) and the transferor spouse has no gain to report, the transferor spouse will not be taxed on the gain if the spouses file separate income tax returns. Furthermore, the transferor will not be taxed on the CODI if one of the CODI exceptions applies. [FN82] Therefore, the transferor can have a substantial salary, purchase assets which may appreciate in value, and own a sole proprietorship without fear that the IRS will levy on these assets and income. [FN83]

The IRS may attempt to collapse the transfer between the spouses and argue that the subsequent transfer from the transferee spouse to Easy Loan was in reality a transfer from both spouses to the creditor. This is commonly known as the step transaction doctrine. [FN84] Application of this doctrine may 17 be avoided if sufficient time elapses between the initial transfer between the spouses and the subsequent transfer to Easy Loan. [FN85] Moreover, if the purpose of the transfer between the spouses is estate planning [FN86] or business related, [FN87] application of the doctrine may similarly be avoided.

D. Plan 3--Nonrecourse to Recourse Debt

As previously stated, when a debtor transfers property to a creditor to satisfy a debt, the tax consequences differ depending upon various factors:

1. whether the debt is recourse or nonrecourse; [FN88]

2. whether the fair market value of the property is less or more than the amount of the debt; [FN89] and

3. whether the adjusted basis is less or more than the fair market value of the property and/or debt. [FN90]

The following diagram contains the possible different tax results of the above combinations:

TABULAR OR GRAPHIC MATERIAL SET FORTH AT THIS POINT IS NOT DISPLAYABLE

18 Thus, if a taxpayer has appreciated property which has a fair market value less than the debt and the debt is nonrecourse, a taxpayer will have more gain to report than if the debt were recourse. This is because the amount realized with a nonrecourse note will equal the amount of the unpaid balance of the note rather than the fair market value of the property--that is, the maximum amount realized when a recourse obligation is satisfied. Therefore, no CODI results to a taxpayer satisfying a nonrecourse obligation with property. [FN91] Because there is no CODI, a taxpayer with nonrecourse debt will not have an opportunity to exclude the gain from income under the CODI exclusion rules. [FN92]

However, if a taxpayer's debt is switched from nonrecourse to recourse and the taxpayer transfers property to the creditor to satisfy the debt, the transfer to the creditor may result in CODI and gain. [FN93] Consider the Riches who owe 19 $1,000,000 to Easy Loan on a recourse loan. If the Riches transfer their land and building, with a fair market value of $400,000 and an adjusted basis of $100,000, to satisfy the $1,000,000 loan, the Riches will have a gain of $300,000 [FN94] and CODI of $600,000. [FN95] The Riches may exclude the CODI from gross income if one of the CODI exceptions applies; [FN96] however, the gain is usually included in gross income. If the loan were nonrecourse, the reportable gain would have been $900,000 without CODI to exclude from gross income. [FN97]

E. Plan 4--Other Alternatives with Less Potential for Practical Success

1. Like-Kind Exchange

Instead of transferring property to the creditor, a taxpayer should consider an exchange, for like-kind property, of the property subject to liabilities. Normally, an exchange of properties will result in recognition of realized gain or loss. [FN98] However, if properties of like-kind are exchanged, no gain or loss is recognized. An exception exists in that gain may be recognized to the extent that property, which is not of like-kind, is received. [FN99] If a taxpayer transfers property which is 20 subject to more liabilities than those on the property which the taxpayer/transferor receives, the excess liabilities, less any money paid by the transferor, may result in gain recognized to the transferor. [FN100]

Even though the possibility of a like-kind exchange exists for a taxpayer in financial trouble, as a practical matter a like-kind exchange may not solve the taxpayer's financial problems. This is because the debt on the property received by the taxpayer/transferor will have to be repaid with after-tax dollars. [FN101]

2. Incorporation

Some taxpayers might consider transferring their business assets to a corporation in exchange for the corporation's stock. [FN102] The corporation could then transfer the assets to its 21 creditors, and the cancellation of indebtedness income and gain would be reported by the corporation rather than by the shareholder. [FN103]

Two problems may result from the incorporation. First, the taxpayer/transferor will recognize gain to the extent that the nondeductible liabilities transferred to the corporation exceed the adjusted bases of the transferred assets. [FN104] Obviously, the taxpayer can avoid this result by balancing the liabilities transferred to the corporation against the adjusted bases of assets transferred to the corporation. [FN105]

Secondly, the IRS may argue that the step transaction doctrine applies to the transfer of assets to the corporation and the subsequent transfer of assets by the corporation to 22 creditors. [FN106] Under this analysis, the income from the corporate transfer to creditors, including gains, would be reported by the taxpayer/shareholder rather than by the corporation. The feasibility of incorporating the business with the liabilities in order to avoid gain to the taxpayer/shareholder will depend upon the specific fact situation.

3. Termination of S Corporation Election

If the taxpayer/debtor is an S Corporation, [FN107] prior to the transfer of assets to a creditor in satisfaction of the debt, the taxpayer/debtor should consider terminating its S Corporation election. [FN108] After the S Corporation election has been terminated, the organization could transfer the assets to its creditor(s) to satisfy the corporation's liability. In most cases, due to the S Corporation termination, the gain and CODI will be reported and taxed at the corporate level and not at the shareholder level. [FN109]

23 4. Transfer to Trust

Some taxpayers may attempt to transfer the assets and liabilities to an irrevocable trust with the hope that the trust will have to report the gain and CODI upon the transfer of assets to the creditor(s). [FN110] Contrary to the taxpayer's goal to have the gain so reported, gain results from the transfer of assets and liabilities to an irrevocable trust if the liabilities exceed the taxpayer's adjusted basis in the assets. [FN111] Thus, such a transfer to avoid gain and CODI to the transferor does not appear to be a viable alternative.

An equally undesirable result is achieved by a transfer of a taxpayer's assets and liabilities to a revocable or grantor trust with a subsequent transfer of the assets by the revocable trust to satisfy the liabilities. The gain and/or CODI resulting from the asset transfer by the revocable or grantor trust, under the grantor trust tax rules, will be reported by the taxpayer/settlor creating an undesirable result in most cases. [FN112]

24 IV. SANITY (OR CLARITY, IF POSSIBLE) AND RELIEF

A. Introduction

The present income taxation system, which in many cases substantially increases the tax burden of financially troubled taxpayers, creates traps for the unwary and has resulted in a search by knowledgeable taxpayers and advisors for maneuvers, as discussed in Section III, which will avoid income taxes from debt restructuring. This tax system should be revised to avoid inequities and additional problems for financially distraught taxpayers. [FN113]

B. Inequities

The transfer of appreciated assets by insolvent or bankrupt taxpayers to satisfy liabilities creates an inconsistent result when compared with the straight reduction in debt by bankrupt or insolvent taxpayers without a transfer of assets. In the former case, the debtor/taxpayer has gain and, usually, CODI. [FN114] The CODI may be excluded from gross income, whereas the gain must generally be reported by the debtor/taxpayer. [FN115] In contrast, the debtor/taxpayer with straight debt reduction and no transfer of appreciated property will have only CODI and may have no income to report due to the statutory exclusions. [FN116] Such an inconsistency is simply not justifiable. A better result would provide similar tax treatment of both transaction types.

C. Congressional Relief

1. Proposed Subsection (h)

In its earliest stages, this article contemplated a new, 25 complex Internal Revenue Code section to resolve the tax problems of restructuring debt and the inequities which result from inconsistent treatment of gain and CODI. However, after drafting several proposed Code sections to resolve the tax problems of inconsistent treatment of those taxpayers who resolve their debts with money or nonappreciated assets compared to those taxpayers who use appreciated assets to settle their debts, [FN117] it became evident that additional sections would only add further complexity to the Code. [FN118]

Therefore, in order to give statutory relief to the affected taxpayers, [FN119] to reduce complexity, to add further certainty, to avoid the mental and transactional gymnastics described in Sections II and III, and to ensure consistent treatment, Congress should consider amending Code section 108 to add the following subsection (h):

Subsection (h) Gain--Discharge of Indebtedness Income

(1) Excludable Gain--For purposes of this Chapter, gain realized from the transfer of property to a seller or lender in partial or full satisfaction of an obligation of the transferor shall be regarded as discharge of indebtedness income to the extent the gain realized would be excluded from gross income under this section if the gain realized were classified as discharge of indebtedness income.

(2) Excess Gain--Gain realized which is not excludable from gross income under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be treated as gain realized for purposes of section 1001 and other gain provisions of this Chapter.

(3) Allocation--Unless otherwise allocated by the transferor and lender in writing, the fair market value of the property transferred to a lender or seller in partial or full satisfaction of the transferor's obligation shall be allocated first to the principal amount of the outstanding debt and any excess shall be allocated to accrued interest.

26 (4) Coordination with Discharge of Indebtedness Income--If some discharge of indebtedness income and/or gain realized are to be included in gross income even after the application of subsection (a), then the amount of gain realized to be excluded from gross income under subsections (a) and (h)(1) shall bear the same relationship to excluded discharge of indebtedness income (including gain realized to be excluded) as the total gain realized on the transfer described in paragraph (1) of this subsection bears to the total discharge of indebtedness income (including total gain realized).

2. Explanation of Proposed Subsection (h)

When a taxpayer transfers property to a lender or seller, in full or partial satisfaction of an obligation, gain realized, if any, on the transfer will be subject to the exclusionary rules of Code subsections 108(a), (d), and (e). In addition, to the extent excluded from gross income, the gain realized will be regarded as discharge of indebtedness income. [FN120] The gain realized, to the extent not excluded from gross income under the Code section 108 exclusionary rules, will retain its status as gain realized [FN121] and will be subject to capital gain, nonrecognition, depreciation recapture, and other gain rules and analyses. [FN122]

For taxpayers who are not in bankruptcy, if gain realized and CODI exceed the amount of the taxpayer's insolvency, some of the gain realized and CODI will be subject to exclusion while other gain realized and CODI will be included in gross income during the same taxable year. [FN123] In this case, in order to determine the amount of gain realized excluded from gross income, the gain realized will be proportionately excluded from gross income based upon the following formula:

> Total Gain Realized/Total Gain Realized and CODI = Gain to be excluded under Code § 108/Income to be excluded under Code § 108

27 For example, if the Riches, who are not in bankruptcy, transfer an asset with a fair market value of $400,000 and an adjusted basis of $100,000 to satisfy a recourse obligation of $1,000,000, the Riches will have gain realized of $300,000 ($400,000 fair market value less $100,000 adjusted basis) [FN124] and CODI of $600,000 (difference between $1,000,000 obligation and $400,000 fair market value of property transferred to satisfy the obligation). [FN125] Assume that the Riches are insolvent to the extent of $796,000. The Riches can only exclude the gain realized ($300,000) and CODI ($600,000) to the extent of insolvency ($796,000). [FN126] Paragraph (4) of proposed subsection (h) would allocate the exclusionary amount as follows:

> Total Gain Realized ($300,000)/Total Gain Realized ($900,000) and CODI = ($265,000) Gain Realized to be excluded/($796,000) Income (Gain Realized and CODI to be excluded)
> Gain Realized to be excluded = $265,000
> CODI to be excluded = $531,000 ($796,000 - $265,000)

The remainder of the gain realized [$300,000 (total gain realized) less $265,000 (gain realized excluded) = $35,000] will be subject to the normal tax rules for gain realized--capital gain, section 1231, depreciation recapture, and nonrecognition provisions, [FN127] and the remaining CODI ($600,000 -$531,000 = $69,000) will be included in gross income under the general rule of the Kirby Lumber case. [FN128]

Without proposed subsection (h), the Riches would have $600,000 of CODI which would be totally excluded from 28 gross income, and they would recognize gain of $300,000. Thus, unless the indebtedness is qualified farm indebtedness and the Riches meet the requirements of Code section 108(g), proposed subsection (h) would allow the Riches to exclude an additional $196,000 from gross income and, as a result, include only $104,000 in gross income as gain realized and/or CODI.

A taxpayer, who had cancelled the $1,000,000 debt with a $100,000 cash payment and was insolvent to the extent of $796,000, would be allowed to exclude $796,000 of the $900,000 in CODI from gross income. The same result would be achieved when appreciated property satisfies the $1,000,000 obligation, [FN129] thus providing more consistent treatment under proposed subsection (h) than under the present CODI/gain realized rules.

3. Implications of Proposed Subsection (h)

The enactment of subsection (h) would result in consistent treatment for CODI and gain realized for taxpayers who could exclude CODI and/or gain realized from gross income if one of the statutory exclusions in Code section 108(a), (d), or (e) applies. Financially troubled taxpayers, under proposed subsection (h), obtain a new federal income tax start, thereby achieving one of the purposes behind the enactment of Code section 108. [FN130]

The effect on tax revenues should be minimal because the affected taxpayer must usually be in bankruptcy, be insolvent, or have status as a qualified farmer in order to exclude the gain from gross income under proposed subsection (h). [FN131] Thus, the IRS will be relieved of attempts to collect taxes from taxpayers who have few if any assets other than exempt assets and assets subject to security interests prior to the IRS tax lien. Consequently, taxpayers should be relieved from the 29 financial and psychological burdens of owing taxes while lacking the funds to pay them.

Some tax purists could argue that subsection (h) would result in a double tax benefit to taxpayers who own depreciable property. The first benefit is represented by the depreciation deduction, [FN132] and a second tax benefit would be realized by excluding gain, as CODI, when the depreciable property is transferred to a creditor to satisfy the taxpayer's obligation. [FN133] However, a similar double tax benefit is available to taxpayers who borrow funds to pay business or production-of-income expenses and later have the loan reduced or cancelled. The taxpayer will first deduct business or production-of-income expenses [FN134] which reduce taxable income and later, when the loan is reduced or cancelled, the CODI may be excluded from gross income. [FN135]

Tax administrators may argue that subsection (h) will result in income tax avoidance by a plethora of tax shelter investors when a tax shelter partnership is insolvent. Accordingly, most gain would be excluded from gross income under the proposed subsection. Practically, however, because the exclusionary tests of Code section 108 are applied at the partner level and not at the partnership level [FN136] and because many tax shelter investors are required to meet certain net worth requirements before committing funds to the tax shelter, [FN137] few tax shelter investors should be insolvent or able to file for bankruptcy. Thus, most of these investors would not qualify under the exclusionary requirements of Code section 108. Therefore, gain from the transfer of the property by a tax shelter or other partnership to a creditor, in partial or full satisfaction 30 of an obligation, will be included in a partner's gross income.

V. CONCLUSION

The inequities created by the difference in treatment between gain realized, which is included in gross income, and cancellation of indebtedness income, which can or may be excluded in many cases, may be alleviated through creative and proper tax planning. Enactment of a statutory provision where gain realized is subject to similar exclusionary rules as CODI should result in more consistent treatment for financially troubled taxpayers. Because most of these taxpayers are arguably levy-proof, no substantial loss of revenue would result.

Furthermore, enactment of the proposed legislation to treat gain realized as CODI for some taxpayers will give financially troubled taxpayers a fresh tax start, similar to the fresh start obtained in bankruptcy, and relief from a tremendous emotional burden. The effect of changing the tax rules on gain realized in debt restructuring transactions should also be minimal to the United States Treasury because collection of the taxes levied against these taxpayers is frequently impracticable.

FN9. The Riches owe Easy Loan principal of $1,000,000 and interest of $150,000. The transfer of the land and building with a fair market value of $400,000 to Easy Loan in satisfaction of the $1,150,000 debt will result in CODI of $750,000 (difference between debt and fair market value of asset transferred to the creditor), assuming the interest is included in the $1,150,000 debt for CODI purposes. Accrued interest is excluded from gross income if the interest would be deductible to the debtor if paid. I.R.C. § 108(e)(2) (1986). If this accrued interest is eliminated from gross income, then the interest should be excluded from both the CODI and insolvency calculations.

FN10. The Riches owe Friendly Bank principal of $500,000 and interest of $75,000. The payment of $200,000 in cash to Friendly Bank in full satisfaction of the $575,000 debt will result in CODI of $375,000. See supra note 9 (analysis of the effect of interest on the CODI and insolvency calculations).

FN16. The Senate Finance Committee stated that I.R.C. § 108 (1986) was amended because the tax rules contained in the Bankruptcy Act were repealed by Pub. L. No. 95-598, 92 Stat. 2549-2688 (1978). Furthermore, the Committee intended to give bankrupt and insolvent taxpayers a fresh start. S. REP. NO. 1035, 96th Cong. 2d Sess. 620, 624

FN17. Prior to the 1980 amendment, I.R.C. § 108 (1954), (as amended), read as follows:

> No amount shall be included in gross income by reason of the discharge, in whole or in part, within the taxable year, of any indebtedness for which the taxpayer is liable, or subject to which the taxpayer holds property, if--
> (1) the indebtedness was incurred or assumed--
>
> (A) by a corporation, or
> (B) by an individual in connection with property used in his trade or business, and
> (2) such taxpayer makes and files a consent to the regulations prescribed under section 1017 (relating to adjustment of basis) then in effect at such time and in such manner as the Secretary by regulations prescribes.
>
> In such case, the amount of any income of such taxpayer attributable to any unamortized premium (computed as of the first day of the taxable year in which such discharge occurred) with respect to such indebtedness shall not be included in gross income, and the amount of the deduction attributable to any unamortized discount (computed as of the first day of the taxable year in which such discharge occurred) with respect to such indebtedness shall not be allowed as a deduction.
> The 1980 amendment to section 108 under Pub. L. No. 96-589, § 2(a), 94 Stat. 3389 (1980) divided section 108 into five subsections. The general exclusion rules are in subsection (a). Subsection (b) contains the reduction of tax attributes. Under subsection (c), a taxpayer could elect to exclude qualified business indebtedness from gross income (this exclusion was repealed by the Tax Reform Act of 1986). Subsection (d) defines the terms and contains special rules, and subsection (e) explains the application of the discharge of indebtedness exceptions.

FN19. I.R.C. §§ 108(a)(1)(B), (a)(3), (d)(1), and (d)(3) (1986).

FN20. I.R.C. § 108(e)(2) (1986). This exception generally applies to cash basis taxpayers because in order for no CODI to result to the taxpayer under I.R.C. § 108(e)(2) (1986), the taxpayer must have received a deduction if the discharged item had been paid. Examples of items which, if paid by a cash basis taxpayer, will result in a deduction to a taxpayer include compensation, interest and rent. Query whether the result would be the same for discharge of personal interest which is no longer deductible, subject to phase out rules. I.R.C. § 163(h)(1) and (6) (1986). If an accrual basis taxpayer has deducted an item and the item is subsequently cancelled or forgiven, the item should be subject to the tax benefit rule, I.R.C. § 111 (1986), and not the CODI rules of I.R.C. § 108 (1986). In situations where the accrued item has been added to the principal owed by the taxpayers and the loan is nonrecourse, the Tax Court has held that the amount realized includes the accrued item and that the tax benefit rule is inapplicable. Allan v. Comm'r, 86 T.C. 655 (1986).

FN21. I.R.C. § 108(e)(5) (1986).

FN22. I.R.C. § 108(g) (1986) which was added by the Tax Reform Act of 1986; Pub. L. No. 99-514, § 405(a), 100 Stat. 2224 (1986), effective for discharge of indebtedness occurring after April 9, 1986. In order to apply the solvent farmer exclusion rules, the lender must be a qualified person, which, now includes federal, state or local governments as well as agencies and instrumentalities of such governments. I.R.C. § 108(g)(3) (1986). The Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act of 1988 expands the definition of 'qualified person' to include federal, state or local governments or affiliates and limits the exclusion from CODI for qualified farmers to the tax attributes and adjusted basis in depreciable property, farm land, or other business or investment property. § 1004 of the Technical and

FN26. See Section III of this article.

FN27. See calculations at supra notes 9 and 10. The amount of federal income taxes on this income of $1,125,000 will depend upon a variety of factors including, but not limited to, net operating losses available to offset this income, other deductions, other income, and filing status.

FN30. I.R.C. § 108(e)(2) (1986). See discussion supra note 20.

FN31. Compare I.R.C. § 111 (1986) (unpaid interest of an accrual basis taxpayer which is cancelled should be included in gross income under the tax benefit rule) with Allan v. Comm'r, 86 T.C. 655 (1986) (accrued interest added to principal should be included in the amount realized for nonrecourse loans and is not subject to the tax benefit rule).

FN32. The liability for the interest excluded under I.R.C. § 108(e)(2) (1986) should not be included in the insolvency calculations because this interest is not included in the CODI calculations and, thus, could result in a double benefit to the taxpayer: one benefit because the interest is not CODI and a second benefit from increasing the amount of the taxpayer's insolvency and potential CODI exclusion.

FN33. 'Insolvency' is defined as 'the excess of liabilities over the fair market value of assets.' I.R.C. § 108(d)(3) (1986). See also supra note 1 for definitions of 'insolvency.' Assets, such as the Riches' personal residence, which are exempt from levy by creditors are excluded from the asset side of the insolvency calculation. Rufus S. Cole, 42 B.T.A. 1110 (1940); Estate of B. M. Marcus, 44 T.C.M. (P-H) ¶75,009 (1975).

FN34. The insolvency exclusion is limited to the amount of the insolvency which is calculated before the discharge occurs. I.R.C. §§ 108(a)(1)(B) and (3), and (d)(3) (1986).

FN35. United States v. Kirby Lumber Co., 284 U.S. 1 (1931).

FN36. See Kenan v. Comm'r, 114 F.2d 217 (2d Cir. 1940). The creditor must report the acquisition or abandonment to the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) on Form 1099-A. See I.R.S., Sales and Other Disposition Assets, 1987 Pub. 544 (IRS position on abandonments and acquisitions of property by creditors to satisfy a debt obligation).

FN37. See supra note 9 and accompanying text for an analysis of the CODI effect.

FN38. Nonrecourse means that the creditor (lender) is not entitled to a personal judgment (recourse) against the debtor but can only recover the property which secures the loan; thus, the debtor has no personal liability. Treas. Reg. § 1.1001-2(a) and (c) (1980).

FN39. The gain realized is equal to:

Amount realized	=	$1,150,000	(amount of the nonrecourse debt--I.R.C. s 7701(g) (1986); Comm'r v. Tufts, 461 U.S. 300 (1983))
Less Adjusted Basis	=	$ 100,000	(I.R.C. ss 1011, 1012, and 1016 (1986))
Gain Realized	=	$1,050,000

The amount realized may be reduced by the accrued interest if the fair market value of the land and building is less than the principal amount of debt. See supra note 29 and accompanying text. Even if the gain includes the interest, the interest should be deductible subject to the personal interest deduction limitation (I.R.C. § 163(h) (1986)), investment interest deduction limitation (I.R.C. § 163(d) (1986)), and the passive loss rules of I.R.C. § 469 (1986).

FN40. Recourse means the debtor has personal liability. U.C.C. § 3-414(1) (1987). The lender may obtain a personal judgment against the debtor. For examples of tax effects of recourse liability, see Treas. Reg. § 1.1001-2(a) and (c) (1980).

FN41. Treas. Reg. §§ 1.1001-2(a)(2), (b), and (c) ex. 8 (1980).

FN42. Id. But see supra notes 5 and 33 for a discussion of the interest adjustment which may reduce the amount of gain realized.

FN43. Texas Gas Distrib. Co. v. Comm'r, 3 T.C. 57 (1944).

FN44. Evidently, in order to avoid the CODI exclusions and a conflict with other court decisions and Treasury Department regulations, the Treasury Department withdrew its acquiescence on June 15, 1987 in Texas Gas Distrib. Co. v. Comm'r, 3 T.C. 57 (1987) (revised action on decision, dated June 15, 1987). The amount realized upon the transfer of property to satisfy a nonrecourse note is not less than the amount of the debt even if the fair market value of the property is less than the debt. I.R.C. § 7701(g) (1986).

FN48. For a discussion of installment payment agreements, see SALTZMAN, IRS PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE ¶15.05 (1981) [hereinafter, SALTZMAN].

FN49. 11 U.S.C. §§ 507(a)(6), 524(a), 523(a)(1)(A) and (B). See SALTZMAN, supra note 48, ¶16.11, for further discussion of bankruptcy effects on income tax liabilities and liens. Some individual taxpayers file for bankruptcy primarily to trap in the bankruptcy estate, which is a separate taxpayer, the income tax resulting from the gain recognized and/or CODI on the transfer of property to a creditor to satisfy the taxpayer's debt. I.R.C. §§ 1398(a) and (c) (1986). However, if there is no equity in an asset, the bankruptcy trustee may abandon the asset to the debtor who subsequently transfers the asset to the creditor. Some taxpayers believe that the abandonment results in gain to the bankruptcy estate and an adjusted basis in the abandoned property to the taxpayer equal to the amount of the indebtedness against the abandoned property. This argument is based upon the negative implication of I.R.C. § 1398(f)(2) (1986) that a transfer from the bankruptcy estate to the debtor in the termination of the bankruptcy estate is not a disposition which will result in gain or loss recognized; thus, an abandonment by the bankruptcy trustee, which is not a termination, should result in gain or loss recognition to the bankruptcy estate subject to other nonrecognition provisions. The fallacy of this argument is that an abandonment for bankruptcy purposes does not result in a disposition or transfer for income tax purposes.

FN69. I.R.C. § 1001(a) (1986). Gain realized from settlements or lawsuits will be included (recognized) in gross income unless a nonrecognition provision applies. I.R.C. § 1001(c) (1986). Nonrecognition I.R.C. sections include § 1031 (like-kind exchange), § 1033 (involuntary conversion), § 1034 (sale of principal residence), and § 121 (election by taxpayer, aged 55 or over, to exclude up to $125,000 of gain from gross income).

FN70. See supra notes 47-63 and accompanying text.

FN71. For a discussion of possible gain, see supra notes 37-41 and accompanying text.

FN72. See supra notes 13-20 and accompanying text (CODI exclusions).

FN73. Capital losses can be used to offset capital gains plus the lesser of $3,000 or taxable income. I.R.C. § 1211(b) (1986). Thus, capital losses in excess of capital gains will offset a maximum of $3,000 of ordinary gain or CODI each year. Capital losses not used are carried forward. I.R.C. § 1212 (1986).

FN74. Tax credits which may be used to reduce taxes from the gain or CODI include carryovers of investment tax credit. I.R.C. § 39(d) (1986). An investment tax credit is generally not available for property placed in service after December 31, 1985. I.R.C. § 49(a) (1986).

FN75. After the federal income tax is assessed under I.R.C. § 6203 (1986), the IRS will send a notice and demand for payment of the tax. I.R.C. § 6303 (1986). If the taxpayer fails to pay the tax within 10 days after the notice and demand is sent, the IRS may levy on all of the taxpayer's property or rights to property, unless the property or right is exempt. I.R.C. §§ 6331, 6334 (1986) (for levy and exempt property, respectively).

FN76. 11 U.S.C.A. § 507(a)(7)(A)(i) (West Supp. 1987).

FN77. See supra note 75.

FN78. I.R.C. § 1041(a) (1986).

FN79. I.R.C. § 1041(b) (1986).

FN80. If the loan is nonrecourse, then the transferee will have only gain to report and no CODI. If the loan is recourse, then there may be gain or loss and/or CODI. See supra notes 38-41 and the accompanying text (discussion of the tax consequences to the transferee spouse).

FN81. See supra notes 18-25 and accompanying text (discussing of these exceptions).

FN82. A spouse is not liable for the other spouse's federal income taxes unless a joint federal income tax return is filed. I.R.C. § 6013 (1986). However, even if a joint return is filed, an innocent spouse may not be liable for unreported items. I.R.C. § 6013(e) (1986). A transfer of property by one spouse to the other spouse after tax liability has accrued may result in transferor liability to the transferee spouse. See SALTZMAN, supra note 48, at ¶¶17.01-17.06.

FN83. Because the transferor is not liable for federal income taxes, except to the extent of federal income taxes on his or her share of CODI which is not excluded from gross income under I.R.C. § 108 (1986), the IRS will be unable to levy on the transferor's assets unless the step-transaction doctrine applies. See supra note 75 and accompanying text (discussion of the tax collection procedures).

FN84. For a complete discussion of the different theories behind the step transaction doctrine, see McDonald's Restaurants, Inc. v. Comm'r, 688 F.2d 520 (7th Cir. 1982). See also Gutkin, Step Transactions, 9 N.Y.U. INST. ON FED. TAX'N 1219 (1951).

FN85. Glenn E. Edgar, 56 T.C. 717, 738-39 (1971). If a tax return is timely filed for the transfer between the two spouses and more than 3 years has expired since the latter of the filing of the tax returns or the due date of the returns, the statute of limitations has expired for the transaction between the two spouses unless there is fraud or a substantial omission from gross income. I.R.C. §§ 6501(a) and (c) (1986).

FN87. Id.

FN88. If a debt is recourse, then the transferor may have gain or loss and/or CODI. See supra notes 40 and 41 and accompanying text. Satisfaction of nonrecourse debt may result in gain or loss, but no CODI, because the amount realized on nonrecourse debt satisfaction is never less than the amount of the debt. See supra notes 38 and 39 and accompanying text.

FN89. See supra notes 40 and 41 and accompanying text. This factor only influences recourse debt since there may be CODI if the FMV is less than the debt.

FN90. If the adjusted basis is less than the FMV and debt, the transferor will have gain to the extent of the excess. The amount of the gain will depend upon whether the debt is recourse or nonrecourse. See supra notes 38-41 and accompanying text and infra note 91 and accompanying text. Loss will result if the fair market value (recourse) or debt (nonrecourse) is less than the adjusted basis. See supra notes 38-41 and accompanying text.

FN91. I.R.C. § 7701(g) (1986) requires the amount realized to be not less than the amount of the unpaid debt. See also Comm'r v. Tufts, 461 U.S. 300 (1983).

FN92. CODI may be excluded under one of the various CODI exceptions. See supra notes 18-22 and accompanying text. Gain may be excluded only if a nonrecognition provision of the I.R.C. applies. See supra note 69 (some of the nonrecognition provisions).

FN93. See supra notes 40 and 41 and accompanying text. The change from nonrecourse to recourse liability could increase the risk to the taxpayer since the note holder could pursue the taxpayer's other assets if the property subject to the liability did not satisfy the taxpayer's obligations.

FN94. Id. Gain is equal to the difference between the fair market value of $400,000 and an adjusted basis of $100,000. I.R.C. § 1001(a) (1986). A contract seller may have gain to report if the seller reported the sale on the installment method. I.R.C. § 453B(a) (1986). But see I.R.C. § 1038 (1986) for nonrecognition rules on all or part of the gain. A lender may have a bad debt deduction for any tax loss incurred due to the transfer of property and/or cancellation of debt. I.R.C. § 166(a) (1986).

FN95. See supra note 9 for a discussion of CODI.

FN96. See supra notes 18-22 and accompanying text.

FN97. I.R.C. § 1001(a) and (c) (1986).

FN98. The gain realized of $900,000 equals the amount realized ($1,000,000) which is not less than the amount of the debt, less the adjusted basis of $100,000. See supra notes 88-91.

FN99. I.R.C. § 1031(a) (1986). 'Like-kind' refers to the 'nature or character of the property and not to its grade or quality.' Treas. Reg. § 1.1031(a)-1(b) (as amended in 1967). Thus, unimproved real estate for improved real estate will qualify as like-kind property. Treas. Reg. § 1.1031-(a) (as amended in 1967). The amount of liabilities assumed by the transferee, or the amount of liabilities to which the property is subject, is treated as money received by the transferor. I.R.C. § 1031(d) (1986). Thus, if the transferor realized a gain on the like-kind exchange and receives nonlike-kind property, the transferor will have to recognize gain to the extent of the lesser gain or the amount treated as money received unless the transferor transfers money to the transferee and/or assumes liabilities on the property received in the exchange (or takes property subject to liabilities) at least equal to the liabilities on the property transferred. Treas. Reg. § 1.1031(d)-2 (1956).

FN100. I.R.C. § 1031(d) (1986). See also Treas. Reg. § 1.1031(d)-2 (1960).

FN101. For example, if the Riches exchanged their land and building (FMV = $400,000, adjusted basis = $100,000, subject to First Credit Union's mortgage of $300,000) for a parking lot with a fair market value of $800,000 and subject to a mortgage of $700,000, the Riches will pay the principal on the mortgage over a period of years with after-tax dollars unless the parking lot is depreciable. Assuming that the Riches are in a 28% tax bracket and the parking lot is not depreciable, the Riches will need $972,222 before federal income taxes to pay off the mortgage. If the Riches are in the 28% tax bracket and the Riches can depreciate $650,000 of the parking lot cost, only $719,444 in before-tax dollars will be required to fully pay the Riches' $700,000 mortgage.

FN102. A transfer of assets is tax free to the transferor if property is transferred in exchange for stock and securities and the transferor controls the corporation immediately after the transfer. I.R.C. § 351(a) (1986). Numerous pitfalls to a tax free incorporation may occur. For example:

a. Services are not property; thus, stock and securities issued for services will not be received tax free by the transferor. I.R.C. §§ 351(d)(1), 83(a) (1986).

b. If the corporation is an investment company and the transfer results in diversification to the transferor, then the transfer will not be subject to the nonrecognition provisions of I.R.C. § 351(a). I.R.C. § 351(e)(1) (1986); Treas. Reg. § 1.351-1(c) (1967).

c. If the transferor incorporates a going concern and has prepaid expenses and/or accumulated accounts receivable prior to incorporation, the IRS may reallocate the income and/or deduction items. Rev. Rul. 80-198, 1982-2 C.B. 113.

d. If the corporation is an existing corporation, the transferor may not have control of the corporation immediately after the transfer. Control is defined as 80% of the voting power of the corporation plus 80% of each class of non-voting stock. I.R.C. § 368(c) (1986); Rev. Rul. 59-259, 1959-2 C.B. 115.

See BITTKER & EUSTICE, FEDERAL INCOME TAXATION OF CORPORATIONS AND SHAREHOLDERS ch. 3 (5th Ed. 1987), (thorough discussion of tax-free incorporations).

FN103. The corporation has the same adjusted basis that the shareholder had in property transferred to the corporation, plus any gain recognized to the transferor/shareholder. I.R.C. § 362(b) (1986). Therefore, when the corporation transfers the property to the creditor, the analysis of the tax effects to the corporation will be similar to the Riches' analysis of their transfer to creditors. See supra notes 38-44 and accompanying text.

FN104. The general rule of I.R.C. § 357(a) (1986) results in the liabilities not being treated as money or other property; thus, the liabilities would not trigger the recognition of gain under I.R.C. § 351(b) (1986). However, I.R.C. § 357(c) (1986) requires a taxpayer to report the excess of the nondeductible liabilities over the adjusted basis of transferred properties as gain. The transferor's adjusted basis in the stock or securities received in the exchange is reduced by the amount of the liabilities which the corporation takes subject to, or by the amount which the corporation assumes. I.R.C. § 358(d)(1) (1986). If the principal purpose of the assumption of liabilities by the corporation was not a business purpose or was to avoid federal income tax liability on the transfer, then all of the liabilities assumed or acquired by the corporation would be regarded as money received by the transferor. I.R.C. § 357(b) (1986). The latter rule takes precedence over the liabilities in excess of basis rule. I.R.C. § 357(c)(2)(A) (1986).

FN105. The balancing of liabilities and adjusted bases of assets can occur in one of several ways. For example:

a. The transferor may retain the liabilities instead of transferring them to the corporation.

b. The transferor may contribute money or assets with sufficient adjusted bases to offset the liabilities acquired by the corporation. The contribution of the transferor's promissory note to the corporation will not increase the transferor's basis since the transferor has a zero basis in that promissory note. Rev. Rul. 68-629, 1968-2 C.B. 154.

c. The transferor may withhold property which is subject to liabilities in excess of basis and lease such property to the corporation.

FN106. See supra notes 84-87 and accompanying text (discussion of the application of the step-transaction doctrine).

FN107. The income and deduction items of an S Corporation, in most cases, flow through the S Corporation to its shareholders in proportion to their percentage of stock ownership; thus, an S Corporation is not subject to income tax unless it has built-in gains (I.R.C. § 1374) (1986) or excess net passive income (I.R.C. § 1375) (1986). An S Corporation is a small business corporation, as defined in I.R.C. § 1361(b) (1986), which, with its shareholders, has elected under I.R.C. §§ 1362(a) and (b) (1986) to be treated as an S Corporation. For a thorough discussion of S Corporations, see EUSTICE & KUNTZ, FEDERAL INCOME TAXATION OF S CORPORATIONS (2d ed. 1985).

FN108. If the S Corporation election is not terminated, then the gain and CODI upon the transfer of assets to the creditor will be passed through the S Corporation and reported by the S Corporation's shareholders. See supra note 107. The exclusionary tests of I.R.C. § 108(a) and (b) are applied at the corporate level and not at the shareholder level. I.R.C. § 108(d)(7) (1986). An S Corporation election continues until the election is terminated through revocation (I.R.C. § 1362(d)(1) (1986)); the corporation ceases to be a small business corporation (I.R.C. § 1362(d)(2) (1986)); or for three consecutive years the corporation has subchapter C earnings and profits and more than 25% of the corporation's gross receipts are passive investment income (I.R.C. § 1362(d)(3) (1986)).

FN109. See supra notes 37-43 and accompanying text. But see supra note 77 and accompanying text (discussing the step-transaction doctrine). If the transfer to the creditor occurs after the S Corporation election is terminated, but during the same taxable year as the corporation's termination is effective, the gain and CODI will be allocated on a daily basis. I.R.C. §§ 1362(e)(1) and (2) (1986). Thus, the shareholders will be required to report the portion of the gain and CODI allocated to the short S Corporation taxable year. However, if the corporation and shareholders agree, the S Corporation taxable year will end on the date of termination; therefore, the CODI and gain will be trapped on the regular corporation's tax return because the transfer of assets and debt restructuring occurred in a taxable year when the S Corporation election was not in effect. I.R.C. § 1362(e)(3) (1986). The regular corporation may exclude the CODI if one of the section 108 exceptions applies (see supra notes 18-23) and the gain may be excluded if a nonrecognition section applies (see supra note 69) or if the transaction can be structured to avoid gain. See section III of this article. Query whether the IRS may argue that if the debt is nonrecourse, then a sale or disposition occurs when the S Corporation election is terminated. See infra note 112 (discussion of the occurrence of a sale or disposition when a revocable trust is converted to an irrevocable trust).

FN110. The IRS may argue that the step-transaction doctrine applies or that the transfer to the trust lacks substance. The Tax Court rejected these arguments in Glenn E. Edgar, 56 T.C. 717 (1971); however, if the transaction has no purpose except to avoid income taxes, a court might find that the transfer did lack substance or might apply the step-transaction doctrine. See McDonald's Restaurants, Inc. v. Comm'r, 688 F.2d 520 (7th Cir. 1982) (discussion of the step-transaction doctrine).

FN111. The trust will report and be taxed on the gain realized unless the trust is a grantor trust (I.R.C. §§ 671-78) (1986); the trust is required to distribute its income to the beneficiaries; or it does distribute the income to its beneficiaries and the gain is allocable to the income beneficiaries rather than the trust. I.R.C. §§ 652, 662 (1986); Treas. Reg. § 1.1001-2(a) (1980); Diedrich v. United States, 457 U.S. 191 (1982) (held that taxpayer who transferred assets to children who in turn paid taxpayer's gift taxes recognized gain to the extent that gift taxes exceeded transferor's adjusted basis). If the transfer to the creditors occurs within two years after the taxpayer's transfer of assets to the trust and the trust is taxable on the gain realized, then the trust may pay an income tax on its transfer at the taxpayer's maximum rate. I.R.C. § 644 (1986). The transferor may avoid recognition of gain through proper tax planning. See supra note 105 (ways to balance liabilities and adjusted bases).

FN112. A transfer of assets and liabilities to a revocable trust will not trigger tax consequences to the transferor because the transferor/taxpayer is regarded as the owner of the trust for most tax purposes. Rev. Rul. 77-402, 1977-2 C.B. 222; Madorin v. Comm'r, 84 T.C. 667 (1985). Furthermore, when the revocable trust transfers assets to satisfy liabilities, the gain and CODI will pass through to the settlor (transferor) of the trust. I.R.C. § 674 (1986). If the transferor releases the power(s) which makes the transferor the owner of the trust, the transferor may report a gain under the recourse (see supra notes 40-42) or nonrecourse (see supra note 39) debt rules. Treas. Reg. § 1.1001-2(c) ex. (5) (1980).

FN114. If the debt is recourse, see supra notes 40-42 and accompanying text. If the debt is nonrecourse, see supra notes 38 and 39 and accompanying text.

FN115. See supra notes 18-25 and 36-47 and accompanying text.

FN120. For example, if a taxpayer who is not in bankruptcy transfers property to a creditor to satisfy debt, has gain of $100 on the transfer, and is insolvent to the extent of $60, then the taxpayer will exclude $60 of the gain from gross income under I.R.C. § 108(a) (1986). The remainder of the gain ($40) will be subject to the normal tax rules for gain. See supra note 47 and accompanying text.

FN128. See supra note 6.

FN129. Note that even if a taxpayer transferred only $1 to the creditor to satisfy a $1,000,000 debt and the taxpayer was insolvent before and after the transaction, then the taxpayer would have no CODI or gain.

*323 ESSENTIALS OF BANKRUPTCY TAX LAW

Paul B. Geilich [FNa1]

Bankruptcy lawyers' decisions and advice can profoundly affect their clients' tax liability. Unfortunately, these tax consequences are often unpremeditated. Perhaps because bankruptcy practice requires a hard-earned familiarity with its own complicated statutes and procedures, bankruptcy professionals tend to rely on others for tax advice rather than tackle the intricacies of the Internal Revenue Code themselves. Nevertheless, it is essential for bankruptcy attorneys and judges to establish a sound foundation in insolvency and bankruptcy tax law. Every attorney practicing in or around bankruptcy cases, whether representing debtors, creditors or trustees, individuals, corporations or partnerships, must understand certain tax rules without reference to manuals or experts, in order to practice competently in the field. Bankruptcy judges must likewise comprehend the tax consequences of various actions by debtors if they are to understand the method and motives behind much of the daily fare presented in their courts. The following is an analysis of the most commonly encountered bankruptcy tax issues, with an emphasis on current developments and emerging trends in the case law.

Duty to File Returns and Pay Taxes

Upon the commencement of a chapter 7 or chapter 11 case, an individual debtor's assets are deemed to be transferred to the estate. [FN1] This transfer of assets, as well as the revesting of assets in the debtor upon the closing of the case or confirmation of the plan, are not "dispositions" and, therefore, do not trigger tax liabitity. [FN2]

The estate of an individual chapter 7 or 11 debtor is a separate taxable entity, which must file tax returns and pay taxes. [FN3] The trustee of an individual's chapter 7 or 11 estate must file a federal income tax return if the estate's gross income for the taxable year is higher than the personal exemption amount plus 324 the basic standard deduction. [FN4]

In contrast to chapter 7 and 11 cases, no separate taxable entity is created by an individual's filing of a chapter 13 case. [FN5] The distinction results from the fact that in chapter 13, unlike chapters 7 and 11, the estate includes property and income received by the debtor after commencement of the case. [FN6] Because no taxable entity is created, a chapter 13 trustee is not responsible for filing federal income tax returns.

The filing of a chapter 7 or 11 case by a corporation likewise does not create a new taxable entity. [FN7] However, a chapter 7 or 11 trustee of a corporate debtor's estate is expressly charged with the duty of filing tax returns on behalf of the corporation. [FN8] This is true whether or not the debtor's property or business continues in operation. [FN9]

Nor does the filing of a bankruptcy case by a partnership create a new taxable entity. [FN10] The provisions of Internal Revenue Code §§ 1398 and 1399, dealing with the treatment of taxable entities in individual and corporate bankruptcy cases, are expressly inapplicable at the partnership level. [FN11] A partnership interest owned by an individual debtor is treated in the same manner as any other interest owned by the debtor. [FN12]

Because the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 [FN13] was enacted prior to the creation of chapter 12 in 1986, [FN14] uncertainty has always existed as to the tax treatment of a chapter 12 estate. Internal Revenue Code § 1399 states that no separate taxable entity results from the commencement of a bankruptcy case except a case to which § 1398 applies, and § 1398 applies by its terms only 325 to chapter 7 and chapter 11 cases. Furthermore, like chapter 13, chapter 12 provides that property of the estate includes property and income received by the debtor after the commencement of a case. [FN15] In contrast, however, a chapter 12 trustee is required to file state and local tax returns for the estate in precisely the same manner required under chapter 11. [FN16] This inconsistency has caused much debate, since it seems unfair to deny the family farmer, typically more of a businessman than a consumer, the favorable tax planning techniques available to an individual debtor in a chapter 7 or a chapter 11 case. Nevertheless, the plain meaning of §§ 1398 and 1399 seems to require the conclusion that a chapter 12 estate is not a separate taxable entity, and the Internal Revenue Service has expressly taken this position in a private letter ruling. [FN17]

Whenever a trustee must file a tax return, he or she is also required to pay the tax as determined by the return. [FN18] This duty exists without need for assessment, notice or demand from the Internal Revenue Service. [FN19] A trustee who fails to prepare tax returns and pay taxes may be personally "surcharged" for penalties and interest accruing as a result. [FN20]

In Holywell Corporation v. Smith [FN21] the United States Supreme Court recently ruled that the trustee of a liquidating trust formed under a chapter 11 plan of reorganization had a duty to file federal income tax returns and pay taxes. The court held that the trustee was an "assignee" of the bankruptcy estate, and was, therefore, required to file returns and pay taxes under Internal Revenue Code § 6012(b)(3). The trustee argued that the liquidating trust was a "grantor trust" and the debtor a "grantor" as defined in Treasury regulations, in which case the debtor would be obliged to pay taxes on any income of the trust applied in discharge of the debtor's obligations. [FN22] But the Court ruled that in this case the property of the estate never revested in the debtor upon confirmation. Rather, it was assigned directly to the liquidating trust, so the debtor could not have been a grantor. [FN23]

326 Priority of Tax Claims

Taxes incurred by the estate subsequent to commencement of the case are first priority administrative expenses. [FN24] Most other tax claims receive seventh priority treatment under Bankruptcy Code § 507(a)(7). [FN25] These include:

(a) Pre-petition income and gross receipt taxes to the extent the tax return was due either after the petition date or three years before the petition was filed, including any requested extensions.

(b) Income and gross receipt taxes assessed any time within 240 days before the commencement of the case, plus any extensions, or assessed after the filing of the case under applicable law or by agreement.

(c) Real and personal property taxes assessed pre-petition and payable without penalty within one year prior to the filing of the case.

(d) Taxes required to be collected or withheld by the debtor, e.g., employee withholding taxes, regardless of age.

(e) An employer's share of employment taxes on wages and salaries, whether or not the wages were actually paid, if the return for these was last due within three years before the petition was filed or after the petition was filed.

(f) Federal, state and local excise taxes, for which a return is due in the three years prior to the filing of the case, or after the case is filed.

(g) Customs duties on imports, subject to certain age restrictions.

(h) Penalties related to any of the above tax claims, but only if in compensation for actual pecuniary loss, as opposed to fines. [FN26]

An interesting twist is added by Bankruptcy Code § 724(b)(2). [FN27] Under this section secured tax claims are subordinated to unsecured claims given priority under § 507(a)(1)-(6). [FN28] This has the curious effect of "securing" priority unsecured claims up to the amount of the tax lien in chapter 7 cases. If priority unsecured claims equal or exceed the amount of the tax lien, the tax is completely unsecured, which allows junior lienholders to be paid to the exclusion of an apparently senior tax lien. [FN29]

327 Discharge of Tax Indebtedness

The tax liability of a corporate debtor in a chapter 7 case or a liquidating chapter 11 case is never discharged. [FN30] However, an individual debtor may receive a discharge from any tax claims not granted priority under Bankruptcy Code § 507(a)(2) ("gap" claims in involuntary cases) or § 507(a)(7). [FN31] Therefore, subject to the exceptions set forth below, federal income tax claims against individuals are discharged if they were incurred with regard to returns for which the due date, including extensions, is more than three years before the bankruptcy petition is filed, and for which no assessment has been made within the 240 days prior to the filing of the case. [FN32]

It is quite possible for taxes more than three years old to be non-dischargeable because they have been assessed within 240 days of the bankruptcy case. For example, a tax otherwise dischargeable under the three-year rule could be unassessed pending an audit, or due to litigation in the U.S. Tax Court, during which time the debtor is not required to pay the disputed tax. If the audit results in liability, or the debtor loses the Tax Court case, the Internal Revenue Service will assess the tax, and then has 240 days to perfect its liens and collect the tax before the claim becomes dischargeable in bankruptcy. [FN33] If the taxpayer makes an offer in compromise within the 240-day period prior to filing the bankruptcy case, this 240 day period is tolled during the time that the offer is pending. Once the offer terminates, the Service is given an additional 30 days to conduct its lien perfection and collection activities before the tax becomes dischargeable. [FN34]

Exceptions to the discharge apply if no return was filed, [FN35] a fraudulent return was filed, the debtor willfully attempted to evade or defeat the tax, [FN36] or if a late return was filed within two years prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition. [FN37]

Balances remaining due on taxes after successful completion of a confirmed chapter 13 plan are discharged. [FN38]

Determination of Tax Liability of the Estate

Generally, the bankruptcy estate is entitled to the same deductions the 328 debtor had on assets transferred to the estate. [FN39] The estate also succeeds to most of the debtor's tax attributes for the last full taxable year, as follows: (a) net operating loss carryovers, (b) charitable contribution carryovers, (c) recovery of tax benefit items, (d) tax credit carryovers, (e) capital loss carryovers, and (f) basis, holding period and character of pre-petition assets. [FN40]

The cancellation of debt received by an individual debtor upon discharge in a bankruptcy case does not result in taxable income. [FN41] However, the estate's tax attributes will be reduced by the amount of the debtor's discharge, [FN42] in the following order:

(a) Net operating losses [FN43]

(b) General business credit

(c) Capital loss carryovers

(d) Basis in assets

(e) Foreign tax credit carryovers [FN44]

Section 505 of the Bankruptcy Code [FN45] provides a trustee or debtor-in-possession an opportunity to seek determination of any tax liability from the bankruptcy court. [FN46] This determination may be made even if the tax has previously been assessed, although a previously contested and adjudicated tax may not be relitigated before the bankruptcy court. [FN47]

A trustee may also request a taxing authority to determine any unpaid tax liability of the estate by submitting a tax return and a request for such determination. [FN48] If the tax shown on the return is paid by the trustee, and the taxpaying authority does not notify the trustee within sixty days after a request for 329 determination that the return has been selected for examination, the trustee, the debtor and any successor to the debtor are discharged of any further tax liability. [FN49]

Two courts have recently decided that, although Bankruptcy Code § 505(b)(1)(A) discharges the trustee and the debtor from personal liability for estate taxes after expiration of the statutory 60-day period, the estate does not receive the same protection. The courts reasoned that, because the bankruptcy estate is not a "trustee, debtor or successor to the debtor," it is not discharged under § 505(b)(1)(A) and must pay the tax claims so long as the estate remains open. [FN50]

Debtor's Short Tax Year Election

Individual debtors in chapter 7 or 11 cases may elect to treat the year in which the bankruptcy petition is filed as two taxable years, the first of which ends on the day before the petition is filed ("the short year"), and the second of which begins on the day the petition is filed. [FN51] The election is irrevocable, and may be made only if the debtor owns non-exempt assets. [FN52] The deadline for making the election, and for filing the tax return for the short year, is the fifteenth day of the fourth full month following the end of the short year. [FN53] If a chapter 7 or 11 case is dismissed, a previously- made short year election is extinguished and all taxes incurred by the estate pass back to the debtor. [FN54]

If the short year election is made, the debtor's tax liability for the short year becomes an allowable pre-petition claim against the estate. Therefore, assets of the estate must be used to pay any tax liability for that period. If the estate cannot pay the taxes for lack of available funds, the debtor remains liable for any non-dischargeable taxes not paid by the estate. [FN55]

A myriad of bewildering hypothetical situations have been used over the years to confuse bankruptcy lawyers about the applicability of the short year election to a given set of facts. Complex financial statements and transactions, of course, can always make the determination of tax liability difficult. The deciphering of these transactions for tax return purposes is perhaps best left to a tax expert. But once the expert has determined taxable income or loss for the proposed two taxable years, the bankruptcy lawyer's work is reduced to 330 a relatively simple evaluation of the proposed tax return for the short year. If the short year return would result in a tax liability, the election should probably be made since this would become a liability of the estate. If, however, the short year return would result in a net loss, i.e., a tax attribute, by foregoing the election the debtor should be able to use the loss to offset post-petition income. [FN56]

Directed Application of Tax Payments

Responsible officers or employees of corporations, or partners or employees of partnerships, who willingly fail to collect and pay employee withholding taxes are personally liable for a penalty equal to the total amount of the tax evaded. [FN57] To avoid this 100% penalty, officers or partners of financially troubled business organizations often cause the entity to make payments to the Internal Revenue Service with directions to apply the payments to these "trust fund" taxes. [FN58] So long as the payment is entirely voluntary, the taxpayer has the right so to direct the application of the payment to whatever type of liability it chooses. [FN59]

Involuntary payments by the taxpayer, however, may be applied by the Service as it sees fit. [FN60] A payment is generally deemed involuntary if it is received as a result of distraint or levy, or from a legal proceeding where the government files a claim or seeks to collect delinquent taxes. [FN61] Payments made by the estate in chapter 7 bankruptcy cases are almost always held to be involuntary. [FN62]

Until recently, the Service took the position that payments received during chapter 11 cases were likewise involuntary. [FN63] This issue divided the circuits until the case of United States v. Energy Resources Company, [FN64] in which the United States Supreme Court ruled that a bankruptcy court may order the Internal Revenue Service to apply chapter 11 payments to trust fund taxes as directed under a confirmed plan of reorganization "if necessary for the success *331 of the plan," whether or not the payments are considered involuntary. [FN65] The Court pointed out that the Service could still collect the 100% penalty from responsible officers and employees under Internal Revenue Code § 6672. [FN66]

Abandonment of Property by the Trustee

A problem frequently arises when a bankruptcy estate holds property with a low tax basis which is subject to debt in excess of its fair market value. Although there is clearly no value in the property for creditors, if the trustee allows the automatic stay to lift and the secured creditor to foreclose, the transfer of title will trigger taxable gain to the estate if the basis in the property is less than the foreclosure price. [FN67]

The abrupt rise in real property foreclosures in the latter half of the 1980's spawned creative attempts by debtors to avoid recapture of accelerated depreciation by filing a bankruptcy petition just prior to foreclosure, in order to trap the recapture liability in the estate. Trustees reacted by abandoning the property back to the debtor [FN68] before the stay could be lifted and the property foreclosed while in the estate, which rendered the debtor liable for any tax consequences resulting from a subsequent disposition of the property, including foreclosure. [FN69]

The debtor bears a heavy burden as a result of this strategy by the trustee. Although the debtor is fully liable for the taxes, the debtor's non-exempt assets and tax attributes are owned by the estate and are not available to pay the tax liability. In addition, the adjusted basis in the property may have been further reduced while in the estate by the reduction in tax attributes resulting from the debtor's discharge.

One district court recently decided that Internal Revenue Code § 1398(f)(2), [FN70] relied upon by trustees to shield the abandonment from the usual taxable event rules, does not apply to § 554 abandonments under the *332 Bankruptcy Code. [FN71] Under this case the abandonment by the trustee generates a tax liability which the estate must bear. The court reasoned that this is not an unfair burden because the estate succeeds to the tax attributes of the debtor upon commencement of the case, which it can use to offset all or part of the tax liability. [FN72]

Conclusion

Knowledge of these tax rules will not convert bankruptcy lawyers into tax lawyers, but it will provide a sound basis for advising financially troubled clients of the major tax consequences of their actions, and will help identify the dividing line between expert insolvency advice and inexpert tax advice. By no means does this synopsis provide an exhaustive review of all bankruptcy tax issues, but a thorough familiarity with these key concepts could at least save some potential embarrassment, and perhaps much more.

FN2. 26 U.S.C.A. § 1398(f)(1) (West 1988). Title 26 of the United States Code is the Internal Revenue Code. The Bankruptcy Code is contained in title 11.

FN3. 26 U.S.C.A. § 1399 (West 1988). As a fiduciary of the new entity, a chapter 7 or 11 trustee must obtain a new taxpayer identification number and file Form 1041-U.S. Fiduciary Income Tax Return.

FN4. 26 U.S.C.A. §§ 6012(a)(9) & (b)(4) (West 1989). Currently the sum of the personal exemption amount plus the basic standard deduction (for bankruptcy estates, deemed to be equal to the deduction for married individuals filing separately) is $5,300.

FN5. 26 U.S.C.A. § 1399 (West 1988). This should be distingished from the separate treatment of a chapter 13 estate for bankruptcy purposes.

FN6. 11 U.S.C.A. § 1306(a) (West 1979 & Supp.1992).

FN7. 26 U.S.C.A. § 1399 (West 1988).

FN8. 26 U.S.C.A. § 6012(b)(3) (West 1989). Because no separate taxable entity is created, a chapter 7 or 11 trustee's corporate tax return is not a fiduciary return, but is filed on behalf of the corporation on the same forms used if no bankruptcy case were involved.

FN9. Trustees of operating estates must withhold income and social security taxes from payment of wages or wage claims of employees of the estate. 26 U.S.C.A. § 3401(d) (West 1989); 26 U.S.C.A. § 3402(a) (West 1989 & Supp.1992). Under currently pending S. 1985, 102d Cong., 2d Sess. § 404(a) (1991) (sponsored by Senators Hefflin and Grassley), a trustee would be required to maintain a separate bank account for post-petition withholding and social security taxes, deposit all such taxes therein, and remit the taxes to the appropriate governmental unit in a timely manner.

FN66. This does not solve the problem presented when the corporation has just enough funds available to pay the trust fund taxes, but no more. I.R.S. Policy Statement P-5-60.

FN67. For example: An estate holds property with an adjusted basis of $100 which has a fair market value of $200 and is subject to secured recourse debt of $300. If the trustee allows the stay to lift and the property is foreclosed at $200, a taxable gain of $100 accrues to the estate.

FN69. 26 U.S.C.A. §§ 108(b)(2) & (b)(5) (West 1988 & Supp.1992). A possible planning device allowing the debtor to avoid this problem is to identify property likely to be abandoned and dispose of it in a non-fraudulent manner prior to filing the bankruptcy petition. Once the bankruptcy case is filed and the short tax year is elected, any liability arising from the disposition is a liability of the estate, although excess liability after the estate's funds are exhausted, is a non-dischargeable liability of the debtor.

THE TAX CONSEQUENCES OF STOCK-FOR-DEBT EXCHANGES

University of Pittsburgh School of Law

Karrie L. Bercik [FNa]

I. INTRODUCTION

Corporate debt restructurings and bankruptcies are reaching a level in the 1990s not approached since the Great Depression. [FN1] Due to the economic slowdown and the aftermath of the leveraged buyouts of the 1980s, many corporations find it necessary to restructure their debt. Often these companies cancel their outstanding debt in exchange for either a new debt interest or an equity interest in the corporation. (This latter exchange is referred to as a "stock-for-debt exchange.") The stock-for-debt exchange is an exception to the general rule that corporations recognize income when they cancel outstanding debt at a discount. This "stock-for-debt exception," however, has been significantly limited by both Congress and the Internal Revenue Service in 1990, at a time when it has been needed most. The author will discuss cancellation of indebtedness income ("COD income") and the exclusion of COD by insolvent and bankrupt companies under Internal Revenue Code s 108 [FN2] and will then analyze the creation and justification of the stock-for-debt exception. Lastly, the author will focus on the limitations placed upon the exception by Congress and the Internal Revenue Service (the "Service").

II. CANCELLATION OF INDEBTEDNESS INCOME

Cancellation of a debt for less than the amount borrowed produces income for the debtor. Thus, if a corporation borrows $1000 and later discharges the debt for $750, the debtor will have $250 of cancellation of indebtedness income. This result is justified by two separate theories. [FN3]

The first approach, the balance sheet test, looks at the debtor's position in balance sheet terms. If the debtor borrows $1000, its balance sheet would reflect an asset (cash) of $1000 and a corresponding liability (the loan obligation) of $1000. The debtor's net worth is zero. When the corporation later discharges the debt for $750, the corporation's assets are reduced by $750 ($1000 - $750 = $250). The liability, however, is eliminated ($1000 - $1000 = $0). At this point the debtor has an increase in net worth of $250. This increase in net worth is income.

The second approach focuses on the fact that at the time the corporation borrows money the corporation receives cash, but is not required to include that cash in income. Borrowing money is not a realization event. Until a realization event occurs, the taxpayer does not include the borrowed money in income. When the debt is discharged at a discount, however, the tax deferral on the cash ends because the cash proceeds of the initial loan are no longer burdened by the repayment obligation. The discharge of indebtedness is a realization event triggering income to the taxpayer. Courts following this approach require the debt to be issued for cash or property. [FN4] Since this approach to COD income seeks to tax the original cash received that is not later repaid, there must be an original receipt of cash or property.

A. Inclusion of COD Income

1. The Common Law Approach

The principle that gross income includes cancellation of indebtedness has been long established. [FN5] Although Treasury regulations adopted this principle as early as 1918, [FN6] the concept of COD income derived from the well-known Kirby Lumber [FN7] decision of the Supreme Court in 1931.

In Kirby Lumber, the taxpayer issued its own bonds receiving $12,126,800. The bonds were not issued for cash, but in exchange for Kirby Lumber's preferred stock, on which there were dividend arrearages. [FN8] The same bonds were repurchased later in the year at a discount of $137,521.30. The Court held the discount was taxable income in the year of the repurchase, stating that: "[a]s a result of its dealings, [a taxpayer] made available $137,521.30 assets previously offset by the obligation of bonds now extinct. [The taxpayer] has realized within the year an accession to income, if we take words in their popular meaning...." [FN9]

2. The Statutory Approach

The Kirby Lumber "freeing of assets" concept is codified in section 61(a)(12), which provides that "gross income means all income from whatever source derived, including income from discharge of indebtedness." The regulations state that a taxpayer may realize income "by the payment or purchase of his obligations at less than their face value." [FN10]

B. The Exclusion of COD Income

1. Common Law Exceptions

Numerous common law exceptions developed excluding COD from income. COD income was excluded from gross income where the taxpayer was insolvent before and after the debt discharge. [FN11] The courts reasoned that the discharge of debts cannot "free" assets of a debtor that remained insolvent even after the discharge, since the debtor still had a negative net worth. If the discharge made the taxpayer solvent, COD income was included to the extent of such solvency. [FN12]

The insolvency exception is justified today by reference to bankruptcy policy. Although cancellation of a debt improves the balance sheet, the debtor does not have any more cash after the discharge. The debtor needs to be shielded from tax on economic income that it is unable to currently pay.

2. Statutory Exclusion of COD Income

Congress determined that relief from COD income was necessary in bankruptcy proceedings. Bankruptcy laws would be frustrated if relief from debt created income tax liabilities jeopardizing the debtor's recovery. [FN13] To protect debtors, Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 codifying the judicial insolvency exception. [FN14] The Senate Report stated:

> The rules of the bill concerning income tax treatment of debt discharge in bankruptcy are intended to accommodate bankruptcy policy and tax policy. To preserve the debtor's 'fresh start' after bankruptcy, the bill provides that no income is recognized by reason of debt discharge in bankruptcy, so that a debtor coming out of bankruptcy (or an insolvent debtor outside bankruptcy) is not burdened with an immediate tax liability. [FN15]

Thus, 26 U.S.C. s 108(a)(1) provides that COD income is excluded from gross income if the discharge occurs in a title 11 case or when the taxpayer is insolvent. [FN16] Section 108(a)(3) limits the amount of COD income excluded to the amount of the debtor's insolvency. The term "title 11 case" means a case under title 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, but only if the taxpayer is under the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court and the discharge is granted by the court or is pursuant to a plan approved by the court. [FN17] "Insolvent" is defined as "the excess of liabilities over the fair market value of assets" [FN18] and is determined on the basis of the taxpayer's assets and liabilities immediately before the discharge. [FN19]

Taxpayers under title 11 have a significant advantage over other insolvent taxpayers because title 11 taxpayers need not prove their net worth. Outside of bankruptcy, a taxpayer must demonstrate its insolvency by valuation of assets. Some authorities suggest that contingent liabilities should be considered in measuring insolvency. [FN20] The courts have held that insolvency valuation requires a computation of any goodwill or going concern values inherent in the taxpayer's business. [FN21] The fair market value of such assets may be difficult to determine in a troubled company restructuring.

> Example 1: D, a financially distressed corporation not under title 11 has assets valued at $75x and liabilities of $100x. An out of court restructuring of D's debt results in $50x of COD income. Under current law, D may only exclude $25x of COD under section 108(a), the amount of D's insolvency prior to the discharge. D will recognize $25x of COD income. Had D been a title 11 debtor, D could exclude the entire $50x, without regard to D's insolvency.

In cases of insolvency, the debt and equity structure of the debtor may be scrutinized. If the debt of a thinly capitalized corporation is recharacterized as equity, the corporate debtor may become solvent. The result of such a recharacterization may be recognition of COD income. [FN22]

C. Attribute Reduction

1. Under Section 108(b)

Although section 108(a) excludes COD income from gross income, the taxpayer must pay a price for such exclusion. Although bankruptcy may be an inappropriate occasion to tax COD income, the debtor should not be able to enjoy both tax-free relief from debts and carryover of the losses created by the borrowed funds. [FN23] The debtor is entitled to a "fresh start, not a head start." [FN24] Section 108(b) therefore provides that the debtor's tax attributes will be reduced when COD income is excluded under section 108(a).

Section 108 is a deferral provision. The COD income excluded reduces certain specified tax attributes of the debtor, eliminating tax savings in the future. [FN25] The attributes are reduced in the following order:

(1) Net operating loss (NOL) for the taxable year of the discharge and any net operating loss carryover to such taxable year.

(2) Any carryover to or from the taxable year of a discharge of an amount for purposes of determining the amount allowable as a credit under section 38 (relating to general business credit).

(3) Net capital loss for the taxable year of the discharge, and any capital loss carryover to such taxable year under section 1212.

(4) The basis of the property of the taxpayer as provided in section 1017.

(5) Any carryover to or from the taxable year of the discharge for purposes of determining the amount of the foreign tax credit. [FN26]

Except for the general business credit and the foreign tax credit, all of the tax attributes are reduced dollar for dollar. The credits are reduced 33 1/3 cents for each dollar of income excluded. [FN27] If the taxpayer has insufficient tax attributes to absorb the excluded COD income, the excess is disregarded and is never considered income to the debtor. [FN28]

After reducing NOLs, business credits and capital losses, section 108(b)(2)(D) provides that the taxpayer must reduce the basis of all the taxpayer's depreciable and nondepreciable property to the extent of the remaining COD income. The basis of the depreciable and nondepreciable property is reduced under the rules of section 1017. [FN29] An important limitation on section 108(b) is section 1017(b)(2), under which the reduction of asset bases cannot exceed the excess of (i) the aggregate of the basis of the property held by the taxpayer immediately after the discharge over (ii) the aggregate of the liabilities of the taxpayer immediately after the discharge. Thus, the tax basis of the debtor's assets after the discharge will not be less than its undischarged liabilities. [FN30]

Example 2: B is involved in a title 11 proceeding. B's creditors agree to accept 50x cash for their 100x debt. B has 25x in NOLs, 5x in capital losses, 1x in investment tax credits and 60x basis in depreciable property. B has 55x of nondischarged liabilities. B's discharge of 100x debt for 50x cash would produce COD income of 50x which would be excluded from B's gross income under section 108(a). Under section 108(b), B would make the following reductions:

50x COD income
(25x) NOL eliminated
(5x) capital losses eliminated
(3x) investment tax credit is eliminated to offset 3x COD income
(5x) basis reduction, limited to aggregate asset bases less undischarged liabilities of the taxpayer after discharge (60-55 = 5)
12x (Remaining untaxed COD income. This amount escapes taxation entirely.)

2. Election to Reduce Basis in Depreciable Property

Under section 108(b)(5), a taxpayer may elect to reduce the basis of its depreciable assets in accordance with section 1017 rather than reducing its other tax attributes. If a taxpayer makes the section 108(b)(5) election, it may reduce the entire basis of the property (unlike basis reduction under section 108(b)(2)(D) where the basis may not be reduced below the remaining undischarged liabilities). If depreciable basis reduction is elected, no other attributes need be reduced. [FN31] The election can only be made in the year of discharge on the taxpayer's return. [FN32] Consent of the service is required to revoke the election. [FN33]

Depreciable property is defined as property subject to an allowance for depreciation, but only if a permitted basis reduction would reduce the depreciation otherwise allowable for the period following such reduction. [FN34] Further, the taxpayer may elect to treat certain property interests as depreciable. A partnership interest may be treated as depreciable under section 1017. [FN35] Under certain circumstances, a parent may treat stock in a subsidiary as depreciable property. [FN36] Inventory may also be treated as depreciable. [FN37] Gain upon the disposition of section 1017 property will be treated as ordinary gain under section 1017(d).

Example 3: Assume the same facts as example 2. Instead of reducing its attributes, B elects under section 108(b)(5) to reduce basis on depreciable property:

50x COD income
(50x) depreciable basis reduction (10x adjusted basis remains)
(0x) NOL reduction (25x remains)
(0x) capital loss reduction (5x remains)
(0x) investment credit (1x remains)
0 COD remaining

A debtor would prefer the section 108(b)(5) election if future income was anticipated. The use of the future carry forward of NOLs to offset income is generally more beneficial than future tax benefits resulting from depreciation. [FN38] Because of the time value of money, the ability to shield $25x of income in year one with an offsetting NOL is more valuable than receiving $5x of depreciation deductions for years one through ten (using the straight line depreciation method). A reduction in basis is only attractive if B does not intend to sell his assets for several years, deferring possible gain on the disposition indefinitely.

III. THE STOCK-FOR-DEBT EXCEPTION TO COD

Often, a debtor would like to completely avoid COD income and section 108. If discharge of indebtedness does not result in COD income, then section 108(b) would be inapplicable and the debtor would not have to reduce any attributes or basis. Without the reduction of NOLs under section 108(b) a debtor can use those NOLs to offset future income and reduce future taxes in the early years after reorganization. Thus, debtors frequently strive to qualify cancellation of indebtedness under the "stock-for-debt" exception. [FN39] The ability of the debtor to cancel indebtedness without attribute reduction by means of the stock-for-debt exception can be critical to the debtor's reorganization. [FN40]

A. The Creation of the Stock-For-Debt Exception

The stock-for-debt exception was judicially created in Capento Securities Corp. v. Commissioner. [FN41] In that case, Raytheon Production Corporation (Raytheon), a wholly owned subsidiary of the Raytheon Manufacturing Co., issued $500,000 in face value bonds in 1929. In 1933, Raytheon Manufacturing Co. organized a second wholly owned subsidiary, Capento Securities Corporation (Capento), for the purpose of purchasing Raytheon's $500,000 bonds from the bondholders. Capento purchased all of the bonds at a cost of $15,160. The bonds were Capento's only assets.

*55 FEDERAL TAXATION OF CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS

Mark A. Frankel [FNa1]

This article analyzes the taxation of corporate reorganizations in bankruptcy including cancellation of indebtedness income under section 108 of the Internal Revenue Code, tax free reorganizations under section 368(a)(1)(G) of the Internal Revenue Code, net operating losses under section 382 of the Internal Revenue Code, and the procedure for determining the tax consequences of bankruptcy reorganization. The article focuses on the collision of the Internal Revenue Code and the Bankruptcy Code and the ambiguities that result in bankruptcy tax law. It concludes that both tax policy and bankruptcy policy would be promoted by enabling the bankruptcy courts to make binding advance determinations of the tax effects of bankruptcy reorganizations under section 1146 of the Bankruptcy Code.

INTRODUCTION: BANKRUPTCY TAX POLICY

The following bankruptcy principles govern chapter 11 reorganizations: (i) fresh start for debtors; (ii) fair and equitable treatment of creditors; (iii) debtor rehabilitation favored over liquidation; and (iv) economy of administration.

Bankruptcy law gives the debtor a "fresh start" by permitting the debtor to reorganize its affairs and permitting many debtors a discharge of debt. As stated by the Supreme Court in Local Loan Co. v. Hunt, "One of the primary purposes of the Bankruptcy Act is to 'relieve the honest debtor from the weight of oppressive indebtedness, and permit him a start afresh free from the obligations and responsibilities consequent upon business misfortunes."' [FN1]

Bankruptcy law protects creditors by requiring the orderly and fair collection and distribution of the debtor's estate. [FN2] In a reorganization case, the 56 Bankruptcy Code requires the following for confirmation of a plan: (i) the plan must be proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law; and (ii) the plan must be feasible and not likely to be followed by a liquidation or another reorganization. [FN3]

The Bankruptcy Code encourages reorganization over liquidation in the interest of economic stability. Congress has determined that rehabilitating a corporation is in the best long-term interest of creditors, shareholders and the public: it is more productive to use assets in the business for which they are designed than to sell assets on a liquidation basis. [FN4] In NLRB v. Bildisco the Supreme Court explained, "The fundamental purpose of reorganization is to prevent a debtor from going into liquidation, with an attendant loss of jobs and possible misuse of economic resources." [FN5]

A bankruptcy petition gives debtors "breathing space" from creditors. All collection activity, including tax collection by the Internal Revenue Service is stayed. [FN6] Bankruptcy law [FN7] further protects the interests of creditors by requiring that expenses incurred by the debtor in furtherance of reorganization be kept to a minimum, "so as to preserve as much of the estate as possible." [FN8]

Bankruptcy tax law does not pervasively contradict these bankruptcy principles. Indeed, legislative history reveals that many bankruptcy tax provisions are intended to encourage reorganization over liquidation. The Treasury Department, however, does not consider only debtor rehabilitation. The Treasury sees itself as an involuntary creditor that cannot refuse to extend credit, cannot demand collateral, and therefore operates at a disadvantage to creditors generally. [FN9]

Several of the advantages enjoyed by taxpayers in bankruptcy contradict tax theory. With increasing success the Treasury has chipped away those advantages. In general, the Treasury maintains that the purpose of tax law is to ensure that all taxes are paid regardless of inconvenience to the taxpayer. [FN10] The Treasury would therefore prefer that any subsidies to business be direct and not at the cost of tax collection. [FN11]

57 A Treasury statement submitted to the House Committee on Ways and Means during consideration of the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 contains this concise summary of the Treasury's bankruptcy tax policy: [FN12]

> (1) Clarification of the law. Many bankruptcy and insolvency tax provisions are "obscure" and should be clarified.
> (2) Equal treatment in and out of bankruptcy. Recognizing that "there is the desire to afford special tax rules for those who appear to be in need," the insolvent debtor in bankruptcy should have no advantage over the insolvent debtor who has not filed a petition for bankruptcy.
> (3) Fresh start but no head start. Debtors should not be entitled to reduce pre-bankruptcy tax liabilities while simultaneously retaining certain built-in tax benefits post-bankruptcy, such as a deduction for net operating loss carryovers from pre-petition tax years.
>
> (4) Minimizing tax shelter abuse. Insolvency should not be a means to avoid recapture of tax shelter deductions for depreciation, investment tax credits, and similar items. [FN13]
>
> (5) Simplicity and "administrability." Where there is a choice among reasonable alternatives, the simpler and more administrable approach should be adopted.

Among the stated policies, Bankruptcy policy and tax policy conflict most directly over the question of whether debtors should be allowed to reduce pre-bankruptcy tax liabilities and retain built-in tax benefits such as deductions against post-petition income for net operating loss carryovers from pre-petition years. The Treasury argues that such a policy constitutes an unwarranted subsidy, and gives debtors in bankruptcy a "head start" over similarly situated tax-payers not in bankruptcy. Congress permits some debtors this slight "head start" apparently because it views such tax advantages as a convenient way to promote rehabilitation over liquidation.

Congress' generosity to debtors has not been constant. The tax provisions governing net operating loss carryovers, corporate reorganizations in bankruptcy, and cancellation of indebtedness income have changed as the political will swings between the competing interests of rehabilitating troubled businesses and raising revenue. The uncertainty and confusion created by frequent changes to the 58 tax law are compounded by the imperfect fit of tax law and bankruptcy law. Consequently, ambiguity is ingrained in bankruptcy tax law. Unfortunately, that ambiguity cannot be resolved in advance by the bankruptcy court considering approval of a debtor's plan of reorganization. Both tax law and bankruptcy law would be promoted by enactment of a provision in the Bankruptcy Code allowing bankruptcy courts to make advance determinations of the tax consequences of bankruptcy plans of reorganization.

CANCELLATION OF INDEBTEDNESS INCOME

Historical Background

In bankruptcy reorganizations the debtor typically pays a percentage of its obligations to creditors, and is forgiven the balance - thus the debtor continues to operate its business with a fresh-start. [FN14] Generally, debt forgiveness creates income for taxpayers; [FN15] however, a debtor in bankruptcy obtains certain tax advantages. This section traces the history of the taxation of cancellation of indebtedness income in bankruptcy, with emphasis on the development of the present law. Professor Eustice has described the history of cancellation of indebtedness income as "at best complex and at worst nearly inscrutable." [FN16]

In U.S. v. Kirby Lumber [FN17] the Supreme Court ruled that retirement of debt at less than its face amount results in taxable income. In 1923 Kirby Lumber had issued bonds, which it repurchased the same year at a discount. Holding that the difference between the issue price and the discount price was taxable income, Justice Holmes observed that the taxpayer had realized an "accession to income," and that "there is not a shrinkage of assets to the taxpayer." [FN18]

In the midst of the Great Depression, several courts recognized an "insolvency" exception to Kirby Lumber: no income arose from a discharge of indebtedness 59 if the debtor were insolvent both before and after the transaction. [FN19] In 1938, Congress amended the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 to provide a statutory insolvency exception which exempted cancellation of indebtedness income in a bankruptcy case from all income taxes, provided the debtor elected to reduce the basis of its assets. [FN20] To implement these changes in bankruptcy law, in 1939 Congress amended the tax code to exclude cancellation of indebtedness income from recognition in certain corporate reorganizations and to require basis reduction instead. [FN21] Thus, by 1940 the Bankruptcy Act and the Internal Revenue Code deferred cancellation of indebtedness income until the debtor's reduced-basis property was sold.

In 1940, the Bankruptcy Act again was amended to enhance the tax benefits of the insolvency exception by providing that a debtor in bankruptcy need only reduce the basis of its assets to the assets' fair market value. [FN22] No further reduction would be required for cancellation of indebtedness in bankruptcy, even though assets often have a tax basis lower than fair market value due to factors such as inflation and depreciation. More significantly, a debtor in bankruptcy did not have to reduce net operating loss carryovers or other tax attributes as a consequence of tax-free treatment. [FN23]

In 1943 Congress gave bankrupt corporations another helping hand by freeing assets from any basis reduction upon a debtor's receipt of cancellation of indebtedness income in an acquisitive reorganization under Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act. Specifically, former sections 371 and 372(a) [FN24] provided that basis would not be reduced as a consequence of realization of cancellation of indebtedness income if a debtor's plan of reorganization called for a transfer of assets to a successor corporation (net operating losses, however, did not carryover). Even if the debtor's reorganization did not involve a successor corporation, basis reduction under Chapter X could be avoided under the stock for debt exception described below. [FN25]

Cancellation of Indebtedness Under The Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 and the Tax Reform Act of 1986

Concerned that debtors in bankruptcy be entitled to a fresh-start, but not 60 to defer tax forever, [FN26] the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 marked the end of the more liberal treatment of discharge of indebtedness income and specifically repealed the "judicial insolvency exception". [FN27]

Generally, § 108(a) excludes cancellation of indebtedness income from gross income for insolvent debtors in bankruptcy. [FN28] Section 108(b) reduces the debtor's tax attributes by the amount of the canceled debt. [FN29] Most significant, deductions against income for net operating loss carryovers must be reduced.

A debtor may elect instead to apply all or any portion of the cancellation of indebtedness income to reduce the basis of depreciable property before reducing deductions such as net operating losses. [FN30] These rules apply to debtors in bankruptcy and to other debtors to the extent they are insolvent. [FN31]

In the absence of an election to reduce basis, tax attributes are reduced in the following order:

(1) Net operating losses for the taxable year of the discharge and any net operating loss carryovers; [FN32]

(2) Carryovers of tax credits, including the research credit [FN33] and the general investment tax credit [FN34] (at the rate of 33 1/3 cents for each dollar of debt cancellation) [FN35] but not the employee's stock ownership plan credit; [FN36]

(3) Net capital loss for the taxable year of discharge [FN37] and any capital loss carryover; [FN38]

(4) Basis of the debtor's depreciable and non-depreciable assets in accordance with regulations; [FN39] and

(5) Foreign tax credit carryovers [FN40] at the rate of 33 1/3 cents for each dollar of debt cancellation. [FN41]

61 Note that passive activity loss credit and credit carryovers [FN42] and the minimum tax credit [FN43] are not reduced. [FN44]

At least one spokesman suggested during the hearings on the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 that the order of attribute reduction should be geared more to the rehabilitation of debtors. [FN45] If a debtor were allowed to choose the order in which attributes are reduced, the debtor could ensure full use of expiring attributes. This would be especially helpful in the case of net operating losses which must be reduced on a last in - first out (LIFO) basis rather than first in - first out (FIFO).

Debtor/taxpayers who elect to reduce the basis of depreciable property before reducing tax attributes must reduced the full amount of the adjusted basis of depreciable property, but not below zero. [FN46] After the basis of depreciable property is reduced to zero, any remaining cancellation of indebtedness income is subject to the rules for reducing tax attributes. [FN47] If, after all these adjustments, some amount of discharged debt has not yet been offset, no tax is imposed on the excess. [FN48]

"Depreciable property" means any property subject to depreciation, including real property held as inventory. [FN49] Adjusted basis of depreciable property is reduced in the following order:

(1) Basis of property acquired with purchase money debt is reduced by the canceled amount of such debt;

(2) Basis of property subject to a lien securing a debt is reduced by the canceled amount of such debt;

(3) Basis of each property item of the debtor is reduced pro rata by an amount equal to the proportion that the basis of each property item bears to the sum of the basis of all the debtor's property; and

(4) Basis of inventory, notes and accounts receivable are reduced in the proportion that the basis of each item bears to the sum of the basis of all of those items. [FN50]

62 In deciding whether to reduce tax attributes or to reduce basis, the debtor must weigh (a) the advantages of using loss and credit carryovers to offset immediate post-petition income against (b) the disadvantages of (1) exhausting additional tax attributes; (2) foregoing depreciation reductions, thus increasing taxes in later years; and (3) (especially under the pre-1986 Code) losing the opportunity to offset capital loss carryovers against ordinary income. [FN51] Further, net operating losses have a useful life of fifteen years, and must be used or they are lost.

For example, if a debtor has net operating loss carryover deductions which are about to expire, but does not anticipate sufficient short term income to exhaust those deductions, the debtor must use those deductions immediately to offset cancellation of indebtedness income, because the net operating losses carryovers will otherwise expire before they can be used as a deduction against income. On the other hand, if the debtor does not anticipate losing net operating loss carryovers through non-use, the debtor should elect to reduce the basis of its assets first to offset cancellation of indebtedness income, because such reduction will not be recaptured until the assets are sold, and the debtor's net operating losses can be used freely in the meantime to offset earned income.

Any gain on subsequent transfers of assets with basis reduced under § 108 [FN52] is subject to recapture [FN53] as ordinary income under §§ 1245 and 1250, [FN54] which are designed to prevent conversion of ordinary income into capital gains. [FN55] Because the Tax Reform Act of 1986 eliminated any reduction of tax liability for capital gains, as opposed to ordinary income, the concern whether ordinary income is converted into capital gains is reduced after the Tax Reform Act of 1986. This is not to say that the ordering rules serve no purpose; to the extent the ordering rules limit reductions to basis of intangible assets, such as goodwill, the rules prevent indefinite deferral of taxes. [FN56]

The Stock for Debt Exception

Exchanges of stock for debt are an historical exception to the cancellation of indebtedness rules. It has long been the case law that no cancellation of indebtedness income is realized by an insolvent corporate debtor if stock is issued 63 in exchange for debt, even if the stock is worth less than the face amount of the obligation satisfied. [FN57] The stock for debt exception was based on the theory that the substitution of stock for debt constitutes a creditor's continued investment in the corporate debtor, and recognition of cancellation of indebtedness income would be inappropriate. [FN58]

The Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 codified in § 108(e)(8) the stock for debt exception to cancellation of indebtedness income recognition. [FN59] In 1984 the stock for debt exception was narrowed to include only debtors in bankruptcy, and other insolvent debtors to the extent a debtor is not made solvent by the stock for debt exchange. [FN60]

Stock for Debt Limitations

The Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 imposed two limitations on the common law stock for debt exchange exception. Under the "de minimis" rule, the stock for debt exception does not apply if, considering "all the facts and circumstances," the stock issued consists of a nominal or token amount of shares. [FN61]

Where stock and other consideration is issued to a creditor, the legislative history to the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 from the House of Representatives suggested that the stock should be treated as satisfying "a proportion of the debt equal to its proportion of the value of the total consideration." [FN62] In contrast, the legislative history in the Senate suggests that the stock should be treated as satisfying the debt remaining after first offsetting the other consideration against the debt. [FN63] The greater the amount of debt offset by stock, the 64 less the debtor must reduce tax attributes and basis of assets. Thus, the Senate approach is more favorable to debtors. Comments by Congressman Ullman, Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, upon introducing the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 indicate that the House accepted the Senate approach. [FN64] Further, the Senate approach is consistent with pre-1980 law. [FN65]

To satisfy the de minimis rule, at least two commentators suggest by analogy to the regulations under § 351 [FN66] that the value of stock exchanged for debt should equal at least 10% of the debt. [FN67] The Internal Revenue Service has confirmed that stock exchanged for debt with a value of 10% of the debt is acceptable. In a letter ruling [FN68] the Service applied the Senate approach to a case in which the debtor distributed both cash and stock, and approved the debtor's use of the stock for debt exception where the fair market value of the stock distributed represented 10% of the amount by which the claims exceeded the cash component of the distribution.

The Service considered the following factors in determining whether the stock transferred in exchange for debt was "nominal or token": (i) the presence of arms length bargaining involving adverse economic interests between debtor and creditors; (ii) the value of the stock relative to the face amount of the debt canceled; and (iii) the value of the stock relative to the value of other consideration received in discharge of the debt. The Service found that creditors received twice the liquidation value of the debtor and (i) that adverse interests existed inasmuch as creditors released their right to force a liquidation, and the debtor had to convince creditors "that the stock used in the exchange represented the greatest economic value available to the creditors"; (ii) the stock amounted to about 10% of the debt canceled in the exchange; and (iii) the stock represented about 15% of the total consideration received.

In general, adverse economic interests between the debtor and creditors is an easy element to satisfy in any bankruptcy case. The Service's second test-that the value of stock received by creditors be measured against the face amount of debt discharged-can be problematic. If all creditors are receiving a very small distribution in a case, creditors who are receiving stock with a value of less than 10% of the debt discharged in exchange for debt may appear to be violating the nominal or token rule requirement. For example, if a bankruptcy plan pays certain creditors nine cents cash on the dollar, and certain other creditors receive stock with a value of nine cents for each dollar of claim, 65 both groups of creditors are treated equally; however, the Service may nonetheless consider that the creditors with stock obtained a "nominal" or "token" distribution.

The better view compares the value of stock exchanged for debt to the value of other consideration received by similarly situated creditors for their debt. In other words, the value of stock exchanged for debt should be at least one-tenth of the value of other consideration received by similarly situated creditors. [FN69] In the letter ruling, all general unsecured creditors were treated alike, leaving no basis for comparison. If under a bankruptcy plan certain creditors are paid thirty cents cash on the dollar, payment in stock to similarly situated creditors should not be considered nominal or token unless the value of that stock is less than one tenth of thirty cents on the dollar, or 3 cents per each dollar of claim.

The third requirement is new: the Service measured the value of stock received by a creditor against the value of other consideration received by that creditor. For example, if a debtor proposes to establish one class of general unsecured creditors who are to be paid $.75 cash for each dollar of debt, the debtor will have to reduce either its asset basis or tax attributes by $.25 of canceled debt. If on the other hand, the debtor proposes to pay general unsecured creditors $.72 cash and stock valued at $.03 for each dollar of debt, the debtor will argue that it realizes no cancellation of indebtedness income under the stock for debt exception. The debtor will have satisfied the 10% rule under the Senate approach because the value of the stock ($.03) is more than 10% of the value of the debt discharged therefor ($.25). Thus the debtor will not have to reduce its asset bases nor reduce tax attributes. The Service might nonetheless disallow the stock for debt exception treatment because the consideration representing stock ($.03) is only 4% of the total consideration creditors receive ($.75). In the letter ruling, the Service approved consideration representing stock in the amount of 15% of total consideration but the Service did not set forth any bright line test.

Proposed Treasury Regulation § 1.108-1 would adopt the reasoning set forth in the letter ruling, and would create the following measurements for applying the de minimis rule:

(i) Stock to debt ratio - ratio of the fair market value of stock transferred to a creditor to the amount of discharged indebtedness allocable to that stock;

(ii) Stock to total consideration ratio - ratio of the fair market value of stock transferred to a creditor to the fair market value of the total consideration received by that creditor; and

66 (iii) Stock to total stock ratio - ratio of the fair market value of the stock transferred to all creditors to the total fair market value of all the corporation's outstanding stock after the bankruptcy or insolvency workout.

For example, assume that a plan of reorganization provides for each dollar of debt $.20 in cash, $.20 in new debt and $.05 of stock, and that former creditors collectively obtain 25% of the debtor's stock. The stock to debt ratio is 5%, the stock to total consideration ratio is 11%, and the stock to total stock ratio is 25%.

The proposed regulations provide for the following safe harbors:

(i) 10 percent stock to debt ratio and 25 percent stock to total consideration ratio;

(ii) 25 percent stock to total consideration ratio and 25 percent stock to total stock ratio; and

(iii) With respect to unsecured creditors, 100 percent stock to total consideration ratio and 90 percent stock to total stock ratio.

In addition to the de minimis rule, the stock for debt exception is not applicable to debt held by an unsecured creditor unless the ratio of (1) the value of the stock received by the creditor to (2) the amount of debt canceled in exchange for the stock is at least 50% of a similar ratio computed for all unsecured creditors receiving stock in the reorganization. [FN70] This is the "proportionality rule."

Violation of the proportionality rule creates a "cliff effect" triggering substantial realization of income by the debtor. For example, if creditor A held $1,000 of unsecured debt of the corporation and in a workout the corporation fully satisfied $10,000 of its unsecured debt with $6,000, A must receive 50% of the pro rata distribution received by the other creditors - in this case, 50% of the 60% pro rata distribution, i.e. 30% of his claim in stock, with a value of $300. If A receives stock with a value of only $250, the corporation realizes cancellation of indebtedness income equal to the difference between A's claim ($1,000) and the value of the stock ($250). Thus the corporation would recognize $750 of income as a consequence of underpaying $50 in stock. [FN71]

The Revenue Reconciliation Act of 1990 added another limitation on the stock for debt exception to the cancellation of indebtedness income rules. Preferred stock issued under a plan of reorganization does not qualify for the stock for debt exception under § 108(e)(10) if: (i) such stock has a fixed liquidation amount, (ii) the issuer of such stock has the right to redeem such stock at one 67 or more times, or (iii) the holder of such stock has the right to require its redemption at one or more times.

The outright prohibition on the use of preferred stock with such attributes is puzzling. Presumably, the intent behind the legislation is to limit the use of preferred stock to discharge debt to the extent that the preferred stock could be redeemed at less than the amount of the debt discharged. Indeed Revenue Ruling 90-87 and the new proposed regulations interpreting the "nominal or token" limitation to the stock for debt exception announce this more reasonable position. The contradiction between the new statute and the proposed regulations may require judicial or legislative resolution.

Recapture

A creditor that receives stock of a debtor corporation in exchange for debt is subject to the recapture rules on subsequent disposition of the stock of § 1245 [FN72], a controversial provision now partially obsolete in light of the Tax Reform Act of 1986, and the elimination of the deduction for capital gains. To the extent creditors can recognize capital losses because of capital gains, the provision remains important.

Timing of Stock for Debt Exchanges

The tax stakes riding on the timing of stock for debt exchanges require identification of:

1. the year creditors owning securities realize gain or loss;

2. the date that an ownership change occurs for net operating loss carryover purposes;

3. the year cancellation of indebtedness income arises;

4. the year interest on old debt ceases to accrue; and

5. for consolidated returns, the year ownership of the debtor falls below the necessary 80% level. [FN73]

Timing of stock for debt exchanges could be affected by the Bankruptcy Code. [FN74] Upon confirmation of a chapter 11 plan of reorganization, claims against the debtor are discharged. [FN75] The "effective date of the plan", however, usually occurs sometime after confirmation, to allow for passage of the time for appeals. The date of discharge could be separated in time from the date of the exchange. No authority prescribes the tax significance of this separation in time. [FN76]

68 The Contribution To Capital Exception

The contribution to capital exception to recognition of discharge of indebtedness income, which also arises from case law, applies to creditors who are shareholders. [FN77] If a creditor/shareholder's debt is contributed to the capital of the debtor corporation, the corporation is deemed to have satisfied the debt with money equal to the shareholder's adjusted basis in the debt. [FN78] If the shareholder's basis in the debt is less than the amount due, the corporation realizes cancellation of indebtedness income equal to the difference.

The contribution to capital exception raises a number of issues. First, should a corporate debtor's tax consequences be dependent upon the accounting practices of its creditors? In General Utilities [FN79] and Moline Properties [FN80] the Supreme Court held that a corporation is a separate entity for tax purposes. The contribution to capital exception appears to contradict General Utilities and Moline Properties insofar as it couples the "outside" recognition by creditors to the "inside" recognition of debtors. Determining recognition by creditors could be an onerous if not impossible compliance burden to impose upon corporate debtors. [FN81]

Commentators raise additional issues: Does it matter if the ownership of stock by a creditor is so unrelated to the cancellation of debt that the cancellation should not be considered a contribution to capital? Can the Service recharacterize a stock for debt exchange as a contribution to capital to force realization? If all the stock of a debtor corporation is held by its sole shareholder, will the contribution to capital rule apply if the creditor cancels the debt without having the corporation issue additional shares? Will the stock for debt exception apply if additional shares are issued? [FN82]

Debt Security for Debt Security Changes

Generally, in any debt security exchange in an insolvency situation, the new debt security has a lower face amount than the old debt security. Ordinarily, the difference between the issue price of an old and a new debt security would be treated under the cancellation of indebtedness provisions of Internal Revenue Code § 108. Due to inadvertence, however, until very recently, Internal Revenue Code § 1275(a)(4) essentially deemed the issue price of the new debt security to be the same as the old debt security. Thus, no cancellation of indebtedness income arose.

69 The Revenue Reconciliation Act of 1990 repealed § 1275(a)(4). Section 108(e)(11) now provides that cancellation of indebtedness income is created upon the exchange of a debt security for a debt security to the extent that the adjusted issue price of the old debt exceeds the issue price of the new debt. To determine the "issue price", adjustments are made to account for that portion of the debt security which the Service deems to be interest rather than principal. That portion is called "original issue discount," and is calculated under §§ 1273 and 1274.

The repeal of § 1275(a)(4) was occasioned in part by In re Chateaugay Corp., [FN83] in which the court applied original issue discount principles to fix the amount of secured claims.

The House Ways and Means Committee Report accompanying the 1990 Revenue Reconciliation Act illustrates the treatment of an exchange of publicly traded debt:

> A corporation issued for $1,000 a bond that provided for annual coupon payments based on a market rate of interest. The bond is publicly traded. Some time later, when the old bond is worth $600, the corporation exchanges the old bond for a new bond that has a stated redemption price at maturity of $750. The exchange is treated as a realization event under section 1001. Under the bill, the new bond will have an issue price of $600 (the fair market value of the old bond) and deductible OID of $150 ($750 stated redemption price at maturity less $600 issue price) and the corporation will have COD of $400 ($1,000 adjusted issue price of the old bond less $600 issue price of the new bond). Such results will occur whether or not the exchange qualifies as a reorganization. [FN84]

It should be noted that section 108(e)(11) does not apply to bankruptcy cases filed on or before October 9, 1990, or to transactions before that date.

Bankruptcy Tax Policy

Background

The insolvency exception to cancellation of indebtedness income has been criticized for its logical inconsistencies. Kirby Lumber, which requires recognition of cancellation of indebtedness income, is premised on the principle that taxpayers enjoy a "net accretion to wealth". Subsequent relaxation of the Kirby Lumber doctrine presupposes that insolvent debtors do not enjoy a net accretion to wealth through debt cancellation. Better economic analysis would look 70 to the benefits taxpayers obtain when a loan is issued (no includible income) and the need to balance that noninclusion of income with a corresponding recognition of income upon loan forgiveness. [FN85] Simply stated, the economic benefit derived from debt forgiveness is no different than the economic benefit derived from other sources of income, such as salary. This economic analysis is especially pertinent if the debtor has obtained a tax deduction for the expenditure of the amount forgiven, or if the creditor can take a tax loss for the debt forgiveness. [FN86]

Nonetheless, the insolvency exception in general and the stock for debt exception in particular are very important to debtor rehabilitation. To the extent that a debtor can persuade creditors to take stock instead of cash as part of a plan, the debtor is better able to maintain adequate cash flow to finance operations and capital expenditures, and to secure credit. [FN87] Despite the inconsistency between tax policy and bankruptcy policy, the insolvency exception persists to promote debtor rehabilitation.

The inevitable byproduct of the mixture of bankruptcy and tax law, as well as the constant changes to that mixture, is uncertainty. For example, the timing of a stock for debt exchange is governed by a variety of bankruptcy considerations not present in nonbankruptcy transactions. The changes made by the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 were superseded by the Tax Reform Act of 1986, before the 1980 changes were fully understood by lawyers. Uncertainty is a hindrance to debtor reorganizations, and supplies one argument to permit advance determination of tax consequences of bankruptcy reorganizations.

Tax Policy

Clarification of the Law. Under the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 and subsequent legislation, the rules for treatment of cancellation of indebtedness income have been clarified, but confusing issues still arise under the stock for debt exception: (i) whether solvent debtors in bankruptcy qualify; (ii) how much debt must be exchanged for stock to qualify; (iii) how much debt is deemed satisfied for stock when a creditor is given both stock and cash; (iv) when the exchange of stock for debt is deemed completed; (v) whether stock for debt exchanges can be recharacterized as a contribution to capital, and (vi) how to treat debt security for debt security exchanges.

Equal Treatment In and Out of Bankruptcy. Generally, the insolvency exception and the stock for debt exception apply to insolvent debtors and debtors in bankruptcy. However, § 108 of the Internal Revenue Code allows solvent and *71 insolvent debtors in bankruptcy the same tax advantages (although the stock for debt exception may not apply to solvent debtors). The Treasury would probably sense unfairness in allowing solvent debtors in bankruptcy to enjoy tax advantages relating to cancellation of debt not enjoyed by debtors struggling to avoid bankruptcy.

Fresh Start But No Head Start. The rules governing cancellation of indebtedness income give debtors in bankruptcy a "head start" in the following ways: (i) the election to reduce basis of assets in lieu of reducing tax attributes as a consequence of realization of cancellation of indebtedness income allows debtors in bankruptcy and insolvent debtors to retain built-in tax attributes while reducing tax liabilities; (ii) the stock for debt exception goes further and does not even require that the basis of assets be reduced as a consequence of realization of discharge of indebtedness income (although net operating loss carryovers could be reduced); (iii) the contribution to capital exception permits debtors to retain tax attributes but potentially realize little income upon the cancellation of indebtedness.

Simplicity and Administrability. As described more fully below, [FN88] the Internal Revenue Service has many opportunities to assert its position in a bankruptcy reorganization. The Service can object to a debtor's plan. The Service can also seek a bankruptcy court decision regarding the propriety of the debtor's treatment of discharge of indebtedness income and other tax issues. If the Service disagrees with the bankruptcy court, the Service can deny the debtors the treatment approved by the bankruptcy court. Debtors cannot, however, obtain a binding ruling prospectively. That the Service has its cake and eats it too with respect to bankruptcy tax determinations seems eminently "administrable" from the Service's point of view, but repetitive administrative reviews following the bankruptcy court's decision are wasteful and unnecessary.

Fairness and Equity. The fairness and equity of the discharge of indebtedness provisions ultimately turns on one's view of the policy balance between orthodox tax theory and the rehabilitation of troubled businesses. The provisions are unfair, however, to the extent that the Service has a procedural advantage over debtors in obtaining binding preconfirmation rulings upon the tax treatment of the debtor's plan.

Bankruptcy Policy

Fresh Start. The debtor's fresh start is promoted because debtors may elect to reduce basis of assets instead of reducing net operating loss carryovers as a consequence of discharge of indebtedness income. In this way, net operating losses are preserved for the use of the debtor.

*72 Fair and Equitable Distribution Among Creditors. In general, the insolvency exception does not affect the debtor's ability to distribute its assets fairly among creditors. Arguably, however, the proportionality rule limits the ability of creditors to agree to certain distributions of the debtor's assets. For example, there is no economic reason why a creditor should not be permitted to accept consideration for its claim in the form of stock, which stock is valued at less than 50% of the value of non-stock consideration to which similarly situated creditors are entitled.

Rehabilitation Favored Over Liquidation. The insolvency exception clearly promotes rehabilitation over liquidation to the extent that debtors are entitled to reduce basis of assets instead of losing tax attributes such as net operating loss carryovers. The stock for debt exception promotes rehabilitation even more effectively by allowing debtors to discharge debt without reducing the basis of assets or tax attributes. Rehabilitation is hindered by the debtor's inability to determine conclusively whether it qualifies for the stock for debt exception, how much debt is deemed satisfied for stock, the timing of the exchange, and the tax characterization of the exchange.

Economy of Administration. As argued more fully below, [FN89] it is not economical to administer bankruptcy tax law in the bankruptcy court if the findings of the bankruptcy judge do not bind the Service. The current procedure frustrates confirmation of plans and fosters repetitious litigation.

"G" REORGANIZATION

Historical Background

Under conventional tax principles, the sale or disposition of all of a corporation's assets to a successor corporation is a taxable transaction which should result in the recognition of taxable gain or deductible loss, [FN90] and the disappearance of loss carryovers of the former corporation. [FN91] In 1918, however, Congress provided for non-recognition of gain and loss if such sales were structured as exchanges of stock for stock, [FN92] and followed in 1924 with a provision for the inheritance of basis, [FN93] and finally in 1954 with the preservation of loss carryovers in the hands of the surviving corporation. [FN94]

Prior to 1934 the term "reorganization" was defined for tax law purposes as:

> A merger or consolidation (including the acquisition by one corporation of . . . substantially all the properties of another corporation). [FN95]

73 Courts soon narrowed the definition to make outright sales taxable, but preserved tax-free treatment for mere adjustments of existing ownership interests. To distinguish sales from tax-free reorganizations, the courts prescribed that for reorganizations, pre-change shareholders must retain a substantial stock interest in the post-change corporation. [FN96] This became known as "continuity of interest," and in 1934 the rule was incorporated into the Internal Revenue Code. [FN97]

Continuity of interest was difficult to achieve in bankruptcy reorganization of cases under the tax rules requiring shareholders to retain a substantial stock interest, because shareholders are usually entitled to little or no consideration in the reorganization of an insolvent corporation as they are last in the "priority" line. Creditors effectively control the reorganization and assume the shareholders' position. As described more fully below, [FN98] the courts have allowed tax-free reorganizations for bankrupt corporations, if creditors obtain the stock which would otherwise remain in the hands of shareholders.

In 1942 the Supreme Court added a new element to continuity of interest. In Southwest Consolidated Corp. [FN99] the court denied tax free treatment for the reorganization of an insolvent corporation that distributed some cash to creditors and former shareholders in addition to voting stock. A year later, Congress added the Southwest Consolidated rule to the predecessor to §§ 371 and 372 of the 1954 Internal Revenue Code. For bankruptcy reorganizations, only stock could constitute consideration for tax free treatment, and net operating losses did not carry over.

"G" Reorganizations Under The Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980

The Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 freed insolvency reorganizations from the "solely for stock" provisions of the 1954 Code, and, with a few exceptions, debtors in bankruptcy now enjoy the same tax-free reorganization rules generally applied to solvent corporations. [FN100] Specifically, Congress created the "G" reorganization. [FN101] Legislative history indicates that the "G" reorganization rules are intended "to facilitate the rehabilitation of corporate debtors in bankruptcy, and to eliminate many requirements which have effectively precluded financially troubled companies from utilizing the generally applicable tax-free reorganization provision of present law." [FN102]

74 Continuity of Interest

Notwithstanding the enactment of the "G" reorganization under the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980, and the repeal of §§ 371 and 372 of the 1954 Internal Revenue Code, the continuity of interest doctrine persists. The legislative history states:

> [T]he "continuity of interest" requirement which the courts and the Treasury have long imposed as a prerequisite for non-recognition treatment for a corporate reorganization must be met in order to satisfy the requirements of new category "G". [FN103]

To satisfy the continuity of interest requirement, and thereby realize treatment as a reorganization rather than a sale, not all of the consideration has to be stock, but a substantial percentage of the consideration to the selling stockholders (creditors) must be qualifying equity interests rather than cash or debt instruments. [FN104] The Internal Revenue Service has stated that it will not issue a private letter ruling regarding any transaction where stock represents less than 50% of the consideration received by old stockholders (creditors). [FN105] Although case law allows less than 50%, [FN106] prudence dictates that debtors strive for 50% continuity of interest.

A pre-1980 regulation for non-recognition treatment provides that in bankruptcy reorganizations creditors stand in shareholders' shoes for purposes of calculating the percentage of consideration received as equity:

> [F]or the purpose of determining whether the requisite continuity of interest exists, the interests of creditors who have by appropriate legal steps, obtained effective command of the property of an insolvent corporation is considered as the equivalent of a proprietary interest . . . . The determinative and controlling factors are the corporation's insolvency and the effective command by the creditors over its property. [FN107]

Treatment of creditors as shareholders for continuity of interest purposes in bankruptcy reorganizations dates from Helvering v. Alabama Asphaltic Limestone Company. [FN108] In Alabama Asphaltic creditors of an insolvent corporation created a new corporate entity to acquire the assets of the involuntary corporate debtor in bankruptcy. With the approval of the bankruptcy court, the creditors acquired the stock of the new corporation in exchange for their claims, 75 and the shareholders' interest was eliminated. The Service argued that the series of transactions could not fit within the statutory definition of a "reorganization" because the former shareholders were eliminated and therefore had no continuing interest in the surviving corporation. The court held that, by initiating the involuntary bankruptcy proceedings, creditors "stepped into the shoes" of the shareholders and were the true owners of the debtor's equity.

In a "G" reorganization, stock received by both shareholders and creditors counts for continuity of interest compliance. More support is found in the legislative history to the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980:

> [S]hort term creditors who receive stock for their claims may be counted toward satisfying the continuity of interest rule, although any gain or loss realized by such creditors will be recognized for income tax purposes. [FN109]

The legislative history also addressed exactly which creditors should be counted towards the required continuity. Under pre-1980 law the "absolute priority" [FN110] rule applied, and claims with the most seniority or security had to be satisfied in cash before claims with less seniority or security. Holders of claims that could be satisfied in full with cash therefore did not count toward continuity of interest. Thus, continuity of interest was measured by the stock received by the most senior class of creditors that could not be paid in full in cash. [FN111]

Legislative history suggests that measurement of continuity after the Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980 should account for all classes of creditors and shareholders that take distribution below and including the most senior class obtaining shares of stock as part of the debtor's plan of reorganization - the "relation back" approach. [FN112] Payment in both cash and stock to senior creditors does not destroy continuity of interest.

For example, if a reorganization plan provides for (i) payment in cash to senior secured creditors, (ii) payment in stock to certain junior secured creditors and payment in cash to certain junior creditors, (iii) payment in cash and stock to all general unsecured creditors and (iv) payment in stock to shareholders, the plan will satisfy the relation back approach. The class of creditors with at least one member receiving stock is the class of junior secured creditors, and all members of all classes junior to the junior secured creditors will receive some stock.

76 The only other source of authority for the relation back approach is two private letter rulings concerning non-bank "G" reorganizations. In the more pertinent ruling, the Service applied the relation back approach and approved a distribution of stock to creditors and shareholders. The measuring group included "all members of any of those classes of creditors having a priority in bankruptcy (as set forth in the Bankruptcy Code) equal to or lower than that of the highest class of creditors to have at least one member acquiring preferred stock." [FN113]

The second private letter ruling involved the acquisition of a debtor by the guarantor of the largest claim against the debtor. [FN114] The guarantor paid all of the debtor's creditors in cash, and exchanged stock for the debt that the corporation had guaranteed. The transaction appears to be a reorganization in lieu of a foreclosure. The Service approved the transaction because the value of the stock distributed under the plan of reorganization was equal to 50% of the value of all of the claims. The Service treated the creditor as if it were a shareholder and treated the creditor's claim as shareholder equity.

The most obvious drawback to the relation back approach is that it limits the mix of consideration that plans of reorganization can provide. For example, the issuance of stock to a very senior class of creditors means that all (not some) junior classes must be counted as equity holders for continuity of interest purposes. In the interest of rehabilitation, debtors and creditors would prefer that stock be distributed to creditors on the basis of a plan negotiated among the parties without regard to the relation back approach or strict priority. Economically it makes little difference which creditor takes stock and which does not. [FN115] The only danger to the Treasury in allowing unrestricted distribution of stock to creditors is that a class of creditors (perhaps a class with only one member) could effectively buy the debtor and take a carryover basis in its assets. The problem is easily remedied by statute. Notwithstanding its shortcomings, the relation back approach has generally been a practical and workable solution to the problem of determining how to treat creditors as shareholders for continuity of interest purposes.

Business Purpose and Continuity of Business Enterprise

A "G" reorganization must also have a "business purpose" [FN116] and must involve a "continuity of the business enterprise under the modified corporate form. [FN117] With regard to business purpose, the reorganization should not be a step toward a sale or liquidation. [FN118] With regard to continuity of business 77 interest, the successor corporation does not have to engage in the same business, so long as there is continued use of the transferor's "historic business" or a "significant part" for a sufficient period. [FN119] The "G" Reorganization private letter rulings typically state that the debtor's business will continue "in a substantially unchanged manner" after consummation of the transaction.

Distribution Requirement

To qualify as a "G" reorganization, a debtor corporation must distribute stock or securities in exchange for its assets in a transaction qualifying under §§ 354, 355 or 356 of the Internal Revenue Code. [FN120] This distribution requirement assures that "either substantially all of the assets of the financially troubled corporation, or assets which consist of an active business" will be transferred to the acquiring corporation. [FN121]

Section 354. Section 354 provides that no gain or loss shall be recognized in an exchange of "stock or securities" for "new stock or securities". [FN122] Hence, the continuity of interest problem reappears. Tax law considers tax-free corporate reorganizations to involve the exchange of stock for stock. In bankruptcy reorganizations, debtors often seek to satisfy the claims of creditors with stock. That manner of exchange does not generally give rise to a tax-free reorganization under the tax law.

The same reasoning that gives debtors in bankruptcy an exception to the continuity of interest rule, however, gives debtors in bankruptcy an exception to § 354(a). The legislative history indicates that compliance with § 354 was not intended to have the same meaning for bankruptcy tax reorganizations as it does for other corporate tax reorganizations. [FN123] In bankruptcy cases the creditors of a debtor are deemed to have stepped into the shoes of shareholders. Thus an exchange of creditors' claims for the debtor's stock is deemed to be an exchange of stock for stock under § 354.

Further, the private letter rulings cited above suggest that creditors can stand in the shoes of shareholders for purposes of § 354(a) continuity. For example, in a recent letter ruling a "G" Reorganization was approved despite the fact that former shareholders obtained no stock or other consideration on account of their shareholder status. [FN124]

One letter ruling suggests, however, that "at least one person or entity" should exchange stock for stock to qualify. [FN125] This limitation, if imposed 78 rigorously, would restrict "cram down" "G" reorganizations. Cram down under § 1129(b)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code allows debtors to confirm a plan over the dissent of an "impaired" class of interests provided, among other things, that no junior class takes any consideration. If a shareholder must take stock in a "G" reorganization, insolvent debtors would be unable to cram down any class of interests senior to shareholders.

The requirements of § 354(b) must also be satisfied: the debtor must distribute "substantially all of the assets" to the acquiring corporation, and the "stock, securities, and other properties" received by the debtor must be distributed in "pursuance of the plan of reorganization." [FN126] In effect, the debtor must liquidate. For advance ruling purposes, the Internal Revenue Service requires that the transferor (debtor) corporation transfer at least 70% of its gross assets and 90% of its net assets. [FN127] The cases interpreting the "substantially all" test have allowed smaller percentages. [FN128]

Fixed percentages and "bright line" tests for the application of the "substantially all" test to bankruptcy reorganizations conflict with the reality of an insolvent corporation. In many instances unprofitable divisions must be disposed of even before a plan of reorganization is proposed. In other cases, individual assets must be sold during the bankruptcy case to raise cash. [FN129] The 1980 legislative history recognized these problems and suggested a case by case approach:

> The "substantially all" test in the "G" reorganization provision is to be interpreted in light of the underlying intent in adding the new "G" category, namely, to facilitate the reorganization of companies in bankruptcy or similar cases for rehabilitative purposes. Accordingly, it is intended that facts and circumstances relevant to this intent, such as the insolvent corporations need to pay off creditors or to sell assets or divisions to raise cash, are to be taken into account in determining whether a transaction qualifies as a "G" reorganization. For example, a transaction is not precluded from satisfying the "substantially all" test for purposes of the new "G" category merely because, prior to the transfer to the acquiring corporation, payments to creditors and asset sales were made in order to leave the 79 debtor with more manageable operating assets to continue its business. [FN130]

To some degree the Service apparently accepts a relaxed interpretation of § 354(b) for bankruptcy reorganizations. In one of the private letter rulings discussed above, the Service approved the debtor's disposal of assets to finance its operations and minimize its losses, until the time, the "Trustee first determined that Target could not be viably operated as an independent going concern, concluding that an internal reorganization was impractical." [FN131]

The letter ruling determination of whether "substantially all" of the debtors assets were transferred turned on when the debtor's management decided that the debtor could not survive as an independent entity. If applied broadly, this analysis requires that a debtor be circumspect about when it decides to reorganize:

> [I]t becomes extremely important to cut square corners regarding the time at which such an intent is formulated. The failing company and its trustee should avoid contingency planning speculations about the possibilities of two-company reorganizations until the last moment at which it becomes necessary to abandon the thought of rescuing the company through a one-company internal recapitalization. [FN132]

The Treasury's interest in simplicity is promoted by its measurement of "substantially all" from the date that a debtor cannot survive independently. On the other hand, the bankruptcy policy of encouraging rehabilitation is deterred. Disposing of assets after deciding that a company cannot survive independently does not, of itself, mean that less than substantially all of the assets of a corportion will be transferred in a subsequent disposition. Nor does it suggest a failure to transfer assets which consist of an active business to the acquiring corporation. [FN133] The determination of whether sufficient operating assets to continue the debtor's business are transferred as part of a "G" reorganization [FN134] can be better based on a facts and circumstances test. For example, whether a pre-transfer disposition of assets resulted from a debtor's business judgment or whether the disposition was the result of prompting from the acquiring corporation is a question of fact which can only be decided on a case-by-case basis. [FN135]

80 Section 355. Generally, a reorganization under § 355 involves the reshuffling of corporate stock ownership to permit the consolidation or division of related corporate entities. Section 355 imposes a number of restrictive requirements to ensure that corporate earnings, which would normally be included in a shareholders tax return as regular income, cannot be included in a shareholder's tax return as capital gains by virtue of the distribution of stock in a divisive reorganization.

Since the Tax Reform Act of 1986 phases in the elimination of preferred capital gains tax rates, the strict standards of § 355 of the Internal Revenue Code are difficult to justify. In any event, bankruptcy reorganizations typically involve the dilution of equity rather than a reshuffling of equity, and therefore § 355 has little relevance to the taxation of bankruptcy reorganizations.

Section 356. Generally, in a tax-free reorganization a corporation does not recognize gain or loss on the receipt of boot (property other than stock or securities), if the corporation distributes the boot to its shareholders as part of the plan of reorganization. [FN136] Shareholders who obtain boot in a tax-free reorganization must recognize gain. [FN137] Shareholders cannot, however, recognize loss on the transaction.

Since creditors step into the shoes of shareholders in a "G" reorganization, applying tax principles strictly, creditors would logically be treated the same as shareholders and denied the business loss deduction to which creditors are otherwise entitled. However, this is not the case - trade creditors and short term lenders do obtain a loss deduction since their losses do not stem from the loss of worthless securities.

Bankruptcy Tax Policy

Background. The conflict between bankruptcy and tax policy is evident in the "G" reorganization provisions. For example, bankruptcy policy encourages the survival of businesses through new investment, mergers and acquisitions. Tax policy does not permit tax-free mergers and acquisitions where the original investment is liquidated. In violation of tax policy, bankruptcy reorganizations allow old tax attributes to attach to new equity, despite the disappearance of the old equity holders. The tax law requirement that continuity of interest be maintained contradicts the bankruptcy reality that shareholder interests are often extinguished.

Further, the cornerstone of the "G" reorganization rules is the notion that shareholders stand in the shoes of creditors. From a bankruptcy prospective, creditors of an insolvent corporation may have the same economic interests as the shareholders. However, the tax implications of being a shareholder are much different than the tax implications of being a creditor. The failure to reconcile 81 the contradiction between a creditor's status as a creditor and a creditor's tax treatment as a shareholder makes the "G" reorganization option inherently ambiguous.

Tax Policy

Clarification of the Law. The "G" reorganization rules simplified the complex case law and statutes which previously crippled tax reorganizations in bankruptcy. The "G" reorganization rules, though not models of clarity, are intentionally simple in some important respects. For example, the relation back approach to identification of creditors who count as shareholders simply looks to the most senior creditors obtaining stock. To determine whether substantially all of the debtor's assets have been transferred as part of a "G" reorganization, the Internal Revenue Service looks only to the date that the debtor first contemplated tax reorganization. Unfortunately, simplicity in these contexts sometimes limits creative strategies that debtors in bankruptcy need to survive.

Equal Treatment In and Out Bankruptcy. The "G" reorganization rules apply to debtors in bankruptcy and to debtors in workout situations. Insolvent debtors in bankruptcy enjoy no tax advantage over insolvent debtors reorganizing outside of bankruptcy. However, solvent debtors in bankruptcy do enjoy an advantage over solvent debtors not in bankruptcy.

Fresh Start But No Head Start. The "G" reorganization rules give corporate debtors a fresh start by deeming creditors to be shareholders and thus permitting tax-free reorganizations in bankruptcy. A debtor corporation is entitled to non-recognition of gain and carryover of corporate tax attributes such as net operating losses. In the absence of bankruptcy a corporation would lose those benefits when shareholders' interests are terminated and worthless security deductions taken. Thus, debtors in bankruptcy enjoy a "head start."

Simplicity and Administerability. The Service has an unfair advantage over debtors because the Service is not bound by bankruptcy court orders addressing the tax consequences of a proposed plan of reorganization. [FN138]

Fairness and Equity. The fairness of the "G" reorganization rules depends on the extent to which one believes that economic policy should be effected by tax laws. [FN139] Having enacted the law, it is unfair to make the tax incentives pertaining to debtors in bankruptcy uncertain and unpredictable. A debtor in bankruptcy should be allowed to obtain an advance ruling from the bankruptcy court deciding whether the "G" reorganization rules have been satisfied.

Fresh Start. The "G" reorganization rules give debtors in bankruptcy a fresh start by deeming creditors to be shareholders and thus permitting tax-free 82 reorganizations. The debtor's fresh start is compromised to the extent the "G" reorganization rules are unclear, especially in the areas of continuity of interest, the relation back doctrine, and the measurement of substantially all of the debtor's assets under § 354 of the Internal Revenue Code.

Equality of Distribution Among Creditors. Equality of distribution is limited by the "G" reorganization rules to the extent that the relation back doctrine limits the mix of consideration that certain creditors can take. In bankruptcy reorganizations the debtor's various assets can be distributed to creditors on any basis on which the debtor and creditors agree. Stock is one "asset" that can be distributed. To ensure equality among creditors, all creditors should have the same right to take equity in satisfaction of claims. The relation back doctrine limits the right to take stock in a "G" reorganization because creditors receiving stock do not count toward satisfying continuity of interest unless all classes below those creditors have at least 50% of their claims satisfied by stock. There is no good reason either to (i) limit which creditors can be counted as taking stock, or (ii) require for continuity of interest that creditors have more than 50% of their claims satisfied by stock.

Rehabilitation Favored Over Liquidation. Obviously, "G" reorganizations further debtor rehabilitation. While stock for debt exchanges permit a debtor to generate capital from within, the "G" reorganization rules allow a debtor to recapitalize by combining with another entity. Rehabilitation is restricted to the extent that the Service suggests that § 354(b) of the Internal Revenue Code requires that at least one shareholder takes stock in exchange for stock, because cramdown under § 1129(b) of the Bankruptcy Code becomes problematic. In a "G" reorganization at cram down, the debtor cannot confirm a plan over the objection of a class of creditors if any creditor with less priority than the objecting class obtains property under the plan. Since shareholders generally have the lowest priority, no cram down confirmation could occur if a shareholder had to receive stock for a "G" reorganization to be effective.

Rehabilitation is further compromised by the requirement that a debtor dispose of substantially "all" of its assets to consummate a "G" reorganization, insofar as the Service measures substantially all of the debtor's assets from a point in time before the debtor has disposed of its non-performing assets.

Economy of Administration. Economic administration of bankruptcy cases is frustrated to the extent the debtor cannot predetermine the tax consequences of its proposed plan.

IMPACT OF BANKRUPTCY REORGANIZATION ON NOL'S

Historical Background

Generally, tax theory condemns transactions where the tax consequences alone create economic viability. Tax rules dating back to 1918 have discouraged 83 buying and selling tax losses. Taxpayers, however, condemn a tax system that requires sharing of gain when a company makes money, but, "if it loses money, the government may, in effect, just walk away . . . . [I]t is an example of tax policy taking off on a conceptural flight of its own . . . . " [FN140] Taxpayers view net operating loss carryovers as an appropriate averaging device, and condemn the government view that "deems the averaging of tax benefits between tax years acceptable as a matter of tax policy, but the averaging of such benefits between taxpayers unacceptable." [FN141]

Over the years, provisions of the Internal Revenue Code have permitted very limited carryovers and carrybacks of net operating losses. [FN142] At one time, corporate reorganizations presented non-statutory possibilities for carryover of tax attributes, and the propriety of those carryovers reached the Supreme Court as early as 1934. In New Colonial Ice [FN143] the Court adopted an "entity" approach and held in the merger of a "loss" and a "gain" corporation that, if the gain corporation survived, it was not the same taxpayer that sustained the losses. Deductions of the old loss corporation's net operating loss were denied against current income of the surviving gain corporation.

Similarly, under the Internal Revenue Codes of 1938 and 1954 a successor corporation to a debtor corporation in bankruptcy was deemed a separate entity and therefore net operating losses could not be carried over. The rule came to be known as the "clean slate doctrine." [FN144] As a result of the entity theory and clean slate doctrine, form prevailed over substance as taxpayers soon learned that, if the loss corporation survived a merger in form, corporate attributes could be preserved. "Minnows swallowing whales" were fairly common during the period. [FN145]

The predecessor to § 269 of the Internal Revenue Code, [FN146] enacted in 1943, authorized the Internal Revenue Service to disallow any deduction, including net operating loss carryovers, if the "principal purpose" of corporate acquisition was the evasion of federal income tax. Section 269 authorizes the commissioner to disallow deductions, based on a subjective consideration of the purpose of an acquisition. The simplicity of § 269 is attractive. The courts usually 84 allow the taxpayer the benefit of the doubt concerning the subjective purpose and intent of a transaction. [FN147]

In 1957, in Lisbon Shops v. Koehler, [FN148] the Supreme Court abandoned earlier tests, and (applying the 1954 Code) considered "continuity of business enterprise" to determine whether net operating losses carry over.

Lisbon Shops involved sixteen commonly owned brother-sister corporations (which owned sixteen stores), that merged into one corporation. The surviving corporation attempted to offset the pre-merger losses of three of the stores against the post-merger income of all of the stores. The court denied the post-merger loss deduction because the post-merger income was not earned by "substantially the same business which incurred the losses." The Lisbon Shops rule was not repealed until the enactment of the Tax Reform Act of 1986. [FN149]

By regulation the Treasury further restricted net operating loss carry-overs in 1966. Specifically, the "consolidated returns change in ownership" regulations provide that, if a common parent of a consolidated return group experiences a larger than 50% change of stock ownership, pre-change net operating loss carryovers may only offset income earned by pre-change members of the consolidated return group. The single return limitation year regulations provide that, when an acquired corporation becomes a member of a consolidated return group, the acquired corporation's pre-acquisition net operating loss carryovers can offset only the acquired corporation's post-acquisition income. [FN150]

The Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980, which included the special "G" reorganization rules for debtors in bankruptcy, made the general rules governing carryover of net operating losses from one year to another applicable to bankruptcy plans of reorganization. Those rules continue to apply to plans of reorganization in bankruptcy, provided the initial petition for bankruptcy was filed before August 14, 1986. [FN151] The 1980 rules disallowed the carryover of net operating losses as a deduction against corporate income in years following the realization of such income if (i) there is a 50% change in ownership of the corporation's stock by the debtor's ten largest shareholders, and (ii) the corporation's business is not carried on substantially the same following such change of ownership. In addition, the 1980 rules disallow or reduce the carryover net operating losses in the case of a tax reorganization if following the reorganization the 85 shareholders of the loss corporation do not own 20% of the stock of the reorganized corporation.

After many studies and many legislative efforts, the Tax Reform Act of 1986 introduced in § 382 the "neutrality principle" for net operating loss carryovers. The policy goal of the neutrality principle is to allow net operating losses to be freely transferable and usable after an acquisition to the extent that the net operating losses would likely have been usable to the loss corporation if no acquisition had occurred. [FN152]

The key to the neutrality principle is estimating the value of net operating losses in the hands of the loss corporation, and carrying those losses over to the hands of the surviving corporation without enhancement or diminution. [FN153] The neutrality principle distinguishes incidental carryovers from carryovers so large as to be the main object of a corporate acquisition.

Section 382 has three distinctive features. First, no differentiation is made between tax-free and taxable reorganizations. Second, the trigger for reducing carryover is an objective measurement of 50% change in stock ownership. Third, tax "neutrality" is achieved by limiting net operating loss carryovers to the amount of money that would have been earned had the value of all of the stock of the old loss corporation been invested in tax exempt bonds.

In other words, prior to an ownership change, Corporation X can use net operating loss carryovers only to the extent that it has income against which the loss carryovers can be deducted. The amount of income is the product of Corporation X's operations. Following an ownership change, the Internal Revenue Code deems the amount of income Corporation X earns to be the amount of money that the value of all of Corporation X's stock would earn if that value was invested in tax exempt bonds. Thus, following an ownership change, Corporation X can use its pre-change net operating loss carryovers as a deduction against post-change income only up to the amount of income that the service deems to represent interest on the pre-change value of Corporation X.

Ownership Change

The limitation on net operating loss carryovers is triggered by an ownership 86 change. An ownership change occurs if within a three-year testing period, 50% of a corporation's stock is transferred to shareholders who hold at least 5% of the corporation's stock. [FN154] The code aggregates less than five-percent shareholders into a single five-percent shareholder. [FN155]

An ownership change may be created by a taxable purchase of stock, a disposition of stock, a conversion of debt to stock, a contribution of capital to the loss corporation, a decrease in the outstanding stock of the loss corporation, or an issuance of stock by the loss corporation. [FN156] A "G" reorganization is described in § 382 as an equity structure shift, [FN157] which would trigger an ownership change. [FN158]

Thus, in order to determine whether an ownership change will occur as a consequence of a distribution of stock, it is necessary to identify who the debtor's 5% shareholders are, and to measure how much their ownership has increased. If 5% shareholders' ownership increased by 50%, an ownership change will have occurred, and net operating losses will be reduced. Five percent shareholders include all shareholders who at any time during the three-year period prior to the testing date held 5% of the debtor's stock, warrants, or options. The shareholders who never held more than 5% of the debtor's stock are deemed to aggregate into a single 5% shareholder.

For debtors in bankruptcy, all increases in ownership within three years of confirmation (including changes caused by confirmation) must be aggregated to see whether the increases exceed 50 percent. Increases are based on the value of shares. Unfortunately, it is impossible to predict prior to confirmation the percentage increase unless trading of shares is halted.

87 Ownership Change and Preferred Stock. In determining whether an ownership change has occurred, "stock" does not include preferred stock as defined in § 1504(a)(4) of the Internal Revenue Code. [FN159] Preferred stock under § 1504(a)(4) does not have voting rights. This definition works as a hindrance to debtors in bankruptcy because § 1123 of the Bankruptcy Code prohibits distribution of nonvoting equity securities following a debtor's bankruptcy plan of reorganization. Therefore, a debtor not in bankruptcy could raise capital without triggering an ownership change by distributing preferred stock, but a debtor in bankruptcy cannot at confirmation. [FN160]

Effect of Ownership Change

For any taxable year ending after the date of an ownership change, the amount of a loss corporation's taxable income that can be offset by pre-change losses cannot exceed the "§ 382 limitation" for that year. [FN161] This limitation is determined by multiplying the value of the loss corporation immediately before the ownership change by the long-term tax exempt rate. [FN162] The long-term tax exempt rate is published by the Treasury monthly. The value of the loss corporation is the fair market value of the loss corporation's stock immediately before the ownership change. [FN163] For example, if the value of a loss corporation's stock immediately before the ownership change is $1,000,000, and the tax exempt rate is 10%, a corporation can only take $100,000 of carryover net operating loss deductions per year following the ownership change.

The value of the stock of a loss corporation in bankruptcy is determined immediately after rather than before the ownership change in either a stock-for-debt exchange or a "G" reorganization. [FN164] Because the value of the loss corporation 88 stock is determined after the ownership change, arguably, the value of the loss corporation can include fresh capital contributed as part of a stock-for-debt exchange or as part of a "G" reorganization, which thereby increases the annual limitation. The Internal Revenue Service would probably look unfavorably on such a result as an unfair advantage to debtors in bankruptcy. Generally, contributions to capital made in the two years before an ownership change are treated as part of the overall plan and disallowed. [FN165] In short, Congress has enacted measures to stop taxpayers from infusing a corporation with capital shortly before an ownership change in order to increase the yearly net operating loss carryover deduction the corporation will enjoy after an ownership change. It is unlikely, therefore, that the Service would look favorably upon debtors in bankruptcy seizing on the literal language of the statute to avoid the restrictions on eleventh hour infusions of capital.

The Continuity of Business Enterprise Test

The Tax Reform Act of 1986 introduced the "continuity of business enterprise" test to replace the old "change in business" test. The continuity of business enterprise test presumably follows the standards set forth for corporate reorganizations under § 368. [FN166] Thus, the surviving corporation must continue at least one "significant" line of the old corporation's "historic business," or use in any business a "significant" portion of the old corporation's business assets. [FN167]

In light of the neutrality principle that tax benefits should neither encourage nor discourage an acquisition, [FN168] the requirement of a continuity of business enterprise test is puzzling. The neutrality principle, which purportedly underlies the 1986 Tax Act net operating loss carryover rules, was supposed to simplify the rules and treat all changes of ownership on a single objective basis. As noted above, the net operating losses of a pre-ownership change corporation can be carried over and set off against income of the post-ownership change corporation to the extent that the pre-change corporation could have earned income if it had invested its value in tax exempt bonds.

Since Congress has set forth an objective measure of income that can be set off by net operating loss carryovers, there is no reason to require that the post-change business engage in the same business as the pre-change business. Thus, the continuity of business enterprise test denies attribute utilization to the surviving corporation in some circumstances, and makes those attributes less valuable to the surviving corporation than they were to the old loss corporation. Therefore, the continuity of business enterprise restrictions of the Tax 89 Reform Act of 1986 violate the neutrality principle by imposing a tax disincentive upon certain corporation reorganizations. [FN169]

Similarly, § 382(1)(4)(A) [FN170] restricts net operating loss carryovers where one-third or more of the fair market value of a loss corporation's assets consist in non-business assets. In those instances, where the loss corporation undergoes an ownership change, the value of the loss corporation must be reduced by the excess of the value of non-business assets over the portion of the corporation's indebtedness attributable to such assets. Because the availability of net operating loss carryovers is the product of the value of the loss corporation's stock multiplied by the tax exempt bond rate, reduction of the value of the loss corporation will translate into a reduction of net operating loss carryovers. Once again, if the tax benefit of net operating loss carryovers is deemed by statute to be the "neutral" economic benefit, tax policy is retarded by reducing that tax benefit for particular taxpayers based upon the value of non-business assets owned by those taxpayers.

Built-In Losses and Built-In Gains

"Built-in loss" refers to any tax loss that would be recognized for tax purposes upon the sale of assets following an ownership change. "Built-in gain" refers to any tax gain that would be recognized for tax purposes upon the sale of assets following an ownership change.

For example, if a debtor owns land purchased for $100, and on the date the debtor experiences an ownership change, the land is worth only $50, the debtor has a built-in loss of $50. By the same token, if a debtor owns land purchased for $50, and on the date the debtor experiences an ownership the land is worth $100, the debtor has a built-in gain of $50.

Section 382 treats all built-in loss recognized during the five years after an ownership change as pre-change loss subject to the § 382 limitations described above. By the same token, built-in gains increase the § 382 limitation for the taxable year by the amount of the recognized built-in gain. [FN171] If the aggregate built-in gain or loss does not exceed twenty-five percent of the fair market value of the pre-change corporation's assets, however, the built-in gain or loss is deemed to be zero. [FN172] The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1987 added § 384 to the Internal Revenue Code to preclude the use of net operating carryovers to offset built-in gains of an acquired corporation.

*90 Special Bankruptcy Rules

Before the enactment of the Tax Reform Act of 1986, net operating losses carried over following an ownership change of a debtor in bankruptcy provided (a) the former shareholders (and creditors in the case of a "G" reorganization) received at least 20% of the stock of the surviving corporation; [FN173] and (b) the surviving corporation did not change its business within 2 years. [FN174] Both old and new § 382 deemed creditors to be shareholders for purposes of determining whether an ownership change has occurred. Thus, § 382 incorporates the continuity of interest principle that creditors succeed shareholders of debtors in bankruptcy. [FN175]

Under new § 382, if the pre-ownership-change creditors and shareholders of a debtor in bankruptcy own at least 50% of the value and voting power of the stock of the loss corporation after the ownership change, at the election of the debtor, neither the annual limitation on the amount of income that can be sheltered by the carryover of built-in losses, nor the continuity of business enterprise requirements apply; provided the ownership change is part of a court-approved plan of reorganization. [FN176] For these purposes, stock received by a creditor in exchange for debt counts towards the 50% threshold only if the creditor held the debt for at least 18 months before the filing of the debtor's bankruptcy, or if the debt arose in the ordinary course of the loss corporation's trade or business, and was held by the same creditor to whom the debt was initially owed. [FN177]

The restriction on transfer of creditor claims is intended to subject creditors to the same rules as shareholders. Thus, if 50% of the "old and cold" creditors sell their claims, full reduction of net operating losses could be the consequence. As stated by the Treasury:

> In our view, only the historic creditors are fairly assumed to be parties who economically suffered the loss and who are thus analogous to loss corporation shareholders. [FN178]

*91 The Treasury's statement makes no sense. The fact that an historic creditor transfers its claim tells us nothing about whether it has suffered an economic loss and therefore stepped into the shoes of shareholders. An historic creditor's desire to liquidate its claim quickly should not, therefore, inhibit the reorganization of debtors in bankruptcy by causing a restriction on the use of net operating loss carryovers. Worse, the tax penalty is retroactive and penalizes trades of claims made when there was little reason to anticipate the impact upon net operating losses. [FN179] The tax restrictions on trading in claims has little justification and should be repealed.

The "toll charge" for the bankruptcy exception is a reduction of the net operating losses of the old loss corporation equal to one-half of the amount of cancellation of indebtedness income hypothetically realized in stock for debt exchanges. [FN180] Effectively, net operating loss carryovers are reduced by 50% of the difference between the amount of debt canceled by creditors and the value of the shares they receive in the reorganized debtor.

For example, if a debtor with $100 of debt and $100 of net operating losses confirms a bankruptcy plan of reorganization which provides for payment to creditors of $.50 per dollar of debt, no reduction of net operating losses will result, and $100 of net operating losses will survive. If, on the other hand, a debtor with $100 of debt and $100 of net operating losses confirms a reorganization plan which provides for payment to creditors with shares of the debtor's stock worth $.50 per dollar of debt, then net operating losses will be reduced by 50% of the difference between the amount of debt canceled ($100) and the value of the shares creditors receive ($50). Thus $75 of net operating losses will survive. Net operating losses are also reduced by the interest on any debt that was paid or accrued during the three-year period preceding the bankruptcy ownership change, if that interest was converted into stock in the reorganization. [FN181]

Finally, if a loss corporation taking advantage of the bankruptcy exception changes ownership within two years, net operating losses after that second ownership change are eliminated. [FN182] The two-year limitation rule is intended to prevent debtors from making large capital contributions during the measuring period to obtain large net operating loss carryovers that might enable shareholders to sell the stock immediately at a higher price. The rule has been criticized, because in bankruptcy cases the price paid for the stock in a second change of ownership is typically attributable to earnings and the prospect of future earnings, not "stuffing" of capital into the business. [FN183] Apparently the 92 Treasury shares this concern, [FN184] and therefore taxpayers might successfully seek relaxation of this all-or-nothing limitation.

In order to avoid inadvertently triggering an ownership change, a number of chapter 11 plans confirmed under the new net operating loss carryover rules contain provisions limiting the transfer of stock issued under the plan for two years. Such plans provide for an initial distribution of stock to a trust, followed by ultimate distribution to the various classes of claimants from the trust over a period of two years. [FN185] The initial distribution of stock to the trust causes an ownership change. By delaying ultimate distributions to claimants no owner-ship change within two years will occur as a consequence of claimants transferring shares. Although no hard data is available, such jumping through hoops can only impede creditor's acceptance of plans, and detract from the clear congressional mandate to provide debtors in bankruptcy relief from the new limitations on net operating loss carryovers.

Recently Proposed Reg. 1.269-3(d) adds yet another obstacle to the use of the bankruptcy exception: the debtor must prove that ownership change was not made to avoid tax in any case in which the new active trade or business requirement is not met. As noted above, § 269 of the Internal Revenue Code authorizes the Internal Revenue Service to deny the tax benefits flowing from a tax reorganization where the principal purpose of the transaction is to evade tax. The proposed regulations state that, absent evidence to the contrary, where the bankruptcy exception to § 382 applies, the principal purpose of the reorganization is deemed to be evasion of federal taxes unless the corporation carries on more than an insignificant amount of an active trade or business during and subsequent to the bankruptcy case. Open issues include the definition of what constitutes an active trade or business, and, more importantly, whether the proposed regulations will survive the anticipated avalanche of negative comment letters.

Significantly, the proposed regulation also seeks to undermine the power of the bankruptcy courts to rule under Bankruptcy Code § 1129(d), which provides that upon the request of a party in interest (such as the Service) the bankruptcy court must deny confirmation of a plan, the principal purpose of which is to avoid taxes. The proposed regulations provide that any bankruptcy court determination under § 1129(d) of the Bankruptcy Code will not control a subsequent challenge by the Service under § 269 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The proposed regulations are yet another example of the uncertainty created for taxpayers by the conflicts between the Internal Revenue Code and the Bankruptcy Code.

*93 THE INTERPLAY OF NET OPERATING LOSS CARRYOVERS AND THE STOCK FOR DEBT EXCEPTION TO CANCELLATION OF INDEBTEDNESS INCOME

Assume that Corporation X is considering a plan of reorganization that will distribute (i) small cash payments plus 90% of "new" X stock to creditors, and (ii) 10% of new X stock to shareholders. An ownership change will be triggered by virtue of a change of ownership of more than 50% of X stock, and X must decide whether to exercise the stock for debt exception to cancellation of indebtedness income.

On the one hand, because the confirmation of the plan triggers an ownership change, the stock for debt exception causes a $.50 reduction in net operating losses for each dollar of debt forgiven. Thus, if $10 of debt is satisfied with $5 of stock, net operating losses must be reduced by $2.50.

On the other hand, failure to exercise the stock for debt exception will cause no reduction of net operating losses. Instead, the basis of X's assets will be reduced one dollar for each dollar of debt forgiven, and, when A has no basis in its assets, then net operating loss carryovers will be reduced by one dollar for each dollar of debt discharged. Thus, if X's basis in its assets is $10, and X does not exercise the stock for debt exception, X's basis will be reduced by the value of the stock ($5), and X will be left with a $5 basis in its assets.

At the very least, the following factors must be considered to determine which option is better:

1. X's basis in its assets. If X has a very low basis in its assets, the failure to exercise the stock for debt exception means net operating loss suicide, because after that basis has been reduced to zero, net operating loss carryovers will be reduced dollar for dollar of debt forgiveness;

2. X's intentions regarding sale of assets. If X intends to sell its assets soon after confirmation, use of the stock for debt exception is probably better.

Example: Assume X has $10 of claims, $10 in net operating loss carryovers and $10 basis in its assets. Assume X were to exchange stock valued at $5 for its claims. Such an exchange would cause a $.50 on the dollar reduction in net operating loss carryovers. The $10 of loss carryovers must be reduced by one-half of the $5 of debt discharged, leaving $7.50 in net operating loss carryovers. If subsequently, X were to sell its assets for $17.50, X would realize a $7.50 gain, ($17.50 minus $10 basis) and that gain would be offset by the $7.50 net operating loss. No gain would be recognized. If X failed to exercise the stock for debt exception (or if X exchanged $5 in cash for the claims), X's basis in its assets would drop dollar for dollar for the $5 of debt discharged, from $10 to $5, and the net operating loss would remain at $10. When X sold its assets for $17.50, X would realize $12.50 gain ($17.50 minus $5), only $10 of which could be offset by its net operating loss. Thus, X would recognize $2.50 gain.

94 3. The Likelihood of large earnings shortly after confirmation. If X can anticipate large earnings, the waiver of the stock for debt exception is probably better.

Example: Assume again $10 of claims, $10 net operating loss and a $10 basis in assets. If X exchanged $5 of stock for $10 of claims and did not elect the stock for debt exception (or if X exchanged $5 cash) X will reduce its basis in its assets dollar for dollar of debt discharged from $10 to $5, and leave the $10 net operating loss carryover undisturbed. If the next year X earns $10, the $10 net operating loss will offset the gain. Assuming X exercised the stock for debt exception, however, if $5 of stock was exchanged for $10 of claims, net operating loss carryovers would be reduced by $.50 on the dollar of the $5 of debt discharged, from $10 to $7.50. If the next year's earnings were $10, X could only offset $7.50 with its net operating loss and would recognize $2.50 in income.

Bankruptcy Tax Policy

Background

The treatment of net operating loss carryovers in bankruptcy again illustrates the conflict between bankruptcy and tax policy. Under § 541(c)(1) of the Bankruptcy Code, all property interests of the debtor become property of the debtor's bankruptcy estate, "notwithstanding any provision in an agreement, transfer instrument, or applicable non-bankruptcy law." Bankruptcy lawyers, accustomed to defining property of the estate very broadly, presume that net operating loss carryovers are included. [FN186]

As a matter of tax policy, however, transferability of net operating loss carryovers is not tenable, because net operating losses carry much more value for solvent taxpayers than they do for insolvent taxpayers. The following analogy to a vacation-exchange illustrates the difference in value:

> Suppose you are an employer who grants all your employees vacations of one month each year. Under your vacation rules, at the end of each year each employee must take her vacation or receive one month's pay in lieu of her vacation. Alternatively, if the employee chooses, she can transfer her vacation rights to another employee, who can then either use the vacation or turn in the vacation right to her employer in exchange for pay equal to one month of her pay. Would any enlightened employer adopting a vacation program permit an employee earning $12,000 a year to convey her $1,000 vacation right to a fellow employee earning $60,000 a year, who promptly remits the vacation right and receives $5,000 cash? As improbable as that sounds, it is the Internal Revenue Code's present vacation - tax vacation - policy.

*95 Corporate taxpayers possessing NOL tax vacation entitlements, to them worth $1,000 or zero, may transfer those entitlements to other corporate taxpayers who cash them in as deductions on their Forms 1120, receiving cash tax savings of $5,000, $50,000, or millions of dollars. [FN187]

In summary, tax policy is violated by relaxing the general restrictions on net operating loss carryovers while bankruptcy policy is violated by imposing any restrictions on net operating loss carryovers.

Although the special bankruptcy rules appear to offer advantages to debtors in bankruptcy, upon closer examination the advantages diminish. In the event of an ownership change, net operating loss carryovers are reduced by one-half of the amount of the debt discharged in exchange for stock, and the cost imposed upon debtors in bankruptcy to qualify for special net operating loss carryover treatment may outweigh the benefits.

For example, if within two years of bankruptcy the debtor undergoes a second ownership change, the special bankruptcy treatment is retroactively revoked. A public company with little control over the exchange of its stock does not know at the time of reorganization whether it will ultimately enjoy the benefits of the special bankruptcy treatment. Similarly, the special bankruptcy treatment does not apply if the debtor emerges from bankruptcy with shareholders and former creditors holding less than 50% of the debtor's stock. For these purposes, stock obtained through claims transfers does not count towards the 50% threshold. Thus, trading in claims, an increasingly popular Wall Street investment strategy, could inhibit the debtor's ability to carry over net operating losses, notwithstanding that trading is beyond the control of debtors in bankruptcy.

Finally, corporations not in bankruptcy can issue non-voting preferred stock without triggering an ownership change. Debtors in bankruptcy, however, are prohibited by the Bankruptcy Code from issuing non-voting preferred stock.

The extraordinary measures that debtors may have to take to preserve the special bankruptcy treatment of net operating loss carryovers (for example, prohibiting trades of stock for two years following bankruptcy) make it problematic whether the special bankruptcy tax treatment offers any advantage over the regular treatment of net operating loss carryovers.

Tax Policy

Clarification of the Law. The tax treatment of net operating loss carryovers has always been unclear, and the Tax Reform Act of 1986 only compounded the confusion.

*96 Equal Treatment In and Out of Bankruptcy. The net operating loss provisions for insolvent debtors apply only to corporations under the formal jurisdiction of a bankruptcy court, and expressly exclude informal workouts (although the conference report directs the Treasury to study the informal workout situation). [FN188] Exclusion of informal workouts under the current law could encourage filing bankruptcy. [FN189]

The bankruptcy exception gives preferential treatment to solvent debtors in bankruptcy over insolvent debtors not in bankruptcy. Granting to solvent taxpayers benefits not enjoyed by insolvent taxpayers is especially offensive to tax policy:

> The Treasury's argument against an informal workout provision was "to ensure that [the bankruptcy exceptions] cannot be used by solvent corporations to avoid application of the general limitations." [FN190]

Fresh Start But No Head Start. Carryover of net operating losses in bankruptcy despite loss of shareholder equity allows debtors to keep built-in tax benefits while simultaneously reducing pre-bankruptcy tax liabilities.

Therefore, in principle debtors in bankruptcy obtain a head start.

Simplicity and Administrability. Once again, simplicity and administrability are compromised because the debtor can obtain no advance ruling regarding how the Service will treat the debtor's plan. Even if advance rulings were allowed, the requirement that no ownership change occur for two years following bankruptcy complicates the administration of the tax law for no apparent tax advantage.

Fairness and Equity. Restricting the carryover of net operating losses for distressed businesses is an unhealthy use of tax law to implement economic policy. The fairness of carryover of net operating losses for distressed businesses is easily articulated if divorced from its tax implications.

Bankruptcy Policy

Fresh Start for Debtors. The net operating loss carryover rules promote the debtor's fresh start by allowing the debtor to offset future income against past losses.

Fair and Equitable Treatment of Creditors. The net operating loss carryover rules do not directly implicate the treatment of creditors.

Debtor Rehabilitation Favored Over Liquidation. The purpose of the special bankruptcy exception is to promote rehabilitation over liquidation. That 97 result is accomplished by easing the debtor's future tax liabilities to make more money available to fund a plan of reorganization. That result is frustrated by the limitations imposed upon net operating loss carryovers under the 1986 Tax Act, including:

(i) retroactive revocation of the bankruptcy exception in the event of an ownership change within two years of bankruptcy;

(ii) revocation of the bankruptcy exception if more than 50% of the claims of creditors to be paid with stock under a plan of reorganization are transferred claims;

(iii) the restrictions upon issuance of preferred stock by debtors in bankruptcy, where such issuance would otherwise avoid any limitation on net operating loss carryovers.

Economy of Administration. That the net operating loss carryover rules are so complex, arbitrary, and unpredictable makes tax planning one of the most expensive and time-consuming elements of designing a plan of reorganization.

ADVANCE DETERMINATION OF TAX CONSEQUENCES OF BANKRUPTCY REORGANIZATIONS

The Present Law

The immediate and future tax burdens imposed by a proposed plan of bankruptcy reorganization may be critical to confirmation. Tax burdens are very important to valuation of the debtor, which bears directly on whether the plan is in the best interest of creditors, is "fair and equitable" to creditors [FN191] and whether reorganization is likely to be followed by liquidation or further financial reorganization. [FN192] The bankruptcy court must find that the plan is proposed in good faith and not by any means forbidden by law, including the tax law. [FN193] Upon request of "any governmental unit," the bankruptcy court must make an additional finding that the principal purpose of the plan is not tax avoidance. [FN194] Notwithstanding a bankruptcy court's findings for the debtor on all of these issues and confirmation of a plan, the Internal Revenue Service can then deny the expected tax benefits and relitigate the same issues after confirmation in non-bankruptcy forums.

Private letter rulings offer little useful relief. If the Service declines to issue a ruling, if a ruling is delayed, or if a debtor disagrees with a ruling, the debtor has no redress and the plan of reorganization could be jeopardized.

Debtors considering a preconfirmation judicial determination of tax issues face two impediments: (1) the Internal Revenue Code prohibits suits "for the 98 purpose of restraining the assessment of collection of any tax," [FN195] and (2) the Declaratory Judgment Act enforces the Internal Revenue Code restriction by excluding issues "with respect to Federal taxes." [FN196]

These problems are more than theoretical. In In re Inland Gas Corp. [FN197] the district court refused to confirm the debtor's plan of liquidation because the risk created by the Service's adverse private letter ruling pertaining to the imposition of gain under § 337 of the Internal Revenue Code rendered the plan not "feasible" and not "equitable." The circuit court affirmed, and held that the Declaratory Judgment Act precluded the debtor from seeking judicial review of the adverse letter ruling. In In re Wingree Co., [FN198] the Service refused to issue a letter ruling. The circuit court held under the Declaratory Judgment Act that the district court had no authority to order the Service to inspect the debtor's books and determine the nature and extent of any available loss carryovers.

Bankruptcy courts can make binding advance determinations of the tax consequences of reorganizations only with respect to state and local taxes. Under § 1146(d) of the Bankruptcy Code the bankruptcy court may authorize the proponent of a reorganization plan to request a state or local taxing authority to declare the tax effects of the plan. In the event of a controversy, the court may rule on those tax effects after the earlier of the date the taxing authority responds or 270 days after the request. [FN199] The bankruptcy court's ruling under § 1146 is limited however to "questions of law." [FN200] Thus, the bankruptcy court can declare whether a reorganization qualifies for tax-free status under state and local law, but the bankruptcy court cannot fix the dollar amount of any tax attributes that survive the reorganization.

Legislative History

Before enactment of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, both the House and Senate considered including in § 1146(d) bankruptcy court authority to determine federal as well as state and local tax consequences of plans of reorganization. Only the provision for state and local tax consequences survived.

Initially, the Service was "in favor of remedial legislation in this area," if it was given nine months from the time of a request to make a response. [FN201] Upon inclusion of the 270 day provision in § 1146 of the Bankruptcy Code, the Service 99 "did not oppose" the provision, provided additional funds would be appropriated to carry the anticipated "increased administrative burdens." [FN202] The provision for advance determination of federal tax consequences was subsequently stricken from the House version of the Bankruptcy Reform Act and inserted into the proposed Bankruptcy Tax Act without a hearing, as a result of a "jurisdictional conflict" between the House Ways and Means Committee and the House Judiciary Committee. [FN203] (The provision for advance determination of state and local taxes was not stricken and was ultimately passed.)

Subsequently, the Senate Finance Committee considered whether to strike the provision for advance rulings on federal tax effects from the Senate version of the Bankruptcy Reform Act. At the hearing, Treasury argued that bankruptcy courts should not be permitted to make advance rulings because of the "serious administrative problems" the IRS would encounter if debtors submitted numerous alternative proposed plans for a single reorganization. [FN204] The American Bar Association, in opposition, argued that bankruptcy judges should be permitted to make advance federal tax rulings because uncertainty over tax consequences would adversely affect the structuring of plans of reorganization:

> Should the Service take an adverse position, its view would have undue finality since proponents of a plan might not want to risk subsequent tax litigation even where they believe their provision properly expresses the applicable law. In this situation, declaratory relief seems appropriate. [FN205]

Ultimately the Senate Finance Committee deleted from the Bankruptcy Reform Act the provision permitting the advance determination of tax consequences of bankruptcy reorganizations for reasons not foreseen by Treasury or the ABA:

> The committee believes that it is unfair to permit the bankruptcy court to issue a declaratory judgment, in effect, on tax matters for bankruptcy. [FN206]

That the tax law is so vague and confusing that the Senate committee considered it an "unfair" advantage for debtors in bankruptcy to be able to request bankruptcy court findings on tax matters is a sad commentary on congressional 100 effort in this area. Congress should not perpetuate the incomprehensibility of bankruptcy tax laws by disabling the means for giving the laws meaning. In light of the strong policies favoring debtors in bankruptcy in the areas of discharge of indebtedness, reorganization and carryover of net operation losses, it is surprising that the marginal advantage of a declaratory judgment on tax questions in bankruptcy was enough to kill the proposal.

The advance determination provision was nominally revisited during the House consideration of the proposed Bankruptcy Tax Act of 1980, but the provision quickly disappeared from early drafts of the Act with no explanation. [FN207]

Bankruptcy Tax Policy

Background

Presently, the Declaratory Judgment Act and the Internal Revenue Code prohibit declaratory judgments with regard to federal taxes. This bar on tax determinations has been relaxed with respect to tax exempt organizations, [FN208] qualification of retirement plans [FN209] and interest on municipal bonds. [FN210] Advance determination for bankruptcy plans of reorganization is appropriate.

Tax Policy

Clarification of the Law. Given (i) the conflict between tax policy and bankruptcy policy in the areas of discharge of indebtedness income, "G" reorganizations, and carryover of net operating losses, (ii) the history of an evershifting balance between the two, and (iii) the imperfect fit of bankruptcy law and tax law, the tax law is improved to the extent the bankruptcy court can introduce clarity in particular cases.

Equal Treatment in and out of Bankruptcy. Notwithstanding the 1977 Senate Finance Committee conclusion that advance determination of tax issues would allow debtors in bankruptcy an unfair advantage, the advantage would not permit debtors in bankruptcy to pay less tax. Further, any such advantage is mitigated by the need for debtors in bankruptcy to obtain court approval for the transaction that gives rise to the advance determination. As demonstrated by Inland Gas Corp. and Wingreen, a debtor in bankruptcy may not be able to obtain bankruptcy court approval of a reorganization without an advance determination of tax consequences.

Fresh Start but no Head Start. The debtor's fresh start is hindered by the debtor's inability to determine the tax consequences of a plan of reorganization. Since the debtor would pay no less tax in or out of bankruptcy in most cases, no "head start" would result from procedural reform.

101 Fairness and Equity. The administrative burdens upon the Service must be weighed against the lost benefits of reorganizations that fail or are frustrated by the ambiguity of tax law. The balance easily favors procedural reform.

Bankruptcy Policy

Fresh Start. Certainty of tax consequences will enable debtors to utilize more effectively the tax advantages that Congress has bestowed upon insolvent corporations. Plans of reorganization will not be frustrated by the inability of the bankruptcy court to determine tax advantages as in Inland Gas Corp. and Wingreen.

Fair and Equitable Distribution Among Creditors. Given the present uncertain state of bankruptcy tax law, reorganization plans may require contingencies such as "givebacks" by creditors in the event of post-confirmation denial of tax benefits. To the extent that tax consequences are certain, contingency givebacks will be unnecessary and the parties can more effectively ensure a fair and equitable distribution among creditors.

Rehabilitation Favored over Liquidation. Certainty of tax burdens favors rehabilitation by establishing the conditions for confirmation of a plan. The court can value the debtor to ensure that a proposed plan is in the best interests of creditors and is fair and equitable. The court can also decide whether a plan complies with tax law. In addition, upon request by the taxing authority, the court can decide whether a plan is proposed for the purpose of tax avoidance. Further, certainty of tax benefits allows debtors to make a more convincing proposal to creditors for reorganization, and allows creditors to make a more informed decision whether to support a proposed plan.

Economy of Administration. If the bankruptcy court's decision is final, judicial economy is promoted by eliminating subsequent tax court relitigation. The debtor's administrative burden already includes consideration of tax consequences. To the extent a measure of certainty is realized, the time and expense devoted to tax matters should be reduced, both pre- and post-confirmation.

CONCLUSIONS

Tax policy and bankruptcy policy conflict because the bankruptcy policy favoring rehabilitation of troubled businesses is often effected by Congress through tax advantages to debtors in bankruptcy. The Treasury argues for payment of taxes regardless of hardship, and opposes in principle tax advantages for financially troubled taxpayers. This conflict creates ambiguity in bankruptcy tax law because (i) tax advantages to debtors in bankruptcy change frequently as the political will of Congress changes, and (ii) the implementation of those tax advantages often involves an imperfect juxtaposition of tax law principles and bankruptcy policies.

In the area of cancellation of indebtedness income, the insolvency exception has shifted in emphasis in recent years from reduction of basis upon debt 102 forgiveness to virtually no reduction of basis and back again to reduction of basis. Under the most recent changes, reduction of net operating losses is a mandatory consequence of stock for debt exchanges if more than 50% of corporate stock is transferred. Uncertainty in this area presently includes the following issues:

(i) the treatment of solvent corporations in bankruptcy.

(ii) the consequences of a mix of consideration in a stock for debt exchange;

(iii) the application of the "de minimis" and "proportionality" limitations on stock for debt exchanges;

(iv) the timing of stock for debt exchanges; and

(v) the tax effect of a debt security for debt security exchange.

In the area of tax-free reorganizations in bankruptcy, the "G" reorganization provisions cleared away years of confusing case law, but new issues have emerged largely because tax law does not fully acount for the consequences of deeming a creditor to be a shareholder. Specific issues include:

(i) the identification of creditors to be treated as shareholders;

(ii) cram down in a "G" reorganization; and

(iii) whether substantially all of the debtor's assets are transferred in a reorganization.

With respect to carryover of net operating losses, the law has shifted many times. Most recently the Tax Reform Act of 1986 sharply curtailed carryover and applied new criteria. Developing issues include:

(i) the effect of trading in claims by creditors;

(ii) the effect of a subsequent ownership change within two years of bankruptcy;

(iii) the effect of "single return limitation year" and "consolidated returns change in ownership" regulations;

(iv) the effect of issuance of non-voting preferred stock under the Bankruptcy Code;

(v) the effect of a fresh contribution of capital post-petition but pre-confirmation; and

(vi) the effect of worthless security deductions by fifty percent of former shareholders.

The uncertainty created by bankruptcy tax law is compounded by the inability of the debtor to obtain a binding advance determination of the tax consequences of reorganization. Section 1146 of the Bankruptcy Code should be amended to permit the bankruptcy courts to make advance determinations.

Advance determination of tax consequence will further the bankruptcy policies of (i) fresh start for debtors; (ii) equality of distribution among creditors; (iii) economy of administration, and most importantly (iv) favoring rehabilitation over liquidation. Tax policy would not be impeded, and may in fact be promoted, especially in the areas of (i) clarification of the law; and (ii) fairness and equity.

FN60. In 1984 Congress explicitly restricted the use of the stock for debt exception by solvent debtors not in bankruptcy. However, no mention was made of solvent debtors in bankruptcy. Arguably, the language of § 108 restricts the use of the stock for debt exception by a solvent debtor in bankruptcy as well. The 1984 amendment provides that the stock for debt exception "shall not apply in the event of a debtor in a title 11 case or to the extent the debtor is solvent" (emphasis added). Thus, the literal language of the statute suggests that solvency can be a bar to use of the stock for debt exception even for debtors in bankruptcy. On the other hand, the legislative history explicitly allows use of the stock for debt exception without qualification for all debtors in bankruptcy: "this rule will not apply to solvent corporations or to corporations in a title 11 case" (emphasis added). Although the legislative history is unambiguous, given the Treasury policies to encourage equal treatment of debtors in bankruptcy and debtors not in bankruptcy, and to encourage a fresh start but not a "head start," a Treasury challenge to stock for debt exchanges involving solvent corporations in bankruptcy is possible.

FN158. Under the provisions of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1987, if a worthless stock deduction is claimed by a shareholder who during the three-year testing period owned 50% or more of the stock of the loss corporation, no net operating loss carryovers can offset the corporation's post-change income. 26 U.S.C.A. § 382(g)(4)(D) (West 1988 & Supp. 1991). This provision is apparently intended to reverse the result of Textron, Inc. v. United States, 561 F.2d 1023 (1st Cir. 1977), which held that, in the context of a deduction claimed by a parent for worthless stock of a non-consolidated subsidiary, the net operating loss carryovers of the subsidiary survived to offset the subsidiary's future income. The 1987 Act avoids the whipsaw problem created by allowing the parent corporation a deduction and at the same time allowing the subsidiary corporation a deduction for the same economic loss. Since the statute is drafted more broadly than the problem it attempts to solve, new problems arise. First, taxpayers must ascertain the deduction taken by any 50% shareholder. It is arguably unfair, however, to have one taxpayer's tax burden dependent upon the treatment of items by another taxpayer. See Moline Properties Inc. v. United States, 319 U.S. 436 (1943); see also text accompanying note 80 supra. Second, the 1987 provision is inserted in § 382(g), the same subsection that aggregates all less-than-five-percent shareholders into one five-percent shareholder. In the context of a bankruptcy all shareholders who are wiped out can take worthless security deductions. Thus, if 50% of those shareholders take worthless security deductions, those shareholders might be aggregated under § 382(g), and net operating loss carryovers would be denied. Presumably, this result was not intended by the statute.

FN160. Despite a debtor's inability to issue nonvoting equity securities, the temporary regulations outline a procedure for excluding from the definition of "stock" interests that would otherwise qualify as stock. Temp. Treas. Reg. §§ 1.382(i)(6)(A) and (K)(6)(ii) (under authority of 26 U.S.C.A. § 382(k)(6)(A) (West 1988 & Supp. 1991)). If all three of the following tests are satisfied, stock does not count as "stock" for § 382 purposes:

1) participation in future growth of the corporation is "disproportionately small" relative to the value of the stock compared to the total value of outstanding stock;

2) treating the stock as non-stock would result in an ownership change; and

3) the amount of pre-change loss exceeds twice the amount obtained by multiplying the value of the loss corporation by the long-term tax-exempt rate.

The regulations provide no objective guideline or safe harbor provisions for measuring whether participation in future growth is "disproportionately small." Because the second element is mandatory and the Congressional intent in allowing the Regulations was to prevent avoidance of the § 382 limitation, H.R. REP. NO. 841, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. II-173 (1986), it is unlikely that debtors in bankruptcy can take advantage of the provisions.

Note that the same issues relevant to the timing of a stock for debt exchange apply with equal force to the timing of ownership change under the net operating loss carryover rules. See notes 73-76 supra and accompanying text. The Internal Revenue Service, in letter rulings, suggests that the "testing date" for determining an ownership change is the confirmation date of a chapter 11 plan. Priv. Ltr. Rul. 89-02-047 (Oct. 28, 1988); Priv. Ltr. Rul. 90-15-033 (Jan. 16, 1990); Priv. Ltr. Rul. 90-19-036 (Feb. 9, 1990). Deeming the confirmation date to be the date of ownership change could undermine reorganizations that are subject to appeal, insofar as additional claimants and additional purchasers of the debtor's equity may surface between the confirmation date and the date that the plan ultimately becomes effective, thus changing the identity of those entitled to stock. If the change in ownership is substantial, a second ownership change could be imminent.

Susan B. Hoekema

INTRODUCTION

An impartial judiciary is an essential element of the system of justice in the United States. The right to a 'neutral and detached judge' in all proceedings is protected by the Constitution. [FN1] In addition, an impartial judiciary is essential to maintain public confidence in the integrity of the judicial system. [FN2] Throughout the history of our national government, Congress has sought to secure the impartiality of trial judges by requiring judges to disqualify themselves in various circumstances. [FN3]

Congress revised the federal disqualification law in 1974, and instituted an objective standard for disqualification in place of a subjective standard. [FN4] As stated in 28 U.S.C. § 455(a), the objective disqualification requirement mandates disqualification when a reasonable person would question a judge's impartiality. [FN5]

Since the objective standard was adopted, however, judicial interpretation of section 455(a) has narrowed the broad scope Congress intended for disqualification law. [FN6] Federal courts have limited the scope of the current statutory provisions *698 by requiring a high standard of proof of bias [FN7] and by applying judicially-created rules restricting the circumstances in which bias can be found. [FN8] In addition, the procedures for disqualification cast into doubt the objectivity of disqualification decisions. [FN9] The procedures allow the challenged judge to make the disqualification decision. If a judge refuses to disqualify himself, review is not always immediately available and appellate courts tend to defer to the initial judgment of the district court. [FN10]

This comment will review current standards and procedures required by statute and applied to judicial disqualification by the courts. It will assess the extent to which current interpretations conform to the objective standard set forth in section 455(a) and explore ways in which disqualification decisions may be made on a more objective basis.

I. STATUTORY PROVISIONS FOR DISQUALIFICATION

Two provisions of federal law furnish the means for disqualifying district court judges. [FN11] The paramount disqualification statute is 28 U.S.C. § 455. [FN12] Section 455(a) sets forth a general provision mandating disqualification whenever *699 a reasonable person would question a judge's impartiality. [FN13]

Section 455(b) requires disqualification in several specified circumstances. [FN14] A judge is disqualified if he or she has a financial interest in a case, [FN15] defined by the statute as 'ownership of a legal or equitable interest, however small, or a relationship as director, adviser, or other active participant in the affairs of a party.' [FN16] Section 455(b) also mandates disqualification if the persons involved in the litigation are related to the judge 'within the third degree of [blood] relationship.' [FN17] The statute also provides for disqualification if the judge has a professional relationship with a party, including representation of a party by the judge or by a member of the judge's former firm. [FN18] Judges who have been in government employment must disqualify themselves from proceedings in which they had a role and from cases about which they have expressed an opinion on 700 the merits. [FN19] Section 455(b) also requires disqualification when a judge has 'a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding.' [FN20]

Parties cannot waive their right to disqualification when it is based on one of the grounds specified in section 455(b). [FN21] When the disqualification is based on section 455(a), however, waiver is permitted upon full disclosure of the basis for disqualification. [FN22]

Section 455 places responsibility for disqualification on the judge. [FN23] This action can be taken sua sponte. [FN24] Courts also permit disqualification to be prompted by a party either by motion or on appeal. [FN25]

Section 455 was significantly revised in 1974. [FN26] A major concern of Congress was to eliminate the subjective opinion of the judge as the basis for determining disqualification. [FN27] The superseded version of section 455 required 701 disqualification if, 'in his opinion,' it was improper for a judge to sit during the proceedings. [FN28] Congress replaced this subjective standard with an objective standard that obliges judges to disqualify themselves when their impartiality 'might reasonably be questioned.' [FN29] In instituting this objective standard, Congress stressed that it was doing away with the 'duty to sit' rule, requiring that a judge should stay with the case when it doubt about disqualification. [FN30]

The general disqualification standard set forth in section 455(a) cannot be understood without analysis of two other disqualification provisions--section 455(b)(1) and 28 U.S.C. § 144, both of which disqualify a judge for personal bias and prejudice. [FN31] A party moving for disqualification under section 455(a) frequently seeks disqualification under both section 455(b)(1) and 144 as well. [FN32] Furthermore, interpretation of section 455(a) has been shaped by judicial interpretation of section 144, which predated the revised general disqualification 702 statute. [FN33]

Section 144, first enacted in 1911, [FN34] focuses exclusively on bias and prejudice as grounds for disqualification. [FN35] It authorizes a litigant with the power to disqualify a district court judge by means of a 'timely and sufficient affidavit' alleging 'personal bias or prejudice' for or against a party. [FN36] The key to disqualification under section 144 is the sufficiency of the affidavit. As long as procedural rules regarding the form and timing of the affidavit are met, [FN37] the filing of a legally sufficient affidavit compels a judge to transfer the case to another district court judge. [FN38]

As the Supreme Court determined in Berger v. United States, [FN39] the challenged judge must take the initial step of evaluating the sufficiency of the affidavit, and may not automatically transfer the case when an affidavit is filed. [FN40] Thus, section 144 does not provide for peremptory challenge of the judge. [FN41] Instead, a judge is required to evaluate the legal sufficiency, but not the truth, of 703 the allegations. [FN42] Standards for determining legal sufficiency have developed in case law, interpretating the meaning of 'personal' bias or prejudice. [FN43]

Section 455(b)(1) echoes the personal prejudice language of section 144, disqualifying where a judge 'has a personal bias or prejudice' concerning a party. [FN44] The vagueness of language in this provision contrasts sharply with the other sections of 455(b), in which Congress spelled out in detail the amount and type of financial interest, and the degree of relationship to a participant or prior involvement in a case that necessitates disqualification. [FN45] Section 455(b)(1) uses undefined terms and provides no concrete guidelines for determining bias or prejudice. [FN46] This vagueness reflects the difficulties inherent in providing standards for disqualification on grounds of bias or prejudice. Such standards are hard to state; when concrete phrases are substituted for a vague statement of objectives, they are subject to the criticism of being underinclusive. [FN47]

the bias and prejudice provisions of their respective codes. One of the earlier drafts of the Senate bill required disqualification when a judge 'has a fixed belief concerning the merits of the matter in controversy or personal knowledge of material facts.' [FN48] This language was later replaced with the language of section 455(b)(1), requiring disqualification where a judge 'has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceedings.' [FN49] The change followed the alternations made in the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct. The 'fixed belief' language in the first ABA draft was abandoned in response to criticism that it would predispose judges to disqualification for having an understanding of the law and a commitment to uphold it. [FN50] The final draft of the Senate bill, like the final ABA draft, returned to the 'personal bias or prejudice' language 704 of section 144, [FN51] and thus premitted courts to apply the judicial gloss built up over the years on section 144 to section 455. [FN52]

II. APPLYING THE DISQUALIFICATION STATUTES

Application of section 455(a), [FN53] the general federal disqualification statute, has been shaped in part by courts' concern to balance the advantages of disqualification with countervailing judicial interests. [FN54] On the one hand, disqualification of judges whenever reasonable doubt arises concerning their impartiality promotes public confidence in the judiciary. Conversely, disqualification may diminish the efficiency of the judicial system. [FN55] Transferring a case always creates some administrative costs, and when disqualification occurs in a complex case some time after the case has commenced in the court, the burden may be substantial. [FN56] Although courts may be tempted to give significant weight to efficiency, Congress' elimination of the duty to sit rule indicates that the goal of impartiality should be paramount whenever there are reasonable grounds for disqualification. [FN57] Congress and the courts also face the concern that litigants will manipulate disqualification to their advantage or to the disadvantage of their opponents by judge-shopping or by causing costly delays. [FN58]

705 Courts have had the opportunity to shape disqualification standards under section 455(a) through their interpretation of the law in two areas of inquiry. One question facing the courts concerns what constitutes reasonable grounds for disqualification. The substantive requirements for disqualification which have been developed through this inquiry will be discussed in section B below. [FN59] Another question facing the courts is whether, and to what extent, the appearance of bias justifies disqualification. Is it appropriate to disqualify a judge on the appearance of bias or is it, at least in some cases, necessary to establish bias in fact? The interpretations offered in each of these areas determine the reach of federal disqualification, its availability in particular cases, and the appealability of the denial of disqualification.

A. Assessing Bias: Standards of Proof

The question whether disqualification should rest on the appearance or the fact of bias arises because the two objectives of disqualification law--promoting confidence in the judiciary and providing a fair trial to litigants--differ in focus. Protection of individual rights requires disqualification of judges who will not consider particular cases with impartiality. Protecting and promoting public confidence in the judiciary, in contrast, depends not only on actual fairness in particular cases but also on the appearance of fairness. [FN60] Disqualification based on the appearance of bias may be required to promote public confidence when, in fact, no actual partiality exists. [FN61]

In many circumstances where federal law requires disqualification, concerns for judicial appearance and individual fairness are both present. But some circumstances may involve only one of these objectives. On the one hand, fairness may require disqualification in situations where there is no appearance of partiality and the need for disqualification is not known to anyone but the judge. [FN62] Public appearances, on the other hand, may require assigning another judge even in cases where litigants are confident they would be treated fairly by the disqualified judge. [FN63]

establish bias. [FN65] Section 455(b)(1) states that a judge 'shall . . . disqualify himself . . . [w]here he has a personal bias or prejudice. . . .' [FN66] The same objective standard applied to these statutes is also applied to section 455(a), [FN67] however, and thus bias in fact cannot be established by subjective assessment of the judge's state of mind. Instead, courts have required that a litigant seeking disqualification meet a higher standard of proof to show bias in fact. [FN68]

A higher standard of proof is firmly established as part of the disqualification process under section 144. When scrutinizing the affidavit to determine whether it is legally sufficient, [FN69] courts apply a 'clear and convincing' standard, and evaluate whether the facts 'would convince a reasonable man that bias exists.' [FN70] In contrast, courts have not asked whether the facts would cause a reasonable person to question the judge's impartiality under section 144. [FN71] Imposing a stricter standard of proof for disqualification under section 144 provides a reasonable counterbalance to the stipulation that the judge accept all the averments in a section 144 affidavit as true. [FN72] This more rigorous standard of proof does not, however, ensure that judges are disqualified under section 144 only where there is bias in fact. The requirement that the facts be taken as true, 707 even where the judge knows them to be false, [FN73] delimits the court's assessment of the facts, making it inaccurate to describe section 144 as a statute that disqualifies only for a actual bias.

Whether the 'clear and convincing' standard of proof should be applied to section 455(b)(1) has seldom been addressed by the courts. Most courts treat section 455(a) as predominant, rest their decision on that section when bias or prejudice is alleged, and avoid the issue of whether they are required to make a finding of actual bias under section 455(b)(1). [FN74] Other courts interpret section 455(b)(1) as providing a specific example of grounds for disqualification under section 455(a) and apply to section 455(b)(1) the standard they apply to section 455(a). [FN75] In United States v. Balistrieri, [FN76] the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that section 455(b)(1) requires that actual bias be found in order to meet that section's standard of proof. [FN77] The court applied the 'clear and convincing' standard, asking whether a reasonable person with knowledge of all the facts would be convinced that the judge was biased. [FN78]

Courts generally apply the reasonable doubt standard to section 455(a) disqualification and disqualify for the appearance of bias. [FN83] However, the standard of proof for disqualification under section 455(a) was subject to controversy for a time during which some courts of appeals' decisions were interpreted as equating section 455(a) with section 144 and requiring the same 'clear and convincing' standard of proof. [FN84] This position appears to have been abandoned. [FN85]

Recently, however, a new controversy has arisen. The Seventh Circuit has limited appellate review of disqualification under section 455(a) because that section disqualifies based on the appearance of bias or prejudice. [FN86] After requiring 709 proof of bias in fact under section 455(b)(1) in Balistrieri, [FN87] the Seventh Circuit refused to consider whether the judge should have recused himself from the case under section 455(a). Rather, the court held that the denial of disqualification under section 455(a) is not reviewable on post-trial appeal because disqualification under that section does not rest on actual bias. [FN88] The court reasoned that because the standard in section 455(a) is the appearance of bias, in contrast to the actual bias standard of section 455(b), section 455(a) does not implicate the substantive rights of the parties. [FN89] The court characterized section 455(a) as aimed only at protecting against injury to the judicial system as a whole, and further suggested that a pretrial mandamus petition provides the only appropriate vehicle for review. [FN90]

This distinction could severely limit the number of disqualification denials that could be heard on appeal.

Courts tend to focus on section 455(a) when considering disqualification and thus may not develop a record that will permit full consideration of whether disqualification could be supported by clear and convincing evidence. [FN91] In addition, questions regarding the impartiality of judges do not only arise before trial, but instead may come to the attention of a party during or after trial. [FN92]

More fundamentally, the legislative history of section 455 does not support a bifurcation of the focus and reviewability of its subsections. Section 455(a) is not accurately characterized as directed solely toward appearances and thus does not compel the Balestrieri court's interpretation. Advocates of section 455(a) described it as a provision that would enhance public confidence, [FN93] but it was not proposed exclusively for that purpose. Instead, members of Congress and the ABA Judicial Conduct Committee viewed section 455(a) as a provision that would fill in gaps and provide a requirement for disqualification in circumstances not covered by the specific standards set forth in section 455(b). [FN94] The Senate committee, for example, regarded section 455(a) as a tool for disqualifying a judge for a close personal relationship not covered by section 455(b)(5), which requires disqualification in cases involving relatives up to the third degree of blood relationship. [FN95] The chairman of the ABA committee also regarded the general provision as a means for disqualifying judges for actual bias, and noted 710 that there was no need for 'fixed opinion' language in section 455(b)(3) because a judge who had expressed an opinion on the merits of a controversy would be disqualified under 455(a). [FN96] These examples indicate that section 455(a) was directed toward actual bias as well as toward the appearance of bias.

Section 455(b) also serves this dual function. Some of the provisions in section 455(b) are clearly directed at promoting the appearance of impartiality rather than protecting parties from actual bias. For example, under section 455(b) a judge is disqualified if she has any financial interest in the case, no matter how small, without the possibility of waiver. [FN97] Concerns with both due process and the preservation of confidence in the judicial system thus permeate the entirety of section 455.

The Supreme Court's analysis of the due process right to an impartial judge provides yet another reason for rejecting an interpretation of the disqualification statutes that conditions review on a finding of actual bias. The due process criteria for judicial disqualification, as delineated by the Supreme Court, [FN98] is not as extensive as the federal statutory requirements mandating disqualification. The Court has focused on disqualification for interest, [FN99] leaving open the question whether a bias charge implicates due process. [FN100] Yet the Court has indicated that where due process requires disqualification, it is concerned with the appearance of justice.

711 The Court's recent decision in Aetna Life Insurance Co. v. Lavoie [FN101] illustrates its approach to the due process implications of judicial bias. In Lavoie, an insurance company charged that its due process rights were violated because the chief judge on the state appellate court panel was suing other insurance companies on issues similar to those in the Lavoie case and because the other judges on the panel were class plaintiffs in one of the suits. [FN102] The Court found that due process required disqualification of the chief judge on the basis of interest because his decision in Lavoie could enhance the status of a case he had filed in a lower court. [FN103]

The Supreme Court declined to find due process violations based on other grounds of personal bias and interest alleged by the appellants. [FN104] Noting that the right to due process does not extend so far as to require disqualification under the fourteenth amendment whenever it is required under statute, the Court held that 'only in the most extreme of cases would disqualification . . . be constitutionally required' on the basis of bias or prejudice. [FN105] The Court also held that the Constitution does not require disqualification for only a slight pecuniary interest. [FN106]

Although the Lavoie Court held that the due process right to disqualification does not extend to all the circumstances in which Congress has required disqualification, the Court did not tie due process disqualification to a showing of actual fairness. Instead, the Court reiterated the position that due process requires disqualification on the basis of the appearance of partiality, stating:

> We made clear that we are not required to decide whether in fact Justice Emery was influenced, but only > whether sitting on the case . . . 'would offer a possible temptation . . . to the average [judge] . . . [to] lead him not to hold the balance nice, clear, and true.' The Due Process Clause 'may sometimes bar trial judges who have no actual bias and who would do their very best to weigh the scales of justice equally between contending parties. But to perform its high function in the best way, 'justice must satisfy the appearance of justice." [FN107]

Thus, the Supreme Court established that whether the due process right to an 712 impartial judge requires disqualification depends on reasonable inferences from facts that raise the possibility of bias, and not a finding of actual bias.

In instituting the objective standard, Congress made a similar choice regarding the extent of inquiry into bias. Investigation into the state of mind of a judge under the objective standard stops at the point where a reasonable inference of bias or prejudice can be made. This limitation of the inquiry permits, and indeed requires, higher courts to consider disqualification without establishing whether a party actually suffered a violation of the right to an independent adjudicator. Thus the restrictions on the appeal of section 455(a) imposed by the Seventh Circuit, [FN108] a court which refuses post-trial review unless actual bias is involved, are not justified.

B. Reasonable Grounds for Disqualification

1. Judicially-Created Requirements for Disqualification for Bias or Prejudice

The most significant way in which courts have limited the availability of disqualification is by placing restrictions on the types of evidence that can be considered in support of disqualification. Courts require that evidence of bias or prejudice have an extrajudicial source and refuse to consider disqualification for opinions on the law. [FN109] Some courts, however, have interpreted the requirement of 'personal' bias to preclude disqualification on grounds of bias toward an attorney. [FN110] The requirement of 'personal' prejudice is also used to refuse disqualification on the basis of general background and experience. [FN111]

These restrictions originally developed through courts' interpretations of 28 U.S.C. § 144. [FN112] The question whether the judicial gloss on section 144 should apply to 28 U.S.C. § 455 [FN113] was answered in the affirmative soon after section 455 was revised. In Davis v. Board of School Commissioners, [FN114] the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit found 'no suggestion in the legislative history that [section 144] decisions were being overruled or in any way eroded.' [FN115] The court concluded that it should 'give [sections] 144 and 455 the same meaning legally . . . whether for purposes of bias and prejudice or when the impartiality of the judge might reasonably be questioned.' [FN116] Most courts agree 713 that the judicial interpretation of section 144 applies fully to section 455. [FN117] In effect, these courts are finding that the judicial gloss on bias and prejudice defines the grounds upon which it is reasonable to question a judge's impartiality. [FN118]

Court-made restrictions developed under section 144 and carried over to disqualification under section 455 in part reflect the logic of the judicial decision-making process and promote efficiency. [FN119] The restrictions may, however, protect the efficiency of the system at the expense of fairness and public confidence in the judiciary. Unfortunately, the presumption that judges are impartial results in restrictions on evidence and the imposition of a heavy burden on a movant. [FN120] To surmount this presumption, a litigant generally must show clear evidence of personal bias. [FN121] Occasionally, courts have based disqualification on evidence of a level of emotional involvement that indicates 'pervasive prejudice.' [FN122] This heavy burden on the movant however, may not further the goals of disqualification law. [FN123]

A fundamental principle of the judicially-created standards for disqualifying judges for bias and prejudice is that the evidence of bias must come from an extrajudicial source. Evidence of prejudice or bias that arises from or can be linked to a judicial source, such as pretrial or trial proceeding or any aspect of case management, is excluded from consideration. [FN124] The Supreme Court stated this requirement in United States v. Grinnell: [FN125] 'The alleged bias and prejudice to be disqualifying must stem from an extrajudicial source and result in an opinion on the merits on some basis other than what the judge learned from his participation in the case.' [FN126]

The extrajudicial source requirement is most frequently applied to reject disqualification on the basis of statements made by a judge in the course of a case. [FN127] Courts also apply the extrajudicial source requirement to reject disqualification based on adverse rulings by a judge, [FN128] whether in the trial of the party bringing the motion [FN129] or in previous trials. [FN130] In criminal trials, the extrajudicial source rule is used to prevent disqualification on the basis of allegations questioning a judge's impartiality merely because the judge, while presiding over a previous hearing, was exposed to or ruled on evidence. [FN131] The extrajudicial 715 source requirement is also invoked to reject disqualification based on claims of bias resulting from hostile actions of a party or an attorney toward a judge or resulting from the judge's response to such actions. [FN132]

The extrajudicial source requirement protects the judicial system from unreasonable interference with judicial decision-making. If statements of opinion could generally disqualify a judge, adjudicators could be inhibited from carrying out the evaluative tasks required to move cases through the court and to reach decisions. [FN133] Use of the extrajudicial source requirement to avoid disqualification as a result of the provocation of a party or attorney serves to prevent litigants from manipulating the judicial system to their advantage by harrassing judges. [FN134]

Despite the important benefits of the extrajudicial source requirement, it could stand in the way of a fair, impartial trial if it were rigidly applied. An absolute refusal to consider as evidence of bias or prejudice any statement made in a judicial setting in response to information learned in the case gives judges a zone of immunity in which to voice personal prejudices. Courts do not, however, generally invoke the extrajudicial source rule to protect a judge from disqualification who has made statements within the judicial context that present clear evidence of personal bias for, or prejudice against, an individual in the case. 716 Berger v. United States [FN135] presents a classic example of prejudicial statements made by a judge within the judicial context. In Berger, the judge allegedly delivered an anti-German diatribe in a case involving Germans and German-Americans as defendants. [FN136] Another example of a judicial remark revealing bias is found in Roberts v. Bailar, [FN137] a case which involved an employment discrimination suit against the Postal Service. In response to a motion to dismiss a party who had a supervisory role, [FN138] the district court judge said: 'I know Mr. Graves, and he is an honorable man and I know that he would never intentionally discriminate against anybody.' [FN139] Because the actions of this 'honorable man' were at issue in the discrimination suit, the court of appeals held that 'it is clear that a reasonable person would question the impartiality of the District Judge.' [FN140]

The statement at issue in a disqualification motion may not, however, clearly reveal personal bias or prejudice evidenced through an extrajudicial source, but rather may suggest that a bias toward or prejudice against a party has developed over the course of the proceeding or a prior proceeding. Disqualifying a judge in these circumstances requires making an exception to the extrajudicial source rule when a judge's statement or action reveal that he or she has not or is not likely to put aside personal feelings in conducting the trial or passing judgment. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit suggested the possibility of a 'pervasive prejudice' exception in Davis v. Board of School Commissioners [FN141] and applied this exception in United States v. Holland. [FN142] In Holland, a defendant sought disqualification of a district court judge after gaining a new trial on appeal because the judge stated that the defendant had 'broker faith' with the court by appealing and intended to increase the defendant's sentence. [FN143] The appellate court held that the district judge's statement showed pervasive prejudice and thereby satisfied the reasonable person standard for disqualification. [FN144]

In Nicodemus v. Chrysler Corp., [FN145] the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals disqualified a judge for bias on the basis of his 'vilification' of the defendant in an employment discrimination suit. [FN146] The court indicated that the development of 717 some degree of bias over the course of court proceedings is a normal part of the judicial process, [FN147] but declared that "if . . . a judge's bias appears to have become overpowering, we think it disqualifies him." [FN148]

In a situation in which the judge was directly or deliberately provoked by a participant in the case, an emotional response by a judge generally will not disqualify her. [FN149] Nevertheless, even in circumstances in which the judge has been deliberately provoked, an extreme reaction to a party or attorney may necessitate disqualification. [FN150] The appropriate focus under section 455(a) is not whether the judge's statement springs from an extrajudicial source but instead whether the judge's statement or action would lead a reasonable person to question whether the judge would remain impartial.

b. Opinion on law or policy

A second fundamental principle of disqualification law articulated by the courts is that judges cannot be disqualified for their knowledge of, or opinions on, the legal issues in a case. [FN151] The policy concerns underlying this rule are 718 clear: disqualification on grounds of previously developed legal opinion would wreak havoc within the judicial system. As the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit recently observed: 'If [j]udges could be disqualified because their background in the practice of law gave them knowledge of the legal issues which might be presented in cases coming before them, then only the least-informed and worse-prepared lawyers could be appointed to the bench.' [FN152]

Although the judicially-created rule against considering disqualifying judges on the basis of their legal knowledge is a sound one, application of the rule may be problematic when a judge has been personally involved in instituting a particular policy or when a judge has emphatically expressed support for, or opposition to, a policy position. The best-known case involving the issue of disqualification of a judge for his involvement in instituting a policy is Laird v. Tatum, [FN153] a case in which the plaintiffs challenged army surveillance of anti-war protestors. [FN154] Plaintiffs moved to disqualify Justice Rehnquist, who had cast the deciding vote in a five to four decision dismissing the case, [FN155] on the grounds that he had been involved in defending the surveillance program before a Senate committee as assistant attorney general in the Nixon administration. [FN156] Justice Rehnquist determined that he was not obliged to disqualify himself because he 'did not have even an advisory role in the conduct of the case of Laird v. Tatum.' [FN157] He also declined to disqualify himself through an exercise of discretion, reasoning that opinions on the law and policy were necessary and inevitable, [FN158] and that having publicly expressed these opinions was not sufficient grounds for disqualification. [FN159]

719 In its revision of section 455, Congress included a specific provision, section 455(b)(3), [FN160] to address issues raised in Tatum. [FN161] Section 544(b)(3) does not, however, clearly require disqualification where a judge is ruling on the applicability or constitutionality of laws or executive policies that he had a significant hand in shaping. Section 455(b)(3), on its face, seems to be applicable only in those cases in which a judge had been involved in, or expressed an opinion about, a particular case. Disqualification in circumstances like those presented in the Tatum case would fall, instead, under the general provision of section 455(a), which requires the court to ask whether the judge's participation in lawmaking raises reasonable doubts concerning his impartiality. It is reasonable to believe that one who has had a significant part in formulating a policy may have difficulty maintaining impartiality when that policy is challenged.

The disqualification issue may also arise when a judge has not played a significant role in formulating policy but rather has expressed an opinion on an issue, either by casting a vote in a legislature, or by publicly expressing an opinion. Courts have generally refused to disqualify judges in these circumstances. [FN162] Nevertheless, evidence of strongly held opinions can raise reasonable doubts about a judge's impartiality.

In Southern Pacific Communications v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., [FN163] the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia considered the issue of disqualification based on emphatic policy statements in post-trial review of an antitrust case against American Telephone & Telegraph Co. ('AT&T'). The district court judge, in his memorandum opinion, [FN164] forcibly stated his belief that the public interest was better served by an AT&T monopoly rather than by competition in the telecommunications industry. [FN165] The court of appeals, noting that views on the law and policy do not ordinarily disqualify a judge, [FN166] allowed for the possibility of disqualification if the court prejudged a case. [FN167] The court set forth an 'irrevocably closed mind' test for determining 720 when a judge's actions overcome the presumption of impartiality. [FN168]

The Southern Pacific Communications 'irrevocably closed mind' test cannot be applied to pretrial disqualification, however. Pretrial application of the test would conflict with the presumption that a judge will maintain an open mind toward a case, and follow precedent faithfully. [FN169] In a section 455(a) pretrial disqualification challenge, this presumption would preclude challenge of a judge's impartiality prior to trial because it would not be possible to prove that an upcoming presentation of an issue would not sway the judge. [FN170] A litigant cannot make a pretrail showing of an 'irrevocably closed' mind sufficient to overcome the presumption when such a showing depends on evidence of bias in the proceedings. [FN171]

Although in general a judge may not be disqualified for an opinion on the law, a judge may be disqualified for holding a fixed opinion regarding sentencing. [FN172] This exception was established in United States v. Thompson, [FN173] the case in which the defendants had allegedly violated the Selective Service Act. [FN174] The district court judge, in a previous case, had announced that it was his policy to sentence all Selective Service Act violators to at least thirty months in jail. [FN175] 721 The appellate court determined that this allegation provided grounds for disqualification because it 'was not an allegation of judicial bias in favor of a particular legal principle,' but rather of personal bias 'directed against the appellant as a member of a class.' [FN176] The court also noted, however, that a fixed policy as to sentencing was inconsistent with the trial judge's authorized discretion to tailor sentences appropriately. [FN177]

The Thompson court's consideration of the judge's violation of his official duties suggests a framework for a narrow exception permitting disqualification for opinions on the law or public policy. Courts could adopt the rule that while policy statements should not generally provide grounds for disqualification, an exception will be made when a statement or action would lead a reasonable person to conclude that the judge is predisposed to violating his or her oath or ignoring a mandate. [FN178] Such a rule would not interfere with the present practice of refusing disqualification when the judge's statement expresses an enthusiastic commitment to enforce the law, [FN179] or when a judge previously voted in favor of a law applicable in the case. [FN180] Simple disagreement with existing law would also not disqualify. [FN181] Under the proposed exception, however, the presumption of impartiality could be overcome if a judge's action provided evidence of intense disagreement with a particular policy or law. [FN182] The critical issue would be whether the judge could reasonably be expected to put aside his or her personal feelings, rather than allow them to dominate the decision-making process. [FN183]

c. Bias or prejudice toward an attorney

Some courts have required that judicial bias be directed toward the party as an individual, rather than toward that party's attorney, before disqualifying a 722 judge. [FN184] Under section 455(a), however, bias or antipathy directed at counsel may justify disqualification, but only if this bias or prejudice could affect the outcome of the case to the detriment of a party. [FN185] As the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit noted in United States v. Ritter, [FN186] 'if a judge is biased in favor of an attorney, his impartiality might reasonably be questioned in relationship to the party.' [FN187]

Yet, as the Ninth Circuit has noted, when a judge is charged with prejudice against an attorney, the court must take into account tensions between judge and attorney inherent in the adversarial system. [FN188] A disqualification motion based on bias for or prejudice against an attorney thus should be evaluated in context, like other charges of prejudice arising from a judge's statements or actions within the judicial process.

d. General background and experience

Reviewing courts also refuse to disqualify judges on the basis of their general background, education, and experience. [FN189] In Blank v. Sullivan & Cromwell, [FN190] a sex discrimination case against a law firm, the defendant sought to disqualify the judge because she was female and as a lawyer had worked on behalf of minorities who had suffered from discrimination. [FN191] The Blank court refused to disqualify, reasoning that if background, race, or sex were in themselves grounds for removal, 'no judge on this court could hear this case, or many others, by virtue of the fact that all of them were attorneys, of a sex, [and] often with distinguished law firm or public service backgrounds.' [FN192]

723 Rejection of recusal for general background or experience is sensible because evidence of general associations does not provide a reasonable basis for an inference of bias. [FN193] Courts must, however, carefully distinguish between general evidence of background or associations and specific evidence that may provide a basis for disqualification under section 455(a) if an interest or relationship is not specified under section 455(b). [FN194]

2. Grounds for Disqualification Under Section 455(a) Other Than Bias or Prejudice

Disqualification under section 455(a) is not limited to circumstances where bias or prejudice is explicitly alleged; section 455(a) also applies when an interest or relationship, not among those defined by section 455(b), raises doubt about a judge's impartiality. [FN195] It is evident from the record of the Senate committee hearing on the proposed revision of section 455 that Congress envisioned the use of section 455(a) as a tool for disqualification on grounds not specified in section 455(b). [FN196]

Recognizing the scope of the general provisions, courts have made use of section 455(a) to disqualify judges for interests or relationships not covered by section 455(b). [FN197] Several courts have used section 455(a) as their framework for examining disqualification motions that allege that a judge's law clerk or former law clerk had a role or an interest in a case. [FN198] The United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit has held that judges are required under section 455(a) to disqualify themselves from criminal actions if they have a substantial interest in the victim of the crime. [FN199] The Fifth Circuit, in Potashnick v. Port 724 City Construction Co., [FN200] relied on section 455(a) to disqualify a judge who had extensive business dealings with the plaintiff's attorney. [FN201] More recently, the Fifth Circuit used section 455(a) in Health Services Acquisition Corp. v. Liljeberg [FN202] to disqualify a judge who claimed he had no knowledge of information that, if known, would have disqualified him under section 455(b)(4). [FN203]

In each of these cases, the respective appellate court determined that a relationship or interest in itself raised questions regarding impartiality. The courts did not evaluate the extent of the relationship or interest to determine whether the judge in each case was actually biased. Rather, the courts disqualified due to the appearance of bias. [FN204]

Casting disqualification questions in terms of relationships or interests, instead of in terms of bias, has several advantages. Stating the disqualification motion in terms of a questionable relationship can bring into clearer focus the grounds for objecting to the participation of a particular judge. [FN205] In addition, relationships and interest are easier for courts to ascertain because the evidence is more concrete and accessible. Such decisions are also easier to review, since the court can consider, as a matter of law, whether a particular interest or relationship should be added to the list of those that disqualify. [FN206] Furthermore, resting the need for disqualification on the existence of a relationship is less personal and may be easier for a judge to view objectively than a direct charge of bias.

Nevertheless, litigants and courts tend to treat any relationship or interest not specifically enumerated in Section 455(b) as presenting a question of disqualification for bias or prejudice, requiring the more difficult showing of personal prejudice, rather than considering the relationship under section 455(a). The opinion issued by the Fifth Circuit in United States v. Harrelson [FN207] provides an 725 example of this tendency. The Harrelson defendants were convicted of murder and conspiracy to murder a federal judge. [FN208] Pursuant to section 455(a), the defendants had sought to disqualify the trial judge, who had known and worked with the murder victim for eight or nine years, served as an honorary pallbearer at his funeral, and eulogized him at several memorial ceremonies. [FN209] The court analyzed section 455(a) as requiring disqualification on the basis of conduct that shows personal prejudice, insisting that 'recusal is not warranted absent specific instances of conduct indicating prejudice against a defendant.' [FN210] Because such evidence was lacking, the court held that disqualification was not required. [FN211]

The Harrelson court then considered the question of relationship briefly and superficially. [FN212] The court reasoned that a trial judge in this position may harbor hostility toward the actual killers but would presume the innocence of persons pleading not guilty. [FN213] The court did not consider the possible impact of this hostility if the judge reached a conclusion regarding guilt before the end of the trial or its possible impact upon sentencing. [FN214] The court concluded that absent a stronger showing of personal prejudice, a reasonable person would not presume that the 'careful and seasoned trial judge' was biased. [FN215] By requiring a showing of personal prejudice, [FN216] the court lost sight of the objective 'appearance of bias' standard established in section 455(a) as applied to questions of disqualifying relationship or interest.

Other courts have given questions involving a relationship equally short shrift. For example, in United States v. Balistrieri, [FN217] disqualification was sought ont he grounds that the judge, when he was Wisconsin Attorney General, identified the defendant as the head of an organized crime family and targeted the defendant's family business for investigation in his efforts against organized crime. [FN218] The court denied disqualification on the grounds that there was no showing of personal animus [FN219] and did not ask whether a reasonable person would consider the relationship of the judge to the defendant one which called into doubt the impartiality of the judge. [FN220]

726 The tendency of courts to focus on personal prejudice suggests that a subjective element remains in disqualification decisions under section 455(a) despite the congressional emphasis on an objective standard. The next section will examine the disqualification decision-making process and consider means for achieving greater objectivity in disqualification under section 455(a).

III. DISQUALIFICATION PROCEDURE

A. Disqualification Decision-Making

Objective disqualification can be promoted by clarifying the process of evaluating evidence for disqualification. The inherently subjective nature of evidence of personal bias and prejudice may make objective evaluation difficult. [FN221] Yet even when disqualification is based on bias or prejudice, courts are required by Congress to apply the objective standard of section 455(a). [FN222]

The decision-making process followed when disqualification is based on an interest or relationship defined under section 455(b) [FN223] is simple to describe and provides a framework for a more objective approach to disqualification under section 455(a). In deciding whether to disqualify for interest or relationship, the first question a court poses is: does the interest or relationship exist? If it does, the court must arrive at an accurate description of the relationship and ask: does the judge's interest or relationship fall within those specified under section 455(b)? If so, disqualification is automatic. [FN224] The statute imposes the presumption that the particular interest or relationship would reasonably result in bias. [FN225]

If the interest or relationship is not one specified under section 455(b), the next question posed is whether this interest or relationship reasonably raises questions regarding a judge's impartiality. [FN226] Once the factual determination is 727 made regarding the existence of an interest or relationship, the question whether it provides reasonable grounds for disqualification is one an appellate court can determine as a matter of law. [FN227]

In cases seeking disqualification on the basis of personal bias or prejudice, the judge's statements and other expressive actions provide the evidence for disqualification. [FN228] To make an objective assessment of this evidence, the court must first test its accuracy, and question whether the event or statement occurred as reported.

Once the court has obtained an accurate description of the expressive act that may reveal bias, that evidence must be evaluated using the reasonable person standard to determine whether the expressive acts reasonably raise doubts regarding the judge's impartiality. [FN229] Under the objective standard, it is inappropriate for the court to inquire further and attempt to determine the judge's actual state of mind. The court is limited to assessing outward manifestations and to making a reasonable inference as to whether the typical judge would be biased under those circumstances. [FN230]

The task of applying the objective standard to the facts grants the judge a degree of discretion in disqualification decisions under section 455(a) that is not present in section 455(b) decisions. The scope of that discretion is limited, however, because Congress established a low threshold when it eliminated the duty to sit. [FN231] Judges are required to recuse themselves if they perceive any grounds for disqualification. [FN232] The discretion of district court judges can be limited further by the courts of appeals if they respond to disqualification cases by establishing clearer guidelines for disqualification. [FN233]

728 B. Evaluation by the Challenged District Court Judge

Federal law provides that the decision-making process described above be carried out by the judge who is under challenge. Under section 144, which provides for disqualification upon filing of a sufficient affidavit, [FN234] the challenged judge is charged with determining whether the affidavit is legally sufficient. [FN235] Although the judge is required to assume the truth of the allegations and the good faith of the attorney regardless of any knowledge to the contrary, [FN236] the judge exercises significant power over disqualification. The requirement of convincing evidence of bias, [FN237] and the restrictions on disqualification evidence such as the extrajudicial source rule, [FN238] give the challenged judge the responsibility of making an extensive evaluation of the charges. [FN239]

Under section 455, judges have more latitude in reaching the decision whether to disqualify themselves. Judges are not required to accept the veracity of the factual averments in a motion, but rather are free to make credibility determinations, weigh the evidence, and contradict it with facts drawn from their own personal knowledge. [FN240]

Giving the challenged judge this role in the disqualification process has the advantage of allowing the judge with the best knowledge of the issue to resolve it speedily. But when the judge denies disqualification, questions regarding that judge's impartiality are compounded rather than settled. Moreover, the appearance of impartiality is not advanced when a challenged judge proceeds to try a case and there has been no outside assessment of the challenge to that judge's impartiality. [FN241]

729 C. Other Means for Determining Disqualification

Commentators have proposed several ways of changing or supplementing disqualification procedures to better ensure an impartial adjudicator. One proposed alternative to the current disqualification procedure is to eliminate judicial decision-making from the process by instituting the peremptory challenge of judges. [FN242] reliance on peremptory challenge, however, may lead to judge-shopping [FN243] and inefficiency. [FN244] Furthermore, the introduction of a peremptory challenge would not actually address the problem of ensuring impartial judges. The proposals limit litigants to one use of a peremptory challenge. [FN245] Litigants could face a biased judge after reassignment and the need for a statute disqualifying judges for cause would remain, as would the problems of achieving disqualification on an objective standard under such a statute.

The other two proposed alternatives, which would bring judges other than the challenged judge into the disqualification process, deserve more extensive consideration. One proposal is to transfer the decision to another judge at the district court level. A second alternative is to allow full and immediate appellate review of denials of disqualification.

1. Transfer to Another District Judge

Commentators have recommended that independent adjudication of disqualification motions be assured by requiring that a district court judge presented with a disqualification motion transfer the motion to another judge for decision. [FN246] Such a transfer would, according to commentators, address the problem presented by having judges decide their own cases, provide a more disinterested forum, and thus promote the appearance of impartiality. [FN247] The major objection commentators have leveled against this proposal is that transfer of 730 the disqualification motion to another judge for a hearing, or for review of affidavits, [FN248] would delay litigation and impose an administrative burden. [FN249] Those advocating this alternative argue that an independent review of disqualification is worth the delay and burden on the courts. [FN250]

2. Appellate Review

Another means for insuring independent assessment of disqualification decisions is to afford litigants immediate and comprehensive review of disqualification denials. Immediate appellate review would clearly further the goals of judicial disqualification. Without interlocutory review, trials proceed before judges whose impartiality is in question, thereby imposing upon litigants a possibly unfair trial and undermining the public perception of the impartiality of judges. [FN251]

Nevertheless, routine interlocutory consideration of disqualification would impose a burden on the courts. Timely appeal may, however, reduce the burden imposed on the judicial system when a new trial is necessitated following reversal based on disqualification. [FN252] Moreover, resolution of a disqualification issue at pretrial is less complex than resolution of the disqualification question as part of a completed case. In post-trial review, a new trial may be required even though everything but the disqualification issue appears to have been correctly decided. [FN253] In this position, a court may be reluctant to apply the liberal standards instituted by Congress which address the disqualification question.

Unfortunately, timely review of disqualification denials is impeded by statutory limitations on interlocutory review. Disqualification motions are usually raised and decided before the trial. [FN254] A final decision on the merits of a case is 731 generally required, however, before an issue in a case can be reviewed on appeal. [FN255]

Review under a writ of mandamus, however, provides a vehicle by which the courts may hear disqualification denials. [FN256] Mandamus is a writ used to 732 command an official to perform a specific act that arises from a public duty, [FN257] or to confine a court to lawful exercise of its prescribed jurisdiction. [FN258] Issuance of the writ is traditionally limited to extraordinary circumstances, [FN259] however, and several conditions governing mandamus limit its use for review of disqualification denials and the comprehensiveness of review under the writ.

One limitation on use of the writ of mandamus is that the writ can be used only to 'compel an officer to perform a purely ministerial duty.' [FN260] A writ of mandamus may be issued to confine judges to their jurisdictional powers or to compel them to exercise their judicial authority, but it cannot be used to compel action within judicial discretion. [FN261] Mandamus may be issued, however, where the discretionary duty is limited and the official has abused that discretion by transgressing those limits. [FN262]

'Abuse of discretion' is the standard of review that is generally applied to section 455 motions on appeal. [FN263] Thus, this requirement of mandamus raises questions, which are also present in post-trial review of disqualification denials, regarding the amount of discretion judges actually have over disqualification and what constitutes abuse of this discretion. If the judge's discretion is limited, review is possible under a writ of mandamus and more comprehensive at any stage.

1974 decision when disqualification was completely discretionary. [FN264] When Congress revised section 455, it made disqualification mandatory, rather than discretionary, when a reasonable person would question the judge's impartiality. [FN265] Yet the House of Representatives' commentary on the revised bill suggested that section 455 decisions would continue to be reviewed under the abuse of discretion standard. [FN266] The House report 733 stated that '[t]he issue of disqualification is a sensitive question of assessing all the facts and circumstances in order to determine whether the failure to disqualify was an abuse of sound judicial discretion.' [FN267]

On the basis of the House report, appellate courts generally have applied the abuse of discretion standard to section 455 questions with little consideration of what discretion the district court should exercise. [FN268] Occasionally, appellate courts have displayed discomfort with broad discretion by focusing on the substantive issue in a case, thoroughly evaluating the evidence, independently assessing reasonableness, and stating their conclusions without any reference to abuse of discretion. [FN269]

Recently, the Seventh Circuit directly questioned the abuse of discretion standard in United States v. Balistrieri, [FN270] and rejected it as an inappropriate standard for appellate evaluation of section 455(b)(1) decisions. [FN271] The court held that review of a disqualification denial should not be deferential because a disqualification motion 'puts into issue the integrity of the court's judgment' and places adjudicators in the role of judges of their own cause. [FN272]

The Balistrieri court's position has appeal because it addresses the most troublesome aspect of the disqualification process, the requirement that a judge under attack make an 'objective' assessment of his personal, emotional involvement. In addition, the Balistrieri court's position rests on the argument frequently used to support mandamus jurisdiction--the responsibility of the courts of appeals to supervise and maintain the integrity of the judicial system. [FN273] The court did not, however, address the fact that plenary review of disqualification is in conflict with the congressional commentary on the standard of review, [FN274] and contrary to the general practice of the courts. [FN275]

Although the position taken by the Balistrieri court is extreme, consideration of the congressional statement in context suggests that appellate courts should not be wholly deferential to district court judges who have denied a disqualification motion. The House Report called on appellate courts to assess 'all the facts and circumstances' of a disqualification issue at the same time that it 734 referred to 'sound judicial discretion,' [FN276] thus suggesting that the court's review should be comprehensive. Furthermore, Congress severely constricted judicial discretion over disqualification in revising section 455. This is evidenced by the fact that there is no discretion if the circumstances of a case fit within one of the categories in section 455(b), which mandates disqualification without exception. [FN277] Although judges have some discretion in their evaluation of the evidence under the objective standard of section 455(a), their evaluation is limited by the low threshold of proof set by Congress and by guidelines set by the appellate courts. [FN278] Moreover, when reasonable grounds for disqualification exist disqualification is mandatory. [FN279] The discretion of the district court is thus narrowly circumscribed and subject to the supervision of the courts of appeals.

Other limitations on issuance of the writ of mandamus restrict its availability. One limitation is that the writ is generally not available when appeal from final judgment provides an adequate remedy. [FN280] The Fifth Circuit has denied the writ on the grounds that appeal provided an adequate remedy for failure to disqualify. [FN281] The majority of courts have held, however, that review of disqualification denials prior to final judgment is critical to the judicial system, if not to the litigant. [FN282]

A more significant barrier to obtaining disqualification by means of a writ of mandamus is that litigants are required to show that their right to issuance of the writ is 'clear and indisputable.' [FN283] It is possible to interpret this requirement as necessitating no more than a finding of abuse of discretion. [FN284] But the 735 need to show a clear and indisputable right has also been interpreted as imposing a higher standard of review. [FN285] Following disqualification denials, courts of appeals generally require a non-frivolous claim for disqualification [FN286] and require that bias be 'clearly and indisputably' established. [FN287]

The limited scope of discretion in disqualification decisions and the courts' general interpretation of mandamus requirements suggest that limitations on mandamus do not preclude interlocutory review of disqualification motions in federal courts. Courts have, in fact, advocated liberal interpretation of their powers of review under the writ in disqualification matters as a measure essential to preserving the integrity of the court. [FN288] Actual disqualification by means of the writ is subject to the clear and indisputable right requirement, however. Thus the writ can be used to correct clearly wrongful refusals but it may not be available for routine review. As a result, mandamus review cannot be relied on to ensure the participation of an adjudicator other than the challenged judge in the disqualification decision.

CONCLUSION

The goals of fairness and public confidence in the judiciary are not fully met by current disqualification practices. Mandamus provides a means for courts of appeals to supervise and set standards for clear abuse of discretion, but it does not provide for the routine involvement of an independent adjudicator in the disqualification process. [FN289] To make objective disqualification more meaningful, Congress should act either to amend section 455 to provide for transfer of the disqualification motion to another adjudicator at the district court level [FN290] or provide for immediate and comprehensive appellate review of disqualification denials without the restrictions imposed on review under the writ of mandamus. [FN291]

736 In addition to congressional action to ensure independent adjudication of disqualification issues, realization of the goals of judicial disqualification require the commitment of the courts. Congress struck a balance when it revised section 455 and decided that, despite the burdens disqualification imposed, it would be mandated where a judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. [FN292] Congress has appropriately left to the courts the responsibility of interpreting this standard. The courts, however, have not always held fast to the objectives Congress established. [FN293] Instead, courts have avoided the burden of disqualification by failing to focus on the congressionally mandated objective standard, and by showing deference at the appellate level to the decisions of the challenged judges. One circuit has gone so far as to impose the requirement of a high standard of proof of bias as a prerequisite to post-trial review. [FN294]

To establish the proper balance, courts of appeals should reexamine the restrictions they have placed on disqualification. As supervisors of the district courts, they should use the available review procedures to set forth more explicit guidelines for disqualification based on an objective standard and thus hold district court judges to the appropriate high level of accountability.

FN12. 28 U.S.C. § 455 (1982) states:

> (a) Any justice, judge, or magistrate of the United States shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned.
>
> (b) He shall also disqualify himself in the following circumstances:
>
> > (1) Where he has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding;
> > (2) Where in private practice he served as lawyer in the matter in controversy, or a lawyer with whom he previously practiced law served during such association as a lawyer concerning the matter, or the judge or such lawyer has been a material witness concerning it;
> > (3) Where he has served in governmental employment and in such capacity participated as counsel, adviser or material witness concerning the proceeding or expressed an opinion concerning the merits of the particular case in controversy;
> > (4) He knows that he, individually or as a fiduciary, or his spouse or minor child residing in his household, has a financial interest in the subject matter in controversy or in a party to the proceeding, or any other interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding;
> > (5) He or his spouse, or a person within the third degree of relationship to either of them, or the spouse of such a person:

(i) Is a party to the proceeding, or an officer, director, or trustee of a party;

(ii) Is acting as a lawyer in the proceeding;

(iii) Is know by the judge to have an interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding;

(iv) Is to the judge's knowledge likely to be a material witness in the proceeding.

(c) A judge should inform himself about his personal and fiduciary financial interests, and make a reasonable effort to inform himself about the personal financial interest of his spouse and minor children residing in his household.

(d) For the purposes of this section the following words or phrases shall have the meaning indicated:

(1) 'proceeding' includes pretrial, trial, appellate review, or other stages of litigation;

(2) the degree of relationship is calculated according to the civil law system;

(3) 'fiduciary' includes such relationships as executor, administrator, trustee, and guardian;

(4) 'financial interest' means ownership of a legal or equitable interest, however small, or a relationship as director, adviser, or other active participant in the affairs of a party, except that:

(i) Ownership in a mutual or common investment fund that holds securities is not a 'financial interest' in such securities unless the judge participates in the management of the fund;

(ii) An office in an educational, religious, charitable, fraternal, or civil organization is not a 'financial interest' in securities held by the organization;

(iii) The proprietary interest of a policyholder in a mutual insurance company, of a depositor in a mutual savings association, or a similar proprietary interest, is a 'financial interest' in the organization only if the outcome of the proceeding could substantially affect the value of the interest;

(iv) Ownership of government securities is a 'financial interest' in the issuer only if the outcome of the proceeding could substantially affect the value of the securities.

(e) No justice, judge, or magistrate shall accept from the parties to the proceeding a waiver of any ground for disqualification enumerated in subsection (b). Where the ground for disqualification arises only under subsection (a), waiver may be accepted provided it is preceded by a full disclosure on the record of the basis for disqualification.

Id. The Senate framers, on the other hand, rejected any waiver of disqualification based on § 455(b) grounds, but allowed waiver of § 455(a) disqualification on the rationale that a judge should be permitted to discuss with the attorneys involved in a case whether the objective standard required disqualification. FN32. Courts have determined that a motion for disqualification under one of the sections--455(a), 455(b)(1), or 144--requires the consideration of disqualification under the other sections as well. See Roberts v. Bailar, 625 F.2d 125, 128 (6th Cir. 1980) (judge has duty to consider disqualification under § 455 when § 144 affidavit does not require disqualification); United States v. Sibla, 624 F.2d 864, 868 (9th Cir. 1980) (judge who declines to grant recusal under § 455 must still consider sufficiency of affidavit under § 144).

Courts have coordinated the statutes procedurally by charting various paths that reach, if necessary, all three provisions. One approach is to begin by evaluating the affidavit under § 144 and to proceed to assessment of the situation under § 455 only if the affidavit is untimely or insufficient. See United States v. Balistrieri, 779 F.2d 1191, 1202 (7th Cir. 1985) (after determining § 144 affidavit legally insufficient, court considered disqualification under § 455(b)(1)), cert. denied, 106 S. Ct. 3284 (1986); Bailar, 625 F.2d at 128 (judge disqualified under § 455(a) although § 144 affidavit was technically insufficient); Sibla, 624 F.2d at 868 (finding that § 144 affidavit is legally insufficient triggers duty to evaluate circumstances under § 455).

Alternatively, judges may begin with § 455(a) and evaluate the § 144 affidavit only if they do not disqualify themselves under § 455. See Sibla, 624 F.2d at 868 (judge who declines to grant recusal under § 455 must still consider the sufficiency of the affidavit under § 144). A judge beginning at § 455(a) would need to consider § 144 only if the allegations of bias where false and thus would not lead a reasonable person to question the judge's impartiality.

FN34. Act of March 3, 1911, ch. 231, § 21, 36 Stat. 1090 (amended by Act of June 25, 1948, ch. 646, § 144, 62 Stat. 898) (amendment added the words 'timely and sufficient' to modify 'affidavit').

FN35. 28 U.S.C. § 144 (1982) provides:

> Whenever a party to any proceeding in a district court makes and files a timely and sufficient affidavit that the judge before whom the matter is pending has a personal bias or prejudice either against him or in favor of any adverse party, such judge shall proceed no further therein, but another judge shall be assigned to hear such proceeding.
> The affidavit shall state the facts and the reasons for the belief that bias or prejudice exists, and shall be filed not less than ten days before the beginning of the term at which the proceeding is to be heard, or good cause shall be shown for failure to file it within such time. A party may file only one such affidavit in any case. It shall be accompanied by a certificate of counsel of record stating that it is made in good faith.

FN37. A § 144 affidavit must 'state the facts and reasons for the belief that bias or prejudice exists,' 28 U.S.C. § 144, and must be signed. See Roberts v. Bailar, 625 F.2d 125, 128 (6th Cir. 1980) (court need not consider § 144 motion where party had not signed affidavit). A court may consider only one affidavit filed pursuant to § 144. See United States v. Merkt, 794 F.2d 950, 961 (5th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 107 S. Ct. 1603 (1987); United States v. Balistrieri, 779 F.2d 1191, 1199 (7th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 106 S. Ct. 3284 (1986).

Section 144's timeliness provision has been interpreted to require filing of the motion within a reasonable time of discovery of the bias. See United States v. Gigax, 605 F.2d 507, 511 (10th Cir. 1979) (file § 144 motion promptly after facts become known); Smith v. Danyo, 585 F.2d 83, 86 (3d Cir. 1978) (timeliness measured not in absolute and arbitrary way from date of discovery but with consideration of future stages of case).

FN41. Until the Supreme Court decided Berger, it was possible to interpret § 144 as providing a peremptory challenge. The chief sponsor of the bill indicated that it would function as a form of peremptory challenge of judges, 46 Cong. Rec. 2627 (1911) (statements of Rep. Cullop), and the wording of the original provision would have permitted it to be so used. Prior to amendment it 1948, the word 'sufficient' did not appear as a modifier of 'affidavit.' Act of March 3, 1911, ch. 231, § 21, 36 Stat. 1090. The 1911 version required the judge to transfer the case when 'an affidavit' was filed. Id.

FN47. Courts seldom offer a definition of bias or prejudice. The Supreme Court provided a general, but tautological, definition of bias or prejudice in Berger v. United States, describing it as 'a bent of mind that may prevent or impede impartiality of judgment.' 255 U.S. at 33-34. In case law, positive definitions tend to be fact-specific. For example, in Mims v. Shapp, 541 F.2d 415 (3d Cir. 1976), a prisoners' rights suit in which the judge was accused of bias toward state prisoners, the court defined personal bias 'as an attitude toward petitioner that is significantly different from and more particularized than the normal, general feelings of society at large against convicted wrongdoers.' (judge disqualified in complex class action suit because his wife had minimal stock holdings in plaintiff companies), aff'd mem. sub nom., Arizona v. United States Dist. Ct., 459 U.S. 1191 (1982). This case has attracted critical comment as an example of the high burden imposed by the expansive definition of financial interest in § 455(b)(4) and the impossibility of waiver under § 455(e) for § 455(b) cases. See Bloom, supra note 55, at 702-05 (disqualification for de minimis financial interest without possibility of waiver disrupts litigation and wastes judicial resources); Note, Bias and Interest: Should They Lead to Dissimilar Results in Judicial Qualification Practice?, 27 ARIZ. Senate Hearing, supra note 2, at 74; House Report, supra note 4, at 6357. See supra note 30 and accompanying text for a discussion of congressional elimination of the duty to sit.

FN58. Concern for judge-shopping is evident in the House Report which stated: 'Nothing in this proposed legislation should be read to warrant the transformation of a litigant's fear that a judge may decide a question against him into a 'reasonable fear' that the judge will not be impartial. Litigants ought not have to face a judge where there is a reasonable question of impartiality, but they are not entitled to judges of their own choice.' House Report, supra note 4, at 6355. FN61. See Hall v. Small Business Admin., 695 F.2d 175, 178-79 (5th Cir. 1983) (to satisfy appearance of impartiality test of § 455(a), disqualification must be based on reasonable conclusion from objectively ascertainable facts, not on subjective assessment of judge's state of mind).

FN62. The language of 28 U.S.C. § 455 (1982), which gives judges the responsibility to disqualify themselves in several specified circumstances, provides for disqualification where no one but the judge knows the reason. Disqualification of this sort is generally not documented by written opinion. An instance of this use of § 455 may be seen in United States v. Merkt, 794 F.2d 950, 960 (5th Cir. 1986) (judge's unexplained voluntary recusal in prior case involving defendant is not sufficient grounds for disqualification in subsequent case involving defendant), cert. denied,

FN66. Id. § 455(b)(1) (emphasis added).

FN67. For the standard applied to § 144, see Chitimacha Tribe v. Harry L. Laws Co., 690 F.2d 1157, 1165 (5th Cir. 1982) (§ 144 affidavit sufficient if it alleges facts which, if true, would convince reasonable person that bias exists), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 814 (1983); see also United States v. Balistrieri, 779 F.2d 1191, 1199 (7th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 106 S. Ct. 3284 (1986); United States v. Thompson, 483 F.2d 527, 528 (3d Cir. 1973).

Courts tend to treat § 455 as a unit when setting forth the standard, rather than treating § 455(b)(1) separately from § 455(a). See Story, 716 F.2d at 1091 (reasonable person standard applied to § 455 as a whole); Chitimacha, 690 F.2d at 1167 (charges of partiality based on §§ 455(a) and (b) resolved by application of reasonable person standard).

FN68. See Chitimacha, 690 F.2d at 1165 (§ 144 affidavit must convince a reasonable person); Balistrieri, 779 F.2d at 1202 (requirement that facts convince a reasonable person of bias applied to both § 455(b)(1) and § 144).

FN69. Courts generally apply a three-part test for legal sufficiency, requiring that the facts set forth in the affidavit (1) be material and stated with particularity (2) be such that, if true, they would convince a reasonable person that bias exists; and (3) show personal rather than judicial bias. United States v. Merkt, 794 F.2d 950, 960 n.9 (5th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 107 S. Ct. 1603 (1987); see also Phillips v. Joint Legislative Comm'n., 637 F.2d 1014, 1019 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 960 (1982); Thompson, 483 F.2d at 528.

FN70. Thompson, 483 F.2d at 528 (emphasis added); accord Balistrieri, 779 F.2d at 1199; United States v. Serrano, 607 F.2d 1145, 1150 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 910 (1980). The standard has become more rigorous over they years. In Berger v. United States, the Supreme Court demanded only that the affidavit 'give fair support to the charge of a bent of mind that may prevent or impede impartiality of judgment.' 255 U.S. at 33-34.

FN71. See infra note 83 and accompanying text for discussion of the § 455(a) standard.

FN73. Balistrieri, 779 F.2d at 1199 (judge must assume facts are true, even if judge knows them to be false); Mims v. Shapp, 541 F.2d 415, 417 (3d Cir. 1976) (judge must accept truth of allegations and good faith of pleader even if judge has knowledge to the contrary).

FN74. See, e.g., In re Yagman, 796 F.2d 1165, 1181-82 (9th Cir. 1986) (§ 455 treated as unit in setting forth reasonable doubt standard for disqualification); United States v. Story, 716 F.2d 1088, 1091 (6th Cir. 1983) (single reasonable doubt standard established for § 455).

Focus on § 455 is not surprising. Judges can save face by disqualifying themselves under § 455(a), on grounds that a reasonable person could question their impartiality, rather than admitting they are actually biased by disqualifying themselves under § 455(b)(1). See Balistrieri, 779 F.2d at 1203 (judges may be especially reluctant to recuse themselves when doing so requires admission that actual bias or prejudice has been proved). Likewise, it is logical for one to surmise that courts of appeals support that focus, because they may then avoid directly impugning the integrity of district court judges by using § 455(a) instead of § 455(b)(1).

FN75. See, e.g., United States v. Sibla, 624 F.2d 864, 867 (9th Cir. 1980) (§ 455(b)(1) simply provides specific example of situation in which a judge's 'impartiality might reasonably be questioned' pursuant to § 455(a)); United States v. Conforte, 624 F.2d 869, 881 (9th Cir.) (same test for subsections (a) and (b) which disqualifies on a reasonable person standard for either the appearance or the fact of bias) cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1012 (1980).

Bloom, supra note 55, at 675, suggests that the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals applies the bias in fact requirement of § 455(b)(1) to both § 455(a) and § 455(b)(1). But the court made clear in Conforte that both sections would be a evaluated under the standard requiring disqualification for the appearance of bias set forth in § 455(a). 624 F.2d at 881.

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, soon after § 455 was revised, issued an ambiguous holding that could be interpreted as imposing a bias in fact requirement on both § 455(a) and § 455(b)(1). Parrish v. Board of Comm'rs, 524 F.2d 98, 103-04 (5th Cir. 1975) (en banc), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 944 (1976). See Comment, Disqualification of Federal Judges for Bias or Prejudice, 46 U. CHI. L. REV. 236, 248 n.66 (1978) (Parrish holding ambiguous but compatible with appearance of bias rule). But cf. Bloom, supra note 55, at 675 (Parrish and subsequent cases require bias in fact). More recent Fifth Circuit decisions clearly apply the § 455(a) requirements to both § 455(a) and § 455(b)(1). See United States v. Merkt, 794 F.2d 950, 960 n.8 (5th Cir. 1986) (test of whether reasonable person would 'harbor doubts' applied to both sections), cert. denied, 107 S. Ct. 1603 (1987).

Board of Comm'rs, 524 F.2d 98, 101-02 (5th Cir. 1975) (en banc) (gloss on § 144 applies fully to § 455), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 944 (1976)); see also Bloom, supra note 55, at 675 (Fifth Circuit and Ninth Circuit cases require bias in fact).

FN85. The Fifth Circuit, which may have required bias in fact at one time, has more recently stated clearly that the standard under § 455(a) is the appearance of bias. Hall v. Small Business Admin., 695 F.2d 175, 178-79 (5th Cir. 1983) (test under § 455(a) is appearance of partiality rather than actual bias). See also Comment, supra note 74, at 248 n.66 (majority opinion in Parrish ambiguous; can be read as acknowledging appearance of bias standard for § 455(a)).

The Ninth Circuit backed away from the bias in fact requirement in United States v. Conforte, 624 F.2d 869 (9th Cir. 1980). The Conforte court interpreted its Olander holding to mean that the same substantive rules regarding bias or prejudice would apply whether the court was determining the appearance or the fact of bias. FN100. See, e.g., Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 106 S. Ct. 1580, 1585 (1986) (only in extreme cases would disqualification on basis of personal bias or prejudice be constitutionally required); Tumey, 273 U.S. at 523 (not all questions of judicial disqualification are constitutional questions). These cases involved disqualification of state court judges.

Other due process decisions dealing with adjudicative impartiality have involved administrative decisionmakers. See Marshall v. Jerrico, Inc., 446 U.S. 238, 242-43 (1980) (decision by regional administrator in Department of Labor not required to meet impartiality standards applied to judges); FTC v. Cement Inst., 333 U.S. 683, 701-02 (1948) (FTC's expressed opinions on points of law neither evidence of bias nor violative of due process).

In the few federal judicial disqualification cases heard by the Supreme Court, the Court has not reached the question of due process but rather has confined itself to interpreting the federal statute at issue. See United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 580-83 (1966) (applying § 144 where judge's personal bias alleged); Berger v. United States, 255 U.S. 22, 34-35, (1921) (applying Act of March 3, 1911, ch. 231, § 21, 36 Stat. 1090, precusor to § 144). The Court's focus on statutory interpretation is consistent with its practice of resolving cases on statutory grounds if possible before reaching constitutional questions. See Wood v. Strickland, 420 U.S. 308, 314 (1975) (Court practice is to deal with dispositive statutory issue before considering constitutional construction issues).

FN117. See, e.g., United States v. Story, 716 F.2d 1088, 1091 (6th Cir. 1983) (well settled that §§ 144 and 455 'must be construed in pari materia') (quoting City of Cleveland v. Kruppansky, 619 F.2d 576, 578 (6th Cir.), cert. denied 449 U.S. 834 (1980)); United States v. Sibla, 624 F.2d 864, 869 (9th Cir. 1980) (§§ 455(a) & (b)(1), like § 144, require recusal only if bias or prejudice is directed against party and stems from extrajudicial source); In re International Business Machs. Corp., 618 F.2d 923, 928-29 (2d Cir. 1980) (§§ 455(a) and 455(b)(1) require that bias be personal and from extrajudicial source).

FN118. See United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31, 132 n.297 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (judicial understanding of § 144 applies to revised § 455, which requires disqualification when impartiality may reasonably be questioned), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 933 (1977).

A few courts have disagreed, stating that the judicial interpretation of § 144 does not carry over to § 455(a). United States v. Coven, 662 F.2d 162, 168 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 916 (1982). See also United States v. Cepeda Penes, 577 F.2d 754, 758 (1st Cir. 1978) (§ 455(a) permits disqualification on evidence from judicial source). The minority view does not, however, produce results significantly different from the results reached by courts which apply the § 144 judicial gloss to § 455(a). The courts that limit the applicability of the § 144 judicially-created rules take them as being without exception or nuance. In contrast, courts that apply the §§ 144 requirements to § 455(a) include exceptions within the standards they apply to each of the sections. Compare Coven, 662 F.2d at 168-69 (information from a judicial source relevant but not sufficiently prejudicial to disqualify without any other basis in record for questioning judge's impartiality) with Nicodemus v. Chrysler Corp., 596 F.2d 152, 156-57 (6th Cir. 1979) (emotional response by judge within judicial context sufficiently prejudicial to warrant disqualification).

Jackson, 627 F.2d 1198, 1207 n.20 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (prior judicial exposure to same type of case inadequate basis for showing personal bias).

FN131. For application of the extrajudicial source requirement to bail hearings, see, e.g., United States v. Archbold-Newball, 554 F.2d 665, 681-82 (5th Cir.) (judge's bail denial based on stated belief of police testimony that defendants were in conspiracy not grounds for recusal), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1000 (1977).

For application of the extrajudicial source requirement to other pretrial proceedings, see, e.g., United States v. Porter, 701 F.2d 1158, 1166 (6th Cir.) (judge's comment during preliminary hearing that defendants were 'apparently caught red-handed' not grounds for disqualification absent pervasive bias), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 1007 (1983); United States v. Cepeda Penes, 577 F.2d 754, 756-58 (1st Cir. 1978) (judge who heard aborted attempt to plead nolo contendere not disqualified from presiding over trial).

For application of the extrajudicial source requirement to trials, see, e.g., Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571, 577 (6th Cir. 1985) (judge who presided over denaturalization hearing need not disqualify himself from extradition hearing or from considering habeas corpus relief), cert. denied, 106 S. Ct. 1198 (1986); In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litig., 614 F.2d 958, 963-66 (5th Cir.) FN132. See, e.g., United States v. Studley, 783 F.2d 934, 939-40 (9th Cir. 1986) (fact that defendant publically denounced and filed lawsuit against judge not grounds for disqualification); United States v. Phillips, 664 F.2d 971, 1000-04 (5th Cir. 1981) (no extrajudicial source of bias to disqualify judge who learned of and discussed defendant's plans to disrupt trial and his threats against judge's life), cert. denied, 457 U.S. 1136 (1982).

FN133. See In re International Business Machs. Corp., 618 F.2d 923 (2d Cir. 1980), in which the court stated: 'A trial judge must be free to make rulings on the merits without the apprehension that if he makes a disproportionate number in favor of one litigant, he may have created the impression of bias.' Id. at 929. See also Johnson v. Trueblood, 629 F.2d 287, 291 (3d Cir. 1980) (extrajudicial source rule extended to statements in settlement conference to avoid unduly hampering judge's ability to effectuate settlement), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 999 (1981).

The use of this rationale in Phillips v. Joint Legislative Comm., 637 F.2d 1014 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 960 (1982), in response to allegations of racism, raises the question whether the protection afforded by the extrajudicial source requirement extends too far. The court stated:

> We would be reluctant, in any but an extreme case, to base a disqualification order on . . . allegations [of a pattern of racism in prior opinions]. It is a district judge's duty to conduct trials, weigh evidence, consider the law, exercise his discretion, and reach decisions in the cases on which he sits. If he understands that a seemingly harsh comment toward a party or an attorney, or a perceived tendency to give severe sentences to some class of offenders, or an aggregate imbalance in victories for plaintiffs or defendants in a particular class of cases may subject him to a train of successful recusal motions in future cases, he may consciously or subconsciously shape his judicial actions in ways urelated to the merits of the cases before him.

In Shank v. American Motors Corp., 575 F. Supp. 125 (E.D. Pa. 1983), a district court judge reacted in similar fashion to the defendant automobile manufacturers. The judge refused to disqualify himself, alleging that his statement arose out of judicial experience and did not indicate extrajudicial bias. Id. at 129. He said, 'Automobile manufacturers FN151. This rule is mitigated somewhat by 28 U.S.C. § 455(b)(3), which provides that judges who had been government employees are disqualified from a case if they previously served as counsel, adviser, or material witness concerning the proceedings, or if they expressed an opinion on the merits of the case. FN168. Id. The court suggested that judges should not be disqualified if they are 'capable of refining' their views in the process of the case, but they should be disqualified if their minds are 'irrevocably closed.' Id. Applying this test to the district court judge's handling of the AT&T case, the court found that the judge did not hold a fixed opinion at the outset of the case, as evidenced by his denial of a motion to dismiss the case on the basis of antitrust immunity, and that his evenhanded administration of the case provided no evidence of a 'closed mind' during trial. Id. at 991-92.

FN169. See id. at 993 (evidence must be weighed against strong presumption that judges do not substitute their personal views for controlling law).

FN170. Cf. Bloom, supra note 55, at 689 (previously stated opinion on important issue in case could lead reasonable person to question judge's impartiality).

Bloom addressed this issue prior to the circuit court decision in Southern Pacific Communications. He perceived the policy against disqualifying judges for opinions on the law as a blanket prohibition, rather than as a policy giving rise to a strong presumption of impartiality. Id. at 688. Bloom advocated replacing the blanket prohibition with a case-by-case analysis that would disqualify judges for the appearance of bias, and that would take into account 'whether and how widely the judge's views are publicly known, how strongly the views are held, whether the proper resolution of the legal issue is unsettled, and whether his views relate to the legal issue as applied in the specific factual context of the case . . ..' Id. at 697.

FN181. Courts have shown an appropriate reluctance to disqualify on the basis of disagreement with applicable law. The Southern Pacific Communications court articulated the reason for this reluctance when it stated:

> It is well established . . . that a judge is not disqualified merely because he personally disagrees with the policy underlying a law that he is bound to apply in a case [since] . . . '[i]n fulfilling the functions of applying or considering the validity of a statute, or a government program, the judge endeavors to put aside personal views as to the desirability of the law or program . . ..'

Pa. 1974), aff'd, 552 F.2d 498 (3d Cir. 1977). The defendants, who were charged with discriminating against a class of black plaintiffs on the basis of race, sought to disqualify Judge Higginbotham by means of a § 144 affidavit alleging that he was black and had identified himself with black causes. Id. at 157-58. The defendant's central allegation was that Judge Higginbotham's recent speech before a black history organization revealed his identification with civil rights cases. Id. at 159-60, 163. In addition to refusing disqualification on the grounds that background and associations could not be used to prove bias, the judge noted that dedication to upholding the law also could not be used to disqualify a judge. Id. at 800-02. 28 U.S.C. § 455(b)(4) requires disqualification if a judge 'knows that he, individually or as a fiduciary . . . has a financial interest in the subject matter in controversy . . ..' The court held that the judge, who was a trustee of Loyola University, had 'constructive knowledge' of an interest in the case because he had attended a meeting at which financial information was disseminated that revealed the university's interest. 796 F.2d at 803. The court concluded that the judge's claimed forgetfulness could not provide a defense against disqualification under the objective standard of § 455(a) and thus held that the judge's recusal was necessary. Id. at 802-03. Cf. Davis v. Xerox, 811 F.2d 1293 (9th Cir. 1987) (if reasonable person would conclude that judge had no knowledge of interest at time rulings made, § 455(a) does not require that rulings be vacated).

FN246. To make transfer of disqualification decisions mandatory would require amendment of the current statute, 28 U.S.C. § 455, which explicitly places the responsibility for disqualification on the challenged judge. See supra note 12 for the text of § 455. See also Comment, supra note 75, at 266 n.172, for a discussion of creative ways to circumvent the current requirement that judges disqualify themselves.

FN250. See Bloom, supra note 55, at 697 (administrative burden may be worth paying to enhance appearance of judicial impartiality); Comment, supra note 75, at 265-66 (transfers would produce more disinterested decision and spare judge embarrassment of ruling; best to make practice of transferring except where delay or disruption substantial).

FN251. See Redish & Marshall, supra note 1, at 504 n.180 (to allow litigant to go through trial with biased judge is at odds with Supreme Court pronouncement that due process affords right to impartial judge at all stages of process); see also Moore, supra note 226, at 851 (permitting trial before judge who is or appears to be biased constitutes enormous encroachment of fundamental value of impartiality).

FN252. See, e.g., Roberts v. Bailar, 625 F.2d 125, 126 (6th Cir. 1980) (remanded for new trial because disqualification required under § 455); Potashnick v. Port City Constr. Co., 609 F.2d 1101, 1104 (5th Cir.) (reversed because judge should have disqualified himself; remanded for new trial before different judge).

FN253. See, e.g., United States v. Harrelson, 754 F.2d 1153 (5th Cir.) (court faced with whether to grant new trial to person convicted of murdering district court judge), cert. denied, 106 S. Ct. 599 (1985).

FN254. Section 144 contains a timeliness requirement. See supra note 37 for discussion of the timeliness requirement under § 144. Section 455 does not contain any such requirement. In SCA Services, Inc. v. Morgan, 557 F.2d 110, 117 (7th Cir. 1977) (per curiam) the Seventh Circuit held that no time limits may be imposed. Since then, the Seventh Circuit has questioned, but not altered, this ruling. See Union Carbide Corp. v. U.S. Cutting Serv., Inc., 782 F.2d 710, 716 (7th Cir. 1986) (Morgan decision repeatedly questioned, recently undermined by court of appeals; reconsideration unnecessary here). Several courts have rejected the Morgan analysis and imposed a timeliness requirement on § 455. See Chitimacha Tribe v. Harry L. Laws Co., 690 F.2d 1157, 1164 n.3 (5th Cir. 1982) (§§ 144 and 455 both require timely motion), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 814 (1983); In re International Business Machs. Corp., 618 F.2d 923, 932 (2d Cir. 1980) (court can impose timeliness requirement despite lack of statutory provision). Timeliness may also be encouraged by treating failure to move for disqualification at an appropriate moment as an implicit waiver, as the Third Circuit did in United States v. Nobel, 696 F.2d 231, 237 (3d Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 462 U.S. 1118 (1983).

FN255. 28 U.S.C. § 1291 (1982). A decision is considered final only when it 'ends the litigation on the merits and leaves nothing for the court to do but execute the judgment.' Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Risjord, 449 U.S. 368, 373-74 (1981) (quoting Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 437 U.S. 463, 467 (1978) (quoting Catlin v. United States, 324 U.S. 229, 233 (1945)).

Courts seldom review disqualification issues under the exception to the finality rule provided by federal law, 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (1982), which allows review prior to a decision on the merits only in narrowly circumscribed instances. Under § 1292(b), a district judge must certify an order asking for review and the appellate court must agree to hear the appeal. Id. The issue in question must involve 'a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial grounds for difference of opinion,' and where 'immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the utlimate termination of the litigation.' Id.

The certification process is seldom available for a disqualification motion grounded in either § 144, 455(b)(1) or 455(a), since such a motion generally hinges on interpretation of facts and is unlikely to present a question involving a controlling issue of law as to which there is substantial grounds for difference of opinion. See 13A C. WRIGHT, A MILLER & E. COOPER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 3553 at 659 (1984) (§ 1292(b) standard not often met in disqualification decisions).

Reviewed by certification has been employed occasionally. See, e.g., Davis v. Board of School Comm'rs, 517 F.2d 1044, 1047 (5th Cir. 1975) (review allowed under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) to determine whether prejudice against attorney disqualifies under § 144), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 944 (1976).

Another means for interlocutory review is the collateral order rule, a common law rule that an interlocutory order is immediately appealable if it is 'in that small class which finally determine claims of right separable from, and collateral to, rights asserted in the action, too important to be denied review and too independent of the cause itself to require that appellate consideration be deferred until the whole case is adjudicated.' Cohen v. Beneficial Indus. Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 546 (1949). Appellate courts have proved unwilling to exercise this common law doctrine to review disqualification motions. See, e.g., In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litig., 614 F.2d 958, 960-61 (5th Cir.) (disqualification motions not reviewable under collateral order doctrine because fully reviewable on appeal from final judgment), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 888 (1980); accord United States v. Gregory, 656 F.2d 1132, 1136 (5th Cir. 1981); United States v. Washington, 573 F.2d 1121, 1122 (9th Cir. 1978). But see Moore, supra note 226, at 862-63 (arguments supporting review for mandamus also support review under collateral order rule; review under collateral order rule preferable because mandamus may impose higher standard).

FN256. See, e.g., Pepsico, Inc. v. McMillen, 764 F.2d 458, 460 (7th Cir. 1985) (mandamus appropriate where judge fails to step down when required to by § 455(a)); In re United States, 666 F.2d 690, 694 (1st Cir. 1981) (mandamus jurisdiction appropriate where issue is judicial disqualification); In re International Business Machs. The court apparently modified its position later. See United States v. Gregory, 656 F.2d 1132, 1136-37 (5th Cir. 1981) (Fifth Circuit followed Corrugated Container in holding that review not available under collateral order rule because claim was reviewable on appeal; ignored this argument in considering whether to issue a writ of mandamus).

1. Governing Rule and Statutes

Rule 63 provides:

> If a trial or hearing has been commenced and the judge is unable to proceed, any other judge may proceed with it upon certifying familiarity with the record and determining that the proceedings in the case may be completed without prejudice to the parties. In a hearing or trial without a jury, the successor judge shall at the request of a party recall any witness whose testimony is material and disputed and who is available to testify again without undue burden. The successor judge may also recall any other witness.

The revision substantially displaces the former rule. The former rule was limited to the disability of the judge, and made no provision for disqualification or possible other reasons for the withdrawal of the judge during proceedings. In making provision for other circumstances, the revision is not intended to encourage judges to discontinue participation in a trial for any but compelling reasons. Cf. United States v. Lane, 708 F.2d 1394, 1395–1397 (9th Cir.1983). Manifestly, a substitution should not be made for the personal convenience of the court, and the reasons for a substitution should be stated on the record.

The former rule made no provision for the withdrawal of the judge during the trial, but was limited to disqualification after trial. Several courts concluded that the text of the former rule prohibited substitution of a new judge prior to the points described in the rule, thus requiring a new trial, whether or not a fair disposition was within reach of a substitute judge. E.g., Whalen v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 684 F.2d 272 (4th Cir.1982, en banc), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 910 (1982) (jury trial); Arrow–Hart, Inc. v. Philip Carey Co., 552 F.2d 711 (6th Cir.1977) (non-jury trial). See generally Comment, The Case of the Dead Judge: Fed.R.Civ.P. 63: Whalen v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 67 MINN.L.REV. 827 (1983).

The increasing length of federal trials has made it likely that the number of trials interrupted by the disability of the judge will increase. An efficient mechanism for completing these cases without unfairness is needed to prevent unnecessary expense and delay. To avoid the injustice that may result if the substitute judge proceeds despite unfamiliarity with the action, the new Rule provides, in language similar to Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 25(a), that the successor judge must certify familiarity with the record and determine that the case may be completed before that judge without prejudice to the parties. This will necessarily require that there be available a transcript or a videotape of the proceedings prior to substitution. If there has been a long but incomplete jury trial, the prompt availability of the transcript or videotape is crucial to the effective use of this rule, for the jury cannot long be held while an extensive transcript is prepared without prejudice to one or all parties.

The revised text authorizes the substitute judge to make a finding of fact at a bench trial based on evidence heard by a different judge. This may be appropriate in limited circumstances. First, if a witness has become unavailable, the testimony recorded at trial can be considered by the successor judge pursuant to F.R.Ev. 804, being equivalent to a recorded deposition available for use at trial pursuant to Rule 32. For this purpose, a witness who is no longer subject to a subpoena to compel testimony at trial is unavailable. Secondly, the successor judge may determine that particular testimony is not material or is not disputed, and so need not be reheard. The propriety of proceeding in this manner may be marginally affected by the availability of a videotape record; a judge who has reviewed a trial on videotape may be entitled to greater confidence in his or her ability to proceed.

The court would, however, risk error to determine the credibility of a witness not seen or heard who is available to be recalled. Cf. Anderson v. City of Bessemer City NC, 470 U.S. 564, 575 (1985); Marshall v. Jerrico Inc, 446 U.S. 238, 242 (1980). See also United States v. Radatz, 447 U.S. 667 (1980).

With respect to the disqualification of a judge on the ground of bias or prejudice, 28 U.S.C.A. § 144 provides as follows:

Whenever a party to any proceeding in a district court makes and files a timely and sufficient affidavit that the judge before whom the matter is pending has a personal bias or prejudice either against him or in favor of any adverse party, such judge shall proceed no further therein, but another judge shall be assigned to hear such proceeding.

The affidavit shall state the facts and the reasons for the belief that bias or prejudice exists, and shall be filed not less than ten days before the beginning of the term at which the proceeding is to be heard, or good cause shall be shown for failure to file it within such time. A party may file only one such affidavit in any case. It shall be accompanied by a certificate of counsel of record stating that it is being made in good faith.

With respect to disqualification of a judge for interest, 28 U.S.C.A. § 455 provides as follows:

(a) Any justice, judge, or magistrate of the United States shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned.

(b) He shall also disqualify himself in the following circumstances:

(1) Where he has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding;

(2) Where in private practice he served as lawyer in the matter in controversy, or a lawyer with whom he previously practiced law served during such association as a lawyer concerning the matter, or the judge or such lawyer has been a material witness concerning it;

(3) Where he has served in governmental employment and in such capacity participated as counsel, adviser or material witness concerning the proceeding or expressed an opinion concerning the merits of the particular case in controversy;

(4) He knows that he, individually or as a fiduciary, or his spouse or minor child residing in his household, has a financial interest in the subject matter in controversy or in a party to the proceeding, or any other interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding;

(5) He or his spouse, or a person within the third degree of relationship to either of them, or the spouse of such a person:

(i) Is a party to the proceeding, or an officer, director, or trustee of a party;

(ii) Is acting as a lawyer in the proceeding;

(iii) Is known by the judge to have an interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding;

(iv) Is to the judge's knowledge likely to be a material witness in the proceeding.

(c) A judge should inform himself about his personal and fiduciary financial interests, and make a reasonable effort to inform himself about the personal financial interests of his spouse and minor children residing in his household.

(d) For the purposes of this section the following words or phrases shall have the meaning indicated:

(1) "proceeding" includes pretrial, trial, appellate review, or other stages of litigation;

(2) the degree of relationship is calculated according to the civil law system;

(3) "fiduciary" includes such relationships as executor, administrator, trustee, and guardian;

(4) "financial interest" means ownership of a legal or equitable interest, however small, or a relationship as director, adviser, or other active participant in the affairs of a party, except that:

(i) Ownership in a mutual or common investment fund that holds securities is not a "financial interest" in such securities unless the judge participates in the management of the fund;

(ii) An office in an educational, religious, charitable, fraternal, or civic organization is not a "financial interest" in securities held by the organization;

(iii) The proprietary interest of a policyholder in a mutual insurance company, of a depositor in a mutual savings association, or a similar proprietary interest, is a "financial interest" in the organization only if the outcome of the proceeding could substantially affect the value of the interest;

(iv) Ownership of government securities is a "financial interest" in the issuer only if the outcome of the proceeding could substantially affect the value of the securities.

(e) No justice, judge, or magistrate shall accept from the parties to the proceeding a waiver of any ground for disqualification enumerated in subsection (b). Where the ground for disqualification arises only under subsection (a), waiver may be accepted provided it is preceded by a full disclosure on the record of the basis for disqualification.

(f) Notwithstanding the preceding provisions of this section, if any justice, judge, magistrate, or bankruptcy judge to whom a matter has been assigned would be disqualified, after substantial judicial time has been devoted to the matter, because of the appearance or discovery, after the matter was assigned to him or her, that he or she individually or as a fiduciary, or his or her spouse or minor child residing in his or her household, has a financial interest in a party (other than an interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome), disqualification is not required if the justice, judge, magistrate, bankruptcy judge, spouse or minor child, as the case may be, divests himself or herself of the interest that provides the grounds for the disqualification.

2. Time of Objection on Ground of Personal Bias or Prejudice

Under 28 U.S.C.A. § 144 an affidavit of prejudice must be timely. The provision that it be filed not less than ten days before the beginning of the term at which the proceeding is to be heard, in the absence of a showing of good cause for failure to file it by that time, no longer can be applied, since terms of court were abolished in 1963. A party requesting the disqualification of a judge must now proceed with due diligence. A request to disqualify can be dismissed if the party has unduly delayed in filing the affidavit. Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 3551.

3. Affidavit and Certificate Requirements for Disqualification on Ground of Personal Bias or Prejudice

When a party seeks to disqualify a judge for personal bias or prejudice under 28 U.S.C.A. § 144, the judge must examine the affidavit or declaration and accompanying certificate to determine whether they are timely and legally sufficient. Only if the documents meet strict scrutiny does disqualification become mandatory. Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 3551. If the affidavit or declaration is presented in time and in proper form, the court must take as true the facts set out in the affidavit or declaration. Only questions of law are presented and there can be no dispute about the truth or falsity of the allegations of the affidavit or declaration. Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 3551. See also Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 3542 with respect to what constitutes personal bias.

The affidavit or declaration must state facts and reasons for the belief that bias exists. The affidavit or declaration must be definite as to the time, place, persons, and circumstances. Mere conclusory allegations are not sufficient. Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 3551.

Section 144 permits the filing of only one affidavit or declaration of prejudice in any case. However, a judge is under a continuing duty to disqualify himself or herself at any time the judge is satisfied that he or she is disqualified under § 455.

The affidavit or declaration must be accompanied by a certificate of counsel stating that the affidavit is made in good faith. The certificate must be signed by counsel of record, who must be an attorney admitted to the bar of the particular court. While § 144 appears to contemplate that the certificate attest to the good faith of the affiant or declarant, some courts have ruled that the certificate must state that counsel is acting in good faith. Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 3551.

See Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d §§ 3542–3549 with respect to grounds for disqualification.

An unsworn declaration under penalty of perjury may be used in lieu of an affidavit. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1746. The form for an unsworn declaration under Section 1746 executed within the United States is as follows: "I declare [or certify, verify, or state] under penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct. Executed on [date]."

However, local practice should be consulted. Some courts may still prefer affidavits to declarations under penalty of perjury. See Moynihan, Affidavit Evidence, 14 Litigation 43 (Spring 1988).

4. Disqualification of Judge for Interest

28 U.S.C.A. § 455 is directed to the judges themselves and says nothing about procedure. Although no action by a party is required to invoke the provision of the statute, a party can suggest to the judge that grounds for disqualification exist. When a judge learns that grounds for his or her disqualification exist under § 455, the judge should disqualify himself or herself regardless of the source of the information. Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 3550.

There can be waiver under § 455(a) only if the facts of the basis of the disqualification have been fully disclosed by the judge on the record. Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction 2d § 3552.

§ 5152. Affidavit of Bias or Prejudice—Another Form

[Title of Court and Cause]

[Venue]

_____, being first duly sworn, upon oath deposes and says: _____ is one of the defendants in the case of _____ against _____, numbered _____, now pending in the United States District Court for the _____ District of _____. _____ believes and charges that his honor, Judge _____, has a personal bias and prejudice against _____ and the codefendants _____ and _____, and each of them, and in favor of the government, by reason of which the judge is unable impartially to exercise his functions as judge in this cause. By reason of this personal bias and prejudice neither of these defendants can have a fair and impartial trial before him. The grounds for the defendant's beliefs are as follows:

The defendants state upon information and belief that Hon. _____, in the city of _____, after the organization of the United States District Court for the _____ District of _____, created and organized pursuant to the act of Congress of _____, made addresses before certain civic clubs and churches of that city on the subject of law enforcement. In all these addresses he told his audiences in substance, and through them the general public, that he intended to bear down with heavy hands on all offenders against federal criminal laws. During the course of his address before one of the clubs, namely, the _____ club, on or about [date], he stated that the higher the law violator's collar and the whiter his shirt, the longer his sentence would be in his court, and that, the longer his list of witnesses, the heavier his sentence would be.

_____ has been informed that Hon. _____, has expressed a willingness to assist the _____ officers in apprehending this affiant in the commission of a violation of the _____ law, by permitting prisoners of the United States government to be used as undercover agents for the purpose of obtaining evidence against this affiant, and this affiant has been further informed that Hon. _____, did, at least upon one occasion, permit a prisoner of the United States government to be placed in the custody of _____ officers, for the purpose of using the prisoner in the obtaining of evidence against this affiant.

Affiant further states that on [date], he was tried before the court upon a charge of violating the _____ laws, and was in the cause acquitted. However, during the progress of the trial, one of the state's witnesses testified to a state of facts which the district attorney contended was contradictory to sworn written statement, furnished by the witness to the district attorney; and over the objections of the attorney for this affiant, his honor, _____, judge of the court, permitted the district attorney to conduct a rigid cross-examination of the state's own witness. And Hon. _____, judge of the court, did at that time and in open court, state in substance that the witness had been tampered with, and from his demeanor cast reflection upon this affiant, and caused this affiant and his friends to believe that Hon. _____ believed that this affiant had in some manner stifled the testimony of the witness. And the court did at that time, in the presence of the jury, order the witness held for perjury, and did instruct the district attorney to file perjury charges against the witness; it was apparent from the testimony that the witness had been tampered with by some one.

Affiant further states that he had prior to the trial, and during the trial, conducted himself properly, and was without fault and did not have anything to do with the witness whatsoever.

Affiant further states that his son, _____, one of the defendants named in the indictment with this affiant, was tried before his honor, _____, and that on [date], in the case of United States against _____, No. _____ in that court, passed sentence upon _____, and while passing the sentence the court stated in substance, as this affiant is informed and believes, as follows: "The _____ tribe seem to believe that they have the privilege as a matter of right to sell _____, but it has got to stop in the _____ district, if I can prevent it."

Affiant further states that he is informed that Hon. _____ further stated, or commented upon the fact, that this affiant, father of _____, had been tried before him, and that an uncle of _____ had been tried and convicted before him.

Affiant further states that on [date], this affiant obtained the attached affidavit of _____, which supports the statements made by this affiant upon information and belief, as to the fact that his honor, _____, had interested himself in obtaining evidence against this affiant.

Affiant further states that on several occasions he has requested his attorneys to prepare and file application to disqualify his honor, _____, from trying this affiant or either of his sons, _____ and _____, but that his attorneys have disagreed with this affiant, until [date], when this affiant received new information, which was imparted to attorneys for this affiant and set out above. The information could not have been obtained at an earlier date, as it was not known to any of the parties defendant that it existed until this affiant was so informed as stated above.

Affiant further states that he believes that Hon. _____ has impressions or prejudices in his mind and against this defendant, and against his family, including his codefendants, sons of this affiant, which it would take evidence to remove, and that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial before Hon. _____, and that he is entitled to have a trial before another United States judge.

Whenever a party in a proceeding in United States District Court files a timely and sufficient affidavit that the judge before whom the matter is pending has a personal bias against the party or in favor of an adverse party, the judge must proceed no further in the proceeding, and another judge must be assigned to hear it. An affidavit alleging bias or prejudice on the part of a judge must state the facts and reasons for the belief that such bias or prejudice exists.[17] The affidavit must be filed not less than 10 days before the beginning of the session at which the proceeding is to be heard, unless good cause is shown for failure to file within such time, and it is to be accompanied by a certificate of counsel of record stating that it is made in good faith. A party may file only one such affidavit in any case.[18] In order to be disqualifying, the judge's alleged bias or prejudice must stem from an extrajudicial source and result in an opinion on the merits on some basis other than what the judge learned from participation in the case.[19]

Under certain circumstances, judges and other judicial officers are required to disqualify themselves from a proceeding.[20]

Any person alleging that a circuit, district, bankruptcy, or magistrate judge has engaged in conduct prejudicial to the effective and expeditious administration of the business of the courts, or alleging that such a judge is unable to discharge all the duties of his or her office by reason of mental or physical disability, may file a written complaint with the clerk of the Court of Appeals for the circuit, which complaint must contain a brief statement of the facts constituting such conduct.[21] The chief judge to whom a complaint of judicial misconduct is referred may either (1) dismiss the complaint; (2) conclude that corrective action has already been taken or that action on the complaint is no longer necessary because of intervening events; or (3) appoint an investigative committee to conduct an investigation of the matter and report to the judicial council of the circuit.[22]

If a judge becomes unable to proceed after a trial or hearing has been commenced, any other judge may proceed upon (1) certifying familiarity with the record, and (2) determining that the proceedings in the case may be completed without prejudice to the parties.[23]

XI. TRIAL

A. DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE OR OTHER JUDICIAL OFFICER; JUDICIAL MISCONDUCT OR DISABILITY

INTRODUCTION

Cases:

Even though the "extrajudicial source" doctrine arose under 28 USCS § 144 (and its predecessor)—providing for the disqualification of a federal district judge upon a party's filing of a timely and sufficient affidavit that the judge has a personal bias or prejudice—the extrajudicial source doctrine or factor applies under 28 USCS § 455(a), for (1) § 455(a) requires the disqualification of any justice, judge, or magistrate of the United States in any proceeding in which such a person's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, and 28 USCS § 455(b)(1) requires such a person's disqualification in circumstances where such a person has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding; (2) in view of the pejorative connotation of the words "bias" or "prejudice" as they are used in §§ 144 and 455(b)(1)—as a favorable or unfavorable disposition that is somehow wrongful or inappropriate, because it is undeserved, rests upon knowledge that the subject ought not to possess, or is excessive in degree—the extrajudicial source doctrine is one application of this pejorativeness requirement; and (3) while the "objective appearance" principle of § 455(a) makes irrelevant the subjective limitation of § 455(b)(1)—so that under § 455(a), a judge does not have to be subjectively biased or prejudiced so long as the judge appears to be so—nothing in § 455(a) eliminates the longstanding § 455(b)(1) limitation that personal bias or prejudice does not consist of a disposition that fails to satisfy the extrajudicial source doctrine, where, for example, the objective appearance of an adverse disposition attributable to information acquired in a prior trial is not an objective appearance of personal bias or prejudice and hence not an objective appearance of improper partiality. wherein a constituent petition for review is pending. Multiple petitions for review pending in a single circuit shall be allotted only a single entry in the drum. This random selection shall be witnessed by the Clerk of the Panel or a designated deputy other than the random selector. Thereafter, an order on behalf of the Panel shall be issued, signed by the random selector and the witness,

(i) consolidating the petitions for review in the court of appeals for the circuit that was randomly selected; and

(ii) designating that circuit as the one in which the record is to be filed pursuant to Rules 16 and 17 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure.

(b) A consolidation of petitions for review shall be effective when the Panel's consolidation order is filed at the offices of the Panel by the Clerk of the Panel.

Rule 25: Service of Panel Consolidation Order

(a) The Clerk of the Panel shall serve the Panel's consolidation order on the affected agency through the individual or individuals, as identified in Rule 23(c) of these Rules, who submitted the notice of multicircuit petitions for review on behalf of the agency.

(b) That individual or individuals, or anyone else designated by the agency, shall promptly serve the Panel's consolidation order on all other parties in all petitions for review included in the Panel's consolidation order, and shall promptly submit a proof of that service to the Clerk of the Panel. Service and proof of that service shall also be governed by Rule 22 of these Rules.

(c) The Clerk of the Panel shall serve the Panel's consolidation order on the clerks of all circuit courts of appeals that were among the candidates for the Panel's random selection.

THE LIMITED POWER OF THE FEDERAL COURTS OF APPEALS TO ORDER A CASE REASSIGNED TO ANOTHER DISTRICT JUDGE*

by

JACK B. WEINSTEIN

Some panels of the federal courts of appeals have recently been ordering that a case on remand be heard by a different district court judge than the one who originally decided the case. This kind of order is a matter of concern because it represents an unjustified arrogation of power by some judges of the court of appeals and is destructive of the proper relationship between the trial and intermediate appellate courts.

I have never been subject to such an order. My interest in the subject is as a Chief Judge concerned with the morale of trial judges and with the important joint work of the federal trial and appellate courts. To satisfactorily administer justice, we should have a sense of mutual respect and understanding among all judges as well as a clear delineation of roles.

The assumption of power by an appeals panel to control judge selection can only add to the burdens placed on the trial courts, while adversely and unnecessarily lowering their morale. The district courts have carefully designed plans for the division of business among their judges, and interference from above gums up the works. Trial courts operate every day, often with one judge hearing several motions and supervising more than one jury at a time. If trial judges are to decide properly, they need the power granted them by statute to organize their own assignments.

One justification relied on by appeals panels ordering reassignment is that this is a power seldom used by the courts of appeals. That excuse hardly answers the argument that the power does not exist.

There are, of course, instances in which recusal by a trial judge is desirable. This result can be obtained on motion at nisi prius, ultimately reviewable on appeal, or by mandamus with notice to the trial judge and the right to be heard.

The situation can also be handled informally by the normal give and take of peers advising each other. As chief judge or colleague I have advised judges to recuse themselves and that advice has always been followed. The chief judge of any Circuit should be aware that his or her views or the views of a panel of the court of appeals can be brought to the attention of the trial judge informally, directly or through the chief judge of the district, when the trial judge may not have seen a difficulty as clearly as the appellate judges. But then the trial judge makes the decision. If he or she refuses to act, our district court Guidelines for the Division of Business among judges provide for involuntary reassignment at the district level. See Guidelines for the Division of Business, United States District Court, Eastern District of New York, revised February 17, 1988 [see Appendix].

* These remarks are from an address to the Alexander Fellows of the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, New York City, given on February 22, 1988.

 Chief Judge, United States District Court, Eastern District of New York. While I take full responsibility for the views expressed in this paper, I should like to acknowledge with thanks the help of my present clerk Jonathan Wiener, and my former clerks Marie O'Connell and Anita Bernstein, who assisted with the research.

Only after a motion to recuse is made by a party at trial and denied, or a mandamus proceeding is brought in the court of appeals, does the appellate court have the power to order transfer of a case, on the ground that the trial court abused its discretion in failing to recuse. The original decision whether to recuse is for the district judge. The system for assigning cases to trial judges is for the district court to administer. Congress delegated that power to the district courts under 28 U.S.C. § 137. There are good policy reasons for that delegation.

I. LOCAL GUIDELINES

Our court has recently revised its guidelines for the division of business among our judges to avoid some of the problems involved in assignment on remand and other assignment choices. Guideline 50.2(l) of the Guidelines for the Division of Business in the Eastern District of New York provides that the case shall stay with the original judge on remand, except that retrials or resentencing in criminal cases are reassigned at random to another judge. In civil remands and criminal remands not requiring retrial or resentencing, the chief judge or the judge to whom the case is assigned, may decide that another judge ought to be assigned instead.

These guidelines were adopted after careful study and much discussion with the trial bar. They reflect a diligent analysis of the problems confronted by the district court. Guideline 50.2(l) of the Guidelines for the Division of Business in the Eastern District of New York now reads as follows:

(l) Appeals—Assignment on Reversal or Remand

(1) In a criminal case upon reversal of a judgment and a direction for retrial or resentence, on receipt of the mandate of the appellate court the clerk shall randomly select a different judge to preside over the case. Notwithstanding this provision the chief judge may order the case assigned to the original presiding judge to avoid placing an excessive burden on another judge.

(2) In a civil case upon reversal the case shall remain assigned to the judge who was previously assigned, unless the chief judge or his designee orders otherwise.

Revised February 17, 1988. [See Appendix p. 286.]

In accordance with present practice, the judge assigned may recuse himself or herself or ask that the chief judge of the district court, or his or her designee, assign the case to another judge. The chief judge may take the initiative to reassign. It is essential that the rule permit the chief judge discretion to avoid such problems as overloading judges and to give temporary relief to a trial judge conducting an extended trial. Reassignment will be made pursuant to a random selection procedure outlined in Guideline 50.2(b).

The guideline is neither predicated upon power granted by, nor inconsistent with, the Federal Rules of Civil or Criminal Procedure. Cf. Fed.R.Crim.P. 57; Fed.R.Civ.P. 83; N.D.Ill.R. 44; S.D.Ind.R. A–8; D.Mass.R. 8(h); D.R.I.R. 7(g); Seventh Circuit Court R. 18. It is adopted pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 137, set out infra.

Generally, the practice in this district has been for a resentencing on remand to be by the same judge who originally sentenced the defendant. Having the judge who is most familiar with the defendant's case (and who in many cases has heard trial testimony) resentence the defendant is usually both the most efficient use of judicial resources and fair for the defendant and the government. Some concern about disparity in sentencing is alleviated in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York because of the practice of having a three-judge panel discuss sentencing recommendations and because of regular and extensive consultation with the Probation Department. This practice has worked well for a number of years.

Nevertheless, after consultation with the bar, the judges decided to experiment with a resentencing change that will normally send the case to a new judge after a remand for resentencing. This new practice will avoid the embarrassment of having some panels of the court of appeals require such transfers on a haphazard basis. Moreover, under the new mandatory sentencing guidelines many factual inquiries may need to be made, requiring, in effect, an extended hearing when resentencing is ordered. The defendant suffers no added risk when the resentencing is before a new judge, because, absent unusual circumstances, the sentence on remand may be no greater than the original sentence, in order to avoid chilling the exercise of the right to appeal. See Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21, 28, 94 S.Ct. 2098, 2102, 40 L.Ed.2d 628 (1974); North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 725–26, 89 S.Ct. 2072, 2080–81, 23 L.Ed.2d 656 (1969); United States v. Whitley, 734 F.2d 994, 996–97 (4th Cir.1984).

II. STATUTORY SCHEME

In considering the power to assign we turn first to the statutory scheme. Section 137 of Title 28 places in the district court, and particularly the Chief Judge of the district, responsibility for division of business among the district judges. It reads:

§ 137. Division of business among district judges

The business of a court having more than one judge shall be divided among the judges as provided by the rules and orders of the court.

The chief judge of the district court shall be responsible for the observance of such rules and orders, and shall divide the business and assign the cases so far as such rules and orders do not otherwise prescribe.

If the district judges in any district are unable to agree upon the adoption of rules or orders for that purpose the judicial council of the circuit shall make the necessary orders.

Judicial councils of the Circuit—not panels of appellate judges—have some administrative supervisory powers. See 28 U.S.C. § 332. But as the revisor's notes to section 137 point out, section 332 does not limit the district court's powers under section 137. The notes to section 137 read:

Section was rewritten and the practice simplified. It provided for division of business and assignment of cases by agreement of judges . . .

The revised section [137] is consistent with section 332 of this title, the last paragraph of which requires the judicial council to make all necessary orders for the effective and expeditious administration of the business of the courts within the circuit.

See Federal Civil Judicial Procedure and Rules 469 (West 1987).

Judicial councils are constituted so as to include both court of appeals and district judges. See 28 U.S.C. § 332(a)(1). It is the council, not individual appellate panels, that may "make all necessary and appropriate orders for the effective and expeditious administration of justice within its circuit." 28 U.S.C. § 332(d)(1). See generally 16 Wright, Miller, Cooper & Gressman, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3939 & n. 27 (1977 & Supp.1987). This supervisory authority extends to both the courts of appeals and district courts. 28 U.S.C. § 332. The judicial council may "abrogate" local rules adopted pursuant to the Federal Rules of Procedure. Fed.R.Civ.P. 83; 16 Wright, Miller, Cooper & Gressman, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3939 n. 27 (Supp.1987). This power of abrogation under Rule 83 does not extend to guidelines for the division of business adopted pursuant to section 137 of Title 28.

The general power of appellate courts to "require further proceedings . . . as may be just" does not encompass the division of business. That appellate power is contained in 28 U.S.C. § 2106, reading:

The Supreme Court or any other court of appellate jurisdiction may affirm, modify, vacate, set aside or reverse any judgment, decree, or order of a court lawfully brought before it for review, and may remand the cause and direct the entry of such appropriate judgment, decree, or order, or require such further proceedings to be had as may be just under the circumstances.

Appropriate proceedings may be ordered, but the statute does not authorize the appellate court to say what judge in a multijudge court shall preside—that issue is covered by section 137.

Where the court of appeals has some power over administrative matters concerning the district courts, the authority is granted by specific statute. See, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 152 (court of appeals appoints bankruptcy judges after consideration of recommendations of judicial council); cf. 18 U.S.C. § 3165 (judicial council approval of district court speedy trial plans); 28 U.S.C. § 1863 (approval of plans for random jury selection); and 28 U.S.C. § 753 (approval of court reporter management plans).

This statutory scheme is better understood in light of the history of the relationship between the federal district and appellate courts. It is to this history that I now turn.

III. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Control over the conduct of individual judges has been a subject of interest since at least as early as Roman times. The Leges Visigothorum, a code of law used in the Roman empire during the seventh century, noted what constituted judicial misconduct: for example, the refusal to hear a case, prejudicial delay, the rendering of a decision contrary to received law, and receiving bribes. Roman law had a quasi-tort cause of action called the actio in indicem qui litem suam facit, permitting a litigant to sue a judge for false judgment. This action was seldom if ever used. It appears that the action would have been brought before a royal court. As a procedural safeguard, the accused judge could escape liability through oath taking, and the aggrieved litigant had to produce witnesses. See generally Hoeflich, Regulation of Judicial Misconduct from Late Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages, 2 Law & Hist. Rev. 79 (1984).

Under English common law, some judges held office during good behavior by patent of the King, and were subject to the control of the King's Bench, a court independent of the monarch from at least the sixteenth century on. Raoul Berger writes:

By virtue of its 'general Superintendency over all inferior Courts,' King's Bench would punish judges of lesser courts by Attachment for Contempt 'for acting unjustly, oppressively, or irregularly,' 'for any practice contrary to the plain rules of natural Justice . . . as for denying a Defendant a Copy of the Declaration against him . . . or for compelling a Defendant to give exorbitant bail' and 'putting the Subject to unnecessary Vexation by colour of a judicial Proceeding wholly unwarranted by Law.' . . . '[T]he Court of King's Bench, by the Plenitude of its Power, exercises a Superintendency over all inferior Courts, and may grant an Attachment against the Judges of such Courts for oppressive, unjust or irregular Practice, contrary to the obvious Rules of Natural Justice.'

Berger, Impeachment of Judges and "Good Behavior" Tenure, 79 Yale L.J. 1475, 1503 n. 142 (1970) (first two ellipses in original) (citations omitted). In addition, it appears that the King's Bench could use its writ of scire facias (a proceeding to declare a forfeiture of the patent, comparable to an order to show cause to repeal a judicial commission) to discipline judges. See id. at 1479–81; see also Ervin, Separation of Powers: Judicial Independence, 35 Law & Contemp.Probs. 108, 110–11 (1970); Biancala, For Want of Justice: Legal Reforms of Henry II, 88 Colum.L.Rev. 433 (1988). Judge Irving Kaufman has maintained that scire facias was only used against administrative officials with life tenure, never against judges. See I. Kaufman, Chilling Judicial Inde- pendence 20–29 (1979). Berger cites in support of his argument the experience of Sir John Walter, whom Charles I asked to surrender his patent in 1628; Walter refused to do so, saying that he was entitled to a scire facias proceeding by judges: "Thus a highly placed judge affirmed that his office could be forfeited for misbehavior in a scire facias proceeding." Berger, supra at 1481. Yet there appears to be no recorded history of a judge removed by judges through scire facias. Schoenbaum, A Historical Look at Judicial Discipline, 54 Chi.-Kent L.Rev. 1, 14 (1977). See generally Shartel, Federal Judges—Appointment, Supervision & Removal—Some Possibilities Under the Constitution, 28 Mich.L.Rev. 485, 723, 870 (Parts 1–3) (1930) (suggesting supervision of district judges by Chief Justice and presiding circuit judges).

In framing the United States Constitution, the members of the Constitutional Convention provided judges with tenure "during good behavior" to ensure their independence from the legislature and the executive. United States Constitution, Art. III, § 1. The drafters of the Constitution rejected many traditional controls over judges, deliberately making no provision for executive removal of the judiciary or for legislative removal by bills of attainder (legislative declaration of a person's guilt), bills of pains and penalties (declarations of guilt where the punishment was less than death), and address (legislative removal for offenses that were less than impeachable). See Cameron, The Inherent Power of a State's Highest Court to Discipline the Judiciary, 54 Chi.-Kent L.Rev. 45, 49 (1977). Debate on a motion made on the floor of the Convention to provide for removal by the President on application of the Senate and House of Representatives (a form of joint address) reveals the framers' intent not to subject judges to extrabranch control except by impeachment. Gouveneur Morris called removal by address a "contradiction in terms" since it would subject judges serving during good behavior to removal without a trial; Edmund J. Randolph "opposed the motion as weakening too much the independence of the Judges." II M. Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 428–29 (rev. ed. 1966). Removal by address was explicitly rejected by the framers, the motion being defeated by a vote of seven to one, with three states absent. See id. at 429. Removal upon "impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," of course, remained. United States Constitution, Art. II, § 4; see id., Art. III, § 1.

I shall refrain from discussing the present plan for disciplining federal judges (which I consider in large part unconstitutional) because it is irrelevant to the present discussion. Responsibility for discipline is placed in the circuit judicial councils and in the United States Judicial Conference, not in the courts of appeals. See 28 U.S.C. § 372(c).

These constitutional choices made by the founding fathers show support for the concept of an independent judiciary in the United States, but they are inconclusive on the nature of that independence. Is an independent judge independent from his fellow judges or only from encroachment by the legislature and executive? Assertions in both directions exist. Because the boundaries of judicial independence have seldom needed clear delineation, the debate has been largely a rhetorical one

See e.g., Rehnquist, Political Battles for Judicial Independence, 50 Wash.L.Rev. 835, 842 (1975) ("the unwritten constitutional law surrounding Article III" supports judicial independence "even at the cost of enduring partisan judges"); Ervin, Separation of Powers: Judicial Independence, 35 Law & Contemp.Probs. 108, 121 (1970) ("judicial independence was ... a sine qua non" to the framers, who intended "that each individual judge would be free from coercion even from his own brethren."); Ziskind, Judicial Tenure in the American Constitution: English and American Precedents, 1969 Sup.Ct.Rev. 135, 153 (1969) (framers' "purpose was to create a truly independent judiciary limited only by the cumbersome process of impeachment"); Otis, A Proposed Tribunal: Is It Constitutional?, 7 U.Kan.Cty.L.Rev. 3 (1938) (impeachment the sole method of control); Note, In Defense of the Constitution's Judicial Impeachment Standard, 86 Mich.L.Rev. 420 (1987) (framers intended that impeachment be sole method, though cumbersome, in order to safeguard judicial independence); Note, Unnecessary and Improper: The Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980, 94 Yale L.J. 1117, 1125 nn. 52 & 53 (1985) (collecting sources; author favors absolute independence); but see Berger, Impeachment of Judges and "Good Behavior" Tenure, 79 Yale L.J. 1475, 1476–77 (1970) (Art. II, § 4's provision of impeachment for conviction of "high crimes and misdemeanors" is narrower than Art. III, § 1's provision of judicial tenure during "good behavior"; therefore Congress may provide for other methods of removing judges whose misbehavior is not impeachable); Shartel, Federal Judges—Appointment, Supervision, and Removal—Some Possibilities under the Constitution, 28 Mich.L.Rev. 870 (1930) (arguing that jurisdiction to discipline judges is not inconsistent with the Constitution).

Although this constitutional debate has not been resolved, the early American common law preserved a version of traditional King's Bench mandamus, an encroachment of judges upon judges. Chief Justice Marshall, the leading American proponent of judicial review, had a strong sense of hierarchy within the judiciary. To Marshall, the superior court must lead the inferior to do what it "determine[s], or at least supposes, to be consonant to right and justice." Ex Parte Crane, 30 U.S. (5 Pet.) 190, 192, 8 L.Ed. 92 (1830). Crane shows none of the hesitancy that arose in later case law, when mandamus began to be thought of as an "extraordinary remedy," a response to "usurpation." Marshall's language differs little from that of Blackstone:

> [I]t is the peculiar business of the court of king's bench to superintend all other inferior tribunals, and therein to enforce the due exercise of those judicial or ministerial powers with which the crown or legislature have invested them; and this, not only by restraining their excesses, but also by quickening their negligence and obviating their denial of justice.

3 W. Blackstone, Commentaries 110, cited in Ex Parte Crane, 30 U.S. at 192.

Much of this constitutional and English history is not helpful in resolving the issue before us because the courts of appeals are a relatively late addition to our federal court structure. They were created by statute and granted limited statutory powers. Even the Supreme Court, which could justly claim to have received all the judicial power of both the King's Bench and Parliament, has been from the outset prudently modest in claiming the inherent power of procedural superintendence over other federal courts. See, e.g., The Federalist No. 81 (A. Hamilton) (distinguishing Supreme Court's judicial power under American system from Parliament's power under British system); J. Goebbel, Jr., I History of the Supreme Court of the United States: Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801, 784–93 (1971) (discussing powers of superintendence); J. Weinstein, Reform of Court Rule–Making Procedures 59, 65–75 (1977) (Supreme Court's rulemaking power exercised pursuant to statutes).

IV. MODERN JUDICIAL SUPERVISION: THE RISE OF COMITY BETWEEN COURTS

A. Creation of the Court of Appeals

Hierarchy in the lower federal courts as we know it is a relatively recent phenomenon. The Judiciary Act of 1789 created two sets of trial courts of original jurisdiction, not a two tiered court system under the Supreme Court. Both district and circuit courts were originally trial courts with extremely limited jurisdiction when compared with the modern district courts. Originally the district courts were specialty courts, hearing admiralty and certain minor civil and criminal cases. Thirteen districts were established, coterminous with the new states, and permanent resident judges were appointed. The three circuit courts exercised original jurisdiction in cases resting on diversity of citizenship. The circuit courts were staffed by Supreme Court justices "riding circuit" sitting with district judges of that circuit.

Additionally, the circuit courts had a limited appellate jurisdiction over district court decisions in admiralty and civil cases. Professors Frankfurter and Landis, in their classic study of the federal judicial system, concluded that > [t]he volume of th[e] [circuit courts'] appellate business with their original jurisdiction [while] not disclosed by available data.... could not have been very considerable if later figures are a dependable guide to the earlier period. The district and circuit courts were in practice two nisi prius courts dealing with different items of litigation.

F. Frankfurter and J. Landis, The Business of the Supreme Court 12–13 & nn. 35–36 (1928). Because federal jurisdiction was so narrow, these courts were able to manage their small caseloads with little centralization.

The expansion of federal court jurisdiction during the nineteenth century strained this court system and led to the authorization of general federal question jurisdiction in 1875. See Act of March 3, 1875, 18 Stat. 470. In 1891, Congress created a court system at the intermediate appellate level to alleviate the burdens on the Supreme Court. See Circuit Court of Appeals Act, Mar. 3, 1891, ch. 517, 26 Stat. 826.

Congress has followed the constitutional scheme of federal jurisdiction, which accords the Supreme Court constitutional status, with inferior courts to be created by Congress as needed. Both district and intermediate appellate courts are similar statutory creations. The federal court system does not preserve, in this relationship, the hierarchical authority of royal or superior courts over courts with more limited charters. In the system of seventeenth century England, lower courts were satellites, regional offices of a superior court. In the United States, the courts of appeals were established after many working years without them; no denigration of the general administrative power of the district courts to control themselves was accomplished by creation of the intermediate federal appellate system.

The need for intermediate appellate review in the federal courts was clear in 1891. With circuit and district courts both maintaining original jurisdiction, the limited right of appeal in most cases led only to the Supreme Court. The legislative history of the Circuit Court of Appeals Act asserted that the proposed bill "destroys the 'judicial despotism' of the present system by creating an intermediate appellate court...." H.R.Rep. No. 942, 50th Cong., 1st Sess. at 4 (1888). An intermediate court "simplifies the whole judicial establishment by modelling the system largely after the systems in the [state courts]." Id. Another goal of the legislation was to "relieve the Supreme Court of very considerable unimportant litigation." Id. at 3.

The structure of the Circuit Court of Appeals Act shows that it was designed to create appellate courts of limited jurisdiction apart from the dual trial court system, thus rearranging the jurisdiction of the lower courts. The bill first divested the existing circuit courts of their appellate jurisdiction. Ch. 517, § 4, 26 Stat. 826, 827. Later it gave the new circuit courts of appeals the power to review final judgments and certain interlocutory orders of the district courts. See ch. 517, § 6, 26 Stat. 826, 828, codified at 28 U.S.C. §§ 1291, 1292. The original jurisdiction of the circuit courts remained until its abolition in 1911, which ended the system of two sets of federal trial courts. See Act of Mar. 3, 1911, 36 Stat. 1087.

The Circuit Court of Appeals Act preserved the power of the federal courts to issue writs in aid of their jurisdiction. Ch. 517, § 12, 26 Stat. 826, 829. The All Writs Act authorizes the modern use of mandamus and prohibition by the courts of appeals. See 28 U.S.C. § 1651. Proper use of this power requires an accurate sense of the boundaries of that jurisdiction: to review errors of law.

Limited authority to control assignment of cases, administrative control of judges, or control over judicial conflict outside the boundaries of the rule of law in a particular case, exists only 1) in the district court sitting as a body, 2) to a limited degree in the judicial council of the circuit as provided by specific statute, 3) to a limited degree in the court of appeals as a body as provided by specific statute, 4) in the Judicial Conference of the United States as provided by statute, and 5) possibly in the Supreme Court as successor to the Court of Kings Bench. It does not exist in an appellate panel which is reviewing a specific case only for specific errors of law in the particular case by a particular federal judge.

B. The Scope of Mandamus

Case law since the creation of the courts of appeals has recognized the evolution of the federal court system from the Blackstone–Marshall hierarchy to a structure with more evenly allocated powers. Mandamus is now an extraordinary writ available to "all courts established by Act of Congress." See All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651 (authority to grant writs only when "necessary or appropriate"). A judge may be controlled by another judge, or panel, only under extraordinary and constrained conditions. In contrast, a judgment, a matter of law, is subject to an appellate court's decision to "affirm, modify, vacate, set aside or reverse." See 28 U.S.C. § 2106.

Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90, 88 S.Ct. 269, 19 L.Ed.2d 305 (1967), illustrates this evolved view of mandamus. In Will the district court had, apparently intentionally, disregarded discovery rules for a criminal case. See 389 U.S. at 100–01, 88 S.Ct. at 276. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court disapproved of the court of appeals' summary issuance of mandamus because the practice was isolated, not a persistent problem; the apparent lapse of the district judge was insufficiently extraordinary. The Court emphasized that mandamus is limited to situations where a judge has intentionally exceeded, or refused to exercise, the authority within his discretion. See 389 U.S. 102–05, 88 S.Ct. at 277–79 (rejecting mandamus where judge has not pursued "a deliberate policy in open defiance of the federal rules").

Will came after what had been the major precedent on mandamus, La Buy v. Howes Leather Co., 352 U.S. 249, 77 S.Ct. 309, 1 L.Ed.2d 290 (1957). There the Supreme Court approved of mandamus against a district judge whose practice it had been to refer antitrust cases to a master, in derogation of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 53(b), which provides that in nonjury cases some "exceptional condition" must require the reference. Issuance of the writ was justified where the orders of reference "amounted to little less than an abdication of the judicial function depriving the parties of a trial before the court on the basic issues involved in the litigation." 352 U.S. at 256, 77 S.Ct. at 313. The Court declared that appellate courts have general supervisory powers to facilitate judicial administration. See 352 U.S. at 259–60, 77 S.Ct. at 315; see also Schlagenhauf v. Holder, 379 U.S. 104, 110–12, 85 S.Ct. 234, 238–39, 13 L.Ed.2d 152 (1964) (court of appeals should have decided all issues raised on mandamus concerning novel question of district court's power under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 35 to order examinations of a defendant).

Will explicitly distinguished La Buy, limiting it to deliberate and persistent breaches of procedure. See Will v. United States, 389 U.S. at 102–05, 88 S.Ct. at 277–79. The four dissenters in La Buy maintained that the majority erroneously read the All Writs Act as conferring on appellate courts a source of independent appellate power; the Will court suggested that there was no such power. See La Buy v. Howes Leather Co., 352 U.S. at 263, 77 S.Ct. at 317 (Brennan, J., dissenting); Will v. United States, 389 U.S. at 98, 88 S.Ct. at 275. It could therefore be argued that Will has overruled the assertion in La Buy "that supervisory control of the District Courts by the Courts of Appeals is necessary to proper er judicial administration in the federal system." 352 U.S. at 259–60, 77 S.Ct. at 315. In a later case, then-Justice Rehnquist, writing for the Court, stated that although the respondent had probably satisfied the standard for review on appeal, it could not meet its burden of showing a "clear and indisputable" right to issuance of the writ of mandamus because the inaction complained of was within the district court's discretion. See Will v. Calvert Fire Insurance Co., 437 U.S. 655, 665–66 & n. 7, 98 S.Ct. 2552, 2558–59 & n. 7, 57 L.Ed.2d 504 (1978).

Courts of appeals have, nevertheless, tended in recent years to use mandamus more freely than Supreme Court precedents have approved, with no interference from the Supreme Court and little objection from academic commentators. See e.g., Fullerton, Exploring the Far Reaches of Mandamus, 49 Brooklyn L.Rev. 1131 (1983); Ward, Can the Federal Courts Keep Order in Their Own House? 1980 Brigham Young L.Rev. 233; Note, Supervisory and Advisory Mandamus Under the All Writs Act, 86 Harv.L.Rev. 595, 598 (1973) (finding endorsement of limited use of "advisory" mandamus in La Buy's "supervisory" mandamus). Supervisory mandamus has been used in a variety of circumstances. See, e.g., In re Virginia Electric & Power Co., 539 F.2d 357 (4th Cir.1976) (mandamus to offer guidance to district judges on when not to recuse under 28 U.S.C. § 455); Sanders v. Russell, 401 F.2d 241 (5th Cir.1968) (writ issued to void local rule on pro hac vice appearances); Rapp v. Van Dusen, 350 F.2d 806 (3d Cir.1965) (disqualifying district judge). As will be pointed out below, there is little warrant for much of this action by appellate panels given the explicit power of the district courts, Circuit Councils and United States Judicial Conference to supervise.

C. Orders of Reassignment on Appeal

While mandamus may lie to correct error in a case of disqualification, the power asserted by some panels of court of appeals judges to reverse a district court decision with an order that the case be assigned to another district judge is without statutory basis. For examples of such assertions of inherent power on appeal, see, e.g., Sobel v. Yeshiva University, 839 F.2d 18 (2d Cir.1988); Outley v. City of New York, 837 F.2d 587 (2d Cir.1988); United States v. Pugliese, 805 F.2d 1117 (2d Cir.1986); United States v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 785 F.2d 777 (9th Cir.), mandamus denied sub nom. In re Real, 479 U.S. 982, 107 S.Ct. 604, 93 L.Ed.2d 604 (1986); United States v. Ritter, 273 F.2d 30 (10th Cir.1959), cert. denied, 362 U.S. 950, 80 S.Ct. 863, 4 L.Ed.2d 869 (1960).

Most recently, the Second Circuit issued four such orders to reassign for sentencing. See United States v. Stratton, 820 F.2d 562 (2d Cir. 1987); United States v. Louis, 814 F.2d 852 (2d Cir.1987); United States v. Pugliese, 805 F.2d 1117 (2d Cir.1986); United States v. Diaz, 797 F.2d 99 (2d Cir.1986). Other precedents exist in that circuit. See United States v. Robin, 545 F.2d 775 (2d Cir.1976), reh'g denied, 553 F.2d 8 (2d Cir.1977) (en banc); United States v. Rosner, 485 F.2d 1213, 1231 (2d Cir.1973), cert. denied, 417 U.S. 950, 94 S.Ct. 3080, 41 L.Ed.2d 672 (1974); United States v. Brown, 470 F.2d 285, 288–89 (2d Cir.1972).

Earlier cases seem to have recognized the lack of power to order reassignment, since circuit panels confined their remarks on reassignment to "recommendations" to the district court on how it should exercise its statutory authority to divide its business. See 28 U.S.C. § 137; United States v. Clark, 475 F.2d 240, 251 (2d Cir.1973) ("a hearing before another member of the court is advisable"); United States v. Brown, 470 F.2d 285, 288–89 (2d Cir.1972) ("we think it best that further proceedings be assigned to a different judge"); United States v. Bryan, 393 F.2d 90, 91 (2d Cir.1968) (assumes trial judge "will act pursuant to our views regarding the preferred practice" of a new trial before another judge); United States v. Mitchell, 354 F.2d 767, 769 (2d Cir.1966) (chief judge, "in the interest of sound judicial administration, would be wise to re-assign the case to another judge for re-trial").

United States v. Yagid, 528 F.2d 962 (2d Cir.1976), demonstrates the dangers that can arise from the interference with normal case assignments at the trial level by an appellate panel. Yagid, one of three defendants jointly tried and convicted, appealed and obtained an order for a new trial because of Jencks Act violations by the prosecution. See United States v. Badalamente, et al., 507 F.2d 12 (2d Cir.1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 911, 95 S.Ct. 1565, 43 L.Ed.2d 776 (1975). The appellate panel, in the course of its opinion declining to rule on Yagid's other claim, stated:

> Because it is possible that at the new trial the district judge who presided at the original trial may be required to testify concerning certain aspects of the suppression, we will not consider Yagid's other claims of reversible error. This is so because on retrial, another district judge should preside and he will not be bound by the rulings of the original trial judge ...

507 F.2d at 15 (emphasis added). On remand, the indictment had to be dismissed without prejudice for failure to retry the defendant within 90 days of his successful appeal. This failure occurred at least in part because of confusion in the district court over how the reassignment of the case should proceed. See United States v. Yagid, 528 F.2d at 963–65. The appellate panel's response was to chide the district court for not reading "should" as "must": "Such suggestions contained in appellate opinions should not be deemed merely precatory because they are not 'ordered,' especially when a retrial is mandated." 528 F.2d at 965 (footnote omitted). In support of this reading the panel cited, inter alia, a case from the previous year in which an appellate panel found it "advisable" that a new suppression hearing be held before another judge although it gave no opinion as to who should preside at the retrial. See Yagid, 528 F.2d at 965 n. 5; United States v. Clark, 475 F.2d 240, 251 (2d Cir.1973).

Courts more recently have used 28 U.S.C. § 2106, a catchall grant of authority to issue orders in aid of jurisdiction, to make reassignment an element of the mandate. This power can be explained and justified in a more principled fashion than the courts have used: Reassignment should be a device of the appellate court that meshes with the district judge's duty of recusal. Self-recusal is impractical in the event of systemic and deliberate repeated errors of law. There the court of appeals need not await action by the district judge, but may proceed by extraordinary writ of mandamus, after notice is given to the district judge. Reassignment to avoid bias, however, is a question that statutorily falls first on the district judge.

D. Statutes Dealing With Recusal in Individual Cases

Both sections 144 and 455 of Title 28, dealing with disqualification, are obviously designed to permit a district judge to pass upon the matter, before his or her decision is reviewed on appeal. Section 144 reads:

> § 144. Bias or prejudice of judge
>
> Whenever a party to any proceeding in a district court makes and files a timely and sufficient affidavit that the judge before whom the matter is pending has a personal bias or prejudice either against him or in favor of any adverse party, such judge shall proceed no further therein, but another judge shall be assigned to hear such proceeding.
>
> The affidavit shall state the facts and the reasons for the belief that bias or prejudice exists, and shall be filed not less than ten days before the beginning of the term at which the proceeding is to be heard, or good cause shall be shown for failure to file it within such time. A party may file only one such affidavit in any case. It shall be accompanied by a certificate of counsel of record stating that it is made in good faith.

And section 455 reads in part:

> § 455. Disqualification of justice, judge, or magistrate

It appears to be a violation of these statutory provisions for the court of appeals to reassign for bias if the district judge has not first passed on the matter. See, e.g. United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31, 131 & n. 287 (D.C.Cir.1976) ("involved judge has the prerogative, if indeed not the duty," to decide bias question), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 933, 97 S.Ct. 2641, 53 L.Ed.2d 250 (1977); Berger v. United States, 255 U.S. 22, 36, 41 S.Ct. 230, 234, 65 L.Ed. 481 (1921) (challenged judge "had a lawful right to pass upon the sufficiency of the affidavit" of bias). Cf. Stempel, Rehnquist, Recusal and Reform, 53 Brooklyn L.Rev. 589, 632–39 (1987).

Where disciplinary action against a judge is required, the judicial council may have power to act under 28 U.S.C. § 372(c) (assuming that this provision is constitutional). The judicial council of the various circuits are subject to detailed rules controlling the exercise of this power. Rule 0.24 of the Second Circuit provided from the outset, for example, that adoption of these disciplinary rules "shall not be construed as indicating any views with respect to the constitutionality of Title 28 U.S.C. § 372(c) or of any action taken thereunder." 16 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3939, Supp. at 237 (Supp. 1987). See also Note, Unnecessary and Improper: The Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980, 94 Yale L.J. 1117, 1124–25 (1985) (questioning authority of judicial council to control district judges); Ervin, Separation of Powers: Judicial Independence, 35 Law & Contemp. Probs. 108 (1970) (discussing original bill).

E. Extraordinary Writ Jurisdiction to Remedy Repeated Errors of Law

The appellate courts' function is to remedy errors of law. Courts without effective appellate review may practice "judicial despotism," as the 50th Congress' report put it. H.R.Rep. No. 942, 50th Cong., 1st Sess. 4 (1888). Not far from the power to review judgments is the power to decide, after repeated misapplication of the law by the district judge, that correction of the error requires reassignment. It is repeated and systematic errors of law that create the appellate grounds for reassignment through extraordinary writs. See, e.g., Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90, 102–05, 88 S.Ct. 269, 277–78, 19 L.Ed.2d 305 (1967).

This practice, predicated upon the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651, requires at least a motion to recuse below, or in the case of mandamus or prohibition, notice to the trial judge. See Fed.R.App. P. 21; see also Rapp v. Van Dusen, 350 F.2d 806, 812 (3rd Cir.1965). The reassignment order in Sobel v. Yeshiva University, 839 F.2d 18 (2nd Cir.1988), and other recent court of appeals cases violate this norm where neither a motion to recuse nor mandamus was utilized.

F. Conflict of Interest or Bias

The distinction between erroneous application of the law and bias parallels the distinction between appeal and mandamus. In the federal courts the question of bias is explicitly left up to the individual judge to decide in the first instance. Review exists because of the obvious danger that an interested judge will conceal or deny his or her bias, but the system requires that each judge first be given the opportunity to determine his or her own capacity. Congress maintained the present system despite a 1961 recommendation from the Judicial Conference of the United States that the trial judge not pass first on the question of recusal. See 13A Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3551 n. 10 (2d ed. 1984).

The recusal statutes instruct the judicial officer on the circumstances which require disqualification. See 28 U.S.C. § 455. A party who believes that the judge has not recused himself when he should have may file an affidavit stating the facts and the reasons for the belief that bias or prejudice exists. See 28 U.S.C. § 144. Both statutes suggest that the question of recusal lies initially in the district court's domain. They do not set forth bias as a ground for appellate review of the judgment; rather, they force the litigant to put the question of bias to the district judge and then appeal. See United States v. Olander, 584 F.2d 876, 883 (9th Cir.1978); United States v. Mitchell, 377 F.Supp. 1312 (D.D.C.1974), aff'd, 559 F.2d 31 (D.C.Cir.1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 933, 97 S.Ct. 2641, 53 L.Ed.2d 250 (1977).

Denial of the motion is not a final order appealable as of right. See 13A Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3553 at 659 (2d ed. 1984). For the court of appeals to have jurisdiction, there must be a judgment to be appealed. Certification for interlocutory appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) is unusual because rarely does a judge's refusal to disqualify raise "a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion." Increasingly the courts of appeals have had recourse to their mandamus power to order the disqualification of a judge who has wrongfully refused to recuse himself if the petitioner has "satisfied the burden of establishing that its right [to the writ] is clear and indisputable." In re IBM Corporation, 618 F.2d 923, 926–27 & n. 3 (2d Cir.1980).

The limited scope of review afforded the court of appeals requires it to decide whether the judge abused his discretion by not recusing himself. See, e.g., Johnson v. Trueblood, 629 F.2d 287, 290 (3d Cir.1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 999, 101 S.Ct. 1704, 68 L.Ed.2d 200 (1981); United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31, 139 & n. 359 (D.C.Cir.1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 933, 97 S.Ct. 2641, 53 L.Ed.2d 250 (1977). On a motion for recusal, the standard for determining "impartiality" is whether it might "reasonably be questioned." 28 U.S.C. § 455(a). One court recently articulated this standard as being "whether an objective, disinterested observer fully informed of the facts underlying the grounds on which recusal was sought would entertain a significant doubt that justice would be done in the case." Pepsico, Inc. v. McMillen, 764 F.2d 458, 460 (7th Cir.1985) (deciding request for mandamus). See also United States v. Carmichael, 726 F.2d 158 (4th Cir.1984); United States v. Nelson, 718 F.2d 315 (9th Cir.1983); In re IBM, 618 F.2d 923, 929 (2d Cir.1980) ("section sets up an objective standard for recusal, creating the so-called 'appearance of justice' rule").

The recusal statutes are not to be abused by parties making motions for tactical reasons which would result in wasted judicial resources. In New York City Housing Development Corporation v. Hart, 796 F.2d 976 (7th Cir.1986), the Seventh Circuit found a district court judge's recusal unwarranted by statute, declared the judge qualified to hear the case and left the question of his reassignment to the case in "the sound discretion of the Executive Committee of the District court." Id. at 981. In Hart, the district court judge had originally denied the disqualification motion because he believed it had been made solely for tactical reasons. 796 F.2d at 978.

Hart emphasizes the importance of not transferring cases from one judge to another without good cause. As the appeals court noted, sanctioning a practice of "ready recusal, coupled with a rule that requires the judge to whom the case is reassigned to revisit all of the rulings after the filing of the motion to disqualify, would multiply the work of judges who already have much to do." 796 F.2d at 981. In United States v. Murray, 762 F.2d 1013 (Table) (6th Cir.1985) (unpublished opinion available on Westlaw), the court of appeals, affirming the denial of a recusal motion which challenged the judge who ruled on the suppression motion on the ground that he had earlier authorized the wiretap, stated: "The frequent recusal of judges in such situations could lead to serious procedural headaches for the federal court system. Such a practice might even encourage an unjust form of judge-shopping." See also In re IBM Corporation, 618 F.2d 923, 934 (2d Cir.1980) (refusing to order disqualification because it "would result in the waste ... [of] the past decade ... of judicial time and energy....").

A busy district court cannot accept unwarranted recusals or changes in judges' assignments; they place extra burdens on the other judges and waste scarce judicial resources. "The district judge is, of course, obligated not to recuse himself without reason just as he is obligated to recuse himself when there is reason." Suson v. Zenith Radio Corporation, 763 F.2d 304, 308–09 n. 2 (7th Cir.1985).

The existence of the recusal statutes indicates why decisions such as United States v. Diaz, 797 F.2d 99 (2d Cir.1986), are inappropriate. In Diaz the trial judge was not asked to recuse himself. On the basis of the trial judge's apparently having written a letter to a senator about the violent-felon sentencing statute, the appellate court ordered reassignment. Reassignment was ordered by the panel without any judgment, erroneous or not, by the district judge on the point of bias. As a result, the trial judge was not given the opportunity of providing the record needed for a proper decision on the issue of bias.

One panel went even further in United States v. Pugliese, 805 F.2d 1117 (2d Cir.1986), in which it held that although the sentencing judge's denial of defendant's motion of recusal was proper, reassignment on resentencing was required since certain of the judge's statements at sentencing concerning the presentence report "call into question [the] sentencing judge's impartiality, and thus cast doubt on the fair and impartial administration of justice...." 805 F.2d at 1124. Apparently the panel applied a lesser and more vague standard to the remand for resentencing before a different judge than it did to the motion for recusal. Recusal was not required because the challenged statement concerned matters that the sentencing judge learned of in his judicial capacity, but resentencing before another judge was ordered by the court of appeals panel, despite the fact that this change was contrary to the then Eastern District practice.

United States v. Robin, 545 F.2d 775 (2d Cir.1976), reh'g denied, 553 F.2d 8 (2d Cir.1977) (en banc), further illustrates the treatment of the recusal statutes on remand. In Robin, the court of appeals, recognizing that "an erroneous impression may have been left as to our reasons for such directions in a few cases," 553 F.2d at 9, set forth "guidelines" for determining when reassignment is desirable. Id. at 11. The principal factors the court of appeals found relevant to reassignment for resentencing in a case where recusal is not required by 28 U.S.C. § 144 are:

> (1) whether the original judge would reasonably be expected upon remand to have substantial difficulty in putting out of his or her mind previously-expressed views or findings determined to be erroneous or based on evidence that must be rejected, (2) whether reassignment is advisable to preserve the appearance of justice, and (3) whether reassignment would entail waste and duplication out of proportion to any gain in preserving the appearance of fairness.

United States v. Robin, 553 F.2d at 10 (2d Cir.1977) (en banc). The judges of the Eastern District of New York have given careful consideration to these suggested "guidelines." Since they can be taken to apply to almost any case of resentencing on remand, the Eastern District's own Guidelines were changed to require resentencing by another judge as the norm. See Guidelines for the Division of Business, Eastern District of New York, Guideline 50.2(l) (revised Feb. 17, 1988).

The suggestion by the court of appeals in Robin that a new judge would be unaware of "previously expressed views or findings" on the "mind" of another judge of the district court strains credulity. Most matters of interest in administering the court are shared. And, of course, all judges read the opinions of the courts of appeals, so they all would be aware of any fact relied upon by the court of appeals as a basis for suggesting reassignment.

The federal system assumes that district judges are capable of understanding and executing a mandate even when they disagree with it. What a judge would "have substantial difficulty in putting out of his or her mind," Robin, 553 F.2d at 10, is a question normally best posed by a litigant, who has a stake in the problem of bias, and can move for recusal. It is better answered in the first instance by the trial judge—the person who knows the limits of his or her own objectivity. The effect on the other judicial business of the court of any transfer from one judge to another can be determined most readily by those responsible for the business of the court, at the trial, not the appellate, level.

Yet several Circuits continue to intrude on the assignment of district judges even in the absence of motions for recusal in the trial court. In United States v. Sears, 785 F.2d 777 (9th Cir.), mandamus denied sub nom. In re Real, 479 U.S. 982, 107 S.Ct. 604, 93 L.Ed.2d 604 (1986), the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit addressed the problem of the recusal statutes and assumed that it had the power to order reassignment without notice to the district judge:

> We are not acting under the disqualification statutes, which a party must first invoke before the district court. Instead, this court is being asked in the first instance to exercise its inherent power to administer the system of appeals and remands by ordering a case reassigned on remand. The basis for the reassignment is not actual bias on the part of the judge, but rather a belief that the healthy administration of the judicial and appellate processes, as well as the appearance of justice, will best be served by such reassignment. We do not believe that the statutory provisions concerning disqualification are either exhaustive or the exclusive method whereby a judge may be removed from hearing a case.

785 F.2d at 780. See also, United States v. Jacobs, 855 F.2d 652 (9th Cir.1988); Brown v. Baden, 815 F.2d 575, 576 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 108 S.Ct. 450, 98 L.Ed.2d 390 (1987); Antron v. Union Pac. R.R. Co., 813 F.2d 917, 921 (9th Cir.1987). Although the Ninth Circuit may have been correct in stating that the recusal statutes are not the only way to disqualify a judge, it has made no adequate argument based on its statutory or historical authority to defend its acting outside those statutes.

Pressing further, the Second Circuit has taken upon itself the occasional role of ordering reassignments even when there is not the slightest evidence of any bias or error by the trial judge. In United States v. Corsentino, 685 F.2d 48 (2d Cir.1982), the appellate court granted a motion to vacate a sentence and ordered resentencing before another judge, although "the need for resentencing was caused entirely by the prosecutor [who violated the plea agreement] and is not attributable to the sentencing judge." 685 F.2d at 52. See also United States v. Chitty, 760 F.2d 425, 432 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 945, 106 S.Ct. 310, 88 L.Ed.2d 287 (1985) (ordering remand to another judge, because of prosecutor's remarks, even "though obviously not the fault of" the judge); United States v. Carbone, 739 F.2d 45 (2d Cir.1984) (rule 35 motion predicated on prosecutor's violation of plea agreement to be heard by another judge).

The trial court is sensitive to the need to reassign some Rule 35 motions for resentencing, depending on their basis. See United States v. Stolon, 561 F.Supp. 63, 64–66 (E.D.N.Y.1983). A rule which would require automatic reassignment of Rule 35 motions does not serve the interests of judicial economy and will often be contrary to the interests of justice. But the decision should be made in the first instance at the trial, not the appellate level. See United States v. Arnett, 628 F.2d 1162, 1165 (9th Cir.1979) ("remand to a new judge is reserved for 'unusual circumstances' "). Cf. Koller v. Richardson–Merrell, 737 F.2d 1038, 1067 (D.C.Cir.1984) (Richey, J., concurring) ("even the suggestion of remanding the case to another judge is inappropriate"), vacated on other grounds, 472 U.S. 424, 105 S.Ct. 2757, 86 L.Ed.2d 340 (1985); Nobel v. Morchesky, 697 F.2d 97, 103 n. 11 (3d Cir.1982) ("mandatory reassignments should be made infrequently and with the greatest reluctance").

The recusal process was created for good reasons. Appellate circumvention of that process can only injure our ability to secure justice. I agree with Judge Richey's ringing conclusion:

> The time has come to implement the mandate of Congress and remand cases to a different judge only on the basis of evidence that would require recusal under 28 U.S.C. §§ 144 and 455. Otherwise, we will be opening a 'Pandora's Box' for countless baseless attacks upon a defenseless judiciary whose independence is essential to the preservation of this republic.

Koller v. Richardson–Merrell, 737 F.2d 1038, 1067 (D.C.Cir.1984) (Richey, J., concurring) (emphasis in original), vacated on other grounds, 472 U.S. 424, 105 S.Ct. 2757, 86 L.Ed.2d 340 (1985). I would add to Judge Richey's remarks that the evidence for recusal must first be presented on motion to the trial judge. In short, absent repeated deliberate errors warranting the issuance of an extraordinary writ, the appellate panels ought never order reassignment on remand without observing the statutory recusal process.

V. CONCLUSION

Peremptory reassignments such as those in United States v. Pugliese, United States v. Diaz, and Sobel v. Yeshiva University, where claims concerning the trial judge's impartiality are made in the first instance in or by the appellate court, distort the statutorily prescribed recusal remedy as well as the All Writs Act. Such reassignment interferes with the docket of the district court where the district judge has neither exceeded his or her authority nor refused to exercise that authority (the standard under Will v. United States), nor demonstrated an inability to execute the appellate mandate (the reasoning of Sears). It is a gratuitous gesture without authority to support it except in recent appellate decisions that themselves lack adequate legal basis. It runs the risk of masking unauthorized "[s]entence review." United States v. Robin, 545 F.2d 775, 782 (2d Cir.1976) (Timbers, J., dissenting), reh'g. denied, 553 F.2d 8 (2d Cir.1977) (en banc). It creates "the potential for havoc ... upon the effective administration of justice in the trial court." Koller v. Richardson–Merrell, 737 F.2d 1038, 1067 (D.C.Cir.1984) (Richey, J., concurring), vacated on other grounds, 472 U.S. 424, 105 S.Ct. 2757, 86 L.Ed.2d 340 (1985).

Despite the court of appeals' lack of authority to issue orders for reassignment, the judges of the district courts have generally followed the advice of the Circuits in these cases in a show of collegiality. The recent revision of Guideline 50.2(l) in the Eastern District of New York should avoid in the future the embarrassment that such unwarranted orders have caused both courts.

We need not consider at this time the limits on the powers of the Circuit judicial councils to order reassignments when the trial judge has received notice that this issue will be pursued on appeal. See, e.g., Chandler v. Judicial Council of the Tenth Circuit, 398 U.S. 74, 90 S.Ct. 1648, 26 L.Ed.2d 100 (1970); Wallace, Judicial Administration in a System of Independents: A Tribe with Only Chiefs, 1978 Brigham Young L. Rev. 39, 47; Note, Unnecessary and Improper: The Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980, 94 Yale L.J. 1117, 1124–25 (1985). The Circuit judicial councils have generally been quite careful and have not attempted to interfere with the assignment of trial judges. Were they to do so, the district judges, I am confident, would resent this attack on their independence. See, e.g., the article by District Judge Frank Battisti, An Independent Judiciary or and Evanescent Dream, 25 Case Western Reserve L.Rev. 711 (1975), decrying the circuit councils' attempts to remove judges outside the impeachment process.

Since the abuses to date have been by only a relatively few judges of the courts of appeals, it is my hope that neither the councils nor individual courts of appeals panels will attempt to flout the present historical and statutory scheme, but, instead, that they will leave the division of business among district courts to the judges of the district courts. For much the same reason that it would be unheard of for the Supreme Court to remand a case to the court of appeals with sua sponte instructions that certain court of appeals judges should not participate in the case, so judges of the courts of appeals should refrain from this practice when remanding to the district courts. One of the great strengths of the federal judicial system has been the strong sense of independent power and responsibility of each federal judge to protect the Constitution and laws of the United States. Any unnecessary erosion of this vital legal resource can only be deprecated and viewed with alarm.

APPENDIX

GUIDELINES FOR THE DIVISION OF BUSINESS UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

ADOPTED PURSUANT TO 28 U.S.C. § 137

50.1 CATEGORIES AND CLASSIFICATION OF CASES; INFORMATION ON CASES AND PARTIES

(a) Categories of cases. Cases shall be divided into the following main categories:

(1) civil

(A) regular

(B) multidistrict litigation

(2) criminal

(3) miscellaneous

(b) Information sheet. The party filing the initial paper in a civil or criminal case shall complete and attach an information sheet. The information sheet shall be placed in the case file.

(c) Disclosure of interested parties. To enable judges and magistrates to evaluate possible disqualification or recusal, counsel for a private (nongovernmental) party shall submit at the time of initial pleading a certificate identifying any corporate parent, subsidiaries, or affiliates of that party.

(d) Long Island cases.

(1) A criminal case shall be designated a "Long Island case" if the crime was allegedly committed wholly or in substantial part in Nassau or Suffolk County.

(2) A civil case shall be designated:

(A) a "Uniondale case" if the cause arose wholly or in substantial part in Nassau County, or all or most of the parties reside in that county; or

(B) a "Hauppauge case" if the cause arose wholly or in substantial part in Suffolk County, or all or most of the parties reside in that county.

(3) As provided in 50.2(f) a party may move to designate a case as a Long Island case, a Uniondale case or a Hauppauge case or to cancel such designation on the grounds that such action will serve the convenience of the parties and witnesses or is otherwise in the interests of justice.

(e) Miscellaneous cases. All matters that do not receive a civil or criminal docket number shall be given a miscellaneous docket number and assigned to the miscellaneous judge. The matter will continue to be assigned to that judge after he or she ceases to be miscellaneous judge.

50.2 ASSIGNMENT OF CASES

(a) Time of assignment. The clerk shall assign a civil case upon the filing of the initial pleading. In a criminal case after an indictment is returned or after an information (including a juvenile information under 18 U.S.C. § 5032) or a motion to transfer under 18 U.S.C. § 5032 has been filed, the United States Attorney shall refer the case to the clerk who shall then assign the case. The United States Attorney shall arrange with the judge to whom the case is assigned, or if that judge is absent or unavailable as provided in 50.5, with the miscellaneous judge, to have the defendant arraigned and a plea entered as promptly as practicable.

(b) Random selection procedure. All cases shall be randomly assigned by the clerk or his designee in public view in one of the clerk's offices in such a manner that each active judge shall receive as nearly as possible the same number of cases, except as provided in paragraph (h). Where a party or his counsel requests prior to selection that he or she be present at the selection, the clerk shall make reasonable efforts to comply with the request. In Brooklyn civil cases a magistrate shall be drawn at the same time and in the same manner as a judge. All Long Island civil cases shall be assigned to the Long Island magistrate. The parties to any Long Island case assigned to a Brooklyn judge may stipulate that the case be assigned to the Long Island magistrate for pretrial purposes.

(c) Assignment of civil cases. There shall be separate Brooklyn, Uniondale and Hauppauge civil assignment wheels. At least quarterly the Chief Judge shall fix the proportion of cases to be assigned to the Long Island courthouses so as to distribute the civil cases relatively equally among all the active judges.

(d) Assignment of criminal cases.

(1) There shall be a Brooklyn criminal and a Long Island criminal assignment wheel.

(2) There shall Brooklyn and Long Island criminal misdemeanor assignment wheels for the random assignment of these matters to a magistrate.

(e) Place of trial. Except in emergencies a case shall be tried at the place to which it has been assigned.

(f) Objection. Any objection by a party to designation of a judge or to place of trial shall be made by letter or motion to the judge assigned

(1) in a criminal case, within ten days from arraignment or from initial notice of appearance, whichever is earlier; or

(2) in a civil case, within the time allowed to respond to the complaint.

(1) The miscellaneous judge shall send all narcotics addict commitment cases involving "eligible individuals" as defined by 28 U.S.C. § 2901(g) to the clerk for assignment as provided in paragraph (b).

APPENDIX—Continued

(2) Pro se applications or claims by persons in custody shall be filed without prepayment of fees upon receipt, prior to decision on their in forma pauperis petitions.

(3) Multidistrict litigation is to be assigned to the judge selected by the multidistrict litigation panel and may not be reassigned except by that panel.

(h) Chief judge; senior judges; temporarily overloaded judges; notice of removal from wheel. The chief judge and each senior judge shall indicate from time to time to the clerk the percentage of a full caseload that he or she elects to have assigned. The chief judge, with the consent of a judge, may remove that judge from any wheel temporarily to reduce the number of pending cases and prevent delay in the disposition of cases by a judge who is then overburdened by cases or due to ill health. The chief judge shall return that judge to the wheel only on consent of the judge. The clerk shall upon request inform any attorney or party of the identity of judges whose names have been removed from a wheel.

(i) Visiting judge. The chief judge shall approve the assignment or transfer of cases to a visiting judge.

(j) Proceedings after assignment. All proceedings in a case after assignment shall be conducted by the assigned judge, except as provided by these guidelines.

(k) Recusal. A judge or magistrate may recuse himself or herself at any time in accordance with U.S.C. § 455. This guideline takes precedence over any other guideline.

(1) In a criminal case upon reversal of a judgment and a direction for retrial or resentence, on receipt of the mandate of the appellate court the clerk shall randomly select a different judge to preside over the case. Notwithstanding this provision the chief judge may order the case assigned to the original presiding judge to avoid placing an excessive burden on another judge.

(2) In a civil case upon reversal the case shall remain assigned to the judge who was previously assigned, unless the chief judge or his designee orders otherwise.

50.3 RELATED CASES; MOTION FOR CONSOLIDATION OF CASES

(a) "Related" case defined. A case is "related" to another for purposes of this guideline when, because of the similarity of facts and legal issues or because the cases arise from the same transactions or events, a substantial saving of judicial resources is likely to result from assigning both cases to the same judge and magistrate.

(b) Civil cases. By way of illustration and not limitation, the following civil cases are "related": when a case (A) relates to property involved in an earlier pending suit, or (B) involves the same factual issue or grows out of the same transaction as does a pending suit, or (C) involves the validity or infringement of a patent already in suit in a prior case.

(c) Criminal cases. Criminal cases are "related" only when (A) a superseding indictment or information is filed, or (B) more than one indictment or information is filed against the same defendant or defendants, or (C) when an application is filed by a person in custody that relates to a prior action. Other cases will be deemed "related" only upon application by a party, upon notice, to the judge presiding over the earlier assigned case. The application will be granted if a substantial saving of judicial resources is likely to result from assigning both cases to the same judge.

(d) Designation of related case. If the party filing a case believes it to be related to a prior case, whether pending or closed, the party shall so indicate on the information sheet, specifying for each such case the title and the docket number, if any. Each attorney in a case has an ongoing duty to advise the clerk in writing upon learning of any facts indicating that his or her case may be related to any other pending case.

(e) Assignment of related case. Related cases shall be assigned by the clerk to the judge to whom was assigned the case with the lowest docket number in the series of cases. The clerk shall advise the judge of such assignment of a "related case."

(f) Case erroneously assigned as related. The designation of cases as related may be corrected sua sponte by the judge to whom they are assigned, by returning to the clerk for reassignment cases erroneously so assigned. The failure to assign related cases appropriately shall be corrected only by agreement of all of the judges to whom the related cases are assigned; if they agree, they may transfer the later-filed cases as provided in paragraph (e), and notify the clerk of that action.

(g) Credit for related case. A related case transferred or assigned to a judge shall be counted as would a newly-filed case regularly assigned. A judge shall be assigned an additional case for each case transferred from him or her under this guideline.

50.4 REASSIGNMENT OF CASES

No case shall be reassigned except in the interest of justice and the efficient disposition of the business of the court. The chief judge may at any time, with the consent of the judges involved, reassign individual cases. Reassignment of cases to accommodate changes in the complement of judges shall be made in accordance with the order of the Board of Judges.

50.5 MISCELLANEOUS JUDGE

(a) Duties and functions. A miscellaneous judge shall be designated for each session of the court to:

(1) hear and determine:

(A) matters requiring immediate action in cases already assigned to any judge of the court, if that judge is unavailable or otherwise unable to hear the matter;

(B) special proceedings which cannot be assigned in the ordinary course, including motions under Fed.R.Crim.Proc. 41 made prior to indictment;

(C) any other proceeding not part of or related to a case, including admissions to the bar and naturalization proceedings;

APPENDIX—Continued

(D) requests to be excused from service on the grand and petit juries; and

(E) all matters relating to proceedings before the grand jury;

(2) impanel the grand jury, receive indictments, and refer criminal cases to the clerk for assignment pursuant to 50.2.

(b) Emergency matters. The miscellaneous judge shall dispose of matters under paragraph (a)(1) only to the extent necessary and shall continue the case before the assigned judge. All applications for emergency action or relief shall disclose any prior application to a judge for the same or related relief and the outcome thereof.

50.6 CALENDARS

(a) Numbers; Order of cases. The docket number of each case shall be the calendar number. No note of issue shall be required to place the case on the calendar. Each judge shall dispose of cases assigned to him or her as required by law and the efficient administration of justice.

(b) Preferences. Each judge shall schedule cases appearing on his or her docket in such order as seems just and appropriate, giving preference to the processing and disposition of the following:

(1) habeas corpus petitions and motions attacking a federal sentence;

(2) proceedings involving recalcitrant witnesses before federal courts or grand juries, under 28 U.S.C. § 1846;

(3) actions for temporary or preliminary injunctive relief; and

(4) any other action if good cause is shown.

(c) Publication of calendars. Each court day the clerk shall post on bulletin boards throughout the courthouse and provide to legal newspapers for publication copies of the judges' calendars.

50.7 CONFERENCES

The judge assigned to any case may direct the attorneys to appear to discuss the case informally, to entertain oral motions, to discuss settlement, or to set a schedule for the events in the case, including completion of discovery, pretrial and trial.

GUIDELINES FOR THE DIVISION OF BUSINESS AMONG UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT JUDGES FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK PURSUANT TO 28 U.S.C. § 137

by

PROFESSOR PETER LUSHING

and

LAWRENCE J. ZWEIFACH, ESQ.

INTRODUCTION

In 1988 the Board of Judges of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 137, adopted Guidelines for the Division of Business among United States District Court Judges. The Guidelines supersede the Court's Rules for the Division of Business among District Judges. The Guidelines were adopted on February 16, 1988, effective March 31, 1988. They were preceded by publication of proposed guidelines and many conferences with members of the bar and bar association committees.

The Guidelines for the Division of Business among United States District Court Judges are in part an outgrowth of the work of the Court's Criminal Procedure Committee, which was appointed by Chief Judge Jack B. Weinstein in the Fall of 1985. Reports of the Criminal Procedure Committee appear at 111 F.R.D. 303 and 311 (1986); these reports were not themselves approved by the Board of Judges and are cited here for informational and historical purposes only. Also part of the history of the Guidelines are letters to Chief Judge Weinstein from the Criminal Procedure Committee (October 8, 1987) and from the Committee on Federal Courts, Association of the Bar of the City of New York (October 6, 1987), commenting on a May 1987 draft of proposed Guidelines, and from the Committee on Federal Courts (January 8, 1987), commenting on the reports of the Criminal Procedure Committee. The Criminal Procedure Committee reports had been well-publicized, appearing not only in Federal Rules Decisions but in the New York Law Journal as well (June 18, 1986; digest published on June 17, page 1). Comments on the reports were received from practitioners, and matters covered by the proposed Guidelines were discussed at retreats of the judges of the court held during the Judicial Conferences of the Second Circuit in 1986 and 1987 and at subsequent meetings of the Board of Judges. In short, the Guidelines are the product of a dialogue among the judges, practitioners, and bar organizations.

This Commentary was prepared by Lawrence J. Zweifach, Esq., Chairman of the Criminal Procedure Committee and Prof. Peter Lushing, the Committee Reporter, with the assistance of Douglas C. Dodge, District Executive of the Court, and has been reviewed by the Chief Judge.

(a) Rule 1 of the Rules for the Division of Business among District Judges (hereinafter "DR") categorized cases as Bankruptcy, Civil, or Criminal. With the restructuring of the bankruptcy court system in 1978, the District Court no longer sees enough original bankruptcy filings to make a separate category necessary. There are also bankruptcy court rules now. The new miscellaneous and multidistrict categories in the Guideline (hereinafter "GL") codifies existing practice.

(b) The first sentence carries over DR 1(b), except that the new category of miscellaneous cases does not require an information sheet, because many miscellaneous cases involve ministerial matters such as filing an abstract of judgment from another court. The new provision that the information sheet shall be filed codifies the existing practice of the clerk's office. The information sheet is of substantial importance, see GL 50.2(f), and the GL's reflect the fact that the sheet must be on file in order to give notice to all parties of case designations. A suggestion that the information sheet be given to defense counsel along with the indictment was rejected as unnecessary.

(c) This paragraph appears in General Civil Rule 9 and is included here as the logical location for requirements affecting the commencement of an action.

(d) Designation of Long Island criminal cases is unchanged from DR 1(c)(1). Long Island civil cases are now subdivided into the locations of the courthouses on Long Island, the Hauppauge Courthouse not being in existence when the DR's were promulgated. The criteria for discretionary designation or cancellation of designation as a Long Island case are unchanged from DR 1(c)(3). A cross-reference to a uniform procedure for objections to case designations is given.

(e) Miscellaneous matters such as non-party motions to quash subpoenas are not categorized as civil or criminal cases and are referred to the miscellaneous judge. To avoid any question on a sensitive topic, the GL makes it clear that a miscellaneous matter follows the judge, not the miscellaneous part.

(a) Unchanged from DR 2(a).

(b) DR 2(b) required the judges to determine the method of random selection of cases and provided other details on the mechanics of assignment. The GL removes some of the formal requirements as unnecessary and provides for the first time that cases shall be assigned in public view in the clerk's office. There was a widespread and deeply held feeling among criminal defense practitioners that assignment of a judge to the case was an important and sensitive step in the litigation and should therefore be performed in public. In fact it was already the practice of the clerk's office to allow counsel to attend the drawing of the judge's name from the assignment drum, but many argued that attorneys unfamiliar with with the practices of the court would not be aware of the opportunity to attend the assignment—hence this restatement of the practice. A recommendation by the Criminal Procedure Committee that the assignment be in open court was rejected as cumbersome and having no additional utility.

It will still be up to the attorney to endeavor to be informed as to when the assignment of the judge takes place. In civil actions the assignment occurs when the complaint is filed, so defendant's eventual counsel will be present at this event only by accident, as it were. But in criminal cases many defendants will have retained counsel or have been assigned the Legal Aid Society prior to indictment, and by dint of counsel's communications with the Assistant United States Attorney and the clerk's office there often can be some assurance that counsel will be aware of the impending filing of the indictment. Counsel will therefore be able to attend the drawing of the judge. This will be mostly in cases where the prosecutor does not intend to have the defendant arrested, for in arrest cases the indictment is usually sealed until the arraignment with the defendant safely in custody, an arrest warrant having been issued when the indictment was handed up to the court in camera. Meanwhile, the judge will have been drawn in secret, and the docket sheet will have been sealed.

In any event this GL should not be construed either as creating any right to be informed of the time of the drawing of the judge or as furnishing any ground for vacating a judgment, vacating an assignment, or any other remedy because of a failure to be informed of the time of the drawing.

The provision on assigning magistrates in Brooklyn civil cases is new and reflects a practice followed for over three years and which was inaugurated through the promulgation of the Standing Orders on Effective Discovery in Civil Cases (Standing Order 4 provides in part that "a magistrate shall be assigned to each case at random on a rotating basis upon the commencement of an action...."). On Long Island there is at present only one magistrate.

(c) Substantially unchanged from DR 2(c). The separate wheels for civil cases reflects the assignment of judges to the several courthouses. Distribution of cases "relatively equally" is a more realistic goal than the terminology of the DR.

(d) DR's did not provide for judge assignment of criminal cases as "Long Island," although that case-designation category did in fact exist. For some time there has been more than one judge assigned to Long Island, but the DR's had not reflected that fact. As there is only one judge in Hauppauge at present, there should only be one criminal assignment wheel for all of Long Island to afford a random selection process for criminal cases, where the bar is most sensitive about judge selection. Proposals to add a category of criminal "complex" cases, or even "short," "medium," and "long" case categories, which were intended to spread the workload evenly among the judges, were rejected as an unnecessary and complicating refinement. Cf. GL 50.2(h).

(e) DR 2(c) gave the assigned judge discretion to designate the place of trial. The existence of such discretion is contrary to the purpose of geographical case designations and assignment wheels, as well as to the rationale for a proposed change in jury wheels under which Brooklyn courthouse jurors will come only from non-Long Island counties. The GL provides an exception only for emergencies, and even those exceptions may be challenged under paragraph (f).

(f) DR's regulated objections to designations and assignments in various places; e.g., DR's 1(c), 2(c), 4(b). The GL provides a single format for objection and sets short time limits, precisely measurable, for the making of objections so that the issue can be resolved before substantial expenditure of judicial energy. This provision includes objections to the designation of cases as related or to failure to so designate under 50.3.

(g) Paragraphs (1) and (2) substantially restate DR 2(d)(1) and (2) The subject matter of DR 2(d)(3) is treated in GL 50.2(l). Paragraph (3) of the GL is in accord with the Manual for Complex Litigation, Second, § 31.121, at 253 (1985).

(h) The first sentence substantially restates DR 2(f). The provisions on removal and restoration of judges to a wheel serve to regularize those practices. The last sentence affords any practitioner before the court equal access to information that often is available only to institutional litigants who are constantly in attendance at the courthouse, such as the United States Attorney and the Legal Aid Society. Many attorneys believe that the status of judges in the wheels is important and unnecessarily recondite and, as "hidden information," could be used to manipulate the assignment of judges by influencing the chosen designation of a case; the GL is intended to assuage these anxieties. A proposal to publish the status of judges in the assignment wheels in the New York Law Journal was rejected as useless, given the time lag between the change of status and the eventual publication.

(i) This regularizes and restates existing practice.

(j) This is a restatement of DR 2(g).

(k) This paragraph simply alerts the practitioner to the overriding statute. See also 28 U.S.C. § 144 (recusal on motion).

(l) DR 2(d)(3) provided for reassignment of civil and criminal cases sent back by an appellate court for retrial, unless the mandate of the appellate court directed otherwise. In fact the practice under the DR was to reassign mechanically only criminal cases, and only those to be retried. The GL draws a distinction between remand in civil and criminal cases, and provides for reassignment of civil cases on remand only in the discretion of the chief judge. Knowledge that a case would be retried by the same judge is believed to have a possible inhibiting effect on vigorous appellate advocacy. In civil litigation however this danger is thought to be outweighed by considerations of judicial economy, civil litigation often having a plethora of complex rulings and information.

In contrast, as to criminal cases the GL mandates reassignment for retrial or resentence but grants the chief judge discretion to assign the case to the original judge in the interest of substantial administrative savings. For example, if a new judge assigned to resentence were compelled to read a record of a multi-month trial, there might be good grounds for the chief judge to order assignment to the original judge.

The court considered the possibility of explicitly providing that upon stipulation of the parties a criminal case would be sent back to the original judge for retrial after reversal. It omitted such a provision in order not to put pressure on the parties to so stipulate. Upon agreement of the parties and the judge involved this result is not precluded by the Guidelines.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has from time to time directed that a new judge hear a matter, but the source of the court's power to do this in the absence of a recusal issue's being first raised in the court below is unstated and seems dubious. Recent examples include Sobel v. Yeshiva University, 839 F.2d 18 (1988); Outley v. City of New York, 837 F.2d 587 (1988); United States v. Pugliese, 805 F.2d 1117 (1986); and United States v. Diaz, 797 F.2d 99 (1986).

No statute authorizes an appellate court to order reassignment for bias as an original matter. 28 U.S.C. § 2106 arguably authorizes an appellate order of reassignment to correct repeated errors of law, but even then only upon notice to the district judge that a petition for mandamus is being filed. The recusal for bias statutes, 28 U.S.C. §§ 144 and 455, seemingly contemplate that the district judge pass upon the issue in the first instance. And even here the scope of appellate review is apparently limited to abuse of discretion.

It is extraordinarily wasteful for a case to be unnecessarily reassigned after remand from an appellate court. This will be especially so under the new sentencing guidelines, which will require many factual inquiries.

Channeling the bias issue before the district court in the first instance affords the judge an opportunity to make a record on the matter. Such channeling further confines the issue to the statutory criterion for bias under §§ 144 and 455 and avoids the use of vague ad hoc standards. See United States v. Pugliese, supra, where denial of a recusal motion was upheld and yet a necessary resentencing was ordered reassigned to a different judge, apparently under a broader standard than provided by the recusal statutes.

The judges of the Eastern District of New York are mindful of the criteria for reassignment set down in United States v. Robin, 553 F.2d 8, 10 (2nd Cir.1977) (per curiam en banc). But it is also the case that any of the judges of the court will be aware of the appellate court's opinion and thus know of the facts that are not to be considered on resentence—and which the original sentencing judge was apparently deemed by the appellate court to be unable to disregard on resentence. A judge is in the best position to know whether he or she can disregard certain facts, and so the question of recusal can properly be left to that judge in the first instance.

The GL therefore effects a sensible compromise between the need for reassignment and the administrative needs of the court. Reassignment in the indicated cases shall be the rule, subject to administrative exception by the chief judge, which exception will itself be subject to overruling by the presiding judge in cases of felt bias.

(a) DR 3(a) defined "related" in general discretionary terms to be applied in the first instance by the party filing the case and furnished illustrative examples. This paragraph retains the general definition, but a party acting on its own can apply the definition to civil cases only; see paragraphs (b) and (c).

(b) These examples come from DR 3(a)(1).

(c) DR 3(a)(2) furnishes examples (A) and (B) as illustrative and not by way of limitation. The GL examples are exclusive unless the court grants an application under the discretionary standard. There was some opposition from the bar to retaining the discretionary standard as overly elastic and inviting judge-shopping. However the proposed GL permitted the prosecutor filing the indictment to designate unilaterally the case as "related" under the discretionary criteria; under the GL as promulgated the prosecutor must instead make an application to the judge presiding over the earlier assigned case. The bar was also concerned with counsel's having to oppose the designation before the very judge who might preside over the case, but the Board of Judges felt that that judge was in the best position to apply the standard, as he or she would know the particulars of the "related" case and therefore whether there would be a substantial saving of judicial resources by approving the designation.

(d) The first sentence substantially restates the first sentence of DR 3(b). The second sentence of DR 3(b) is omitted as having little or no application. The second sentence of the paragraph derives from DR 3(f).

(e) This paragraph derives from DR 4(c). The last sentence of DR 4(c) is omitted as redundant to 50.3(b)(B).

(f) This paragraph deals with sua sponte challenges to relating or failing to relate cases and substantially restates DR 4(d). Party challenges to unilateral relating or failing to relate cases must be made in accordance with GL 50.2(f).

(g) This paragraph derives from DR 4(e).

This is a substantial restatement of DR 4(a). The proposed GL granted unlimited discretion to reassign; this raised some concern among the bar so the DR criteria were restored.

50.5

Paragraphs (a) and (b) restate DR 5 (a) and (b); the subject of DR 5(c) is covered by the second sentence of GL 50.5(b). A highly controversial proposal to add an arraignment function to the miscellaneous part was rejected. See the Criminal Procedure Committee Report on the Assignment of Cases to Judges, 111 F.R.D. 307 (1986); Rakoff, Business Crime, N.Y.L.J., May 14, 1987, p. 1, col. 1.

50.6

Paragraphs (a) and (b) restate DR 6(a) and (b). Paragraph (c) is new and restates existing practice. DR 6(d), (e), and (f) are omitted.

This is a restatement of DR 7.

INTRODUCTION

An impartial judiciary is an essential element of the system of justice in the United States. The right to a "neutral and detached judge" in all proceedings is protected by the Constitution.[1] In addition, an impartial judiciary is essential to maintain public confidence in the integrity of the judicial system.[2] Throughout the history of our national government, Congress has sought to secure the impartiality of trial judges by requiring judges to disqualify themselves in various circumstances.[3]

Congress revised the federal disqualification law in 1974, and instituted an objective standard for disqualification in place of a subjective standard.[4] As stated in 28 U.S.C. § 455(a), the objective disqualification requirement mandates disqualification when a reasonable person would question a judge's impartiality.[5]

Since the objective standard was adopted, however, judicial interpretation of section 455(a) has narrowed the broad scope Congress intended for disqualification law.[6] Federal courts have limited the scope of the current statutory provisions by requiring a high standard of proof of bias[7] and by applying judicially-created rules restricting the circumstances in which bias can be found.[8] In addition, the procedures for disqualification cast into doubt the objectivity of disqualification decisions.[9] The procedures allow the challenged judge to make the disqualification decision. If a judge refuses to disqualify himself, review is not always immediately available and appellate courts tend to defer to the initial judgment of the district court.[10]

In addition, federal law disqualifies judges in circumstances where a reasonable person would question a judge's impartiality, 28 U.S.C. § 455(a), and specifically disqualifies a judge for bias or prejudice. 28 U.S.C. §§ 144 & 455(b)(1); see infra note 35 for the text of § 144, and infra note 12 for the text of § 455.

This comment will review current standards and procedures required by statute and applied to judicial disqualification by the courts. It will assess the extent to which current interpretations conform to the objective standard set forth in section 455(a) and explore ways in which disqualification decisions may be made on a more objective basis.

I. Statutory Provisions for Disqualification

Two provisions of federal law furnish the means for disqualifying district court judges.[11] The paramount disqualification statute is 28 U.S.C. § 455.[12] Section 455(a) sets forth a general provision mandating disqualification whenever a reasonable person would question a judge's impartiality.[13]

Section 455(b) requires disqualification in several specified circumstances.[14] A judge is disqualified if he or she has a financial interest in a case,[15] defined by the statute as "ownership of a legal or equitable interest, however small, or a relationship as director, adviser, or other active participant in the affairs of a party."[16] Section 455(b) also mandates disqualification if the persons involved in the litigation are related to the judge "within the third degree of [blood] relationship."[17] The statute also provides for disqualification if the judge has a professional relationship with a party, including representation of a party by the judge or by a member of the judge's former firm.[18] Judges who have been in government employment must disqualify themselves from proceedings in which they had a role and from cases about which they have expressed an opinion on

10. See infra notes 51-88 and accompanying text for a discussion of the availability and standards of review on appeal.

11. 28 U.S.C. §§ 144, 455 (1982). Appellate courts as well as district courts are subject to § 455, while § 144 applies only to district courts. The only other federal disqualification statute applies to appellate courts and provides that "[n]o judge shall hear or determine an appeal from the decision of a case or issue tried by him." 28 U.S.C. § 47 (1982).

12. 28 U.S.C. § 455 (1982) states:

(a) Any justice, judge, or magistrate of the United States shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned.

(b) He shall also disqualify himself in the following circumstances:

(1) Where he has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding;

(2) Where in private practice he served as lawyer in the matter in controversy, or a lawyer with whom he previously practiced law served during such association as a lawyer concerning the matter, or the judge or such lawyer has been a material witness concerning it;

(3) Where he has served in governmental employment and in such capacity participated as counsel, adviser or material witness concerning the proceeding or expressed an opinion concerning the merits of the particular case in controversy;

(4) He knows that he, individually or as a fiduciary, or his spouse or minor child residing in his household, has a financial interest in the subject matter in controversy or in a party to the proceeding, or any other interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding;

(5) He or his spouse, or a person within the third degree of relationship to either of them, or the spouse of such a person:

(i) Is a party to the proceeding, or an officer , director, or trustee of a party;

(ii) Is acting as a lawyer in the proceeding;

(iii) Is known by the judge to have an interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding;

(iv) Is to the judge's knowledge likely to be a material witness in the proceeding.

(c) A judge should inform himself about his personal and fiduciary financial interests, and make a reasonable effort to inform himself about the personal financial interest of his spouse and minor children residing in his household.

(d) For the purposes of this section the following words or phrases shall have the meaning indicated:

(1) "proceeding" includes pretrial, trial, appellate review, or other stages of litigation;

(2) the degree of relationship is calculated according to the civil law system;

(3) "fiduciary" includes such relationships as executor, administrator, trustee, and guardian;

(4) "financial interest" means ownership of a legal or equitable interest, however small, or a relationship as director, adviser, or other active participant in the affairs of a party, except that:

(i) Ownership in a mutual or common investment fund that holds securities is not a "financial interest" in such securities unless the judge participates in the management of the fund;

(ii) An office in an educational, religious, charitable, fraternal, or civil organization is not a "financial interest" in securities held by the organization;

(iii) The proprietary interest of a policyholder in a mutual insurance company, of a depositor in a mutual savings association, or a similar proprietary interest, is a "financial interest" in the organization only if the outcome of the proceeding could substantially affect the value of the interest;

(iv) Ownership of government securities is a "financial interest" in the issuer only if the outcome of the proceeding could substantially affect the value of the securities.

(e) No justice, judge, or magistrate shall accept from the parties to the proceeding a waiver of any ground for disqualification enumerated in subsection (b). Where the ground for disqualification arises only under subsection (a), waiver may be accepted provided it is preceded by a full disclosure on the record of the basis for disqualification.

the merits.[19] Section 455(b) also requires disqualification when a judge has "a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding."[20]

Parties cannot waive their right to disqualification when it is based on one of the grounds specified in section 455(b).[21] When the disqualification is based on section 455(a), however, waiver is permitted upon full disclosure of the basis for disqualification.[22]

Section 455 places responsibility for disqualification on the judge.[23] This action can be taken sua sponte.[24] Courts also permit disqualification to be prompted by a party either by motion or on appeal.[25]

Section 455 was significantly revised in 1974.[26] A major concern of Congress was to eliminate the subjective opinion of the judge as the basis for determining disqualification.[27] The superseded version of section 455 required

Waiver is not permitted under the general provision that disqualifies the judge whose impartiality is reasonably questioned. Id. The ABA's rule was based on the premise that parties should not be permitted to waive a provision designed to promote public confidence in the judiciary. Senate Hearing, supra note 2, at 109 (Professor Thode, Reporter of the ABA's Special Committee on Standards for Judicial Conduct). The ABA allowed waiver where public confidence in the judiciary would not be affected, and safeguarded the parties by requiring that the waiver be made in writing, rather than orally in the presence of the judge. Id. The Senate framers, on the other hand, rejected any waiver of disqualification based on § 455(b) grounds, but allowed waiver of § 455(a) disqualification on the rationale that a judge should be permitted to discuss with the attorneys involved in a case whether the objective standard required disqualification. Id. at 112 (Mr. Westphal, chief counsel to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary).

27. Senate Hearing, supra note 2, at 74 (statement of Senator Burdick); House Report, supra note 4, at 6355. The revisions were also motivated, in part, by a perceived need for clarification of standards that arose from the confirmation hearings for Judge Haynsworth, a Nixon nominee to the Supreme Court who was rejected by the Senate. Senate Hearing, supra note 2, at 10, 25 (statements of Senators Burdick, Bayh, and Hollings).

Congress also acted to coordinate federal law with revisions in the Canon of Judicial Conduct being developed by the American Bar Association. A tentative draft of the proposed ABA revisions was circulated two months prior to the first Senate hearings on the revisions to § 455, and the bill was delayed until the ABA completed its process of revision. Senate Hearing, supra note 2, at 2, 74, 78-79 (statements of Senator Burdick and Judge Traynor). The bill's sponsors wanted to minimize discrepancies between federal disqualification law and ABA standards. Id. at 74 (Senator Burdick).

The bill's sponsors were also motivated by their perception of heightened public standards of impartiality, id. at 10 (statement of Senator Bayh), and noted that the increased number of federal disqualification if, "in his opinion," it was improper for a judge to sit during the proceedings.[28] Congress replaced this subjective standard with an objective standard that obliges judges to disqualify themselves when their impartiality "might reasonably be questioned."[29] In instituting this objective standard, Congress stressed that it was doing away with the "duty to sit" rule, requiring that a judge should stay with the case when in doubt about disqualification.[30]

The general disqualification standard set forth in section 455(a) cannot be understood without analysis of two other disqualification provisions—section 455(b)(1) and 28 U.S.C. § 144, both of which disqualify a judge for personal bias and prejudice.[31] A party moving for disqualification under section 455(a) frequently seeks disqualification under both sections 455(b)(1) and 144 as well.[32] Furthermore, interpretation of section 455(a) has been shaped by judicial interpretation of section 144, which predated the revised general disqualification judges gave them the freedom to require stricter standards. Id. at 26 (statement of Senator Hollings).

28. The superseded statute read in full:

> Any justice or judge of the United States shall disqualify himself in any case in which he was a substantial interest, has been of counsel, is a material witness, or is so related to or connected with any party or his attorney as to render it improper, in his opinion, for him to sit on the trial, appeal, or other proceeding therein.

30. Senate Hearing, supra note 2, at 2, 74 (Senator Burdick); House Report, supra note 4, at 6255. The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee described the "duty to sit" rule as a rule that clouded a judge's judgment on disqualification. Senate Hearing, supra note 2, at 74 (Senator Burdick). The House, however, added the caution that elimination of this rule "should not be used by judges to avoid sitting on difficult or controversial cases." House Report, supra note 4, at 6355; see also New York City Hous. Dev. Corp. v. Hart, 796 F.2d 976, 980 (7th Cir. 1986) (judge disqualified himself unnecessarily when his holdings did not constitute § 455(b)(4) financial interest). 31. See supra note 12 for the text of § 455(b)(1); see infra note 35 for the text of § 144.

32. Courts have determined that a motion for disqualification under one of the sections—455(a), 455(b)(1), or 144—requires the consideration of disqualification under the other sections as well. See Roberts v. Bailar, 625 F.2d 125, 128 (6th Cir. 1980) (judge has duty to consider disqualification under § 455 when § 144 affidavit does not require disqualification); United States v. Sibla, 624 F.2d 864, 868 (9th Cir. 1980) (judge who declines to grant recusal under § 455 must still consider sufficiency of affidavit under § 144).

Courts have coordinated the statutes procedurally by charting various paths that reach, if necessary, all three provisions. One approach is to begin by evaluating the affidavit under § 144 and to proceed to assessment of the situation under § 455 only if the affidavit is untimely or insufficient. See United States v. Balistrieri, 779 F.2d 1191, 1202 (7th Cir. 1985) (after determining § 144 affidavit legally insufficient, court considered disqualification under § 455(b)(1)), cert. denied, 106 S. Ct. 3284 (1986); Bailar, 625 F.2d at 128 (judge disqualified under § 455(a) although § 144 affidavit was technically insufficient); Sibla, 624 F.2d at 868 (finding that § 144 affidavit is legally insufficient triggers duty to evaluate circumstances under § 455).

Alternatively, judges may begin with § 455(a) and evaluate the § 144 affidavit only if they do not disqualify themselves under § 455. See Sibla, 624 F.2d at 868 (judge who declines to grant recusal under § 455 must still consider the sufficiency of the affidavit under § 144). A judge beginning at § 455(a) would need to consider § 144 only if the allegations of bias where false and thus would not lead a reasonable person to question the judge's impartiality.

Section 144, first enacted in 1911,[34] focuses exclusively on bias and prejudice as grounds for disqualification.[35] It authorizes a litigant with the power to disqualify a district court judge by means of a "timely and sufficient affidavit" alleging "personal bias or prejudice" for or against a party.[36] The key to disqualification under section 144 is the sufficiency of the affidavit. As long as procedural rules regarding the form and timing of the affidavit are met,[37] the filing of a legally sufficient affidavit compels a judge to transfer the case to another district court judge.[38]

As the Supreme Court determined in Berger v. United States,[39] the challenged judge must take the initial step of evaluating the sufficiency of the affidavit, and may not automatically transfer the case when an affidavit is filed.[40] Thus, section 144 does not provide for peremptory challenge of the judge.[41] Instead, a judge is required to evaluate the legal sufficiency, but not the truth, of 35. 28 U.S.C. § 144 (1982) provides:

> Whenever a party to any proceeding in a district court makes and files a timely and sufficient affidavit that the judge before whom the matter is pending has a personal bias or prejudice either against him or in favor of any adverse party, such judge shall proceed no further therein, but another judge shall be assigned to hear such proceeding.
>
> The affidavit shall state the facts and the reasons for the belief that bias or prejudice exists, and shall be filed not less than ten days before the beginning of the term at which the proceeding is to be heard, or good cause shall be shown for failure to file it within such time. A party may file only one such affidavit in any case. It shall be accompanied by a certificate of counsel of record stating that it is made in good faith.

37. A § 144 affidavit must "state the facts and reasons for the belief that bias or prejudice exists," 28 U.S.C. § 144, and must be signed. See Roberts v. Bailar, 625 F.2d 125, 128 (6th Cir. 1980) (court need not consider § 144 motion where party had not signed affidavit). A court may consider only one affidavit filed pursuant to § 144. See United States v. Merkt, 794 F.2d 950, 961 (5th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 107 S. Ct. 1603 (1987); United States v. Section 144's timeliness provision has been interpreted to require filing of the motion within a reasonable time of discovery of the bias. See United States v. Gigax, 605 F.2d 507, 511 (10th Cir. 1979) (file § 144 motion promptly after facts become known); Smith v. 41. Until the Supreme Court decided Berger, it was possible to interpret § 144 as providing a peremptory challenge. The chief sponsor of the bill indicated that it would function as a form of peremptory challenge of judges, 46 Cong. Rec. 2627 (1911) (statements of Rep. Cullop), and the wording of the original provision would have permitted it to be so used. Prior to amendment in 1948, the word "sufficient" did not appear as a modifier of "affidavit." the allegations.[42] Standards for determining legal sufficiency have developed in case law, interpretating the meaning of "personal" bias or prejudice.[43]

Section 455(b)(1) echoes the personal prejudice language of section 144, disqualifying where a judge "has a personal bias or prejudice" concerning a party.[44] The vagueness of language in this provision contrasts sharply with the other sections of 455(b), in which Congress spelled out in detail the amount and type of financial interest, and the degree of relationship to a participant or prior involvement in a case that necessitates disqualification.[45] Section 455(b)(1) uses undefined terms and provides no concrete guidelines for determining bias or prejudice.[46] This vagueness reflects the difficulties inherent in providing standards for disqualification on grounds of bias or prejudice. Such standards are hard to state; when concrete phrases are substituted for a vague statement of objectives, they are subject to the criticism of being underinclusive.[47]

Both Congress and the American Bar Association ("ABA") encountered this difficulty in their attempts to frame the bias and prejudice provisions of their respective codes. One of the earlier drafts of the Senate bill required disqualification when a judge "has a fixed belief concerning the merits of the matter in controversy or personal knowledge of material facts."[48] This language was later replaced with the language of section 455(b)(1), requiring disqualification where a judge "has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceedings."[49] The change followed the alterations made in the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct. The "fixed belief" language in the first ABA draft was abandoned in response to criticism that it would predispose judges to disqualification for having an understanding of the law and a commitment to uphold it.[50] The final draft of the Senate bill, like the final ABA draft, returned to the "personal bias or prejudice" language

United States, describing it as "a bent of mind that may prevent or impede impartiality of judgment." 255 U.S. at 33-34. In case law, positive definitions tend to be fact-specific. For example, in Mims v. Shapp, 541 F.2d 415 (3d Cir. 1976), a prisoners' rights suit in which the judge was accused of bias toward state prisoners, the court defined personal bias "as an attitude toward petitioner that is significantly different from and more particularized than the normal, general feelings of society at large against convicted wrongdoers." Id. at 417.

of section 144,[51] and thus premitted courts to apply the judicial gloss built up over the years on section 144 to section 455.[52]

II. Applying the Disqualification Statutes

Application of section 455(a),[53] the general federal disqualification statute, has been shaped in part by courts' concern to balance the advantages of disqualification with countervailing judicial interests.[54] On the one hand, disqualification of judges whenever reasonable doubt arises concerning their impartiality promotes public confidence in the judiciary. Conversely, disqualification may diminish the efficiency of the judicial system.[55] Transferring a case always creates some administrative costs, and when disqualification occurs in a complex case some time after the case has commenced in the court, the burden may be substantial.[56] Although courts may be tempted to give significant weight to efficiency, Congress' elimination of the duty to sit rule indicates that the goal of impartiality should be paramount whenever there are reasonable grounds for disqualification.[57] Congress and the courts also face the concern that litigants will manipulate disqualification to their advantage or to the disadvantage of their opponents by judge-shopping or by causing costly delays.[58]

51. See supra note 35 for the text of § 144. The ABA commentator indicated that despite the change in language, "[i]t was intended that a judge disqualify himself if he had made up his mind on the merits before he heard the case." Senate Hearing, supra note 2, at 93 (Professor Thode).

This case has attracted critical comment as an example of the high burden imposed by the expansive definition of financial interest in § 455(b)(4) and the impossibility of waiver under § 455(e) for § 455(b) cases. See Bloom, supra note 55, at 702-05 (disqualification for de minimis financial interest without possibility of waiver disrupts litigation and wastes judicial resources); Note, Bias and Interest: Should They Lead to Dissimilar Results in Judicial Qualification Practice?, 27 Ariz. Concern for judge-shopping is evident in the House Report which stated: "Nothing in this proposed legislation should be read to warrant the transformation of a litigant's fear that a judge may decide a question against him into a 'reasonable fear' that the judge will not be impartial. Litigants ought not have to face a judge where there is a reasonable question of impartiality, but they are not entitled to judges of their own choice." House Report, supra note 4, at 6355. See also In re International Business Machs. Courts have had the opportunity to shape disqualification standards under section 455(a) through their interpretation of the law in two areas of inquiry. One question facing the courts concerns what constitutes reasonable grounds for disqualification. The substantive requirements for disqualification which have been developed through this inquiry will be discussed in section B below.[59] Another question facing the courts is whether, and to what extent, the appearance of bias justifies disqualification. Is it appropriate to disqualify a judge on the appearance of bias or is it, at least in some cases, necessary to establish bias in fact? The interpretations offered in each of these areas determine the reach of federal disqualification, its availability in particular cases, and the appealability of the denial of disqualification.

A. Assessing Bias: Standards of Proof

The question whether disqualification should rest on the appearance or the fact of bias arises because the two objectives of disqualification law—promoting confidence in the judiciary and providing a fair trial to litigants—differ in focus. Protection of individual rights requires disqualification of judges who will not consider particular cases with impartiality. Protecting and promoting public confidence in the judiciary, in contrast, depends not only on actual fairness in particular cases but also on the appearance of fairness.[60] Disqualification based on the appearance of bias may be required to promote public confidence when, in fact, no actual partiality exists.[61]

In many circumstances where federal law requires disqualification, concerns for judicial appearance and individual fairness are both present. But some circumstances may involve only one of these objectives. On the one hand, fairness may require disqualification in situations where there is no appearance of partiality and the need for disqualification is not known to anyone but the judge.[62] Public appearances, on the other hand, may require assigning another judge even in cases where litigants are confident they would be treated fairly by the disqualified judge.[63]

59. See supra notes 109-94 and accompanying text for a discussion of the judicial development of substantive grounds for disqualification under § 455(a).

60. See Note, Disqualification of Judges and Justices in the Federal Courts, 86 Harv. L. Rev. 736, 746-47 (1973) (concern for appearances necessary because judicial authority rests ultimately on public acceptance of judicial decisionmaking).

61. See Hall v. Small Business Admin., 695 F.2d 175, 178-79 (5th Cir. 1983) (to satisfy appearance of impartiality test of § 455(a), disqualification must be based on reasonable conclusion from objectively ascertainable facts, not on subjective assessment of judge's state of mind).

62. The language of 28 U.S.C. § 455 (1982), which gives judges the responsibility to disqualify themselves in several specified circumstances, provides for disqualification where no one but the judge knows the reason. Disqualification of this sort is generally not documented by written opinion. An instance of this use of § 455 may be seen in United States v. Merkt, 794 F.2d 950, 960 (5th Cir. 1986) (judge's unexplained voluntary recusal in prior case involving defendant is not sufficient grounds for disqualification in subsequent case involving defendant), cert. denied, 107 S. Ct. 1603 (1987).

63. See supra notes 21-22 and accompanying text for a discussion of waiver requirements in § 455(e), prohibiting waiver where disqualification is based on § 455(b).

Analysis of the language of the disqualification statutes suggests that both 28 U.S.C. §§ 144 and 455(b)(1) can be interpreted as requiring bias in fact.[64] Section 144 requires that the affidavit state facts sufficient to establish bias.[65] Section 455(b)(1) states that a judge "shall . . . disqualify himself . . . [w]here he has a personal bias or prejudice. . . ."[66] The same objective standard applied to these statutes is also applied to section 455(a),[67] however, and thus bias in fact cannot be established by subjective assessment of the judge's state of mind. Instead, courts have required that a litigant seeking disqualification meet a higher standard of proof to show bias in fact.[68]

A higher standard of proof is firmly established as part of the disqualification process under section 144. When scrutinizing the affidavit to determine whether it is legally sufficient,[69] courts apply a "clear and convincing" standard, and evaluate whether the facts "would convince a reasonable man that bias exists."[70] In contrast, courts have not asked whether the facts would cause a reasonable person to question the judge's impartiality under section 144.[71] Imposing a stricter standard of proof for disqualification under section 144 provides a reasonable counterbalance to the stipulation that the judge accept all the averments in a section 144 affidavit as true.[72] This more rigorous standard of proof does not, however, ensure that judges are disqualified under section 144 only where there is bias in fact. The requirement that the facts be taken as true,

Courts tend to treat § 455 as a unit when setting forth the standard, rather than treating § 455(b)(1) separately from § 455(a). See Story, 716 F.2d at 1091 (reasonable person standard applied to § 455 as a whole); Chitimacha, 690 F.2d at 1167 (charges of partiality based on §§ 455(a) and (b) resolved by application of reasonable person standard).

69. Courts generally apply a three-part test for legal sufficiency, requiring that the facts set forth in the affidavit (1) be material and stated with particularity; (2) be such that, if true, they would convince a reasonable person that bias exists; and (3) show personal rather than judicial bias. United States v. Merkt, 794 F.2d 950, 960 n.9 (5th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 107 S. Ct. 1603 (1987); see also Phillips v. The standard has become more rigorous over the years. In Berger v. United States, the Supreme Court demanded only that the affidavit "give fair support to the charge of a bent of mind that may prevent or impede impartiality of judgment." 255 U.S. at 33-34.

even where the judge knows them to be false,[73] delimits the court's assessment of the facts, making it inaccurate to describe section 144 as a statute that disqualifies only for actual bias.

Whether the "clear and convincing" standard of proof should be applied to section 455(b)(1) has seldom been addressed by the courts. Most courts treat section 455(a) as predominant, rest their decision on that section when bias or prejudice is alleged, and avoid the issue of whether they are required to make a finding of actual bias under section 455(b)(1).[74] Other courts interpret section 455(b)(1) as providing a specific example of grounds for disqualification under section 455(a) and apply to section 455(b)(1) the standard they apply to section 455(a).[75] In United States v. Balistrieri,[76] the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that section 455(b)(1) requires that actual bias be found in order to meet that section's standard of proof.[77] The court applied the "clear and convincing" standard, asking whether a reasonable person with knowledge of all the facts would be convinced that the judge was biased.[78]

73. Balistrieri, 779 F.2d at 1199 (judge must assume facts are true, even if judge knows them to be false); Mims v. Shapp, 541 F.2d 415, 417 (3d Cir. 1976) (judge must accept truth of allegations and good faith of pleader even if judge has knowledge to the contrary).

Focus on § 455 is not surprising. Judges can save face by disqualifying themselves under § 455(a), on grounds that a reasonable person could question their impartiality, rather than admitting they are actually biased by disqualifying themselves under § 455(b)(1). See Balistrieri, 779 F.2d at 1203 (judges may be especially reluctant to recuse themselves when doing so requires admission that actual bias or prejudice has been proved). Likewise, it is logical for one to surmise that courts of appeals support that focus, because they may then avoid directly impugning the integrity of district court judges by using § 455(a) instead of § 455(b)(1).

75. See, e.g., United States v. Sibla, 624 F.2d 864, 867 (9th Cir. 1980) (§ 455(b)(1) simply provides specific example of situation in which a judge's "impartiality might reasonably be questioned" pursuant to § 455(a)); United States v. Conforte, 624 F.2d 869, 881 (9th Cir.) (same test for subsections (a) and (b) which disqualifies on a reasonable person standard for either the appearance or the fact of bias) cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1012 (1980).

Bloom, supra note 55, at 675, suggests that the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals applies the bias in fact requirement of § 455(b)(1) to both § 455(a) and § 455(b)(1). But the court made clear in Conforte that both sections would be evaluated under the standard requiring disqualification for the appearance of bias set forth in § 455(a). 624 F.2d at 881.

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, soon after § 455 was revised, issued an ambiguous holding that could be interpreted as imposing a bias in fact requirement on both § 455(a) and § 455(b)(1). Parrish v. Board of Comm'rs, 524 F.2d 98, 103-04 (5th Cir. 1975) (en banc), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 944 (1976). See Comment, Disqualification of Federal Judges for Bias or Prejudice, 46 U. CHI. More recent Fifth Circuit decisions clearly apply the § 455(a) requirements to both § 455(a) and § 455(b)(1). See United States v. Merkt, 794 F.2d 950, 960 n.8 (5th Cir. 1986) (test of whether reasonable person would "harbor doubts" applied to both sections), cert. denied, 107 S. Ct. 1603 (1987).

The language of section 455(a) suggests that it requires disqualification for the appearance of bias.[79] The section mandates disqualification when a reasonable person would question a judge's impartiality, regardless whether actual bias exists.[80] Clear and convincing evidence is not required by the language of the statute.[81] Moreover, disqualification when doubt about impartiality exists, rather than only when convincing evidence of bias is produced, is in keeping with the congressional aim to eliminate the duty to sit rule and replace it with the rule that judges, when uncertain, should disqualify themselves.[82]

Courts generally apply the reasonable doubt standard to section 455(a) disqualification and disqualify for the appearance of bias.[83] However, the standard of proof for disqualification under section 455(a) was subject to controversy for a time during which some courts of appeals' decisions were interpreted as equating section 455(a) with section 144 and requiring the same "clear and convincing" standard of proof.[84] This position appears to have been abandoned.[85]

Recently, however, a new controversy has arisen. The Seventh Circuit has limited appellate review of disqualification under section 455(a) because that section disqualifies based on the appearance of bias or prejudice.[86] After requiring

85. The Fifth Circuit, which may have required bias in fact at one time, has more recently stated clearly that the standard under § 455(a) is the appearance of bias. Hall v. Small Business Admin., 695 F.2d 175, 178-79 (5th Cir. 1983) (test under § 455(a) is appearance of partiality rather than actual bias). See also Comment, supra note 74, at 248 n.66 (majority opinion in Parrish ambiguous; can be read as acknowledging appearance of bias standard for § 455(a)).

The Ninth Circuit backed away from the bias in fact requirement in United States v. Conforte, 624 F.2d 869 (9th Cir. 1980). The Conforte court interpreted its Olander holding to mean that the same substantive rules regarding bias or prejudice would apply whether the court was determining the appearance or the fact of bias. Conforte, 624 F.2d at 880 (citing Idaho v. proof of bias in fact under section 455(b)(1) in Balistrieri,[87] the Seventh Circuit refused to consider whether the judge should have recused himself from the case under section 455(a). Rather, the court held that the denial of disqualification under section 455(a) is not reviewable on post-trial appeal because disqualification under that section does not rest on actual bias.[88] The court reasoned that because the standard in section 455(a) is the appearance of bias, in contrast to the actual bias standard of section 455(b), section 455(a) does not implicate the substantive rights of the parties.[89] The court characterized section 455(a) as aimed only at protecting against injury to the judicial system as a whole, and further suggested that a pretrial mandamus petition provides the only appropriate vehicle for review.[90]

This distinction could severely limit the number of disqualification denials that could be heard on appeal. Courts tend to focus on section 455(a) when considering disqualification and thus may not develop a record that will permit full consideration of whether disqualification could be supported by clear and convincing evidence.[91] In addition, questions regarding the impartiality of judges do not only arise before trial, but instead may come to the attention of a party during or after trial.[92]

More fundamentally, the legislative history of section 455 does not support a bifurcation of the focus and reviewability of its subsections. Section 455(a) is not accurately characterized as directed solely toward appearances and thus does not compel the Balestrieri court's interpretation. Advocates of section 455(a) described it as a provision that would enhance public confidence,[93] but it was not proposed exclusively for that purpose. Instead, members of Congress and the ABA Judicial Conduct Committee viewed section 455(a) as a provision that would fill in gaps and provide a requirement for disqualification in circumstances not covered by the specific standards set forth in section 455(b).[94] The Senate committee, for example, regarded section 455(a) as a tool for disqualifying a judge for a close personal relationship not covered by section 455(b)(5), which requires disqualification in cases involving relatives up to the third degree of blood relationship.[95] The chairman of the ABA committee also regarded the general provision as a means for disqualifying judges for actual bias, and noted that there was no need for "fixed opinion" language in section 455(b)(3) because a judge who had expressed an opinion on the merits of a controversy would be disqualified under 455(a).[96] These examples indicate that section 455(a) was directed toward actual bias as well as toward the appearance of bias.

Section 455(b) also serves this dual function. Some of the provisions in section 455(b) are clearly directed at promoting the appearance of impartiality rather than protecting parties from actual bias. For example, under section 455(b) a judge is disqualified if she has any financial interest in the case, no matter how small, without the possibility of waiver.[97] Concerns with both due process and the preservation of confidence in the judicial system thus permeate the entirety of section 455.

The Supreme Court's analysis of the due process right to an impartial judge provides yet another reason for rejecting an interpretation of the disqualification statutes that conditions review on a finding of actual bias. The due process criteria for judicial disqualification, as delineated by the Supreme Court,[98] is not as extensive as the federal statutory requirements mandating disqualification. The Court has focused on disqualification for interest,[99] leaving open the question whether a bias charge implicates due process.[100] Yet the Court has indicated that where due process requires disqualification, it is concerned with the appearance of justice.

Cement Inst., 333 U.S. 683, 701-02 (1948) (FTC's expressed opinions on points of law neither evidence of bias nor violative of due process).

In the few federal judicial disqualification cases heard by the Supreme Court, the Court has not reached the question of due process but rather has confined itself to interpreting the federal statute at issue. See United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 580-83 (1966) (applying § 144 where judge's personal bias alleged); Berger v. United States, 255 U.S. 22, 34-35, (1921) (applying Act of March 3, 1911, ch. 231, § 21, 36 Stat. 1090, precusor to § 144). The Court's focus on statutory interpretation is consistent with its practice of resolving cases on statutory grounds if possible before reaching constitutional questions. See Wood v. Strickland, 420 U.S. 308, 314 (1975) (Court practice is to deal with dispositive statutory issues before considering constitutional questions).

The Court's recent decision in Aetna Life Insurance Co. v. Lavoie[101] illustrates its approach to the due process implications of judicial bias. In Lavoie, an insurance company charged that its due process rights were violated because the chief judge on the state appellate court panel was suing other insurance companies on issues similar to those in the Lavoie case and because the other judges on the panel were class plaintiffs in one of the suits.[102] The Court found that due process required disqualification of the chief judge on the basis of interest because his decision in Lavoie could enhance the status of a case he had filed in a lower court.[103]

The Supreme Court declined to find due process violations based on other grounds of personal bias and interest alleged by the appellants.[104] Noting that the right to due process does not extend so far as to require disqualification under the fourteenth amendment whenever it is required under statute, the Court held that "only in the most extreme of cases would disqualification . . . be constitutionally required" on the basis of bias or prejudice.[105] The Court also held that the Constitution does not require disqualification for only a slight pecuniary interest.[106]

Although the Lavoie Court held that the due process right to disqualification does not extend to all the circumstances in which Congress has required disqualification, the Court did not tie due process disqualification to a showing of actual fairness. Instead, the Court reiterated the position that due process requires disqualification on the basis of the appearance of partiality, stating:

> We made clear that we are not required to decide whether in fact Justice Emery was influenced, but only whether sitting on the case . . . "would offer a possible temptation . . . to the average [judge] . . . [to] lead him not to hold the balance nice, clear, and true." The Due Process Clause "may sometimes bar trial judges who have no actual bias and who would do their very best to weigh the scales of justice equally between contending parties. But to perform its high function in the best way, 'justice must satisfy the appearance of justice.' "[107] impartial judge requires disqualification depends on reasonable inferences from facts that raise the possibility of bias, and not a finding of actual bias.

In instituting the objective standard, Congress made a similar choice regarding the extent of inquiry into bias. Investigation into the state of mind of a judge under the objective standard stops at the point where a reasonable inference of bias or prejudice can be made. This limitation of the inquiry permits, and indeed requires, higher courts to consider disqualification without establishing whether a party actually suffered a violation of the right to an independent adjudicator. Thus the restrictions on the appeal of section 455(a) imposed by the Seventh Circuit,[108] a court which refuses post-trial review unless actual bias is involved, are not justified.

B. Reasonable Grounds for Disqualification

1. Judicially-Created Requirements for Disqualification for Bias or Prejudice

The most significant way in which courts have limited the availability of disqualification is by placing restrictions on the types of evidence that can be considered in support of disqualification. Courts require that evidence of bias or prejudice have an extrajudicial source and refuse to consider disqualification for opinions on the law.[109] Some courts, however, have interpreted the requirement of "personal" bias to preclude disqualification on grounds of bias toward an attorney.[110] The requirement of "personal" prejudice is also used to refuse disqualification on the basis of general background and experience.[111]

These restrictions originally developed through courts' interpretations of 28 U.S.C. § 144.[112] The question whether the judicial gloss on section 144 should apply to 28 U.S.C. § 455[113] was answered in the affirmative soon after section 455 was revised. In Davis v. Board of School Commissioners,[114] the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit found "no suggestion in the legislative history that [section 144] decisions were being overruled or in any way eroded."[115] The court concluded that it should "give [sections] 144 and 455 the same meaning legally . . . whether for purposes of bias and prejudice or when the impartiality of the judge might reasonably be questioned."[116] Most courts agree that the judicial interpretation of section 144 applies fully to section 455.[117] In effect, these courts are finding that the judicial gloss on bias and prejudice defines the grounds upon which it is reasonable to question a judge's impartiality.[118]

Court-made restrictions developed under section 144 and carried over to disqualification under section 455 in part reflect the logic of the judicial decision-making process and promote efficiency.[119] The restrictions may, however, protect the efficiency of the system at the expense of fairness and public confidence in the judiciary. Unfortunately, the presumption that judges are impartial results in restrictions on evidence and the imposition of a heavy burden on a movant.[120] To surmount this presumption, a litigant generally must show clear evidence of personal bias.[121] Occasionally, courts have based disqualification on evidence of a level of emotional involvement that indicates "pervasive prejudice."[122] This heavy burden on the movant however, may not further the goals of disqualification law.[123]

117. See, e.g., United States v. Story, 716 F.2d 1088, 1091 (6th Cir. 1983) (well settled that §§ 144 and 455 "must be construed in pari materia") (quoting City of Cleveland v. A few courts have disagreed, stating that the judicial interpretation of § 144 does not carry over to § 455(a). United States v. Coven, 662 F.2d 162, 168 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 916 (1982). See also United States v. Cepeda Penes, 577 F.2d 754, 758 (1st Cir. 1978) (§ 455(a) permits disqualification on evidence from judicial source). The minority view does not, however, produce results significantly different from the results reached by courts which apply the § 144 judicial gloss to § 455(a). The courts that limit the applicability of the § 144 judicially-created rules take them as being without exception or nuance. In contrast, courts that apply the §§ 144 requirements to § 455(a) include exceptions within the standards they apply to each of the sections. Compare Coven, 662 F.2d at 168-69 (information from a judicial source relevant but not sufficienlty prejudicial to disqualify without any other basis in record for questioning judge's impartiality) with Nicodemus v. a. The extrajudicial source requirement

A fundamental principle of the judicially-created standards for disqualifying judges for bias and prejudice is that the evidence of bias must come from an extrajudicial source. Evidence of prejudice or bias that arises from or can be linked to a judicial source, such as pretrial or trial proceeding or any aspect of case management, is excluded from consideration.[124] The Supreme Court stated this requirement in United States v. Grinnell:[125] "The alleged bias and prejudice to be disqualifying must stem from an extrajudicial source and result in an opinion on the merits on some basis other than what the judge learned from his participation in the case."[126]

The extrajudicial source requirement is most frequently applied to reject disqualification on the basis of statements made by a judge in the course of a case.[127] Courts also apply the extrajudicial source requirement to reject disqualification based on adverse rulings by a judge,[128] whether in the trial of the party bringing the motion[129] or in previous trials.[130] In criminal trials, the extrajudicial source rule is used to prevent disqualification on the basis of allegations questioning a judge's impartiality merely because the judge, while presiding over a previous hearing, was exposed to or ruled on evidence.[131] The extrajudicial source requirement is also invoked to reject disqualification based on claims of bias resulting from hostile actions of a party or an attorney toward a judge or resulting from the judge's response to such actions.[132]

124. See, e.g., United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31, 133 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (§ 144 does not disqualify judges on basis of prior judicial rulings or in-court comments prompted by legal proceedings), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 933 (1977).

(judge's bail denial based on stated belief of police testimony that defendants were in conspiracy not grounds for recusal), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1000 (1977).

For application of the extrajudicial source requirement to other pretrial proceedings, see, e.g., United States v. Porter, 701 F.2d 1158, 1166 (6th Cir.) (judge's comment during preliminary hearing that defendants were "apparently caught red-handed" not grounds for disqualification absent pervasive bias), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 1007 (1983); United States v. Cepeda Penes, 577 F.2d 754, 756-58 (1st Cir. 1978) (judge who heard aborted attempt to plead nolo contendere not disqualified from presiding over trial).

For application of the extrajudicial source requirement to trials, see, e.g., Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571, 577 (6th Cir. 1985) (judge who presided over denaturalization hearing need not disqualify himself from extradition hearing or from considering habeas corpus relief), cert. denied, 106 S. Ct. 1198 (1986); In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litig., 614 F.2d 958, 963-66 (5th Cir.) (judge not disqualified from presiding over retrial), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 903 (1977).

The extrajudicial source requirement protects the judicial system from unreasonable interference with judicial decision-making. If statements of opinion could generally disqualify a judge, adjudicators could be inhibited from carrying out the evaluative tasks required to move cases through the court and to reach decisions.[133] Use of the extrajudicial source requirement to avoid disqualification as a result of the provocation of a party or attorney serves to prevent litigants from manipulating the judicial system to their advantage by harrassing judges.[134]

Despite the important benefits of the extrajudicial source requirement, it could stand in the way of a fair, impartial trial if it were rigidly applied. An absolute refusal to consider as evidence of bias or prejudice any statement made in a judicial setting in response to information learned in the case gives judges a zone of immunity in which to voice personal prejudices. Courts do not, however, generally invoke the extrajudicial source rule to protect a judge from disqualification who has made statements within the judicial context that present clear evidence of personal bias for, or prejudice against, an individual in the case.

132. See, e.g., United States v. Studley, 783 F.2d 934, 939-40 (9th Cir. 1986) (fact that defendant publically denounced and filed lawsuit against judge not grounds for disqualification); United States v. Phillips, 664 F.2d 971, 1000-04 (5th Cir. 1981) (no extrajudicial source of bias to disqualify judge who learned of and discussed defendant's plans to disrupt trial and his threats against judge's life), cert. denied, 457 U.S. 1136 (1982).

133. See In re International Business Machs. Corp., 618 F.2d 923 (2d Cir. 1980), in which the court stated: "A trial judge must be free to make rulings on the merits without the apprehension that if he makes a disproportionate number in favor of one litigant, he may have created the impression of bias." Id. at 929. See also Johnson v. Trueblood, 629 F.2d 287, 291 (3d Cir. 1980) (extrajudicial source rule extended to statements in settlement conference to avoid unduly hampering judge's ability to effectuate settlement), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 999 (1981).

The use of this rationale in Phillips v. Joint Legislative Comm., 637 F.2d 1014 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 960 (1982), in response to allegations of racism, raises the question whether the protection afforded by the extrajudicial source requirement extends too far. The court stated:

> We would be reluctant, in any but an extreme case, to base a disqualification order on . . . allegations [of a pattern of racism in prior opinions]. It is a district judge's duty to conduct trials, weigh evidence, consider the law, exercise his discretion, and reach decisions in the cases on which he sits. If he understands that a seemingly harsh comment toward a party or an attorney, or a perceived tendency to give severe sentences to some class of offenders, or an aggregate imbalance in victories for plaintiffs or defendants in a particular class of cases may subject him to a train of successful recusal motions in future cases, he may consciously or subconsciously shape his judicial actions in ways unrelated to the merits of the cases before him.

Id. at 1020.

134. See, e.g., Wilks v. Israel, 627 F.2d 32, 37 (7th Cir. 1980) (allowing defendant's assault of judge to support disqualification would encourage unruly courtroom behavior and result in disruption of judicial administration), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1086 (1981).

Berger v. United States[135] presents a classic example of prejudicial statements made by a judge within the judicial context. In Berger, the judge allegedly delivered an anti-German diatribe in a case involving Germans and German-Americans as defendants.[136] Another example of a judicial remark revealing bias is found in Roberts v. Bailar,[137] a case which involved an employment discrimination suit against the Postal Service. In response to a motion to dismiss a party who had a supervisory role,[138] the district court judge said: "I know Mr. Graves, and he is an honorable man and I know that he would never intentionally discriminate against anybody."[139] Because the actions of this "honorable man" were at issue in the discrimination suit, the court of appeals held that "it is clear that a reasonable person would question the impartiality of the District Judge."[140]

The statement at issue in a disqualification motion may not, however, clearly reveal personal bias or prejudice evidenced through an extrajudicial source, but rather may suggest that a bias toward or prejudice against a party has developed over the course of the proceeding or a prior proceeding. Disqualifying a judge in these circumstances requires making an exception to the extrajudicial source rule when a judge's statement or actions reveal that he or she has not or is not likely to put aside personal feelings in conducting the trial or passing judgment. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit suggested the possibility of a "pervasive prejudice" exception in Davis v. Board of School Commissioners[141] and applied this exception in United States v. Holland.[142] In Holland, a defendant sought disqualification of a district court judge after gaining a new trial on appeal because the judge stated that the defendant had "broken faith" with the court by appealing and intended to increase the defendant's sentence.[143] The appellate court held that the district judge's statement showed pervasive prejudice and thereby satisfied the reasonable person standard for disqualification.[144]

In Nicodemus v. Chrysler Corp.,[145] the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals disqualified a judge for bias on the basis of his "vilification" of the defendant in an employment discrimination suit.[146] The court indicated that the development of 151. This rule is mitigated somewhat by 28 U.S.C. § 455(b)(3), which provides that judges who had been government employees are disqualified from a case if they previously served as counsel, adviser, or material witness concerning the proceedings, or if they expressed an opinion on the merits of the case. Id.

some degree of bias over the course of court proceedings is a normal part of the judicial process,[147] but declared that " 'if . . . a judge's bias appears to have become overpowering, we think it disqualifies him.' "[148]

In a situation in which the judge was directly or deliberately provoked by a participant in the case, an emotional response by a judge generally will not disqualify her.[149] Nevertheless, even in circumstances in which the judge has been deliberately provoked, an extreme reaction to a party or attorney may necessitate disqualification.[150] The appropriate focus under section 455(a) is not whether the judge's statement springs from an extrajudicial source but instead whether the judge's statement or action would lead a reasonable person to question whether the judge would remain impartial.

b. Opinion on law or policy

A second fundamental principle of disqualification law articulated by the courts is that judges cannot be disqualified for their knowledge of, or opinions on, the legal issues in a case.[151] The policy concerns underlying this rule are clear: disqualification on grounds of previously developed legal opinion would wreak havoc within the judicial system. As the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit recently observed: "If [j]udges could be disqualified because their background in the practice of law gave them knowledge of the legal issues which might be presented in cases coming before them, then only the least-informed and worse-prepared lawyers could be appointed to the bench."[152]

Although the judicially-created rule against considering disqualifying judges on the basis of their legal knowledge is a sound one, application of the rule may be problematic when a judge has been personally involved in instituting a particular policy or when a judge has emphatically expressed support for, or opposition to, a policy position. The best-known case involving the issue of disqualification of a judge for his involvement in instituting a policy is Laird v. Tatum,[153] a case in which the plaintiffs challenged army surveillance of anti-war protestors.[154] Plaintiffs moved to disqualify Justice Rehnquist, who had cast the deciding vote in a five to four decision dismissing the case,[155] on the grounds that he had been involved in defending the surveillance program before a Senate committee as assistant attorney general in the Nixon administration.[156] Justice Rehnquist determined that he was not obliged to disqualify himself because he "did not have even an advisory role in the conduct of the case of Laird v. Tatum."[157] He also declined to disqualify himself through an exercise of discretion, reasoning that opinions on the law and policy were necessary and inevitable,[158] and that having publicly expressed these opinions was not sufficient grounds for disqualification.[159]

Congress specifically rejected this rule when it passed the revised disqualification statute later that same year. See supra note 30 and accompanying text for a discussion of the duty to sit.

In its revision of section 455, Congress included a specific provision, section 455(b)(3),[160] to address issues raised in Tatum.[161] Section 544(b)(3) does not, however, clearly require disqualification where a judge is ruling on the applicability or constitutionality of laws or executive policies that he had a significant hand in shaping. Section 455(b)(3), on its face, seems to be applicable only in those cases in which a judge had been involved in, or expressed an opinion about, a particular case. Disqualification in circumstances like those presented in the Tatum case would fall, instead, under the general provision of section 455(a), which requires the court to ask whether the judge's participation in lawmaking raises reasonable doubts concerning his impartiality. It is reasonable to believe that one who has had a significant part in formulating a policy may have difficulty maintaining impartiality when that policy is challenged.

The disqualification issue may also arise when a judge has not played a significant role in formulating policy but rather has expressed an opinion on an issue, either by casting a vote in a legislature, or by publicly expressing an opinion. Courts have generally refused to disqualify judges in these circumstances.[162] Nevertheless, evidence of strongly held opinions can raise reasonable doubts about a judge's impartiality.

In Southern Pacific Communications v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co.,[163] the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia considered the issue of disqualification based on emphatic policy statements in post-trial review of an antitrust case against American Telephone & Telegraph Co. ("AT&T"). The district court judge, in his memorandum opinion,[164] forcibly stated his belief that the public interest was better served by an AT&T monopoly rather than by competition in the telecommunications industry.[165] The court of appeals, noting that views on the law and policy do not ordinarily disqualify a judge,[166] allowed for the possibility of disqualification if the court prejudged a case.[167] The court set forth an "irrevocably closed mind" test for determining when a judge's actions overcome the presumption of impartiality.[168]

The Southern Pacific Communications "irrevocably closed mind" test cannot be applied to pretrial disqualification, however. Pretrial application of the test would conflict with the presumption that a judge will maintain an open mind toward a case, and follow precedent faithfully.[169] In a section 455(a) pretrial disqualification challenge, this presumption would preclude challenge of a judge's impartiality prior to trial because it would not be possible to prove that an upcoming presentation of an issue would not sway the judge.[170] A litigant cannot make a pretrail showing of an "irrevocably closed" mind sufficient to overcome the presumption when such a showing depends on evidence of bias in the proceedings.[171]

Although in general a judge may not be disqualified for an opinion on the law, a judge may be disqualified for holding a fixed opinion regarding sentencing.[172] This exception was established in United States v. Thompson,[173] the case in which the defendants had allegedly violated the Selective Service Act.[174] The district court judge, in a previous case, had announced that it was his policy to sentence all Selective Service Act violators to at least thirty months in jail.[175]

168. Id. The court suggested that judges should not be disqualified if they are "capable of refining" their views in the process of the case, but they should be disqualified if their minds are "irrevocably closed." Id. Applying this test to the district court judge's handling of the AT&T case, the court found that the judge did not hold a fixed opinion at the outset of the case, as evidenced by his denial of a motion to dismiss the case on the basis of antitrust immunity, and that his evenhanded administration of the case provided no evidence of a "closed mind" during trial. Id. at 991-92.

Bloom addressed this issue prior to the circuit court decision in Southern Pacific Communications. Bloom advocated replacing the blanket prohibition with a case-by-case analysis that would disqualify judges for the appearance of bias, and that would take into account "whether and how widely the judge's views are publicly known, how strongly the views are held, whether the proper resolution of the legal issue is unsettled, and whether his views relate to the legal issue as applied in the specific factual context of the case . . . ." Id. at 697.

173. 483 F.2d 527 (3d Cir. 1973). Although the Thompson court held that a litigant can disqualify a judge through a pretrial § 144 affidavit alleging a fixed sentencing policy, the court was evaluating a case in which the judge had declined to disqualify himself, id. at 528, and had actually imposed the thirty-month sentence he had indicated was his minimum. Id. The court, however, focused on the allegations in the affidavit, rather than the judge's conduct in the case. Id. at 528-29.

175. Id. See United States v. Townsend, 478 F.2d 1072, 1074 (3d Cir. 1973) (judge disqualified for statement showing fixed opinion on sentencing).

The appellate court determined that this allegation provided grounds for disqualification because it "was not an allegation of judicial bias in favor of a particular legal principle," but rather of personal bias "directed against the appellant as a member of a class."[176] The court also noted, however, that a fixed policy as to sentencing was inconsistent with the trial judge's authorized discretion to tailor sentences appropriately.[177]

The Thompson court's consideration of the judge's violation of his official duties suggests a framework for a narrow exception permitting disqualification for opinions on the law or public policy. Courts could adopt the rule that while policy statements should not generally provide grounds for disqualification, an exception will be made when a statement or action would lead a reasonable person to conclude that the judge is predisposed to violating his or her oath or ignoring a mandate.[178] Such a rule would not interfere with the present practice of refusing disqualification when the judge's statement expresses an enthusiastic commitment to enforce the law,[179] or when a judge previously voted in favor of a law applicable in the case.[180] Simple disagreement with existing law would also not disqualify.[181] Under the proposed exception, however, the presumption of impartiality could be overcome if a judge's action provided evidence of intense disagreement with a particular policy or law.[182] The critical issue would be whether the judge could reasonably be expected to put aside his or her personal feelings, rather than allow them to dominate the decision-making process.[183]

c. Bias or prejudice toward an attorney

Some courts have required that judicial bias be directed toward the party as an individual, rather than toward that party's attorney, before disqualifying a

181. Courts have shown an appropriate reluctance to disqualify on the basis of disagreement with applicable law. The Southern Pacific Communications court articulated the reason for this reluctance when it stated:

> It is well established . . . that a judge is not disqualified merely because he personally disagrees with the policy underlying a law that he is bound to apply in a case [since] . . . '[i]n fulfilling the functions of applying or considering the validity of a statute, or a government program, the judge endeavors to put aside personal views as to the desirability of the law or program . . . .'

182. For example, a judge who had previously campaigned for political office on an anti-abortion platform could be disqualified from abortion cases.

judge.[184] Under section 455(a), however, bias or antipathy directed at counsel may justify disqualification, but only if this bias or prejudice could affect the outcome of the case to the detriment of a party.[185] As the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit noted in United States v. Ritter,[186] "if a judge is biased in favor of an attorney, his impartiality might reasonably be questioned in relationship to the party."[187]

Yet, as the Ninth Circuit has noted, when a judge is charged with prejudice against an attorney, the court must take into account tensions between judge and attorney inherent in the adversarial system.[188] A disqualification motion based on bias for or prejudice against an attorney thus should be evaluated in context, like other charges of prejudice arising from a judge's statements or actions within the judicial process.

d. General background and experience

Reviewing courts also refuse to disqualify judges on the basis of their general background, education, and experience.[189] In Blank v. Sullivan & Cromwell,[190] a sex discrimination case against a law firm, the defendant sought to disqualify the judge because she was female and as a lawyer had worked on behalf of minorities who had suffered from discrimination.[191] The Blank court refused to disqualify, reasoning that if background, race, or sex were in themselves grounds for removal, "no judge on this court could hear this case, or many others, by virtue of the fact that all of them were attorneys, of a sex, [and] often with distinguished law firm or public service backgrounds."[192]

192. Id. Disqualification sought on the basis of a judge's background and experience was also rejected in Pennsylvania v. Local 542, Int'l Union of Operating Eng'rs, 388 F. Supp. 155, 182 (E.D. Pa. 1974), aff'd, 552 F.2d 498 (3d Cir. 1977). The defendants, who were charged with discriminating against a class of black plaintiffs on the basis of race, sought to disqualify Judge Higginbotham by means of a § 144 affidavit alleging that he was black and had identified himself with black causes.

Rejection of recusal for general background or experience is sensible because evidence of general associations does not provide a reasonable basis for an inference of bias.[193] Courts must, however, carefully distinguish between general evidence of background or associations and specific evidence that may provide a basis for disqualification under section 455(a) if an interest or relationship is not specified under section 455(b).[194]

2. Grounds for Disqualification Under Section 455(a) Other Than Bias or Prejudice

Disqualification under section 455(a) is not limited to circumstances where bias or prejudice is explicitly alleged; section 455(a) also applies when an interest or relationship, not among those defined by section 455(b), raises doubt about a judge's impartiality.[195] It is evident from the record of the Senate committee hearing on the proposed revision of section 455 that Congress envisioned the use of section 455(a) as a tool for disqualification on grounds not specified in section 455(b).[196]

Recognizing the scope of the general provisions, courts have made use of section 455(a) to disqualify judges for interests or relationships not covered by section 455(b).[197] Several courts have used section 455(a) as their framework for examining disqualification motions that allege that a judge's law clerk or former law clerk had a role or an interest in a case.[198] The United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit has held that judges are required under section 455(a) to disqualify themselves from criminal actions if they have a substantial interest in the victim of the crime.[199] The Fifth Circuit, in Potashnick v. Port

Small Business Admin., 695 F.2d 175, 179 (5th Cir. 1983) (judge disqualified because current law clerk had interest in case).

199. United States v. Nobel, 696 F.2d 231, 235 (3d Cir. 1982) (judge disqualified for holding stock in corporate victim of fraud), cert. denied, 462 U.S. 1118 (1983).

City Construction Co.,[200] relied on section 455(a) to disqualify a judge who had extensive business dealings with the plaintiff's attorney.[201] More recently, the Fifth Circuit used section 455(a) in Health Services Acquisition Corp. v. Liljeberg[202] to disqualify a judge who claimed he had no knowledge of information that, if known, would have disqualified him under section 455(b)(4).[203]

In each of these cases, the respective appellate court determined that a relationship or interest in itself raised questions regarding impartiality. The courts did not evaluate the extent of the relationship or interest to determine whether the judge in each case was actually biased. Rather, the courts disqualified due to the appearance of bias.[204]

Casting disqualification questions in terms of relationships or interests, instead of in terms of bias, has several advantages. Stating the disqualification motion in terms of a questionable relationship can bring into clearer focus the grounds for objecting to the participation of a particular judge.[205] In addition, relationships and interest are easier for courts to ascertain because the evidence is more concrete and accessible. Such decisions are also easier to review, since the court can consider, as a matter of law, whether a particular interest or relationship should be added to the list of those that disqualify.[206] Furthermore, resting the need for disqualification on the existence of a relationship is less personal and may be easier for a judge to view objectively than a direct charge of bias.

Nevertheless, litigants and courts tend to treat any relationship or interest not specifically enumerated in Section 455(b) as presenting a question of disqualification for bias or prejudice, requiring the more difficult showing of personal prejudice, rather than considering the relationship under section 455(a). The opinion issued by the Fifth Circuit in United States v. Harrelson[207] provides an example of this tendency. The Harrelson defendants were convicted of murder and conspiracy to murder a federal judge.[208] Pursuant to section 455(a), the defendants had sought to disqualify the trial judge, who had known and worked with the murder victim for eight or nine years, served as an honorary pallbearer at his funeral, and eulogized him at several memorial ceremonies.[209] The court analyzed section 455(a) as requiring disqualification on the basis of conduct that shows personal prejudice, insisting that "recusal is not warranted absent specific instances of conduct indicating prejudice against a defendant."[210] Because such evidence was lacking, the court held that disqualification was not required.[211]

The Harrelson court then considered the question of relationship briefly and superficially.[212] The court reasoned that a trial judge in this position may harbor hostility toward the actual killers but would presume the innocence of persons pleading not guilty.[213] The court did not consider the possible impact of this hostility if the judge reached a conclusion regarding guilt before the end of the trial or its possible impact upon sentencing.[214] The court concluded that absent a stronger showing of personal prejudice, a reasonable person would not presume that the "careful and seasoned trial judge" was biased.[215] By requiring a showing of personal prejudice,[216] the court lost sight of the objective "appearance of bias" standard established in section 455(a) as applied to questions of disqualifying relationship or interest.

Other courts have given questions involving a relationship equally short shrift. For example, in United States v. Balistrieri,[217] disqualification was sought on the grounds that the judge, when he was Wisconsin Attorney General, identified the defendant as the head of an organized crime family and targeted the defendant's family business for investigation in his efforts against organized crime.[218] The court denied disqualification on the grounds that there was no showing of personal animus[219] and did not ask whether a reasonable person would consider the relationship of the judge to the defendant one which called into doubt the impartiality of the judge.[220]

The tendency of courts to focus on personal prejudice suggests that a subjective element remains in disqualification decisions under section 455(a) despite the congressional emphasis on an objective standard. The next section will examine the disqualification decision-making process and consider means for achieving greater objectivity in disqualification under section 455(a).

III. Disqualification Procedure

A. Disqualification Decision-Making

Objective disqualification can be promoted by clarifying the process of evaluating evidence for disqualification. The inherently subjective nature of evidence of personal bias and prejudice may make objective evaluation difficult.[221] Yet even when disqualification is based on bias or prejudice, courts are required by Congress to apply the objective standard of section 455(a).[222]

The decision-making process followed when disqualification is based on an interest or relationship defined under section 455(b)[223] is simple to describe and provides a framework for a more objective approach to disqualification under section 455(a). In deciding whether to disqualify for interest or relationship, the first question a court poses is: does the interest or relationship exist? If it does, the court must arrive at an accurate description of the relationship and ask: does the judge's interest or relationship fall within those specified under section 455(b)? If so, disqualification is automatic.[224] The statute imposes the presumption that the particular interest or relationship would reasonably result in bias.[225]

made regarding the existence of an interest or relationship, the question whether it provides reasonable grounds for disqualification is one an appellate court can determine as a matter of law.[227]

In cases seeking disqualification on the basis of personal bias or prejudice, the judge's statements and other expressive actions provide the evidence for disqualification.[228] To make an objective assessment of this evidence, the court must first test its accuracy, and question whether the event or statement occurred as reported. Once the court has obtained an accurate description of the expressive act that may reveal bias, that evidence must be evaluated using the reasonable person standard to determine whether the expressive acts reasonably raise doubts regarding the judge's impartiality.[229] Under the objective standard, it is inappropriate for the court to inquire further and attempt to determine the judge's actual state of mind. The court is limited to assessing outward manifestations and to making a reasonable inference as to whether the typical judge would be biased under those circumstances.[230]

The task of applying the objective standard to the facts grants the judge a degree of discretion in disqualification decisions under section 455(a) that is not present in section 455(b) decisions. The scope of that discretion is limited, however, because Congress established a low threshold when it eliminated the duty to sit.[231] Judges are required to recuse themselves if they perceive any grounds for disqualification.[232] The discretion of district court judges can be limited further by the courts of appeals if they respond to disqualification cases by establishing clearer guidelines for disqualification.[233]

B. Evaluation by the Challenged District Court Judge

Federal law provides that the decision-making process described above be carried out by the judge who is under challenge. Under section 144, which provides for disqualification upon filing of a sufficient affidavit,[234] the challenged judge is charged with determining whether the affidavit is legally sufficient.[235] Although the judge is required to assume the truth of the allegations and the good faith of the attorney regardless of any knowledge to the contrary,[236] the judge exercises significant power over disqualification. The requirement of convincing evidence of bias,[237] and the restrictions on disqualification evidence such as the extrajudicial source rule,[238] give the challenged judge the responsibility of making an extensive evaluation of the charges.[239]

Under section 455, judges have more latitude in reaching the decision whether to disqualify themselves. Judges are not required to accept the veracity of the factual averments in a motion, but rather are free to make credibility determinations, weigh the evidence, and contradict it with facts drawn from their own personal knowledge.[240]

Giving the challenged judge this role in the disqualification process has the advantage of allowing the judge with the best knowledge of the issue to resolve it speedily. But when the judge denies disqualification, questions regarding that judge's impartiality are compounded rather than settled. Moreover, the appearance of impartiality is not advanced when a challenged judge proceeds to try a case and there has been no outside assessment of the challenge to that judge's impartiality.[241]

To determine the legal sufficiency of a § 144 affidavit, a judge must consider whether it is definite enough in its pleadings, whether the kind of prejudice it alleges is judicially recognized as grounds for disqualification, and, if so, whether the facts it alleges would convince a reasonable person that the judge is biased. See supra note 69 for the three-part test for legal sufficiency generally applied by the courts.

C. Other Means for Determining Disqualification

Commentators have proposed several ways of changing or supplementing disqualification procedures to better ensure an impartial adjudicator. One proposed alternative to the current disqualification procedure is to eliminate judicial decision-making from the process by instituting the peremptory challenge of judges.[242] Reliance on peremptory challenge, however, may lead to judge-shopping[243] and inefficiency.[244] Furthermore, the introduction of a peremptory challenge would not actually address the problem of ensuring impartial judges. The proposals limit litigants to one use of a peremptory challenge.[245] Litigants could face a biased judge after reassignment and the need for a statute disqualifying judges for cause would remain, as would the problems of achieving disqualification on an objective standard under such a statute.

The other two proposed alternatives, which would bring judges other than the challenged judge into the disqualification process, deserve more extensive consideration. One proposal is to transfer the decision to another judge at the district court level. A second alternative is to allow full and immediate appellate review of denials of disqualification.

1. Transfer to Another District Judge

Commentators have recommended that independent adjudication of disqualification motions be assured by requiring that a district court judge presented with a disqualification motion transfer the motion to another judge for decision.[246] Such a transfer would, according to commentators, address the problem presented by having judges decide their own cases, provide a more disinterested forum, and thus promote the appearance of impartiality.[247] The major objection commentators have leveled against this proposal is that transfer of

245. See Senate Hearing, supra note 2, at 7-8, 13 (S. 1886, introduced by Senator Bayh, allowed one peremptory challenge per side).

246. To make transfer of disqualification decisions mandatory would require amendment of the current statute, 28 U.S.C. § 455, which explicitly places the responsibility for disqualification on the challenged judge. See supra note 12 for the text of § 455. See also Comment, supra note 75, at 266 n.172, for a discussion of creative ways to circumvent the current requirement that judges disqualify themselves.

the disqualification motion to another judge for a hearing, or for review of affidavits,[248] would delay litigation and impose an administrative burden.[249] Those advocating this alternative argue that an independent review of disqualification is worth the delay and burden on the courts.[250]

2. Appellate Review

Another means for insuring independent assessment of disqualification decisions is to afford litigants immediate and comprehensive review of disqualification denials. Immediate appellate review would clearly further the goals of judicial disqualification. Without interlocutory review, trials proceed before judges whose impartiality is in question, thereby imposing upon litigants a possibly unfair trial and undermining the public perception of the impartiality of judges.[251]

Nevertheless, routine interlocutory consideration of disqualification would impose a burden on the courts. Timely appeal may, however, reduce the burden imposed on the judicial system when a new trial is necessitated following reversal based on disqualification.[252] Moreover, resolution of a disqualification issue at pretrial is less complex than resolution of the disqualification question as part of a completed case. In post-trial review, a new trial may be required even though everything but the disqualification issue appears to have been correctly decided.[253] In this position, a court may be reluctant to apply the liberal standards instituted by Congress which address the disqualification question.

Unfortunately, timely review of disqualification denials is impeded by statutory limitations on interlocutory review. Disqualification motions are usually raised and decided before the trial.[254] A final decision on the merits of a case is

Review under a writ of mandamus, however, provides a vehicle by which the courts may hear disqualification denials.[256] Mandamus is a writ used to Services, Inc. v. Morgan, 557 F.2d 110, 117 (7th Cir. 1977) (per curiam) the Seventh Circuit held that no time limits may be imposed. Since then, the Seventh Circuit has questioned, but not altered, this ruling. See Union Carbide Corp. v. U.S. Cutting Serv., Inc., 782 F.2d 710, 716 (7th Cir. 1986) (Morgan decision repeatedly questioned, recently undermined by court of appeals; reconsideration unnecessary here). Several courts have rejected the Morgan analysis and imposed a timeliness requirement on § 455. See Chitimacha Tribe v. Harry L. Laws Co., 690 F.2d 1157, 1164 n.3 (5th Cir. 1982) (§§ 144 and 455 both require timely motion), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 814 (1983); In re International Business Machs. Corp., 618 F.2d 923, 932 (2d Cir. 1980) (court can impose timeliness requirement despite lack of statutory provision). Timeliness may also be encouraged by treating failure to move for disqualification at an appropriate moment as an implicit waiver, as the Third Circuit did in United States v. Nobel, 696 F.2d 231, 237 (3d Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 462 U.S. 1118 (1983).

255. 28 U.S.C. § 1291 (1982). A decision is considered final only when it "ends the litigation on the merits and leaves nothing for the court to do but execute the judgment." Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Risjord, 449 U.S. 368, 373-74 (1981) (quoting Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 437 U.S. 463, 467 (1978) (quoting Catlin v. United States, 324 U.S. 229, 233 (1945)).

Courts seldom review disqualification issues under the exception to the finality rule provided by federal law, 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (1982), which allows review prior to a decision on the merits only in narrowly circumscribed instances. Under § 1292(b), a district judge must certify an order asking for review and the appellate court must agree to hear the appeal. Id. The issue in question must involve "a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial grounds for difference of opinion," and where "immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation." Id.

The certification process is seldom available for a disqualification motion grounded in either § 144, 455(b)(1) or 455(a), since such a motion generally hinges on interpretation of facts and is unlikely to present a question involving a controlling issue of law as to which there is substantial grounds for difference of opinion. See 13A C. WRIGHT, A MILLER & E. COOPER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 3553 at 659 (1984) (§ 1292(b) standard not often met in disqualification decisions).

Reviewed by certification has been employed occasionally. See, e.g., Davis v. Board of School Comm'rs, 517 F.2d 1044, 1047 (5th Cir. 1975) (review allowed under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) to determine whether prejudice against attorney disqualifies under § 144), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 944 (1976).

Another means for interlocutory review is the collateral order rule, a common law rule that an interlocutory order is immediately appealable if it is "in that small class which finally determine claims of right separable from, and collateral to, rights asserted in the action, too important to be denied review and too independent of the cause itself to require that appellate consideration be deferred until the whole case is adjudicated." Cohen v. Beneficial Indus. Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 546 (1949). Appellate courts have proved unwilling to exercise this common law doctrine to review disqualification motions. See, e.g., In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litig., 614 F.2d 958, 960-61 (5th Cir.) (disqualification motions not reviewable under collateral order doctrine because fully reviewable on appeal from final judgment), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 888 (1980); accord United States v. Gregory, 656 F.2d 1132, 1136 (5th Cir. 1981); United States v. Washington, 573 F.2d 1121, 1122 (9th Cir. 1978). But see Moore, supra note 226, at 862-63 (arguments supporting review for mandamus also support review under collateral order rule; review under collateral order rule preferable because mandamus may impose higher standard).

256. See, e.g., Pepsico, Inc. v. command an official to perform a specific act that arises from a public duty,[257] or to confine a court to lawful exercise of its prescribed jurisdiction.[258] Issuance of the writ is traditionally limited to extraordinary circumstances,[259] however, and several conditions governing mandamus limit its use for review of disqualification denials and the comprehensiveness of review under the writ.

One limitation on use of the writ of mandamus is that the writ can be used only to "compel an officer to perform a purely ministerial duty."[260] A writ of mandamus may be issued to confine judges to their jurisdictional powers or to compel them to exercise their judicial authority, but it cannot be used to compel action within judicial discretion.[261] Mandamus may be issued, however, where the discretionary duty is limited and the official has abused that discretion by transgressing those limits.[262]

"Abuse of discretion" is the standard of review that is generally applied to section 455 motions on appeal.[263] Thus, this requirement of mandamus raises questions, which are also present in post-trial review of disqualification denials, regarding the amount of discretion judges actually have over disqualification and what constitutes abuse of this discretion. If the judge's discretion is limited, review is possible under a writ of mandamus and more comprehensive at any stage.

Establishment of abuse of discretion as the standard of review for section 455 decisions occurred prior to the 1974 decision when disqualification was completely discretionary.[264] When Congress revised section 455, it made disqualification mandatory, rather than discretionary, when a reasonable person would question the judge's impartiality.[265] Yet the House of Representatives' commentary on the revised bill suggested that section 455 decisions would continue to be reviewed under the abuse of discretion standard.[266] The House report stated that "[t]he issue of disqualification is a sensitive question of assessing all the facts and circumstances in order to determine whether the failure to disqualify was an abuse of sound judicial discretion."[267]

On the basis of the House report, appellate courts generally have applied the abuse of discretion standard to section 455 questions with little consideration of what discretion the district court should exercise.[268] Occasionally, appellate courts have displayed discomfort with broad discretion by focusing on the substantive issue in a case, thoroughly evaluating the evidence, independently assessing reasonableness, and stating their conclusions without any reference to abuse of discretion.[269]

Recently, the Seventh Circuit directly questioned the abuse of discretion standard in United States v. Balistrieri,[270] and rejected it as an inappropriate standard for appellate evaluation of section 455(b)(1) decisions.[271] The court held that review of a disqualification denial should not be deferential because a disqualification motion "puts into issue the integrity of the court's judgment" and places adjudicators in the role of judges of their own cause.[272]

The Balistrieri court's position has appeal because it addresses the most troublesome aspect of the disqualification process, the requirement that a judge under attack make an "objective" assessment of his personal, emotional involvement. In addition, the Balistrieri court's position rests on the argument frequently used to support mandamus jurisdiction—the responsibility of the courts of appeals to supervise and maintain the integrity of the judicial system.[273] The court did not, however, address the fact that plenary review of disqualification is in conflict with the congressional commentary on the standard of review,[274] and contrary to the general practice of the courts.[275]

Although the position taken by the Balistrieri court is extreme, consideration of the congressional statement in context suggests that appellate courts should not be wholly deferential to district court judges who have denied a disqualification motion. The House Report called on appellate courts to assess "all the facts and circumstances" of a disqualification issue at the same time that it referred to "sound judicial discretion,"[276] thus suggesting that the court's review should be comprehensive. Furthermore, Congress severely constricted judicial discretion over disqualification in revising section 455. This is evidenced by the fact that there is no discretion if the circumstances of a case fit within one of the categories in section 455(b), which mandates disqualification without exception.[277] Although judges have some discretion in their evaluation of the evidence under the objective standard of section 455(a), their evaluation is limited by the low threshold of proof set by Congress and by guidelines set by the appellate courts.[278] Moreover, when reasonable grounds for disqualification exist disqualification is mandatory.[279] The discretion of the district court is thus narrowly circumscribed and subject to the supervision of the courts of appeals.

Other limitations on issuance of the writ of mandamus restrict its availability. One limitation is that the writ is generally not available when appeal from final judgment provides an adequate remedy.[280] The Fifth Circuit has denied the writ on the grounds that appeal provided an adequate remedy for failure to disqualify.[281] The majority of courts have held, however, that review of disqualification denials prior to final judgment is critical to the judicial system, if not to the litigant.[282]

A more significant barrier to obtaining disqualification by means of a writ of mandamus is that litigants are required to show that their right to issuance of the writ is "clear and indisputable."[283] It is possible to interpret this requirement as necessitating no more than a finding of abuse of discretion.[284] But the

The Seventh Circuit has settled the issue of whether appeal provides an adequate remedy by denying the post-trial appealability of § 455(a) disqualification motions and making mandamus the only remedy. need to show a clear and indisputable right has also been interpreted as imposing a higher standard of review.[285] Following disqualification denials, courts of appeals generally require a non-frivolous claim for disqualification[286] and require that bias be "clearly and indisputably" established.[287]

The limited scope of discretion in disqualification decisions and the courts' general interpretation of mandamus requirements suggest that limitations on mandamus do not preclude interlocutory review of disqualification motions in federal courts. Courts have, in fact, advocated liberal interpretation of their powers of review under the writ in disqualification matters as a measure essential to preserving the integrity of the court.[288] Actual disqualification by means of the writ is subject to the clear and indisputable right requirement, however. Thus the writ can be used to correct clearly wrongful refusals but it may not be available for routine review. As a result, mandamus review cannot be relied on to ensure the participation of an adjudicator other than the challenged judge in the disqualification decision.

CONCLUSION

The goals of fairness and public confidence in the judiciary are not fully met by current disqualification practices. Mandamus provides a means for courts of appeals to supervise and set standards for clear abuse of discretion, but it does not provide for the routine involvement of an independent adjudicator in the disqualification process.[289] To make objective disqualification more meaningful, Congress should act either to amend section 455 to provide for transfer of the disqualification motion to another adjudicator at the district court level[290] or provide for immediate and comprehensive appellate review of disqualification denials without the restrictions imposed on review under the writ of mandamus.[291]

In a line of cases beginning in 1943, the United States Supreme Court develoed a doctrine that exempts certain state action from the operation of the fedeal antitrust laws.[1] In the seminal case of Parker v. Brown,[2] the Supreme Court held that Congress did not intend that the Sherman Antitrust Act[3] ("Sherman Act") should apply to sovereign state action.[4] Similarly, the Court recognized a "state action defense" in a series of cases involving anticompetitive conduct by state supreme courts,[5] state agencies,[6] municipalities,[7] and private parties[8] who Plumer analysis involves a determination as to whether a rule is substantive or procedural.

For the constitutional provision for a federal court system (augmented by the necessary and proper clause) carries with it congressional power to make rules governing the practice and pleading in those courts, which in turn includes a power to regulate matters which, though falling within the uncertain area between substance and procedure, are rationally capable of classification as either.

Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. at 472, 85 S.Ct. at 1144. Plaintiffs in this case make no showing that the classification of Rule 81(c) as procedural is not rationally based and this Court finds no basis upon which to so hold.

Accordingly, it is ORDERED that Plaintiffs' Motion for Jury Trial be, and is hereby, DENIED.

So ORDERED.

THE DELICATE DICHOTOMIES OF JUDICIAL ETHICS

by

CHIEF JUDGE HOWARD T. MARKEY

"Judicial Ethics" has become a growth industry. Dean McKay has pointed out that "The ethical expectations of the public have risen more rapidly than the perception of judges of what is expected of them." In 1960 there were five literary articles published on judicial ethics. In 1975, there were thirty. Congress has enacted "The Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980," (Discipline Act) establishing a mechanism for receiving and acting on complaints of judicial misconduct. Congress also passed the "Ethics in Government Act," over-named because it requires only that judges and others publicly disclose their financial status and that of their families once a year. The Judicial Conference of the United States has adopted a "Code of Judicial Conduct for United States Judges," (App. A) and has charged an Advisory Committee of thirteen judges with the triple task of advising inquiring individual judges on ethical questions, publishing opinions on ethics for guidance of all judges, and recommending changes in the Code to the Conference. Many states have established similar advisory bodies.

An expanded, and expanding, public interest in judicial ethics should surprise no one. The federal judiciary is currently at the height of its power and influence. Federal judges not only send people to jail, and make people pay large sums, and decide disputes between A and B—they tell whole classes of people, and cities, and states, and presidents, what they can and cannot do—and they do that almost every day.

It is important to federal judges as well that the public look at judicial ethics and be satisfied with what it sees. It is a requirement absolute that federal judges enjoy a reputation for adherence to the highest ethical standards, for that is the bedrock of their power and influence. Without it they would be impotent. As we all know, the judiciary has no armies. Its ability to render justice, to protect the people's liberties against abuse by any group and by the other branches of government, to cement the public's adherence to the law—all depend on its lifeblood: respect for its moral authority, the only authority it has.

That respect must be earned. It doesn't come with the title, "Judge," or with "Your Honor," or with the robe, or with the Bench, which are but its symbols, important and necessary, but symbols nonetheless. Respect cannot, of course, be ordered, bought, or assumed. It cannot for long be simply granted. Respect must be—and can only be—earned.

Neither is it surprising that every judicial misstep, apparent or real, makes headlines. Nor is that practice all bad. Judges who object should ask themselves whether they would want a federal judiciary in which judicial misconduct was so commonplace as not to be newsworthy. Of course it is sad that, when our burgeoning communications enable the peccadillos of one judge to be seen by millions on TV, the American public's tendency to generalize results in a nationwide tarnishing of the judicial image. That tendency, plus the advent and growth of the investigative reporting phenomenon—reporting only failures, never triumphs—makes the smallest apparent anthill of judicial misconduct a mountain to be climbed by other judges in earning respect for the judiciary. An outstanding judge was denied elevation on the expressed ground that he had reflected an insensitivity to general ethical considerations, by participating in a case in which his family financial interest may have been at least minimally involved. In-house publications, like "Judicature," "The Judges' Journal," and the American and Federal Bar Journals, have periodically carried articles on judicial ethics. The ferment proves the prescience of the Commentary to Canon 2 of the Code of Judicial Conduct in its warning that judges should expect to be "the subject of constant public scrutiny."

The widespread, intense interest in the conduct of judges has many causes, among them the expanded judicial role in the affairs of the people described above, the Justice Fortas affair, and the Watergate syndrome. With "U.S. News and World Report" reporting that 26,000,000 law suits were filed in this country last year, a disinterest in judicial ethics would be impossible. Whatever the cause, however, that increased interest in itself is all to the good. Sunlight can be a great cure. What may be coming clear now, after the early forays, is that some actions taken toward assured saintliness may have been excessive. The aftermath of Watergate may have led to a spasm reaction, unrecognized as such at the time. Improperly handled, sunlight can produce cancer. Hence it was a happy election of The Roscoe Pound—American Trial Lawyers Foundation to address at its 1982 Earl Warren Conference the issues associated with "Ethics in Government." The subject is seen as particularly apt when one recalls that Chief Justice Warren, like the present Chief Justice, took a strong personal interest in the ethics of Bench and Bar.

It would be comforting, but unrealistic, to suppose that ethical conduct of judges is a subject without issues. Ethical principles, like all true principles, may themselves be unchallengeable. It is in their application to specific conduct that discomforting issues are present. The need for value trade-offs, mostly unforeseen when ethical codes and statutes were being adopted, arises when the judge confronts a match-up of an ethical principle or a Code provision with contemplated conduct. It would be nice to think that promulgation of Codes and Statutes, and expected, rigid adherence thereto by all judges all the time, would solve the problem. It would be easy, in responding to a judge's "can I ethically do this?" to merely read a code or statute and always say "No." In a pluralistic, complex society, with numerous competing interests and values, that easy course is rarely open. There are too many delicate dichotomies.

I do not, of course, speak for the federal judiciary, or for the Advisory Committee. My purpose here is to describe, in general and nonexhaustive terms, some of the delicate dichotomies present in considering the ethics of the Judicial branch of government. Others will surely occur to the reader. The conflict content of some may be seen as either greater or less than that envisaged here. In all events, solutions appear needed to problems represented by at least some of the troubling choices outlined.

INDEPENDENCE v. ACCOUNTABILITY

Federal judges are constitutionally appointed to serve "during good behavior." The practical effect of that provision in Article III is that federal judges, absent an impeachable offense, may hold their office "for life."

That the constitutional provision serves as a protection of the people, not the judges, was recognized in Bradley v. Fisher.[1] Nonetheless, the presumed inability of "the system" to deal with judicial misconduct short of that warranting impeachment, and the impracticalities attending the impeachment process, have led some to question the wisdom of appointing federal judges "for life." Historically, the questioning has surfaced when judicial decisions have displeased a fair segment of the public and its political representatives, leading often to suggestions that federal judges be subject to reappointment every 10 or 12 years. That dislike for decisions phenomenon, thought by some to be alive today, and to the extent that it seeks to control judicial decisionmaking, constitutes perhaps the greatest threat to the constitutional principle of judicial independence, for it appears directed at the very purpose of the principle.

It is too easy to say judges should be independent in decisionmaking but accountable for the ethics of every other activity in their lives, and stop there. It may well be true in principle. It can be very difficult in application. One must define terms. Accountable to whom? Under what sanctions? Does "accountable" mean "removable" for less than an impeachable offense?

The present-day question is not, or should not be, whether judicial accountability requires creation of an alternative to impeachment as a means of removing judges from office. The real question is, or should be, whether accountability for misconduct or unfitness can be achieved by other means. That effort is not aided when the "independence" of federal judges is equated with a blanket, absolute, "unaccountability." Interestingly, the equation appears in the approach made by supporters and opponents of judicial independence.

1. 80 U.S. (13 Wall) 335 at 349–50, 20 L.Ed. 646.

Though directed at preserving limitation of removal to the established impeachment process, Judge Irving R. Kaufman's perceptive article, "Chilling Judicial Independence" [2] encompasses the view that making judges accountable, even to their judicial peers and for non-impeachable conduct, would so chip away at independence as to warrant rejection of even that limited accountability. Beyond validity of the attribution, it is at least possible to conceive of circumstances under which a judge who had been "disciplined" (short of removal) by his or her colleagues might thereafter feel fear of consequences in decisionmaking. Judge Kaufman makes that point directly in "The Essence of Judicial Independence." [3] Unfortunately, ad hominem derogations of their colleagues' decisions appearing in dissents and concurrences lend credence to the view that judges could (though there is no evidence they ever have) equate "bad" decisionmaking with "bad" conduct warranting some form of "discipline."

Some judges—happily few—nay, very few—whose peccadillos have graced the front page have either stated or implied that no person, body, or institution (other than Congress by impeachment) has a right even to question their conduct, however egregious that conduct may have been. At the moment, the press reports an indicted federal judge as maintaining that he cannot be indicted or tried for a crime until after he has been impeached by the House and convicted by the Senate (an approach that does not appear to have occurred to Judges Kerner and Manton, the former resigning his office after conviction, the latter just before trial, or to readers of United States v. Isaacs.[4])

The equating of unaccountability with independence by supporters of judicial independence is joined by its opponents, who find unaccountability an easier target, and who often take it another step by equating unaccountability with unelectability. Only by rendering judges "accountable" to the public through the electoral process, say these opponents, can judges be made to correlate their decisions and their conduct with "current societal mores." It does not appear to have occurred to those particular opponents that judges were made to correlate their decisions with current societal mores in Hitler's Germany, as well as in King George's England.

Lest it be thought that no judge sees accommodation possible between maintenance of the constitutional independence of federal judges and creation of a mechanism for their accountability, Chief Judge Edward D. Re published his "Judicial Independence and Accountability: The Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980." [5] In that article, Judge Re opposes the views expressed by Judge Kaufman in "The Essence of Judicial Independence," supporting what he sees in the Act as a clear separation of independence and accountability, and pointing up the need for both in our modern, complex democracy.

Ethical considerations come into play, in the independence-accountability dichotomy, in a variety of ways. Almost, if not all, "violations" of the Code of Conduct for Federal Judges are grist for the mill of "accountability" advocates. Obviously, a judge considered totally unaccountable for his or her conduct, except perhaps to God and history, would have neither need for nor interest in any ethical code or guidance. On the other hand, a judge worthy of canonization would so instinctively conform his or her conduct at all times to the highest of ethical principles as to require no ethical code or guidance. Fact is, of course, that judges are human and thus fallible beings. As such, they are subject to the same temptations toward insensitivity, arrogance, concupiscence, greed, pride, inattentiveness-to-all-but-work, and the like, that have plagued mankind since Adam's day.

That judges have adopted a Code and have established and are continuously using an advisory process, and that Congress in the Discipline Act has provided, with formal acquiescence of the judicial branch, a mechanism for public complaints of judicial misconduct, speak well for the notion that judges are presently holding themselves "accountable" for their conduct outside or separate from their decisionmaking. Though there is no method for removing a federal judge for unethical behavior short of that warranting impeachment, the Discipline Act does provide for public complaint and action by judicial councils against such behavior. In this sense, the Act is designed to spotlight accountability of judges for their ethics, and, at the same time, to preserve the independence and autonomy of the judiciary. The question comes on whether judicial compliance with procedures under the Act (App. B), will supply sufficient accountability, and be sufficiently seen as doing so, to destroy what is now seen by some as a dichotomy between judicial independence and judicial accountability.

ISOLATION v. INVOLVEMENT

In a seeming paradox, the American public is currently and simultaneously demanding (1) that judges through their judging get more and more involved in the management of society; and (2) that judges, when they are not judging, be more and more isolated from society.

The demand for increased judicial imposition has stemmed in part from frustration with what is viewed as legislative and executive failures to act, as well as from statutes establishing broad societal goals, giving government agencies broad authority to act toward those goals, and creating new causes of action in favor of anyone dissatisfied with agency action. That is not to say that all judges have been dragged kicking and screaming into the social management morass. Some have. Others have cheerfully rushed in, out of a compelling sense of duty to decide and a perceived call to render justice.

The demand for isolation is not so described, but is inherent in the increased interest in the ethical conduct of judges engendered by post-Watergate disenchantment with officialdom in general and from highly publicized incidents of apparent misconduct by three federal and three or four state judges. That the numbers are small is not a compelling argument against a demand for ethical conduct and guideline codes to serve as aids in defining that conduct. The small-number factor does, however, raise a caveat concerning the value trade-off involved in the isolation of judges. Query: If total isolation of all judges from all societal contact off the Bench would guarantee a totally ethical judiciary, what would be the cost?

The increased involvement of judges in the management of society's affairs through judicial decisions is not the involvement intended for discussion here. The current reaction to what is viewed in some quarters as "judicial activism" and "the imperial judiciary" will in time work toward some semblance of balance in measuring the roles of our judicial, legislative, and executive branches of government.

The involvement intended for discussion here is that of the individual judge and his family as persons in the everyday affairs of the community. It is from that arena that ethical considerations have served, and are serving, to isolate federal judges. The dichotomy arises from the felt need of judges for familiarity with the affairs of men and women beyond that gleanable from TV and newspapers, and insofar as that familiarity would assist in decisionmaking. Judges in their judging must on occasion ignore public clamor, current fads, and what may be asserted by vociferous groups to be "modern societal mores." To do that they must be independent. But that is not to say that judges should be attempting to interpret and apply the law to a society of strangers. Absent some fair level of familiarity, the language and thrust of judicial decisions could appear to be so far ahead or behind the march of society as to cause the people to be "turned off," to cause the people to simply disregard judicial decisions because they seem just too "far out." It is unlikely, for example, that the people would, or with safety could, put all their eggs in a judicial basket carried by a man or woman from outer space, or newly arrived from outer Mongolia. The example emphasizes with exaggeration, but not too much, for most of the Canons in the Code of Conduct for Federal Judges deal with and tend to limit the involvement of the judge as a person in community affairs. Further, the opinions published by the Advisory Committee of the Judicial Conference have supplied similarly limiting interpretation and applications of the Code.

Under the Code, the Commentaries to the Code, and the published Advisory Opinions, for example, a federal judge should not:

1. Do anything that may interfere with performance of his or her judicial duties.
2. Do anything that may enable others, or appear to enable others, to exploit his or her judicial position.
3. Volunteer as a character witness.
4. Initiate recommendations of others for appointment, promotion, parole, admission to school, etc.

5. Join certain types of clubs.
6. Do any fund raising of any kind for any organization or purpose whatsoever.
7. Join any organization that is a potential litigant or financer of litigation.
8. Increase the bases for disqualification by associating with former partners and lawyer-friends, or by making certain investments.
9. Sit in a case in which his or her impartiality might "reasonably be questioned," and shall absolutely not sit when any one of some 14 specific circumstances exist.
10. Advise a trustee of a family estate on investments, unless the judge had a close familial relationship with the deceased.
11. Testify on legislation as a citizen. Testimony as a judge and on legislation dealing with the courts and administration of justice is alone permissible.
12. Speak, be a guest of honor, or accept an award, at any fund raising event.
13. Engage in financial or business dealings with lawyers or persons likely to come before his or her court.
14. Serve as officer, director, partner, manager, advisor, or employee of a business or corporation.
15. Accept any gift, favor, or loan, except under specified, very limited circumstances.
16. Serve as executor, administrator, trustee, or guardian of any trust or estate, except that of a family member, and then only if the trust or estate is not likely to come before the judge.
17. Act as arbitrator or mediator, or practice law, or accept appointment to a non-judicial governmental committee or commission, local, state, or federal.
18. Advise any member of the legislative or executive branches on any subject.
19. Serve on the board of a community legal aid bureau.
20. Serve as co-trustee of a pension trust.
21. Fail to report to the public all of his or her income and investments and those of the judge's family.
22. Lead or hold office in any political organization, local, state, or federal.
23. Speak for or endorse any political candidate.
24. Contribute money to any political organization or candidate.
25. Attend or buy tickets for political gatherings.
26. Run for political office without first resigning his or her judicial office.

27. Fail to caution a spouse against appearance of involvement of the judge in the spouse's political activities.
28. Lunch once a year at a political club.
29. Serve as counsel to a local United Way charity.
30. Hire as law clerk the child of another judge of the court.
31. Attend an educational seminar financed by frequently litigating corporations.

The foregoing list is by no means exhaustive. The list of "no-no's" would grow beyond the limits of this short paper if it were to include the advice given in confidence to the hundreds of judges who have submitted specific inquiries to the Advisory Committee, which publishes its opinions only in relation to repetitive situations likely to be encountered by most or all judges. The list appears of sufficient length and breadth, however, to warrant discussion of the isolation-involvement dichotomy.

PRESUMPTION OF IMPARTIALITY v. PRESUMPTION OF PARTIALITY

In talking, about five years ago, with a judge of the High Court of England, an American judge exhibited shock when the British judge said his son had argued a case before him. Noting the American's expression, the British judge in turn expressed shock that anyone might even question the impartiality of a judge of the High Court on the mere and sole premise that his son represented one side. The American responded that the same was probably true in the earlier days of his country, but it is true no more.

The view that justice includes the appearance of justice has increasingly gained adherents over the years, until it is now accepted wisdom. The appearance of justice is today seen not as separate from, but as an integral part of justice itself. John P. MacKenzie, now of the New York Times, set forth the rational basis for that view in the clearest terms in his book "The Appearance of Justice." It simply is not enough that justice be actually done. It must be seen to have been done. Our British friend felt free to sit in his son's case precisely because his public would not, apparently, view that event as raising even the possibility that injustice would be done by the judge. On this side of the Atlantic, the public has acquired what some would call a more realistic view of human nature. Others might call the American view jaundiced. In any case, we seem to think it not only possible but probable, if not certain, that a judge sitting in his son's case would either favor his son's client or, because our public is "realistically suspicious," the judge would lean overmuch the other way to avoid an appearance of doing so. It was not always so.

The great Chief Justice Marshall, without quibble or concern, sat on the appeal of decisions he had rendered as trial judge and served a role as Secretary of State in the midnight Judge Scenario that led to his justly famous decision in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 2 L.Ed. 60.

As now documented by Bruce Murphy in "The Brandeis-Frankfurter Connection," those famous and familiar justices of more recent days apparently felt perfectly free to participate up to their elbows in political appointments and political policy-making while on the Bench. That the latter were active in recent times may account for what may have been an attempt to protect the Court, an attempt evidenced by their yeoman efforts to mask their political activities. Though those efforts may indicate that concern for judicial ethics was beginning to be felt in America during and post World War II, that concern was obviously not yet of sufficient strength, or sufficiently widespread, to cause Justices Brandeis and Frankfurter to refrain from or even limit their political activities. Indeed, Murphy ends "Connection" with a quasi-absolution of the two justices on the ground that they had no reason to expect exposure and thus no reason to fear injury to the Court. Given the absence of investigative reporters and widespread public interest in judicial ethics, such an expectation of the justices was reasonable and the cover-up efforts documented in the book were in fact successful at the time.

What may now be seen as a past public faith in American judges may have been something quite different. It may have been mere apathy, aided by lack of communications and minimal contact with the courts as compared with today's litigious society. In any event if it did previously exist here, a public presumption of impartiality cannot be expected to return as part of America's view of its judges. The problem now is to consider whether we are in danger of going, or may have already gone, too far in the direction of a public presumption of partiality.

It is not too much to say that most persons tend to live up, or down, to the reputation given them and to do the expected. There may be something to be said for the proposition that judges should be given at least an initial presumption of rectitude, if not quite the presumption of innocence given those indicted for crimes. Do we run the risk of attracting less than the best to the Bench if we confront them throughout their remaining lives with our expressed expectation that they are likely to act unethically? Is it enough to say that the best would have nothing to fear from that expectation? It may yet be too early to tell, but perhaps a continuing study of the effect of such an expectation on judges' lives, on their self-image, on refusals of the best to accept appointments, and on resignations, would be justified.

Canon 3 C(1) and 28 U.S.C. § 455(a) say, for example, that a judge is disqualified if his or her impartiality might "reasonably" be questioned. What means "reasonably"? 28 U.S.C. § 455(b) says the judge is absolutely disqualified if he or she or a family member in the household has an involved financial interest "however small." Whether it is reasonable to expect that a judge will violate his or her oath of office for ten cents is irrelevant under 28 U.S.C. § 455(b). The irrebuttable presumption of partiality in section (b) thus tends to be carried into applications of the general section (a) and to interpretations of "reasonably" in that section.

It would, of course, be possible to establish a presumption that judges act honorably and ethically. Certainly the vast majority of judges work daily toward that end. Canon 1 recognizes that it is the conduct of judges that either preserves or destroys the perceived integrity and the continued independence of the judiciary. It does seem unfair, though doubtless inevitable, that "the judiciary," and all its members, are tarnished when one judge goes astray. It seems even more unfair when an individual judge, after twenty-five years of outstanding, totally ethical service, is presumed incapable of rendering justice in a case in which his wife has inherited .00000000012% of the stock of Exxon (an actual case). It may also be unwise, for the taxpayers must arrange to replace that judge in that case, and, multiplied by the hundreds, the time and paperwork costs seem excessive.

Last year, Federal District Judge Muecke was forced by 28 U.S.C. § 455(b) to step aside after years and years of presiding over a complex anti-trust class action, when it was learned that his wife owned a few shares in one of some 2000 corporate parties identified long after the suit was filed. In doing so, he issued a lengthy memorandum opinion outlining what can only be here called the unwisdom of the "however small" provision in section 455(b). He pointed out that a new judge and the parties would have to virtually "start over," down a road already paved with massive expenditures of time and money by the parties and the taxpayers. Having made the calculations, he included in his memorandum a statement that the maximum possible effect on his wife's financial interests could not, under even a worst-case scenario, exceed $4.69!

Because of section 455(b) and the public disclosure of judge-and-family stockholdings required by the "Ethics in Government Act," lawyers are enabled to implead or intervene an applicable corporation, or arrange filing by a corporate amicus curiae, at a late stage, should things appear to be going badly before the presiding judge. Because the judge or the judge's family owns stock in that corporation, the lawyers may thereby acquire a new judge and a fresh start. There are no studies and no proofs that this maneuver is yet widespread, but the events in certain cases raise a strong basis for the belief that it has been carried out in some cases, where the stock ownership of the judge and the availability of the right corporation dovetailed. Whether yet widely used, it is obviously available in some cases, and a lawyer's dedication to what is perceived as the client's interest will lead to its use in some of those cases.[6]

The Judicial Conference of the United States has submitted to the Congress a proposed amendment to section 455(b), which would permit a

6. Some judges have simply divested themselves of all stockholdings in corporations, in an effort "to avoid the problem." Others are unable to do so, either because of heavy attendant losses and taxes, or because the stock is owned by a spouse or household family member who declines the invitation to divestment. Query: if no judge or judge's family owned any stock in any American corporation, what would be the effect of that further isolation from society's affairs (in this instance, its economic affairs)?

judge to weigh the public interest present in his decision to step aside or continue with the case. The amendment would apply only in certain limited circumstances. Congress has thus far been too involved with other matters to take any action whatever on the proposal. The proposal is but a tiny inroad on the presumption of partiality inherent in the requirement that a judge recuse himself to avoid being influenced by $4.69. It does not, of course, destroy the dichotomy between presumptions of impartiality and partiality.

Perhaps the move now should be toward such revisions in the Code and Statutes as would tend toward some diminution in the presumption of partiality and at least some slight movement, where feasible, toward a salutory presumption of impartiality.

APPEARANCE v. REALITY

The dichotomy between presumptions of impartiality and partiality exists on a "wholesale" level. At the "retail" level, where individual judges confront specific circumstances, a dichotomy between appearance and reality resides.

As above indicated, the appearance of justice cannot be divorced from justice itself. A corollary has grown up: "the appearance of unethical conduct cannot be divorced from the conduct itself." Perhaps ninety-five percent of the work of the Advisory Committee on Codes of Conduct deals with "appearance" questions. When contemplated conduct is advised against, it is almost always because that conduct could reasonably present to a watching and suspicious public, or to a segment thereof, the appearance of impropriety, or the appearance that the judge may be partial, or may be subject to an influence, or may be advancing the private or political interests of a person or party, or may have made an appointment on a basis other than merit, or may have an interest in the outcome of a case before him. Similarly, when the Committee advises that no ethical impediment precludes the conduct, it is almost invariably because no such appearance is reasonably possible.

In either case, the reality is irrelevant. The question is rarely whether the conduct is itself unethical. Most if not all unethical conduct is rejected out of hand by judges and no inquiry to the Committee is necessary or useful. No doubt a judge knowingly engaged in clearly unethical conduct, if such judge there be, would not be likely to seek the advice of the Committee. The inquiring judge, in most instances has determined that the contemplated conduct would probably be in fact fully ethical, but seeks the Committee's advice respecting the appearance aspect. Similarly, the Committee has often specifically recognized the ethical purity of the conduct in question, while advising against its undertaking because of the appearances that step would create.

Does it matter that judges are precluded from what is otherwise ethical conduct because that conduct might reasonably create an untoward facade or appearance? It does to some judges. In the throes of accepting the code and some of its provisions, some judges, certain of their own rectitude, objected to the very concept of a code. That position was variously stated, extending from an assertion that some provisions violated a judge's First Amendment right of free association, to the more common assertion that the code was simply unnecessary, because the conduct of most judges already matched its provisions, and that any expectedly rare infraction could be dealt with on a case-by-case basis. The last was based on a quasi-burden of proof approach, i.e., if someone had any reason to think a particular judge was acting improperly it was up to that person to come forward and assert such charges as were thought appropriate, while the other judges went on acting properly, without codes, advisory opinions, and committees. Recognizing the existence of earlier codes, the burgeoning public interest in the ethics of government officials, including judges, and a need for some guidance, at the very least to aid new judges, the Judicial Conference adopted the present Code in April, 1973.

Though judges have, as above noted, fully accepted the code and advisory system, the notion that, "I know I am doing right. I have been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Why can't I be trusted?" has not entirely died, particularly among the more experienced judges who add a reference to their years of distinguished and totally ethical service on the Bench. Alongside that notion may be placed the concept, quietly and privately expressed by a tiny minority of small but roughly equal numbers of both experienced and inexperienced judges, that judges should be judged solely on their performance as judges. Holders of the latter concept readily accept guidelines relating to their demeanor in court, their treatment of litigants, counsel and witnesses, their work habits, and in general their approach to the work of judging. To them those are the realities, and the only realities, to which ethical considerations should apply. To them it doesn't matter with whom a judge associates (barring criminals and the like), or which clubs he joins, or whether he sits in a case involving a corporation in which he owns substantial stock or in which his recent partner and continuing good friend appears as counsel. Certain of their ability to judge with integrity and impartiality regardless of circumstances, to comply with their oaths of office even when compliance injures their interests, they find it at least somewhat incongruous for the courts to hold that homosexuality, communist party membership, and similar circumstances do not warrant denial of government employment unless the circumstance affects the person's performance on the job, while judges are assumed to be "incapable" of "doing their job" on the basis of mere appearances.

I hasten to add that even the tiny minority desiring to be judged solely on job performance have accepted the Code and are complying with it. They simply view it as unnecessary and somewhat demeaning.

Those entertaining the "performance on the Bench is all that counts" concept would, in any event, be likely to find few adherents to that concept among other judges and virtually none among today's general public. First, judging is not merely a "job," like plumbing, or carpentering, or whatever. Judges are given the privileged joy of working at the heartbeat of a free society, the law. They deal daily with society's most precious asset, justice. The property, the liberty, the fortunes, and the very lives of citizens, are often in their hands. In the dichotomy of appearances and realities, the public's current approach to its judges does not permit it to perceive that justice is being done if the public be limited to observation of the performance of the judge qua judge. Few of the public understand the judicial process or are capable of distinguishing the good judge from the poor solely on the quality of his or her judging. For much of the public, appearances are all it has to go by. It is conceivable, for example, that a judge might do an outstanding "job" on the Bench, while appearing drunk in a public bar three nights a week, but few if any of the public would believe it—and the few who might would still prefer that their judges, however good their judicial performance, not be chosen from drunkards. In virtually every instance of reasonably asserted conflict between unethical appearances and ethical realities, appearances must win.

There is, however, some hope for at least a partial resolution of the appearances—realities dichotomy. Passage of the Discipline Act may serve to ameliorate both public and judicial concern for what to some may appear an overemphasis on appearances and an unwarranted disregard of realities. It has the potential for stripping away appearances and unearthing the underlying realities, whatever the latter may be.

The Act expands the powers and duties of the Judicial Councils of the Circuits. It requires the Chief Judge of each circuit to call a meeting of the circuit judicial council at least twice a year. It provides for selection of council members, to include district judges. If the number of circuit judges is less than six, the number of district court judges must be at least two. If the number of circuit judges is more than six, the number of district court judges must be at least three. The council is authorized to hold hearings, receive testimony and issue subpoenas. The Act requires that all judicial officers and employees of the circuit "promptly carry into effect all orders of the judicial council."

Under the Act, "any person" may complain that a circuit or district judge, a bankruptcy judge, or a magistrate "has engaged in conduct prejudicial to the effective and expeditious administration of the business of the courts, or ... that such a judge or magistrate is unable to discharge all the duties of office by reason of mental or physical disability." The complaint must be written and filed with Clerk of the Court of Appeals of the circuit. The complaint is then transmitted by the Clerk to the Chief Judge of the circuit.

The Chief Judge may dismiss those complaints not addressed to conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice or disability, those complaints directed to the merits of a case or a procedural ruling, and those complaints that are clearly frivolous.[7] He may conclude the proceeding if "appropriate corrective action has been taken" by the Chief Judge.

When the Chief Judge dismisses a complaint, copies of his written order are sent to the complainant and to the judge or magistrate complained against. When the Chief Judge decides that the complaint requires investigation, he appoints himself and other judges to a "special committee to investigate the facts and allegations." To preserve their rights, the judge and complainant are given notice in writing of the committee's actions.

The judicial council receives a "comprehensive written report" of the special committee's investigation and recommendations. The council may then conduct "any additional investigation which it considers to be necessary," and "shall take such action as is appropriate to assure the effective and expeditious administration of the business of the courts." The council may take one or more different actions, including: certifying disability of the judge; requesting voluntary retirement; ordering a temporary halt in assignment of cases to the judge; private or public censure or reprimand; and "such other action as it considers appropriate," except removal from office of an Article III judge. The parties receive written notice of the council's actions.

In more serious cases, the council may refer the complaint and its recommendations to the Judicial Conference of the United States. When the council has determined that a judge's conduct "might constitute grounds for impeachment," the council must refer the matter to the Judicial Conference of the United States. Written notice of a referral to the Conference must be given to the parties "unless contrary to the interests of justice."

The Judicial Conference may take any action takeable by the councils, and may transmit the record to the House of Representatives when impeachment is a possibility.

Complainants, judges, or magistrates aggrieved by final orders of a Chief Judge or a judicial council may petition the judicial council or the Judicial Conference of the United States for review. Denials of such petitions are final, safeguarding the judge from harassment, and binding a sanctioned judge to the decision.

The judicial councils have prescribed procedural rules for carrying out the Act (App. B). The rules guarantee the judge prior written notice of any investigation, and allow the judge to appear at proceedings, present evidence, compel attendance of witnesses and present oral and written evidence and argument. The rules may allow complainants to appear at proceedings "if the panel concludes that the complainant could offer substantial information." The rules are made public record, and available from the Clerk of Court, to facilitate their use by the public.

The act is not intended to establish an adversary procedure. It does not require that the complainant be given a hearing, or the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses. The council investigates the complaint and controls the inquiry as appropriate under the circumstances. The proceeding is intended to be "inquisitorial-administrative" rather than "accusatorial-adversary."

Perhaps the most important provision of the Act is its recognition of the need to preserve judicial independence. By providing a complaint mechanism operated entirely by and within the judiciary, and by specifically denying removal action except by impeachment, the Act makes clear that inroads on judicial independence are not intended.

The Act also seeks to preserve independence of judicial decisionmaking by providing for summary dismissal of complaints directed against judgments and procedural rulings. It has been said that the availability of an appeal from district court judgments, and of petitions for rehearing, rehearing en banc, and certiorari in relation to appellate court judgments, make redundant the Act's separation of complaints on subject matter properly assertable by appeal or petition. If so, a little redundancy cannot hurt the setting up of this new and potentially sensitive complaint mechanism, particularly when the redundancy is directed toward judicial independence. Moreover, summary dismissal by the circuit Chief Judge frees the judge complained of from the interruption of the judge's judicial work that would occur if the judge were required to review and respond to such complaints.

Like most legislative efforts, the Act is not a panacea. Questions respecting its implementation surfaced almost immediately upon its passage. In "The New Federal Judicial Discipline Act: Some Questions Congress Didn't Answer," [8] Eric Neisser asked numerous questions: What constitutes a council "meeting" and "quorum"? Must the chief judge preside? What are and who sets the terms for council membership? Who chooses the method of selecting council members? Who decides on inability of a council member to serve? What can be done if one refuses to obey a council order? How does the government itself file a complaint? Are anonymous complaints permissible? Are impeachable and criminal offenses proper subjects for this mechanism? What if any time limits are intended by "promptly" and "expeditiously" and how can a complainant confront dilatoriness? Who can serve on an investigating committee and on its staff? Are that committee's findings binding on the council? Can a council impose more than one sanction, or conduct more than one proceeding, for the same Act? How can the requirement for publication of orders be reconciled with the provision for a "private" reprimand? Can or should disciplinary orders be stayed? Who can serve on the Judicial Conference of the United States' standing committee? What rules will be applicable to the review procedure?

Doubtless other questions will arise as the councils gain experience with the Act. Legislative modification may also be indicated. For our purposes here, it is enough to note that one probable effect of procedures under the act is to nudge the public's approach to judicial ethics in the direction of actual realities in specific cases. Appearances will not down, of course, nor should they. A large part of the consideration of a complaint about specific conduct will be played by the appearances that may have prompted the complaint. Conceivably, a Chief Judge may dismiss a complaint because it does not allege conduct that is in reality "prejudicial to the effective and expeditious administration of the business of the courts," and still privately counsel the complained of judge to avoid whatever appearances may be involved. Perhaps the Act will not raise realities to an entitlement of "equal billing" with appearances, but it can, by spotlighting realities in specific cases, resolve at least part of the appearance—reality dichotomy.

CONCLUSION

I close on a personal note. Having had the inestimable privilege of getting to know many if not most federal judges, through eleven years on the Judicial Conference, through sitting repeatedly with every court of appeals, through committee work, through service on the Judicial Center Faculty, and through phone calls related to the work of the advisory committee, I can report that I have never met an unethical federal judge. That is not to guarantee that none exists. Nor is it to say that I am authorized, qualified or sufficiently informed to assess the ethics of all federal judges or of any one judge. I am not. I have not met the three judges whose names have "made the press" in connection with untoward conduct, but every one of the hundreds of judges I have met impresses me as singularly dedicated to a desire that has haunted his or her dreams since the day the robe was donned—a desire to decide every case correctly, to render equal justice under law to all persons and institutions.

Indeed, I have often said, "No one would ever work as hard as judges do for money!" In the last decade, as is still too little known, the workload of the federal judiciary has quadrupled. With grudging, long-after-the-fact and minimal additions of judges, and long-delayed-but-still-inadequate increases in compensation, the federal judiciary, under the outstanding and innovative administrative leadership of The Chief Justice, has established an edifying record of dedicated, selfless public service. Yeoman in-house efforts have been made to keep up with an ever burgeoning caseload, to develop and adopt new procedures, new staffing, new rules. To consider, modify, disseminate, and adopt new procedures and rules has required devotion of many hours on top of those needed for the pure work of judging in four times the number of cases faced in 1970. It is doubtful that any institution, private or governmental, can point to a finer record of dedicated performance of duty.

Yet, through it all, the federal judiciary has been fully conscious of the requirement that it not only act ethically but that it be seen as acting ethically at all times and under all circumstances. As said at the outset, I speak only for myself, but I am confident that if I were to speak for the entire federal judiciary, I would be authorized to welcome any and all suggestions for even further improvement. The judiciary's door is in my view wide open to any and every means by which the American people can be continuously assured that their judicial servants are not only interpreting and applying the law independently and properly, but that they are doing so out of lives lived in accord with the highest ethical standards.

APPENDIX A

CODE OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT FOR UNITED STATES JUDGES

PART I. CODE OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT FOR UNITED STATES JUDGES[1]

CANON 1

A JUDGE SHOULD UPHOLD THE INTEGRITY AND INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY

An independent and honorable judiciary is indispensable to justice in our society. A judge should participate in establishing, maintaining, and enforcing, and should himself observe, high standards of conduct so that the integrity and independence of the judiciary may be preserved. The provisions of this Code should be construed and applied to further that objective.

CANON 2

A JUDGE SHOULD AVOID IMPROPRIETY AND THE APPEARANCE OF IMPROPRIETY IN ALL HIS ACTIVITIES

A. A judge should respect and comply with the law and should conduct himself at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary.

B. A judge should not allow his family, social, or other relationships to influence his judicial conduct or judgment. He should not lend the prestige of his office to advance the private interests of others; nor should he convey or permit others to convey the impression that they are in a special position to influence him. He should not testify voluntarily as a character witness.

COMMENTARY

Public confidence in the judiciary is eroded by irresponsible or improper conduct by judges. A judge must avoid all impropriety and appearance of impropriety. He must expect to be the subject of constant public scrutiny. He must therefore accept restrictions on his conduct that might be viewed as burdensome by the ordinary citizen and should do so freely and willingly.

The testimony of a judge as a character witness injects the prestige of his office into the proceeding in which he testifies and may be misunderstood to be an official testimonial. This Canon, however, does not afford him a privilege against testifying in response to an official summons.

The Judicial Conference of the United States has endorsed the principle that it is inappropriate for a judge to hold membership in any organization that practices invidious discrimination. A judge should carefully consider whether the judge's membership in a particular organization might reasonably raise a question of the judge's impartiality in a case involving issues as to discriminatory treatment of persons on the basis of race, sex, religion, or national origin. The question whether a particular organization practices invidious discrimination is often complex and not capable of being determined from a mere examination of its membership roll. Judges as well as others have rights of privacy and association. Although each judge must always be alert to the question, it must ultimately be determined by the conscience of the individual judge whether membership in a particular organization is incompatible with the duties of the judicial office.

[1] By resolution of the Judicial Conference of the United States this Code has been made applicable to Bankruptcy Judges and to United States Magistrates.

CANON 3

A JUDGE SHOULD PERFORM THE DUTIES OF HIS OFFICE IMPARTIALLY AND DILIGENTLY

The judicial duties of a judge take precedence over all his other activities. His judicial duties include all the duties of his office prescribed by law. In the performance of these duties, the following standards apply:

A. Adjudicative Responsibilities

(1) A judge should be faithful to the law and maintain professional competence in it. He should be unswayed by partisan interests, public clamor, or fear of criticism.

(2) A judge should maintain order and decorum in proceedings before him.

(3) A judge should be patient, dignified, and courteous to litigants, jurors, witnesses, lawyers, and others with whom he deals in his official capacity, and should require similar conduct of lawyers, and of his staff, court officials, and others subject to his direction and control.

COMMENTARY

The duty to hear all proceedings fairly and with patience is not inconsistent with the duty to dispose promptly of the business of the court. Courts can be efficient and businesslike while being patient and deliberate.

(4) A judge should accord to every person who is legally interested in a proceeding, or his lawyer, full right to be heard according to law, and, except as authorized by law, neither initiate nor consider ex-parte or other communications concerning a pending or impending proceeding. A judge, however, may obtain the advice of a disinterested expert on the law applicable to a proceeding before him if he gives notice to the parties of the person consulted and the substance of the advice, and affords the parties reasonable opportunity to respond.

COMMENTARY

The proscription against communications concerning a proceeding includes communications from lawyers, law teachers, and other persons who are not participants in the proceeding, except to the limited extent permitted. It does not preclude a judge from consulting with other judges, or with court personnel whose function is to aid the judge in carrying out his adjudicative responsibilities.

An appropriate and often desirable procedure for a court to obtain the advice of a disinterested expert on legal issues is to invite him to file a brief amicus-curiae.

(5) A judge should dispose promptly of the business of the court.

COMMENTARY

Prompt disposition of the court's business requires a judge to devote adequate time to his duties, to be punctual in attending court and expeditious in determining matters under submission, and to insist that court officials, litigants and their lawyers cooperate with him to that end.

(6) A judge should abstain from public comment about a pending or impending proceeding in any court, and should require similar abstention on the part of court personnel subject to his direction and control. This subsection does not prohibit judges from making public statements in the course of their official duties or from explaining for public information the procedures of the court.

COMMENTARY

"Court personnel" does not include the lawyers in a proceeding before a judge. The conduct of lawyers is governed by DR7–107 of the Code of Professional Responsibility.

(7) A judge should prohibit broadcasting, televising, recording, or taking photographs in the courtroom and areas immediately adjacent thereto during sessions of court or recesses between sessions, except that a judge may authorize:

(a) the use of electronic or photographic means for the presentation of evidence, or for the perpetuation of a record; and

(b) the broadcasting, televising, recording, or photographing of investitive, ceremonial, or naturalization proceedings.

B. Administrative Responsibilities

(1) A judge should diligently discharge his administrative responsibilities, maintain professional competence in judicial administration, and facilitate the performance of the administrative responsibilities of other judges and court officials.

(2) A judge should require his staff and court officials subject to his direction and control to observe the standards of fidelity and diligence that apply to him.

(3) A judge should take or initiate appropriate disciplinary measures against a judge or lawyer for unprofessional conduct of which the judge may become aware.

COMMENTARY

Disciplinary measures may include reporting a lawyer's misconduct to an appropriate disciplinary body.

(4) A judge should not make unnecessary appointments. He should exercise his power of appointment only on the basis of merit, avoiding nepotism and favoritism. He should not approve compensation of appointees beyond the fair value of services rendered.

COMMENTARY

Appointees of the judge include officials such as referees, commissioners, special masters, receivers, guardians, and personnel such as clerks, secretaries, and bailiffs. Consent by the parties to an appointment or an award of compensation does not relieve the judge of the obligation prescribed by this subsection.

C. Disqualification

(1) A judge shall disqualify himself in a proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned, including but not limited to instances where:

(a) He has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding;

(b) he served as lawyer in the matter in controversy, or a lawyer with whom he previously practiced law served during such association as a lawyer concerning the matter, or the judge or such lawyer has been a material witness concerning it;

(c) he knows that he, individually or as a fiduciary, or his spouse or minor child residing in his household, has a financial interest in the subject matter in controversy or in a party to the proceeding, or any other interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding;

(d) he or his spouse, or a person within the third degree of relationship to either of them, or the spouse of such a person:

(i) is a party to the proceeding, or an officer, director, or trustee of a party;
(ii) is acting as a lawyer in the proceeding.

COMMENTARY

The fact that a lawyer in a proceeding is affiliated with a law firm with which a lawyer-relative of the judge is affiliated does not of itself disqualify the judge. Under appropriate circumstances, the fact that "his impartiality might reasonably be questioned" under Canon 3C(1), or that the lawyer-relative is known by the judge to have an interest in the law firm that could be "substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding" under Canon 3C(1)(d)(iii) may require his disqualification.

(iii) is known by the judge to have an interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding;
(iv) is to the judge's knowledge likely to be a material witness in the proceeding;

(e) he has served in governmental employment and in such capacity participated as counsel, advisor, or material witness concerning the proceeding or expressed an opinion concerning the merits of the particular case in controversy.

(2) A judge should inform himself about his personal and fiduciary financial interests, and make a reasonable effort to inform himself about the personal financial interests of his spouse and minor children residing in his household.

(3) For the purposes of this section:

(a) the degree of relationship is calculated according to the civil law system;

COMMENTARY

According to the civil law system, the third degree of relationship test would, for example, disqualify the judge if his or his spouse's father, grandfather, uncle, brother, or niece's husband were a party or lawyer in the proceeding, but would not disqualify him if a cousin were a party or lawyer in the proceeding.

(b) "fiduciary" includes such relationships as executor, administrator, trustee, and guardian;

(c) "financial interest" means ownership of a legal or equitable interest, however small, or a relationship as director, advisor, or other active participant in the affairs of a party, except that:

(i) ownership in a mutual or common investment fund that holds securities is not a "financial interest" in such securities unless the judge participates in the management of the fund;
(ii) an office in an educational, religious, charitable, fraternal, or civic organization is not a "financial interest" in securities held by the organization;
(iii) the proprietary interest of a policy holder in a mutual insurance company, of a depositor in a mutual savings association, or a similar proprietary interest, is a "financial interest" in the organization only if the outcome of the proceeding could substantially affect the value of the interest;
(iv) ownership of government securities is a "financial interest" in the issuer only if the outcome of the proceeding could substantially affect the value of the securities.

(d) "proceeding" includes pretrial, trial, appellate review, or other stages of litigation.

D. Remittal of Disqualification

A judge disqualified by the terms of Canon 3C(1), except in the circumstances specifically set out in subsections (a) through (e), may, instead of withdrawing from the proceeding, disclose on the record the basis of his disqualification. If, based on such disclosure, the parties and lawyers, independently of the judge's participation, all agree in writing that the judge's disqualification should be waived, the judge is no longer disqualified and may participate in the proceeding. The agreement, signed by all parties and lawyers, shall be incorporated in the record of the proceeding.

CANON 4

A JUDGE MAY ENGAGE IN ACTIVITIES TO IMPROVE THE LAW, THE LEGAL SYSTEM, AND THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

A judge, subject to the proper performance of his judicial duties, may engage in the following quasi-judicial activities, if in doing so he does not cast doubt on his capacity to decide impartially any issue that may come before him:

A. He may speak, write, lecture, teach, and participate in other activities concerning the law, the legal system, and the administration of justice.

B. He may appear at a public hearing before an executive or legislative body or official on matters concerning the law, the legal system, and the administration of justice, and he may otherwise consult with an executive or legislative body or official, but only on matters concerning the administration of justice.

C. He may serve as a member, officer, or director of an organization or governmental agency devoted to the improvement of the law, the legal system, or the administration of justice. He may assist such an organization in raising funds and may participate in their management and investment, but should not personally participate in public fund-raising activities. He may make recommendations to public and private fund-granting agencies on projects and programs concerning the law, the legal system, and the administration of justice.

COMMENTARY

As a judicial officer and person specially learned in the law, a judge is in a unique position to contribute to the improvement of the law, the legal system, and the administration of justice, including revision of substantive and procedural law and improvement of criminal and juvenile justice. To the extent that his time permits, he is encouraged to do so, either independently or through a bar association, judicial conference, or other organization dedicated to the improvement of the law.

Extra-judicial activities are governed by Canon 5.

A JUDGE SHOULD REGULATE HIS EXTRA-JUDICIAL ACTIVITIES TO MINIMIZE THE RISK OF CONFLICT WITH HIS JUDICIAL DUTIES

A. Avocational Activities. A judge may write, lecture, teach, and speak on non-legal subjects, and engage in the arts, sports, and other social and recreational activities, if such avocational activities do not detract from the dignity of his office or interfere with the performance of his judicial duties.

COMMENTARY

Complete separation of a judge from extra-judicial activities is neither possible nor wise; he should not become isolated from the society in which he lives.

B. Civic and Charitable Activities. A judge may participate in civic and charitable activities that do not reflect adversely upon his impartiality or interfere with the performance of his judicial duties. A judge may serve as an officer, director, trustee, or non-legal advisor of an educational, religious, charitable, fraternal, or civic organization not conducted for the economic or political advantage of its members, subject to the following limitations:

(1) A judge should not serve if it is likely that the organization will be engaged in proceedings that would ordinarily come before him or will be regularly engaged in adversary proceedings in any court.

COMMENTARY

The changing nature of some organizations and of their relationship to the law makes it necessary for a judge regularly to reexamine the activities of each organization with which he is affiliated to determine if it is proper for him to continue his relationship with it. For example, in many jurisdictions charitable hospitals are now more frequently in court than in the past. Similarly, the boards of some legal aid organizations now make policy decisions that may have political significance or imply commitment to causes that may come before the courts for adjudication.

(2) A judge should not solicit funds for any educational, religious, charitable, fraternal, or civic organization, or use or permit the use of the prestige of his office for that purpose, but he may be listed as an officer, director, or trustee of such an organization. He should not be a speaker or the guest of honor at an organization's fund-raising events, but he may attend such events.

(3) A judge should not give investment advice to such an organization, but he may serve on its board of directors or trustees even though it has the responsibility for approving investment decisions.

COMMENTARY

A judge's participation in an organization devoted to quasi-judicial activities is governed by Canon 4.

C. Financial Activities

(1) A judge should refrain from financial and business dealings that tend to reflect adversely on his impartiality, interfere with the proper performance of his judicial duties, exploit his judicial position, or involve him in frequent transactions with lawyers or persons likely to come before the court on which he serves.

(2) Subject to the requirements of subsection (1), a judge may hold and manage investments, including real estate, and engage in other remunerative activity, but should not serve as an officer, director, active partner, manager, advisor, or employee of any business other than a business wholly owned by members of the judge's family all of whom are related to the judge or his or her spouse within the third degree of relationship calculated according to the civil law system.

(3) A judge should manage his investments and other financial interests to minimize the number of cases in which he is disqualified. As soon as he can do so without serious financial detriment, he should divest himself of investments and other financial interests that might require frequent disqualification.

(4) Neither a judge nor a member of his family residing in his household should accept a gift, bequest, favor, or loan from anyone except as follows:

(a) a judge may accept a gift incident to a public testimonial to him; books supplied by publishers on a complimentary basis for official use; or an invitation to the judge and his spouse to attend a bar-related function or activity devoted to the improvement of the law, the legal system, or the administration of justice;

(b) a judge or a member of his family residing in his household may accept ordinary social hospitality; a gift, bequest, favor, or loan from a relative; a wedding or engagement gift; a loan from a lending institution in its regular course of business on the same terms generally available to persons who are not judges; or a scholarship or fellowship awarded on the same terms applied to other applicants;

(c) a judge or a member of his family residing in his household may accept any other gift, bequest, favor, or loan only if the donor is not a party or other person whose interests have come or are likely to come before him, and, if its value exceeds $100, the judge reports it in the same manner as he reports compensation in Canon 6C.

(5) For the purposes of this section "members of his family residing in his household" means any relative of a judge by blood or marriage, or a person treated by a judge as a member of his family, who resides in his household.

(6) A judge is not required by this Code to disclose his income, debts, or investments, except as provided in this Canon and Canons 3 and 6.

COMMENTARY

Canon 3 requires a judge to disqualify himself in any proceeding in which he has a financial interest, however small; Canon 5 requires a judge to refrain from engaging in business and from financial activities that might interfere with the impartial performance of his judicial duties; Canon 6 requires him to report all compensation he receives for activities outside his judicial office. A judge has the rights of an ordinary citizen, including the right to privacy of his financial affairs, except to the extent that limitations thereon are required to safeguard the proper performance of his duties. Owning and receiving income from investments do not as such affect the performance of a judge's duties.

(7) Information acquired by a judge in his judicial capacity should not be used or disclosed by him in financial dealings or for any other purpose not related to his judicial duties.

D. Fiduciary Activities. A judge should not serve as the executor, administrator, trustee, guardian, or other fiduciary, except for the estate, trust, or person of a member of his family, and then only if such service will not interfere with the proper performance of his judicial duties. "Member of his family" means any relative of a judge by blood, adoption, or marriage or any other person treated by a judge as a member of his family who resides, or has resided, in his household.

COMMENTARY

Mere residence in the household of a judge is insufficient for a person to be considered a member of the judge's family for purposes of this canon. The person must not only be treated by a judge as a member of his family but must have resided in the judge's household for a sufficient length of time and under such circumstances as to make it apparent that it was his principal place of abode.

As a family fiduciary a judge is subject to the following restrictions:

(1) He should not serve if it is likely that as a fiduciary he will be engaged in proceedings that would ordinarily come before him or if the estate, trust, or ward becomes involved in adversary proceedings in the court on which he serves or one under its appellate jurisdiction.

COMMENTARY

The Effective Date of Compliance provision of this Code qualifies this subsection with regard to a judge who is an executor, administrator, trustee, or other fiduciary at the time this Code becomes effective.

(2) While acting as a fiduciary a judge is subject to the same restrictions on financial activities that apply to him in his personal capacity.

COMMENTARY

A judge's obligation under this Canon and his obligation as a fiduciary may come into conflict. For example, a judge should resign as trustee if it would result in detriment to the trust to divest it of holdings whose retention would place the judge in violation of Canon

E. Arbitration. A judge should not act as an arbitrator or mediator.

F. Practice of Law. A judge should not practice law.

G. Extra-Judicial Appointments. A judge should not accept appointment to a governmental committee, commission, or other position that is concerned with issues of fact or policy on matters other than the improvement of the law, the legal system, or the administration of justice, unless appointment of a judge is required by Act of Congress. A judge should not, in any event, accept such an appointment if his governmental duties would interfere with the performance of his judicial duties or tend to undermine the public confidence in the integrity, impartiality, or independence of the judiciary. A judge may represent his country, state, or locality on ceremonial occasions or in connection with historical, educational, and cultural activities.

COMMENTARY

Valuable services have been rendered in the past to the states and the nation by judges appointed by the executive to undertake important extra-judicial assignments. The appropriateness of conferring these assignments on judges must be reassessed, however, in light of the demands on judicial manpower created by today's crowded dockets and the need to protect the courts from involvement in extra-judicial matters that may prove to be controversial. Judges should not be expected or permitted to accept governmental appointments that could interfere with the effectiveness and independence of the judiciary.

The dangers attendant upon acceptance of extra-judicial governmental assignments are ordinarily less serious where the appointment of a judge is required by legislation. Such assignments ordinarily do not involve excessive commitments of time, and they typically do not pose a serious threat to the independence of the judiciary. Moreover, it is hardly the function of a Code of Judicial Conduct to compel judges to refuse, without careful regard to the circumstances, tasks Congress has seen fit to authorize as appropriate in the public interest. Accordingly, although legislatively prescribed extra-judicial assignments should be discouraged, where Congress requires the appointment of a judge to perform extra-judicial duties, the judge may accept the appointment provided that his services would not interfere with the performance of his judicial responsibilities or tend to undermine public confidence in the judiciary.

A JUDGE SHOULD REGULARLY FILE REPORTS OF COMPENSATION RECEIVED FOR QUASI-JUDICIAL AND EXTRA-JUDICIAL ACTIVITIES

A judge may receive compensation and reimbursement of expenses for the quasi-judicial and extra-judicial activities permitted by this Code, if the source of such payments does not give the appearance of influencing the judge in his judicial duties or otherwise give the appearance of impropriety, subject to the following restrictions:

A. Compensation. Compensation should not exceed a reasonable amount nor should it exceed what a person who is not a judge would receive for the same activity.

B. Expense Reimbursement. Expense reimbursement should be limited to the actual costs of travel, food, and lodging reasonably incurred by the judge and, where appropriate to the occasion, by his spouse. Any payment in excess of such an amount is compensation.

C. Public Reports. A judge should report the date, place, and nature of any activity for which he received compensation, and the name of the payor and the amount of compensation so received. Compensation or income of a spouse attributed to the judge by operation of a community property law is not extra-judicial compensation to the judge. His report should be made at least annually and should be filed as a public document in the office of the clerk of the court on which he serves or other office designated by rule of court.

A JUDGE SHOULD REFRAIN FROM POLITICAL ACTIVITY

A. Political Conduct in General

(1) A judge should not:

(a) act as a leader or hold any office in a political organization;

(b) make speeches for a political organization or candidate or publicly endorse a candidate for public office;

(c) solicit funds for or pay an assessment or make a contribution to a political organization or candidate, attend political gatherings, or purchase tickets for political party dinners, or other functions.

(2) A judge should resign his office when he becomes a candidate either in a primary or in a general election for any office.

(3) A judge should not engage in any other political activity; provided, however, this should not prevent a judge from engaging in the activities described in Canon 4.

APPENDIX B

RULES FOR PROCESSING COMPLAINTS OF JUDICIAL MISCONDUCT

JUDICIAL COUNCIL OF THE D.C. CIRCUIT

RULES FOR PROCESSING COMPLAINTS OF JUDICIAL MISCONDUCT

Preface. The following rules are adopted in conformity with and pursuant to the Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980, (P.L. 96-458, Oct. 15, 1980), 28 U.S.C. § 372(c).

Rule 1 Any person alleging that a circuit, district, or bankruptcy judge or a magistrate has engaged in conduct prejudicial to the effective and expeditious administration of the business of the courts, or alleging that such a judge or magistrate is unable to discharge all the duties of office by reason of a mental or physical disability, may file with the Clerk of the Court of Appeals of the Circuit a written complaint containing a brief statement of the facts constituting such conduct.

Rule 2 Upon receipt of a complaint filed under Rule 1, the Clerk shall promptly transmit such complaint to the Chief Judge of the Circuit, or, if the conduct complained of is that of the Chief Judge, to that circuit judge in regular active service next senior in date of commission (hereafter, for purposes of these rules, included in the term "Chief Judge"). The Clerk shall simultaneously transmit a copy of the complaint to the judge or magistrate whose conduct is the subject of the complaint.

Rule 3 After expeditiously reviewing a complaint, the Chief Judge, by written order stating the reasons therefor, may:

(A) dismiss the complaint, upon finding it to be (i) not in conformity with Rule 1, (ii) directly related to the merits of a decision or procedural ruling, or (iii) frivolous, or

(B) conclude the proceeding upon determining that appropriate corrective action has been taken.

(C) Notice of the written order of the Chief Judge shall be transmitted to the complainant and to the judge or magistrate whose conduct is the subject of the complaint. The Chief Judge shall report to the Council on complaints dismissed or closed.

Rule 4 If the Chief Judge does not enter an order under Rule 3, such judge shall promptly—

(A) appoint a special committee composed of the Chief Judge and equal numbers of circuit and district judges of the Circuit to investigate the facts and allegations contained in the complaint;

(B) certify the complaint and any other documents pertaining thereto to each member of such committee; and

(C) provide written notice to the complainant and the judge or magistrate whose conduct is the subject of the complaint of the action taken under this rule.

Rule 5 (A) Each committee appointed under Rule 4 shall conduct an investigation as extensive as it considers necessary, and shall expeditiously file a comprehensive written report thereon with the Judicial Council of the Circuit. Such report shall present both the findings of the investigation and the committee's recommendations for necessary and appropriate action by the Judicial Council of the Circuit.

(B) The judge or magistrate whose conduct is the subject of the complaint shall be afforded an opportunity to appear (in person or by counsel) at proceedings conducted by the investigating panel, to present oral and documentary evidence, to compel the attendance of witnesses or the production of documents, to cross-examine witnesses, and to present argument orally or in writing.

(C) The judge or magistrate whose conduct is the subject of an investigation shall receive payment of attorney's fees in accordance with procedures established by the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

(D) The complainant may be afforded an opportunity to appear at proceedings conducted by the investigating panel, if the panel concludes that the complainant could offer substantial information.

(E) A complainant appearing before an investigating panel may, at the discretion of the panel, be authorized to request payment of attorney's fees by the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

Rule 6 Upon receipt of a report filed under Rule 5, the Judicial Council—

(A) may conduct any additional investigation which it considers to be necessary;

(B) shall take such action as is appropriate to assure the effective and expeditious administration of the business of the courts within the Circuit, including, but not limited to, any of the following actions:

(i) directing the chief judge of the district of the magistrate whose conduct is the subject of the complaint to take such action as the Judicial Council considers appropriate;

(ii) certifying disability of a judge appointed to hold office during good behavior whose conduct is the subject of the complaint, pursuant to the procedures and standards provided under 28 U.S.C. § 372(b);

(iii) requesting that any such judge appointed to hold office during good behavior voluntarily retire, with the provision that the length of service requirements under 28 U.S.C. § 371 shall not apply;

(iv) ordering that, on a temporary basis for a time certain, no further cases be assigned to any judge or magistrate whose conduct is the subject of a complaint;

(v) censuring or reprimanding such judge or magistrate by means of private communication;

(vi) censuring or reprimanding such judge or magistrate by means of public announcement;

(vii) ordering such other action as it considers appropriate under the circumstances, except that (I) in no circumstances may the Council order removal from office of any judge appointed to hold office during good behavior, and (II) any removal of a magistrate shall be in accordannce with 28 U.S.C. § 631, and any removal of a bankruptcy judge shall be in accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 153; and

(C) shall immediately provide written notice to the complainant and to such judge or magistrate of the action taken under this rule.

Rule 7 (A) In addition to the authority stated in Rule 6, the Judicial Council may, in its discretion, refer any complaint under these rules, together with the record of any associated proceedings and its recommendations for appropriate action, to the Judicial Conference of the United States.

(B) In any case in which the Judicial Council determines, on the basis of a complaint and an investigation under these rules, or on the basis of information otherwise available to the Council, that a judge appointed to hold office during good behavior has engaged in conduct—

(i) which might constitute one or more grounds for impeachment under article I of the Constitution; or

(ii) which, in the interests of justice, is not amenable to resolution by the Judicial Council, the Judicial Council shall promptly certify such determination, together with any complaint and a record of any associated proceedings, to the Judicial Conference of the United States.

(C) The Judicial Council acting under authority of this rule shall, unless contrary to the interests of justice, immediately submit written notice to the complainant and to the judge or magistrate whose conduct is the subject of the action taken under this rule.

Rule 8 In conducting any investigation under these rules, the Judicial Council, or a special investigating committee appointed under Rule 4, shall have full subpoena powers as provided in 28 U.S.C. § 332(d). Enforcement of such subpoenas shall be as provided in Rule 45(f), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Rule 9 All papers, documents, and records of proceedings related to investigations conducted under these rules shall be confidential and shall not be disclosed by any person in any proceeding unless—

(A) the Judicial Council of the Circuit, the Judicial Conference of the United States, or the Senate or the House of Representatives by resolution, releases any such material which is believed necessary to an impeachment investigation or trial of a judge under article I of the Constitution; or

(B) release of such material in whole or in part is authorized in writing by the judge or magistrate who is the subject of the complaint and by the Chief Judge of the Circuit, the Chief Justice, or the chairman of the standing committee established under 28 U.S.C. § 331.

Rule 10 (A) A complainant, judge, or magistrate aggrieved by a final order of the Chief Judge under Rule 3 may petition the Council for review thereof. A complainant, judge, or magistrate aggrieved by an action of the Judicial Council under Rule 6 may petition the Judicial Conference of the United States for review thereof.

(B) No person shall be granted the right to intervene or to appear as amicus curiae in any proceeding before the Judicial Council under these rules.

Rule 11 Each written order to implement any action under Rule 6(B), which is issued by the Judicial Council, shall be made available to the public through the Clerk's Office of the Court of Appeals. Unless contrary to the interests of justice, each such order issued under this paragragh shall be accompanied by written reasons therefor.

Rule 12 These rules shall become effective October 1, 1981.

S6823 SENATE RESOLUTION 120-ESTABLISHING A SPECIAL COMMITTEE ADMINISTERED BY THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, HOUSING, AND URBAN AFFAIRS

Mr. D'AMATO (for himself and Mr. DOLE) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 120

Resolved,

SECTION 1. ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.-There is established a special committee administered by the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs to be known as the " Special Committee to Investigate Whitewater Development Corporation and Related Matters" (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "special committee").

(b) PURPOSES.-The purposes of the special committee are-

(1) to conduct an investigation and public hearings into, and study of, whether improper conduct occurred regarding the way in which White House officials handled documents in the office of White House Deputy Counsel Vincent Foster following his death;

(2) to conduct an investigation and public hearings into, and study of, the following matters developed during, or arising out of, the investigation and public hearings concluded by the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs prior to the adoption of this resolution-

(A) whether any person has improperly handled confidential Resolution Trust Corporation (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "RTC") information relating to Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association or Whitewater Development Corporation, including whether any person has improperly communicated such information to individuals referenced therein;

(B) whether the White House has engaged in improper contacts with any other agency or department in the Government with regard to confidential RTC information relating to Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association or Whitewater Development Corporation;

(C) whether the Department of Justice has improperly handled RTC criminal referrals relating to Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association or Whitewater Development Corporation;

(D) whether RTC employees have been improperly importuned, prevented, restrained, or deterred in conducting investigations or making enforcement recommendations relating to Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association or Whitewater Development Corporation; and

(E) whether the report issued by the Office of Government Ethics on July 31, 1994, or related transcripts of deposition testimony-

(i) were improperly released to White House officials or others prior to their testimony before the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs pursuant to Senate Resolution 229 (103d Congress); or

(ii) were used to communicate to White House officials or to others confidential RTC information relating to Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association or Whitewater Development Corporation;

(3) to conduct an investigation and public hearings into, and study of, all matters that have any tendency to reveal the full facts about-

(A) the operations, solvency, and regulation of Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association, and any subsidiary, affiliate, or other entity owned or controlled by Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association;

(B) the activities, investments, and tax liability of Whitewater Development Corporation and, as related to Whitewater Development Corporation, of its officers, directors, and shareholders;

(C) the policies and practices of the RTC and the Federal banking agencies (as that term is defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act) regarding the legal representation of such agencies with respect to Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association;

S6824 (D) the handling by the RTC, the Office of Thrift Supervision, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation of civil or administrative actions against parties regarding Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association;

(E) the sources of funding and the lending practices of Capital Management Services, Inc., and its supervision and regulation by the Small Business Administration, including any alleged diversion of funds to Whitewater Development Corporation;

(F) the bond underwriting contracts between Arkansas Development Finance Authority and Lasater & Company; and

(G) the lending activities of Perry County Bank, Perryville, Arkansas, in connection with the 1990 Arkansas gubernatorial election;

(4) to make such findings of fact as are warranted and appropriate;

(5) to make such recommendations, including recommendations for legislative, administrative, or other actions, as the special committee may determine to be necessary or desirable; and

(6) to fulfill the constitutional oversight and informational functions of the Congress with respect to the matters described in this section.

SEC. 2. MEMBERSHIP AND ORGANIZATION OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

(a) MEMBERSHIP.-

(1) IN GENERAL.-The special committee shall consist of-

(A) the members of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs; and

(B) the chairman and ranking member of the Committee on the Judiciary, or their designees from the Committee on the Judiciary.

(2) SENATE RULE XXV.-For the purpose of paragraph 4 of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, service of a Senator as the chairman or other member of the special committee shall not be taken into account.

(b) ORGANIZATION OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.-

(1) CHAIRMAN.-The chairman of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs shall serve as the chairman of the special committee (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "chairman").

(2) RANKING MEMBER.-The ranking member of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs shall serve as the ranking member of the special committee (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "ranking member").

(3) QUORUM.-A majority of the members of the special committee shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of reporting a matter or recommendation to the Senate. A majority of the members of the special committee, or one-third of the members of the special committee if at least one member of the minority party is present, shall constitute a quorum for the conduct of other business. One member of the special committee shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of taking testimony.

(c) RULES AND PROCEDURES.-Except as otherwise specifically provided in this resolution, the special committee's investigation, study, and hearings shall be governed by the Standing Rules of the Senate and the Rules of Procedure of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs. The special committee may adopt additional rules or procedures not inconsistent with this resolution or the Standing Rules of the Senate if the chairman and ranking member agree that such additional rules or procedures are necessary to enable the special committee to conduct the investigation, study, and hearings authorized by this resolution. Any such additional rules and procedures shall become effective upon publication in the Congressional Record.

SEC. 3. STAFF OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

(a) APPOINTMENTS.-To assist the special committee in the investigation, study, and hearings authorized by this resolution, the chairman and the ranking member each may appoint special committee staff, including consultants.

(b) ASSISTANCE FROM THE SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL.-To assist the special committee in the investigation, study, and hearings authorized by this resolution, the Senate Legal Counsel and the Deputy Senate Legal Counsel shall work with and under the jurisdiction and authority of the special committee.

(c) ASSISTANCE FROM THE COMPTRCLLER GENERAL.-The Comptroller General of the United States is requested to provide from the General Accounting Office whatever personnel or other appropriate assistance as may be required by the special committee, or by the chairman or the ranking member.

SEC. 4. PUBLIC ACTIVITIES OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

(a) IN GENERAL.-Consistent with the rights of persons subject to investigation and inquiry, the special committee shall make every effort to fulfill the right of the public and the Congress to know the essential facts and implications of the activities of officials of the United States Government and other persons and entities with respect to the matters under investigation and study, as described in section 1.

(b) DUTIES.-In furtherance of the right of the public and the Congress to know, the special committee-

(1) shall hold, as the chairman (in consultation with the ranking member) considers appropriate and in accordance with paragraph 5(b) of rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hearings on specific subjects, subject to consultation and coordination with the independent counsel appointed pursuant to chapter 40 of title 28, United States Code, in Division No. 94-1 (D.C. Cir.

August 5, 1994) (hereafter in this resolution referred to as "the independent counsel");

(2) may make interim reports to the Senate as it considers appropriate; and

(3) shall make a final comprehensive public report to the Senate which contains-

(A) a description of all relevant factual determinations; and

(B) recommendations for legislation, if necessary.

SEC. 5. POWERS OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

(a) IN GENERAL.-The special committee shall do everything necessary and appropriate under the laws and the Constitution of the United States to conduct the investigation, study, and hearings authorized by section 1.

(b) EXERCISE OF AUTHORITY.-The special committee may exercise all of the powers and responsibilities of a committee under rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate and section 705 of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, including the following:

(1) SUBPOENA POWERS.-To issue subpoenas or orders for the attendance of witnesses or for the production of documentary or physical evidence before the special committee. A subpoena or order may be authorized by the special committee or by the chairman with the agreement of the ranking member, and may be issued by the chairman or any other member of the special committee designated by the chairman, and may be served by any person designated by the chairman or the authorized member anywhere within or outside of the borders of the United States to the full extent permitted by law. The chairman, or any other member of the special committee, is authorized to administer oaths to any witnesses appearing before the special committee. If a return on a subpoena or order for the production of documentary or physical evidence is incomplete or accompanied by an objection, the chairman (in consultation with the ranking member) may convene a meeting or hearing to determine the adequacy of the return and to rule on the objection. At a meeting or hearing on such a return, one member of the special committee shall constitute a quorum. The special committee shall not initiate procedures leading to civil or criminal enforcement of a subpoena unless the person or entity to whom the subpoena is directed refuses to produce the required documentary or physical evidence after having been ordered and directed to do so.

(2) COMPENSATION AUTHORITY.-To employ and fix the compensation of such clerical, investigatory, legal, technical, and other assistants as the special committee, or the chairman or the ranking member, considers necessary or appropriate.

(3) MEETINGS.-To sit and act at any time or place during sessions, recesses, and adjournment periods of the Senate.

(4) HEARINGS.-To hold hearings, take testimony under oath, and receive documentary or physical evidence relating to the matters and questions it is authorized to investigate or study. Unless the chairman and the ranking member otherwise agree, the questioning of a witness or a panel of witnesses at a hearing shall be limited to one initial 30-minute turn each for the chairman and the ranking member, or their designees, including majority and minority staff, and thereafter to 10-minute turns by each member of the special committee if 5 or more members are present, and to 15-minute turns by each member of the special committee if fewer than 5 members are present. A member may be permitted further questions of the witness or panel of witnesses, either by using time that another member then present at the hearing has yielded for that purpose during the yielding member's turn, or by using time allotted after all members have been given an opportunity to question the witness or panel of witnesses. At all times, unless the chairman and the ranking member otherwise agree, the questioning shall alternate back and forth between members of the majority party and members of the minority party. In their discretion, the chairman and the ranking member, respectively, may designate majority or minority staff to question a witness or a panel of witnesses at a hearing during time yielded by a member of the chairman's or the ranking member's party then present at the hearing for his or her turn.

(5) TESTIMONY OF WITNESSES.-To require by subpoena or order the attendance, as a witness before the special committee or at a deposition, of any person who may have knowledge or information concerning any of the matters that the special committee is authorized to investigate and study.

(6) IMMUNITY.-To grant a witness immunity under sections 6002 and 6005 of title 18, United States Code, provided that the independent counsel has not informed the special committee in writing that immunizing the witness would interfere with the ability of the independent counsel successfully to prosecute criminal violations. Not later than 10 days before the special committee seeks a Federal court order for a grant of immunity by the special committee, the Senate Legal Counsel shall cause to be delivered to the independent counsel a written request asking the independent counsel promptly to inform the special committee in writing if, in the judgment of the independent counsel, the grant of immunity would interfere with the ability of the independent counsel successfully to prosecute criminal violations. The Senate Legal Counsel's written request of S6825 the independent counsel required by this paragraph shall be in addition to all notice requirements set forth in sections 6002 and 6005 of title 18, United States Code.

(7) DEPOSITIONS.-To take depositions and other testimony under oath anywhere within the United States, to issue orders that require witnesses to answer written interrogatories under oath, and to make application for the issuance of letters rogatory. All depositions shall be conducted jointly by majority and minority staff of the special committee. A witness at a deposition shall be examined upon oath administered by a member of the special committee or an individual authorized by local law to administer oaths, and a complete transcription or electronic recording of the deposition shall be made. Questions shall be propounded first by majority staff of the special committee and then by minority staff of the special committee. Any subsequent round of questioning shall proceed in the same order. Objections by the witness as to the form of questions shall be noted for the record. If a witness objects to a question and refuses to answer on the basis of relevance or privilege, the special committee staff may proceed with the deposition, or may, at that time or at a subsequent time, seek a ruling on the objection from the chairman. If the chairman overrules the objection, the chairman may order and direct the witness to answer the question, but the special committee shall not initiate procedures leading to civil or criminal enforcement unless the witness refuses to answer after having been ordered and directed to answer.

(8) DELEGATIONS TO STAFF.-To issue commissions and to notice depositions for staff members to examine witnesses and to receive evidence under oath administered by an individual authorized by local law to administer oaths. The special committee, or the chairman with the concurrence of the ranking member, may delegate to designated staff members of the special committee the power to issue deposition notices authorized pursuant to this paragraph.

(9) INFORMATION FROM OTHER SOURCES.-To require by subpoena or order-

(A) any department, agency, entity, officer, or employee of the United States Government;

(B) any person or entity purporting to act under color or authority of State or local law; or to produce for consideration by the special committee or for use as evidence in the investigation, study, or hearings of the special committee, any book, check, canceled check, correspondence, communication, document, financial record, paper, physical evidence, photograph, record, recording, tape, or any other material relating to any of the matters or questions that the special committee is authorized to investigate and study which any such person or entity may possess or control.

(C) any private person, firm, corporation, partnership, or other organization;

(10) RECOMMENDATIONS TO THE SENATE.-To make to the Senate any recommendations, by report or resolution, including recommendations for criminal or civil enforcement, which the special committee may consider appropriate with respect to-

(A) the willful failure or refusal of any person to appear before it, or at a deposition, or to answer interrogatories, in compliance with a subpoena or order;

(B) the willful failure or refusal of any person to answer questions or give testimony during the appearance of that person as a witness before the special committee, or at a deposition, or in response to interrogatories; or

(C) the willful failure or refusal of-

(i) any officer or employee of the United States Government;

(ii) any person or entity purporting to act under color or authority of State or local law; or

(iii) any private person, partnership, firm, corporation, or organization; to produce before the special committee, or at a deposition, or at any time or place designated by the committee, any book, check, canceled check, correspondence, communication, document, financial record, paper, physical evidence, photograph, record, recording, tape, or any other material in compliance with any subpoena or order.

(11) CONSULTANTS.-To procure the temporary or intermittent services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof.

(12) OTHER GOVERNMENT PERSONNEL.-To use, on a reimbursable basis and with the prior consent of the Government department or agency concerned, the services of the personnel of such department or agency.

(13) OTHER CONGRESSIONAL STAFF.-To use, with the prior consent of any member of the Senate or the chairman or the ranking member of any other Senate committee or the chairman or ranking member of any subcommittee of any committee of the Senate, the facilities or services of the appropriate members of the staff of such member of the Senate or other Senate committee or subcommittee, whenever the special committee or the chairman or the ranking member considers that such action is necessary or appropriate to enable the special committee to conduct the investigation, study, and hearings authorized by this resolution.

(14) ACCESS TO INFORMATION AND EVIDENCE.-To permit any members of the special committee, staff director, counsel, or other staff members or consultants designated by the chairman or the ranking member, access to any data, evidence, information, report, analysis, document, or paper-

(A) that relates to any of the matters or questions that the special committee is authorized to investigate or study under this resolution;

(B) that is in the custody or under the control of any department, agency, entity, officer, or employee of the United States Government, including those which have the power under the laws of the United States to investigate any alleged criminal activities or to prosecute persons charged with crimes against the United States without regard to the jurisdiction or authority of any other Senate committee or subcommittee; and

(C) that will assist the special committee to prepare for or conduct the investigation, study, and hearings authorized by this resolution.

(15) REPORTS OF VIOLATIONS OF LAW.-To report possible violations of any law to appropriate Federal, State, or local authorities.

(16) EXPENDITURES.-To expend, to the extent that the special committee determines necessary and appropriate, any money made available to the special committee by the Senate to carry out this resolution.

(17) TAX RETURN INFORMATION.-To inspect and receive, in accordance with the procedures set forth in sections 6103(f)(3) and 6104(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986, any tax return or tax return information, held by the Secretary of the Treasury, if access to the particular tax-related information sought is necessary to the ability of the special committee to carry out section 1(b)(3)(B).

SEC. 6. PROTECTION OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION.

(a) NONDISCLOSURE.-No member of the special committee or the staff of the special committee shall disclose, in whole or in part or by way of summary, to any person other than another member of the special committee or other staff of the special committee, for any purpose or in connection with any proceeding, judicial or otherwise, any testimony taken, including the names of witnesses testifying, or material presented, in depositions or at closed hearings, or any confidential materials or information, unless authorized by the special committee or the chairman in concurrence with the ranking member.

(b) STAFF NONDISCLOSURE AGREEMENT.-All members of the staff of the special committee with access to confidential information within the control of the special committee shall, as a condition of employment, agree in writing to abide by the conditions of this section and any nondisclosure agreement promulgated by the special committee that is consistent with this section.

(c) SANCTIONS.-

(1) MEMBER SANCTIONS.-The case of any Senator who violates the security procedures of the special committee may be referred to the Select Committee on Ethics of the Senate for investigation and the imposition of sanctions in accordance with the rules of the Senate.

(2) STAFF SANCTIONS.-Any member of the staff of the special committee who violates the security procedures of the special committee shall immediately be subject to removal from office or employment with the special committee or such other sanction as may be provided in any rule issued by the special committee consistent with section 2(c).

(d) STAFF DEFINED.-For purposes of this section, the term "staff of the special committee" includes-

(1) all employees of the special committee;

(2) all staff designated by the members of the special committee to work on special committee business;

(3) all Senate staff assigned to special committee business pursuant to section 5(b)(13);

(4) all officers and employees of the Office of Senate Legal Counsel who are requested to work on special committee business; and

(5) all detailees and consultants to the special committee.

SEC. 7. RELATION TO OTHER INVESTIGATIONS.

(a) PURPOSES.-The purposes of this section are-

(1) to expedite the thorough conduct of the investigation, study, and hearings authorized by this resolution;

(2) to promote efficiency among all the various investigations underway in all branches of the United States Government; and

(3) to engender a high degree of confidence on the part of the public regarding the conduct of such investigation, study, and hearings.

(b) SPECIAL COMMITTEE ACTIONS.-To carry out the purposes stated in subsection (a), the special committee is encouraged-

(1) to obtain relevant information concerning the status of the investigation of the independent counsel, to assist in establishing a hearing schedule for the special committee; and

(2) to coordinate, to the extent practicable, the activities of the special committee with the investigation of the independent counsel.

SEC. 8. SALARIES AND EXPENSES.

A sum equal to not more than $950,000 for the period beginning on the date of adoption of this resolution and ending on February 29, 1996, shall be made available from the contingent fund of the Senate out of the Account for Expenses for Inquiries and Investigations for payment of salaries and other expenses of the special committee under this resolution, which shall include not more S6826 than $750,000 for the procurement of the services of individual consultants or organizations thereof, in accordance with section 5(b)(11). Payment of expenses shall be disbursed upon vouchers approved by the chairman, except that vouchers shall not be required for the disbursement of salaries paid at an annual rate.

SEC. 9. REPORTS; TERMINATION.

(a) COMPLETION OF DUTIES.-

(1) IN GENERAL.-The special committee shall make every reasonable effort to complete, not later than February 1, 1996, the investigation, study, and hearings authorized by section 1.

(2) EVALUATION OF PROGRESS.-The special committee shall evaluate the progress and status of the investigation, study, and hearings authorized by section 1 and, not later than January 15, 1996, make recommendations with respect to the authorization of additional funds for a period following February 29, 1996. If the special committee requests the authorization of additional funds for a period following February 29, 1996, the Majority Leader and the Democratic Leader shall meet and determine the appropriate timetable and procedures for the Senate to vote on any such request.

(b) FINAL REPORT.-

(1) SUBMISSION.-The special committee shall promptly submit a final public report to the Senate of the results of the investigation, study, and hearings conducted by the special committee pursuant to this resolution, together with its findings and any recommendations.

(2) CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION.-The final report of the special committee may be accompanied by such confidential annexes as are necessary to protect confidential information.

(3) CONCLUSION OF BUSINESS.-After submission of its final report, the special committee shall promptly conclude its business and close out its affairs.

(c) RECORDS.-Upon the conclusion of the special committee's business and the closing out of its affairs, all records, files, documents, and other materials in the possession, custody, or control of the special committee shall remain under the control of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

SEC. 10. COMMITTEE JURISDICTION AND RULE XXV.

The jurisdiction of the special committee is granted pursuant to this resolution, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate relating to the jurisdiction of the standing committees of the Senate.

Hearing

Day Seven of the Special Hearings Into Investments Made by President and Mrs. Clinton and Articles Allegedly Removed from the Office of Vince Foster.

WHITEWATER SPECIAL COMMITTEE

AUGUST 1, 1995

SPEAKERS LIST: SENATOR ALFONSE D'AMATO, R-NY
SENATOR PAUL SARBANES, D-MD
ROBERT LANGSTON, U.S. PARK POLICE CHIEF
DEBORAH GORHAM, EXECUTIVE ASSISTANT TO VINCE FOSTER

[*]
D'AMATO: ...statement that he wants to make. Senator Sarbanes.

SARBANES: Mr. Chairman, first of all, happy birthday.

D'AMATO: Thank you.
SARBANES: Secondly, and more ... I'm very much concerned about this leak problem. I've raised this before, but now we've had a situation in which apparently actual deposition transcripts were given to the press. These are the, as I understand it, the actual documents or copies of the documents, and it directly contravenes every procedure of the Committee, which were worked out very carefully and for very good reason.

Now, section six of the resolution provides for the protection of confidential information and states non-disclosure, and no member of the Special Committee or the staff shall disclose in whole or in part to any person other than other staff or other members various material. Then there's a non-disclosure agreement which members of the staff sign. Now this isn't the...we've had previous problems here that I've raised where people have disclosed information, often erroneous information. So you've had articles then written that completely misstate the situation. Witnesses suffer as a consequence of that.

That was drawn out in the course of previous testimony here. Ms. Mathews, for instance, was written up as having said certain things which she didn't say and which became very clear in her testimony. And now we have a situation in which apparently the actual transcript of the deposition itself is being given out.

This is rather important, and it's kind of interesting, because I was reading, you know, these become available to the members the night before under our procedures. So I was reading through one of the depositions of one of the witnesses here this morning, and just to underscore why it's important for the witnesses, let me just read from that transcript very quickly. One of the deponents, one of the witnesses on our first panel, they asked about the release of the transcripts, and were told by Mr. Jiuffra, who was doing the questioning at that point for the Committee, "Know the depositions will be treated as Committee-confidential until that time," meaning the time of the testimony here, meaning only a limited number of people can see the deposition, that people have signed confidentiality agreements. And then later the witness herself said, was asked whether they understood what had just been said about the procedures, and said I do.

There are, however, leaks obviously because we continue to read about them in the paper, the people that you've deposed to dates. So where is the confidentiality being violated? And Mr. Jiuffra said, "do you want to go off the record for a second?" And then they went off the record, a discussion ensued, and then Mr. Jiuffra, when they came back on the record, just to briefly summarize, we discussed some of the procedures that the Committee has in place to protect the confidentiality of deposition transcripts. That's what the depondent was told. And, of course, the Committee did put those procedures in place last summer.

Now, if the procedures, they're obviously not being adhered to and I must say, Mr. Chairman, I think there's a problem which requires looking, very intense looking into on the part of the Committee, because obviously someone is breaking all of our, breaking all of our procedures here. We had the...

D'AMATO: Well, I wish that all of our members were here to hear the concern that you have very aptly and correctly raised. I believe that this is a betrayal of the work of our counsels and their staff and indeed of the Committee and its members.

(SPEAKER CORRECTION)

D'AMATO: Senators, from both sides, were endeavoring to get the facts, and to do it in a way that is not prejudicial. I can only say that I will work with you, and ask our two counsels to do anything and everything they can necessary, to find a manner in which to secure whatever of the depositions and testimony has been given. It is difficult, if not impossible, without the good faith of those people, not only on the committee but the staffers. I do not believe that any senator, on either side, has violated the sacred trust.

I do believe that there is a staffer or staffers who for their own reason, whether it is to aggrandize themselves with the media, get their little oar in the water, show what kind of pull or knowledge they have, has undertaken this. It undermines the credibility of all of the work that we undertake when they engage in this kind of activity.

I think we can continue to lament about it, but I'd like to suggest that we see if we can't--I don't know what else we can do--except keep everything under lock and key to the point that they can't even remove any documents, not even to work. I know there have been certain procedures. And I just spell out to the lame brain who has undertaken this kind of thing, that they do terrible damage to the entire process and to the people who come and who do testify.

And again, to this committee and to every member of the committee they undermine. I don't know what to say. I've spoken. I've sought out individuals. I've spoken to staffs. Maybe we'll have to get them together again. Maybe we'll have to --What do they do when they have a criminal trial? They put all the people, keep them incommunicado from getting certain information. Maybe we'll have to get the staffs in the senate to. What do we call that? Maybe we'll have to sequester. And the staff now, I mean this really is incredible. I don't think we should. It is important. I share your concern. And if Mr. Ben-Veniste and Mr. Chertoff and yourself or I can attempt to impose better security, why I would look for anything I can in that nature within reason to insure that.

SARBANES: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think we can focus this in much more finally. As I understand our procedures, which I assume have been followed, an agreement was worked out whereby the deposition transcripts would not be given to the members of the committee or their staff until the evening before the witnesses appearance in front of the committee.

In other words, last night we, the members, received the transcripts for the witnesses who are coming in today. Now the transcripts that were leaked were for witnesses who weren't even coming this week. They're coming next week. So presumably, if the procedures were followed, and I have no reason to think they weren't, members and member's staffs do not have access to those transcripts.

SARBANES: The only people having access to those transcripts would be staff of the committee. so it seems to me that we can, we can focus in very directly there. And I think that your suggestion to Mr. Chertoff and Mr. Ben-Veniste undertake to do that, in consultation with us is, is a very good suggestion. Particularly, when as I just quoted you had one deponent who asked about this very issue and was given assurances by Mr. Jiuffra with respect to it.

D'AMATO: Well, I'm -- again I renew the, the agreement that we undertake this together. Have our counsels pursue this matter and see if we can't narrow and maybe even get a better idea as to who exactly was responsible for this. We're just working too hard and doing too much good work to have this jeopardized in this kind of manner. Yes, Senator.

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, I think it is even a little more complicated than Senator Sarbanes suggests because here. You have Mr. Margolis, who is clearly one of the key players in all this. I ask my staff some time ago if we had a deposition, they said no, I think he had a triple bypass. We did not have a deposition.

But this is not the leak from a deposition. It's from E-Mail, which I don't think my staff doesn't seem to have. I don't think other staffs have, and it is the selective and distorted leaking that I think does concern us. And I appreciate your attitude and I know it is difficult in this body to prevent leaking. But I think we should try to, so that we get balance out there and not a distorted picture of what's taking place.

D'AMATO: I share the Senators concern and I'm going to ask that again that our counsels see -- we're going to have a vote at 10 o'clock. My initial intent was to see if we could not get the witnesses up, swear them in, maybe we'll take their testimony and adjourn for that, that vote.

But I'm going to ask counsels to pursue the matter, see what we can do. And, and accept again, to the staffers, staffers are doing this. You're not doing anything but really jeopardizing these hearings. And I have to tell you what we will do in the future, will be to be even more restrictive, as it relates to the, the depositions. And the availability of the deposition, because it's become obvious to this Senator, that they will not be able to be made available at the staffers. And that only Senators at certain times, if we have to keep it to that, to that manner of modality, we'll have the ability to see them until the night before.
Now, that will necessarily make it more difficult for the participation of the full committee. But I see no other recourse, certainly at this particular time. There's little that we can do, as it relates to those depositions that have already been taken. And the access that has been afforded at this point.

But I'm going to ask that our counsels review the matter and give us some recommendations. Then we'll confer with all of the members of the committee, as it relates to the manners in which we will proceed to, to provide as much in the way of, of secrecy, so to speak or guarding the contents of these documents, so that they are not selectively released.

D'AMATO: I have not read any of these depositions, because I didn't want to be in the position of inadvertently responding to a question, recall something that I may have read that would not be appropriate, and put that in a response. So I have deliberately refrained from that. I don't think it comes from any of the members, but I do think there is at least a staffer who thinks he's playing some wonderful public service. And he or she is not doing that.

Why don't we get our witnesses up -- the first panel, and we'll get any statement they want to make, we'll swear them in, and I don't think it's worthwhile starting, because we will have a vote at 10:00, but immediately after that vote, we'll come back and resume.

I think we have Deborah Gorham and Linda Tripp. Please remain standing. Raise your right hand. Do you swear and affirm that the testimony that you are about to give is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

GORHAM/TRIPP: I do.

D'AMATO: Deborah Gorham, you are an assistant to the associate counsel to the President, a former assistant to the deputy counsel to the President, Vincent Foster. Is that correct?

GORHAM: I'm sorry, Chairman D'Amato.

D'AMATO: You were formerly the executive assistant to the deputy counsel to the President, Vincent Foster?

GORHAM: I was.

D'AMATO: Do you have a statement you'd like to give, Ms. Gorham?

GORHAM: Yes, sir, I do. My name is Deborah Gorham. I now work at a private law firm in Washington, DC. I worked for Vincent Foster as an executive assistant for a very brief period of time -- from March 8, 1993 until July 20, 1993.

During that time, we had a very professional working relationship. I had great respect for Vincent Foster, and his death was a tragic loss. It affected me deeply, and I feel great sympathy for the Foster family and hope that this matter will soon be put to rest. I am here to cooperate fully to the best I can. Thank you.

D'AMATO: Thank you very much, Ms. Gorham. Linda Tripp.
TRIPP: Yes, Chairman.

D'AMATO: Do you have a statement, Linda?

TRIPP: I do, briefly.

D'AMATO: We'll be happy to receive it.

TRIPP: My name is Linda Tripp. From April 93 through April 94, I served as executive assistant to the counsel to the President, Bernie Nussbaum. I worked in the same suite of offices as Vince Foster at the time he died. I am prepared at this time to answer any questions you have regarding the handling of documents following the death of Mr. Foster. Thank you.

D'AMATO: May I ask you, do you still work at the White House?

TRIPP: I work for the Department of Defense at the Pentagon.

D'AMATO: First of all, let me say that we very much appreciate your cooperation, and if you have been placed in any inconvenience as a result of anybody putting out, I don't believe to date there's been any leaking of your depositions, we certainly are concerned about that.

D'AMATO: We certainly are concerned about that. I have been informed by staff that you have been most cooperative, both of you. And we deeply appreciate your cooperation and understand the sensitivity of this matter. Now, I'm going to ask the ranking member if he thinks we should begin or should we take a break now, given that the vote is supposedly going to start in five minutes. OK, we're going to take a break. We'll probably be back at about quarter after ten to resume. Mr. Chertoff will then put some questions to you. No trick questions, OK?

We stand in recess until the conclusion of the vote that's about to start.

GORHAM: It's simply based on recollections in, over the last two years.

CHAFFE: Putting aside the particular day, and I should tell you we have some independent evidence that the two of them were actually in the office on the 22nd, which would be the week of Mr. Foster's death, would you tell us what you recall of the occasion on which Mr. Nussbaum and Ms. Williams were in Mr. Foster's office?

GORHAM: Mr. Nussbaum had called me into Mr. Foster's office and asked me to state to him what was in, what were the file drawers, what were the file folders in the file drawer that contained the President's and First Lady's personal and financial documents.

CHAFFE: Was Mr. Nussbaum alone at that point?

GORHAM: He was not.

CHAFFE: Was Mr. Nussbaum alone at the point?

GORHAM: He was not.

CHAFFE: Who was with him?

GORHAM: Miss Maggie Williams.

CHAFFE: Where were they in the office when you were called in?

GORHAM: Mr. Nussbaum was seated at a club chair in front of Mr., in the front of Mr. Foster's desk. Miss Williams was standing on the other side of the table of the club chair in front of Mr. Foster's sofa.

CHAFFE: And would you tell us what you said to Mr. Nussbaum, and what happened?

GORHAM: I stated if I would, and walked around Mr. Foster's desk, and pulled open the drawer that contained the President's and First Lady's personal and financial documents.

CHAFFE: Where was that drawer?

GORHAM: If you were seated at Mr. Foster's desk, it was to the left, and there were four drawers and a cabinet and it was the farthest left at the top.
CHAFFE: When you pulled open the drawer, what did you see?

GORHAM: I saw Pendaflex folders and file folders. And I did not see a index that normally would have been there, listing the names of the files.

CHAFFE: What index are you referring to?

GORHAM: I maintained indexes for all file drawers that I recall. And listed the contents of the names of each of the folders in each drawer.

CHAFFE: And you say when you opened the drawer on that day, in the presence of Mr. Nussbaum and Miss Williams that index was not where you normally kept it?

GORHAM: No, sir, it was not in that drawer.

CHAFFE: Did you see that index anywhere else that day?

GORHAM: No, sir.

CHAFFE: Now, after you had opened the drawer, what did you do?

GORHAM: I started to tell Mr. Nussbaum, read him the name of those file folders, at which time after the first few names to ask me to stop and stated to me that he would take care of that himself.

CHAFFE: And then what did you do?

GORHAM: I left the office of Mr. Foster's.

CHAFFE: Now, do you remember how long Mr. Nussbaum and Miss Williams remained in the office after you left?

GORHAM: I do not recall exactly how long it was?

CHAFFE: Was there a point that you were called back in by Mr. Nussbaum?

GORHAM: I don't believe so. That he would called me back in.

CHAFFE: And tell us what happened there?

GORHAM: I sat down at Mr. Foster's desk. And I opened his metal desk drawer and in there I found personal items such as checks that were written to Mr. Foster, and his life insurance policy.

CHAFFE: And, why did you do that?

GORHAM: I do not recall if, why I sat down at his desk an did that.

CHAFFE: At the point that you went back in to open up the middle desk drawer, was Ms. Williams still there with Mr. Nussbaum?

GORHAM: She was.

CHAFFE: What did you do after you opened the door?

GORHAM: I looked in, and then I closed it, and then left the office.

CHAFFE: Do you remember seeing during this period of time, either the first or second time you went into the office, a box or boxes in the offices?

GORHAM: I'm sorry, would you repeat the question?

CHAFFE: During either the first time you went in, or the second time you went in on this occasion, with Mr. Nussbaum and Ms. Williams, did you see a box, or boxes in the office?

GORHAM: Yes, sir, I did.

CHAFFE: And, did there come a point later that something happened with those boxes?

GORHAM: Yes, sir.

CHAFFE: Tell us about that.

GORHAM: Mr. Nussbaum asked me to have the boxes moved out of Mr. Foster's office, and I asked Mr. Tom Castleton if he would carry them.

CHAFFE: And who was Tom Castleton?

GORHAM: Mr. Castleton was a staff assistant in our office.

CHAFFE: Can you tell us what happened?

GORHAM: Mr. Castleton picked them and carried them out behind Miss Williams. And the last the that I saw of them, noticed them was in the door just outside of our suite.

CHAFFE: Did you know where the boxes were the boxes were going?

GORHAM: No, sir.

CHAFEE: At any point on that day, getting your attention back to this index you've described, did you access your computer and revise that index on that day?

TRIPP: I don't recall if I accessed my computer in any way. I do not recall, I do not recall looking at that index on the hard drive.

CHAFEE: Now, let me turn to you, Miss Tripp, for a moment. Were you around on the day that Maggie Williams, the chief of staff for the First Lady and Mr. Castleton took a box or boxes out of Mr. Foster's office?

TRIPP: I recall Tom Castleton removing a box.

CHAFEE: And, what do you recall about the circumstances of that?

TRIPP: My recollection is that the box or boxes were placed in front of Deb Gorham's desk. My next recollection is that Tom Castleton is physically carrying a box out of the safe.

CHAFEE: What was your understanding at that time of where the box or boxes were going?

TRIPP: Until I asked, I had no idea where they were going.

CHAFEE: Who did you ask?

TRIPP: I asked Deb Gorham and later Tom Castleton when he returned.

CHAFEE: And what did you learn?

TRIPP: That the boxes were going and had been delivered to the residence.

CHAFEE: That's the White House resident?

TRIPP: Yes, sir.

CHAFEE: I also, Miss Tripp, just to turn from you for a moment, and focusing your attention on . . .

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, can we ask how big a box are we talking about, bigger than a bread box, or a file cabinet? How many files are we talking about?

TRIPP: A box. I can't define the size of the box. It wasn't a two-man box. One person could easily carry the box.

CHAFEE: Were these files standing vertically? Were they lying down? Was the box 10 inches tall so that the files could be vertically, or was it three inches tall? How many documents, is what I'm after. I really don't care about the size of the box.

TRIPP: I don't know.

CHAFEE: Ms. Gorham, maybe you, do you remember how big the box was and what it was like?

GORHAM: To the best that I could recall the size of the boxes were the size of a small box that would hold approximately four or five reams of photocopy paper.

D'AMATO: OK, that's helpful. Thank you, I'm sorry to interrupt.

CHAFEE: Let me keep your attention focused on this same time period, Ms. Tripp, this two-day period between Mr. Foster's death and funeral. Do you remember Susan Thomases making calls to Bernard Nussbaum during that period of time?

TRIPP: I have a recollection of speaking with Susan Thomases during that time.

CHAFEE: What about the First Lady? Do you have a recollection of her having a telephone conversation with Mr. Nussbaum?

TRIPP: I don't have a clear recollection of the First Lady speaking to him during that timeframe.

CHAFEE: Do you have some kind of a recollection of it?

TRIPP: I know at one point, there was a telephone conversation between Mr. Nussbaum and Mrs. Clinton. I don't recall when that was.

CHAFEE: Do you recall that it occurred during this period of time in a day or two after Mr. Foster's death?

TRIPP: I thought so, yes.

CHAFEE: Do you remember what the subject of that conversation was, or did you ever learn the subject of that conversation between the First Lady and Mr. Nussbaum in the day or two after Mr. Foster's death?

TRIPP: No, sir, I would have had no reason to know that.

CHAFEE: Do you remember how long the conversation was?

TRIPP: No, sir, I don't.

CHAFEE: Now, Ms. Tripp, I also want to ask you in this period of time, do you recall an occasion you had a conversation with Ms. Gorham concerning something that was seen in the bottom of Mr. Foster's briefcase?

TRIPP: Yes, sir.

CHAFEE: Would you tell us what you recall about the circumstances of that conversation?

TRIPP: I am uncertain as to what day and what time this conversation took place.

CHAFEE: When you say what day, you mean it could have either been the Wednesday or the Thursday following Mr. Foster's death?

TRIPP: To the best of my recollection, it was one of those two days, yes, sir.

CHAFEE: Tell us about the circumstances.

TRIPP: The conversation followed Deborah's return to the reception area suite after having been called into one of the two principal's offices, either...

CHAFEE: You said...I'm sorry, go ahead.

TRIPP: Either Mr. Nussbaum's or Mr. Foster's, I'm unclear as to it. When she returned, I asked her, had there been anything found, was there any indication as to why, a note anything. And she said, no. And I pursued it, and said did you look everywhere? Did you look in the briefcase? And she said, the briefcase was empty. There was nothing in there but a bunch of little yellow sticky notes.

CHAFEE: Now, you say this conversation occurred after Ms. Gorham came out of a meeting with, that either took place inside Mr. Nussbaum's office or inside Mr. Foster's office.

TRIPP: Yes, sir.

CHAFEE: Does the fact that the conversation you had with her had to do with searching for any note or searching for an indication of motivation help you to remember that it's likely this meeting occurred in Mr. Foster's office?

TRIPP: I just don't know, sir.

CHAFEE: You'd agree with me, at least, that there was no reason to search in Mr. Nussbaum's office for evidence of a note or anything of that sort. Correct?

TRIPP: Again, I don't know. I don't know what had transpired prior to that, whether something had perhaps been moved to Mr. Nussbaum's office. I had clearly no idea.

CHAFEE: But your recollection is in any event that after Ms. Gorham came out of this meeting, you initiated the questions about whether there had been a search for a note or some other kind of indication of why Mr. Foster killed himself?

TRIPP: Absolutely.

CHAFEE: And it was in connection with that that Ms. Gorham said to you, again, as precisely as you can recall, what about the briefcase?

TRIPP: I don't recall Deborah saying she looked in the briefcase. I recall her saying either it was empty or there is nothing in there, followed by, except for a bunch of little yellow sticky notes, she may have said, at the bottom. My understanding was there was nothing else but scattered little yellow sticky notes.

CHAFEE: Ms. Gorham, do you recall this conversation with Ms. Tripp?

GORHAM: No, I'm sorry, I do not.

CHAFEE: So, you can't, you can't help us anymore with this conversation?

GORHAM: No, I just don't recall the conversation.

CHAFEE: Let me now take you forward to Monday, which was Monday the 26th of July, which is the Monday of the following week. Ms. Gorham, do you remember in the afternoon on that day Mr. Neuwirth, who is one of the associate counsels to Mr. Nussbaum, coming out of Mr. Foster's office with a briefcase?

GORHAM: I recall Mr. Neuwirth coming out of Mr. Foster's office with a briefcase. I don't recall if it was in the afternoon or the morning.

CHAFEE: And where did he go with the briefcase?

GORHAM: He went into Mr. Nussbaum's office and slammed the door.

CHAFEE: And then tell us what you saw of the comings and goings thereafter.

GORHAM: To the best of my memory, Mr. Neuwirth came out and asked one of the assistants to find Mr. Nussbaum. Later, Mr. Nussbaum returned to the office, went into his office, slammed the door. A few minutes later, Mr. Nussbaum opened the door, exited, slammed the door, and walked down the hallway.

CHAFEE: And then what else happened?

GORHAM: And then, I believe Mr. Burton, Bill Burton, might have appeared next, going into Mr. Nussbaum's office. And then other people, I think, came in, straggling, but I don't recall who they were.

CHAFEE: And was the office closed? Was the door to Mr. Nussbaum's office closed except when people were coming and going?

GORHAM: Yes, sir.

CHAFEE: Ms. Tripp, do you remember this occurrence on Monday?

TRIPP: I remember Steve Neuwirth opening the door, yes.

CHAFEE: And asking for somebody?

TRIPP: Yes, sir.

CHAFEE: And you remember Mr. Burton coming in?

TRIPP: I didn't have an independent recollection Mr. Burton coming back to our suite until I went over the E-mail traffic.

CHAFEE: And that refreshed your memory?

TRIPP: It did.

CHAFEE: Do you remember the First Lady coming into that, into Mr. Nussbaum's office during that same period?

TRIPP: Again, I did not have an independent recollection until I read the E-mail traffic.

CHAFEE: But now you do remember that?

TRIPP: Yes, sir.

CHAFEE: During that same period of coming and going, did you have a discussion with Mr. Clifford Sloan about something?

TRIPP: Actually, are you referring to that particular time period?

CHAFEE: Yes.

TRIPP: No, sir.

CHAFEE: How about later that day?

TRIPP: Later that evening I did.

CHAFEE: Tell us about that.

TRIPP: It was later in the evening. I was in the reception area. The door to Bernie's office was closed. At one point in time, Cliff Sloan came out of Bernie's office and asked me if it was possible to remove one of the typewriters to bring back into Bernie's office.

CHAFEE: And what did you say?

TRIPP: I asked him why it was necessary to try to do that when we had five computers in the outer office.

CHAFEE: And what did he say?

TRIPP: That he wanted the typewriter.

CHAFEE: And so what happened?

TRIPP: Well, we had two typewriters, and I explained to him that the way they were configured and plugged in under all the massive furniture with taping to the carpet and the co-mingling of all the various cable underneath, that it would be a very difficult endeavor, and that I offered to get him a typewriter, excuse me, from elsewhere.

CHAFEE: And what did he say?

TRIPP: He indicated he, that was not something he chose for me to do at that point, and he went back in the office.

CHAFEE: Went back into Mr. Nussbaum's office?

TRIPP: Yes, sir.

CHAFEE: And he closed the door.

TRIPP: He did.

CHAFEE: At that point, was Mr. Nussbaum, were Mr. Nussbaum and Mr. Neuwirth still in Mr. Nussbaum's office?

TRIPP: It was my understanding that those are two others in the office.

CHAFEE: And you're quite sure it was Mr. Sloan who came out that evening and not Mr. Neuwirth?

TRIPP: To the best of my recollection, it was Mr. Sloan.

CHAFEE: Now, I also want to keep your attention, Ms. Gorham, focussed on the same afternoon or evening. After the, you had observed the briefcase being taken out of Mr. Foster's office and the various comings and goings, did there come a time that Mr. Nussbaum had asked you to come into his office, either later that day or early the next morning?

GORHAM: Yes.

CHAFEE: Would you tell us about that.

GORHAM: Mr. Bernie, Mr. Nussbaum asked me to sit at the chair on the opposite side of his table and asked me if I had seen anything in the bottom of Vince's briefcase. And I told him that I had only seen the color yellow and I had seen the top of a gold kraft third-cut folder, and that is all I had seen.

CHAFEE: Now when you say a gold kraft third-cut folder, you mean a folder like this, a manila type folder?

GORHAM: Yes, sir.

CHAFEE: And you told Mr. Nussbaum you had seen that in Mr. Foster's briefcase at an earlier time?

S6771 ESTABLISHING A SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE WHITEWATER DEVELOPMENT CORP. AND OTHER MATTERS

Mr. D'AMATO.

Mr. President, I send the resolution to the desk on behalf of myself and Senator DOLE-and I know others would like to join-and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 120) establishing a special committee administered by the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs to conduct an investigation involving Whitewater Development Corp., Madison Guaranty Savings & Loan Association, Capital Management Services, Inc., the Arkansas Development Finance authority, and other related matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. D'AMATO.

Mr. President, Whitewater is a very serious matter. Some questions raised by Whitewater go to the very heart of our democratic system of government. We must determine whether the public trust has been abused. We must ascertain whether purely private interests have been placed above the public trust. The American people have a right to know the full facts about Whitewater and related matters.

After the Banking Committee's hearings last year, many important questions still remain. The American people have a right and a need to know the answers to these questions.

Congress has the responsibility to serve as the public's watchdog. We would be derelict in our duties if we did not pursue these Whitewater questions. The Senate must proceed in an evenhanded, impartial, and thorough manner. We have a constitutional responsibility to resolve these issues.

Mr. President, we now bring before the Senate a resolution that authorizes a special committee administered by the Banking Committee to continue the Whitewater inquiry that was started but not completed during the last Congress.

I thank my distinguished colleague, Senator SARBANES, for his hard work and cooperation in the preparation of this resolution. We have jointly prepared a resolution that is balanced and fair and that will allow the special committee to search for the truth. I am confident that Senator SARBANES and I will continue the Banking Committee's bipartisan approach to the Whitewater matter.

Mr. President, our pursuit of these questions must be and will be fair, straightforward, and responsible. The American people expect and deserve a thorough inquiry committed to the pursuit of truth. That is the American way.

Last summer, the Banking Committee met these vigorous requirements. Our examination of the Whitewater matter was impartial, balanced, and thorough. That is our goal in this Congress. I am confident that we will meet these goals.

During last summer's hearings, many facts were uncovered. We learned that certain top administration officials were not fully candid and forthcoming with the Congress. That is an undisputed fact. The public has a right to expect more from those in positions of trust. We also learned that senior Treasury Department and Clinton White House officials mishandled confidential law enforcement information concerning Madison Guaranty. That is another undisputed fact. Madison is now defunct; it is a defunct S&L at the heart of the Whitewater matter. The failure of this Arkansas S&L eventually cost American taxpayers more than $47 million.

Mr. President, the American people have a right to know the answers to S6772 many serious questions still remaining about Whitewater and related matters. We have a constitutional obligation to seek the answers to these questions. That is why I am offering this resolution today.

Now I will briefly outline some of the matters that this resolution authorizes the special committee to investigate. We will begin with the handling of the papers in deputy White House counsel Vince Foster's office following his death. Who searched Mr. Foster's office on the night of his death? What were they looking for? What happened to Mr. Foster's papers? Were any papers lost or destroyed? And who authorized the transfer of Mr. Foster's Whitewater file to a closet in the First Family's residence? The public has a right to the answers to these questions.

Mr. President, this resolution encourages the special committee to coordinate its activities with those of the independent counsel, Kenneth Starr. Senator SARBANES and I have met with the independent counsel. Judge Starr has indicated to us that he has no objection to the special committee's plan to inquire into the handling of Mr. Foster's papers. Senator SARBANES and I are committed to coordinating the committee's activities with those of the special counsel.

This resolution authorizes the special committee to pursue answers to other questions raised during the Banking Committee's hearings last year.

We will explore the scope and impact of the improper dissemination of confidential law enforcement information concerning Madison Guaranty. How widely did the Clinton administration officials communicate this confidential information? Did any high-ranking officials inform targets of criminal investigations? If so, did this impact any ongoing investigations? The public has a right to know the answers to these questions.

The special committee will also examine whether there were any improper contacts between the Clinton White House and the Justice Department regarding Madison Guaranty.

We know that Paula Casey, the U.S. attorney in Little Rock, declined to pursue criminal referrals involving Madison. That is an undisputed fact. We also know that Webster Hubbell, who has pleaded guilty to mail fraud and tax evasion, was the No. 3 official at the Justice Department at this critical time. This is another undisputed fact.

The committee will ascertain whether Mr. Hubbell contacted Paula Casey about Madison. And who else, if anyone, knew about these contacts with the U.S. attorney. The public has the right to know.

Mr. President, this resolution authorizes the special committee to explore whether the Resolution Trust Corporation and other officials in Washington tried to interfere improperly with RTC staff in Kansas City responsible for investigating wrongdoing at Madison. If such interference occurred, who authorized it, and why? The public deserves answers to these questions.

During last summer's hearings, the Banking Committee learned that the Treasury inspector general furnished the Clinton White House, at the White House counsel's request, transcripts of the inspector general's depositions. That is an undisputed fact.

The committee will now look into whether these deposition transcripts were used to coach administration witnesses before they appeared in front of the committee. That would be wrong. The public has a right to know if it happened.

All of these matters that I have discussed so far involve events that occurred after January 1993 when President Clinton took office. There are also serious questions regarding events that occurred in Arkansas in the 1980's when President Clinton was Governor. This resolution also authorizes the special committee to examine these matters. Some of these Arkansas matters are complex and will require the committee's close review of many thousands of pages of documents.

We will review the operations and regulations of Madison Guaranty. Did James McDougal, Madison's chairman and Governor Clinton's business partner, improperly divert Madison's funds to himself and others? Did any of this money find its way into the White House real estate project in which McDougal and Governor Clinton were partners? Did McDougal misuse Madison funds to cover any losses the First Family suffered on their Whitewater investment? The public has a right to know the answers to these questions.

Mr. President, the resolution further authorizes the special committee to examine the Rose law firm's representation of both Madison and RTC, and senior partners at the Rose law firm, including Larry Rodham Clinton, Webster Hubbell, and Vince Foster. The committee must ascertain whether the Rose law firm properly handled the RTC civil claims concerning Madison.

Did the firm have a conflict of interest, and did American taxpayers lose money in the process?

We will also examine Capital Management Services and its president, David Hale, a former Arkansas judge and Clinton appointee. Hale has publicly charged that the President pressured him to make Small Business Administration loans that were used to prop up Madison.

Did this happen? Did Hale also make improper Small Business Administration loans to current Arkansas Gov. Jim Guy Tucker?

Then there is the matter of the financing of the 1990 Arkansas gubernatorial campaign. We now know that the president of the Perry County Bank, Neal Ainley, has pleaded guilty to violating Federal laws in connection with the handling of certain large cash transactions for the Clinton campaign. Ainley claims he did so at the direction of campaign officials. The public has a right to know who authorized this activity and why.

Mr. President, this resolution will authorize the special committee to examine these and related matters. We will take every reasonable step to complete this inquiry promptly. We hope that the administration cooperates with us in this regard. But we also intend to be thorough and comprehensive.

This resolution provides $950,000 to fund the special committee through February 29, 1996. If additional money is needed, the special committee will make a recommendation not later than January 15, 1996, and the majority and minority will meet to determine the time for any vote.

Mr. President, we expect to hold public hearings into the handling of the papers of Vince Foster's office in late June or early July. We will continue our inquiry by subject matter until it is completed. In doing so, we will make every effort not to interfere with the independent counsel's criminal investigation.

Mr. President, the American people deserve to know the full facts about Whitewater and related matters. As I said at the outset, we will conduct this inquiry in a fair, evenhanded, and impartial manner.

That is what the American people want, expect, and deserve. I urge the approval of this resolution.

I see that my distinguished colleague and ranking member, Senator SARBANES, is here. We have allocated up to 2 hours, equally divided.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES.

Mr. President, may I ask what the time situation is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. HUTCHISON).

There are 2 hours, of which 15 minutes has already been used.

Mr. SARBANES.

There is an hour now remaining on this side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

That is correct.

Mr. SARBANES.

I thank the Chair.

Madam President, it is not my intention to use the entire hour. I hope at some point both sides might be able to yield back time and proceed to final consideration of the resolution.

Let me say at the outset that the resolution we are considering today, which authorizes a special committee to be administered by the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, is really a carrying out of resolutions that were adopted last year by this body. I think it is important to consider this resolution in the context of those resolutions-actions taken by the Senate last year.

On March 17, 1994, a little over a year ago, the Senate adopted a resolution by a vote of 98-0 expressing the sense of the Senate that hearings should be held on all matters relating to Madison, to Whitewater, and to Capital Management.

Then, to carry out that resolution, at least in part, on June 21 of last year, S6773 the Senate agreed to Senate Resolution 229, which authorized hearings to be held into certain areas. Those hearings were done last summer. We had 6 days of public hearings. We had extensive analysis of documents that were provided to the inquiry committee in order to enable it to carry out its responsibilities.

Now, one of the things that was authorized to be looked into by the June 21 resolution was the handling of the Foster documents. That was later deferred, in response to a request from the independent counsel who contacted the committee and indicated that, given the nature of his inquiry, it would be preferable if the Committee did not go ahead with that hearing. Accordingly, we held off.

Now the distinguished chairman has indicated that it would be the first item which will be considered in the hearings that will now take place under the resolution we are considering here today.

So this resolution is in effect a continuation of our earlier work. It authorizes the completion of work specified in last year's resolution, as well as matters developed during and arising out of the hearings that were held last summer, and also a number of matters my colleague has enumerated that carry forth on the sense-of-the-Senate commitment last year to investigate all matters pertaining to Madison.

I want to go through some other aspects of this resolution, just to lay them out on the record. The chairman of the Banking Committee, Senator D'AMATO, has gone through a number of matters that have been provided for in this resolution to be examined by the special committee. The special committee, administered by the Banking Committee, shall consist of all of the members of the Banking Committee plus two members added from the Judiciary Committee. The chairman and ranking members of the Committee on the Judiciary, or their designees, will join with the members of the Banking Committee to constitute the special committee which will be administered by the Banking Committee. So it is essentially-or primarily, let me say-a Banking Committee activity, since most of the areas to be examined clearly fall under the jurisdiction of the Banking Committee. But we did add from the Judiciary Committee last year. A member came on in order to help carry out the inquiry. And there are some matters that are contained in the resolution, to be examined that, it could well be argued, are under the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee. So, to bring that together, we are bringing on two members from the Judiciary Committee, the chairman and ranking member or their designees. They will be designating someone else to handle this responsibility if they choose to do so, and I do not know at this point what Chairman HATCH and ranking member BIDEN intend to do in that regard. But obviously we will abide by their decision.

We have also provided in the resolution which is now before us, and which shortly will be adopted, for rules and procedures of this committee which essentially will be the rules and procedures of the Senate, the Standing Rules of the Senate, and the rules of procedure of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs. That is, in effect, the rules framework, procedural framework within which we will operate. There are in the resolution sections that cover aspects of the process that the special committee will follow; these are matters it was deemed important that we spell out in the resolution how they were going to be dealt with. Those involve questions of subpoena powers, questions of how the hearings will be conducted-important questions about immunity. I want to underscore that because that is a matter we have had to address before.

We provide that to grant a witness immunity-I want to read this section because it is an important matter. The special committee has the power: "To grant a witness immunity under section 6002 and 6005" of title 18, United States Code, "provided that the independent counsel has not informed the special committee in writing that immunizing the witness would interfere with the ability of the independent counsel successfully to prosecute criminal violations."

We also provide for staffing of the committee. There is power to appoint special committee staff including consultants, assistance from the Senate legal counsel, assistance from the Comptroller General. There is a provision whereby the committee can draw on other Government agencies, Government personnel, and on other congressional staff. And we hope, through a combination of all of these sources, that we will have an adequate staff to carry out a proper inquiry and investigation.

There is also, of course, special provision for the protection of confidential information, since we will be interacting with the independent counsel and others and we think it is important to have such provisions.

Finally, the money asked for in this resolution, just under $1 million, $950,000, is to cover the salaries and other expenses of the special committee carrying out this inquiry, beginning on the date of the adoption of this resolution-I assume today-and ending February 29, 1996.

If it is judged that additional money is needed, that the inquiry needs to go forward and additional money is required in order to fund it, the special committee will recommend that. Of course there will have to be a further vote for the providing of additional moneys to the special committee.

Mr. President, let me just make a couple of further, more general observations. I have very quickly gone through the resolution and I think most of it is straightforward. I think Members of the Senate upon reviewing it will conclude that is the case. Many of the provisions are what one might call boilerplate for such an inquiry, and track previous provisions that have been used in various Senate resolutions establishing committees to carry out inquiries or investigations of the sort that is being authorized here.

I listened to the chairman with great interest and I was particularly encouraged by his very strong statement of the need to conduct impartial, balanced and thorough hearings, which is exactly what I think needs to be done. There are a lot of allegations that are swirling around and there are a lot of questions that are being raised. We see them from time to time raised in the press and in the media. And, of course, one could sit around all day long and conjure up one question after another. It is not difficult, it is very easy. It is not difficult just simply to say, "Well, suppose this happened or suppose that happened; or if this or if that." Of course, one of the purposes of these hearings is to get a good, tough-minded examination of these various allegations to see if there is anything to them. It needs to be appreciated, that it is very easy to make the allegations. Whether the allegations are in fact substantiated by the facts is a tougher question to determine, and that does require an impartial, balanced and thorough hearing. In fact, the President himself has said the best way to address these matters is to look at the facts candidly, and that is what I very much hope and expect that this committee will be able to do.

I do think last summer we conducted hearings that were perceived by all as being thorough and fair and impartial. We went at it, in effect, to find out what the facts were, to ascertain the truth. I think we pressed that issue in a resolute manner, and I would expect the special committee will do so in the case that is-in the instance that is before us.

These hearings will make an effort to get the facts out fully and impartially. We anticipate that the administration will cooperate with this effort. They certainly have indicated that is what they intend to do. Last year they made every document available that was requested, as I recall. I think I am correct in that statement. Now the time has come to move forward, to begin our hearings, to begin, in effect, to examine these various questions and allegations and ascertain with respect to each of them whether there is any factual grounding behind them or whether they simply raise questions that people can ask. And that, of course, is the purpose of the inquiry which we will be undertaking here with this provision of $950,000 to carry out this investigation in the period between now and February 29. The resolution provides that the special committee shall make every reasonable effort to complete, S6774 not later than February 1, 1996, the investigation, study, and hearings authorized by section 1.

This resolution does provide the basis for carrying out a full and proper, impartial, and balanced hearing.

I think our challenge now is to move ahead in carrying out our responsibilities in the special committee. It is a heavy burden to add to the responsibilities that Members already have but is one that obviously we are charged with responding to.

As I said, we adopted resolutions last year addressing this matter. This, in effect, carries forward on those resolutions. It is a continuation, in effect, of that work. But I hope that if we apply ourselves to it over the coming months, we will be able to work through all of these matters and, in effect, bring this issue to closure in the sense that the Members of the Senate and the American people know that the various questions have been raised and thoroughly examined, that it has been done with a great deal of balance and fairness and impartiality, and that these are what the facts are as a consequence of that investigation and inquiry.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. Will time be equally charged?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SARBANES.

I ask unanimous consent to put in a quorum call and that the time be equally charged to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

Is there objection? Hearing none, it is so ordered. The time will be charged to both sides equally.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAIRCLOTH.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FAIRCLOTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

Who yields time to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. D'AMATO.

I yield to the Senator from North Carolina whatever time he needs, Madam President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

(Cite as: 141 Cong. Rec. S6771-02, *S6774)

The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. FAIRCLOTH.

Madam President, I want to begin my remarks by saying that I plan to enthusiastically support the Whitewater resolution.

I think it is a good resolution. I am concerned, however, that a few key things have been left out of it. Nevertheless, I think that before the hearings are over, we will wind up working them in.

Nothing in this resolution allows us to probe the circumstances surrounding the death of Vince Foster. When we held the hearings last year in the Senate, a key witness, Captain Hume, simply did not show up at the hearings the day he was supposed to be there. The hearings had been planned for months. Captain Hume was out of town that day. He was supposed to be there. Our ranking member at the time demanded that they bring him back for several days. But they did not bring him back. The hearings adjourned and we never heard from him. I do not think this was a thorough airing of the issues, and I think we need to do it again.

I understand that Mr. Starr is looking at this again. I hope that he will, given the miserable job that Mr. Fiske did of investigating.

Madam President, the Congress also needs to probe the $100,000 profit in the commodities market that came to Mrs. Clinton courtesy of Red Bond and Jim Blair, the general counsel of Tyson Foods. This is not mentioned in the resolution, and it should be.

Just recently, I discovered that a friend of the Clintons, Barbara Holum, was conveniently installed as acting head of the CFTC before the story of Mrs. Clinton's commodity trades broke.

There are many confusing issues. Now we find that Red Bond, who did the commodity trading, who is practically bankrupt, was able to pay off $7 million in back taxes just 2 months before the commodity trading story became public. To me, the evidence on this is just too much to believe that all of this is a coincidence.

Madam President, this resolution does not allow us to probe the failure of First American Savings & Loan in Illinois.

If you can believe this, Vince Foster and Mrs. Clinton were hired by the Federal Government to sue Dan Lasater. The same Dan Lasater that was a close friend of the Clintons. That is right, Mrs. Clinton was hired by the Federal Government to sue Dan Lasater in connection with the failure of First American Savings & Loan in Illinois. Mrs. Clinton participated in the decision to lower the amount of money the Government would recover from Dan Lasater from $3.3 million to $200,000, and we do not know yet what percentage of that went to her as attorney's fee because the records were sealed.

The Government spent over $100 billion to resolve the savings and loan crisis. With crooks like Dan Lasater involved and with Mrs. Clinton acting on behalf of the taxpayers, suing a friend, it is no wonder the cost was so high.

I want to again state my strong support-and I say this not necessarily in the language as we often use in the Senate-but of my good friend, fellow member of the Banking Committee and our chairman, ALFONSE D'AMATO. He truly is a good friend, and he has given us the leadership we need.

I hope, and I know that before this hearing is over, under his leadership, we will have probed all aspects of Whitewater in a fair manner so that the American people understand what happened, when it happened, and who knew it when it happened. I look forward to the hearings.

Mr. D'AMATO addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.
The Senator from New York is recognized.
Mr. D'AMATO.
Madam President, I know of my good friend, Senator FAIRCLOTH's concern that there be ample scope to look into all of the matters that are relevant, and I share that concern. I think that this resolution very fairly embodies us with the authority-and I would refer to page 4.
As my friend raises, we did not attempt to spell out every single area. Page 4, line 12, says:
Subsection 3. To conduct an investigation and public hearings into and study all matters that have any tendency to reveal the full facts about . . .
Then we go through all of the various areas. There are other Senators who are going to speak, but I believe it is important to summarize those areas. Senator SARBANES has. The fact is that we include the ability to look into the bond underwriting contracts between the Arkansas Development Finance Authority and Lasater & Co., and all of those activities to which my friend has referred. But there must be a connection, and if there is a connection, well, then, we will look into the area, and I will touch on these areas in more detail before our time is up.
So I share my friend's concern. This will be thorough. It will be thoughtful. And when subpoenas are issued-and I must tell you that the specific instance that he raises is troubling, that of a witness who failed to respond to a subpoena, especially one who works for the Government, who was given notice, and who gave the committee, either the majority or the minority or our staff, no reason to believe that he would not be there. That will not be tolerated. If we run into a situation like that, I can assure you, and I know that the ranking member shares this same concern, we want people to respond to subpoenas. We will not issue them frivolously.
I think in that case a subpoena might not have even been issued because we assumed that he was going to be there. So it is not a bad track record to have almost everybody respond, including even those who were not subpoenaed. But, we will remain vigilant in seeking this kind of cooperation.
I see that Senator BOND is in the Chamber, and he is on the Banking Committee and was an integral part of last year's hearings, and I yield to him 10 minutes from my time.
The PRESIDING OFFICER.
The Senator from Missouri is recognized.
Mr. BOND.
Madam President, I thank my good friend, my colleague from New York.
Madam President, as we begin the debate on this resolution authorizing a second round of Whitewater hearings, I thought it would be helpful to review why the Senate and the committee need these issues to be aired.
S6775 I wish to summarize for my colleagues some points that are particularly important to me and have come from my experience with the first round of hearings and also with the hearing back in February where we asked the questions that began some of the process in finding out what has gone on in the administration.

As most of the Nation now knows, Madison Guaranty was a Little Rock savings and loan which went belly-up at the cost of nearly $50 million, and was owned by James McDougal-the business partner of the Clintons' in the Whitewater real estate deal.

Madison Guaranty was the classic S&L story of insider dealing, reckless loan policies and ultimate failure with the U.S. taxpayers picking up the tab. It is a part of the $105 billion cost of the S&L debacle, and in that way is a story repeated in many communities around the country.

But one part of this case has made it famous-many of its borrowers, directors, and counsel were prominent figures in Arkansas politics and government.

The tangled web of Madison, Jim McDougal, and the Clintons has led to two sets of criminal referrals, an ongoing civil liability investigation by the RTC, a potential conflict of interest case for the First Lady's former law firm, a conviction of a Little Rock judge who improperly loaned SBA money to McDougal and Whitewater, several other recent guilty plea agreements and an ongoing investigation by independent counsel Starr.

Since these issues first came to light, I have said over and over that the American people have a right to know what happened to the millions of dollars lost, and we, in Congress, must fulfill our obligation and get the facts out into the open.

Last year the Senate was engaged in a lengthy struggle over what questions and areas the Banking Committee would be allowed to address as Whitewater-Madison hearings begin. Unfortunately, the Democratic leadership at that time did everything in their power to limit the scope of the hearings, and to block our efforts to get at the truth-particularly as it relates to what Clinton administration officials have done to control or interfere with investigations.

The questions we asked last year remain as relevant today as they did last May:

Did Whitewater Development Corp. benefit from taxpayers insuring of Madison Guaranty deposits?

Did any of Madison's federally insured funds go to benefit the Clinton campaigns?

Were the bank regulatory agencies operating in an impartial and independent manner as they handled Madison Guaranty?

How did the Resolution Trust Corporation handle the criminal referrals on Madison-both under the Bush administration as well as the Clinton administration?

How did the Resolution Trust Corporation and the FDIC handle potential civil claims against Madison-both under the Bush administration as well as the Clinton administration?

How did the Department of Justice handle the RTC criminal referrals it received, again both under the Bush administration and the Clinton administration?

What were the sources of funding and lending practices of Capital Management Services, and how did the SBA regulate and supervise it, particularly as it related to loans to Susan McDougal and her company, Master Marketing.

Full hearings on the Whitewater-Madison affair are needed so that all these questions can be fairly asked and answered. What happened in Arkansas, what happened in the 1992 Clinton campaign in their efforts to keep the lid on about the actions in Arkansas, and what has the administration done to manage the Madison-Whitewater issues since they took office.

If we are to finally get to the bottom of the story as to what happened with the criminal referrals, I believe that we need to start with the first criminal referral on Madison Guaranty which was already in the Justice Department awaiting action when the Clinton administration took office.

Remember, Madison Guaranty had failed in 1989 and had been first taken over by the FDIC, and then in August 1989 when Congress passed the S&L bailout bill the newly created RTC took over Madison.

The RTC's mission was to close down failed thrifts, sell the assets, pay off the depositors and then seek out criminal or civil wrongdoing that may have occurred. If they found criminal wrongdoing-fraud, or attempts to enrich, they referred their findings to the Department of Justice for further action.

If they found civil wrongdoing-for example, law firms or accounting firms who helped institutions stay open by providing misleading, incomplete or incorrect information to regulators or the S&L's board members-the RTC would pursue those cases.

Thus from August 1989 the RTC had Madison Guaranty on its plate. No action was taken by the RTC on potential civil claims, but several criminal referrals were developed. In one case Jim McDougal and two others were accused of fraud, but were acquitted, in another case a board member plead guilty to falsifying documents.

Then came March 1992 when the New York Times reported a series of potential misdealings in Madison Guaranty and spurred the RTC to take another look at the institution. This second look caused the first criminal referral to be sent to Justice in the fall of 1992, and it was this referral which awaited final action when the Clinton administration came into office in January 1993.

I give this brief history in order to put things into perspective. Last year, Senator SPECTER and I offered amendments to the Whitewater Committee resolution which would have allowed the Banking Committee to pick up story at this point, and follow the trail of the first referral as it made its way through the Government, and then to follow the trail of the second referral as it was developed throughout 1993, up to and including the improper contacts by Treasury officials with White House staff. This of course would entail questioning the RTC officials involved, Justice Department officials involved, as well as Treasury and White House staff.

Because we must remember that on the day that the Clinton administration officials walked in the door on January 21, 1993, a criminal referral on Madison Guaranty was sitting in the Department of Justice.

I for one still want to know:

How did the Department of Justice handle this referral?

Was the White House informed and if so when and by whom?

Who in Justice was assigned to monitor the Madison case, and what actions did they take?

And then, as we know now, just months after taking office, a second set of referrals was being developed-and it too was sent off to the Clinton Justice Department by RTC officials in Kansas City.

I want to know why the RTC decided to stay on the case. What happened to get a series of RTC officials reassigned and taken off the case? Is there a pattern of special treatment for politically sensitive cases? And again, how did the Department of Justice handle the second referral?

I want to know why did the Clinton appointed Little Rock U.S. attorney Paula Casey, along with Webb Hubbell, delay their recusals until after the decision not to prosecute Madison was made? I also want to know the details about Paula Casey and Webb Hubbell's phone contacts during the period when Casey was deciding what to do with the referrals, and did either one of them have any contact with the White House on the referrals at any time?

And now, just in the past weeks we have seen reported by the Associated Press that:

Preparing for televised Whitewater hearings last summer, White House attorneys consulted confidential depositions from a Treasury investigation in an effort to reconcile differing accounts of administration officials who were about to testify.

Former White House counsel Lloyd Cutler acknowledged this week that the depositions were used to identify discrepancies in the recollections of presidential aides before the congressional hearings.

White House lawyers would then "confront" the aides with information they had obtained from the depositions without revealing the sources, he told The Associated Press.

"If we found inconsistencies, we would go back to White House officials, and go back over testimony they gave us," Cutler explained. "and then we would say 'we have heard other reports."'

S6776 This of course brings into play several other issues which I have been following since the close of the hearings last August. As we know now, confidential information was again turned over by Treasury to the White House-this time under the guise of a Treasury Department inspector general's investigation.

This calls into question not only the independence of the IG, but also the willingness of this administration to politicize what is supposed to be an internal watchdog.

It also calls into question the entire testimony offered by White House officials before the Senate Banking Committee-as they were given another heads up in order to best tailor their testimony to help the boss.

Last November I wrote to then Chairman Riegle and ranking member D'AMATO about what I had discovered. In my letter I stated:

As you know, over these past several months I have continued my efforts to resolve outstanding questions which were raised during the Banking Committee's Whitewater hearings. Initially I became concerned upon discovering during our hearings that the Treasury Inspector General had turned over to the White House-at Lloyd Cutler's specific request-transcripts of all the testimony taken by the investigators a full week before the Office of Government Ethics (OGE) report was made public. At the time we learned this, several former Inspectors General expressed amazement at this unprecedented action. However, no further review of the incident was undertaken.

During my investigation of this disclosure, I discovered that not only were the documents released to the White House at the specific request of White House Counsel Lloyd Cutler, but, in doing so, the Treasury turned over confidential RTC information to the White House.

On Saturday, July 23, 1994, the Department of the Treasury gave the White House all of the sworn depositions of Treasury, White House, and RTC personnel.

These depositions were unedited.

According to the RTC, it was not until July 26 or 27 that the RTC became aware of the fact that RTC depositions had been provided to the White House.

July 26, after reviewing the information provided by the Treasury I.G., Lloyd Cutler testified before the House Banking Committee.

July 28 and 29, Counsel to the RTC Inspector General Patricia Black redacted all the Treasury, RTC, and White House depositions in order to remove confidential RTC information.

July 31 the OGE report, with edited testimony, was provided to Congress and subsequently made public.

Given that the focus of our hearings this past August was the improper transmittal of confidential information from the RTC to the White House regarding Madison Guaranty and the Clintons, I must tell you I am appalled that the same Treasury Department, acting under specific direction from Secretary Bentsen, would again provide nonpublic information about the Madison Guaranty case directly to the White House.

In addition, I found it extraordinary that the White House, which was itself under investigation, would be given nonpublic information prior to Congressional hearings-particularly when Congress itself was not given the information.

And now of course we have discovered that Mr. Cutler and others used this information not only to assist in the drafting of Mr. Cutler's testimony-but to help White House staff with the inconsistencies in their own stories.

I find this entire episode just another example of the extraordinary lengths the White House was willing to go to keep the facts from Congress, keep the facts from the American people, and ultimately to protect the administration.

As I have said on this floor before, breaching the public trust is as serious an offense as committing a crime, or being found liable for financial penalties. Governments in free societies have a fundamental pact with the governed. In exchange for the powers and responsibilities which is given the Government, the people expect fairness, evenhanded justice, impartiality, and they held the innate belief that those in power can be trusted to be good stewards of their power.

Our form of democracy relies on checks and balances to keep too much power from ending up in just one place-and Congress, as the people's closest link to their Government has the responsibility to keep a sharp eye out for abuses and breaches of the people's trust.

Thus every Member of Congress takes an oath of office, to uphold the Constitution-and certainly part of that duty to be ever watchful for abuses of power. Interestingly, and not surprisingly, it nearly always falls to the party out of power to be the more diligent in watching out for abuses.

No one disputes this.

But one other fact should also be noted. As important it is for the general public to believe in and trust that their elected leaders are performing their jobs in an ethical, truthful, and fair manner-we, in Congress, must also believe that those in high positions of responsibility are telling us the truth. When we ask questions or make inquiries we must trust that administrations will tell the truth, will be honest, and that when we get an answer, it is a full and complete one.

Unfortunately, Madam President, it is this standard that inevitably some administration officials seem unable to comprehend.

Instead of cooperation and truthfulness we have seen evasions, omissions, misstatements, and possibly outright lies.

And the story of potential abuse of the public trust, the politicization of independent agencies and investigations, the use of confidential material for political gain-it only seems to get worse the deeper you look.

Madam President, the next rounds of hearings will go a long way toward clearing the air, and I commend the chairman of the Banking Committee for brining this matter back into the public eye.

I reserve the remainder of my time and I yield the floor.

Mr. DODD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

Who yields time?

Mr. SARBANES.

Madam President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Senator from Connecticut is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DODD.

Thank you, Madam President, and I thank my colleague from Maryland.

Madam President, let me begin these brief remarks by commending our colleagues from New York and Maryland for what I think is a very fair and balanced resolution. Obviously, matters such as this are a source of deep controversy and can get out of hand. The fact that they have presented us with a resolution that is balanced and fair is a credit to both the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from New York. Any discussion of this ought to begin with an expression of appreciation on the part of all of us in this body, particularly those of us who will serve on the special committee and who will be working during this calendar year to carry out the mandates and requirements of this resolution. Now I would like to make a few brief observations about the resolution.

As my colleagues know, Madam President, there was a vote by 98 to 0 on March 17 of last year to look into these matters, and what we are talking about here is a continuation of that process. This resolution is simply another step in a process designed to help the American public know the facts about Whitewater.

Second, I would like to point out, Madam President, that the President has fully cooperated in this process. We ought to commend him for this unprecedented level of cooperation.

Many of us recall other Presidents who, when confronted with similar situations, have clogged up the courts of this land, fighting everything along the way. This administration has not done that. In fact, the administration has been entirely forthcoming.

As we discuss these matters, it is important to make it clear that, unlike previous situations where there was a constant conflict between the executive branch and the legislative branch over documents and testimony, that has not been the case here. The administration has complied with every document request, answered every question that has been submitted to it, and I am confident is ready and willing to cooperate in this second stage of the proceeding.

I think that is an important point to make because, as we look down the road, there is the potential for a prolonged and nasty conflict between the executive and legislative branch.

Third, Madam President, I think last year's hearings, despite moments of passion and emotion, were credible and fair. I think it is important to point out and to state emphatically that it was the conclusion of the committee S6777 last year that there had been no violation of criminal statutes or ethical standards.

Of course, individual Members may have their own particular opinions on those matters, and certainly that is their right. But, as a conclusion of the committee, let me restate, Madam President, there were no violations of any criminal statute or any ethical standards. That was the conclusion of last year's hearings.

Now we are going to go to a second phase. I have listened to some who are suggesting that there must have been some wrongdoing, or, even worse, they have already reached the conclusion that there was wrongdoing. Quite simply, that is inappropriate. The purpose of the hearings is to determine whether there was wrongdoing-we must not prejudge the matter.

We do not want to end up appearing like that famous character from the West, Judge Roy Bean. Everyone will remember Judge Roy Bean. He used to say, "We'll hang 'em first and try 'em later."

Sometimes that can happen in congressional proceedings, and I know it is not the intention of anyone on the committee to have that be the case.

So let us avoid partisan wrangling and get the facts on the table. Now the presumption of innocence may not apply to congressional hearings in the same way as in our court system, but there ought to at least be an effort to fully consider matters, and let people have their say, before we reach any conclusions.

Last year, the Senate held thorough hearings, as I mentioned earlier. The committee heard from 30 witnesses, generating 2,600 pages of testimony; 38 witnesses were deposed, generating some 7,000 additional pages of testimony.

It is very difficult to sort through that much material and I want to thank the staff for the work they did. That was a herculean effort. Both the majority and minority staff had to work extremely long hours on this matter, Madam President, and they deserve our appreciation.

Obviously, Madam President, the Senate's integrity and credibility are at stake. The American public has a right to know the facts about Whitewater and the Senate has a constitutional obligation to see that they do.

Last year, the facts were presented fully and impartially. That must be our goal this year. The public, in my view, is fed up with the partisanship that seems to cloud every issue.

As we go through this process, I urge my colleagues to avoid that partisan pitfall. Because we are entering a presidential campaign cycle, that may be difficult for some. But we must all try. The President is sadly correct, and I suspect most of my colleagues, regardless of their political persuasion, would agree when he says that the politics of personal attack are alive and well. I agree with the President that the best way to put this matter behind us is to address the facts candidly.

Madam President, I ask for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. SARBANES.

I yield whatever time the Senator requires.

Mr. DODD.

I thank my colleague. I will wrap this up.

Madam President, the public wants us to present the facts impartially, come to our conclusions and then move on. And it bears repeating that after going through such a process last year, the Banking Committee concluded that there had been no violation of criminal statutes or ethical standards.

During this next stage, we must not get into political diversions and drag this thing out. The American people want us to get on with the business of creating jobs and expanding economic opportunity, of dealing with health care issues and education. They want us to tackle the hard problems that they face every day.

I think it was there sense of frustration with politics as usual, more than anything else, that created the changes in the Congress. We now have a Republican leadership, and every committee is chaired by that party. They now have an even greater responsibility to the public. They must elevate the good of the nation above politics and I hope that they will do so in proceeding with this matter.

Once again, I commend Senator D'AMATO and Senator SARBANES for putting together a fair resolution and for stating their determination to wrap this matter up by February of next year. I hope we can stick to that schedule and finish this job efficiently.

Finally, while the subject of the independent counsel statute is not the subject of this particular resolution, Madam President, I want to suggest that we revisit that legislation as soon as we can.

The idea of appointing an independent counsel was to keep politics out of these issues. Unfortunately, it seems that the statute may invite fishing expeditions. We need to be very careful about spending the taxpayers dollars in this way. Otherwise we will have some questionable expenditures. I was told the other day that someone was looking at a witnesses' grade school and high school transcripts. I hope that report is inaccurate because there is just no way to justify that kind of expenditure.

There is the potential for an independent counsel to run wild and we need to carefully monitor these matters. I caution those who would like to use independent counsels for political gain-regardless of whether it was a previous administration or this administration-that whatever goes around comes around. We would be well advised, in my view, to take a hard look at how some of these operations are being run.

Of course, Congress spends a great deal of money on these investigations. The Banking Committee spent about $400,000 last year, and this resolution authorizes another $950,000. But even that amount is only a fraction of what the independent counsel is spending. We are looking at almost $10 million spent by the independent counsel and that is just the beginning of it. That figure will go higher.

Of course, the Federal Government must investigate serious accusations of wrongdoing to maintain the public trust. But when it appears there are more Federal agents operating in Little Rock than there are in high-crime areas in certain parts of our country, then one ought to pause and look carefully at what we are doing.

Again, I know that the independent counsel statute is not the subject of this resolution. I do not want to inject a whole new subject of debate. But I think we ought to take another look at that law and make sure it is operating properly.

Again, I commend the chairman of the Banking Committee, my friend from New York, Senator D'AMATO, and my colleague and friend from Maryland, Senator SARBANES, for the fine job they have done in working out this resolution. We have a very difficult job in front of us. Hopefully, we will conduct our work thoroughly, fairly, and promptly, and in a manner that brings credit to this great body. I look forward to the effort.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Senator from New York.

Mr. D'AMATO.

Madam President, at this time, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. D'AMATO.

I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has 10 minutes.

Mr. SPECTER.

Madam President, I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding me this time. I support the resolution and commend the chairman and the ranking member of the Banking Committee for presenting a resolution which I understand will have wide bipartisan support.

I believe it is important to have a congressional inquiry on this in the broad terms which are described in the resolution. It is with some regret, I note, that it has taken us more than a year to get to this point. But it is better late than never, and these are matters where congressional oversight is important.

I recognize the sensitivity of a congressional inquiry on a matter which is being handled by an independent counsel, also known as the special prosecutor. But the functions are very, very different where you have an investigation which is handled through grand jury proceedings which are secret and which are directed at indictments. I know that field with some detail, having been a district attorney myself and S6778 having run grand jury investigations. That is very, very different from a congressional inquiry where we are inquiring into matters in the public record for the public to see what is going on in Government with a view to legislative changes.

The thrust and focus are entirely different between a grand jury investigation conducted by independent counsel and a congressional inquiry which will be handled through the Banking Committee. I am glad to see that the composition of the committee will be expanded to include the chairman and ranking member of the Judiciary Committee, or their designees.

Madam President, the issues involved here have long been a concern of many of us in this Chamber, and I refer to statements which I made last year dated March 17, June 9, June 16, and June 21. I will not incorporate them because that would unduly burden the RECORD, but a good many of my thoughts were expressed last year on the matter.

I was particularly concerned about issues involving the RTC as to their inclusion, which was not handled last year, and I am glad to see that the Resolution Trust Corporation is included in the scope of the inquiry which we are about to undertake.

This matter was one that I focused on when we had an oversight hearing on the Department of Justice on July 28 of last year, and I ask unanimous consent, Madam President, that a number of documents be printed in the RECORD which have not been made a part of the RECORD heretofore: My letter dated July 26, 1994, to Attorney General Reno; the attachment of a list of documents which I had wanted to inquire into during the proceedings before the Judiciary Committee; the response which was made by Robert Fiske, who was then independent counsel; and a portion of the transcript dated July 28, 1994 before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. SPECTER.

I thank the Chair.

Madam President, these documents will show on their face concerns which were on the record and which were apparent from such documents: that there were considerable issues to be investigated in the RTC at that time. It is unfortunate, in a sense, that there has been the long delay, because we all know, as a matter of investigative procedure, that leads grow cold and witnesses' memories diminish and that the best investigation is a prompt investigation. But the time factor is something that cannot be altered at this time, and at least now we will have a congressional inquiry which will move forward into these very, very important matters.

I agree with the distinguished Senator from Connecticut when he talks about the presumption of innocence. I think that is indispensable as a matter of fairness to all concerned. But these are questions which need to be answered, and questions do not imply an answer of any sort; they raise issues which ought to be answered. We ought to let the chips fall where they may. And in a Government based on a Constitution which elevates the separation of powers among the Congress in article I, and the executive branch in article II, and the judiciary in article III, the congressional oversight function is a very, very important function. Now, finally, we will be in the context where we will be able to inquire into these matters and to find out what those answers are.

I am confident that there will be a fair, judicious, quality inquiry conducted by the committee, and this resolution is one which I think ought to be supported broadly by the U.S. Senate.

I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

U.S. SENATE, COMMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, WASHINGTON, DC, JULY 28, 1994

Senator SPECTER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Attorney General Reno, as you know, I had intended to ask you questions about the handling by the Department of Justice in the matter involving David Hale in this oversight hearing, and I may be able to cover the principal points of my interest without undue specification, or at least undue specification from your point of view.

At the outset, I would like to put into the record my letter to you dated July 26, 1994, together with the chronology of events and all the attachments which I sent over to you, except for numbers 20 and 21. I may get into 20 and 21. I think the balance have been in the record in one form or another, and even if they haven't I think they are appropriate for the public record.

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, July 26, 1994.
Hon. JANET RENO,
Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, DC.

DEAR ATTORNEY GENERAL RENO: I have just noted that you are scheduled to testify before the Judiciary Committee on Thursday, July 28, at 2:00 p.m. at an oversight hearing.

In that hearing I intend to ask questions on the Justice Department's role in investigations of Madison Guaranty and/or "Whitewater." While I have not had access to many of the relevant documents, I have seen a few and am alerting you to those documents which will formulate at least some of the basis for my questions.

Some of the documents are referred to in my floor statement on June 21. Other documents that I may refer to are listed on the attached index.

Sincerely,
ARLEN SPECTER.

Senator SPECTER. I would also want to put into the record the faxed letter from Robert Fiske, Independent Counsel, to me, dated July 27, 1994.

<The letter referred to follows:>

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE INDEPENDENT COUNSEL,
Little Rock, AR, July 27, 1994.
Hon. ARLEN SPECTER,
U.S. Senate, Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SPECTER: The Department of Justice has sent over to me a copy of your letter of July 26, 1994 to Attorney General Reno, together with the index of documents enclosed with it.

It is apparent from a review of the documents on that index that they relate to the handling by the Department of Justice of a particular criminal referral from the RTC. Based upon interviews we have had with representatives from the Kansas City Field Office of the RTC, we are currently actively investigating this matter. Accordingly, I would respectfully request that you not go into this subject with the Attorney General at your hearing tomorrow since to do so might prejudice our ongoing investigation. (For similar reasons we request that you not go into the matter referenced by documents #20 and #21.)

We have made a similar request to both the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs and the House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs which, as you know, are in the process of conducting Whitewater hearings. Both of those Committees have agreed not to go into this subject until we have completed our investigation.

Respectfully yours,

ROBERT B. FISKE, Jr.,

Independent Counsel.

Senator SPECTER. At the outset, I want to say for the record that I do not agree with the deference which the Congress has accorded the independent counsel because I believe that Congress has independent status, and at least equal status, if not more important status, on matters of public policy than the criminal prosecutions. But the Senate has decided otherwise as a political matter, in my opinion.

As I reviewed the charter of Mr. Fiske, it seemed to me that questions about oversight on what happened with David Hale were not within his charter, his charter being to investigate matters of possible criminal or civil wrongdoing. I am advised to the contrary on that, and we may get into that in some specificity.

So let me start in an effort to ask the questions in a generalized way, but candidly as they arise on David Hale's matter. I refer to a memorandum from RTC investigator Jean Lewis to Richard Iorio which quotes officials within the Department of Justice, which is why I ask you about this; specifically, Ms. Donna Henneman in the Office of Legal Counsel. Without making anything more specific as to the Hale matter, my question to you as a general matter is, any time a referral comes in to the Department of Justice that would make the Department look bad or has political ramifications, it goes to the Attorney General. Is that true?

Attorney General RENO. I don't know whether any time something comes in to the Department that would make the Department look bad it comes to the Attorney General.

Senator SPECTER. Well, if you don't know, who does, Attorney General Reno?

Attorney General RENO. I would suspect that each one of the 95,000 people who hear something that might make the Department look bad. I think your question is a little bit broad. I cannot answer it. As I have tried to say from the very beginning, when I appointed Mr. Fiske I tried to make sure that he was as independent as possible. I have continued to try to do that, and I think the S6779 worst thing that I could do would be to comment or talk about matters that he is pursuing. I should be happy, because I have great respect for the Senate and for you, at the conclusion of the matter to try to respond to anything, including the specifics.

Senator SPECTER. Well, I don't think that is sufficient, Attorney General Reno, because I think this is a legitimate matter for Judiciary Committee oversight, and we don't have very much of it. But I accept your point that my question was too general, so I will be specific.

The investigator, L. Jean Lewis, of RTC, had many conversations with representatives of the Department of Justice, as reflected in the number of the memoranda which I sent on to you. So if it is too general as to whether any time a referral comes in that would make the Department look bad or has political ramifications it goes to the Attorney General, I would ask you, were you personally informed about the referral from the RTC on the check kiting case involving Madison Guaranty?

Attorney General RENO. As I indicated to you, Senator, I made a determination when I appointed Mr. Fiske that I would not comment or make any comment. He has expressed to you that he would prefer that I not comment on the specific matters. I do not want to do anything that would impair has independence. I do think you have an oversight function with respect to the Department of Justice, and when it would be appropriate for me to comment I would look forward to the opportunity to do so.

Senator SPECTER. Well, tell me, Attorney General Reno, has would it impair Mr. Fiske's investigation or prosecution for you to answer a question as to whether you had personal knowledge of a referral to the Department of Justice?

Attorney General RENO. I can't tell you, sir, because I have tried to do everything in my power to make sure that Mr. Fiske's investigation is independent and I don't know what his investigation involves. Therefore, I am not going to say anything that could possibly interfere with his investigation.

Senator SPECTER. Well, my question to you is how could it possibly interfere with his investigation to answer a question as to when you had knowledge of a referral to the United States Department of Justice.

Attorney General RENO. I don't know, sir, because I am not going to take the chance of interfering with it. You would have to ask Mr. Fiske because I don't want to do anything at this time that would interfere or impair that investigation. I do not know the nature of the process of that investigation and it would be inappropriate for me to comment, but I do--

The CHAIRMAN. Put another way, Senator, how would it shed any light in this oversight if the Attorney General answered that question? What the hell difference does it make now?

Senator SPECTER. Well, the hell difference that it makes now is on an earlier question which I asked that whenever there is a matter with political ramifications that it goes to the Attorney General-and I asked that question in its broadest terms and was told that it was too general, so that is when I came back to the specific question.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask the question the other way to the Senator. Mr. Fiske's investigation in this matter is likely to be wrapped up. He has been moving expeditiously. Does it matter to the Senator whether or not the Attorney General speaks to this issue today or in two weeks or a month, or whenever it is when Mr. Fiske settles this part of his investigation? I don't know when he is going to settle that, but I mean he has been moving very rapidly.

In terms of oversight for next year's budget and last year's actions, it seems to me the Senator would have plenty of time to ask these questions as it would impact on the outcome of the Senator's view as to what the Attorney General should or shouldn't do in the future.

Senator SPECTER. Well, I would be glad to respond to the chairman. It does make a difference to me, and it makes a difference to me because this is an oversight hearing and the request to the committee chairman to have oversight on these matters was declined. There has been a charter which is very, very narrow before the Banking Committee, and this does not involve, to my knowledge, a matter which is within the charter of Mr. Fiske until when I sent a letter to the Attorney General, I suddenly find a reply from Mr. Fiske.

I had two detailed conversations with Mr. Fiske, the thrust of which-and I would be glad to detail them-led me to the conclusion that there was absolutely no interference with the criminal prosecution, a subject that I have had some experience with.

So when I asked the Attorney General a question as to when she has knowledge of a referral, I can't conceive that it interferes with an investigation, and that is why I am asking an experienced prosecutor who is now the Attorney General how could it conceivably interfere with a pending investigation.

Attorney General RENO. An experienced prosecutor, Senator, doesn't comment about something that she doesn't know about. I don't know about the details of Mr. Fiske's investigation. But if Mr. Fiske doesn't have any problem with it, what I would suggest that we do is prepare the questions, submit them to Mr. Fiske. If he has no objection to my answering them, then we will try to answer them because I honor your oversight function and I would want to be able to honor that and to not interfere with Mr. Fiske's investigation.

Senator SPECTER. Attorney General Reno, I did not say that Mr. Fiske did not have a problem. He specifically told me that he would like the field to be totally left alone. What I said to you was that after talking to Mr. Fiske, I had no doubt that these questions were appropriate, in my judgment, on oversight by the Judiciary Committee.

Let me ask you this, Attorney General Reno. In terms of the charter that Mr. Fiske has about investigating matters which may involve a violation of the criminal or civil law, is the handling by the Department of Justice of David Hale's matter something that falls within that charter?

Attorney General RENO. I have tried to, again, let Mr. Fiske define that based on the charter that we described so that I would not in any way impair his independence.

Senator SPECTER. Well, do you have any interest in whether any current employees of the Department of Justice are subject to an investigation which might be within Mr. Fiske's charter for possible criminal wrongdoings?

Attorney General RENO. Yes.

Senator SPECTER. Well, if that were so, would you have a duty as the head of the Department of Justice to take some action on those matters before a long investigation was concluded?

Attorney General RENO. It depends on what they are, sir.

Senator SPECTER. Well, suppose they were obstruction of justice?

Attorney General RENO. It depends on the nature of the facts and the circumstances, sir Senator SPECTER. Well, do you know anything about that on the Hale matter?

Attorney General RENO. Again, sir, I can't comment on the Hale matter.

Senator SPECTER. I am not asking you to comment on the Hale matter. I am asking you whether you know anything about the Hale matter.

Attorney General RENO. That would be commenting, sir, and what I would suggest, if we want to pursue this, is that you pose the questions and then let's see whether Mr. Fiske thinks that they would in any way interfere with the investigation. I am delighted to answer them if they don't interfere.

Senator SPECTER. Well, I am not going to follow the way you would like me to proceed. I make a judgment as to what I think a Senator ought to do by way of oversight, and if you have a concern about that I am prepared to discuss it with you, but I am not prepared to take your instruction or your suggestion.

The question that I pose on an investigation by Mr. Fiske as independent counsel within his charter to investigate crimes, obstruction of justice, within the Department of Justice is not something which bears on anything which could conceivably implicate the underlying facts on what David Hale is doing.

Is Ms. Paula Casey-I understand that she is, but can you confirm for me that she is still the United States attorney?

Attorney General RENO. Yes, sir, she is.

Senator SPECTER. Is she the subject of a criminal investigation by Mr. Fiske?

Attorney General RENO. You would have to talk to Mr. Fiske.

Senator SPECTER. Do you know whether or not she is the subject of a criminal investigation by Mr. Fiske?

Attorney General RENO. You would have to talk to Mr. Fiske. I have avoided having anything to do with Mr. Fiske's investigation in terms of any information that he may have so that I do not impair his independence.

Senator SPECTER. Would you continue a United States attorney operating actively if that United States attorney were the subject of a criminal investigation?

Attorney General RENO. It would depend on the circumstances.

Senator SPECTER. Well, under what circumstances would you terminate such an attorney?

Attorney General RENO. It would depend on the circumstances. Again, you get into a situation of hypotheticals and it is far better that we look at the actual facts, and I would be happy at the appropriate time to do that with you.

Senator SPECTER. Well, Attorney General Reno, I consider your responses, as I see them, totally unsatisfactory, and I consider them totally unsatisfactory because I am not asking you anything about a pending investigation. I am asking you questions as to what came to your knowledge as the Attorney General of the United States Department of Justice.

I am asking you questions about what you know and about what your policy would be if there were charges of criminal wrongdoing, and I don't ask these questions in a vacuum or for no purpose. I ask these questions in the context of having initiated an inquiry on oversight on something which is outside the charter of the independent counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. In your opinion, Senator, right, is that correct? In your opinion?

Senator SPECTER. Everything I say is in my opinion. You can add that to everything. I don't speak for anybody but myself, but I do speak independently for myself.

I took a look at an extensive series of correspondence which has gotten to the Department of Justice and gotten to the FBI and gotten to the United States attorney's office and gotten to the executive office and gotten to the Office of Legal Counsel, according to these documents, which I sent to you as soon S6780 as I knew there would be this hearing so you would have an opportunity to review them. I promptly advised the chairman as to what I intended to do there would be no surprises about it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Senator SPECTER. When I pursue the matter and find I have a telephone call and a letter from the independent counsel, I call him and then I am told that it is within his charter, that there is an investigation which is underway for obstruction of justice.

As I review the facts of this matter, I am struck with wonderment as to how officials in the United States attorney's office decline to have immunity granted to David Hale, and then independent counsel comes in and in a short time has a grant of immunity. Then officials in the United States attorney's office in Little Rock recuse themselves in a later matter, and I wonder how can they recuse themselves in a later matter without having recused themselves in an earlier matter, given their relationship to subjects of the investigation.

I ran a big office myself as a prosecutor, and if I had any reason to believe anybody in my office had any problem, I wouldn't wait for anybody to cleanse it totally and thoroughly and immediately. I do not believe that the charter to the independent counsel takes away any of the authority or the responsibility of the Attorney General to act in that circumstance.

In my opinion-everything I say is in my opinion-the questions which I have asked you are entirely appropriate questions, and I give some additional background because I think these are matters which ought to be answered, and I intend to pursue them and I don't intend to wait.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

General, I think you have answered totally appropriately, in my opinion. I think were you to do otherwise, in light of Mr. Fiske's comments, you would be excoriated by Mr. Fiske and anyone else. I guarantee you, you would have an article saying that you have interfered if you went in and, quote, "cleansed," were there a need to cleanse. You would be accused of whitewashing to avoid Mr. Fiske being able to fully look at the matter.

You are answering, in my opinion, totally appropriately, and you have done what I don't know many others have been willing to do. You have said to this committee, without having to have some big show on the floor, that when Mr. Fiske says he is finished with this phase of the investigation you will come back and you will answer questions. It seems to me you are being totally appropriate, but that is why there are Democrats and Republicans, chocolate and vanilla, good and bad, right and wrong, different points of view. Our opinions are different.

I respect this man. He did notify me. Stick to your guns, don't answer his questions, in my opinion.

Senator SPECTER. If I might have just one sentence?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. You may have more than one sentence.

Senator SPECTER. I don't think this matter has anything to do with good and bad or chocolate and vanilla.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it may not have to do with good and bad, but it has to do with what one considers to be the appropriate way for you to respond. I think you are responding appropriately because I think you are in the ultimate catch-22 position. At the request of all of us in the Senate, you appointed a Republican named Fiske. Now, the Republican named Fiske tells you, please don't respond to anything having to do with this. You are being asked to respond to something having to do with this, and if you respond or don't respond, you are in deep trouble in the minds of whoever wants to view you as being in trouble. I think you are doing just fine. My view is worth no more, probably a little less in this circumstance, than the Senator from Pennsylvania's, but good job, General.

6. RTC-KC E-Mail, May 19, 1993. Madison matter forwarded to Donna Henneman in "Legal Counsel." Referral submitted to that office "because of the political ramifications and political motivations."

7. RTC-KC E-Mail, May 26, 1993. Follow-up call from Donna Henneman (DOJ). RTC advised by an FBI agent in Little Rock that it was a 'very solid case of check kiting, and was highly prosecutable." Henneman was growing increasingly frustrated by the situation, because she had seen the information, knew that it had come in, and couldn't understand why she was having such a hard time tracking where the referral and exhibits had gone.

8. RTC-KC E-Mail, June 8, 1993. Conversation with Donna Henneman (DOJ). Madison Referral has reappeared on her desk. Criminal Division has sent memo to Doug Frazier (in Depty. Atty. General Heyman's office) advising him that there was "no identifiable basis for recusal of the U.S. Attorney in the Eastern District of Arkansas." Referral sent to Frazier for review and final decision.

Mr. SARBANES.

What is the time situation, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Senator from Maryland has 31 minutes; the Senator from New York has 20 minutes.

Mr. SARBANES.

Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas, Senator PRYOR.

Mr. PRYOR.

Mr. President, we have come to a point in this debate when we are about to vote on this particular resolution. If I might, I would like to talk for a few moments about the public's right to know, as the distinguished chairman of the Banking Committee from New York has made reference to.

He says the public has a right to know what happened in the Whitewater matter. The public has a right to know who did what, when, and whatever. I can assure you that the Senator from Arkansas does not disagree.

But I think also the public has a right to know something else. I think the public has a right to know in this case exactly how much money of the taxpayers' dollars we are spending in the so-called Whitewater matter. I think the public has a right to know that with this resolution, if it passes and if the funding goes through-and we all assume it will-the Senate alone will have spent, up through January or maybe February of next year, in the Whitewater matter $1.350 million of Senate money to investigate this matter. I do not have available the amount of money the House of Representatives has spent and will spend in the future. And we do not know exactly how much the cost of the independent counsel will be. But here are some figures I might throw out for the RECORD at this time. To the best of our knowledge, Mr. S6781 President, thus far, as of August 31. 1994, the independent counsel, Mr. Starr and Mr. Fiske, combined, spent $1.879 million. Projected funding for the independent counsel for the 1995 fiscal year is $6.3 million, which is a subtotal of $8.129 million, and a total, adding all the figures up, Mr. President, for both the Senate and the independent counsel to investigate so-called Whitewater, comes to almost $10 million in taxpayers' dollars.

Mr. President, I think there is something else the public has a right to know. I think the public has a right to know that this White House, this President, this First Lady, this administration, has never one time been accused of lack of cooperation. In fact, our President has pointed out, as one of our colleagues has already mentioned, that to be candid and truthful in this matter is going to be the quickest and best way to get to the bottom of it.

In the first round of hearings last summer, the committee heard from 30 witnesses generating 2,600 pages of testimony, deposing 38 witnesses, generating 7,000 pages of testimony.

The administration has produced thousands of pages of documents for committee review. This administration has complied with every document request. They have answered every question posed to it. The administration is ready and willing to cooperate on this second round of hearings and it bears emphasis, I think, that after the long days of hearings and pages of documents reviewed, that the Banking Committee concluded at the end of this hearing, in phase 1, that there had been no violation of a criminal statute and no violation of an ethical standard.

Mr. President, I think, too, it needs to be added that at no time during any of these investigations or any of these hearings, whether it be in Little Rock or Washington, the Banking Committee or the special counsel, wherever, to the best of our knowledge, not one witness, not one person has taken the fifth amendment.

I think that this speaks loudly and clearly about this administration's position, wanting to get on with the important business of our country.

Mr. President, let me compliment our friend, Senator SARBANES, for working out what I think-and going forward with-is a fairly reasonable proposal in trying to attack this problem and to set up these hearings. I think that there are some things, however, that I must state that I do not feel are fair. I do not feel that it is fair for one of the members of the committee, as he did earlier in this debate, to come to the floor and say what should have been within the scope of this hearing and then start talking about those particular issues as if to condemn them, even though they are not in the scope of these particular hearings.

Mr. President, I think for a Senator to come to the floor who is a member of the Banking Committee and to make a statement like he knows for a fact, or he has knowledge that Kenneth Starr, the special counsel, is now going to reinvestigate the death of Vince Foster, I think the public has a right to know how that particular Senator from North Carolina has knowledge of this so-called fact, Mr. President. I think the Senator from North Carolina needs to explain how he knows Mr. Kenneth Starr is now looking or relooking at the death of Vincent Foster.

Mr. President, we hope that these hearings will be fair. We hope they will be soon. We hope that they will be done in a very efficient manner. I am just hoping above all, Mr. President, that in this hearing, these issues are not going to be bogged down in the political morass that we have seen some other hearings conclude with. I would like to say, also, Mr. President, that I think for us to go back to the 1990 Governor's campaign, I think is stretching it a bit. I do not know what that has to do with Whitewater. I think some of my colleagues would like to see us investigate Bill Clinton when he was the attorney general of Arkansas. Maybe we would like to go back to look at his campaign of 1974 when he ran for the U.S. Congress and was defeated. There might be some who have no limits on how far back in time we should go.

I hope we can keep our eye on the ball. I am hoping, Mr. President, that we can keep our eye focused on the issue of Whitewater and the particular mission under which carefully this resolution has basically pointed out would be the scope of this particular hearing.

I am also concerned that one of our colleagues has referred to the "the miserable job of Mr. Fiske." Those remarks were made earlier on this floor. Of course, they refer to Mr. Fiske, who was allegedly fired from this investigation as special counsel because he was not finding out enough, bringing forward enough, to satisfy some of our colleagues.

Mr. President, I will conclude once again, as I have done other times on this floor, by quoting a note that Vince Foster wrote. It is his last note. It was his last sentence in this note, when he said "Here"-reference to Washington-"ruining people is considered sport." Those were the words written by the late Vincent Foster.

I am hoping, Mr. President, that when this investigation begins, every person involved with that investigation, from top to bottom, will realize these are human beings; they have families; they have hopes and desires; they have beliefs; and they have reputations. Hopefully, we will not treat lightly those reputations, and hopefully we will make certain that the character and the nature of these hearings seek fairness and justice.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES.

Mr. President, I yield such time as he may consume to the minority leader.

Mr. DASCHLE.

Mr. President, I thank the ranking member. Let me say, I did not have the opportunity to hear all of his remarks, but let me commend the distinguished Senator from Arkansas for what I have heard him say. Let me associate myself with each and every one of his words. He speaks from the heart, and he certainly speaks for all Members in representing what we hope will be the ultimate goal of this committee as we begin this ever once more.

This resolution provides a sum of $950,000 for the purpose of completing the work on the Whitewater matter. I think it needs to be emphasized again, as we consider the funding, that this resolution includes every issue related to Whitewater that has any credence whatever. There ought not be any question about its work, its scope, and the effort undertaken after today by the Banking Committee.

The funding will expire on February 29 of next year. It is an adequate amount to fund and an ample allowance of time to permit comprehensive and thorough hearings, while providing also for the completion of this issue.

In the 103d Congress, the Senate voted on March 17, 1994, on a bipartisan vote of 8 to 0, to authorize hearings on the Whitewater matter. Senate Resolution 229, adopted in June of last year, authorized a first round of hearings which were subsequently held by the Banking Committee.

The new resolution creates a special committee, administered by the Banking Committee, to conduct the final round of these hearings. The committee will be comprised of the full membership the Banking Committee, with the addition of one Republican and one Democratic member of the Judiciary Committee.

Chairman D'AMATO will also chair this special committee. Senator SARBANES will serve as the ranking member.

Last year, the Banking Committee heard from a substantial number of witnesses and took thousands of pages of testimony. Last year's hearings were thorough, fair, and bipartisan. They are the model which this year's hearings must emulate.

The majority, which conducted the hearings last year, were fair and judicious in their approach. The new majority in this Senate has the obligation to follow that record in exactly the same manner.

It is important to be thorough and comprehensive, because the American people have a right to know all the facts about this matter; but it is equally important that hearings be fair and responsible. We must all strive to remember and draw the distinction between an unproven allegation and a known, verifiable fact.

What is at stake is the integrity and credibility of the U.S. Senate. The last Senate recognized this by voting unanimously to authorize hearings when questions were raised that deserved examination. This Senate should follow that example.

S6782 The Senate has the constitutional obligation to see that the facts are brought out. It has the moral obligation to do so fully and impartially. If we do less, we risk reinforcing the unfortunate impression that Senators care more about partisanship than about conducting the Nation's business in the best interests of all the people.

The President has said that in an era of attack politics, the best way to put this matter behind America is to address the facts candidly. He is entirely right.

The administration cooperated fully and extensively with hearings last year and stands ready to do so again this year. Last year, the President ordered his administration to cooperate and all parties did so. Every document request was honored. Every question raised by the committee was answered.

Americans have the right to know the facts of Whitewater. But Americans care about other matters which are also on the Senate agenda a great deal more than they do about this.

Americans are now facing a budget which seeks to dramatically alter Medicare and student aid programs, as well as virtually every other thing the Government does. They are anxious about the future, because so many millions of Americans are either Medicare enrollees or have parents who are Medicare enrollees. They are anxious to see the Senate begin the debate over the budget soon.

Americans expect the Senate to devote the bulk of our efforts to the issues that are of most importance to the majority of American people. I agree. That should be our priority. Today, no issue is more critical than resolving the budget debate.

Mr. President, I urge prompt action on this resolution. I hope it allows for completion of this matter with fairness and impartiality, so that Senators can focus their attention on the issues that deserve it most, the problems facing the American people.

I thank the ranking member for yielding.

Mr. D'AMATO.

Mr. President, I did not mean to unduly delay acting on this resolution, because I think most things that have been said summarize where we are at, what we are attempting to do, and the scope of the investigation and the manner in which we hope to conduct it.

I think is important to point out that what one of my colleagues, the Senator from North Carolina, Senator FAIRCLOTH, pointed out is a matter of public record. That is that Judge Starr is reexamining all matters reviewed by Special Counsel Fiske, including Vincent Foster's death.

I think he alluded to that, and I think he did so in that context. That is not an area we intend to revisit unless there are some very special circumstances, which I certainly do not envision. However, I think we have to at least put it in that context.

As it relates to what the committee did and did not find last year, I think it is important to note that the Republican minority did make findings on the three major areas where there were questions of misconduct and malfeasance. I will not attempt to enunciate all of them now, but that was a very strong finding.

I would also like to point out that the majority made some findings and recommendations as it related to the need to indicate very clearly that before Congress, all executive branch members and others who testified are "required to be fully candid and forthcoming," and testify "truthfully, accurately, and completely."

The committee recommends that the President issue an Executive order reinforcing this obligation and setting forth procedures requiring the prompt correction, amplification and/or supplementation of congressional testimony to ensure that it is accurate, thorough and completely responsive.

Why did they do that? Without going through the entire history, it was because it was clear and evident-and, by the way, we have sent to Mr. Fiske and to his successor, Mr. Starr, those areas, we being the Republicans on the committee, the minority-that those areas of concern, that, at the very least, there was testimony that was disingenuous, if not outright false. And that is being reviewed.

So, to say that there were no findings of any wrongdoing, that everything was OK, or to imply that there was nothing wrong, is simply an oversimplification and is not an accurate or fair representation of the situation.

Now, I do not intend, nor is it my job and duty, to defend the work of the special counsel. The special counsel was appointed because the Attorney General concluded that it was necessary. It was not this Congress. I thought it was. I believe it was. There were leading Democrats who spoke to the necessity-Senator MOYNIHAN, Senator BRADLEY, and others-as it relates to dealing with this. But as it relates to the expenditures of money, let us look at the record.

This committee, I think, has been very judicious. The Democratic leadership working with Republicans last year authorized $400,000. We only spent $300,000. This year we have set $950,000. I hope we spend less than that. We have been very judicious in using taxpayers' money. So to date we have spent $300,000. Although that is not an inconsequential sum, we have been extremely judicious.

With regard to the expenditures and what has taken place with the special counsel, let me just indicate, first, that David Hale pleaded guilty. He was a municipal judge and has made some extremely serious allegations. The special counsel is reviewing his allegations with respect to why he made certain loans that were illegal or inappropriate, who asked him to do so, and so forth.

Webster Hubbell, the third ranking official in the Attorney General's office, pleaded guilty to charges that emanated, again, from this investigation.

Neil Ainley, president of the Perry County Bank, where large sums of money, $180,000, were taken out to fund campaign activities, pleaded guilty.

Chris Wade, a real estate agent who was the sales agent for Whitewater Development, pleaded guilty in a bankruptcy matter. Robert Palmer, last December, a Little Rock real estate appraiser, pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges relating to backdating and falsifying appraisals for Madison Guaranty.

I make these remarks because I do not believe that it is fair to leave the impression that this has just been a big waste of time and that there was no wrongdoing. Five individuals, at this early and preliminary stage of these investigations, have already pleaded guilty, some in very high, responsible positions. That is the work of the special counsel. He has to defend the appropriateness of the expenditures which he makes.

However, I think for the record it is fair to reflect that several individuals have pleaded guilty to various charges. As it relates to our work, I am going to reiterate that I believe this committee has properly set forth the venue, the scope and the way in which it intends to move forward in a bipartisan manner to find out the truth and get the facts. Was there an attempt to impede legitimate investigations undertaken at RTC? Why were certain people taken off the case? Why were certain RTC investigators disciplined? Why was information about confidential criminal referrals made public? Was there a failure to go forward? These are legitimate questions. There may be appropriate reasons. But, then again, we might discover inappropriate action.

So these areas are within the scope. We are not going to attempt to dig up something that does not appear to be really connection to the matters that we have set forth. And it is our hope, depending upon the schedule of the special counsel as he goes through the materials, that we can wind this up sooner rather than later, and conduct the business of the people in a manner which reflects credibly on our constitutional obligations as Senators.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield the remainder of my time. My colleague may have something to do. I am prepared to vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES.

Mr. President, I will take just a couple of minutes, I say to my distinguished colleague from New York.

First of all, I want to underscore the positive and constructive way in which the chairman of the Banking Committee and members of his staff interacted with us in trying to address the question of working out a resolution that we would bring to the floor of the Senate. Obviously, it is not an easy thing to do, and Members of the Senate have S6783 differing views about this matter. But I do think we were able to, in the end, work out a rational approach to this inquiry and investigation, which I indicated in a sense had been committed to last year.

Obviously, you always have to work out carefully the scope questions, which has been done in this resolution, because the scope could be infinite, in a sense, if you leave it to people's imagination. So there were candidates for scope that I think went beyond the horizon, and they are not included. But we have tried to, in effect, put a focus here.

In fact, some of the questions the distinguished Senator from New York just raised, that he felt emerged out of the previous hearings-and he made reference to last year's minority statement in the report-have in fact been spelled out here as matters that could be looked into under this resolution.

There were other candidates, of course, that were not included. We have tried to be rational here. We have tried to be reasonable. The matters specified herein have been the outcome of that process.

Second, I want to say the resolution has been put together in a way that presumes that the two sides will work together cooperatively in carrying out the inquiry, that the staffs will interact in that fashion, that material will be generally available and so on. We are trying to get an inquiry here in which everyone is joined in trying to find out what the facts are. A lot of questions are raised, and will be looked into. If you did not raise questions, you would not have an inquiry, so I recognize that. But our job, I think, is to probe the factual matter behind those issues.

I was interested that my colleague earlier used the word "allegations," and that is what it is until you actually get the facts that sustain it. And that is the process we are going to engage in. Some things, you know, when you finally examine them, turn out to be fairly innocent. At least I think. We had this point about Captain Hume, who did not appear when he was supposed to be a witness.

Well, what happened-obviously there was a slip-up, but I think that is what it was, a slip-up. Captain Hume was deposed. He had over 300 pages of deposition testimony. Apparently at his deposition he said he was about to take a-go on a vacation. After that the hearing date was set. Everyone sort of assumed that Captain Hume could be brought back in for the hearing. A subpoena, I do not think, was issued for him.

Mr. D'AMATO.

I do not think it was issued.

Mr. SARBANES.

I do not think it was issued for him so he did not, as it were, ignore a subpoena. And he went on a hunting and fishing trip and could not be located, is what happened.

In the end, I think it was judged that given we had 300 pages worth of deposition it was not worth having another hearing simply to bring Captain Hume in. I mean it is a small matter, but I only mention it to show that sometimes when you really examine the facts you discover that something that looked amiss at first has a very simple, plausible, and reasonable explanation for it.

We expect, as I understand it, now to move forward with this. I know that the chairman and his staff will be talking with our staff to begin to plan the first set of hearings which I think will probably be in the next month or so, and then we can proceed from there as we schedule other matters which have been stipulated here in the resolution as being within the scope of the inquiry which this special committee will now undertake.

But I do again want to underscore the, I think, responsible way in which the chairman and members of the staff have worked with us in order to try to frame a resolution which we could bring to the floor of the Senate today which I think carries forward the legitimate requirements imposed upon us in terms of carrying out an investigation without straying beyond what most people regard as reasonable bounds.

Mr. President, with that, I made my statement. I see the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, and I would like to yield time to him.

Mr. President, how much time is remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

Ten minutes.

Mr. SARBANES.

Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS.

Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland for yielding.

Mr. President, when I was a student in law school I remember studying criminal law. There never had been a lawyer in my family. So I knew nothing about any kind of law. But I remember the professor about the second day said, "Remember, the presumption of innocence is the hallmark of our system of criminal jurisprudence." It is not presumption of guilt.

I asked the question, "Should I defend somebody if they came into my office and told me they were guilty?'

He said that will be a personal call, but you bear one thing in mind. That person may not know whether he or she is guilty under the law. They may think they are and are not.

I am going to vote for this resolution. I have no objection whatever to a fair, open hearing giving everybody a chance to answer the questions of this committee. But I have heard some names thrown around here this morning.

Mr. President, in cases like this, all you have to do is throw out a name. Oftentimes you have destroyed a person or at least destroyed their reputation. And there has been entirely too much of that surrounding this case.

So let me admonish my friends in the U.S. Senate, and especially on this special committee, lawyers and nonlawyers, to ask yourself when you are making some of these speeches and you are throwing out names, why did not this happen, why did not that happen? Well, hindsight is a wonderful thing. But ask yourself when you are throwing names around and wondering whether or not you are destroying that person, a perfectly innocent person for life, you ask yourself this question: "How would you like to be in that somebody's shoes and hear your name bandied around on the floor of the Senate which carries with it the connotation of some wrongdoing or some guilt?"

I hope the Members of this body will rise above that sort of thing, and when they say something and use some of these names in regard to this hearing, make awfully sure they are not destroying some innocent person needlessly and wrongfully.

I look forward to the hearings. I look forward to the people having an opportunity to say what they want to say and answer the questions of the Members of this committee. But for God's sakes do not prejudge everybody that is going to be called as a witness before they get there and have an opportunity to answer the questions.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES.

Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PRYOR.

Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding me 2 minutes. I had not planned to speak again. But the distinguished chairman of the committee made reference to three or four individuals who have either pled guilty or have been indicted, et cetera. I would like to talk about some of those.

Neil Ainley worked with a bank in Perryville about 50 miles from Little Rock. He pled guilty to four counts, but not one of those counts related to Whitewater; not even close to Whitewater. One was his so-called failure to file with the Internal Revenue Service a withdrawal of cash for the 1990 Clinton campaign; nothing whatsoever to do with Whitewater.

The second individual the distinguished chairman mentioned is Chris Wade. If I am not mistaken, Chris Wade was a real estate broker I believe in Mountain Home near the Whitewater development area. Chris Wade, subsequent to these many years of dealing with the lots at Whitewater, filed bankruptcy; not related to Whitewater in any way. But in the bankruptcy filing he failed to disclose either an asset or a debt. I do not know all the facts but this matter is unrelated, totally unrelated to Whitewater; no relationship whatsoever to the President and Mrs. Clinton. But yet S6784 the prosecution has now had him plead guilty.

The third person referred to was Webb Hubbell. We know that case. Webb Hubbell has pled guilty. It is a sad day. He is a good friend. But it was nothing that related to Whitewater Development Corp., absolutely nothing that related to Madison Guaranty, nothing whatsoever. Web Hubbell pled guilty to overbilling his clients; nothing to do with the RTC, nothing to do with Whitewater; totally irrelevant.

If we continue spreading this dragnet out further, if we go after every person that has ever had contact with Bill Clinton or Hillary Clinton or James McDougal or whatever, if they have ever made a phone call to them, if they have ever borrowed money or given them a campaign contribution, Lord only knows how long this investigation is going to go. It will go beyond the year 2000.

I just hope that our colleagues on the Banking Committee will realize that we must focus this investigation as it relates to Whitewater and to its original mission.

Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator, ranking member, and the distinguished chairman for yielding me this time.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back time.

Mr. D'AMATO.

Mr. President, we yield back the remainder of our time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.

All time having been yielded, the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. FORD.

I announce that the Senator from Massachusetts <Mr. KENNEDY> is necessarily absent.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SANTORUM)

NOT VOTING-1 Kennedy

So the resolution (S. Res. 120) was agreed to.
Mr. D'AMATO.
Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.
Mr. SARBANES.
I move to lay that motion on the table.
The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.
Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.
The Senator from South Carolina.
Mr. THURMOND.
Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak as in morning business.
The PRESIDING OFFICER.
Without objection, it is so ordered.
Mr. THURMOND.
I thank the Chair.

Conspiracy / Statute of Limitations

CONSPIRACY / STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

DRAFT

To : T. J. Mayopoulos Date 3/23/95

From : E. H. Jaso

Subject: Conspiracy (18 U.S.C. 371) statute of limitations--overt acts of concealment

Issue: Whether an act done to conceal a past crime may be viewed as an overt act in furtherance of an ongoing conspiracy for the purposes of tolling the statute of limitations.

Short answer: Under the facts present here, yes. Where the unlawful object of the conspiracy itself is to conceal information from the Government, acts of concealment may be viewed as overt acts reasonably contemplated in the course of the conspiracy.

FOIA(b)(7) - (C)

FOIA(b)(7) - (C)

Analysis

Statute of limitations for conspiracy under § 371

The five-year statute of limitations applicable to conspiracy under 18 U.S.C. § 371 (conspiracy to defraud the Federal Government) runs from the date the last overt act committed in furtherance of the conspiracy occurs. Grunewald v. U.S., 353 U.S. 391, 396-97 (1957), see also Buford v. Tremayne, 747 F.2d 445, 447 (8th Cir. 1984). As pertains to any particular defendant, the commission of such an overt act by any of the co-conspirators brings that defendant's crime within the limitations period unless that defendant can prove he withdrew from the conspiracy prior to the running of the limitations period. See U.S. v. Edwards, 994 F.2d 417, 421 (8th Cir. 1993) (conspiracy "presumed to exist until there has been an affirmative showing that it has terminated, and its members continue to be conspirators until there has been an affirmative showing that they have withdrawn") (citations omitted), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 701 (1994); U.S. v. Lash, 937 F.2d 1077, 1083 (6th Cir.) ("[w]ithout affirmative action to disavow or defeat the purposes of the conspiracy, liability continues for all actions in furtherance of the conspiracy by the other conspirators"), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 949 (1991); see also, e.g., U.S. v. Hauck, 980 F.2d 611, 614 (10th Cir. 1992) (even where defendant did no further business with co-conspirators within limitations period, defendant still liable where fraudulent sales that defendant conspired to facilitate continued into limitations period, and defendant had taken no affirmative steps to withdraw from conspiracy).

Concealment as an "overt act"

Grunewald held that, in most instances, subsequent acts undertaken to conceal a conspiracy may not be considered acts "in furtherance of" the conspiracy.

> "[A]fter the central criminal purposes of a conspiracy have been attained, a subsidiary conspiracy to conceal may not be implied from circumstantial evidence showing merely that the conspirators took care to cover up their crime in order to escape detection and punishment." 353 U.S. at 401-02.

However, the Court distinguished "acts of concealment done in furtherance of the main conspiracy" from "acts of concealment done after these central objectives have been attained, for the purpose only of covering up after the crime". Id. at 405. Where "the successful accomplishment of the crime necessitates concealment", acts of concealment may be viewed as overt acts in furtherance of the conspiracy. Id.

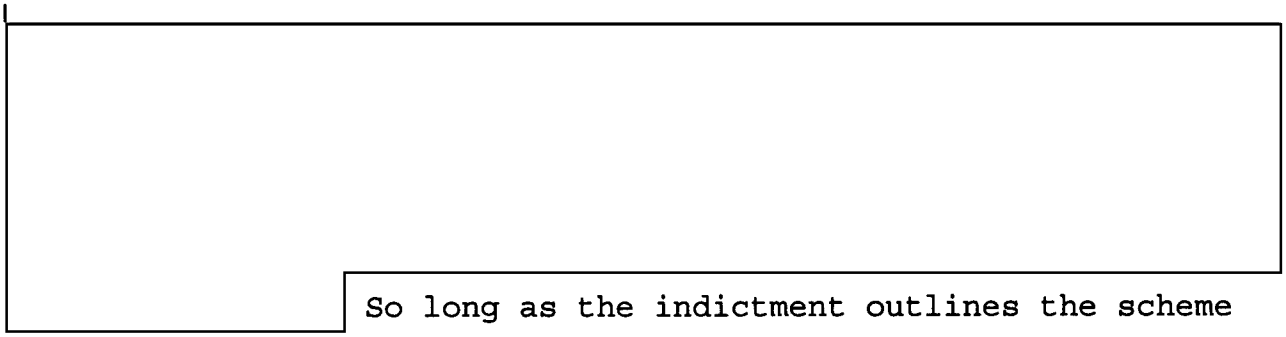
which under Grunewald may not constitute an "overt act" in furtherance of the original conspiracy.

In anticipating and successfully countering both objections, the Government must draft its indictment, and prosecute its case,

FOIA(b)(7) - (C)



So long as the indictment outlines the scheme in this fashion (and the Government is able to prove the initial agreement was made) the statute casts a broad net: even where the underlying overt acts are technically legal (not the case here), a conviction may be had under § 371 so long as the object of the conspiracy is illegal. See, e.g., U.S. v. Bucey, 876 F.2d 1297, 1312 (7th Cir.) (under § 371, "the government need not charge or prove that [defendant] agreed to commit, or actually did commit a substantive offense. He merely must have agreed to interfere with or obstruct one of the government's lawful functions by deceit, craft or trickery, or at least by means that are dishonest"), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1004 (1989).

A situation similar on its facts was at issue in U.S. v. Walker, 871 F.2d 1298 (6th Cir. 1989). The defendant, a bank president, arranged for loans to be approved in the name of a third party, but with the intention that the proceeds go to his own use and benefit. To this end, Walker (among other acts) denied on an FDIC "questionnaire" (apparently a bank certification) that the bank had made "extensions of credit made . . . for the accommodation of others than those whose names appear on bank's records or on credit instruments in connection with such extension". 871 F.2d at 1300. Defendant was charged with conspiracy to make false entries in bank records under § 371, and (in a separate count) making false statements to the FDIC under § 1005. While the court did not squarely address whether the false certification to the FDIC constituted an "overt act" in furtherance of the conspiracy alleged,[2] it nonetheless seemed to consider that act one in the continuing series of acts defendant did in perpetration of the crime. In rejecting Walker's argument that his conspiracy count be dismissed as time-barred, his contention being that the crime was complete with the issuing of the loans, the court noted: "[a]lthough the loans . . . were made in 1981, Walker continuously attempted to conceal his interest in them. . . . The government thus established that repayment of the loans and concealment of Walker's interest in them were objectives of the conspiracy". Thus, while the case does not squarely address the legal issue at hand, the facts are quite similar, and the court seemed to consider the false certification as one of many acts in furtherance of the [2] The false certification only was raised as an issue where defendant argued (unsuccessfully) that he had answered the questionnaire "truthfully", since he claimed to believe the question as to whether such loans existed "since the last bank examination" included state examinations. 871 F.2d at 1307.

Also similar on its facts was U.S. v. Gleason, 616 F.2d 2 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1082 (1980). There, officers of the Franklin National Bank ("FNB"), in an effort to conceal heavy losses from creditors and from the Government in order to obtain financing and government approval for an acquisition, falsified bank financial statements and other records. The defendants were convicted under 18 U.S.C. §§ 371, 1001, and 1014. As in Walker, the court did not directly address the question at hand, but it did note, in the context of challenged jury instructions regarding the conspiracy charge and a sufficiency-of-the-evidence argument, that each falsification of bank records constituted an overt act for which each of the co-conspirators was liable. The court stated:

> "It hardly necessitated any great mental gymnastics for any reasonable person logically to conclude in the present case that when a bank officer participated in the falsification of bank entries . . . he did so for the purpose of enabling the bank to falsify its quarterly financial statement, not for his own edification or to alter the bank's internal bookkeeping system but to mislead others who would normally rely on the statement as a true representation of the bank's financial picture. Any major participant aware of the ultimate objective and its achievement through one type of false entry could also reasonably foresee that other types of entry falsification . . . might well be used to achieve that goal." 616 F.2d at 18.

Perhaps the best legal and factual analogy can be drawn to cases involving tax evasion, which are commonly prosecuted as conspiracies to defraud the Government under § 371. As in this case, tax evasion is a crime of concealment, concealment of money (and, more importantly, information) from the Government. Tax evasion defendants have typically argued that the applicable statute of limitations (six years) has elapsed since all or some of the tax returns in question had been filed longer than six years ago. The Eighth Circuit carved out a broad exception to Grunewald in U.S. v. Gleason, 766 F.2d 1239 (8th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 1058 (1986), a tax case where defendant sought reversal on the ground that co-conspirator statements regarding a "cover-up" of the crime had been improperly admitted as hearsay exceptions. The court distinguished Grunewald, quoting its exception for crimes where "the successful accomplishment of the crime necessitates concealment", 766 F.2d at 1242 (quoting Grunewald, 353 U.S. at 405) and holding that "a conspiracy covered by 18 U.S.C. § 371, such as the one charged here, necessarily contemplates acts of concealment to accomplish its objectives", id. (citing cases) (emphasis added). The holding is broad indeed, considering that § 371 plainly applies to more than tax evasion cases, but is principled to the extent that the crime of defrauding the Government "necessarily" involves concealment; nothing about tax fraud suggests the principle should not apply to other contexts of defrauding the Government.[4]

One additional line of cases which may be of use arises in the context of mail and wire fraud. In these cases, the courts have held that, where defendant has perpetrated a fraud, additional mailings or communications intended to "lull" the victim into a false sense of security or confidence, such that the victim does not discover the fraud or initiate investigation, constitute criminal acts of fraud rather than subsequent acts of concealment. See, e.g., U.S. v. Lane, 474 U.S. 438, 452-53 (1986) ("[m]ailings occurring after the receipt of goods obtained by fraud are within the statute if they 'were designed to lull the victims into a false sense of security, postpone their ultimate complain to the authorities, and therefore make the apprehension of the defendants less likely than if no mailings had taken place'") (quoting U.S. v. Maze, 414 U.S. 395, 403 (1974)). This principle has been applied to the context of conspiracy, where defendant argued (citing Grunewald) that his the main conspiracy, which, by its very nature, called for concealment") (citing the exception in Grunewald) (quoted in Gleason, 766 F.2d at 1242 (8th Cir.)), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1052 (1976). Tax evasion has also been considered a "continuing conspiracy" wherein the object is not only to conceal income by filing false tax returns, etc. but also to evade detection, e.g., by lying to auditors, falsifying government documents, etc. See, e.g., U.S. v. Pinto, 838 F.2d 426, 435 (10th Cir. 1988) ("the indictment was based on one continuing conspiracy, the central object of which was not merely to evade taxes on marijuana income in 1978, but rather to immunize defendants from prosecution for tax evasion") (distinguishing Grunewald); U.S. v. Feldman, 731 F. Supp. 1189, 1195 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) ("the government alleges an ongoing course of conduct that constitutes the affirmative act of [tax] evasion. In essence, that course of conduct consisted of a series of lies and acts of concealment. . . . The government is not required by the statute of limitations to parse out that course of conduct in order to find the date of the first misstatement to an accountant").

subsequent acts of concealment were not overt acts falling within the statute of limitations. See U.S. v. Rogers, 9 F.3d 1025, 1029-30 (2d Cir. 1993) ("the conspiracy to commit wire fraud . . . was not complete until after the [fraudulent] June 1985 telexes were submitted. . . . As such, the June 1985 communications . . . were overt acts of the conspiracy that took place within the statute of limitations"), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 95 (1994).

ORDER DENYING PETITION FOR REHEARING AND SUGGESTION FOR REHEARING EN BANC

Feb. 2, 1994.

The suggestion for rehearing en banc is denied.

[17] The petition for rehearing by the panel is also denied with the following explanation. In its petition for rehearing, Black Hills Institute of Geological Research (Black Hills) relies on United States v. Good, —— U.S. ——, 114 S.Ct. 492, 126 L.Ed.2d 490 (1993), for the claim that it was entitled to an adversary hearing before the Department of Justice seized the fossil "Sue" from it. In Good, it was undisputed that Good owned the real property that the government had seized without first providing Good with an adversary hearing. See id. at ——————, 114 S.Ct. at 496. This fact distinguishes Good from the instant case, where the panel determined that Black Hills did not own the property in question. See Black Hills Inst. of Geological Research v. United States Dep't of Justice, 12 F.3d 737, 742–43 (8th Cir.1993).

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff–Appellee,

v.

Arthur James WESSELS, Defendant–Appellant.

No. 93–2678.

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Nov. 11, 1993.

Rehearing and Suggestion for Rehearing En Banc Denied Feb. 9, 1994.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court, Southern District of Iowa, Charles R. Wolle, Chief Judge, of conspiracy to distribute marijuana, of conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, and of using and carrying firearm in relation to drug trafficking crime, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Susan Webber Wright, District Judge, sitting by designation, held that: (1) evidence supported convictions; (2) indictment was not fatally defective; (3) no double jeopardy violation occurred; (4) defendant was not entitled to jury instruction on abandonment of conspiracy; (5) statutory penalties were properly applied; but (6) court should not have taken judicial notice of type of methamphetamine involved.

Defendant is entitled to have jury instructed on his theory of defense if proposed instruction correctly states applicable law and is supported by evidence.

13. Criminal Law ⇐863(1)

District court has wide discretion in deciding which supplemental instructions to submit to jury.

14. Double Jeopardy ⇐151(2)

Prosecution for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine did not violate right against double jeopardy of defendant who had pled guilty to conspiracy to distribute marijuana, even though defendant was charged with conspiracy to distribute marijuana or methamphetamine; since defendant had pled guilty to marijuana charge, jury was only required to determine whether methamphetamine was also an object of the conspiracy and, therefore, verdict on each allegation was unanimous and independent of the other. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5.

15. Double Jeopardy ⇐131

Government may bring alternative charges against defendant, and conviction for both charges does not violate prohibition against double jeopardy, so long as verdict on each allegation is unanimous and independent of the other. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5.

16. Criminal Law ⇐1206.3(1)

Sentencing enhancement provision contained in Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 for defendants with prior drug convictions applies to defendants convicted of drug conspiracies. Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, §§ 401(b), 406, 21 U.S.C.A. §§ 841(b), 846.

17. Criminal Law ⇐273.1(2)

Government's withdrawal of consent to oral plea agreement to move for reduction of sentence did not entitle defendant to relief from sentence imposed; whatever benefits defendant intended to reap from agreement were entirely contingent upon district court's approval and acceptance thereof.

18. Criminal Law ⇐1237

District court sentencing defendant for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine and marijuana could use sentencing provisions penalties applicable to methamphetamine as opposed to those applicable to marijuana, where indictment for conspiracy to distribute each substance was not duplicitous. 19. Conspiracy ⇐51

District court sentencing defendant for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine and marijuana could base computation of statutory penalties on amount of drugs attributable to entire conspiracy, rather than on greatest amount of drugs involved in any single transaction in course of the conspiracy. Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, § 401(b), 21 U.S.C.A. § 841(b).

20. Conspiracy ⇐51

In computing statutory penalties for defendant convicted of conspiracy to distribute drugs, district court may include not only amount of drugs involved in transactions which were known to defendant, but also amount of drugs involved in transactions which were reasonably foreseeable to defendant. Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, § 401(b), 21 U.S.C.A. § 841(b).

21. Conspiracy ⇐51

Evidence supported district court's determination that, for purposes of sentencing defendant for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, defendant was responsible for three and one-half pounds of methamphetamine; coconspirator testified that he had personally supplied defendant with three and one-half to four pounds of methamphetamine during course of conspiracy. SUSAN WEBBER WRIGHT, District Judge.

Arthur James Wessels pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute marijuana and was convicted of conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine and of using and carrying a firearm in relation to a drug trafficking crime. He was sentenced to 240 months in prison on the conspiracy count and sixty months in prison on the firearms count, the terms to be served consecutively. He now appeals both the judgment of conviction and the sentence. We affirm his conviction on both counts and remand for further findings on the type of methamphetamine involved.

I.

On December 17, 1992, the grand jury filed a two-count indictment charging Wessels with conspiracy to distribute marijuana or methamphetamine and with using and carrying a firearm in relation to a drug trafficking crime. The indictment provided as follows:

Count 1

From on or about the 1st day of January, 1989 up to and including the 17th day of December, 1992, the exact dates to the Grand Jury unknown, in the Southern District of Iowa and elsewhere, two or more persons, known and unknown to the Grand Jury, including ARTHUR JAMES WESSELS, did conspire to commit an offense against the United States, namely to knowingly and intentionally distribute marijuana, a Schedule I controlled substance or a mixture or substance containing methamphetamine, a Schedule II controlled substance in violation of Title 21, United States Code, Section 841(a)(1).

This is a violation of Title 21, United States Code Section 846.

THE GRAND JURY FURTHER CHARGES:

Count 2

That from on or about the 1st day of January, 1989 up to and including the 17th day of December, 1992, the exact dates to the grand jury unknown, in the Southern District of Iowa and elsewhere, defendant, ARTHUR JAMES WESSELS did knowingly and unlawfully during and in relation to a drug trafficking crime, to wit: conspiracy to distribute marijuana, a Schedule I controlled substance or a mixture or substance containing methamphetamine, a Schedule II controlled substance, use or carry a firearm.

This is a violation of Title 18, United States Code, Section 924(c).

Wessels was arraigned on January 4, 1993, and pleaded not guilty. On March 1, 1993, he entered a guilty plea to the marijuana conspiracy and went to trial on the methamphetamine portion of count 1 and on the weapons count. The jury found Wessels guilty on both counts and the district court sentenced and entered judgment against Wessels on June 22, 1993.

II.

For his first point on appeal, Wessels challenges his conviction under count 2 of the indictment. He contends there was insufficient evidence to convict him of use of a firearm in relation to a drug conspiracy and that the indictment was vague and testimony was admitted in violation of the bill of particulars. He also argues the district court erred in failing to instruct the jury on abandonment of a conspiracy.

Upon Wessels' motion and pursuant to an order of the district court, the government filed a bill of particulars on the weapons count. This bill of particulars provided the following with regard to Wessels' use of a firearm:

1. Each and every time the defendant, Arthur James Wessels sold methamphetamine or marijuana to Steven Grade, Brett Rork or Sharon Jones, he had a gun present.

2. During the search of his residence on or about February 25, 1992, guns were found during the search of the defendant's residence and cabin.

On the eve of trial, the government provided Wessels with a memorandum which set forth further details as to its witnesses' expected testimony concerning possession of firearms during various drug transactions. The memorandum stated:

2. Steve Grade will testify that between the first of January, 1990, and June 26, 1991, when he was arrested, he and Art Wessels trafficked in methamphetamine on the average of one to two times per week. Fifty percent of the time, Grade would travel to Kirkville, Iowa. Wessels always travelled with a weapon under his seat. Grade believes the firearm was a large caliber revolver. Wessels kept a loaded rifle by the door at his cabin in Eddyville as did he likewise at his house in R.R. Oskaloosa. In the winter of 1990, Wessels arrived at Grade's house carrying two MAC 10 semi automatic weapons strapped around his neck. On that occasion, Wessels and Grade did a methamphetamine transaction.

3. Further, Sharon Jones will likewise testify about the incident in the winter of 1990 when Wessels arrived at the Grade residence in possession of the MAC 10 semi automatic weapon.

*The HONORABLE SUSAN WEBBER WRIGHT, United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Arkansas, sitting by designation.

Wessels' motion to dismiss count 2 for failure to comply with the court's order granting a bill of particulars and for variance between the bill of particulars and the indictment was denied.[1]

[1–4] At trial, the evidence showed that numerous firearms were seized in the search of Wessels' residence on February 26, 1992, and that he was in possession of an automatic weapon in the winter of 1990 at the trailer home of friends in Kirkville, Iowa. Wessels argues there was insufficient evidence to show that these firearms were used in the alleged drug conspiracy and that all the major players except for himself had been arrested or had dropped out of the conspiracy by the summer of 1991. The government maintains, and this court agrees, that mere inactivity does not terminate a conspiracy and that Wessels has the burden of proving withdrawal from a conspiracy. United States v. Askew, 958 F.2d 806, 812 (8th Cir. 1992) (quoting United States v. Boyd, 610 F.2d 521, 528 (8th Cir.1979)). Wessels did not present evidence that he had affirmatively withdrawn from the conspiracy. He took the position that because all of his alleged co-conspirators had withdrawn, abandoned, or ceased their activities by the summer of 1991 there was no conspiracy.

[5] A jury verdict must be sustained if there is substantial evidence, taking the view most favorable to the government, to support it. United States v. Sileven, 985 F.2d 962, 967 (8th Cir.1993). This Court finds that substantial evidence supports the jury verdict. In addition to the search of Wessels' residence which revealed marijuana, drug notes, and a scale, the evidence showed that while several members of the conspiracy had been apprehended, not all of the participants were in custody or affirmatively out of the conspiracy at the time of the search. At the February 26 search, a loaded derringer was found on a shelf in Wessels' basement, a loaded .38 caliber revolver was found two to three feet from marijuana, and another loaded revolver was found in his garage. From this evidence, the jury could reasonably conclude not only that the conspiracy was still in existence but also that the firearms were used in connection with the conspiracy.

[6] Wessels also contends that the firearms possession at the trailer in the winter of 1990 was neither presented to the grand jury nor specified in the bill of particulars. He argues the indictment was unconstitutionally vague and that evidence outside the scope of the indictment and the bill of particulars was submitted to the petit jury.

[7, 8] An indictment is legally sufficient on its face if it contains all of the essential elements of the offense charged, fairly informs the defendant of the charges against which he must defend, and alleges sufficient information to allow a defendant to plead a conviction or acquittal as a bar to a subsequent prosecution. United States v. Young, 618 F.2d 1281, 1286 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 844, 101 S.Ct. 126, 66 L.Ed.2d 52 (1980). An indictment will ordinarily be held sufficient unless it is so defective that it cannot be said, by any reasonable construction, to charge the offense for which the defendant was convicted. Id. Likewise, the primary purpose of a bill of particulars is to inform the defendant of the nature of the charges against him and to prevent or minimize the element of surprise at trial. United States v. Garrett, 797 F.2d 656, 665 (8th Cir.1986). A bill of particulars, however, is not a proper tool for discovery, United States v. Hester, 917 F.2d 1083, 1084 (8th Cir.1990); it is not to be used to provide detailed disclosure of the government's evidence at trial. United States v. Automated Medical Laboratories, Inc., 770 F.2d 399, 405 (4th Cir.1985).

[9, 10] Wessels urges that the grand jury did not hear the same evidence as the petit jury. The only evidence presented to the grand jury, Wessels argues, was that firearms were discovered at his house on February 26, 1992; yet the indictment alleges weapon possession from January 1989 to December 1992. He contends the government was erroneously allowed to broaden the indictment to include events other than those of February 1992.

United States v. Huntsman, 959 F.2d 1429, 1435 (8th Cir.1992) (quoting United States v. Begnaud, 783 F.2d 144 (8th Cir.1986)).

> Tests of fatal variance are: Was defendant misled? Will defendant be protected against a future proceeding? 'Upon the question of variance between indictment and proofs, the controlling consideration should be whether the charge was fairly and fully enough stated to apprise defendant of what he must meet, and to protect him against another prosecution, and whether those particulars in which the proof may differ in form from the charge support the conclusion that respondent could have been misled to his injury.'
> [T]he 'true inquiry ... is not whether there has been a variance in proof, but whether there has been such a variance as to 'affect the substantial rights' of the accused.'

United States v. West, 549 F.2d 545, 552 (8th Cir.1977) (citations omitted). See also United States v. Yeo, 739 F.2d 385, 387 (8th Cir.1984) (where there is a variance between the facts alleged in the indictment and the evidence offered at trial, the issue is one of fairness, and actual prejudice must be considered).

The grand jury was presented evidence of gun possession acquired through the search of Wessels' residence in February 1992; this evidence was sufficient to support the indictment. The bill of particulars set out that each and every time Wessels sold methamphetamine or marijuana to Grade, Rork, or Jones, he had a gun present and that guns were found in a search of his residence in February 1992. The government subsequently presented to the petit jury evidence showing additional instances of gun use during the conspiracy, i.e., the winter 1990 gun possession. This does not amount to a "variance" as the evidence did not prove facts "materially different" from those alleged in the indictment but did prove other facts in addition to those presented to the grand jury. The indictment and the bill of particulars fully and fairly apprised Wessels of the charges he would face at trial. In addition, Wessels failed to show how he was actually prejudiced.

[11–13] Wessels further argues that the district court erred in not giving his proposed jury instruction concerning abandonment of a conspiracy. Criminal defendants are entitled to an instruction on their theory of defense if the proposed instruction is a correct statement of the applicable law and is supported by the evidence. United States v. Austin, 915 F.2d 363, 365 (8th Cir.1990). The district court has wide discretion in deciding which supplemental instructions to submit to the jury. United States v. Blumberg, 961 F.2d 787, 790 (8th Cir.1992). Wessels' abandonment theory was based upon his argument that there was no conspiracy because there were no remaining active co-conspirators. The evidence, however, was not sufficient to allow a reasonable jury to find Wessels had abandoned the conspiracy, and we find the district court committed no error in denying the instruction.

III.

[14] For his second point, Wessels argues the district court violated his Fifth Amendment right against double jeopardy by allowing the government to proceed with a trial on the methamphetamine portion of count 1 after he had pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute marijuana under count 1. Wessels contends his right against double jeopardy was violated because he was convicted twice on the same count: once when the court accepted his guilty plea to conspiracy to distribute marijuana and again when he was tried on conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine. He argues that a count cannot contain more than one charge, and that the guilty plea should therefore have disposed of count 1 entirely.

1. Wessels had earlier moved to dismiss count 2 under Fed.R.Crim.P. 12(b)(2), arguing that the indictment was vague.

In support of his argument, Wessels cites United States v. Owens, 904 F.2d 411 (8th Cir.1990) (Owens). The indictment in Owens charged the defendant with conspiracy to distribute and possess with intent to distribute "methamphetamine/amphetamine." The jury instructions repeated the ambiguous designation "methamphetamine/amphetamine" and the jury returned a general verdict of guilty. The problem then arose as to which substance should be used by the district court in determining the correct sentencing range. The guidelines provided disparate sentencing ranges for amphetamine and methamphetamine, with amphetamine having the lower range and the jury did not indicate which drug was the object of the conspiracy. Nevertheless, the district court concluded that methamphetamine was the object of the conspiracy and sentenced the defendant on that basis.

On appeal, we held that the sentence should have been calculated on the basis that the drug involved was amphetamine. Id. at 413–14. We concluded that by instructing the jury on an "either/or" basis with respect to the two substances and by failing to enable the jury to indicate by use of a special verdict form which of the two substances it found the conspiracy to have involved, the district court elicited an ambiguous verdict of guilty. Id. at 414. Under such circumstances, the court erred in sentencing the defendant based on the alternative which yielded a higher sentencing range. Id. at 414–15.

[15] Wessels' reliance on Owens is misplaced. Owens does not prohibit the government from charging a defendant in the alternative so long as the verdict on each allegation is unanimous and independent of the other. 904 F.2d at 414; see also United States v. Page-Bey, 960 F.2d 724, 727–728 (8th Cir.1992) (special verdict form not required where indictment charged defendant with conspiracy to distribute both cocaine and heroin when evidence indicated defendant supplied both and it would have made no difference in defendant's sentence) (per curiam). Here, there is no ambiguity in the jury's verdict. Because Wessels had already pleaded guilty to the marijuana conspiracy, the jury only needed to determine whether methamphetamine was also an object of the conspiracy, which it did. Accordingly, there was no violation of Wessels' Fifth Amendment rights.

IV.

[16] For his final point, Wessels raises several challenges to his sentence. He first argues that the enhancement provision for prior drug convictions set forth in 21 U.S.C. § 841(b) does not apply to persons convicted under the drug conspiracy statute, 21 U.S.C. § 846. Citing Bifulco v. United States, 447 U.S. 381, 100 S.Ct. 2247, 65 L.Ed.2d 205 (1980), Wessels argues that only the penalties applicable to the offense that was the object of the conspiracy, and not those applicable to the offender, apply by reference from § 846. This argument is without merit. As we noted in United States v. Askew, 958 F.2d at 812, the drug conspiracy statute has been amended since Bifulco to expressly provide that convicted drug conspirators are "subject to the same penalties as those prescribed for the [underlying substantive] offense." Thus, the enhancement provision of § 841(b) applies whether the conviction was for violating the substantive statute or for conspiring to violate the substantive statute.

[17] Wessels also argues the district court should not have applied the penalty enhancement because of an oral plea agreement upon which he detrimentally relied. Apparently, Wessels and the government had entered into an oral agreement whereby in exchange for Wessels' cooperation, the government would move for a reduction in Wessels' sentence. However, the government subsequently informed Wessels that it would not go through with the agreement and proceeded to file a notice of enhancement after learning that Wessels had a prior felony drug conviction. Wessels argues that the government breached the plea agreement, and in so doing, engaged in misconduct, gained an unfair advantage, and deprived him of due process and the effective assistance of counsel.

Wessels is not entitled to relief due to the government's withdrawal of its consent to the plea agreement. Whatever benefits Wessels intended to reap as a result of the agreement were entirely contingent upon the approval of the district court. United States v. Walker, 927 F.2d 389, 390 (8th Cir.1991).

> Surely neither party contemplates any benefit from the agreement unless and until the trial judge approves the bargain and accepts the guilty plea. Neither party is justified in relying substantially on the bargain until the trial court approves it. We are therefore reluctant to bind them to the agreement until that time. As a general rule, then, we think that either party should be entitled to modify its position and even withdraw its consent to the bargain until the plea is tendered and the bargain as it then exists is accepted by the court.

United States v. McGovern, 822 F.2d 739, 744 (8th Cir.) (quoting United States v. Ocanas, 628 F.2d 353, 358 (5th Cir.1980)), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 956, 108 S.Ct. 352, 98 L.Ed.2d 377 (1987).

Wessels was not justified in relying on the terms of the plea agreement because it had not been approved and accepted by the district court.[2] In addition, he has not shown that the government gained an unfair advantage over him in withdrawing its consent to the agreement, such as by the use at trial of statements made during the course of the plea negotiations, nor has he shown a deprivation of due process in his subsequent trial. Wessels was not prejudiced by the government's withdrawal of its consent to the plea agreement and the district court committed no error when it increased the statutory penalty on account of Wessels' prior felony drug conviction.

[18] Wessels next argues the indictment was duplicitous and that the district court thus erred in utilizing the statutory penalties applicable to the conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine charge as opposed to those applicable to the marijuana conspiracy. In support of this argument, Wessels again cites Owens. However, we have already determined there was no ambiguity in the jury's verdict and that the jury properly determined that methamphetamine was an object of the conspiracy. Accordingly, the district court did not err in utilizing the penalties applicable to the charge of conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine.

[19] Wessels next argues the district court erred in determining that the penalties set forth in § 841(b) are based upon the amount of drugs attributable to the entire conspiracy. He argues that the penalty should be determined by using the greatest amount of any single transaction in the course of the conspiracy rather than by aggregating small amounts involved in numerous transactions. He additionally argues that the district court erred in determining the quantity of drugs involved based of the testimony of witness Steve Grade. We reject both of these arguments.

[20] One of the measures employed in determining the severity of a drug conspiracy offense is the amount of narcotics involved in the entire conspiracy. United States v. Savage, 891 F.2d 145, 151 (7th Cir.1989). Indeed, the amount of narcotics considered in sentencing for conspiracy includes not only the amount involved in the transactions that were known to the defendant but also those that were reasonably foreseeable, reflecting the fact that each conspirator is responsible for the acts and offenses of each one of his co-conspirators committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. Id. See also United States v. Tolson, 988 F.2d 1494, 1502 (7th Cir.1993) (finding that the defendant may be held responsible for all marijuana transactions [18,500 pounds] from 1986 through 1988 that were reasonably foreseeable to him). Wessels cites no authority requiring the court to determine the penalty by using only the greatest amount of any single transaction in the course of the conspiracy and nothing in § 841(b) imposes such a requirement. The district court properly determined that the penalties set forth in § 841(b) are based upon the amount of drugs attributable to the entire conspiracy.

2. The district court denied Wessels' pretrial motion to enforce the plea agreement, stating that it cannot accept a plea of guilty based upon a plea agreement that asserts that the court knows to be false, and that it would not have accepted the plea agreement in this case because it omitted the notice of prior conviction.

[21] In addition, the district court did not commit error in its determination that Wessels was responsible for three and one-half pounds of methamphetamine. The court credited Grade's testimony that he personally supplied Wessels with three and one-half to four pounds of methamphetamine during the course of their drug trafficking activities. Grade's testimony, which was based upon his own personal knowledge, clearly established the amount of drugs involved. See United States v. Galvan, 961 F.2d 738, 740 (8th Cir.1992) (trial testimony used to estimate the amount of uncharged drugs must clearly establish either the dates of the transactions or the amounts of drugs involved) (citations omitted). Although Wessels argues that Grade's testimony should not have been credited, witness credibility is an issue for the sentencing judge that is virtually unreviewable on appeal. United States v. Candie, 974 F.2d 61, 64 (8th Cir.1992) (citations omitted). We conclude that the district court's findings regarding the quantity of methamphetamine involved were reasonably supported by the evidence and are not clearly erroneous.

[22] However, we do find the district court erred in taking judicial notice that the methamphetamine involved in this case was D-methamphetamine rather than L-methamphetamine.[3] The court acknowledged at the sentencing hearing that the government failed to present evidence on this issue, but noted that it had been involved in some 50 methamphetamine cases in the State of Iowa, none of which involved L-methamphetamine. Stating that under such circumstances the defense was obligated to do more than simply say the government had not proven that the substance was D-methamphetamine, the court, over Wessels' objections, took judicial notice that the methamphetamine involved was D-methamphetamine. This was error. While irrelevant to the question of guilt, the type of methamphetamine involved was essential to the calculation of the proper sentence, and the government rather than Wessels carried the burden of producing evidence on this issue. United States v. Patrick, 983 F.2d 206, 208 (11th Cir.1993) (citations omitted). See also United States v. Koonce, 884 F.2d 349, 353 (8th Cir.1989). Because the district court did not receive any evidence as to the type of methamphetamine involved, we remand for further findings on this issue.

V.

In sum, we affirm Wessels' conviction on both counts and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

3. Under the sentencing guidelines, the involvement of D-methamphetamine requires a sentence that is significantly more severe than that for an equal quantity of L-methamphetamine. U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1. See United States v. Koonce, 884 F.2d 349, 352 (8th Cir.1989).

Inmate brought civil rights action against jail officials who shot him with stun gun when he refused to clean his cell. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas, Jerry W. We disagree. The bidding procedures established by the bankruptcy court are the sort that routinely govern estate sales. Moreover, the court adopted those procedures precisely because of the perceived collusion between Fisher and Gould in crafting the bogus second offer. Fisher's attack on the rebidding procedures is largely a roundabout attack on the (unappealable) May 1989 order. The issue is not whether the property should be rebid, but how it will be rebid. Again, if Fisher believed that rebidding would be futile because he was the only potential bidder, the time to make that argument was in an appeal of the May 1989 order. Furthermore, we are not in a position on this record to say whether the location of the 7.5 acre parcel does in fact limit bids to the Weavers and Fisher. The bankruptcy court, fully apprised of the facts, attempted to find an equitable solution to the defects that infected both the first and second attempts to sell the property. Indeed, by establishing a procedure for claims resolution, the bankruptcy court took pains not to leave anyone, including Fisher, without recourse for damages resulting from the vacated sale; although Fisher complains that the rebidding procedures will prove time-consuming and costly, we cannot say, under the circumstances, that it was an abuse of discretion to adopt this approach.

[5] Finally, Fisher challenges the bankruptcy court's determination that he did not hold a claim for breach of warranty against Gould. Whether he did or not turns on whether the original sale was a judicial sale under Indiana law, see, e.g., Vonderahe v. Ortman, 128 Ind.App. 381, 147 N.E.2d 924, 926 (1958), or a sale in the ordinary course of business under the Bankruptcy Code. See, e.g., In re Canyon Partnership, 55 B.R. 520, 524 (Bankr. S.D.Cal.1985). The district court declined to address that issue, concluding that it was an integral part of the claims resolution process established by the bankruptcy court. We agree. As noted, the bankruptcy court specifically ordered that all proceeds from the sale of the 7.5 acre parcel be subject to the court's jurisdiction for distribution to potential claimants. Whether Fisher is entitled to recover for breach of warranty is properly left for that stage of the litigation.

AFFIRMED.

* Case number 91-2586, Roger Curry's appeal, was not argued but was submitted on the record and briefs.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,

v.

Timothy S. CURRY, Samuel T. Harding, Don J. Leinenbach, Robert Holland and Roger S. Curry, Defendants-Appellants.

Nos. 91-2550, 91-2556, 91-2578, 91-2579 and 91-2586.

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit.

Rehearing and Rehearing En Banc Denied Oct. 28, 1992 in No. 91-2586.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Indiana, Gene E. Brooks, Chief Judge, of, inter alia, conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute in excess of 50 kilograms of marijuana, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Cummings, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) joinder of one defendant's perjury counts with other defendants' conspiracy counts was proper; (2) expert testimony regarding eyewitness identification was properly excluded; (3) evidence was sufficient to support finding that each defendant participated in single, ongoing conspiracy; (4) certain testimony was properly admitted under exceptions to hearsay rule; and (5) sentences were not improper.

1. Indictment and Information ⇐124(4)

Under rule permitting multiple defendants to be tried together only if their charged conduct arose from "same act or transaction" or "same series of acts or transactions," acts or transactions are considered part of "same series" if they are performed pursuant to common scheme or plan. Fed.Rules Cr.Proc.Rule 8(b), 18 U.S.C.A.

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

2. Indictment and Information ⇐124(5)

Joinder of perjury counts with other defendants' conspiracy counts was proper under rule allowing multiple defendants to be tried together if charged conduct arose from same series of acts or transactions, in prosecution arising from alleged conspiracy to grow marijuana, regardless of number of years between end of alleged conspiracy and subsequent alleged perjury. Fed. Rules Cr.Proc.Rule 8(b), 18 U.S.C.A.

3. Indictment and Information ⇐124(4)

Conspiracy and its cover-up are considered parts of common plan, for purposes of rule allowing multiple defendants to be tried together if charged conduct arises from common scheme or plan. Fed.Rules Cr.Proc.Rule 8(b), 18 U.S.C.A.

4. Criminal Law ⇐620(6)

Defendants in prosecution alleging conspiracy to grow marijuana were not entitled to severance of one defendant's perjury charges, even if trial were severed, testimony regarding perjury defendant's role in drug conspiracy would have been relevant and admissible to show that he committed perjury and, although evidence relating to perjury may not have been admissible in separate conspiracy trial, there was no severe prejudice. Fed.Rules Cr. Proc.Rule 14, 18 U.S.C.A.

5. Criminal Law ⇐469.1

Expert testimony is generally admissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 702 if it will assist trier of fact to understand evidence or to determine fact in issue, but district judge has broad discretion to exclude relevant evidence that is confusing or redundant under Rule 403. Fed.Rules Evid.Rules 403, 702, 28 U.S.C.A.

6. Criminal Law ⇐338(7), 474.3(2)

Exclusion of expert testimony regarding reliability of eyewitness identifications was proper, whether under Rule of Evidence 702, governing expert testimony, or under Rule 403, governing exclusion of relevant evidence on grounds of prejudice, confusion, or waste of time; intrusion of expert to comment on what was minor issue was not necessary, especially when record revealed that vigorous cross-examinations by defendants exposed weaknesses of identifications; moreover, defendants gave government only four days' notice of intent to call expert. Fed.Rules Evid.Rules 403, 702, 28 U.S.C.A.

7. Conspiracy ⇐48.2(2)

Multiple conspiracy instruction was not required in prosecution of several defendants alleging conspiracy to manufacture, and to possess with intent to distribute, marijuana; defendants failed to show that they had been prejudiced by alleged variance between indictment and proof.

8. Conspiracy ⇐24(1)

Essence of conspiracy is agreement; to join conspiracy is to join agreement, not group.

9. Conspiracy ⇐24(2)

Multiple conspiracies exist when there is no agreement toward common goal, and each conspirator's agreement constitutes end unto itself.

10. Conspiracy ⇐24(3)

Participants in conspiracy need not know all other members or participate in every aspect of conspiracy.

11. Conspiracy ⇐24(1), 24.5

Proof of conspiracy requires substantial evidence that particular defendant knew of illegal objective of conspiracy and agreed to participate in its achievement.

12. Conspiracy ⇐24(1), 47(2)

Because of secretive nature of conspiracies, formal agreement need not be proven; jury may infer agreement based solely on circumstantial evidence regarding relationship of parties and their overt acts.

13. Conspiracy ⇐24(3)

Parties may join or withdraw from conspiracy at any time without altering fundamental nature of conspiracy.

14. Conspiracy ⇐40

"Employee" of conspiracy is participant in conspiracy, since employee has agreed to perform certain duties in furtherance of conspiracy and because employee materially benefits from success of conspiracy.

15. Conspiracy ⇐47(12)

Evidence in prosecution for conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute marijuana was sufficient to support finding that defendant whose agreed duties were limited to tending marijuana plants and participating in harvest was participant in overall conspiracy. Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, § 401(a)(1), 21 U.S.C.A. § 841(a)(1).

16. Conspiracy ⇐47(12)

Evidence in prosecution for conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute marijuana was sufficient to support conclusion that attorney, who was involved in planting, harvesting, drying, packing, inspecting, and transplanting marijuana, joined the conspiracy alleged. Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, § 401(a)(1), 21 U.S.C.A. § 841(a)(1).

17. Conspiracy ⇐47(12)

Evidence in prosecution for conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute marijuana was sufficient to support finding that owner of farm where marijuana was grown joined in the conspiracy alleged; although there was no evidence that defendant participated in harvesting, manicuring, or distributing marijuana, there was evidence that he harvested corn on his farm at night when others were harvesting marijuana, and that he had conversations with other defendants indicating his awareness of the marijuana-growing; jury was entitled to infer that defendant was compensated for allowing portion of land to be used for growing marijuana. Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, § 401(a)(1), 21 U.S.C.A. § 841(a)(1).

18. Criminal Law ⇐417(15)

There is no need to redact inculpatory portion of hearsay admitted under exception for admissions against penal interest as long as that portion is closely related to incriminatory portion of statement, and other requirements of rule are met. Fed. Rules Evid.Rule 804(b)(3), 28 U.S.C.A.

19. Criminal Law ⇐422(5), 662.10

Testimony by government informant about codefendant's statements that inculpated defendant was properly admitted under exception to hearsay rule for admissions against penal interest, and admission of testimony did not violate confrontation clause, in prosecution arising from alleged conspiracy to grow marijuana; statements, which were not made in attempt to curry favor with law enforcement officers but were made to acquaintance, were sufficiently reliable. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 804(b)(3), 28 U.S.C.A.; U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. 6.

20. Criminal Law ⇐662.60

Reading of codefendant's grand jury testimony to jury did not violate defendant's confrontation clause rights under Bruton, in prosecution for conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute marijuana; codefendant's grand jury testimony did not directly implicate any other defendant. U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. 6.

21. Criminal Law ⇐662.10

Admission of codefendant's statement to coconspirator that government had made mistake in indicting one person who had not even lived in Indiana did not, under Bruton, violate confrontation rights of defendant, whom jury allegedly knew was from Indiana, in prosecution arising from alleged conspiracy to grow marijuana; statement did not directly incriminate defendant, but at best, exculpated one defendant who was not from Indiana.

22. Criminal Law ⇐422(1)

Hearsay statement related to concealment activity begun while conspiracy was still ongoing was admissible under rule defining as nonhearsay those statements made by coconspirators within scope of conspiracy, in prosecution arising from alleged conspiracy to grow marijuana. Fed. Rules Evid.Rule 801(d)(2)(E), 28 U.S.C.A.

23. Criminal Law ⇐1166.22(4)

Any erroneous comments to jury by trial judge regarding evidence of marijuana-cultivating endeavors did not warrant reversal of convictions in prosecution arising out of alleged conspiracy to grow marijuana, even though comments were somewhat confusing and failed to distinguish clearly between two different hearsay exceptions.

24. Conspiracy ⇐24.15, 27

In conspiracy prosecution, government is not required to prove any overt acts with regard to particular defendant within limitations period; instead, government is required to prove that conspiracy existed into limitations period and that defendants did not withdraw before that period.

25. Constitutional Law ⇐268(10)
Witnesses ⇐88

District court was not required under due process clause to inquire specifically whether defendant was knowingly and intelligently waiving right to testify at trial. U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 5, 14.

26. Criminal Law ⇐1177

It is only when it can be said with certainty that acceptance of responsibility has been shown that reversal of district court's denial of reduction under Sentencing Guidelines for acceptance of responsibility is warranted. U.S.S.G. § 3E1.1, 18 U.S.C.A.App.

27. Criminal Law ⇐1252

Denial of reduction under guidelines for acceptance of responsibility was proper in prosecution for making false declarations before federal grand jury; sentencing judge made specific findings that defendant did not voluntarily withdraw from criminal activities in timely fashion, did not provide voluntary assistance to officials, and stated that he felt "pressured." U.S.S.G. § 3E1.1, 18 U.S.C.A.App.

28. Perjury ⇐41

Defendant convicted for making false declarations before federal grand jury in connection with investigation into alleged marijuana-growing conspiracy was not illegally sentenced under guidelines as accessory after fact, even though defendant was principal in conspiracy; defendant was trying to protect others and not himself, as he was immunized for his testimony. U.S.S.G. §§ 2J1.3(c)(1), 2X3.1, 18 U.S.C.A.App.

29. Criminal Law ⇐1210(4)

Consecutive sentences for conviction on count of conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute in excess of 50 kilograms of marijuana and count alleging manufacturing in excess of 50 kilograms of marijuana were permissible.

30. Criminal Law ⇐986(3)

District court did not err in sentencing defendant simply because it did not mention every mitigating factor listed in presentence report, especially when they were not mentioned by defendant or counsel at sentencing.

CUMMINGS, Circuit Judge.

A jury found defendants Timothy Curry ("Tim"), Roger Curry ("Roger"), Don Jeffrey Leinenbach, and Samuel T. Harding guilty of conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute in excess of fifty kilograms of marijuana in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 846. Tim, Roger, and Harding were also found guilty of manufacturing in excess of fifty kilograms of marijuana, in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1). The jury found defendant Robert Holland guilty of making false declarations before a federal grand jury in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1623. The defendants raise a number of issues regarding the propriety of their convictions and sentences. We affirm.

I.

Co-conspirators Mary Lynch and Brenton Long provided the details surrounding the defendants' conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute marijuana. Long testified at trial for the government under a grant of immunity. Defendant Lynch pleaded guilty pursuant to a plea agreement limiting her prison term to no more than three years, and was obligated to testify under the agreement.

In late 1982, Lynch and Long helped Tim and his wife, defendant Joyce Curry (who has not appealed from her conviction), and others hang marijuana to dry in the basement of Tim's Niwot, Colorado, residence. After the marijuana was dry, Lynch "manicured" (prepared) some of it for sale, earning $10.00 per hour from Tim. Tim told her that the marijuana came from Indiana.

In the spring of 1983, Tim hired Lynch and Long to help clone marijuana plants in his residence. After Tim taught them how to clone the plants, they (primarily Long) produced approximately 2,500 new marijuana plants from thirty to fifty mother plants. Long agreed to work for Tim in transporting, planting, and harvesting the marijuana. Tim, Long, defendant Holland, and another individual brought the new marijuana plants first to Nebraska, where they planted 500 of the plants, and then to Jasper, Indiana. In Jasper, Long met Tim's brother, Roger, and Long, Tim, Roger, and Holland subsequently planted the remaining 2,000 plants on defendant Leinenbach's farm in Otwell, Indiana. Long met and had conversations with Leinenbach in the spring of 1983, but Leinenbach did not participate directly in any of the planting activity. The spring planting was completed by June 21, 1983.

A person named "Rich Kelly" was mentioned on numerous occasions during trial. Testimony at trial indicated that Kelly is a fictional character created by the defendants to take blame for their marijuana growing, although at least some of the defendants apparently still contend that he is an actual person. A "Rich Kelly" purchased a farm in Velpen, Indiana, from the Jasper State Bank in September 1983. According to the Bank's president Joseph Miller, Roger vouched for Kelly, stating that he had known Kelly since boyhood. Miller testified that the real estate transaction with Kelly was "highly unusual" because no financial statement, credit report, or employment verification of Kelly was ever done. A checking account was opened in Kelly's name which listed Roger as the person who would know Kelly's location. In addition, Lynch testified that she, Tim, Roger, and Holland discussed the use of a fictitious person named Kelly during the summer of 1985. Lynch also testified that the continued use of a "Richard Kelly" as a scapegoat was discussed by Holland, Joyce and herself in 1987, and by Tim and herself in 1989. In the spring of 1983, Tim had asked Long to play the role of Rich Kelly, in whose name certain property in Indiana was to be purchased, but Long refused.

During the fall of 1983, Long, Roger, Tim, and Holland harvested marijuana at Leinenbach's farm. To avoid detection, the marijuana was harvested at night while Leinenbach harvested the surrounding corn crop. The harvested marijuana was transported to the Velpen farm where it was hung to dry. When the marijuana was dry, Tim, Roger, Long, and Joyce packed it into over 100 boxes. At Tim's request, Long drove 56 of the boxes to Colorado. The boxes were eventually stored at Tim's home. The marijuana was transferred over a period of time to Lynch's home in Boulder, Colorado, where Lynch and others manicured it for sale in late 1983 and early 1984. Approximately 1,000 pounds of finished marijuana were produced for sale. Tim told Long that he (Tim) had made over one million dollars between the 1983 marijuana project and a "spec house" that he had built.

In May 1984, an electric company employee discovered hundreds of small marijuana plants growing in containers near the Velpen farmhouse. In June 1984, Roger asked Dennis Mehringer to estimate the cost of plumbing repairs at the Velpen farmhouse. Merhinger was introduced to a Richard Kelly at the farmhouse. Around September 1984, defendant Steven Bush (who was found not guilty at trial) showed Jeff Griffith where marijuana was growing at Leinenbach's farm. Griffith returned to Leinenbach's farm and stole marijuana at least three times in 1984. Bush told Griffith that the people who were growing the marijuana included Roger and Holland. In the fall of 1984, Tim again asked Lynch to manicure some of the marijuana from Indiana. She and others processed approximately 250 to 300 pounds of saleable marijuana in Colorado. Tim indicated that this was only part of the harvest.

In the spring of 1985, "Richard Kelly" purchased a farm in rural Martin County, Indiana, from Mark and Cindy Hewitt. The closing was attended by "Kelly," Tommy and Thelma Crane, Mark and Cindy Hewitt, and two realtors. Mark Hewitt identified Tim as the person who introduced himself as Kelly at the closing. One of the realtors and Thelma Crane reaffirmed their previous selections of Tim's photograph as Kelly, although neither could make a certain in-court identification. Thelma Crane noted that Kelly's hair was shorter and he did not have glasses. Lynch had earlier testified that Tim's hair was darker than usual and that he had not worn glasses previously. One of the previous residents at the Martin County farm testified that she saw Tim and Roger walking around the farm twice before the sale of the farm, and that Tim's hair had been lighter and he was not wearing glasses. Another previous resident also identified Tim as one of the two persons at the farm. This resident saw Roger at the farm after it was sold, and talked to Tim and defendant Samuel Harding. A neighbor also saw Harding at the Martin County farm.

In the summer of 1985, Tim offered Lynch $15,000 to come to the Martin County farm and "weed" marijuana because Harding had hurt his back. Lynch agreed and came to Jasper, where she met Holland and went to Roger's law office to get keys to the Martin County farm. She saw the marijuana growing room at the Velpen farmhouse while she was in Indiana, and helped Roger clean the house. During her visit, Holland helped Lynch weed around the marijuana plants, Tim gave her money for expenses, and Roger visited her.

Harding's former wife, Joan Hylinski, testified that Harding went to Jasper, Indiana, in May 1985, telling her that he was going to help some friends on a farm. In July of that year, Hylinski traveled to Jasper and stayed with Harding for approximately 10 days at the Martin County farm, helping Harding pull weeds from the marijuana fields there. Hylinski also went to Leinenbach's farm with Harding and Roger where they inspected the marijuana plants. Hylinski, Harding, and Roger transplanted marijuana plants in the growing room of the Velpen farmhouse.

In September 1985, Lynch, Tim, Roger, Harding, Holland, and one other person harvested the marijuana at the Martin County farm. Lynch acted as a lookout for the operation. She also assisted Tim, Harding, and others with the preparation of the barn for harvest, including putting plastic on the floors, stringing twine between the walls, cutting a ventilation hole in the side of the barn, and getting a large propane heater to dry the marijuana. When the marijuana from the Martin County farm was hung to dry, Tim, Roger, Harding, and Holland went to harvest Leinenbach's farm. They returned, however, and said the marijuana had been stolen.

To avoid discovery by police, the harvesters dismantled the growing room at the Velpen farm. The valuable items were returned to Colorado, as were some marijuana plants and some dried marijuana from the Martin County farm. During the clean-up of the Velpen farmhouse, Lynch used the central vacuum system at the house, but the bag was never emptied. Lynch returned to Colorado, where she and others manicured marijuana for approximately one month, producing about 250 pounds of saleable marijuana. Lynch sold some of this marijuana and observed Tim sell a "large portion" of it in late 1985. Tim paid Lynch $10,000 in cash and marijuana for her part in the undertaking.

In October 1985, Jeff Griffith told police about the marijuana operation and took police officers to Leinenbach's farm and the Velpen farm. Police officers found approximately 2,500 to 3,000 cut marijuana stalks among the corn plants and approximately 97 marijuana plants at Leinenbach's farm. At the Velpen farm, officers found personal documents related to Roger and Holland, high-intensity light fixtures, horticultural literature, handwritten notes regarding plant care, watering pipes, shears, and marijuana, including some found in the bag from the house's central vacuum system.

Also in October, Tim told Lynch that he was going to clean out the Martin County farm. Apparently before he was able to do so, police officers located the farm from documents found at the Velpen farmhouse and found approximately 5,000 cut marijuana stalks amid corn plants, noticed twine strung in the barn, and found personal documents relating to Lynch and Hylinski.

In 1987, at Tim's request, Lynch cloned approximately 250 marijuana plants for Tim and another 500 or so marijuana plants for Roger. In October 1988, Tim delivered approximately 900 pounds of marijuana to Lynch for manicuring.

On September 8, 1989, Holland appeared before a federal grand jury for the Southern District of Indiana pursuant to a grant of formal immunity. Roger, Tim, and Long were targets of the grand jury's investigation. Holland testified under oath that he had no knowledge that Roger, Tim, or Long were involved in the marijuana operation. After the indictment in this case was returned in September of 1990, Holland met with Lynch and attempted to give her a copy of the indictment with notes written on it, requesting Lynch to conform any statements she made to authorities to the notes.

An indictment was returned on September 13, 1990, charging Tim, Roger, Joyce, Don Jeffrey Leinenbach, Lynch, Charles E. Leinenbach, Harding, and Bush in Count I with conspiracy to manufacture and possess with intent to distribute in excess of fifty kilograms of marijuana, from about March or April 1983 through at least October 31, 1985. Count II alleged that Don Jeffrey Leinenbach's farm was forfeitable to the United States. Count III charged Tim, Roger and Harding with manufacturing in excess of fifty kilograms of marijuana in or about October 1985. Counts IV through VI charged Holland with making false declarations before the federal grand jury. Counts VII and VIII charged Roger with filing false federal income tax returns. A second superseding indictment was returned on February 19, 1991.

Lynch entered a plea of guilty pursuant to a plea agreement, and the remaining defendants pleaded not guilty. The district court severed Counts VII and VIII relating to Roger's alleged filing of false income tax returns. Trial began on February 25, 1991. At the end of the government's case, the court granted Charles E. Leinenbach's motion for judgment of acquittal. On April 6, 1991, the jury found all defendants guilty of all counts except Bush, who was found not guilty. Jeff Leinenbach's property was found to be forfeitable. Tim and Roger were each sentenced to 20 years with three years parole; Harding was sentenced to serve 12 years with three years parole; Jeff Leinenbach was sentenced to serve 18 months; and Holland was sentenced to serve 78 months.

II.

The defendants raise a number of issues, and all adopt issues raised by their co-defendants as applicable. Unless otherwise mentioned, the issues discussed below apply to all defendants.

A. Joinder of Holland's Perjury Counts

Defendants argue that Counts IV through VI of the superseding indictment, relating to Holland's perjury before the grand jury in 1989, were improperly joined with Counts I through III, which dealt with a marijuana conspiracy from 1983 to 1985. Rule 8(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides that:

> Two or more defendants may be charged in the same indictment or information if they are alleged to have participated in the same act or transaction or in the same series of acts or transactions constituting an offense or offenses. * * * [A]ll of the defendants need not be charged in each count.

"Rule 8 is construed broadly to allow liberal joinder and thereby enhance the efficiency of the judicial system." United States v. Isaacs, 493 F.2d 1124, 1158 (7th Cir.1974), certiorari denied, 417 U.S. 976, 94 S.Ct. 3184, 41 L.Ed.2d 1146. Joint trials are beneficial because they increase court efficiency, limit inconvenience to witnesses, and avoid delays in bringing defendants to trial. United States v. Sophie, 900 F.2d 1064, 1083 (7th Cir.1990), certiorari denied, — U.S. —, 111 S.Ct. 124, 112 L.Ed.2d 92. Joint trials may also be beneficial in presenting the "total story" to one jury, as opposed to bits and pieces of a story being presented to several juries. Id.

[1] Nevertheless, in order to avoid undue prejudice, under Rule 8(b) multiple defendants may be tried together only if their charged conduct arose from the "same act or transaction" or the "same series of acts or transactions." Acts or transactions are considered part of the "same series" if they are performed pursuant to a common scheme or plan. United States v. Velasquez, 772 F.2d 1348, 1353 (7th Cir.1985), certiorari denied, 475 U.S. 1021, 106 S.Ct. 1211, 89 L.Ed.2d 323. We decide this question based on the allegations in the indictment, not on the evidence adduced at trial. Id. at 1354 ("Rule 8 on its face is about pleading rather than proof, and there are practical reasons for maintaining the distinction").

[2, 3] The joinder of Holland's perjury counts with the other defendants' conspiracy counts was proper under Rule 8(b). Holland is prominently mentioned in the "overt acts" section of the superseding indictment as an unindicted coconspirator in the marijuana growing enterprise. Most pertinently, it is alleged that Holland and several of the defendants discussed the creation of a fictional character to be known as "Richard Kelly." Holland's perjury counts quote the statements that he made before the grand jury which indicate that Rich Kelly was the leader of the conspiracy. Although the indictment could have been clearer in spelling out the link, we think that the perjury counts sufficiently communicate that Holland's statements before the grand jury were made pursuant to a preconceived plan to cover up the identity of the conspirators. A conspiracy and its cover-up are considered parts of a common plan. Velasquez, 772 F.2d at 1354. Finally, the main allegation of perjury against Holland relates to his statements that Long, Tim, and Roger were not involved in the marijuana conspiracy. Therefore joinder is proper here because proof that these statements were false required proof of Long's, Tim's, and Roger's involvement in the marijuana conspiracy, so that there is considerable overlap of evidence.[1]

The defendants argue that the conspiracy counts and the perjury counts were not part of a common plan because the perjury occurred almost four years after the end of the conspiracy alleged in Counts I and III. Counts may be joined under Rule 8(b) even if they could not have been charged as one conspiracy. Sophie, 900 F.2d at 1084. Indeed, several courts have specifically held that perjury counts may be considered part of the same series of acts or transactions as the underlying conduct which was misrepresented. Isaacs, 493 F.2d at 1159; United States v. Swift, 809 F.2d 320, 322 (6th Cir.1987); United States v. Moeckly, 769 F.2d 453, 465 (8th Cir.1985), certiorari denied, 475 U.S. 1015, 106 S.Ct. 1196, 89 L.Ed.2d 311; United States v. Dekle, 768 F.2d 1257, 1261–1262 (11th Cir.1985).[2] The number of years between the end of the alleged conspiracy and the subsequent alleged perjury is in our view irrelevant.

[4] Defendants' argument that the district court should have exercised its discretion to sever the counts relating to Holland pursuant to Rule 14 is also without merit.[3] "[S]evere prejudice is required for an order of severance and the trial judge's refusal to sever is rarely reversed." Velasquez, 772 F.2d at 1352. Holland is the only defendant who specifically argues that he was unduly prejudiced by joinder here for the purposes of Rule 14. We conclude that no defendant was unduly prejudiced, however. Holland only argues that the jury would have been confused and prejudiced by the numerous allegations in the indictment and the testimony regarding Holland's role in the conspiracy. But if his trial were severed, this testimony would have been relevant and admissible to show that he committed perjury. Furthermore, although evidence relating to Holland's perjury may not have been admissible in a separate conspiracy trial, there was no severe prejudice because Holland's grand jury testimony did not directly implicate any of the other defendants. Therefore the district court correctly denied defendants' motion to sever Holland's perjury counts.

B. Exclusion of Expert Testimony Regarding Eyewitness Identification

[5] The first in a number of evidentiary objections made by defendants relates to the decision by the district court to exclude the expert testimony of Dr. Elizabeth Loftus, a recognized authority on the issue of eyewitness identifications. Expert testimony is generally admissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 702 if it "will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue * * *." However, "a district judge has broad discretion to exclude relevant evidence that is confusing or redundant" under Federal Rule of Evidence 403. Krist v. Eli Lilly and Co., 897 F.2d 293, 298 (7th Cir.1990). For the reasons given below, we conclude that the district judge did not abuse his discretion here.

Dr. Loftus' testimony was offered to rebut the testimony of several witnesses who identified Tim, Roger, or Harding around the time of the purchase of the Martin County farm. In particular, Thelma Crane testified that she met a person introducing himself as Rich Kelly at the Martin County closing. She identified a photograph of Tim Curry as Rich Kelly about three years later. At trial, about six years after the closing, she was unable certainly to identify Tim as Kelly. Mark Hewitt was also present at the closing and identified Tim as Kelly at trial. Cynthia Hawkins testified that around the time of the closing, she saw on two different occasions two men examine the Martin County farm where she lived. At trial she identified Tim and Roger as these two men. Cynthia's husband Robert Hawkins testified that he talked to two men at the Martin County property in the spring of 1985. At trial he identified Tim and Harding as the men he had seen. Hewitt, Cynthia Hawkins, and Robert Hawkins all viewed photograph arrays and had identified photographs on one or more occasions before trial.

Dr. Loftus would have testified on a number of issues relating to the accuracy of these identifications. Among the propositions discussed in her offer of proof that are arguably beyond the understanding of an average person are: 1) witnesses invariably overestimate the duration of their observation of an individual; 2) a witness' confidence in his identification bears little or no relationship to the accuracy of the identification; 3) memory fades at a geometric rather than an arithmetic rate; 4) "post-event phenomena" may distort or supplant original memory, and memory is easily distorted by leading questions or other manipulations; 5) prior photographic identifications increase the likelihood that later in-person identifications will be erroneous; and 6) social alcohol and marijuana use hinders the ability of an individual to retain information.

The district court entered a written order denying the admissibility of Dr. Loftus' testimony, concluding that:

> [S]uch testimony may be properly excluded where the testimony addresses an issue of which the jury is generally aware. In the present controversy the jury was questioned during voir dire about recall and the ability to identify persons they had seen only briefly, or had not seen for a period of time. Additionally, all of the witnesses who identified defendants were thoroughly cross examined about the reliability of their identification, the length of time they saw the defendant, the conditions under which they saw the defendant, the length of time which elapsed between the witness seeing the defendant and the photos or the defendant in person, the number of times the witness saw the photo arrays, and when the witness was shown the photo array. Thus, the jury was made aware of many of the factors which may effect [sic] perception, retention and recall. * * * Thus, although the jury may not understand the intricacies of perception, recall and retention, the jury is generally aware of the problems with identification.

Government's Br.App. at 7. The district court's focus on what the jury is "generally aware" of could be a finding that Dr. Loftus' testimony would not assist the trier of fact under Rule 702, or it could be considered a finding that her testimony would be unduly confusing or a waste of time under Rule 403.[4] As has been noted, "The Rule 702 analysis * * * incorporates to some extent a consideration of the dangers, particularly the danger of unfair prejudice, enumerated in Fed.R.Evid. 403." United States v. Downing, 753 F.2d 1224, 1242 (3rd Cir.1985). The "helpfulness factor" under Rule 702 involves consideration whether the expert testimony would be misleading or confusing in the context of the trial. See id. at 1237.

[6] Dr. Loftus' testimony may not have been totally unhelpful; as the court noted, most persons do not understand the intricacies of perception, retention, and recall. The district court also apparently had no quarrel with her competency to testify or with the reliability of her scientific testimo-

1. The defendants argue that the district court erred by finding only a "logical relationship" between the conspiracy counts and the perjury counts. It is true that a mere "logical relationship" between counts cannot support the joinder of multiple defendants in a single trial. The district court here, however, specifically noted that "Holland is alleged to have been involved in the conspiracy * * *. It is about this very conspiracy which defendant Holland is alleged to have provided false testimony during the grand jury proceeding." Timothy Curry's Br.App. at 22.

2. The defendants rely on United States v. Grey Bear, 863 F.2d 572 (8th Cir.1988), where an equally divided en banc court affirmed the district court's decision to allow joinder. We believe that the facts in that case (which is without precedential value) are distinguishable in that the government did not allege any conspiracy.

3. Rule 14 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides in pertinent part that:

> If it appears that a defendant or the government is prejudiced by a joinder of offenses or of defendants in an indictment or information or by such joinder for trial together, the court may order an election or separate trials of counts, grant a severance of defendants or provide whatever other relief justice requires.

4. In an oral decision to deny reconsideration of his earlier written order, the district judge explicitly stated that the basis of his ruling was both Rule 702 and Rule 403. Tr. at 2503.

ny.[5] We conclude, however, that the district court's decision to exclude Dr. Loftus' testimony was a proper exercise of its discretion, whether under Rule 702 or Rule 403. The eyewitness testimony was far from the only evidence against the defendants. Indeed, as noted above, the bulk of testimony came from two government witnesses and co-conspirators, Brenton Long and Mary Lynch. The testimony of Joan Hylinski was also important. Although the eyewitness testimony bolstered the government's theory that there was no real Rich Kelly, it can fairly be described as minor and amounted to only one day in a four-week trial. The intrusion of an expert to comment on this minor testimony was not necessary, especially when the record reveals that vigorous cross-examination by the defendants exposed the weakness of the identifications.

In addition, the defendants gave the government only four days' notice of their intent to call Dr. Loftus. The Third Circuit held that it was not an abuse of discretion to exclude expert testimony when only five days' notice of a proposed proffer was given. United States v. Dowling, 855 F.2d 114, 118 (3d Cir.1988), affirmed, 493 U.S. 342, 110 S.Ct. 668, 107 L.Ed.2d 708.

Defendants' reliance on our decision in Krist is misplaced. In Krist, we specifically noted that "in routine cases the trial judge is not required to allow wide-ranging inquiry into the mysteries of human perception and recollection." 897 F.2d at 298. Krist was not a routine case because it involved an individual's recollection of the color of pills she took forty years ago. Our case, on the other hand, is routine—the identifications were not of pills and took place no more than six years after the events in question. Although it is likely that it was within the discretion of the trial court to allow the eyewitness expert testimony here, we decline to hold that the court was required to do so.

C. Sufficiency of the Evidence/Multiple Conspiracy Challenges

[7–13] The defendants challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that each participated in a single, ongoing conspiracy to manufacture and possess with an intent to distribute marijuana. Their challenge is sometimes styled as an allegation that the evidence at trial showed only multiple conspiracies, not a single conspiracy, and that there was therefore a fatal variance between the indictment and proof. In addition, they assert as unlawful the district court's decision not to give a multiple conspiracy instruction.

We initially reject the defendants' argument that the district court was required to give a multiple conspiracy instruction. The defendants cite United States v. Kendall, 665 F.2d 126, 136 (7th Cir.1981), certiorari denied, 455 U.S. 1021, 102 S.Ct. 1719, 72 L.Ed.2d 140, where we stated that "if the possibility of multiple conspiracies exists, the trial judge must so instruct the jury." We have carefully limited this statement in more recent cases. In United States v. Townsend, 924 F.2d 1385, 1410 (1991), we noted that "[t]he failure to give a proposed multiple conspiracy instruction cannot, then, be error unless the defendants demonstrate that they have been prejudiced by the variance itself." Similarly, in United States v. Grier, 866 F.2d 908, 934 (1989), we stated that "[w]hile the district court could properly have instructed the jury on the possibility of multiple conspiracies, it was not required to do so." These cases teach that the lack of a multiple conspiracy instruction is simply one of several factors to be considered when deciding if a defendant has been prejudiced by a variance. Thus the district court did not err by failing to give a multiple conspiracy instruction.

Before examining the sufficiency of the evidence with regard to particular defendants, we briefly delineate some basic principles of conspiracy law. "A conspiracy consists of a combination or confederation between two or more persons formed for the purpose of committing, by their joint efforts, a criminal act." United States v. Mealy, 851 F.2d 890, 895 (7th Cir.1988) (citations omitted). The essence of a conspiracy is an agreement; to join a conspiracy is to join an agreement, not a group. Townsend, 924 F.2d at 1390.

"It is the nature and scope of the agreement that is the determinative factor in distinguishing between single and multiple conspiracies." United States v. Sababu, 891 F.2d 1308, 1322 (7th Cir.1989). Multiple conspiracies exist when there is no agreement toward a common goal, and each conspirator's agreement constitutes an end unto itself. United States v. Paiz, 905 F.2d 1014, 1020 (7th Cir.1990), certiorari denied, — U.S. —, 111 S.Ct. 1319, 113 L.Ed.2d 252. However, it is clear that the participants in a conspiracy need not know all the other members or participate in every aspect of the conspiracy. Id. at 1323. Indeed, the whole point of a conspiracy, and the reason why it is punished separately as a crime, is to enable several persons to cooperate and split duties in order to facilitate the object of the conspiracy. Townsend, 924 F.2d at 1394.

In evaluating a sufficiency of the evidence challenge, we review the evidence in the light most favorable to the government. If any rational jury could have found the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, the conviction will be affirmed. United States v. Burrell, 963 F.2d 976, 987 (7th Cir.1992). We require "substantial evidence that a particular defendant knew of the illegal objective of the conspiracy and agreed to participate in its achievement." Id. Because of the secretive nature of conspiracies, a formal agreement need not be proven. A jury may infer an agreement based solely on circumstantial evidence regarding the relationship of the parties and their overt acts. Mealy, 851 F.2d at 896.

It should be stressed that the conspiracy alleged in this case is not a complex distribution scheme encompassing wholesalers, middlemen, and retailers, nor is it one where persons who are arguably competitors (such as competing retailers) are alleged to be co-conspirators because of occasional cooperation. Instead, this case involves a conspiracy to manufacture and possess with an intent to distribute marijuana. In other words, the common purpose of the defendants in this case is clear—to grow marijuana and make money selling it. Cf. Burrell, 963 F.2d at 989 ("In the instant case, however, it is easier to establish mutual benefit and cooperation because the defendants were acting as a single economic unit—large-scale purchasers of narcotics.").

We reject an argument that the proof at trial showed three separate conspiracies each lasting one year. The defendants point to evidence that certain defendants explicitly agreed to work for one year, and that some defendants were paid for work done in a particular year. Defendants' argument is based on a fundamental misunderstanding of conspiracy law. Parties may join or withdraw from a conspiracy at any time without altering the fundamental nature of the conspiracy. Sababu, 891 F.2d at 1322. Furthermore, the fact that certain parties were paid for a year's work is only of marginal relevance. It would be artificial to divide a conspiracy to grow marijuana into several conspiracies simply because marijuana growing is seasonal in nature. Here, a core group of persons grew marijuana in the same general area over a number of years. A farmer does not start anew his or her farming business every year when the new crops are planted—it is the same farming business as the one initially started.

We now turn to an examination of the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to the government, relating to each defendant (except Holland, who was not convicted on a conspiracy count) in order to determine if it supports a joining of the conspiracy alleged here.

5. Although we make no specific assertion as to its reliability or general acceptance, a number of cases indicate that Dr. Loftus' field of study is now well accepted. See Krist, 897 F.2d at 296–297 (specifically citing work by Loftus); United States v. Moore, 786 F.2d 1308, 1312 (5th Cir. 1986) ("The scientific validity of the studies confirming the many weaknesses of eyewitness identification cannot be seriously questioned at this point."); United States v. Smith, 736 F.2d 1103, 1107 (6th Cir.1984) (suggesting that eyewitness expert testimony is generally accepted), certiorari denied, 469 U.S. 868, 105 S.Ct. 213, 83 L.Ed.2d 143.

1. Timothy S. Curry

Tim makes no specific argument that the evidence is insufficient to support a finding that he joined the conspiracy. Indeed, the evidence strongly suggests that he was the leader of the conspiracy, and the other defendants point to him in this regard. There is no need to recount the numerous facts that support the jury's verdict as to Tim.

2. Samuel T. Harding

[14, 15] Harding states that he "was engaged as an employee of the conspiracy and his agreed duties were limited to tending the marijuana plants and participating in the harvest." Harding Br. at 8. We agree that the record supports this characterization, except for the suggestion that these duties were in any sense limited. Harding is apparently arguing that only "managers," and not "employees," are considered members of a conspiracy. An "employee" of a conspiracy, however, is in fact a participant in the conspiracy, since the employee has agreed to perform certain duties in furtherance of the conspiracy and because the employee materially benefits from the success of the conspiracy.[6]

Harding stresses his role as a "manufacturing employee" because he thinks the evidence cannot support the finding that he agreed to join any conspiracy to distribute marijuana. Count I of the indictment charged a conspiracy "to manufacture, and possess with intent to distribute marijuana, a Schedule I Non–Narcotic Controlled Substance, in a quantity of greater than fifty (50) kilograms." It would seem that manufacturing with the intent to distribute marijuana implies possession with an intent to distribute, since the cultivation of marijuana necessarily encompasses its possession.[7] In any event, Harding was involved not only with the harvesting of the marijuana but also with the drying and cultivating of the marijuana. The record, when read in a light favorable to the government, supports the conclusion that Harding joined the conspiracy and agreed to its underlying goals, which obviously included the distribution of marijuana at a profit.

Harding wisely does not argue that he should not be considered part of the alleged conspiracy because he did not join it until 1985. As has been noted, a party may join a conspiracy at any time during its life span.

3. Roger S. Curry

[16] Roger, an attorney, suggests that he did no more than act as legal counsel to some of the defendants. Roger's hands are literally much dirtier than that. In 1983, he and others planted around 2,000 plants at Leinenbach's farm. He was also involved in harvesting, drying, and packing the marijuana at Leinenbach's farm. In 1985, the evidence indicates that Roger inspected the marijuana plants at Leinenbach's farm, transplanted marijuana plants at the Velpen farmhouse, and harvested the marijuana at the Martin County farm and was prepared to harvest the marijuana at Leinenbach's farm.

This evidence, standing alone, would support the jury's conclusion that he joined the conspiracy alleged. Roger's argument that he only agreed to two smaller, stand-alone conspiracies in 1983 and 1985 has already been rejected. Even if Roger withdrew from the conspiracy in 1984 and rejoined the next year, his conspiracy conviction is sustainable. Although not necessary, the record supports the conclusion that Roger did not withdraw from the conspiracy in 1984. In that year, Roger asked a plumbing contractor to go to the Velpen farm house for a repair estimate. There is also hearsay testimony (the admissibility of which is discussed below) that Roger was involved with the 1984 operation at Leinenbach's farm. In sum, the conspiracy conviction against Roger is supported by substantial evidence.

6. Arguably, a more appropriate distinction is not between employee and manager, but between employee and independent contractor (unlike employees, independent contractors are not considered part of the organization for which they work).

7. It appears that the government crafted the indictment in this manner to avoid a possible statute of limitations problem. Federal criminal charges, unless otherwise specifically provided by law, must be brought within five years after the offense was committed. 18 U.S.C. § 3282. The original indictment here was returned on September 13, 1990, very close to five years from the end of the conspiracy alleged in the indictment (October 31, 1985). There is substantial evidence to support a finding that the 1985 harvest was in process after September 13; it is undisputed, however, that this marijuana was manicured for distribution ("possessed") after that date.

4. Don Jeffrey Leinenbach

[17] The government's case against Leinenbach is arguably the weakest. Leinenbach owned the farm where marijuana was grown in 1983, 1984, and 1985. It is also apparent that he knew of and supported the growing of marijuana on his farm. For example, he harvested the corn on his farm at night at the same time others were harvesting marijuana. He also had a number of conversations with the other defendants in this case that indicated his awareness of the marijuana-growing, including conversations where the best method of harvesting the marijuana was discussed. There is no evidence, however, that he participated in the harvesting, manicuring, or distribution of the marijuana.

We conclude that there is substantial evidence that Leinenbach joined the conspiracy as alleged. The jury was entitled to infer that Leinenbach was compensated for giving up a portion of his land, which could have been used to grow corn, to allow the other defendants to grow marijuana. This is especially true since Leinenbach allowed the marijuana-growing to occur for at least three years. The opposite inference would call for an unusual amount of generosity on Leinenbach's part.

D. Admissibility of Hearsay Evidence/Application of the Bruton Rule

Roger's brief identifies, in a somewhat confusing manner, testimony that he believes is unlawfully admitted hearsay. The other defendants adopt Roger's arguments, but some of them are applicable only to Roger. The discussion below is aimed at Roger but applies to all defendants as necessary. Roger objects to the following testimony:

1. Jeffrey Griffith's Statements

[18, 19] Government informant Griffith testified that Bush told him in 1984 that he (Bush) was working for people who had marijuana for him to sell and also told him that the main person was Roger Curry. Griffith also testified that in 1985 Bush told him that "those guys" were hiding marijuana from him, and that those guys included Roger Curry. The district court allowed this testimony as admissions against penal interest under Federal Rule of Evidence 804(b)(3).[8] Roger does not argue that Bush's statements do not meet the requirements of this rule; rather, he argues that the statements relating to his involvement in the conspiracy should have been redacted or otherwise not allowed in as evidence. In its order, the district court decided that all of Bush's statements could come in, except that under Rule 403 there could be no reference to Roger as the "ringleader." The court also noted that the jury would be instructed that the testimony was admissible only against Bush.

We recently examined the relationship between the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment and Rule 804(b)(3) in some detail in United States v. York, 933 F.2d 1343 (7th Cir.1991), certiorari denied, — U.S. —, 112 S.Ct. 321, 116 L.Ed.2d 262. York was on trial for mail fraud and arson. Two associates of York's partner (who was killed in the fire) testified at trial that she had told them of a plan concocted by York and herself to blow up the business and collect the insurance pro-

8. This rule provides in relevant part that:
A statement which was at the time of its making so far contrary to the declarant's pecuniary or proprietary interest, or so far tended to subject the declarant to civil or criminal liability, or to render invalid a claim by the declarant against another, that a reasonable person in the declarant's position would not have made the statement unless believing it to be true.

ceeds. Id. at 1360. This testimony was allowed in without redaction pursuant to Rule 804(b)(3). Faced with a confrontation clause challenge, we initially stated that the confrontation clause question and the Rule 804(b)(3) question were really one question, not two:

> To be admissible under rule 804(b)(3), then, the inculpatory portion of a statement against interest must be sufficiently reliable to satisfy the confrontation clause. There seems little reason to treat the requirement of reliability differently in each context. Such an approach would be needlessly complex, requiring two bodies of case law where one will do.

Id. at 1361. The decision in Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123, 88 S.Ct. 1620, 20 L.Ed.2d 476, was not considered dispositive, since the ruling in that case rested upon the inadmissibility of the inculpatory confession against the defendant. Id. at 1362. We concluded that there is no need to redact the inculpatory portion of hearsay admitted under Rule 804(b)(3) as long as that portion is closely related to the incriminatory portion of the statement and the other requirements of Rule 804(b)(3) are met. Id. at 1364.

The facts in this case are similar to those in York, and we likewise affirm the district court's decision to allow all portions of Griffith's statement in as evidence. As in York, the statements by Bush to Griffith were not made in an attempt to curry favor with law enforcement officers but were made to an acquaintance. "[T]he advisory committee used that scenario as an example of an inculpatory statement that 'would have no difficulty in qualifying' for admission under 804(b)(3)." Id. at 1363. Because they were sufficiently reliable, Bush's inculpatory statements were admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) and did not violate Roger's rights under the Confrontation Clause.[9]

2. Holland's Grand Jury Testimony

[20] Roger also objects to the reading of Holland's grand jury testimony to the jury, claiming again that his rights under Bruton are implicated.[10] We disagree.

Holland's grand jury testimony was not facially inculpatory of any defendant. Indeed, the intent behind the government's perjury charge was to show that Holland was lying when he denied on numerous occasions Roger's and Tim's involvement in the marijuana manufacturing conspiracy and instead placed the blame on Rich Kelly. Roger points out that Holland admitted before the grand jury that he was friends with Roger and Tim, and that Roger had visited him at the Velpen farm house on up to ten occasions, and that Roger had lent him money. Contrary to Roger's assertions, these statements would not have supported a jury verdict against him. Instead, we agree with the government that "Holland's grand jury testimony did no more than put the government to its proof that Tim, Roger and Long were participants in the conspiracy as charged." Plaintiff's Br. at 26.

Because Holland's grand jury testimony does not directly implicate any other defendant, "the Bruton rule does not come into play." United States v. Briscoe, 896 F.2d 1476, 1501 (7th Cir.1990), certiorari denied, — U.S. —, 111 S.Ct. 173, 112 L.Ed.2d 137. The fact that Roger asked the jury to consider the transcript as to him supports a conclusion that it was not facially incriminatory to him. In addition, any statements that become incriminatory only when linked with other evidence do not fall under the Bruton rule. Id. at 1503. Thus Leinenbach's claim that Holland's statement regarding an "Otwell" farm incriminated him fails because it depends on evidence that Leinenbach was the owner of the Otwell farm.

3. Holland's Post–Conspiracy Statement

[21] Lynch testified that Holland told her after the first indictment came down that the government had made a mistake in indicting one of the people, who had not even lived in Indiana. Roger's Bruton challenge to this testimony, based on the fact that the jury knew he was from Indiana, fails for the same reason as his challenge to Holland's grand jury testimony. Simply put, Holland's statement does not directly incriminate Roger. At best, the statement objected to exculpated one of the defendants who was not from Indiana. But that does not mean that the remaining defendants are thereby incriminated. Since no defendant is specifically mentioned, and it is not obvious that any particular defendant is being singled out as being guilty, Roger's Bruton challenge to this statement is without merit.

4. Admission of Other Hearsay Under Rule 801(d)(2)(E)

[22] In scattershot fashion, Roger argues that a number of statements were erroneously admitted under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(E), which defines as non-hearsay statements made by co-conspirators within the scope of the conspiracy. Under Rule 801(d)(2)(E), "a statement by a coconspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy" is not considered hearsay. To the extent that Roger's argument rests on the proposition that the proof at trial showed multiple conspiracies and not one single conspiracy, it fails for the reasons stated above.

Roger objects to a number of hearsay statements that occurred either before the beginning of the alleged conspiracy or after its end, contending that these statements do not fall within Rule 801(d)(2)(E). It is true that such statements could not be in furtherance of a conspiracy not in existence, and thus were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). However, the statements were not admitted on the basis of that rule. Instead, it is clear that the statements were admitted pursuant to Rule 801(d)(2)(A) as admissions of party opponents.[11]

[23] In general, Roger complains that the limiting instructions regarding Rules 801(d)(2)(A) and 404(b) evidence were incomplete. Specifically, Roger complains that no contemporaneous limiting instructions were given regarding evidence of 1982, 1987, and 1988 marijuana-cultivating endeavors. The comments by the district judge at trial regarding this evidence were somewhat confusing, and failed to distinguish clearly between Rule 801(d)(2)(E) statements applicable to all defendants and Rule 801(d)(2)(A) statements applicable only to the person making the statement. For example, the district court stated at one point:

> [If] the witness says that one of the defendants told them something, it only applies to that particular defendant and it doesn't implicate the rest of them. These eight people here are separate * * * and if that defendant makes a statement or allegedly makes a statement and a witness testifies, you can only consider that evidence to that particular defendant and none other, unless it implicates another defendant. You can judge it based upon what they testify to and don't take that and use it to try to implicate the rest of the defendants.

Tr. at 1392. The phrase "unless it implicates another defendant" seems to contradict the rest of the instruction and caused 9. We decline Roger's invitation to overrule York, based on his reading of Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805, 110 S.Ct. 3139, 111 L.Ed.2d 638; Vincent v. Parke, 942 F.2d 989 (6th Cir.1991); and United States v. Gomez–Lemos, 939 F.2d 326 (6th Cir.1991). Our decision in York is not inconsistent with Wright, which indeed was discussed in York. The Sixth Circuit cases are clearly distinguishable, in that one involved inculpatory statements made to a police officer and the other involved Rule 804(b)(5), not Rule 804(b)(3).

Griffith violated the court's order against referring to Roger as the ringleader when he testified that Bush told him that Roger was the "main person." The district court did not abuse its discretion when it denied Roger's motion for a mistrial and instead cautioned the jury that the statements of Bush may only be held against him and not any of the other defendants.

10. The district court instructed the jury to consider the grand jury testimony only against Holland. At Roger's request, the jury was instructed to consider it with respect to his case also. It was not to be considered against or for any other defendant.

11. One hearsay statement objected to by Roger related to concealment activity begun while the conspiracy was still on-going and was thus admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). United States v. Doerr, 886 F.2d 944, 951 (7th Cir.1989).

Roger's counsel at trial to object again (the nature of the objection is not on the record, but this is the only part of the instruction not favorable to the defendants). A similar confusing contemporaneous instruction is in the record.

We conclude that any erroneous comments to the jury do not warrant reversal of the convictions. Detailed testimony by Lynch and Long spelled out the involvement of the various defendants in the conspiracy, the existence of which is corroborated by substantial physical evidence. In addition, the final instructions given to the jury lessen the impact of any error here. Instruction Number 34 stated that:

> You have heard evidence of acts alleged against several defendants other than those acts alleged in the indictment. You may consider this evidence only on the question of intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, absence of mistake, or accident. This evidence is to be considered by you only for these limited purposes, and only as to the defendants against whom it was offered.

Instruction Number 44 contains similar language. The judge recognized that his extemporaneous comments were not particularly helpful, and specifically told the jury on several occasions that they would be receiving final instructions in which matters would be clarified. Viewing the record as a whole, therefore, we conclude that the district court committed no reversible error.

E. Leinenbach—Statute of Limitations

[24] Leinenbach argues that he should have been dismissed from the case because there is no evidence to support a finding that he committed an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy after September 13, 1985, and therefore the five-year statute of limitations was not satisfied as to him (see supra note 7). Leinenbach misstates the law. The government is not required to prove any overt acts with regard to a particular defendant within the limitations period; instead, the government is required to prove that the conspiracy existed into the limitations period and that the defendants did not withdraw before that period. United States v. Read, 658 F.2d 1225, 1232–1233 (7th Cir.1981). Leinenbach has not met his initial burden to produce some evidence of withdrawal, id. at 1234, and therefore no error has been committed.[12]

F. Arguments Raised by Holland

1. Conviction

[25] Holland raises two specific objections to his conviction. He first contends that the district court was required, under the Due Process clause in the Constitution, to inquire specifically whether he was knowingly and intelligently waiving his right to testify at trial. We have rejected this identical claim on numerous occasions. See, e.g., United States v. Brimberry, 961 F.2d 1286, 1289–1290 (1992); United States v. Thompson, 944 F.2d 1331, 1345 (1991), certiorari denied, — U.S. —, 112 S.Ct. 1177, 117 L.Ed.2d 422. Holland does not give a persuasive reason for overruling these cases. Holland also claims error in that the second superseding indictment, returned less than a week before trial, changed certain dates relevant to him from 1984 to 1983. Holland does not rebut the government's assertion that these were clerical errors of which Holland should have been aware, and does not explain why he was prejudiced by the amendment. Therefore his claim of error is without merit.

2. Sentence

[26, 27] Holland also raises a number of issues regarding his sentence, which was calculated in accordance with the Sentencing Guidelines. He first argues that the district court erred by denying him a two-point reduction for acceptance of responsibility under Guidelines Section 3E1.1. Holland suggests that Judge Brooks did not properly exercise his discretion but rather "reject[ed] his plea out of hand" (Holland's Br. at 10). The record rebuts this contention. Judge Brooks accepted and evaluated both written and oral statements from Holland. The judge made specific findings that Holland did not voluntarily withdraw from his criminal activities in a timely fashion; he did not provide voluntary assistance to officials; and he stated that he felt "pressured." Holland's App. at 57–58. Holland's brief on appeal states that "it cannot be said with certainty that Mr. Holland is entitled to a reduction" (Holland's Br. at 10). Yet it is only when it can be said with certainty that acceptance of responsibility has been shown that reversal of a district court's denial is warranted. Judge Brooks' findings are not "without foundation," see United States v. Delgado, 936 F.2d 303, 308 (7th Cir.1991), certiorari denied, — U.S. —, 112 S.Ct. 972, 117 L.Ed.2d 137; § 3E1.1, app. note 5, and we therefore affirm the district court's decision to deny Holland credit for acceptance of responsibility.[13]

Holland also argues that his due process rights were violated because the judge made a finding regarding the number of plants involved in the conspiracy under a preponderance of evidence standard, rather than submitting the question to the jury under a reasonable doubt standard. This Court has rejected this claim, however, United States v. McNeese, 901 F.2d 585, 605 (1990); United States v. Reynolds, 900 F.2d 1000, 1003–1004 (1990), and we decline to revisit the question at this time, especially since Holland did not raise this issue in the district court.[14]

[28] Finally, Holland claims that he was illegally sentenced as an accessory after the fact under Sections 2J1.3(c)(1) and 2X3.1 of the Guidelines, because as a principal in the marijuana-growing conspiracy he could not also be sentenced as an accessory. United States v. Huppert, 917 F.2d 507 (11th Cir.1990), is cited as authority for this proposition. Huppert was convicted of two counts of obstructing justice in connection with the investigation of a money-laundering scheme in which he was engaged, and was sentenced pursuant to Section 2J1.2(c)(1), which like Section 2J1.3(c)(1) contains a cross-reference to Section 2X3.1. The court concluded that Huppert could not be sentenced as an accessory after the fact because he was protecting himself, not others, and it was clear that he was a principal in the money-laundering scheme. Id. at 510–511. See also United States v. Pierson, 946 F.2d 1044 (4th Cir. 1991) (affirming district court's decision not to apply Section 2X3.1 where defendant was convicted of perjury but acquitted of the substantive underlying offense; defendant obviously perjured to protect himself). Holland's case is different than Huppert and Pierson, because he was clearly trying to protect others, and not himself—he was immunized for his testimony, and thus had no reason to protect himself. We conclude that the analysis in those cases has no relevance here.[15]

G. Non-Guidelines Sentencing Objections

The other defendants received non-guideline sentences, since the conspiracy of 12. Similarly, application of 21 U.S.C. § 853, which was enacted on October 12, 1984, to Leinenbach does not create any ex post facto concerns because there is no evidence that he withdrew from the conspiracy before that date.

13. Holland's sentence was also enhanced for obstruction of justice under Section 3C1.1, because of his attempt to mold Lynch's testimony to be consistent with his grand jury testimony. Holland argues that "he merely attempted to determine the extent of her knowledge in the conspiracy and what information would be expected to be contained in her testimony." It was appropriate for the judge to reject this spin on the facts.

Application note 4 of Section 3E1.1 states that application of the obstruction of justice section "ordinarily indicates that the defendant has not accepted responsibility for his criminal conduct. There may, however, be extraordinary cases in which adjustments under both §§ 3C1.1 and 3E1.1 apply." There is nothing exceptional from Holland's case supporting the district court's decision to deny him credit for acceptance of responsibility.

14. In the case relied upon by Holland, United States v. Rigsby, 943 F.2d 631 (6th Cir.1991), certiorari denied, — U.S. —, 112 S.Ct. 1269, 117 L.Ed.2d 496, the court followed its own precedent and declined to hold that the jury must pass on the question of the number of plants involved in the narcotics conviction, although it expressed dissatisfaction with having to reach that result.

15. Holland does not raise on appeal the issue whether it was proper to sentence him as an accessory after the fact for an offense for which he had received immunity against his will, an issue he argued at sentencing.

which they were convicted ended in October 1985, before the adoption of the Guidelines. Roger and Harding raise issues regarding their sentences. Because neither claims that the sentences imposed were outside the statutory limit, the sentences will not be vacated "unless the sentencing judge relied upon improper considerations or unreliable information in exercising his discretion or failed to exercise any discretion at all in imposing the sentence." Briscoe, 896 F.2d at 1519. We now examine their claims of error.

1. Roger Curry

[29, 30] Roger was sentenced to 10 years under Count I, 10 years under Count III, to be served consecutively, and a special parole term of three years.[16] He argues that the court relied on "inaccurate information and erroneous assumptions" in deciding a proper sentence. We have carefully reviewed the record and conclude that the supposed errors are either taken out of context or were clearly not the basis for the court's ruling. For example, Roger argues that there is no evidence that he had a "special skill" which was used in connection with the purchase of the Velpen property. However, the district court specifically stated that "I don't think it would fit under special skills. I am not going to consider that in the sentencing in this matter." Roger's App. at 25. Other comments by the judge that may have been erroneous were in fact made in a question-and-answer fashion, and were not in the nature of findings.

Roger also contends that the district court "improperly" exercised its discretion for failing to consider mitigating factors, giving him consecutive sentences, blindly accepting government testimony, and handing out grossly disparate sentences for the various defendants. These arguments are without merit. First, Judge Brooks considered as a mitigating factor a number of letters he received from Roger's clients, and also noted that he was a skilled and hard-working attorney. Roger notes on appeal that he had no prior record, had the possibility of rehabilitation, showed remorse, and supported a wife and two children. However, there is no indication that the judge did not read the presentence report or consider these factors. We cannot hold that a district court erred simply because it did not mention every mitigating factor listed in the report, especially when they were not mentioned by Roger or his counsel at sentencing. It was also permissible for the district court to hand down consecutive sentences for Counts I and III. United States v. Cerro, 775 F.2d 908, 910 (7th Cir.1985). Finally, we find that the judge adequately supported the different sentences the various defendants received; indeed, we find the judge's version of the equities more plausible than Roger's proffered version.[17] In summary, the district court did not abuse its discretion in sentencing Roger.[18]

Finally, Roger argues that the district court failed to comply with Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 32(c)(3)(D), which states that:

> If the comments of the defendant and the defendant's counsel or testimony or other information introduced by them allege any factual inaccuracy in the presentence investigation report * * *, the court shall, as to each matter controverted, make (i) a finding as to the allegation, or (ii) a determination that no such finding is necessary because the matter controverted will not be taken into account in sentencing.

Roger points to three alleged Rule 32 errors. The first related to an allegation of Roger's special skills, which, as noted above, the district court specifically found would not be considered in sentencing. Apparently Roger's argument is that the allegation of special skills has not been totally expunged from his presentence report, as the district court ordered. Since it has offered to ensure that the corrections have been made, we direct the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana to do so. Roger's second argument relates to a statement in the presentence report that he obstructed justice by filing a lawsuit against a government witness. Again, the district court agreed with the substance of Roger's criticisms, and held that the characterization of Roger's lawsuit as an "obstruction of justice" was not a "fact" but a legal conclusion, and ordered Roger's interpretation of the suit to be included in the presentence report. Finally, with regard to the pounds of marijuana involved, the district court indicated that it would not consider that information in its sentencing decision, in accordance with part (ii) of Rule 32(c)(3)(D).

2. Samuel T. Harding

Harding was sentenced to consecutive 6-year terms under Counts I and III, with a special parole term of three years with regard to Count III. Harding's arguments about the propriety of his sentence are not materially different than Roger's arguments, and fail for the reasons noted above. It should be noted that his attempt to compare his sentence to Lynch's, who entered into a plea agreement, is without merit, because her plea was conditioned on the express promise that her sentence not exceed three years.

III.

For the foregoing reasons, the convictions and sentences of all defendants are affirmed.

16. He was also sentenced to serve three years for his income tax violations, to be served concurrently with his 20-year sentence under Counts I and III, after pleading guilty to severed Counts VII and VIII.

17. To cite one example, Roger states that Harding was equally culpable with himself even though Roger was involved for three years and Harding was involved only in 1985.

18. Roger also argues that Holland's guideline sentence was improper, and that his sentence was improperly compared to Holland's. Holland's sentence was affirmed above, so this argument has no merit. Roger argues that Holland's sentence was invalid because the sentencing court used the number of plants as opposed to the dry weight of the marijuana in arriving at Holland's base offense level. Even assuming Roger has standing to make this argument (which was not advanced by Holland), it fails on the merits. United States v. Haynes, 969 F.2d 569 (7th Cir.1992).

Ninth Circuit.

Argued and Submitted March 11, 1993.

Decided Oct. 18, 1993.

Taxpayer sued for refund of federal income taxes paid after Internal Revenue Service (IRS) disallowed business expense deduction based upon taxpayer's payment of settlement monies with respect to civil antitrust claims. The United States District Court for the Northern District of California, Fern M. Smith, J., entered judgment in favor of government. Taxpayer appealed. The Court of Appeals, Cynthia Holcomb Hall, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) civil and criminal antitrust actions against taxpayer concerned same antitrust violation so that civil settlement could not be deducted from taxpayer's income as business expense, and (2) conspiracy to which taxpayer admitted by his nolo contendere plea was continuing conspiracy coextensive in time with conspiracy alleged in civil actions, and thus, five-year statutory period for criminal prosecution did not commence until conspiracy's end.

Affirmed.

1. Internal Revenue ⇐3358

Civil and criminal antitrust actions against taxpayer concerned same antitrust violation, and thus, civil settlement amount could not be deducted from taxpayer's income as business expense, where taxpayer pled nolo contendere in criminal case to single, continuing conspiracy which occurred during time period coextensive with conspiracy alleged in civil suits. Sherman Anti-Trust Act, §§ 1, 2, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1, 2; 26 U.S.C.A. § 162(g).

2. Criminal Law ⇐150

Antitrust conspiracy to which taxpayer admitted by his nolo contendere plea was continuing conspiracy coextensive in time with conspiracy alleged in civil antitrust actions, and thus, five-year statutory period for bringing criminal prosecutions against taxpayer did not commence until conspiracy's end. Sherman Anti-Trust Act, §§ 1, 2, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1, 2; 18 U.S.C.A. § 3282.

3. Criminal Law ⇐150

As long as some part of antitrust conspiracy continued into five-year period preceding indictment, five-year statute of limitations for bringing criminal prosecution did not insulate taxpayer from criminal liability for actions taken more than five years prior to time of indictment. 18 U.S.C.A. § 3282.

4. Conspiracy ⇐24.15

Although five-year statute of limitations for criminal prosecutions for noncapital offense limits how much time government has to indict alleged violator once conspiracy is complete, it does not limit temporal scope of conspiracy for which violator is liable. 18 U.S.C.A. § 3282.

5. Internal Revenue ⇐3358

Civil and criminal antitrust actions against taxpayer concerned same antitrust violations so that civil settlement could not be deducted from taxpayer's net income as business expense, even though civil suits alleged violations of several, distinguishable antitrust provisions while criminal indictment charged violation of § 1 of Sherman Act, where same conduct affecting single product market was alleged to violate different statutes, civil plaintiffs suffered single antitrust harm, and there was no practical method of tracing amount of settlement payment attributable to each alleged offense. 26 U.S.C. § 162(g); Sherman Anti-Trust Act, §§ 1, 2, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1, 2.

CYNTHIA HOLCOMB HALL, Circuit Judge:

The Flintkote Company ("Flintkote") appeals from the district court's judgment in favor of the government following cross-motions for summary judgment in this action for refund of federal income taxes plus interest paid by Flintkote for the years 1970–73. Flintkote contests the Internal Revenue Service's ("IRS") partial disallowance of Flintkote's deduction of $3.5 million paid to settle a large number of civil antitrust treble damage actions. The parties to this action dispute whether, within the meaning of 26 U.S.C. § 162(g), the civil suits involved the same violation as was charged in a subsequent criminal indictment against Flintkote.

The district court had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1346(a)(1), and this court has jurisdiction of this timely appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291. We affirm.

1. The actual text of section 162(g) relevant to this action provides:

> If in a criminal proceeding a taxpayer is convicted of a violation of the antitrust laws, or his plea of guilty or nolo contendere to an indictment or information charging such a violation is entered or accepted in such a proceeding, no deduction shall be allowed under subsection (a) for two-thirds of any amount paid or incurred—
> (2) in settlement of any action brought under [section 4 of the Clayton Act] on account of such violation or related violation.

I.

In 1973, Flintkote agreed to settle a large number of civil antitrust treble damage actions brought in the late 1960s against it and other manufacturers of gypsum wallboard. Flintkote paid $3.5 million as its share of the settlement payment, and then deducted that amount from its federal income taxes as a business expense. Relying on 26 U.S.C. § 162(g), the IRS disallowed $ 2,013,809 of that deduction. The disallowance was based on the fact that a month after the civil settlement became final, a grand jury in Pennsylvania handed down a criminal indictment against Flintkote which raised factual allegations essentially identical to those in the civil complaints. Flintkote pled nolo contendere to the indictment. In this action, Flintkote contests the disallowance.

This case requires us to interpret section 162(g), which provides that a taxpayer who is convicted of a criminal antitrust violation (or who pleads guilty or nolo contendere to an indictment charging such) may not deduct two-thirds of any civil antitrust damages or settlement monies paid on account of "such violation or any related violation." [1] This provision is an exception to the general rule that damages or settlement payments are deductible as business expenses.

II.

We review the district court's grant of summary judgment de novo. Maisano v. U.S., 908 F.2d 408, 409 (9th Cir.1990). Summary judgment is appropriate where there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Id.

26 U.S.C. § 162(g).

Only two reported cases interpret section 162(g); neither answers the question presented in this appeal. See Federal Paper Board Co., Inc. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 90 T.C. 1011, 1988 WL 46843 (1988), and Fisher Companies, Inc. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 84 T.C. 1319, 1985 WL 15365 (1985), aff'd mem., 806 F.2d 263 (9th Cir.1986).

III.

The question we consider is whether the IRS properly disallowed under section 162(g) Flintkote's deduction for money paid to settle civil antitrust actions on the ground that the settlement concerned the same violation to which Flintkote pled nolo contendere in a criminal antitrust action.[2]

Flintkote advances two principal arguments to support its assertion that the civil antitrust actions and the criminal indictment did not concern the same violations. Flintkote first contends that because the statute of limitations for criminal antitrust actions is five years,[3] Flintkote's conviction on the criminal indictment only concerned conduct within the five-year period preceding the 1973 return of the indictment. Thus, for purposes of calculating the disallowance, the settlement payment, which released Flintkote of liability for alleged conspiratorial conduct lasting from the late 1950s until 1973, should be apportioned between the five-year statutory period (1968–1973) and the years prior to that.[4] Flintkote asks this court to hold that a deduction should be allowed for the portion of the settlement payment attributable to the prior years. Essentially, Flintkote argues that because it was not criminally liable for conduct beyond the five-year statutory period, it was not convicted of any violation occurring in the years before 1968 and thus the pre–1968 violations on which the civil settlement was based were not the same as any criminal violation.

Flintkote's second argument is that because the civil suits alleged violations of several separate antitrust laws, including section 1 of the Sherman Act, and the criminal indictment charged only a violation of section 1, a portion of the settlement payment should be allocated to violations other than of section 1 and a deduction permitted for that portion. In other words, Flintkote asserts that section 162(g) should not apply to the portion of the settlement payment attributable to violations of statutory provisions not alleged in the criminal indictment.

A. Were the violations not the same because they involved different time periods?

[1] The district court found that the indictment charged misconduct occurring during the same time period as that alleged in the civil cases. The court found further that by pleading nolo contendere to the indictment, Flintkote admitted every essential element of the offense pleaded in the indictment, including the allegation that the conspiracy extended back to the early 1960s.[5]

2. Section 162(g) permits disallowance on settlement monies paid on either the same or related violations. A "related" violation within the meaning of this section is governed by Treasury Regulation 1.162–22(c) (stating that a violation of the Federal antitrust laws is related to a subsequent violation if 1) with respect to the subsequent violation the United States obtains both a judgment in a criminal proceeding and an injunction against the taxpayer, and 2) the taxpayer's actions which constituted the prior violation would have contravened such injunction if such injunction were applicable at the time of the prior violation). Under this specific definition, both parties agree that the settlement clearly arose out of violations that were not "related" to the violation charged against Flintkote in the subsequent criminal indictment. Thus, the question presented is whether the settlement was on account of the same violation—i.e. "such violation"—as that charged in the criminal indictment.

3. 18 U.S.C. § 3282, which applies here, provides: "Except as otherwise expressly provided by law, no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense, not capital, unless the indictment is found or the information is instituted within five years next after such offense shall have been committed."

4. In Flintkote's opening brief, it argued that the settlement only covered conduct continuing up until 1968, and that the time periods covered by the criminal indictment and by the civil settlement were therefore completely distinct. In Flintkote's reply brief, however, it acknowledged in a footnote that "pursuant to the settlement agreement, the antitrust plaintiffs released all claims they had against Flintkote up to July 1, 1973, the date of that agreement." Flintkote conceded that section 162(g) thus applies to the settlement payment to the extent that it is attributable to violations within the five-year period preceding the indictment. The question remains, however, whether the indictment actually covered the entire alleged conspiracy or just conduct from 1968 to 1973.

5. Specifically, the indictment stated in the section titled "Offense Charged" that the antitrust conspiracy counted "beginning sometime prior to or to 1960 and continuing thereafter at least until sometime in 1973." In the section titled "Jurisdiction and Venue" the indictment stated that the "aforesaid combination and conspiracy was carried out . . . within five years next preceding the return of this indictment."

Noting that the criminal antitrust laws have a five-year limitations period, the court concluded that Flintkote's present troubles are traceable to its own mistake in failing to limit the scope of its nolo contendere plea to its post–1968 activities. The court found that Flintkote had "ample opportunity, in 1973, to consider the tax consequences of its plea and adjust its plea accordingly," but instead chose not to contest the allegations in the indictment. The district court held that by not raising the affirmative defense of statute of limitations when entering its plea, Flintkote waived that defense for future proceedings.

The district court correctly determined that the violations alleged in the civil suits and charged in the criminal indictment were the same, but erred in focussing on the question of waiver in reaching that result. Flintkote is not arguing after the fact that prosecution was barred by the statute of limitations—that is, Flintkote is not trying to raise in this action a limitations defense to the form of indictment or the conviction. Moreover, as discussed below, Flintkote never had a statute of limitations defense to begin with, thus no affirmative defense existed for it to raise or waive at the plea hearing. The question here is not whether Flintkote can now limit its conviction by invoking the statute of limitations. Rather, Flintkote raises the question of what the scope of its conviction was in the first place. We can answer this question without considering waiver doctrine.

[2] Flintkote argues that by pleading nolo contendere it only admitted allegations of conduct within the five years preceding the return of the indictment, because under the statute of limitations that is the only time period for which it could possibly have been criminally liable. See United States v. Heller, 579 F.2d 990, 998 (6th Cir.1978) (by plea of nolo contendere appellant admitted every essential element of the offense well pleaded in indictment). Flintkote's argument fails because the conspiracy to which it admitted by its plea was a continuing conspiracy (co-extensive in time with the conspiracy alleged in the civil actions),[6] and therefore the five-year statutory period did not commence until the conspiracy's end.

[3, 4] As long as some part of the conspiracy continued into the five-year period preceding the indictment, the statute of limitations did not insulate Flintkote from criminal liability for actions taken more than 5 years prior to the time of indictment. See United States v. Dynalectric Co., 859 F.2d 1559, 1563–65 (11th Cir.1988), cert. denied, 490 U.S. 1006, 109 S.Ct. 1641, 104 L.Ed.2d 157 (1989); United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 600 F.2d 414, 417–18 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 884, 100 S.Ct. 175, 62 L.Ed.2d 114 (1979); United States v. Walker, 653 F.2d 1343, 1347 (9th Cir.1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 908, 102 S.Ct. 1253, 71 L.Ed.2d 446 (1982); United States v. Inryco, Inc., 642 F.2d 290, 293 (9th Cir.1981), cert. dismissed, 454 U.S. 1167, 102 S.Ct. 1045, 71 L.Ed.2d 324 (1982). In other words, although the statute limits how much time the government has to indict an alleged violator once a conspiracy is complete, it does not limit the temporal scope of a conspiracy for which a violator is liable. See United States v. All Star Industries, 962 F.2d 465, 476–77 (5th Cir.) (statute of limitations does not limit antitrust defendants' liability for restitution to losses occurring within five years preceding indictment; defendants ordered to pay restitution for losses from entire conspiracy), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 113 S.Ct. 377, 121 L.Ed.2d 288 (1992).

Because Flintkote pled nolo contendere to a single, continuing conspiracy which occurred during a time period co-extensive with the conspiracy alleged in the civil suits, we conclude that the civil and criminal actions

6. As the government points out, the Supreme Court held in United States v. Kissel, 218 U.S. 601, 607–08, 31 S.Ct. 124, 125–26, 54 L.Ed. 1168 (1910), that a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act is a single event that has "continuance in time," and is not a "cinematographic series of against Flintkote concerned the same antitrust violation.

B. Were the violations not the same because they involved different antitrust laws?

[5, 6] Flintkote asserts that the civil suits alleged violations of several separate, distinguishable antitrust provisions,[7] while the criminal indictment only charged a violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act. Flintkote accurately notes that offenses under section 1 and section 2 of the Sherman Act are legally distinct even though they may overlap. See American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 788, 66 S.Ct. 1125, 1128, 90 L.Ed. 1575 (1946) (section 1 and section 2 are separate statutory offenses and "require proof of conspiracies which are reciprocally distinguishable from and independent of each other although the objects of the conspiracies may partially overlap"); United States v. Socony–Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 226 n. 59, 60 S.Ct. 811, 846 n. 59, 84 L.Ed. 1129 (1940) ("the crime under § 1 is legally distinct from that under § 2 . . . though the two sections overlap in the sense that a monopoly under § 2 is a species of restraint of trade under § 1"). The government argues in response that though the various antitrust laws are separately punishable, they overlap significantly, and conduct that violates section 1 of the Sherman Act can violate other provisions as well.

Because the civil suits alleged separate violations of the antitrust laws, Flintkote's argument that section 162(g) should be applied only to the portion of the settlement payment attributable to a violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act has some surface appeal. However, Flintkote has not suggested any method by which the settlement payment could be apportioned. Flintkote cites Federal Paper Board, 90 T.C. at 1011, 1988 WL 46843, for the proposition that the settlement payment should be allocated among the various alleged statutory violations, but the differences between that case and this one highlight the problem inherent in Flintkote's position.

In Federal Paper Board, the company was indicted for antitrust violations involving price-fixing in the market for folding cartons and settled civil litigation in which it was alleged to have conspired to fix prices of both folding cartons and milk cartons. The Tax Court determined that the violation giving rise to the criminal action was not the same in all material respects as that giving rise to the civil actions. The court therefore allocated the company's settlement payment between milk carton claims and folding carton claims, based on the aggregate sales by all the settling defendants to the settling plaintiffs in the civil class action. The court held that section 162(g) applied only to the portion of the payment allocable to the folding carton claims.

In the circumstances of Federal Paper Board, the antitrust harms to the folding carton and milk carton markets were distinct, and by comparing sales and purchases in each market, the court could readily ascertain an actual proportion to use in allocating the settlement payment. Federal Paper Board's misconduct in each of the different product markets was, in effect, different misconduct, even though the civil plaintiffs alleged a single conspiracy. In Flintkote's situation, however, the same conduct affecting a single product market was alleged to violate different statutes. Though the civil plaintiffs alleged separate offenses, they suffered a single antitrust harm. Thus, we see no practical method of tracing the amount of the settlement payment attributable to each alleged offense. Moreover, the various claims in the civil case were, essentially, different ways of characterizing the results of a single set of core activities in which the conspirators engaged. We see no legal justification for allocating the damages even if an allocation could somehow be approximated.

We conclude that even though the civil actions alleged violations of antitrust laws in addition to section 1 of the Sherman Act, those actions alleged a single conspiracy arising from a single set of facts—the same conspiracy and facts which formed the basis of the criminal indictment. Flintkote has presented no basis for determining that the civil actions and criminal indictment involved different violations.

IV.

We hold that the IRS properly disallowed Flintkote's deduction for money paid to settle civil antitrust actions on the ground that the settlement concerned the same violation to which Flintkote pled nolo contendere in a criminal antitrust action. The violations alleged in the civil suits and charged in the criminal indictment resulted from the same continuing conspiracy, and therefore did not involve different time periods. In addition, the civil and criminal violations were the same because both involved section 1 of the Sherman Act, and because the additional statutory offenses alleged in the civil actions are not practicably separable from the section 1 offense.

AFFIRMED.

7. Flintkote states that "[a]lthough the civil complaints claimed a violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act, many of them also alleged claims of monopolization and attempts to monopolize in violation of section 2 of the Sherman Act, restrictive dealing arrangements in violation of section 3 of the Clayton Act, and price discrimination in violation of the Robinson–Patman Act." Id. at 607, 31 S.Ct. at 125.

Charles H. HENDERSON, Petitioner,

v.

FEDERAL AVIATION ADMINISTRATION; National Transportation Safety Board, Respondents.

No. 91-70511.

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit.

Argued and Submitted March 3, 1993.

Decided Oct. 18, 1993.

Helicopter pilot sought review of suspension of license by National Transportation Safety Board. The Court of Appeals, Poole, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) aerial photography exception to Part 135 regulations was applicable even though, after flight commenced, pilot learned that passengers desired a landing as well as the opportunity to take photographs; (2) evidence sustained finding that pilot operated helicopter below minimum safe altitude, regardless of the likelihood of a power unit failure; and (3) evidence sustained finding that pilot did not use reasonable judgment in flying the helicopter very low at a slow speed over congested area.

Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

1. Aviation ⇐35

Court's review of National Transportation Safety Board's decisions is narrow and court will uphold them unless they are arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or not otherwise in accordance with the law; NTSB factual findings are conclusive when support by substantial evidence in the record, but purely legal questions are reviewed de novo.

2. Aviation ⇐33

If pilot knows, prior to departure, that passengers desire landing in addition to aerial photography, flight is not exempt from Part 135 regulations governing altitude for helicopters in congested areas but, where pilot hired for aerial photography finds out only in the air that the passengers desire landing, the aerial photography exception applies.

3. Aviation ⇐33

When plans for landing in addition to aerial photography are unknown to helicopter pilot before departure, pilot is exempt from Part 135 regulations governing altitude no matter when during the flight the pilot learns of the plans to land.

4. Aviation ⇐33

Fact that news photographers told pilot that they did not need to have door removed from helicopter and that they would shoot through the window did not show that helicopter pilot knew before departure that photographers would desire a landing in addition to aerial photography so as to prevent appliing a lower rate to customers who would not otherwise be steam heat customers was rationally related to the legitimate goal of ensuring the economic viability of the steam loop.

[7] Besides helping ensure the survival of the steam loop, the classification was also rationally related to another legitimate governmental purpose: promoting the loop's efficiency. Customers who have on-premises boilers have the ability to provide their own heat without using the steam loop. For this reason, the interruptible rate service agreements, unlike the standard rate agreements, contained a provision granting Bi–State the right to terminate steam service for any reason on ten days' notice. This provision allowed Bi–State to continue to attract new customers while retaining the ability to ration steam in the event of a shortage; during periods where steam usage is extremely high, for example, Bi–State can satisfy the needs of standard rate customers by terminating service to interruptible rate customers. We need not speculate, as BLF would have us do, about whether there will ever be such a shortage of steam heat. The salient point is that Bi–State could have believed that offering a lower rate to customers with boilers in exchange for the right to interrupt service at will would encourage supply to meet demand while at the same time ensuring necessary flexibility in the system. Thus, interruptible rate customers received a lower rate for two good reasons: they would not have become Bi–State's customers otherwise at a time when the steam loop needed new customers to survive and, unlike the standard rate customers, they could tolerate service interruptions in the event of an emergency. For this reason, the classification is immunized from BLF's equal protection challenge.

BLF's final claim is that Bi–State and Thermal arbitrarily applied the interruptible rate. It argues that Thermal amended the interruptible rate service agreements of "certain customers" by eliminating the provision granting Bi–State and Thermal authority to terminate service on ten days' notice. Appellant's Br. at 15. Under the amended agreements, these customers retained the immediate right to become standard rate customers in the event of a steam shortage, eliminating the possibility of a service disruption. The only customers who BLF claims received such favorable treatment, however, were interruptible rate customers in the first place. If BLF is arguing that it was treated differently to the extent Thermal did not offer it an amended interruptible rate agreement, we reject such a claim because BLF did not qualify for the interruptible rate and thus is not similarly situated to those customers who negotiated amended agreements. See E & T Realty v. Strickland, 830 F.2d 1107, 1109 (11th Cir.1987) (explaining that "[d]ifferent treatment of dissimilarly situated persons does not violate the equal protection clause"), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 961, 108 S.Ct. 1225, 99 L.Ed.2d 425 (1988).

Alternatively, BLF could be arguing that the amended agreements undermine the efficiency rationale behind the dual rate system. As to customers with amended interruptible rate service agreements, Bi–State cannot terminate their service selectively in the event the steam loop is overextended because they may elect to become standard rate customers and continue service. Thus, BLF asserts, these customers did not receive a lower rate in exchange for Bi–State's right to interrupt service at will; rather, they impermissibly received a lower rate than standard rate customers whose service contracts were functionally identical.

[8] We have already explained, however, that the Constitution does not prohibit the government from charging different rates for the same service if there is a rational basis for doing so. Even absent the contract provision allowing service interruption at the discretion of Bi–State, a rational basis existed for offering the lower rate to these customers: the need to attract new customers and preserve the steam loop. If anyone has a right to complain about the amended agreements, it is the similarly situated interruptible rate customers who are still subject to service termination on ten days' notice. That several interruptible rate customers had contracts eliminating the risk of service interruption, however, does not render Bi–State's application of the dual rate system arbitrary or irrational as to BLF. Cf. Mahone v. Addicks Util. Dist. of Harris County, 836 F.2d 921, 932–33 (5th Cir.1988) (applying rationality test to claim that government selectively imposed additional requirements on some applicants seeking land annexation).

[9] At bottom, BLF's claim is that it had a right to the same rate for steam heat as customers with gas-fired boilers. The Constitution accords it no such right. Under rational basis review, the government has wide latitude to distinguish between different groups to further legitimate interests. Here, Bi–State and Thermal could have believed that distinguishing between steam customers who had gas-fired boilers and those who did not would allow the steam loop to survive for the refuse-to-energy plan and to function efficiently. Whether or not these objectives actually motivated defendants to develop the dual rate system, we cannot say that the classification was irrational on its face or that Bi–State and Thermal applied it arbitrarily as to BLF. Thus, we hold that defendants are entitled to summary judgment on BLF's equal protection claim.

B. Attorney's Fees

Bi–State and Thermal claim that they are entitled to attorney's fees under 42 U.S.C. § 1988. Under § 1988, "the court, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party [in a § 1983 action], other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee as part of the costs." 42 U.S.C. § 1988(b). To the extent defendants request attorney's fees for services performed in connection with the proceedings in district court, we reject such a claim. They cite no authority for the proposition that the court of appeals may in the first instance award attorney's fees for legal services performed in district court.

[10, 11] We may, however, award attorney's fees to the prevailing party on appeal for legal services performed in connection with the appeal. See Reel v. Arkansas Dep't of Correction, 672 F.2d 693, 699 (8th Cir. 1982). A prevailing defendant-appellee is entitled to attorney's fees "only if the plaintiff's appeal is frivolous, unreasonable or without foundation, even though not brought in subjective bad faith." Munson v. Friske, 754 F.2d 683, 698 n. 10 (7th Cir.1985). Although BLF did not have a strong claim, we cannot say that its appeal was frivolous, unreasonable or without foundation. BLF had plausible, though unavailing, legal arguments. This is not "one of the few cases where defendant-appellees [are] entitled to attorney['s] fees for appellate work." Id.

III. CONCLUSION

We affirm the district court's order granting summary judgment to Bi–State and Thermal and deny defendants' request for attorney's fees under § 1988.

Finally, there is no equitable basis for the Petitioner's argument that it deserves priority over other accountholders because it stands to suffer the most substantial loss. We simply can find no basis in equity for giving the Petitioner a disproportionate advantage over other Franklin shareholders who also suffered losses.

Submitted Dec. 12, 1991.

Decided April 9, 1992.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa, Charles R. Wolle, J., of conspiracy to distribute cocaine, and aiding and abetting the distribution of cocaine. Defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals, Magill, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) district court did not err in calculating defendant's offense level as 26 under Sentencing Guidelines; (2) defendants' conviction for conspiracy was supported by evidence; and (3) prosecutor's remarks during closing argument did not infringe on defendant's right not to testify.

Affirmed.

1. Criminal Law ⇐1158(1)

When appeal is based on factual grounds, Court of Appeals reverses sentence imposed by district court only if it concludes that factual findings on which district court relied are clearly erroneous.

2. Criminal Law ⇐1158(1)

Whether uncharged drugs are part of common scheme or plan is factual finding subject to clearly erroneous standard.

3. Criminal Law ⇐1244

Where uncharged drugs are found to be part of common scheme or plan, sentencing court is not limited by amount seized and may sentence according to estimation based upon trial testimony; however, trial testimony used to estimate amount of uncharged drugs must clearly establish either dates of transactions or amounts of drugs involved.

When conviction for violating federal drug statutes is involved, trial court may consider amounts of drugs involved in conviction of coconspirators.

5. Drugs and Narcotics ⇐133

Calculation of defendant's base offense level as 26 was supported by testimony which clearly attributed at least 19 ounces of cocaine to defendant. U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1(c)(9), 18 U.S.C.A.App.

6. Criminal Law ⇐1144.13(8), 1159.2(10)

In reviewing conspiracy conviction for sufficiency of evidence, Court of Appeals views evidence in light most favorable to government, giving it benefit of all reasonable inferences drawn from evidence that supports jury's verdict; evidence need not exclude every reasonable hypothesis except guilt, and jury's verdict must be upheld if there is interpretation of evidence which would allow a reasonable-minded jury to conclude guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

7. Conspiracy ⇐24(1), 27

"Conspiracy" consists of agreement between two or more people to violate law and overt act in furtherance of conspiracy; person becomes member of conspiracy when he knowingly contributes his efforts to conspiracy's objective.

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

8. Conspiracy ⇐47(12)

Defendants' convictions for conspiracy to distribute cocaine were supported by evidence that defendants were roommates in two different places for over one year, that both defendants sold cocaine, that defendants traveled together to Chicago for purpose of buying cocaine, that defendants gave one another money from sales of cocaine, and that both frequently had large sums of money at their disposal.

9. Drugs and Narcotics ⇐123(3)

Defendant's conviction for aiding and abetting distribution of cocaine was supported by evidence that defendant and codefendant engaged in conspiracy to distribute cocaine and that defendant directed drug enforcement agent disguised as prospective buyer to codefendant for purchase of cocaine.

10. Conspiracy ⇐24(8)

Jury could convict defendant of conspiracy with his girlfriend, even though grand jury knew about her and did not name her as unindicted coconspirator; grand jury may not name unindicted coconspirator in indictment.

11. Criminal Law ⇐721(6)

Prosecutor's statement during closing argument that codefendant had not called "mutual friend or mutual employee" to testify regarding alleged romantic relationship between codefendant and government informant did not infringe on defendant's right not to testify, even though defendant was only person who was both mutual friend and mutual employee; prosecutor's remark was directed to codefendant's failure to call witness who could substantiate his claim that he had romantic relationship with informant, and judge properly instructed jury that defense did not have burden of proof or burden to produce evidence.

I.

A. Amount of Cocaine[3]

[1–5] Galvan claims that the district court erred in calculating his offense level as 26 under § 2D1.1 of the Sentencing Guidelines because there was insufficient evidence to support the district court's findings that thirty-eight ounces of cocaine were attributable to him.[4] When an appeal is based on factual grounds, we reverse the sentence imposed by the district court only if we conclude that the factual findings on which the court relied are clearly erroneous. United States v. Pou, 953 F.2d 363, 370 (8th Cir.1992) (citing 18 U.S.C. § 3742(e) (1988); United States v. Lawrence, 915 F.2d 402, 406 (8th Cir.1990)). Whether uncharged drugs are part of a common scheme or plan is also a factual finding subject to the clearly erroneous standard. Lawrence, 915 F.2d at 406. Where uncharged drugs are found to be part of a common scheme or plan, the sentencing court is not limited by the amount seized and may sentence according to its estimation based on trial testimony. United States v. Duckworth, 945 F.2d 1052, 1054 (8th Cir.1991) (citing United States v. Evans, 891 F.2d 686, 687 (8th Cir.1989), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 931, 110 S.Ct. 2170, 109 L.Ed.2d 499 (1990)). Trial testimony used to estimate the amount of uncharged drugs, however, must clearly establish either the dates of the transactions or the amounts of drugs involved. United States v. Hewitt, 942 F.2d 1270, 1274 (8th Cir.), reh'g denied, No. 90–5578 (8th Cir. Oct. 1 1991); United States v. Phillippi, 911 F.2d 149, 151 (8th Cir.1990), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 111 S.Ct. 702, 112 L.Ed.2d 691 (1991). In this case, trial testimony clearly attributed at least nineteen ounces (538.65 grams) of cocaine to Galvan. Because a base offense level of twenty-six applies to amounts of at least 500 grams but less than two kilograms of cocaine, U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1(c)(9), we do not need to reach the question of whether the government proved the additional amounts. United States v. Regan, 940 F.2d 1134, 1136 (8th Cir.1991); see also Phillippi, 911 F.2d at 151 (erroneous inclusion of drugs harmless error where base offense level remained the same after improperly included amounts omitted). We conclude the district court correctly assigned Galvan a base offense level of twenty-six.

B. Conspiracy

Galvan and Silva both argue that there was insufficient evidence of a conspiracy.[5] They claim that the evidence failed to show that an agreement existed, with each other or with others, to distribute cocaine. Galvan claims that there was no proof that anyone else had a stake in the outcome of his actions or got paid for participating in his distribution of cocaine. Silva argues that the government did not show that he "knowingly contributed [his] efforts in the furtherance" of selling cocaine, United States v. Mims, 812 F.2d 1068, 1075 (8th Cir.1987), or that he was a party to any actual agreement, tacit or explicit, to distribute cocaine.

[6, 7] In reviewing a conspiracy conviction for sufficiency of the evidence, the court views the evidence in the light most favorable to the government, giving it the benefit of all reasonable inferences drawn from the evidence that support the jury's verdict. Duckworth, 945 F.2d at 1053; United States v. Newton, 756 F.2d 53, 54 (8th Cir.1985). The evidence need not exclude every reasonable hypothesis except guilt. Newton, 756 F.2d at 54. The jury's verdict must be upheld if there is an interpretation of the evidence that would allow a reasonable-minded jury to conclude guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. United States v. Rodriguez, 812 F.2d 414, 416 (8th Cir. 1987). A conspiracy generally consists of an agreement between two or more people to violate the law and an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy. United States v. Watts, 950 F.2d 508, 512 (8th Cir.1991). A person becomes a member of a conspiracy when he knowingly contributes his efforts to the conspiracy's objectives. Duckworth, 945 F.2d at 1053; Mims, 812 F.2d at 1075.

[8] Here, there was sufficient evidence that a conspiracy existed between Galvan and Silva to sustain the conviction. They were roommates in two different places for over a year. Brad Wiegand, a former customer, testified that several times when he had taken people to buy cocaine from Galvan, Silva answered the door and told them Galvan was not there. After some discussion, however, Silva would sell them cocaine. In addition, Wiegand testified that once, when he went to buy from Galvan, Silva was present and Galvan gave Silva the money from the sale. Deborah Benninger, Galvan's ex-girlfriend, testified that she bought cocaine from both men. She also testified that Galvan sometimes sent her to Silva to buy cocaine when he needed more to distribute. Benninger stated that Silva had been present sometimes when Galvan sold cocaine to other people, and that she had overheard conversations between the two men about cocaine and how much money they made. She said that she had seen them counting large amounts of money. She also testified about a trip to Chicago she had taken with Galvan, Silva and another man called Tito. They went to a bar called "Cerveza Frio." Tito and Galvan went into the back room, where Silva joined them briefly. They left the bar almost immediately after the three men rejoined her. When they got into the car, Galvan stuffed something between the seats. Then, they all "did" some cocaine. When they arrived home, Galvan left, announcing that he was going to go make money. Benninger understood that to mean that he was going to sell cocaine because he was unemployed at the time and she believed the trip had been for the purpose of buying drugs. Stacy Williams, a government informant, testified that on one occasion when she went to make a buy from Galvan, he went into the bedroom with Silva and another man for a few minutes, then called her to the bedroom door and sold her the cocaine she wanted. On another buy, she went to the apartment looking for Galvan, and Silva told her Galvan had just left to meet her.

We believe that the evidence, taken in the light most favorable to the government, is sufficient to allow a jury to find that Galvan and Silva conspired with each other to distribute cocaine. Therefore, we affirm their convictions.

C. Aiding and Abetting

[9] Silva argues that the evidence is insufficient to support his conviction of aiding and abetting. The government claims that Silva aided and abetted the distribution of cocaine to a drug enforcement agent. Stacy Williams testified that she had made arrangements to meet Galvan at a motel to introduce him to a buyer, who was really a drug enforcement agent. When Galvan did not arrive at the agreed time, she and the agent drove to Galvan's apartment. Silva answered the door and told her that Galvan had just left to meet her.

Although we agree that, standing alone, this would not be sufficient to sustain a conviction, we must look to the evidence as a whole to determine whether a reasonable jury could have found that Silva aided and abetted Galvan in this sale. Given the evidence of conspiracy, and the fact that the jury found there was a conspiracy, the verdict was reasonable. We affirm.

D. Jury Instruction

[10] Galvan contends that the district court erred because it failed to give a jury instruction he requested. The instruction would have told the jury that they could not convict him of conspiracy with Ben-

3. Silva adopted this argument and the arguments addressed in Parts D and E of this opinion by reference pursuant to Rule 28(i) of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure. Because we find that the district court did not err, we do not address these issues separately for Silva.

4. When a conviction for violating federal drug statutes is involved, the trial court may consider amounts of drugs involved in the conviction of co-conspirators. United States v. Holland, 884 F.2d 354, 358 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 997, 110 S.Ct. 552, 107 L.Ed.2d 549 (1989).

5. Because appellants' arguments on this point are so similar, we address them together.

ninger because the grand jury knew about her and did not name her as an unindicted co-conspirator. He argues that the government suggested that Benninger was a co-conspirator, and that the jury may have convicted him of conspiring with her rather than with Silva. He admits, however, that he could be indicted and convicted for conspiring with unnamed co-conspirators if the grand jury did not know their identity.

Galvan's position is without legal merit. The case he relies on for support, United States v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794 (5th Cir. 1975), is directly opposed to his proposition. In that case, the court held that the grand jury could never name an unindicted co-conspirator in an indictment. Any unindicted co-conspirators must remain unnamed. Id.[6]

E. Comment on Failure to Testify

[11] Galvan's last argument is that the government impermissibly shifted the burden of proof to the defense, constituting an infringement of his Fifth Amendment right not to testify. Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609, 615, 85 S.Ct. 1229, 1233, 14 L.Ed.2d 106 (1965); United States v. Neumann, 887 F.2d 880, 887 (8th Cir.1989). Both Galvan and Silva met Stacy Williams, the government informant, prior to 1990 through work. Williams had been hospitalized with mental and emotional problems during 1989 due to the breakup of a past relationship. Silva testified that he had had a romantic relationship with her during most of 1990.[7] He claimed that Williams had threatened him when they broke up, saying "I'll see you soon." He testified that he believed Williams was trying to get revenge. During closing argument, the government attorney said, "The defendant [Silva] has brought no one of what might be [sic] their mutual friend [sic] or mutual employees to tell you about their relationship." Galvan claims that because he was the only person the jury knew about who was both a mutual friend and a mutual employee, the government was impermissibly pointing out the fact that he had not testified.

Galvan's right not to testify was not infringed by the prosecutor's remark in this case. We have read the prosecutor's remarks with great care. The remark was directed to defendants' failure to call a witness in the context of discussing Silva's credibility. The prosecutor used the disjunctive "or" in his remark. His comment simply pointed out that, in considering Silva's credibility, the jury should remember that no one who knew both Williams and Silva, either as a friend or as a co-worker, had testified that there had been a romantic relationship between the two. In addition, the judge properly instructed the jury, both in the final instructions and at the time of the remark, that the defense did not have a burden of proof or a burden to produce evidence. Given the context and the phraseology of the remark, and the judge's instructions to the jury, we do not think that the remark was improper. See Neumann, 887 F.2d at 887; Moore v. Wyrick, 760 F.2d 884 (8th Cir.1985) (prosecutor's inviting jury to draw adverse inference from defendant's failure to call certain witnesses did not deprive defendant of a fair trial).

II.

Because we find no errors of fact or law, we affirm the district court.

6. Galvan also relies on Rogers v. United States, 340 U.S. 367, 71 S.Ct. 438, 95 L.Ed. 344 (1951). This case does not stand for his proposition either. It simply notes, in dicta, that a person can be convicted of conspiracy with an unnamed person. Id. at 375, 71 S.Ct. at 443.

7. Williams denied having any such relationship with Silva.

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Jan. 7, 1992.
Decided April 9, 1992.

Defendants were convicted of drug and firearm offenses, following jury trial in the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri, D. Brook Bartlett, J., and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Arnold, Chief Judge, held that: (1) disruptive and unorthodox trial tactics of codefendant did not entitle defendant to mistrial or severance; (2) sufficient evidence connected defendant with cocaine and gun found in car in which he was riding; and (3) trial court could deny untimely motions to suppress evidence.

Affirmed.

1. Criminal Law ⇐1166(6)

Denial of severance is not grounds for reversal unless clear prejudice and abuse of discretion are shown.

2. Criminal Law ⇐622.2(6, 7, 11)

Mere fact that there is hostility among defendants, or one defendant may try to save himself at expense of another, or that evidence against one defendant is more damaging than evidence against another, is not sufficient grounds to require separate trials.

3. Criminal Law ⇐622.2(8)

In order to justify severance, defendant must make showing of real prejudice by demonstrating that jury was unable to compartmentalize evidence as it related to him and his codefendant.

Defendant was not entitled to severance, even though codefendant's counsel conducted noisy, disruptive, unorthodox defense and introduced incriminating testimony concerning defendant, where defendant was represented by professional, highly effective counsel, defendant's defense of general denial did not conflict with that of codefendant, and trial involved only two defendants and five counts and lasted only three and one-half days; danger that jurors would be unable to compartmentalize the evidence was minimal.

GRUNEWALD v. UNITED STATES.

NO. 183. CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT.*

Argued April 3–4, 1957.—Decided May 27, 1957.

1. The three petitioners were convicted in a federal district court of violating 18 U. S. C. § 371 by conspiring to defraud the United States by preventing the criminal prosecution of certain taxpayers for fraudulent tax evasion. They had succeeded in obtaining "no prosecution" rulings from the Bureau of Internal Revenue in 1948 and 1949, and their subsequent activities were directed at concealing the irregularities through which these rulings were obtained. They were not indicted until October 25, 1954. Held: If the main objective of the conspiracy was to obtain the "no prosecution" rulings, petitioners' prosecution was barred by the three-year statute of limitations, since no agreement to conceal the conspiracy after its accomplishment was shown or can be implied on the record in this case to have been a part of the conspiracy. Pp. 399–406.

   (a) After the central criminal purposes of a conspiracy have been attained, a subsidiary conspiracy to conceal the crime may not be implied from circumstantial evidence showing merely that the conspiracy was kept a secret and that the conspirators took care to cover up their crime in order to escape detection and punishment. Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U. S. 440; Lutwak v. United States, 344 U. S. 604. Pp. 399–402.

   (b) On the record in this case, nothing more is shown than (1) a criminal conspiracy carried out in secrecy, (2) a continuation of the secrecy after accomplishment of the crime, and (3) attempts to cover up after the crime began to come to light. Pp. 402–404.

   (c) The duration of a conspiracy cannot be lengthened indefinitely for the purpose of the statute of limitations merely because the conspiracy is kept secret and the conspirators take steps to bury their traces, in order to avoid detection and punishment after the central criminal purpose has been accomplished. Pp. 399, 404–405.

2. The judge's charge to the jury was not adequate to justify petitioners' conviction on the theory that the main objective of the conspiracy was not merely to obtain the initial "no prosecution" rulings but to obtain final immunity of the taxpayers from criminal prosecution by preventing their prosecution until after expiration of the six-year statute of limitations applicable to their tax-evasion offenses, which did not expire until less than three years before petitioners were indicted for conspiracy—since the judge's charge left it open for the jury to convict even though it found merely (1) that the central aim of the conspiracy was accomplished in 1949, and (2) that the subsequent acts of concealment were motivated exclusively by petitioners' fear of a conspiracy prosecution. Pp. 406–415.

3. Petitioner Halperin was also convicted on other counts of the indictment charging him with violating 18 U. S. C. § 1503 by endeavoring corruptly to influence certain witnesses before a grand jury which was investigating matters involved in the conspiracy. At his trial, he answered certain questions in a manner consistent with innocence and then, over his objection, was subjected to cross-examination which revealed that he had refused to answer the same questions, on grounds of possible self-incrimination, while he was appearing before a grand jury, under subpoena, without benefit of counsel, without the right to summon witnesses and without any opportunity to cross-examine witnesses testifying against him. Held: In the circumstances of this case, it was prejudicial error for the trial judge to permit cross-examination of Halperin on his plea of the Fifth Amendment privilege before the grand jury. Raffel v. United States, 271 U. S. 494, distinguished. Pp. 415–424.

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The three petitioners were convicted on Count 1 of an indictment brought under 18 U. S. C. § 371 [1] for conspiracy to defraud the United States with reference to certain tax matters. Petitioner Halperin was also convicted on Counts 5, 6, and 7 of the same indictment, charging him with violating 18 U. S. C. § 1503 [2] by endeavoring corruptly to influence certain witnesses before a grand jury which was investigating matters involved in the conspiracy charged in Count 1 of the indictment. Each petitioner was sentenced to five years' imprisonment and fined under Count 1. On each of Counts 5, 6, and 7, Halperin was sentenced to two years' imprisonment and a fine of $1,000, the prison sentences on these Counts and that on Count 1 to run concurrently. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed, with the late Judge Frank dissenting. 233 F. 2d 556. We granted certiorari, 352 U. S. 866, in order to resolve important questions relating to (a) the statute of limitations in conspiracy prosecutions, as to which the decision below was alleged to be in conflict with this Court's decisions in Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U. S. 440, and Lutwak v. United States, 344 U. S. 604; and (b) the use on Halperin's cross-examination of his prior claim of the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination before a grand jury. For the reasons discussed hereafter, we conclude that these convictions must be reversed, and the petitioners granted a new trial.

[1] This section provides: "If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States, or any agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such persons do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

[2] 18 U. S. C. § 1503 provides, in relevant part: "Whoever corruptly . . . endeavors to influence, intimidate, or impede any witness, in any court of the United States or before any United States commissioner or other committing magistrate, or any grand or petit juror, or officer in or of any court of the United States . . . in the discharge of his duty . . . or corruptly . . . influences, obstructs, or impedes, or endeavors to influence, obstruct, or impede, the due administration of justice, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both." Grunewald and Bolich were acquitted on these Counts.

On October 25, 1954, a grand jury returned an indictment, Count 1 of which charged petitioners and others with conspiring among themselves and with others "to defraud the United States in the exercise of its governmental functions of administering the internal revenue laws and of detecting and prosecuting violations of the internal revenue laws free from bribery, unlawful impairment, obstruction, improper influence, dishonesty, fraud and corruption . . . ." The indictment further charged that a part of the conspiracy was an agreement to conceal the acts of the conspirators.[3] Overt acts within three years of the date of the indictment were charged. Counts 5, 6, and 7 of the indictment charged petitioners with violating 18 U. S. C. § 1503 in the manner already indicated.

The proofs at the trial presented a sordid picture of a ring engaged in the business of "fixing" tax fraud cases

[3] Paragraph 7 of the indictment alleged: "It was a part of the conspiracy that the defendants and co-conspirators would make continuing efforts to avoid detection and prosecution by any governmental body . . . of tax frauds perpetrated by the defendants and co-conspirators, through the use of any means whatsoever, including but not limited to, bribery, improper influence and corruption of government employees, the giving of false testimony, [etc.] . . . ."

Paragraph 13 alleged: "It was further a part of the conspiracy that the defendants and co-conspirators at all times would misrepresent, conceal and hide and cause to be misrepresented, concealed and hidden, the acts done pursuant to and the purposes of said conspiracy."

by the use of bribes and improper influence. In general outline, the petitioners' scheme, which is set forth in more detail in the Court of Appeals' opinion,[4] was as follows:

In 1947 and 1948 two New York business firms, Patullo Modes and Gotham Beef Co., were under investigation by the Bureau of Internal Revenue for suspected fraudulent tax evasion. Through intermediaries, both firms established contact with Halperin, a New York attorney, and his associates in law practice. Halperin in turn conducted negotiations on behalf of these firms with Grunewald, an "influential" friend in Washington, and reported that Grunewald, for a large cash fee, would undertake to prevent criminal prosecution of the taxpayers. Grunewald then used his influence with Bolich, an official in the Bureau, to obtain "no prosecution" rulings[5] in the two tax cases. These rulings were handed down in 1948 and 1949. Grunewald, through Halperin, was subsequently paid $60,000 by Gotham and $100,000 by Patullo.[6]

Subsequent activities of the conspirators were directed at concealing the irregularities in the disposition of the Patullo and Gotham cases. Bolich attempted to have the Bureau of Internal Revenue report on the Patullo case "doctored," and careful steps were taken to cover up the traces of the cash fees paid to Grunewald. In 1951 a congressional investigation was started by the King Committee of the House of Representatives; the conspirators felt themselves threatened and took steps to hide their traces. Thus Bolich caused the disappearance of certain records linking him to Grunewald, and the taxpayers were repeatedly warned to keep quiet. In 1952 the taxpayers and the conspirators were called before a Brooklyn grand jury. Halperin attempted to induce the taxpayers not to reveal the conspiracy, and Grunewald asked his secretary not to talk to the grand jury. These attempts at concealment were, however, in vain. The taxpayers and some of Halperin's associates revealed the entire scheme, and petitioners' indictment and conviction followed.[7]

[5] A "no prosecution" ruling is an internal decision by the investigative branch of the Bureau of Internal Revenue not to press criminal charges against a taxpayer.

[6] The payments were made in cash. In order to raise the money and leave no traces, the taxpayers made unrecorded sales, the profits of which were again unreported income. Further large fees were paid to Halperin and his associates.

The first question before us is whether the prosecution of these petitioners on Count 1 of the indictment was barred by the applicable three-year statute of limitations.[8]

The indictment in these cases was returned on October 25, 1954. It was therefore incumbent on the Government to prove that the conspiracy, as contemplated in the agreement as finally formulated, was still in existence on October 25, 1951, and that at least one overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy was performed after that date.[9] For where substantiation of a conspiracy charge

[7] Petitioner Bolich was also convicted on Count 2 of the indictment, which charged him and two other Bureau of Internal Revenue employees with conspiracy in violation of 26 U. S. C. § 4047 (e)(4). He was sentenced to three years' imprisonment and a $5,000 fine on this Count, the prison sentence to run concurrently with the five-year sentence on Count 1. The Court of Appeals held that both Counts related to the same conspiracy, and set aside the separate fine on Count 2.

[8] The governing statute was 18 U. S. C. § 3282, which provided: "Except as otherwise expressly provided by law, no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense, not capital, unless the indictment is found . . . within three years next after such offense shall have been committed."

[9] On September 1, 1954, the statute of limitations was amended to provide for a five-year limitation period. 68 Stat. 1145, 18 U. S. C. (Supp. III) § 3282. Since the amending statute was by its terms made applicable to offenses not barred on its effective date, that is, requires proof of an overt act, it must be shown both that the conspiracy still subsisted within the three years prior to the return of the indictment, and that at least one overt act in furtherance of the conspiratorial agreement was performed within that period. Hence, in both of these aspects, the crucial question in determining whether the statute of limitations has run is the scope of the conspiratorial agreement, for it is that which determines both the duration of the conspiracy, and whether the act relied on as an overt act may properly be regarded as in furtherance of the conspiracy.[10]

Petitioners, in contending that this prosecution was barred by limitations, state that the object of the conspiratorial agreement was a narrow one: to obtain "no prosecution" rulings in the two tax cases. When these rulings were obtained, in October 1948 in the case of Gotham Beef, and in January 1949 in the case of Patullo Modes, the criminal object of the conspiracy, petitioners say, was attained and the conspirators' function ended. They argue, therefore, that the statute of limitations started running no later than January 1949, and that the September 1, 1954, it would seem that in fact the crucial date here is September 1, 1951, rather than October 25; in other words, if the conspiracy was still alive after September 1, it was not barred. However, the case was tried on the theory that October 25 was the crucial date, and we so treat it in this opinion. The error, of course, was favorable to the petitioners and was therefore harmless. On the other hand, since we hold that petitioners must have a new trial, the error may be corrected.

[10] See, in general, Lutwak v. United States, 344 U. S. 604; Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U. S. 440; Bollenbach v. United States, 326 U. S. 607; McDonald v. United States, 89 F. 2d 128; United States v. Manton, 107 F. 2d 834; Cousens, Agreement as an Element in Conspiracy, 23 Va. L. prosecution was therefore barred by 1954, when the indictment was returned.[11]

The Government counters with two principal contentions: First, it urges that even if the main object of the conspiracy was to obtain decisions from the Bureau of Internal Revenue not to institute criminal tax prosecutions—decisions obtained in 1948 and 1949—the indictment alleged,[12] and the proofs showed, that the conspiracy also included as a subsidiary element an agreement to conceal the conspiracy to "fix" these tax cases, to the end that the conspirators would escape detection and punishment for their crime. Says the Government, "from the very nature of the conspiracy . . . there had to be, and was, from the outset a conscious, deliberate, agreement to conceal . . . each and every aspect of the conspiracy . . . ." It is then argued that since the alleged conspiracy to conceal clearly continued long after the main criminal purpose of the conspiracy was accomplished, and since overt acts in furtherance of the agreement to conceal were performed well within the indictment period, the prosecution was timely.

Second, and alternatively, the Government contends that the central aim of the conspiracy was to obtain [11] In support of this theory, petitioners point to evidence showing that the administrative practice of the Bureau of Internal Revenue was that only recommendations to prosecute would be reviewed at a higher echelon, whereas a determination of no prosecution would, for all practical purposes, end the case. They also emphasize that payment to Grunewald was made under the terms of an escrow which released the money when the "no prosecution" rulings came down.

Petitioners further urge that the acts of concealment occurring after 1949 show at most that a new and separate agreement to conceal was entered into after 1949, an agreement which was not charged in the indictment. Cf. United States v. Siebricht, 59 F. 2d 976. In view of our disposition of the case, we need not deal with this contention.

for these taxpayers, not merely a "no prosecution" ruling, but absolute immunity from tax prosecution; in other words, that the objectives of the conspiracy were not attained until 1952, when the statute of limitations ran on the tax cases which these petitioners undertook to "fix." The argument then is that since the conspiracy did not end until 1952, and since the 1949–1952 acts of concealment may be regarded as, at least in part, in furtherance of the objective of the conspirators to immunize the taxpayers from tax prosecution, the indictment was timely.

For reasons hereafter given, we hold that the Government's first contention must be rejected, and that as to its second, which the Court of Appeals accepted, a new trial must be ordered.

I.

We think that the Government's first theory—that an agreement to conceal a conspiracy can, on facts such as these, be deemed part of the conspiracy and can extend its duration for the purposes of the statute of limitations—has already been rejected by this Court in Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U. S. 440, and in Lutwak v. United States, 344 U. S. 604.

In Krulewitch the question before the Court was whether certain hearsay declarations could be introduced against one of the conspirators. The declarations in question were made by one named in the indictment as a co-conspirator after the main object of the conspiracy (transporting a woman to Florida for immoral purposes) had been accomplished. The Government argued that the conspiracy was not ended, however, since it included an implied subsidiary conspiracy to conceal the crime after its commission, and that the declarations were therefore still in furtherance of the conspiracy and binding on co-conspirators. This Court rejected the Government's argument. It then stated:

> "Conspirators about to commit crimes always expressly or implicitly agree to collaborate with each other to conceal facts in order to prevent detection, conviction and punishment. Thus the [Government's] argument is that even after the central criminal objectives of a conspiracy have succeeded or failed, an implicit subsidiary phase of the conspiracy always survives, the phase which has concealment as its sole objective.
>
> "We cannot accept the Government's contention. . . . The rule contended for by the Government could have far-reaching results. For under this rule plausible arguments could generally be made in conspiracy cases that most out-of-court statements offered in evidence tended to shield co-conspirators. We are not persuaded to adopt the Government's implicit conspiracy theory which in all criminal conspiracy cases would create automatically a further breach of the general rule against the admission of hearsay evidence." [13]

Mr. Justice Jackson, concurring, added:

> "I suppose no person planning a crime would accept as a collaborator one on whom he thought he could not rely for help if he were caught, but I doubt that this fact warrants an inference of conspiracy for that purpose. . . .
>
> "It is difficult to see any logical limit to the 'implied conspiracy,' either as to duration or means . . . . On the theory that the law will impute to the confederates a continuing conspiracy to defeat justice, one conceivably could be bound by another's unauthorized and unknown commission of perjury, bribery of a juror or witness, [etc.] . . . .
>
> "Moreover, the assumption of an indefinitely continuing offense would result in an indeterminate extension of the statute of limitations. If the law implies an agreement to cooperate in defeating prosecution, it must imply that it continues as long as prosecution is a possibility, and prosecution is a possibility as long as the conspiracy to defeat it is implied to continue." [14]

[13] 336 U. S., at 443–444.

The Krulewitch case was reaffirmed in Lutwak v. United States, supra. Here again the question was the admissibility of hearsay declarations of co-conspirators after the main purpose of the conspiracy had been accomplished; again the Government attempted to extend the life of the conspiracy by an alleged subsidiary conspiracy to conceal. Although in Lutwak, unlike in Krulewitch, the existence of a subsidiary conspiracy to conceal was charged in the indictment, the Court again rejected the Government's theory, holding that no such agreement to conceal had been proved or could be implied.

The Government urges us to distinguish Krulewitch and Lutwak on the ground that in those cases the attempt was to imply a conspiracy to conceal from the mere fact that the main conspiracy was kept secret and that overt acts of concealment occurred. In contrast, says the Government, here there was an actual agreement to conceal the conspirators, which was charged and proved to be an express part of the initial conspiracy itself.

We are unable to agree with the Government that, on this record, the cases before us can be distinguished on such a basis.

The crucial teaching of Krulewitch and Lutwak is that after the central criminal purposes of a conspiracy have been attained, a subsidiary conspiracy to conceal may not be implied from circumstantial evidence showing merely that the conspiracy was kept a secret and that the conspirators took care to cover up their crime in order to escape detection and punishment. As was there stated, allowing such a conspiracy to conceal to be inferred or implied from mere overt acts of concealment would result in a great widening of the scope of conspiracy prosecutions, since it would extend the life of a conspiracy indefinitely. Acts of covering up, even though done in the context of a mutually understood need for secrecy, cannot themselves constitute proof that concealment of the crime after its commission was part of the initial agreement among the conspirators. For every conspiracy is by its very nature secret; a case can hardly be supposed where men concert together for crime and advertise their purpose to the world. And again, every conspiracy will inevitably be followed by actions taken to cover the conspirators' traces. Sanctioning the Government's theory would for all practical purposes wipe out the statute of limitations in conspiracy cases, as well as extend indefinitely the time within which hearsay declarations will bind co-conspirators.

A reading of the record before us reveals that on the facts of this case the distinction between "actual" and "implied" conspiracies to conceal, as urged upon us by the Government, is no more than a verbal tour de force. True, in both Krulewitch and Lutwak there is language in the opinions stressing the fact that only an implied agreement to conceal was relied on.[15] Yet when we look to the facts of the present cases, we see that the evidence from which the Government here asks us to deduce an "actual" agreement to conceal reveals nothing beyond that adduced in prior cases. What is this evidence?

First, we have the fact that from the beginning the conspirators insisted on secrecy. Thus the identities of Grunewald and Bolich were sedulously kept from the taxpayers; careful steps were taken to hide the conspiracy from an independent law firm which was also working on Patullo's tax problems; and the taxpayers were told to make sure that their books did not reflect the large cash payments made to Grunewald. Secondly, after the "no prosecution" rulings were obtained, we have facts showing that this secrecy was still maintained. Thus, a deliberate attempt was made to make the above-mentioned independent law firm believe that it was its (quite legitimate) efforts which produced the successful ruling. Finally, we have the fact that great efforts were made to conceal the conspiracy when the danger of exposure appeared. For example, Bolich got rid of certain records showing that he had used Grunewald's hotel suite in Washington; Patullo's accountant was persuaded to lie to the grand jury concerning a check made out to an associate of the conspirators; Grunewald attempted to persuade his secretary not to talk to the grand jury; and the taxpayers were repeatedly told by Halperin and his associates to keep quiet.

We find in all this nothing more than what was involved in Krulewitch, that is, (1) a criminal conspiracy which is carried out in secrecy; (2) a continuation of the secrecy after the accomplishment of the crime; and (3) desperate attempts to cover up after the crime begins to come to light; and so we cannot agree that this case does not fall within the ban of those prior opinions.

In effect, the differentiation pressed upon us by the Government is one of words rather than of substance. In Krulewitch it was urged that a continuing agreement to conceal should be implied out of the mere fact of conspiracy, and that acts of concealment should be taken as overt acts in furtherance of that implied agreement to conceal. Today the Government merely rearranges the argument. It states that the very same acts of concealment should be used as circumstantial evidence from which it can be inferred that there was from the beginning an "actual" agreement to conceal. As we see it, the two arguments amount to the same thing: a conspiracy to conceal is being implied from elements which will be present in virtually every conspiracy case, that is, secrecy plus overt acts of concealment.[16] There is not a shred of direct evidence in this record to show anything like an express original agreement among the conspirators to continue to act in concert in order to cover up, for their own self-protection, traces of the crime after its commission.

Prior cases in this Court have repeatedly warned that we will view with disfavor attempts to broaden the already pervasive and wide-sweeping nets of conspiracy prosecutions.[17] The important considerations of policy behind such warnings need not be again detailed. See Jackson, J., concurring in Krulewitch v. United States, supra. It is these considerations of policy which govern our holding today. As this case was tried, we have before us a typical example of a situation where the Government, [16] One might cite as an example Grunewald's attempt at influencing his secretary not to talk to the grand jury, accompanied by an offer to "pay her expenses." Under the Government's Krulewitch theory, the argument would have been (in Mr. Justice Jackson's words) that the "law will impute to the confederates a continuing conspiracy to defeat justice," and that therefore the other confederates are "bound by another's unauthorized and unknown . . . bribery of a juror or witness." But no different result is achieved by saying that the attempted bribe of the witness is evidence from which one can infer an "actual" conspiracy to "defeat justice." In both cases the essential missing element is a showing that the act was done in furtherance of a prior criminal agreement among the conspirators.

[17] Delli Paoli v. United States, 352 U. S. 232; Lutwak v. United States, supra; Krulewitch v. United States, supra; Bollenbach v. United States, 326 U. S. 607.

faced by the bar of the three-year statute, is attempting to open the very floodgates against which Krulewitch warned. We cannot accede to the proposition that the duration of a conspiracy can be indefinitely lengthened merely because the conspiracy is kept a secret, and merely because the conspirators take steps to bury their traces, in order to avoid detection and punishment after the central criminal purpose has been accomplished.

By no means does this mean that acts of concealment can never have significance in furthering a criminal conspiracy. But a vital distinction must be made between acts of concealment done in furtherance of the main criminal objectives of the conspiracy, and acts of concealment done after these central objectives have been attained, for the purpose only of covering up after the crime. Thus the Government argues in its brief that "in the crime of kidnapping, the acts of conspirators in hiding while waiting for ransom would clearly be planned acts of concealment which would be in aid of the conspiracy to kidnap. So here, there can be no doubt that . . . all acts of concealment, whether to hide the identity of the conspirators or the action theretofore taken, were unquestionably in furtherance of the initial conspiracy . . . ." We do not think the analogy is valid. Kidnapers in hiding, waiting for ransom, commit acts of concealment in furtherance of the objectives of the conspiracy itself, just as repainting a stolen car would be in furtherance of a conspiracy to steal; in both cases the successful accomplishment of the crime necessitates concealment.[18] More closely analogous to our case would be conspiring kidnapers who cover their traces after the main conspiracy is finally ended—i. e., after they have abandoned the kidnaped person and then take care to escape detection. In the latter case, as here, the acts of covering up can by themselves indicate nothing more than that the conspirators do not wish to be apprehended—a concomitant, certainly, of every crime since Cain attempted to conceal the murder of Abel from the Lord.

We hold, therefore, that, considering the main objective of the conspiracy to have been the obtaining of "no prosecution" rulings, prosecution was barred by the three-year statute of limitations, since no agreement to conceal the conspiracy after its accomplishment was shown or can be implied on the evidence before us to have been part of the conspiratorial agreement.

II.

In view of how the case was submitted to the jury, we are also unable to accept the Government's second theory for avoiding the statute of limitations. This theory is (1) that the main objective of the conspiracy was not merely to obtain the initial "no prosecution" rulings in 1948 and 1949, but to obtain final immunity for Gotham and Patullo from criminal tax prosecution; (2) that such immunity was not obtained until 1952, when the statute of limitations had run on the tax-evasion cases which the petitioners conspired to fix;[19] (3) that the conspiracy therefore did not end until 1952, when this object was attained; (4) that the acts of concealment within the indictment period were overt acts in furtherance of this conspiracy; and (5) that the prosecution was thus timely.[20] In short, the contention is that the agreement

[19] The tax evasion cases were governed by a six-year statute of limitations, 26 U. S. C. (1940 ed.) § 3748, which began to run when the last return, pertaining to the year 1946, was filed by the taxpayers.

[20] The Government also suggests a further theory under which this conspiracy could be deemed to have lasted into the indictment period. Under this theory, the central aim of the conspiracy was not specifically to "fix" the tax troubles of Gotham and Patullo, but to engage in the continuing business of fixing any and all tax-fraud to conceal was to protect the taxpayers rather than the conspirators, and as such was part of the main conspiracy rather than a subsidiary appendage to it, as under the Government's first theory.

The Court of Appeals accepted this theory of the case in affirming these convictions. It stated:

> "What the fixers had to sell was freedom from criminal prosecution for tax frauds. What the taxpayers bargained for was protection from a tax evasion prosecution.
>
> . . . . .
> "This conspiracy is wholly unlike the ordinary illegal scheme in that the jury may well have inferred that the official announcement that there would be no criminal prosecution of the taxpayers cases. If this were the aim of the conspiracy, acts of concealment could have been in furtherance of this aim by enabling the ring to stay in business so that it could get new cases. Evidence supporting this theory, says the Government, is that in 1950, after the "no prosecution" rulings in the Patullo and Gotham cases, Halperin engaged in negotiations with another firm which was in tax difficulties. Although these negotiations came to nothing, due to disagreement about the fee to be paid to the conspirators, the incident is presented as evidence that the conspirators were actively soliciting future tax clients in 1950 and were thus still "in business."

We cannot accept this theory of the Government. The trouble is not only that the theory was never submitted to the jury, but that no overt act done to further the purpose of engaging in "new" business was charged or proved to have occurred after October 25, 1951. If one of the purposes of the conspiracy was to engage in the business of fixing tax cases generally, it must be deemed to have been abandoned in 1951, when investigations of the petitioners started in Congress, since the 1951 and 1952 activities of the conspirators consisted merely of covering up old ventures rather than seeking new ones, and since there is no indication that there was an intent to resume operations after the investigations had ended. Indeed, upon the oral argument the Government seemed to abandon this theory.

was merely the delivery of a substantial installment of what appellants agreed to deliver for the huge sums paid. The six-year Statute of Limitations . . . did not run in favor of the taxpayers until some time after the commission of the overt acts relied upon. In the interval there was no assurance, other than continuing efforts by Grunewald, Bolich and the others, that the whole nefarious business might not be brought to light, followed by the revocation of the decision not to criminally prosecute the taxpayers. This is a significant element in the proofs adduced by the government, as concealment of the conspiratorial acts was necessary not only to protect the conspirators from a conspiracy prosecution but also to protect the taxpayers from a tax evasion prosecution." 233 F. 2d, at 564–565.

We find the legal theory of the Court of Appeals unexceptionable. If the central objective of the conspiracy was to protect the taxpayers from tax-evasion prosecutions, on which the statute of limitations did not run until 1952, and if the 1948 and 1949 "no prosecution" rulings were but an "installment" of what the conspirators aimed to accomplish, then it is clear that the statute of limitations on the conspiracy did not begin to run until 1952, within three years of the indictment.[21]

Furthermore, we agree with the Court of Appeals that there is evidence in this record which would warrant submission of the case to the jury on the theory that the central object of the conspiracy was not attained in 1948 and 1949, but rather was to immunize the taxpayers completely from prosecution for tax evasion and thus continued into 1952. The many overt acts of concealment occurring after 1949 could easily have been motivated at least in part by the purpose of the conspirators to deliver the remaining "installments" owing under the bargain—to wit, the safeguarding of the continued vitality of the "no prosecution" rulings.[22] Furthermore, there is evidence showing that from the beginning the aim of the scheme was not restricted to the merely provisional and necessarily precarious "fixing" of the taxpayers' troubles which was achieved in 1948 and 1949.[23] A jury might therefore [22] One might cite as a typical example an incident in the record occurring in November 1949, 10 months after the "no prosecution" ruling was handed down in the Patullo case. The Special Agent who had been working on the case wrote a final report on it, which stated that Patullo was not prosecuted solely because of Bolich's decision. This report was sent to Bolich, who thereupon called the Chief of the Conference Section and asked him to write an explanatory memorandum on the case so as to "take a little heat off the situation." This attempt to "doctor" the report might easily have been motivated not only by fear for himself, but by a purpose to safeguard the "no prosecution" ruling from change in order to maintain the immunity of the taxpayers.

[23] The negotiations between Halperin and his associates and the taxpayers were never very specific as to what exactly was to be accomplished. The tenof of the discussions was that if the taxpayers would hire the mysterious "influential" man in Washington, the matter "would be ended," the "prosecution end of the case" would be avoided, the matter would be settled "in a civil way without criminal prosecution." In the same tenor, the accountant of Gotham Beef testified that "nothing at all was to be paid unless the criminal prosecution had been eliminated. It was further understood that they were not at all concerned with the amount of the tax that might result by way of assessment, but it was either that they were completely successful in eliminating criminal prosecution . . . or there would be no fee at all." In other words, there is little indication that it was the specific and narrow end of obtaining the "no prosecution" rulings which was to be the quid pro quo.

This is further buttressed by the fact that the taxpayers were well aware of the precarious nature of the 1948 and 1949 rulings; it is quite clear that they realized that this did not "end" the danger of criminal prosecution. Thus the Patullo taxpayers were aware that the continued investigation of their books for the purposes of civil fairly infer that it was part of the conspiratorial agreement that Grunewald and Bolich would make continuing efforts to safeguard the fruits of the partial victories won in 1948 and 1949 by trying to immunize the "no prosecution" rulings from change. In other words, we think a jury could infer from this evidence that the conspirators were prepared and had agreed to engage in further frauds and bribery if necessary in order to maintain in effect the tentative rulings obtained in 1948 and 1949.[24] tax liability exposed them to constant danger of "tipping the applecart." They were warned to "keep their mouths shut," and a further payment of $25,000 was made for the "boys in New York" so that no one would "raise a fuss about the phony deal that had been put through." Another Patullo officer testified that, after the "no prosecution" ruling, "we still were not at ease about the thing. We knew that we were elated over the results, but we still were worried about it. There was cooperation to take care of. We had to make this payoff for the New York boys. We were not through with it at that time. We never knew when something else was going to come up. We weren't through at all. . . . For two years after that we still weren't through with the thing." And, referring to the payment for the "New York boys" in 1949: "[W]e never felt too sure about anything because the civil settlement still had to be made and we knew there were people that had to go through it and pass on it and everything, and while this was going on we were told that we would have to get up some more money."

A jury could thus easily infer that the conspirators' function did not end in January 1949, and that the conspiratorial agreement contemplated further efforts to immunize the taxpayers from tax prosecution.

[24] It should be mentioned that the Court of Appeals was unanimous in finding that there was sufficient evidence in the record to warrant the submission of the case to the jury on the theory that the central objectives of the conspiracy were not achieved until the statute of limitations ran on the tax-evasion charges. Judge Frank, while dissenting on the ground that the charge to the jury was inadequate in putting the case to the jury on this basis—a view which we share, see infra, p. 413—agreed that under a proper charge the jury might infer that the conspiracy was still alive through 1951. See 233 F. 2d, at 592–596.

If, therefore, the jury could have found that the aim of the conspiratorial agreement was to protect the taxpayers from tax prosecution, and that the overt acts occurring in the indictment period were in furtherance of that aim, we would affirm. We do not think, however, that we may safely assume that the jury so found, for we cannot agree with the Court of Appeals' holding that this theory of the case was adequately submitted to the jury.

The trial judge's charge on the problem of the scope and duration of the conspiracy was as follows:

> "You will recall that the indictment states, among other things, that it was part of the conspiracy that the defendants and co-conspirators would make 'continuing efforts to avoid detection and prosecution by any governmental body, executive, legislative, and judicial of tax frauds perpetrated by the defendants and co-conspirators through the use of any means whatsoever including but not limited to . . . the influencing, intimidating, and impeding of prospective witnesses to refrain from disclosing the true facts.' In other words, the indictment alleges that the conspiracy comprehended within it a conspiracy to conceal the true facts from investigation, should investigation thereafter eventuate. This is an important element of the first count of the indictment which you must take into consideration, inasmuch as the Statute of Limitations on the charge of criminal conspiracy is three years and unless the conspiracy was continuing to a period within three years prior to the date of the indictment, October 25, 1954, and some overt act was performed within that three-year period, the crime, if any, alleged in the first count of the indictment would be outlawed. It is the contention of the government that the conspiracy did not end when the taxpayers were advised that there would be no criminal prosecution recommended by the Special Agent's office, but that an integral part of the entire conspiracy was an agreement to conceal the acts of the conspirators and that when thereafter an investigation was started by Congress and by the Grand Jury in the Eastern District of New York, the conspirators performed overt acts in pursuance of the original conspiracy designed to conceal the true facts; and that these acts occurred within three years prior to the date of the indictment. On this issue, it will be necessary for you to determine whether, beyond a reasonable doubt, you can conclude that the conspiracy was of the nature described in the first count of the indictment and comprehended an agreement to conceal and whether some overt act took place in the period of three years prior to October 25, 1954 to carry out such purpose of the conspiracy.

"To determine whether certain of the alleged overt acts were in furtherance of the object of the conspiracy, you have to determine the duration of the conspiracy. Did it end when the Pattullo [sic] Modes people and the Gotham Beef people received an assurance of no prosecution from the Bureau of Internal Revenue, or was a part of the conspiracy a continuing agreement to conceal the acts done pursuant thereto? In determining whether a part of the conspiracy was an agreement to continue to conceal the illegal acts after their consummation, you may not imply that such an agreement was part of the conspiracy. You would have to find from the evidence of the acts and declarations of the co-conspirators that there was an understanding or agreement to conceal the conspiracy. If you find that such an agreement or understanding to conceal the conspiracy was not a part of the conspiracy to defraud the government, but no more than an afterthought brought to the surface when the co-conspirators were confronted with the Grand Jury and King Committee investigations, then you must find, as a matter of law, that the defendants are not guilty of the crime charged in the first count of the indictment. If you find that the evidence shows, beyond a reasonable doubt, that as a part of a conspiracy to defraud the government, there was an agreement or understanding to conceal the illegal acts and that this too was an objective or part of the conspiracy, then you may find that such understanding was a part of the conspiracy. However, you must additionally determine whether this objective of the conspiracy was known to the defendants. If this objective was known originally by only part of the conspirators but thereafter during the existence of the conspiracy, the scope of the conspiracy was extended so as to include such an agreement to conceal, and if you find that some of the defendants did not know of the expansion to include the agreement to conceal, you may not impute to them the knowledge of their co-conspirators and they could not be found guilty of the crime charged in Count One."

We are constrained to agree with Judge Frank that this charge did not adequately enlighten the jury as to what they would have to find in order to conclude that the conspiracy was still alive after October 25, 1951. For the charge as given failed completely to distinguish between concealment in order to achieve the central purpose of the conspiracy (that is, the immunization of the taxpayers from tax-evasion prosecution), and concealment intended solely to cover up an already executed crime

(that is, the obtaining of the "no prosecution" rulings). The jury was never told that these overt acts of concealment could be taken as furthering the conspiracy only if the basic criminal aim of the conspiracy was not yet attained in 1949. On the charge as given, the jury might easily have concluded that the petitioners were guilty even though they found merely (1) that the central aim of the conspiracy was accomplished in 1949, and (2) that the subsequent acts of concealment were motivated exclusively by the conspirators' fear of a conspiracy prosecution. As far as we know, therefore, the present convictions were based on the impermissible theory discussed in the first part of this opinion—namely, that a subordinate agreement to conceal the conspiracy continued after the central aim of the conspiracy had been accomplished.

Furthermore, if the convictions were based on a finding that the overt acts of concealment were done with the single intention of protecting the conspirators' own interests, then it is irrelevant that these acts in fact happened to have the effect also of protecting the taxpayers against revocation of the "no prosecution" rulings. For overt acts in a prosecution such as this one are meaningful only if they are within the scope of the conspiratorial agreement. If that agreement did not, expressly or impliedly, contemplate that the conspiracy would continue in its efforts to protect the taxpayers in order to immunize them from tax prosecution, then the scope of the agreement cannot be broadened retroactively by the fact that the conspirators took steps after the conspiracy which incidentally had that effect.

We thus find that the judge's charge left it open for the jury to convict even though they found that the acts of concealment were motivated purely by the purpose of the conspirators to cover up their already accomplished crime. And this, we think, was fatal error. For the facts in this record are equivocal. The jury might easily have concluded that the aim of the conspiracy was accomplished in 1949, and that the overt acts of concealment occurring after that date were done pursuant to the alleged conspiracy to hide the conspirators. As we have said, a conviction on such a theory could not be sustained. Under such circumstances, therefore, it was essential for the judge to charge clearly and unequivocally that on these facts the jury could not infer a continuing conspiracy to conceal the conspiracy, whether actual or implied. Further, it was incumbent on the judge to charge that in order to convict the jury would have to find that the central aim of the conspiracy was to immunize the taxpayers from tax prosecution, that this objective continued in being through 1951, and that the overt acts of concealment proved at trial were at least partly calculated to further this aim.

Since, under the judge's charge, the convictions on Count 1 might have rested on an impermissible ground, we conclude that they cannot stand, and the petitioners must be given a new trial as to this Count.

III.

What we have held as to the statute of limitations disposes of the conviction of the three petitioners under Count 1, but does not touch Halperin's conviction on Counts 5, 6, and 7 for violating 18 U. S. C. § 1503.[25] As to those Counts, Halperin, who took the stand in his own defense at the trial, contends (a) that the Government was improperly allowed to cross-examine him as to the assertion of his Fifth Amendment privilege before a grand jury investigating this conspiracy, before which he had been called as a witness,[26] and (b) that the evidence did not justify his conviction on these Counts. For the reasons given hereafter we think that the first contention is well taken, but that the second one is untenable.

[26] Grunewald and Bolich also make this contention on their own behalf.

In 1952 Halperin was subpoenaed before a Brooklyn grand jury which was investigating corruption in the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Testimony had already been received by the grand jury from the Patullo and Gotham taxpayers, which linked Halperin with the tax-fixing ring. Halperin was asked a series of questions before the grand jury, including, among others, such questions as whether he knew Max Steinberg (an employee of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and a co-defendant in the charge under Count 1); whether he knew Grunewald; whether he had held and delivered escrow money paid to Grunewald by Gotham after the "no prosecution" ruling; and whether he had phoned Grunewald to arrange a meeting between one of his own associates and Bolich. Halperin declined to answer any of these questions, on the ground that the answers would tend to incriminate him and that the Fifth Amendment therefore entitled him not to answer. He repeatedly insisted before the grand jury that he was wholly innocent, and that he pleaded his Fifth Amendment privilege only on the advice of counsel that answers to these questions might furnish evidence which could be used against him, particularly when he was not represented by counsel and could not cross-examine witnesses before the grand jury.

When the Government cross-examined Halperin at the trial some of the questions which he had been asked before the grand jury were put to him.[27] He answered

each question in a way consistent with innocence. The Government was then allowed, over objection, to bring out in cross-examination that petitioner had pleaded his privilege before the grand jury as to these very questions. Later, in his charge to the jury, the trial judge informed them that petitioner's Fifth Amendment plea could be taken only as reflecting on his credibility, and that no inference as to guilt or innocence could be drawn therefrom as to Halperin or any co-defendant.[28]

filed a power of attorney in the Glover case; (5) whether he had ever met one Oliphant, an official in the Treasury; (6) whether he knew Steinberg; (7) whether he knew Tobias, the accountant of Gotham Beef; (8) whether he had ever met Grunewald in the Munsey Building in Washington.

[28] The charge as to this point was as follows:

"During the cross examination of one of the defendants, the government questioned the defendant as to his previous statements before the Brooklyn Grand Jury in which he refused to answer certain questions on the ground that answers to them might tend to incriminate him. These questions related to matters similar to those to which the defendant testified at this trial when he took the stand. No witness is required to take the stand or required to give testimony that might tend to incriminate him; but when a defendant takes the stand in his own defense at a trial, it is proper to interrogate him as to previous statements which he may have made under oath concerning the same matter, including his assertion of his constitutional privilege to refuse to testify as to those matters before a grand jury. You may use this evidence of a defendant's prior assertions of the Fifth Amendment for the sole purpose of ascertaining the weight you choose to give to his present testimony with respect to the same matters upon which he previously invoked his privilege.

"The defendant had the right of asserting the Fifth Amendment when he appeared before the Grand Jury, and I charge you that you are not to draw any inference whatsoever as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant in this case by reason of the fact that he chose to assert his unquestioned right to invoke the Fifth Amendment on that previous occasion. However, it was proper for the Government to question the defendant with respect to his previous invocation of the Fifth Amendment, but you may consider this evidence of

In thus allowing this cross-examination, the District Court relied on Raffel v. United States, 271 U. S. 494, where this Court held that a defendant's failure to take the stand at his first trial to deny testimony as to an incriminating admission could be used on cross-examination at the second trial, where he did take the stand, to impugn the credibility of his denial of the same admission. In upholding the District Court here, the Court of Appeals likewise relied on Raffel, and also on one of its own earlier decisions.[29] Halperin attacks these rulings on these principal grounds: (a) Raffel is distinguishable from the present case; (b) if Raffel permitted this cross-examination, then the trial court erred in refusing to charge, as Halperin requested, that "an innocent man may honestly claim that his answers may tend to incriminate him"; (c) in any case Raffel has impliedly been overruled by Johnson v. United States, 318 U. S. 189; and (d) compelling Halperin to testify before the grand jury, when he had already been marked as a putative defendant, violated his constitutional rights, so that, by analogy to the rule of Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383, his claim of privilege could in no event be used against him. We find that in the circumstances presented here Raffel is not controlling, and that this cross-examination was not permissible.

It is, of course, an elementary rule of evidence that prior statements may be used to impeach the credibility of a criminal defendant or an ordinary witness. But this can be done only if the judge is satisfied that the prior statements are in fact inconsistent. 3 Wigmore, Evi-his prior assertions of the Fifth Amendment only for the purpose of ascertaining the weight you choose to give to his present testimony with respect to the same matters upon which he previously asserted his constitutional privilege. It is not to be considered in a determination of the guilt or innocence of any co-defendant."

dence, § 1040. And so the threshold question here is simply whether, in the circumstances of this case, the trial court erred in holding that Halperin's plea of the Fifth Amendment privilege before the grand jury involved such inconsistency with any of his trial testimony as to permit its use against him for impeachment purposes.[30] We do not think that Raffel is properly to be read either as dispensing with the need for such preliminary scrutiny by the judge, or as establishing as a matter of law that such a prior claim of privilege with reference to a ques-

[30] When the trial court first ruled that the Government could cross-examine as to petitioner's Fifth Amendment plea, it did not do so on the grounds of inconsistency reflecting on credibility. In fact the implication to be drawn from the record is that the court at that time felt that the jury might use this evidence for any purpose at all, including the drawing of inferences as to guilt or innocence. When the Government first embarked on this method of cross-examination, the judge overruled objections in these words:

"The Court: I know the Government's position. As I see it, Mr. Corbin [a defense attorney], no witness can be compelled to testify against himself. The witness is called before the grand jury and the answer was, I refuse to answer something on the ground that if I answer that question it will incriminate me.

"Mr. Corbin: Tend to incriminate.

"The Court: Or tend to incriminate. A witness can make that statement. No witness has to take the witness stand, as I understand the law and if a witness has so stated, then he could not be compelled to take the stand here, but if a witness voluntarily takes the stand and is asked in a previous proceeding did you say any testimony on this subject would incriminate you, that can be considered by the jury for such benefit or such worth as the jury may want to give it."

When the defendants asked that at the very least the use of this evidence be restricted to the question of credibility, the judge contented himself with asking for a memorandum of law on the subject. Thus, although later, in the charge to the jury, the matter was specifically restricted to the issue of credibility, there was no inquiry by the judge at the time of the initial admission of this evidence as to whether a sufficient showing of inconsistency had been made.

tion later answered at the trial is always to be deemed to be a prior inconsistent statement, irrespective of the circumstances under which the claim of privilege was made. The issue decided in Raffel came to the Court as a certified question in quite an abstract form,[31] and was really centered on the question whether a defendant who takes the stand on a second trial can continue to take advantage of the privilege asserted at the first trial. This Court held, in effect, that when a criminal defendant takes the stand, he waives his privilege completely and becomes subject to cross-examination impeaching his credibility just like any other witness: "His waiver is not partial; having once cast aside the cloak of immunity, he may not resume it at will, whenever cross-examination may be inconvenient or embarrassing." The Court, in Raffel, did not focus on the question whether the cross-examination there involved was in fact probative in impeaching the defendant's credibility. In other words, we may assume that under Raffel Halperin in this case was subject to cross-examination impeaching his credibility just like any other witness, and that his Fifth Amendment plea before the grand jury could not carry over any form of immunity when he voluntarily took the stand at the trial. This does not, however, solve the question whether in the particular circumstances of this case the cross-examination should have been excluded because its probative value on the issue of Halperin's credibility was so negligible as to be far outweighed by its possible impermissible impact on the jury.[32] As we consider that in the [31] The certified question was: "Was it error to require the defendant, Raffel, offering himself as a witness upon the second trial, to disclose that he had not testified as a witness in his own behalf upon the first trial?" 271 U. S., at 496.

[32] In Raffel this Court assumed that the defendant's failure to testify at the first trial could not be used as evidence of guilt in the second trial, 271 U. S., at 497. The Court further stated that "the circumstances of the present case, the trial court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, should have refused to permit this line of cross-examination, we are not faced with the necessity of deciding whether Raffel has been stripped of vitality by the later Johnson case, supra, or of otherwise re-examining Raffel.

We need not tarry long to reiterate our view that, as the two courts below held, no implication of guilt could be drawn from Halperin's invocation of his Fifth Amendment privilege before the grand jury. Recent re-examination of the history and meaning of the Fifth Amendment has emphasized anew that one of the basic functions of the privilege is to protect innocent men. Griswold, The Fifth Amendment Today, 9–30, 53–82. "Too many, even those who should be better advised, view this privilege as a shelter for wrongdoers. They too readily assume that those who invoke it are either guilty of crime or commit perjury in claiming the privilege." Ullmann v. United States, 350 U. S. 422, 426. See also Slochower v. Board of Higher Education, 350 U. S. 551, when, at the same Term, this Court said at pp. 557–558: "The privilege serves to protect the innocent who otherwise might be ensnared by ambiguous circumstances."

When we pass to the issue of credibility, we deem it evident that Halperin's claim of the Fifth Amendment privilege before the Brooklyn grand jury in response to questions which he answered at the trial was wholly consistent with innocence. Had he answered the questions put to him before the grand jury in the same way he subsequently answered them at trial, this nevertheless trial judge might appropriately instruct the jury that the failure of the defendant to take the stand in his own behalf is not in itself to be taken as an admission of the truth of the testimony which he did not deny." As already indicated, p. 418, supra, here the trial judge refused to charge that "an innocent man may honestly claim that his answers may tend to incriminate him."

would have provided the Government with incriminating evidence from his own mouth. For example, had he stated to the grand jury that he knew Grunewald, the admission would have constituted a link between him and a criminal conspiracy, and this would be true even though he was entirely innocent and even though his friendship with Grunewald was above reproach. There was, therefore, as we see it, no inconsistency between Halperin's statement to the grand jury that answering the question whether he knew Grunewald would tend to furnish incriminating evidence against him, and his subsequent testimony at trial that his acquaintance with Grunewald was free of criminal elements. And the same thing is also true, as we see it, as to his claim of privilege with respect to the other questions asked him before the grand jury and his answers to those same questions when they were put to him at the trial. These conclusions are fortified by a number of other considerations surrounding Halperin's claim of privilege:

First, Halperin repeatedly insisted before the grand jury that he was innocent and that he pleaded his Fifth Amendment privilege solely on the advice of counsel.

Second, the Fifth Amendment claim was made before a grand jury where Halperin was a compelled, and not a voluntary, witness; where he was not represented by counsel; where he could summon no witnesses; and where he had no opportunity to cross-examine witnesses testifying against him. These factors are crucial in weighing whether a plea of the privilege is inconsistent with later exculpatory testimony on the same questions, for the nature of the tribunal which subjects the witness to questioning bears heavily on what inferences can be drawn from a plea of the Fifth Amendment. See Griswold, supra, at 62. Innocent men are more likely to plead the privilege in secret proceedings, where they testify without advice of counsel and without opportunity for cross-examination, than in open court proceedings, where cross-examination and judicially supervised procedure provide safeguards for the establishing of the whole, as against the possibility of merely partial, truth.

Finally, and most important, we cannot deem Halperin's plea of the Fifth Amendment to be inconsistent with his later testimony at the trial because of the nature of this particular grand-jury proceeding. For, when Halperin was questioned before the grand jury, he was quite evidently already considered a potential defendant. The taxpayers whose cases had been "fixed" by the conspiratorial ring had already testified before the grand jury, and they gave there largely the same evidence as they did later, at trial. The scheme was thus in essence already revealed when Halperin was called to testify. Under these circumstances it was evident that Halperin was faced with the possibility of an early indictment, and it was quite natural for him to fear that he was being asked questions for the very purpose of providing evidence against himself. It was thus quite consistent with innocence for him to refuse to provide evidence which could be used by the Government in building its incriminating chain. For many innocent men who know that they are about to be indicted will refuse to help create a case against themselves under circumstances where lack of counsel's assistance and lack of opportunity for cross-examination will prevent them from bringing out the exculpatory circumstances in the context of which superficially incriminating acts occurred.

We are not unmindful that the question whether a prior statement is sufficiently inconsistent to be allowed to go to the jury on the question of credibility is usually within the discretion of the trial judge. But where such evidentiary matter has grave constitutional overtones, as it does here, we feel justified in exercising this Court's supervisory control to pass on such a question. This is particularly so because in this case the dangers of impermissible use of this evidence far outweighed whatever advantage the Government might have derived from it if properly used. If the jury here followed the judge's instructions, namely, that the plea of the Fifth Amendment was relevant only to credibility, then the weight to be given this evidence was less than negligible, since, as we have outlined above, there was no true inconsistency involved; it could therefore hardly have affected the Government's case seriously to exclude the matter completely. On the other hand, the danger that the jury made impermissible use of the testimony by implicitly equating the plea of the Fifth Amendment with guilt is, in light of contemporary history, far from negligible. Weighing these factors, therefore, we feel that we should draw upon our supervisory power over the administration of federal criminal justice in order to rule on the matter. Cf. McNabb v. United States, 318 U. S. 332.

We hold that under the circumstances of this case it was prejudicial error for the trial judge to permit cross-examination of petitioner on his plea of the Fifth Amendment privilege before the grand jury, and that Halperin must therefore be given a new trial on Counts 5, 6, and 7.

Finally, we find no substance to Halperin's contention that he was in effect convicted for advising, as a lawyer, some of the witnesses before the grand jury that they had a right to plead their Fifth Amendment privilege. The evidence against Halperin under these Counts was quite sufficient to make out a case for submission to the jury.

For the reasons given we hold that the judgments below must be reversed, and the cases remanded to the District Court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE, MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, and MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN join, concurring.

I concur in the reversal of these cases for the reasons given in the Court's opinion with one exception.

In No. 184, the petitioner, Halperin, appeared before a grand jury in response to a subpoena. There he declined to answer certain questions relying on the provision of the Fifth Amendment that "No person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

Later, at his trial, Halperin took the stand to testify in his own behalf. On cross-examination the prosecuting attorney asked him the same questions that he had refused to answer before the grand jury. This time Halperin answered the questions; his answers tended to show that he was innocent of any wrong-doing. The Government was then permitted over objection to draw from him the fact that he had previously refused to answer these questions before the grand jury on the ground that his answers might tend to incriminate him.

At the conclusion of the trial the judge instructed the jury that Halperin's claim of his constitutional privilege not to be a witness against himself could be considered in determining what weight should be given to his testimony—in other words, whether Halperin was a truthful and trustworthy witness. I agree with the Court that use of this claim of constitutional privilege to reflect upon Halperin's credibility was error, but I do not, like the Court, rest my conclusion on the special circumstances of this case. I can think of no special circumstances that would justify use of a constitutional privilege to discredit or convict a person who asserts it. The value of constitutional privileges is largely destroyed if persons can be penalized for relying on them. It seems peculiarly

v.

Wesley BUCEY, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 88-1912.

United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.

Argued Jan. 11, 1989.

Decided June 8, 1989.

Rehearing and Rehearing En Banc Denied July 13, 1989.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Ann C. Williams, J., of various offenses stemming from his participation in money laundering scheme. On appeal, the Court of Appeals, Cudahy, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) defendant did not violate substantive currency reporting statutes, and (2) evidence supported convictions for mail fraud and conspiracy.

Affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded with directions.

1. United States ⇐34

Defendant accused of laundering money was not "financial institution," and thus could not be convicted for failing to file currency transaction reports upon receipt of currency in excess of $10,000; statute, defining "financial institution" as "agency, branch, or office" of person acting in one of listed capacities, was inapplicable to individual. 31 U.S.C.A. § 5313(a).

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

2. Fraud ⇐68.10(1)

Defendant accused of participating in money laundering scheme did not willfully conceal or falsify material fact when he listed himself on currency transaction report as individual conducting transaction with bank, though transaction may have been carried out on behalf of third party, in that it was defendant who was responsible for carrying out money laundering operation, who received commission for his services, who controlled bank account used, and who was solely authorized to make necessary deposits. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 2(b), 1001.

3. Fraud ⇐68.10(1)
United States ⇐34

Defendant charged with participating in money laundering scheme was not re-

5. While appellant has raised an additional issue, whether the court erred in failing to enter judgment for it because the arbitration awards "draw their essence" from the collective bargaining agreement, we will not discuss this issue because it is lacking in merit. A court can review an arbitral award solely to determine if it "draws its essence from the collective bargaining agreement." See United Steelworkers v. Enterprise Wheel & Car Corp., 363 U.S. 593, 597, 80 S.Ct. 1358, 1361, 4 L.Ed.2d 1424 (1960). However, neither party challenges the validity of either of the two, prior arbitration awards. Furthermore, the union never alleges that the defendants failed to comply with the terms of the Gibson and Sabella awards. The union does not dispute the fact that the defendants complied with the awards by paying the miners the appropriate back pay. Instead, appellant is asking us to enforce the prior awards in this subsequent dispute. As discussed throughout the text of this opinion, this is something we decline to do based on the facts of the instant case.

quired to disclose source of funds involved in transaction on currency transaction report; defendant could reasonably believe that report requirement that he list "organization for whom this transaction was completed" could be satisfied by listing his own organization, whose bank account was being used. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 2(b), 1001.

4. Post Office ⇐48(4)

Allegation that defendant charged with mail fraud in connection with money laundering devised scheme to deprive federal Government of tax dollars was sufficient to allege deprivation of money or property within meaning of mail fraud statute. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1341.

5. Post Office ⇐35(9)

Defendant could be convicted of mail fraud, based upon allegation that he schemed to deprive federal Government of tax revenues, though his tax evading "clients" were in fact undercover government agents and thus Government was not in fact deprived of tax revenues; statute punished scheme to defraud, with ultimate success of scheme being unnecessary to constitute violation. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1341.

6. Conspiracy ⇐43(12)

When indictment alleges conspiracy with multifarious objectives, conviction will be sustained so long as evidence is sufficient to show that defendant agreed to accomplish at least one of the alleged objectives. 18 U.S.C.A. § 371.

7. Conspiracy ⇐33(2)

Defendant charged with conspiracy in connection with his participation in money laundering scheme could be convicted of conspiracy to defraud Government, even if he did not violate substantive currency laws, where there was evidence that defendant and accomplice had engaged in overall scheme to circumvent currency reporting laws and prevent IRS from collecting accurate data, reports and income taxes. 18 U.S.C.A. § 371.

8. Obstructing Justice ⇐4

Defendant could be convicted of obstructing justice, though allegedly influenced grand jury witness was in fact undercover government agent; statute proscribed "endeavor" to influence witness, regardless of defendant's ability to succeed. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1503.

9. Criminal Law ⇐16

Finding that defendant charged with obstructing grand jury possessed requisite corrupt intent to influence administration of justice was sufficiently supported by evidence that defendant, knowing of ongoing grand jury investigation, instructed witness to provide false and misleading testimony to grand jury. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1503.

10. Criminal Law ⇐338(4)

Evidence that money laundering defendant's "clients" were purportedly involved in narcotics trafficking was admissible as serving to explain purpose of and circumstances surrounding money laundering scheme.

CUDAHY, Circuit Judge.

Defendant-appellant Wesley Bucey was convicted of multiple related offenses arising out of an elaborate money laundering scheme designed to ostensibly "legitimize" the source of illegally obtained cash and to evade taxes. Bucey's conviction was based on a twelve-count indictment charging him with conspiracy, 18 U.S.C. section 371; mail and wire fraud, 18 U.S.C. sections 1341, 1343; failure to file currency transaction reports with the Internal Revenue Service ("IRS"), 31 U.S.C. sections 5313, 5322(b); causing false information to be provided to the IRS, 18 U.S.C. sections 2(b), 1001; and attempting to obstruct the administration of a grand jury, 18 U.S.C. section 1503. Bucey appeals his conviction on all counts. We affirm in part and reverse in part.

I.

This is a tale of an illicit money laundering enterprise engineered by defendant Bucey and Boston Witt, a former Attorney General of New Mexico.[1] We shall chronicle the facts, keeping in mind that all evidence and permissible inferences must be taken in the light most favorable to the government. See United States v. Gimbel, 830 F.2d 621, 622 (7th Cir.1987).

Bucey and Witt orchestrated a scheme with dual objectives: money laundering and tax evasion. The money laundering aspect of the operation was designed to provide a method for converting cash from unlawful activities, such as narcotics trafficking, into ostensibly legitimate business income. To carry out this scheme, Bucey set up a tax-exempt organization called the "Huguenot National Church," which was the conduit through which money was laundered.[2] Bucey and Witt charged a commission for these services rendered through the "church."

Bucey and Witt devised two methods for achieving the secondary objective of their scheme, tax evasion. First, they planned to use the Huguenot Church as a facade for directing their clients' illegally obtained cash overseas to the bank accounts of shell corporations. The clients could then spend this money in connection with the "business" of the foreign corporations, thereby avoiding taxation by the United States government. Bucey and Witt also arranged a second tax evasion strategem for persons seeking an illegal tax deduction to purchase art work through Bucey at an established price but to report the purchase at an inflated price through false documentation. Bucey would then accept the property as a sham donation to the Huguenot Church, enabling the purchaser to take an inflated charitable tax deduction.

Bucey and Witt's machinations were unveiled by an extensive undercover investigation. Undercover police officers, John and Don Smith, posed as drug dealers interested in laundering narcotics proceeds. In October 1985, Witt met the Smiths and advised them of a money laundering device by which they could transfer their cash overseas to a shell corporation and avoid paying taxes. Witt also discussed another mode of laundering the Smiths' cash through channels that would generate income purportedly earned by the Smiths for services provided to the Huguenot Church. All transactions would be supported by bogus documentation.

Following the October 1985 meeting, Witt contacted Bucey in Chicago and the two discussed the feasibility of exchanging the Smiths' cash for cashier's checks using the Huguenot Church account. Witt informed Bucey that the Smiths' cash was from a dubious source. Tr. at 221. On November 4, 1985, Witt met the Smiths in Las Vegas and discussed in more detail the money laundering operation. Witt explained Bucey's role in handling the cash and controlling the church's account. Witt proposed that the Smiths launder an initial deposit through a transaction conducted within the United States. Witt and Bucey viewed this as a step preparatory to generating cash for subsequent overseas transactions. See Tr. at 228. Witt instructed the Smiths to take their money to Chicago where Bucey would exchange it (minus a commission) for cashier's checks. Fraudulent documentation would identify the cash-

1. Boston Witt pleaded guilty and was a cooperating witness for the government in this case.

2. The church was an entity operated out of Bucey's home and had no edifice of its own. Upon searching Bucey's home, government agents discovered a "Huguenot National Church" file. Among other items, the file contained several newspaper articles about money laundering, including one entitled "Getting Dirty Money Squeaky Clean." See Government's Brief at 5 n. 4; Government's Exhibits 10A and 23–48; Tr. 1165–66.

ier's checks as income from business activities carried out by the Smiths on behalf of the church.[3] An agreement was made to conduct an initial transaction involving $50,000 at Freedom Federal Savings and Loan ("Freedom Federal") in Chicago on January 6, 1986.

Witt and Bucey met the Smiths in Chicago on January 6 to carry out the laundering transaction at Freedom Federal. Prior to the transaction, Bucey and Witt received $8,000 as part of their 20% commission. Bucey and Don Smith then approached the teller, Smith counted the money, $42,000, and Bucey deposited it into the Huguenot Church account, informing the teller that the money was for medicine and supplies for Mexico earthquake victims. Bucey then drew a check on the church's account for $40,000 to pay for two cashier's checks that were given to the Smiths; $2,000 remained in the church account.[4] Bucey completed a Currency Transaction Report ("CTR") describing the cash deposit. On the CTR form, Bucey listed himself as the "individual conducting the transaction with the bank," and listed the Huguenot National Church as the "organization for whom this transaction was completed." See Appellant's App. at 58. Nowhere did he identify the Smiths as the source of the money.

As a result of the January 6 transaction, Bucey had converted $50,000 of the Smiths' purported drug proceeds into $40,000 in cashier's checks supported by false documentation legitimizing its source. While Bucey and Witt understood that the Smiths would be required to pay taxes on the $40,000, the remaining $10,000 of the Smiths' narcotics income would be unreported.

On January 23, 1986, Bucey and Witt arranged a similar transaction involving Dembitz, a third government agent posing as a drug-trafficking associate of the Smiths. The transaction was carried out at Freedom Federal on February 20, 1986. Bucey deposited $84,000 in the church account and completed a CTR again listing himself as the "individual conducting the transaction" and the Huguenot Church as the "organization for whom this transaction was completed." See Appellant's App. at 60. Bucey then drew three checks totaling $80,000 on the Huguenot Church account in exchange for three cashier's checks in the same amount, which were given to Dembitz. Afterwards, the transaction was similarly documented by false invoices.

This second transaction resulted in Bucey's converting $100,000 of purported drug income into $80,000 supported by documentation legitimizing its source. The remaining $20,000 of Dembitz' drug income was to go unreported.

On April 24, 1986, Dembitz introduced Bucey to a fourth undercover government agent, Ahern, who posed as an investor seeking to avoid taxes through illegal deductions. Bucey advised Ahern of an art donation scam in which Ahern would purchase art with a check for an inflated price and receive 80% back as a kickback in cash. He described how Ahern could then donate the art to Bucey's church and report a charitable deduction for the inflated amount of his cancelled check.[5] When Dembitz expressed concern about excluding Witt from the deal, Bucey responded reassuringly that he and Witt "are a team as far as that goes." Government's Brief

3. Witt and Bucey discussed the details of how the Smiths' money would be deposited in the church's bank account and portrayed as contributions to the church on behalf of earthquake disaster victims. Bucey was then to funnel the money back to the Smiths as a fee for services never rendered and provide the corresponding false documentation.

4. Later, Bucey described to the Smiths how the church insulated them from IRS detection. He explained that had the Smiths themselves simply brought in $40,000 and purchased cashier's checks for cash, the bank would be required to report that the Smiths purchased the checks. By writing a check on the church's account to pay for the cashier's checks, however, Bucey explained that there would be no report identifying the Smiths. Government's Brief at 11; Government's Exhibit 4A, at 20–21.

5. Ahern would retain possession of the art work, which would display a plaque stating that it was "on loan from the Huguenot National Church." See Government's Brief at 20; Government's Exhibit 13A, at 90.

at 20; Government's Exhibit 8A, at 18. Bucey later discussed the art deal with Witt, who wanted to ensure that the transaction ran smoothly. Tr. at 764–65.

Witt was eventually arrested on charges involving cocaine trafficking. Thereafter, agent Dembitz notified Bucey by telephone that he had been served with a grand jury subpoena ordering him to produce documents relating to Bucey and the Huguenot Church. Bucey requested that Dembitz send him the subpoena. Bucey then advised Dembitz to rehearse his grand jury testimony with an attorney. Bucey instructed Dembitz that, "You will discuss with the attorney how you raised funds in dribs and drabs for the Huguenot Church and then went over—went over into Mexico and bought—bought goods for those earthquake victims with funds—you know, funds in Mexico, and that you got reimbursed—you brought in the money that you raised and got reimbursed for your out-of-pocket expenses by check from the Huguenot Church." Government's Brief at 22; Government's Exhibit 18A, at 4. In a later discussion, Bucey reiterated that Dembitz should adhere to the story that he had performed services on behalf of the church. Id. at 23; Tr. at 842.

Bucey's escapades led to a grand jury indictment on twelve counts: count 1—conspiracy; counts 2–5—mail fraud; counts 6–7—wire fraud; counts 8–9—failure to file CTRs in violation of 31 U.S.C. sections 5313 and 5322(b); counts 10–11—causing false information to be provided to the government in violation of 18 U.S.C. sections 2(b) and 1001; and count 12—attempting to influence, obstruct or impede the administration of a grand jury.

A jury convicted Bucey on all twelve counts. He was sentenced to five years' imprisonment on each of counts 1–9, to run concurrently, and two years' imprisonment on each of counts 10 and 11, to run concurrently with each other, but consecutively to the sentences on counts 1–9. On count 12, he was placed on probation for five years and fined $600.00. Bucey has appealed on all counts.

II.

A. Failure to File CTRs

Counts 8 and 9 charge, respectively, that on January 6, 1986, and February 20, 1986, Bucey and Witt, while acting in their capacity as a "financial institution," received currency in excess of $10,000 and knowingly and intentionally failed to file the required CTRs with the IRS in violation of 31 U.S.C. sections 5313 and 5322(b).[6] It is undisputed that on both occasions Bucey completed CTRs upon depositing the currency at Freedom Federal, which the bank then properly filed with the IRS. But, irrespective of those bank filings, the government contends that Bucey himself had an independent legal duty to file CTRs when he received the currency from the third-party government agents. These charges are predicated on the theory that Bucey is a "financial institution." Whether an individual acting in Bucey's capacity can be charged as a "financial institution" under the currency reporting laws is a question of first impression in this circuit.[7] The

6. With respect to the violation of 31 U.S.C. section 5322(b), a penalty enhancement provision, the indictment alleges that the failure to file CTRs offense was part of a pattern of illegal activity involving currency transactions exceeding $100,000, and was committed while violating another law of the United States, 18 U.S.C. section 1001.

Section 5322(b) states in pertinent part:

A person willfully violating this subchapter or a regulation prescribed under this subchapter ... while violating another law of the United States or as part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than $100,000 in a 12-month period, shall be fined not more than $500,000, imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

7. As a preliminary matter, we reject the government's argument that, because Bucey's tendered jury instructions defining "financial institution" were given to the jury without objection, Bucey has failed to preserve this issue for appeal. In a pretrial motion to dismiss the indictment, Bucey initially raised the issue whether, as a matter of law, he could be considered a "financial institution" under the currency reporting laws or regulations promulgated under them. Because the court rejected this challenge to the government's definition of "financial institution," it would have been futile for Bucey to object to the jury instruction. "If the problem has been brought to the attention of the court, and the court has indicated in no uncertain terms what its views sufficiency of the indictment under the currency reporting laws and regulations, of course, raises questions of law for our de novo review. See United States v. Gimbel, 830 F.2d 621 (7th Cir.1987); United States v. Varbel, 780 F.2d 758 (9th Cir. 1986).

To be valid, an indictment must allege acts which, if proven, would constitute an offense under the law that the defendant is charged with violating. If the indictment does not charge such a cognizable offense, of course, we must reverse any subsequent conviction based on that indictment. Gimbel, 830 F.2d at 624 (citing McNally v. United States, 483 U.S. 350, 107 S.Ct. 2875, 97 L.Ed.2d 292 (1987)). Accordingly, we must determine whether the acts alleged in counts 8 and 9 establish a violation of the currency reporting laws by a "financial institution."

We begin by examining the plain meaning of the statutes and regulations. "[I]n determining the scope of a statute, one is to look first at its language. If the language is unambiguous, ... it is to be regarded as conclusive unless there is a clearly expressed legislative intent to the contrary." Dickerson v. New Banner Institute, Inc., 460 U.S. 103, 110, 103 S.Ct. 986, 74 L.Ed.2d 845 (1983), reh'g denied, 461 U.S. 911, 103 S.Ct. 1887, 76 L.Ed.2d 815 (1983).

The Currency Transactions Reporting Act, 31 U.S.C. section 5313, and its implementing regulations provide specific rules designating who is responsible for filing CTRs. See California Bankers Ass'n v. Schultz, 416 U.S. 21, 26, 94 S.Ct. 1494, 1500, 39 L.Ed.2d 812 (1974). Section 5313 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to require domestic financial institutions, and any other participants that the Secretary may prescribe, engaged in transactions for the payment, receipt or transfer of United States currency, to report this currency to the Secretary.[8] Pursuant to this authority there are Treasury regulations directing financial institutions to "file a report of each deposit [or] withdrawal ... which involves a transaction of more than $10,000." 31 C.F.R. § 103.22(a) (1986).[9] In 1986, when the acts charged in the indictment occurred, a financial institution subject to the reporting requirements was defined in 31 C.F.R. section 103.11(e) as follows:

> Financial institution. Each agency, branch, or office within the United States of any person doing business in one or more of the capacities listed below:
> (1) A bank ...;
>
> (2) A broker or dealer in securities;
>
> (3) A person who engages as a business in dealing in or exchanging currency as, for example, a dealer in foreign exchange or a person engaged primarily in the cashing of checks;
>
> (4) A person who engages as a business in the issuing, selling, or redeeming of travelers' checks, money orders or similar instruments ...;

Title 31 U.S.C. section 5312(a)(2) defines "financial institution" to include banks, thrifts, brokers, currency exchangers, travel agents, and other such establishments.

are, to require an objection would exalt form over substance." United States v. Pirovolos, 844 F.2d 415, 424 n. 8 (7th Cir.1988).

8. Title 31 U.S.C. section 5313(a) states in relevant part:

> When a domestic financial institution is involved in a transaction for the payment, receipt, or transfer of United States coins or currency ... in an amount ... prescribe[d] by regulation, the institution and any other participant in the transaction the Secretary may prescribe shall file a report on the transaction at the time and in the way the Secretary prescribes. A participant acting for another person shall make the report as the agent or bailee of the person and identify the person for whom the transaction is being made. [emphasis supplied].

9. 31 C.F.R. section 103.22, as in effect during the relevant time period, provided in part:

> (a) Each financial institution shall file a report of each deposit, withdrawal, exchange of currency or other payment or transfer, by, through, or to such financial institution, which involves a transaction in currency of more than $10,000. Such reports shall be made on forms prescribed by the Secretary and all information called for in the forms shall be furnished.

(5) A licensed transmitter of funds, or other person engaged in the business of transmitting funds abroad for others;

(6) A [licensed] casino....[10]

Id. (emphasis supplied).

The indictment alleges that Bucey and Witt were persons acting as a "financial institution" by engaging as a business in dealing in currency and in transmitting funds abroad for others. Indictment ¶ 1(c) at 1–2. Bucey claims that the indictment is legally deficient and, alternatively, that the evidence established at trial on this count was insufficient to support his conviction.

[1] There is little case authority directly establishing whether an individual acting in Bucey's capacity could be criminally prosecuted as a "financial institution" under the currency laws in effect at the time of the offense alleged here. Most cases involving money laundering operations have involved the separate issue whether an individual engaged in money laundering can be derivatively liable under 18 U.S.C. section 2(b)[11] for causing what is indubitably a "financial institution" to fail to file an accurate CTR as required by the currency reporting laws. Yet these cases are replete with intimations that an individual such as Bucey could not be prosecuted as a "financial institution." For example, in United States v. Gimbel, 830 F.2d 621 (7th Cir.1987), this court noted the government's concession that Gimbel, a lawyer who allegedly structured currency transactions for his clients in order to launder proceeds from narcotics trafficking and to conceal income from the IRS, had no independent duty to file a CTR reflecting the structured nature of the transactions. See id. at 624 n. 2. Instead, the government sought, albeit unsuccessfully, to convict Gimbel under 18 U.S.C. sections 2(b) and 1001[12] for causing a bank to conceal information, namely, CTRs, from the IRS.[13]

Likewise, in United States v. Mastronardo, 849 F.2d 799 (3d Cir.1988), defendants who had engaged in a multimillion dollar bookmaking and money laundering operation were charged with structuring currency transactions to avoid having financial institutions file CTRs. The defendants themselves were not charged as a "financial institution"; rather, the government charged them on a derivative theory for violating 18 U.S.C. sections 2(b) and 1001. The Third Circuit stated:

> conceals or covers up by any trick, scheme, or device a material fact, or makes any false, fictitious or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious or fraudulent statement or entry, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

10. In 1987, the regulations defining a financial institution were amended to provide in pertinent part:

> Financial institution. Each agent, agency, branch, or office within the U.S. of any person doing business, whether or not on a regular basis or as an organized business concern, in one or more of the capacities listed below:
>
> . . . . . .
>
> (3) A currency dealer or exchanger, including a person engaged in the business of a check casher; ...
>
> . . . . . .
> (5) A licensed transmitter of funds, or other person engaged in the business of transmitting funds;....

See 52 Fed.Reg. No. 67, at 11436 (April 8, 1987). Of course, because this amendment was not in effect at the time Bucey committed the alleged violations, it is not controlling.

11. Title 18 U.S.C. section 2(b) establishes that a person who causes another to commit an offense against the United States is chargeable as a principal.

12. Title 18 U.S.C. section 1001 provides:

> Whoever, in any matter within the jurisdiction of any department or agency of the United States knowingly and willfully falsifies,

13. In Gimbel, the defendant received funds from his clients in excess of $10,000 but then structured separate withdrawal and deposit transactions with the bank so that each transaction involved less than $10,000. Gimbel structured the transactions in this manner so that the bank would not be required to file CTRs under the currency reporting laws. The events in Gimbel arose before the Treasury Department promulgated new regulations requiring financial institutions to aggregate structured transactions of this sort. Because the bank had no duty, prior to these new regulations, to aggregate multiple deposits and withdrawals which exceeded $10,000 and to file the corresponding CTRs, this court concluded that Gimbel could not be liable for causing a financial institution to fail to disclose material facts on CTRs to the IRS. See also United States v. Risk, 843 F.2d 1059 (7th Cir.1988).

> Although the statute authorizes the Secretary to draft regulations requiring "participants" in transactions to file CTRs, the Secretary did not do so. Rather, the Secretary enacted regulations which, by their explicit language place a duty to file CTRs only on financial institutions. The regulations do not even intimate that a bank customer might somehow be violating the law if he structures his transactions so as to avoid making a transaction in currency greater than $10,000.... "[T]he present ambiguity regarding coverage of the Reporting Act and its regulations has indeed been created by the government itself."

Heyman*, 794 F.2d 788, 790–91 (2d Cir. 1986) (government conceded, and court stated in dicta, that defendant, a Merrill Lynch account executive who devised scheme to structure customers' transactions in amounts less than $10,000 in circumvention of the currency reporting laws, had no legal duty to file CTRs), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 989, 107 S.Ct. 585, 93 L.Ed. 2d 587 (1986); United States v. Varbel, 780 F.2d 758, 762 (9th Cir.1986) (defendants engaged in money laundering had no duty to report currency transactions to or through the bank); United States v. Denemark, 779 F.2d 1559, 1561 (11th Cir.1986) (dicta); United States v. Shearson Lehman Bros., Inc., 650 F.Supp. 490, 495, 500 (E.D.Pa.1986) (dicta), aff'd in part and rev'd in part sub nom. United States v. Mastronardo, 849 F.2d 799 (3d Cir.1988); United States v. Richter, 610 F.Supp. 480, 487 n. 4 (N.D. Ill.1985) (dicta), *aff'd without op. sub nom. United States v. The only case in this circuit directly re[illegible] solving this question is United States v. Riky, 669 F.Supp. 196 (N.D. Ill.1987). There, the defendant had engaged in a money laundering scheme in which he received commissions for assisting others in concealing the source of income from narcotics trafficking. Focusing on the opening language of 31 C.F.R. section 103.11(e),[14] the court held that, because the defendant was not an "agency, branch, or office" of any person doing business in one of the subsequently listed capacities, she was not a "financial institution." A later amendment to the regulation, adding the term "agent" to the definition of "financial institution," indicated that the government had not previously believed that the CTR filing obligation applied to individuals. Id. at 200. Accordingly, the court dismissed the indictment. Id. See also United States v. Gimbel, 632 F.Supp. 713, 721 n. 10 (E.D. Wis.1984), rev'd on other grounds, 830 F.2d 621 (7th Cir.1987) (the "plain meaning of the term 'financial institution,' as it is defined by statute and regulation, would be strained to cover a person such as Gimbel," who had engaged in a money laundering scheme) (dicta).

The First Circuit took a similar tack in United States v. Anzalone, 766 F.2d 676 (1st Cir.1985). There, the defendant "structured" transactions with the bank so that each involved less than $10,000; hence, the bank did not file CTRs. The First Circuit reversed his conviction and dismissed the indictment, which charged him personally with failing to file CTRs in violation of 31 U.S.C. section 5313, with causing the bank to fail to file CTRs in violation of 18 U.S.C. section 2(b) and with causing the bank to conceal material facts from the IRS in violation of 18 U.S.C. sections 2(b) and 1001. See id. at 679–8[illegible] The court concluded that, since the currency regulations limited application of the reporting requirements to financial institutions only, the defendant had no indepen[illegible] dent duty to file CTRs. Id. at 681, 683.[15] Cf. United States v. Robinson, 832 F.2d 1165 (9th Cir.1987) (bank teller, who was acting as a private individual and was not charged with operating a currency exchange business, was not a financial institution within currency laws and, thus, had no duty to file CTRs).

However, several other circuits have disagreed. For example, in United States v. Goldberg, 756 F.2d 949 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 472 U.S. 1009, 105 S.Ct. 2706, 86 L.Ed.2d 721 (1985), the Second Circuit held that three defendants engaged in money laundering, including two bank officers, constituted a "financial institution," namely, a partnership or joint venture engaged as a business in dealing in currency.[16] The court adverted to the legislative history of the Bank Secrecy Act, 31 U.S.C. section 5311 et seq., which indicated a design to provide a sweeping law enforcement tool for locating large currency transfers of proceeds from unlawful transactions. See id. at 954–55 (citing H.R.Rep. No. 975, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. 11–12, reprinted in 1970 U.S.Code Cong. & Ad.News 4394, 4396–97). The court divined an intent to reach a vast range of criminal conduct and to grant the Secretary broad authority to impose reporting requirements. Id. at 954–55 (citing 116 Cong.Rec. 16957 (1970) (statement of Rep. Burton)). Relying on this legislative history, the court held that the defendants qualified as a "financial institution."

The Eighth, Ninth and Eleventh Circuits have also on occasion broadly construed the term "financial institution" in the money laundering context. In United States v. Hernando Ospina, 798 F.2d 1570 (11th Cir. 1986), the defendant, who provided a money laundering service in which he exchanged approximately $1.3 million for Colombian pesos for a total commission of $52,000, was deemed a "financial institution," namely, a "person who engages as a business in dealing in or exchanging currency." Likewise, in United States v. Mouzin, 785 F.2d 682 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 985, 107 S.Ct. 574, 93 L.Ed. 2d 577 (1986), the Ninth Circuit held that a defendant who participated in an extensive money laundering and cocaine conspiracy qualified as a "financial institution" by virtue of her role in transferring currency across the country and overseas in an ostensibly legitimate business venture. The Mouzin court focused on the language in 31 C.F.R. section 103.11, which relates the definition of a "financial institution" to a "person who engages as a business in dealing in or exchanging currency as, for example, a dealer in foreign exchange or a person engaged primarily in the cashing of checks" and a "person engaged in the business of transmitting funds abroad." Id. at 689. See also United States v. Cuevas, 847 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir.1988) (extensive money laundering operation with several international offices constitutes a "financial institution"), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 109 S.Ct. 1122, 103 L.Ed.2d 185 (1989); United States v. Dela Espriella, 781 F.2d 1432 (9th Cir.1986) (defendant, a kingpin of an intricate money laundering operation who delivered cash in excess of $10,000 to his couriers, qualified as a "financial institution" possessing a duty to file CTRs). But cf. United States v. Rob-

15. In addition, the court held that the regulations did not impose a duty on the defendant to inform the bank of the structured nature of his transactions. The court explained:

> Although this court, like all other institutions of the United States, is supportive of the law enforcement goals of the government and society, we cannot engage in unprincipled interpretation of the law, lest we foment lawlessness instead of compliance. Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 361, 103 S.Ct. 1855, 1860, 75 L.Ed.2d 903 (1983). This is particularly so when the confusion and uncertainty in this law has been caused by the government itself, and when the solution to that situation, namely eliminating any perceived loop holes, lies completely within the government's control.

Anzalone, 766 F.2d at 682.

16. The court noted in dicta that even assuming that the indictment charged each defendant individually as a "financial institution," the defendants would be encompassed by the language of the regulations which specifically applied to "a person." Nevertheless, the court held that it need not decide that issue because, at the very least, the three defendants acted as a partnership and joint venture, an entity from which Congress sought to require CTRs. See Goldberg, 756 F.2d at 955.

inson, 832 F.2d 1165 (9th Cir.1987); United States v. Varbel, 780 F.2d 758 (9th Cir. 1986). The Eighth Circuit has reflected a similar perspective. See United States v. Hawley, 855 F.2d 595, 602 (8th Cir.1988) (husband and wife team engaged in "warehouse banking" services constitute "financial institution"; "currency dealers or exchangers who act as middlemen between individuals and commercial banks can appropriately be defined as 'financial institutions' under section 103.11(e)(3), and convicted for failing to [file CTRs]"), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 109 S.Ct. 1141, 103 L.Ed.2d 202 (1989).

Some of these cases may be factually distinguishable; but, more importantly, none attempts to make sense of the directly operative "agency, branch, or office" language, which controls the definition contained in section 103.11(e). This language (which has subsequently been expanded) requires that, in order to qualify as a "financial institution," the defendant must be an "agency, branch, or office" of a person acting in one of the listed capacities. This language, which was relied upon in Riky, 669 F.Supp. 196 (N.D. Ill.1987), is clearly inapplicable to an individual. Moreover, our opinion in Gimbel is presumably premised on the assumption that an individual cannot be charged as a "financial institution." See 830 F.2d at 624 n. 2.

We are, of course, cognizant of the purpose underlying the Currency Transactions Reporting Act: "Congress recognized the importance of reports of large and unusual currency transactions in ferreting out criminal activity and desired to strengthen the statutory basis for requiring such reports." California Bankers Ass'n v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 38, 94 S.Ct. 1494, 1506, 39 L.Ed.2d 812 (1974). Nonetheless, it is not the role of the judiciary to "strengthen" the basis for requiring CTRs beyond that expressly provided by statute and regulation.

> If the government wishes to impose a duty on customers, or "other participants in the transaction," to report [currency] transactions, let it require so in plain language. It should not attempt to impose such a duty by implication, expecting that the courts will stretch statutory construction past the breaking point to accommodate the government's interpretation.

United States v. Anzalone, 766 F.2d at 682.

It is clear from the language of 31 C.F.R. section 103.22 that only financial institutions as defined are required to file CTRs. Therefore, it would be improper for us to resort to the legislative history as a basis for applying the regulation to entities other than those specified in it. Varbel, 780 F.2d at 762.[17] Accordingly, we conclude that the terms of the statute and regulations in

17. In response to the apparent inefficacy of the Bank Secrecy Act as a basis for imposing criminal liability on individuals engaged in money laundering, Congress enacted the Money Laundering Control Act of 1986. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 1956, 1957; 31 U.S.C. § 5324. Among other things, the Money Laundering Act prohibits individual bank customers from structuring transactions to circumvent CTR filing requirements. See 31 U.S.C. § 5324. See generally Comment, The Money Laundering Control Act of 1986: Tainted Money and the Criminal Defense Lawyer, 19 Pac. L.J. 171 (1987).

It is also worth noting that, in the Internal Revenue Code, Congress has explicitly imposed an independent reporting burden on individual persons who receive in excess of $10,000. See 26 U.S.C. § 6050I (West Supp.1989). This section provides in pertinent part:

> (a) Cash receipts of more than $10,000.00
> —Any person—
> (1) who is engaged in a trade or business, and
> (2) who, in the course of such trade or business, receives more than $10,000 in cash in 1 transaction (or 2 or more related transactions), > shall make the return described in subsection (b) with respect to such transaction (or related transactions) at such time as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe.

This statute specifically excludes financial institutions subject to the reporting requirements of title 31. See 26 U.S.C. § 6050I(c)(1). Of course this provision is inapplicable to the present case involving a conviction under 31 U.S.C. section 5313, a provision which does not by its express terms address the conduct of persons other than financial institutions. See United States v. Denemark, 779 F.2d 1559, 1563–64 (11th Cir.1986); United States v. Perlmutter, 656 F.Supp. 782, 788 (S.D.N.Y.1987), aff'd without op., 835 F.2d 1430 (2d Cir.1987), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 108 S.Ct. 1110, 99 L.Ed.2d 271 (1988).

existence at the relevant time did not impose a duty on Bucey to file CTRs.[18] To countenance the government's theory of prosecution imposing such a duty would deprive Bucey of his due process right to fair notice of the criminality of a failure to file. See Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 103 S.Ct. 1855, 75 L.Ed.2d 903 (1983).[19] Hence, we conclude that the allegations contained in counts 8 and 9 of the indictment, charging Bucey as a "financial institution" with a duty to file CTRs, are legally insufficient to establish violations of 31 U.S.C. sections 5313 and 5322(b). Bucey's conviction on these counts must therefore be reversed and the indictment insofar as it relates to these counts dismissed.

B. Concealing and Falsifying Material Facts on CTRs

Counts 10 and 11 of the indictment charge Bucey with causing the concealment and falsification of material facts within the jurisdiction of the IRS in violation of 18 U.S.C. sections 2(b) and 1001.[20] Under section 1001, concealment violations "relate to the nondisclosure of statements required by statute, government regulation or form." United States v. Tobon-Builes, 706 F.2d 1092, 1096 (11th Cir.1983) (citations omitted). During each deposit transaction at Freedom Federal on January 6, 1986, and February 20, 1986, Bucey completed the required CTR on Form 4789, which was prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. See 31 C.F.R. § 103.25(a). Part I of Form 4789 requests the identity of the "individual conducting the transaction with the financial institution," while Part II requests the identity of the "individual or organization for whom this transaction was completed." See Appellant's App. at 58, 60.[21] Bucey listed himself as the individual conducting the transaction and Huguenot National Church as the individual or organization for whom the transaction was completed. See id. The indictment charges that, by completing the form in this manner, Bucey intentionally concealed the true identity of the individual who conducted the transaction and the individual for whom the transaction was completed. See Indictment ¶¶ 3, 4 at 25, ¶¶ 3, 4 at 26. In response to Bucey's motion to dismiss these counts of the indictment for failure to state an offense, the district court cursorily determined that the allegations of active concealment of material facts that were required to be disclosed sufficiently stated a criminal offense.

[2] The government submits that, based upon the evidence established at trial, a jury could have rationally concluded that the individual who conducted the transaction in each instance was the undercover agent, not Bucey, and that, therefore, Bucey had lied in completing Form 4789. The government relies primarily on the evidence that the agent physically carried the money into the bank, assisted in counting it, and received cashier's checks as a result of the transaction. We do not think these facts are probative. While the agent may have carried the money into the bank, it was Bucey who was responsible for carrying out the money laundering operation, who received a commission for his services, who controlled the Huguenot Church account and who was solely autho-

18. At the very least, we think that the language contained in the statute, regulations and legislative history is "ambiguous, leaving us unable to define the ambit of the criminal statute[; therefore,] the Rule of Lenity requires that we strictly construe the statute in favor of the defendant." United States v. Lowe, 860 F.2d 1370, 1376 (7th Cir.1988) (citing United States v. Turkette, 452 U.S. 576, 587 n. 10, 101 S.Ct. 2524, 2531 n. 10, 69 L.Ed.2d 246 (1981)), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 109 S.Ct. 1639, 104 L.Ed.2d 155 (1989).

19. Conceptually, the government's theory is somewhat anomalous. Essentially, the argument is that Bucey was a walking "financial institution" so that when he received the cash from the agents at Freedom Federal, a duty attached requiring him to file a CTR in addition to the one he would complete immediately upon depositing the money. We do not think the regulations contemplate such a scenario.

20. See supra notes 11–12.

21. This language resembles the language contained in 31 U.S.C. section 5313(a), which provides: "A participant acting for another person shall make the report as the agent or bailee of the person and identify the person for whom the transaction is being made."

rized to make the necessary deposits. Therefore, we do not think a rational juror could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that Bucey willfully concealed or falsified a material fact when he listed himself as the individual conducting the transaction with the bank.

[3] A closer question is whether Part II of Form 4789 required Bucey to disclose that the agents were the "individual[s] or organization for whom this transaction was completed." In essence, the issue is whether Bucey had a duty to reveal the source of the funds involved in the transaction.

In United States v. Gimbel, 632 F.Supp. 713, 721 n. 10 (E.D. Wis.1984), rev'd on other grounds, 830 F.2d 621 (7th Cir.1987), the district court held that the law did not require the defendant, an attorney engaged in money laundering, to disclose on CTRs the real parties in interest in connection with currency transactions. In dismissing this count of the indictment, the court concluded:

> Under the plain meaning of the regulations implementing the Bank Secrecy Act, Gimbel and others similarly situated would not have notice that they must reveal the identities of the real parties in interest to domestic currency transactions made through their trust accounts.

Id. at 723.

Similarly, in United States v. Murphy, 809 F.2d 1427 (9th Cir.1987), the Ninth Circuit held that the law did not clearly impose a duty on the defendant to disclose the source of the funds on CTR Form 4789. In Murphy, the defendant was charged with conspiring to conceal and falsify material facts within the jurisdiction of the IRS by "falsely identifying the source of the deposited funds as ATC, although he knew the money came from undercover IRS agents." Id. at 1429. The court noted that ATC had an account at the bank where the money was deposited, and that an ambiguity in the instructions on the CTR could reasonably lead a depositor to fill out the form as the defendant did in the challenged transaction.[22] The court concluded that the directions on Form 4789 "could easily lead noncriminal participants in CTR transactions to believe that they were required only to name the holder of the account." Id. at 1431. As the Murphy court reasoned:

> Due process requires that penal statutes define criminal offenses with sufficient clarity that an ordinary person can understand what conduct is prohibited. Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 357 [103 S.Ct. 1855, 1858, 75 L.Ed.2d 903] (1983). Section 5313 and its regulations do not clearly require depositors to identify the source of their funds. Therefore, the imposition of criminal sanctions on these facts would violate due process. Cf. Varbel, 780 F.2d at 762.

Murphy, 809 F.2d at 1431.

We agree with the reasoning and result of the Ninth Circuit in Murphy and the district court in Gimbel. Bucey deposited cash into the Huguenot Church account and, accordingly, listed the church as the "organization for whom this transaction was completed." We do not think the language of the statute, regulations or Form

> [B]efore effecting any transaction with respect to which a report is required the financial institution shall verify and record the name and address of the individual presenting a transaction, as well as record the identity, account number, and the social security or taxpayer identification number, if any, of any person or entity for whose or which account such transaction is to be effected. [emphasis supplied].

We think that the language contained in Part II was sufficiently ambiguous to preclude notice to a reasonable depositor of the duty to disclose the source of the funds.

22. The ambiguity arose out of language contained in the explanatory instructions to Part II, which referred to "the identity ... of the individual or organization for whose account the transaction is being made." Murphy, 809 F.2d at 1430. The court reasoned that the emphasized phrase could mean "for whose bank account," in which case the defendant truthfully responded "ATC," the nominal account holder. Id. These instructions were not introduced into evidence in the case at bar. See Tr. at 524. Nevertheless, the regulation in effect at the time of Bucey's actions contained the same language as that included on the form in Murphy. In a section labeled "Identification required," title 31 C.F.R. section 103.27 provided in pertinent part:

4789 was sufficiently clear for an ordinary person to understand that listing the undercover agents was required. Thus, because neither Bucey nor the bank had a duty to report the source of the money in Part II of Form 4789, there was no concealment or falsification of material facts in violation of 18 U.S.C. sections 2(b) and 1001. Accordingly, Bucey's conviction for this offense must be reversed and counts 10 and 11 dismissed.

C. Mail and Wire Fraud Counts

Bucey raises two principal objections in connection with the mail and wire fraud counts.[23] First, he contends that the indictment is legally insufficient to allege a violation of the mail and wire fraud statutes because it does not adequately charge loss of property by the government. Alternatively, he argues that, even if the indictment sufficiently alleges violations of the mail and wire fraud statutes, the government failed to prove at trial that the government in fact did or would have lost income tax revenue as a consequence of Bucey's actions.

In McNally v. United States, 483 U.S. 350, 107 S.Ct. 2875, 97 L.Ed.2d 292 (1987), the Supreme Court held that the mail fraud statute is limited to schemes "aimed at causing deprivations of money or property." Id., 107 S.Ct. at 2881. Hence, the McNally Court determined that the citizen's intangible right to honest government is not a protectible property right for purposes of mail fraud. The Court has since made clear, however, that "property" may comprise both tangible and intangible property rights. See Carpenter v. United States, 484 U.S. 19, 108 S.Ct. 316, 98 L.Ed.2d 275 (1987) (holding that confidential business information constitutes "property" protected by the mail and wire fraud statutes). Thus, the fact that the government's interest in unpaid taxes is intangible is no definitive obstacle to a mail or wire fraud conviction. See United States v. Porcelli, 865 F.2d 1352, 1360 (2d Cir.1989). The determinative inquiry is whether Bucey's money laundering scheme defrauded the federal government of a property right, thereby injuring the government in its role as a "property-holder." See McNally, 107 S.Ct. at 2882 n. 9.

With respect to the mail fraud counts, the indictment alleges that Bucey "devised and intended to devise a scheme and artifice to defraud the United States of money and property, that is, income taxes." Indictment ¶ 2 at 8. Bucey argues that this allegation does not satisfy the McNally standard because the federal government does not possess a cognizable "property interest" in income taxes due and owing.

In United States v. Gimbel, 830 F.2d 621, 627 n. 3 (7th Cir.1987), this court specifically left open the question whether a scheme to deprive the federal government of tax dollars is cognizable under McNally. The indictment in Gimbel did not charge that the defendant's scheme deprived the Treasury Department of money or property. Instead, the indictment alleged that the scheme consisted of depriving the Treasury Department of CTRs and other "accurate and truthful information and data." The government had argued that because Gimbel's scheme concealed information from the Treasury Department which, if disclosed, might have resulted in the Department's assessing tax deficiencies, Gimbel in effect deprived the Treasury of tax revenues. Gimbel, 830 F.2d at 626. This court rejected the government's theory, relying on the principle of McNally that the mail fraud statute does not proscribe schemes to defraud entities of intangible rights. Because the jury was not required to find that the scheme resulted in the government's being deprived of money or property, the court reversed Gimbel's mail fraud conviction. Id. Likewise, in United States v. Eckhardt, 843 F.2d 989, 996 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 109 S.Ct. 106, 102 L.Ed.2d 81 (1988), this court concluded that an allegation that the defendant's scheme was devised "[t]o defraud the United States by impeding ... the functions of the Internal Revenue Service in the ascertainment, computation, assessment and collection of the revenue, to wit, income taxes" would not, in itself, satisfy McNally. However, the indictment in Eckhardt had alleged multiple objectives, one of which was "[t]o obtain money and property [from investors] by false and fraudulent representations and pretenses...." Id. Thus, this court concluded, "The failure of the indictment to allege an underlying scheme to defraud the government of money or property is not fatal because it does allege a scheme to defraud the investors of money or property." Id. at 997. Arguably, this language reflects the Eckhardt court's view that, had the indictment specifically alleged that the government was defrauded of money or property, it would have comported with the McNally standard.

23. The mail fraud statute, 18 U.S.C. section 1341, states in pertinent part:

> Whoever, having devised or intending to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud, or for obtaining money or property by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises, ... for the purpose of executing such scheme or artifice or attempting so to do [uses the mails or causes them to be used,] shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Our analysis of Bucey's conviction under the mail fraud statute, counts 2 through 5, also applies to his conviction on counts 6 and 7 under the corollary wire fraud statute, 18 U.S.C. section 1343. See United States v. Gimbel, 830 F.2d 621, 627 (7th Cir.1987) (citing United States v. Feldman, 711 F.2d 758, 763 n. 1 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 939, 104 S.Ct. 352, 78 L.Ed.2d 317 (1983)).

In response to Bucey's motion to dismiss the mail and wire fraud counts of the indictment, the district court determined that the allegations sufficiently charged a cognizable loss of money or property. The district court relied on the general principle that the government has a property right in tax revenues on the date that they accrue. See Manning v. Seeley Tube & Box Co., 338 U.S. 561, 566, 70 S.Ct. 386, 389, 94 L.Ed. 346 (1950) ("Congress intended the United States to have the use of money lawfully due when it became due."). Similarly, in United States v. Doe, 867 F.2d 986 (7th Cir.1989), we held that a scheme to deprive Cook County of its tax revenues satisfied the McNally money or property interest test. See id. at 989 ("Under Illinois law, Cook County has a property interest in its collected and uncollected tax revenues.").

Although no other circuit court has conclusively resolved this issue, the Fifth Circuit has stated in dicta that "[c]ertainly a scheme to defraud the United States of taxes would meet the 'money or property' requirement of McNally...." United States v. Herron, 825 F.2d 50, 56 (5th Cir.1987). Moreover, the district court in United States v. Regan, 699 F.Supp. 36, 40 (S.D.N.Y.1988), expressly held that the government did indeed have a McNally property interest in income taxes due and owing. The Regan court reasoned:

> The alleged purpose of the [defendant's] transactions was to defraud the [U.S.] government of tax revenue. The defendants argue that this cannot be characterized as a scheme to defraud the government of property, because the government's property interest in tax revenue does not vest until a tax deficiency is declared. Whether the government had a vested property interest during the life of the scheme is irrelevant. If the alleged scheme had been brought to fruition, it would have fraudulently deprived the government of tax receipts. That was the alleged purpose of the scheme. Surely that putative monetary detriment satisfies the McNally requirement.

699 F.Supp. at 40.

[4] The reasoning of Regan and Doe is sound and we affirm the determination of the district court that the allegation in the indictment charging Bucey with devising a scheme "to defraud the United States of money and property, that is, income taxes" satisfies the McNally "money or property" requirement.[24]

24. In Gimbel, we left open the issue whether a scheme to deprive the federal government of tax dollars is cognizable in light of footnote 4 of McNally, which states, "The Government concedes that it was error for the District Court to include the instruction on tax fraud in the substantive mail fraud instruction ... but the effect of that error is not now at issue." 107 S.Ct. at 2878 n. 4. We conclude that footnote 4 of McNally does not foreclose a mail fraud convic

[5] Bucey's second objection to his conviction for mail and wire fraud is that there was insufficient proof at trial that the United States actually did lose or would have lost tax revenues. Obviously, since Bucey's tax-evading "clients" in this case were undercover government agents, the government was not in fact deprived of tax revenues. Nevertheless, since the mail fraud statute punishes the scheme to defraud, this court has reiterated on numerous occasions that the ultimate success of the fraud and the actual defrauding of a victim are not necessary prerequisites to a successful mail fraud prosecution. See Moore v. United States, 865 F.2d 149, 153 n. 1 (7th Cir.1989); Ward v. United States, 845 F.2d 1459, 1462 (7th Cir.1988); United States v. Keane, 522 F.2d 534, 545 (7th Cir.1975), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 976, 96 S.Ct. 1481, 47 L.Ed.2d 746 (1976). Consequently, the fact that the government was not actually deprived of tax revenues does not warrant reversal of Bucey's conviction.

tion based on a scheme to defraud the federal government of income taxes. In McNally, the district court had erroneously instructed the jury that, in order to convict for mail fraud, the jury had to find that the defendant impeded the IRS' collection of income taxes. This instruction was legally incorrect because the district court had previously dismissed those mail fraud counts alleging tax fraud objectives due to the government's failure to charge that the tax returns involved were fraudulent. Thus, footnote 4 is irrelevant to the issue at bar. See McNally, 107 S.Ct. at 2878 n. 2; United States v. Gray, 790 F.2d 1290, 1297–98 (6th Cir.1986), rev'd sub nom. McNally v. United States, 483 U.S. 350, 107 S.Ct. 2875, 97 L.Ed.2d 292 (1987); Brief of United States at 9–10 n. 9, McNally v. United States, 483 U.S. 350, 107 S.Ct. 2875, 97 L.Ed.2d 292 (1987); Brief of Gray at 7 n. 7, McNally v. United States, 483 U.S. 350, 107 S.Ct. 2875, 97 L.Ed.2d 292 (1987); Cf. Doe, 867 F.2d at 989.

25. In connection with the "money or property" element, the jury received the following instruction:

> As to Counts 2 through 7 only, the money and property in question is the income taxes that would be due and owing from an amount of income of $24,000, an amount of income earned by Don and John Smith and James Dembitz in their undercover roles.

Tr. at 1331. Apparently, the $24,000 figure was the difference between the amount purportedly earned by the agents in their drug-trafficking affairs and the amount they could declare as income to the IRS evidenced by bogus documentation prepared by Bucey and Witt. Tr. at 1136.

Bucey indicated on several occasions that the scheme was designed to "stick it back in Uncle Sam's ear" and to "screw the IRS." Moreover, the jury was specifically instructed that, in order to convict, it was required to find a scheme to defraud the government of money or property.[25] We think the evidence was sufficient in this case for the jury to find that Bucey and his partner, Witt, intended to defraud the government of money or property.

D. Conspiracy

Title 18 U.S.C. section 371, includes two prongs: it is a crime (1) to "conspire ... to commit any offense against the United States, or [2] to defraud the United States, or any agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose." Id. Count 1 of the indictment charges Bucey both with conspiracy to defraud the United States and with conspiracy to commit substantive offenses against the United States.[26] On appeal,

26. Specifically, count 1 of the indictment charges Bucey with conspiracy

> (A) to defraud the United States:
>
> (i) by impairing, obstructing and defeating the lawful functions of the Department of Treasury:
>
> (a) in the collection of accurate data and reports relating to currency transactions at financial institutions in excess of $10,000, for use in criminal, tax, and regulatory investigations and proceedings, and of the enforcement of those laws and regulations found in Title 31, U.S.C. section 5311 et seq., and Title 31, C.F.R. section 103.11 et seq....;
>
> (b) in the obtaining of accurate information and data for determining the sources and amounts of income; and
>
> (c) in the determination, assessment and collection of revenue, that is, income taxes; and
>
> (ii) by concealing the source of funds subject to forfeiture under the federal laws relating to narcotics;
>
> (B) to willfully counsel and advise the preparation and presentation of federal income tax returns, which returns were to be false and fraudulent as to the material matters of the source and amount of income, in violation of U.S.C. section 7206(2); and
> (C) to travel and cause travel in interstate commerce ... and [use the mails] with the intent to distribute the proceeds of an unlawful activity, and ... to perform acts of distri-

Bucey asserts that the conspiracy conviction must be set aside because none of the acts comprising the conspiracy constitutes a criminal offense. He marshals his arguments challenging each alleged unlawful objective and then concludes that the only conspiracy proven was a conspiracy to conceal the source of currency, which, he submits, is not criminal.

The indictment charges a multi-faceted conspiracy aimed at attaining six separate but related objectives:

to defraud the United States by-

(1) impairing the Treasury Department's collection of accurate CTRs and enforcement of the currency laws;

(2) impairing the Treasury's collection of information to determine the correct sources and amounts of income;

(3) impairing the Treasury's assessment and collection of income taxes; and

(4) concealing the source of funds subject to forfeiture under the federal narcotics laws; and to commit the substantive offenses of—

(5) willfully advising the preparation of false income tax returns; and

(6) facilitating and distributing the proceeds of a narcotics distribution.

[6] It is a general tenet of conspiracy law that when an indictment alleges a conspiracy with multifarious objectives, a conviction will be sustained so long as the evidence is sufficient to show that the defendants agreed to accomplish at least one of the alleged objectives.[27] See United States v. Soteras, 770 F.2d 641, 646 (7th Cir.1985) (citing United States v. Alvarez, 735 F.2d 461, 465–66 (11th Cir.1984); United States v. Mackey, 571 F.2d 376, 387 n. 14 (7th Cir.1978); United States v. James, 528 F.2d 999, 1014 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 959, 97 S.Ct. 382, 50 L.Ed.2d 326 (1976)).

[7] Notwithstanding the absence of substantive currency law violations, Bucey's acts, when viewed as part of the overall illicit money laundering scheme, support a conviction for conspiracy to defraud the United States by impeding the lawful function of the Treasury Department as described in objectives (1) through (3).[28] In order to convict under the conspiracy to defraud clause of section 371, the government need not charge or prove that Bucey agreed to commit, or actually did commit a substantive offense. He merely "must have 'agreed to interfere with or obstruct one of [the government's] lawful functions by deceit, craft or trickery, or at least by means that are dishonest.'" United States v. Richter, 610 F.Supp. 480, 486 (N.D. Ill.1985) (Aspen, J.) (quoting Hammerschmidt v. United States, 265 U.S. 182, 188, 44 S.Ct. 511, 512, 68 L.Ed. 968 (1924)). "[A]cts which are in themselves legal lose their legal character when they become constituent elements of an unlawful scheme." Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 707, 82 S.Ct. 1404, 1415, 8 L.Ed.2d 777 (1962).

bution of said proceeds and facilitation of carrying on said unlawful activity, in violation of 18 U.S.C. section 1952(a)(1) and (3). Indictment ¶ 2 at 3–4.

27. In this connection, the court properly instructed the jury that, in order to convict Bucey of conspiracy, the jury had to find that Bucey conspired to commit at least one of the six alleged objectives. See Tr. at 1318. Because none of the objectives upon which the jury may have relied involves a legally invalid or unconstitutional basis for conviction, the general verdict form does not require reversal of Bucey's conspiracy conviction. Contra Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298, 312, 77 S.Ct. 1064, 1073, 1 L.Ed.2d 1356 (1957) (where a general verdict is supportable on one ground, but an alternative ground is invalid due to a statute of limitations bar, and it is impossible to tell which ground the jury selected, the verdict must be set aside), overruled on other grounds by Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 98 S.Ct. 2141, 57 L.Ed.2d 1 (1978); Feela v. Israel, 727 F.2d 151, 154 (7th Cir.1984) ("Where a verdict is general, and conviction under one of several alternate theories would be unconstitutional, the conviction must be set aside lest the verdict rest on an unconstitutional basis."); Cramer v. Fahner, 683 F.2d 1376, 1380 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1016, 103 S.Ct. 376, 74 L.Ed.2d 509 (1982); United States v. Baranski, 484 F.2d 556, 560–61 (7th Cir.1973). Cf. United States v. Holguin, 868 F.2d 201, 202–03 (7th Cir.1989).

28. Thus, under Soteras, we need not determine whether the conspiracy conviction may also be sustained on the basis of objectives (4) through (6).

Although Bucey's failure to file CTRs and failure to disclose the source of currency on Form 4789 are not unlawful acts, these acts "lost their lawful character when considered as part of a scheme to intentionally deprive the government of material information it would otherwise receive." Richter, 610 F.Supp. at 487. Quite apart from the underlying substantive offenses, Bucey is liable for agreeing with Witt to obstruct by deceit, craft or trickery the lawful function of the Treasury in collecting accurate CTRs (objective 1). See Richter, 610 F.Supp. at 486; United States v. Nersesian, 824 F.2d 1294, 1313 (2d Cir. 1987).[29] In addition, the evidence sufficiently establishes that the Bucey–Witt confederacy aspired to impede the function of the Treasury in obtaining information concerning the sources and amounts of income (objective 2), and in assessing and collecting income taxes (objective 3). Bucey informed the agents that by using the Huguenot Church account as a conduit for the cash-for-cashier's-checks transactions, the identity of the agents would not be disclosed on CTRs filed by the bank with the IRS and, thus, their identity and drug income would be insulated from government detection. Government's Brief at 11; Government's Exhibit 4A, at 20–21. Bucey and Witt also agreed to provide bogus documentation to prevent the IRS from tracing the illicit source and amount of the agent's income. Moreover, Bucey expressed on several occasions their plot to "stick it back in Uncle Sam's ear" and "screw the IRS." See Government's Brief at 19; Tr. at 623. Considering the evidence in the light most favorable to the government, we think this overall scheme to circumvent the currency reporting laws and to prevent the IRS from collecting accurate data, reports and income taxes supports a conspiracy conviction regardless of the absence of substantive currency law violations. Cf. United States v. Montalvo, 820 F.2d 686, 690 (5th Cir.1987).[30]

E. Obstructing the Grand Jury

Count 12 of the indictment charges Bucey with violating 18 U.S.C. section 1503[31] on the grounds that Bucey "well knowing of the existence of said federal grand jury investigation did corruptly endeavor to influence, obstruct and impede the due administration of justice by advising, counseling and encouraging a person known to him as 'James O'Brien' to give false and misleading testimony when appearing before said grand jury." Indictment ¶ 3 at 27. Bucey's challenge is two-fold: (1) the government failed to prove that he had the requisite corrupt intent to impede a grand jury investigation; and (2) his actions were incapable of interfering with the adminis-

29. Contra United States v. Murphy, 809 F.2d 1427, 1432 (9th Cir.1987) (once court finds no violation of the currency laws, conspiracy to defraud IRS charge must also fail if it rests solely on the alleged violations of the currency laws); United States v. Mastronardo, 849 F.2d 799, 803–05 (3d Cir.1988).

30. Although at the time the acts arose in this case money laundering in itself was not a substantive criminal offense, courts have held that agreements to engage in such money laundering schemes may constitute criminal conspiracy under section 371. See United States v. Jerkins, 871 F.2d 598, 603–04, (6th Cir.1989); United States v. Browning, 723 F.2d 1544 (11th Cir. 1984) (laundering scheme aimed in part at thwarting IRS' identification of revenue and collection of taxes subject to criminal conspiracy conviction); United States v. Enstam, 622 F.2d 857 (5th Cir.1980) (defendants with intent to use the laundering scheme to obstruct the IRS' tax collecting function can be prosecuted for criminal conspiracy), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 912, 101 S.Ct. 1351, 67 L.Ed.2d 336 cert. denied, 451 U.S. 907, 101 S.Ct. 1974, 68 L.Ed.2d 294 (1981); United States v. Richter, 610 F.Supp. 480, 485–87 (N.D. Ill.1985).

After the conduct in this case arose, Congress enacted legislation making money laundering a substantive crime in the "Money Laundering Control Act of 1986," which is part of the Anti–Drug Abuse Act of 1986. See Pub.L. 99–570, 100 Stat. 3207 (Oct. 27, 1986) (codified at 18 U.S.C. §§ 1956, 1957; 31 U.S.C. § 5324).

31. Title 18 U.S.C. section 1503 provides in relevant part:

> Whoever corruptly or by threats of force, or by any threatening letter or communication, endeavors to influence, intimidate or impede any grand or petit juror ... or corruptly or by threats of force, or by any threatening letter or communication, influences, obstructs, or impedes, or endeavors to influence, obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

tration of justice since the putative grand jury "witness" was a fictional character.

[8] To establish a violation of section 1503, the government must demonstrate that the "defendant knew of the pending judicial proceeding and specifically intended to impede its administration." United States v. Guzzino, 810 F.2d 687, 696 (7th Cir.) (citation omitted), cert. denied, 481 U.S. 1030, 107 S.Ct. 1957, 95 L.Ed.2d 529 (1987). Section 1503 is violated when a defendant interferes with the due administration of justice by tampering with a witness. See United States v. Rovetuso, 768 F.2d 809, 824 (7th Cir.1985), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 1076, 106 S.Ct. 838, 88 L.Ed.2d 809 (1986), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1106, 106 S.Ct. 1951, 90 L.Ed.2d 360 (1986). We do not think the fact that O'Brien (agent Dembitz' pseudonym) was a "fictional" grand jury witness precludes an obstruction of justice conviction. The statute proscribes the endeavor to influence or obstruct the administration of justice; thus, "the impossibility of accomplishing the goal of an obstruction of justice does not prevent a prosecution for the endeavor to accomplish the goal." United States v. Brimberry, 744 F.2d 580, 583 (7th Cir.1984) (citing Osborn v. United States, 385 U.S. 323, 333, 87 S.Ct. 429, 435, 17 L.Ed.2d 394 (1966) (where defendant Osborn allegedly employed informer to contact prospective juror, fact that informer never intended to carry out scheme did not preclude defendant's conviction for endeavoring to bribe juror)). See also United States v. Rosner, 485 F.2d 1213, 1228 (2d Cir.1973), cert. denied, 417 U.S. 950, 94 S.Ct. 3080, 41 L.Ed. 2d 672 (1974). Thus, Dembitz' fictitious identity as a grand jury witness does not exonerate Bucey from his "endeavor" to influence the proper administration of the grand jury.

[9] In addition, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the government, we think it was sufficient for the jury to conclude that Bucey possessed the requisite corrupt intent to influence the administration of justice. This court elucidated the requisite intent element for obstruction of justice offenses in United States v. Machi, 811 F.2d 991 (7th Cir. 1987), and aligned itself with the Fourth Circuit:

> In our view, the defendant need only have had knowledge or notice that success in his fraud would have likely have [sic] resulted in an obstruction of justice. Notice is provided by the reasonable foreseeability of the natural and probable consequences of one's acts.

Id. at 998 (quoting United States v. Neiswender, 590 F.2d 1269, 1273 (4th Cir.1979)).

Bucey, who had been apprised of the ongoing grand jury investigation and of the subpoena purportedly issued to Dembitz, counseled Dembitz on how to role-play his grand jury testimony with his attorney and instructed Dembitz to provide false and misleading testimony to the grand jury. We think a jury could readily infer that Bucey had knowledge or notice that the success of his fraudulent endeavor would likely influence the just administration of the grand jury proceedings. See United States v. Shannon, 836 F.2d 1125 (8th Cir.) (sustaining obstruction of justice conviction based upon defendant's advice to former bank teller, who was prospective grand jury witness, that it would be "in her best interest" to forget about any large currency transactions which she had processed), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 108 S.Ct. 2830, 100 L.Ed.2d 930 (1988).

F. Prejudicial Reference to Drugs

[10] The final issue in Bucey's barrage of challenges on appeal is whether the references to narcotics trafficking during the course of the trial were prejudicial to the defendant. In a pretrial motion, Bucey moved that the district court strike as surplusage all references to drug dealing in the indictment and bar all evidence pertaining to drug dealing at trial. Bucey contends that the district court's denial of that motion was in error and that, because there was no evidence that he had direct knowledge that the undercover agents were posing as drug dealers, admission of these references was unduly prejudicial. Because we agree fully with the district court's disposition of this issue, we do not think the court abused its discretion in denying Bucey's motion.

This court has stated that "evidence of other crimes may be presented when they are so blended or connected with the one on trial that proof of one incidently involves the other or explains the circumstances thereof or tends logically to prove any element of the crime charged." United States v. Dorn, 561 F.2d 1252, 1258 (7th Cir.1977). See also United States v. Moreno–Nunez, 595 F.2d 1186, 1188 (9th Cir. 1979); United States v. Wilson, 578 F.2d 67, 72 (5th Cir.1978). As the court below acknowledged, evidence of other acts may be admissible if it would assist the jury in understanding the factors surrounding the crime at issue and if the absence of evidence concerning the other acts would leave a "chronological and conceptual void" in the story. See United States v. Hattaway, 740 F.2d 1419, 1425 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1089, 105 S.Ct. 599, 83 L.Ed.2d 708 (1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1028, 105 S.Ct. 448, 83 L.Ed.2d 373 (1984). In the instant case, the references to narcotics trafficking in both the indictment and at trial served to explain the purpose of and circumstances surrounding the money laundering scheme. We do not think the risk of unfair prejudice arising from this evidence substantially outweighed its probative value.

III.

Accordingly, we reverse Bucey's conviction on counts 8–11 for violations of the currency reporting laws and dismiss the indictment on these counts. In addition, we affirm Bucey's conviction for conspiracy, mail and wire fraud and obstruction of justice, and, in accordance with our usual practice, we direct that he be resentenced. See United States v. Holzer, 840 F.2d 1343, 1352 (7th Cir.1988) (citing United States v. Manzella, 791 F.2d 1263, 1270 (7th Cir. 1986)).

v.

GENERAL SCANNING, INC., Defendant–Appellee.

No. 88–1917.

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit.

Argued Jan. 6, 1989.

Decided June 8, 1989.

Terminated employee brought action under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act against his former employer. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, Terence T. Evans, J., granted summary judgment for employer, and employee appealed. The Court of Appeals, Manion, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) the fact that employee falsified his resume when applying for employment did not preclude him from establishing a prima facie case, and (2) lack of seniority and poor performance evaluations were legitimate, nondiscriminatory business reasons for discharging employee.

Affirmed.

1. Civil Rights ⇐44(6)

In reduction in force case under Age Discrimination in Employment Act, plaintiff can establish prima facie case by showing that he was within protected age group, that he was performing according to his employer's legitimate expectations, that he was terminated, and that others not in protected class were treated more favorably; if plaintiff makes this showing, rebuttable presumption of discrimination arises and burden of production shifts to defendant employer to articulate legitimate and nondiscriminatory reasons for discharge. Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967, §§ 2–17, 14(b), as amended, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 621–634, 633(b).

Tapes of a conversation between Barnes and McGee on April 3, 1990 ("the McGee Tape"), and a conversation between Barnes and Jones on April 11, 1990 ("the Jones Tape"), were played at trial. The conversations described the roles of various conspirators and discussed who might have been responsible for the March 7 arrests. [FN2] McGee argues that he is entitled to a new trial because the Jones Tape was inadmissible hearsay, because the tapes were inaudible, and because the district court erred by allowing the prosecution to play only selected portions of the tapes.

FN2. Neither the tapes nor their transcripts are part of the record on appeal. The substance of the conversations has been gleaned from Barnes's testimony.

[4][5] A. The Conspirator Hearsay Issue. Statements made "by a coconspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy" are not hearsay. Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(E). Using the procedure approved in United States v. Bell, 573 F.2d 1040, 1044 (8th Cir.1978), the district court conditionally admitted the tapes and then found at the close of the government's evidence that the government had proved the existence of the conspiracy at the time of the taped conversations by a preponderance of the evidence. We review this finding for clear error. See United States v.

Meeks, 857 F.2d 1201, 1203 (8th Cir.1988). As our prior review of the evidence makes clear, the trial court's Bell ruling was not clearly erroneous.

McGee argues that the conversation recorded in the Jones Tape was not made "during the course of" the conspiracy because the conspiracy had ended by April 11, 1990. A CONSPIRACY "is presumed to exist until there has been an AFFIRMATIVE showing that it has terminated, and its members continue to be conspirators until there has been an AFFIRMATIVE showing that they have WITHDRAWN." United States v. Lewis, 759 F.2d 1316, 1343 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 994, 106 S.Ct. 407, 88 L.Ed.2d 357 (1985). To withdraw from a conspiracy, a conspirator *422 must "either [make] a clean breast to the authorities or [communicate] his withdrawal in a manner reasonably calculated to reach co-conspirators." Askew, 958 F.2d at 812-13. Here, there was overwhelming evidence that the conspiracy continued beyond April 11, 1990, and no evidence that McGee had affirmatively withdrawn.

[6] McGee also argues that the conversation was not "in furtherance of" the conspiracy. This term is interpreted broadly. See United States v. Johnson, 925 F.2d 1115, 1117 (8th Cir.1991). Statements are admissible under 801(d)(2)(E) if the overall effect of the conversation is to facilitate the conspiracy. See United States v. Leisure, 844 F.2d 1347, 1361-62 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 932, 960, 109 S.Ct. 324, 403, 102 L.Ed.2d 342 (1988). The Jones Tape conversation covered many subjects, including the identity of the informant responsible for the March 7 arrests, McGee's arrangements with Jones and Barnes, and McGee's relationship with Mason. The evidence establishes that much of this conversation was in furtherance of the cocaine conspiracy. See United States v. Krevsky, 741 F.2d 1090, 1095 (8th Cir.1984) (discussion of conspirators' duties and particulars of their operations); Meeks, 857 F.2d at 1203 (statements identifying a source of cocaine). Thus, the Jones Tape was properly admitted.

B. Issues of Audibility and Selective Playing. Prior to trial, the district court denied McGee's motion for a pretrial hearing to determine the audibility of some 32 tapes that the government might offer. At trial, the government first offered to play portions of the McGee Tape after it was identified by Barnes. The district court permitted the government to play selected portions of the tape but sustained defense objections to the use of government-prepared transcripts of the tape, explaining that, "I'm interested in what they [the jurors] hear." As the tapes were played, there was considerable sidebar colloquy about whether the listener was able to identify who was speaking and about the poor audibility of portions of the tapes. However, no defense counsel objected during trial that the tapes were so inaudible that they should not be played at all, or requested that portions in addition to those selected by the government also be played. During its deliberations, the jury asked to replay one of the tapes; the district court sustained defense objections to

v.
Arloha Mae PINTO, Defendant-Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Marcel Samuel LAMBERT, Defendant-Appellant.
Nos. 87-1023, 87-1045.
United States Court of Appeals,
Tenth Circuit.
Jan. 29, 1988.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Kansas, Dale E. Saffels, J., of conspiring to defraud the United States and falsifying tax returns, and one defendant was additionally convicted of five counts of tax evasion, and defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals, Baldock, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence was sufficient to support convictions; (2) there was sufficient evidence of existence of conspiracy to render coconspirator hearsay admissible; (3) there was no fatal variance between indictment and proof; (4) severance was not required; and (5) statute of limitations had not run on conspiracy count.

defendant-appellant Marcel Samuel Lambert.

Before MOORE, McWILLIAMS and BALDOCK, Circuit Judges.

BALDOCK, Circuit Judge.

On April 1, 1986, defendant-appellant Marcel Samuel Lambert (Lambert) and his wife, defendant-appellant Arloha Mae Pinto (Pinto), were named in a seven-count indictment. They were jointly charged with one count of conspiring to defraud the United States, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371, and one count of falsifying a tax return, in violation of 26 U.S.C. s 7206(1) and 18 U.S.C. s 2. Defendant Lambert also was charged with five counts of tax evasion, in violation of 26 U.S.C. s 7201.

A jury found defendants guilty on all counts. The court sentenced defendant Lambert to seven consecutive two-year terms of imprisonment and defendant Pinto to concurrent three-year terms of imprisonment. Both defendants appeal, contending that: 1) the evidence was insufficient to support the convictions; 2) the trial court erroneously admitted co-conspirator hearsay; 3) there was a fatal variance, as to the conspiracy count, between the indictment and the evidence presented at trial; 4) the trial court erred in denying severance; 5) the conspiracy count should have been dismissed because the statute of limitations had expired; and 6) the trial court failed to give defendants' instruction regarding their theory of defense and improperly instructed the jury regarding the cash expenditure method of proving tax evasion. We affirm.

The rather complex factual background of these cases will be briefly summarized, with additional facts discussed as they pertain to the issues raised by defendants. At trial, the government presented its case in two parts, initially introducing evidence pertaining to the joint charges of conspiring to conceal taxable income derived from the sale and distribution of marijuana in 1977 and of claiming a false home mortgage interest expense on Pinto's 1980 tax return. The essence of the government's theory was that defendants concealed $150,000 in marijuana income by using cash to purchase the first in a series of three homes and later obtaining sham mortgages to create the appearance that the purchase money came from loans.

Marty Ritschel and Michael Bono testified that they purchased substantial quantities of marijuana from Lambert over an approximately two-year period commencing in 1976. Sally Robinson Wells testified that in September of 1977, Lambert "fronted" 300 pounds of marijuana to her former husband, Bruce Robinson, and another man. Robinson testified that the bales were weighed in defendants' basement and transported in Lambert's car to a "stash" house. The marijuana was then stolen. Soon after the theft was discovered, the parties to the transaction held a meeting, at which time Pinto demanded payment for the stolen marijuana and identified the lost $100,000 as hers.

Regarding the series of real estate transactions, it was revealed that during the final two months of 1977, Pinto took $149,000 in cash and purchased eighteen cashier's checks from sixteen different banks in the Kansas City area. With the cashier's checks, $1,154.66 in cash and a mortgage in favor of the builder, Pinto bought a $190,500 home in Leawood, Kansas. Neither Pinto nor Lambert reported the $150,000 on their respective 1977 income tax returns. In November of the following year, defendants sold the house. With the proceeds from that sale, plus an additional $31,960.19 in cash, Pinto purchased outright a *429 second home in Leawood for $220,050. On December 5, 1978, Pinto presented her realty company with a $150,000 note and mortgage, which had been executed in favor of a Cayman Islands corporation formed by Lambert, and requested that a lien be filed against the residence she had purchased outright the previous month.

In early 1980, defendants bought yet another residence, again in Leawood. The mortgage on the second home was rolled over into a new note in favor of the offshore corporation. On March 25, 1981, Pinto filed her 1980 income tax return and reported a deductible home mortgage interest expense of $20,424.00, an amount arrived at by computing interest on the $150,000 note. Defendants sold the third residence in November of 1985. On November 8, 1985, they gave the title insurance company a Deed of Release, dated November 20, 1984, which stated that the second mortgage was released "in consideration of the full payment" of the debt.

Following a summary of the evidence admitted on the joint charges, the government, employing the cash expenditure method of proof, endeavored to prove the tax evasion charges filed against Lambert. An analysis of defendants' financial activities for the years 1974 through 1978 established that they spent $115,913.96 more cash than they had available, signifying that Lambert did not have an appreciable amount of cash on hand in 1979, the beginning of the indictment period. The government then analyzed the tax years 1979 through 1983 and established that Lambert's cash expenditures far exceeded his reported income.

Additional evidence was presented to show that Lambert took steps to conceal income and thereby evade the payment of taxes. The government established that Lambert dealt almost exclusively in cash, and that among his sizeable cash expenditures were the purchases a number of automobiles, none of which were registered in his name or titled in the state of Kansas. In 1980, Lambert directed his brother, who was preparing their parents' estate tax returns, to report a non-interest bearing loan of $50,000, which Lambert represented their father had made to him in 1976, and also to report $60,000 cash on hand, an amount which Lambert represented had been given to him by their parents.

I.

Both defendants strenuously argue that the evidence was insufficient to support their convictions. Our standard for evaluating the sufficiency of the evidence is well established. We view all the evidence, both direct and circumstantial, together with the reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom, in the light most favorable to the government. United States v. Hooks, 780 F.2d 1526, 1529 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1128, 106 S.Ct. 1657, 90 L.Ed.2d 199 (1986). We then must determine whether a reasonable jury could find the defendants guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Id. at 1531.

A.

Defendant Lambert claims that the evidence was insufficient to show that he had substantial income from the sale and distribution of marijuana. In a related argument, defendant Pinto asserts that the evidence was insufficient to show that she intended to join a conspiracy to evade taxes on that income.

[1] It is true, as defendants point out, that the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) agents who testified were unable to state the amount of defendants' income from drug trafficking. Nevertheless, there was substantial evidence to support the jury's conclusion that defendants derived a significant amount of income from the sale and distribution of marijuana. At one time, Lambert described himself as the "main man" for supplying marijuana in Kansas City. Ritschel testified that he had paid Lambert more than $200,000 for the marijuana that he had purchased between 1976 and 1978. Bono testified that he had purchased marijuana from Lambert on six occasions, each time buying quantities of twenty-five to fifty pounds at a price of $285 per pound. That testimony, along *430 with other evidence indicating that defendants dealt almost exclusively in cash and failed to report the $150,000 used to purchase the first residence, supports a reasonable inference that the funds used by Pinto to purchase the residence were derived from the sale of marijuana.

In arguing that the government failed to show that she had the requisite intent to join the conspiracy, defendant Pinto similarly alleges that there was no evidence of marijuana income, and in addition asserts that there was no evidence to show that she had knowledge of marijuana profits realized by Lambert or of the illegitimate nature of the two mortgages. We cannot agree. Contrary to Pinto's assertion, she does not stand convicted without proof of her knowledge of the conspiracy's objective or solely because of her relationship with Lambert. See, e.g., United States v. Jones, 808 F.2d 754, 756 (10th Cir.1987); United States v. McMahon, 562 F.2d 1192, 1196-97 (10th Cir.1977).

[2] "The essence of the crime of conspiracy is an agreement to violate the law." United States v. Troutman, 814 F.2d 1428, 1446 (10th Cir.1987). In a conspiracy prosecution, the evidence must support a finding that the conspirators had a unity of purpose or a common design and understanding. United States v. Kendall, 766 F.2d 1426, 1431 (10th Cir.1985), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 1081, 106 S.Ct. 848, 88 L.Ed.2d 889 (1986). The existence of an agreement to accomplish an unlawful objective "may be inferred from a 'development and a collocation of circumstances.' " United States v. Pack, 773 F.2d 261, 265-66 (10th Cir.1985) (quoting Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 80, 62 S.Ct. 457, 469, 86 L.Ed. 680 (1942)).

[3] The government was required to show that Pinto knew of the conspiracy to evade taxes on marijuana profits and knowingly participated in the conspiracy. United States v. Kendall, 766 F.2d at 1431-32. Despite the fact that the majority of the evidence regarding the marijuana trafficking directly implicated only her husband, there was evidence which linked Pinto to the trafficking and thus supported a reasonable inference that she knew of the existence of profits derived from the sale of marijuana. For instance, it was shown that large quantities of marijuana were stored in the basement of the house where she lived with Lambert. When the $100,000 drug deal went awry, Pinto claimed ownership of the stolen marijuana and demanded payment of the money lost as a result of the theft. Her knowledge of both the existence of marijuana profits and the use of the sham mortagages to conceal those profits was demonstrated by the fact that her purchase of the first residence was, in effect, a cash transaction, the bulk of the purchase price having been comprised of cashier's checks which she had acquired earlier with $149,000 in cash. Moreover, as discussed below, there was other evidence which indicated that Pinto had knowledge of the illegitimate nature of the mortgages.

B.

[4] Both defendants assert that the government failed to prove either that Pinto did not have a legitimate home mortgage or that she did not pay mortgage interest as stated on her 1980 income tax return.

The nature of the purported mortgages and Pinto's failure to pay any mortgage interest can be inferred from the evidence presented. In the latter half of 1978, Lambert set up a corporation in the Bahamas, Luxaco Limited (Luxaco), and another corporation in the Cayman Islands, Yarrabee International Limited (Yarrabee). At that time, the secrecy laws of the Bahamas and the Cayman Islands prevented the United States government from investigating corporations established in those countries. Pursuant to a 1984 agreement between the United States and the Cayman Islands, the government obtained public records pertaining to Yarrabee as well as records kept by the law firm and the management company which represented the corporation. Those records revealed that Yarrabee was a subsidiary of Luxaco and that the corporation had issued only three shares of stock at a price of one dollar per share. No mortgages or schedules of payments were *431 found. A letter dated March 17, 1980, provided that there would be no further use for the corporation after the release of the mortgage had been finalized. The transcript also reflects the testimony of the designated agent for Yarrabee, a Kansas City attorney, who testified that Pinto made no interest payments to his law firm.

C.

[5] Defendant Lambert makes a three-pronged attack on the sufficiency of the evidence presented to show that he had taxable income in excess of that reported on his returns for the years 1979 through 1983. [FN1] He contends that the government failed to 1) show that he did not have cash on hand in 1979, 2) offer an accurate cash on hand figure for the beginning of each taxable year in the indictment period and 3) establish a likely source of income.

> FN1. During the indictment period, Lambert's cash expenditures far exceeded his reported income: in 1979, his income was $36,000, while cash expenditures totalled $132,098.31; in 1980, his income was $6,000, while cash expenditures totalled $134,265.44; in 1981, his income was $6,000, while cash expenditures totalled $100,820.79; in 1982, his income was $7,000, while cash expenditures totalled $34,160.21; and in 1983, his income was $30,000, while cash expenditures totalled $158,901.39.

The government employed the cash expenditure method of proof, which permits circumstantial proof of a defendant's taxable income in cases where the prosecution is unable to show directly specific items of such income. United States v. Bianco, 534 F.2d 501, 503 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 822, 97 S.Ct. 73, 50 L.Ed.2d 84 (1976).

Under the 'cash expenditures' method, after taking into account the amount of resources the taxpayer had on hand at the beginning of a period, the income received by the taxpayer for the same period is compared with his expenditures that are not attributable to his resources on hand or non-taxable receipts during the period. A substantial excess of expenditures over the combination of reported income, non-taxable receipts, and cash on hand may establish the existence of unreported income.

United States v. Citron, 783 F.2d 307, 310 (2d Cir.1986). The relevant issue is whether expenditures in excess of reported income can be accounted for by assets available at the outset of the prosecution period or non-taxable receipts during the period. Taglianetti v. United States, 398 F.2d 558, 565-66 (1st Cir.1968), aff'd, 394 U.S. 316, 89 S.Ct. 1099, 22 L.Ed.2d 302 (1969); see also United States v. Pack, 773 F.2d at 264-65 (establishing unreported income by cash expenditure method of proof).

While the opening net worth of the taxpayer, including cash on hand, must be demonstrated "to a reasonable certainty," it need not be established by a formal net worth statement. United States v. Citron, 783 F.2d at 315. Here, the government compared defendants' cash expenditures during the years 1974 to 1978 with the amount of income reported on their tax returns, plus other funds they had available, resulting in a showing that cash expenditures exceeded reported income and other funds by $115,913.96. See United States v. Terrell, 754 F.2d 1139, 1146-47 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 472 U.S. 1029, 105 S.Ct. 3505, 87 L.Ed.2d 635 (1985). That comparison tended to show that defendant could not have had a significant amount of cash on hand and thus supports the jury's conclusion that Lambert had insufficient assets at the beginning of the prosecution period to have supported his expenditures in any of those years. [FN2] United States v. Bianco, 534 F.2d at 505.

> FN2. In Bianco, the defendant's contention that the government failed to negate the possibility of a cash hoard was rejected because there was no evidence to indicate that the defendant had such a cache. United States v. Bianco, 534 F.2d at 505. As the court explained, > [o]f course, as in any criminal prosecution, the defendant is under no obligation to prove any particular set of facts, including the existence of a non-taxable source, such as a 'cash hoard' from which his expenditures were made. But once the government has introduced sufficient evidence from which the jury could conclude with reasonable certainty that no such assets existed, the defendant remains silent at his own peril.
> Id. at 505-06 (citations omitted).

Nor was the government required to offer an accurate cash on hand figure, as *432 part of opening net worth, for the beginning of each taxable year in the indictment period. See United States v. Mastropieri, 685 F.2d 776, 784 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 945, 103 S.Ct. 260, 74 L.Ed.2d 203 (1982). In a cash expenditure case, reasonable certainty may be established without presenting opening net worth positions for each of the taxable years so long as the proof "makes clear the extent of any contribution which beginning resources or a diminution of resources over time could have made to expenditures." Taglianetti v. United States, 398 F.2d at 565. Thus, there need not be any formal opening net worth statement, which would include cash on hand, so long as sources of available funds are identified and quantified. Id. at 565 n. 7. The purpose of including an accurate identification of any diminution of resources is to enable the jury to determine if expenditures were financed by a liquidation of assets, depletion of a cash hoard or unreported income. United States v. Citron, 783 F.2d at 315. For example, if an asset is sold, an accounting must be made of that fact because the proceeds could be used to finance expenditures during the year in question. See Taglianetti v. United States, 398 F.2d at 564. The government accounted for the sale or disposal of assets during the indictment period, and none of the assets acquired by Lambert during that time were income-producing. The evidence presented was sufficient to enable the jury to determine whether the expenditures in excess of reported income could be accounted for by assets available at the opening of the prosecution period or by non-taxable receipts during the period. Id. at 565-66.

Defendant's final contention, that the government did not establish a probable source of income, is also unavailing. By presenting evidence pertaining to Lambert's involvement in marijuana and cocaine trafficking, the government met its burden of showing "at least one 'likely source' of taxable income." United States v. Bianco, 534 F.2d at 506; see United States v. Mastropieri, 685 F.2d at 784-86. Such evidence was sufficient to support the inference that the cash expenditures proved were attributable to currently taxable income. See United States v. Bianco, 534 F.2d at 506-07.

Upon a careful review of the record, we conclude that defendants' sundry claims are without merit and hold that the evidence was sufficient to support the jury's verdict.

II.

Defendant Pinto next asserts that the trial court erred in admitting certain hearsay statements. She argues that the court failed to follow the preferred order of proof for the admission of co-conspirator hearsay and erroneously found that the government had shown the existence of a conspiracy.

At the outset of the trial, Ritschel and Bono testified about their marijuana dealings with Lambert. During the testimony of Sally Wells, defense counsel objected to the admission of any statements made by Lambert to Wells concerning Lambert's involvement in marijuana trafficking and his identification of boxes in defendants' basement as containing marijuana. In allowing the testimony, the court apparently agreed with the government's argument that the statements were admissible as admissions made by Lambert and therefore were not hearsay. Rec. vol. III at 81-88; see Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2). Wells then testified that during the meeting about the stolen marijuana, Pinto identified the lost $100,000 as hers. Upon the succeeding direct examination of Wells' ex-husband, Bruce Robinson, a question was asked about Robinson's discussions with Lambert concerning marijuana distribution. Counsel for Pinto again objected on grounds of hearsay. The court found that there was substantial evidence, independent of the statements at issue, that a conspiracy existed, that both defendants were members of the conspiracy and that the statements were made during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. Rec. vol. III at 101. The court subsequently restated its finding that the government had shown the existence of a conspiracy. Rec. vol. VII at 789.

*433 [6] Defendant apparently is arguing that the court failed to follow the "preferred order of proof" [FN3] by admitting co-conspirator hearsay before finding the existence of a conspiracy. That argument fails, primarily because the hearsay statements offered in the course of direct examination of Wells were admitted as admissions by Lambert. Even assuming the statements were admitted as co-conspirator hearsay, they would have been conditionally admissible subject to being connected up. See United States v. Hernandez, 829 F.2d 988, 994 (10th Cir.1987). The other statements which defendant now contends were improperly admitted were allowed after the trial court had found the existence of a conspiracy.

FN3. This court recently clarified the meaning of the term "preferred order of proof" as it pertains to the admission of co-conspirator hearsay. In United States v. Hernandez, 829 F.2d 988 (10th Cir.1987), we stated that the "preferred order of proof" simply refers to the requirement that the trial court make the requisite factual determination of the existence of a conspiracy prior to allowing co-conspirator hearsay statements to be heard by the jury. Id. at 994 n. 6. We further stated that "this order of proof does not involve a right to a pretrial hearing on admissibility, and in no way precludes the trial judge from exercising his considerable discretion and conditionally admitting the statements subject to later being connected up." Id.

[7][8] Defendant further claims that the government had not shown the existence of the conspiracy as charged. Co-conspirator hearsay is properly admitted if the trial court makes a factual determination that the government has established, by a preponderance of the evidence, that: 1) a conspiracy existed; 2) the declarant and the defendant were members of the conspiracy; and 3) the hearsay statements were made in the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. United States v. Esch, 832 F.2d 531, 537 (10th Cir.1987). There was substantial evidence of the existence of a conspiracy. Ritschel and Bono testified that they had purchased large quantities of marijuana from Lambert and each testified about obtaining marijuana which had been stored in defendants' basement. Wells then testified that Pinto claimed ownership of the stolen marijuana. Wells' testimony, which was not hearsay as to Pinto, linked Pinto to the drug trafficking, which was an integral part of the alleged conspiracy to evade taxes on income generated by the sale and distribution of marijuana. The trial court did not err in admitting the contested testimony.

III.

Defendant Pinto next claims that there was a fatal variance between the conspiracy as charged and the evidence adduced at trial, which she maintains indicated the existence of a second, uncharged conspiracy to possess, sell and distribute marijuana. Consequently, defendant argues, her convictions were based on a theory not charged in the indictment.

[9][10] A variance occurs when the evidence presented at trial establishes facts different from those alleged in the indictment. Dunn v. United States, 442 U.S. 100, 105, 99 S.Ct. 2190, 2193, 60 L.Ed.2d 743 (1979); United States v. Dickey, 736 F.2d 571, 581 (10th Cir.1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1188, 105 S.Ct. 957, 83 L.Ed.2d 964 (1985). In assessing a claim of a fatal variance, the pivotal inquiry is whether there has been a variance in proof which affects the substantial rights of the accused. United States v. Morris, 623 F.2d 145, 149 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1065, 101 S.Ct. 793, 66 L.Ed.2d 609 (1980). This court has previously stated that such a variance occurs when the accused could not have anticipated from the indictment what evidence would be presented at trial. Id. "Another source of prejudice is the transference of guilt to an accused from incriminating evidence presented in connection with the prosecution of another in the same trial for a crime in which the accused did not participate." Id.

[11] The indictment charged that "[t]he object of the defendants' conspiracy was to knowingly and willfully hide substantial income from the sale and distribution of marijuana and to evade the payment of taxes on that and other income," which was accomplished by creating the appearance that funds used to purchase the series of residences *434 came from loans when, as defendants knew, the funds came from the sale and distribution of marijuana. Rec. vol. I, doc. 1, at 2. In setting out the overt acts committed in furtherance of the conspiracy, the indictment alleged that during 1977, defendants possessed, sold and distributed, and aided and abetted in the possession, sale and distribution, of marijuana. Id. at 3. Although Pinto was not charged with conspiring to sell drugs, she could anticipate from the indictment what evidence would be presented at trial, in particular her involvement in the alleged overt act of possessing, selling and distributing marijuana. United States v. Morris, 623 F.2d at 149.

[12] Also meritless is Pinto's argument that she was prejudiced by an improper transference of guilt resulting from the evidence submitted on the tax evasion charges which indicated Lambert's post-1977 drug activities. As to the joint conspiracy charge, the evidence indicated that defendants acted in concert to effectuate the common illicit goal of evading taxes by concealing income derived from the sale and distribution of marijuana. See United States v. Dickey, 736 F.2d at 582. Pinto's allegation of prejudice arising from the evidence showing Lambert's likely source of income during the tax evasion indictment period is more pertinent to the issue of severance, and, in any event, the evidence of Lambert's post-1977 drug activities did not result in a transference of guilt affecting her substantial rights.

IV.

[13][14] Defendant Pinto next contends that the trial court committed reversible error in denying her motion for severance. She argues that she was prejudiced by the great disparity in the weight of the evidence admitted solely against Lambert, the disparity being exacerbated by the fact of their marital relationship.

The general rule in this circuit is that individuals jointly indicted should be jointly tried. United States v. Rinke, 778 F.2d 581, 590 (10th Cir.1985). The trial court's decision whether to sever is made within its sound discretion, and will not be reversed absent a strong showing of prejudice. United States v. Esch, 832 F.2d at 537. In ruling on a motion to sever, the trial court must weigh any potential prejudice caused by the joinder against considerations of economy and expedition in judicial administration. Id.; United States v. Rinke, 778 F.2d at 590.

The government presented the testimony and exhibits relating to the joint charges during the first portion of the trial, concluding with the summary testimony of IRS Special Agent Kenneth Wissel. The evidence that followed pertained to the tax evasion counts filed against Lambert. The government's order of proof facilitated the separation of the evidence and served to mitigate any potentially adverse effect of the evidence submitted solely against Lambert. Throughout the trial, the court admonished the jury to consider certain evidence only as to Lambert. As a result, the jury was able to compartmentalize the evidence as to each of the defendants and to properly apply it as the court instructed. United States v. Pack, 773 F.2d at 267.

Further, we cannot agree with Pinto's claim that her right to a fair trial was undermined by the disparity in the evidence against Lambert as compared to the alleged dearth of evidence implicating her. In a conspiracy case, a quantitative disparity in the evidence, without more, provides no justification for severance. United States v. Hack, 782 F.2d 862, 871 (10th Cir.), cert.

denied, 476 U.S. 1184, 106 S.Ct. 2921, 91 L.Ed.2d 549 (1986). Given the government's order of proof, the trial court's continuous admonitions and the fact that the interests of judicial economy were served by the avoidance of duplicitous separate trials, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for severance.

V.

[15] Both defendants next argue that the trial court erred in not dismissing the conspiracy count because the statute of limitations had expired before the charges *435 were filed on April 1, 1986. Their theory is that the offense of evading tax due on income derived from the sale and distribution of marijuana in 1977 was completed no later than April 15, 1978, the due date for the filing of their tax returns.

Under the Internal Revenue Code, the statute of limitations for a conspiracy to defraud the United States is six years. 26 U.S.C. s 6531; [FN4] United States v. Brunetti, 615 F.2d 899, 901-02 (10th Cir.1980). It therefore was incumbent upon the government to prove that the conspiracy was still in existence on April 1, 1980, and that at least one overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy was performed after that date. Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391, 396, 77 S.Ct. 963, 969, 1 L.Ed.2d 931 (1957); United States v. Brunetti, 615 F.2d at 901.

FN4. 26 U.S.C. s 6531 provides in pertinent part:
No person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any of the various offenses arising under the internal revenue laws unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within 3 years next after the commission of the offense, except that the period of limitation shall be 6 years--
(1) for offenses involving the defrauding or attempting to defraud the United States or any agency thereof, whether by conspiracy or not, and in any manner;

(8) for offenses arising under section 317 of Title 18 of the United States Code, where the object of the conspiracy is to attempt in any manner to evade or defeat any tax or the payment thereof.

Defendants' theory, that the central purpose of the conspiracy was accomplished with the filing of the tax returns, ignores both the object of their conspiracy as charged in the indictment and the evidence presented at trial to establish the conspiracy. They were charged with conspiring to defraud the United States, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371, [FN5] "by impeding, impairing, obstructing, and defeating the lawful governmental functions" of the IRS "in the ascertainment, computation, assessment, and collection of income taxes...." Rec. vol. I, doc. 1, at 1. The indictment was based on one continuing conspiracy, the central object of which was not merely to evade taxes on marijuana income in 1978, but rather to immunize defendants from prosecution for tax evasion. Forman v. United States, 361 U.S. 416, 422-23, 80 S.Ct. 481, 485-86, 4 L.Ed.2d 412 (1960); see Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. at 405, 77 S.Ct. at 974 (distinguishing between acts of concealment done in furtherance of the main criminal objectives of the conspiracy and acts of concealment done solely for the purpose of covering up the crime).

FN5. 18 U.S.C. s 371 provides in pertinent part:
If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States, or any agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such persons do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

The object of defendants' conspiracy, the concealment of income derived from the sale and distribution of marijuana in 1977, did not end with the filing of their income tax returns in 1978. The filing of the returns was but the first step in the process of evading taxes on that income, with additional overt acts subsequently undertaken to conceal the marijuana income in an attempt to make the evasion succeed. Forman v. United States, 361 U.S. at 423-24, 80 S.Ct. at 485-86. Because at least one overt act was committed within six years prior to the filing of the indictment, the trial court properly denied defendants' motion to dismiss the conspiracy count. United States v. Brunetti, 615 F.2d at 901.

VI.

Defendants' final contention is that the trial court erred by failing to give their tendered instruction setting out their theory of defense. Defendant Lambert also contends that the court erred in giving instruction 38, which addressed the cash expenditure method of proving tax evasion.

[16] Jury instructions must be evaluated as a whole. United States v. Grissom, 814 F.2d 577, 580 (10th Cir.1987). The trial court is given substantial discretion in tailoring and formulating its instructions, so long as they correctly state the law and fairly and adequately cover the issues *436 presented. United States v. Pack, 773 F.2d at 267. Although a defendant is entitled to an instruction regarding his theory of defense, the trial court need not follow the exact language in an instruction tendered by the defendant. United States v. Hoffner, 777 F.2d 1423, 1426 (10th Cir.1985).

[17] The defendants tendered the following instruction:

If the evidence fails to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that defendants had taxable income from sales of marijuana in 1977 then you must find the defendants not guilty as to Count I.

In instructions 9 through 15, the court advised the jury of the law pertaining to the conspiracy charge. Rec. vol. II, doc. 78, at 23-31. Instruction 10 provided that the government had the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt every essential element of the crime charged, including the existence of the conspiracy charged in the indictment. Id. at 24. Instruction 2 contained the substance of the indictment, in which defendants were charged with conspiring to conceal income received in 1977 from the sale and distribution of marijuana. Id. at 4. While defendants reiterate their previously rejected claim that there was no evidence to show such income, the fact remains that the jury was properly instructed that it had to find beyond a reasonable doubt that defendants had income in 1977 from the sale and distribution of marijuana. The trial court did not err in refusing to give the tendered instruction when the substance of the instruction was contained in the charge given to the jury.

[18] Regarding instruction 38, defendant Lambert contends that the instruction was erroneous because it failed to require the government to prove his net worth at both the beginning and end of the indictment period and in addition was confusing and internally inconsistent. Due to the government's employment of the cash expenditure method of proof, it was not required to present formal net worth statements. United States v. Citron, 783 F.2d at 315; Taglianetti v. United States, 398 F.2d at 564-66. As to Lambert's corollary contention, we note that he did not submit a tendered instruction on the cash expenditure method of proof, and conclude that the trial court's instruction was neither confusing nor inconsistent, but rather properly directed the jury to determine whether expenditures in excess of reported income could be accounted for by assets available at the outset of the prosecution period. See Taglianetti v. United States, 398 F.2d at 565-66.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee (88-5195), Plaintiff-Appellant (88-5484),
v.
Billy York WALKER, Defendant-Appellant (88-5195), Defendant-Appellee (88-5484).

Nos. 88-5195, 88-5484.
United States Court of Appeals,
Sixth Circuit.
Argued Nov. 14, 1988.
Decided April 3, 1989.

Defendant was convicted after jury trial in the United States District Court for the Western District of Tennessee, Odell Horton, Chief Judge, of various federal banking laws. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Enslen, District Judge, sitting by designation, held that: (1) evidence of coconspirator's guilty plea was admissible as evidence of coconspirator's credibility, and (2) evidence of named borrowers' credit worthiness and their understanding of obligation to repay loans was irrelevant and inadmissible on charges of bank fraud.

FN* Honorable Richard A. Enslen, United States District Judge for the Western District of Michigan, sitting by designation.

ENSLEN, District Judge.

Billy York Walker appeals his conviction following a jury trial on each count of a 28-count indictment alleging violations of various federal banking laws. [FN1] Prior to 1985, Mr. Walker was the president and majority shareholder of Farmers Bank located in Dyersburg, Tennessee. Most of the bank's business was agricultural in nature. Mr. Walker was also the owner, president and operator of Walker Grain Company ("Walker Grain"), a grain storage firm, located in the same town.

FN1. The indictment alleged violations of the following statutes: Count 1, conspiracy to commit bank fraud, 18 U.S.C. s 371, Counts 3-21, 24-26, false entries in bank records, 18 U.S.C. s 1005; Counts 22 and 28, false statement on loan application, 18 U.S.C. s 1014; and Counts 23 and 27, bank fraud, 18 U.S.C. s 1344.

Count 1 alleges that Walker and his life-long friend, Walter Hastings, conspired to defraud Farmers Bank, to misapply bank funds and to make false entries in bank records in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371. Walker convinced Hastings to sign two promissory notes, one for $150,000 secured by stock owned by Hastings, and one for $118,000 which was unsecured. The proceeds of both loans were immediately deposited to Walker Grain's account at Farmers Bank. The loan applications did not disclose Walker Grain's interest in the loans. Walker personally approved both loans.

Originally, Hastings called Walker each time an interest payment was due and Walker made the payment using a Walker Grain check. In 1985, Walker started giving checks to Hastings and Hastings made the payments using his own checks. The overt acts in the conspiracy each involve separate interest payments on the two loans. The bank's records on each loan indicate that the loans were for Hastings' benefit and that Hastings made the interest payments. Counts 3-21 allege false entries in bank records based upon the failure of the records to indicate that the loans were not for Hastings' benefit and that he did not make the interest payments from his own funds.

In 1985, the bank's vice president in charge of loans, Larry James, noticed that the Hastings loans were becoming past due. He knew that Walker and Hastings were friends and offered to take the collection of these loans over for Walker, thinking Walker might be uncomfortable handling the accounts himself. Walker assured James that Hastings would repay the loans as soon as Hastings solved some other financial problems. An investigation conducted by the bank, at the suggestion of federal examiners, subsequently revealed Walker's interest in the Hastings loans. When confronted with the matter by bank officials, Walker shook his head and replied, "What can I say?" Thereafter, Walker took an indefinite leave of absence and never returned to the bank.

*1300 Walker's defense to counts 1 and 3-21 was that he lacked any intent to defraud the bank. He contends that he approved each loan in the ordinary course of business, based upon Hastings' credit worthiness, character, and reputation, as well as the bank's potential to profit from each loan. He claims that he lacked any intent to deceive the bank, although he admits that he did not tell the bank's board of directors of Walker Grain's interest in the loans. Walker contended that he did not think it necessary to tell the bank's board of directors about Walker Grain Company's interest in the Hastings loans, since the bank was only interested in profitability and since Hastings had the ability to repay the loans. [FN2] Walker testified that Hastings understood his obligation to repay the loans, but understood that the money would come from Walker. Hastings testified that he had no intention of repaying the loans and thought Walker would do so.

FN2. Hastings' financial statement filed with the bank indicated Hastings' tax evasion case — nature of crime requires concealment

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Fred T. MACKEY, Defendant-Appellant.
Nos. 77-1074 and 77-1978.
United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.
Argued Dec. 7, 1977.
Decided Feb. 22, 1978.

Defendant was convicted before the United States District Court for the Northern District of Indiana, South Bend Division, Allen Sharp, J., of attempted income tax evasion and of conspiracy to evade payment of income taxes, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Sprecher, Circuit Judge, held that (1) a witness' hearsay testimony that defendant's alleged coconspirator told him that comments he made to IRS agents would "probably send him (the coconspirator) to jail" was admissible, since the statement was "in furtherance of" the concealment portion of the conspiracy, and since the coconspirator's statement was made "during the course" of the conspiracy, (2) although a misstatement of law by the prosecutor in closing argument can be ground for reversal, and although defendant claimed that the prosecutor's closing comments suggested that the jury, in order to acquit, would have to believe that the prosecution suborned two witnesses to perjure themselves, an examination of the record disclosed that the prosecutor made no statement of law in his closing argument and merely stated that he "resent(ed)" defense counsel's argument that the aforesaid two prosecution witnesses had been induced to testify as they did out of fear of further prosecution, (3) while defendant argued that his conviction on the indictment's second count, attempted income tax evasion, must be reversed because two of the affirmative acts of tax evasion alleged were not proved, defendant did not contest that there was sufficient evidence to prove the other three affirmative acts alleged in that count and therefore the conviction had to be affirmed and (4) prosecution's failure to provide defendant with a copy of a transcript of an interview by an internal revenue agent with one prosecution witness was not a Brady violation, since defendant's request for Brady materials was general, and since nondisclosure of the aforesaid interview, which was merely additional material for impeaching an already thoroughly impeached witness, did not deprive defendant of a fair trial.

In prosecution for conspiracy to evade payment of income taxes and attempted tax evasion, a witness' hearsay testimony that defendant's alleged coconspirator told him that comments he made to IRS agents would "probably send him [the coconspirator] to jail" was admissible, since the statement was "in furtherance of" the concealment portion of the conspiracy, and since the coconspirator's statement was made "during the course" of the conspiracy; moreover, even if the testimony were inadmissible, its admission was harmless error since it was merely a single comment in an eight-day trial that was only directly inculpatory as to the coconspirator, not defendant. 26 U.S.C.A. (I.R.C.1954) s 7201; 18 U.S.C.A. s 371; Federal Rules of Evidence, rule 801(d)(2)(E), 28 U.S.C.A.

Where the district court decided that the subject matter of defense counsel's cross-examination of a witness dealt with meetings between the witness and defendant's alleged coconspirator without any apparent time limitation, the court did not abuse its discretion in then allowing the prosecution, on redirect examination, to ask the witness about one meeting between him and the coconspirator not specifically raised in cross-examination.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW k662.11
110k662.11

Defendant's Fifth Amendment right to confront and cross-examine his alleged coconspirator was not violated by the admission of a witness' hearsay testimony to the effect that the coconspirator told him that his comments to IRS agents would "probably send him [the coconspirator] to jail, since defendant had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness as to whether the statement was actually made and the statement, itself, was basically reliable, being a statement against penal interest and not dependent on the coconspirator's recollection.

Although statements to a jury suggesting some relationship between a defendant's fraudulent activities and the jurors' insurance premiums or taxes is improper, and although the prosecutor, in the instant attempted tax evasion trial, did say at one point "we recognize our responsibility to the Government to pay our taxes," such comment was in response to defense counsel's argument that $2,000,000 is a lot of money and that some of the expenditures that were being used as evidence were for the benefit of defendant's son; the prosecutor's comment was intended to dispel any sympathy for defendant on this point, not to appeal to the jury's pecuniary interests. 26 U.S.C.A. In light of defense counsel's closing argument, the prosecutor rightly concluded that defendant was attempting to shift the blame to his alleged coconspirator, and there was thus no error in the prosecutor presenting his response to that issue in a colorful fashion, i. e., referring to the Biblical story of the slaying of Abel by Cain and quoting Cain's statement to God "I'm not my brother's keeper.".

The case involves a large number of alleged errors by the district court in a criminal trial where the defendant was convicted both of attempted tax evasion in violation of 26 U.S.C. s 7201 and conspiracy to evade the payment of taxes in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371. Defendant's chief arguments deal with the admissibility of the hearsay declarations of a co-conspirator not on trial, the propriety of some of the prosecutor's closing remarks and the failure of the prosecution to provide materials that might have been used by the defendant to impeach one of the prosecution's main witnesses.

I

This case involves two consolidated appeals arising out of the same district court case. Initially, defendant appeals his convictions for tax evasion and conspiracy on the basis of numerous assigned errors at trial. Defendant also appeals the district court's denial of his motion for a new trial based on "newly discovered" evidence that defendant claims was subject to disclosure by the government under Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963), and/or the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. s 3500. The facts underlying the convictions will be discussed first and those relevant to the motion for a new trial will be described subsequently.

A

The defendant, Fred T. Mackey, and his alleged co-conspirator, F. Lawrence Anderson, were charged in a five count indictment. Count I charged the defendant with conspiracy to evade payment of income tax and to defraud the United States by impeding the Internal Revenue Service in the collection of revenue in violation of 18 *380 U.S.C. s 371.[FN1] Count II charged the defendant with attempted tax evasion in violation of 26 U.S.C. s 7201.[FN2] Count III charged the defendant with subornation of perjury in violation of 18U.S.C. s 1622.[FN3] Counts IV and V of the indictment related only to F. Lawrence Anderson.[FN4]

FN1. That section provides:
If two or or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States . . . in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such persons do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.
18 U.S.C. s 371.

FN2. That section provides:
Any person who willfully attempts in any manner to evade or defeat any tax imposed by this title or the payment thereof shall . . . be guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, together with the costs of prosecution.
26 U.S.C. s 7201.

FN3. That section provides:
Whoever procures another to commit any perjury is guilty of subornation of perjury, and shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.
18 U.S.C. s 1622.
The district court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant on this count of the indictment. Nonetheless, its inclusion at the trial is claimed as a basis for reversal. See part VII of this opinion infra.

FN4. F. Lawrence Anderson was severed from defendant's trial due to ill health. He was subsequently tried and acquitted of all charges against him in the indictment.

The claims in the indictment stem from a series of events subsequent to a $2,488,712 stipulated settlement of June 5, 1972, between the defendant and the Internal Revenue Service in a civil case before the Tax Court for back taxes and penalties for the period from 1954 through 1961 and 1963 through 1965. It was this large sum of money due and owing the federal government that the prosecution claims the defendant conspired and attempted to avoid paying.
The defendant's trial lasted for over a week, during which the prosecution presented 34 witnesses and over 100 documents. In turn, the defendant presented three witness on his behalf. Since we cannot describe all of the evidence presented at trial without unduly prolonging this opinion, we will focus on the important points in the government's and defendant's cases.
The prosecution presented evidence as to six affirmative acts of attempted tax evasion committed by the defendant. First, the prosecution showed that the defendant had substantial control over three companies, Gibraltar Mutual Insurance Company, Gibraltar Industrial Insurance Company and M.W.E. & S.

Investment Company (M.W.E. & S.), and that he manipulated them so that most of the assets of the three were kept in M.W.E. & S. which left them potentially at the defendant's disposal. Second, the prosecution presented evidence that several checks of M.W.E. & S. were used to purchase personal goods and services for the defendant, and therefore, a bank account at the Gary National Bank placed in the company's name may have been "fictitious." Third, the defendant was shown to have made substantial purchases in cash, the source of which was generally unknown. Fourth, the prosecution presented evidence that defendant used money from M.W.E. & S. and the insurance companies to pay for various personal items, including, among other things, a security system and swimming pool for the defendant's home. Fifth, the prosecution showed that defendant had kept mortgages on his property, notwithstanding that there was no money due and owing to anyone. Finally, it was shown that defendant had placed his assets with another person and company by giving $25,000 in cash to a Carl Smith to invest in a company named A & D Realty, Inc. (A & D).

The prosecution's conspiracy charge is somewhat more complex. It revolves around the formation by F. Lawrence Anderson, defendant's co-conspirator, and Robert F. Deal, defendant's nephew by marriage, of A & D, which purchased the defendant's *381 home from the IRS.[FN5] It was the prosecution's theory that A & D was created for the defendant's benefit so that his resources could be placed secretly in A & D and thereby be protected from collection by the Internal Revenue Service. The defendant claimed that A & D was a legitimate realty company with bona fide investors. The prosecution presented three key witnesses on the conspiracy count who were purportedly shareholders in A & D, but who testified that they, in fact, had not invested their own money in the enterprise. Carl Smith, a pharmacist in a building owned by defendant, testified that he was initially contacted by Mr. Anderson about an "investment" in A & D Realty. He testified further that he was called by defendant to come to his office, whereupon he was given by the defendant $25,000 in cash in a paper bag and was told to purchase a cashier's check payable to A & D Realty and to take the check to Mr. Anderson. Smith testified that he did this, and that at some indeterminate time later he signed an A & D stock certificate for a $25,000 investment.

> FN5. The house was sold at auction in partial satisfaction of the two million dollars due and owing the IRS. It was initially purchased by an unrelated party at the first auction, but that party was unable to acquire sufficient funds to make the down payment. A & D Realty subsequently purchased the property for $136,000. The defendant continued to reside at his house throughout the entire period prior to trial.

A second witness, Warren E. Dotson, an automobile tire dealer, testified that defendant Mackey had asked him about investing in A & D Realty. In response to Dotson's comment that he lacked the money to invest, defendant said that Dotson "didn't need any" (Tr. at 672-75). Subsequently, Dotson was contacted by co-conspirator Anderson who gave Dotson $12,000 in cash and told him to take it to a bank and to get a cashier's check payable to A & D Realty. Dotson returned the check to Anderson's secretary. Later, just before he was to testify before the grand jury, Dotson was invited to an A & D Realty shareholders' meeting at Anderson's house, at which time he signed the company's stockholders book and a certificate for 60 shares of its stock.[FN6]

FN6. Warren Dotson's testimony was impeached by defense counsel on cross-examination. He had testified before the grand jury that the $12,000 was his own. He subsequently was indicted and pleaded guilty to perjury. As a part of his plea bargain for probation, Dotson promised to testify against the defendant. In addition, there was some reason to believe that Dotson had received $12,000 in a loan from the Small Business Administration, and that he testified that the money had come from Anderson to conceal his misuse of that loan which is a criminal offense.

The third witness, Dr. Edwin G. Moore, testified that he had been contacted by F. Lawrence Anderson about loaning Anderson money for some real estate investments. Dr. Moore agreed to do so, wrote a check payable to A & D Realty for the sum of $10,000 and took it to Anderson. In return, Dr. Moore immediately was given $10,000 in cash by one of Anderson's employees.

In addition to the evidence of a conspiracy between the defendant and F. Lawrence Anderson to have A & D Realty established and to place defendant's assets in the firm for the purpose of purchasing defendant's home, the prosecution sought to demonstrate the existence of a conspiracy to cover-up the true nature of A & D Realty. The primary evidence used was F. Lawrence Anderson's false grand jury testimony in April 1975, that Messrs. Smith and Dotson and Dr. Moore were actual investors in A & D Realty (Exhibit 33a). The concealment phase of the conspiracy was alleged to have continued until the date of the indictment.

Based primarily on the evidence described above, the jury found the defendant guilty on both the conspiracy and tax evasion counts in the indictment. The defendant appeals both convictions relying on several claimed errors by the district court during the trial.

B

As suggested above, Carl Smith's testimony that he received cash from the defendant and was told to invest it in A & D *382 Realty was an important part of the prosecution's conspiracy case. Subsequent to the entry of judgment in this case, defense counsel discovered evidence indicating that Smith might have been involved in the trafficking of narcotics before and after he supposedly received $25,000 in cash from defendant. While investigating this possibility, defense counsel discovered that agents of the Internal Revenue Service, including one who was investigating the defendant, had interrogated Smith about his narcotics activity. The IRS had elicited from Smith, in return for possible consideration in other matters, a statement which he refused to sign without his attorney present and which, in fact, he never did sign.

Defense counsel, believing that the evidence of Smith's narcotics trafficking was significant because it was a possible source for the $25,000 Smith claimed the defendant had given him, and also because it was a source that Smith would have a strong motive to conceal, moved for a new trial under Fed.R.Crim.P. 33 based on evidence that allegedly was withheld by the prosecution.

A hearing on the motion was held. During that hearing it was shown that defense counsel had evidence of Smith's possible narcotics trafficking available to him prior to trial. Smith had been questioned before the Grand Jury by the prosecution about a previous interview he had had with the government about narcotic transactions.[FN7] Smith's grand jury testimony was provided to defense counsel during pre-trial discovery.

FN7. During the grand jury testimony of Carl Smith on May 8, 1975, Smith was questioned by the prosecutor as follows:
Q. All right. Now, Mr. Smith, sometime ago, were you interviewed by a representative of Narcotics Bureau in connection with some transactions?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. All right. During that period of time did you tell this Narcotics Agent that you had no other source of income other than the salary that you received from your employment?
A. Yes, sir.

After the hearing, the court denied defendant's motion for two reasons. First, the court held that this evidence was not "newly discovered" because defense counsel could have located it had he exercised due diligence. Second, the court determined that the evidence was cumulative since it could only be used to impeach Smith's testimony which already had been impeached severely by defense counsel.[FN8] The defendant appeals from the district court's denial of his motion for a new trial.

FN8. Smith had testified previously before the grand jury investigating the defendant that he had invested his own money in A & D Realty. In fact, he had told the same story to his wife, parents and the Internal Revenue Service. Smith was subsequently indicted and convicted for perjury based on this testimony before the grand jury. In addition, Smith was granted immunity after his perjury conviction so that he would testify again before the grand jury and at the trial.

II

[1] Defendant's first argument is that the district court erred in admitting, through Dr. Moore's testimony, the statement by F. Lawrence Anderson made in August 1975, that Dr. Moore's comments to the IRS would "probably send" Anderson to jail. During cross-examination, defense counsel asked Dr. Moore about various conversations he had had with Mr. Anderson. From Dr. Moore's answers, defense counsel elicited the fact that the defendant had never been present during any of their meetings.

On redirect examination, the prosecution asked about a conversation between Dr. Moore and Anderson that occurred subsequent to the former's appearance before the grand jury. Defense counsel objected on the ground that the question was beyond the temporal scope of the cross-examination. The court overruled the objection on the basis that it fell within the subject matter of the cross-examination.

[2][3][4] In response to the question, Dr. Moore testified that Anderson told him that the comments to the Internal Revenue Service *383 agents would "probably send him (Anderson) to jail . . .." (Tr. at 771). Defendant argues primarily [FN9] that since the statement was made neither "in the course of" nor "in furtherance of" the conspiracy, as required by Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(E), it was inadmissible hearsay and that its admission against the defendant was prejudicial error.

FN9. Defendant also appears to argue that the question on redirect examination that elicited the hearsay statement was beyond the scope of cross-examination. The general rule is that the scope of redirect examination is a matter firmly committed to the sound discretion of the trial court. United States v. Hodges, 480 F.2d 229, 233 (10th Cir. 1973); Chapman v. United States, 346 F.2d 383, 388 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 909, 86 S.Ct. 249, 15 L.Ed.2d 161 (1965). See also Schutter Candy Co. v. Stein Bros. Paper Box Co., 371 F.2d 340, 342 (7th Cir. 1966). Here the district court decided that the subject matter of the cross-examination dealt with meetings between Anderson and Moore without any apparent time limitation. On redirect examination, the prosecution asked about one meeting between Anderson and Moore not specifically raised in cross-examination. The judge certainly did not abuse his discretion by deciding that that line of questioning was appropriate. That the questioning elicited a response that was damaging to defendant does not affect the propriety of the court's decision as to the appropriate scope of redirect examination.
Defendant also asserts that the admission of Anderson's statement to Dr. Moore at the trial violated the defendant's constitutional right under the Fifth Amendment to confront and cross-examine Anderson. The assertion lacks merit. Defendant had the opportunity to cross-examine Dr. Moore as to whether the statement was actually made and the statement, itself, was basically reliable, being a statement against penal interest and not dependent on Anderson's recollection. See United States v. Cogwell, 486 F.2d 823, 833-35 (7th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 959, 94 S.Ct. 1975, 40 L.Ed.2d 310 (1974).

It seems to us quite clear that if the conspiracy can be said to have continued up to the time of Anderson's statement to Dr. Moore then that statement was "in furtherance of" the concealment portion of the conspiracy. The standard to be applied is whether some reasonable basis exists for concluding that the statement furthered the conspiracy. See United States v. Moore, 522 F.2d 1068, 1077 (9th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1049, 96 S.Ct. 775, 46 L.Ed.2d 637 (1976); United States v. Knippenberg, 502 F.2d 1056, 1061 (7th Cir. 1974). While the statement is susceptible of alternative interpretations, it is quite reasonable to view it as an attempt to persuade Dr. Moore either to alter his statements to the IRS or to stop talking to the agency altogether.

Somewhat less clear is whether Anderson's statement was made "during the course" of the conspiracy. This court has recognized that "(t)he duration of a conspiracy . . . depends upon the scope of the agreement entered into by its members" and is, therefore, dependent on the facts in each case. United States v. Hickey, 360 F.2d 127, 141 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 928, 87 S.Ct. 284, 17 L.Ed.2d 210 (1966); United States v. Nowak, 448 F.2d 134, 139 (7th Cir. 1971). In addition, in determining whether there has been an agreement to conceal, the Supreme Court has stated that there must be more than "circumstantial evidence showing merely that . . . the conspirators took care to cover up their crime in order to escape punishment." Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391, 402, 77 S.Ct. 963, 972, 1 L.Ed.2d 931 (1957).

See also Lutwak v. United States, 344 U.S. 604, 73 S.Ct. 481, 97 L.Ed. 593 (1953); Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440, 69 S.Ct. 716, 93 L.Ed. 790 (1949).

On the record before us, we find that sufficient evidence existed from which a jury could infer that an agreement to conceal existed at the outset of the conspiracy. First, the indictment alleged and the prosecution proved a broad effort to evade taxes which by its nature required a substantial effort at concealment. Nowak, supra, 448 F.2d at 139. Thus, unlike in Lutwak and Krulewitch, where the object of the conspiracy was a discrete criminal act, here we deal with a crime that had no specific terminating event.[FN10] Therefore, *384 the nature of the attempted crime by itself provides a substantial inference of agreement to conceal or cover-up.

FN10. This case is distinguishable from both United States v. Flecha, 539 F.2d 874 (2d Cir. 1976) and United States v. Floyd, 555 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1977), on the basis that in both decisions the court found an event which terminated the conspiracy. In Flecha, the court concluded quite reasonably that the arrest of the conspirators ended the conspiracy. In Floyd, the court found that the conspiracy had as its sole object the robbing of a bank. Once that object was concluded, the conspiracy terminated. In this case, there is no such single event, and, therefore, we must examine all of the evidence to determine what the jury could reasonably decide the duration of the conspiracy had been.

In addition, there was the evidence of the meeting of the A & D stockholders and the false testimony of Anderson before the grand jury. The successful commission of the crime, rather than its mere concealment from investigation, required that the "investors" true status not be uncovered. Both acts, therefore, could be viewed by a jury as relating back to the decision to evade taxes. Viewing the case in the light most favorable to the government, we conclude that there was sufficient evidence from which a jury could determine that a cover-up of the crime was one of the central objects of the conspiracy as originally conceived. Therefore, the conspiracy continued until the date of the filing of the indictment, and Anderson's statement to Dr. Moore was made "during the course" of the conspiracy.

[5] We should note finally in dealing with this issue that, even if we were disposed to conclude that this evidence was inadmissible, we would still hold that its admission was harmless error under Fed.R.Crim.P. 52(a). It was merely a single comment in an eight-day trial that was only directly inculpatory as to Anderson, and not the defendant. Also, there is substantial independent evidence of the defendant's guilt. See United States v. Rizzo, 418 F.2d 71, 79 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied sub nom., Tornabene v. United States, 397 U.S. 967, 90 S.Ct. 1006, 25 L.Ed.2d 260 (1970); United States v. Fellabaum, 408 F.2d 220, 226 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 858, 90 S.Ct. 125, 24 L.Ed.2d 109 (1969). We, therefore, conclude that the admission of Anderson's statement to Dr. Moore is not a sufficient basis for reversal.[FN11]

FN11. Although defendant's brief is not clear on the point, it appears to argue in a footnote that the duration of the conspiracy cannot exceed the date of the last overt act charged and proved in the indictment. Since the last overt act in this case was Anderson's statements to the grand jury and his statement to Dr. Moore occurred subsequent to the grand jury appearance, the defendant argues that the statement was inadmissible. Defendant's reliance on Fiswick v. United States, 329 U.S. 211, 67 S.Ct. 224, 91 L.Ed. 196 (1946), to support his position is misplaced. In that case the Court held that the last overt act was also the object of the conspiracy, and therefore marked its termination. Id. at 216-17, 67 S.Ct. 224. The Court did not purport to establish a rule that the last overt act, of necessity, marks the duration of the conspiracy. In fact, the Court, itself, only stated that the overt acts "may" mark the duration of the conspiracy, and not that they must. Id. at 216, 67 S.Ct. 224. We should also note that defendant later in his brief argued that it was error for the prosecutor in his closing argument to make reference to Anderson's remark to Dr. Moore. Given our holding that the statement was admissible, it is obvious that defendant's argument has become frivolous.

[6] Defendant's next set of arguments deals with the propriety of the prosecutor's closing argument at the trial. The basis for the defendant's first assignment of error is the prosecutor's comments suggesting, in the defendant's view, that the jury would have to believe that the prosecution suborned witnesses Smith and Dotson to perjure themselves in order to acquit the defendant. Based on this characterization, the defendant argues that no such finding was necessary to acquit, and therefore, concludes that the prosecutor's statement represented a misstatement of the law within the meaning of United States v. Bohle, 445 F.2d 54 (7th Cir. 1971), and United States v. Phillips, 527 F.2d 1021 (7th Cir. 1975).

Defendant properly cites Bohle and Phillips for the proposition that a misstatement of law by the prosecutor in a closing argument can be a ground for reversal.[FN12] However, *385 the defendant here seriously exaggerates the nature of the prosecutor's remarks. The prosecutor made no statements of law in his closing argument. All that he did was respond to defense counsel's argument that Smith and Dotson had been induced to testify as they did out of fear of further prosecution. The prosecutor raised the point merely to state that he "resent(ed) it" (Tr. at 1063). There was no statement here, like that repeated several times in Phillips, that the jury had to find the prosecutor guilty of wrongdoing before it could acquit the defendant. We find no error in the prosecutor's comments on this point.[FN13]

FN12. This case is readily distinguishable from Bohle and Phillips. In Bohle, the prosecutor told the jury that in its evaluation of the defendant's insanity defense it could properly consider the presumption of sanity. However, as a matter of law, the jury was not permitted to consider that presumption. The court held that such a serious misstatement of the law on the central issue to the defendant's case was error. 445 F.2d at 71. There is no comparable misstatement of law in this case. In Phillips, the prosecutor on three separate occasions, and with the approval of the court in the presence of the jury, argued "you're going to have to find, I suppose, that I conspired with the agent to commit this crime by bringing it to you." 527 F.2d at 1022. The court correctly decided on those facts that the jury might reasonably have concluded that it had to find the prosecutor guilty of misconduct before it could acquit the defendant. The argument to the jury in this case was significantly less likely to mislead the jury.

FN13. Defendant also argues that the prosecutor's remarks about Dotson and Smith amounted to "placing his personal integrity behind the truthfulness of the witness(es)." United States v. Phillips, 527 F.2d 1021, 1023 (7th Cir. 1975). We cannot agree. Nothing in the prosecutor's comments even approaches the defendant's characterization that the argument "amounts to placing the prosecutor in the same conspiratorial nest with the witnesses." Id. at 1025.

[7] Next, defendant complains that the prosecutor in his closing argument improperly appealed to the pecuniary interests of the jury. This court has held that statements to a jury suggesting some relationship between a defendant's fraudulent activities and the jurors' insurance premiums or taxes is improper and potentially reversible error. See United States v. Trutenko, 490 F.2d 678, 679 (7th Cir. 1973); Epperson v. United States, 490 F.2d 98, 100 (7th Cir. 1973). However, this is not such a case.

At one point the prosecutor did say, "we recognize our responsibility to the Government to pay our taxes" (Tr. at 1080). However, the comment was in response to defense counsel's argument that two million dollars is a lot of money and that some of the expenditures that were being used as evidence were for the benefit of defendant's son. The prosecutor's argument was intended to dispel any sympathy for the defendant on this point, and not to appeal to the jury's pecuniary interests.

[8] Defendant's final assignment of error based on the closing argument is that the prosecutor made an uncalled for reference to the Biblical story of the slaying of Abel by Cain that was included merely for its highly prejudicial effect. During his argument, the prosecutor characterized the defendant's defense as an effort to shift the defendant's responsibility to F. Lawrence Anderson. In so doing, he quoted Cain's statement to God, "I'm not my brother's keeper" (Tr. at 1085). Defendant claims that he never attempted to shift the blame to Anderson in his argument. However, in his closing argument, defense counsel twice suggested that the arrangements for fraudulent shareholders might have been in Anderson's interest rather than the defendant's. He argued:

If Mr. Anderson was working some kind of a plan with . . . Dr. Moore, for example, . . . that is their problem. There's no proof whatsoever that Mr. Mackey had anything to do with that.

If you choose to believe that Mr. Dotson got the twelve thousand dollars, that he . . . invested in A & D from Mr. Anderson, that may be something between them, but you can't hold that against Mr. Mackey.

(Tr. at 1039). In light of these arguments, the prosecutor rightly concluded that defendant was attempting to shift the blame to Anderson. There is no error in presenting his response to this issue in a colorful fashion.

Based on our evaluation of the closing arguments of both the defense counsel and *386 the prosecutor, we conclude that the district court rightly decided that the prosecutor "in response to defense arguments made struck hard blows, but he did not strike foul ones" (Tr. at 1090). See Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78, 88, 55 S.Ct. 629, 79 L.Ed. 1314 (1935). We, therefore, find no error based on the prosecution's closing argument.

IV

One of the prosecution's witnesses, Artie Jenkins, was asked about the source of $5000 in cash that he had used to attempt to post bail for the defendant before a magistrate in Hammond, Indiana. The prosecution sought to elicit from the witness the fact that he had acquired the money from Gibraltar Insurance Company. Jenkins, however, stated that the money had come from his mother (Tr. at 145). In an effort to impeach this statement, the prosecutor asked if Jenkins had told the magistrate in charge of defendant's bail that the money had come from Gibraltar Insurance Company. Jenkins responded that he could not recall. The prosecutor then asked about other statements that Jenkins made before the magistrate, but he again responded that he did not recall. The prosecution did not attempt to offer into evidence a transcript of the proceedings before the magistrate in order to complete the impeachment.

Defendant claims that the prosecution, having emphasized the witness's comments to the magistrate, had a duty to complete the impeachment and failure to do so was prejudicial error. We disagree with defendant's analysis on both points.

[9][10] First, to the extent there is ever a duty to complete an impeachment, it will only arise once the witness categorically denies ever having made the prior inconsistent statement, United States v. Bohle, 445 F.2d 54, 73 (7th Cir. 1971), and not when he merely fails to remember whether or not he has made it. Second, even if a duty to impeach had arisen, it is difficult to fathom what harm to the defendant's case attended that error. The witness's testimony was generally favorable to defendant, the effort at impeachment was modest and the witness's significance to the prosecution's case was de minimis. Under these circumstances, we find no error in the prosecution's conduct.

Defendant argues that the prosecution deceived him by first stating in a bill of particulars that the fictitious bank account alleged in Count II of the indictment was maintained at the Citizens Trust Bank in Atlanta, Georgia and then subsequently proving that the account in fact was kept at the Gary National Bank. We find no basis in defendant's argument for reversal.

Initially, we note that the letter sent to defendant was not a bill of particulars. The district court denied the defendant's motion for a bill of particulars on September 24, 1976, because of the extensive discovery permitted. Therefore, cases cited by defendant dealing with misstatements in a bill of particulars are inapposite.

[11] There remains the possibility that defendant was sufficiently misled by the representations of the prosecution so that he was deprived of a fair trial. Defendant, in this respect, fails to identify how he was prejudiced by the prosecution's statement. In fact, after the trial below, counsel for the defendant stated, "I did not recall specifically that the letter related to the fictitious bank accounts until I had an opportunity to review it last night in the motel" (Tr. at 1100). This statement seems to belie any reliance by the defendant on the prosecution's letter. We agree with the district court's assessment that "(i)t would appear to me that defense counsel should have known about the M.W.E. & S. account and the Government's contentions in regard to it a long time ago" (Tr. at 1100). The prosecution's possible misstatement did not deny defendant a fair trial.

VI

Defendant's next two arguments are that the conviction under Count II must be reversed *387 because two of the affirmative acts of tax evasion alleged in the indictment were not proved. Defendant asserts that no evidence was presented as to fictitious bank accounts or fictitious mortgages. Defendant is incorrect in his assessment both of the law and the facts surrounding these issues.

[12][13] Under 26 U.S.C. s 7201, the prosecution must prove some affirmative act constituting an attempt to evade or defeat the payment of taxes. Spies v. United States, 317 U.S. 492, 499, 63 S.Ct. 364, 87 L.Ed. 418 (1943); United States v. Ming, 466 F.2d 1000, 1004 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 915, 93 S.Ct. 235, 34 L.Ed.2d 176 (1972). However, the prosecution need not prove each affirmative act alleged. This case seems directly controlled by this court's previous decision in United States v. Reicin, 497 F.2d 563 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 996, 95 S.Ct. 309, 42 L.Ed.2d 269 (1974), a mail fraud case involving, as here, several instances of illegal activity guided by a unitary scheme. Id. at 569-70. There, the court distinguished a Second Circuit decision, relied on heavily by defendant in this case, United States v. Groves, 122 F.2d 87 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 314 U.S. 670, 62 S.Ct. 135, 86 L.Ed. 536 (1941), and held "it is necessary to prove at least one but not necessarily each of the specific acts to sustain each count." 497 F.2d 568. We believe that the court's analysis in Reicin applies with equal force here. Since defendant does not contest that there is at least sufficient evidence to prove the other three affirmative acts alleged in Count II of the indictment, we must affirm the conviction on this Count.

We note as an alternative basis for affirming the conviction on this Count that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that the defendant committed all the affirmative acts alleged. First, defendant asserts that the only fictitious bank account at issue was the one in Atlanta, Georgia. In light of our discussion in part V, supra, however, this view is patently incorrect. The M.W.E. & S. account in Gary, Indiana was the basis for the allegation and there was a great deal of evidence as to whether it was a corporate account or merely a personal account of the defendant.

Second, the prosecution demonstrated that mortgages remained on defendant's property long after the debts that created them had been satisfied (Tr. at 479-80, 509, 546). While defendant presents persuasive arguments as to what inferences to draw from this fact, those arguments were for the jury and do not affect the correctness of the district court's decision to let the general allegation be considered by the jury. We, therefore, find no error on these points.[FN14]

FN14. Defendant argues similarly, again relying on United States v. Groves, 122 F.2d 87 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 314 U.S. 670, 62 S.Ct. 135, 86 L.Ed. 536 (1941), that his conspiracy conviction must be reversed because the prosecution failed to prove one of the alleged objects of the conspiracy charged in Count I of the indictment, viz., that defendant and

F. Lawrence Anderson caused witnesses to testify falsely before the grand jury and at the perjury trial of Carl Smith. First, there was some evidence supporting both general allegations. Second, the prosecution need only prove one object of the conspiracy, absent undue prejudice created by the evidence presented as to the object not proved. See United States v. Papadakis, 510 F.2d 287, 297 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 950, 95 S.Ct. 1682, 44 L.Ed.2d 104 (1975); United States v. Grizaffi, 471 F.2d 69, 73 (7th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 411 U.S. 964, 93 S.Ct. 2141, 36 L.Ed.2d 684 (1973). Defendant neither contests that the prosecution in fact proved several objects of this conspiracy nor contends that the evidence used to prove the objects at issue here was prejudicial. Therefore, we find defendant's argument without merit.

VII

[14] Defendant next argues that there was no evidence before the grand jury to support a charge of subornation of perjury (Count III of the indictment), and that the inclusion of such a charge both as a separate count and as a part of each of the other counts in the indictment requires reversal of defendant's conviction. Defendant contends that courts must exercise some supervisory control over grand jury indictments if there is an allegation that there was "no evidence" presented to the *388 grand jury to support a given charge. United States v. Costello, 221 F.2d 668, 677 (2d Cir. 1955), aff'd on other grounds, 350 U.S. 359, 76 S.Ct. 406, 100 L.Ed. 397 (1956); Brady v. United States, 24 F.2d 405, 407-08 (8th Cir. 1928). Assuming, without deciding, that defendant correctly states the law, we nonetheless find no basis in this argument for reversal. Defendant raised this issue before the district court and it stated initially that it has inspected in camera several grand jury transcripts and concluded "with all due respect, Counsel, I don't think you are even close" (Tr. at 781). Then, the court overruled defendant's motion for a mistrial based on this argument (Tr. at 782). Nothing in defendant's one-sided summary of the proceedings before the grand jury convinces us that the court below erred in its assessment of the grand jury record. In light of this fact, and defendant's failure to certify the grand jury transcript as part of the record for appeal, we hold there was no error in the district court's decision.

VIII

[15] Defendant's last argument in his initial appeal is that the district court erred in requiring the defendant, pursuant to Fed.R.Crim.P. 17(c), to produce documents without a fuller presentation by the prosecution to support its motion. The court concluded in response to the defendant's motion to reconsider that production of the documents would "expedite the trial in this case." Defendant does not contest that finding. More importantly, defendant fails to allege any prejudice caused by the court's order. We, therefore, find no error.

IX

[16] On his appeal to the district court's denial of his motion for a new trial, defendant raises two arguments. First, defendant argues that the prosecution's failure to provide him with a copy of a transcript of an interview by an Internal Revenue Agent with Carl E. Smith was a violation of Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963). We disagree.

In Brady, the Supreme Court held that:

(T)he suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution.

373 U.S. at 87, 83 S.Ct. 1196 (emphasis added). As suggested by the quotation from Brady, the narrow issue for us is, given the nature of the defendant's request for exculpatory materials, did the prosecutor have a duty to provide defendant with a transcript of this particular interview? That issue is controlled by the Supreme Court's recent decision in United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 96 S.Ct. 2392, 49 L.Ed.2d 342 (1976).

The Court in Agurs reasoned that two factors define the duty of the prosecutor to provide Brady materials: whether the request for those materials was specific or general and their materiality. With regard to a general request, the Court concluded:

Such a request really gives the prosecutor no better notice than if no request is made. If there is a duty to respond to a general request of that kind, it must derive from the obviously exculpatory character of certain evidence in the hands of the prosecutor.

427 U.S. at 106-07, 96 S.Ct. at 2399. If the request for Brady material is general in nature, the Court held as to the materiality of that evidence that, "the prosecutor will not have violated his constitutional duty of disclosure unless his omission is of sufficient significance to result in the denial of the defendant's right to a fair trial." Id. at 108, 96 S.Ct. at 2399.

Applying those standards to the record before us, we conclude that the prosecutor did not violate his constitutional duty to disclose. Here the defendant's request was for "(i)nformation relating to material inconsistencies between statements given by any person, whether or not he is a prospective Government witness, and information relating to material inconsistencies between two or more persons, whether or not they are prospective government witnesses." *389 Contrary to defendant's contention, we conclude that this request was "general" within the meaning of Agurs. At a minimum, we would require that defendant focus his request on a particular witness before we would hold the request to be "specific." Plainly, defendant's request did not give "the prosecutor notice of exactly what the defense desired." Id. at 106, 96 S.Ct. at 2398.

Having determined that the request was general, it remains to be determined whether its non-disclosure deprived defendant of a fair trial. That determination is best made by the district court judge, with our review limited to whether his "first-hand appraisal of the record" was "thorough" and "reasonable." Id. at 114, 96 S.Ct. at 2402. The court below, after a careful consideration of the requested material and the record at trial, concluded:

The material presented would have been of a collateral nature. At the very most a small part of the material presented might have been used for impeachment of Carl Smith. However, such would only have been cumulative.

(Order of Sept. 23, 1977, at 12). Given that the omitted evidence was merely additional material for impeaching an already thoroughly impeached witness, we conclude that the district court's assessment was reasonable.[FN15]

FN15. There is a substantial dispute between the defendant and the prosecution as to whether defense counsel exercised "due diligence" in discovering the relevance of Smith's narcotics interview. It is not exactly clear what role this issue plays in defendant's appeal of the denial of his motion for a new trial. Defendant in his initial brief before this court did not argue that the interview was "newly discovered" evidence. Instead, his arguments were limited to possible violations of Brady and the Jencks Act. The prosecution in its brief raised the "due diligence" defense. That analysis, as argued, seems absolutely unrelated to any point raised in defendant's brief. Nonetheless, the defendant responded to the issue in his reply brief; however, he did so within the context of the Brady issue. Initially, we conclude that we are not being asked to reverse solely because the interview is "newly discovered" evidence. Second, in light of our view that, regardless of whether defense counsel exercised "due diligence," there is no violation of Brady and Agurs on this record, we decline to consider the possible effect of that factor either for or against the defendant. Compare United States v. Hedgeman, 564 F.2d 763 (7th Cir. 1977) with Marshall v. United States, 141 U.S.App.D.C. 1, 436 F.2d 155 (1970).

[17] Second, defendant in this appeal argues that the failure of the prosecution to provide the memorandum of the interview of Carl Smith relating to his narcotics activities was a violation of the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. s 3500.[FN16] Since neither party argued the point, we assume, without deciding, that this was a "statement" within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. s 3500(e)(1). Thus, the key issue is whether the information contained in the interview " relates generally to the events and activities testified to" by Carl Smith. United States v. O'Brien, 444 F.2d 1082, 1086 (7th Cir. 1971).

FN16. That section provides in relevant part:
(b) After a witness called by the United States has testified on direct examination, the court shall, on motion of the defendant, order the United States to produce any statement (as hereinafter defined) of the witness in the possession of the United States which relates to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified.
18 U.S.C. s 3500.

The district court concluded both that the statement did not "relate to" Smith's testimony within the meaning of United States v. Cleveland, 507 F.2d 731 (7th Cir. 1974), and that, even if it had, failure to produce that information did not require reversal of the case. See United States v. Esposito, 523 F.2d 242, 248 (7th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 916, 96 S.Ct. 1517, 47 L.Ed.2d 768 (1976). We find no basis for reversing those determinations. The subject matter of Smith's statement to the IRS agent occurred well before the creation of A & D Realty and it only indirectly reflected on the witness's statement on direct examination that he received money from defendant. In addition, the fact that the witness was promised consideration in return for his cooperation in a completely unrelated narcotics investigation cannot be said to "relate to" his trial testimony in any way. *390 We, therefore, find no violation of the Jencks Act requiring reversal of defendant's conviction.

For these reasons, the judgment of conviction entered by the district court on January 14, 1977, and the judgment denying the defendant's motion for a new trial entered September 23, 1977, are affirmed.

AFFIRMED.

END OF DOCUMENT

conspir to defraud gov't → crime of concealment istrative decisions in the Department of Justice must flow. Nevertheless, the government has already received special dispensation in this regard through the federal rules. Fed.R.App.P. 4(a)(1) gives the government twice as long as the private litigant to file notice of appeal. If the government cannot make its strategic decisions within this time and a protective notice must be filed and later dismissed, there is no reason that the private litigant should be forced to pay attorneys' fees for a meaningless appeal. We conclude, therefore, that the government's appeal was not substantially justified.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,

v.

Lorraine D. GLEASON, Appellant.

No. 84-1913.

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit.

Submitted March 14, 1985.

Decided July 3, 1985.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri, Joseph E. Stevens, Jr., J., of conspiracy to defraud United States by obstructing Treasury and collection of income taxes, and two counts of aiding in preparation of fraudulent income tax returns, and she appealed. The Court of Appeals, Floyd R. Gibson, Senior Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence, in form of coconspirator's statements, of "cover-up" or concealment of fraud was admissible, and did not create variance between conspiracy charged in indictment and evidence produced at trial; (2) trial judge, in questioning witnesses, did not overstep bounds of propriety; (3) defendant's rights under Speedy Trial Act were not violated; (4) district court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to limit potential cross-examination of defendant; and (5) conviction on one count of aiding in preparation of fraudulent returns was supported by sufficient evidence.

Affirmed.

1. Conspiracy ⇐43(12)

Evidence, in form of coconspirator's statements, of "cover-up" or concealment of fraud was admissible, and did not create variance between conspiracy charged in indictment and evidence produced at trial. 18 U.S.C.A. § 371.

2. Conspiracy ⇐28(1)

When successful accomplishment of crime necessitates concealment, acts of concealment are properly considered to be within scope of original conspiracy. 18 U.S.C.A. § 371.

3. Criminal Law ⇐656(2)

Trial judge, in questioning witnesses, did not overstep bounds of propriety, and questioning did not become so one-sided as to deprive defendant of fair trial.

4. Criminal Law ⇐1035(8)

In absence of objection to trial judge's comment, and because record reflected that comment was made out of jury's hearing, there was no plain error warranting reversal.

5. Criminal Law ⇐577.14

Where first trial ended in declaration of mistrial, and second indictment was filed before first indictment was dismissed, section of Speedy Trial Act [18 U.S.C.A. § 3161(e)] providing 70 days for retrial of case controlled, and, where retrial on superseding indictment commenced before that period expired, defendant's rights under such Act were not violated.

6. Witnesses ⇐393(1)

Prosecutor could not properly have confronted defendant with her prior statements made in course of proceeding regarding guilty plea which was later withdrawn. Fed.Rules Cr.Proc.Rule 11(e)(6)(C), 18 U.S.C.A.

7. Witnesses ⇐277(2)

District court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to limit potential cross-examination of defendant about allegedly fraudulent tax return, after prosecutor stated that he would be compelled to seek perjury indictment against defendant if she testified, contrary to her prior sworn statement, that she did not know receipts attached to tax return were fraudulent, where prosecutor had right to use statement made by defendant in proceeding involving guilty plea, which was later withdrawn, in subsequent criminal proceeding for perjury, and even if defendant had testified without mentioning return on direct examination, if she had represented that she did not know that any receipts that she had attached to returns were fraudulent, return would relate to this testimony and could properly be addressed on cross-examination.

8. Criminal Law ⇐1144.13(3, 5)

In reviewing district court's denial of motion for judgment of acquittal, Court of Appeals must consider evidence in light most favorable to government and must give government benefit of all reasonable inferences that may be logically drawn from evidence.

9. Internal Revenue ⇐5303

Conviction of aiding in preparation of fraudulent income tax returns was supported by sufficient evidence, from which jury could reasonably conclude that defendant prepared return knowing that claimed charitable contribution had not been made, and that receipt she attached to return fraudulently represented that such contribution had been made. 26 U.S.C.A. 7206(2).

James R. Wyrsch, Kansas City, Mo., for appellant.

John R. Osgood, Asst. U.S. Atty., Kansas City, Mo., for appellee.

Before JOHN R. GIBSON, Circuit Judge, FLOYD R. GIBSON, Senior Circuit Judge, and BOWMAN, Circuit Judge.

FLOYD R. GIBSON, Senior Circuit Judge.

Defendant Lorraine D. Gleason appeals from the district court's [1] judgment entered on a jury verdict convicting her on one count of conspiracy to defraud the United States by obstructing the Department of Treasury in collection of income taxes in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371, and two counts of aiding in the preparation of fraudulent income tax returns in violation of 26 U.S.C. § 7206(2) [2]. On July 6, 1984, the district court sentenced Gleason to two years imprisonment on the conspiracy count, with all but six months suspended, and three years probation to begin upon her release from custody, plus a $1,000 fine. On the remaining two counts, the court sentenced Gleason to three years probation on each count, to be served concurrently with each other and with the probation sentence imposed on the conspiracy count. Gleason appeals to this court, arguing that a variance existed at trial between the conspiracy charged in the indictment and the evidence shown at trial; that the trial court impermissibly acted as an advocate at trial; that her rights to a speedy trial were violated; that the trial court erred in refusing to limit potential cross-examination of her; and that the evidence as to Count Three of the indictment was insufficient to sustain a guilty verdict. We affirm.

1. The Honorable Joseph E. Stevens, United States District Judge for the Western District of Missouri.

2. Count Two charged Gleason with aiding and abetting in the preparation of the 1980 fraudulent tax return of Orville and Diane Hart. Count Three made a similar charge as to the 1980 tax return of Nora and Charles Blankenship.

I. Facts

In 1981, Lorraine Gleason worked with her husband Michael J. Gleason at Gleason's Tax and Accounting Service, a sole proprietorship owned by Michael Gleason in Independence, Missouri. Both Michael and Lorraine Gleason were members of the Universal Life Church, as was George Leigh, who occupied a separate office in the same building as the tax service. The Universal Life Church is a non-profit, religious corporation headquartered in Modesto, California. The Universal Life Church operates through "mail order ministries," through which anyone can be ordained as a minister and have conferred upon him ministerial credentials and powers. The ministers have no required duties, nor does the church have any established creed or doctrines. The Universal Life Church also issues "mail order church charters," through which as few as three people can be designated as a congregation. The members of the congregation may be members of the same family. Once ordained, a minister may donate to the church the earnings from his regular occupation, by placing the money into his congregation's bank account. In so doing, the minister receives a charitable contributions deduction of up to 50 percent of his gross income, with a corresponding reduction in income tax liability. The minister may then withdraw money from the account, tax-free, for the upkeep of the "church" (his home), and his living expenses, including food and lodging. The "Mother Church" in Modesto requires only that the congregation file a regular report.

The evidence at trial showed that both Michael and Lorraine Gleason prepared fraudulent income tax returns for various clients for the 1980 tax year. Typically, either Michael or Lorraine Gleason, or both, would conduct a preliminary interview with taxpayers, during which the taxpayers would produce necessary information to prepare their tax returns. Then either Michael or Lorraine Gleason would inform the taxpayers that more deductions would either decrease their tax liability or increase their tax refund. The Gleasons would refer the taxpayers to George Leigh, who would sell them receipts falsely stating that the taxpayers had made contributions to the Universal Life Church during 1980. Leigh sold the receipts for a small percentage of the stated contributions.[3] Either Michael or Lorraine Gleason would prepare returns for the taxpayers reflecting these bogus contributions, and the receipts were attached to the returns. If any taxpayer expressed concern about the possibility of audits, he or she would be assured by either Michael or Lorraine Gleason or George Leigh that the Universal Life Church would corroborate the claimed contributions.

Lorraine Gleason sought to establish as a defense at trial that she played no part in the conspiracy, and that her position at the tax service was merely that of a receptionist. Gleason insisted that she had not prepared any of the fraudulent returns but merely copied over returns sloppily prepared by her husband, or signed her name as preparer when he was too busy to sign his own name. The testimony at trial, however, showed that Lorraine Gleason had informed Orville and Diane Hart how they could receive a bigger refund by purchasing phony receipts from George Leigh. Gleason also filled out the Harts' receipts, signed their return as the preparer, and told the Harts not to worry about the validity of the deductions because the receipts substantiated the claimed contributions. Further, Lorraine Gleason was present when her husband informed Nora and Charles Blankenship about the availability of the false receipts and told them to contact George Leigh. She later attached the receipts that the Blankenships obtained from George Leigh to a completed tax return, which she had signed as preparer.

3. For example, the evidence at trial showed that Dale Bedsaul received from George Leigh receipts reflecting a total 1980 contribution of $9,000 to the Universal Life Church. Bedsaul paid Leigh $100 for the receipts. Ralph Keeling obtained receipts from Leigh representing a total 1980 contribution of $12,000; Keeling paid $60 or $65 for the receipts. James Massey paid Leigh $60 for receipts reflecting a $22,000 contribution to the Universal Life Church in 1980.

Lorraine Gleason pled guilty on July 27, 1983 to a one-count information charging her with aiding and assisting in the preparation of the false and fraudulent income tax return of taxpayer Ralph Keeling, in violation of 26 U.S.C. § 7206(2).[4] Gleason withdrew her guilty plea on November 23, 1983, and was indicted along with an alleged co-conspirator, J.C. Baxter, on December 9, 1983. A jury trial began on February 27, 1984, before the Honorable Scott O. Wright of the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri. The court declared a mistrial on March 5, 1984, because the jury was unable to reach a verdict. Gleason was subsequently reindicted, and retried before Judge Stevens on May 7, 1984, resulting in the convictions from which she now appeals.

A. Variance

Gleason first contends on appeal that the district court erred in denying her motion for a new trial, for arrest of judgment, and for judgment of acquittal based on her allegation that a variance existed between the conspiracy charged in the indictment and the evidence produced at trial. She asserts that the district court erred in admitting evidence, in the form of a co-conspirator's statements, of the "cover-up" or concealment of the fraud, because the cover-up was not within the scope of the conspiracy charged in the indictment.[5] Thus, Gleason's argument goes, the Government introduced evidence at trial as to multiple conspiracies—the initial conspiracy to defraud the United States and a second conspiracy to conceal the fraud. Gleason cites Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391, 77 S.Ct. 963, 1 L.Ed.2d 931 (1957), in support of her claim that the admission of the cover-up evidence caused an impermissible variance from the indictment. Because of the variance between the lone conspiracy count in the indictment and the evidence produced as to multiple conspiracies, Gleason contends her conviction should be reversed.

[1, 2] We hold that the cover-up evidence was properly admitted and that no variance existed here. In citing Grunewald, Gleason overlooks the Court's direction in that case to distinguish "between acts of concealment done in furtherance of the main criminal objectives of the conspiracy, and acts of concealment done after these central objectives have been attained, for the purpose only of covering up after the crime." 353 U.S. at 405, 77 S.Ct. at 974 (emphasis in original). When "[t]he successful accomplishment of the crime necessitates concealment," acts of concealment are properly considered to be within the scope of the original conspiracy. Id. We agree with other courts that have held that a conspiracy covered by 18 U.S.C. § 371, such as the one charged here, necessarily contemplates acts of concealment to accomplish its objectives. See United States v. Mackey, 571 F.2d 376, 383–84 (7th Cir. 1978); United States v. Diez, 515 F.2d 892, 897–98 (5th Cir.1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1052, 96 S.Ct. 780, 46 L.Ed.2d 641 (1976). *See also Forman v. 5. The first indictment against Gleason did not specifically mention the concealment efforts. In the trial on this indictment, which ended in a mistrial, Judge Wright did not admit the concealment evidence. of the substantial possibility that the returns would be audited and investigated, the filing of the returns did not fully accomplish the purpose of the main conspiracy, which by its very nature, called for concealment.

515 F.2d at 897–898. Because the co-conspirators' concealment attempts were part of the original conspiracy, no variance existed and the concealment evidence was properly admitted.

II. Alleged Misconduct of Trial Judge

Gleason next asserts that the trial court erred in denying her motions for a new trial and for a mistrial based on her allegations that the trial judge's misconduct deprived her of a fair trial. Specifically, Gleason contends that the trial judge impermissibly interjected himself into her trial by questioning witnesses, particularly Bishop Imbeau of the Universal Life Church headquarters in Modesto; calling for Bishop Imbeau to produce certain evidence; and commenting on the evidence, all to her prejudice. In support of her argument Gleason cites us to many places in the transcript that she deems examples of the judge's misconduct.

[3, 4] We have reviewed the transcript carefully and conclude that the trial judge did not overstep the bounds of propriety. First, we note that at least a few of the transcript pages to which Gleason refers us contain no comments by the trial judge at all, while others contain comments made by the judge out of the presence of the jury, thus averting any chance of prejudice. Other passages cited by Gleason consist of comments made by the judge to the prosecutor or defense counsel, including rulings on objections. Still other comments by the judge appear in the record as having been made in the presence, but out of the hearing, of the jury. Gleason's counsel contends that one such comment in particular, when the judge stated that a witness had been "dead wrong" in his testimony concerning the tax free benefits of ministers, was audible at the counsel table and therefore probably to the jury as well. Counsel, however, did not make a contemporaneous objection to the comment. Had an objection been made at the time of the perceived error, the trial court would have had the opportunity to determine whether members of the jury had in fact overheard the comment. In the absence of such an objection, however, and because the record reflects that the comment was made out of the jury's hearing, we find that no plain error warranting reversal exists. See United States v. Ellis, 747 F.2d 1205, 1208 (8th Cir.1984).

A trial judge is more than a "mere moderator" of a trial. United States v. Woods, 696 F.2d 566, 570–71 (8th Cir.1982) (quoting Dranow v. United States, 307 F.2d 545, 572 (8th Cir.1962)).

> [The trial judge] has the prerogative, and at times the duty, of eliciting facts he deems necessary to the clear presentation of the issues. To this end he may examine witnesses who testify, so long as he preserves an attitude of impartiality and guards against giving the jury an impression that the court believes the defendant is guilty.

Llach v. United States, 739 F.2d 1322, 1329–30 (8th Cir.1984) (quoting Dranow, 307 F.2d at 572). Those questions that the trial judge did ask of witnesses were properly intended to clarify testimony and elicit necessary facts; the judge's questioning did not become so one-sided as to deprive Gleason of a fair trial. See United States v. Bland, 697 F.2d 262, 265 (8th Cir.1983) (when trial judge has made allegedly prejudicial comments, appeals court must use balancing process to determine whether such comments have "pervaded over-all fairness" of proceedings). In sum, the trial court did not err in denying Gleason's motions for a new trial and for a mistrial based on alleged misconduct.

III. Alleged Violation of Speedy Trial Act

Gleason also contends that her right to a speedy trial pursuant to the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161–3174 (1982), was violated in this case. For consideration of this issue we review the relevant dates involved. Gleason originally waived indictment and pled guilty to a one-count information on July 27, 1983. The district court subsequently allowed her to withdraw her guilty plea November 23, 1983. The grand jury then handed down a nine-count indictment against Gleason and J.C. Baxter, in which Gleason was named in seven of the nine counts. Upon defense counsel's motion, the magistrate on January 9, 1984 ordered that the trial be continued from its scheduled January 23, 1984 starting date until February 27, 1984. After the case was tried, beginning on February 27, and submitted to the jury, the district court ordered a mistrial on March 5, 1984, because the jury was unable to reach a verdict. Baxter subsequently entered a guilty plea.

On March 13, 1984, the grand jury returned a new indictment against Gleason. This superseding indictment contained three counts. Count One charged a conspiracy based upon the same acts that served as the basis for the conspiracy charged in Count One of the previous indictment, but added a paragraph specifically including as part of the conspiracy actions taken to cover up the fraud. Counts Two and Three of the superseding indictment were identical to Counts Seven and Eight of the first indictment. The remaining charges in the previous indictment were dropped from the superseding indictment.

Gleason was arraigned on the new indictment on March 21, 1984, and the district court set the matter for trial on May 7, 1984. Gleason filed a motion to dismiss the case on April 25, based on alleged violations of the Speedy Trial Act, asserting that Speedy Trial computation should be governed by 18 U.S.C. § 3161(h)(6).[6] The district court denied the motion in an order filed April 26, 1984, citing 18 U.S.C. § 3161(e), which provides 70 days for the retrial of a case that ended in a mistrial.[7] Trial on the superseding indictment began on May 7, 1984, with the jury returning its guilty verdict on May 15. The Government subsequently moved to dismiss the first indictment against Gleason.

On appeal to this court Gleason argues that the district court erred in denying her motion to dismiss based on the Speedy Trial Act. She repeats her contention that section 3161(h)(6), rather than section 3161(e), applies. Gleason claims that the superseding indictment differs greatly from the initial indictment, and that the Government benefited from the alterations because it had fewer charges to prove and more evidence (from the broadening of the conspiracy count) with which to prove them. Because under section 3161(h)(6) the 70-day time period within which she could be tried expired before May 7, 1984, the indictment should have been dismissed with prejudice under 18 U.S.C. § 3162(a)(2).

[5] We agree with the district court that section 3161(e) applies to Gleason's case. Section 3161(e) plainly addresses the circumstance that warranted retrial in this case: the declaration of a mistrial. By its terms, section 3161(e) requires that a defendant be retried within seventy days of the declaration of a mistrial. Gleason's trial on May 7, 1984, was within seventy days of the March 5th declaration of mistrial. Gleason would have us read into section 3161(e) a condition that does not exist—namely, that a defendant must be tried on the identical indictment following a

6. 18 U.S.C. § 3161(h)(6) states:

> If the information or indictment is dismissed upon motion of the attorney for the Government and thereafter a charge is filed against the defendant for the same offense, or any offense required to be joined with that offense, any period of delay from the date the charge was dismissed to the date the time limitation would commence to run as to the subsequent charge had there been no previous charge [shall be excluded in computing the time within which the trial of any such offense must commence].

7. 18 U.S.C. § 3161(e) states in relevant part: "If the defendant is to be tried again following a declaration of the trial judge of a mistrial * * *, the trial shall commence within seventy days from the date the action occasioning the retrial becomes final."

mistrial—and asks us to apply section 3161(h)(6).

We do not think section 3161(h)(6) can be applied without some distortion. That section expressly covers the circumstance when the Government moves to dismiss an indictment and thereafter a charge is filed for the same offense. Here, however, the second indictment was filed before the first indictment was dismissed. Thus by its terms section 3161(h)(6) does not apply to Gleason's situation. See United States v. McCown, 711 F.2d 1441, 1446 (9th Cir. 1983); United States v. Horton, 676 F.2d 1165, 1170 (7th Cir.1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1201, 103 S.Ct. 1184, 75 L.Ed.2d 431 (1983). C.f. United States v. Harris, 724 F.2d 1452, 1454 (9th Cir.1984) (construing similar language in 18 U.S.C. § 3161(d)(1)). Gleason argues that the return of the second indictment in effect dismissed the first indictment against her, so that no excludable delay exists under section 3161(h)(6). She cites us to no cases, however, which hold that a superseding indictment automatically dismisses an original indictment, nor have we found any such authority. Based on a plain reading of the statute, then, we agree with the district court that section 3161(e)(6) specifically controls this situation and that Gleason's rights under the Speedy Trial Act were not violated.

IV. District Court's Refusal to Limit Potential Cross-Examination of Gleason.

[6] Gleason next assigns as error the district court's refusal to limit in advance the Government's cross-examination of her should she take the stand. When Gleason pled guilty on July 27, 1983 to the one-count information, she stated under oath that she knew the receipts attached to the tax return of Ralph Keeling were fraudulent. The district court later allowed Gleason to withdraw her guilty plea. Before this case went to trial, the prosecutor indicated that if Gleason elected to take the stand, he would question her about the Keeling return. If Gleason then testified that she did not know the receipts were fraudulent when she attached them to the Keeling return, the prosecutor stated that he would be compelled to seek a perjury indictment against her for contradicting her prior sworn statement.[8] Gleason thus asked the district court to rule before trial that the Government would not be able to cross-examine her about the Keeling return. The court refused to so limit the questioning, and Gleason did not testify.

Gleason argues that the failure to restrict the potential cross-examination of her prevented her from testifying. Basically, she asserts that the court should have restricted the cross-examination for two reasons. First, the Government was able to use the threat of perjury either to prevent Gleason from testifying or to force her to waive her rights under Fed.R.Crim.P. 11(e)(6)(C). Second, if Gleason did testify but did not mention the Keeling return on direct examination, any questions about that return on cross-examination would have been outside the scope of direct and therefore inadmissible under Rule 610 of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

[7] We think both of Gleason's arguments are without merit. Rule 11(e)(6)(D)(ii) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure specifically contemplates the use of a statement made by a defendant in a proceeding involving a guilty plea, which is later withdrawn, in a subsequent criminal proceeding for perjury. The prosecutor's "threat" of perjury, therefore, was nothing more than a statement of intent to do that which he had an express right to do.

8. The prosecutor would not have been able to confront Gleason with her prior statements because Rule 11(e)(6)(C) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides that statements made by a defendant in the course of a proceeding regarding a guilty plea, which is later withdrawn, are not admissible against the defendant in any civil or criminal proceeding. Rule 11(e)(6)(D)(ii), however, allows as an exception to the general rule that such a statement is admissible "in a criminal proceeding for perjury or false statement if the statement was made by the defendant under oath, on the record, and in the presence of counsel." See also Rule 410 of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Further, even if Gleason had testified without mentioning the Keeling return on direct examination, if she had represented that she did not know that any of the receipts that she had attached to returns were fraudulent, the Keeling return would relate to this testimony and could properly be addressed on cross-examination. The scope of questioning permissible on cross-examination is within the broad discretion of the district court. United States v. Schepp, 746 F.2d 406, 410 (8th Cir.1984), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 105 S.Ct. 1190, 84 L.Ed.2d 336 (1985); Villanueva v. Leininger, 707 F.2d 1007, 1010 (8th Cir.1983) (per curiam). "Cross-examination may embrace any matter germane to direct examination, qualifying or destroying it, or tending to elucidate, modify, explain, contradict or rebut testimony given by the witness." Roberts v. Hollocher, 664 F.2d 200, 203 (8th Cir.1981). The district court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to limit the potential cross-examination of Gleason, especially when it could have expressly contradicted her testimony on direct.

V. Sufficiency of Evidence

Gleason's final contention before us is that the district court erred in denying her motions for a new trial, for arrest of judgment, and for judgment of acquittal based on her contention that the evidence as to Count Three of the Indictment was insufficient to sustain a guilty verdict. Count Three alleges that Gleason willfully and knowingly aided and assisted in preparing a fraudulent income tax return for Charles and Nora Blankenship for the 1980 tax year. Although Gleason concedes that the Blankenships' tax return did contain fraudulent deductions, she contests the jury's finding that she acted willfully, with full knowledge of the fraudulent nature of the return. She asserts that her duties at the tax service were merely clerical, that she had no tax expertise, and that the Blankenships relied on Michael Gleason's advice in claiming the fraudulent deductions. In support of her contentions, Gleason points to the Blankenships' testimony that they had no direct conversations with her about the Universal Life Church, and to Charles Blankenship's failure to identify her in court at trial.

[8, 9] In reviewing the district court's denial of a motion for judgment of acquittal, this court must consider the evidence "in the light most favorable to the government and must give the government the benefit of all reasonable inferences that may logically be drawn from the evidence." United States v. DeLuna, 763 F.2d 897, 924 (8th Cir.1985); see also United States v. Anziano, 606 F.2d 242, 244 (8th Cir.1979) (per curiam). In reviewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Government, we conclude that the evidence as to Count Three was sufficient to sustain the jury verdict. Upon the Blankenships' initial visit to the tax service in March 1981, Lorraine Gleason conducted a preliminary interview to get information necessary to prepare their return. The Blankenships made no mention of any charitable contributions at that time. Lorraine Gleason was also present when her husband told the Blankenships that they needed a $9,000 deduction and discussed with them how they could get a receipt for a contribution from George Leigh. When Nora Blankenship later brought in a receipt obtained from Leigh representing that a $9,000 contribution had been made, Lorraine Gleason attached the receipt to a return that she had signed as the preparer, which already reflected that a $9,000 contribution had been made. That Charles Blankenship could not identify Gleason at trial is not significant in light of the fact that he met her only once in 1981, and the trial took place three years later. No question exists as to whether Lorraine Gleason was actually the woman who assisted the Blankenships on their visit to Gleason's Tax and Accounting Service. From the evidence the jury could reasonably conclude that Gleason prepared the Blankenships' return knowing that a $9,000 contribution to the Universal Life Church had not been made in 1980, and that the receipt she attached to the return fraudulently represented that such a contribution had been made.

VII. Conclusion

Because we find Gleason's allegations of error to be without merit, and the evidence of her guilt overwhelming, we affirm her convictions.

Roesevelt HAYES, Appellant,

v.

A.L. LOCKHART, Director, Arkansas Department of Corrections, Appellee.

No. 84-2092.

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit.

Submitted April 10, 1985.

Decided July 9, 1985.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 13, 1985.

Petitioner sought habeas corpus relief from state court conviction. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas, Henry Woods, J., denied relief, and petitioner appealed. The Court of Appeals, Collinson, J., sitting by designation, held that: (1) trial judge had no affirmative duty to inquire on conflict of interest in joint representation of codefendants; (2) petitioner failed to show actual conflict of interest; and (3) issue whether petitioner was denied due process by giving of state's requested instruction was barred from collateral review by habeas court for failure to comply with state procedural rules.

Affirmed.

1. Criminal Law ⇐641.5(2)

Joint representation of codefendants is not per se violative of constitutional guarantees of effective assistance of counsel. U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 6, 14.

2. Criminal Law ⇐641.5(5)

Trial judge did not have an affirmative duty to inquire whether joint representation of co-defendants would create a conflict of interest where neither defendant nor his trial attorney objected to proceeding to trial without separate counsel, and trial counsel did not indicate to the court that he foresaw even the possibility of a conflict.

3. Habeas Corpus ⇐25.1(6)

Without an objection or other signal to trial judge that a potential conflict of interest exists, a habeas petitioner must demonstrate that his attorney's performance was adversely affected by an actual conflict of interest.

4. Criminal Law ⇐641.5(3)

Defendant failed to demonstrate actual conflict of interest in trial counsel's joint representation of codefendants in first degree murder prosecution, notwithstanding that defendant, who shot victim after codefendant had initially shot her, and who alleged that his participation involved a "mercy killing," did not receive a reduced sentence, as given young age of codefendant and defendant's relationship to victim and codefendant, namely, sharing an apartment with them, it was not unreasonable for jury to have imposed a greater sentence on defendant.

5. Criminal Law ⇐641.13(1)

An appropriate inquiry in a Sixth Amendment case alleging ineffectiveness of counsel focuses upon the adversarial process, not on accused's relationship with his lawyer as such. U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. 6.

6. Criminal Law ⇐641.13(1)

If counsel is a reasonably effective advocate, he meets constitutional standards irrespective of his client's evaluation of his performance. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 6.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Fred W. SANS, Frank A. Weaner, Raymond O. McDonald, Jr., Defendants-Appellants.

No. 82-3106.
United States Court of Appeals,
Eleventh Circuit.
May 11, 1984.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Florida, Ben Krentzman, J., of conspiring to defraud government and failure to file currency transaction reports, and defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals, Tjoflat, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) delegation of authority to Secretary of Treasury in statute authorizing Secretary to require reports of transactions involving payment, receipt or transfer of United States currency was valid; (2) evidence was sufficient to support conviction of bank officials for wilfully failing to file currency transaction reports; (3) whether bank officials knew that other bankers disobeyed law was not relevant to whether they acted knowingly in failing to file forms or whether they acted with specific intent to ignore law; (4) jury was entitled to fine nonbank officer defendant guilty of conspiring even though it decided to acquit bank officers; (5) evidence of coconspirator's checkered past was relevant to establish bank officials' state of mind in entering into currency transaction; and (6) conspiring to fail to file currency transaction reports in order to impair Internal Revenue Service's ability to collect data constituted conspiracy to defraud United States.

1524 Before TJOFLAT and FAY, Circuit Judges, and WISDOM [FN], Senior Circuit Judge.

FN* Honorable John Minor Wisdom, U.S. Circuit Judge for the Fifth Circuit, sitting by designation.

TJOFLAT, Circuit Judge:

This case involves the attempts of Leon Cohen and his associates to "launder" illegally obtained money through the Palm State Bank, Palm Harbor, Florida, and to avoid federal income tax liability. Leon Cohen, his bookkeeper Fred Sans, the Palm State Bank, and two of the bank's officers, Frank Weaner and Ray McDonald, were charged in four counts with conspiracy to defraud the government, failure to file currency transaction reports (CTR's) (two counts), and falsifying facts in a matter under the jurisdiction of the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). [FN1] Leon Cohen's case was severed because he was ill, and the remaining indictees went to trial before a jury. At the close of the government's case, the court acquitted all four defendants of the fourth count. The jury found Sans guilty of the conspiracy count only; it found Weaner, McDonald, and the Palm State Bank guilty only of the two counts of failure to file the CTR's. Sans, Weaner and McDonald appeal, presenting several claims of error. We affirm.

FN1. See infra text at 1525 for the complete indictment.

I.

The conduct for which appellants were indicted took place in 1976 and 1977. At that time, Leon Cohen, an Atlanta, Georgia, resident, owed the IRS over $600,000, and it had filed substantial tax liens against him. Appellant Sans was Cohen's bookkeeper and accountant. Between late 1976 and mid-1977, Cohen obtained over $900,000, much of it in small bills ($5's, $10's and $20's), through various schemes to defraud Leslie Atkinson, a convicted drug dealer then serving a federal sentence in the Atlanta penitentiary. [FN2]

FN2. Atkinson's conviction is reported in United States v. Atkinson, 565 F.2d 1283 (11th Cir.1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 944, 98 S.Ct. 2845, 56 L.Ed.2d 785 (1978).

In November 1976, Cohen, through his attorney Stanley Galkin and associate John Tipton, offered to sell Atkinson six kilograms of heroin for $300,000. [FN3] Atkinson's representatives and Cohen's representatives were to exchange the drugs and money; however, Cohen arranged a simulated arrest at the exchange point, inducing Atkinson's associates to flee without the drugs or the money. Tipton and Sans counted the money over a period of two days at Cohen's house. Tipton and Jerome Kaplan, a business associate of Cohen's, exchanged some of the money at Atlanta banks; Cohen had instructed them not to exchange more than $5,000 at any one bank, and not to attract attention.

FN3. Atkinson apparently still managed a drug operation though he was incarcerated.

In January 1977, Sans and Cohen showed Charles Michael, another of Cohen's associates, what Cohen boasted was "a million dollars" in low denomination bills, and Cohen gave him $25,000 of that money to exchange for $100 bills at several North Carolina banks. Sans and Tipton were present when Michael returned the clean money. Also in January, Cohen showed Milton Chalmers, a commercial loan officer in a St. Petersburg, Florida, bank, a briefcase full of money and sought to exchange it for one hundred dollar bills. Chalmers, declining to make the exchange, explained the federal reporting requirements; [FN4] Cohen commented that he could circumvent *1525 the requirements by exchanging the money at the Palm State Bank because his associates controlled the bank.

FN4. 31 U.S.C. s 1081 (1976) authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to require the reporting of domestic currency transactions. Pursuant to this authority, the Secretary promulgated 31 C.F.R. 103.22(a) (1983) providing that "[e]ach financial institution shall file a report of each deposit, withdrawal, exchange of currency or other payment or transfer, by, through, or to such financial institution, which involves a transaction in currency of more than $10,000."

On January 20, 1977, one day after the Palm State Bank received a large shipment of $100 and $50 bills from the Federal Reserve, Cohen came to the bank. Appellant McDonald, as the vice president with whom Cohen was dealing, brought Cohen to then head teller Rosemary Gardner and instructed her that Cohen had a large number of small bills that should be exchanged for large ones. $20,000 to $25,000 was exchanged on that occasion. McDonald told Gardner that no CTR was necessary, implying to her that such reports did not apply to exchanges of bills for other bills.

In early February 1977, appellant Weaner, in the presence of McDonald and Cohen, instructed his secretary Loraine Ingham to take a large stack of cash to Rosemary Gardner to be exchanged, and to open a safety deposit box for Cohen, but without his name appearing on the bank's records. They set up the account in Tipton's name.

On March 10, 1977, Galkin and Cohen, accompanied by Chalmers, [FN5] exchanged about $50,000 at the Palm State Bank. Teller Gary Watson, who exchanged the money, asked Rosemary Gardner if a CTR needed to be filed. Gardner took a CTR form to Weaner's office and returned with it five minutes later. [FN6] No form was filed.

FN5. Cohen had asked Chalmers to accompany him on this trip, apparently to impress Chalmers with his authority at the Palm State Bank. Later that day, Cohen asked Chalmers if he could set up a similar exchange at the St. Petersburg bank. Chalmers, avoiding a direct refusal, told Cohen the risk involved would warrant a 10% charge on such an exchange.

FN6. The record does not reflect whether the form was filled out when Rosemary Gardner returned.

In March and April 1977, Cohen weaseled more money out of Atkinson. Galkin, at Cohen's direction, convinced Atkinson that he had high official connections who, for a $1 million fee, could arrange Atkinson's release from prison. After receiving a $100,000 prepayment from one of Atkinson's associates, Cohen, impersonating then Associate Attorney General Michael Egan, visited Atkinson at the prison. When Cohen returned, Sans and Tipton counted the $100,000. In April, Cohen forged a note to Atkinson's brother and used it to get $300,000 of Atkinson's money. Also in April, Cohen sent Sans to the Grand Cayman Islands where, by trick, Sans and Cohen arranged a wire transfer of $260,000 from an account Atkinson had there through a Canadian bank to a checking account in Sans' name at the Palm State Bank. Weaner's initials were on the card establishing the account.

On May 10, 1977, Palm State Bank received another Federal Reserve shipment of $50,000 in large bills. Cohen then exchanged about $40,000 in $5's, $10's and $20's for large bills. McDonald waited with Cohen at the teller window while then head teller Gary Watson made the exchange. Watson retained the small bills in his teller drawer. Watson again asked Rosemary Gardner about filing a CTR; no report was filed, however.

Cohen, Sans, Weaner, McDonald and Palm State Bank were indicted for: (count one) conspiracy to (a) defraud the United States by obstructing the IRS in its efforts to collect information and reports of currency transactions larger than $10,000, (b) falsify and conceal material facts within IRS jurisdiction in violation of 18 U.S.C. 1001, (c) willfully fail to file and cause the failure to file CTR's in connection with currency exchanges totaling in excess of $100,000 at Palm State Bank, and (d) defraud the United States by impeding collection of Cohen's income taxes; (count two) willful failure to file a CTR in connection with the March 10, 1977, money exchange; (count three) willful failure to file a CTR in connection with the May 10, 1977, money exchange; and (count four) concealing facts within IRS jurisdiction in violation of 18 U.S.C. 1001.

*1526 At trial, the government presented Galkin, Tipton, Chalmers, Watson, Rosemary Gardner and teller Shirley Scoggins, among others, as witnesses. They testified to the above transactions. The defendants denied any wrongdoing on their part. Sans' denial, presented through his attorney's argument to the jury, was that he did not know Cohen was violating the law and did not know about the money exchanges. Weaner testified that no exchange had taken place to his knowledge, and even if one had he would not have thought a CTR was required because he thought Cohen fell into a "known customer" exemption to the reporting requirements. The exemption, at 31 CFR s 103.22(b)(3) (1972), provided that a bank would not need to "report transactions with an established customer maintaining a deposit relationship with the bank, in amounts which the bank may reasonably conclude do not exceed amounts commensurate with the customary conduct of the business ... of the customer concerned." McDonald testified that he recalled one cash exchange; Cohen had told him a real estate seller he was dealing with needed cash in large bills for certain property Cohen was trying to purchase, and McDonald had allowed him to exchange some small bills for large bills. No other exchanges had taken place, and, for the purpose of that one exchange, he had considered Cohen a "known customer" and so had not filed the CTR.

The defendants sought to buttress their denials of wrong-doing with the testimony of the president of the Palm State Bank, Phyllis Jones, and a banking expert, Gerald Stogniew; their testimony raised an inference that the currency exchange of May 10, 1977, handled by Gary Watson, could not have taken place. Jones said the bank's guidelines on the amount of cash the head teller could have in his drawer at any one time was $25,000 to $30,000, substantially less than the amount Cohen gave Watson on May 10; under the guidelines, Watson would have been required to deposit the excess in the bank's vault. Stogniew opined that the records of the bank's vault showed no deposit on May 10 of the number of small denomination bills Watson said he received from Cohen on that date, the inference being, as the defendants argued to the jury, that Watson had not conducted the exchange. As we have indicated, the jury found the bank officers and the bank guilty of having willfully failed to file the CTR's; it found Sans guilty of conspiracy.

On appeal, Weaner, McDonald and Sans raise three kinds of error. The first would require us to enter one or more judgments of acquittal; the second would require us to grant one or more of the appellants a new trial, and the third would require us to grant a resentencing. In the first category are two claims by Weaner and McDonald: (1) that the rules requiring CTR's to be filed were unconstitutional as they resulted from an overbroad congressional delegation, and (2) that the evidence was insufficient to establish that the March 10 and May 10 transactions occurred and that any failure to file was willful.

Two claims by Weaner and McDonald would require a new trial: (1) that the trial court erred in refusing one of two jury instructions Weaner requested on willfulness, and (2) that the trial court erred in refusing expert testimony proffered by Weaner regarding the banking trade custom of ignoring currency regulations. Sans brings two claims requiring us to grant him a new trial. First, he claims that his conspiracy conviction is flawed because it may have been based on a conspiracy objective which, due to the acquittals of Weaner and McDonald on the conspiracy count, could not have been part of the conspiracy. Second, he claims that irrelevant and prejudicial evidence regarding Leon Cohen fatally flawed his conviction. He brings one claim of the third type, asking us to require that he be resentenced because the conspiracy charge contained both misdemeanor and felony objectives, such that Sans might be guilty of a misdemeanor conspiracy rather than a felony *1527 conspiracy. If so, his sentence, as it stands, would be excessive. We first address Weaner's and McDonald's arguments.

I.

A. Constitutionality of the Regulations.

[1] Weaner and McDonald were convicted of substantive violations of 31 U.S.C. ss 1081 and 1058 (1976). [FN7] These statutory provisions were part of Chapter 21 of Title 31 of the United States Code, entitled Reports of Currency and Foreign Transactions. Section 1081 in its entirety provided that:

FN7. Since the indictment and trial, these sections have been revised and renumbered. Reports of Currency and Foreign Transactions now appear at 31 U.S.C.A. ss 5311-5322 (1983) as Records and Reports on Monetary Instruments Transactions. Also, the regulations promulgated pursuant to the statutes have been amended since the dates of the alleged offense. Here, reference is made to the statutes and regulations as existing at the time of the alleged offenses.

Transactions involving any domestic financial institution shall be reported to the Secretary [of the Treasury] at such time, in such manner, and in such detail, as the Secretary may require if they involve the payment, receipt, or transfer of United States currency, or such other monetary instruments as the Secretary may specify, in such amounts, denominations, or both, or under such circumstances, as the Secretary shall be regulation prescribe. (emphasis supplied.)

Section 1058 in its entirety provided that:

Whoever willfully violates any provision of this chapter or any regulation under this chapter shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both. (emphasis supplied.)

31 C.F.R. s 103.22 (1972), enacted by the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to the aforementioned statutes, provided in pertinent part that:

Each financial institution shall file a report of each deposit, withdrawal, exchange of currency or other payment or transfer, by, through, or to such financial institution, which involves a transaction of currency of more than $10,000.

Weaner and McDonald argue that the legislative delegation in section 1081 was too broad because Congress granted the Secretary the option to create criminal statutes in his sole discretion, unlimited by any guidelines. [FN8]

FN8. They also argue that even if the statute is a constitutional delegation, the Secretary has exceeded the scope of that delegation in creating 31 C.F.R. s 103.22 (1983). They base this argument on section 1081's reference to reportable transactions as "payment, receipt, or transfer" of currency, and the regulation's coverage of "deposit, withdrawal, exchange of currency or other payment or transfer." An "exchange," they assert, was not contemplated by section 1081. This argument is not credible; an "exchange" is certainly nothing more than two "payments" and thus is covered by the language of section 1081.

[2] The U.S. Constitution, Art. 1, s 1, provides that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." Congress may not transfer to others the essential legislative functions with which it is vested. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 529, 55 S.Ct. 837, 843, 79 L.Ed. 1570 (1935). However, Congress may "authorize other bodies to determine specific facts and may also establish general standards and delegate to others the responsibility of effectuating the legislative policy." United States v. Gordon, 580 F.2d 827, 839 (5th Cir.) cert. denied 439 U.S. 1051, 99 S.Ct. 731, 58 L.Ed.2d 711 (1978), citing Schechter.

United States v. Womack, 654 F.2d 1034, 1037 (5th Cir. Unit B 1981) cert. denied 454 U.S. 1156, 102 S.Ct. 1029, 71 L.Ed.2d 314 (1982), describes the standard we apply in judging a delegation challenge:

Congressional legislation which prescribes essential standards and basic legislative policy and delegates to an administrator authority for promulgation of rules and regulations is constitutionally *1528 permissible, provided the standards are "sufficiently definite and precise to enable Congress, the courts and the public to ascertain whether the Administrator ... has conformed to those standards." The standards of the statute are not to be tested in isolation but must derive meaningful content from the purpose of the statute and its factual background and the statutory context in which the standards appear. (citations omitted)

[3] The statute in question here met these standards. The statute delegated a limited power to the Secretary: it enabled him to require only "reports" of transactions involving "monetary instruments" to which a "domestic financial institution" was a party. The statute defined both "monetary instruments" and "domestic financial institutions." While it is true that the Secretary might have chosen not to regulate at all under this section, if he chose to act he could require only that reports of transactions involving payment, receipt, or transfer of U.S. currency be made. Moreover, his choice whether to require the reports at all, or of what specific transactions, was limited by the purposes of the act, to require certain reports or records where such reports or records have "a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, or regulatory investigations or proceedings." H.R. No. 975, 91st Cong., 2d Sess., reprinted in 1970 U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News, 4394, 4395. The legislative history of the Act indicates that "the domestic reporting requirements were enacted because law enforcement agencies found that the growth of financial institutions had been paralleled by an increase in criminal activity associated with them." Id.

The limited nature of the delegation is even clearer when we consider, as we must, the factual background in which the statute appears. When the statute was enacted, the Secretary of the Treasury had been requiring reports of customers' large currency transactions for twenty-five years. Reports had been required for "currency transactions that, in the judgment of the institution, exceeded those 'commensurate with the customary conduct of the business, industry or profession of the person or organization concerned.' " California Bankers Association v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 37, 94 S.Ct. 1494, 1506, 39 L.Ed.2d 812 (1974). This pattern of regulation was merely continued by the reporting requirements in this case.

Given the single action the Secretary could undertake (requiring reports), the pattern of prior regulation, and the extent to which Congress defined in the statute and legislative history the targets of the reporting requirements, the transactions covered, and the purpose of the reporting legislation, we find no delegation problem here. That the Secretary under section 1081 could have imposed standards enforceable by criminal penalties did not make the delegation less valid, for "[i]t is well established that a delegatee may formulate rules for violation of which the statute itself provides penalties imposable by judicial process...." Gordon, 580 F.2d at 840 (citations omitted).

B. Sufficiency of the Evidence

[4] Weaner and McDonald argue that there was insufficient evidence to show that the counts two and three currency transactions occurred and that their failure to file CTR's was willful. We disagree. There was sufficient testimony from the teller Gary Watson and Weaner's secretary Loraine Ingham for the jury to find that the transactions took place. Watson's testimony was not, as appellants argue, rendered valueless by the testimony of the bank's president and the banking expert we have recited concerning the currency exchange of May 10, 1977. Watson flatly refuted the president's statement that the bank's guidelines limited the amount of cash he could have in his teller's drawer; he said the limit was $80,000. He also said that he kept the money he got from Cohen in the drawer overnight. Consequently, he *1529 rendered meaningless the bank expert's testimony as to the state of the vault records on May 10.

The evidence was also sufficient for the jury to conclude that Cohen's actions did not reasonably fit within the known customer exemption. The evidence, albeit circumstantial, was also plainly adequate to support a conclusion that the bankers failed to file CTR's with specific intent to violate the reporting laws.

[5] Weaner and McDonald next argue that their acquittal of the conspiracy count bars conviction of the substantive counts because the jury, in determining that they had not joined the Cohen-Sans conspiracy, implicitly determined that they had not failed to file CTR's following the March 10 and May 10 currency exchanges. This argument is clearly without merit. The jury could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that Sans and Cohen engaged in a conspiracy with each other to defraud the United States by obstructing the calculation and collection of Cohen's taxes, and also that the bankers had purposely violated currency laws by failing to file the CTR's. The jury could certainly have found the evidence sufficient to show that the bankers purposely violated the reporting laws, but perhaps did so just to boost their business, and not as coconspirators of Cohen or Sans. Contrary to Weaner's and McDonald's arguments, the jury's conclusion that the bankers should be acquitted of conspiracy is consistent with its determination that the currency exchanges took place. That conclusion could merely indicate that the jury did not find the bankers to have had the requisite state of mind to be conspirators when those exchanges occurred.

C. The Willfulness Instruction

Weaner and McDonald asked the trial judge to instruct the jury on willfulness as follows:

The willfulness element under this law is of a special nature. The mere failure to comply with the terms of the law is not a violation, it must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt that the Defendant had specific knowledge of the reporting requirements alleged to have been violated. An acknowledgement by the Defendant of awareness of currency laws is not sufficient to prove willfulness under these statutes.

Declining to give this requested charge to the jury, the district court instructed the jury as follows:

Each of the following essential elements must be proved in order to establish the violation charged in Counts 2 and 3 of the indictment [the substantive counts charging failure to file the CTR's]:

* * *

[T]hird, that the defendant's act or acts, if any, in failing to file and causing the failure to file such a report were done willfully.

An act is willful if done knowingly and with specific intent to act with a bad purpose, either to disobey or to disregard the law. Specific intent, as the term implies, means more than the general intent to commit the act. To establish specific intent, the Government must prove that a defendant knowingly did an act which the law forbids or knowingly failed to do an act which the law requires, purposely intending to violate the law.

An act or a failure to act is knowingly done if done voluntarily and intentionally and not because of mistake or accident or other innocent reasons. (emphasis added.)

[6] A trial court's refusal to deliver a requested instruction is reversible error only if the requested instruction (1) was correct, (2) was not substantially covered by others delivered, and (3) concerned a point in the trial so important that the failure to give the requested instruction seriously impaired the defendant's ability *1530 to defend himself. United States v. Stone, 702 F.2d 1333, 1339 (11th Cir.1983); Pine v. United States, 135 F.2d 353, 355 (5th Cir.), [FN9] cert. denied, 320 U.S. 740, 64 S.Ct. 40, 88 L.Ed. 439 (1943); see United States v. Hitsman, 604 F.2d 443, 446 (5th Cir.1979). Here, to the extent the requested instruction was correct, it was substantially covered by the instruction the trial court gave.

FN9. In Bonner v. City of Prichard, 661 F.2d 1206, 1209 (11th Cir.1981) (en banc), this court adopted as binding precedent all decisions of the former Fifth Circuit handed down prior to October 1, 1981.

[7] The first sentence of the requested instruction was not a clear statement of the law. Any willfulness requirement may or may not be "special"; this elucidated nothing helpful for the jury. The second sentence was substantially covered by the willfulness instruction and the court's other instructions; those instructions placed the burden on the government to prove every element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt, including that the defendants purposefully intended to violate the reporting law. The third sentence was also adequately covered; nothing in the judge's instructions would have led the jury to believe that knowing the law was enough in itself to show willfulness. [FN10] Accordingly we find no error in the trial judge's rejection of the requested instructions.

FN10. Even taken as the defendants probably meant it, the third sentence was largely an incorrect statement of the law in this case. It comes from a case, United States v. Schnaiderman, 568 F.2d 1208 (5th Cir.1978), in which a Venezuelan tourist was carrying a large sum of money into the country. A customs officer asked the tourist if he understood U.S. currency laws. The tourist replied that he was aware of such laws but that he was going to spend the money gambling in Aruba two days later. The customs officer never asked about what, if any, specific currency laws the tourist was aware of. This court found the statement that he was aware of "U.S. currency laws" to be too vague and unspecific to constitute "knowledge" or provide a basis for a showing of willfulness within the meaning of the currency offenses charged. In this case, all defendants indicated a higher level of awareness than mere awareness of "U.S. currency laws" generally. The third sentence of the defendant's requested instruction is thus, at its best, a correct, but misleading and irrelevant, statement of the law.

D. The Expert Witness

Weaner and McDonald called a banking expert, Gerald Stogniew, to testify. Stogniew had been in banking for twenty-two years, had worked extensively as a bank auditor, and had conducted "director's audits." [FN11] Appellants asked the trial court to find Stogniew qualified as an expert on bank management for the purpose of testifying that banks universally ignored currency reporting requirements at the time of the Cohen transactions. They argued that this testimony, if received, would permit an inference that their failure to file the CTR's was not willful. The government objected that the testimony was not relevant to Weaner or McDonald's willfulness. The trial judge sustained the objection.

FN11. These covered an examination of responsibilities a director would have in his position with the bank and would include operational accounting reviews of the bank's operation and a determination if the bank was in compliance with various laws and regulations.

[8][9] The trial judge has broad discretion in admitting or excluding expert testimony, and his action is to be upheld unless manifestly erroneous. United States v. Costa, 691 F.2d 1358, 1361 (11th Cir.1982). We find no error here. The evidence was not relevant on the willfulness issue. As we have discussed, willfulness required the knowing failure to obey the law, with the specific intent to disobey the law. Whether the appellants knew that other bankers disobeyed the law was not relevant to whether they acted knowingly in failing to file the forms or whether they acted with specific intent to ignore the law.

II.

A. The Conspiracy Acquittals

Sans' first claim is based on a theory that one cannot be guilty of a conspiracy to *1531 commit an illegal act if the only party capable of committing the illegal act is acquitted of the conspiracy. Applying this theory, Sans observes initially that Weaner and McDonald were the only actors in this case with the legal duty to file CTR's and therefore the only ones capable of disregarding that duty. Because they were acquitted of conspiring to disregard that duty, he argues, he could not be guilty of conspiring with Cohen or anyone else to do so. We are not persuaded by Sans' theory. [FN12]

FN12. To willfully fail to file, or cause the failure to file, CTR's with the second object of the conspiracy charged. If Sans' theory were correct, a conviction based on this object would be defective. The evidence was clearly sufficient to support a conviction based on either of the other two objections of the conspiracy, however. Thus, if we were to agree with Sans, we would remand the case for a new trial on the conspiracy count, with the second object deleted.

We first note that "failing to file" the CTR and causing the "failure to file" the CTR are really just two ways in which one offense can be consummated. Sans was capable of "failing to file" a CTR under 18 U.S.C. s 2(b) (1982), which provides that one who "willfully causes an act to be done which if directly performed by him or another would be an offense against the United States is punishable as a principal" (emphasis added). United States v. Tobon-Builes, 706 F.2d 1092, 1099 (11th Cir.1983), shows clearly that a person with no duty to disclose financial information or file currency transaction reports can be found guilty under section 2(b). This is so even if the one who actually performs the criminal act or omission has no criminal intent and is thus innocent of the substantive crime. Tobon-Builes, 706 F.2d at 1099. See also United States v. Puerto, 730 F.2d 627 at 631 (11th Cir., 1984).
Tobon-Builes, id., cites with approval United States v. Lester, 363 F.2d 68 (6th Cir.1966) cert. denied, 385 U.S. 1002, 87 S.Ct. 705, 17 L.Ed.2d 542 (1967), which presented the precise issue Sans now raises. It involved application of section 2(b) in the context of a conspiracy where all of those who could have actually performed the illegal act charged as the object of the conspiracy were acquitted. In that case, two private citizens were tried along with three police officers for conspiring willfully to deprive another private citizen of his fourteenth amendment rights under color of state law. The police officers were also charged with committing the substantive offense and the two private citizens with aiding and abetting them in committing that offense. 18 U.S.C. s 2 (1982) was not explicitly alleged in the conspiracy count of the indictment. The jury acquitted the police officers of the conspiracy and the substantive offense; it acquitted the two other men of aiding and abetting, but convicted them of the conspiracy. On appeal, the two men argued that because they could not have acted "under color of law," and thus could not have committed the substantive offense, they could not have conspired to commit that offense in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371 (1982).
The Lester court, reading 18 U.S.C. s 2 (1976) into the conspiracy count, upheld the conspiracy convictions. It pointed out first that, "[i]n keeping with the provisions of s 2, it has long been held that [a count of] an indictment need not specifically charge 'aiding and abetting' or 'causing' the commission of an offense against the United States, in order to support a jury verdict based upon a finding of either." Id. at 72. The court then applied this principle to the conspiracy count as follows:
So long as anyone who "willfully causes an act to be done" which, "if directly performed by him or another would be an offense against the United States", is punishable as a principal, it follows a fortiori that when two or more persons conspire willfully to "cause" an act forbidden by s 2(b), they ex necessitate conspire to "commit [an] offense against the United States" within the meaning of 18 U.S. s 371. Id. at 73.

The court cautioned:

Of no consequence here is the fact that one reading the record before us might *1532 find it difficult, perhaps even impossible, to comprehend how the jury could have acquitted all the police officers of the conspiracy offense. It is not the province of the Court to inquire by what course of reasoning the jury may have reached seemingly inconsistent verdicts. Inconsistency of verdicts as to various defendants in a particular case has always been an exclusive prerogative of the jury. Id. at 74.

[10] We agree with the Lester analysis. The second object of the conspiracy--the violation of the law requiring the filing of CTR's--must be read as having incorporated section 2(b). [FN13] Therefore, Sans could have been convicted of conspiring with Cohen to cause the failure to file the CTR's. Accordingly, the jury was entitled to find Sans guilty of the conspiracy even though it decided to acquit the bank officers.

FN13. Here, as in Lester the substantive offenses charged violations of 18 U.S.C. s 2 (1982), but the conspiracy charge failed to mention that section.

B. Prejudicial Evidence

Sans argues that the trial judge's admission of evidence of Leon Cohen's checkered past was erroneous because it was both irrelevant and overly prejudicial and denied him a fair trial. From time to time during the trial, the government introduced testimony and items of evidence that portrayed Cohen as a criminal. These items included newspaper articles, which detailed some of Cohen's criminal activity, taken from the records of the Palm State Bank. The articles were introduced to show that the bank and officers McDonald and Weaner knew, or at least had reason to believe, that Cohen was using the bank to launder his ill-gotten gains. The testimony of Cohen's criminal activity dealt mainly with his acquisition from Leslie Atkinson of the money he laundered at Palm State Bank. The testimony also suggested that Cohen had approached Wilton Chalmers about a possible loan from Chalmers' bank to set up a marijuana operation in Central America, and that Cohen had been convicted of impersonating a federal officer.

[11][12] Sans objected to some of the newspaper articles and the testimony about Cohen's criminal activities on the ground that this evidence was irrelevant to any issue in the case. His objections were overruled. Determinations of the admissibility of evidence rest largely within the discretion of the trial judge and will not be disturbed on appeal absent a clear showing of abuse of discretion. See United States v. Russell, 703 F.2d 1243 (11th Cir.1983). We find no abuse of discretion in the trial judge's admission of the evidence to which Sans objected on relevancy grounds. The newspaper articles were relevant to the bankers' state of mind in entering into the Cohen currency transactions. Evidence of Cohen's trial for impersonating a federal officer in the Atkinson schemes corroborated Galkin's testimony about the scheme. Cohen's comment to Chalmers about the marijuana loan was relevant to the issue of Cohen's criminal intent regarding the conspiracy. Since Cohen was an alleged coconspirator, his state of mind was relevant. Sans did not ask for any limiting instructions on any of this testimony.

[13] Sans also presents a new argument on appeal, that the evidence showing Cohen to be a criminal was inadmissible because its probative value was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. We review an objection not made at trial by a plain error standard. See Fed.R.Crim.P. 51, 52(b). Plain error is error which, when examined in the context of the entire case, is so obvious that [our] failure to notice it would seriously affect the fairness and integrity of judicial proceedings. Russell, 703 F.2d at 1248.

[14] We find the trial judge's admission of the evidence not to be plain error. Evidence of Cohen's dealings with Leslie Atkinson was necessary to show where Cohen obtained the large sums of money that he endeavored to launder through the Palm *1533 State Bank, and the amount he needed to dispose of. Most of the evidence of Cohen's criminal activity was contained in the newspaper articles with which the prosecution showed the bankers to have come in contact. These articles were clearly admissible; as we have noted, they were important for the jury to consider in determining the bankers' state of mind in dealing with Cohen and processing the illicit transactions for him. The prosecution argued to the jury only that it should use the articles in considering Weaner's and McDonald's states of mind. All the "prejudicial" information had substantial probative value. It showed Cohen's acquisition of a large sum of money that required laundering, his trouble with Atlanta banks due to his past criminal conduct, his according need to go out-of-state to launder money, and Weaner and McDonald's state of mind in conducting the transactions. Any improper prejudicial effect of this evidence was minimized by the prosecutor's closing argument to the jury in that he drew only the proper inferences from the evidence.

Sans also argues that he moved for a severance because of the likelihood that evidence against Leon Cohen would be overly prejudicial, and the district court erroneously denied the motion. It is unclear whether Sans actually had a motion for severance before the court; his attorney merely filed a statement that he joined in other defendants' motions. At the time, Weaner and McDonald had pending a motion for a severance on the ground that information at trial regarding Cohen and Sans would be overly prejudicial. The trial court, ruling on the motion, stated that only Weaner and McDonald sought the severance; we find no evidence in the record that Sans took issue with that determination or requested a ruling on "his" motion for a severance. If he was a party to the severance motion, its denial was appropriate as to him in any event.

[15][16][17] The decision to sever is discretionary; an appellant must show an abuse of discretion in denying the motion to sever and can do so only by demonstrating "compelling prejudice." See United States v. Capo, 693 F.2d 1330 (11th Cir.1982) cert. denied --- U.S. ----, 103 S.Ct. 1793, 76 L.Ed.2d 359. "Compelling prejudice" means that the jury will not be able to "collate and appraise the independent evidence against each defendant.... [T]hough the task be difficult [unless the jury is unable to perform it] severance should not be granted." Tillman v. United States, 406 F.2d 930, 935 (5th Cir.), vacated in part on other grounds 395 U.S. 830, 89 S.Ct. 2143, 23 L.Ed.2d 742 (1969). Coconspirators should be tried jointly in the interests of judicial economy, and severance is not warranted even if a defendant participated in only a single aspect of the conspiracy. See

United States v. Marszalkowski, 669 F.2d 655, 659-60 (11th Cir.1982) cert. denied sub. nom Brock v. United States, 459 U.S. 906, 103 S.Ct. 208, 74 L.Ed.2d 167. Applying these principles to Sans' case, even if he was included in the Weaver-McDonald motion for a severance, that motion was properly denied as to him. He shows no "compelling prejudice"; the jury was certainly able to distinguish what was necessary for his conviction of conspiracy from what was not.

C. The Conspiracy--Felony or Misdemeanor

The conspiracy statute, 18 U.S.C. s 371 (1982), subjects to criminal liability two kinds of conspiracies: (1) conspiracies "to defraud the United States, or any agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose"; and (2) conspiracies "to commit any offense against the United States." If such an offense is a misdemeanor, the punishment for such conspiracy cannot exceed the maximum punishment provided for such misdemeanor. *1534 [FN14] Sans argues that the first object of the conspiracy count described a misdemeanor offense rather than a felony. Since the jury could have convicted him on that object, he asserts, the maximum sentence he could have received was that for a misdemeanor conspiracy rather than that for a felony conspiracy. [FN15] Since we disagree with his premise, we uphold the sentence imposed. [FN16]

FN14. Section 371 provides:
Conspiracy to commit offense or to defraud United States
If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States, or any agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such persons do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.
If, however, the offense, the commission of which is the object of the conspiracy, is a misdemeanor only, the punishment for such conspiracy shall not exceed the maximum punishment provided for such misdemeanor.

FN15. He received an indeterminate three-year prison sentence under 18 U.S.C. s 4205(b)(2) (1982).

FN16. There is some question as to whether Sans properly preserved this point for appeal. At the charge conference prior to closing arguments, the parties discussed using a special verdict form showing separate verdicts for each object of the conspiracy. During the discussion, Sans' attorney stated that he thought the first conspiracy objective was the commission of a misdemeanor, and asked what the others thought. The court and the government stated that it was a felony. The attorney did not mention the point again. After the jury retired, the court asked counsel about their record objections to the court's jury instructions, and Sans' counsel stated that he adopted the objections "and comments" he had made at the charge conference. The misdemeanor/special verdict forms issue might arguably be such a "comment."

The conspirators' first objective was "[t]o unlawfully, knowingly, and intentionally defraud the United States ..." by impairing the IRS' ability to collect the data that would have been in the CTR's that should have been filed following the currency exchanges in question. Sans argues that a conspiracy to fail to file CTR's cannot rise to the level of a conspiracy to defraud the United States. Rather, he argues, the indictment alleged only a conspiracy to commit the misdemeanor offense of failing to file CTR's. We do not find this argument convincing. A conspiracy to fail to file CTR's can amount to a conspiracy to defraud the United States.

United States v. Burgin, 621 F.2d 1352 (5th Cir.), cert. denied 449 U.S. 1015, 101 S.Ct. 574, 66 L.Ed.2d 474 (1980), discusses the broad sweep of allowable conspiracies "to defraud the United States" under section 371. The court, citing Dennis v. United States, 384 U.S. 855, 86 S.Ct. 1840, 16 L.Ed.2d 973 (1966), noted that the conspiracy-to-defraud language reaches "any conspiracy for the purpose of impairing, obstructing, or defeating the lawful function of any department of government." 621 F.2d at 1356. The Burgin court also quoted Hammerschmidt v. United States, 265 U.S. 182, 188, 44 S.Ct. 511, 512, 68 L.Ed. 968 (1924) as follows:

> To conspire to defraud the United States means primarily to cheat the government out of property or money, but it also means to interfere with or obstruct one of its lawful governmental functions by deceit, craft or trickery, or at least by means that are dishonest. It is not necessary that the government shall be subjected to property or pecuniary loss by the fraud, but only that its legitimate official action and purpose shall be defeated by misrepresentation, chicane, or the overreaching of those charged with carrying out the governmental intention. (emphasis added).

[18][19] The first conspiracy object alleged certainly met the criteria expressed in Burgin. It involved the dishonest impeding of a lawful governmental function. As the government points out, by submitting the fraud charge to the jury instead of charging simple conspiracy to commit a misdemeanor, it increased its own burden of proof. The jury was required to find the *1535 fraud element rather than just an agreement to fail to file CTR's. Accordingly, we find no error in the government's proceeding under the conspiracy-to-defraud theory, or to Sans' sentence. Whether guilty of joining in the conspiracy to defraud or either of the two other objects of the conspiracy in this case, Sans was subject to being sentenced under section 371 to five years in prison, or a $10,000 fine, or both. His sentence was within these bounds.

AFFIRMED.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee (88-5195), Plaintiff-Appellant (88-5484),
v.
Billy York WALKER, Defendant-Appellant (88-5195), Defendant-Appellee (88-5484).

Nos. 88-5195, 88-5484.
United States Court of Appeals,
Sixth Circuit.
Argued Nov. 14, 1988.
Decided April 3, 1989.

Defendant was convicted after jury trial in the United States District Court for the Western District of Tennessee, Odell Horton, Chief Judge, of various federal banking laws. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Enslen, District Judge, sitting by designation, held that: (1) evidence of coconspirator's guilty plea was admissible as evidence of coconspirator's credibility, and (2) evidence of named borrowers' credit worthiness and their understanding of obligation to repay loans was irrelevant and inadmissible on charges of bank fraud.

Affirmed.

FN* Honorable Richard A. Enslen, United States District Judge for the Western District of Michigan, sitting by designation.

ENSLEN, District Judge.

Billy York Walker appeals his conviction following a jury trial on each count of a 28-count indictment alleging violations of various federal banking laws. [FN1] Prior to 1985, Mr. Walker was the president and majority shareholder of Farmers Bank located in Dyersburg, Tennessee. Most of the bank's business was agricultural in nature. Mr. Walker was also the owner, president and operator of Walker Grain Company ("Walker Grain"), a grain storage firm, located in the same town.

FN1. The indictment alleged violations of the following statutes: Count 1, conspiracy to commit bank fraud, 18 U.S.C. s 371, Counts 3-21, 24-26, false entries in bank records, 18 U.S.C. s 1005; Counts 22 and 28, false statement on loan application, 18 U.S.C. s 1014; and Counts 23 and 27, bank fraud, 18 U.S.C. s 1344.

Count 1 alleges that Walker and his life-long friend, Walter Hastings, conspired to defraud Farmers Bank, to misapply bank funds and to make false entries in bank records in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371. Walker convinced Hastings to sign two promissory notes, one for $150,000 secured by stock owned by Hastings, and one for $118,000 which was unsecured. The proceeds of both loans were immediately deposited to Walker Grain's account at Farmers Bank. The loan applications did not disclose Walker Grain's interest in the loans. Walker personally approved both loans.

Originally, Hastings called Walker each time an interest payment was due and Walker made the payment using a Walker Grain check. In 1985, Walker started giving checks to Hastings and Hastings made the payments using his own checks. The overt acts in the conspiracy each involve separate interest payments on the two loans. The bank's records on each loan indicate that the loans were for Hastings' benefit and that Hastings made the interest payments. Counts 3-21 allege false entries in bank records based upon the failure of the records to indicate that the loans were not for Hastings' benefit and that he did not make the interest payments from his own funds.

In 1985, the bank's vice president in charge of loans, Larry James, noticed that the Hastings loans were becoming past due. He knew that Walker and Hastings were friends and offered to take the collection of these loans over for Walker, thinking Walker might be uncomfortable handling the accounts himself. Walker assured James that Hastings would repay the loans as soon as Hastings solved some other financial problems. An investigation conducted by the bank, at the suggestion of federal examiners, subsequently revealed Walker's interest in the Hastings loans. When confronted with the matter by bank officials, Walker shook his head and replied, "What can I say?" Thereafter, Walker took an indefinite leave of absence and never returned to the bank.

*1300 Walker's defense to counts 1 and 3-21 was that he lacked any intent to defraud the bank. He contends that he approved each loan in the ordinary course of business, based upon Hastings' credit worthiness, character, and reputation, as well as the bank's potential to profit from each loan. He claims that he lacked any intent to deceive the bank, although he admits that he did not tell the bank's board of directors of Walker Grain's interest in the loans. Walker contended that he did not think it necessary to tell the bank's board of directors about Walker Grain Company's interest in the Hastings loans, since the bank was only interested in profitability and since Hastings had the ability to repay the loans. [FN2] Walker testified that Hastings understood his obligation to repay the loans, but understood that the money would come from Walker. Hastings testified that he had no intention of repaying the loans and thought Walker would do so.

FN2. Hastings' financial statement filed with the bank indicated Hastings' net worth was between $6 and $8 million dollars at the time of these loans.

Count 2 alleges that Walker, in his capacity as president of Farmers Bank, made a false statement on a Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation ("FDIC") questionnaire. The questionnaire at issue, dated May 25, 1982, asked net worth was between $6 and $8 million dollars at the time of these loans.

Count 2 alleges that Walker, in his capacity as president of Farmers Bank, made a false statement on a Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation ("FDIC") questionnaire. The questionnaire at issue, dated May 25, 1982, asked Walker to: "List all extensions of credit made since last examination for the accommodation of others than those whose names appear on bank's records or on credit instruments in connection with such extension." Walker answered that no such loans had been made. The government charged that this statement was false because it failed to disclose the loans to Hastings which were used for the benefit of Walker Grain.

Count 22 involves a loan made to Mr. Hastings by the Bank of Friendship, located in Friendship, Tennessee, in the amount of $150,000. The president of the Bank of Friendship is John York, Mr. Walker's cousin. Mr. York testified that Walker called him and asked him to make a loan to Walter Hastings. York never spoke to Hastings about the loan. The note showed that the purpose of the loan was for "operating capital." It was repaid by a check drawn on Farmers Bank showing Hastings as the remitter. Hastings testified that he had never been to the Bank of Friendship and had never spoken to York regarding a loan. The government contended that the loan to Hastings was not used as operating capital, but was instead used to make a principal and interest payment on Hastings' $150,000 note at Farmer's Bank. The balance of one of the Hastings notes was increased to repay the Bank of Friendship loan. The government argued that Walker obtained this loan for Hastings under false pretenses, by failing to disclose Walker Grain's interest in the transaction. [FN3]

FN3. At trial, Walker characterized this transaction as a "participation loan," arguing that the Bank of Friendship extended credit to Hastings at the request of Farmers Bank, to provide the latter bank with some ready cash. Walker argued that such transactions were commonplace, and that in the general course of business, Farmers Bank would repay the participating bank when it had available cash. Since the participating bank would look to Farmers Bank, rather than to debtor for repayment, Walker contended that it was unnecessary to inform the Bank of Friendship of the loan's real beneficiary.

Counts 23 and 24 relate to a gentleman named Dan Holloway. Mr. Holloway's 1982 financial statement showed a net worth of $100 million dollars and he had deposits in the Farmers Bank totaling up to $1,250,000. Walker owned an option on an 80-acre farm in Dyersburg, Tennessee. He and Holloway decided to develop the farm as a gravel pit. They jointly applied for, and received, a loan for $120,000 from First Tennessee Bank to buy the farm/gravel pit. This note was secured by a deed of trust on the land. Walker and Holloway never earned any profits on the gravel pit. They each paid half of the interest on the loan and of one payment to reduce principal.

When First Tennessee Bank requested a second principal reduction, Walker could not come up with the funds. Holloway agreed to take over the loan in exchange for Walker's interest in the property. At Holloway's request, Walker arranged for *1301 Farmers Bank to lend Holloway $122,055.90. Part of the proceeds from the loan went to pay off the First Tennessee loan and part went to cover an overdraft in a checking account held jointly by Walker and Holloway. Walker transferred his interest in the property to Holloway after these transactions were completed.

Count 23 alleges that Walker engaged in a scheme to defraud Farmers Bank by means of false statements to the bank's finance committee. Members of the finance committee testified that, on January 7, 1985, Walker told the committee that the loan to Holloway was well collateralized and/or secured by real estate. The minutes of the meeting contain the following entry:

Dan Holloway, application for loan of $122,000 at FBP for one year, accompanied by financial statements, to payoff farm note at First Tennessee Bank, secured by deed of trust on farm. Approved.

Walker did not disclose his interest in the loan to the finance committee and none of the loan documents disclosed that Walker benefited from the loan. Walker also denied that he benefited from the loan, even though it eliminated his obligation to First Tennessee Bank and an overdraft on a checking account at Farmers Bank.

Count 24 alleges that Walker caused a false entry to be made in bank records--specifically the minutes of the January 7, 1985 finance committee meeting--since those minutes imply that the note to Holloway was secured by a deed of trust on the farm when, in fact, the loan from Farmers Bank was unsecured. Walker argued that the minute entry is not false, since the reference to a deed of trust refers to the First Tennessee Bank loan, not to the loan from Farmers Bank. In addition, the note itself and the loan documents all indicated on their face that the Farmers Bank loan was unsecured. Walker argued that he did not receive a benefit from the loan to Holloway, since he had already relinquished his interest in the gravel pit.

Count 25 alleges a false entry in the form of a false endorsement Walker caused another bank employee, Mabel Paschal, to make on a cashier's check. Walker drew a check for $54,747.51 on Walker Grain's checking account, made payable to Henry Simon. Walker gave Paschal the Walker Grain/Henry Simon check and directed her to make out a cashier's check to Holloway in the amount of $47,770.02, which she did. Walker then told her to give him the difference in cash. Paschal complied, and then noticed that the Simon check was not endorsed. She testified that Walker told her to sign it. When she refused, he instructed her to stamp the back of the check with a stamp reading "Credit to the account of the within named payee. Absence of endorsement guaranteed, Farmers Bank, Dyersburg, TN."

Walker denied telling Paschal to endorse the check or to stamp it. He argued that, since the check was drawn on the Walker Grain account, it did not need an endorsement and this was not unusual. Walker admitted that Henry Simon did not exist, and explained his use of a false name by saying that he did not want Holloway to become embroiled in his difficulties with the FDIC. The government contends that the cash was given to Holloway to make one half of an interest payment due on the $122,055.90 loan to Holloway. Holloway made this interest payment, with a check drawn on his business account, on the same day as the cashier's check transactions occurred.

Count 26 alleges that Walker incorrectly answered the question involved in Count 2 on a July, 1985 FDIC questionnaire. As he had in 1982, Walker answered that no accommodation loans had been made. An FDIC examiner took the July, 1985 questionnaire to Walker and stated that he had found two loans which should have been reflected in the questionnaire. Walker had his secretary delete the previous answer and type the two loans in its place. The government contends that Walker should have, but did not, include the loan to Holloway and a January 23, 1985 loan to Carl Jones. Walker contends that his original answer was correct, according to his understanding of the questionnaire.

*1302 Jones was a former business partner in Walker Grain. He left the firm in 1983 or 1984, owing it approximately $200,000. He also owned some beans and milo which were stored at the grain company. Walker approved a loan from Farmers Bank to Jones for approximately $130,000 which was secured by Jones' beans. Walker did not need board approval to make this loan. The money was deposited to Jones' account and was used to pay his debt to Walker Grain, leaving a balance due of approximately $70,000. Walker contends that this was not an "accommodation loan" within the meaning of the FDIC questionnaire.

The government characterized this transaction somewhat differently. It argued that Jones was the manager of Walker Grain in January 1985 and that he also had a farming partnership with Walker. The farming operation was financed by advances from Walker Grain. In January, 1985, Walker told Jones that the farm owed Walker Grain for the advances and that they needed to be paid because the Walker Grain account was overdrawn. Walker wanted Jones to come to the bank to get a loan to cover the overdraft. On January 24, Jones borrowed about $130,000 from the bank in his own name. Walker approved the loan. The money went to Jones' personal account and was paid to Walker Grain by Jones' personal check on the same day. Although the note said it was secured by beans, Jones testified that these beans did not exist. The note did not indicate that Jones' farm or Walker Grain would benefit from the loan.

Count 27 alleges that Walker engaged in a scheme to defraud Farmers Bank when, in January, 1985 he applied to the bank for a loan on behalf of Walker Grain. Walker needed the loan to cover a $300,000 overdraft in the grain company's checking account. After applying for the loan, Walker then deposited a check for $300,000, drawn on Walker Grain's account at First Citizens National Bank, into the company's Farmers Bank account. The First Citizens account had been closed in 1982 and did not have sufficient funds to cover the check. Walker told a vice president of Farmers Bank that the grain company had a loan for $300,000 and other deposits coming in which would cover the overdraft. He failed to disclose the loans made to Hastings and Jones on behalf of the grain company. Walker Grain eventually obtained a $190,000 loan from Farmers Bank.

Count 28 alleges that Walker made a false statement to the bank, for the purpose of influencing its action on the Walker Grain loan. The statement at issue is Walker's statement that the grain company had funds to cover the check drawn on First Citizens Bank and therefore the overdraft in the grain company's Farmers Bank account. The government charged that this statement was false since Walker knew that the First Citizens account was closed and did not have funds to pay the check.

Walker testified that he was aware of the overdraft and called an employee of First Citizens Bank to arrange a loan. The employee, Mr. Lipford, told Walker that the loan would have to be approved by his discount committee. Walker told Lipford that, in the meantime, he was going to write a check on the company's First Citizens account and deposit it at Farmers Bank. Lipford approved and this was done. Walker alleges that he informed Farmers Bank about the First Citizens loan and about the fact that the check was written before the loan was actually approved. The First Citizens loan was never approved. Walker Grain's overdraft at Farmers Bank was cured by the Farmers Bank loan and by the check from Jones.

Mr. Walker raises five issues on appeal. He argues first that the trial court erred in admitting into evidence Walter Hastings' guilty plea to a conspiracy identical to that alleged in count 1 of the indictment. His second argument is that the trial court erred in denying him a new trial when Hastings withdrew his guilty plea. Third, Walker argues that the trial court erred in excluding evidence relevant to his intent to defraud or injure Farmers Bank. Fourth, he contends that prosecution of the conspiracy alleged in count 1 is barred by the applicable statute of limitations. Finally, Walker argues that the trial court erred in *1303 denying his motion for judgments of acquittal on counts 2, 3-21, 24, 26 and 28. Because we find no error, we will affirm Walker's conviction on all counts. The government has appealed from the district court's order granting Walker bond pending appeal. Because we resolve Walker's appeal in favor of the government, we need not reach the issues raised in its appeal.

Admission of Hastings' Guilty Plea and Plea Agreement. Prior to Walker's trial, Mr. Hastings pled guilty to a conspiracy charge virtually identical to Count 1 of the indictment against Walker. [FN4] Mr. Hastings testified at Walker's trial, and was allowed to testify to both his guilty plea and the contents of his plea agreement with the government. Walker argues that admission of this evidence made his conviction on Count 1 inevitable, since the jury knew that Hastings was guilty of a conspiracy and that Walker was the only individual Hastings could have conspired with. He concludes that admission of Hastings' guilty plea and plea agreement allowed the government to establish his guilt by association with Hastings.

FN4. Hastings is identified as a co-conspirator in the Walker indictment, but is not named as a co-defendant in that indictment.

[2] We have held that much of the prejudice associated with the use of a plea agreement is negated where the pleading individual testifies at trial. "In such a case, it is reasonable to believe that the jury uses the testimony regarding the facts to convict the [ ]defendants and the testimony regarding the guilty plea to assess the witness' credibility." Christian, 786 F.2d at 214. Introduction of the entire plea agreement is permitted, even where the agreement contains a promise to testify truthfully, since these details allow the jury to "consider fully the possible conflicting motivations underlying the witness' testimony, and, thus, the witness' credibility." United States v. Townsend, 796 F.2d 158, 163 (6th Cir.1986).

In this case, these is no argument that the government improperly emphasized Hastings' guilty plea, United States v. Halbert, 640 F.2d 1000, 1005 (9th Cir.1981); United States v. Pickett, 746 F.2d 1129, 1135-36 (6th Cir.1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1226, 105 S.Ct. 1222, 84 L.Ed.2d 362 (1985), nor could such a claim be sustained. Hastings testified only briefly regarding the matter, and the government did not refer to his plea in its closing argument. The agreement was relevant to Hastings' credibility and was admissible for that purpose. Further, the trial court gave the jury an appropriate limiting instruction, cautioning them that the plea agreement had "been offered so that you may properly assess the credibility of the witness. It is not offered for any other purpose and you should not consider it for any other purpose." While it is a better practice to instruct the jury on both the plea agreement and the guilty plea itself, the trial court's failure to do so in this instance did not deprive Walker of a fair trial. As the government argues, the plea agreement at issue discussed Hastings' guilty plea. An instruction regarding the plea agreement was sufficient to confine the jury's consideration of both the plea and the agreement to its assessment of Hastings' credibility.

Walker's remaining argument, that the similarity between the charge against Hastings *1304 and Count 1 of the indictment against Walker virtually assured his conviction on that count, is without merit. It is often the case that a defendant will plead guilty to a conspiracy charge, and then testify against his co-conspirators who stand trial for a similar or identical crime. If it was always unfairly prejudicial to admit the guilty plea of such a co-defendant, then the rule recognized in Christian, Townsend and Halbert would be meaningless. The jury was instructed that Hastings' guilty plea could not be used as evidence of Walker's guilt, and that it could consider that plea only in evaluating Hastings' credibility. There is no reason to assume that the jury disregarded this instruction.

[3] Denial of Motion for New Trial. Approximately five months after Walker's conviction, Hastings appeared for sentencing pursuant to his guilty plea and was allowed to withdraw that plea. At the sentencing hearing, Hastings expressly denied that he intended to defraud the bank through his transactions with Walker. Upon learning of Hastings' withdrawn plea, Walker moved for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The trial court denied this motion without a hearing. Walker argues that it was an abuse of the trial court's discretion to deny this motion. We find that this issue need not be decided because, after Walker's motion was denied, Mr. Hastings changed his plea a second time and pled guilty to the same conspiracy. The "newly discovered evidence" proffered by Walker in support of a new trial, therefore, no longer exists. [FN5]

FN5. Even if Walker's "newly discovered evidence" had not evaporated, we would affirm the trial court's decision. The so-called rule of consistency requires that, where all possible co-conspirators are tried together, and all but one are acquitted, the remaining conspirator's conviction must be reversed for lack of sufficient evidence. United States v. Patterson, 678 F.2d 774 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 911, 103 S.Ct. 219, 74 L.Ed.2d 174 (1982); United States v. Phillips, 630 F.2d 1138 (6th Cir.1980). The rule does not apply where co-conspirators are tried separately or could have conspired with unindicted individuals. United States v. Sachs, 801 F.2d 839 (6th Cir.1986); United States v. Irvin, 787 F.2d 1506, 1512-13 (11th Cir.1986); United States v. Espinos-Cerpa, 630 F.2d 328 (5th Cir.1980). Thus, even if Hastings had been acquitted of the conspiracy, his acquittal would not mandate reversal of Walker's conviction. Further, at the time Walker's motion was denied, Hastings' guilt had not been determined. The jury was free to discredit Hastings' claim that he lacked intent to defraud the bank, just as it discredited Walker's similar claim. While Hastings' withdrawn plea may incrementally increase Walker's chances of acquittal, it is insufficient to demonstrate that Walker would likely be acquitted if his case were retried. United States v. O'Dell, 805 F.2d 637 (6th Cir.1986), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 108 S.Ct. 170, 98 L.Ed.2d 124 (1987); United States v. Terry, 729 F.2d 1063, 1067 (6th Cir.1984); United States v. Barlow, 693 F.2d 954 (6th Cir.1982), cert. denied, 461 U.S. 945, 103 S.Ct. 2124, 77 L.Ed.2d 1304 (1983).

Intent to Defraud. At trial, Mr. Walker attempted to prove that he lacked an intent to defraud or injure the bank by proving that Holloway and Hastings were good credit risks and understood their obligation to repay the loans at issue. Walker argues that, under United States v. Gens, 493 F.2d 216 (1st Cir.1974), this evidence is relevant to show a lack of intent to defraud the bank. The government argues that this evidence was properly excluded. Relying on United States v. Foster, 566 F.2d 1045 (6th Cir.1977), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 917, 98 S.Ct. 1473, 55 L.Ed.2d 509 (1978), the government argues that whether the loans were "good" or "bad" is irrelevant to the defendant's intent to defraud the bank. The trial court apparently agreed with the government's position, ruling the evidence irrelevant. Despite this ruling, however, the jury heard testimony from a number of witnesses indicating that both Hastings and Holloway were good credit risks and their financial statements indicated that they had the ability to repay the loans. In addition, Mr. Walker testified that he considered the borrower's financial strength, character, and reputation as well as the bank's potential to profit from the loans before approving the loans. Mr. Walker further testified that Holloway and Hastings understood their obligation to repay the loans in the event that Walker was unable to do so. Although we believe that the government and the trial court construed Foster too broadly, we find no error in the attempted exclusion of this evidence.

*1305 In United States v. Gens, 493 F.2d 216 (1st Cir.1974), the court reversed a bank director's conviction for misapplication of bank funds, 18 U.S.C. s 656, finding insufficient evidence that the director had intended to defraud the bank. In that case, two bank officers approved loans to third parties, knowing that the funds would be given to Gens, a bank director who could not borrow the money himself because he had already exceeded the bank's lending limit. The First Circuit held that misapplication of bank funds had not been established:

[W]here the named debtor is both financially capable and fully understands that it is his responsibility to repay, a loan to him cannot--absent other circumstances--properly be characterized as a sham or dummy, even if bank officials know he will turn over the proceeds to a third party. Instead, what we really have in such a situation are two loans: one from the bank to the named debtor and the other from the named debtor to the third party. The bank looks to the named debtor for repayment of its loan, while the named debtor looks to the third party for repayment of his loan. If for some reason the third party fails to make repayment to the named debtor, the latter nonetheless recognizes that this failure does not end his own obligation to repay the bank. In this situation, the bank official has simply granted a loan to a financially capable party, which is precisely what a bank official should do. There is no natural tendency to injure or defraud the bank, and the official cannot be said to have willfully misapplied bank funds in violation of s 656.

Id. at 222 (footnote omitted). See also United States v. Fusaro, 708 F.2d 17, 21 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 1007, 104 S.Ct. 524, 78 L.Ed.2d 708 (1983); United States v. Blackwood, 735 F.2d 142, 145-46 (4th Cir.1984).

A number of other circuits have accepted the Gens court's reasoning, but have refused to apply it in cases where the beneficiary of the loan is a bank officer who conceals his interest in the loan from the bank. See United States v. Shively, 715 F.2d 260, 265 (7th Cir.1983) ("it has been held to be misapplication per se for a bank officer or employee to funnel funds to himself by making a loan to a third party ..."), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1007, 104 S.Ct. 1001, 79 L.Ed.2d 233 (1984); United States v. Krepps, 605 F.2d 101, 106 (3rd Cir.1979); United States v. Twiford, 600 F.2d 1339, 1341 (10th Cir.1979) ("misapplication occurs when an officer of a bank knowingly lends money to a fictitious borrower or causes the loan to be made for his own benefit, concealing his interest from the bank"); United States v. Steffen, 641 F.2d 591, 597 (8th Cir.) (financial condition of borrower irrelevant where bank officer benefits from loan and conceals interest from the bank), cert. denied, 452 U.S. 943, 101 S.Ct. 3091, 69 L.Ed.2d 959 (1981). At least one circuit has rejected the Gens analysis in all circumstances. United States v. Kennedy, 564 F.2d 1329, 1339 (9th Cir.1977) ("misapplication ... occurs when funds are distributed under a record which misrepresents the true state of the record with the intent that bank officials ... will be deceived"), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 944, 98 S.Ct. 1526, 55 L.Ed.2d 541 (1978). [FN6]

FN6. Each of these cases involve misapplication of bank funds in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 656. The crime at issue here is bank fraud, in violation of 18 U.S.C. ss 371, 1344. Both crimes require proof that the defendant intended to defraud or injure a bank. The crimes differ in that misapplication requires proof of a conversion of bank funds, while bank fraud requires only a fraudulent statement designed to influence a bank's action. Compare United States v. Goldblatt, 813 F.2d 619, 625-26 (3rd Cir.1987), with United States v. Duncan, 598 F.2d 839, 860 (4th Cir.1979).

Although we have been faced with the issue on at least two occasions, United States v. Cooper, 577 F.2d 1079 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 868, 99 S.Ct. 196, 58 L.Ed.2d 179 (1978); United States v. Foster, 566 F.2d 1045 (6th Cir.1977), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 917, 98 S.Ct. 1473, 55 L.Ed.2d 509 (1978), we have never expressly adopted or rejected the Gens analysis. In Cooper, we found that the named borrowers lacked the ability to repay the loans and did not understand their obligation to do so. *1306 Thus, even if Gens had been adopted, it would not have exonerated the bank official's conduct in that case. In Foster, we distinguished Gens on the grounds that, unlike the defendants in Foster, "the defendants in Gens were not recipients of kickbacks from loans which they had approved." 566 F.2d at 1050. Since the bank officials in Foster received kickbacks in exchange for approving the loans at issue, they knew that the loans had to be made in an amount larger than would otherwise have been necessary. Thus, even if the borrowers had fit the Gens criteria, a portion of the loan proceeds had been misapplied--that portion attributable to the kickbacks. Foster did not hold that evidence of a named borrower's credit worthiness was irrelevant under all circumstances.

In this case, there is no evidence that Mr. Walker received a kickback from the loans at issue, and it appears that the named borrowers, Hastings and Holloway, had the ability to repay the loans and understood their obligation to do so. Mr. Walker is, however, a bank officer, and he approved the loans at issue for his own benefit concealing that fact from the bank's board of directors. This case, therefore, requires us to determine whether we will adopt the First Circuit's Gens rule, the modified form of that rule adopted by other circuits, or the Ninth Circuit's complete rejection of Gens. We believe that the Third Circuit's reasoning in United States v. Krepps, 605 F.2d 101 (3rd Cir.1979), most accurately states the law on this issue.

[4] In Krepps, a bank officer loaned money to two borrowers, who then loaned the money to him. He concealed his interest in these loans from other bank officials. The Third Circuit found sufficient evidence of an intent to defraud the bank, and affirmed his conviction for misapplication of bank funds:

> [I]f the named debtor is credit worthy and understands that he is responsible to repay the loan, "the bank official has simply granted a loan to a financially capable party, which is precisely what a bank official should do." How this party chooses to dispose of the fund so obtained should, in the absence of misrepresentation on his part, be of no interest to the bank, and certainly not to the criminal law.
>
> It is quite a different matter, however, when a bank officer procures the assistance of another person in obtaining the desired funds for his own use. In these circumstances, it cannot be said that the bank officer is doing "precisely what a bank official should do." To the contrary, a jury would be warranted in concluding that the loan transaction was undertaken with intent to defraud the bank or to deceive its officers or examiners, notwithstanding the fact that the intermediary may have been financially capable of repaying the loan and undertook to do so. A jury might plausibly deduce that the bank officer, by channeling the funds through another party, sought to conceal from the bank his own interest in the transaction and thereby circumvent the barrier--imposed by the statute [limiting direct loans to bank officers] and the bank's own regulations--to the bank's making the particular loan directly to him.

Essentially, then, it is our view that a willful misapplication ... is established when a bank officer secures a loan for himself by having the bank lend to a named debtor who then transfers the funds to him, even when the named debtor is financially capable and [fully] understands that it is his legal responsibility to repay the loan. In these circumstances, the very existence of a mediated transaction demonstrates that the bank officer had the measure of criminal intent needed to establish a willful misapplication of bank funds.

Id. at 106, 108.

The Krepps rule is compatible with our decisions in Cooper, Foster and United States v. Franklin, 608 F.2d 241 (6th Cir.1979). In each of these cases, we held that, "at the very least, the term misapplication '[means a] deceitful and dishonest mishandling of bank funds.' " Franklin, 608 *1307 F.2d at 244 (quotingCooper, 577 F.2d at 1085). Where a bank officer arranges loans for a named borrower, intending that the proceeds will benefit himself, and without disclosing his interest in the loan transaction, he has acted in a deceitful and dishonest manner. As the Third Circuit noted in Krepps, he has acted to circumvent federal statutes limiting a bank's extension of credit to its own officers and he has concealed material facts about the transaction from other bank officials. Such conduct is sufficient to establish the necessary intent to injure or defraud the bank.

[5] In this case, evidence of Hastings' and Holloway's credit worthiness and their understanding of the obligation to repay was irrelevant, as the trial court held. Mr. Walker arranged these loans for his own benefit, concealing his interest in them from other bank officials. With these facts, the government adequately established Walker's intent to defraud the bank. The fact that the loans were otherwise "good" loans, and that the named borrowers understood their obligation to repay the loans if Walker defaulted on them, is irrelevant because Walker personally benefited from the transactions at issue. Thus, even if the trial court misread our holding in Foster, his ruling was correct. Walker was not prejudiced by the trial court's attempted exclusion of this evidence, and his convictions on counts 1, 23 and 27 are affirmed.

[6] Walker's remaining arguments are without merit. Count 1 of the indictment is not barred by the applicable statute of limitations. 18 U.S.C. s 3282. Although the loans at issue in that count were made in 1981, Walker continuously attempted to conceal his interest in them by keeping payments on the loans current and, later, by giving Hastings the funds to make payments on Walker's behalf. The government thus established that repayment of the loans and concealment of Walker's interest in them were objectives of the conspiracy. The conspiracy therefore continued until its discovery in 1985. "In conspiracies where a main objective has not been attained or abandoned and concealment is essential to success of that objective, attempts to conceal the conspiracy are made in furtherance of the conspiracy." United States v. Howard, 770 F.2d 57, 61 (6th Cir.1985). See also United States v. Portner, 462 F.2d 678 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 983, 93 S.Ct. 319, 34 L.Ed.2d 246 (1972); United States v. Hickey, 360 F.2d 127 (7th Cir.1966).

[7] Walker attacks his convictions on counts 2 and 26 of the indictment, which allege that he made false entries in two Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation ("FDIC") questionnaires, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1005. The entries at issue required Walker to disclose all accommodation loans, or loans made to named parties on behalf of an unnamed person, which had been made, "since last examination." Walker answered this question in the negative in 1982, after the loans to Hastings, and again in 1985, after the Holloway and Jones loans. He testified at trial that he believed the question referred to the last bank examination by any entity, including state bank examiners. Because the record does not disclose whether Walker revealed these loans during examinations by state officials which preceded the FDIC examinations, Walker argues that his answers to the questions were correct and that the jury must have speculated as to his guilt on these counts.

Walker was not entitled to a directed verdict of acquittal on either count. Taking the evidence in the light most favorable to the government, a reasonable jury could have concluded that the FDIC's question referred to the last examination conducted by that agency. See United States v. O'Boyle, 680 F.2d 34 (6th Cir.1982); United States v. Gibson, 675 F.2d 825 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 972, 103 S.Ct. 305, 74 L.Ed.2d 285 (1982). Under that theory, Walker's answers were false. Further, there is no evidence to indicate that Walker disclosed the transactions at issue to state officials, or even that state officials require such a disclosure. Finally, the testimony showed that, after an FDIC official explained the question to Walker in 1985, he changed his answer to this question to reveal *1308 two previously omitted loans, but failed to disclose the Holloway and Jones loans. The government was required to show that Walker knowingly and willfully made a false entry in the questionnaire regarding a material fact, with the intent to deceive the FDIC. United States v. McGuire, 744 F.2d 1197, 1200 (6th Cir.1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1004, 105 S.Ct. 1866, 85 L.Ed.2d 159 (1985). The evidence adduced at trial, taken in the light most favorable to the government, would allow a reasonable jury to draw that conclusion.

[8] Nor was Walker entitled to a directed verdict on counts 3 through 21 of the indictment. These counts allege false entries in bank records based upon the recordation of interest payments on the Hastings loans. These records recorded the fact that interest payments had been made, but did not reveal that the payments were not made with Hastings' funds or that the loans were not made for Hastings' benefit. Walker contends that the entries are not false because they recorded actual transactions exactly as they occurred.

A statement may be false when it contains a half truth or when it conceals a material fact. McGuire, 744 F.2d at 1200, n. 2; United States v. Krepps, 605 F.2d 101, 108 (3rd Cir.1979) ("an entry may be false by virtue of an omission of material information as much as by an actual misstatement"). Here, the records failed to disclose Walker Grain's interest in the loans and the fact that Walker Grain made the interest payments on Hastings' behalf. Both facts may be regarded as material. The jury was entitled to conclude that these entries were false.

Walker argues that the entries are not false because they recorded actual transactions exactly as they occurred. In United States v. Hardin, 841 F.2d 694, 697 (6th Cir.1988), we noted, "It is undisputed that an entry that shows a transaction as it actually occurred is not a false entry under section 1005." That rule remains undisputed, but does not require that Walker's conviction be reversed. In Hardin, a bank official made a questionable loan of $250,000 to a business in which his wife had an interest. The loan was sold to another bank. Two years later, the bank official renewed the loan, using the proceeds to extinguish his bank's obligation to the purchasing bank. The bank records disclosed a $250,000 loan to the business. The indictment charged that this entry was false because the loan was not made to the business, but to another bank. At trial, the government failed to prove that the loan was never made; instead it argued that the loan was a sham or a mere formality. Since the government failed to prove that the loan was never made, the defendant's conviction for making false statements was reversed.

This case is distinguishable from Hardin on its facts. Here the government alleged and proved that the entries at issue were false because they failed to disclose that the loans were not made for the benefit of the named borrower and that the named borrower had not made the interest payments with his own funds. Hardin expressly distinguished cases involving loans made for the benefit of unnamed third parties. Id. at 698. Further, the charge in this case was that the entries failed to disclose material information, not that they recorded interest payments or loans which had never been made. The entries at issue are false not because they fail to disclose the manner in which a transaction occurred, but because they fail to disclose the true beneficiary of the loans at issue.

Walker argues that the trial court erred in refusing to grant a judgment of acquittal on Count 24 of the indictment. This count alleges a false entry in the minutes of the finance committee meeting which approved the Holloway loan. That entry stated, "Dan Holloway, application for loan of $122,000 at FBP for one year ... to pay off farm note at First Tennessee Bank, secured by deed of trust on farm. Approved." The government argued at trial that this entry was false because it misled the finance committee into believing that the bank's loan to Holloway would be secured by a deed of trust on a farm, when the loan was in fact unsecured. Walker points out that the loan documents indicate *1309 that the loan was unsecured. No member of the finance committee testified that Walker told them the loan would be secured. Walker concludes that, because the minute entry can be read two ways, he was entitled to a verdict of acquittal on this count.

We disagree. The minute entry may, indeed, be read in two ways, one favorable to Walker and one unfavorable. In considering Walker's motion for a judgment of acquittal, the district court was required to view the evidence in the light most favorable to the government. There was sufficient evidence to allow the jury to conclude that this entry was false, and Walker's argument to the contrary is without merit. See, United States v. Johnson, 741 F.2d 854, 856 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1075, 105 S.Ct. 572, 83 L.Ed.2d 512 (1984); United States v. Green, 548 F.2d 1261, 1262 (6th Cir.1977).

Walker's challenge to his conviction on Count 28 of the indictment is equally without merit. On January 18, 1985, Walker applied for a loan of $200,000 from the bank for Walker Grain Company. On that date, Walker Grain Company's checking account at the bank was overdrawn by $293,072.06. In applying for the loan, Walker assured Gary Carlton that he had a check for $300,000 coming in which would cover the overdraft. The check was written on a Walker Grain Company checking account at First Citizens Bank. This account had been closed in June, 1982 and there were no funds in the account to cover the $300,000 check. Walker testified at trial that the check was written because he had applied for a loan in that amount from First Citizens Bank, although the loan had not yet been approved. He testified that he informed Mr. Carlton of these facts. The loan from First Citizens Bank was never approved, although there was no evidence that Walker Grain Company's $300,000 check was dishonored by that bank. On January 24, 1985, Farmers Bank loaned $190,000 to Walker Grain Company and the proceeds were deposited into the Walker Grain Company account. These proceeds, together with the proceeds of the Jones loan, allowed Farmers Bank to cover the $300,000 check written on the First Citizens account, curing the overdraft in the Walker Grain Company account.

Walker argues that he made no false statements to Carlton in order to receive the $190,000 loan, because he explained to Carlton that the $300,000 check would be covered by a loan from First Citizens. As the government argues, however, the jury was entitled to view Walker's statements as false because he failed to tell Carlton that Walker Grain Company's checking account at First Citizens had been closed for nearly four years. Further, in the course of applying for the loan from Farmers Bank, Walker failed to inform Carlton that the grain company already had hundreds of thousands of the bank's dollars in its coffers from the Hastings and Jones loans. Certainly these are omissions of material fact which the jury was entitled to consider in determining Walker's guilt. That they chose not to accept Walker's version of the events is no ground for reversing his conviction.

We conclude, therefore, that the jury's verdict on each count of the indictment must be affirmed. The district court did not err in admitting evidence of Hastings' guilty plea and plea agreement, or in excluding evidence of the named borrowers' ability to repay the loans at issue in counts 1, 23 and 27 of the indictment. While evidence of the named borrowers' ability to repay and understanding of their obligation to do so may be relevant in certain cases, it is not where, as here, the individual who actually benefited from the loan was a bank officer. The prosecution is not barred by the applicable statute of limitations, and the district court did not err in denying Walker's motion for judgment of acquittal on the remaining counts of the indictment. Accordingly, we AFFIRM Walker's conviction on all counts. Given our disposition of Walker's appeal, we see no need to address the issues raised in the government's appeal.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Joe Raymond DIEZ and Peter A. Palori, Defendants-Appellants.
No. 74-2641.
United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.
July 14, 1975.

The United States District Court for the Middle District of Florida, at Tampa, Ben Krentzman, J., found one of the defendants guilty of income tax evasion and found both defendants guilty of conspiring to defraud the United States by impeding the Internal Revenue Service in the collection of income taxes, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Ainsworth, Circuit Judge, held that (1) the hearsay statements made by a coconspirator in 1972 were part of the central conspiracy itself, which involved a series of real estate transactions between 1965 and 1968 but which had not terminated when the statements were made, and they were thus admissible under the coconspirator exception to the hearsay rule, (2) the work papers of defendant's accountant, an alleged coconspirator, were admissible, (3) the refusal of the defendant's motion for a trial separate from his accountant was not an abuse of discretion, where, inter alia, defendant's proffer in support of his motion was bereft of exculpatory content and where the motion was made late in the trial, and (4) the illustrative charts used by the government, while undeniably making assumptions concerning the proper attribution of income from the real estate transactions, had ample evidentiary support.

Affirmed.

895 Before GIBSON,[FN] THORNBERRY and AINSWORTH, Circuit Judges.

FN* Of the Eighth Circuit, sitting by designation.

AINSWORTH, Circuit Judge:

Peter A. Palori and Joe Raymond Diez appeal from convictions of conspiring to defraud the United States by impeding the Internal Revenue Service in the collection of income tax in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371. Palori also appeals from his conviction on four counts of income tax evasion. 26 U.S.C. s 7201. Both defendants assign numerous errors in the trial court's rulings concerning the admissibility and weight of hearsay evidence, the propriety of a joint trial of the defendants, and the possibility of prejudice from the Government's use of illustrative charts.

I. Factual Background

The Government's case against Palori and Diez involved a series of real estate transactions in Tampa, Florida, between 1965 and 1968. The Government's theory was that Palori was the real owner of shares of the various parcels sold in these transactions, but that he had arranged for several of his relatives to act as nominal owners or brokers in the transactions and to report part of the profits from the sales on their own tax returns. Palori's mother, Minnie Lopez, reported profits from a number of the transactions on her returns and was indicted as a member of the conspiracy but acquitted. Diez, who is Palori's uncle, reported part of the profit from one of the transactions, as well as two brokerage commissions allegedly received in connection with other transactions, and interest on a loan he allegedly made to Palori. B. J. DeGuzman, Palori's accountant during the tax years in question, reported part of the profit from one of the real estate transactions, and was indicted and convicted both for his role in the conspiracy and for preparing false returns specifically those of Palori and his relatives.[FN1] The Government contended that all of this income was properly attributable to Palori. James Garrett and Clarence Prevatt, two unindicted coconspirators, also participated in some of the transactions.

FN1. DeGuzman did not appeal his conviction.

II. Evidence Allegedly Admitted in Violation of the Hearsay Rule

A. Statements of Coconspirators

[1] Palori and Diez contend that it was error to permit the introduction of several statements by Garrett and DeGuzman, two of their coconspirators, which, they argue, were inadmissible under the hearsay rule. The general principles governing the introduction of out-of-court declarations by one conspirator against another, for the truth of the matter stated, are clear:

It is established law, at least since Krulewitch v. United States, 1949, 336 U.S. 440, 69 S.Ct. 716, 93 L.Ed. 790, and under so many cases prior to and following Krulewitch that it would be an affectation to cite them, that acts and declarations of co-conspirators are binding upon each member of the conspiracy, if made during the life of the conspiracy and in furtherance of any of its objects.

United States v. Harrell, 5 Cir., 1970, 436 F.2d 606, 613. See United States v. Register, 5 Cir., 1974, 496 F.2d 1072, 1078.

[2][3] The statements complained of were part of the testimony of Agents Brock and Hill of the Internal Revenue Service. Brock testified that DeGuzman told him, in an interview in November 1970, that during a prior audit another agent, named Hunting, had proposed to classify Palori as a dealer in real estate,[FN2]and *896 thus as ineligible for the special tax treatment usually given long-term capital gains.[FN3] DeGuzman also stated in interviews during July 1969 and July 1970, according to the testimony of Agents Brock and Hill, that he and Minnie Lopez had paid fees and brokerage commissions to Diez in connection with several of the real estate transactions in the case.[FN4]

FN2. The fact that DeGuzman's statement, like numerous others introduced at trial, relied on a statement by another person does not render the testimony inadmissible. Agent Hunting's statement, reported to Agent Brock by DeGuzman, was a statement of his intention to classify Palori as a dealer in real estate. The statement was received not to prove that Palori was or had been classified as a dealer, but rather to prove that Agent Hunting intended to regard him as one. The statement was thus a "statement of the declarant's then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation, or physical condition (such as intent, plan, motive, design, mental feeling, pain and bodily health)" and falls under the well-established exception to the hearsay rule for such statements. Fed.R.Evid. Rule 803(3). DeGuzman was therefore a competent witness to Hunting's statement, just as Agent Brock was a competent witness to DeGuzman's statement under the coconspirator rule. "Hearsay included within hearsay is not excluded under the hearsay rule if each part of the combined statements conforms with an exception to the hearsay rule provided in these rules." Fed.R.Evid. Rule 805.

The Federal Rules of Evidence were approved by Congress on January 2, 1975, and take effect on the one hundred and eightieth day thereafter. The Rules are to be applied even in advance of their effective date "except to the extent that application of the rules would not be feasible, or would work (an) injustice." United States v. Rivera, 2 Cir., 1975, 513 F.2d 519. See United States v. Arias-Diaz, 5 Cir., 1974, 497 F.2d 165, 170.

FN3. Palori made no objection to the introduction of this statement, either on the basis of the hearsay rule or on the basis of irrelevance, and admission of the testimony was not plain error. Wright, Federal Practice and Procedure: Criminal s 856 (1969). Therefore, it seems doubtful that we can consider this assignment of error as to Palori. Moreover, Agent Hunting was available and testified at trial. Neither Palori nor Diez has explained why they did not attempt to cross-examine him or call him as a witness on this issue.

FN4. Because DeGuzman's statement is consistent with Palori and Diez's version of the facts, it is unclear how admission of this testimony prejudiced defendants. Moreover, when Agent Brock first interviewed Diez he specifically referred the agent to DeGuzman for answers to any questions concerning his taxes. DeGuzman's statement, therefore, would appear to be an "admission by an authorized agent," Hayes v. United States, 5 Cir., 1969, 407 F.2d 189, 192, and therefore would be admissible irrespective of whether the coconspirator exception applies. In Hayes the accountant acted pursuant to a written power of attorney, but we know of no precedent requiring authorization by a written instrument.

According to Agent Brock's testimony, in an interview during January 1972 Garrett stated that Diez "didn't participate as a partner in any of Mr. Palori's real estate transactions, nor did he perform any services which would entitle him to a commission." This statement, in contrast to that of DeGuzman concerning payment of fees and commissions, supported the Government's contention that income properly belonging to Palori was being attributed to Diez as part of the conspiracy. Agent Brock, testifying as an expert witness, also stated that in computing Palori's income for 1965 he disregarded a check from Palori to Garrett, allegedly for the latter's interest in a parcel sold in one of the transactions, because Garrett had told him (in the January 1972 interview) that he did not own an interest in the parcel in question.[FN5]

FN5. This testimony is largely repetitive of earlier testimony by Agent Brock. On cross-examination his testimony strongly suggested that Garrett had told him he held no interest in the property in question. No objection was made by defendants. His testimony on redirect examination, to which Palori objected, was largely repetitive of his answers on cross-examination.
Garrett's statement to the agents disavowing any ownership of a share in one of the parcels sold in 1965 was also introduced in the form of his tax return for that year, which contained no reference to gain from that sale. Palori contends that the tax return was inadmissible, relying on Greenbaum v. United States, 9 Cir., 1935, 80 F.2d 113, 125, which we cited approvingly in dicta in United States v. Ragano, 5 Cir., 1973, 476 F.2d 410, 417-418. Like the testimony on redirect concerning Garrett's oral statement to the agents, however, the information supplied by the tax return was merely repetitive of what Agent Brock had stated on cross-examination without objection. Under these circumstances, the admission of the tax return and Agent's Brock's statements on redirect examination was not erroneous or prejudicial.

Palori and Diez contend that these hearsay statements were, at most, attempts to conceal the completed crime, and thus could not be introduced under the coconspirator exception to the hearsay rule. A review of the prior Supreme *897 Court cases convinces us that this argument must fail.

In Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440, 69 S.Ct. 716, 93 L.Ed. 790 (1949), the Supreme Court held inadmissible the hearsay statement of a coconspirator made after she had been apprehended. The Government argued that there was an implicit conspiracy to conceal the crime. The Court noted, however, that no such conspiracy to conceal had been charged in the indictment, and stated:

It is beyond doubt that the central aim of the alleged conspiracy transportation of the complaining witness to Florida for prostitution had either never existed or had long since ended in success or failure when and if the alleged co-conspirator made the statement attributed to her.

336 U.S. at 442, 69 S.Ct. at 718.

In Lutwak v. United States, 344 U.S. 604, 73 S.Ct. 481, 97 L.Ed. 593 (1953), a conspiracy to conceal the crime was charged in the indictment, but the Court interpreted Krulewitch to require more than an unsubstantiated allegation:

This Court in (Krulewitch) rejected the Government's contention that in every conspiracy there is implicit an agreement as a part thereof for the conspirators to collaborate to conceal the conspiracy.

344 U.S. at 616, 73 S.Ct. at 489. The Court held in Lutwak that the Government had failed to prove a conspiracy to conceal the crime, and went on to discuss what kind of proof would be sufficient. See GRUNEWALD v. United States, 353 U.S. 391, 403-405, 77 S.Ct. 963, 973-974, 1 L.Ed.2d 931 (1957).

[4] It is unnecessary to apply the reasoning developed in these prior cases concerning proof of a conspiracy to conceal a completed crime, because the statements in question here were part of the central conspiracy itself, which had not terminated when those statements were made. In this case the Government charged a conspiracy to defraud the United States by impeding the Internal Revenue Service in the collection of income tax. This conspiracy is different from the conspiracies discussed in the cases relied on by defendants.

In Krulewitch the conspiracy was to transport a woman across state lines for prostitution in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 2421. That conspiracy clearly had ended when the arrested coconspirator made her statement. In Lutwak, supra, the conspiracy was " 'to defraud the United States of and concerning its governmental function and right of administering' the immigration laws and the Immigration and Naturalization Service, by obtaining the illegal entry into this country of three aliens as spouses of honorably discharged veterans."

344 U.S. at 605, 73 S.Ct. at 483 (emphasis added). The conspiracy to defraud was complete when the conspirators deceived the immigration officials into permitting them to enter the country.[FN6] The Court held that coconspirators' statements made later would not be admissible under the coconspirator exception to the hearsay rule. In GRUNEWALD, supra, the conspiracy was to defraud the United States by preventing criminal tax prosecutions. The prosecutions were prevented through the procurement, by bribery, of "no prosecution" rulings from the Internal Revenue Service, and ended when the rulings were issued.

FN6. The dissolution of the fraudulent marital relations, after the aliens had entered the United States but long before the indictments were handed down, left little doubt that the conspiracy to defraud the Government had ended.

On the other hand, in the present case the central aim of the conspiracy was to deceive officials of the Internal Revenue Service, thereby inducing them to accept fraudulent tax returns as truthful and accurate. In light of the substantial possibility that the returns would be audited and investigated, the filing of the returns did not fully accomplish the purpose *898 of the main conspiracy, which, by its very nature, called for concealment.[FN7]

FN7. The conspiracy alleged in this case is similar to the Supreme Court's examples, in GRUNEWALD, supra, of crimes that inherently involve concealment.
Kidnapers in hiding, waiting for ransom, commit acts of CONCEALMENT in furtherance of the conspiracy itself, just as repainting a stolen car would be in furtherance of a conspiracy to steal; in both cases the SUCCESSFUL ACCOMPLISHMENT of the crime NECESSITATES CONCEALMENT.
353 U.S. at 405, 77 S.Ct. at 974 (emphasis added).

The Supreme Court described a very similar conspiracy in Forman v. United States, 361 U.S. 416, 423-424, 80 S.Ct. 481, 486, 4 L.Ed.2d 412 (1960):
(T)he conspiracy was a continuing one extending from 1942 to 1953 and its principal object was to evade (taxes) for 1942-1945, inclusive, by concealing (the conspirators') "holdout" income. This object was not attained when the tax returns for 1945 concealing the "holdout" income were filed. As was said in GRUNEWALD, this was but the first step in the process of evasion. The concealment of the "holdout" income must continue if the evasion is to succeed.
In some circumstances it may be difficult to determine precisely when the deception has been accomplished in a conspiracy like this one.[FN8] A lapse of several years between the filing of the last fraudulent return and the initiation of investigative efforts by the Government might suggest that the conspiracy had succeeded in its purpose. Statements made during the course of such an investigation might be considered outside the scope of the coconspirator exception. That difficult determination is unnecessary in the present case, however, because an IRS audit of Palori's returns for 1965 and 1966 was undertaken in April 1968 even before the last fraudulent return involved here was filed. Thus the conspirators were clearly on notice that their activities had aroused suspicion and that further deception might be necessary to fulfill their purpose. At the time of the statements by DeGuzman and Garrett, it could not be said that the conspiracy "had long since ended in success or failure," as was true in Krulewitch. No charges had been brought, so the conspiracy could not be considered a failure, and the investigation had not been abandoned, so the conspiracy could not be considered a success.

FN8. In Forman the Supreme Court suggested that so long as acts of concealment continue beyond the filing of the returns, such conspiracies cannot be said to have "ended in success or failure" until either the conspirators are caught or the statute of limitations has run on any action to recover the evaded taxes. 361 U.S. at 424, 80 S.Ct. at 486.

"(T)he termination of a conspiracy generally is an issue to be determined on the facts of the individual case . . . ." United States v. Sarno, 1 Cir., 1972, 456 F.2d 875, 878. We find no reversible error in the District Court's conclusion that, for purposes of admissibility, there was sufficient evidence that the statements in question were made during the course of the conspiracy. See United States v. Nowak, 7 Cir., 1971, 448 F.2d 134, 139; Nassif v. United States, 8 Cir., 1966, 370 F.2d 147, 151-152; United States v. Hickey, 7 Cir., 1966, 360 F.2d 127, 140-141; United States v. Klein, 2 Cir., 1957, 247 F.2d 908.

[5][6] Defendants contend that, even if made during the conspiracy, several of the statements made by DeGuzman and Garrett to the IRS agents cannot be considered in furtherance of the conspiracy.[FN9] Defendants argue that since the statements were consistent with the Government's position at trial, they must be considered as true; and true statements do not further a conspiracy to deceive. A statement need not be false in every detail, however, in order to have been *899 made in furtherance of a conspiracy to conceal and defraud. Deception rarely takes the form of an uninterrupted series of lies. A fair reading of the agents' interviews with DeGuzman and Garrett convinces us that, taken as a whole, the coconspirators' statements were deceptive in design, especially when considered in conjunction with the versions of the facts related to the agents by Palori, Diez and the others during the investigation. The truthfulness of isolated parts of the statements does not affect this conclusion. Cf. Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123, 126, 88 S.Ct. 1620, 1622, 20 L.Ed.2d 476 (1968); United States v. Maddox, 5 Cir., 1974, 492 F.2d 104, 107.

FN9. The fact that Garrett and Prevatt were not made defendants in the case does not render the coconspirator exception inapplicable to them. United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 700-701, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3104, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974).

B. Evidence Admitted Under the Business Records Act

[7] The trial court received into evidence, over defendants' objections, several documents which the Government contended were admissible under the Business Records Act. 28 U.S.C. s 1732(a).[FN10] Defendants particularly objected to the introduction of work papers, given to the IRS agents by DeGuzman, showing that Palori had a one-third interest in a parcel of land sold in one of the transactions in the case, although Diez reported half of the gain attributable to that one-third share on his own tax return for 1965. Defendants contend that proper foundation for introducing the papers as business records was lacking. We need not resolve that question, however, because DeGuzman's work papers, like his statements discussed earlier, were admissible under the coconspirator exception to the hearsay rule. The work papers were prepared shortly after the sale of the parcel in 1965, and thus were statements made during the course of the conspiracy. They also were in furtherance of the purpose of the conspiracy: the filing of false income tax returns.[FN11]

FN10. Section 1732(a) provides:
In any court of the United States and in any court established by Act of Congress, any writing or record, whether in the form of an entry in a book or otherwise, made as a memorandum or record of any act, transaction, occurrence, or event, shall be admissible as evidence of such act, transaction, occurrence, or event, if made in regular course of any business, and if it was the regular course of such business to make such memorandum or record at the time of such act, transaction, occurrence, or event or within a reasonable time thereafter.
Rule 803(6) of the Federal Rules of Evidence provides:
The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:
(6) Records of regularly conducted activity. A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. The term "business" as used in this paragraph includes business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit.

FN11. As we noted earlier in connection with DeGuzman and Garrett's oral statements, the fact that DeGuzman's notations on the work papers coincided with the Government's version of the facts at trial does not mean that they were not in furtherance of the conspiracy.

The remainder of the documents in question, objected to by Palori, are writings "made in (the) regular course of any business," 28 U.S.C. s 1732, and were otherwise qualified to be introduced under the Act. Palori does not dispute this, but raises other objections to the admission of these documents, which we deal with separately.
The Government offered in evidence the work papers of Clarence Prevatt's accountant, showing a profit of $24,612.91 on the sale of a parcel of real estate in 1968 and allocating $9,000 of that profit as Palori's share $9,000 that Palori did not report on his 1968 return. *900 The accountant testified that he prepared the work paper in the regular course of business, specifically in the course of preparing Prevatt's 1968 tax return. He also testified that Prevatt, an unindicted coconspirator in the case, had provided the information he used in his computations.
[8] Apparently Palori's only objection to the introduction of this document is that, since the accountant could not testify to what Prevatt had told him concerning the ownership of the land, the same information could not come in by virtue of being preserved in a business record. We believe, however, that the accountant could have so testified, because Prevatt's statements to him were those of a coconspirator during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. The purpose of the conspiracy was to enable Palori to receive income from the various real estate transactions without revealing his participation in them as an owner and thus exposing himself to tax liability. The statements of the conspirators that were intended to facilitate the flow of funds to Palori were as much in furtherance of the conspiracy as were the statements designed to conceal the disposition of the proceeds of the transactions. Without Prevatt's directions to his accountant, which indisputably were given before the conspiracy ended, Palori would not have received his share of the proceeds from the sale, and a major purpose of the conspiracy would have been frustrated.

To establish Palori's intention to conceal his participation in one of the transactions in 1967, the prosecution offered a letter from an official of the title company that closed the sale, stating that Palori "did not want his name to appear because he did not think it was politically expedient that it do so." The title company official testified that he wrote the letter in the regular course of business and that Palori himself was the source of his statement concerning the omission of Palori's name from the transaction.[FN12]

FN12. Palori contends that the title company official could not remember whether Palori specifically directed that his name be kept out of the transaction or whether he simply drew that conclusion himself. A careful reading of the testimony to which Palori refers, however, shows that the official's uncertainty concerned a different part of his letter. In any event, the clear import of the text of the letter is that Palori had requested that his name not be mentioned, and a specific present recollection of that fact on the part of the writer of the letter is unnecessary.

[9] Palori contends that the title company officer's letter should not have been admitted because he was available to provide his own testimonial recollection of the facts in the letter. Availability of the declarant, however, does not bar introduction of a document under the Act. McCormick on Evidence s 311 at 728-729 (1972); Fed.R.Evid. Rule 803(6).

[10] As further evidence of Palori's concealment of his participation in the transactions, the prosecution introduced a letter from an attorney for the seller of a parcel purchased and later resold by Palori. It stated that Palori was the actual mortgagor of the property, even though the parcel was held in the name of Minnie Lopez, Palori's mother. The attorney testified that he prepared the letter in the regular course of his business. He stated that he had written Mrs. Lopez to tell her where to send the mortgage payments, but she had failed to make the first payment. Garrett intervened, informing the attorney that Palori was the actual mortgagor of the property and would be making the payments.

Palori maintains that the attorney was uncertain of the source of his information, but a review of the attorney's testimony reveals this contention to be without merit. Furthermore, the fact that the attorney relied on Garrett's statement does not render admission of the letter violative of the hearsay rule. The statement was made in 1967, long before the conspiracy ended. It was in furtherance *901 of the conspiracy because the attorney had already brought foreclosure proceedings against Minnie Lopez. If Garrett had not intervened the conspirators could not have resold the property.

III. Sufficiency of the Evidence as to Diez

[11] Diez contends that the trial court erred in denying his motion for acquittal under Rule 29 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, because the evidence was insufficient for submission of the case to the jury. His argument is based chiefly on the paucity of references to his role in the conspiracy by the numerous witnesses at trial. Under the Government's theory of the case, however, Diez's role was amply established by the evidence.

The Government sought to prove that Diez had reported income that was not properly attributable to him. That the income was reported by Diez was established by introducing his tax returns for 1965, 1966, 1967 and 1968. The other half of the Government's case against Diez was more difficult, because it required proof that Diez had not earned the income in question and had not owned a share of the property that was the source of the sales proceeds listed on his return.

[12] The prosecutor asked a number of witnesses whether they knew Diez, and many of them answered affirmatively. Diez argues that, because the prosecutor did not pursue the relevance of these witnesses' familiarity with Diez, his conviction was the product of guilt by association. It is true that mere association with members of a conspiracy is insufficient to establish a person's participation in the conspiracy,[FN13] but in this case it was the defendant's nonassociation that proved his guilt. Despite his acquaintance with a number of the witnesses at trial, Diez was not mentioned as a participant in the real estate transactions by anyone but Palori and, in one statement, DeGuzman.

> FN13. United States v. Oliva, 5 Cir., 1974, 497 F.2d 130, 134; United States v. Suarez, 5 Cir., 1973, 487 F.2d 236, 239; United States v. Martinez, 5 Cir., 1973, 486 F.2d 15, 24; United States v. Jackson, 5 Cir., 1970, 426 F.2d 305, 309; Jett v. United States, 5 Cir., 1968, 393 F.2d 139, 140; Causey v. United States, 5 Cir., 1965, 352 F.2d 203, 207; Panci v. United States, 5 Cir., 1958, 256 F.2d 308, 312; United States v. Cantone, 2 Cir., 1970, 426 F.2d 902, 904. Cf. United States v. Menichino, 5 Cir., 1974, 497 F.2d 935, 942-943; United States v. Edwards, 5 Cir., 1974, 488 F.2d 1154, 1158.

Simon Wooten, an associate of Palori who owned a one-third share of one of the parcels sold, indicated no knowledge of any participation in the transaction by Diez, who nevertheless reported the profit from a one-sixth interest in the property on his return. Gaston Fernandez, the real estate broker who handled the transaction, identified only Palori, Garrett, and Simon Wooten as owners of the land. Diez's name did not appear on any documents connected with the sale, and there was no record of any payment of sale expenses by him. Although the other owners received payments from Palori by check for their interests in the property, there was no record of any such check from Palori to Diez.

DeGuzman's worksheet compiled during the preparation of Palori's 1965 tax return, lists one-third interests held by Palori, Garrett, and Simon Wooten.
Diez reported a $5,000 brokerage commission, allegedly paid by Minnie Lopez, from another real estate sale involved in the case. The broker who procured the purchase option by which the owners (Palori and others) acquired this land, however, knew of nothing Diez had done in connection with the property which would warrant receipt of a commission. The closing statements for this transaction show payment of commissions to several real estate brokers, but Diez is not among them. Although in all the other transactions Minnie Lopez paid sale expenses by purchasing cashier's checks with cash withdrawals from her *902 savings account, there was no such check payable to Diez.[FN14]

FN14. At trial Palori offered a different explanation of Diez's receipt of the $5,000. He stated that Diez had made arrangements for sewerage hook-ups for a parcel sold in Minnie Lopez's name, and he had recommended that she pay Diez $5,000 for his services. The Government introduced evidence showing that Palori was aware of the need for sewerage hook-ups long before he allegedly commissioned Diez to look into the matter and had hired an expert engineer to solve the problem. Palori maintains that the engineer was hired in connection with sewerage hook-ups for another parcel sold in the same transaction, but that was a question for the jury.

Diez also reported a $6,000 commission, allegedly paid to him in cash by DeGuzman, in connection with another real estate transaction involved in the case. Like Minnie Lopez, DeGuzman consistently made payments by check in the other transactions. The real estate broker who helped Palori and Garrett obtain an option to purchase on the property, which was later sold, testified that he knew of no efforts by Diez in connection with the property which would warrant receipt of a commission.
Finally, Diez reported as his income $3,200 allegedly paid to him by Palori as interest on a loan. Palori's records contain no indication, however, of such payments. Nor is there any evidence that any such loan was made to Palori by Diez.
The pattern of Diez's reporting of income also reinforced the Government's case. For three of the four years in question (1965-1968), Diez reported substantial losses consistently in excess of his gains from the real estate transactions. In 1966, the only year in which Diez reported no losses, no gains from commissions or the sale of real estate were reported on his return.
Against all this evidence there was only the out-of-court statement of DeGuzman (to which Agent Brock testified) concerning his payment of a commission to Diez, for which he furnished an alleged receipt, and the testimony of Palori, who stated that Diez participated in all of the transactions from which he reported income, but had been paid in cash each time and had participated without the knowledge of anyone but himself, DeGuzman, and Minnie Lopez.
[13] The standard we must apply in reviewing a denial of a motion for acquittal is clear. "The verdict of a jury must be sustained if there is substantial evidence, taking the view most favorable to the Government, to support it." Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 80, 62 S.Ct. 457, 469, 86 L.Ed. 680 (1942). That the Government's case rested in substantial part on circumstantial evidence does not change that standard. Id.; United States v. Prince, 5 Cir., 1974, 496 F.2d 1289, 1293; McFarland v. United States, 5 Cir., 1960, 273 F.2d 417, 419. "Circumstantial evidence in this respect is intrinsically no different from testimonial evidence." Holland v. United States, 348 U.S. 121, 140, 75 S.Ct. 127, 137, 99 L.Ed. 150 (1954). See United States v. Miller, 5 Cir., 1974, 500 F.2d 751, 763. Our examination of the evidence and application of the appropriate standard of review compels the conclusion that the trial court did not err in denying Diez's motion for acquittal.

IV. Defendants' Motions for Severance

Palori contends that the trial court erred in refusing to grant him a trial separate from DeGuzman's. Diez contends that the trial court erred in refusing to grant him a trial separate from Palori's. Both of these assignments of error are without merit.

A. Palori's Motion

[14] After the Government and the other defendants had rested and he had presented his evidence, Palori moved for a severance, alleging that DeGuzman would testify in his behalf if a separate trial was granted. Palori's proffer in support of his motion was, in its entirety, as follows:

*903 He (DeGuzman) would be prepared to testify for and on behalf of Mr. Palori as to the manner and means by which he computed the taxes and his error or omission on the 1967 tax return. His advice from time to time on tax matters.

[15] In Byrd v. Wainwright, 5 Cir., 1970, 428 F.2d 1017, we discussed the factors a trial court should consider in ruling on a motion for severance based on the unavailability of a codefendant whose testimony is allegedly needed. First, the movant must show a bona fide desire to use the codefendant's testimony. In Byrd the movant's assertions concerning the importance of the codefendant's testimony were made "with full exploration of reasons." 428 F.2d at 1020. Here, in contrast, the defendant offered an unelaborated conclusory statement.

Second, the codefendant's testimony must be specifically shown to be exculpatory. United States v. Wilson, 5 Cir., 1974, 500 F.2d 715, 721. In this case the defendant's proffer not only lacked sufficient detail but also was bereft of exculpatory content. Palori had based prior motions for severance on the allegedly prejudicial effect of admissions made by DeGuzman during the investigation. His proffer contained nothing to erase this suggestion that DeGuzman would be a damaging, rather than exculpating, witness. The testimony briefly described in the proffer was irrelevant. Palori's defense was not that he relied in good faith on advice that proved to be incorrect. He contended that the transactions were exactly as represented on the various tax returns. As to the omission on Palori's 1967 tax return, Palori had already stated that the proceeds from one of the sales was left out of the return inadvertently. See United States v. Burke, 5 Cir., 1974, 495 F.2d 1226, 1234. Cf. United States v. Shuford, 4 Cir., 1971, 454 F.2d 772, 778.

Third, the movant must show a substantial likelihood that the codefendant will testify if the severance is granted. In Byrd the prosecutor and other defense counsel advised the judge, before he ruled on the severance motion, that the codefendant would testify if a separate trial was granted. Here there is nothing to show why DeGuzman would be any more willing to testify in a separate trial than in a joint trial. See United States v. Cochran, 5 Cir., 1974, 499 F.2d 380, 391-392; United States v. Burke, supra, 495 F.2d 1226, 1234.

Finally, the trial judge should consider the timeliness of the motion and the effect of a severance on economy of judicial resources. Byrd v. Wainwright, supra, 428 F.2d at 1020; United States v. Burke, supra, 495 F.2d at 1234; United States v. Johnson, 5 Cir., 1973, 478 F.2d 1129, 1134. In the present case, Palori has offered no explanation for making his motion very late in the trial.[FN15] Having spent three weeks of trial time hearing the testimony of over sixty witnesses and considering over three hundred documents, the trial judge was not obliged to treat Palori's motion as he would an ordinary severance request made at the outset of a trial.

FN15. Palori's two prior motions for severance were not based on the contention that DeGuzman would testify in his behalf, and he has not contended on appeal that the denial of these earlier motions is error.

The granting of a motion for severance under Rule 14 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure is within the trial court's discretion. E. g., Opper v. United States, 348 U.S. 84, 95, 75 S.Ct. 158, 165, 99 L.Ed. 101 (1954); United States v. Burke, supra, 495 F.2d at 1233-1234; Byrd v. Wainwright, supra, 428 F.2d at 1018; Smith v. United States, 5 Cir., 1967, 385 F.2d 34, 38. We find nothing to indicate an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in denying Palori's motion.[FN16]

FN16. Palori alternatively requested that the court bifurcate the jury deliberations, so that DeGuzman's guilt or innocence could be resolved whereupon he would testify for Palori. This procedure would have been impractical and unwarranted. The jury could not have determined DeGuzman's guilt or innocence on the conspiracy count without coming to a conclusion concerning Palori's guilt or innocence on the substantive count, which would nullify the purpose of having the bifurcated deliberation in the first place.

*904 B. Diez's Motion

Diez contends that trying him with Palori was inherently unfair, because of the sheer complexity of the case and the impossibility of expecting the jury to restrict their consideration of evidence admitted against less than all the defendants. Closely related to this contention is Diez's assertion that the trial court's general instructions to the jury concerning the admissibility of evidence in a conspiracy trial were inadequate.

[16] The complexity of a trial, by itself, is insufficient grounds for overturning a trial court's denial of a severance motion. In complex trials the pressures against severance are especially great, because of the drain on judicial resources that would be created by separate trials. See Byrd v. Wainwright, supra ; United States v. Martinez, supra, 486 F.2d at 23.

The only specific evidence cited by Diez as prejudicing him in the joint trial was a record of zoning proceedings held by the Hillsborough County Commission in late 1966 and early 1967, and a financial statement given by Palori to his bank in September 1964. The minutes of the Commission proceedings were introduced to refute Palori's contention that he recommended to Minnie Lopez that she pay Diez a $5,000 commission for arranging sewer hook-ups to a parcel of property sold in her name in 1967. This evidence showed that Palori had been aware of the sewerage problem months before he allegedly commissioned Diez to look into the matter, and had hired an engineer to develop plans for sewerage connections. The minutes supported the Government's contention that Diez had not earned the $5,000 he reported on his 1967 tax return. They were admissible against both Palori and Diez as proof of the existence of a conspiracy to conceal Palori's income.[FN17]

FN17. Diez asserts that a cautionary instruction was necessary because this evidence was offered only to impeach Palori's credibility. Although in its brief the Government does use the term "impeachment" in discussing Diez's contention, this evidence is referred to as "impeachment of Palori's testimony." The context in which the Commission records were offered leaves no doubt that they were introduced as evidence of guilt. Palori contends the minutes were introduced to inject an element of political scandal into the trial, because they suggest connivance between him and Prevatt, an unindicted coconspirator and member of the Commission, to arrange for zoning variances and changes. As we explained in our discussion of Diez's motion for severance, however, there were legitimate reasons for the introduction of the minutes. The Government is not required to forego valuable evidence merely because it may lay bare the unsavory details of a defendant's dealings.

[17][18] Diez's objection to the admission of Palori's financial statement is also without merit. Palori furnished the statement to his bank in connection with an application for a loan several months before, under the Government's theory, the conspiracy began. The statement purported to list Palori's outstanding obligations, yet made no mention of a loan from Diez. By casting doubt on whether Palori had made a $3,200 payment of interest to Diez, the evidence supported the Government's charge of a conspiracy to conceal Palori's income. Although the court did not give an instruction to the jury cautioning that Palori's admission was not binding on Diez, or the other alleged coconspirators, such an instruction was given in connection with the introduction of a similar financial statement by Palori later in the trial. More importantly, the jury was repeatedly instructed throughout the trial that "(s)tatements of any conspirator which are not in furtherance of the conspiracy or made before its existence or after its termination may be considered as evidence only against the person making it." In light of these instructions we fail to see how Diez was prejudiced by the introduction of Palori's pre-conspiracy financial statement.

*905 To say that the jury might have been confused amounts to nothing more than an unfounded speculation that the jurors disregarded clear instructions of the court in arriving at their verdict.

Opper v. United States, supra, 348 U.S. at 95, 75 S.Ct. at 165.[FN18]

FN18. Diez challenges the correctness of the court's cautionary instruction concerning the kind of evidence admissible to connect a defendant with a conspiracy. The record shows that the trial judge apparently did skip a line, inadvertently, when he first read to the jury the standard instruction on this point. No one objected. Moreover, the instruction was correctly repeated throughout the trial, thus eliminating any possibility of prejudice.

V. The Government's Use of Charts

[19] Palori and Diez claim prejudice by the Government's use of illustrative charts and summaries in connection with the testimony of its summary witness, Agent Brock. Their argument is that the captions on the charts and the headings on various columns of figures misled the jury by assuming the central fact to be proved at trial to whom various items of income were properly attributable. [FN19] The caption on one chart, for example, reads "Schedule of Sales, Net Taxable Gains to Peter A. Palori And Amounts Not Reported Or Taxable Gain Reported By Others."

FN19. Defendants also object to the parts of one chart listing the total sales price of the properties sold and the listing of the taxable gains, rather than the entire gains, reported by DeGuzman and Minnie Lopez on the various real estate transactions. We find no prejudice from the listing of the sales prices. Furthermore, the taxable gain to Lopez and DeGuzman was only half of the entire gain because they reported these items of income as long-term capital gains. If the entire gain had been shown, the chart would have given a misleading indication of the amount of taxable income Palori had avoided reporting.

The charts undeniably make assumptions concerning the proper attribution of the income from the transactions in this case, and the propriety of Palori and Diez's attributions of this income was the crucial issue at trial. Any such chart of computations, however, must rest on certain assumptions. Contrary to defendants' argument, the essential requirement is not that the charts be free from reliance on any assumptions, but rather that these assumptions be supported by evidence in the record. United States v. Lawhon, 5 Cir., 1974, 499 F.2d 352, 357; Gordon v. United States, 5 Cir., 1971, 438 F.2d 858, 876; Myers v. United States, 5 Cir., 1966, 356 F.2d 469, 470; Azcona v. United States, 5 Cir., 1958, 257 F.2d 462, 466; Barsky v. United States, 9 Cir., 1964, 339 F.2d 180, 181-182. See Watkins v. United States, 1 Cir., 1961, 287 F.2d 932, 934.[FN20] In this case it is indisputable that the assumptions on which the Government based its charts that is, its version of the facts were amply supported by evidence already presented to the jury.

FN20. Baines v. United States, 5 Cir., 1970, 426 F.2d 833, relied on by defendants, is inapposite. In that case the crucial issue was whether dancing and music occurred simultaneously after 9:30 p. m. in a nightclub, for purposes of a cabaret tax on the sale of liquor. The Government relied on a chart computing the amount of taxes based on the assumption that every sale of liquor after 9:30 p. m. occurred while music and dancing were occurring simultaneously. There was no evidence to support that assumption. In this case, each representation made on the charts is supported by evidence in the record.

[20] The court should instruct the jury that "summaries do not, of themselves, constitute evidence in the case but only purport to summarize the documented and detailed evidence already submitted." [FN21] Gordon v. United States, supra, 438 F.2d at 877. See Myers v. *906 United States, supra, 356 F.2d at 470. In this case such instructions were given both when the Government's summary witness testified and again at the close of the case. [FN22] We believe the court's instructions eliminated any possibility of the charts confusing the jury.

FN21. Contrary to defendants' assertion, relying on Steele v. United States, 5 Cir., 1955, 222 F.2d 628, this Court has never held that the jury cannot take illustrative charts with them to the jury room. In that case we held only that the charts in question, because of their composition and layout, could not properly have been submitted to the jury, and that it was doubly prejudicial to accede to the jury's request for the charts after the deliberations began. See Flemister v. United States, 5 Cir., 1958, 260 F.2d 513, 516; United States v. Warner, 8 Cir., 1970, 428 F.2d 730, 737.

FN22. Defendants contend that the court described these charts in its instruction to the jury as "summaries of facts." Although that phrase appears in the Government's proposed instruction, the record shows that the trial judge did not use this language.

[21] It is within the trial court's discretion to decide whether the Government may use illustrative charts. United States v. Lawhon, supra, 499 F.2d at 357; Gordon v. United States, supra, 438 F.2d at 877; Bobsee Corporation v. United States, 5 Cir., 1969, 411 F.2d 231, 241; Lloyd v. United States, 5 Cir., 1955, 226 F.2d 9, 16; United States v. Dana, 7 Cir., 1972, 457 F.2d 205, 207-208. We perceive no abuse of discretion here.

Having reviewed all of defendants' assignments of error carefully, we find no reversible error.

Affirmed.

UNITED STATES of America
v.
Jeffrey L. FELDMAN and Paul J. Foont, Defendants.
No. 89 Cr. 765 (CSH).
United States District Court,
March 2, 1990.

affd 992 F2d 320

Defendants charged with tax evasion and conspiracy filed motion for various pretrial relief. The District Court, Haight, J., held that: (1) six-year limitations period applicable to tax evasion counts based on defendants' alleged creation of limited partnerships designed to defer income for one tax year commenced to run on last date defendants concealed true nature of transactions engaged in by partnerships; (2) Government was required to supply affidavit on personal knowledge of IRS agent or Justice Department official specifying exact date on which Justice Department referral was made; (3) defendants were not entitled to discover list of Government's witnesses; and (4) defendant was not entitled to severance based on his claim that codefendant would exculpate him at separate trial.

Motions granted in part and denied in part.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

HAIGHT, District Judge:

Trial in this tax evasion case is scheduled to begin on April 23, 1990. Defendants now move for various pre-trial relief.

Background

The indictment in the captioned case charges the defendants with various offenses arising out of certain financial transactions entered into by the Cralin partnerships. [FN1]

FN1. The Cralin partnerships "were a series of New York limited partnerships that were promoted as dealers or broker-dealers in various securities, commodities, and options." Indictment at P 2(a).
Specifically, the Cralin partnerships refer collectively to the following limited partnerships: Securities Arbitrage Company, Capital Trading Group, Arbitrage Partners, The Money Market Group, Capital Futures Group, Multi-Asset Group, Cralin Securities Company, Cralin Metals Company, and Greystone Investment Group. Id. at PP 2(b)-(j).
Feldman was, at all times relevant to the indictment, a "Special Partner" in Securities Arbitrage Company, Capital Trading Group and Arbitrage Partners. As a special partner, Feldman had a 1% partnership interest in each of those partnerships. Feldman also had a "controlling interest in the managing or general partners" of The Money Market Group, Capital Futures Group, Multi-Asset Group, Cralin Securities Company, Cralin Metals Company, and Greystone Investment Group. Id. at P 2(m).
Foont was, at all times relevant to the indictment, the Chief Trader for the Cralin partnerships. In addition, Foont was the President of the corporate general partner of Multi-Asset Group and the Executive Vice President of the general partners of Cralin Securities Company, Cralin Metals Company and Greystone Investment Group. Id. at P 2(n).

The government alleges that the defendants devised a plan to create approximately *1191 $140,000,000 in false tax deductions for the 1981 tax year, such deductions to be passed on to the limited partners in the Cralin partnerships. The government charges the defendants with the creation and concealment of a fraudulent income deferral device aimed at evading taxes for the 1981 tax year.

Specifically, the defendants are charged with having entered into a secret oral agreement with New York Hanseatic Division ("New York Hanseatic") [FN2] on behalf of the Cralin partnerships pursuant to which New York Hanseatic was paid a set fee for creating records substantiating certain false transactions by the Cralin partnerships in government securities. These transactions led to fraudulent interest deductions by the limited partners in the amount of $140,000,000 for the tax year 1981. The second stage of the transaction was the reporting of false income in the amount of $132,000,000 for the tax year 1982. That false income was also passed on to the limited partners.

FN2. New York Hanseatic operates "as a broker-dealer in government backed securities and other interest-rate sensitive instruments, to purchase significant tax losses for a fee, and to provide significant tax losses to willing purchasers for a fee." Indictment at P 2(1).

The charges in the indictment, all of which arise out of the basic scenario set forth above, are divided into three groups. Count 1 charges the defendants with conspiracy in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371. The conspiracy is defined as one extending from "in or about 1981 through in or about the end of 1985", one object of which was the evasion of taxes due and owing in the 1981 tax year. Indictment at P 1.

Counts 2 through 6 charge the defendants with tax evasion arising out of the 1981 tax returns of various limited partners. The return of each of those partners forms the basis for a separate count in the indictment. Although the offenses arise out of the 1981 tax returns, the indictment charges the defendants with tax evasion for the period 1981 through 1985.

Counts 7 through 15 charge the defendants with aiding and assisting in the filing of certain false tax returns for the Cralin partnerships. Each of the false filings referred to in this set of charges relates to the 1983 tax year.

Defendants move for various pre-trial relief. Specifically, defendants move to dismiss counts 1 through 6 as barred by the statute of limitations. Defendants further move for various discovery and a bill of particulars. Defendant Foont moves for a severance. I address these issues in turn.

Discussion

I. Statute of Limitations

It is common ground that the applicable statute of limitations in respect of both the conspiracy charged in count 1 and the tax evasion charges contained in counts 2 through 6 is six years. 26 U.S.C. s 6531. [FN3]

FN3. 26 U.S.C. s 6531 provides in pertinent part:
No person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any of the various offenses arising under the internal revenue laws unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within 3 years next after the commission of the offense, except that the period of limitation shall be 6 years--
(1) for offenses involving the defrauding or attempting to defraud the United States or any agency thereof, whether by conspiracy or not, and in any manner;
(2) for the offense of willfully attempting in any manner to evade or defeat any tax or the payment thereof....

The indictment in the captioned case was filed on October 10, 1989. Thus, in order to be timely filed, the indictment must charge the defendants with crimes committed within six years of October 10, 1989, namely on or after October 10, 1983. Defendants contend that the indictment fails in that regard, while the government argues that both the conspiracy and the counts of evasion were not complete until the end of 1985, well after the October 1983 limitations cutoff date.

A. Tax Evasion

[1] Defendants are charged with five counts of tax evasion in violation of 26 U.S.C. s 7201. [FN4] The elements of tax evasion are familiar:

FN4. 26 U.S.C. s 7201 provides:
Any person who willfully attempts in any manner to evade or defeat any tax imposed by this title or the payment thereof shall, in addition to other penalties provided by law, be guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, together with the costs of prosecution.

*1192 (1) an attempt to evade or defeat a tax or the payment thereof;
(2) an additional tax due and owing; and
(3) willfulness.

Sansone v. United States, 380 U.S. 343, 351, 85 S.Ct. 1004, 1010, 13 L.Ed.2d 882 (1965).

That first element of tax evasion, commonly referred to as the "affirmative act" requirement or the affirmative act of evasion, is described by the Supreme Court as "some willful commission in addition to the willful omissions that make up the list of misdemeanors," Spies v. United States, 317 U.S. 492, 499, 63 S.Ct. 364, 368, 87 L.Ed. 418 (1943), such as failure to pay a tax or failure to file a tax return in any given year.

Willful but passive neglect of the statutory duty may constitute the lesser offense, but to combine with it a willful and positive attempt to evade tax in any manner or to defeat it by any means lifts the offense to the degree of felony.

Id. The question presented by the instant motion is when the statute of limitations began to run.

Defendants contend that the crime was complete, if committed at all, with the filing of the 1981 tax returns that contained the allegedly fraudulent deductions. In the alternative, defendants argue that the counts of evasion were complete with the filing of the 1982 tax returns that constituted the second prong of the attempt to evade taxes for the 1981 tax year. In essence, the government alleges that the defendants engaged in a course of conduct aimed at evading taxes for 1981, which continued through 1985 at which time the statute of limitations began to run. In consequence, the government argues, the instant indictment was filed only four years after the limitations period began to run, well within the limitations period.

The indictment alleges the following as affirmative acts of evasion occurring after October 10, 1983.

(d) From in or about 1981 through in or about 1985, FELDMAN and FOONT concealed the bogus, fraudulent and pre-arranged nature of the New York Hanseatic transactions from the outside accountants of the Cralin partnerships and attempted to mislead those accountants as to the true nature of the transactions.

(f) On or about December 1, 1983, FOONT made false statements and representations to an employee of the IRS, in the presence of FELDMAN and one of the outside accountants for the Cralin partnerships, for the purpose of concealing the fraudulent and pre-arranged nature of the tax losses passed on to the limited partner-investors of the Cralin partnerships, ..., to wit, FOONT told an IRS agent that there were no oral or written agreements affecting the 1981 transactions between the Cralin partnerships and New York Hanseatic.

(g) In or about 1984, FELDMAN made false statements and representations to an employee of the IRS, in the presence of FOONT and one of the outside accountants for the Cralin partnerships, for the purpose of concealing the fraudulent and pre-arranged nature of the tax losses passed on to the limited partner-investors of the Cralin partnerships, ..., to wit, FELDMAN told an IRS agent that there were no oral or written agreements affecting the 1981 transactions between the Cralin partnerships and New York Hanseatic.

(h) Between in or about mid-1984 and in or about April 1985, FOONT refused to answer questions posed by an employee of the IRS, in the presence of one of the outside accountants for the Cralin partnerships, for the purpose of concealing the fraudulent and pre-arranged nature of the tax losses passed on to the limited partner-investors of the Cralin partnerships, *1193 ..., to wit, FOONT refused to answer an IRS agent's question about the financing for the 1981 transactions between the Cralin partnerships and New York Hanseatic.

(i) Between in or about March 1985 and in or about April 1985, FELDMAN made false statements and representations to one of the outside accountants for the Cralin partnerships for the purpose of concealing the fraudulent and pre-arranged nature of the tax losses passed on to the limited partner-investors of the Cralin partnerships, ..., to wit, FELDMAN lied to the accountant about the financing for the 1981 transactions between the Cralin partnerships and New York Hanseatic.

Indictment at P 7(d), (f)-(i).

Defendants concede, as they must, that false statements to an employee of the IRS constitute affirmative acts of evasion. United States v. Beacon Brass, 344 U.S. 43, 45-46, 73 S.CT. 77, 78-79, 97 L.Ed. 61 (1952) ("[t]he language of [26 U.S.C. s 7201] which outlaws willful attempts to evade taxes 'in any manner' is clearly broad enough to include false statements made to Treasury representatives for the purpose of concealing unreported income"). [FN5] Rather, defendants contend that the alleged false statements, along with the other affirmative acts of evasion set forth in the indictment, occurred after the crime of evasion was complete.

FN5. Defendants take issue with two of the so-called affirmative acts of evasion, namely those contained in PP 7(h) and (i). Paragraph 7(h) alleges that sometime in mid-1984 Foont refused to answer certain questions put to him by an employee of the IRS. Defendants argue that Foont had a Fifth Amendment right to refuse to answer whatever questions were asked of him by the IRS and such refusal can thus not constitute an affirmative act of evasion and should be struck from the indictment. Although defendants cite no case law in support of their argument, the government is in essence attempting to hold Foont's > invocation of the Fifth Amendment privilege against him on the face of the charging instrument, in violation of basic principles of constitutional law.

>
> It does not appear that there existed a duty on the part of defendant Foont to answer the questions asked by the IRS. Indeed, by letter dated December 7, 1989, counsel for defendant Foont served a request for a bill of particulars as follows:
>
> 7. Paragraph 7(h)--Identify any duty on Mr. Foont's part to answer the question allegedly put by the IRS agent.
>
> The government declined to provide a response to defendant Foont's request. Affidavit of Celia Goldwag Barenholtz sworn to on December 19, 1989 at P 7. Absent some showing by the government that Foont had a duty to answer the IRS's questions, or citation to case law demonstrating the propriety of the inclusion of Foont's failure to do so as an affirmative act of evasion or an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy, I direct that the allegations be stricken from the indictment. The government has ten (10) days to make the requisite showing.
>
> In respect of P 7(i) which alleges that Feldman made false statements in March or April of 1985 to an outside accountant for the Cralin partnerships, defendants argue that even if the allegation is true, it does not amount to an affirmative act of evasion as to taxes due and owing in the 1981 tax year. Defendants make this argument without benefit of citation to case law, which points clearly in the opposite direction. The Supreme Court has held that "any conduct, the likely effect of which would be to mislead or conceal" constitutes an affirmative act of evasion. Spies, 317 U.S. at 499.
>
> Congress did not define or limit the methods by which a willful attempt to defeat and evade might be accomplished and perhaps did not define lest its effort to do so result in some unexpected limitation. Nor would we by definition constrict the scope of the Congressional provision that it may be accomplished 'in any manner.' By way of illustration, and not by way of limitation, we would think affirmative willful attempt may be inferred from conduct such as keeping a double set of books, making false entries or alterations, or false invoices or documents, destruction of books or records, concealment of assets or covering up sources of income, handling of one's affairs to avoid making the records usual in transactions of the kind, and any conduct, the likely effect of which would be to mislead or to conceal. If the tax-evasion motive plays any part in such conduct the offense may be made out even though the conduct may also serve other purposes such as concealment of other crime.
> Id.

Two separate but related issues are presented by these facts and the arguments of counsel. First, the question arises whether the elements of the alleged crime of evasion were present in 1981 or 1982. The next issue presented for consideration is whether, assuming that the elements *1194 of tax evasion were all present in 1981 or 1982, the limitations period began to run at that point, or after the last affirmative act of evasion, that being in 1985. I address these issues in turn.

In respect of that first issue, whether the elements of evasion were present in 1981, it is important to note that the tax returns at issue were not filed by the defendants. Rather, the fraudulent tax returns were filed by various limited partners of the Cralin partnerships to whom the tax benefits of certain false transactions were passed along. In these circumstances, it is difficult to view the allegedly false filings as a "watershed event" for purposes of the statute of limitations. [FN6]

FN6. Indeed, the Supreme Court has recognized that affirmative acts of evasion, such as lying to the IRS, can support a prosecution for tax evasion, and consequently start the clock on the limitations period, even where the defendant never files a return. Spies, 317 U.S. 492, 63 S.Ct. 364.

It is defendants' course of conduct preceding and subsequent to the false filings that constitutes the evasion with which they are charged. Specifically, the government charges the defendants with a continuing series of acts ranging in time from the creation of the allegedly fraudulent transactions with New York Hanseatic to the defendants' continued and ongoing concealment of the true nature of those transactions. The question is whether the last act in such a course of conduct is that which properly triggers the statute of limitations.

While not cited in the briefs, United States v. Shorter, 608 F.Supp. 871 (D.C.D.C.1985), aff'd, 809 F.2d 54 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 817, 108 S.Ct. 71, 98 L.Ed.2d 35 (1987) is instructive. In that case the government had charged the defendant in one felony count of "willful attempt to evade the payment of income taxes due for the years 1972 through 1983, in violation of 26 U.S.C. s 7201." 608 F.Supp. at 873. Shorter had filed allegedly fraudulent tax returns for the years in question. The indictment was returned in 1984. The defendant argued that the indictment was time-barred as to the tax years between and including 1972 and 1977 and consequently that allegations as to those tax years should be stricken from the indictment. The defendant further argued that the single felony count was impermissibly duplicitous and should be dismissed, inasmuch as it alleged twelve separate offenses, namely evasion for each tax year 1972 through 1983.

The district court rejected defendant's first claim, namely that certain of the allegations of evasion were time-barred.

[T]he statute of limitations does not ipso facto rule out prosecution with respect to taxes owing prior to 1978, for the offense of tax evasion is not necessarily committed only in the year when the tax was due and payable. That is so because the existence of a tax deficiency is but one of the two essential elements of the crime, the other being an affirmative act of willful evasion. Sansone v. United States, 380 U.S. 343, 351, 85 S.Ct. 1004, 1010, 13 L.Ed.2d 882 (1965); Spies v. United States, 317 U.S. 492, 63 S.Ct. 364, 87 L.Ed. 418 (1943). An act constituting evasion which occurs during the limitations period brings the prosecution within the statute of limitations even if the taxes being evaded were due and payable prior thereto. United States v. Trownsell, 367 F.2d 815 (7th Cir.1966); United States v. Mousley, 194 F.Supp. 119 (E.D.Pa.1961), aff'd without opinion, 311 F.2d 795 (3d Cir.1963); United States v. Sclafani, 126 F.Supp. 654 (E.D.N.Y.1954), aff'd on other grounds, 265 F.2d 408 (2d Cir.1959); see also, United States v.

Malnik, 348 F.Supp. 1273 (S.D.Fla.1972), aff'd on other grounds, 489 F.2d 682 (5th Cir.1974).

It follows that the indictment in this case is not subject to dismissal even with respect to the evasion of taxes due prior to 1978 if it is supported by proof of one or more affirmative acts of evasion committed by the defendant within the past six years if these acts relate to taxes due in earlier years. Id. at 874 (footnote omitted). The court held that, on its face, the indictment did not *1195 suffer from a statute of limitations problem. That was so because the indictment alleged, and the government contended that it would prove, a continuing series of acts of evasion, or a course of conduct aimed at evading the payment of past taxes. Where defendant's conduct was of a continuing nature, the court viewed the limitations period as properly running from the last of defendant's actions, not the first.

The defendant in Shorter further argued that the single felony count was impermissibly duplicitous and should therefore be dismissed. The district court denied the motion. The court's analysis in that regard is illuminating. In determining whether "it is proper to charge a continuing scheme to evade taxes for several years", the court looked to "(1) the language and legislative history of the statute, and (2) the nature of the proscribed conduct." [FN7] 608 F.Supp. at 877. The district court found little guidance in the language and legislative history of the tax evasion statute and thus turned to the Supreme Court's opinion in Spies. Specifically, the district court turned to the Court's non-exclusive list of conduct amounting to affirmative acts of evasion. Much of the conduct envisioned by the Court as paving the way for a prosecution for tax evasion is that sort of conduct "which typically would be committed on a multi-year, continuing-course-of-conduct basis," id., namely the keeping of a double set of books, concealment of assets or covering up sources of income, and acts of that nature. The type of conduct alleged in the instant indictment, continuing efforts by the defendants to conceal the fraudulent nature of the New York Hanseatic transactions from the outside accountants of the Cralin partnerships, is that same sort of continuing conduct faced by the district court in Shorter.

> FN7. This is the analysis set forth by the Court in Toussie v. United States, 397 U.S. 112, 115, 90 S.Ct. 858, 860, 25 L.Ed.2d 156 (1970), which defendants urge upon this Court.

The district court further evaluated the duplicity argument with respect to the statute of limitations question. In what is essentially a fairness inquiry, the court observed that if the first count of the indictment were severed into twelve separate counts, each alleging a violation of the tax evasion statute for a single year 1972 through 1983, all of the acts of evasion occurring within the limitations period relating to those years could be introduced as to each year in which there was a tax deficiency.

Thus, the first count of such a hypothetical indictment presumably would allege evasion of taxes due in 1972. In support of that count, the government would be entitled to introduce evidence of a tax deficiency in 1972 as well as of any and all affirmative acts of evasion after 1978 [the limitations cutoff date] which may have been intended to evade payment of the 1972 taxes. Id. at 878-79. The court further noted that "[a]cts of evasion occurring between 1972 and 1978 would probably also be admissible, especially where--as in the instance of the establishment of a bank account in the name of another--they had continuing consequences." Id. at 878 n. 21. The court of appeals agreed with the district court's observations on this point. 809 F.2d at 57.

I find the court's reasoning in Shorter persuasive. Here, as in that case, the government alleges an ongoing course of conduct that constitutes the affirmative act of evasion. In essence, that course of conduct consisted of a series of lies and acts of concealment in respect of both the outside accountants of the Cralin partnerships and employees of the IRS. The government is not required by the statute of limitations to parse out that course of conduct in order to find the date of the first misstatement to an accountant. Of course, whether the government will be able to prove that sort of continuing conduct that the indictment suggests is ultimately a question for the jury. [FN8]

FN8. I note that in Shorter Judge Greene instructed the jury that it must find that sort of continuous conduct alleged by the government in order to convict.
Judge Greene took steps to ensure against the problem "of a possible lack of unanimity of the jury under the indictment and the proposed evidence in the event of a guilty verdict." 608 F.Supp. at 881. Specifically, the Judge charged the jury on the requirement that an affirmative act of evasion occurring after 1978 must be proved by the government and that such act must relate to the alleged nonpayment of taxes for any one or more of the specific years 1972 through 1978. The court further employed "special interrogatories" or a special verdict form in order to make certain that each juror, in the case of a conviction, voted for that verdict based on the same affirmative act of evasion.
Moreover, the court instructed the jury that in order "to return a verdict of guilty on the felony count, it must agree unanimously ... that these acts of evasion were part of a course of conduct which had as its purpose the willful evasion of the payment of such taxes." Id. In respect of that last instruction, the district court noted that "[a]lthough the existence of a course of conduct is not an element of the offense as such, it would be unfair to the defendant and inconsistent with the prosecutions' theory to permit it to rely on the existence of such a course to defeat the duplicity claim (as augmented by the statute of limitations defense), but then to have this factor ignored when the jury is called upon to make its decision." Id. at 881-82 n. 27.

*1196 I am not faced with the situation where a defendant files a false tax return and then is called in by the IRS to talk about that return perhaps a decade or more after its filing. Defendants argue that if that individual were to give false testimony to the IRS, under the government's theory at bar he could then be prosecuted for tax evasion as to the return filed more than six years before the return of the indictment, based solely on the single affirmative act of giving false testimony to the IRS, a result with which they disagree.

But that is not the case at bar. In the instant case, defendants did not even file the returns at issue. Rather, it is their ongoing course of allegedly fraudulent conduct in its entirety that forms the basis for this prosecution. The statute of limitations thus cannot begin to run until the entirety of that conduct is complete, which in this case is the end of 1985. The indictment was timely filed in respect of counts 2 through 6, the tax evasion counts.

B. Conspiracy

[2] Relying on Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391, 77 S.Ct. 963, 1 L.Ed.2d 931 (1957), defendants argue that the conspiracy count is barred by the six year statute of limitations.

In Grunewald the defendants were charged with and convicted of conspiracy to defraud the United States with reference to certain tax matters. The indictment charged the defendants with conspiring " 'to defraud the United States in the exercise of its governmental functions of administering the internal revenue laws and of detecting and prosecuting violations of the internal revenue laws free from bribery, unlawful impairment, obstruction, improper influence, dishonesty, fraud and corruption....' " Id. at 394, 77 S.Ct. at 968. The indictment further charged that "a part of the conspiracy was an agreement to conceal the acts of the conspirators." Id.

The acts of concealment, such as bribery and the giving of false testimony, occurred within the six year limitations period. However, the defendants' improper efforts to get "no prosecution" rulings in two tax fraud cases were complete with the issuance of those rulings more than six years prior to the filing of the indictment. The question presented in Grunewald was whether the indictment, in light of the government's proof at trial, properly charged a single conspiracy, or whether the non-time-barred acts of concealment were merely part of a second conspiracy to cover up the first, namely that to obtain the no prosecution rulings. If there were two conspiracies then the first was time-barred. The Court said the following:

> [A]fter the central criminal purposes of a conspiracy have been attained, a subsidiary conspiracy to conceal may not be implied from circumstantial evidence showing merely that the conspiracy was kept a secret and that the conspirators took care to cover up their crime in order to escape detection and punishment.

353 U.S. at 401-02, 77 S.Ct. at 972. The Court rejected the government's argument that the defendants' efforts to conceal their earlier wrongdoings should be viewed as part of the original conspiracy to obtain the no prosecution rulings. Defendants at bar *1197 argue that their alleged misstatements to agents of the IRS, which statements constitute three out of the four overt acts executed within the limitations period, [FN9] similarly constitute a second conspiracy to conceal the first.

> FN9. One of the three overt acts dealing with statements made to the IRS alleges Foont's refusal to answer questions of that agency. Indictment at P 5(i). As discussed at n. 5 supra, that allegation is improper absent some showing by the government to the contrary.
> The fourth overt act within the limitations period alleges that between March and April 1985, Feldman lied to one of the Cralin partnerships' outside accountants concerning the financing for the New York Hanseatic transactions.

This case is manifestly different from Grunewald. Here the conspiracy was entered into, in part, to accomplish the offenses of tax evasion charged in counts 2 through 6 of the indictment. [FN10] As discussed above, the misstatements to the IRS are an integral element of the substantive evasion charges underlying the conspiracy alleged in count 1. Grunewald itself suggests the importance of this distinction:

> FN10. The indictment also alleges that the defendants conspired to accomplish the acts of aiding and assisting in those false filings charged in counts 7 through 15.

> By no means does this mean that acts of concealment can never have significance in furthering a criminal conspiracy. But a vital distinction must be made between acts of concealment done in furtherance of the main criminal objectives of the conspiracy, and acts of concealment done after these central objectives have been attained, for the purpose only of covering up after the crime.

Id. at 405, 77 S.Ct. at 974 (emphasis in original). In this instance, the acts of concealment are central to the government's proof on the underlying evasion charges. In other words, they were in furtherance of one of the main criminal objectives of the conspiracy, tax evasion.

Defendants' motion to dismiss the conspiracy count as barred by the statute of limitations is denied.

II. Discovery

A. Initiation of the Criminal Investigation

[3] Defendants seek discovery of a limited nature in respect of the start and duration of the IRS's civil investigation as well as the start of the criminal investigation. Specifically, defendants seek to determine whether summonses served upon the defendants were improper and thus whether statements given by the defendants in response to those summonses are subject to suppression.

The relevant statutory provision is 26 U.S.C. s 7602, which grants the IRS authority to serve summonses for "the purpose of inquiring into any offense connected with the administration or enforcement of the internal revenue laws", so long as a Justice Department referral is not in effect. [FN11] If a Justice Department referral is in effect at the time summonses are issued, defendants have the basis for a motion to suppress the statements made in consequence of those summonses. See United States v. MacKenzie, 777 F.2d 811, 819 (2d Cir.1985); see also United States v. Piper, 681 F.Supp. 833, 839 (M.D.Ga.1988). [FN12] Defendants at bar are not in a position to know whether a Justice Department referral was in effect at the time the summonses were issued without limited discovery from the government on the point. It is that discovery they now seek.

> FN11. The statute defines a Justice Department referral as being in effect when either (i) the IRS has recommended to the Attorney General "a grand jury investigation of, or the criminal prosecution of, such person for any offense connected with the administration or enforcement of the internal revenue laws", 26 U.S.C. s 7602(c)(2)(A)(i), or when "any request is made [by the Justice Department of the IRS] under section 6103(h)(3)(B) for the disclosure of any return or return information (within the meaning of section 6103(b)) relating to such person", 26 U.S.C. s 7602(c)(2)(A)(ii).

FN12. I intimate no present view as to outcome of such a motion to suppress were it to be made.

The government argues that "the only showing that the Government need make, at most, is an affidavit from the case agent affirming that there was no Justice Department *1198 referral at the time the summonses were issued." Government's Memorandum at 18-19. The government cites cases to that effect. See Godwin v. United States, 564 F.Supp. 1209, 1211 (D.Del.1983) (amendment of 26 U.S.C. s 7602 "did not alter the showing required by the government to establish a prima facie case for the enforcement of the summons"); Drum v. United States, 570 F.Supp. 938, 941 (M.D.Pa.1983) ("[t]he requisite showing of good faith may be made by the affidavit of the Internal Revenue Service Agent who issued the challenged summons and who is seeking enforcement thereof"), aff'd without opinion, 735 F.2d 1348 (3d Cir.1984).

The government supplies the affidavit of Special Agent Laura Wolf, the IRS special agent currently assigned to the case. Wolf states that a Justice Department referral was not in effect until approximately April 1987, some two years after the last statements alleged in the indictment. Affidavit of Laura Wolf sworn to on January 5, 1990 at P 3. That affidavit is on information and belief. Wolf states that she "was initially assigned to the instant investigation in approximately March, 1987 [and] ... was the first IRS criminal investigator so assigned." Id. at P 2. Apart from this general statement as to Wolf's association with the investigation, the affidavit contains no statement as to the source of her beliefs in respect of the date on which the Justice Department referral was in effect. Having submitted that affidavit, the government declares the ball to be in defendants' court.

By letter dated January 18, 1990, counsel for defendant Foont brings to this Court's attention a grand jury subpoena dated March 19, 1985 which seemingly relates to the captioned action. Specifically, the subpoena is one directed to the "Custodian of Records" at Cralin & Co., Inc. The subpoena directs production as follows:

Arbitrage Trading Partners
Greystone Investment Group
Money Market Group
Securities Arbitrage
Cralin Securities Co.
Cralin Metals Co.
Multi Asset Group
Cralin Governments Group
Cralin & Co., Inc.
Cralin Group, Inc.
Cralin Capital Partners
Cralin Capital Investment Associates
Capital Futures Group
Capital Trading Group

1. From January 1, 1980 to the present for the above-named entities all documents and material, including but not limited to tape recordings, correspondence, memoranda, notes, wires, telexes, checks, comparisons, confirmations, workpapers, traders' tickets, spread sheets, contracts, blotters relating any financial business or proposed dealings with Arbitrage Management Company.

2. Employment/Personnel and Compensation file for Paul Foont.

NOTE: If any document is not produced under a claim of privilege, provide a list of the documents not produced, their author, date, parties distributed to and a brief description of the subject matter so that the claims may be litigated.

The subpoena states that the information was sought in connection with the investigation of an alleged violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371 (conspiracy to defraud the IRS); 18 U.S.C. s 1341 (mail fraud); and 26 U.S.C. s 7206(2) (aiding and assisting in the filing of false tax returns). On its face, the subpoena appears to be one issued in connection with the grand jury investigation of this case. If that is so, a Justice Department referral was in effect at least as early as March 19, 1985, the date of the subpoena's issuance, rather than the April 1987 date suggested by the affidavit supplied by the government. Defendants' having provided such information, the ball is now back in the government's court.

I therefore direct the government to supply an affidavit(s) on personal knowledge of an IRS agent(s) or other official of that agency, and/or representatives of the Justice Department specifying the exact date on which a Justice Department referral was made in this case. The affidavit(s) should specify whether the grand jury subpoena of March 19, 1985 was issued in *1199 connection with the investigation of this case. The government is to comply with this direction within ten (10) days of the date of this Opinion.

B. Notes of Defendants' Oral Statements

Defendants move for production of any notes memorializing defendants' statements to the IRS. The government represents that no such notes were taken, thereby rendering the request moot.

C. Witness List

[4] Defendants move for production of "a list of the witnesses the government intends to call during its case in chief." Defendants' Memorandum at 24. The government opposes that application.

The lead case in this circuit on the subject of witness list disclosure is United States v. Cannone, 528 F.2d 296 (2d Cir.1975). Both defendants and the government find comfort in Cannone. Defendants argue that certain language in Cannone supports the application for disclosure, while the government argues that the holding of the case clearly prohibits it. The court stated that it is "often desirable" to allow disclosure because without the benefit of such disclosure, the defense may be substantially hampered in its preparation for trial. At a minimum, pretrial ignorance of the identity of the prosecution's witnesses tends to detract from the effectiveness of the defense's objections and cross-examination.

528 F.2d at 301. However, the Second Circuit held that the district court had abused its discretion in providing the defendants with a witness list where "the defense made only an abstract, conclusory claim that such disclosure was necessary to its proper preparation for trial." Id. at 301-02.

Defendants next point to the factors enumerated in United States v.

Turkish, 458 F.Supp. 874, 881 (S.D.N.Y.1978) in support of their application. Those factors are as follows:

(1) Did the offense alleged in the indictment involve a crime of violence?

(2) Have the defendants been arrested or convicted for crimes involving violence?

(3) Will the evidence in the case largely consist of testimony relating to documents (which by their nature are not easily altered)?

(4) Is there a realistic possibility that supplying the witnesses' names prior to trial will increase the likelihood that the prosecution's witnesses will not appear at trial, or will be unwilling to testify at trial?

(5) Does the indictment allege offenses occurring over an extended period of time, making preparation of the defendants' defense complex and difficult?

(6) Do the defendants have limited funds with which to investigate and prepare their defense?

458 F.Supp. at 881.

While it is true that four out of the six Turkish factors support defendants' argument, [FN13] they have not come forth with "specific evidence of the need for disclosure", 528 F.2d at 302, as is required for the district court to properly direct disclosure. In essence, defendants argue that the government's investigation was a long one and the potential witness pool is a large one and a witness list would thus greatly facilitate defense preparation. That is not the specific showing contemplated by Cannone. Indeed, although the potential witness pool is large in an absolute sense, many of the witnesses are known to the defendants. Specifically, defendants are familiar with the former employees of the Cralin partnerships, the limited partners involved in the case and the outside accountants and lawyers with whom they dealt. Moreover, defendants have access to the record of and therefore knowledge of the witnesses called in United States v. Atkins, 87 Cr. 246 (MEL), a related trial arising out of the same transactions at issue here.

FN13. Specifically, the first two factors as well as factors four and five point in defendants' favor.

*1200 Defendants' motion for the production of a witness list is denied.

D. Bill of Particulars

Defendants outline eight basic areas as to which they seek a bill of particulars. Specifically, defendants seek immediate production of the following:

1. a list of those documents the government intends to introduce at trial;

2. the identities of those persons allegedly aided and abetted by the defendants in respect of the false income tax returns that form the basis for counts 7 through 15;

3. the substance of the alleged "secret oral agreements" entered into by the defendants;

4. identification of the alleged fraudulent sales literature distributed to potential investors in the Cralin partnerships;

5. the means by which the conspirators attempted to mislead the outside accountants of the Cralin partnerships;

6. the allegedly false information contained on the schedule K-1 forms sent by the Cralin partnerships to its partners;

7. whether the government intends to use similar act evidence at trial;
8. Brady impeachment material.

[5] The second of these requests, namely one for the production of the identities of those persons whom the defendants are alleged to have aided and abetted, is on par with the traditional request for an enumeration of one's alleged co-conspirators. The government recognizes its obligation to provide that latter information to the defendants and has presumably now made the requisite production. The government is similarly directed to make production forthwith of the names of those persons whom the defendants are alleged to have aided and abetted.

[6] As to a list of those documents which the government will seek to introduce at trial, I will not ask the government to finalize the minutiae of its case in this way some six weeks in advance of trial. However, in this case where all concede that a significant number of documents have been produced by the government and will presumably be used at trial, it is right to narrow the field before trial in order to allow more effective case preparation by the defense. I therefore direct that the government make available to the defendants a list of those exhibits it anticipates might be used at trial within fourteen (14) days of trial.

[7] The middle four requests are no more than a "demand for the government's evidence in advance of trial," United States v. Gottlieb, 493 F.2d 987, 994 (2d Cir.1974), and the "law does not impose an obligation [on the government] to preview its case or expose its legal theory." United States v. Leonelli, 428 F.Supp. 880, 882 (S.D.N.Y.1977). The requests are denied.

[8] The government declined to respond to defendants' request in respect of whether it intends to offer similar act evidence at trial, but states that "[a]s the trial date approaches, we will address this issue anew." Letter of AUSA Robert J. Cleary dated February 22, 1989 at P 13. The government is directed to make production in that regard within fourteen (14) days of trial.

[9] As to the Brady impeachment material which defendants seek, the government recognizes its well-established obligation to produce that material and states its intent to make such production along with the 3500 material for each government witness. That is sufficient. See, e.g., United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 701, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3104, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974) ("[g]enerally, the need for evidence to impeach witnesses is insufficient to require its production in advance of trial"); United States ex rel. Lucas v. Regan, 503 F.2d 1, 3 n. 1 (2d Cir.1974) ("[n]either Brady nor any other case we know of requires that disclosures under Brady be made before trial"), cert. denied, 420 U.S. 939, 95 S.Ct. 1149, 43 L.Ed.2d 415 (1975); United States v. Biaggi, 675 F.Supp. 790, 812 (S.D.N.Y.1987) (" '[i]nformation bearing on a witness' credibility, such as grants or promises of immunity, *1201 plea bargain arrangements, or other consideration promised by the Government in return for testimony must be turned over at the same time as other 18 U.S.C. s 3500 materials' ") (citations omitted); United States v. Abrams, 539 F.Supp. 378, 390 (S.D.N.Y.1982) ("Brady ... does not require the government to disclose information pertaining to the credibility of witnesses before that witness testifies") (citations omitted). Defendants' motion to compel immediate production of Brady impeachment material is denied.

III. Severance

[10] Defendant Foont moves for severance pursuant to the doctrine of United States v. Finkelstein, 526 F.2d 517 (2d Cir.1975), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 960, 96 S.Ct. 1742, 48 L.Ed.2d 205 (1976). The Finkelstein doctrine is one that governs motions for severance based on attempts by one defendant to obtain the exculpatory testimony of his co-defendant. Foont contends that were he to be tried separately from Feldman, Feldman would exculpate Foont at Foont's trial.

The Second Circuit has enumerated four factors to be considered in evaluating such a claim for severance.

> (1) the sufficiency of the showing that the co-defendant would testify at a severed trial and waive his Fifth Amendment privilege, ... (2) the degree to which the exculpatory testimony would be cumulative, ... (3) the counter arguments of judicial economy, ... and (4) the likelihood that the testimony would be subject to substantial, damaging impeachment....

526 F.2d at 523-24 (citations omitted). I address these factors in turn.

As to the first factor, the likelihood that Feldman would waive his Fifth Amendment privilege and testify at a separate trial of Foont, Foont offers the affidavit of his co-defendant in which Feldman states that he would testify at Foont's trial as follows:

> On several occasions, including at least one occasion in 1981, Paul J. Foont and I discussed the fact that Price Waterhouse, the Cralin entities' accountants, and Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton and Garrison, the Cralin entities' legal counsel, had stated, in substance, that the transactions entered into by the Cralin entities in 1981 were legal. During the time period covered by the transactions alleged in the indictment, Mr. Foont was an employee of the Cralin entities and reported to me and others who were in charge of and had ownership interests in the Cralin entities.

Affidavit of Jeffrey L. Feldman sworn to on December 19, 1989 at P 2. Feldman further states that he is "willing to testify at a separate trial of Mr. Foont, even if that trial came before [his] own, and [he is] prepared to waive [his] fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination at Mr. Foont's trial." Id. at P 3. While the Feldman affidavit is certainly a strong suggestion that he would indeed testify at Foont's trial, there is no indication that he would not also testify at a joint trial of both defendants. Moreover, Feldman's affidavit suggests that he may indeed be willing to so testify given his representation that he would waive his Fifth Amendment privilege and testify at a trial of Foont even if that trial were scheduled before his own.

The second factor is the degree to which the proffered exculpatory testimony would be cumulative. Foont states that his defense at trial "will be that he lacked the requisite intent for the crimes charged." Defendants' Memorandum of Law at 34. Foont argues that Feldman's testimony goes directly to the central issue of Foont's intent in respect of the transactions at issue. The government argues that the proffered testimony is cumulative insofar as the accountants and lawyers had been misled into believing that the transactions were legal and will so testify. In other words, the accountants and lawyers will themselves testify that they advised the defendants that the transactions were legal, but that such advise was given based on fraudulent information. Assuming that Feldman would testify that the conversations were innocent discussions concerning whether the Cralin partnerships should enter into the subject transactions and Feldman *1202 informed Foont that the outside accountants and lawyers found no legal impediments to so doing, then such testimony would be probative of Foont's state of mind.

Considerations of judicial economy clearly weigh against severance. This is a complex case that will take more than one month to try and the burdens on limited judicial resources in trying the case twice are obvious. Moreover, witnesses would be twice inconvenienced and our jury system doubly taxed.

As to possible impeachment of Feldman's testimony, it is true that if Feldman were tried first and convicted, his testimony at a later trial of Foont would be subject to damaging impeachment. Of course, that is a problem easily remedied by scheduling Feldman's trial after that of Foont. However, the information contained in the ex parte affidavit of AUSA Cleary suggests certain possible areas of impeachment.

On balance, Foont has not satisfied his burden under Finkelstein.

Conclusion

Defendants' motions are denied except as set forth in this Opinion.

The government is directed to proceed in conformity with this Opinion.

The foregoing is SO ORDERED.

UNITED STATES, Petitioner

James C. LANE and Dennis R. Lane, Petitioner
v.
UNITED STATES.
Nos. 84-744, 84-963.
Argued Oct. 9, 1985.
Decided Jan. 27, 1986.
Rehearing Denied March 31, 1986.
See 475 U.S. 1104, 106 S.Ct. 1507.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas on various charges arising from certain arson schemes, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, 735 F.2d 799, reversed and remanded. Rehearing was denied, 741 F.2d 1381. After granting certiorari, the Supreme Court, Chief Justice Burger, held that: (1) misjoinder under Criminal Procedure Rule pertaining to multiple defendants is subject to harmless-error analysis and is not reversible error per se; (2) misjoinder of one count of mail fraud involving one defendant with other counts of mail fraud involving both defendants was harmless error; and (3) evidence was sufficient to support convictions.

Reversed and remanded.

Justice Brennan filed opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part in which Justice Blackmun joined.

Justice Stevens filed opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part in which Justice Marshall joined.

726 438 Syllabus [FN]

FN* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

James Lane and his son Dennis, respondents in No. 84-744, were indicted on counts for, inter alia, mail fraud in connection with insurance claims that were made and that insurers paid for fire damage to a restaurant and duplex that James had hired a professional arsonist to burn. The restaurant was operated by James in partnership with others. Count 1 charged James with mail fraud with regard to that fire. The duplex was owned by a different partnership, of which Dennis was one of the partners. Counts 2 through 4 charged both respondents with mail fraud related to the duplex fire. Count 5 charged both respondents with conspiracy to commit mail fraud in connection with a third arson scheme, and Count 6 charged Dennis with perjury before the grand jury. The Federal District Court denied respondents' pretrial motions for severance on the alleged ground that the charged offenses were misjoined in violation of Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 8(b), which provides that two or more defendants may be charged in the same indictment if they are alleged to have participated "in the same act or transaction or in the same series of acts or transactions constituting an offense or offenses." The trial then proceeded jointly before a jury. When evidence relating to the restaurant fire was admitted, the court instructed the jury not to consider that evidence against Dennis, and repeated this instruction in the final charge and admonished the jury to consider each count and defendant separately. The jury returned convictions on all counts. The Court of Appeals reversed and remanded for new trials, holding that the joinder of Count 1 with the other five counts violated Rule 8(b) and that such misjoinder was prejudicial per se. The court, however, rejected respondents' contention that there was insufficient evidence to support convictions under Counts 2 through 4 because each charged mailing occurred after each related insurance payment had been received and thus after each scheme to defraud had reached fruition.

Held:

1. Misjoinder under Rule 8(b) is subject to harmless-error analysis and is not reversible error per se. An error involving misjoinder "affects *439 substantial rights" and requires retrial only if the misjoinder results in actual prejudice because it "had substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict." Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 776, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 1253, 90 L.Ed. 1557 (1946). It is only by such a holding that Rule 8(b) and Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 52(a)--which provides that any error "which does not affect substantial rights shall be disregarded"--can be brought into substantial harmony. Here, in the face of overwhelming evidence of guilt, the claimed error was harmless. The District Court provided proper limiting jury instructions, and, moreover, the same evidence on Count 1 would likely have been admissible on joint retrial of the other counts to show James' intent under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b). Any error therefore failed to have any "substantial influence" on the verdict. Pp. 729-733.

2. There was sufficient evidence to support the convictions on Counts 2 through 4. On the evidence and under proper instructions, the jury could properly find that the mailings charged in Counts 2 and 3 took place while the overall scheme charged in the indictment was still continuing and that the scheme was not completed until after the mailing charged in Count 4, because that mailing, as were the others, was intended to "lull" the insurer into a false sense of security. Pp. 733-734.

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

We granted certiorari to resolve a conflict among the Circuits as to whether a misjoinder under Rule 8 of the Federal *440 Rules of Criminal Procedure is subject to the harmless-error rule, [FN1] and to determine whether there is sufficient evidence in this case to support convictions for mail fraud under 18 U.S.C. s 1341.

FN1. Six Circuits have adopted a per se approach holding that misjoinder is always reversible error. See United States v. Turkette, 632 F.2d 896, 906, and n. 35 (CA1 1980), rev'd on other grounds, 452 U.S. 576, 101 S.Ct. 2524, 69 L.Ed.2d 246 (1981); United States v. Graci, 504 F.2d 411, 414 (CA3 1974); United States v. James Lane and three partners opened the El Toro Restaurant in Amarillo, Texas, in the summer of 1978. The business never operated at a profit, however, and sales began to decline that fall. In November, Lane purchased fire insurance covering the building's contents and improvements and any related business losses. Simultaneously, he hired Sidney Heard, a professional arsonist, to burn the building in order to escape the lease and partnership. On February 27, 1979, Heard set a fire that caused smoke damage to the building's contents. Lane first settled with the insurer on the contents and improvements. He then submitted an income statement that falsely indicated the restaurant had operated at a profit. After the insurance adjuster mailed the statement to the insurer's headquarters, Lane settled his business interruption claim.

*441 In early 1980, Lane again hired Heard to set fire to a duplex that Lane was moving to a vacant lot in Amarillo. Lane obtained a fire insurance policy on the building, listing the owner as L & L Properties, a partnership between his son Dennis Lane and Andrew Lawson. An accomplice of Heard's burned the duplex on May 1, 1980.

Thereafter, on three occasions Dennis Lane signed proof-of-loss claims for repairs and submitted them to an insurance adjuster, who issued drafts in return totaling $12,000. [FN2] Each time, the adjuster later 728 mailed the proof-of-loss to the insurer's headquarters. The adjuster issued a final settlement draft for $12,250 on September 16, 1980. Two days later, he mailed a memorandum to headquarters explaining why repairs had exceeded previous estimates by some $10,000. He enclosed invoices supplied by Dennis Lane listing various materials and furniture purportedly purchased to repair and refurbish the duplex. In fact, these invoices had been fabricated by James Lane, Heard, and Heard's secretary.

FN2. Each proof-of-loss form stated that the "loss did not originate by any act, design or procurement on the part of your insured or this affiant" and that "no attempt to deceive [the] company as to the extent of the loss has been made."

The Lanes and Lawson met with Heard several weeks after the duplex fire to discuss a proposal to establish and burn a flower shop in Lubbock, Texas. Heard and Dennis Lane picked out a suitable building in July 1980, and an accomplice of Heard's, William Lankford, prepared fictitious invoices for merchandise and delivered some artificial flowers to the building later in August. In November, James Lane insured the contents for $50,000. Heard, however, was later arrested for an unrelated crime, and the planned arson never took place.

In March 1981, an Amarillo newspaper article connected Dennis Lane with a scheme to burn the flower shop with Heard; that same day, James Lane canceled the insurance policy. On May 12, 1981, Dennis Lane appeared before a *442 federal grand jury investigating Heard. He testified that Heard had nothing to do with the flower shop or with his own dealings with Lankford.

B

James Lane and Dennis Lane were indicted in multiple counts for mail fraud in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1341, conspiracy in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371, and perjury in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1623. Count 1 charged James Lane with mail fraud with regard to the El Toro Restaurant fire. Counts 2 through 4 charged both Lanes with mail fraud related to the duplex fire, and Count 5 charged them with conspiracy to commit mail fraud in connection with the flower shop arson plan. In Count 6, Dennis Lane was charged with perjury before the grand jury.

Prior to trial in the District Court for the Northern District of Texas, the Lanes filed motions for severance contending that the charged offenses were misjoined in violation of Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 8(b), but the motions were denied and the trial proceeded jointly before a jury. When evidence relating to the El Toro Restaurant fire was admitted, the trial court instructed the jury not to consider that evidence against Dennis Lane. App. 21. The trial judge repeated this instruction in the final charge, together with an instruction regarding the separate consideration to be given each defendant and each count. Ibid. The Lanes renewed their severance motions at the end of the Government's evidence and at the close of all evidence, but the motions were again denied. The jury returned convictions on all counts.

On appeal, the Lanes argued that misjoinder under Rule 8(b) had occurred. [FN3] The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit *443 concluded that Counts 2 through 6 were properly joined, but agreed "that Count 1 should not have been joined with the others because it was not part of the same series of acts or transactions as Counts 2 through 6." 735 F.2d 799, 803-804 (1984). The court refused to consider the Government's argument that the error, if any, was harmless, stating only that "Rule 8(b) misjoinder is prejudicial per se in this circuit." Id., at 806 (citing United States v. Levine, 546 F.2d 658 (CA5 1977)). The court reversed 729 the Lanes' convictions and remanded for new trials.

FN3. Rule 8(b) provides:
"(b) Joinder of Defendants. Two or more defendants may be charged in the same indictment or information if they are alleged to have participated in the same act or transaction or in the same series of acts or transactions constituting an offense or offenses. Such defendants may be charged in one or more counts together or separately and all of the defendants need not be charged in each count."

At the same time, the Court of Appeals rejected the Lanes' contention that there was insufficient evidence to support convictions for mail fraud under Counts 2 through 4 because each charged mailing occurred after each related payment had been received, and thus after each scheme had reached fruition. [FN4] The Court of Appeals distinguished our holding in United States v. Maze, 414 U.S. 395, 94 S.Ct. 645, 38 L.Ed.2d 603 (1974), and instead relied on United States v. Sampson, 371 U.S. 75, 83 S.Ct. 173, 9 L.Ed.2d 136 (1962), to hold that mailings occurring after receipt of an insurance payment may nevertheless be "in execution of fraud" as required by 18 U.S.C. s 1341 where they are "designed to lull the victims into a false sense of security and postpone investigation." 735 F.2d, at 807-808.

FN4. The Court of Appeals also rejected James Lane's challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence with regard to Count 1. That holding was not challenged in the Lanes' cross-petition.

The court found sufficient evidence for the properly instructed jury to "infer that the mailings were intended to and did have a lulling effect" because they helped persuade the insurer that "the claims were legitimate." Id., at 808. It emphasized that had the proof-of-loss forms not been mailed shortly after issuance of the insurance drafts, the insurer might have been alerted to the possibility of a fraud. Ibid. *444 Similarly, the false invoices submitted by Dennis Lane "gave the impression of a perfectly innocent claim." Ibid.

The Government's petition for rehearing was denied. 741 F.2d 1381 (1984). We granted certiorari, 469 U.S. 1206, 105 S.Ct. 1167, 84 L.Ed.2d 318 (1985). We reverse in part and affirm in part.

II

The Court of Appeals held that misjoinder "is inherently prejudicial." [FN5] 735 F.2d, at 804. The Circuits are divided on the question whether misjoinder requires automatic reversal, or whether the harmless-error rule governs. [FN6] Most Circuits that have adopted the per se approach have relied on McElroy v. United States, 164 U.S. 76, 17 S.Ct. 31, 41 L.Ed. 355 (1896), where this Court applied the joinder statute then in force and reversed convictions of jointly tried defendants after rejecting the Government's argument that there was no showing of prejudice. Id., at 81, 17 S.Ct., at 33.

FN5. Although the Government continues to believe that Count 1 was properly joined with Counts 2 through 6, it does not challenge that holding here.

FN6. See n. 1, supra.

McElroy, however, was decided long before the adoption of Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure 8 and 52, and prior to the enactment of the harmless-error statute, 28 U.S.C. s 2111, which provides that on appeal we are to ignore "errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." Under Rule 52(a), we are similarly instructed that any error "which does not affect substantial rights shall be disregarded." [FN7]

FN7. Justice STEVENS' partial dissent argues that McElroy conclusively determined misjoinder is prejudicial per se, and that Rule 8 was intended to represent a restatement of existing law, including the "rule of the McElroy case." Post, at 735. Rule 8, however, is simply a procedural rule with certain technical requirements, and Justice STEVENS' opinion refers to the Advisory Committee on Rules' citation of McElroy, see post, at 738, n. 3, making clear they were referring only to those technical requirements of prior law. Nowhere is there any indication Rule 8 was intended to enshrine any substantive "principle" of McElroy that misjoinder requires reversal, nor is there any citation of McElroy 's specific holding.

*445 The Court's holding in Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 87 S.Ct. 824, 17 L.Ed.2d 705 (1967), made a significant change in the law of harmless error. There, Justice Black, speaking for the Court, emphasized that even "some constitutional errors [may] be deemed harmless, not requiring the automatic reversal of the 730 conviction." Id., at 22, 87 S.Ct., at 827. In rejecting the automatic reversal rule, the Court stated:

"We are urged by petitioners to hold that all federal constitutional errors, regardless of the facts and circumstances, must always be deemed harmful.... We decline to adopt any such rule." Id., at 21-22, 87 S.Ct., at 826-827 (emphasis added).

Justice Black went on to note that all 50 States follow the harmless-error approach, and "the United States long ago through its Congress established ... the rule that judgments shall not be reversed for 'errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties.' 28 U.S.C. s 2111. None of these rules on its face distinguishes between federal constitutional errors and errors of state law or federal statutes and rules." Id., at 22, 87 S.Ct., at 827 (footnote omitted).

Since Chapman, we have "consistently made clear that it is the duty of a reviewing court to consider the trial record as a whole and to ignore errors that are harmless, including most constitutional violations." United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S. 499, 509, 103 S.Ct. 1974, 1980, 76 L.Ed.2d 96 (1983). In Hasting, we again emphasized that "given the myriad safeguards provided to assure a fair trial, and taking into account the reality of the human fallibility of the participants, there can be no such thing as an error-free, perfect trial, and ... the Constitution does not guarantee such a trial." Id., at 508-509, 103 S.Ct., at 1980.

[1] *446 In this case, the argument for applying harmless-error analysis is even stronger because the specific joinder standards of Rule 8 are not themselves of constitutional magnitude. [FN8] Clearly, Chapman and Hasting dictate that the harmless-error rule governs here. [FN9]

FN8. Improper joinder does not, in itself, violate the Constitution. Rather, misjoinder would rise to the level of a constitutional violation only if it results in prejudice so great as to deny a defendant his Fifth Amendment right to a fair trial.

FN9. Justice STEVENS' partial dissent suggests Chapman is irrelevant to our analysis because that case involved a constitutional violation, whereas the error here is of a nonconstitutional nature. Post, at 738. It is difficult to see any logic in the argument that although the harmless-error rule may be applicable to constitutional violations, it should not be applied to violations of mere procedural rules. Justice STEVENS recognizes that the standard for harmless-error analysis adopted in Chapman concerning constitutional errors is considerably more onerous than the standard for nonconstitutional errors adopted in Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 90 L.Ed. 1557 (1946). See post, at 731, n. 11. The heightened regard we have for constitutional protections surely warrants a conclusion that nonconstitutional provisions must be treated at least comparably, and in Hasting we emphasized even "most constitutional violations" must be ignored if they are harmless. 461 U.S., at 509, 103 S.Ct., at 1980.

The applicability of harmless error to misjoinder also follows from Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 90 L.Ed. 1557 (1946), a case similar to the one at hand. There, some 32 defendants were charged with one conspiracy, when in fact there had been at least eight separate conspiracies. Nineteen defendants were jointly tried, and seven were convicted. The Court applied the harmless-error statute to an error resulting from a variance from the indictment, and held the error was not harmless in that case. Emphasizing the numerous conspiracies involving unrelated defendants, as well as seriously flawed jury instructions, the Kotteakos Court reversed the convictions in light of each of the 32 defendants' "right not to be tried en masse for the conglomeration of distinct and separate offenses" involved. Id., at 775, 66 S.Ct., at 1252.
*447 Although the Court's review in that case was from the perspective of a variance from the indictment, rather than misjoinder, the Court recognized that misjoinder was implicated, and suggested that the harmless-error rule could similarly apply in 731 that context. [FN10] Id., at 774-775, 66 S.Ct., at 1252.

FN10. The Court pointed out that "the problem is not merely one of variance ... but is also essentially one of proper joinder." 328 U.S., at 774, 66 S.Ct., at 1252. Even so, the Court indicated the harmless-error rule must apply, although perhaps with "restraint." Id., at 775, 66 S.Ct., at 1252.

A holding directly involving misjoinder again indicated the harmless-error rule should apply. In Schaffer v. United States, 362 U.S. 511, 80 S.Ct. 945, 4 L.Ed.2d 921 (1960), three different groups of defendants were charged with participating in separate criminal acts with one other group of three defendants. The indictment also charged all the defendants with one overall count of conspiracy, making joinder under Rule 8 proper. At the close of the Government's case, however, the District Court concluded there was insufficient evidence of conspiracy and dismissed that count. The court then denied a motion for severance after concluding that defendants failed to show prejudice from the joint trial; the Court of Appeals affirmed. This Court recognized that "the charge which originally justified joinder turn[ed] out to lack the support of sufficient evidence." Id., at 516, 80 S.Ct., at 948.

Essentially, at that point in the trial, there was a clear error of misjoinder under Rule 8 standards. Nevertheless, the Schaffer Court held that once the Rule 8 requirements were met by the allegations in the indictment, severance thereafter is controlled entirely by Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 14, which requires a showing of prejudice. Id., at 515-516, 80 S.Ct., at 947-948. The Court then affirmed the finding of no prejudice. Although the Court did not reach the harmless-error rule because Rule 8(b) had initially been satisfied, the Court's language surely assumed the rule was applicable.

A plain reading of these cases shows they dictate our holding. Applying the 1919 statute treated in Kotteakos, which *448 governed only "technical errors," 28 U.S.C. s 391 (1946 ed.), the Court emphasized the clear intent of Congress "was simple: To substitute judgment for automatic application of rules." 328 U.S., at 759-760, 66 S.Ct., at 1245. "In the final analysis judgment in each case must be influenced by conviction resulting from examination of the proceedings in their entirety, tempered but not governed in any rigid sense of stare decisis by what has been done in similar situations." Id., at 762, 66 S.Ct., at 1246. The Court flatly rejected per se rules regarding particular errors because "any attempt to create a generalized presumption to apply in all cases would be contrary not only to the spirit of [the statute] but also to the expressed intent of its legislative sponsors." Id., at 765, 66 S.Ct., at 1248.

Schaffer discussed the current harmless-error statute, which was enacted in 1949 after Kotteakos and deleted the qualifying word "technical" regarding errors governed by the rule. See 28 U.S.C. s 2111. The Court again rejected any per se rule for joinder errors requiring reversal, refusing to "fashion a hard-and-fast formula that ... [the] joinder [wa]s error as a matter of law." 362 U.S., at 516, 80 S.Ct., at 948. Citing Kotteakos, the Court pointed out that there "[t]he dissent agreed that the test of injury resulting from joinder 'depends on the special circumstances of each case.' " 362 U.S., at 517, 80 S.Ct., at 948 (quoting 328 U.S., at 777, 66 S.Ct., at 1254 (Douglas, J., dissenting)). [FN11]

FN11. Contrary to these clear holdings, Justice STEVENS' partial dissent advocates a rule-by-rule review establishing bright-line per se rules whether to conduct harmless-error analysis. Post, at 733-739. But on its face, Rule 52(a) admits of no broad exceptions to its applicability. Any assumption that once a "substantial right" is implicated it is inherently "affected" by any error begs the question raised by Rule 52(a). Assuming there is a "substantial right," the inquiry remains whether the error "affects substantial rights" requiring reversal of a conviction. That kind of inquiry requires a review of the entire record. See United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S., at 509, 103 S.Ct., at 1980. It is simply too late in the day to argue that Congress intended to incorporate any per se rule of McElroy for misjoinder following Kotteakos, the subsequent enactment of an arguably broader statute, and this Court's prejudice inquiry in Schaffer.

*449 732 In common with other courts, the Court has long recognized that joint trials "conserve state funds, diminish inconvenience to witnesses and public authorities, and avoid delays in bringing those accused of crime to trial." Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123, 134, 88 S.Ct. 1620, 1627, 20 L.Ed.2d 476 (1968). Rule 8 accommodates these interests while protecting against prejudicial joinder. But we do not read Rule 8 to mean that prejudice results whenever its requirements have not been satisfied.

Under Rule 52(a), the harmless-error rule focuses on whether the error "affect [ed] substantial rights." In Kotteakos the Court construed a harmless-error statute with similar language, and observed:

"The inquiry cannot be merely whether there was enough to support the result, apart from the phase affected by the error. It is rather, even so, whether the error itself had substantial influence. If so, or if one is left in grave doubt, the conviction cannot stand." 328 U.S., at 765, 66 S.Ct., at 1248.

[2] Invoking the Kotteakos test, we hold that an error involving misjoinder "affects substantial rights" and requires reversal only if the misjoinder results in actual prejudice because it "had substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict." Id., at 776, 66 S.Ct., at 1253. Only by so holding can we bring Rules 8 and 52(a) "into substantial harmony, not into square conflict." [FN12] Id., at 775, 66 S.Ct., at 1253.

FN12. Respondents argue that application of the harmless-error rule to Rule 8(b) misjoinder will eviscerate Rule 14, which provides the trial court with discretion to grant a severance even if the joinder is proper under Rule 8 when it believes the defendants or the Government may be prejudiced by a joinder. We see no conflict with our holding and the applicability of Rule 14. Rule 14's concern is to provide the trial court with some flexibility when a joint trial may appear to risk prejudice to a party; review of that decision is for an abuse of discretion. Rule 8(b), however, requires the granting of a motion for severance unless its standards are met, even in the absence of prejudice; review on appeal is for an error of law. Applying the harmless-error rule to Rule 8(b) misjoinder simply goes to the additional question whether the error requires setting aside the convictions. We need not decide whether the degree of prejudice necessary to support a Rule 14 motion for severance is identical to that necessary to require reversal for a Rule 8(b) error. Justice STEVENS' partial dissent fails to recognize that the Rule 14 prejudice component involves a different inquiry from the Rule 8 technical requirements. Indeed, the express language of Rule 14, as well as the Advisory Committee Note, shows that Congress tolerates some Rule 8 joinders even when there is prejudice. The first hurdle in obtaining a severance under Rule 14 is a showing of prejudice, and if shown, it remains in the district court's discretion whether to grant the motion.

*450 Of course, "we are not required to review records to evaluate a harmless-error claim, and do so sparingly, [but] we plainly have the authority to do so." United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S., at 510, 103 S.Ct., at 1981 (footnote omitted).

[3] In the face of overwhelming evidence of guilt shown here, we are satisfied that the claimed error was harmless. When evidence on misjoined Count 1 was introduced, the District Court provided a proper limiting instruction, and in the final charge repeated that instruction and admonished the jury to consider each count and defendant separately. Moreover, the same evidence on Count 1 would likely have been admissible on joint retrial of Counts 2 through 6 to show James Lane's intent under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b). Any error therefore failed to have any "substantial influence" on the verdict. Kotteakos, supra, 328 U.S., at 765, 66 S.Ct., at 1248. [FN13]

FN13. We can agree with Justice STEVENS' partial dissent "that the harmless-error inquiry is entirely distinct from a sufficiency-of-the-evidence inquiry." Post, at 740; our reliance on the Kotteakos test makes that clear. See supra, at 731. But that does not in any sense mean that overwhelming evidence of guilt is irrelevant; the threshold of overwhelming evidence is far higher than mere sufficiency to uphold conviction.
Nor may proper limiting instructions or jury charges never be "an adequate response" to a prejudice inquiry. Post, at 747. Contrary to the suggestion of the dissent, Blumenthal v. United States, 332 U.S. 539, 68 S.Ct. 248, 92 L.Ed. 154 (1947), provides direct support for the Court's approach in this case. There the Court recognized that, in the context of mass trials (as in Kotteakos), limiting instructions on evidence admissible only as to one defendant might in some circumstances be inadequate to prevent prejudice. 332 U.S., at 559-560, 68 S.Ct., at 257-258. But here, as in Blumenthal, we are not faced with any trial en masse of numerous defendants and unrelated crimes.
When there are few defendants and the trial court is aware of the potential for prejudice, "the risk of transference of guilt over the border of admissibility [may be] reduced to the minimum" by carefully crafted limiting instructions with a strict charge to consider the guilt or innocence of each defendant independently. Id., at 560, 68 S.Ct., at 257. We cannot necessarily "assume that the jury misunderstood or disobeyed" such instructions. Id., at 553, 68 S.Ct., at 254. Indeed, this Court's conclusion in Schaffer that defendants failed to show prejudice was based directly on the fact that "the judge was acutely aware of the possibility of prejudice and was strict in his charge--not only as to the testimony the jury was not to consider, but also as to that evidence which was available in the consideration of the guilt of each [defendant] separately under the respective substantive counts." 362 U.S., at 516, 80 S.Ct., at 948.
The same caution was exercised by the trial judge here, and no different result should be required. The Government initially observes that because of the similarity of each arson scheme, "only the court of appeals' narrow reading of Rule 8" led to its finding of misjoinder. At trial, Heard and Lankford--two principal actors--testified against both Lanes, who relied essentially on denials or character defenses. Moreover, the evidence as to Count 1 was distinct and easily segregated from evidence relating to Counts 2 through 6. The misjoinder error, if any, in these circumstances was harmless.

[4] Respondents challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain their convictions. To find a violation of the mail fraud statute, 18 U.S.C. s 1341, [FN14] the charged "mailings" must be "for the purpose of executing the scheme." Kann v. United States, 323 U.S. 88, 94, 65 S.Ct. 148, 151, 89 L.Ed. 88 (1944). Mailings occurring after receipt of the goods obtained by fraud are within the statute if they "were designed to lull the victims into a false sense of security, postpone their ultimate complaint to the *452 authorities, and therefore make the apprehension of the defendants less likely than if no mailings had taken place." United States v. Maze, 414 U.S., at 403, 94 S.Ct., at 650. See United States v. Sampson, 371 U.S. 75, 83 S.Ct. 173, 9 L.Ed.2d 136 (1962).

FN14. The statute provides in relevant part:
"Whoever, having devised or intending to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud, ... for the purpose of executing such scheme or artifice ..., places in any post office or authorized depository for mail matter, any matter or thing whatever to be sent or delivered by the Postal Service, ... or knowingly causes to be delivered by mail ... any such matter or thing, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

[5] Only Counts 2 through 4, involving the duplex fire, are at issue. The Lanes argue that each mailing occurred after irrevocable receipt of the related payment, and thus after each scheme to defraud came to fruition. [FN15] This argument misconstrues the nature of the indictment, which charged an overall scheme to defraud based on the events surrounding the duplex fire. Counts 2 through 4 merely relate to separate mailings concerning partial payments that were a part of the whole scheme. The jury could properly find the scheme, at the earliest, was not completed until receipt of the last payment on September 16, 1980, which finally settled their claim. Hence, the mailings charged in Counts 2 and 3 clearly took place while the scheme was still continuing.

FN15. The Government contends that undisputed testimony shows the insurance drafts issued to the Lanes, unlike normal business checks, were not payable on demand but only upon authorization from the insurer's home office when they arrived at the insurer's bank for collection. If the drafts deposited by the Lanes had been dishonored by the insurer's banks, the amounts would have been charged against their account. The Lanes, therefore, may not have irrevocably received the proceeds of the fraud prior to the final mailing. See Brief for United States 30-31. The Court of Appeals, however, did not rely on this argument, and we decline to resolve this factual issue here.

Moreover, the jury could reasonably have found that the scheme was not completed 734 until the final mailing on September 18, 1980, charged in Count 4, because that mailing was intended (as were the two earlier ones) to "lull" the insurer into a false sense of security. [FN16] The jury was properly instructed *453 that each charged mailing must have been made both "for the purpose of executing the scheme to defraud," App. 22, and prior to the scheme's completion, id., at 23, and further that mailings "which facilitate concealment of the scheme" are covered by the statute. [FN17] Id., at 24.

FN16. Our conclusion that the delayed mailings at issue in this action were part of an ongoing scheme to defraud is in accord with our holding in United States v. Sampson, 371 U.S. 75, 83 S.Ct. 173, 9 L.Ed.2d 136 (1962). In that case, defendants purported to help businessmen obtain loans or sell their businesses in exchange for an "advance fee." Id., at 77, 83 S.Ct., at 174. Following the deposit of checks for these fees, the defendants' plan called for the mailing of a form letter assuring the victims of the fraud that they were receiving the services they paid for. Id., at 78, 83 S.Ct., at 174. The Court upheld defendants' convictions for mail fraud because of the "lulling effect" of the delayed mailings.
We see no conflict with our holding in United States v. Maze, 414 U.S. 395, 94 S.Ct. 645, 38 L.Ed.2d 603 (1974). There, use of a stolen credit card led to the mailing of charge statements to a bank. We held that the fraud was completed upon the defrauder's receipt of the goods, distinguishing Sampson because the mailing of the charge slips, rather than acting to "lull" the bank into acquiescence, instead "increased the probability that [the defrauder] would be detected and apprehended." 414 U.S., at 403, 94 S.Ct., at 650. Had the Lanes failed to submit timely proof-of-loss forms here, the insurer might very well have discovered the fraud.
The Lanes contend that the Fifth Circuit's decision in this case also conflicts with United States v. Ledesma, 632 F.2d 670 (CA7), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 998, 101 S.Ct. 539, 66 L.Ed.2d 296 (1980), which reversed a conviction involving the mailing of a fraudulent proof-of-loss form after receipt of insurance proceeds. In that case, however, the Seventh Circuit never discussed Sampson or the possibility that the delayed mailing had any "lulling" effect.

FN17. The Lanes argue that the Government must show that the charged mailings were specifically intended to lull, rather than showing simply a general intention on their part to defraud, in order to come within Sampson 's holding. We need not determine whether any such specific intent must be shown, as we agree with the Court of Appeals that there was sufficient evidence for the jury to infer specific intent to lull here under these instructions, which the Lanes did not challenge on appeal or in their cross-petition.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals, ordering a new trial based on misjoinder of Count 1 with Counts 2 through 6, is reversed in part and affirmed in part, and the action is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.
It is so ordered.

Justice BRENNAN, joined by Justice BLACKMUN, concurring in part and dissenting in part.
I agree that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the mail fraud convictions and therefore join Part III of the Court's *454 opinion. I also agree that the Court of Appeals erred in holding that misjoinder under Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure is prejudicial per se. I write separately, however, because my reasons for reaching this conclusion differ from the Court's, and because I agree with Justice STEVENS that the harmless-error inquiry should be made in the first instance by the Court of Appeals.

I

The Act of February 26, 1919 (1919 Act), 40 Stat. 1181, amended s 269 of the Judicial Code. It provided in part:

"On the hearing of any appeal, certiorari, writ of error, or motion for a new trial, in any case, civil or criminal, the court shall give judgment after an examination of the entire record before the court, without regard to technical errors, defects, or exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." 28 U.S.C. s 391 (1925-1926 ed.).

In 1949, this provision was reenacted in its current form as 28 U.S.C. s 2111, and now instructs appellate courts to "give judgment after an examination of the record without regard to errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." The 1919 Act was also incorporated 735 in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and Rule 52(a) provides that "[a]ny error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial rights shall be disregarded." See also, Fed.Rule Civ.Proc. 61 ("The court at every stage of the proceeding must disregard any error or defect in the proceeding which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties"). Although s 2111 and Rule 52(a) refer to "errors or defects" without the qualifying word "technical," this change did not alter the substantive legal test. See H.R.Rep. No. 352, 81st Cong., 1st Sess., 18 (1949), U.S.Code Cong.Serv. 1949, 1248 (s 2111 "[i]ncorporates" former harmless-error statute); Advisory Committee's *455 Notes on Fed.Rule Crim.Proc. 52(a), 18 U.S.C.App., p. 657 (Rule is a "restatement of existing law").

The 1919 Act, s 2111, and Rule 52(a) all provide that an error is to be disregarded unless it "affects the substantial rights of the parties." This litigation thus presents a straightforward question of statutory construction: what does the phrase "affects the substantial rights of the parties" mean? Respondents in No. 84-744 contend that the term "substantial rights" refers to a particular class of rights which are essential to a fair trial and argue that errors which "affect" these rights cannot be disregarded on appeal. According to respondents, the 1919 Act, as reenacted in s 2111 and Rule 52(a), incorporated our holding in McElroy v. United States, 164 U.S. 76, 17 S.Ct. 31, 41 L.Ed. 355 (1896), that joinder is one of these "substantial rights," so that misjoinder is per se reversible.

For the reasons which follow, I conclude that the question whether a particular error "affects the substantial rights of the parties" does not entail a process of classification, whereby some rights are deemed "substantial" and errors affecting these rights are automatically reversible. Rather, an error "affects substantial rights" only if it casts doubt on the outcome of the proceeding. In other words, subject to the exceptions discussed in Part II (most importantly the exception for constitutional errors), I read s 2111 and Rule 52(a) to require harmless-error inquiry for all procedural errors. As none of these exceptions is applicable to misjoinder in violation of Rule 8, I concur in the Court's result on this issue.

Reference to whether error "affected the substantial rights of the parties" was not invented by Congress in 1919. The phrase was commonly used by courts throughout the 19th century to express the conclusion that particular claims of error did or did not warrant reversal. However, as used by these courts, error which "affected the substantial rights of the parties" was generally understood to refer, not to errors respecting a particular class of rights, but rather to any error which affected the fairness of the trial as a whole by calling *456 into question the reliability of the result. See, e.g., Connors v. United States, 158 U.S. 408, 411, 414, 15 S.Ct. 951, 952, 953, 39 L.Ed. 1033 (1895); Maish v. Arizona, 164 U.S. 599, 602, 17 S.Ct. 193, 195, 41 L.Ed. 567 (1896); Williams v. United States, 168 U.S. 382, 390-398, 18 S.Ct. 92, 95-98, 42 L.Ed. 509 (1897); American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U.S. 133, 159, 18 S.Ct. 552, 562, 42 L.Ed. 977 (1898); McCabe & Steen Constr. Co. v. Wilson, 209 U.S. 275, 279, 28 S.Ct. 558, 560, 52 L.Ed. 788 (1908); Holmgren v. United States, 217 U.S. 509, 523-524, 30 S.Ct. 588, 591-592, 54 L.Ed. 861 (1910). In other words, the statement that an error did not "affect the substantial rights of the parties" was a way of stating the conclusion that the error was not prejudicial.

A careful reading of McElroy demonstrates that it is consistent with this understanding of the phrase "affects the substantial rights of the parties." In McElroy, five defendants were charged in two indictments with separate assaults and in a third indictment with arson. Three of the defendants were also charged in yet a fourth indictment with another assault. After explaining these charges, the Court noted that "it is the settled rule ... to confine the indictment to one distinct offence 736 or restrict the evidence to one transaction" because "[i]n cases of felony, the multiplication of distinct charges has been considered so objectionable as tending to confound the accused in his defence, or to prejudice him as to his challenges...." 164 U.S., at 80, 17 S.Ct., at 32. The Court then stated: "Necessarily where the accused is deprived of a substantial right by the action of the trial court, such action, having been properly objected to, is revisable on error." Ibid. In context, this merely restates the common-law understanding that an error is reversible if it prejudices the defendant. The Court did not state that joinder is a "substantial right" and, for this reason, any error respecting joinder is reversible. Rather, the Court held that "[i]t cannot be said in [a case of improper joinder] that all the defendants may not have been embarrassed and prejudiced in their defence, or that the attention of the jury may not have been distracted to their injury in passing upon distinct and independent transactions." Id., at 81, 17 S.Ct., at 33. In other words, the *457 Court concluded that misjoinder is the kind of error which must be presumed to have prejudiced the accused and, for that reason, misjoinder affects his "substantial rights." As discussed in Part II, the irrebuttable presumption that misjoinder is prejudicial is inconsistent with the Court's subsequent harmless-error jurisprudence and can be overruled. For the moment, however, it is important only to note that nothing in McElroy suggests that the requirement that error have "affect[ed] the substantial rights of the parties" refers to anything other than that the error have been prejudicial.

Absent some contrary indication, then, it would seem logical to conclude that when Congress used the phrase "affect[s] the substantial rights of the parties" in the 1919 Act, Congress meant to require an inquiry into whether an error cast doubt on the verdict, not to create a class of rights as to which error was per se reversible. The legislative history of the 1919 Act confirms that this was in fact what Congress intended.

The primary impetus for the enactment of the 1919 Act was the practice in some jurisdictions of reversing convictions on appeal for any procedural error at trial, without regard to whether the error was prejudicial. See Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 758-759, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 1244-1245, 90 L.Ed. 1557 (1946). There was also concern over the inconsistent application of harmless-error analysis by other courts, this Court in particular. See H.R.Rep. No. 913, 65th Cong., 3d Sess., 2 (1919) (quoting H.R.Rep. No. 611, 62d Cong., 2d Sess., 2 (1912)). The large number of reversals which resulted from failure to scrutinize errors for their prejudicial effect was criticized by leaders of the legal profession, including Taft, Pound, Wigmore, and Hadley. See Kotteakos, supra, at 758-759, 66 S.Ct., at 1244-1245. After prolonged consideration, Congress responded to this criticism by passing the 1919 Act. The House Report accompanying the Act explained:
" 'It is the purpose of the ... bill to enact, in so far as the appellate courts are concerned, that in the consideration *458 in an appellate court of a writ of error or an appeal judgment shall be rendered upon the merits without permitting reversals for technical defects in the procedure below and without presuming that any error which may appear had been of necessity prejudicial to the complaining party.' " H.R.Rep. No. 913, supra, at 2 (quoting H.R.Rep. No. 611, supra, at 2) (emphasis added).
The theme that reversal be limited to prejudicial errors is found throughout the legislative history. For example, the Report accompanying the first version of the bill to pass the House of Representatives explained the meaning of the requirement that error be disregarded unless it "affect[s] the substantial rights of the parties" by quoting from an article by President Taft: " 'No judgment of the court below should be reversed except for an error which the court, after hearing [sic] the entire evidence, can affirmatively say would have led to a different verdict.' " 737 H.R.Rep. No. 1949, 61st Cong., 3d Sess., 1 (1911) (quoting Taft, The Administration of Criminal Law, 15 Yale L.J. 1, 16 (1905)). The Report criticized the practice of reversing judgments for errors which "did not in the least affect the substantial rights of the parties, the real merits of the case having been properly adjudicated upon the first trial." H.R.Rep. No. 1949, supra, at 2 (emphasis added). See also, ibid. (quoting Justice O'Gorman of the New York Supreme Court to the effect that "[o]ne of the gravest faults with our present mode of trial is the ease and frequency with which judgments are reversed on technicalities which do not affect the merits of the case, and which at no stage of the case have affected the merits"); H.R.Rep. No. 1218, 63d Cong., 3d Sess. (1914); H.R.Rep. No. 264, 64th Cong., 1st Sess. (1916).
Our decision in Kotteakos v. United States, supra, forecloses any remaining questions as to the interpretation of the phrase "affects substantial rights of the parties." In Kotteakos, we expressly rejected the argument that the 1919 Act required a determination of "what are only technical, *459 what substantial rights; and what really affects the latter hurtfully." 328 U.S., at 761, 66 S.Ct., at 1246. We held instead that the Act's command to disregard errors unless they "affect the substantial rights of the parties" was a command not to overturn a conviction unless, after examining the record as a whole, the court concludes that an error may have had "substantial influence" on the outcome of the proceeding. Id., at 765, 66 S.Ct., at 1248. Justice Rutledge's explanation, which includes a description of the proper analysis to apply in evaluating the effect of procedural errors, is well worth repeating:

"It comes down on its face to a very plain admonition: 'Do not be technical, where technicality does not really hurt the party whose rights in the trial and in its outcome the technicality affects.' ...

"Easier was the command to make than it has been always to observe. This, in part because it is general; but in part also because the discrimination it requires is one of judgment transcending confinement by formula or precise rule. That faculty cannot ever be wholly imprisoned in words, much less upon such a criterion as what are only technical, what substantial rights; and what really affects the latter hurtfully. Judgment, the play of impression and conviction along with intelligence, varies with judges and also with circumstance. What may be technical for one is substantial for another; what minor and unimportant in one setting crucial in another.

"In the final analysis judgment in each case must be influenced by conviction resulting from examination of the proceedings in their entirety, tempered but not governed in any rigid sense of stare decisis by what has been done in similar situations. Necessarily the character of the proceeding, what is at stake upon its outcome, and the relation of the error asserted to casting the balance *460 for decision on the case as a whole, are material factors in judgment.

* * *

"If, when all is said and done, the conviction is sure that the error did not influence the jury, or had but very slight effect, the verdict and the judgment should stand, except perhaps where the departure is from a constitutional norm or a specific command of Congress. But if one cannot say, with fair assurance, after pondering all that happened without stripping the erroneous action from the whole, that the judgment was not substantially swayed by the error, it is impossible to conclude that substantial rights were not affected. The inquiry cannot be merely whether there was enough to support the result, apart from the phase affected by the error. It is rather, even so, whether the error itself had substantial influence. If so, or if one is left in grave doubt, the conviction cannot stand." Id., at 760-765, 66 S.Ct., 738 at 1245-1248 (citations and footnotes omitted). [FN1]

FN1. It scarcely needs repeating that, since correction may come from the legislature, considerations of stare decisis are at their strongest when this Court confronts its previous constructions of a statute. Cf. Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393, 406-407, 52 S.Ct. 443, 447, 76 L.Ed. 815 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

II

This interpretation of s 2111 and Rule 52(a) as requiring examination of the prejudicial effect of all procedural errors is subject to several exceptions. First, and most importantly, constitutional errors are governed by the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments rather than by s 2111 and Rule 52(a). See Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 87 S.Ct. 824, 17 L.Ed.2d 705 (1967); United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S. 499, 103 S.Ct. 1974, 76 L.Ed.2d 96 (1983). Thus, the test for harmless constitutional error is stricter than its statutory counterpart. Compare, Chapman, supra, at 24, 87 S.Ct., at 828 (prosecution must establish that the error *461 was "harmless beyond a reasonable doubt"), with Kotteakos, 328 U.S., at 765, 66 S.Ct., at 1248 (error is harmless unless it had "substantial influence" on the outcome or leaves one in "grave doubt" as to whether it had such effect). [FN2] In addition, Congress may, of course, expressly provide that a particular right is excluded from the operation of the harmless-error rule. Neither of these exceptions applies to misjoinder in violation of Rule 8, however. Misjoinder does not ordinarily rise to the level of a constitutional violation, [FN3] and nothing in the language or *462 history of either the statutory harmless-error provisions or Rule 8 indicates that Congress chose to except misjoinder from harmless-error scrutiny. [FN4]

FN2. Until Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 87 S.Ct. 824, 17 L.Ed.2d 705 (1967), harmless-error analysis was considered inapplicable to errors respecting constitutional rights. See id., at 42-44, 87 S.Ct., at 836-837 (Stewart, J., concurring in result) ("[I]n a long line of cases, involving a variety of constitutional claims in both state and federal prosecutions, this Court has steadfastly rejected any notion that constitutional violations might be disregarded on the ground that they were 'harmless' " (citing and discussing examples)); see also, Kotteakos, 328 U.S., at 764-765, and n. 19, 66 S.Ct., at 1247-1248, and n. 19. In Chapman, we altered this practice and held that "there may be some constitutional errors which in the setting of a particular case are so unimportant and insignificant that they may, consistent with the Federal Constitution, be deemed harmless, not requiring the automatic reversal of the conviction." 386 U.S., at 22, 87 S.Ct., at 827. Although we have since held that the Chapman harmless-error test applies to "most constitutional violations," United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S., at 509, 103 S.Ct., at 1980, harmless-error analysis remains inapplicable to many constitutional rights. E.g., Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254, 106 S.Ct. 617, 88 L.Ed.2d 598 (1985) (discrimination in grand jury selection); Connecticut v. Johnson, 460 U.S. 73, 84-88, 103 S.Ct. 969, 976-978, 74 L.Ed.2d 823 (1983) (opinion of BLACKMUN, J.) (Sandstrom violation); Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 83 S.Ct. 792, 9 L.Ed.2d 799 (1963) (right to counsel); Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, 47 S.Ct. 437, 71 L.Ed. 749 (1927) (right to impartial tribunal).
Because the source and nature of the harmless-error test for constitutional errors does not derive from s 2111 or Rule 52(a), our cases concerning constitutional errors do not affect, and are not affected by, our decision today, which applies only to the statutory harmless-error doctrine.

FN3. But cf. Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123, 88 S.Ct. 1620, 20 L.Ed.2d 476 (1968). It is also possible that a particular case of misjoinder may be so egregious as to constitute a deprivation of due process. If this were the case, the error would be governed by Chapman rather than by s 2111 or Rule 52(a). See n. 4, infra. Of course, a joinder of claims or parties that was so improper as to violate the Due Process Clause would undoubtedly also be prejudicial.

FN4. As explained above, the 1919 Act was not intended to codify a rule of per se reversal for particular rights, much less for misjoinder. Similarly, as the majority points out, nothing in the legislative history of Rule 8 indicates an intent to do anything more than set forth the technical requirements for and limitations on the joinder of claims or defendants. Ante, at 729, n. 7.

Justice STEVENS' partial dissent recognizes two further exceptions: (1) "when an independent value besides reliability of the outcome suggests that [harmless-error] analysis is inappropriate," and (2) "when the harmlessness of the error cannot be measured with precision." Post, at 745. 739 Although the cases he cites to support these additional exceptions involved constitutional errors, Justice STEVENS may well be correct in asserting that they also apply to errors governed by the statutory harmless-error provisions. I need not decide that question to conclude, as does Justice STEVENS, that--like the first two exceptions--neither applies to misjoinder.

The applicability of the exception to protect values other than reliability is easily disposed of. Rules respecting joinder are based on recognition that the multiplication of charges or defendants may confuse the jury and lead to inferences of habitual criminality or guilt by association. McElroy, 164 U.S., at 80, 17 S.Ct., at 32. Apart from this, however, joinder rules do not serve "an independent value besides reliability of the outcome" justifying an exception to the harmless-error principle. Surely it cannot be maintained that misjoinder affects a right so fundamental to a fair trial that it " 'infect[s] the validity of the underlying judgment itself, or the integrity of the process by which that judgment was obtained.' " Post, at 745, n. 15 (quoting Rose v. Lundy, 455 U.S. 509, 544, 102 S.Ct. 1198, 1216, 71 L.Ed.2d 379 (1982) (STEVENS, J., dissenting)).

*463 The exception for errors as to which the prejudicial effect cannot be measured with precision requires closer consideration. As previously noted, McElroy held that misjoinder is per se reversible because a court can never safely conclude that it was not prejudicial. 164 U.S., at 81, 17 S.Ct., at 33. However, trial courts routinely inquire into possible prejudice from joint trials when considering motions for severance under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 14, and appellate courts just as routinely perform that inquiry in reviewing Rule 14 rulings. [FN5] To be sure, problems of jury confusion arising from misjoinder may be substantial. It is also quite easy for the jury to be prejudiced by evidence of other crimes or by inferences from an accused's association with other defendants. Thus, it may be that, once the proper test for harmless error is applied, most misjoinders will in fact result in reversal. However, the prejudice that may result from misjoinder is not so difficult to ascertain that it must always be presumed to be present. Whatever force the holding in McElroy may once have had, its precedential force has been greatly eroded by the 1919 Act, whose legislative history disapproves of such presumptions, supra, at ----, and by subsequent decisions such as Kotteakos. [FN6] Today, adherence to the view that misjoinder is per se prejudicial would stand out as a stark and unjustified anomaly, leading to just the sort of unnecessary reversals that inspired enactment of the *464 1919 Act. To the extent that McElroy states a contrary holding, I would overrule it.

FN5. The Court correctly notes in its opinion, see ante, at 732, n. 12, that while the nature of the inquiry under Rules 8 and 14 is similar, the purposes and scope of these Rules are different.

FN6. Kotteakos rejected the argument that variance between the indictment and proof at trial should be per se reversible because such errors "naturally" result in prejudice. Relying on the legislative history of the harmless-error rule, the Court concluded that such presumptions should not lightly be inferred. "The only permissible presumption," the Court said, "would seem to be particular, arising from the nature of the error and 'its natural effect' for or against prejudice in the particular setting." 328 U.S., at 765-766, 66 S.Ct., at 1248.

III

The Court goes on to resolve the harmless-error question. I respectfully dissent. To begin with, I agree with Justice STEVENS that "[u]ndertaking a harmless-error analysis is perhaps the least useful function that this Court can perform." Post, at 746. See United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S., at 520, n. 2, 103 S.Ct., at 1986, n. 2 (opinion of BRENNAN, J.); see also, Connecticut v. Johnson, 460 U.S. 73, 102, 103 S.Ct. 969, 985, 74 L.Ed.2d 823 (1983) (POWELL, J., dissenting). Having concluded that a harmless-error inquiry is required, I, like Justice STEVENS, think we should remand to the Court of Appeals, 740 which is in a better position than we are to study the complete trial record with care.

Moreover, it is apparent that the Court's perfunctory effort to evaluate the effect of this error is inadequate. The Court tells us simply that the error is harmless "[i]n the face of overwhelming evidence of guilt shown here...." Ante, at 739. But where is the "examination of the proceedings in their entirety" called for by Kotteakos? See 328 U.S., at 762, 66 S.Ct., at 1246. Kotteakos instructs the reviewing court to "ponde[r] all that happened without stripping the erroneous action from the whole," and expressly states that "[t]he inquiry cannot be merely whether there was enough to support the result, apart from the phase affected by the error." Id., at 765, 66 S.Ct., at 1248. Obviously, the existence of overwhelming evidence is relevant to determining the "effect the error had or reasonably may be taken to have had upon the jury's decision." Id., at 764, 66 S.Ct., at 1247. But I would have thought it equally obvious that, at the very least, consideration of the magnitude of the error in the context of the trial would also be called for; this the Court has not done. The Court also tells us that the error was harmless because the same evidence "would likely have been admissible" at a joint retrial of the defendants without the improper count. Ante, at 732-733. However, as I thought *465 iKotteakos made clear, that is irrelevant. The crucial thing is the effect the error had in the proceedings which actually took place, not whether the same thing could have been done in hypothetical proceedings. See 328 U.S., at 762-765, 66 S.Ct., at 1246-1248. Harmless-error analysis is not an excuse for overlooking error because the reviewing court is itself convinced of the defendant's guilt. The determination of guilt is for the jury to make, and the reviewing court is concerned solely with whether the error may have had a "substantial effect" upon that body.

Justice Traynor of the California Supreme Court wrote that "the evaluation of an error as harmless or prejudicial is one of the most significant tasks of an appellate court, as well as one of the most complex." R. Traynor, The Riddle of Harmless Error 80 (1970). It is a task this Court is manifestly ill-equipped to undertake. See United States v. Hasting, supra, at 516-518, 103 S.Ct., at 1984-1985 (STEVENS, J., concurring in judgment). I would remand the cases for the Court of Appeals to undertake the task.

Justice STEVENS, with whom Justice MARSHALL joins, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

Rule 52(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides:

"Harmless Error. Any error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial rights shall be disregarded." (Emphasis added.)

The question presented in No. 84-744 is whether a misjoinder of defendants prohibited by Rule 8(b) is an error which affects substantial rights. [FN1] In my opinion, the Court *466 has answered that question incorrectly; moreover, its opinion unfortunately confuses rather than clarifies the law of "harmless error."

FN1. Rule 8(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides: "Two or more defendants may be charged in the same indictment or information if they are alleged to have participated in the same act or transaction or in the same series of acts or transactions constituting an offense or offenses. Such defendants may be charged in one or more counts together or separately and all of the defendants need not be charged in each count."

I

Our central task is, of course, to construe Rule 8(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Thus, we must consider the history, purpose, and language of that Rule.

Prior to the adoption of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, this Court decided that the misjoinder of defendants, as well as the misjoinder of offenses, was an error that deprived the accused of "a substantial right." McElroy v. United 741 States, 164 U.S. 76, 80, 17 S.Ct. 31, 32, 41 L.Ed. 355 (1896). McElroy concerned both kinds of misjoinder. Five defendants were charged with offenses committed on April 16, 1894, and May 1, 1894, but only three of them were charged with a separate offense committed on April 16, 1894. The two defendants who were not charged with the separate offense made essentially the same objection to their joint trial as did Dennis Lane in this case. As to those two defendants, the Government confessed error and the Court unanimously reversed and remanded for a new trial. [FN2] As to the other three defendants, *467 the majority of the Court held that a misjoinder of offenses had occurred, and required a new trial without any special showing of prejudice. After reviewing the misjoinder of defendants and of offenses, the Court concluded:

> FN2. "It is clear that the statute does not authorize the consolidation of indictments in such a way that some of the defendants may be tried at the same time with other defendants charged with a crime different from that for which all are tried.

> In confessing error, the Government seemed to concede that reversal was appropriate without any specific showing of prejudice. See Brief for United States in McElroy v. United States, O.T.1896, No. 402, p. 6 ("It cannot be certainly affirmed that Stufflebeam and Charles Hook were not embarrassed and prejudiced, in their defense to the indictments under which they stood charged, by the fact that they were compelled to make their defense in a proceeding in which McElroy, Bland, and Hook were prosecuted for arson committed April 16, 1894, which was on the same day of the assaults and fifteen days before the arson for which they were tried").

"Necessarily where the accused is deprived of a substantial right by the action of the trial court, such action, having been properly objected to, is revisable on error." Ibid.

Thus, almost a half century before the adoption of Rule 8, the Court squarely held that protection against misjoinder was a "substantial right," and that the violation of the misjoinder rule required reversal.

Today, the Court does not dispute that McElroy required reversal for misjoinder. Instead, the Court suggests, rather obliquely, that three developments have undermined that holding: (1) the adoption of Rule 8; (2) the adoption of Rule 52(a) and the passage of the harmless-error statute; and (3) the development of a harmless-error doctrine in constitutional law. Ante, at 729-730. The reliance on the harmless-error developments will be addressed in more detail. Since we are construing Rule 8, however, the majority's bare citation to it--and apparent reliance on the history of its passage--must be first considered.

The majority seems to be of the view that the adoption of Rule 8 cast doubt on the validity of McElroy. Ante, at 729. Far from disavowing McElroy, however, the Federal Rules continued the misjoinder rule. The notes of the Advisory Committee on Rules state that both subdivisions of Rule 8 represent "substantially a restatement of existing law." Neither the text of Rule 8, nor the Advisory Committee Notes, nor the history of the Rule contains any suggestion that Rule 8 was intended to change the rule of the McElroy case. Indeed, the Advisory Committee displayed a keen awareness of the McElroy precedent by citing the opinion in *468 its discussion of misjoinder. [FN3] At the time the Federal Rules were being considered, moreover, commentators shared the Advisory Committee's view that the Rules merely continued the misjoinder doctrine in its then current form, and restated existing law. [FN4]

The principle 742 that misjoinder deprives the accused of "a substantial right" and therefore is "revisable on error" thus remained the law when the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure became effective in 1946.

FN3. See 5 Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure: Documentary History, Second Preliminary Draft, Feb. 1944, Note to Rule 8, pp. 35-36 ("Since the counts of two or more indictments consolidated for trial, under 18 U.S.C. s 557, are 'put ... in the same category as if they were separate counts in one indictment,' McElroy v. United States, 164 U.S. 76, 77, 17 S.Ct. 31, 32, 41 L.Ed. 355 (1896), this type of joinder is more widely practiced than is generally realized").

FN4. See Maguire, Proposed New Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 23 Ore.L.Rev. 56, 59 (1943) ("Subdivision (b) of Rule 9 provides for a joinder of defendants where they are alleged to have participated in the same act or transaction or in the same series of acts or transactions constituting or resulting in an offense, and that they may be charged in one or more counts, together or separately, in any manner indicating their respective participation in the offense or offenses.... This rule merely restates the present Federal statute ..."). "Rule 9" became the current "Rule 8" without substantial change. See Orfield, Joinder in Federal Criminal Procedure, 26 F.R.D. 23, 28-29 (1960).

Furthermore, if one reads Rule 8 in conjunction with Rule 14, it is immediately apparent that the draftsmen of the Rules regarded every violation of Rule 8 is inherently prejudicial. For Rule 14 authorizes the Court to grant a severance, even in the absence of a Rule 8 violation, if either the defendant or the Government is prejudiced by a joinder of offenses or defendants. [FN5] Thus, it seems clear that the draftsmen of the Rules regarded violations of Rule 8 as inherently prejudicial, and recognized that even joinders that were not prohibited by the Rule should be forbidden if a party *469 could demonstrate actual prejudice. This is the way Professor Charles Wright interpreted the intent of the draftsmen in his 1969 treatise. He wrote:

FN5. Rule 14 provides, in pertinent part: "If it appears that a defendant or the government is prejudiced by a joinder of offenses or of defendants in an indictment or information or by such joinder for trial together, the court may order an election or separate trials of counts, grant a severance of defendants or provide whatever other relief justice requires."

"Indeed there would be no point in having Rule 8 if the harmless error concept were held applicable to it. If that concept could be applied, then defendant could obtain reversal only if the joinder were prejudicial to him. But Rule 14 provides for relief from prejudicial joinder, and a defendant can obtain a reversal, in theory at least, if he has been prejudiced even though the joinder was proper. If misjoinder can be regarded as harmless error, then reversal could be had only for prejudice whether the initial joinder was proper or improper. If that were true, it would be pointless to define in Rule 8 the limits on joinder, since it would no longer be of significance whether those limits were complied with, and the draftsmen would have been better advised to allow unlimited joinder of offenses and defendants, subject to the power of the court to give relief if the joinder were prejudicial." 1 C. Wright, Federal Practice and Procedure, s 144, p. 329 (1969). [FN6]

FN6. In his current edition, Professor Wright notes that a number of federal courts have held that misjoinder may be harmless error, but he concludes that "there remains much to be said for what was once the almost-unanimous view that misjoinder is never harmless error." 1 C. Wright, Federal Practice and Procedure: Criminal, s 145, p. 532 (2d ed. 1982).

Other commentators have agreed that the structure of the Federal Rules strongly supports the conclusion that the draftsmen viewed a violation of the misjoinder rule as inherently prejudicial. [FN7]

FN7. See Note, Harmless Error and Misjoinder Under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure: A Narrowing Division of Opinion, 6 Hofstra L.Rev. 533, 544, n. 65 (1978) ("Implicit in the assertion that rule 8 sets the limits of tolerable prejudice is the argument that if its purpose is not to set such limits there is no purpose in the rule. Rule 14 would vest all questions of joinder in the trial court.... As both rule 14 and rule 8 were included in the rules, rule 8 must have been intended to establish the outer bounds within which the trial court has discretionary power under rule 14"). In my view, the majority's discussion of this issue, ante, at 732, n. 12, fails to answer this straightforward reading of Rule 8 and Rule 14.

*470 Thus, a review of the state of the law of joinder at the time the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure were adopted, of the Advisory Committee's intent to restate then-existing law, and of the text of the Rules themselves requires a conclusion that a Rule 8 misjoinder violation is an error that affects the substantial rights of the accused and therefore requires reversal of a conviction.

In addition to its unexplained reference to the adoption of Rule 8, the Court suggests that its new misjoinder rule--that prejudice must be shown to justify reversal of a Rule 8 misjoinder error--is supported by its interpretation of developments in the law of "harmless error." Specifically, the Court observes that the McElroy approach has been undermined by the passage of a harmless-error statute and rule, ante, at 729, and by the development of a harmless-error doctrine for constitutional errors, ante, at 729-730. Although the majority does not distinguish between these two categories, they require separate analysis. Neither category, however, remotely supports the majority's bald assertion that misjoinder should not be viewed as affecting "substantial rights," and thus not be viewed as inherently prejudicial.

The majority refers to the current harmless-error statute, 28 U.S.C. s 2111, and to Rule 52(a). As the majority points out, both define harmless error in terms of whether a violation affects "substantial rights." [FN8] Since this Court had already made clear that misjoinder affected "substantial *471 rights," McElroy, 164 U.S. 76, 17 S.Ct. 31, 41 L.Ed. 355 (1896), it is curious that the majority concludes, with no support at all, that the passage of a statute and Rule which allowed for correction of errors that did not affect "substantial rights" somehow changed the legal status of a violation that had been described in precisely those words. This view is especially curious when it is remembered that the Rule governing joinder was viewed by the draftsmen as a restatement of existing law.

FN8. See 28 U.S.C. s 2111 ("On the hearing of any appeal or writ of certiorari in any case, the court shall give judgment after an examination of the record without regard to errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties"); Fed.Rule Crim.Proc. 52(a) ("Any error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial rights shall be disregarded").

To be sure, McElroy was decided before the first harmless-error statute was passed in 1919. That statute, a reaction to the hypertechnicality that had developed in American jurisprudence, did mark a significant change in our system's view of the effect of error. [FN9] But it is a long leap from that recognition to a view that the passage of the harmless-error statute in 1919--and the subsequent adoption of Rule 52(a) in 1946 and the passage of the current harmless-error statute in 1949--summarily jettisoned all prior jurisprudence on the errors that affected "substantial rights." Indeed, interpretations of the 1919 statute accorded it a very different mission. As Justice Frankfurter explained in refusing to require a showing of prejudice to justify reversal for a statutory violation: "Suffice it to indicate, what every student of the history behind the Act of February 26, 1919, knows, that that Act was intended to prevent matters concerned with the mere etiquette of trials and with the formalities and minutiae of procedure from touching the merits of a verdict." Bruno v. United States, 308 U.S. 287, 294, 60 S.Ct. 198, 200, 84 L.Ed. 257 (1939). And, while Rule 52(a) and the 1949 harmless-error statute were changed in a way that some commentators have found significant, [FN10] the *472 continuation 744 of "substantial rights" as the benchmark for assessing the harmlessness of error provides no support for the proposition that anyone intended to change something that had been found to affect a "substantial right" into something that did not affect a substantial right.

FN9. For a discussion of the background of the 1919 statute, see Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 758-760, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 1244-1245, 90 L.Ed. 1557 (1946).

FN10. The 1919 statute referred to "technical errors, defects, or exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." 40 Stat. 1181, 28 U.S.C. s 391 (1946 ed.) (emphasis added). Rule 52(a) referred to "[a]ny error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial rights"; the 1949 statute referred to "errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." 28 U.S.C. s 2111. See Note, 6 Hofstra L.Rev., supra n. 7, at 540 (discussing possible significance of change). But cf. H.R.Rep. No. 352, 81st Cong., 1st Sess., 18 (1949) (new harmless-error statute intended to "incorporate" former harmless-error statute); Rule 52(a), Notes of Advisory Committee on Rules, 18 U.S.C.App., p. 657 (Rule intended as "a restatement of existing law"); Kotteakos, 328 U.S., at 757, n. 9, 66 S.Ct., at 1243, n. 9 (citing Advisory Committee comment that Rule 52(a) was intended as " 'a restatement of existing law' ").

Thus, neither the harmless-error statute, passed within a few years of the adoption of Rule 8, nor Rule 52(a), adopted at the same time as Rule 8, changed the interpretation of the misjoinder rule reflected in Rule 8.

The harmless-error statute and Rule are, however, at least relevant to the inquiry at hand. In contrast, the majority's reliance on Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 87 S.Ct. 824, 17 L.Ed.2d 705 (1967), ante, at 729-730, is plainly misplaced. The majority observes: "Clearly, Chapman and Hasting dictate that the harmless-error rule governs here." Ante, at 730. Nothing could be less clear. This case does not involve a claim of constitutional error. The harmless-error doctrine that was enunciated in Chapman thus does not settle the issue raised by this case. Simply because constitutional errors may be subject to a harmless-error inquiry does not mean that all nonconstitutional errors must be subject to harmless-error analysis, and this Court has never so held. [FN11] Rather, our mission in *473 reviewing nonconstitutional errors is, first, to discern whether the rule or statute which is being violated was intended to be subject to harmless-error analysis. If there is a definitive answer to that question, our inquiry should be at an end. [FN12] If there is no definitive answer, then we must try to assess the rule or statute in question in light of the purpose of the harmless-error rule and statute. We should not, however, rewrite existing law by adopting a presumption that, simply because a violation is nonconstitutional, it is automatically subject to harmless-error inquiry.

FN11. That the Court has recognized the difference between constitutional and nonconstitutional harmless-error inquiries is reflected in the considerable difference in the Court's standards on these two subjects. Compare Chapman, 386 U.S., at 24, 87 S.Ct., at 828 ("before a federal constitutional error can be held harmless, the court must be able to declare a belief that it was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt"), with Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S., at 765, 66 S.Ct., at 1248 (in nonconstitutional cases, "[t]he inquiry ... is ... whether the error itself had substantial influence"). To the extent that the majority ultimately cites the Kotteakos standard as governing this case, ante, at 731-732, it is consistent with this distinction in our case law; to the extent that the majority suggests that Chapman controls the outcome of this case, however, ante, at 730, it reveals confusion about this distinction.

FN12. Cf. Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 842-843, 104 S.Ct. 2778, 2781, 81 L.Ed.2d 694 (1984) ("If the intent of Congress is clear, that is the end of the matter; for the court ... must give effect to the unambiguously expressed intent of Congress").

As the majority observes, the Court's willingness to invoke the harmless-error doctrine has expanded dramatically in recent years. This expansion is a source of considerable concern, [FN13] particularly because the Court has often been unclear and imprecise in its increasingly frequent invocation of harmless *474 error. [FN14] In my view, 745 harmless-error analysis is inappropriate in at least three situations: (1) when it is clear that a statute or Rule was not intended to be subject to such a rule; (2) when an independent value besides reliability of the outcome suggests that such analysis is inappropriate; [FN15] and (3) when the harmlessness of an error cannot be measured with precision. [FN16] In my view, misjoinder clearly falls into the first *475 category. It also has elements of the second and third. Misjoinder implicates the independent value of individual responsibility and our deep abhorrence of the notion of "guilt by association." Our criminal justice system has expanded considerably in its tolerance of multiple joinders and massive conspiracy trials. The rule against misjoinder remains, however, as an ultimate safeguard of our cherished principle that one is tried for one's own deeds, and not for another's. [FN17] The harmfulness of misjoinder is also the type of error that has consequences that are difficult to measure with precision. [FN18] These concerns may or may not outweigh the societal interests that motivate the Court today, but they are surely strong enough to demonstrate that the draftsmen of the Federal Rules acted responsibly when they adhered to the time-honored rule of the McElroy case. The misjoinder Rule that they crafted is clear, and should be respected. [FN19] Misjoinder affects "substantial rights," and should lead to reversal.

Cf. United States v. Jackson, 429 F.2d 1368, 1373 (CA7 1970) (Clark, J., sitting by designation) (" 'Harmless error' is swarming around the 7th Circuit like bees.... [T]he courts may have to act to correct a presently alarming situation").

FN14. See Field, Assessing the Harmlessness of Federal Constitutional Error--A Process in Need of a Rationale, 125 U.Pa.L.Rev. 15, 32 (1976) (

"In sum, the case law on the content of the harmless error standard is less than lucid. There is some indication that Supreme Court opinions slip back and forth from one suggested standard to another, without explicit notice of the change, though the change could produce different results in many cases"); Saltzburg, The Harm of Harmless Error, 59 Va.L.Rev. 988 (1973) ("Chaos surrounds the standard for appellate review of errors in criminal proceedings"); Mause, Harmless Constitutional Error: The Implications of Chapman v. California, 53 Minn.L.Rev. 519, 557 (1969) ("the Court, if only in an effort to further the interest of net judicial economy, should attempt to delineate certain well-defined classes of constitutional error which require automatic reversal").

FN15. In the constitutional area, the Court has made clear that certain independent values render a harmless-error analysis inappropriate. See, e.g., Rose v. Mitchell, 443 U.S. 545, 99 S.Ct. 2993, 61 L.Ed.2d 739 (1979) (racial discrimination in the selection of a grand jury is not subject to harmless-error analysis); Chapman, 386 U.S., at 23, 87 S.Ct., at 827 ("there are some constitutional rights so basic to a fair trial that their infraction can never be treated as harmless error"). Cf. Rose v. Lundy, 455 U.S. 509, 544, 102 S.Ct. 1198, 1216, 71 L.Ed.2d 379 (1982) (STEVENS, J., dissenting) (some constitutional errors "are so fundamental that they infect the validity of the underlying judgment itself, or the integrity of the process by which that judgment was obtained").

FN16. In Holloway v. Arkansas, 435 U.S. 475, 491, 98 S.Ct. 1173, 1182, 55 L.Ed.2d 426 (1978), Chief Justice BURGER explained that harmless error was inappropriate in assessing the constitutional error of inappropriate joint representation in part because such an inquiry required "unguided speculation." See also Note, 64 Cornell L.Rev., supra n. 13, at 563-564 ("Holloway's rationale naturally extends beyond the sixth amendment: it suggests that a rule of automatic reversal should apply to those fundamental, pervasive errors that have uncertain prejudicial impact.... The rule of automatic reversal should be extended to all errors, whether or not pervasive or constitutional, that result in unascertainable prejudice") (footnotes omitted).

FN17. Cf. Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440, 457-458, 69 S.Ct. 716, 724-725, 93 L.Ed. 790 (1949) (Jackson, J., concurring) ("Few instruments of injustice can equal that of implied or presumed or constructive crimes. The most odious of all oppressions are those which mask as justice").

FN18. See Note, 6 Hofstra L.Rev., supra n. 7, at 563 (harmless error "is inaccurate as a test for ascertaining the prejudice resulting from misjoinder because of the impossibility of determining the extent of that prejudice").

FN19. The majority's suggestion that two Supreme Court opinions have held misjoinder subject to the harmless-error rule is erroneous. The majority writes: "A holding directly involving misjoinder again indicated the harmless-error rule should apply." Ante, at 730. The decision cited by the majority for this proposition, Schaffer v. United States, 362 U.S. 511, 80 S.Ct. 945, 4 L.Ed.2d 921 (1960), explicitly found no Rule 8 error and explicitly disavowed the type of "indication" claimed by the majority. See 362 U.S., at 517, 80 S.Ct., at 948 ("The harmless-error rule, which was the central issue in Kotteakos, is not even reached in the instant case, since here the joinder was proper under Rule 8(b) and no error was shown"). Thus, the majority's discussion of Schaffer, ante, at 730-731, is completely beside the point. Indeed, one year after Schaffer was decided, it was read to support, not the majority's conclusion, but the viability of the McElroy rule. See Ward v. United States, 110 U.S.App.D.C. 130, 137, 289 F.2d 877, 878 (1961) (Burger, J.) (citing Schaffer and McElroy to reject Government suggestion that defendant must show prejudice to obtain reversal after misjoinder of defendants has been established).

Similarly, the majority's claim that Kotteakos "suggested that the harmless-error rule could similarly apply" to misjoinder, ante, at ----, vastly overstates the case. The Court noted that a possible joinder violation gave added weight to its conclusion that the error before it was not harmless. 328 U.S., at 774-775, 66 S.Ct., at 1252. The Court observed that "s 269 [the harmless-error statute] carries the threat of overriding the requirement of s 557 for substituting separate counts in the place of separate indictments, unless the application of s 269 is made with restraint. The two sections must be construed and applied so as to bring them into substantial harmony, not into square conflict." Id., at 775, 66 S.Ct., at 1253. This expression of concern about the possible effect of harmless error on misjoinder, however, hardly supports the notion that Kotteakos held misjoinder subject to harmless-error analysis. And, despite the majority's view that its holding is the only way to bring harmless error and misjoinder into "substantial harmony," ante, at 732, a conclusion that misjoinder necessarily affects substantial rights produces the same harmony.

*476 746 III

Undertaking a harmless-error analysis is perhaps the least useful function that this Court can perform, cf. United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S. 499, 516-518, 103 S.Ct. 1974, 1984-1985, 76 L.Ed.2d 96 (1983) (STEVENS, J., concurring in judgment). For that reason, a decision that a harmless-error inquiry is required should lead to a remand to the Court of Appeals, which is in a far better position than we are to study the complete trial record with care. The majority's opinion in this case confirms the general advisability of that approach.

The Court's conclusion that Dennis Lane suffered no prejudice is based on three cursory observations. First, the Court asserts, with no explanation, that there was "overwhelming evidence" of his guilt. Ante, at 732. There are at least two problems with this observation. The first is that the majority fails to appreciate the Kotteakos recognition that the harmless-error inquiry is entirely distinct from a sufficiency-of-the-evidence inquiry. [FN20] The second is that, *477 even if it were faithfully applying the Kotteakos distinction between sufficiency of the evidence and harmless error, the majority utterly fails to explain its statement about "overwhelming evidence." A reading of Kotteakos reveals that only the most painstaking and thorough review of an entire trial record can justify a conclusion that its standard has, or has not, been met. The opinion the Court announces today contains no indication that it has made that kind of analysis of the case against Dennis Lane. [FN21]

FN20. In Kotteakos, the Court accepted the defendants' concession that the evidence was not "insufficient, if considered apart from the alleged errors relating to the proof and the instructions at the trial." 328 U.S., at 753, 66 S.Ct., at 1242. The Court went on to emphasize that the harmless-error analysis is fundamentally different from the sufficiency analysis. "The inquiry cannot be merely whether there was enough to support the result, apart from the phase affected by the error. It is rather, even so, whether the error itself had substantial influence. If so, or if one is left in grave doubt, the conviction cannot stand." Id., at 765, 66 S.Ct., at 1248. Even though the evidence was concededly sufficient without the errors, the Court thus found the errors not harmless, and the convictions reversible. The majority quotes the relevant passage from Kotteakos, ante, at 732, but fails to reflect its principle in its analysis.

FN21. The only specific evidence even mentioned by the majority--the testimony of Heard and Lankford, ante, at 732, n. 13--represents accomplice testimony. Such testimony is, of course, generally recognized as posing special evidentiary problems. See, e.g., 1 J. Weinstein & M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence P 107[04], pp. 107-50--107-51 (1985); 3 S. Gard, Jones on Evidence s 20:60, pp. 736-737 (6th ed.1972).

Second, the Court notes that the jury was properly instructed to evaluate the evidence under each count and against each defendant separately. Since that instruction should be given routinely in every case in which there is a joinder of defendants or offenses, it surely cannot be regarded as an adequate response to a claim that a misjoinder was prejudicial. [FN22]

FN22. Indeed, in the year following Kotteakos, this Court made clear that proper jury instructions might not alleviate the problems inherent in joint trials:
"The grave danger in this case, if any, arose not from the trial court's rulings upon admissibility or from its instructions to the jury. As we have said, these were as adequate as might reasonably be required in a joint trial. The danger rested rather in the risk that the jury, in disregard of the court's direction, would transfer, consciously or unconsciously, the effect of the excluded admissions from the case as made against Goldsmith and Weiss across the barrier of the exclusion to the other three defendants." Blumenthal v. United States, 332 U.S. 539, 559, 68 S.Ct. 248, 257, 92 L.Ed. 154 (1947).

*478 747 Finally, the Court rather hesitantly suggests that the evidence on Count 1 "would likely have been admissible" in a joint retrial on Counts 2-6, ante, at 732. The Court thus assumes that a joint retrial is inevitable. Of course, if misjoinder is found only as to Dennis Lane, as I suggest below, then the majority's point collapses. In any event, nothing in Kotteakos or in our harmless-error precedents suggests that this Court should find an error harmless because of the Court's completely untested speculations about a possible future retrial. Not surprisingly, Kotteakos suggests precisely the opposite. [FN23]

FN23. "The Government's theory seems to be, in ultimate logical reach, that the error presented by the variance is insubstantial and harmless, if the evidence offered specifically and properly to convict each defendant would be sufficient to sustain his conviction, if submitted in a separate trial. For reasons we have stated and in view of the authorities cited, this is not and cannot be the test under s 269 [the harmless error statute]." 328 U.S., at 767, 66 S.Ct., at 1249.

A determination that an error was harmless is an extremely weighty conclusion; it implicates profound notions of fairness and justice. [FN24] Even if the majority is correct that Rule 8 misjoinder should be subject to harmless-error analysis, I am convinced that the majority's summary finding of harmless error in this case fails to give the issue the attention it deserves. [FN25]

FN24. See R. Traynor, The Riddle of Harmless Error 80 (1970) ("[T]he evaluation of an error as harmless or prejudicial is one of the most significant tasks of an appellate court, as well as one of the most complex. Each evaluation bears upon our traditional understanding that fair trial encompasses not only fair notice and an adequate opportunity to be heard before the appropriate tribunal, but also an orderly presentation of evidence and a rational application of the law thereto").

FN25. A more searching review of the record might require the majority to confront certain troublesome aspects of this erroneous joinder. The majority might have to confront the fact that at least 9 of the Government's 26 witnesses--more than one third--addressed the El Toro fire, the offense for which Dennis Lane was not charged. See Testimony of Morris Loewenstern, Tr. 33-43; Testimony of Earl Simpson, id., at 44-50; Testimony of Cindy Wright, id., at 58-59; Testimony of David Lard, id., at 62-89, 96-103; Testimony of Ben Shaw, id., at 103-112; Testimony of Jack Stotts, id., at 113-123; Testimony of Wayne Cox, id., at 123-132; Testimony of Jay Messenger, id., at 139-157; and Testimony of Sidney Heard, id., at 230-243. It might have to confront the fact that two of the defense witnesses similarly focused on the El Toro fire. See Testimony of Janie Malone, id., at 681-736; Testimony of Jess Maddox, id., at 891-894. It might have to confront the fact that, in their closing arguments, both the Government and the defense counsel devoted considerable attention to the El Toro fire. See id., at 989-993; defense's closing arg., id., at 1008-1014. And it might, finally, have to confront the fact that the prosecutor's closing words to the jury were that "each of these charges has been proved against J.C. Lane and Dennis Lane beyond a reasonable doubt." Id., at 1051 (emphasis added).

This is not to say that I have studied the record with sufficient care to conclude that, if misjoinder is subject to harmless-error analysis, the error here was not harmless. Rather, it is to say that I am convinced that the majority's opinion gives no indication of having wrestled with the complexities of the 1,000-page trial transcript in a manner that would permit its confident assertion that the error was harmless.

*479 IV

I agree with the Court's conclusion that the evidence was sufficient to sustain both convictions of mail fraud and therefore join Part III of its opinion. I also agree with the judgment insofar as it upholds the conviction of James Lane. It is perfectly clear that the violation of Rule 8(b)--the rule prohibiting the improper joinder of defendants --occasioned by the misjoinder of Count 1 did not affect James Lane because he was the defendant in Count 1. But since there is no claim that the son, Dennis Lane, took any part in Count 1 (the mail fraud regarding the 1979 El Toro Restaurant 748 fire), I believe that his right not to be joined as a defendant in his father's trial for that felony was a "substantial right" that was adversely affected by the misjoinder.

In my view, the Court's opinion misconstrues the history and purpose of Rule 8, sows further confusion in the Court's *480 harmless-error jurisprudence, and fails to make the kind of harmless-error analysis that Rule 52(a) requires. Because I do not consider these errors harmless, I respectfully dissent from the judgment regarding Dennis Lane in No. 84-744.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Steven E. ROGERS, Defendant-Appellant.
No. 1184, Docket 92-1111.
United States Court of Appeals,
Second Circuit.
Argued April 1, 1993.
Decided Nov. 16, 1993.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, Charles S. Haight, Jr., J., of wire fraud, transporting fraudulent securities in interstate commerce, and conspiring to commit those crimes. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Pierce, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence supported finding that telexes were overt acts of conspiracy within statute of limitations, which established timeliness of prosecution; (2) evidence supported convictions for wire fraud, even if defendant did not personally send telexes; and (3) defendant's Sixth Amendment rights were violated by district judge's refusal to instruct jury on definition of "securities" and to let jury decide whether fictitious equipment leases were within meaning of statute prohibiting transportation of stolen "securities." Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded.

Evidence supported finding that telexes sent within limitations period were intended to stall repayment of credit previously issued on collateral of fictitious equipment leases and to lull lender into not discovering fraud and, thus, communications were acts within wire fraud statute and overt acts of conspiracy, rather than acts of concealment after attainment of objectives of conspiracy. 18 U.S.C.A. s 3282.

372k363
Evidence supported convictions for wire fraud based on findings that defendant was consulted before coconspirator sent telexes to lender, that communications were integral to scheme to defraud lender through fictitious equipment leases offered as collateral for line of credit, and that communications were reasonably foreseeable part of scheme in which defendant participated, even though defendant did not personally send or instruct coconspirator to send telexes. 18 U.S.C.A. s 1343.

Defendant's Sixth Amendment right to counsel was not violated by district court's disqualification of defendant's attorney for conflict of interest from prior representation involving coconspirator, despite district court's failure to personally address defendant on disqualification; attorney had agreed to withdrawal and district court had authority to insist that defendant be represented by counsel who did not have conflicts of interest. Before OAKES, PIERCE and PRATT, Circuit Judges.

PIERCE, Circuit Judge:
Steven E. Rogers appeals from a judgment of conviction, entered after a jury trial in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York (Charles S. Haight, Jr., Judge). Rogers was convicted of conspiring to commit wire fraud and to transport fraudulent securities in interstate or foreign commerce, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371; wire fraud, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1343; and transporting a fraudulent security in interstate or foreign commerce, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 2314. For the reasons set forth below, we affirm in part and reverse in part, and remand to the district court.

BACKGROUND

Steven E. Rogers was the Director of International Operations of Trend International, a subsidiary of the Trend Group. Leonard Hoffman was Vice President of Administration and oversaw the finances of Trend Group in Connecticut. Trend Group was primarily a financial services business and Lease Trend, one of its subsidiaries, was mainly in the business of leasing equipment, which it had purchased, to end users of the equipment. The lessee submitted an application to Lease Trend and agreed to make periodic payments once the equipment was delivered, installed and accepted. To obtain financing for the purchase of the equipment, Lease Trend borrowed money from a funding source, such as a bank. The funding source, in turn, would get a security interest in the equipment and an assignment from Lease Trend of the payments it was to receive from the lessee.
In July 1984, Trend Group established a one-year, $2 million revolving line of credit with Banque de L'Union Europeenne ("BUE"), a French bank, to finance equipment lease transactions. To draw upon the line of credit, Trend Group was to present a complete lease package, including a lease signed by the lessee and a letter from a financing source stating that it would lend money for permanent financing of the equipment. The money BUE lent to Trend Group was to be partial financing for the purchase of the equipment, to pay the manufacturer while he finished installing the equipment. Trend Group was permitted to borrow the funds from BUE for 180 days.

Rogers and Hoffman were the individuals at Lease Trend responsible for administering the BUE line of credit. As of August 15, 1984, Trend Group had tendered signed leases it had on hand to borrow approximately $950,000 from BUE. Despite this, by the end of August 1984, Trend Group had, according to Hoffman, "almost zero cash in the company." Hoffman testified that he reported this to Rogers and the two of them agreed to submit falsified lease packages to BUE *1027 and to borrow money on this collateral. Hoffman constructed phony lease packages and brought them to Rogers, who signed his own name on behalf of Trend Group and forged the signatures of the lessee where required. Hoffman and Rogers submitted fifteen to twenty phony lease packages. By March 1985, Trend Group had exhausted its $2 million line of credit with BUE, and there was no possibility of drawing further on the line of credit. Trend Group began falling behind on interest payments for both the phony and legitimate leases, as some of both types of leases remained in BUE's possession longer than the 180 days permitted under the revolving credit line. In late March 1985, Christiane Godchaux, whose duties included loan administration and documentation at BUE, began requesting the payment of back interest and explanations of why the older leases had not been repaid within 180 days.

Hoffman responded in a series of letters and telexes. He testified that he was "stalling for time." In these communications, Hoffman falsely represented the status of the phony lease packages and stated false excuses for the late payments. Hoffman discussed these series of communications with Rogers before sending each of them out. In one telex, sent on June 4, 1985, Hoffman falsely stated that several leases held by BUE for nearly a year were experiencing installation problems, and he set out a schedule of when the equipment covered by the leases should be installed. In a letter dated June 6, 1985, Hoffman offered to exchange four older legitimate leases for a new phony lease. He then forwarded a phony lease package with Focus 4, Inc., a California printing concern, as the lessee. In the lease package, Rogers had forged the signatures of Focus 4 officials. Hoffman testified that this lease package was sent out so that Trend Group would not have to repay BUE $191,000 then owing on the four older leases. BUE permitted the exchange of the four older leases with the Focus 4 lease. Through June 1985, Godchaux continued to request from Trend Group payment of unpaid interest and principal. On June 25, 1985, Hoffman sent her another telex falsely stating that the leases in BUE's possession would be taken out in accordance with the schedule set out in the June 4, 1985 telex.

Trend Group never repaid the $2 million it had borrowed under the line of credit with BUE. BUE sued and obtained a judgment against Lease Trend, and made efforts to collect on the leases it held as collateral. Prior to indictment, Rogers executed for the prosecution's benefit a written waiver of the statute of limitations for any offenses committed on or after May 30, 1985.

On June 12, 1990, a four-count indictment was filed against Rogers and Hoffman. Count One charged them with conspiring to commit wire fraud, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1343, and conspiring to transport forged and fraudulent securities in interstate and foreign commerce, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 2314. The objects of the conspiracy were the creation by Rogers and Hoffman of a scheme to defraud investors to obtain money and property by means of false and fraudulent representations and promises using wire communications, and the transportation of forged securities in interstate commerce. The indictment alleged that the conspiracy was achieved by the defendants and their co-conspirators via the forging and creation of fictitious equipment leases which were provided to BUE, as collateral, to induce BUE to advance monies to Lease Trend; and that the defendants and their co-conspirators forged and created fictitious equipment leases and assorted documentation, and provided them to BUE so that Lease Trend would not have to repay earlier loans. Listed also as overt acts were: Hoffman's sending of telexes from Lease Trend's Connecticut office to Paris, France, on June 4 and 25, 1985; Rogers' causing a letter to be sent from Lease Trend to Godchaux at BUE on June 6, 1985; and that on June 6 and 21, 1985, Hoffman caused letters to be sent from Lease Trend to Godchaux at BUE. Count Two charged Rogers and Hoffman with committing wire fraud through a telex wire communication on approximately June 4, 1985, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1343, and Count Three charged them with committing wire fraud through a telex wire communication on approximately June 25, 1985. Under Count Four, Rogers and Hoffman were charged with transporting *1028 a fraudulent security in interstate commerce on or about June 6, 1985, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 2314.

Prior to trial, Rogers moved to dismiss Counts One through Three, claiming that the alleged conspiracy had terminated in March 1985 and that prosecution under the conspiracy and substantive wire fraud counts was barred by the five-year statute of limitations, 18 U.S.C. s 3282. He moved also to dismiss Count Four because the Focus 4 lease was not a security within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. s 2311. In an order dated January 24, 1991, the district court denied his motion, ruling that the statute of limitations had not lapsed, and that the Focus 4 lease was a security as a matter of law. Also, the court denied Rogers' request for a hearing to offer testimony on the question of whether the equipment lease named in Count Four was a security.

On January 2, 1991, Hoffman pleaded guilty to Count Four of the indictment and agreed to testify on behalf of the Government at Rogers' trial. On January 7, 1991, the Government moved to disqualify as Rogers' attorney, Gary D. Rafsky, Esq., who is Rogers' son. In its memorandum of law in support of the motion, the Government asserted that in preparation for trial it had recently discovered that Rafsky had represented Hoffman at a 1986 deposition in connection with a civil lawsuit arising out of the same facts; that it anticipated that Hoffman would be a key trial witness against Rogers; and that this created a conflict of interest for Rafsky. The Government argued that Rafsky, in representing Rogers and cross-examining Hoffman, would unfairly rely upon confidential attorney-client communications he received from Hoffman, and that Rafsky, to avoid becoming a fact-witness at trial, might limit his cross-examination of Hoffman, which might impair his representation of Rogers.

A hearing was held the next day, at which Hoffman joined in the Government's motion. After hearing the Government's presentation, the judge asked Rafsky his "perception" on the motion for his disqualification. Rafsky responded:

I do believe it's clear that there is a conflict in my representation, particularly in light of the fact that having just learned that Mr. Hoffman will be a key witness and in that regard, while I am not happy with the prospect of disqualification, I understand what the obligations are and would have to concur with the government in that respect.

Rafsky also stated that when he had suggested to Rogers the possibility of continuing to represent him, but not to cross-examine Hoffman, Rogers had decided against such a limitation. After a brief discussion, the court excused Rafsky from the case as Rogers' primary attorney. The Assistant United States Attorney then stated: "Mr. Rogers is in court, and I should note for the record that he has been present throughout this entire proceeding." The judge then instructed Rogers that he could apply for the appointment of counsel, if warranted under his present economic circumstances. Thereafter, John Burke, Esq., was appointed, pursuant to the Criminal Justice Act, as substitute counsel.

On January 24, 1991, Burke raised the issue of whether Rafsky would be able to assist in Rogers' defense "in any way possible with the exception of the cross examination or anything to do with Mr. Hoffman in this matter." The district court issued an order the next day addressing that issue. In that order, the court directed that in any consultation between Rafsky, as former counsel to Rogers, and Burke, as successor counsel, Rafsky was not to reveal and Burke was not to inquire into any confidential information or secrets Rafsky had obtained during his previous representation of Hoffman. Burke was also not to engage in any discussions referring to that representation with Rogers or anyone else on the defense team.

On June 3, 1991, Rogers' jury trial began. Prior to the selection of the jury, Burke requested that Rafsky be permitted to sit at counsel table and that, with respect to the prior deposition, if the Government wanted "to make an issue out of it that he represented Mr. Hoffman, that's their business." The district judge ruled that Rafsky could sit at counsel table and that the Government would *1029 be permitted to elicit that Hoffman was represented at the deposition by Rafsky. Hoffman was the only witness who testified that Rogers was involved in the crimes. During Hoffman's testimony, the Government elicited that Rafsky was Lease Trend's corporate attorney, that he had attended the deposition with Hoffman, and that before the deposition Rogers told Hoffman: "Don't do anything to hurt yourself." Hoffman stated that he believed that Rogers meant he was to protect himself and that if he had told the truth during the deposition he would not have been protecting himself. On cross-examination, Hoffman stated that he lied approximately twenty to thirty times during the deposition. After the Government rested, Rogers did not put on a defense case, but defense counsel moved for a judgment of acquittal. The court denied the motion.

In its instructions to the jury, the court charged that the Focus 4 lease was a security as a matter of law, and the court, without objection, charged the jury that it had to consider whether the communications alleged to have occurred after May 30, 1985, were designed to lull BUE into a false sense of security, postpone its ultimate complaint to the authorities and make the apprehension of Rogers less likely than if those communications had not taken place. The jury returned with verdicts of guilty on all counts. On February 18, 1992, Rogers was sentenced to concurrent terms of four years' imprisonment on Counts One and Two; and to concurrent terms of five years' probation on Counts Three and Four, to be commenced following his imprisonment. A mandatory special assessment was imposed upon each count. Rogers is now serving his sentence. This appeal followed.

DISCUSSION

On appeal, Rogers contends that his convictions under Count One--the conspiracy count--and Counts Two and Three--the substantive wire fraud counts--were barred by the statute of limitations. He notes that, in accordance with Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391, 396, 77 S.Ct. 963, 969, 1 L.Ed.2d 931 (1957), the Government had to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he was responsible for an act, on or after May 30, 1985, that was executed in furtherance of a continued main object of the alleged scheme. Rogers maintains that the trial evidence established that Lease Trend drew its last funds from BUE in March 1985 and that the indictment did not allege, either as an object or a means of the scheme, an agreement by the co-conspirators to conceal the alleged conduct, either before or after the main objects of the conspiracy were accomplished. Consequently, he argues that the sending of the telexes in June 1985 was not charged as part of the original conspiracy and that the prosecution should not have been permitted to rely upon that evidence.

Grunewald v. United States considered the statute of limitations in conspiracy prosecutions. The Supreme Court stated:

> [T]he crucial question in determining whether the statute of limitations has run is the scope of the conspiratorial agreement, for it is that which determines both the duration of the conspiracy, and whether the act relied on as an overt act may properly be regarded as in furtherance of the conspiracy.

353 U.S. at 397, 77 S.Ct. at 970 (footnote omitted). Grunewald noted that "a vital distinction must be made between acts of concealment done in furtherance of the main criminal objectives of the conspiracy, and acts of concealment done after these central objectives have been attained, for the purpose only of covering up after the crime." Id. at 405, 77 S.Ct. at 974 (emphasis in original). "Thus, the life of a conspiracy cannot be extended for statute of limitations purposes by acts of concealment occurring after the conspiracy's criminal objectives have been fully accomplished even if those acts are 'done in the context of a mutually understood need for secrecy.' " United States v. Fletcher, 928 F.2d 495, 499 (2d Cir.) (quoting Grunewald, 353 U.S. at 402, 77 S.Ct. at 972), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 67, 116 L.Ed.2d 41 (1991).

[1] We disagree with Rogers' contention that the statute of limitations barred his prosecution under Count One. Count One herein charged that Rogers and Hoffman conspired to, inter alia, commit wire fraud, *1030 and that the sending of the telexes in June 1985 was part of that conspiracy. In the context of wire fraud, the Supreme Court has stated that mailings occurring after the receipt of goods obtained by fraud are within the statute if those mailings were designed "to lull the victims into a false sense of security, postpone their ultimate complaint to the authorities, and therefore make the apprehension of the defendants less likely than if no mailings had taken place." United States v. Lane, 474 U.S. 438, 451-52, 106 S.Ct. 725, 733, 88 L.Ed.2d 814 (1986) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted). In this case, based upon the evidence presented at trial, the jury could have properly found that the conspiracy to commit wire fraud, which was charged in Count One of the indictment, was not complete until after the June 1985 telexes were submitted to BUE. As such, the June 1985 communications listed in Count One were overt acts of the conspiracy that took place within the statute of limitations. See United States v. Elkin, 731 F.2d 1005, 1008-09 (2d Cir.) (fraudulent verification letter sent to Government two years after defendant had received improperly obtained money from Government was part of scheme to defraud Government), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 822, 105 S.Ct. 97, 83 L.Ed.2d 43 (1984). Similarly, prosecution of Rogers for wire fraud, under Counts Two and Three of the indictment, was not barred by the statute of limitations because the June 1985 communications could properly be considered by the jury to have been designed to lull BUE into not discovering the alleged fraud. Lane, 474 U.S. at 451-52, 106 S.Ct. at 733.

[2] Rogers also challenges the sufficiency of the evidence under Counts Two and Three. According to him, there was insufficient evidence of an intent by him to join Hoffman in sending the June telexes. He argues that the Government did not prove that, within the statute of limitations, he personally sent or instructed anyone to send telexes on June 4 and 25, 1985.

We do not agree. Under the wire fraud statute, the Government was required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Rogers caused a wire communication to be transmitted for the purpose of executing his scheme to defraud. See 18 U.S.C. s 1343. For purposes of the wire fraud statute, "an act [can be] caused not simply when it was a physical consequence of the person's conduct but when, in addition, the actor either knew the consequence would occur or its occurrence was reasonably foreseeable." United States v. Muni, 668 F.2d 87, 89-90 (2d Cir.1981) (footnote omitted).

Herein, Hoffman testified that in late August 1984 he reported to Rogers that there was almost no cash in Lease Trend, that the two of them agreed to submit falsified lease packages to BUE as collateral, and to borrow money on this collateral. Hoffman thereafter composed phony lease packages and Rogers forged the signatures of the lessee, where required, on these documents. After Lease Trend had submitted these leases and exhausted its line of credit and began falling behind on interest payments, BUE began requesting the payment of back interest. Hoffman then sent out a series of telexes, including communications on June 4 and 25, 1985, which falsely represented the status of the phony lease packages and misrepresented reasons for the late payments. He testified that he discussed both of these communications with Rogers before sending them out. Based upon this evidence, the jury could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that Rogers was consulted prior to when the challenged communications were sent out, that these communications were integral to the scheme to defraud BUE, of which Rogers was a part, and that these communications were a reasonably foreseeable part of the scheme. United States v. Keats, 937 F.2d 58, 64 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 399, 116 L.Ed.2d 348 (1991).

[3] Next, Rogers argues that he was denied his sixth amendment right to counsel of choice. Rogers claims that Rafsky was not subject to disqualification because there was no previous attorney-client relationship between him and Hoffman, since Rafsky was representing Lease Trend, and not Hoffman at the deposition. Rogers also claims that he did not waive his sixth amendment right to counsel because in considering the Government's motion to disqualify Rafsky, the district *1031 court failed to advise him personally of his right to counsel and to question him personally.

A criminal defendant's sixth amendment right to counsel of choice is circumscribed in several important respects. For instance, a defendant may not "insist on the counsel of an attorney who has a previous or on-going relationship with an opposing party, even when the opposing party is the Government." Wheat v. United States, 486 U.S. 153, 159, 108 S.Ct. 1692, 1697, 100 L.Ed.2d 140 (1988). Nor can a defendant insist upon being represented by an attorney "where the attorney in question is potentially in a position to use privileged information obtained during prior representation of the movant." United States v. James, 708 F.2d 40, 45 (2d Cir.1983) (quotation marks and citations omitted).

Rogers is correct that, when Hoffman testified at the deposition, it was on Lease Trend's behalf, see Fed.R.Civ.P. 30(b)(6), and that it was not Hoffman but Lease Trend, the corporation, on whose behalf Rafsky appeared. Accordingly, Lease Trend was the client and the holder of any attorney-client privilege with respect to any information Rafsky may have obtained in relation to the deposition. See Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n v. Weintraub, 471 U.S. 343, 348-49, 105 S.Ct. 1986, 1990-91, 85 L.Ed.2d 372 (1985). The record does not indicate Lease Trend's position regarding the possible use by Rafsky, in his defense of Rogers, of information obtained during his employment at Lease Trend. Our observation in United States v. Cunningham, 672 F.2d 1064, 1072 (2d Cir.1982), is equally pertinent here:

> No case has been called to our attention, and we are aware of none, in which an attorney has been disqualified on grounds of conflicting prior representation solely at the behest of a person other than the former client or its privy.... '[A]s a general rule, courts do not disqualify an attorney on the grounds of conflict of interest unless the former client moves for disqualification.' The refusal to disqualify in the absence of a motion by the former client is all the more appropriate in the context of a criminal prosecution with its implication of constitutional rights.

(quoting In re Yarn Processing Patent Validity Litigation, 530 F.2d 83, 88 (5th Cir.1976) (footnotes omitted)). We believe, however, that in this case, Hoffman, as an employee at Lease Trend when he was deposed, should be considered a privy of the company. As such, his joinder in the motion to disqualify Rafsky was sufficient to assert the adverse nature of his interest in the confidences he may have disclosed to Rafsky vis-a-vis Rogers' continued representation by Rafsky, and presented the district judge "with a plain duty to act" on the disqualification motion. Yarn Processing, 530 F.2d at 89. In this Circuit, when faced with a motion to disqualify a criminal defendant's attorney, and the defendant indicates that he desires to waive his right to representation by an attorney without a conflict of interest, a district court must:

> (i) advise the defendant of the dangers arising from the particular conflict; (ii) determine through questions that are likely to be answered in narrative form whether the defendant understands those risks and freely chooses to run them; and (iii) give the defendant time to digest and contemplate the risks after encouraging him or her to seek advice from independent counsel.

United States v. Iorizzo, 786 F.2d 52, 59 (2d Cir.1986) (citation omitted). We have also stated that motions for disqualification should be made pre-trial. Id.

[4] We reject Rogers' contention that his right to counsel was violated because the district court failed to advise him personally of his right to counsel and to question him personally prior to disqualifying Rafsky. The record supports the district court's conclusion that Rafsky could no longer participate as Rogers' primary attorney, but that he could, with certain limitations, continue to assist in Rogers' defense. Upon discovering that Rafsky, as corporate counsel, and Hoffman, an employee of Lease Trend, had attended a deposition in connection with a civil lawsuit arising out of the same facts, the government moved to disqualify Rafsky. At a hearing on the motion, Rafsky agreed to *1032 withdraw, stating "while I am not happy with the prospect of disqualification, I understand what the obligations are and would have to concur with the Government in that respect." He also stated that Rogers had considered and previously rejected the possibility of Rafsky continuing to represent him, but not cross-examining Hoffman. It would have been preferable for the court to personally address Rogers, who was present in the courtroom during the entire proceeding, to insure that he had been properly advised of his constitutional rights. Although Rogers was not questioned as to Rafsky's imminent disqualification, the district court did not abuse its discretion in disqualifying Rafsky. "Federal courts have an independent interest in ensuring that criminal trials are conducted within the ethical standards of the profession and that legal proceedings appear fair to all who observe them.... Thus, where a court justifiably finds an actual conflict of interest, there can be no doubt that it may decline a proffer of waiver, and insist that [a] defendant[ ] be [represented by conflict-free counsel]." Wheat, 486 U.S. at 160, 162, 108 S.Ct. at 1697, 1698.

Rogers contends that the district court denied him his sixth amendment right to a jury trial on each issue of fact when it decided as a matter of law that the Focus 4 leases were "securities," and so charged the jury.

[5] We agree with Rogers' claims on this issue. A trial court's decision not to charge the jury on all the elements of a charged crime is an error that has the effect of relieving the prosecution of its burden of proving every element beyond a reasonable doubt. United States v. Smith, 939 F.2d 9, 10-11 (2d Cir.1991) (per curiam) (citing Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307, 313, 105 S.Ct. 1965, 1970, 85 L.Ed.2d 344 (1985)). As the Supreme Court noted recently, in reversing a conviction entered after the jury was given constitutionally deficient instructions:

> The [sixth amendment right to a jury trial] includes, of course, as its most important element, the right to have the jury, rather than the judge, reach the requisite finding of "guilty." Thus, although a judge may direct a verdict for the defendant if the evidence is legally insufficient to establish guilt, he may not direct a verdict for the [prosecution], no matter how overwhelming the evidence.

Sullivan v. Louisiana, --- U.S. ----, ----, 113 S.Ct. 2078, 2080, 124 L.Ed.2d 182 (1993) (citation omitted).

Section 2314 prohibits the transportation in commerce of stolen goods, wares, and merchandise valued at $5,000 or more, stolen securities, or falsely made, forged, altered, or counterfeited securities. The term "security," as used in s 2314, is defined in 18 U.S.C. s 2311. [FN1] Herein, the district court relied upon United States v. Wexler, 621 F.2d 1218 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 841, 101 S.Ct. 119, 66 L.Ed.2d 48 (1980), to rule against Rogers.

In Wexler, we held that the defendants, by conceding the issue at trial, had waived their ability to challenge in this Court the issue of whether the equipment leases therein were "securities" within the meaning of ss 2311 and 2314. Id. at 1222-23. In any event, we went on to state that "securities are 'instruments which have intrinsic value and are recognized and used as such in the regular channels of commerce,' " id. at 1223 (citing United States v. Canton, 470 F.2d 861, 864 (2d Cir.1972)) (emphasis in original), and that "it appears that the decision in each case depends upon the particular facts of that case." Id. at 1224 n. 4. We then analyzed the trial evidence and concluded that "each *1033 equipment lease in this case is the type of instrument Congress intended to and did include in the definition contained in s 2311." Id. at 1225.

FN1. Section 2311, in part, provides:
"Securities" includes any note, stock certificate, bond, debenture, check, draft, warrant, traveler's check, letter of credit, warehouse receipt, negotiable bill of lading, evidence of indebtedness, certificate of interest or participation in any profit-sharing agreement, collateral-trust certificate, preorganization certificate or subscription, transferable share, investment contract, voting-trust certificate; valid or blank motor vehicle title; certificate of interest in property, tangible or intangible; instrument or document or writing evidencing ownership of goods, wares, and merchandise, or transferring or assigning any right, title, or interest in or to goods, wares, and merchandise; or, in general, any instrument commonly known as a "security", or any certificate of interest or participation in, temporary or interim certificate for, receipt for, warrant, or right to subscribe to or purchase any of the foregoing, or any forged, counterfeited, or spurious representation of any of the foregoing ...

[6][7] We believe that it may have been proper for the court to determine preliminarily whether or not an item could possibly be a security. See Canton, 470 F.2d at 862 (New York motor vehicle certificate not "security" as defined in s 2311); cf. In re Vericker, 446 F.2d 244, 248 (2d Cir.1971) (FBI documents not "goods," "wares" or "merchandise" under, inter alia, s 2314). But once the court concluded that the Focus 4 leases may have been securities, then, provided there was sufficient evidence in the case and upon timely request, Rogers was entitled to have the judge instruct the jury on what a security is and to let the jury decide whether the items at issue were securities. See United States v. Johnson, 718 F.2d 1317, 1323-25 (5th Cir.1983) (en banc). The district court prevented Rogers from presenting evidence in support of his claim that the Focus 4 leases were not securities, declined to instruct the jury on this issue, and the indictment did not set forth an alternative theory of prosecution for Rogers' alleged violation of s 2314. See United States v. Jackson, 576 F.2d 749, 756 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 828, 99 S.Ct. 102, 58 L.Ed.2d 122 (1978). We therefore conclude that Rogers suffered a "structural error" in the trial process and that his conviction under Count Four must be reversed, and remanded to the district court for appropriate proceedings. Sullivan, --- U.S. at ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2083; Smith, 939 F.2d at 11.

[8] We do not agree with Rogers' further contention that a reversal on Count Four affects his convictions under Counts One through Three. Count One charged a conspiracy, the objects of which were to commit wire fraud and to transport forged and fraudulent securities in commerce. Counts Two and Three charged Rogers with substantive wire fraud. Thus, although we reverse Count Four, which supported one of the objects of the conspiracy, the indictment alleged, and the jury found, that Rogers engaged in other conspiratorial conduct, namely, the sending of a telex on approximately June 4, 1985 with intent to defraud (Count Two) and the sending of a telex on approximately June 25, 1985 with intent to defraud (Count Three). Thus, Rogers' convictions under Counts One through Three are unaffected. See Brennan v. United States, 867 F.2d 111, 114-16 (2d Cir.) (affirming general jury verdict finding conspiracy to violate and substantive RICO violation predicated upon wire fraud and violations of the Travel Act, despite subsequent invalidation by the district court of the wire fraud convictions because "[t]he very same telephone calls that formed the basis of every separate wire fraud count also formed the basis of a Travel Act count.") (emphasis in original), cert. denied, 490 U.S. 1022, 109 S.Ct. 1750, 104 L.Ed.2d 187 (1989).

CONCLUSION

We find no merit in the remaining issues Rogers raises on appeal. We affirm the district court's judgment of conviction on Counts One through Three of Rogers' indictment, charging him with conspiracy to commit wire fraud, and substantive wire fraud. However, we reverse the district court's judgment of conviction on Count Four of Rogers' indictment, charging him with transporting a fraudulent security in interstate or foreign commerce, and remand to the district court for appropriate proceedings, because the judge was erroneous on the law.

FISWICK et al.
v.
UNITED STATES.
No. 51.
Dec. 9, 1946.
Argued Nov. 19, 20, 1946.

Ferdinand Fiswick, Jacob F. Mayer and Fritz Gustav Rudolph were convicted of conspiring to defraud the United States in the exercise of its governmental functions, which conviction was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, 153 F.2d 176, and the defendants bring certiorari.

Reversed.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

225 *213 Frederick M. P. Pearse, of Washington, D.C., for petitioners.

Leon Ulman, of Washington, D.C., for respondent.

Mr. Justice DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Alien Registration Act of 1940, 54 Stat. 670, 8 U.S.C. s 451 et seq., 8 U.S.C.A. s 451 et seq., required aliens, with certain exceptions, to register pursuant to regulations of the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization. [FN1] Among the disclosures required was whether during the preceding five years the alien had been 'affiliated with or active in (a member of, official of, a worker for) organizations, devoted in whole or in part to influencing or furthering the political activities, public relations, or public policy of a foreign government.' [FN2]

FN1 See 5 Fed.Reg. 2836 for the regulations.

FN2 Regulations, supra, note 1, s 29.4(1)(15).

Petitioners are German nationals who registered under the Act, the last of the three, Mayer, registering on December 23, 1940. Each stated when he registered that he was not affiliated with or active in such an organization. Each failed to disclose in 226 answer to another question pertaining to 'memberships or activities in clubs, organizations, or societies' that he was in any way connected with the Nazi party. They were indicted in 1944 with 28 others for conspiring to defraud the United States in the exercise of its governmental functions (see Curley v. United States, 1 Cir., 130 F. 1, 4) in violation of s 37 of the Criminal Code, 18 U.S.C. s 88, 18 U.S.C.A. s 88.

*214 The indictment charges that petitioners continuously between September 1, 1939, and the date the indictment was returned, September 13, 1944, conspired with each other and with Draeger, the German consul in New York City and leader of the Nazi party in this country, with Draeger's secretary, Vogel, and with other representatives of the Third Reich, to defraud the United States by concealing and misrepresenting their membership in the Nazi party. It charges that since 1933 the Nazi party was devoted to furthering the political activities and policy of the German Reich in this country, that each petitioner during the five years prior to his registration was a member of that party, that Draeger and Vogel directed petitioners in registering under the Act to conceal and falsify their connection with the Nazi party, that petitioners followed such directions, that after their registration they continued from day to day to misrepresent to the government their connection with and activities in the Nazi party. The indictment alleges that as a means of accomplishing the conspiracy the petitioners appeared for registration and in registering falsely failed to disclose their connection with and activities in the Nazi party. The indictment sets forth 40 overt acts. Many related to instructions given by Draeger and Vogel to various defendants from September to December 1940, in connection with their registration. Others related to the registering by petitioners in November and December, 1940. The last over act alleged to have been committed by any of petitioners was the filing by Mayer of his registration statement on December 23, 1940.

Of the 31 indicted, only the three petitioners were convicted after a jury trial. [FN3] Fiswick and Rudolph were sentenced *215 to imprisonment for 18 months each. Mayer was sentenced to imprisonment for a year and a day. The judgments of conviction were affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, one judge dissenting. 3 Cir., 153 F.2d 176. The case is here on a petition for a writ of certiorari which we granted because the rulings of the lower courts on the continuing nature of the conspiracy were apparently in conflict with decisions of this Court. See United States v. Irvine, 98 U.S. 450, 25 L.Ed. 193; United States v. Kissel, 218 U.S. 601, 31 S.Ct. 124, 54 L.Ed. 1168.

FN3 Six entered pleas of guilty. There was a dismissal as to one, a severance as to 14. Ten were tried. The jury acquitted three and disagreed as to the other four.

First. The nature and duration of the conspiracy assumed great importance at the trial for the following reason. Each petitioner after he was apprehended made damaging statements to agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Mayer, in November, 1943, stated that he had applied for membership in the Nazi party and had not disclosed the fact because Vogel told him not to. Fiswick's statement made in April, 1944, was to the same effect. Rudolph made substantially the same admissions in November, 1943, and then in September, 1944, retracted them insofar as he had said that in registering under the Act and in failing to disclose his Nazi party affiliation he had followed instructions. His later reason for non-disclosure was his asserted desire to protect his family. Each of these statements was admitted at the trial. At first, each was admitted only as against the maker. At the close of the government's case, however, the District Court ruled that each of these statements was admissible against each of the other coconspirators. It so charged the jury. Later the jury returned to the courtroom for further instructions. One of the questions on which the foreman stated that they desired instruction 227 related to that part of the charge 'where you said something about all of the defendants were bound by the act of one or something, something as a group, and the other said the individuals.' *216 The judge then repeated that the admissions of each were admissible against all provided there was a conspiracy and they were all in it.

[1][2][3][4][5][6] The Solicitor General now rightly concedes that that ruling was erroneous. Though the result of a CONSPIRACY may be continuing, the CONSPIRACY does not thereby become a continuing one. See United States v. Irvine, supra. Continuity of action to produce the unlawful result, or as stated in United States v. Kissel, supra, page 607 of 218 U.S., at page 126 of 31 S.Ct., 54 L.Ed. 1168, 'continuous co-operation of the conspirators to keep it up' is necessary. A CONSPIRACY is a partnership in crime. United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 253, 60 S.Ct. 811, 858, 84 L.Ed. 1129. Under s 37 of the Criminal Code, the basis of the present indictment, an overt act is necessary to COMPLETE the offense. [FN4] The statute of LIMITATIONS, unless suspended, [FN5] RUNS from the last overt act during the existence of the CONSPIRACY. Brown v. Elliott, 225 U.S. 392, 401, 32 S.Ct. 812, 815, 56 L.Ed. 1136. The overt acts averred and proved may thus mark the duration, as well as the scope, of the CONSPIRACY.

FN4 At common law it was not necessary to aver or prove an overt act. See Hyde v. United States, 225 U.S. 347, 359, 32 S.Ct. 793, 799, 56 L.Ed. 1114, Ann.Cas.1914A, 614. The same is true under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 15 U.S.C.A. ss 1--7, 15 note. Nash v. United States, 229 U.S. 373, 378, 33 S.Ct. 780, 782, 57 L.Ed. 1232; United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., supra, at page 252 of 310 U.S., at page 857 of 60 S.Ct., 84 L.Ed. 1129. But s 37 of the Criminal Code requires not only an agreement to do the unlawful act but also the doing of 'any act to effect the object of the conspiracy'. See Hyde v. United States, supra, at page 359, of 225 U.S., at page 799 of 32 S.Ct., 56 L.Ed. 1114, Ann.Cas.1914A, 614.

FN5 See, for example, s 1 of the Act of August 24, 1942, 56 Stat. 747, 18 U.S.C.Supp. II, s 590a, as amended by s 19(b) of the Act of July 1, 1944, 58 Stat. 649, 667, 18 U.S.C.Supp. IV, s 590a, 18 U.S.C.A. s 590a.

In this case the last overt act, as we have noted, was the filing by Mayer of his registration statement on December 23, 1940. That act was adequate as an overt act in furtherance of a conspiracy to make a false return. But there is difficulty in also making it serve the function of an overt act in furtherance of a conspiracy to conceal from 1940 to 1944 the fact that false returns had been *217 made. All continuity of action ended with the last overt act in December, 1940. There was no overt act of concealment which followed the act of making false statements. If the latter is permitting to do double duty, then a continuing result becomes a continuing conspiracy. If, as we think, the conspiracy charged and proved did not extend beyond the date of the last overt act, the admissions of each petitioner were improperly employed against the others. While the act of one partner in crime is admissible against the others where it is in furtherance of the criminal undertaking, Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U.S. 640, 66 S.Ct. 1180, and cases cited, all such responsibility is at an end when the conspiracy ends. Logan v. United States, 144 U.S. 263, 309, 12 S.Ct. 617, 632, 36 L.Ed. 429; Brown v. United States, 150 U.S. 93, 98, 14 S.Ct. 37, 39, 37 L.Ed. 1010. Moreover, confession or admission by one coconspirator after he has been apprehended is not in any sense a furtherance of the criminal enterprise. It is rather a frustration of it. If, as the Circuit Court of Appeals thought, the maintenance of the plot to deceive the government was the objective of this conspiracy, the admissions made to the officers ended it. So far as each conspirator who confessed was concerned, the plot was then terminated. He thereupon ceased to act in the role of a conspirator. His admissions were therefore not admissible against his erstwhile fellow-conspirators. Gambino v. United States, 3 Cir., 108 F.2d 140, 142, 143.

228 [7] It is earnestly argued, however, that the error was harmless. The 'harmless error' statute, Judicial Code, s 269, 28 U.S.C. s 391, 28 U.S.C.A. s 391, provides that 'On the hearing of any appeal, certiorari, * * * or motion for a new trial, in any case, civil or criminal, the court shall give judgment after an examination of the entire record before the court, without regard to technical errors, defects, or exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties.' We have recently reviewed the history of this statute and the function *218 it was designed to serve in criminal cases. Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 66 S.Ct. 1239. The Court there stated, page 1248 of 66 S.Ct.: 'If, when all is said and done, the conviction is sure that the error did not influence the jury, or had but very slight effect, the verdict and the judgment should stand, except perhaps where the departure is from a constitutional norm or a specific command of Congress. * * * But if one cannot say, with fair assurance, after pondering all that happened without stripping the erroneous action from the whole, that the judgment was not substantially swayed by the error, it is impossible to conclude that substantial rights were not affected. The inquiry cannot be merely whether there was enough to support the result, apart from the phase affected by the error. It is rather, even so, whether the error itself had substantial influence. If so, or if one is left in grave doubt, the conviction cannot stand.'

[8] We cannot say with fair assurance in this case that the jury was not substantially swayed by the use of these admissions against all petitioners. It is not enough to say that there may be a strong case made out against each petitioner. The indictment charges a conspiracy, not the substantive crime of falsely registering. The evidence that petitioners conspired with each other and with Draeger, Vogel, and others, is not strong. Though we assume there was enough evidence to go to the jury on the existence of that conspiracy, the case was one which a prosecutor would be anxious to bolster.

The prosecutor's case, apart from the admissions, may be briefly summarized. Draeger and Vogel were active in the affairs of the Nazi party in this country. Their stenographer, a government witness, testified that applications for membership in the party were received at their *219 office. Dues were paid there. A car file of members of the party and of applicants for membership was kept there. The name of each petitioner was on the list. A letter was sent to all on the list in August or September, 1940, over Draeger's signature, requesting them to discuss a matter with Draeger. Those who appeared in response to the letter were told to conceal their Nazi party membership or affiliation when they registered under the Act. Another witness for the government--a defendant in the case who was granted a severance--also testified that Vogel gave instructions to party members not to disclose their affiliation with the Nazi party. And a clerk in Draeger's office testified for the government that the party members who came to the consulate were told to say in their registration statement that they were members of an innocuous sounding association of German nationals. There was no evidence that petitioners came to the consulate seeking advice. There was no direct evidence that petitioners had received the instructions from the consulate to conceal their party membership. There was no direct evidence that petitioners came to the consulate in response to the letter which was sent. They were not identified as being with any group which called there. There was no evidence that they conferred with Draeger or Vogel or with each other.

The Solicitor General states with commendable candor that in this state of the proof it was manifestly important for the prosecutor 'to bring into the case against petitioners evidence of a character that might better convince the jury that when each failed to reveal his Party connection in registering he had done so upon Party instructions, and, hence, that he was a member of the conspiracy.' The admissions served that purpose. They supplied the first direct evidence that petitioners 229 acted pursuant to the instructions of the consulate. It is true, *220 as respondent emphasizes, that none of these admissions implicates any petitioner except the maker. But since, if there was a conspiracy, Draeger and Vogel were its hub, evidence which brought each petitioner into the circle was the only evidence which cemented them together in the illegal project. And when the jury was told that the admissions of one, though not implicating the others, might be used against all, the element of concert of action was strongly bolstered, if not added. Without the admissions the jury might well have concluded that there were three separate conspiracies, not one. Cf. Kotteakos v. United States, supra. With the admissions the charge of conspiracy received powerful reinforcement. And the charge that each petitioner conspired with the others became appreciably stronger, not from what he said but from what the other two said. We therefore cannot say with any confidence that the error in admitting each of these statements against the other petitioners did not influence the jury or had only a slight effect. Indeed, the admissions may well have been crucial. The admissions apparently became of considerable importance in the deliberations of the jury, for, as we have noted, they asked for clarification of the instructions on that point. And the admissions so strongly bolstered a weak case that it is impossible for us to conclude the error can be disregarded under the 'harmless error' statute. The use made of the admissions at the trial constituted reversible error.

[9] Second. A further question remains. As we have noted, Fiswick was sentenced to imprisonment for 18 months. No fine was imposed. It now appears that he has served his sentence. Accordingly, it is suggested that the cause is moot and that the writ of certiorari should be dismissed as to him. We followed that procedure in St. Pierre v. United States, 319 U.S. 41, 42, 63 S.Ct. 910, 911, 87 L.Ed. 1199, saying that since the sentence had been served, 'there was no longer a subject *221 matter on which the judgment of this Court could operate.' We added, however, that the petitioner had not shown that 'under either state or federal law further penalties or disabilities can be imposed on him as a result of the judgment which has now been satisfied.' At page 43 of 319 U.S., at page 911 of 63 S.Ct., 87 L.Ed. 1199.

The situation here is different. Fiswick is an alien. An alien sentenced to imprisonment for one year or more 'because of conviction in this country of any crime involving moral turpitude' is, unless pardoned, subject to deportation if the crime was committed within five years after the alien's entry into the United States. 39 Stat. 874, 889, 8 U.S.C. s 155, 8 U.S.C.A. s 155. The conspiracy with which Fiswick is charged was formed and executed within that five year period, as his last entry was in 1937. The conspiracy of which he was convicted was one to impede the government in one of its lawful functions, to prevent it from obtaining information which the Executive and Congress deemed vital to our internal security, to conceal by fraud, deceit, and perjury [FN6] the ramifications of an organization in our midst bent on our undoing. We need not determine in this collateral way whether conviction for such a crime would involve 'moral turpitude' within the meaning of the deportation laws. [FN7] But the judgment, 230 if undisturbed, stands as unimpeachable evidence that Fiswick committed *222 the crime charged. The hazards of deportation because of that fact are real. [FN8] To leave him to defend a deportation order on the ground that the crime of which he was convicted did not involve 'moral turpitude' is to add to his burdens by depriving him of his best defense--that he was not properly convicted.

FN6 The registration statements required by the Act were sworn statements. Regulations, supra note 1, s 29.4(g), (j).

FN7 Convictions for perjury, Kaneda v. United States, 9 Cir., 278 F. 694, for frauds on the revenues, Guarneri v. Kessler, 5 Cir., 98 F.2d 580, United States ex rel. Berlandi v. Reimer, 2 Cir., 113 F.2d 429, for frauds with respect to property, United States ex rel. Medich v. Burmaster, 8 Cir., 24 F.2d 57, have been held by the lower courts to meet that test. And counterfeiting was so classified by the Court in United States ex rel. Volpe v. Smith, 289 U.S. 422, 53 S.Ct. 665, 77 L.Ed. 1298. As to deportation for violations of the Alien Registration Act of 1940 see s 20(b)(4) and (5). See also Alien Enemy Act of 1798, Rev.Stat. ss 4067--4070, as amended 40 Stat. 531, 50 U.S.C. ss 21--24, 50 U.S.C.A. ss 21--24; Presidential Proclamation No. 2655, 10 Fed.Reg. 8947.

FN8 Although deportation is not technically a criminal punishment, it may visit great hardship on the alien. Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135, 147, 65 S.Ct. 1443, 1449, 89 L.Ed. 2103. As stated by the Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Brandeis, in Ng Fung Ho. v. White, 259 U.S. 276, 284, 42 S.Ct. 492, 495, 66 L.Ed. 938, deportation may result in the loss 'of all that makes life worth living.'

Moreover, other disabilities or burdens may flow from the judgment, improperly obtained, if we dismiss this cases as moot and let the conviction stand. If Fiswick seeks naturalization, he must establish that during the five years immediately preceding the date of filing his petition for naturalization he 'has been and still is a person of good moral character.' 54 Stat. 1137, 1142, 8 U.S.C. s 707(a)(3), 8 U.S.C.A. s 707(a)(3). An outstanding judgment of conviction for this crime stands as ominous proof that he did what was charged and puts beyond his reach any showing of ameliorating circumstances or explanatory matter that might remove part or all of the curse. And even though he succeeded in being naturalized, he would, unless pardoned, carry through life the disability of a felon; [FN9] and by reason of that fact he might lose certain civil rights. [FN10] Thus Fiswick has a substantial stake in the judgment of conviction which survives the satisfaction of the sentence imposed on him. In no practical sense, therefore, can Fiswick's case be said to be moot.

FN9 'All offenses which may be punished by death or imprisonment for a term exceeding one year, shall be deemed felonies.' Criminal Code s 335, 18 U.S.C. s 541, 18 U.S.C.A. s 541.

FN10 Thus Mo.R.S.A. s 4561 renders such person incompetent to serve on a jury and forever disqualifies him from voting or holding office, unless pardoned.

*223 It is said however, that having served his sentence, Fiswick may not be resentenced on a new trial and that if his conviction is reversed, he thereby escapes deportation. The argument is that he thwarts the deportation policy by electing to serve his sentence. We cannot assume, however, that Fiswick is guilty of the conspiracy charged. He was not accorded the trial to which he is entitled under our system of government. The conviction which he suffered was not in accordance with law. The errors in the trial impeach the conviction; and he must stand in the position of any man who has been accused of a crime but not yet shown to have committed it. To dismiss his case as moot would permit the government to compound its error at Fiswick's expense. That course does not comport with our standards of law enforcement.

Reversed.

v.
DONAHUE, Joseph P., Appellant.
No. 89-5133.
United States Court of Appeals,
Third Circuit.
Submitted Under Third Circuit Rule 12(6)
Aug. 8, 1989.
Decided Sept. 6, 1989.
Rehearing and Rehearing In Banc Denied Oct. 6, 1989.

Defendant was convicted by jury in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, Richard P. Conaboy, J., of various offenses relating to his participation in money laundering scheme, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Greenberg, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) defendant could be convicted of conspiring to willfully and knowingly avoid filing currency transactions reports on basis of his agreement with bank branch manager to willfully conceal bank's duty to file those reports or by aiding and abetting that violation, even though he himself could not have been held liable for failure to file those reports, and (2) venue on count relating to transportation of currency to Grand Cayman Island without filing of requisite Currency and Monetary Instrument Reports was proper in district where offense "began"--i.e., where defendant, bearing that currency, boarded first of successive flights.

Affirmed.

OPINION OF THE COURT

Before SLOVITER and GREENBERG, Circuit Judges, and FISHER, District Judge. [FN*]

FN* Honorable Clarkson S. Fisher, Judge, United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, sitting by designation.

GREENBERG, Circuit Judge.

On April 19, 1988, a three-count indictment was returned against appellant, Joseph Donahue, and his co-defendant Michael Coffey, in the Middle District of Pennsylvania. Count I charged both defendants, along with unindicted co-conspirator Frederick Luytjes, with conspiring in violation *46 of 18 U.S.C. s 371 [FN1] (1) to willfully and knowingly avoid filing Currency Transaction Reports (CTRs), relating to domestic currency transactions, as required by 31 U.S.C. ss 5313 and 5322; (2) to willfully and knowingly avoid filing Currency and Monetary Instrument Reports (CMIRs), relating to international transfer of currency and monetary (negotiable) instruments, as required by 31 U.S.C. ss 5316 and 5322; and (3) to defraud the United States of lawful revenue in violation of the foregoing currency transaction reporting laws, as well as 26 U.S.C. ss 7201 and 7206. Count II charged Donahue and Coffey, as well as Luytjes, with a substantive and aiding and abetting violation, 18 U.S.C. s 2, of 31 U.S.C. ss 5316 and 5322, by transporting, causing to be transported, or aiding and abetting the transportation of approximately $1,000,000 in currency from Lackawanna County, Pennsylvania, to the Grand Cayman Island, British West Indies, without filing the CMIRs. [FN2] Count III of the indictment charged Coffey alone with a substantive violation of 31 U.S.C. ss 5313 and 5322. [FN3] On motion by the government the defendants' trials were severed and, on November 16, 1988, Donahue was convicted at a jury trial on Counts I and II. He appeals his conviction on both counts. For the reasons that follow we will affirm.

FN1. 18 U.S.C. s 371 provides:
If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States, or any agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such persons do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

FN2. Count II also charged violations of 31 U.S.C. ss 1101 and 1059, the predecessors of ss 5316 and 5322(b).

FN3. Again, Count III also charged violation of 31 U.S.C. s 1059.

I.

Donahue's conviction stems from his participation in a money laundering scheme with Coffey, branch manager of United Penn Bank in Scranton, Pennsylvania, and Luytjes, a drug trafficker. Luytjes, who had entered into a plea agreement with the government and was its primary witness at Donahue's trial, testified that in 1984, he was tried in Florida for drug trafficking and ultimately was acquitted. During the course of his trial, however, he managed to earn between $10 and $13 million from drug smuggling, which he planned to stash away in the event he was convicted. [FN4] He and his agents deposited $10 million of these proceeds into accounts at United Penn Bank. Luytjes testified that he told Coffey, the officer with whom he dealt at United Penn, that the money had come from the sale of his business, Air America, and that he had written up a fictitious agreement to sell the company and represented that the buyer had paid him in cash. [FN5] He further testified that Coffey asked him if he would be interested in smuggling money to the Cayman Islands in order to avoid paying taxes on it, and that they agreed that Coffey would launder $4 million in exchange for a fee of $100,000. Pursuant to this agreement, Luytjes on various occasions delivered cash to Coffey. Although Coffey refused to disclose to Luytjes how he was transporting the money to the Cayman Islands, he introduced Luytjes to Donahue, suggesting that Luytjes might want to invest in Donahue's scuba diving business in the Cayman Islands. According to Luytjes, Donahue revealed to him that he was working with Coffey in moving Luytjes' money to the Cayman Islands.

FN4. Luytjes testified as to how he did this as follows: On the weekends of the trial I scheduled approximately seven flights, seven weekends of the 11-week trial. And I would leave Tampa, the court, and fly back to Pennsylvania, get in another airplane, fly down to Colombia, spend the night, get up in the morning, fly back to the United States on Sunday morning and get back to Pennsylvania Sunday night, get in another airplane, fly back to Tampa and go back to court for the week.

FN5. Luytjes had unusual assistance in carrying out this farce, as the agreement of sale was prepared by a large Philadelphia law firm which thought the sale was legitimate.

Donahue and Coffey dealt with the cash Coffey received from Luytjes in a number *47 of different ways. On one occasion, Coffey converted a million dollars in cash received from Luytjes into five cashier's checks of $200,000 each. Coffey filled out a CTR upon receipt of the cash, but never filed it. Coffey gave the cashier's checks to Donahue, who transported them to Grand Cayman Island. On other occasions Coffey gave Donahue cash, which Donahue took to various banks in Pennsylvania and New York for conversion into cashier's checks under $10,000 which he then transported to Grand Cayman Island. [FN6] Finally, from time to time Donahue would transport cash given to him by Coffey, apparently in $200,000 allotments, from Pennsylvania to Grand Cayman Island. Coffey did not file CTRs for the cash he gave to Donahue. Donahue never filed a CMIR when he left this country.

FN6. A total of 143 cashier's checks were purchased in northern Pennsylvania in amounts less than $10,000, and deposited in Donahue's accounts in the Cayman Islands.

Upon arrival at Grand Cayman Island, Donahue would deposit the cash and cashier's checks into his own bank accounts, from which it was transferred into Luytjes' accounts there. Donahue told Luytjes that he was being paid $50,000 for his role in the money laundering scheme.

As part of his plea agreement with the government, Luytjes taped a number of his conversations with Donahue. Various statements made by Donahue on these tapes indicate his knowing participation in the above-described money laundering scheme. [FN7]

FN7. After his acquittal in Florida, Luytjes decided to report his drug trafficking proceeds as income and pay taxes on them. Again using the ruse of the sale of Air America, he reported the money as a long-term capital gain rather than as ordinary income so as to pay less tax. Id.

II.

[1] Donahue's primary challenge to his conviction on Count I of the indictment relates to the charge that he, Coffey and Luytjes conspired, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371, to willfully and knowingly avoid filing CTRs in violation of 31 U.S.C. ss 5313 and 5322. The essence of his argument is that he was held criminally liable for "structuring" currency transactions, conduct which, during the relevant time period, was not unlawful.

31 U.S.C. s 5313(a) authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to require both financial institutions and other participants in a currency transaction to file a report on the transaction. During the time period relevant to this case, the Secretary required only financial institutions to file reports on transactions of more than $10,000. 31 C.F.R. s 103.22(a) (1983). Nothing in the Act or regulations expressly prohibited a bank customer from "structuring" transactions to keep each transaction under $10,000, in order to avoid triggering, or in an attempt to conceal, the bank's obligation to file.

In United States v. Mastronardo, 849 F.2d 799 (3d Cir.1988), we held that prior to the Act's 1986 amendment, [FN8] a customer could not be held criminally liable for structuring transactions to avoid the reporting requirements. The defendants in Mastronardo, all bank customers, had been convicted of participating in a conspiracy to defraud the United States in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371, and participating in a scheme to conceal material facts from the United States in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1001. We noted that "while this appeal does not involve a specific conviction for the act of 'structuring' transactions, both the s 1001 convictions and the s 371 conspiracy convictions rely upon the purported illegality of 'structuring' in order to impose criminal liability upon these defendants." Id. at 803-04. We went on to reverse these convictions, reasoning that the statute and regulations "did not give a reasonable bank customer fair notice that 'structuring' cash transactions to avoid the reporting requirement is criminal." Id. at 804.

FN8. In 1986 Congress expressly proscribed the structuring of transactions to evade the reporting requirements. See 31 U.S.C. s 5324.

Although Donahue maintains that our decision in Mastronardo mandates reversal of his conviction, we fully agree with the *48 district court's contrary determination. [FN9] As the district court recognized, the theory of the government's case on the conspiracy charge was not that Donahue conspired to violate section 5313 by structuring transactions, but rather that he did so by agreeing with Coffey to willfully conceal United Penn's duty to file CTRs or by aiding and abetting that violation. When Luytjes delivered quantities of cash exceeding $10,000 to Coffey, Coffey should have but did not file reports of the transactions, and Donahue collaborated in Coffey's efforts to conceal that the cash had ever been received. Donahue was convicted, then, not in the capacity as a bank customer or for conduct involving structuring, but rather as a co-conspirator or abettor in a financial institution's scheme to avoid filing CTRs. Thus, Mastronardo is inapposite. The fact that part of the scheme to conceal involved structuring transactions at other banks is immaterial.

FN9. We regard the Mastronardo issue in the context of this appeal, as well as the venue issue discussed below, as involving the interpretation and application of legal precepts and thus we are undertaking a plenary review on these issues. United States v. Adams, 759 F.2d 1099, 1106 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 906, 971, 106 S.Ct. 275, 336, 88 L.Ed.2d 236, 321 (1985).

While Donahue himself could not have been held liable for a failure to file CTRs, this does not foreclose his criminal liability for conspiring to do so. A person, even though incapable of committing the underlying substantive offense, can be convicted of conspiracy under 18 U.S.C. s 371. See, e.g., United States v. Hayes, 827 F.2d 469, 472-73 (9th Cir.1987). The same is true of aiding and abetting under 18 U.S.C. s 2(a). See United States v. Standefer, 610 F.2d 1076, 1085 (3d Cir.1979) (in banc), aff'd, 447 U.S. 10, 100 S.Ct. 1999, 64 L.Ed.2d 689 (1980). [FN10]

FN10. Although Count I of the indictment does not specifically charge Donahue with "aiding and abetting" under 18 U.S.C. s 2(a), the absence of specific reference to 18 U.S.C. s 2 in an indictment is not fatal. See United States v. Catena, 500 F.2d 1319, 1323 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1047, 95 S.Ct. 621, 42 L.Ed.2d 641 (1975). Here, the district court in fact charged the jury under an aiding and abetting theory.

Our recent decision in United States v. American Investors of Pittsburgh, Inc., 879 F.2d 1087 (3d Cir.1989), lends support to our analysis here. There, we affirmed the conviction of one of the defendants [Zytnick] for conspiring with a financial institution to circumvent the currency reporting laws in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371 and/or aiding and abetting the scheme in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 2(a). The evidence established that Zytnick collaborated in the financial institution's violation, not by structuring transactions, but by concealing the extent of his transactions through various other means. [FN11] We recognized that "under United States v. Mastronardo, Zytnick could not be charged with the substantive offense of failing to file CTRs since he had no duty to do so." 879 F.2d at 1103. We nonetheless affirmed his liability on conspiracy and aiding and abetting grounds, noting that "the relief afforded to customers under Mastronardo does not apply to Zytnick...." 879 F.2d at 1103 n. 20. [FN12]

FN11. In fact, one of Zytnick's arguments was that "if he had been aware of the CTR requirement he could have structured his transactions to avoid any violation." 879 F.2d at 1103 n. 20.

FN12. We also held in American Investors that a customer of a financial institution could be held criminally liable for willfully causing the institution to fail to file CTRs pursuant to 31 U.S.C. s 5313 and 18 U.S.C. s 2(b), and that Mastronardo did not compel a contrary holding because there the defendants had been acquitted of violating 18 U.S.C. s 2(b). Under American Investors, liability under sections 5313 and 2(b) can be imposed on a customer if (1) the financial institution had the legal obligation to file CTRs--i.e., the legal capacity to commit the crime--and if (2) the customer had the intent to preclude the financial institution from filing CTRs.

In sum, we reject Donahue's argument that under Mastronardo his conviction on Count I must be reversed. Because we find Donahue's remaining objections to his conviction on that count likewise lacking in merit, we will affirm his conviction on Count I. [FN13]

FN13. Donahue challenges his conviction on Count I on an alternative ground in relation to that portion of the count charging him with conspiring to defraud the United States by participating in a scheme to evade income taxes in violation of 31 U.S.C. ss 5313, 5316 and 5322 and 26 U.S.C. ss 7201 and 7206. He maintains, inter alia, that the district court improperly failed to charge the jury that in order to convict Donahue on this charge, the evidence had to establish that he had the specific intent to help Luytjes evade his taxes, and that in any event such evidence was lacking. The district court charged the jury that it had to find a "mutual understanding" to "move money in such a way, money of Mr. Luytjes in such a way that the government would be deprived of the ability ... to decide whether or not there was a tax ... due," in which scheme Donahue "willfully and intentionally" joined. Thus, the district court apprised the jury of exactly what Donahue claims it did not know. Furthermore, we find that the evidence introduced by the government was sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict on this charge.

*49 III.

[2] Donahue's principal contention that his conviction on Count II of the indictment must be reversed is predicated on a claim that venue of the charge on that count was improper in the Middle District of Pennsylvania. "Congress has incorporated the basic constitutional provisions on venue in Rule 18 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure which provides, in relevant part, that 'the prosecution shall be had in a district in which the offense was committed.' " United States v. Passodelis, 615 F.2d 975, 977 (3d Cir.1980). Donahue contends that the crime charged in Count II was not committed in the Middle District of Pennsylvania. We, however, agree with the government that Count II involves an offense "begun in one district"--the Middle District of Pennsylvania--"and completed in another" under 18 U.S.C. s 3237(a) and therefore could be prosecuted in the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

As noted earlier, Count II charged Donahue with violating 31 U.S.C. ss 5316 and 5322 by knowingly transporting currency from Pennsylvania to Grand Cayman Island without filing reports required by the Secretary of the Treasury. [FN14] Section 5316(a) provides in relevant part:

FN14. Count II charged that such transportation was "part of a pattern of illegal activity involving transactions of more than one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000) in a 12-month period" so as to invoke the enhanced penalty provided by 31 U.S.C. s 5322(b). The count also charged Donahue with aiding and abetting the substantive violation, thus leading the government to contend, brief at 20, that his "accessorial acts in the Middle District of Pennsylvania" justified venue there. While there may be force to this contention, inasmuch as Donahue in Pennsylvania assisted Coffey and Luytjes in the transportation of the money and they might each be viewed as a person who "has transported" monetary instruments, we prefer to predicate our decision on Donahue's direct conduct as a transporter.

(a) ... a person or an agent or bailee of the person shall file a report under subsection (b) of this section when the person, agent, or bailee knowingly--
(1) transports, is about to transport, or has transported, monetary instruments of more than $10,000 at one time--
(A) from a place in the United States to or through a place outside the United States[.] [FN15]

FN15. In October of 1984, section 5316(a)(1) was amended to raise the amount transported from $5,000 to $10,000. The text of section 5316(a) was amended in 1984 and 1986 but not materially to this case. We quote the 1986 version.

Section 5316(b) directs that the report be filed "at the time and place the Secretary of the Treasury prescribes." In turn, the applicable regulations provide that the report must be filed "at the time of departure," "with the Customs officer in charge at any port of ... departure." 31 C.F.R. s 103.26(b)(1), (3).
In its efforts to prove the charges in Count II, the government introduced evidence at trial that on a variety of occasions Donahue flew from Pennsylvania to Miami, where he changed planes and continued directly on to Grand Cayman Island. [FN16] Donahue asserts, and the government does not dispute, that "[a]ll of the evidence showed that Donahue went through Customs in Miami," and that "the government neither alleged nor proved that Donahue had a legal duty to file CMIRs in the M.D. of Pa." Appellant's brief at 33. Asserting *50 that " 'where the crime charged is failure to do a legally required act, the place fixed for its performance fixes the situs of the crime,' " Donahue maintains that the government failed to establish venue in Pennsylvania because the "situs of the crime" was Miami--the place where the reports should have been filed. Brief at 28-34 (citing Johnston v. United States, 351 U.S. 215, 220, 76 S.Ct. 739, 742, 100 L.Ed. 1097 (1956)).

FN16. The government introduced, inter alia, some of Donahue's plane tickets and travel itineraries documenting various of his trips to and from Grand Cayman Island. Government Exhibits 18.1, 18.2. The exhibits showed that the layovers in Miami were only a few hours at most.

The problem with this analysis is that it focuses on one aspect of the conduct proscribed by section 5316, the failure to file a report, to the exclusion of the other element of the offense--the transportation of currency. It is true, as Donahue notes, that it is often helpful to look at the statutory verb in the description of the offense in determining where an offense was committed. See, e.g., 2 Wright, Federal Practice & Procedure: Criminal 2d s 302 (1982). However, his choice of "file" in 31 U.S.C. s 5316(a) as the only relevant verb in the section ignores the fact that standing alone the failure to file a report is not unlawful; such failure must be accompanied by the knowing transportation of currency out of the country to become a crime. Although Donahue cites a case, addressing issues other than venue, for the proposition that " 'the crime which [s 5316] punishes is not the transportation of more than [$10,000] in currency out of the United States, but rather the failure to file the required report,' " appellant's brief at 37, [FN17] the fact remains that absent the transportation or intent to transport the failure to file is unobjectionable. [FN18] Thus, Count II of the indictment charged that the offense was the transportation of the currency, without the filing of the report.

FN17. Donahue cites United States v. Rojas, 671 F.2d 159, 162 (5th Cir.1982). See also United States v. Warren, 612 F.2d 887, 891 (5th Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 956, 100 S.Ct. 2928, 64 L.Ed.2d 815 (1980).

FN18. Moreover, in making his venue argument Donahue relies not upon the language of section 5316 itself, which merely requires a report to be filed "at the time and place the Secretary of the Treasury prescribes," but upon the federal regulations implementing the Act. The fact that Congress did not explicitly designate the place of filing weakens any argument that it intended to restrict venue in the manner Donahue suggests.

In view of the foregoing, we agree with the government that the conduct underlying Donahue's conviction on Count II constituted an offense "begun in one district and completed in another" under 18 U.S.C. s 3237(a). [FN19] The evidence established that Donahue, bearing large sums of currency, on various occasions boarded a plane in Pennsylvania, [FN20] changed planes in Florida without filing the requisite report, and proceeded on to Grand Cayman Island. In our view, this uninterrupted series of events is properly regarded as one continuing offense for purposes of venue, beginning in Pennsylvania and ending in Grand Cayman Island. Cf. United States v. Rigdon, 874 F.2d 774, 779-80 (11th Cir.1989) (venue for failure to file CTR as required by 31 U.S.C. s 5313 not only proper in Washington, D.C., where CTRs can be filed, but also in *51 Northern District of Florida where cash was exchanged for cashier's checks.)

FN19. That section provides:
s 3237. Offenses begun in one district and completed in another
(a) Except as otherwise expressly provided by enactment of Congress, any offense against the United States begun in one district and completed in another, or committed in more than one district, may be inquired of and prosecuted in any district in which such offense was begun, continued, or completed.

Any offense involving the use of the mails, transportation in interstate or foreign commerce, or the importation of an object or person into the United States is a continuing offense and, except as otherwise expressly provided by enactment of Congress, may be inquired of and prosecuted in any district from, through, or into which such commerce, mail matter, or imported object or person moves.

FN20. Donahue's airline tickets indicate that he flew from Scranton/Wilkes Barre in the Middle District of Pennsylvania to Philadelphia, then from Philadelphia to Miami, and then on to the Grand Cayman Island. The stop in Philadelphia does not affect the existence of venue in the Middle District of Pennsylvania under our analysis. We, of course, are not concerned with whether venue would have been proper if Donahue had picked up the currency in Miami, rather than leaving Pennsylvania with it.

We agree with the government that this case is distinguishable from Travis v. United States, 364 U.S. 631, 81 S.Ct. 358, 5 L.Ed.2d 340 (1961), cited by Donahue. In Travis, the defendant was charged with filing a false non-Communist affidavit with the National Labor Relations Board in violation of section 9(h) of the National Labor Relations Act, and section 35A of the Criminal Code (since replaced by 18 U.S.C. s 1001). Although the affidavits were filed in Washington, D.C., the defendant was tried in Colorado, where he had executed and mailed them. The Court held that venue lay only in Washington, D.C., rejecting the government's argument that the charged offense was a continuing one under section 3237 beginning in Colorado. The Travis court did state that "[w]hen a place is explicitly designated where a paper must be filed, a prosecution for failure to file lies only at that place." Id. at 636, 81 S.Ct. at 362. While, viewed in a vacuum, this statement arguably lends support to Donahue's position, in Travis "only the single act of having a false statement at a specified place [was] penalized." Id. at 637, 81 S.Ct. at 362. [FN21] Transportation of the document was not an element of the offense in Travis. Here, however, as discussed above, the elements of the offense included not only a failure to file but also the transportation of currency outside of the country, and thus Travis is not controlling. [FN22]

FN21. Significantly, the Court noted that section 9(h) provided only that the Board could not make investigations or issue complaints on questions raised by labor organizations unless non-Communist affidavits were filed, and did not require the filing of such affidavits. It stated that "[i]f it had, the whole process of filing, including the use of the mails, might logically be construed to constitute the offense." Id. at 635, 81 S.Ct. at 361. Here, in contrast to Travis, filing was required by the applicable regulations.

FN22. A number of courts have limited Travis to its particular facts. See, e.g., United States v. Mendel, 746 F.2d 155, 165 (2d Cir.1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1213, 105 S.Ct. 1184, 84 L.Ed.2d 331 (1985) (

" 'the decision [in Travis] surely was meant to be confined to the facts on the unusual statute involved' " (citations omitted)); United States v. Herberman, 583 F.2d 222, 227 (5th Cir.1978) (Travis does not mandate that every defendant whose forms are filed in another district must defend there). We also note that Donahue relies on our decision in United States v. Valenti, 207 F.2d 242 (3d Cir.1953), which was approved in Travis. For the same reasons we find Travis not controlling, Valenti is not applicable here.

Indeed, the second paragraph of section 3237(a), which has been described as "a specific application of the general provision about continuing offenses in the first paragraph of the section," Wright, supra, s 303, expressly provides that offenses involving foreign commerce are continuing and may be prosecuted in any district "from, through or into which such commerce ... moves" (emphasis added). We think that for venue purposes, this case is more analogous to those involving the transportation of stolen objects in interstate or foreign commerce than to "one-step crime" [FN23] cases like Travis, where the only act of significance was the false filing. Cf. United States v. Infanti, 474 F.2d 522, 527 (2d Cir.1973) (prosecution for transporting stolen stock certificates in foreign commerce in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 2314 proper in district where stolen certificates in possession of co-defendant before transportation began.) [FN24] While the mere transportation of the currency outside of the country was not unlawful, it became so when coupled with Donahue's failure to file the CMIRs.

FN23. See United States v. Dekunchak, 467 F.2d 432, 438 (2d Cir.1972).

FN24. We see no reason to hold that the fact that no national boundary had yet been crossed when Donahue left Pennsylvania defeats venue there. While we will assume, arguendo, that under 31 U.S.C. s 5316 the offense was not completed in Pennsylvania, undoubtedly the commission of the offense was eventually completed and the transportation in the Middle District of Pennsylvania was an integral part of it. Cf. United States v. Hankish, 502 F.2d 71 (4th Cir.1974) (offense of transporting goods stolen from interstate commerce committed as soon as defendants began transporting them, not when they crossed state line, and venue under section 3237 proper in district where transportation began.)

*52 In sum, we hold that Donahue's commission of the offense proscribed by section 5316--the transportation of currency from the United States to a place outside the country without filing a report--began in the Middle District of Pennsylvania, where he boarded the first of the successive flights which ultimately would land him in Grand Cayman Island, and that venue was proper there, even assuming that the report required by section 5316 could only have been filed in Miami. [FN25]

FN25. Because of our holding it is unnecessary to address the government's alternative argument that Donahue waived his right to challenge venue by not timely raising the challenge.

IV.

Although Donahue voices a variety of other objections to his conviction, we find them to be lacking in merit. [FN26] Accordingly, we will affirm his conviction on both counts of the indictment.

FN26. Donahue contends that a recorded conversation between himself and Luytjes introduced at trial should have been suppressed under 18 U.S.C. s 2515, which prohibits the use as evidence of certain intercepted wire or oral communications. Although 18 U.S.C. s 2511(2)(c) sets forth an exception to 18 U.S.C. s 2515 when the communication is intercepted by a "person acting under color of law" and "one of the parties to the communication has given prior consent to such interception," Donahue maintains that the exception is inapplicable here because Luytjes did not voluntarily consent to the interception but was misled into doing so by false promises in his plea agreement. Despite Donahue's efforts to characterize his objection as involving Luytjes' consent to the interception, what he is really challenging is the government's authority to grant Luytjes what he indisputably received by virtue of his plea agreement; he maintains, for instance, that the government lacked the authority to compromise Luytjes' civil tax liability in the agreement but does not claim that the government reneged on this promise. We therefore reject Donahue's challenge to his conviction on this basis.
Donahue raises a number of other grounds for reversal of his conviction, including claims that the Assistant United States Attorney should have been recused; that he breached a rule of professional conduct; and that certain hearsay testimony was improperly allowed at trial. We have examined these arguments and find them lacking in merit.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Harold V. GLEASON, Paul Luftig and J. Michael Carter, Defendants-Appellants.

Nos. 125, 126 and 137, Dockets 79-1147, 79-1151 and 79-1208.
United States Court of Appeals,
Second Circuit.
Argued Oct. 9, 1979.
Decided Dec. 19, 1979.
Certiorari Denied March 17, 1980. See 100 S.Ct. 1320.

Former officers of national bank were convicted before the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, Thomas P. Griesa, J., of making false entries in bank records with intent to defraud and CONSPIRING to perpetrate such frauds on the federal Government, bank shareholders and prospective lenders, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Mansfield, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) although improper, instruction likening job of jury's drawing an inference to a spectator at a football game who, having observed quality of play, makes certain inferences concerning the coaching provided was not reversibly erroneous; (2) since object of alleged CONSPIRACY was to falsify operating statements for the first quarter to make it appear that the bank had earned a profit, it was not necessary that each coconspirator have comprehended full scope of the scheme, i. e., false evaluation of securities as well as fictitious foreign exchange transactions; (3) instruction that term "individual" in false entry statute included depositors was not inflammatory; and (4) although deceptive foreign exchange transactions actually took place and were reflected in bank's books, the subject entries, showing a profit rather than loss, were "false entries".

Affirmed.

110k1172.2
Although circumstantial evidence instruction likening the job of the jury drawing an inference to the spectator at a football game who, having observed the quality of play, makes certain inferences concerning the coaching being provided, was ill-conceived, confusing and inappropriate it did not require reversal of conviction of high bank officers of making false entries in bank records with intent to defraud as jury was otherwise advised of nature of circumstantial evidence, was repeatedly told to use common sense in drawing inferences and court carefully stated that "football coach" example was an illustration and had nothing to do with the case. 18 U.S.C.A. ss 1005, 1014.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW k785(3)
110k785(3)
It is the trial court's duty, in instructing on witness' credibility, to give balanced instructions.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW k785(3)
110k785(3)

Where the trial court points out that testimony of certain types of witnesses may be suspect and should therefore be scrutinized and weighed with care, such as that of accomplices or coconspirators, those who have made plea bargains or are awaiting sentence, those who have been granted immunity, and defendants, it must also direct the jury's attention to the fact that it may well find such witnesses to be truthful in whole or part; in short, the court should not emphasize the suspect nature of the testimony of certain witnesses without pointing out that they may be believed.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW k811(5)
110k811(5)
Although a trial judge has the right to comment on credibility of specific witnesses, such right is limited and its exercise is appropriate only when necessary to assist the jury.

[5] CRIMINAL LAW k742(1)
110k742(1)
Credibility issues are left solely to the jury which, as the conscience of the community, is expected to act with sound judgment.

110k785(3)
Although credibility was essential issue in view of diametrically conflicting testimony of government witnesses, including accomplices, and the defendants, charge on credibility was not weighted in favor of the Government where court pointed out that the Government is frequently required to rely on participants, accomplices and persons who have committed crimes and that jury must view such witnesses with particular caution and scrutinize them with great care and it did not follow that because a person had a vital interest he was not capable of telling the truth and that it was for the jury to determine credibility.

Alleged motives of bank officials, charged with falsifying operating statements with intent to defraud, were relevant but were not elements of the crime and were not required to be proven. 18 U.S.C.A. ss 371, 1005, 1014.

91k40.1
To be convicted as a member of a CONSPIRACY, a defendant need not know every objective of the CONSPIRACY, every detail of its operation or means employed to achieve the agreed-upon criminal objective or even the identity of every coconspirator; however, there must be agreement on the essential nature of the plan and on the kind of criminal conduct in fact contemplated. 18

[9] CONSPIRACY k24.5
91k24.5
Formerly 91k23
A CONSPIRATOR must agree to and participate in a scheme which he knows to have an illegal objective. 18 U.S.C.A. s 371.

91k40.1
If in course of a CONSPIRACY there occur other illegal acts not specifically contemplated by an individual CONSPIRATOR but reasonably akin to the anticipated illegality and in furtherance or in consequence of the scheme, a CONSPIRATOR may not on that account escape liability for participation in the CONSPIRACY. 18 U.S.C.A. s 371.

91k48.2(2)
CONSPIRACY instruction in prosecution of high bank officers for CONSPIRING to make false entries in bank records was sufficient, notwithstanding contention that CONSPIRACY involved two distinct transactions, i. e., false evaluation of securities and fictitious foreign exchange transactions, since instructions described general goal and various federal offenses alleged to have been committed, with court selecting one of the alleged objects in interest of simplicity and expounding thereon, and jury was told that to convict they must find a single CONSPIRACY of the type alleged and that acquittal was necessary if jury found two separate, independent CONSPIRACIES. 18 U.S.C.A. ss 371, 1005.

91k40.1
As long as jury, in prosecution of high bank officials for CONSPIRING to make false entries in bank records with intent to defraud and making false statements to federally insured bank to influence fulfillment of loan commitment, found one CONSPIRACY to falsify bank books in order to produce a false income statement and that each defendant played a part in the CONSPIRACY it was unnecessary for the Government to establish that each defendant agreed to each of the unlawful acts, i. e., false evaluation of securities and entry into fictitious foreign exchange contracts, or means that might be used to achieve that goal. 18 U.S.C.A. ss 371, 1005, 1014.

110k1173.2(2)
Even if it was error to deny bank president a charge that if jury found a CONSPIRACY to falsify quarterly earnings statement solely by fictitious exchange transactions it should not convict him, error was harmless as jury could have found that CONSPIRACY was not carried out solely by fictitious foreign exchange transactions. 18 U.S.C.A. ss 371, 1005, 1014.

91k48.2(2)
Evidence that each defendant, including high bank officers, in his own way joined in a scheme to falsity bank's earnings statement was sufficient to permit the giving of a Pinkerton charge with respect to the reasonably foreseeable crimes that might be committed by fellow CONSPIRATORS in furtherance of that scheme, especially since obvious purpose of falsifying earnings statement was to commit frauds, notwithstanding that there was little evidence of bank president's knowledge of or participation in fictitious foreign exchange transactions or of chairman of the board's participation in false evaluation of the trading account securities. 18 U.S.C.A. ss 371, 1005, 1014.

210k144.1(1)
Count charging senior vice-president of bank's investment division with making false entries in bank records with intent to defraud by causing bank to enter into fictitious foreign exchange contracts showing a nonexisting profit would not be dismissed on ground that the vice-president had not personally participated in foreign exchange transactions since under the evidence the jury could find that the vice-president joined a CONSPIRACY to falsify bank's first-quarter financial statement and could reasonably anticipate that his partners in crime might commit other criminal acts, including use of fictitious foreign exchange transactions. 18 U.S.C.A. ss 371, 1005.

91k48.2(2)
Pinkerton charge that CONSPIRACY count related to bank entry statute and that some substantive counts related to Securities Exchange Act and false statements statute but that if any defendant was found guilty on CONSPIRACY count the jury was obliged to reconsider guilt on substantive count under consideration was not objectionable as committing jury, once it found a CONSPIRACY to violate one statutory provision, to hold a CONSPIRATOR liable for violations of other provisions not among the objects of the CONSPIRACY and not done in furtherance thereof, especially when viewed in context and considering the evidence as to substantive violations. 18 U.S.C.A. ss 371, 1005, 1014, 1623; Securities Exchange Act of 1934, ss 10(b), 32, 15 U.S.C.A. ss 78j(b), 78ff.

Since there was sufficient evidence to permit finding that at least one defendant or coconspirator participated in each of the alleged criminal acts, either as a principal, an aider and abettor or under Pinkerton as a coconspirator who could reasonably foresee that substantive crimes might be committed by fellow CONSPIRATORS in furtherance of the CONSPIRACY and absent indication that there was a failure to prove that a defendant committed one of the alleged criminal acts or participated knowingly in commission of such an act by another, refusal to require jury first to identify the principals and then, the aiders and abettors was proper. 18 U.S.C.A. ss 2, 371.

110k792(3)

[20] JURY k31.3(1)
Formerly 230k31(11)
Instruction that term "any * * * individual person" in statute governing false entries in bank records includes depositors and other customers did not destroy bank officers' right to an impartial jury on ground that most jurors were undoubtedly bank depositors since there was no indication that any juror was a depositor of subject bank and there was nothing inflammatory or unfair about such accurate description of the type of person whom the statute is designed to protect or an indication that any defendant was prejudiced. 18 U.S.C.A. s 1005.

[21] CRIMINAL LAW k1172.1(1)

410k270(2)
Although showing that prior to false evaluation of bank securities at issue bank's vice-chairman of investment division engaged in prior similar misconduct without knowledge of vice-president would have some probative value on issue whether he was acting under latter's direction at time of instant transactions it would not preclude a finding that both officers, charged with making false entries in bank records, had joined together in such misconduct and, hence, trial court properly limited vice-president's cross-examination of vice-chairman as to prior transactions, permitting evidence as to one transfer on ground that matter had been opened up on cross-examination. 18 U.S.C.A. s 1005.

[23] CRIMINAL LAW k1153(4)
110k1153(4)
Trial court ruling limiting cross-examination is tested by the standard of whether exclusion of evidence constituted clear abuse of discretion.

110k338(1)
Refusal to permit bank's chief executive officer, charged with making false entries, to testify that several weeks after principal conduct at issue he opposed issuance of press release, as favored by principal stockholder, which failed to disclose certain hidden foreign exchange transactions unrelated to transactions at issue was not abuse of discretion since any dispute between the pair was collateral to matters at issue. 18 U.S.C.A. ss 1005, 1014.

[25] WITNESSES k269(8)
410k269(8)
It was not abuse of discretion, in prosecution of bank officials for making false entries, to preclude chief administrative officer from cross-examining vice-chairman of investment division to bring out that the latter had vigorously opposed before board of directors a management proposal to disband municipal dealer department, which evidence allegedly indicated unlikelihood that vice-chairman would have done president's bidding to falsely value securities by backdating transfers from trading to investment account, as such was outside scope of cross-examination, was tenuous and would have opened up collateral matters. 18 U.S.C.A. s 1005.

110k427(5)
Testimony of partner in CERTIFIED public accounting firm that he was told by senior vice-president of bank's investment division that backdated transfer of government securities had been ordered by someone superior to vice-chairman of investment division was not objectionable as a postconspiracy narrative as to the president, charged with making FALSE entries, as there was sufficient independent evidence that a CONSPIRACY was still alive on date of statement and that president and senior vice-president were participants. Counts charging former officer of national bank with manipulative or deceptive practices in connection with purchase and sale of bank stocks by issuance of false financial statements were not required to be dismissed on ground of alleged failure to prove any reliance by specific purchasers on the false statements since the government need only prove that a false representation is one that a reasonable stockholder would rely on in purchasing or selling the relevant corporate shares, and trial court so instructed the jury. MANSFIELD, Circuit Judge:

Harold V. Gleason, former Chairman of the Board of the Franklin National Bank [FNB], Paul Luftig, its former president and chief administrative officer, and J. Michael Carter, its former senior vice president in charge of its Investment Division, appeal from judgments of the District *9 Court of the Southern District of New York, entered on March 27, 1979, by Judge Thomas P. Griesa after an eight-week jury trial, convicting them (except for dismissal of charges in Count Three against Carter) of (1) making false entries in the bank's records on or about March 31, 1974, by false evaluation of securities with intent to defraud, thereby concealing operating losses in excess of $5 million and making it appear that FNB had a profit of $79,000, for the first quarter of 1974, all in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1005 [FN1] (Count Two), (2) making false entries in the bank's records on or about March 31, 1974, with intent to defraud, by causing FNB to enter into fictitious foreign exchange contracts showing a non-existent profit in excess of $2 million, which falsely made the bank appear to have a profit for the first quarter of 1974 when in fact it had suffered heavy losses, also in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1005 (Count Three),[FN2] (3) making false statements to the Manufacturers Hanover Trust Company on or about April 18, 1974, to influence its action in fulfilling a $35 million loan commitment previously made to FNB, by submitting to Manufacturers Hanover a consolidated income statement for the first quarter of 1974, ending March 31, showing a profit of $79,000 when in fact the bank had suffered losses of over $7 million, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1014 [FN3] (Count Four), (4) employing a manipulative scheme or device during March 1974 and on various dates in April and May 1974, in connection with the purchase and sale of FNB stock by using the foregoing falsifications of bank records to make it appear that the bank had realized a profit for the first quarter of 1974, when in fact it had suffered heavy losses, in violation of 15 U.S.C. ss 78j(b) and 78ff [FN4] (Counts Five through Fourteen), and (5) CONSPIRACY to commit each of the foregoing crimes, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371 (Count One). In addition, Luftig alone was convicted of making false material declarations *10 on or about March 15, 1977, with respect to some of the matters that are the subject of the foregoing charges in his testimony before a grand jury in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1623 (Count Fifteen). Appellants claim that numerous errors were committed in the trial of the case. After careful consideration of each of these contentions we affirm the convictions.

FN1. Title 18 U.S.C. s 1005 provides in pertinent part:
"Whoever makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of such BANK with intent to injure or defraud such BANK, or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of such BANK, or the Comptroller of the Currency, or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, or any agent or EXAMINER appointed to examine the affairs of such BANK, or the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System
"Shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

FN2. The charge in Count Three against Carter was dismissed by the court at the end of the Government's case.

FN3. Title 18 U.S.C. s 1014 provides in pertinent part:
"Whoever knowingly makes any false statement or report, or willfully overvalues any land, property or security, for the purpose of influencing in any way the action of . . . any bank the deposits of which are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, any member of the Federal Home Loan Bank System, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, or the Administrator of the national Credit Union Administration, upon any application, advance, discount, purchase, purchase agreement, repurchase agreement, commitment, or loan, or any change or extension of any of the same, by renewal, deferment of action or otherwise, or the acceptance, release, or substitution of security therefor, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both."

FN4. Title 15 U.S.C. s 78j(b) provides:
"It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, by the use of any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce or of the mails.

"(b) To use or employ, in connection with the purchase or sale of any security registered on a national securities exchange or any security not so registered, any manipulative or deceptive device or contrivance in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors."
Title 15 U.S.C. s 78ff provides:
"(A)ny person who willfully and knowingly makes, or causes to be made any statement in any application, report, or document required to be filed under this chapter or any rule or regulation thereunder . . . which statement was false or misleading with respect to any material fact, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both . . . ."

The evidence, viewed favorably to the Government (as it must be at this stage, Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 80, 62 S.Ct. 457, 86 L.Ed. 680 (1942)), shows that, although FNB suffered an operating loss in excess of $7 million during the three-month period ending March 31, 1974, it issued a financial statement on April 18, 1974, for the same first quarter of 1974 falsely representing that it had realized earnings of approximately $79,000. The financial statement was of special significance to FNB because of its anticipated influence in obtaining Government approval of a proposed FNB merger with Talcott National Corporation, a factoring and finance company, and in borrowing some $35 million from Manufacturers Hanover to be used by FNB for the purchase from Michele Sindona, the principal stockholder of FNB, of his interest in Talcott.[FN5]

FN5. FNB, with deposits at the end of 1973 of $3.7 billion and assets of $5 billion, was a subsidiary of Franklin New York Corporation, registered with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York as a bank holding company. In 1972 Sindona purchased 21.6% of the holding company's outstanding stock for $40 million. In the spring of 1973 Sindona, through a company controlled by him (Fasco) purchased 1.6 million shares of Talcott for $27 million, which he later offered to sell to FNB for a price equal to his cost plus expenses and interest, subject to approval of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Bank pursuant to the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956.

FNB had begun to suffer substantial losses during the first three months of 1974, partly due to a decline in the market value of government securities, which had been acquired with a view to realization of a profit when interest rates declined, but which then fell in value when interest rates increased. By the end of March those losses together with others had swelled to approximately $7 million. The loss was concealed to the extent of about $5 million by falsely showing FNB-owned securities as worth more than the prices at which they should have been carried. The balance of the loss was concealed by having FNB engage in four fictitious foreign exchange transactions with European banks controlled by Sindona and his colleague Carlo Bordoni, who at Sindona's request had served as a director of the holding company, Franklin New York Corporation, which controlled FNB. These bogus transactions made it appear, by using fictitious exchange rates, that FNB had a $2.2 million unrealized profit when in fact its foreign exchange department had suffered a loss.

The false evaluation of securities was accomplished in part by backdating two transfers of government bonds from FNB's bond trading account to its investment account at inflated prices and by one such transfer of municipal and corporate securities at prices which had not been reduced to show losses in value. Securities in the bank's trading account, having been acquired for resale, were required to be carried at the lower of cost or market value, which was computed by determining the value of each security so held at the end of each month. Securities held in FNB's investment or portfolio account, on the other hand, were carried at cost with a straight line adjustment to amortize premiums or discounts. Upon transfer of a security from the bank's trading to its investment account, the bank was required to value the security at the lower of cost or market value on the date of transfer.

On March 26, 1974, Luftig, FNB's President, faced with mounting losses on the part of the bank, learned this evaluation rule from John Sadlik, FNB's chief financial officer, and asked Sadlik whether such a transfer could be backdated if instructions previously given to make the transfer had not been executed. After checking with Cornell Wright of Ernst & Ernst, FNB's independent certified public accountants, *11 Sadlik responded that backdating was permissible if there was documentary verification of the earlier instructions. Luftig then advised Sadlik that he had documentation showing that instructions had been given on March 8, 1974, to transfer $100 million in United States Treasury certificates from the bank's trading to its investment account. The market value of these securities on March 11, 1974, the next business day after March 8th, had been approximately $2 million higher than their value on March 26. Sadlik thereupon arranged for Wright to visit the bank on March 27 in order to verify the documentation of the March 8th instruction which Luftig represented he had given.

On March 27, 1974, according to the testimony of Howard D. Crosse, the bank's Vice-Chairman in charge of its Investment Division, Luftig advised Crosse that if Ernst & Ernst could be convinced that the claimed instruction to transfer the securities had been given on March 8th it would not object to the bank's evaluating the securities as of March 11, 1974, and asked Crosse in substance to assist in making this possible and falsely to tell Wright that the instruction had been given. As Crosse left the room, he first noticed Gleason standing in the doorway. Gleason patted him on the shoulder and said, "Good luck." At a meeting with Wright and Sadlik later the same day, after initial documentation proved unacceptable to Ernst & Ernst, Luftig falsely stated to Wright that the instruction had been given by him earlier in March and prepared a confirmatory memorandum.

On the following day, March 28, at a meeting with Sadlik, Wright and a more senior Ernst & Ernst partner, James Russell, Crosse corroborated Luftig's fraudulent representation by falsely confirming that he had been instructed by Luftig in early March to make the transfer and had relayed the instruction to Carter. The failure to carry out the instruction was then explained to Wright and Russell by J. Michael Carter, the bank's Senior Vice-President in charge of its Investment Division, who falsely told them that the transfer had not been made because he had in effect misunderstood the earlier instruction as one to liquidate rather than to make a transfer between accounts.[FN6] Crosse added support to this explanation by furnishing to Ernst & Ernst his own handwritten memorandum falsely summarizing directions supposedly given to him by Luftig in early March and stating that the failure to execute them had only just been discovered.

FN6. Even assuming that an order to liquidate had been made by Luftig, Carter at trial testified it was not made until March 18, 1974.

Relying upon these false representations Ernst & Ernst did not object to the bank's March 29 transfer of the $100 million in Government securities to its investment account at March 11 market values, which enabled FNB to conceal a loss of about $2 million.

In the meantime, on March 27, 1974, Carter directed employees of the bank to transfer $62.5 million in U.S. Treasury and government agency bonds from the bank's trading account to its investment account at cost rather than at lower market prices in response to his false representation in writing that the securities had been purchased by traders without his consent when he had been instructed to keep security trading positions as low as possible. In fact, as Carter later conceded, the purchases had been authorized by him and he had not received any such instructions to the contrary prior to March 20, 1974. The effect of the transfer of $62.5 million of Government securities at cost was to conceal approximately $2 million in losses suffered by the bank during the first quarter of 1974.

The third transfer, which concealed a loss of approximately another $1 million during the first quarter, was made after Crosse, on or about April 12, 1974, was advised by Carter that municipal and corporate securities in the trading account had not been "marked to market" (i. e., evaluated at the lower of cost or market) at the end of March as was required. This information *12 was passed on by Crosse to Luftig who told Crosse to "transfer them to portfolio (investment account) as best you can." Crosse thereupon directed Carter to transfer the securities to the bank's investment account at March 11 market values, thus concealing an intervening decline in market value of approximately $1 million that had occurred by March 31.

The generation of approximately $2.2 million in fictitious profits from contrived foreign exchange transactions for the quarter ending March 31, 1974, was arranged by Gleason and Peter R. Shaddick, Executive Senior Vice-President of FNB and director of Franklin New York Corp., who was in charge of its International Division. Following a conference with Sindona in London on March 26, 1974, Gleason returned to New York where he advised Shaddick on March 27, 1974, that unless the foreign exchange department showed a $700,000 profit for the month of March the bank would have a loss for the quarter. After advising Gleason that the department would actually have a loss for the month of March Shaddick, upon learning from Andrew N. Garofalo, the head of the bank's foreign exchange department, that the loss would be from $1 million to $11/2 million, told Garofalo that they would probably have to "pass an entry" with Bordoni that would wipe out the loss and create an apparent profit of $700,000. The term "pass an entry" meant entering into a fictitious foreign exchange contract with a European bank controlled by Sidonona and Bordoni, showing a purchase or sale of foreign currencies for future delivery at prices that would permit the bank to show a profit on the bank's earning statement.

Shaddick thereupon revealed to Gleason the loss and the steps that would be taken to reflect the fictitious $700,000 profit, receiving the latter's thanks. On March 28, after Bordoni was advised by Gleason of the foreign exchange department's predicament and agreed to help, Shaddick and Bordoni arranged for the FNB to "pass a contract" with the Amincor Bank in Zurich. Gleason was informed of the arrangement by Shaddick. Thereupon, pursuant to instructions from Shaddick, Garofalo entered into four contracts for future delivery of foreign exchange, two with the Amincor Bank and two with Banca Unione in Milan, a bank controlled by Sindona, of which Bordoni was managing director. The contracts were made at fictitiously high exchange rates unrelated to market prices, enabling the bank's foreign exchange department to show an unrealized profit of $2.2 million on the transactions and a $700,000 profit for the quarter.

The foregoing falsifications enabled FNB and its holding company to show a profit of $79,000 in their quarterly statement published and sent on April 18, 1974, to the bank's stockholders and to Manufacturers Hanover Trust Company, whereas in fact FNB had suffered a loss of over $7 million. In the meantime on April 3, 1974, FNB received from Manufacturers Hanover $30 million of the $35 million loan which the latter had obligated itself to make to FNB.

At trial the Government presented its case principally through accomplices (Crosse, Shaddick, Bordoni, Garofalo), various FNB employees, Ernst & Ernst partners Wright and Russell, Government agents, and documentary proof. Each of the three appellants testified in his own defense. Luftig denied knowledge of or participation in the making of any of the alleged false entries. He testified that on March 8, 1974, he had directed Crosse to transfer the $100 million in Government securities from the bank's trading to its investment account, ordering a liquidation of the trading account, and that when he found out on March 26 from Sadlik that the direction for the transfer had not been carried out he asked Sadlik to review the matter with Ernst & Ernst, furnishing a memorandum confirming his earlier instruction and later learning that Ernst & Ernst did not object to the transfer as of the date when the transfer order had been given. Luftig did acknowledge that on April 11, 1974, he had been advised by Crosse that a trader had failed to mark some securities to market.

*13 Carter testified that after the bank had with his approval increased its trading position in government securities by purchasing up to $100 million in December, 1973, he was authorized by Luftig on March 18, 1974, to liquidate these securities at a loss, which he undertook to do over the following weeks; that on March 27 he was instructed by Crosse to transfer all but $100 million of the securities from the trading account to the investment account at cost, with a memorandum noting that the securities being transferred had been purchased without Carter's knowledge and consent at a time when he had been instructed to keep the bank's trading accounts as low as possible; that he gave the instruction and he signed the memorandum knowing it to be false but did it because ordered; that with respect to the March 28 meeting with Sadlik, Crosse, Russell and Wright, he could only recall stating in response to an inquiry that he had heard of a bank transferring securities from its trading account to its investment account but that this had not been done at the Chase Manhattan Bank where he had previously worked; that thereafter at Crosse's directions he had transferred the $100 million in Government securities at March 11th prices; and that in the first week of April under Crosse's orders he directed that municipal and corporate bonds be transferred to the investment account at cost although they had depreciated in value by $1 million and had not been marked to market at the end of March.

Gleason testified that his duties as Chairman were principally of a customer and public relations nature and that he did not involve himself in the day-to-day operations of the bank. He denied discussing the bank's earnings or the proposed Talcott merger with Sindona at their March 26, 1974, meeting in London, denied asking Shaddick to create a false profit through fictitious foreign exchange transactions or having any conversations about the matter, and denied having known that the bank's financial statement for the first quarter of 1974 was false.

Thus the trial of the case boiled down to a battle of credibility between each of the three defendants, on the one hand, and the Government witnesses, including accomplices, on the other, who gave diametrically opposed testimony with respect to material aspects of each of the alleged dishonest transactions forming the basis of the indictment.

DISCUSSION

Since certain errors claimed by appellants to have been committed during the trial apply to all and some to only specific appellants, we initially consider the jointly-shared arguments. The first of these relates to the trial judge's instructions to the jury, which, including post-instruction discussions with counsel, cover some 157 trial transcript pages and were discussed extensively by the judge with counsel before the charge was given.

The Instructions

(1) Circumstantial Evidence and Credibility

Appellants contend that they were irreparably prejudiced by a portion of the trial judge's charge in which he sought to illustrate the nature of circumstantial evidence and the drawing of inferences by reference to a football game. The pertinent portion of the instruction is footnoted.[FN7] Briefly *14 summarized, it advised the jury that on the basis of common sense and experience a jury could infer from a team's performance on the field what previous instructions and training had been given by the coach and what had been done by the players in preparation for the game, even though the jury had not been present in the locker room or on the training field and hence had not witnessed the instructions and training.

FN7. "Sometimes judges give illustrations to jurors about the use of circumstantial evidence. A familiar one is the one where if you look out the window and see a lot of people with umbrellas, you can infer it's raining. I never know how that is helpful to a jury. You are not really trying to decide whether some weather condition exists, at least I don't know that that's a major problem in this case. But the point is that I think if you thought for a minute you would realize that this is not a novel or unusual or super human kind of process that the lawyers and that the Court have asked you to give consideration to. Frequently in our every-day life, without calling it circumstantial evidence, we draw conclusions about what people must have done, must have thought, and must have said.

"Here is a little illustration that may show you that this is a matter which can well be accomplished by the use of common sense and common good judgment and experience. This is an illustration that quite obviously has nothing to do with the present case. Let's assume that you attend a football game. You see the players and the teams performing certain plays. You observe on the field many details about how well or how poorly the teams perform, whether there are a lot of passes or a lot of runs, whether there are many penalties or few penalties, whether there are many injuries or few injuries, whatever details go on before you.

"Now, on the basis of common experience and common sense, and on the basis of whatever information you know about football and about your observing this game, you can logically and reasonably infer some things about what people did and said and thought before that game and in preparation for that game, although you were not present in the locker room or on the training field and although no witnesses come to tell you what went on. You can infer that there are some things that you will be able to infer about whether the coach gave good or bad training, what instructions he gave, what he must have said in substance, what acts were done by the coach and the players in preparation for that game. There will be some things that a person in the audience could reasonably and logically infer and know beyond any doubt; there will be some things that they could not reasonably and logically infer beyond a doubt. But that kind of thought process, if anybody went through it, would be something which would not be a super human effort or bizarre or unusual.

"Now, you're being asked in this case to not only evaluate the direct evidence but to determine what the circumstantial evidence shows as to what various people did, said, and thought. The question for you is: What you can infer and what you cannot reasonably infer?"

[1] Unquestionably the example used in the instruction was ill-conceived, confusing and inappropriate. Since the three defendants were top officers of the FNB, the example exposed them to the risk that the jury might interpret it as implying that they could be considered to have played the role of "football coaches" who had from behind the scenes directed bank officials or employees on the "team" (e. g., Crosse, Shaddick, Garofalo, etc.) to commit the alleged crimes. As we thought we had made clear in United States v. Dizdar, 581 F.2d 1031 (2d Cir. 1978), the choice of an example too close or analogous to the facts of the case on trial is likely to be more prejudicial than "helpful" and is quite unnecessary when other clearly non-prejudicial examples are available.

Moreover, the example was inaccurate. Experience demonstrates that one cannot logically or reasonably infer that players' actions on a football field are necessarily or even probably the result of a coach's directions or training. It hardly requires an expert to appreciate that some "plays," "passes," "runs," "penalties" and "injuries," see n. 7 supra, may arise from circumstances unrelated to a coach's training or instructions, such as a quarterback's inspiration of the moment or sheer luck or happenstance. Well-trained and coached teams have been known to perform poorly and vice-versa. In effect, therefore, the example could be viewed as an invitation to speculate rather than to use logic and reason in drawing inferences from circumstantial

Notwithstanding these weaknesses in the example, we are not persuaded that it calls for a reversal in this case. When the entire charge on the subject is viewed in context, as it must be, see United States v. Hanlon, 548 F.2d 1096, 1101 (2d Cir. 1977); United States v. Guillette, 547 F.2d 743, 750 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 839, 98 S.Ct. 132, 54 L.Ed.2d 102 (1977); United States v. Gentile, 530 F.2d 461, 469 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 426 U.S. 936, 96 S.Ct. 2651, 49 L.Ed.2d 388 (1976), we do not view the example as having any serious prejudicial effect. The jury was adequately advised of the nature of circumstantial evidence. It was repeatedly told to use "common sense," "common experience" and "common good judgment" in drawing inferences from facts found by them and that inferences depended on the jury's acting "logically and reasonably." Moreover, before launching *15 into the "football coach" example the court carefully stated "This is an illustration that quite obviously has nothing to do with the present case." We believe it would be denigrating the intelligence of the average jury to conclude that it would forsake its own common sense and experience for the suggestions implied in the court's ill-conceived "example."
Turning to the court's instructions on the subject of credibility, we recognize that the witnesses' credibility was a central issue and played a decisive role in the case, in view of the diametrically conflicting testimony of the Government's witnesses, on the one hand, and the defendants, on the other, with respect to crucial material facts. Appellants contend that with this background the court's charge precluded a balanced assessment of the witnesses' credibility because it failed adequately to warn of the inherently suspect nature of the testimony of the accomplices called by the Government, some of whom had admitted to a series of frauds, perjury and other criminal acts, and others of whom had pleaded guilty pursuant to plea bargains and were awaiting sentence, and because it exaggerated the reasons for distrusting a defendant's testimony. We disagree.
[2][3][4][5] Unquestionably, it is the court's duty, in instructing a jury on the subject of witnesses' credibility, to give balanced instructions. Where the court points out that testimony of certain types of witnesses may be suspect and should therefore be scrutinized and weighed with care, such as that of accomplices or coconspirators, e. g., United States v. Santana, 503 F.2d 710, 715-16 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1053, 95 S.Ct. 632, 42 L.Ed.2d 649 (1974), those who have made plea bargains or are awaiting sentence, see, e. g., United States v. Corcione, 592 F.2d 111, 116-17 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 975, 99 S.Ct. 1545, 59 L.Ed.2d 794 (1979); United States v. Projansky, 465 F.2d 123, 136 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1006, 93 S.Ct. 432, 34 L.Ed.2d 299 (1972); Good v. United States, 410 F.2d 1217, 1221 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 1002, 90 S.Ct. 1131, 25 L.Ed.2d 413 (1970), those who have been granted immunity, United States v. DeLoach, 174 U.S.App.D.C. 138, 530 F.2d 990, 994 & n. 5 (D.C.Cir.1975), cert. denied, 426 U.S. 909, 96 S.Ct. 2232, 48 L.Ed.2d 834 (1976), and defendants, United States v. Rucker, 586 F.2d 899, 903-04 (2d Cir. 1978); United States v. Martin, 525 F.2d 703, 707 & n. 3 (2d Cir. 1975), it must also direct the jury's attention to the fact that it may well find these witnesses to be truthful, in whole or in part. United States v. Vega, 589 F.2d 1147, 1154 (2d Cir. 1978). In short, the court should not emphasize the suspect nature of the testimony of certain witnesses without pointing out that they may be believed. Although a trial judge has the right to comment on credibility of specific witnesses, this right is limited and its exercise is appropriate only when necessary to assist the jury. Quercia v. United States, 289 U.S. 466, 469-71, 53 S.Ct. 698, 77 L.Ed. 1321 (1933). Confidence in our jury system leads us to leave credibility solely to the jury which, as the conscience of the community, is expected to act with sound judgment.

[6] Applying these basic principles here we conclude that Judge Griesa's credibility charge, viewed in its entirety, satisfied all legal requirements and was neither unfair to the appellants nor weighted in favor of the Government's witnesses. The court pointed out that the Government is frequently out of necessity required to rely on participants, accomplices, and persons who have committed crimes including perjury, as witnesses and that "you must view these witnesses with particular caution and scrutinize them with particular care." Similarly, although Judge Griesa noted that a defendant "has a deep personal interest in the result of this prosecution" and "the greatest kind of stake in its outcome" which "creates, at least potentially, a motive for false testimony" and "is of a character possessed by no other witness," which has been the standard language used by district judges for many years, he continued with the same boiler-plate language to the effect that "it by no means follows that simply because a person has a vital interest in the end result *16 of a case he is not capable of telling a truthful, candid, and straight-forward story" and that it was for the jury, after weighing these factors, and giving "the most careful and fair consideration to the testimony of each defendant and to the factors which . . . could weigh for or against its credibility" to determine its credibility. Thus the instructions were balanced and did not preclude the jurors from making a fair assessment of the credibility of the witnesses who had appeared before them.

(2) CONSPIRACY

Appellants contend that since the alleged CONSPIRACY was one to engage in fraudulent falsification of entries (in violation of 18 U.S.C. ss 1005, 1014 and 15 U.S.C. ss 78j(b), 78ff) by means of two distinct types of transactions (i. e., false evaluation of securities and fictitious foreign exchange transactions), the trial judge was not only required to instruct the jury regarding the entire alleged plan or scheme, including all means to be used to effectuate it, but to advise the jury that no defendant could be convicted unless he comprehended its full scope and knew of every means which the jury found to have been employed in furtherance of the CONSPIRACY. They cite United States v. Peoni, 100 F.2d 401, 403 (2d Cir. 1938), for this proposition. Failure to give such a charge, they claim, allowed the jury to convict defendants who may not have been knowing parties to the entire scheme.

The scope of the CONSPIRACY alleged in the present case, while rather broad and encompassing conduct that would violate several laws, was by the time of trial sufficiently defined to be clearly comprehensible and if proven, to warrant a conviction for violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371.

[7] The objective of the alleged CONSPIRACY was to falsify FNB's operating statement for the first quarter of 1974 so that the bank would appear to have made a profit when in fact it had suffered a loss of over $7 million, and thereby to deceive anybody who might normally be expected to rely on the statement (e. g., federal authorities, lenders, stockholders, etc.) as an honest and accurate representation of the bank's operations for the quarter. The alleged motives, which were relevant but not elements of the crime and need not be proven, included the desire to gain approval of the proposed Talcott merger by Federal bank authorities. Two principal means were allegedly used to accomplish the goal of the CONSPIRACY: (1) false evaluation of securities, and (2) fictitious foreign exchange transactions.

[8][9][10] Review of a few basic principles of CONSPIRACY law is essential to determine whether the charge here was sufficient. To be convicted as a member of a CONSPIRACY, a defendant need not know every objective of the CONSPIRACY. United States v. DiGeronimo, 598 F.2d 746, 755 (2d Cir. 1979); United States v. Bernstein, 533 F.2d 775, 793-94 & n. 12 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 998, 97 S.Ct. 523, 50 L.Ed.2d 608 (1976); United States v. Papadakis, 510 F.2d 287, 297 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 950, 95 S.Ct. 1682, 44 L.Ed.2d 104 (1975), every detail of its operation or means employed to achieve the agreed-upon criminal objective, Blumenthal v. United States, 332 U.S. 539, 557, 68 S.Ct. 248, 92 L.Ed. 154 (1947); United States v. Rosenblatt, 554 F.2d 36, 38 (2d Cir. 1977), or even the identity of every CO-CONSPIRATOR, United States v. Sperling, 506 F.2d 1323, 1340 (2d Cir. 1974); United States v. Sisca, 503 F.2d 1337, 1345 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1008, 95 S.Ct. 328, 42 L.Ed.2d 283 (1974). There must, however, be agreement on the "essential nature of the plan," Blumenthal v. United States, supra, and on the "kind of criminal conduct . . . in fact contemplated." United States v. Gallishaw, 428 F.2d 760, 763 n. 1 (2d Cir. 1970). See also United States v. Rosenblatt, supra, 554 F.2d at 38-39. In addition

> "a person may be held to intend that which is the anticipated consequence of a particular action to which he agrees, when that action is unreasonable in view of that consequence."

Developments in the Law CONSPIRACY, 72 Harv.L.Rev. 920, 932 (1959). See also 1 *17 Wharton's Criminal Law and Procedure s 90, at 197 (1957). In short, the CONSPIRATOR must agree to and participate in a scheme which he knows to have an illegal objective. If, in the course of the CONSPIRACY, there occur other illegal acts not specifically contemplated by an individual CONSPIRATOR but reasonably akin to the anticipated illegality and in furtherance or in consequence of the scheme, the CONSPIRATOR may not on that account escape liability for participation in the CONSPIRACY.

[11] With these principles in mind we are satisfied that Judge Griesa's CONSPIRACY charge was sufficiently clear to provide the jury with the basic legal principles it needed to determine whether there was a CONSPIRACY in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 371 and whether each defendant joined it with knowledge of its illegal objective. At the outset he accurately summarized Count One as charging generally that the three defendants "CONSPIRED to falsify the first-quarter 1974 financial statement of the Franklin National Bank, for various purposes." Having thus described the general goal, Judge Griesa described the various federal offenses which were alleged to have been committed in the course of the CONSPIRACY and correctly noted that in order to convict a defendant the jury need not find that he "CONSPIRED to achieve all of the objects alleged or to violate all of the statutes or rules referred to." (A.67).

The court's next step, stated as being in the interest of simplicity, was to select one of the alleged objects of the CONSPIRACY violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1005, which makes it a crime for an officer or director of a national bank to make a false entry in a report or statement of the bank with the intent to defraud as the vehicle for explaining the basic elements that must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt to establish the alleged CONSPIRACY. The court properly instructed that there must be proof of an agreement between two or more persons "to make a false entry, namely, the $79,000 net income item in the statement of earnings of the Franklin National Bank for the first quarter of 1974, with the purpose of defrauding or deceiving;" that "the particular defendant you are considering, knowingly joined in the CONSPIRACY;" and "that at least one of the CONSPIRATORS committed at least one overt act charged in the indictment." The jury was then accurately instructed that the FNB was a national bank within the meaning of s 1005 and that the $79,000 item in its first quarter statement of earnings was an "entry," as were the other figures in the quarterly statement including the earnings figures of $1,301,000 for the trading account and $2,454,000 for the foreign exchange trading account.

After defining accurately the term "false entry," "defraud," and "intent to deceive" as used in the statute and indictment, the district judge focused on the two means charged in Paragraphs 5 and 6 of Count One of the indictment as those whereby the CONSPIRACY was allegedly to be effectuated, i. e., by concealment of depreciation in the value of securities in the trading account and by fictitious foreign exchange contracts to create the false appearance of profits, pointing out that the jury was not required to find that both means had been used in order to convict the defendants, and that it might convict all three defendants if it found they had CONSPIRED to falsify the financial statement and used either or both means. This instruction was qualified by the statement that Carter could not be found guilty if the jury found that the CONSPIRACY was solely to falsify through foreign exchange contracts. The reason for this qualification and the court's dismissal of the Count Three charge (fictitious foreign exchange contracts) against Carter was that there was no evidence that he had anything to do with such contracts. Lastly, the court properly charged the jury that to convict on the CONSPIRACY count it must find a single CONSPIRACY of the type alleged. It also advised the jury that if it found two separate independent CONSPIRACIES it must acquit.[FN8]

FN8. This instruction was more favorable to the defendants than the law required, since it is subject to the qualification that where there is proof of the CONSPIRACY charged in an indictment, a finding of other CONSPIRACIES would not mandate acquittal. United States v. Tramunti, 513 F.2d 1087, 1108 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 832, 96 S.Ct. 54, 46 L.Ed.2d 50 (1975).

*18 [12] Thus the CONSPIRACY instructions were adequate and conformed to basic principles of CONSPIRACY law as they have evolved. As long as the jury found one CONSPIRACY to falsify the bank's books in order to produce a false income statement for the first quarter of 1974 and that each defendant played a part in that CONSPIRACY it was unnecessary for the Government to establish that each defendant agreed to each of unlawful acts or means that might be used to achieve that goal.

It hardly necessitated any great mental gymnastics for any reasonable person logically to conclude in the present case that when a bank officer participated in the falsification of bank entries designed to hide a huge depreciation in the value of the bank's assets he did so for the purpose of enabling the bank to falsify its quarterly financial statement, not for his own edification or to alter the bank's internal bookkeeping system but to mislead others who would normally rely upon the statement as a true representation of the bank's financial picture. Any major participant aware of the ultimate objective and its achievement through one type of false entry could also reasonably foresee that other types of entry falsification, such as fictitious foreign exchange transactions, might well be used to achieve that goal. There was an abundance of evidence from which the jury could infer that each of the appellants agreed to the general objective of fraudulently falsifying FNB's first quarter 1974 earnings statement.

Our earlier decisions in United States v. Peoni, supra, and United States v. Falcone, 109 F.2d 579 (2d Cir. 1939), affd., 311 U.S. 205, 61 S.Ct. 204, 85 L.Ed. 128 (1940), relied upon by appellants, do not require a contrary conclusion. In each of those cases there was simply no evidence from which a jury could infer an agreement to which the defendant could have been a party or that he willfully or knowingly participated in the alleged CONSPIRACY. Here, on the other hand, there was ample evidence to permit a jury to infer a general agreement on the part of FNB's top officials to falsify its financial statement for the first quarter of 1974 and that each played some part in it.

No defendant here was held liable beyond "the fair import of the concerted purpose or agreement as he understands it." United States v. Peoni, supra, 100 F.2d at 403. The appellants would have us read this broadly, to mean that to be a CONSPIRATOR, one must have full knowledge of each facet of the CONSPIRACY. We have, however, read Peoni and Falcone more narrowly than this, see, e. g., United States v. Calabro, 467 F.2d 973, 981 (2d Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 410 U.S. 926, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 35 L.Ed.2d 587 (1973); United States v. Tramaglino, 197 F.2d 928, 930 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 344 U.S. 864, 73 S.Ct. 105, 97 L.Ed. 670 (1952), and we do not believe they contradict our statement above of the legal principles involved here.

[13] Luftig contends that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury, as it did with respect to Carter, that if the jury found a CONSPIRACY to falsify FNB's quarterly earnings statement solely by fictitious foreign exchange transactions it should not convict him. We doubt that Carter, who did not participate in or know of the foreign exchange transactions, was entitled to this instruction, since there was evidence of his participation in the broad CONSPIRACY to falsify FNB's quarterly earnings statement and, as we stated above, it was unnecessary for the Government to prove that he knew of each means used to carry it out. Moreover, even if there was error in denying Luftig the charge, the error was harmless. Since the jury convicted Carter, it had to have found that the CONSPIRACY was not carried out solely by fictitious foreign exchange transactions. Thus Luftig's conviction could not have been based on a CONSPIRACY carried out solely by that means.

In any event, the jury found all defendants guilty of falsification by concealment of the depreciation in value of the securities in its trading account (Count Two) and Luftig guilty of perjuring himself before the *19 grand jury when he swore that he had in early March ordered the transfer of the $100 million from the bank's trading account to its investment account. Thus there was ample evidence to support a finding of CONSPIRACY to falsify the bank's earnings statement in which Luftig played a major part.

(3) Pinkerton Charge

The Supreme Court in Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U.S. 640, 66 S.Ct. 1180, 90 L.Ed. 1489 (1946), held that a CONSPIRATOR may be found guilty of a substantive offense committed by a CO-CONSPIRATOR in furtherance of and as part of an alleged CONSPIRACY even though he personally did not commit the acts constituting the substantive crime itself. In accordance with Pinkerton Judge Griesa instructed the jury that if it found that a defendant was a member of the CONSPIRACY alleged in Count One but did not commit the acts constituting one of the alleged substantive crimes (e. g., violation of 18 U.S.C. ss 1005 (Count Two), 1014 (Count Three), or s 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act), it might nevertheless find him guilty of a substantive crime committed by a CO-CONSPIRATOR in furtherance of the CONSPIRACY and as part of it, provided the conduct "was within the scope of the CONSPIRACY and a foreseeable consequence of it," since the defendant committing the substantive crime, like a partner, might then be treated as an agent of the other members of the CONSPIRACY.

Appellants contend that this instruction was erroneous. First they argue that no Pinkerton charge at all should have been given because there was insufficient evidence of the existence of a general CONSPIRACY, in furtherance of which the substantive offenses were committed, to warrant such a charge, cf. United States v. Sperling, supra, 506 F.2d at 1341-42. We disagree.

[14][15] There was ample evidence independent of the substantive crimes themselves from which the jury could find beyond a reasonable doubt that the top officers of FNB joined in a plan to falsify its first quarter earnings statements so that it would appear to show a profit and that to accomplish the unlawful objective some engaged in criminal acts that were either known or should have been reasonably foreseeable to the others. Although there was little evidence of Luftig's knowledge of or participation in the fictitious foreign exchange transactions or of Gleason's participation in the false evaluation of the bank's trading account securities, there was ample proof, crediting as we must the testimony of Crosse and Shaddick, that each defendant in his own way joined in a scheme to falsify the bank's earnings statement. This was sufficient to permit the giving of a Pinkerton charge with respect to the reasonably foreseeable crimes that might be committed by fellow CONSPIRATORS in furtherance of that scheme. Indeed, the obvious purpose of falsifying the bank's earnings statement was to commit frauds.[FN9]

FN9. Although the court dismissed Count Three against Carter on the ground that he had not personally participated in the foreign exchange transactions, this was not required since, upon the evidence before it, the jury could find that Carter joined the CONSPIRACY to falsify FNB's first quarter 1974 financial statement and could reasonably anticipate that his partners in crime might commit other criminal acts, including use of fictitious foreign exchange transactions, to misrepresent the bank's earnings.

Appellants' second objection is that the court's Pinkerton charge permitted the jury to find them guilty of substantive crimes which were not part of the CONSPIRACY. We disagree.

[16] When Judge Griesa explained the CONSPIRACY count to the jury, he used the s 1005 violation, which was one of the alleged objectives of the CONSPIRACY, as an example. He did not go through the s 1014 and Rule 10b-5 counts at that time; rather he stated that he had not stricken the others, but was trying to simplify his explanation. However, when it came time to explain the Pinkerton rule, the court said:

"And remembering that the CONSPIRACY count relates to 1005, and of course some of these substantive counts relate to other statutes 1014, SECTION 10(b) of the *20 Exchange Act, and so forth but nevertheless, if you have found any defendant guilty under Count one (the CONSPIRACY count), then you are obliged to reconsider his guilt on the substantive count you are considering."

Appellants argue that this statement permitted the jury, once it found a CONSPIRACY to violate one statutory provision, to use Pinkerton to hold a CONSPIRATOR liable for violations of other provisions not among the objects of the CONSPIRACY and not done in furtherance of the CONSPIRACY.

A diligent reading of the charge, however, reveals that Judge Griesa properly instructed the jury. He followed the passage quoted above with the instruction that in order to convict:

"You must find that the crime charged in the substantive count was committed by CO-CONSPIRATOR and that it was committed during and in furtherance of the CONSPIRACY charged in the CONSPIRACY count. You must find that the crime charged in the substantive count was within the scope of the CONSPIRACY and a foreseeable consequence of the unlawful agreement."

As already noted, he had previously instructed the jury that the alleged objective of the CONSPIRACY was to falsify FNB's first quarter 1974 financial statement by making a false entry to the effect that it had a net income of $79,000 when it had in fact suffered losses, all with a view to defrauding others. Thus the court's Pinkerton charge was in accordance with the principles enunciated by the Supreme Court, see Nye & Nissen v. United States, 336 U.S. 613, 618, 69 S.Ct. 766, 93 L.Ed. 919 (1949), and by this court, see United States v. Molina, 581 F.2d 56, 60-61 (2d Cir. 1978). The instruction was therefore sufficient, and there was ample evidence from which the jury could have concluded that the substantive violations were committed in furtherance of the CONSPIRACY charged, if indeed the jury found it necessary to reach the question of Pinkerton liability at all.

(4) Aiding and Abetting

The indictment charged and the court gave instructions regarding liability of the defendants for "aiding and abetting" or "causing" the various crimes, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. s 2.[FN10] Appellants argue that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury that before it might find any defendant guilty as an aider and abettor the principal must be identified, or in failing to identify the principal himself.

FN10. 18 U.S.C. s 2 provides:
"(a) Whoever commits an offense against the United States or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces or procures its commission, is punishable as a principal.
"(b) Whoever willfully causes an act to be done which if directly performed by him or another would be an offense against the United States, is punishable as a principal."

[17] We have held that under 18 U.S.C. s 2(a) a person charged as an aider and abettor "cannot be found guilty . . . unless a principal whom he has aided and abetted committed the criminal act." United States v. Bernstein, 533 F.2d 775, 799 (2d Cir. 1976). See also United States v. Erb, 543 F.2d 438, 446 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 981, 97 S.Ct. 493, 50 L.Ed.2d 590 (1976). Under 18 U.S.C. s 2(b) a person who causes an innocent party to commit an act which, if done with the requisite intent, would constitute an offense may be found guilty as a principal even though he personally did not commit the criminal act.[FN11]

FN11. We are not confronted here with a case where any defendant was legally incapable of committing an alleged offense. See United States v. Ruffin, 613 F.2d 408, Dkt. No. 78-1361 (2d Cir.); United States v. Lester, 363 F.2d 68, 72-73 (6th Cir. 1966), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 1002, 87 S.Ct. 705, 17 L.Ed.2d 542 (1967).

[18][19] In the present case there was sufficient evidence to permit the jury to find that at least one defendant or CO-CONSPIRATOR participated in each of the alleged criminal acts, either as a principal, an aider and abettor, or under Pinkerton as a CO-CONSPIRATOR who could reasonably foresee that the substantive crimes might be committed by fellow CONSPIRATORS in furtherance of the CONSPIRACY.

*21 Absent some indication that there was a failure to prove that a defendant committed one of the alleged criminal acts or participated knowingly in the commission of such an act by another, we believe that the court's refusal to require the jury first to identify the principals and then to identify the aiders and abettors was proper. Several other circuits have held that there is no such requirement, see United States v. Staten, 189 U.S.App.D.C. 100, 109, 581 F.2d 878, 887 (D.C.Cir. 1978); United States v. Bryan, 483 F.2d 88, 93-94 (3d Cir. 1973) (en banc); United States v. Austin, 462 F.2d 724, 731 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1048, 93 S.Ct. 518, 34 L.Ed.2d 501 (1972); Feldstein v. United States, 429 F.2d 1092, 1095 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 920 (1970), and we agree. It is sufficient that the court instruct the jury that in order to convict under 18 U.S.C. s 2 the acts must have been committed by someone. Judge Griesa's charge was entirely adequate in this respect, and there was sufficient evidence to permit the jury to find that at least one defendant or CO-CONSPIRATOR acted as principal in the commission of each of the crimes charged.[FN12]

FN12. We are not here confronted with a case where a possible principal was acquitted. See United States v. Ruffin, 613 F.2d 408, Dkt. No. 78-1361 (2d Cir.); United States v. Standefer, 610 F.2d 1076 (3d Cir. 1979).

(5) Potential Adverse Effect on Bank Depositor-Jurors

[20][21] Appellants contend that by implying in his charge that bank depositors were victims of the crimes alleged, Judge Griesa destroyed appellants' Sixth Amendment right to an impartial jury, since most of the jurors were undoubtedly bank depositors and one had been a depositor in FNB.

The claim is so speculative as to border on the frivolous.
In the first place, the record gives no indication that any juror had been an FNB depositor. Regardless of this side-issue, the court's instruction did not suggest that depositors were victimized. Judge Griesa quite properly stated that the term "any other company or body politic or corporate or any individual person," as used in s 1005, "obviously includes persons who are depositors and other customers of the bank, borrowers from the bank; it also includes other banks which lend money to the particular bank."
We find nothing inflammatory or unfair about this accurate description of the type of persons whom the statute was designed to protect. Nor is there any indication that any defendant was prejudiced or likely to have been prejudiced by the description, which must be shown for reversal. Mikus v. United States, 433 F.2d 719, 724 (2d Cir. 1970). Cf. Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717, 723, 81 S.Ct. 1639, 6 L.Ed.2d 751 (1961); United States v. Tramunti, 513 F.2d 1087, 1114 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 832, 96 S.Ct. 54, 46 L.Ed.2d 50 (1975).
Evidentiary Rulings
(1) Prior Similar Conduct by Crosse
[22][23] Luftig contends that the district court erred in refusing to permit him to offer certain evidence tending to establish his innocence of any false evaluation of FNB's securities and unduly restricted his cross-examination of Crosse on the same subject. We disagree.
As evidence of Luftig's participation in the false evaluation of bank securities by backdating the transfer of some from the bank's trading to its investment account in March, 1974, and by failing to "mark to market" other securities in the trading account, the Government introduced Crosse's testimony regarding Luftig's instructions. In his defense Luftig sought to introduce a series of eight items, including evidence that during the period 1971-74 Crosse, both prior to and after Luftig's joining FNB, had without Luftig's knowledge repeatedly transferred securities from the bank's trading to its investment account without proper evaluation and had failed to reevaluate or "mark to market" securities in the trading account or establish adequate depreciation reserves, thus concealing hundreds of thousands of dollars of depreciation. *22 The purpose of the offer, of course, was to try to show that in March, 1974, as on prior occasions, Crosse had acted on his own without Luftig's knowledge and that Crosse's testimony implicating Luftig was incredible.
Judge Griesa restricted Luftig to two items, one a transfer at Crosse's discretion on September 20, 1973, of $37.85 million of securities at cost from FNB's trading to its investment account, which allegedly concealed more than $695,000 of depreciation and the other a failure in July, 1973, to "mark to market" securities in four trading accounts or to establish adequate reserves for some $3 million in losses, which were concealed from Crosse's superiors. Evidence regarding the other six items was excluded on the ground that whatever probative value the evidence might have was outweighed by the danger of confusing the jury regarding the issues on trial by diverting its attention to collateral issues.
Upon this review the propriety of the district court's ruling must be tested by the standard of whether the exclusion of the evidence constituted a clear abuse of discretion. Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 124-25, 94

S.Ct. 2887, 41 L.Ed.2d 590 (1974); United States v. Corr, 543 F.2d 1042, 1051 (2d Cir. 1976). Given the circumstances before the trial judge, we find no such abuse.

A clear showing that Crosse had engaged in prior similar misconduct without Luftig's knowledge would have some probative value (though far from conclusive) on the issue of whether he later acted under Luftig's directions in March and April 1974. See, e. g., United States v. Matot, 146 F.2d 197, 198 (2d Cir. 1944) (exclusion of evidence of offer by one charged with fraud based on overdrafts to make good on deficiencies held error); United States v. Platt, 435 F.2d 789, 793 (2d Cir. 1970). Crosse's engagement in earlier wrongdoing, on the other hand, would not preclude a finding that Luftig and he joined together in the later misconduct, with Luftig willing to take the lead for obvious reasons. Moreover, where such proof, though of some relevance, may lead to confusing and time-consuming disputes with respect to collateral issues the trial judge may properly reject or limit it. United States v. King, 560 F.2d 122, 134 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 925, 98 S.Ct. 404, 54 L.Ed.2d 283 (1977); Fed.R.Evid. 403. This appears to have been the situation confronting the district court in this case.

Even with respect to the September 20, 1973, transfer of securities, serious collateral issues were raised regarding the extent of Crosse's involvement in the transfer and whether it was made by lesser employees (possibly by mistake), possibly without his knowledge. Moreover, the Government contended that some purchases of securities ostensibly for the bank's trading account were in fact made from the outset for the investment account, which had no traders of its own, using trading account traders and then transferring acquisitions to the investment account. If this were established, the transfer from trading to investment at cost might have been justified or excused as a mistake. Lastly, Carter vigorously opposed introduction of evidence as to the earlier security transfers and failures to "mark to market" since they might reflect upon his honesty as vice-president in charge.

Faced with these complexities, which could lead to "trials within the trial," Judge Griesa sensibly in our view limited Luftig to two of the earlier examples, permitting evidence as to the September, 1973, transfer on the ground that the matter had been opened up by the Government on its examination of Crosse.[FN13] We find no abuse of discretion in this ruling.

FN13. Even as to the September, 1973, transfer the record discussion regarding the side issues created by its introduction covered almost 50 pages of transcript.

(2) The May 12 Press Release

[24] Luftig next argues that the court erred in refusing to permit him to testify that on May 12, 1974, several weeks after the principal fraudulent conduct which was the subject of the indictment, he opposed *23 the issuance by FNB of a press release, favored by Sindona, which failed to disclose certain hidden foreign exchange transactions concededly "unrelated" to the transactions that were the subject of the indictment. We find no abuse of discretion in this ruling which properly avoided getting into more complicated collateral issues with respect to other differences that developed later between Luftig and Sindona, leading to the former's being asked to resign. At most the evidence would show a disagreement between the two having nothing to do with the criminal conduct alleged in the indictment. Further evidence of Luftig's differences with Sindona over unrelated matters would be of doubtful probative value with respect to the issues on trial and could confuse the jury.[FN14]

FN14. Luftig was permitted to testify that beginning on May 6, 1974, despite Sindona's strong opposition, he actively supported a merger of FNB with Manufacturers Hanover, and that he (Luftig) requested an FBI investigation into the bank's non-disclosure of certain unrelated foreign exchange transactions.

(3) Cross-Examination of Crosse

[25] Similarly we find no merit in Luftig's claim that it was error to bar him from bringing out that Crosse had vigorously opposed before FNB's board of directors a management proposal to disband the bank's municipal dealer department. Luftig argues that the evidence indicates unlikelihood that Crosse would have done Luftig's bidding to falsely value $100 million of the bank's securities by backdating to March 11, 1974, their transfer from its trading to its investment account. Here again, aside from the tenuousness of the inference sought to be drawn and the fact that the subject was beyond the scope of cross-examination, since it had not been opened up on direct, see Fed.R.Evid. 611(b), to permit such questions could open up a flood of evidence regarding a possibly confusing collateral issue, with the Government seeking to establish dissimilarities or reasons why Crosse would act differently under one circumstance than under the other. We find no abuse of discretion in the judge's precluding cross-examination of Crosse on this subject matter. See United States v. Carr, 584 F.2d 612, 617 (2d Cir. 1978).

(4) Testimony Challenged as Hearsay

[26] Appellant Luftig argues that the court erred in admitting testimony by Cornell Wright, an Ernst & Ernst partner, that on May 17, 1974, he was told by Carter that the March 27, 1974, transfer at cost of $62.5 million of U. S. Government agency securities had been "ordered by someone superior to Howard Crosse." Luftig contends that the statement was POST-CONSPIRACY, narrative hearsay as to him, see United States v. Birnbaum, 337 F.2d 490, 494-95 (2d Cir. 1964). We disagree.

There was sufficient independent evidence to justify a finding by the trial judge that the CONSPIRACY was still alive on May 17 and that Luftig and Carter were participants. Carter's quoted statement was therefore admissible against Luftig under Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(E) as a statement in furtherance of it designed to allay suspicion on Wright's part regarding the propriety of the March transfer. United States v. Ruggiero, 472 F.2d 599, 607 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 412 U.S. 939, 93 S.Ct. 2772, 37 L.Ed.2d 398 (1973); United States v. Geaney, 417 F.2d 1116 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 1028, 90 S.Ct. 1276, 25 L.Ed.2d 539 (1970).

[27] The testimony of John Sadlik, the bank's chief financial officer, to the effect that after Luftig had left FNB Sadlik had ordered Carter to reverse the March, 1974, transfer from the bank's trading to its investment account and to revise the March 31 quarterly financial statement is also objected to by Luftig as hearsay. However, the underlying corporate memorandum and entry confirming the instruction was properly admitted as a record made in the regular course of business, Fed.R.Evid. 803(6), and Sadlik's testimony was admissible to explain the background of the document. In any event, assuming the admission of the memorandum was error, it was harmless.

*24 Claims of Prosecutorial Misconduct

(1) Alleged Violation of F.R.Cr.P. 16(a) by Non-Disclosure of Statements

Appellant Gleason, formerly FNB's chief executive officer, argues that the Government violated F.R.Cr.P. 16(a)(1)(A) by failing to disclose before trial a letter written by him on August 30, 1965, to FNB's then Chairman, years before the events here in issue, and notations in his handwriting on various financial statements and agenda of FNB board meetings during the period from December 20, 1973, to March 28, 1974, after Gleason had himself become Chairman. We disagree.

The issue arose when the Government sought to use the foregoing material in its cross-examination of Gleason, who had testified on direct that following the creation in November, 1973, of the "Office of Chairman" at the bank (consisting of himself, Shaddick and Luftig) he (Gleason) ceased to be involved in the day-to-day activities of the bank. He testified that thereafter he devoted himself primarily to public relations activities on behalf of FNB, visiting important domestic customers and cultivating its foreign relationships with a view to improving its image, while Shaddick supervised the bank's international operations and Luftig its domestic operations. He denied being privy to any instructions by Luftig to Crosse to falsify the value of the bank's securities by backdating their transfer and denied asking Shaddick to create false profits by fictitious foreign exchange transactions. Thus Gleason sought to divorce himself from sufficient responsibility for the bank's earnings' statements to have been involved in the falsification of its earnings' report for the first quarter of 1974.

On cross-examination the Government, in an effort to impeach Gleason's denials and his posture of ignorance, confronted him with the August 1965 letter in which, in advocating himself for the presidency of the bank, he had urged that the bank's head should closely follow its earnings. He was also faced with his various handwritten notations on FNB Board agendas and earnings statements in early 1974 to indicate that he had been keeping himself advised of the bank's financial operations in some detail at the very time when, according to his direct testimony, he had been ignorant of these essential financial facts.

[28] Rule 16(a) obligates the Government upon request to permit a defendant to inspect "any relevant written or recorded statements made by the defendant, or copies thereof, within the possession, custody or control of the government, the existence of which is known, or by the exercise of due diligence may become known, to the attorney for the government." The rule, of course, is intended to enable a defendant to obtain prior to trial any of his own statements relevant to the crime charged against him so that he will be able to prepare properly to face the evidence that may be introduced against him at trial.

[29] Gleason's 1965 letter, which predated by almost 10 years the events in issue, and his mere notations on agenda and financial statements, were hardly "relevant" to the crimes charged against him; they did not tend to show that he had participated in any falsification of the bank's earnings statement for the first quarter of 1974. The fact that a bank officer once believed that its president should follow its earnings statements does not implicate him in any dishonest underlying transaction that is not in the bank's earnings reports.

The Government was not therefore required by Rule 16(a) to disclose the documents because they were not "relevant . . . statements" within the meaning of that Rule. The documents became relevant for impeachment purposes only after Gleason testified on direct that he did not personally keep acquainted with the bank's day-to-day operations, thus seeking to corroborate his denials of involvement in the transactions at issue. See United States v. Hodges, 480 F.2d 229, 232-33 (10th Cir. 1973); United States v. Skillman, 442 F.2d 542, 550 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 833, 92 S.Ct. 82, 30 L.Ed.2d 63 (1971).

*25 The Government's failure to turn over the documents prior to trial, moreover, did not prevent Gleason from preparing to meet the charges against him. The documents were at all times in the custody of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) as liquidator of FNB and were as available to Gleason as they were to the Government, which obtained them on the eve of trial, approximately November 27, 1978. Although the FNB records in custody of the FDIC were voluminous,[FN15] Gleason had long before trial been provided with an inventory of them and in preparing a strategy of ignorance should have known that Board minutes and earnings statements to which he might have been exposed would be important and should, with the aid of the inventory, have been extracted from the mass for examination.

FN15. Gleason's counsel did visit the FDIC depository, but only once, and may have attended a deposition in a civil suit, In re Franklin National Bank & Securities Litigation, MDL 196 (E.D.N.Y.), at which the documents may have been used in the examination of Gleason.

[30] The Government is not obligated by Rule 16(a) to anticipate every possible defense, assume what the defendant's trial testimony (if he decides to testify) will be, and then furnish him with otherwise irrelevant material that might conflict with his testimony. With respect to such material, if any obligation to disclose existed under Rule 16(a) it was satisfied by making the underlying files available to the defendant prior to trial. United States v. Haldeman, 181 U.S.App.D.C. 254, 559 F.2d 31, 74 n. 80, 76 n. 93 (D.C.Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 933, 97 S.Ct. 2641, 53 L.Ed.2d 250 (1977) (White House files); United States v. Cirillo, 499 F.2d 872, 882 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1056, 95 S.Ct. 638, 42 L.Ed.2d 653 (1974) (wiretaps). From that point on it was Gleason's task to prepare his defense.

[31] Lastly, Gleason has failed to show any legally cognizable prejudice as a result of the failure to have the documents in advance of trial. It is not suggested that if he had received them he would have decided not to testify. Indeed, no request was made for a continuance to permit preparation of a more plausible reconciliation between the documents and his direct testimony.

(2) Alleged Improper Rebuttal Summation

Gleason argues that he was denied a fair trial because the prosecutor, in his rebuttal summation pursuant to F.R.Cr.P. 29.1, introduced prejudicial new matter and the court refused to give a curative instruction.

The controversy arose out of the apparent absence from the record of any explanation or basis for the $700,000 profit figure which Gleason told Shaddick that the bank's foreign exchange department must have for the month of March, 1974, if FNB was to avoid showing a loss for the first quarter. During his main summation the prosecutor commented sardonically that the defendants would probably claim the $700,000 figure was dreamt up by Shaddick on the beaches of Acapulco. Accepting this suggestion, Gleason's counsel in his summation then argued that the figure was indeed the product of Shaddick's imagination. The prosecutor responded in his rebuttal summation with an adding machine tape which totalled losses from the liquidation of government securities during the period March 15-27, 1974, at $699,431.86, almost precisely the same as the figure of $700,000 that had been used by Gleason in stating the profit needs of the foreign exchange department.

Gleason contends that it was unfair and improper to introduce such new material in a reply summation, citing Moore v. United States, 120 U.S.App.D.C. 173, 344 F.2d 558, 560 (D.C.Cir. 1965), and United States v. Rubinson, 543 F.2d 951, 956-66 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 850, 97 S.Ct. 139, 50 L.Ed.2d 124 (1976), to which the Government replies that the material was not new but a response, based entirely on exhibits already in evidence, negating Gleason's claim in his counsel's summation that Shaddick invented the $700,000 figure.

*26 [32] Had Gleason's summation been the first occasion for the latter argument, the Government's reply might be persuasive, because it could then argue that it had no intention of referring to the computation unless and until Gleason challenged the source of the $700,000 figure. Fairness would dictate that a copy be furnished to Gleason well enough in advance of its use to permit a reply rather than confront him with a new theory (albeit based on record evidence) at almost literally the last minute of a long trial. See 1975 House Judiciary Committee Report regarding proposed F.R.Cr.P. 29.1 (H.R.Rep.No.94-247).[FN16] Since the argument of this appeal, however, the Government has represented in writing that only after Gleason's summation did it for the first time calculate the total losses and discover that they totalled approximately $700,000, which led to its use of the tabulation in its rebuttal summation.

FN16. The House Judiciary Committee commented:
"The Committee believes that . . . fair and effective administration of justice is best served if the defendant knows the arguments actually made by the prosecution in behalf of conviction before the defendant is faced with the decision whether to reply and what to reply."

[33] Had no action been taken by the court after the Government's surprise reply summation, a reversal might be required. But Judge Griesa, recognizing the eleventh-hour unfairness and surprise, offered Gleason and the other defendants the opportunity to respond by way of a surrebuttal summation after they had sufficient time to confer and review the trial transcript and exhibits forming the basis of the Government's computation. This in our view adequately protected the defendants against any prejudice. For reasons best known to themselves, possibly their inability to find any material errors in the Government's computation, defense counsel refused the court's offer and instead asked for a curative instruction.[FN17] Absent proof that the Government's computation was erroneous, the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing a cautionary instruction.

FN17. We disagree with Gleason's argument that additional summations which might result in introduction of the Government's computation, could not resolve the problem because they would only serve to magnify the unfair impact of the prosecutor's rebuttal. If the computation, based on evidence already in the record, was accurate, the jury was entitled to have the summary as an aid in analyzing the complex proof before it rather than be forced to the laborious task of making its own computation.
The situation here is clearly distinguishable from that in cases relied upon by Gleason where the Government improperly referred to matter not in the record. See, e. g., Moore v. United States, supra; United States v. Rubinson, supra, 543 F.2d at 966.

(3) Alleged Suppression of Exculpatory Evidence

Gleason charges that the Government suppressed exculpatory evidence and permitted witnesses to give materially false testimony, thereby depriving him of a fair trial. The record reveals these charges to be both baseless and irresponsible.

Specifically Gleason contends that the Government withheld from the jury evidence supporting multicount indictments, filed on September 29, 1975, January 5, 1977, and March 19, 1979, against Sindona, Shaddick and Bordoni in the Southern District of New York, charging that prior to the falsification of FNB's March 1974 statement those three men, without Gleason's knowledge, had falsified every single monthly foreign exchange profit and loss report beginning with the month of January, 1973, yet permitted Shaddick to testify that he had engaged in falsifying the bank's books on only three occasions during this period and Bordoni to testify that he had participated in only six such transactions. In addition, Gleason argues that the superseding indictment filed against Sindona and Bordoni on March 19, 1979, after Gleason had been convicted, contains a paragraph [FN18] revealing that the Government had *27 evidence that Bordoni and Sindona were involved in the misevaluation of securities in FNB's bank trading account.

FN18. "On or about March 31, 1974, Sindona and Bordoni, the defendants, and other CO-CONSPIRATORS caused the Franklin National Bank to hide losses in the bond trading operation by misvaluing securities held in bond trading account." Indictment S75 Cr. 948, count I, Par. 54 (S.D.N.Y. March 19, 1979).

[34][35] The fallacy of Gleason's claims with respect to the 1973-74 false foreign exchange transactions lies in his failure to distinguish between a fraudulent transaction and a false financial statement. Although the fraudulent transactions during this period of time were relatively few, they were reflected in subsequent monthly and quarterly financial statements, which were many. Since each one of the financial statements could properly be charged in a separate count, see United States v. Huber, 603 F.2d 387, 398-99 (2d Cir. 1979), and some statements were also charged as violations of federal mail and wire fraud statutes, the number of counts in the superseding indictment far exceeded the number of fraudulent transactions. There is thus no proof that the Government knowingly allowed false testimony.

[36] Were Gleason's counsel unaware of this differentiation, his specious charges might be pardonable. But the earlier superseded indictments (one filed on Sept. 29, 1975, and another on Jan. 5, 1977), which contain basically the same allegations with respect to the 1973-74 foreign exchange transactions, were made available to defense counsel before the trial of the present case, were used extensively by Gleason's counsel on his cross-examination of Bordoni and Shaddick, and could have been used to reveal the supposed perjury on their part. Under the circumstances, Gleason is wholly unjustified in labelling the Government's conduct, as he does in his brief on appeal, as "prosecutorial misconduct," "suppression of evidence," "knowing use of false testimony," failure "to correct false testimony," silence "in the face of their witnesses' perjury," "foul conduct," and resort to "slippery and less than thoroughly upright conduct." [FN19]

FN19. These scurrilous statements, which indicate a reckless disregard by counsel for the facts of record, exceed the bounds of responsible advocacy in our adversarial system and merit consideration by the Bar Association Grievance Committee for appropriate action. ABA Code of Professional Responsibility, DR 7-102(A)(1), (2).

[37] As for the allegation in the last superseding indictment that on March 31, 1974, Sindona and Bordoni caused FNB to conceal losses in its bond trading account by misvaluing securities, the simple and complete answer is that it does not refer to their personal participation in the false security evaluation but merely to acts committed by their CO-CONSPIRATORS in furtherance of the CONSPIRACY to falsify the bank's earnings statement for the first quarter of 1974, for which they could be held criminally responsible under Pinkerton v. United States, supra.

GOVERNMENT'S REFUSAL TO CONFER IMMUNITY ON SINDONA

[38] Gleason contends that his due process rights were violated by the Government's failure to accede to his request that use immunity (i. e., immunity from the use of his testimony and evidence derived from it in subsequent prosecution) be extended to an alleged principal accomplice and co-CONSPIRATOR, Sindona, who was at the time and remains a defendant named in a separate indictment, 75 Cr. 948, charging him and Bordoni with participation in the same false foreign exchange transactions as those forming a major part of the case against Gleason. We disagree.

As we pointed out in United States v. Lang, 589 F.2d 92, 95-96 (2d Cir. 1978), the law is "well settled that the power of the Executive Branch to grant immunity to a witness is discretionary and no obligation exists on the part of the United States Attorney to seek such immunity. United States v. Bautista, 509 F.2d 675, 677 (9th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom. Monsivais v. United States, 421 U.S. 976, 95 S.Ct. 1976, 44 L.Ed.2d 467 (1975); United States v. Ramsey, 503 F.2d 523, 532-33 (7th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 420 U.S. 932, 95 S.Ct. 1136, 43 L.Ed.2d 405 (1975); United States v. Berrigan, 482 F.2d 171, 190 (3d Cir. 1973); Earl v. United States, 124 *28 U.S.App.D.C. 77, 80, 361 F.2d 531, 534 (1966) (Burger, J.), cert. denied, 388 U.S. 921, 87 S.Ct. 2121, 18 L.Ed.2d 1370 (1967); People v. Sapia, 41 N.Y.2d 160, 166, 391 N.Y.S.2d 93, 359 N.E.2d 688 (1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 823, 98 S.Ct. 68, 54 L.Ed.2d 80 (1977).

"We note that this court has held that the government is not obligated to grant immunity to witnesses so that they may be made available to testify on behalf of the defendant. United States v. Stofsky, 527 F.2d 237, 249 (2d Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 819, 97 S.Ct. 65, 50 L.Ed.2d 80 (1976)."

Moreover, there was no representation that if granted immunity Sindona would furnish specific exculpatory evidence unobtainable from any other source. The most that was suggested through Sindona's counsel, who refused to permit Sindona to talk with Gleason, was that Sindona "would deny any wrongdoing or conversations in furtherance of any wrongdoing with Gleason," which would at best be merely cumulative of Gleason's testimony and from an obviously interested witness who would be subject to intensive cross-examination that might well destroy his credibility.

Nor is this a case where the Government deliberately manipulated grants of immunity to gain an unfair advantage over any defendant, United States v. Lang, supra, 589 F.2d at 96-97. The major accomplices who testified (Crosse, Shaddick, Bordoni and Garofalo) were not granted immunity. Only two lesser figures, Thomas Murphy and Bruce Carlton, were promised by the United States Attorney that their statements to him would not be used against them. No sound reason exists, therefore, for departing from the general rule that the Government may refuse to grant immunity.

THE ALLEGED INSUFFICIENCY OF THE CHARGES AND PROOF OF USE OF DECEPTIVE DEVICES IN CONNECTION WITH THE SALE OF SECURITIES

[39] Gleason contends that Counts 5-14, which allege that the defendants, in violation of s 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act, 15 U.S.C. s 78j(b) and Rule 10b-5, used interstate commerce and the mails to employ manipulative and deceptive devices in connection with the purchase and sale of FNB's stock, which was purchased by 12 identified persons on specified dates after the issuance of the false FNB financial statement for the first quarter of 1974, are insufficient for failure to contain specific allegations of misconduct and to set forth all of the elements of a crime. The contention must be rejected for the reason that each count of the indictment followed the precise language of s 10(b), thus alleging all of the essential elements of the crime charged, see Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 117, 94 S.Ct. 2887, 41 L.Ed.2d 590 (1974); United States v. Carr, 582 F.2d 242, 244 (2d Cir. 1978). Moreover, by incorporating by reference paragraphs 6-8 of Count One into Counts Five through Fourteen the Government specified the nature of the alleged criminal conduct in sufficient detail to enable the defendants to prepare their defenses and to plead an acquittal or conviction in bar of any future prosecution for the same offense.

[40][41] Gleason's further contention that the counts should have been dismissed for the Government's failure to prove any reliance by the specified purchasers of FNB shares upon the bank's false financial statement for the first quarter of 1974 must also be rejected. Despite contrary suggestions in earlier decisions relied on by appellants, the law is settled that the Government need only prove that the false representation is one that a reasonable stockholder would rely on in purchasing or selling the relevant corporate shares, SEC v. Texas Gulf Sulphur Co., 401 F.2d 833, 860 (2d Cir. 1968) (en banc), cert. denied, 394 U.S. 976, 89 S.Ct. 1454, 22 L.Ed.2d 756 (1969); cf. TSC Indus. v. Northway Inc., 426 U.S. 438, 449, 96 S.Ct. 2126, 48 L.Ed.2d 757 (1976), and Judge Griesa so instructed the jury. It is also settled that the same standards apply to civil and criminal liability under the securities law. United States v. Peltz, 433 F.2d 48, 53 (2d Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 955, 91 S.Ct. 974, 28 L.Ed.2d 238 (1971).

*29 THE CLAIM THAT THE RECORDS OF THE FRAUDULENT FOREIGN EXCHANGE TRANSACTIONS ARE NOT "FALSE ENTRIES" WITHIN THE MEANING OF 18 U.S.C. s 1005

Gleason's last contention, derived principally from Coffin v. United States, 156 U.S. 432, 462-63, 15 S.Ct. 394, 39 L.Ed. 481 (1895), is that those counts of the indictment based on the four deceptive foreign exchange transactions which showed FNB as earning a profit must be dismissed because the transactions took place and were reflected in the bank's books, thus precluding a claim that they were "false entries" within the meaning of s 1005. The argument disregards the indictment and later authority controlling the interpretation of the term "false entry."

The indictment (e. g., Count Three) alleges that the defendants caused a false entry to be made in the bank's books and earnings statement by representing in its financial statement that the bank had earned a profit of $79,000 for the first quarter of 1974 when in fact it had suffered a loss of over $7 million and that this had been accomplished "by means of fictitious and false foreign exchange contracts between said bank and Amincor Bank, Zurich, Switzerland, and Banca Unione, Milan, Italy, which reflected a fictitious profit in the foreign exchange operations of approximately $2,000,000."

[42][43] It is true that in Coffin the Court stated that a crime of making a false entry is not committed if the transaction entered on the books actually took place and was entered as it occurred. 156 U.S. at 463, 15 S.Ct. 394. However, this was modified by Agnew v. United States, 165 U.S. 36, 52-54, 17 S.Ct. 235, 41 L.Ed. 624 (1897), holding that a false entry statute may be violated by entering on the books a transaction known to be fraudulent, even though the entry might be accurate. See United States v. Darby, 289 U.S. 224, 226-27, 53 S.Ct. 573, 77 L.Ed. 1137 (1933); United States v. Huber, 603 F.2d 387, 397-98 (2d Cir. 1979). While an entry is not false merely because the underlying transaction is illegal, see United States v. Manderson, 511 F.2d 179, 180-81 (5th Cir. 1975), here the profit shown on the record of the foreign exchange transactions was known by the defendants to be false and fictitious, concocted for the very purpose of distorting the financial statement. The result was a violation of 18 U.S.C. s 1005. See Billingsley v. United States, 178 F. 653, 663 (8th Cir. 1910).

[44] We find no merit in appellants' remaining contentions, which require little or no discussion. The district court's grant of one extra peremptory challenge to the Government without the defendants' consent after granting three peremptories to the defendants, while not in compliance with F.R.Cr.P. 24(b), [FN20] is not shown to have resulted in the selection of a jury that was unrepresentative of the community, or biased in any other way. Nor is any prejudice to appellants shown. The proportional advantage accorded defendants by Rule 24(b) (10 peremptories as against 6 for the Government) was approximately maintained. While the court's action was improper in the absence of defense counsels' consent, we do not believe that reversal is warranted in the absence of prejudice to the defendants.

FN20. Although F.R.Cr.P. 24(b) does not authorize the granting of additional peremptories to the Government, it is not uncommon for the court to condition the grant of a defendant's request for additional peremptories on his consent to a proportionate increase being accorded to the Government.

The judgments of conviction are affirmed.

Division No. 87-1.

United States Court of Appeals,
District of Columbia Circuit.

(Division for the purpose of Appointing Independent Counsel, Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as Amended).

July 12, 1990.

United States Attorney General sought recovery of attorney fees under Independent Counsel Reauthorization Act for expenses incurred in connection with investigation by independent counsel as to whether Attorney General, as counselor to President, violated conflict of interest laws. The Court of Appeals held that Attorney General was entitled to recover attorney fees and costs.

Ordered accordingly.

Right to recover attorney fees in independent counsel investigations is based on waiver of sovereign immunity of United States and that standard must be strictly construed against application and in favor of sovereign. 28 U.S.C.A. § 593(f)(1).

Reasons given for referral to independent counsel of investigation of United States Attorney General as to whether, as counselor to President, Attorney General violated conflict of interest laws were insufficient to constitute "reasonable grounds" required to justify application for further investigation by independent counsel; referral was made on basis of fragmentary and preliminary information that lacked specificity from the beginning. 28 U.S.C. (1982 Ed.) § 592(a)(1).

1194 188 Before MacKINNON, Presiding, BUTZNER and PELL, Senior circuit judges.

PER CURIAM:

On May 11, 1987 the Acting Attorney General, by letter, referred the matter of Attorney General Edwin Meese III and his association with several individuals involved in "Welbilt Electronic Die Corporation," also known as Wedtech Corporation, to Independent Counsel James C. McKay, Esquire for investigation (hereafter "the referral"). The referral followed immediately upon a letter request by Meese dated the same date as the referral. At the time of the referral Mr. McKay was conducting an investigation into Franklyn C. Nofziger's representation of Wedtech Corporation 1195 189 and Comet Rice, Inc. [FN1] Giving rise to the referral for investigation of Mr. Meese were the circumstances of his official and "personal and/or financial relationships with ... [Wedtech Corporation, Franklyn C. Nofziger,] E. Robert Wallach, and W. Franklyn Chinn ..." [FN2] during the time that Meese had been serving as Counselor to the President. The referral did not request a focused investigation into any specific criminal offense but rather requested a generalized investigation into possible violations of all eleven of the federal conflict of interest laws, i.e., 18 U.S.C. §§ 201-211.

FN1. The Special Division of the court had previously appointed Independent Counsel McKay to investigate whether Nofziger violated conflict of interest laws in connection with, inter alia, his lobbying activities on behalf of Wedtech Corporation and Comet Rice, Inc. See Order, In re Nofziger, Div. No. 87-1, at 2 (Feb. 2, 1987).

FN2. Referral letter of Acting Attorney General to Independent Counsel McKay of May 11, 1987; see also text infra pp. 1199-1200.

At the outset the independent counsel investigation centered on whether Meese as Counselor to the President violated the conflict of interest laws in assisting the minority-owned Wedtech Corporation in its efforts to obtain a government defense contract. Independent Counsel later requested the Special Division to define his prosecutorial jurisdiction with respect to Meese, and the court complied. [FN3] The resulting investigation inquired into the Wedtech matter and then expanded extensively into six non-Wedtech matters. [FN4] It became very intensive and eventually continued for fourteen months. Upon the completion of the investigation, "no indictment [was] brought" against Mr. Meese. Now, as authorized by § 593(f)(1) of the Independent Counsel Reauthorization Act of 1987, [FN5] Meese applies to the court for an award of $575,598.01 in attorneys' fees and costs incurred as a result of the investigation to which he was subjected. The court approves an award of $460,509.07.

FN5. 28 U.S.C. § 591 et seq. (1988).

I.

Independent Counsel McKay began his investigation of Meese on May 11, 1987 under the terms of the Ethics in Government Act Amendments of 1982 as approved January 3, 1983 (96 Stat. 2039) (hereafter "the 1982 Act"). The 1982 Act was followed by the enactment on December 15, 1987 of the Independent Counsel Reauthorization Act of 1987 (hereafter "the 1987 Act" and "the Act") (101 Stat. 1293). It is the terms of Section 593(f)(1) of the 1987 Act that determine whether "reasonable" attorneys' fees are to be awarded in this case: [FN6]

FN6. The provisions of the 1987 Act regarding attorneys' fees apply retroactively to independent counsel proceedings pending on December 15, 1987. Independent Counsel Reauthorization Act of 1987, Pub.L. No. 100-191 § 6(b)(2)(A), 101 Stat. 1307 (1987). The 1987 Act added the "reasonable" requirement.

> Upon the request of an individual who is the subject of an investigation conducted by an independent counsel pursuant to this chapter, the division of the court may, if no indictment is brought against such individual pursuant to that investigation, award reimbursement for those reasonable attorneys' fees incurred by that individual during that investigation 1196 190 which would not have been incurred but for the requirements of this chapter.

28 U.S.C. § 593(f)(1) (emphasis added).

[1] We have recently outlined the standards for awarding attorneys' fees in independent counsel investigations. These standards require proof that the fees are "reasonable," adequately documented, and would not have been incurred "but for" the Act. See In re Donovan, 877 F.2d 982, 994 (D.C.Cir.1989); In re Olson, 884 F.2d 1415, 1428 (D.C.Cir.1989); In re Sealed Case, 890 F.2d 451 (D.C.Cir.1989); In re Olson/Perry, 892 F.2d 1073 (D.C.Cir.1990). Satisfying the "but for" requirement is the most difficult. The right to recover attorneys' fees in such cases against the Government is based on a waiver of the sovereign immunity of the United States and that standard must be strictly construed against the application and in favor of the sovereign. Ruckelshaus v. Sierra Club, 463 U.S. 680, 685, 103 S.Ct. 3274, 3277, 77 L.Ed.2d 938 (1983); McMahon v. United States, 342 U.S. 25, 27, 72 S.Ct. 17, 19, 96 L.Ed. 26 (1951); In re Donovan, supra, at 994; In re Olson, supra, at 1428; In re Jordan, 745 F.2d 1574, 1576 (D.C.Cir.1984).

A. The "But For" Requirement

The Ethics in Government Act of 1978 [FN7] was amended by the 1982 Act to provide that subjects of independent counsel investigations, who are not indicted, may be reimbursed for all or part of their attorneys' fees that "would not have been incurred in the absence of the special prosecutor [now independent counsel] law." S.Rep. No. 496, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. 18 (1982), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, pp. 3537, 3554; 28 U.S.C. § 593(g) (1982). This provision for reimbursement was included because:

FN7. The present Independent Counsel Act has gone through two amendatory enactments: (1) Ethics in Government Act of 1978, Pub.L. No. 95-521, 92 Stat. 1867 (1978), amended by (2) Ethics in Government Act Amendments of 1982, Pub.L. No. 97-409, 96 Stat. 2039 (approved Jan. 3, 1983); and (3) then amended by the Independent Counsel Reauthorization Act of 1987 (effective Dec. 15, 1987), 101 Stat. 1293.

> Congress learned that certain government officials ... had been subjected to investigations by independent counsels that the Department of Justice would not have conducted had these officials been private citizens.... Thus, these officials were subjected to a harsher standard than ordinary citizens and incurred legal expenses no ordinary citizen would have incurred, but for the independent counsel statute. In such cases, reasonable attorney fees should be awarded.

H.R.Conf.Rep. No. 452, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. 31 (1987), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1987, pp. 2150, 2197 (emphasis added).

In addition to adding the provision for the reimbursement of attorneys' fees, Congress in the same Act raised the standards required for applications by the Attorney General to the Special Division for the appointment of independent counsels.

Prior to the 1982 Act, following a preliminary investigation, the Attorney General was required to request the appointment of an independent counsel unless the allegations were "so unsubstantiated that no further investigation or prosecution is warranted." 28 U.S.C. § 592(b)(1) (Supp. II 1978). The amendments brought by the 1982 Act, however, raised that standard to provide:

> If the Attorney General, upon completion of the preliminary investigation, finds reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted, ... then the Attorney General shall apply to the division of the court for the appointment of a [sic] independent counsel....

28 U.S.C. § 592(c)(1) (1982) (emphasis added). [FN8] Requiring a finding of reasonable grounds substantially changed the nature and amount of evidence required to support a request for the appointment of an independent counsel.

> FN8. This standard was further amended in 1987 to eliminate "or prosecution." See 28 U.S.C. § 592(c)(1)(A) and 28 U.S.C. § 593(c)(2)(B) and (C) (1988) (101 Stat. 1293, 1296, 1299).

In adding such change, Congress further directed the Attorney General to exercise 1197 191 the "reasonable discretion [that] is regularly practiced by the Department of Justice, U.S. Attorneys, and prosecutors throughout the federal system," and to "comply with the written or other established policies of the Department of Justice with respect to the enforcement of criminal laws." S.Rep. No. 496, supra, at 14, 15, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, pp. 3550, 3551; see also 28 U.S.C. § 592(c)(1) (1982).

This brought into play the policies of the Department of Justice, insofar as they relate to "further investigation[s]," including the following:

> 1. If the attorney for the government has probable cause to believe that a person has committed a federal offense within his jurisdiction, he should consider whether to:
> (a) request or conduct further investigation; ...

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, PRINCIPLES OF FEDERAL PROSECUTION, p. 5 (1980) (emphasis added).

Joining the "reasonable grounds" standard of the 1982 Act, with the Departmental policy of "probable cause" as the standard that must be satisfied before considering whether to "request or conduct [a] further [criminal] investigation," according to the latest interpretation of probable cause by the Supreme Court, requires a determination that "reasonable grounds" exist to believe that there is a "fair probability ... or substantial chance of criminal activity...." Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 238, 244 n. 13, 103 S.Ct. 2317, 2332, 2335 n. 13, 76 L.Ed.2d 527 (1983) (emphasis added). The "reasonable grounds" need not be as strong as the showing required to support an arrest or search, but traditionally cannot be based on mere association, casual rumor, speculation or mere suspicion. It appears to the court that, taking all the applicable requirements into consideration, before an independent counsel investigation could be initiated, Congress was requiring a showing that there was a fair probability or substantial chance that the subject engaged in some criminal activity.

The Meese fee application in substance contends that the "but for" requirement is satisfied because the referral of his investigation to the Independent Counsel, in asserted compliance with 28 U.S.C. § 592(e) and § 594(e) (1982), did not fully comply with the statutory standards that Congress had prescribed. The authorization of the investigation did not follow the normal procedure; it did not originally begin following an application to, and order by the Special Division of the court. And there is nothing in the court record to indicate that the normal preliminary investigation had been completed from which it was concluded that there were "reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted." 28 U.S.C. § 592(c)(1) (1982).

[2] Rather, the addition of Edwin Meese III as a new targeted subject of an existing independent counsel investigation began as a result of a referral by letter to Independent Counsel McKay who was already investigating Nofziger's role in Wedtech. That investigative jurisdiction over an additional targeted individual subject was being requested and obtained by referral, however, did not eliminate the necessity for compliance with the requirement of § 592(c)(1) that there be a preliminary investigation and finding of reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution of the targeted official, as a subject of the investigation, was warranted. Otherwise, once an independent counsel was appointed to investigate one official, additional officials could be targeted as subjects by a mere letter of referral without a finding of the basic "reasonable grounds" protections the statute affords. As we interpret the statute, there must be a determination by the Attorney General that the "reasonable grounds" requirement is satisfied before a valid investigation of an added official can be referred to an existing independent counsel.

1. The Referral

[3] As indicated above, the independent counsel investigation of Mr. Meese began when the Attorney General (Acting), following the receipt on May 11, 1987 of a letter from Meese's counsel requesting 1198 192 such investigation, immediately, by letter, referred the Meese matter to Independent Counsel McKay who had previously been appointed with investigative and prosecutorial jurisdiction over Franklyn C. Nofziger and his lobbying relationship to Welbilt Electronic Die Corporation (Wedtech) and Comet Rice, Inc. [FN9] Under the 1982 Act, given the proper findings, referral could be a proper procedure; [FN10] it was granted the same day as the Meese request and without any finding in the record of "reasonable grounds."

FN9. See Order, In re Nofziger, Div. No. 87-1, at 2 (Feb. 2, 1987).

FN10. § 592(e) The Attorney General may ask a [sic] independent counsel to accept referral of a matter that relates to a matter within that independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction. § 594(e) ... [A] [sic] independent counsel may accept referral of a matter by the Attorney General, if the matter relates to a matter within such independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction as established by the division of the court. If such a referral is accepted, the independent counsel shall notify the division of the court.

The letter of referral was limited to a request to Independent Counsel to investigate Meese's conduct involving Wedtech and his association with individuals involved in Wedtech:

> I hereby request that you accept referral of the question whether the federal conflict of interest law, 18 U.S.Code §§ 201-211, or any other provision of federal criminal law, was violated by Mr. Meese's relationship or dealings at any time from 1981 to the present with any of the following: Welbilt Electronic Die Corporation/ Wedtech Corporation (including any of its contracts with the U.S. Government or efforts to obtain same); Franklyn C. Nofziger; E. Robert Wallach; W. Franklyn Chinn; and/or Financial Management International, Inc.

Referral letter of May 11, 1987 of Attorney General (Acting) to Independent Counsel McKay at 3.

2. Grounds Urged Upon Independent Counsel to Accept Referral

At this point we note two significant extracts from the letter of referral of May 11, 1987 urging Independent Counsel to accept the referral, and upon which the Independent Counsel immediately accepted the Meese matter for investigation:

> In fairness to Mr. Meese, I should state that the reports we have received concerning Mr. Meese's relationships with Wedtech-associated individuals and entities are only fragmentary, and do not show that Mr. Meese ever received any compensation from Welbilt/Wedtech, nor that he ever invested in the securities of Welbilt/Wedtech. While I believe the Public Integrity Section is in possession of all relevant information developed to date by the U.S. Attorneys' offices in New York and Baltimore and by your office, it may well be that further investigation will be able to resolve definitively the questions raised by Mr. Meese's relationship to the Welbilt/Wedtech contract and to associates of the Welbilt/Wedtech Company.
> Finally, while as indicated above the information concerning Mr. Meese himself is fragmentary and preliminary, the present situation is somewhat unusual in that the various investigations have developed substantial evidence of Wedtech-related criminal conduct on the part of individuals other than Mr. Meese.

Letter of May 11, 1987, pp. 2, 3 (emphasis added).

The above extracts from the letter of referral, the remainder of the letter, and Independent Counsel's notification to the Special Division, indicate that referral of the investigative cause and the acceptance by Independent Counsel was made on the basis of "fragmentary " and "preliminary " information that lacked "specificity" from the beginning. See 28 U.S.C. § 592(a)(1) (1982). This information, despite the substantial amount of evidence that had been accumulated from official investigations by two grand juries in New York and Baltimore, the independent counsel investigation of Nofziger/ Wedtech, the 1199 193 investigation by the Public Integrity Section of the Department of Justice, and undoubtedly some FBI investigation, included:

> [no] show[ing] that Mr. Meese ever received any compensation from Welbilt/Wedtech, [or Wedtech associated individuals,] nor that he ever invested in the securities of Welbilt/Wedtech.... [And the letter stated] the present situation [was considered to be] somewhat unusual in that the various investigations have developed substantial evidence of Wedtech-related criminal conduct on the part of individuals other than Mr. Meese.

Referral Letter of May 11, 1987, supra, pp. 1195 (emphasis added). It rather appears that it is the characterization of the failures of numerous official investigations to discover any evidence of "criminal conduct" by Mr. Meese as "unusual" that is "unusual." [FN11]

> FN11. It thus comes as no surprise that the extensive investigation by Independent Counsel exonerated Mr. Meese on all Wedtech related allegations.

Nevertheless, despite the deficiency of inculpatory information, Independent Counsel was urged to accept the referral: (1) because the Independent Counsel was already investigating certain Wedtech related matters; (2) because the Department did not wish to "interfere with or otherwise burden" the Nofziger investigation; (3) because the Department of Justice considered that "public confidence in the administration of justice [would] be better served if these matters are resolved by an investigation conducted independently of the Department of Justice, which is headed by Mr. Meese;" (4) because the Department considered "that the most appropriate course [was] for ... [Independent Counsel McKay] to accept referral of this matter...." (5) because of Meese's prior association and relationship with two individuals being investigated in the Wedtech phase of the matter; (6) because two grand juries were conducting on-going related investigations of some of Meese's associates; (7) because conducting an independent investigation and thereby foregoing a duplicative investigation would serve the interests of the public and the convenience of the Department of Justice; and (8) because of the hope that additional investigation would definitively resolve unspecified circumstantial questions raised by Meese's relationship to Nofziger and his personal and business association with two individuals whose Wedtech related activities were being investigated. Id.

The Department of Justice also contends that the investigation was properly referred to Independent Counsel because:

> Mr. Meese specifically requested that the matter be referred to Independent Counsel McKay pursuant to § 592(e).

Department of Justice Evaluation Memorandum of Meese's Request for Attorneys' Fees at 7 (April 20, 1988) (emphasis added). However, Congress in its legislative history states definitively:

> [T]he desires of the possible subject of the investigation are irrelevant to the decisionmaking process [as to whether an independent counsel should be requested].

S.Rep. No. 123, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. 21 (1987), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1987, p. 2170 (emphasis added); see text at p. 1201, infra.

The reasons referred to above are insufficient to constitute the "reasonable grounds" the statute requires to justify the application for further investigation by an independent counsel, and there is no finding in the letter of referral, or in the court's record of this case, that such standard was satisfied. "Specificity of information" is an initial requirement for the preliminary investigation, 28 U.S.C. § 592(a)(1), and there is no justification for dropping that requirement from the "reasonable grounds" standard. If stronger cause existed it was not stated.

In addition, when the Department contends that the Meese request for appointment of independent counsel should be relied upon as one factor justifying the referral, it appears that too much reliance may have been placed on the Meese request. See text, infra, at p. 1201. Such reliance 1200

194 as a normal reaction is understandable, but irrelevant. Also, particularly objectionable is the reliance on Meese's association with some individuals who were being investigated. When suspicion is bred from association it is a doubly deficient ground.

Taken by its four corners, the letter of referral seems to admit that, although there have been several official investigations into Wedtech, actual criminal conduct by Meese is not being suggested, but that Independent Counsel should accept the broad referral and investigate Meese as a subject because of a concatenation of irrelevant facts and circumstances that at best add up to relying on: generalized suspicion based on associations of a personal and personal business nature, Meese's request for the investigation, the "unusual" nature of the investigative situation, that reasonable grounds had already been found for investigating Nofziger and they did not want to interfere with that investigation, and that the public interest and the convenience of the Department of Justice would be served by McKay's acceptance of the referral.

The court agrees with the Department that the public interest and "public confidence in the administration of justice [was] better served" by the referral of the matter to the Independent Counsel, but this and the several other ordinarily commendable reasons referred to above, that normally might justify a non-criminal administrative investigation, do not constitute the "reasonable grounds" that the Congress required before a high ranking government official could be subjected to an extraordinary criminal investigation by an independent counsel. To do so, as was the case here, violated the intent that Congress expressed in enacting the "reasonable grounds" (probable cause) standard to better protect those covered officials from the severe intrusion of an extensive criminal investigation by an independent counsel. S.Rep. No. 496, supra, at 19; see also 28 U.S.C. § 592(c)(1) (1982).

3. The Acceptance of the Referral and the Resulting Investigation

[4] Independent Counsel McKay immediately accepted the referral and in accordance with § 594(e) did "notify" the Special Division on May 11, 1987 as follows:

> Independent Counsel has accepted the referral as a matter related to the jurisdiction mandated by the February 2, 1987 Order of the Special Division of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, In re Franklyn C. Nofziger.

Notice by Independent Counsel of Acceptance of Referral, In re Nofziger, Div. No. 87-1 (May 11, 1987). Upon receipt of McKay's notice, the Special Division immediately granted Independent Counsel leave to disclose his Acceptance of the Referral. [FN12] Thus, an extensive independent counsel investigation of Meese/Wedtech was publicly launched on the basis of the letter of referral to an existing Independent Counsel.

> FN12. Order, In re Nofziger, Div. No. 87-1 (May 11, 1987).

It was not until three months later on August 6, 1987 that Independent Counsel McKay applied to the Special Division to define his necessary additional prosecutorial jurisdiction. Application to Define the Jurisdiction of the Independent Counsel, In re Nofziger/Meese, Div. No. 87-1 (Aug. 6, 1987). That complete authority to investigate and prosecute Meese was not acquired by virtue of the referral of the matter for investigation to Independent Counsel McKay was recognized in his delayed application to the Special Division for prosecutorial jurisdiction, which, after describing the referral, stated:

> It does not appear [under the Act], however, that the Acting Attorney General has the power to define the prosecutorial jurisdiction of an independent counsel, See 28 U.S.C. § 593(c) [FN13] That power 1201 195 is vested only in this court, which has not formalized a definition of Independent Counsel McKay's prosecutorial jurisdiction in the Meese matter.

> FN13. 28 U.S.C. § 593(c) provides that the Special Division, upon application of the Attorney General, may expand the prosecutorial jurisdiction of an existing independent counsel: The division of the court, upon the request of the Attorney General ... may expand the prosecutorial jurisdiction of an existing independent counsel, and such expansion may be in lieu of the appointment of additional independent counsel. 28 U.S.C. § 593(c) (1982). But prior to August 6, 1987 no application was made to the court by the Attorney General (Acting).

Application to Define Jurisdiction of Independent Counsel, In re Nofziger/Meese, Div. No. 87-1 (Aug. 6, 1987). In response to the application by the Independent Counsel, the Special Division issued an order expanding his prosecutorial jurisdiction to include Mr. Meese as a subject of investigation. [FN14]

FN14. See Order, In re Nofziger/Meese, Div. No. 87-1 (Aug. 18, 1987).

The investigation continued for 14 months and was broadened far beyond any investigation contemplated by the initial referral. [FN15] Following completion of the Wedtech investigation six additional matters were thoroughly investigated. [FN16] The Final Report of Independent Counsel covered 814 pages. It thus clearly appears that the basis upon which the referral was made and the extreme expansion of the resulting investigation subjected Meese to a "more rigorous application of the criminal law than is applied to other citizens." S.Rep. No. 496, supra, at 19, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 3555, and see supra n. 4.

FN15. See supra note 4.

FN16. Extraordinary thoroughness of investigation is to be expected in some independent counsel investigations because of the "institution of the independent counsel," and the extensive nature of the investigation and report required by Congress. Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 713-14, 108 S.Ct. 2597, 2630-31, 101 L.Ed.2d 569 (1988) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

For all of the above reasons, the court finds that the reasonable attorneys' fees Meese subsequently incurred in his defense, to the extent we find their payment to be authorized, "would not have been incurred but for the requirements of [the Independent Counsel] chapter." 28 U.S.C. § 593(f)(1) (1988).

B. The Meese Request for an Independent Counsel Investigation

[5] As previously stated, on May 11, 1987 Meese formally requested the Acting Attorney General to refer the matter of his alleged involvement in Welbilt/Wedtech to Independent Counsel McKay.

The fact that Meese initially requested appointment of an independent counsel has no bearing on Meese's right to be awarded his reasonable attorneys' fees. The legislative history of the Act clearly states that such request is "irrelevant" to the court's decision to award attorneys' fees incurred by the subject in the resulting investigation:

> It has sometimes been suggested that, when considering whether to award attorney fees under the statute, the special court should take into consideration whether the subject of the investigation requested an independent counsel. This factor should not play any role in the decision to award attorney fees. The statute specifies that the Attorney General must request an independent counsel whenever there are reasonable grounds to believe further investigation is warranted in a case; the desires of the possible subject of the investigation are irrelevant to the decisionmaking process.

S.Rep. No. 123, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. 21 (1987), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1987, p. 2170 (emphasis added).

C. Compliance with the Reasonable Fee Requirement

Having found that Meese satisfies the "but for" requirement, it must next be determined whether the attorneys charged a reasonable hourly rate, whether the time expended by the attorneys on the case was reasonable, and whether the foregoing requirements are adequately documented. In re Donovan, 877 F.2d at 990, 994; In re Olson, 884 F.2d at 1422, 1428.

1. Hourly Rates

[6] The Conference Committee Report accompanying the Act provides the following 1202 196 standard for use in determining the reasonableness of the hourly rates charged by attorneys:

> [T]he hourly rate is left to the judgment of the special court using the standard of reasonableness. In determining the proper rate, the special court should consider the prevailing community standards and any helpful case law.

H.R.Conf.Rep. No. 452, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. 31 (1987), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1987, p. 2197 (emphasis added). Reasonable fees are "calculated according to the prevailing market rates in the relevant community" and the applicant must "produce satisfactory evidence--in addition to the attorney's own affidavit--that the requested rates are in line with those prevailing in the community for similar services by lawyers of reasonably comparable skill, experience, and reputation." In re Donovan, supra, at 992 & n. 19 (quoting Blum v. Stenson, 465 U.S. 886, 895, 896 n. 11, 104 S.Ct. 1541, 1547, 1547 n. 11, 79 L.Ed.2d 891 (1984)); see also In re Olson, supra, at 1423.

[7] Applying these standards to the Meese application, we find the rates charged by Meese's attorneys conform to local standards and hence must be held to be reasonable. Meese was represented throughout the investigation by the Washington, D.C. firm of Miller, Cassidy, Larroca & Lewin. His principal attorneys and their corresponding hourly rates were: Nathan Lewin--$300/hr.; James Rocap III--$140/hr.; and Nicki Kuckes--$100/hr. In support of these rates, the application includes a supporting affidavit dated February 1, 1989 of a qualified attorney stating that the rates are reasonable and consistent with the rates usually charged by attorneys of comparable ability in Washington, D.C. A recent survey of billing rates for partners and associates at the nation's largest firms was also filed. The affidavit and survey discharge Meese's burden of demonstrating through independent evidence that the Miller, Cassidy rates are in line with community standards. [FN17]

> FN17. In approving a rate of $300 per hour the court has some reservations. But given the Supreme Court's opinion in Blum v. Stenson, 465 U.S. 886, 892-896, 104 S.Ct. 1541, 1545-47, 79 L.Ed.2d 891 (1984) and Missouri v. Jenkins, supra, upholding "market rates," and Meese's documentary support for his request, the court has no option. The attorney's extraordinary qualifications and supporting documentation support a finding that the rate is in line with community standards.

[8] We also find the rates billed for the services of several paralegals and law clerks to be reasonable. Such rates ranged from $45 to $75 per hour. However, in light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Missouri v. Jenkins, --- U.S. ----, 109 S.Ct. 2463, 105 L.Ed.2d 229 (1989), which we have previously applied to the Act, In re Sealed Case, 890 F.2d 451, 454 (D.C.Cir.1989) we deduct $4253.75 for services billed at these rates that were of a purely clerical nature. In Missouri, the Court held, inter alia, that "reasonable attorney's fee," under the Civil Rights Attorneys' Fees Awards Act, included work performed by paralegals and law clerks. Missouri, 109 S.Ct. at 2470. However, the court stated:

> It has frequently been recognized in the lower courts that paralegals are capable of carrying out many tasks ... that might otherwise be performed by a lawyer and billed at a higher rate. Such work might include, for example, factual investigation, including locating and interviewing witnesses; assistance with depositions, interrogatories, and document production; compilation of statistical and financial data; checking legal citations; and drafting correspondence.... Of course purely clerical or secretarial tasks should not be billed at a paralegal rate regardless of who performs them. What the court in Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express Inc., 488 F.2d 714, 717 (CA5 1974) said in regard to the work of attorneys is applicable by analogy to paralegals: "It is appropriate to distinguish between legal work, in the strict sense, and investigation, clerical work ... and other work which can often be accomplished by non-lawyers but which a lawyer may do because he has no other help available. Such non-legal 1203 197 work may command a lesser rate. Its dollar value is not enhanced just because a lawyer does it."

Id. 110 S.Ct. at 2471 n. 10 (emphasis added). The court therefore deducts those charges by both paralegals and law clerks for such tasks as "delivering" or "picking up" various documents as well as photocopying. In our view, such tasks are "purely clerical or secretarial" and thus cannot be billed at paralegal or law clerk rates. [FN18]

> FN18. The charges for these tasks have not been eliminated entirely. Rather, the rate has been reduced to $10 per hour which we find to be reasonable for such services.

2. Reasonable Amount of Time Expended by Attorneys

In evaluating the reasonableness of the hours billed by Meese's attorneys, we are required to examine the application in light of the specific provisions of the Act as well as general case law on what constitutes hours reasonably incurred. In re

Donovan, supra, at 993; In re Olson, supra, at 1427-28.

[9] The Act provides only for the reimbursement of those attorneys' fees incurred "during [the] investigation." 28 U.S.C. 593(f)(1) (emphasis added). This provision permits recovery only for those fees "rendered in asserting the merits of the subject's defense against the criminal charges being investigated." In re Olson, supra, at 1427; see also, In re Donovan, supra, at 993; In re Olson/ Perry, 892 F.2d 1073, 1074 (D.C.Cir.1990). Therefore, as with prior fee applications, we disallow $7,585 in fees claimed for the preparation of the fee application. Such fees were not for services rendered in asserting the merits of Meese's defense to the investigation. In re Olson, supra, at 1427-28; In re Olson/Perry, supra, at 1074.

[10] Similarly excluded is $5,170 in fees incurred preparing Meese for his testimony in the trial of Nofziger and his testimony before a congressional subcommittee. Such fees were not incurred in Meese's defense to the investigation by Independent Counsel McKay as both proceedings were separate and distinct from the independent counsel investigation.

[11][12] Also excluded is $16,652 in fees incurred for responding to media inquiries. [FN19] As stated in In re Donovan, "[m]edia related activity has no bearing on the operation of an independent counsel's investigation and thus is not reasonably related to a defense to such investigation." Id. at 994.

> FN19. While fees incurred responding to media inquiries have been excluded, no deduction is made for fees incurred by Meese's attorneys reviewing press clippings concerning the investigation. We believe that such activity in this case, because of the heavy media involvement, provided useful and important information that assisted counsel in their representation of the subject and is therefore "reasonably related to a defense to [this] investigation."

[13] Additionally, we shall exclude $220 in fees for the letter written on May 11, 1987 by Meese's attorneys to the Acting Attorney General, requesting referral of the Meese matter to Independent Counsel McKay. Such fees were not incurred during the investigation nor were they incurred in Meese's defense.

[14] We also deduct $6335 for fees incurred by Meese after the filing of his response to the Independent Counsel Report on July 14, 1988. Upon the filing of the Final Report by the Independent Counsel, the investigation terminates and only those fees incurred responding to the Final Report are thereafter compensable under the Act. See In re Donovan, supra, at 994.

3. Adequacy of Documentation

[15][16] Turning to an examination of the fee application in light of general case law concerning hours reasonably incurred, the Act requires fee requests to include "contemporaneous time records of hours worked and rates claimed, plus a detailed description of the subject matter of the work with supporting documents, if any." In re Donovan, supra, at 994 (emphasis added). Where there is inadequate documentation for the work performed during 1204 198 the time billed the award must be reduced accordingly. Id. Additionally, hours must be "exclude[d] from a fee request ... that are excessive, redundant or otherwise unnecessary." In re Olson, supra, at 1428 (quoting Hensley v. Eckerhart, 461 U.S. 424, 433-34, 103 S.Ct. 1933, 1939, 76 L.Ed.2d 40 (1983)). Adequate documentation is necessary for the court to satisfy its review requirement.

[17] Our review of Meese's application reveals several expenses we find to be excessive or unnecessary. We disallow entirely expenses for "business meals" ($457.61), "support staff overtime" ($11,311.25), "service fee (rental fee--National Press Club)" ($345.60), and "supplies" ($884.05). See In re Olson, supra, at 1429. The court also finds the $28,523.73 in photocopying expenses to be excessive because of the absence of any supporting documentation. This amount is reduced by $10,000. Also, for lack of documentation, we exclude the $707 claimed as a travel expense.

[18] Finally, we find numerous instances where the billing entries are not adequately documented. The time records maintained by the attorneys, paralegals and law clerks are replete with instances where no mention is made of the subject matter of a meeting, telephone conference or the work performed during hours billed. As such it is "impossible for the court to verify [as the statute requires] the reasonableness of the billings, either as to the necessity of the particular service or the [total] amount of time expended on a given task." In re Sealed Case, supra, at 455. Therefore, for numerous inadequately documented billings, we will reduce the award by ten percent of the billings that remain after the other deductions described above.

CONCLUSION

In sum, in accordance with the above analysis it is concluded that the award shall reflect the following:

1. Disallow expenses for "business meals," "support staff overtime," "service fee (rental fee--National Press Club)" and "supplies."

2. Disallow fees for preparing fee application.

3. Disallow expense for "Travel."

4. Reduce photocopying expenses by $10,000.00.

5. Disallow fees incurred after the filing of the Independent Counsel Report, except fees for filing response.

6. Disallow fees incurred preparing Meese for his testimony in United States v. Nofziger and before congressional subcommittee.

7. Disallow fees incurred prior to the appointment of Independent Counsel.

8. Disallow fees for media related activity.

9. Reduce fees for clerical or secretarial work performed by paralegals and law clerks.

10. After all specific deductions are made, the remaining fees will be reduced ten percent for insufficient documentation of services rendered by attorneys, paralegals and law clerks.

For the foregoing reasons, it is Ordered that petitioner be awarded $460,509.07 in reasonable attorneys' fees and expenses. The computation is set forth in the Appendix.

Judgment accordingly.

Division No. 86-1.

United States Court of Appeals,
District of Columbia Circuit.

Division for the Purpose of Appointing Independent Counsels.
Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as Amended.

April 2, 1987.
As Amended May 1 and May 27, 1987.

Independent Counsel, who had been appointed to investigate alleged wrongdoing in Justice Department, applied for referral of certain matters related to her investigative jurisdiction. The Court of Appeals held that: (1) statute, providing that Independent Counsel could ask Attorney General or division of court to refer matters related to independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction, did not authorize division to refer allegations of wrongdoing which Attorney General had previously determined should not be pursued; but (2) order appointing Independent Counsel, which authorized her to investigate any allegation or evidence of wrongdoing by particular individual in Department, implicitly authorized her to investigate whether this individual had conspired with, or been aided or abetted by, other persons, including persons Attorney General had previously determined should not be investigated in their own right.

PER CURIAM.

Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 594(e), the Independent Counsel has applied for referral of certain matters related to the investigative jurisdiction granted previously in our Orders dated April 23, 1986, and May 29, 1986. Specifically, the Independent Counsel in her Application for Referral of Related Matters ("Independent Counsel Application") seeks investigative and prosecutorial jurisdiction over "certain allegations against two former Department of Justice ("Department") officials, Edward C. Schmults ("Schmults") and Carol E. Dinkins ("Dinkins"), in a report of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives ("Committee") entitled Report on the Investigation of the Role of the Department of Justice in the Withholding of Environmental Protection Agency Documents in 1982-83 ("Committee Report")." Independent Counsel Application at 1-2. The Department of Justice has responded to the Independent Counsel's application for referral of related matters, urging that 28 U.S.C. § 592(b)(1) precludes the Division from granting the request of Independent Counsel. ("Department of Justice Response"). The Independent Counsel has in turn replied to the objections of the Department of Justice. ("Independent Counsel Reply"). We agree generally with the Department of Justice that the applicable statute requires us to deny the Application because the Attorney General has twice denied such request.

I
Background

The House of Representatives in the 97th Congress conducted two separate investigations [FN1] into the administration by the Environmental Protection Agency of the Hazardous Substance Response Fund ("Superfund"). In the course of those investigations the Committees requested and subpoenaed a number of documents. Acting on advice from the Department of Justice, the EPA promptly acceded to some of these requests, but the EPA initially opposed other requests, asserting claims of executive privilege and that the documents were "enforcement sensitive" or "deliberative." However, it was eventually agreed that the Committees would have access to the requested documents except "enforcement sensitive" documents, the release of which it was felt could hamper law enforcement efforts. It was also agreed that the Department would not shield documents containing evidence of criminal or unethical conduct by agency officials.

FN1. One investigation was by the Subcommittee on Investigations and Oversight (the Levitas Subcommittee) of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, and the other investigation was by the Subcommittee on Investigations and Oversight (the Dingell Subcommittee) of the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

In the next Congress, the House Judiciary Committee decided to investigate the 36 170 conduct, during the prior investigation, of certain individuals in the Justice Department. As a consequence, the Committee initiated an investigation and compiled a report in excess of 3,000 pages, entitled Report on the Investigation of the Role of the Department of Justice in the Withholding of Environmental Protection Agency Investigative Documents from Congress 1982-83.

Upon completion of this follow-up investigation, the House Judiciary Committee directed its Chairman to transmit the Committee Report to the Attorney General. In his December 12, 1985, letter transmitting the Report, the Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee requested the Attorney General to conduct an independent determination and to consider the Chairman's letter as "an official request of the Committee on the Judiciary that you apply for the appointment of an independent counsel under the provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 591, et seq." The letter from the Committee also stated that among other possible issues raised by the report, it would appear appropriate that the Executive Branch examine whether, during the Superfund Investigation in the prior Congress, there had been any violations of 18 U.S.C. §§ 1001, 1505, 1621-23, 371, "or any other provision of federal law."

After studying the Committee Report, the Attorney General determined that it contained sufficient information to warrant "preliminary investigations," within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 592 as to:

(A) Whether the conduct of former Assistant Attorney General Theodore Olson in giving testimony at a hearing of the Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law of the House Judiciary Committee on March 10, 1983, and later revising that testimony, regarding the completeness of the Office of Legal Counsel's response to the Judiciary Committee's request for OLC documents, and regarding his knowledge of EPA's willingness to turn over certain disputed documents to Congress, violated 18 U.S.C. § 1505, § 1001, or any other provision of federal criminal law;

(B) Whether the conduct of former Deputy Attorney General Edward Schmults, resulting in the undisclosed withholding of documents from the House Judiciary Committee from March, 1983, through April, 1984, violated 18 U.S.C. § 1505, § 1001, § 1512 or any other provision of federal criminal law;

(C)(1) Whether the conduct of former Assistant Attorney General Carol Dinkins, resulting in the undisclosed withholding of documents from the Judiciary Committee during its investigation, violated 18 U.S.C. § 1505, § 1001, § 1512, or any other provision of federal criminal law; and (2) whether the conduct of Mrs. Dinkins in preparing and submitting a declaration in the case captioned United States v. United States House of Representatives, Civil No. 82-3583 (D.D.C.), violated 18 U.S.C. § 1503, § 1621, § 1623, § 401, § 1001, § 1512, or any other provision of federal criminal law.

Report of the Attorney General Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 592(c)(1) Regarding Allegations Against Department of Justice Officials in United States House Judiciary Committee Report ("Report of Attorney General") at 3-5.

Following the foregoing determination, the Attorney General directed the Public Integrity Section of the Department to conduct the preliminary investigation into the allegations contained in the Committee Report. Thereafter, the Public Integrity Section, as well as John C. Keeney, Deputy Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division, and William F. Weld, United States Attorney for Massachusetts, designated by the Attorney General to be his Special Assistant in the matter, made recommendations to the Attorney General as to whether any allegations in the Committee Report warranted further investigation by an independent counsel.

After considering all these recommendations, the Attorney General on April 10, 1986, requested the Division to appoint an Independent Counsel to investigate the allegation against Olson set out in section A above, "and any other matter related to that allegation." Report of Attorney General 37 171 at 11 (emphasis added). The Attorney General also stated in his report to the Division that he had determined, pursuant to § 592(b)(1), that there were no reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution was warranted with respect to the allegations against Schmults and Dinkins. Id. at 26 & 47-48.

Acting upon the Attorney General's report, the Division for the Purpose of Appointing Independent Counsels on April 23, 1986, filed an order appointing independent counsel and defining his jurisdiction. [FN2] In re: Theodore Olson,

D.C.Cir., Division No. 86-1. In response to the request of the Attorney General, Independent Counsel was ordered to investigate and pursue the question whether testimony of Mr. Theodore Olson and his revision of such testimony on March 10, 1983, violated either 18 U.S.C. § 1505 [FN3] or § 1001, [FN4] or any other provision of federal law.

> FN2. The independent counsel appointed by the Division on April 23, 1986, Mr. James C. McKay, resigned due to the possible appearance of a conflict of interest created by the activity of one of his many partners. Ms. Alexia Morrison was appointed to succeed Mr. McKay on May 29, 1986, without alteration of the Division's original jurisdictional order.

> FN3. The relevant provisions of 18 U.S.C. § 1505 provide: Whoever corruptly, or by threats or force, or by any threatening letter or communication influences, obstructs, or impedes or endeavors to influence, obstruct, or impede ... the due and proper exercise of the power of inquiry under which any inquiry or investigation is being had by either House, or any committee of either House or any joint committee of the Congress--Shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

> FN4. 18 U.S.C. § 1001 provides: Whoever, in any matter within the jurisdiction of any department or agency of the United States knowingly and willfully falsifies, conceals or covers up by any trick, scheme, or device a material fact, or makes any false, fictitious or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious or fraudulent statement or entry, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

In addition to this authority the Division further ORDERED, ... that the Independent Counsel shall have jurisdiction to investigate any other allegation of evidence or violation of any federal criminal law by Theodore Olson developed during investigations by the Independent Counsel referred to above, and connected with or arising out of that investigation and the Independent Counsel shall have jurisdiction to prosecute for any such violation.

The jurisdictional order also noted that the Independent Counsel would have "all the powers and authority provided by the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as amended, and specifically by 28 U.S.C. § 594." This section provides an independent counsel with very broad investigative and prosecutorial powers. The Independent Counsel then proceeded to conduct an investigation of Theodore Olson as authorized by her appointment.

By letter of November 14, 1986 ("Independent Counsel letter"), the Independent Counsel requested the Attorney General to refer to the Independent Counsel the allegations in the Committee Report against Schmults and Dinkins and the criminal investigation being conducted by the Department of Justice of former General Counsel to the Environmental Protection Agency, Robert M. Perry. This request was made pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 594(e) [FN5] on the claim that under the statute, the allegations were "related matters" to the investigation of Olson that she was then conducting.

> FN5. 28 U.S.C. § 594(e) provides: A[n] independent counsel may ask the Attorney General or the division of the court to refer matters related to the independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction. A[n] independent counsel may accept referral of a matter by the Attorney General, if the matter relates to a matter within such independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction as established by the division of the court. If such a referral is accepted, the independent counsel shall notify the division of the court.

After reciting the incidents of her investigation of Olson to date, the Independent 38 172 Counsel concluded in her application to the Attorney General that:

> no reasonable, fair, impartial and complete investigation can be conducted without examining the conduct of Mr. Schmults and Ms. Dinkins.

Independent Counsel letter at 3. The Independent Counsel stated that this conclusion was rooted in the following:

> (1) standing in isolation, as framed by [the Attorney General's] report, Mr. Olson's testimony of March 10, 1983, probably does not constitute a prosecutable violation of any federal criminal law, based on my present understanding of the evidence;

(2) Mr. Olson's testimony cannot properly be viewed in such isolation, because there are at a minimum "reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation ... is warranted" with respect to whether Mr. Olson's testimony was part of a larger, concerted plan, including Mr. Schmults, Ms. Dinkins, or others, to obstruct or impede the Committee's investigation into the Department's discharge of its responsibilities in the EPA documents dispute, possibly in violation of federal criminal law;
(3) wholly apart from any participation by Mr. Olson in a scheme to obstruct or impede the Committee's investigation, there are at a minimum "reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation ... is warranted" with respect to the conduct of Mr. Schmults and Ms. Dinkins, whose active and apparently admitted roles in the withholding of documents from the Committee seem to merit further scrutiny at least as much as Mr. Olson's testimony at the very threshold of the inquiry; and
(4) my inquiry has turned up new information which justifies referral to me of the allegations as to Mr. Schmults and Ms. Dinkins.
It is, therefore, necessary that I request, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 594(e) and for the reasons set out below, that you refer to me, as matters related to my present jurisdiction over specific aspects of Mr. Olson's March 10, 1983 testimony, the allegations made against Mr. Schmults and Ms. Dinkins in the Committee Report, as well as the investigation, which is now being conducted by Public Integrity, of possible perjury charges against Robert M. Perry, EPA's General Counsel during the interbranch controversy over the Superfund documents. I also request that you refrain from personal consideration of the requests made herein on grounds explained below.
Id. at 3-4 (emphasis added).

Deputy Attorney General Burns, in a letter dated December 17, 1986 ("Burns letter"), informed the Independent Counsel that the Attorney General had, as authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 594(e), referred to the Independent Counsel the Department's ongoing investigation of Robert M. Perry (not a person covered by the Independent Counsel provisions of the Ethics in Government Act). The Attorney General had, however, denied granting the Independent Counsel authority to investigate Schmults or Dinkins. Deputy Attorney General Burns' letter emphasized that the Attorney General had already determined there were no reasonable grounds warranting further investigation or prosecution of the allegations against Schmults and Dinkins. In addition, the letter stated that although the Independent Counsel claimed that "newly discovered" evidence (not available to the Justice Department at the time of its April 10, 1986, report to the Division) warranted further investigation, the Attorney General either had already considered the evidence when he reported to the Division on April 10, 1986, or had considered the Independent Counsel's request for referral and determined that the evidence would not "alter [his] conclusion." Burns Letter at 3.

[1][2] The Independent Counsel thereafter applied to this Division for referral of the allegations against Schmults and Dinkins on the ground that they were "related 39 173 matters" under 28 U.S.C. § 594(e), [FN6] and that the Division had authority to refer them for investigation.

FN6. In addition to arguing that the Attorney General's determination pursuant to § 592(b) does not limit the Division's authority under § 594(e) to refer to the Independent Counsel the allegations against Schmults and Dinkins, the Independent Counsel charges that the Attorney General's determination under 592(b) was tainted because he "applied an erroneous standard in concluding that no further scrutiny by an independent counsel of the allegations against Schmults and Dinkins was warranted" and "made his determination under the disability of at least an apparent--if not actual--conflict of interest which should have led to his recusal." Independent Counsel Application at 20. The most specific fact relied upon to support the Independent Counsel's charge is that Meese, when Counselor to the President, had expressed opposition to a Presidential pardon for former EPA Administrator Anne Gorsuch Burford. Id. at 37-38. This action, however, does not demonstrate any conflict of interest that would disqualify the Attorney General from evaluating the Schmults and Dinkins matters. The Independent Counsel also urges that the Attorney General should have automatically forwarded to the Division the allegations contained in the House Committee Report, because the Attorney General did not comply with the ninety-day limitation imposed by § 592(c)(1). Independent Counsel Application at 3 n. 7. Section 592(c)(1) provides in part: if ninety days elapse from the receipt of the information without a determination by the Attorney General that there are no reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted, then the Attorney General shall apply to the division of the court for the appointment of a[n] independent counsel. The Department received the extensive Committee Report on December 12, 1985. Based on the results of the review of the Report conducted by Department attorneys, the Attorney General determined on January 10, 1986, that a preliminary investigation was warranted as to the allegations against Olson, Schmults, and Dinkins. This action was expeditious. The Attorney General's Report to the Division was filed on April 10, 1986. Section 592(a)(1) compels the conclusion that the Attorney General's Report was timely filed. Section 592(a)(1) provides in part: Upon receiving information that the Attorney General determines is sufficient to constitute grounds to investigate that any person covered by the Act has engaged in conduct described in subsection (a) or (c) of section 591 of this title, the Attorney General shall conduct, for a period not to exceed ninety days, such preliminary investigation of the matter as the Attorney General deems appropriate. We agree with the Department that "some period of time is often required to ... determin[e] whether the information is sufficient to trigger even a preliminary investigation [and thus] the Department must be afforded a reasonable period of time to make that determination before the 90-day period for the preliminary investigation begins to run." Department Response at 27 n. 14. In our opinion, thirty days is not an unreasonable period of time to properly evaluate a 3,000 page investigatory report.

II
The Independent Counsel Provisions of the Ethics in Government Act

Before addressing the Independent Counsel's request, we discuss briefly the independent counsel provisions of the Ethics in Government Act and their historical background.

A.
Historical Background of the Independent Counsel Provisions

The Ethics in Government Act of 1978, Pub.L. No. 95-521, 92 Stat. 1824, as amended Pub.L. No. 97-409, 96 Stat. 2039 (1982), provides inter alia for the appointment of an independent counsel to investigate and prosecute (1) certain designated high-ranking government officials, and (2) other persons if the Attorney General determines that their investigation by the Attorney General or other officer of the Department may result in a personal, financial, or political conflict of interest. 28 U.S.C. § 591 et seq. The statute is designed to ensure that violations of federal criminal law by high-ranking government officials (particularly those who are of the same party as the Administration in power) will be fairly and impartially investigated and prosecuted.

The need for a special counsel who is to some extent independent of the Justice Department and free of the conflicts of interest that exist when an Administration investigates the alleged wrongdoing of its own high officials has been demonstrated several times this century.

(1) Teapot Dome Scandal

During the Teapot Dome scandal of the Harding Administration, Congress found 40 174 normal federal prosecution authority to be flawed [FN7] and deemed it necessary after investigating the leases of certain naval oil reserves to pass a special act appropriating money:

FN7. Public confidence was lacking in Attorney General Harry Daugherty. In matters unrelated to Teapot Dome, he was indicted and acquitted of conspiracy involving violations of the prohibition statutes and graft in the Veteran's Administration.

to be expended by the President for the purpose of employing the necessary attorneys and agents ... in instituting and carrying on any suits or other proceedings, either civil or criminal, which he may cause to be instituted or which may be instituted, or to take any other steps deemed necessary to be taken in relation to the cancellation of any leases on oil lands in former naval reserves, in the prosecution of any person or persons guilty of any infraction of the laws of the United States in connection with said leases or in any other measures which he may take to protect the interests of the United States and the people > thereof in connection therewith. Any counsel employed by the President under the authority of this resolution shall be appointed by, and with the advice and consent of the Senate and shall have full power and authority to carry on said proceedings, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

H.J.Res. 160, 43 Stat. 16 (1924) (emphasis added).

Pursuant to this statutory authority, former Senator Atlee Pomerene of Ohio was appointed by President Coolidge and on February 16, 1924, confirmed by the Senate as "Special Counsel to have charge and control of the prosecution ..." 68 Cong.Rec. 2566 (1924). Mr. Owen J. Roberts, a private attorney from Philadelphia and later an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, was subsequently appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate to assist Senator Pomerene in the prosecution of the "oil cases." These lawyers then conducted the "oil cases" including the criminal prosecution of the former Secretary of the Interior, Albert B. Fall. See United States v. Fall, 10 F.2d 648 (D.C.Cir.1925). Secretary Fall was convicted of bribery and, being a sick man, was sentenced to one year in prison and fined $100,000. See Fall v. United States, 49 F.2d 506 (D.C.Cir.1931). Henry F. Sinclair and Edward L. Doheny were acquitted of bribery in obtaining their oil leases, but Sinclair was sentenced to nine months in prison and a $1,000 fine for contempt of court. The oil leases were cancelled.

(2) Corruption in the Truman Administration

During the last years of the Truman Administration, Senator John J. Williams of Delaware on numerous occasions on the Senate floor exposed widespread corruption throughout the nation in the handling of tax evasion cases. In 1951, more than one hundred and fifty Bureau of Internal Revenue officials from all over the country were discharged or forced to resign. The Assistant Attorney General of the Tax Division of the Department of Justice, T. Lamar Caudle, was forced to resign, N.Y. Times, Nov. 20, 1951, but was not prosecuted during the Truman Administration. Daniel A. Bolich, the Assistant Commissioner of Internal Revenue, also resigned. Id. No area of the nation seemed to be immune.

Acting under this public pressure, Attorney General J. Howard McGrath on February 1, 1952, appointed former President of the New York City Council Newbold Morris, a highly respected associate of former New York Mayor Fiorello La Guardia, to lead an investigation into the alleged corruption throughout the federal government. Morris was designated Special Assistant to the Attorney General. At the time of Mr. Morris' appointment, Senator Taft complained that the investigation should be taken out of Department of Justice jurisdiction: "The President should ask Congress for a law to set up an independent agency to conduct the investigation." N.Y. Times, Feb. 3, 1952. Mr. Morris, replying to Senator Taft's suggestion stated:

> I'm not under the Department of Justice. I'm completely independent. There are no strings attached. It is entirely nonpolitical. I'm designated as a special assistant 41 175 attorney general, but I'm even going to investigate the Department of Justice itself. Id.

Senator Taft's reservations were subsequently borne out by the firing of Mr. Morris on April 3, 1952, by Attorney General J. Howard McGrath shortly after Special Assistant Attorney General Morris, as one of the first acts of his investigation, sent McGrath a questionnaire on his personal finances and requested access to McGrath's Attorney General files, telephone records, engagement book, diary, and other documents. President Truman immediately fired Attorney General McGrath. N.Y. Times, Apr. 4, 1952. [FN8] Morris told the Senate Subcommittee on April 10th that his investigation stalled when "it moved into the Attorney General's office." Id. During the remainder of the Truman Administration, no special counsel was appointed to succeed Morris to continue the investigation of government corruption. However, during the Eisenhower Administration, the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice under Assistant Attorney General Warren Olney prosecuted and obtained key bribery convictions of T. Lamar Caudle, the former Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Tax Division, and Matthew J. Connelly, Truman's Appointments Secretary. Both convictions were affirmed on appeal. Connelly and Caudle v. United States, 249 F.2d 576 (8th Cir.1957), cert. denied, 356 U.S. 921, 78 S.Ct. 700, 2 L.Ed.2d 716 (1958). Also, John D. Nunan, Jr., former Commissioner of Internal Revenue, was indicted and convicted of tax evasion of $91,086.00 on June 29, 1954.

FN8. Thus it was incorrect for Assistant Attorney General John R. Bolton at the March 19, 1987, hearing of the Senate Governmental Affairs Subcommittee to testify with respect to the firing of a special prosecutor: "It happened only once before [Watergate] ..." and the President "paid a price for it." Wash.Post, Mar. 20, 1987, at A15, col. 1. As shown above, a special counsel was fired in 1952 and the President did not "pay a price for it."

(3) Watergate Scandal

During the Watergate scandal of the Nixon Administration, Attorney General Richard Kleindienst determined, shortly after taking office in 1973, that there was the appearance of conflicts of interest requiring his resignation. His voluntary resignation letter stated:

> persons with whom I have had close personal and professional associations could be involved in conduct violative of the laws of the United States. Fair and impartial enforcement of the law requires that a person who has not had such intimate relationships be the Attorney General of the United States.

9 Weekly Comp.Pres.Doc. 431-32 (May 5, 1973). The Honorable Elliot Richardson was appointed Attorney General and a special prosecutor's office was established on May 25, 1973. [FN9] Professor Archibald Cox was then appointed by President Nixon as special prosecutor to lead the Watergate investigations. When Cox threatened to secure a judicial ruling that President Nixon was violating the order of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to deliver certain presidential tapes to Chief Judge Sirica of the United States District Court, the President ordered him fired. The Attorney General refused to execute the President's order and resigned. Immediately thereafter the Deputy Attorney General was fired for the same reason. Cox was then discharged as special prosecutor by the Solicitor General, in his capacity as Acting Attorney General. The President also abolished the special prosecutor's office; the Watergate investigations were transferred back to the Department of Justice. A few days later President Nixon reversed his decision to abolish the special prosecutor's office and announced that a new special prosecutor would be named. Acting Attorney General Bork, by formal order, established "The Office of Watergate Special Prosecution Force." 38 Fed.Reg. 30738, 32805 (1973). Shortly thereafter, Leon Jaworski, a private attorney from Houston, Texas, was appointed by Acting Attorney General Bork to be the new Watergate Special Prosecutor. Jaworski continued to act in 42 176 that capacity until a number of convictions were obtained and most of the principal cases were disposed of. The vacancy in the office of Attorney General was not filled until Congress passed a special act to authorize the appointment of Senator William B. Saxbe. Pub.L. No. 93-178, 87 Stat. 697 (1973). The special act was necessary in light of his prior vote to increase the salary of the office which would otherwise have disqualified him under art. I, § 6, cl. 2 of the Constitution.

FN9. 38 Fed.Reg. 14688, and amendments, 18877, 21404 (1973).

Thus, fifty years of the nation's history involving the Teapot Dome, Truman Administration, and Watergate scandals, has demonstrated a generally recognized inability of the Department of Justice and the Attorney General to function impartially with full public confidence in investigating criminal wrongdoing of high-ranking government officials of the same political party. In each of these events, extraordinary steps were deemed necessary to ensure fair investigation and in each instance, special prosecutors were appointed. The examples of the firings of special prosecutors Morris (1952) and Cox (1973), and the fact that Congress found it necessary to pass a special act requiring the appointment of special counsel outside government in the Teapot Dome cases (1924), and the act for Senator Saxbe in 1973, made it obvious to Congress that if special prosecution counsel were necessary in the future, such counsel would have to enjoy some measure of independence from the Executive Branch. Accordingly, Congress in 1978, acting to regularize the manner of handling such major conflict of interest problems, enacted the Special Prosecutor provisions of the Ethics in Government Act.

(4) Application of the Independent Counsel Provisions: The Iran Weapons Sale and the Alleged Diversion of Funds

The best evidence that the independent counsel provisions are "necessary" and reasonable lies in their application to the current investigation into the sale of weapons to Iran and the alleged diversion of the funds to the Contra rebels.

In late 1986 there was considerable political discussion about American hostages held in the Middle East and in the provision of materiel and financial aid to the insurgents in Nicaragua. A number of letters were sent from congressional committees to the Attorney General but none generated any request for the appointment of an Independent Counsel. Then suddenly out of the blue, a Middle East newspaper reported that the United States had been involved in the sale of arms to Iran. This report led Attorney General Edwin Meese III to an immediate investigation. A few days later he called a very significant press conference in which he stated there was a strong possibility that some of the proceeds from the Iran arms sale had been diverted to the Contras. The announcement shocked the nation. Then in an act which has had no parallel in the history of the Special Prosecutor (Independent Counsel) statute, the Attorney General voluntarily requested (and President Reagan publicly supported his request) that this Division appoint an Independent Counsel with the broadest investigatory powers ever requested under the Act. The violation of every federal criminal law was to be investigated. Only one person, Lieutenant Colonel Oliver L. North, U.S. Marine Corps, was designated as a subject of the investigation, and this, not because he was a high government official but because with respect to him the Attorney General had a "personal, financial, or political conflict of interest." 28 U.S.C. § 591(c) (emphasis added). The Attorney General then added every government official and every other person "acting in concert with Lieutenant Colonel North or with any other United States Government official, whether or not covered by the Independent Counsel Provisions of the Ethics in Government Act ... in connection with the sale or shipment of military arms to Iran and the transfer or diversion [without limitation] of funds realized in connection with such sale or shipment." In re Oliver L. North, et al., D.C.Cir., Division No. 86-6 (1986) (emphasis added). In response to this request, the Division appointed the Honorable Lawrence E. Walsh as Independent Counsel and ordered 43 177 the broadest investigation ever ordered by the Division.

The voluntary action of the Attorney General, with the President's publicly voiced support, emphasizes that the statute authorizing such investigation is "necessary and proper" whenever a conflict of interest exists in the narrow circumstances covered by the Act.

B.
Constitutional Authority for the Independent Counsel Provisions

(1) The Authority to Create the Office of Independent Counsel

[3] The statute authorizing the court to appoint independent counsel to prosecute violations of the criminal law involving high government officials is grounded in the "necessary and proper" clause and the Article II appointments clause of the Constitution. It is as fully consistent with the separation of powers doctrine of the Constitution to which we briefly allude as it is a commonplace that the Constitution does not "contemplate[ ] total separation of each of the three essential branches of Government." Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 121, 96 S.Ct. 612, 683, 46 L.Ed.2d 659 (1976). See Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 635, 72 S.Ct. 863, 870, 96 L.Ed. 1153 (1952) (Jackson, concurring) (the Constitution ... contemplates that practise will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government); United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 707, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3107, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974) ("In designing the structure of our Government and dividing and allocating the sovereign power among three co-equal branches, the Framers of the Constitution sought to provide a comprehensive system, but the separate powers were not intended to operate with absolute independence."); Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425, 443, 97 S.Ct. 2777, 2790, 53 L.Ed.2d 867 (1977) (noting that "the Court [has] squarely rejected the argument that the Constitution contemplates a complete division of authority between the three branches").

[4] In authorizing by statute the appointment of independent counsel, Congress acted pursuant to its constitutional authority to create "by law" inferior officers and vest their appointment in the courts of law:

"[For] all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by > Law ... [Congress] may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as [Congress] think proper, ... in the Courts of Law."

U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. It is noteworthy that this clear grant of authority to Congress to establish other officers "by law" and to provide "by law" for their appointment by "courts of law" is found in Article II--that part of the Constitution devoted to the Executive Department. The responsibility imposed upon Congress by Article II empowers it to enact laws to guard against the evils of massive conflicts of interest involved in the enforcement of federal criminal law against the highest officials of government and to vest in the courts the appointment of inferior officers to carry out this responsibility. Such counsel serve in the Executive Department and are constitutionally entitled to the independence that the statute provides. Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602, 55 S.Ct. 869, 79 L.Ed. 1611 (1935); Wiener v. United States, 357 U.S. 349, 78 S.Ct. 1275, 2 L.Ed.2d 1377 (1958). Since 1863 the courts have been authorized by statute to fill temporary vacancies in the office of United States Attorneys (formerly District Attorneys). [FN10] The appointment by the Division of an independent counsel is tantamount to a court filling a vacancy created by adverse interest. For example, in United States v. Morris, 23 U.S. (10 Wheat.) 246, 6 L.Ed. 314 (1825), Daniel Webster argued in a condemnation case brought by court-appointed counsel in the name of the United States when the U.S. District Attorney refused to act: "The 44 178 discretionary power exercised by the court below, in this instance [appointing counsel], was essential to the administration of justice, whenever the district-attorney refuses to act, or is interested, or in case of his death." Id. at 274. The court decided the case without commenting on the propriety of the appointment, but one judge expressed "surprise." Id., 300.

> FN10. See Act of March 3, 1863, 12 Stat. 768; Rev.Stat. § 793 at 149 (1878); 28 U.S.C. § 546 (1982) as amended by Pub.L. No. 99-646 § 59(d), 100 Stat. 3592, 3616 (1986).

Our history, as above outlined, has thus demonstrated that it is "necessary " when high government officials are being investigated for criminal wrongdoing by officials of their own party, and that is the usual situation, that the Congress to the extent it thinks "proper " "may by Law vest the Appointment of ... inferior Officers ... in the Courts of Law." In dealing with this problem a page of history is worth a ton of theory. The independent counsel provisions are tailor-made to meet all the requirements envisioned by the Constitution. And the Independent Counsel is clearly an "inferior officer"--he is appointed for a single task to serve for a temporary limited period.

If there were any doubt about the validity of Congress acting as it has to deal with the conflict of interest problems, which are at the heart of the independent counsel provisions, it is answered by the power set forth in the "Necessary and Proper" clause. This provision of the Constitution provides that:

> The Congress shall have Power * * * To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18 (emphasis added). The constitutional authority of Congress to vest appointment of inferior officers in the courts of law, conjoined with its power to enact laws that are "necessary and proper," "gives Congress a share in the responsibilities lodged in other departments." E. Corwin, The Constitution of the United States--Analysis and Interpretation 358 (U.S. Govt. Printing Office 1972). Thus, with the constitutional authority to establish offices to be filled by inferior officers in the Executive Department and to vest the appointment of inferior officers in "Courts of Law," the Congress is authorized to enact the laws necessary to carry into execution such powers. As Chief Justice Marshall cogently remarked in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. (17 U.S.) 316, 420, 4 L.Ed. 579 (1819):

> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

Id. The Independent Counsel statute meets all these requirements.

(2) The Exercise of Power by the Attorney General in the Independent Counsel Scheme

[5] The minimal powers conferred on Independent Counsel do not by any means constitute an assumption of the constitutional field of action of the Executive Branch in enforcing the criminal law. The highly limited duties of the Independent Counsel are "fixed according to sense and the inherent necessities of the governmental [problem]." See Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394, 405-406, 48 S.Ct. 348, 350-351, 72 L.Ed. 624 (1928). The provision of the Constitution providing that: "[The President] ... shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." U.S. Const. art. II, § 3, does not require the President (or his delegate) to "execute the laws." The President's responsibility may be satisfied by Congress entrusting the power of execution to some other officer while the President's obligation would be satisfied by the right of the President (or his delegate) to remove the individual officer for impropriety, which may be done here. [FN11] Kendall v. United States ex rel. 45 179 Stokes, 12 Pet. (37 U.S.) 524, 9 L.Ed. 1181 (1838); see also, The Jewels of the Princess of Orange, 2 Opin.A.G. 482 (1832). A review of the Independent Counsel provisions of the Ethics in Government Act § 591 et seq., discloses that broad power and authority of the Attorney General are closely interwoven into the statutory scheme.

> FN11. 28 U.S.C. § 596(a)(1) provides: A[n] independent counsel appointed under this chapter may be removed from office, other than by impeachment and conviction, only by the personal action of the Attorney General and only for good cause, physical disability, mental incapacity, or any other condition that substantially impairs the performance of such independent counsel's duties.

(a) The Attorney General conducts the investigation and determines whether the information is sufficient to constitute grounds to investigate that any person covered by the Act has committed a violation of any major "federal criminal law." § 591(a).
(b) The Attorney General also determines whether the investigation of other persons by the Attorney General or other officer of the Department of Justice may result in a personal, financial, or political conflict of interest. § 591(c).
(c) Even after the Attorney General determines that the evidence is sufficient to constitute grounds to investigate, he has discretion to conduct "such preliminary investigation of the matter as [he] ... deems appropriate." § 592(a)(1).
(d) If the Attorney General upon completion of the preliminary investigation finds there are no reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted, he notifies the Division of the Court and his decision is final. Thereafter the Division of the Court shall have "no power to appoint an independent counsel." § 592(b)(1).
(e) If the Attorney General upon completion of the preliminary investigation finds reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted, he then applies to the Division of the Court for the appointment of an independent counsel. He merely "compl[ies] with the written or other established policies of the Department of Justice with respect to the enforcement of criminal laws." § 592(c)(1).
(f) Even if the Attorney General has initially found that an independent counsel is not warranted, he may still, on the basis of additional information, apply for appointment of an independent counsel. § 522(c)(2).
(g) The Attorney General may also set forth in an application for an independent counsel sufficient information to assist the Division in selecting an independent counsel and in defining counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction. This gives the Attorney General the power to suggest the type of independent counsel that is necessary and the nature and extent of the jurisdiction that should be set forth in the Division's order. § 592(d)(1).
(h) The Attorney General, in his discretion, may request the independent counsel to accept referral of a matter that relates to the independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction. § 592(e).
(i) The Attorney General's determination under § 592(c) to apply to the Division of the Court for the appointment of an independent counsel is not reviewable in any court. § 592(f).
(j) The Attorney General may request the Division of the Court to disclose the identity and prosecutorial jurisdiction of such independent counsel as would be in the best interests of justice. § 593(b).
(k) The Attorney General may request the Division of the Court to expand the prosecutorial jurisdiction of an existing independent counsel. § 593(c).
(l) Upon showing of good cause by the Attorney General, the Division of the Court may grant an extension of the preliminary investigation conducted pursuant to § 592(a) for a period not to exceed 60 days. § 593(f).

(m) The Attorney General's authority to exercise direction and control of those matters that specifically require the Attorney General's personal action under § 2516 of Title 18 (Authorization for interception of wire or oral communications) is not affected. § 594(a).
(n) The Department of Justice has discretion to assist the independent counsel at his request. This may include access to any records, files, or any other materials 46 180 relevant to the matters within such independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction and the use of the resources and personnel necessary to perform such duties of the independent counsel. § 594(d).
(o) The Attorney General may, at the request of the independent counsel, refer a matter related to the independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction. § 594(e).
(p) An independent counsel, except where not possible, is required to comply with the written or other established policies of the Department of Justice respecting the enforcement of the criminal laws. § 594(f).
(q) An independent counsel may dismiss matters within his prosecutorial jurisdiction at any time prior to prosecution only upon compliance with the written or other established policies of the Department of Justice with respect to the enforcement of criminal laws. § 594(g).
(r) The majority and minority members of the Judiciary Committees of Congress separately may request in writing that the Attorney General apply for the appointment of an independent counsel. If no such application is made, the Attorney General notifies the respective committee members why such application was not made. § 595(e).
(s) The Attorney General may by "personal action" remove from office an independent counsel "only for good cause, physical disability, mental incapacity, or any other condition that substantially impairs the performance of such independent counsel's duties." § 596(a)(1).
(t) The Division of the Court upon suggestion of the Attorney General may terminate an office of independent counsel at any time, on the ground that the investigation of all matters within the prosecutorial jurisdiction of the independent counsel or accepted by such independent counsel under § 594(e), and any resulting prosecutions, have been completed or so substantially completed that it would be appropriate for the Department of Justice to complete such investigations and prosecutions. § 596(b)(2).
(u) Whenever an independent counsel is proceeding under a jurisdictional order, he may agree in writing that such investigation or proceedings may be continued by the Department of Justice. § 597(a).
(v) The Attorney General or the Solicitor General may make a presentation as amicus curiae to any court as to issues of law raised by any case or proceeding in which an independent counsel participates in an official capacity or in any appeal of such case or proceeding. § 597(b).

The analysis of the foregoing extracts makes it clear that Congress did not provide for a substantive intrusion by independent counsel into the Executive Department such as was found to exist in Bowsher v. Synar, --- U.S. ----, 106 S.Ct. 3181, 92 L.Ed.2d 583 (1986).

Upon enactment of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 73, §§ 2, 35 (1789), the supervision of district attorneys came not from the Attorney General but from the Secretary of State and it remained there throughout the Federalist period. L. White, The Federalists, 406-11 (1948). The Attorney General was thought of as the legal advisor to the President and department heads and as an agent to whom Congress might turn for advice. It was a part-time job and the government was merely one of his clients for which he was paid half the salary of department heads. He was expected to pursue private legal work. Id. at 164. The District Attorneys acted in the Department of State and contacts between the two were largely fortuitous. Apart from cases of exceptional importance and difficulty, the District Attorneys operated largely on their own responsibility as matters developed within their respective districts. On occasion they employed "special counsel." Id. at 406-411. It was not until the Act of August 2, 1861, c. 37, 12 Stat. 285, that the "general superintendence and direction" of District Attorneys was placed with the Attorney General. This history indicates that the authority and powers of District Attorneys (now United States Attorneys) and the Attorney General are largely governed by statute.

47 181 III
Application of the Statutory Provisions

The instant dispute between the Independent Counsel and the Department of Justice concerns only two provisions of the independent counsel statutory scheme. The relevant statutory language provides:

> § 592(b)(1) If the Attorney General, upon completion of the preliminary investigation, finds that there are no reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted, the Attorney General shall so notify the division of the court specified in section 593(a) of this title, and the division of the court shall have no power to appoint a[n] independent counsel. (Emphasis added).
>
> § 594(e) A[n] independent counsel may ask the Attorney General or the division of the court to refer matters related to the independent counsel's prosecutorial jurisdiction.

[6] We agree with the Department of Justice that "Section 594(e) cannot be read, as the Independent Counsel suggests, to give the Division the authority to refer allegations to the Independent Counsel when the Attorney General has specifically determined, under § 592(b)(1) that those allegations should not be pursued." Department of Justice Response at 5. The provisions of §§ 592(b)(1) and 594(e) must be read together and not in isolation. It would be highly unreasonable to interpret these statutory provisions either as requiring the Attorney General, or as authorizing the division of the court, to refer the investigation of the conduct of two officials to an independent counsel's investigatory and prosecutorial jurisdiction under § 594(c) when the Attorney General has twice determined with respect to the conduct of said two individuals, in accordance with his statutory authority under § 592(b)(1), that there were "no reasonable grounds to believe that further investigation or prosecution is warranted." That is in effect what the court would accomplish if the order appointing independent counsel to investigate Olson were amended by the court, in effect, to appoint the same counsel to investigate Schmults and Dinkins as separate subjects.

To suggest that the division of the court can bring about this result acting alone, upon the sole request of the independent counsel, would undercut the plain intent of § 592(b)(1) and permit the accomplishment by indirect means of a result that the statute prohibits being accomplished by direct means. Section 594(e) cannot be read to achieve such an unreasonable result.

The Independent Counsel, while urging "that the allegations against Schmults and Dinkins, standing alone, warrant further investigation," Independent Counsel Application at 34, also maintains that "the known facts raise a reasonable suspicion that Olson, Schmults, and Dinkins may have acted together to frustrate the Committee's inquiry." Independent Counsel Reply at 11. See also Independent Counsel Application at 34 (noting "possibility that the actions of Schmults, Dinkins, and Olson were taken pursuant to a concert of action involving some or all of them and designed to obstruct the Committee's inquiry").

[7] Our current Order appointing the Independent Counsel authorizes her:

> to investigate and pursue the question whether testimony of Mr. Theodore Olson and his revision of testimony on March 10, 1983 violated either 18 U.S.C. § 1505 or § 1001, or any other provision of federal law. [The Order also further grants] jurisdiction to investigate any other allegation or evidence of violation of any Federal criminal law by Theodore Olson developed during investigations, by the Independent Counsel, referred to above, and connected with or arising out of that investigation and the Independent Counsel shall have jurisdiction to prosecute for any such violation.

Order of April 23, 1986 at 1-2 (emphasis added). Implicit in this jurisdictional grant to investigate possible connected violations of federal criminal law is the authority to investigate allegations and evidence that Theodore Olson was engaged in an unlawful conspiracy with others or that he aided 48 182 and abetted any criminal offense connected to the investigation ordered. To the extent that the Independent Counsel wishes to investigate "whether Mr. Olson's testimony was part of a larger, concerted plan, including Mr. Schmults, Ms. Dinkins, or others, to obstruct or impede the Committee's investigation into the Department's discharge of its responsibility in the EPA documents dispute, possibly in violation of federal law," Independent Counsel letter at 3, the current order confers that power upon the Independent Counsel. The Attorney General's decision not to request appointment of an independent counsel with respect to Schmults and Dinkins, or to refer certain allegations against them to the Independent Counsel investigating Olson, simply cannot impinge upon the Independent Counsel's current jurisdiction, as stated in our April 23, 1986, Order, to investigate "any other allegation or evidence of violation of any Federal criminal law by ... Olson and connected with or arising out of that investigation."

It should be pointed out, however, that while the Independent Counsel's authority to investigate the possibility that Olson was engaged in criminal conspiracy, or aided or abetted any criminal offense, a fortiori encompasses the authority to investigate the actions of others involved in the possible unlawful concert of action, the current order grants the Independent Counsel jurisdiction to prosecute only Olson. If further investigation by the Independent Counsel turns up credible evidence of federal criminal violations by others, the Department of Justice has expressed its willingness to consider such new evidence. Burns Letter at 3. ("If you have any additional information that bears on this matter please do not hesitate to bring it to our attention. In that event, the Attorney General will, of course, consider your request in the light of any additional information available.") See also Report of Attorney General at 11 (noting that "independent counsel may wish to confer with the Department concerning related matters").

Thus, the Independent Counsel has jurisdiction under our current jurisdictional order to investigate whether Olson conspired with or aided or abetted any person (including but not limited to Schmults or Dinkins), to frustrate the inquiry of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, in violation of federal criminal law. Also, the investigation of EPA's Perry has been transferred by the Attorney General as a related matter from the Public Integrity Section to Independent Counsel at her request. Due to the Attorney General's prior decisions closing investigation of the distinct allegations against Schmults and Dinkins, and the preclusive effect of § 592(b)(1), the Independent Counsel has continuing jurisdiction to investigate the actions of Schmults and Dinkins only insofar as they were part of a concert of action with Olson, in violation of federal criminal law.

Miscellaneous

[8] The Independent Counsel has requested the Division to publicly release the pleadings with respect to her request for jurisdiction over the alleged "related matters" discussed above and the Attorney General has agreed to such request. Schmults and Dinkins have submitted motions to intervene and have been allowed to file amicus curiae briefs in support of their request to withhold disclosure of the Independent Counsel's application, the response of the Department, and the reply of the Independent Counsel.

Courts have consistently held that a person challenging the authority or propriety of a criminal investigation can do so only after an indictment (if any) is returned by the grand jury. See, e.g., Matter of Doe, 546 F.2d 498 (2d Cir.1976); Jett v. Castaneda, 578 F.2d 842 (9th Cir.1978). The court therefore denies the motions to intervene and the requests to withhold disclosure, and in the best interests of justice grants leave of court to publicly release the application of the Independent Counsel, the briefs of the parties on the application, and 49 *183 the court's foregoing opinion in this cause. [FN12]

FN12. Prior to appointing Ms. Morrison, the Division considered whether the fact that she had eight months earlier been Chief Litigation Counsel for the Securities and Exchange Commission would disqualify her pursuant to § 593(d). That subsection provides: The division of the court may not appoint as a[n] independent counsel any person who holds or recently held any office of profit or trust under the United States. We noted that the legislative history of this provision indicates that: [a] person appointed special prosecutor who formerly was an employee of the United States Government should have left the government a long enough period of time prior to being appointed a special prosecutor so that there is the reality and the appearance that such individual is totally independent from that government. Senate Report 95-170, 95th Cong., 2d Sess., reprinted in U.S.Code Cong. & Ad.News 1978, 4216, 4282. The Senate report also states that: No time period was specified in this section; however, the Committee felt that it would defeat the purposes of this title if, for example, someone could resign their position as United States attorney or a member of the Justice Department one day, and be appointed a special prosecutor the next. Id. The Division concluded that the eight months between Ms. Morrison's departure from the SEC and her appointment as Independent Counsel in this matter was an adequate lapse of time that ensured she is "independent, both in reality and in appearance, from the President and the Attorney General." During the interval, she had been actively engaged in the private practice of law as a partner in a local law firm.

Order Accordingly.

ORDER

Upon consideration of the request of counsel for Edward C. Schmults and Carol E. Dinkins to intervene in this cause and for the Court to withhold disclosure of the documents ordered unsealed by the Court's order of March 9, 1987, which was temporarily revoked by the Court's order of March 11, 1987, and the Court being fully advised in the premises, for reasons set forth in its accompanying opinion, it is hereby ORDERED, by the Court, that the motions to intervene and the requests to withhold disclosure are hereby denied; and it is further ORDERED, by the Court, that the motion of Independent Counsel, partially concurred in by the Attorney General, for leave of Court to unseal and publicly release:

(1) The Application of the Independent Counsel for Referral of Related Matters Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 594(e) and all exhibits thereto, filed January 13, 1987; (2) the Response of the Department of Justice to Application of the Independent Counsel for Referral of Related Matters Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 594(e), filed February 12, 1987; and (3) the Reply to Department of Justice Response to Independent Counsel's Application for Referral of Related Matters Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 594(e), filed February 24, 1987, is hereby granted in the best interests of justice; and it is further ORDERED, by the Court, in the best interests of justice, that this order and the accompanying opinion of the Court are hereby authorized to be publicly released.

No. 87-5247.

United States Court of Appeals,
District of Columbia Circuit.

Argued Aug. 5, 1987.

Decided Aug. 20, 1987.

On remand from the Court of Appeals, 666 F.Supp. 231, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, Aubrey E. Robinson, Jr., Chief Judge, upheld authority of independent authority of independent counsel appointed by the Attorney General and person who had been subpeonaed by grand jury convened by the independent counsel appealed. The Court of Appeals, D.H. Ginsburg, Circuit Judge., held that: (1) appointment of independent counsel by the Attorney General was valid; (2) independent counsel had properly exercised delegated authority; and (3) issue of constitutionality of statute providing for appointment of independent counsel by special division of the Court of Appeals under the Ethics Act was not ripe for review.

Affirmed.

Williams, Circuit Judge, filed an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part.

Opinion for the Court filed by Circuit Judge D.H. GINSBURG.

Opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part filed by Circuit Judge WILLIAMS.

D.H. GINSBURG, Circuit Judge:

Lt. Col. Oliver North appeals an order of the district court holding him in contempt for refusing to comply with a grand jury subpoena. North challenges the contempt order on the ground that it was issued by a grand jury presided over by Independent Counsel Lawrence Walsh and his associate counsel who, North contends, lack the legal authority to conduct that grand jury proceeding. North can prevail only if we find that Walsh's investigation cannot rely on either of two claimed sources of authority: (1) the December 19, 1986, appointment of Walsh as an independent counsel under the Ethics in Government Act [FN1] (Ethics Act), or (2) the Attorney General's March 5, 1987, delegation of investigative and prosecutorial authority of his own to Walsh. North raises constitutional challenges to both sources of authority as well as statutory challenges to the Attorney General's delegation.

On remand from the previous appeal to this court, the district court upheld the authority of Walsh and his associate counsel under the Attorney General's appointment. [FN2] The district court also held that it was unnecessary to address the question of the constitutionality vel non of the independent counsel provisions of the Ethics Act. We affirm each holding as well as the district court's order of July 10, 1987, directing North to comply with the subpoena.

FN2. In re Sealed Case, 666 F.Supp. 231 (D.D.C. 1987).

I. BACKGROUND

A. Appointment by the Special Division

Pursuant to the Ethics Act, 28 U.S.C. § 592(c)(1), the Attorney General on December 4, 1986, filed an application with the Independent Counsel Division of this court (the "Special Division") seeking the appointment of an independent counsel with jurisdiction > to investigate whether violations of U.S. federal criminal law were committed by Lieutenant Colonel Oliver L. North, other United States Government officials, or other individuals acting in concert with Lieutenant Colonel North or with other United States Government officials, whether or not covered by the Independent Counsel provisions of the Ethics in Government Act, from in or around January 1985 (the exact date being unknown) to the present, in connection with the sale or shipment of military arms to Iran and the transfer or diversion of funds 52 267 realized in connection with such sale or shipment. The independent counsel should have jurisdiction sufficiently broad to investigate and prosecute any and all violations of U.S. federal criminal law which his or her investigation may establish in this matter, and any related matters over which the independent counsel may request or accept jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 594(e).

On December 19, 1986, the Special Division filed an order, pursuant to its authority under 28 U.S.C. § 593(b), appointing Walsh as independent counsel, thereby conferring upon him, within the jurisdiction it prescribed, "all investigative and prosecutorial functions and powers of the Department of Justice, the Attorney General, and any other officer or employee of the Department," with exceptions not here relevant, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 594(a). [FN3] In exercising its authority under 28 U.S.C. § 593(b) to define the prosecutorial jurisdiction of the independent counsel, the Special Division granted Walsh jurisdiction beyond that requested by the Attorney General. Most significantly, the Special Division expanded the time frame of the inquiry into arms sales to Iran to include the period "since in or about 1984," rather than "from in or around January 1985," and the Special Division granted Walsh the additional jurisdiction to investigate "the provision or coordination of support for persons or entities engaged as military insurgents in armed conflict with the Government of Nicaragua since 1984." Soon after the Special Division announced Walsh's appointment, the President issued a statement saying that "Mr. Walsh has my promise of complete cooperation, and I have instructed all members of my administration to cooperate fully with the investigation in order to ensure full and prompt disclosure." [FN4]

B. Appointment by The Attorney General

Exercising his authority under 28 U.S.C. § 594(a)(1), Walsh empaneled a grand jury in this district on January 28, 1987. On February 24, 1987, North filed a complaint claiming that the independent counsel provisions of the Ethics Act are unconstitutional, and seeking to enjoin the grand jury proceedings. [FN5] In response to this constitutional challenge to Walsh's authority, the Attorney General on March 5, 1987, promulgated a regulation designed "to assure the courts, Congress, and the American people that [Walsh's] investigation will proceed in a clearly authorized and constitutionally valid form regardless of the eventual outcome of [North's] litigation." [FN6]

FN6. 52 Fed.Reg. 7270 (March 10, 1987) (to be codified as 28 C.F.R. Parts 600 and 601).

In accordance with the Attorney General's expressed intent "to make certain that the necessary investigation and appropriate legal proceedings can proceed in a timely manner," [FN7] the regulation established the "Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra"--under the direction of an Independent Counsel to be appointed by the Attorney General--and delegated to that Counsel authority identical to that provided to an independent counsel by the Ethics Act. [FN8] The regulation also sets forth the jurisdiction of the "Independent Counsel: Iran/ Contra" [FN9] in exactly the same terms employed by the Special Division in establishing the jurisdiction of Independent Counsel Walsh. The regulations' provisions relating to the removal of the "Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra" also largely parallel those found in the Ethics Act. [FN10] In particular, the regulation sets forth the 53 268 same grounds for removal as does the Ethics Act, [FN11] and it provides that "an Independent Counsel originally appointed by court order shall have such rights of review as provided by said order and by section 596(a)(3) of Title 28 of the United States Code." [FN12] The provisions of the regulation concerning "reporting and congressional oversight" and "relationship with components of the Department of Justice" are also virtually identical with parallel provisions in the Ethics Act. [FN13] The regulation also includes provisions that state:

FN14. 28 C.F.R. § 600.5, 52 Fed.Reg. at 7272.

On March 5, 1987, the date the Attorney General's regulation was promulgated, Independent Counsel Walsh signed an Appointment Affidavit naming him Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra.

C. North's Challenges to Walsh's Authority

In response to the Attorney General's regulation of March 5, 1987, North filed on the following day a new complaint in district court, [FN15] which was later consolidated with his previously filed petition for injunctive relief. On March 12, 1987, the district court rendered its decision in both actions. [FN16] Citing Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37, 46, 91 S.Ct. 746, 751, 27 L.Ed.2d 669 (1970), for the proposition that "a party who seeks to enjoin a criminal investigation has a particularly heavy burden," [FN17] the district court denied North's request that it enjoin the on-going grand jury investigation, stating that "Colonel North, like any other potential criminal defendant, can raise his objections by appropriate motions, if and when an indictment is entered." [FN18]

FN18. Id. at 423 (emphasis in original). This ruling was similar to one handed down by another judge and affirmed by this court, rejecting Michael Deaver's request, based on a virtually identical constitutional challenge to that presented by North, that Independent Counsel Whitney North Seymour, Jr. be enjoined from seeking Deaver's indictment from the grand jury empaneled to investigate his lobbying activities. Deaver v. Seymour, 656 F.Supp. 900 (D.D.C.1987), aff'd, 822 F.2d 66 (D.C.Cir.1987) stay denied, 55 U.S.L.W. 3641 (March 18, 1987) (Rehnquist, C.J., in chambers). See also Deaver v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 107 S.Ct. 3177, 3178, 97 L.Ed.2d 784 (1987) (Rehnquist, C.J., in chambers) ("There will be time enough for applicant to present his constitutional claim to the appellate courts if and when he is convicted of the charges against him.").

Subsequent to the district court's dismissal of his complaint seeking injunctive relief, the grand jury issued a subpoena to North, with which he refused to comply. The district court having thereupon held him in contempt, North appealed to this court. In support of the contempt order, Walsh and the Attorney General argued that North's challenge to the prosecutor's legal authority was no more ripe for review then than it had been when he sought civil injunctive relief raising the same challenge. We disagreed, [FN19] concluding that a recalcitrant witness' "claim that a subpoena was applied for and issued under the signature 54 269 of unauthorized persons" [FN20] was ripe for review under United States v. Ryan, 402 U.S. 530, 91 S.Ct. 1580, 29 L.Ed.2d 85 (1971), which stated:

FN19. In re Sealed Case, 827 F.2d 776 (D.C.Cir. 1987).

FN20. Id. at 778.

If, as he claims, the subpoena is unduly burdensome or otherwise unlawful, he may refuse to comply and litigate those questions in the event that contempt or similar proceedings are brought against him. Should his contentions be rejected at that time by the trial court, they will then be ripe for appellate review.

Id. at 532, 91 S.Ct. at 1582 (footnote omitted). [FN21] The factual record was inadequate, however, for us to determine whether Walsh and his associate counsel could rely solely on the grant of authority under the Attorney General's March 5, 1987, regulation as the legal basis for the subpoena issued to North. If the regulation provided such authority--and if that authority had been exercised by Walsh and his counsel--it appeared that we might not need to reach the question of whether the Ethics Act provided an independent source of authority, a question that would have required us to address the constitutionality vel non of the appointment of an independent counsel by the Special Division pursuant to the provisions of the Ethics Act.

FN21. For additional support, we noted that "issues analogous to appellant's have been litigated, and thus treated as ripe, in the contempt setting." In re Sealed Case, 827 F.2d at 778. This was in reference to the line of cases that includes In re Persico, 522 F.2d 41 (2d Cir.1975), in which the Second Circuit reached the merits of a recalcitrant witness' contention that a subpoena was unlawful because, he argued, the "special attorney" for the Government had not been "specifically directed" by the Attorney General, in accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 515(a), to conduct the grand jury proceeding. See In re Sealed Case, supra at 778 and cases therein cited. In holding that Ryan permits a grand jury witness to challenge the legal authority of a government attorney, we withheld judgment as to whether the Court intended the language in Ryan to overrule Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 39 S.Ct. 468, 63 L.Ed. 979 (1919), which held that a recalcitrant grand jury witness could not challenge the constitutionality of the underlying statute violation of which the grand jury was investigating. In re Sealed Case, supra, at 778-79.

We therefore remanded the case to the district court for it to determine "whether the Attorney General had legal authority to delegate the powers which he purported to convey in the [March 5, 1987] regulation ..., and if so, whether appropriate authority has been properly vested in Mr. Walsh and his associates." [FN22] In addition, because of our uncertainty about the precise application for this case of certain language in the Supreme Court's decision in Bowsher v. Synar, --- U.S. ---- n. 5, 106 S.Ct. 3181, 3189 n. 5, 92 L.Ed.2d 583 (1986), we also directed the district court to determine "whether any aspect of the relationship between the special division of this court and the Independent Counsel requires consideration of the constitutionality of the statute even if the Attorney General's appointment is otherwise valid." [FN23]

After taking evidence, the district court "determined that the parallel appointment of Mr. Walsh under the Attorney General's regulation was factually and legally valid and that appropriate authority has been vested in him and his associates." [FN24] In response to our second question, the district court "also determined that the limited relationship between the Special Division ... and the Office of Independent Counsel does not require consideration of the constitutionality of the [Ethics] Act." [FN25] This appeal followed.

II. ANALYSIS

A. Appointment by the Attorney General

As we indicated when remanding the case to the district court, North in effect claims that the subpoena was "unduly burdensome or otherwise unlawful" because it had been "applied for and issued under the 55 270 signature of unauthorized persons." [FN26] In accordance with the "well-established principle ... that normally [a c]ourt will not decide a constitutional question if there is some other ground upon which to dispose of the case," [FN27] we address first North's contention that Walsh and his associate counsel did not derive the requisite authority from the Attorney General's parallel appointment of March 5, 1987. Because the "investigative and prosecutorial functions and powers" purportedly conveyed to the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra by the Attorney General's regulation include the power to conduct grand jury proceedings and to issue the type of subpoena in dispute here, [FN28] the only questions raised by this contention are whether the Attorney General's delegation is lawful and, if so, whether that delegated authority has in fact been exercised by Walsh and his associate counsel.

FN26. In re Sealed Case, 827 F.2d at 778.

FN27. Escambia County v. McMillan, 466 U.S. 48, 51, 104 S.Ct. 1577, 1579, 80 L.Ed.2d 36 (1984) (per curiam). See Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 347, 56 S.Ct. 466, 483, 80 L.Ed. 688 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring).

FN28. See 28 C.F.R. § 600.1(a), 52 Fed.Reg. at 7271, which provides that the "investigative and prosecutorial functions and powers shall include," inter alia, "[c]onducting proceedings before grand juries and other investigations," subsection (a)(1), and "[m]aking applications to any Federal court for ... subpoenas[ ] or other courts orders," subsection (a)(7). We note also that the Department of Justice, amicus curiae, which is entitled to considerable deference in interpreting its own regulations, see Udall v. Tallman, 380 U.S. 1, 16-17, 85 S.Ct. 792, 801, 13 L.Ed.2d 616 (1965), has never maintained that either the grand jury proceeding or the specific subpoena before us exceeded the scope of the authority that the Attorney General delegated in the regulation.

i. Is the Attorney General's Delegation Lawful?

[1] We have no difficulty concluding that the Attorney General possessed the statutory authority to create the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra and to convey to it the "investigative and prosecutorial functions and powers" described in 28 C.F.R. § 600.1(a) of the regulation. The statutory provisions relied upon by the Attorney General in promulgating the regulation are 5 U.S.C. § 301 and 28 U.S.C. §§ 509, 510, and 515. [FN29] While these provisions do not explicitly authorize the Attorney General to create an Office of Independent Counsel virtually free of ongoing supervision, we read them as accommodating the delegation at issue here. [FN30]

FN29. See 52 Fed.Reg. at 7270-72. Section 301 of Title 5 of the United States Code authorizes a department head to issue regulations. Sections 509, 510, and 515 of Title 28 outline the authority of the Attorney General. Section 509 vests in the Attorney General, with four exceptions not relevant here, "all functions" of other officers, employees, and agencies of the Department of Justice. Section 510 authorizes the Attorney General to delegate this authority to "any other officer, employee, or agency of the Department of Justice." Finally, section 515(a) authorizes the Attorney General to conduct "any kind of legal proceeding, civil or criminal, including grand jury proceedings ... which United States attorneys are authorized by law to conduct," and it authorizes the Attorney General to delegate this authority to "any other officer of the Department of Justice, or any attorney specially appointed by the Attorney General under law." Together, these provisions vest in the Attorney General the "investigative and prosecutorial functions and powers" described in the regulation, 28 C.F.R. § 600.1(a), and authorize him to delegate such functions and powers to others within the Department of Justice.

FN30. In U.S. v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 694-96, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3100-01, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974), the Supreme Court presupposed the validity of a regulation appointing the Special Prosecutor, a position indistinguishable from the one at issue here.

[2] Moreover, the Attorney General's delegation did not violate the Ethics Act, 28 U.S.C. § 597(a), which provides:

> Whenever a matter is in the prosecutorial jurisdiction of a[n] independent counsel or has been accepted by a[n] independent counsel under [28 U.S.C. § 594(e)], the Department of Justice, the Attorney General, and all other officers and employees of the Department of Justice shall suspend all investigations and proceedings regarding such matter ... except insofar as such independent counsel agrees in writing that such investigation 56 *271 or proceedings may be continued by the Department of Justice.

The Attorney General's power of appointment extends only to the Department of Justice; hence the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra is "within" the Department, though free of ongoing supervision by the Attorney General. [FN31] Walsh has acknowledged that his signing the appointment form under the regulation constitutes an "agree[ment] in writing" within the meaning of § 597(a). The purpose of that provision--preventing investigations by the Department of Justice which would duplicate and possibly impede the work of Independent Counsel--is preserved by the present arrangement.

FN31. In his brief, Walsh disputes the district court's conclusion that--as he puts it--"under the regulation the Office of Independent Counsel is inside rather than outside the Department of Justice." Brief for Appellee Independent Counsel at 52. Walsh and his staff acknowledge that they are within, and claim the authority of, the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra established by the regulation. Id. at 43. They have argued, however, that the Attorney General had the authority, and used it, to locate this Office "outside" the Department of Justice. Id. at 52-63. Nonetheless, at oral argument they clearly stated that their arguments were made in the alternative and that if the court holds that this Office is "within" the Department of Justice, as we do, then they would not on that account abjure their authority under the regulation.

[3] North contends that the Attorney General's delegation of authority to the Independent Counsel violates the Appointments Clause of the Constitution, Art. II, § 2, which provides that the President > shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other Public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law; but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

Citing Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 96 S.Ct. 612, 46 L.Ed.2d 659 (1976), North contends that, given the substantial authority delegated to him, the Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra is not an "inferior Officer" but an "Officer of the United States" [FN32] who may be appointed only by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. North raises essentially the same contention with respect to the authority given to the independent counsel under the Ethics Act. We need not decide whether the Ethics Act creates such an "Officer of the United States," however, in order to conclude that the regulation does not. The crucial difference is that the Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra serves only for so long as the March 5, 1987, regulation remains in force. Subject to generally applicable procedural requirements, the Attorney General may rescind this regulation at any time, thereby abolishing the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra. [FN33] As a result, we must conclude that the Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra "is charged with the performance of the duty of the superior [i.e., the Attorney General] for a limited time and under special and temporary conditions." United States v. Eaton, 57 *272 169 U.S. 331, 343, 18 S.Ct. 374, 379, 42 L.Ed. 767 (1898). As such, "he is not thereby transformed into the superior and permanent official," id., but rather remains an "inferior Officer" whom the Attorney General, as the "Head[ ] of [a] Department[ ]," may appoint under the express terms of the Appointments Clause. [FN34] See id. at 343-44, 18 S.Ct. at 879; United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. (9 Otto) 508, 509-10, 25 L.Ed. 482 (1878). [FN35]

FN32. North consistently refers to Independent Counsel Walsh as a "superior Officer," which term is not to be found in the text of the Constitution; we prefer the words of the Framers to a tendentious neologism.

FN33. In Nader v. Bork, 366 F.Supp. 104, 108-09 (D.D.C.1973), the district court found arbitrary and capricious the October 23, 1973, rescission of the regulation creating the Office of Watergate Special Prosecutor, inferring from its repromulgation three weeks later that it was rescinded only to permit a result--the firing of Archibald Cox--that "could not legally have been accomplished while the regulation was in effect under the circumstances presented." Id. at 109. Cf. Vitarelli v. Seaton, 359 U.S. 535, 545-46, 79 S.Ct. 968, 975-76, 3 L.Ed.2d 1012 (1959). We are not presented with similar facts here and thus need not decide whether that analysis was correct. Nor does the Attorney General's March 5, 1987, regulation require, as a condition of its rescission, the consent of the Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra. Accordingly, we need not decide either whether the district court in Nader v. Bork properly relied upon the alternative ground that the rescission was invalid because Cox had not consented to it, as the regulation purported to require. 366 F.Supp. at 108.

FN34. Because the Attorney General created the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra and retains the authority to rescind his March 5, 1987, regulation, North's reliance on Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. at 126, 96 S.Ct. at 685 ("any appointee exercising significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States is an 'Officer of the United States' ") is misplaced. Unlike the Federal Election Commissioners in Buckley, the Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra derives his authority not by direct delegation from Congress, but rather through the Attorney General. Having been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, the Attorney General was properly vested with the investigative and prosecutorial authority described in 28 U.S.C. § 509, and could delegate it to others "for a limited time and under special and temporary conditions." United States v. Eaton, 169 U.S. at 343, 18 S.Ct. at 379. For the same reason, North can derive no support from Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602, 55 S.Ct. 869, 79 L.Ed. 1611 (1935), and Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 47 S.Ct. 21, 71 L.Ed. 160 (1926), which involve the constitutional limitations on the authority of Congress to place restrictions on the removal power of the President. The Supreme Court has long recognized that an agency may impose limits on its own exercise of discretionary authority to remove officers and employees. See Vitarelli v. Seaton, 359 U.S. at 539-40, 79 S.Ct. at 972-73; Service v. Dulles, 354 U.S. 363, 383-89, 77 S.Ct. 1152, 1162-65, 1 L.Ed.2d 1403 (1957).

FN35. See also United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974); Service v. Dulles, 354 U.S. at 366, 77 S.Ct. at 1154; and United States ex rel Accardi v. Shaughnessy, 347 U.S. 260, 265-67, 74 S.Ct. 499, 502-03, 98 L.Ed. 681 (1954), each of which implicitly recognizes that an "officer of the United States" may lawfully delegate his or her authority to an "inferior Officer."

ii. Has the Independent Counsel Properly Exercised the Authority Delegated?

North argues further that, "[e]ven assuming that the Attorney General had the authority to delegate the powers purportedly delegated under the regulation, that authority has not been properly vested in Mr. Walsh or his associate counsel, who are therefore acting without any lawful authority whatsoever." [FN36] North argues that neither Walsh nor his associate counsel may act pursuant to the regulation because the associate counsel have not formally accepted appointments in the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra [FN37] and both they and Walsh have not been "specifically directed by the Attorney General" to conduct the grand jury investigation, as required by 28 U.S.C. § 515(a). We address each argument in turn.

FN36. Brief of Appellant at 21. Under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(d), an "[a]ttorney for the government ... may be present while the grand jury is deliberating or voting." Rule 54 then defines "attorney for the government" to include "the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States Attorney, [or] an authorized assistant of a United States Attorney."

FN37. Walsh accepted appointment as Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra when he signed the appointment and oath form to that effect on March 5, 1987.

[4] It is less than perfectly clear whether associate counsel have formally accepted appointments under the regulation. [FN38] The Attorney General delegated to Walsh the express authority to hire associate counsel. In a March 13, 1987, letter, Assistant Attorney General Stephen Trott wrote to Walsh that, "[i]n order to effectuate the appointment of your staff, you should have each employee complete the standard 'Affidavits of Appointment' form ... and be sworn-in in the presence of a person designated in 5 U.S.C. § 2903." [FN39] The record contains no evidence that Walsh's associate counsel have taken any actions pursuant to Trott's request. North contends that the associate counsel therefore may act only in accordance with their previous appointments by the Special Division. Accordingly, North argues, any legal authority they possess proceeds from the Ethics Act, and not from the regulation.

FN38. 28 C.F.R. § 600.1(c), 52 Fed.Reg. at 7271.

FN39. Exhibit 6 to Brief of Appellant.

*58 273 Under the particular circumstances of this case, however, we find that appointment to the one office carries over to the other. The offices established under the Ethics Act and under the regulation have identical investigative and prosecutorial powers and jurisdiction. In addition, Walsh serves as Independent Counsel for each office, with the parallel authority to appoint associate counsel. Finally, the terms of the appointment and oath forms for the two offices are virtually identical. In sum, by previously submitting the appointment and oath forms to the Special Division, the associate counsel accepted appointments and took oaths identical to those that would have been required under the regulation, in order to perform the same jobs in a functionally indistinguishable office to that established by the regulation. Undoubtedly for these reasons, the Department of Justice accepts that the appointments and oaths made pursuant to the Ethics Act are sufficient as appointments and oaths of associate counsel within the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra. [FN40] We agree with the district court that "[n]ew appointment documents, therefore, would have served no purpose, as associate counsel had already made the necessary representations and were bound to their responsibilities under the first set of forms." [FN41]

FN40. Brief on Behalf of Amicus Curiae United States at 16 n. 7, 19-21. There is no evidence in the record that the Department ever renewed the request made in General Trott's letter of March 13, although it never received the affidavits as requested.

FN41. In re Sealed Case, supra note 2, 666 F.Supp. at 235 (footnote omitted).

North also contends that the Attorney General failed to comply with the requirement of 28 U.S.C. § 515(a) that he "specifically direct[ ]" Walsh and his associate counsel to conduct a grand jury investigation. In so arguing, North relies upon the lack of any "letter of authority" from the Attorney General (or his delegate) to each attorney, which is customarily provided in order to define the scope of the grand jury investigation and identify the attorneys conducting it. Although the cases concerning compliance with section 515(a) almost uniformly involve a dispute over whether a particular "letter of authority" specifically authorized the investigation being conducted, [FN42] no court has held that section 515(a) requires that there be any "letter of authority" as such. In fact, as the Department of Justice emphasizes, the Seventh Circuit has recently held that an attorney was "specifically directed" to conduct a grand jury proceeding even though a "letter of appointment" had not been sent until after the indictment issued. United States v. Balistrieri, 779 F.2d 1191, 1207-10 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 106 S.Ct. 1490, 89 L.Ed.2d 892 (1985).

FN42. See e.g., United States v. Prueitt, 540 F.2d 995, 999-1003 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 959, 97 S.Ct. 790, 50 L.Ed.2d 780 (1976); United States v. Morrison, 531 F.2d 1089, 1092 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 837, 97 S.Ct. 104, 50 L.Ed.2d 103 (1976); Infelice v. United States, 528 F.2d 204 (7th Cir.1975); In re Persico, 522 F.2d 41, 56-66 (2d Cir.1975); United States v. Wrigley, 520 F.2d 362 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 987, 96 S.Ct. 396, 46 L.Ed.2d 304 (1975).

[5][6] We need not determine how we would decide Balistrieri, however, in order to resolve the case before us. In this case, no "letters of authority" were sent to Walsh and his associates, either before or after they began to act pursuant to the authority delegated by the Attorney General. What section 515(a) requires is a "specific [] direct[ion]"--not a "letter of authority." Congress imposed this requirement in order "to protect the government from abuse of discretion by a special attorney or unnecessary personnel expenditures by the Attorney General, not to limit the Attorney General's power to prosecute." [FN43] From the facts of this case, we conclude that a specific direction has been given, and that the purpose of the statute has been met.

FN43. In re Persico, 522 F.2d at 63.

It was the Attorney General, after all, who initially requested that the Special Division appoint an independent counsel. When the Special Division appointed *59 274 Walsh, it delineated the jurisdiction of his investigation with considerable specificity. The President immediately responded to this appointment by pledging the "complete cooperation" of the executive branch. [FN44] Later, when North challenged the legal authority of Walsh's investigation, the Attorney General, in order "to assure the courts, Congress, and the American people that [Walsh's] investigation will proceed in a clearly authorized and constitutionally valid form," [FN45] specially created the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra, provided it with the identical powers and jurisdiction employed by the independent counsel appointed by the court, and appointed Walsh as Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra. Accordingly, Walsh and his associate counsel have received, from the inception of their investigation, more than the usual and at least the necessary degree of "specific [] direct[ion]" required by statute. To find fault in the Department of Justice's failure to prepare "letters of authority" would be to demand the same duplicative effort as involved in requiring the associate counsel to submit appointment forms and take oaths, for a second time, in order to carry out their existing responsibilities within a functionally equivalent and in all material respects an actually identical office. We will not so exalt forms over substance. [FN46]

FN44. See supra note 4 and accompanying text.

FN45. 52 Fed.Reg. at 7270; see supra note 6 and accompanying text.

FN46. Finally, North contends that, even if Walsh and his associate counsel satisfied the requirements discussed in the text, their actions cannot be predicated upon that authority because, according to North, "Walsh has never purported to act pursuant to the regulation." Brief of Appellant at 21-22. We consider irrelevant Walsh's legally erroneous belief that the Attorney General may create offices outside the Department of Justice. See supra note 31. The only other evidence upon which North relies is Walsh's failure to proclaim in documents filed with the court that he was acting pursuant to authority derived from the regulation as well as from the Ethics Act. See Brief of Appellant at 34. We are persuaded, however, by Walsh's argument that "as a matter of law, because Independent Counsel has executed an appointment affidavit pursuant to the regulation as well as one pursuant to the statute, all actions taken by the Office of Independent Counsel have been taken pursuant to both the regulation and the statute." Brief for Appellee Independent Counsel at 43 (citations omitted). See In re Sealed Case, supra note 2, 666 F.Supp. at 235 n. 9 ("That the Independent Counsel's office chose to consistently use the label assigned to it under the [Ethics] Act does not belie the Independent Counsel's assertion that every official action of his office was taken under both the Act and the regulation.").

iii. Summary

The Attorney General promulgated the March 5, 1987, regulation in order "to make certain that the necessary investigation and appropriate legal proceedings can proceed in a timely manner." [FN47] He possessed the legal authority, both constitutional and statutory, to create the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra. Walsh and his associate counsel have accepted appointments in that office, and their grand jury investigation complies with the "specific [] direct[ion]" they have received since December 19, 1986. As a result, the Attorney General's March 5, 1987, regulation has provided Walsh and his associate counsel with the legal authority necessary to conduct the grand jury investigation--and in particular, to issue the subpoena to North--regardless of whether they may also have such authority under the Ethics Act. Accordingly, because the subpoena North has received was "applied for and issued under the signature of [ ]authorized persons," [FN48] it is not "unduly burdensome or otherwise unlawful." [FN49]

B. The Tenure Issue

[7] In remanding the case, we asked the district court to determine "whether any aspect of the relationship between the special division of this court and the Independent Counsel requires consideration of the constitutionality of the statute even if the Attorney General's appointment is otherwise 60 275 valid." [FN50] As indicated above, we requested the district court to address this question because, upon initial inspection, we were unsure whether the Supreme Court's decision in Bowsher v. Synar required us to address the question of the constitutionality vel non of the removal provisions of the Ethics Act, [FN51] even though no one alleges that the Attorney General is likely to seek Walsh's removal in the foreseeable future. In Bowsher the Court

> FN50. Order, In re Sealed Case, supra note 23 and accompanying text.
>
> FN51. The relevant provisions are found in 28 U.S.C. § 596(a): (1) A[n] independent counsel appointed under this chapter may be removed from office, other than by impeachment and conviction, only by the personal action of the Attorney General and only for good cause, physical disability, mental incapacity, or any other condition that substantially impairs the performance of such independent counsel's duties.

> (3) A[n] independent counsel so removed may obtain judicial review of the removal in a civil action commenced before the division of the court [i.e., the Special Division] and, if such removal was based on error of law or fact, may obtain reinstatement or other appropriate relief.

> reject[ed the] argument that consideration of the effect of a removal provision is not "ripe" until that provision is actually used.... "[I]t is the Comptroller General's presumed desire to avoid removal by pleasing Congress, which creates the here-and-now subservience to another branch that raises separation-of-powers problems." The Impeachment Clause of the Constitution can hardly be thought to be undermined because of non-use.

106 S.Ct. at 3189 n. 5 (citation omitted).

In this case, the removal provisions in the Ethics Act and in the Attorney General's regulation are identical. [FN52] In general, they provide that the Attorney General may remove Walsh for cause only. What differentiates the two schemes is that the Attorney General may rescind or amend the regulation, thereby withdrawing the delegated authority or Walsh's security of tenure, whereas in order to effect the parallel result under the Ethics Act, the Congress and the President, or Congress overriding a veto, would have to legislate to repeal the statute, arguably a less likely development. North appears to argue that Walsh's more secure status under the Ethics Act, combined with the fact that under the Act's removal provisions the court that appointed him would review his removal, creates in Walsh a "here-and-now subservience" to the Special Division and, under Bowsher, compels us to reach the merits of his constitutional challenge. [FN53] > FN52. Compare 28 U.S.C. § 596 with 28 C.F.R. § 600.3, 52 Fed.Reg. at 7272. In particular, the grounds for removal are identical.

> FN53. Brief of Appellant at 37-38.

In Bowsher, the constitutional claim was "ripe" because the removal provision, by making the Comptroller General the servant of the Congress and not of the President, necessarily had an immediate and real impact on how he performed his duties. [FN54] 61 276 Under the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, the Comptroller General's duties involved the question of how to allocate scarce government monies; as illustrated by the budget controversies from which that Act emerged, it is particularly in the context of fiscal policy that "th[e] system of division and separation of powers produces conflicts, confusion, and discordance...." Bowsher v. Synar, 106 S.Ct. at 3187. In that context, too, one's institutional allegiance goes a long way, if not all the way, in determining how one acts: or, as is often said of such interbranch conflicts, where one stands depends upon where one sits. The three-judge district court opinion [FN55] on which Bowsher relied for its ripeness analysis makes the point that assertion of the authority to remove has an impact distinct from the mere possibility that an officer will in fact be removed. [FN56] "It is the prior assertion of authority to remove embodied in the tenure statute that has the immediate effect, and presumably the immediate purpose, of causing the Comptroller General to look to the legislative branch rather than the President for guidance" in making his day-to-day budgetary decisions under the Deficit Reduction Act. Synar v. United States, 626 F.Supp. at 1393 (emphasis added). Thus the Comptroller General--out of a "presumed desire to avoid removal by pleasing Congress"--would be significantly influenced in making decisions determining, in substantial part, whether the petitioners would receive anticipated federal benefits. Id. at 1392. So viewed, the Supreme Court in Bowsher was virtually compelled to conclude that the separation of powers question was ripe for review even though the removal provision had not been exercised and, in fact, might never be. [FN57]

FN54. As the district court in Synar v. United States perceptively observed, a similar analysis applied with respect to bankruptcy judges whose terms, under the Bankruptcy Code, expired after fourteen years. In explaining why the Supreme Court reached the constitutional challenge to that provision in Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 102 S.Ct. 2858, 73 L.Ed.2d 598 (1982), the district court stated that: It is true, of course, that the expiration of fourteen years was certain to occur while in the present case congressional removal is not. But that is quite irrelevant to whether the two provisions differ in their immediate impact, so that one is more "ripe" than the other. The immediate impact in Northern Pipeline came not from the certainty of expiration of fourteen years, but from the bankruptcy judge's awareness of the possibility of nonreappointment. It is his presumed desire to avoid that possibility by pleasing the appointing power, just as in the present case it is the Comptroller General's presumed desire to avoid removal by pleasing Congress, which creates the here-and-now subservience to another branch that raises separation-of-powers problems. Synar v. United States, 626 F.Supp. 1374, 1392 (D.D.C. 1986). In a similar vein, the district court analogized the "immediate effect" that Congress' latent removal power had on the Comptroller General to the effect that "an agency's ... formal assertion (by rule) of the power" to "punish [ ] certain conduct" has on a party whose conduct is so regulated. Id. at 1393, comparing Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner.

FN55. Synar v. United States, 626 F.Supp. 1374 (D.D.C.1986).

FN56. Citing Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 87 S.Ct. 1507, 18 L.Ed.2d 681 (1967).

FN57. We do not read Bowsher, however, to hold that the constitutionality of a statute is ripe for review any time a party raises a separation of powers claim. For example, suppose, improbably, that Congress transferred the National Weather Service from the Department of Commerce to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, and that this prompted someone--perhaps an employee who had hoped to move up within the Commerce Department--to bring a declaratory judgment suit challenging the move on separation of powers grounds. In terms purely of when that issue would be "ripe" for judicial review, it is difficult to see how the change in allegiances occasioned by the move would realistically have any effect on how the Service's employees perform their duties. Accordingly, it would not be unreasonable for a court to consider such a declaratory judgment action unripe until a plaintiff complains of some conduct by the newly-moved Service that would likely have been different if it had remained within the Department of Commerce.

In contrast, while North claims to suffer a harm from the removal provisions of the Ethics Act that he challenges as unconstitutional, he does not identify any way in which this "here-and-now" effect is even arguably felt by him. [FN58] We have already held that the Attorney General's parallel appointment provides Walsh with the legal authority, independent of the Ethics Act, to conduct the grand jury investigation from which this case arises. In light of this parallel source of authority, any harm to North that is a sufficiently direct and immediate consequence of the Ethics Act must involve an investigative or prosecutorial activity that Walsh would not undertake if he depended for his authority solely upon the Attorney General's regulation. In other words, North could only feel an immediate impact from the Act's removal provisions at this juncture if Walsh, without the benefit of the Act, would not take a certain action out of fear that the Attorney General would rescind or amend the regulation in order to abolish or limit his authority thereunder, but with the Act in place does so act, disregarding the risk that the Attorney General will remove him or limit 62 277 his authority because the Special Division acts as the guarantor of his authority under the Ethics Act.

FN58. Instead, North instances various ex parte contacts between Walsh and his associates and the Special Division. He has not made it clear, however, how he thinks these contacts adversely affect him here and now; at most he could be read to imply that, if the Special Division were ever to review Walsh's removal by the Attorney General, it would so identify itself with him as to bias its judgment. This implication is no more a present effect, however, than the hypothetical removal to which it relates.

There is not the slightest reason to believe, however, that Walsh would not have convened the grand jury and issued the challenged subpoena to North if the Ethics Act did not exist. The Attorney General, by creating the Office of Independent Counsel: Iran/Contra in the image of the independent counsel's office under the Ethics Act, intended that Walsh would conduct his investigation just as he would pursuant to his identical authority under the Ethics Act so that, even if the Act were held unconstitutional, its absence would not in any way impair Walsh's investigation or prosecutions. In fact, the Attorney General stated as much in the preamble to the regulation. [FN59]

FN59. See 52 Fed.Reg. at 7270-71.

Furthermore, even if Walsh had acted in a manner demonstrably beyond the Attorney General's delegation of authority, during the course of this investigation but apart from issuing this subpoena, it would be of no avail to North on this appeal. In accordance with the principles we announced in Deaver v. Seymour, and in our opinion remanding this case to the district court, North may litigate only the lawfulness of the specific subpoena issued to him, not that of such other investigative or prosecutorial actions as Walsh may undertake. [FN60]

FN60. As we said in Deaver v. Seymour, see supra note 18, and as the district court said in North v. Walsh and Meese, see supra note 16, courts do not, except in very limited circumstances not alleged here, entertain the claim of a person subject to a criminal investigation that the investigation is unlawful and must therefore be enjoined. Courts exercise this restraint because, as Justice Frankfurter explained, "[b]earing the discomfiture and cost of a prosecution for crime even by an innocent person is one of the painful obligations of citizenship." Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U.S. 323, 325, 60 S.Ct. 540, 541, 84 L.Ed. 783 (1940). In previously remanding this case to the district court, we found a narrow pre-indictment exception to this rule, under which a recalcitrant grand jury witness, such as North, may raise the claim that his or her subpoena was "applied for and issued under the signature of unauthorized persons." In re Sealed Case, supra note 19, 827 F.2d at 778. This exception, though, was not intended to swallow the general rule barring judicial interference with the conduct of a grand jury proceeding. As a result, in asserting that the subpoena issued to him was "unduly burdensome or otherwise unlawful," United States v. Ryan, 402 U.S. at 532, 91 S.Ct. at 1582, North may raise only those issues that relate to the specific subpoena with which he refused to comply. He may not rely upon the fortuitous circumstance of receiving that subpoena to effect an end run around the rule we announced in Deaver v. Seymour and in so doing challenge the entire investigation.

III. CONCLUSION

North appeals the district court's order holding him in contempt, challenging the legal authority of Independent Counsel Walsh and his associate counsel to conduct the grand jury that issued the subpoena with which he has refused to comply. We hold that Walsh and his associate counsel derive the necessary legal authority from the Attorney General's regulation of March 5, 1987, regardless of whether they also have this authority pursuant to their appointments under the Ethics Act. North's challenge to the subpoena does not make his constitutional challenge to the removal provisions of the Ethics Act reviewable at this time. [FN61]

FN61. Buckley v. Valeo does not suggest a contrary result. In that decision, which involved a suit for declaratory judgment, the Supreme Court held ripe for review a separation of powers challenge to Congress' appointment of Federal Election Commission members, 424 U.S. at 113-18, 96 S.Ct. at 679-82, to whom Congress had given "extensive rulemaking and adjudicative powers" and "direct and wide ranging" enforcement powers over the conduct of political elections. Id. at 110-11, 96 S.Ct. at 678. Moreover, the Court found that "the Commission ha[d] undertaken to issue rules and regulations," and that "[w]hile many of its other functions remain[ed] as yet unexercised," that exercise was nevertheless "all but certain." 424 U.S. at 116-17, 96 S.Ct. at 681. Although the politically-related nature of the Commission's duties and the present exercise of some powers and the "all but certain" exercise of others might not in themselves render "ripe" the separation of powers claim in a declaratory judgment setting, the Court relied heavily upon the additional consideration that "Congress was understandably most concerned with obtaining a final adjudication of as many issues as possible" as swiftly as possible. Id. at 117, 96 S.Ct. at 681. Cf. Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Env. Study Group, 438 U.S. 59, 82, 98 S.Ct. 2620, 2635, 57 L.Ed.2d 595 (1978). The configuration of factors that rendered the constitutional claim in Buckley ripe are not present here. Most importantly, whereas Congress expressed a desire for prompt review of the Federal Election Commission's authority, the Ethics Act contains no parallel provision. Moreover, as we have indicated, supra note 60, courts properly view declaratory actions such as that in Buckley with considerable disfavor in the criminal context; yet for the court today to reach North's constitutional claim would, as a practical matter, have the same effect as entertaining a declaratory action.

63 278 The judgment of the district court is therefore

Affirmed.

WILLIAMS, Circuit Judge, concurring and dissenting:

I concur in the court's opinion insofar as it upholds the authority of Independent Counsel Walsh and his subordinates under the Attorney General's regulations creating "Independent Counsel: Iran/ Contra" (the "Regulations"). I write separately on that issue only to explain why I regard any revocation of the Regulations as free from judicial review, a factor that greatly facilitates my agreement with the conclusion that Walsh's appointment under the Regulations can be squared with the Appointments Clause, Art. II, § 2.

I dissent from the court's conclusion in that Counsel Walsh's regulatory authority renders North's attack on the Ethics in Government Act unripe.

I. REVOCABILITY OF THE REGULATIONS

North contends that Counsel Walsh's tenure under the Regulations violates the Appointments Clause, Art. II, § 2, by constituting him a "superior officer" whose appointment is not made pursuant to that clause, i.e., by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The court responds that since the Attorney General can rescind the Regulation "at any time," Majority ("Maj.") at 56, Counsel Walsh is merely filling a part of the office of the Attorney General " 'for a limited time and under special and temporary conditions,' " id. (citing United States v. Eaton, 169 U.S. 331, 343, 18 S.Ct. 374, 379, 42 L.Ed. 767 (1898)). Eaton upheld the non-presidential appointment of a vice consul to temporarily wield all the powers of an ailing consul, even though Art. II, § 2 specifically identifies consuls as "superior officers." Accordingly, Walsh's similarly defeasible appointment is also valid. So far, I agree.

A premise of my sharing this conclusion is my belief that the Attorney General's revocation of the Regulations would be unreviewable. [FN1] Such revocation would, I believe, be exempt from judicial review as a decision "committed to agency discretion by law." 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2) (1982).

FN1. Of course superior officers are typically (and perhaps necessarily) dismissible by the President at will, so it may seem ironic to suggest that ease of dismissal facilitates upholding the appointment under the Regulations. But ease of dismissal by the Attorney General clearly establishes that Walsh is not a superior officer under the Regulations, thus reconciling his powers with the fact of his not having been appointed by the President.

The Supreme Court has long recognized that "the Executive Branch has exclusive authority and absolute discretion to decide whether to prosecute a case." United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 693, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3100, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974) (citing Confiscation Cases, 7 (U.S.) Wall 454, 19 L.Ed. 196 (1869)) (other citations omitted); see also United States v. Batchelder, 442 U.S. 114, 123-24, 99 S.Ct. 2198, 2203-04, 60 L.Ed.2d 755 (1979); Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 364, 98 S.Ct. 663, 668, 54 L.Ed.2d 604 (1978). It recently reaffirmed this principle emphatically. Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 832, 105 S.Ct. 1649, 1656, 84 L.Ed.2d 714 (1985) (agency decision not to enforce "presumptively unreviewable"); Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 607, 105 S.Ct. 1524, 1531, 84 L.Ed.2d 547 (1985) ("the Government retains 'broad discretion' as to whom to prosecute"). In both Wayte and Chaney the Court found judicial review peculiarly inappropriate. See Wayte, 470 U.S. at 607, 105 S.Ct. at 1531 ("the decision to prosecute is particularly ill-suited to judicial review"); Chaney, 470 U.S. at 831, 105 S.Ct. at 1656 ("the general unsuitabiilty for judicial review 64 279 of agency decisions to refuse enforcement").

The Court identified factors militating in favor of discretion and against review, all of which are applicable here. Assuming the existence of a "technical violation," Chaney, 470 U.S. at 831, 105 S.Ct. at 1656, enforcement decisions depend upon a multiplicity of concerns, all within the expertise of the agency: likelihood of success, relation to overall enforcement goals, and status within the agency's priorities. Chaney, 470 U.S. at 831-32, 105 S.Ct. at 1655-56; Wayte, 470 U.S. at 607, 105 S.Ct. at 1531. Such a decision involves an agency's comparison of expected cost and return for the particular case against the impact of deploying those resources elsewhere--a decision that can hardly be made without a grasp of the full range of enforcement possibilities before the agency. The administrator has this grasp (or should); a reviewing court does not. The Court further noted that judicial intervention into prosecutorial decisions "delays the criminal proceeding, threatens to chill law enforcement ..., and may undermine prosecutorial effectiveness by revealing the Government's enforcement policy." Wayte, 470 U.S. at 607, 105 S.Ct. at 1531; see also Chaney, 470 U.S. at 834, 105 S.Ct. at 1657.

The Attorney General's issuance or revocation of regulations such as the ones in question is similarly discretionary. In substance the Regulations simply implement his organization of his department. Such decisions, like the ones in Chaney and Wayte, turn on the relationship between numerous factors as to which the Attorney General is expert, and the courts are not. Again they revolve around agency resource allocation priorities: potentialities for administrative confusion or duplication, economies of effort deriving from characteristics of the decisions being made, and--perhaps most relevant to the present case--the de facto priorities that are likely to emerge from the structure. (Streamlined, special-focus sub-agencies are likely to be relatively single-minded; commitment of an issue to such a sub-agency is an assignment of special priority to the field in question.) The traditional presumption of nonreviewability of prosecutorial decisions applies by analogy here.

There are, to be sure, limits on the presumption of nonreviewability, but none that appears applicable to this case. Absent a claim that an agency decision was based on some impermissible factor--a belief that the agency lacked jurisdiction (or general policy amounting to total abdication), or unjustifiable criteria such as race or the accused's exercise of statutory or constitutional rights, see Chaney, 470 U.S. at 833 n. 4, 838, 105 S.Ct. at 1656 n. 4, Wayte, 470 U.S. at 608, 105 S.Ct. at 1531--the only basis for finding reviewability would be congressional provision of guidelines detailed enough to provide the courts with "law to apply," and thus a basis for review. Chaney, 470 U.S. at 833, 105 S.Ct. at 1659; see also Citizens to Preserve Overton Park v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 410, 91 S.Ct. 814, 820, 28 L.Ed.2d 136 (1971).

As in Chaney, the search for any "law to apply" is singularly unproductive. The sources of authority invoked by the Attorney General speak in the broadest imaginable terms: 5 U.S.C. § 301 (generally authorizing heads of departments to promulgate regulations); 28 U.S.C. § 509 (vesting in the Attorney General virtually all functions of "other officers" of the Department of Justice (i.e., officers other than those specified in immediately prior sections)); id. § 510 (stating that the Attorney General "may from time to time make such provisions as he considers appropriate authorizing the performance by any other officer, employee, or agency of the Department of Justice of any function of the Attorney General"); id. § 515(a) (allowing the Attorney General, or any other officer of the Department, "or any attorney specially appointed by the Attorney General under law," to conduct various legal proceedings, including grand jury proceedings).

Accordingly, the revocation and promulgation of the Regulations appear committed to agency discretion by law.

This conclusion makes dismissal of North's Art. II, § 2 attack on the Regulations a comparatively simple matter. Given 65 280 the Attorney General's complete legal freedom to dispose of Counsel Walsh by revocation of the Regulations, Walsh is no more a "superior officer" under the Regulations than was the vice consul appointed in Eaton to exercise consular duties until the executive removed him at its pleasure.

In view of my position on judicial review of revocation, I need not address the Art. II, § 2 issue that would be presented if such an act by the Attorney General were reviewable. It is plainly a more difficult case.

II. THE RIPENESS OF NORTH'S ATTACK ON THE ACT, GIVEN THE VALIDITY OF THE REGULATIONS

All members of the court agree that Walsh has valid authority under the Regulations. [FN2] The remaining question is whether, notwithstanding that authority, there is any occasion to consider North's attacks on Walsh's tenure under the Act. Under the doctrinal terminology of Bowsher v. Synar, --- U.S. ----, 106 S.Ct. 3181, 92 L.Ed.2d 583 (1986), the problem is whether the issue is "ripe."

FN2. At least for me, this is subject to a caveat based on possible intertwining of the Regulations with the Act. See infra, p. 69.

North contends that, notwithstanding any authority under the Regulations, Walsh's incremental tenure under the Act--his independence of the executive and possible subservience to the Special Court and Congress [FN3]--is so great as to affect his conduct "here-and-now." Clearly the gulf between the two forms of legal tenure is huge. The Attorney General is legally free to sweep the Regulations aside at will. Under the Act, by contrast, the Attorney General must establish "cause," and, perhaps most important, must convince the Special Court that there has been no error "of fact or law" in that finding. Thus the Special Court, which selected Walsh and might well be expected to view him as its protege, exercises effectively de novo review over dismissal. The Regulation affords gossamer tenure, the Act steel.

FN3. North notes that the Special Court's decision to vest in the Independent Counsel far broader jurisdiction than that proposed by the Attorney General followed communications to the Special Court from members of the then minority of the Senate Judiciary Committee, urging such an expansion. Letter from Joseph R. Biden, Jr., et al. to Special Division for Independent Counsel (Dec. 9, 1986). The episode suggests a point that should be borne in mind throughout: the label "independent" is not necessarily descriptive of true relations. Powers abhors a vacuum. Unhitching the Independent Counsel from the executive may make the office naturally prone to domination by the branch that represents its primary competitor.

That the Act's incremental tenure is likely to affect Walsh's day-to-day, "here-and-now" conduct seems indisputable. As I read the cases, this likelihood permits one against whom the distorted authority is wielded to raise separation-of-powers challenges to the legislation creating the distortion. And this is true, I believe, even though the object of the exercise of authority (here North) cannot directly trace the injuring exercise (service of a subpoena duces tecum) to the distorting element in Walsh's authority.

In challenges to the authority of a non-Article III court on the grounds that the challenger is entitled to a court enjoying Article III's exceptional tenure provisions, the assumption that inadequate tenure may prejudice the challenger is so automatic that it usually goes unmentioned. See, e.g., Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50, 102 S.Ct. 2858, 73 L.Ed.2d 598 (1982); Palmore v. United States, 411 U.S. 389, 93 S.Ct. 1670, 36 L.Ed.2d 342 (1973); Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 52 S.Ct. 285, 76 L.Ed. 598 (1932); cf. Ex parte Bakelite Corp., 279 U.S. 438, 49 S.Ct. 411, 73 L.Ed. 789 (1929). On at least one occasion, however, the Court explicitly stated that there was no need to inquire into the actual conduct of the decisionmaker, or to trace his or her rulings to influence from any institution on which, by virtue of the tenure arrangements, he or she might be dependent. See Glidden Co. v. Zdanok, 370 U.S. 530, 533, 82 S.Ct. 1459, 1463, 8 L.Ed.2d 671 (1962).

66 281 In Bowsher the Court extended this principle--automatic inference of distorting effects from unconstitutional tenure--from the context of claims to an Article III tribunal to that of a general separation-of-powers attack on an officer's tenure. It treated as "ripe" the issue whether Congress's power to remove the Comptroller General invalidated its effort to vest certain executive powers in him under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act (more formally, the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, P.L. 99-177, 99 Stat. 1037, 2 U.S.C.A. § 901 et seq. (West Supp.1987)). Ripeness was created, the Court found, by the Comptroller General's "here-and-now subservience" to Congress. 106 S.Ct. at 3189 n. 5. (The footnote adopted the analysis of the district court, Synar v. United States, 626 F.Supp. 1374, 1392 (D.D.C.1986), which relied explicitly on one of the Article III cases, Northern Pipeline.)

In evaluating the Bowsher Court's standards for linking the tenure defect to plaintiffs' harm, one must examine the role of the Comptroller General under Gramm-Rudman. In each year the Directors of the Office of Management and Budget ("OMB") and the Congressional Budget Office ("CBO") (the executive's and Congress's champions, respectively) were to prepare estimates of the deficit for the coming year. If the estimated deficit exceeded specified amounts, each director was to calculate program reductions pursuant to rules provided in the act. See Synar, 626 F.Supp. at 1377. They were to forward these estimates and program reductions to the Comptroller General, who was to issue his report on the same issues. He in turn was to forward that report to the President, who was bound to implement his findings. When the Bowsher action was brought, one round of this had occurred--through the issuance of a presidential implementing order. Id.

Among the plaintiffs was a union of government employees, whose cost-of-living adjustments (COLAs) had already been suspended, and were about to be canceled, pursuant to that order. Id. at 1380-81. Thus its members were injured by the operation of the act. But the union evidently made no effort to trace the size of the cutbacks emerging from the Comptroller General's edict to his subservience to Congress. If the CBO's deficit estimates were larger than OMB's, thus compelling more severe cutbacks, neither court bothered to mention it. If OMB and CBO split on the union members' COLAs and the Comptroller General's decision leaned unduly toward CBO's, again neither court alluded to the point. Clearly neither considered direct evidence of the distorting effect necessary to the outcome.

Another feature of Bowsher is directly relevant here. The Senate, defending the Comptroller General's role, noted that his removal could occur only by means of a joint resolution, which to take legal effect would require either the President's approval or passage by two thirds of both houses. See id. at 1393 & n. 21. Accordingly, it argued that the court need no more consider the removal provision than it need consider the obvious and omnipresent possibility that Congress might later pass a law purporting to remove him. The district court responded that the tenure provision had "the immediate effect, and presumably the immediate purpose, of causing the Comptroller General to look to the legislative branch rather than the President for guidance." [FN4] Id. at 1393.

> FN4. The Supreme Court, though noting that the dismissal resolution could be vetoed, merely observed that the veto could be overridden. 106 S.Ct. at 3189-90 n. 7. It did not address the similarity between Congress's asserted power to remove by resolution under the act and the underlying, inescapable possibility of its trying to do so by a new statute.

The district court opinion thus manifests great sensitivity to the likelihood that subtle variations in the quality of tenure will affect conduct. In Bowsher, Congress's merely signaling its ability to discharge the Comptroller General was enough, even though the ability signaled was no more than what existed anyway. And neither the district court nor the Supreme Court demanded any showing whatsoever that the alleged illegality of the tenure would 67 *282 move the Comptroller General in a direction hostile to plaintiffs' interests.

Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 113-18, 96 S.Ct. 612, 679-81, 46 L.Ed.2d 659 (1976), manifests the same approach. Parties expecting their interests to be affected by future rulings of the Federal Election Commission challenged the means by which its members were to be chosen, invoking both the Appointments Clause and more general separation-of-powers principles. Even though nothing whatsoever had happened to these parties (in contrast to North, who faces prison for non-obedience to the subpoena), the Court found the issue ripe. The Court broadly observed:

> Party litigants with sufficient concrete interests at stake may have standing to raise constitutional questions of separation of powers with respect to an agency designated to adjudicate their rights.

424 U.S. at 117-18, 96 S.Ct. at 681 (citing cases including traditional Article III cases, Palmore and Glidden). In Buckley the Court perceived the timing of the case as the primary problem and did not address the strength of the link between the defects in appointment process and the plaintiffs' expected injuries. Thus a fair reading of Buckley is that Glidden 's automatic inference of distorted conduct from defects in allegiance is of general applicability and not confined to claims to an Article III tribunal.

Thus not only the Supreme Court's standard treatment of Article III claims, but also Bowsher and Buckley support hospitable treatment for constitutional challenges to tenure arrangements (indeed, under Buckley, structural defects in allegiance generally). The Court has been ready to infer the prospect of distortions in conduct from the illegality in tenure, without more. The inference is hardly a wild leap. The maxim "Where you stand depends on where you sit" (your viewpoint depends on your position or interest) suggests folk recognition of the point. And the founders' adoption of Article III's extraordinary tenure arrangements reflects it at the most sophisticated level of political thought. (Perhaps judges' sensitivity on the point stems from their being beneficiaries of Article III's unmatched tenure provisions.) What is most striking is the Court's willingness to draw the inference without specific proof--indeed without so much as a hint of connection.

But this willingness is by no means inexplicable. Despite widespread recognition of the causal link between allegiance and stance, it may rarely be susceptible of direct proof. In fact direct proof might often require embarrassing and inappropriate inquiries into thought processes, cf. United States v. Morgan, 313 U.S. 409, 421-22, 61 S.Ct. 999, 1004, 85 L.Ed. 1429 (1941) (explaining impropriety of judicial inquiry into thought processes of administrators); Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. at 607, 105 S.Ct. at 1531 (explaining harm that might flow from judicial inquiry into thought processes underlying prosecutorial decisions). As a result, insistence on proof would likely put courts to a choice between permitting such dubious inquiries or denying relief to claims based on unconstitutional tenure. The Supreme Court appears to have avoided that dilemma by making the inference of distorted conduct automatic.

Nor is the logic of the automatic inference confined to claims of entitlement to an Article III court. Whenever the Constitution is construed to forbid a given arrangement of tenure (or allegiance), courts may infer that the framers believed the arrangement would distort conduct; thus Bowsher and Buckley. [FN5]

FN5. At the ripeness stage, of course, the inference of distorting effect is drawn on the basis of an assumption arguendo that there is a substantive illegality. Once the merits are reached, obviously, the courts may uphold the challenged arrangement. See, e.g., Palmore v. United States, 411 U.S. 389, 93 S.Ct. 1670, 36 L.Ed.2d 342 (1973); Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 52 S.Ct. 285, 76 L.Ed. 598 (1932); United States v. Woodley, 751 F.2d 1008 (9th Cir.1985) (en banc), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1048, 106 S.Ct. 1269, 89 L.Ed.2d 577 (1986). Nothing in this opinion should be understood to reflect any view on the merits of North's claim.

North's challenge to the Act is that it subjects him to coercive process by a man who is free to disregard constraints that would operate on a member of the executive 68 283 branch. These constraints are at their core the presence of competing priorities, including not merely other possible lines of inquiry and offenses, but also the need for sensitivity to the inquiry's possible impact on foreign relations. [FN6] Walsh's subordinates have already, in open court, stated his position to be that in the event of any clash between his judgment on such matters, and that of the executive branch, he is the final judge. Exhibit 1 to Reply Brief for Appellant. Though North has not directly traced the subpoena to Walsh's utter freedom from the executive branch, the inference is more readily drawn than the similar inference in Bowsher, Buckley, or the Article III cases.

FN6. Walsh enjoys full prosecutorial discretion within the rather large domain confided to him under the Regulation and Act: the potential impact of constitutionally questionable allegiances is correspondingly broad. In Bowsher, the discretion exercised by the Comptroller General, though enough to rank as "executive," 106 S.Ct. at 3191-92, was comparatively narrow, and the potential congressional influence correspondingly so.

The parties have not framed the issue in terms of standing, but we have an independent duty to satisfy ourselves that standing exists. Under the view taken by the Court in Bowsher, there can be little doubt that the three predicates of constitutional standing exist: North will suffer injury in fact either from going to prison or from being forced by that prospect to comply with the subpoena duces tecum; Walsh's subpoena is the direct cause of his injury; and a court order quashing the subpoena would redress his injury. See Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751, 104 S.Ct. 3315, 3324, 82 L.Ed.2d 556 (1984).

It is useful, however, to explore some difficulties in this analysis, both to satisfy the standing inquiry and to derive such light as it may shed on the ripeness issue. Walsh might argue (though he hasn't) that the illegality alleged (a faulty tenure arrangement) is not the cause of North's injury, pointing to his alternative authority under the Regulations. Similarly, quashing the subpoena may be a null remedy if Walsh, abjuring his authority under the Act and explicitly invoking only the Regulations, were to issue another one. A judgment quashing the subpoena would presumably leave him free to do so, even though it explicitly held the Act unconstitutional. Thus, North's claims of causation and redressability appear suspect under the typically rigorous standing inquiry. See, e.g., id.; Simon v. Eastern Kentucky Welfare Rights Organization, 426 U.S. 26, 96 S.Ct. 1917, 48 L.Ed.2d 450 (1976); Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 95 S.Ct. 2197, 45 L.Ed.2d 343 (1975).

In Bowsher, however, the Court's brief standing discussion (which basically incorporated the district court's analysis) indicates that for claims of unconstitutional tenure a relaxed concept of causation applies. See Bowsher, 106 S.Ct. at 3186; Synar, 626 F.Supp. at 1380-81. The district court found injury in fact (and, implicitly, the requisite causation) in the suspension of COLAs and in the prospect of their cancellation. Synar, 626 F.Supp. at 1380-81. It viewed this causal connection as enough, without any suggestion that the Comptroller General's disputed tenure actually caused his decision to be any more adverse to the union than it would have been if his tenure had been constitutionally correct.

The district court's analysis can readily be applied here: the contempt and the subpoena cause the harm, their extinction will redress it. But this does not answer the question that the district court neither posed nor answered: what is the causal link between the illegality (i.e., that part of the legislation said to render it unlawful) and the harm? The answer to that question, I believe, must lie in the same reasoning developed in the ripeness context: that in the context of a constitutional attack on tenure provisions, distorted conduct may be inferred automatically from faulty allegiances.

Redressability poses a slightly different problem. The district court found redressability in Bowsher in the fact that invalidation of the automatic deficit reduction process would prevent the impending cancellation 69 *284 of benefits. While under Gramm-Rudman's "fallback" provisions Congress might itself enact the cancellation, that possibility--patently a lesser risk--would not undermine the effectiveness of invalidating the provisions for automatic reduction. See Synar, 626 F.Supp. at 1381.

The present case is different. If quashing the subpoena and invalidating the Act were to leave Walsh completely free to proceed, would North's injury be redressed at all? The answer lies in the substantive rulings that would be possible if the court reached the merits. A court accepting North's arguments on the merits might find that the momentum of Walsh's investigation--built initially on the challenged tenure--would assuredly carry it forward to the identical point. If so, the court would have to consider whether there had been so great an intertwining of the Regulations with the Act as to call for invalidation of both. Such a remedy would, of course, leave the Attorney General free to repromulgate the Regulations (shorn, presumably, of their references to procedures under the Act). But the remedy would break the momentum, and negate the allegedly unconstitutional influence. As the panel majority finds no ripeness, and none of us has reached the merits, I need not try to resolve these issues. But I believe the analysis establishes that the selection of proper redress would turn on the conclusions reached by the court on the merits; there is no inherent obstacle to adequate redress.

* * *

> Where a person is the object of the exercise of authority by one whose tenure he seeks to challenge on constitutional grounds (at least ones involving separation of powers), the courts are ready to infer that the allegedly defective tenure has played a significant role in bringing about that exercise of authority and its tendency to injure plaintiff. Here, the inference that North's predicament stems from the questioned tenure is at least as plausible as the parallel inference in Bowsher or the Article III cases, in my judgment far more so. See also Buckley, 424 U.S. at 113-18, 96 S.Ct. at 679-81. Accordingly I believe his claim to be ripe and would reach the merits.

John L. BRADY, Petitioner,
v.
STATE OF MARYLAND.

No. 490.

Supreme Court of the United States

Argued March 18 and 19, 1963.

Decided May 13, 1963.

Proceeding for post-conviction relief. Dismissal of the petition by the trial court was affirmed by the Maryland Court of Appeals, 226 Md. 422, 174 A.2d 167, which remanded the case for retrial on the question of punishment but not the question of guilt. On certiorari, the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Douglas, held that where the question of admissibility of evidence relating to guilt or innocence was for the court under Maryland law, and the Maryland Court of Appeals held that nothing in the suppressed confession of petitioner's confederate could have reduced petitioner's offense below murder in the first degree, the decision of that court to remand the case, because of such confession withheld by the prosecution, for retrial on the issue of punishment only did not deprive petitioner of due process.

Affirmed.

Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice Black dissented.

*1195 *84 E. Clinton Bamberger, Jr., Baltimore, Md., for petitioner.

Thomas W. Jamison, III, Baltimore, Md., for respondent.

Opinion of the Court by Mr. Justice DOUGLAS, announced by Mr. Justice BRENNAN.

Petitioner and a companion, Boblit, were found guilty of murder in the first degree and were sentenced to death, their convictions being affirmed by the Court of Appeals of Maryland. 220 Md. 454, 154 A.2d 434. Their trials were separate, petitioner being tried first. At his trial Brady took the stand and admitted his participation in the crime, but he claimed that Boblit did the actual killing. And, in his summation to the jury, Brady's counsel conceded that Brady was guilty of murder in the first degree, asking only that the jury return that verdict 'without capital punishment.' Prior to the trial petitioner's counsel had requested the prosecution to allow him to examine Boblit's extrajudicial statements. Several of those statements were shown to him; but one dated July 9, 1958, in which Boblit admitted the actual homicide, was withheld by the prosecution and did not come to petitioner's notice until after he had been tried, convicted, and sentenced, and after his conviction had been affirmed.

[1] Petitioner moved the trial court for a new trial based on the newly discovered evidence that had been suppressed by the prosecution. Petitioner's appeal from a denial of that motion was dismissed by the Court of Appeals without prejudice to relief under the Maryland 85 Post Conviction Procedure Act. 222 Md. 442, 160 A.2d 912. The petition for post-conviction relief was dismissed by the trial court; and on appeal the Court of Appeals held that suppression of the evidence by the prosecution denied petitioner due process of law and remanded the case for a retrial of the question of punishment, not the question of guilt. 226 Md. 422, 174 A.2d 167. The case is here on certiorari, 371 U.S. 812, 83 S.Ct. 56, 9 L.Ed.2d 54. [FN1]

FN1. Neither party suggests that the decision below is not a 'final judgment' within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. s 1257(3), and no attack on the reviewability of the lower court's judgment could be successfully maintained. For the general rule that 'Final judgment in a criminal case means sentence. The sentence is the judgment' (Berman v. United States, 302 U.S. 211, 212, 58 S.Ct. 164, 166, 82 L.Ed. 204) cannot be applied here. If in fact the Fourteenth Amendment entitles petitioner to a new trial on the issue of guilt as well as punishment the ruling below has seriously prejudiced him. It is the right to a trial on the issue of guilt 'that presents a serious and unsettled question' (Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 547, 69 S.Ct. 1221, 1226, 93 L.Ed. 1528) that 'is fundamental to the further conduct of the case' (United States v. General Motors Corp., 323 U.S. 373, 377, 65 S.Ct. 357, 359, 89 L.Ed. 311). This question is 'independent of, and unaffected by' (Radio Station WOW v. Johnson, 326 U.S. 120, 126, 65 S.Ct. 1475, 1479, 89 L.Ed. 2092) what may transpire in a trial at which petitioner can receive only a life imprisonment or death sentence. It cannot be mooted by such a proceeding. See Largent v. Texas, 318 U.S. 418, 421--422, 63 S.Ct. 667, 668--669, 87 L.Ed. 873. Cf. Local No. 438 Const. and General Laborers' Union v. Curry, 371 U.S. 542, 549, 83 S.Ct. 531, 536, 9 L.Ed.2d 514.

*1196 The crime in question was murder committed in the perpetration of a robbery. Punishment for that crime in Maryland is life imprisonment or death, the jury being empowered to restrict the punishment to life by addition of the words 'without capital punishment.' 3 Md.Ann.Code, 1957, Art. 27, s 413. In Maryland, by reason of the state constitution, the jury in a criminal case are 'the Judges of Law, as well as of fact.' Art. XV, s 5. The question presented is whether petitioner was denied a federal right when the Court of Appeals restricted the new trial to the question of punishment.

86 [2] We agree with the Court of Appeals that suppression of this confession was a violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court of Appeals relied in the main on two decisions from the Third Circuit Court of Appeals--United States ex rel. Almeida v. Baldi, 195 F.2d 815, 33 A.L.R.2d 1407, and United States ex rel. Thompson v. Dye, 221 F.2d 763--which, we agree, state the correct constitutional rule.

This ruling is an extension of Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103, 112, 55 S.Ct. 340, 342, 79 L.Ed. 791, where the Court ruled on what nondisclosure by a prosecutor violates due process:

'It is a requirement that cannot be deemed to be satisfied by mere notice and hearing if a state has contrived a conviction through the pretense of a trial which in truth is but used as a means of depriving a defendant of liberty through a deliberate deception of court and jury by the presentation of testimony known to be perjured. Such a contrivance by a state to procure the conviction and imprisonment of a defendant is as inconsistent with the rudimentary demands of justice as is the obtaining of a like result by intimidation.'

In Pyle v. Kansas, 317 U.S. 213, 215--216, 63 S.Ct. 177, 178, 87 L.Ed. 214, we phrased the rule in broader terms:

'Petitioner's papers are inexpertly drawn, but they do set forth allegations that his imprisonment resulted from perjured testimony, knowingly used by the State authorities to obtain his conviction, and from the deliberate suppression by those same authorities of evidence favorable to him. These allegations sufficiently charge a deprivation of rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, and, if proven, would entitle petitioner to release from his present custody. Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103, 55 S.Ct. 340, 79 L.Ed. 791.'

87 The Third Circuit in the Baldi case construed that statement in Pyle v. Kansas to mean that the 'suppression of evidence favorable' to the accused was itself sufficient to amount to a denial of due process. 195 F.2d, at 820. In Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264, 269, 79 S.Ct. 1173, 3 L.Ed.2d 1217, we extended the test formulated in Mooney v. Holohan when we said: 'The same result obtains when the State, although not soliciting false evidence, allows it to go uncorrected when it appears.' And see Alcorta v. Texas, 355 U.S. 28, 78 S.Ct. 103, 2 L.Ed.2d 9; Wilde v. Wyoming, 362 U.S. 607, 80 S.Ct. 900, 4 L.Ed.2d 985. Cf. Durley v. Mayo, 351 U.S. 277, 285, 76 S.Ct. 806, 811, 100 L.Ed. 1178 (dissenting opinion).

[3] We now hold that the suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates *1197 due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution.

The principle of Mooney v. Holohan is not punishment of society for misdeeds of a prosecutor but avoidance of an unfair trial to the accused. Society wins not only when the guilty are convicted but when criminal trials are fair; our system of the administration of justice suffers when any accused is treated unfairly. An inscription on the walls of the Department of Justice states the proposition candidly for the federal domain: 'The United States wins its point whenever justice is done its citizens in the courts.' [FN2] A prosecution that withholds evidence on demand of an accused which, if made available, 88 would tend to exculpate him or reduce the penalty helps shape a trial that bears heavily on the defendant. That casts the prosecutor in the role of an architect of a proceeding that does not comport with standards of justice, even though, as in the present case, his action is not 'the result of guile,' to use the words of the Court of Appeals. 226 Md., at 427, 174 A.2d, at 169.

FN2. Judge Simon E. Sobeloff when Solicitor General put the idea as follows in an address before the Judicial Conference of the Fourth Circuit on June 29, 1954: 'The Solicitor General is not a neutral, he is an advocate; but an advocate for a client whose business is not merely to prevail in the instant case. My client's chief business is not to achieve victory but to establish justice. We are constantly reminded of the now classic words penned by one of my illustrious predecessors, Frederick William Lehmann, that the Government wins its point when justice is done in its courts.'

The question remains whether petitioner was denied a constitutional right when the Court of Appeals restricted his new trial to the question of punishment. In justification of that ruling the Court of Appeals stated:

'There is considerable doubt as to how much good Boblit's undisclosed confession would have done Brady if it had been before the jury. It clearly implicated Brady as being the one who wanted to strangle the victim, Brooks. Boblit, according to this statement, also favored killing him, but he wanted to do it by shooting. We cannot put ourselves in the place of the jury and assume what their views would have been as to whether it did or did not matter whether it was Brady's hands or Boblit's hands that twisted the shirt about the victim's neck. * * * (I)t would be 'too dogmatic' for us to say that the jury would not have attached any significance to this evidence in considering the punishment of the defendant Brady.

'Not without some doubt, we conclude that the withholding of this particular confession of Boblit's was prejudicial to the defendant Brady. * * *
'The appellant's sole claim of prejudice goes to the punishment imposed. If Boblit's withheld confession had been before the jury, nothing in it could have reduced the appellant Brady's offense below murder in the first degree. We, therefore, see no occasion to retry that issue.' 226 Md., at 429--430, 174 A.2d, at 171. (Italics added.)

89 If this were a jurisdiction where the jury was not the judge of the law, a different question would be presented. But since it is, how can the Maryland Court of Appeals state that nothing in the suppressed confession could have reduced petitioner's offense 'below murder in the first degree'? If, as a matter of Maryland law, juries in criminal cases could determine the admissibility of such evidence on the issue of innocence or guilt, the question would seem to be foreclosed.

[4][5][6] But Maryland's constitutional provision making the jury in criminal *1198 cases 'the Judges of Law' does not mean precisely what it seems to say. [FN3] The present status of that provision was reviewed recently in Giles v. State, 229 Md. 370, 183 A.2d 359, appeal dismissed, 372 U.S. 767, 83 S.Ct. 1102, where the several exceptions, added by statute or carved out by judicial construction, are reviewed. One of those exceptions, material here, is that 'Trial courts have always passed and still pass upon the admissibility of evidence the jury may consider on the issue of the innocence or guilt of the accused.' 229 Md., at 383, 183 A.2d, at p. 365. The cases cited make up a long line going back nearly a century. Wheeler v. State, 42 Md. 563, 570, stated that instructions to the jury were advisory only, 'except in regard to questions as to what shall be considered as evidence.' And the court 'having such right, it follows of course, that it also has the right to prevent counsel from arguing against such an instruction.' Bell v. State, 57 Md. 108, 120. And see Beard v. State, 71 Md. 275, 280, 17 A. 1044, 1045, 4 L.R.A. 675; Dick v. State, 107 Md. 11, 21, 68 A. 286, 290. Cf. Vogel v. State, 163 Md. 267, 162 A. 705.

FN3. See Dennis, Maryland's Antique Constitutional Thorn, 92 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 34, 39, 43; Prescott, Juries as Judges of the Law: Should the Practice be Continued, 60 Md.St.Bar Assn.Rept. 246, 253--254.

90 We usually walk on treacherous ground when we explore state law, [FN4] for state courts, state agencies, and state legislatures are its final expositors under our federal regime. But, as we read the Maryland decisions, it is the court, not the jury, that passes on the 'admissibility of evidence' pertinent to 'the issue of the innocence or guilt of the accused.' Giles v. State, supra. In the present case a unanimous Court of Appeals has said that nothing in the suppressed confession 'could have reduced the appellant Brady's offense below murder in the first degree.' We read that statement as a ruling on the admissibility of the confession on the issue of innocence or guilt. A sporting theory of justice might assume that if the suppressed confession had been used at the first trial, the judge's ruling that it was not admissible on the issue of innocence or guilt might have been flouted by the jury just as might have been done if the court had first admitted a confession and then stricken it from the record. [FN5] But we cannot raise that trial strategy to the dignity of a constitutional right and say that the deprival of this defendant of that sporting chance through the use of a 91 bifurcated trial (cf. Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241, 69 S.Ct. 1079, 93 L.Ed. 1337) denies him due process or violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

FN4. For one unhappy incident of recent vintage see Oklahoma Packing Co. v. Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co., 309 U.S. 4, 60 S.Ct. 215, 84 L.Ed. 447, 537, that replaced an earlier opinion in the same case, 309 U.S. 703.

FN5. 'In the matter of confessions a hybrid situation exists. It is the duty of the Court to determine from the proof, usually taken out of the presence of the jury, if they were freely and voluntarily made, etc., and admissible. If admitted, the jury is entitled to hear and consider proof of the circumstances surrounding their obtention, the better to determine their weight and sufficiency. The fact that the Court admits them clothes them with no presumption for the jury's purposes that they are either true or were freely and voluntarily made. However, after a confession has been admitted and read to the jury the judge may change his mind and strike it out of the record. Does he strike it out of the jury's mind?' Dennis, Maryland's Antique Constitutional Thorn, 92 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 34, 39. See also Bell v. State, supra, 57 Md. at 120; Vogel v. State, 163 Md., at 272, 162 A., at 706--707.

Affirmed.

Separate opinion of Mr. Justice WHITE.

1. The Maryland Court of Appeals declared, 'The suppression or withholding by the State of material evidence exculpatory to an accused is a violation 1199 of due process' without citing the United States Constitution or the Maryland Constitution which also has a due process clause. [FN*] We therefore cannot be sure which Constitution was invoked by the court below and thus whether the State, the only party aggrieved by this portion of the judgment, could even bring the issue here if it desired to do so. See New York City v. Central Savings Bank, 306 U.S. 661, 59 S.Ct. 790, 83 L.Ed. 1058; Minnesota v. National Tea Co., 309 U.S. 551, 60 S.Ct. 676, 84 L.Ed. 920. But in any event, there is no cross-petiton by the State, nor has it challenged the correctness of the ruling below that a new trial on punishment was called for by the requirements of due process. In my view, therefore, the Court should not reach the due process question which it decides. It certainly is not the case, as it may be suggested, that without it we would have only a state law question, for assuming the court below was correct in finding a violation of petitioner's rights in the suppression of evidence, the federal question he wants decided here still remains, namely, whether denying him a new trial on guilt as well as punishment deprives him of equal protection. There is thus a federal question to deal with in this Court, cf. Bell v. Hood, 327 U.S. 678, 66 S.Ct. 773, 90 L.Ed. 939, 92 wholly aside from the due process question involving the suppression of evidence. The majority opinion makes this unmistakably clear. Before dealing with the due process issue it says, 'The question presented is whether petitioner was denied a federal right when the Court of Appeals restricted the new trial to the question of punishment.' After discussing at some length and disposing of the suppression matter in federal constitutional terms it says the question still to be decided is the same as it was before: 'The question remains whether petitioner was denied a constitutional right when the Court of Appeals restricted his new trial to the question of punishment.'

FN* Md.Const., Art. 23; Home Utilities Co., Inc., v. Revere Copper & Brass, Inc., 209 Md. 610, 122 A.2d 109; Raymond v. State ex rel. Szydlouski, 192 Md. 602, 65 A.2d 285; County Com'rs of Anne Arundel County v. English, 182 Md. 514, 35 A.2d 135, 150 A.L.R. 842; Oursler v. Tawes, 178 Md. 471, 13 A.2d 763.

The result, of course, is that the due process discussion by the Court is wholly advisory.

2. In any event the Court's due process advice goes substantially beyond the holding below. I would employ more confining language and would not cast in constitutional form a broad rule of criminal discovery. Instead, I would leave this task, at least for new, to the rule-making or legislative process after full consideration by legislators, bench, and bar.

3. I concur in the Court's disposition of petitioner's equal protection argument.

Mr. Justice HARLAN, whom Mr. Justice BLACK joins, dissenting.

I think this case presents only a single federal question: did the order of the Maryland Court of Appeals granting a new trial, limited to the issue of punishment, violate petitioner's Fourteenth Amendment right to equal protection? [FN1] In my opinion an affirmative answer would 93 be required if the Boblit statement would have been admissible on the issue of guilt at petitioner's original trial. This indeed seems to be the clear implication of this Court's opinion.

FN1. I agree with my Brother WHITE that there is no necessity for deciding in this case the broad due process questions with which the Court deals at pp. 1196--1197 of its opinion.

The Court, however, holds that the Fourteenth Amendment was not infringed because it considers the Court of Appeals' opinion, and the other Maryland cases dealing with Maryland's constitutional provision making juries in criminal cases 'the Judges of Law, as 1200 well as of fact,' as establishing that the Boblit statement would not have been admissible at the original trial on the issue of petitioner's guilt.

But I cannot read the Court of Appeals' opinion with any such assurance. That opinion can as easily, and perhaps more easily, be read as indicating that the new trial limitation followed from the Court of Appeals' concept of its power, under s 645G of the Maryland Post Conviction Procedure Act, Md.Code, Art. 27 (1960 Cum.Supp.) and Rule 870 of the Maryland Rules of Procedure, to fashion appropriate relief meeting the peculiar circumstances of this case, [FN2] rather than from the view that the Boblit statement would have been relevant at the original trial only on the issue of punishment. 226 Md., at 430, 174 A.2d, at 171. This interpretation is indeed fortified by the Court of Appeals' earlier general discussion as to the admissibility of third-party confessions, which falls short of saying anything that is dispositive *94 of the crucial issue here. 226 Md., at 427--429, 174 A.2d, at 170. [FN3]

FN2. Section 645G provides in part: 'If the court finds in favor of the petitioner, it shall enter an appropriate order with respect to the judgment or sentence in the former proceedings, and any supplementary orders as to rearraignment, retrial, custody, bail, discharge, correction of sentence, or other matters that may be necessary and proper.' Rule 870 provides that the Court of Appeals 'will either affirm or reverse the judgment from which the appeal was taken, or direct the manner in which it shall be modified, changed or amended.'

FN3. It is noteworthy that the Court of Appeals did not indicate that it was limiting in any way the authority of Day v. State, 196 Md. 384, 76 A.2d 729. In that case two defendants were jointly tried and convicted of felony murder. Each admitted participating in the felony but accused the other of the homicide. On appeal the defendants attacked the trial court's denial of a severance, and the State argued that neither defendant was harmed by the statements put in evidence at the joint trial because admission of the felony amounted to admission of guilt of felony murder. Nevertheless the Court of Appeals found an abuse of discretion and ordered separate new trials on all issues.

Nor do I find anything in any of the other Maryland cases cited by the Court (ante, p. 1197) which bears on the admissibility vel non of the Boblit statement on the issue of guilt. None of these cases suggests anything more relevant here than that a jury may not 'overrule' the trial court on questions relating to the admissibility of evidence. Indeed they are by no means clear as to what happens if the jury in fact undertakes to do so. In this very case, for example, the trial court charged that 'in the final analysis the jury are the judges of both the law and the facts, and the verdict in this case is entirely the jury's responsibility.' (Emphasis added.)

Moreover, uncertainty on this score is compounded by the State's acknowledgment at the oral argument here that the withheld Boblit statement would have been admissible at the trial on the issue of guilt. [FN4]

FN4. In response to a question from the Bench as to whether Boblit's statement, had it been offered at petitioner's original trial, would have been admissible for all purposes, counsel for the State, after some colloquy, stated: 'It would have been, yes.'

In this state of uncertainty as to the proper answer to the critical underlying issue of state law, and in view of the fact that the Court of Appeals did not in terms *95 address itself to the equal protection question, I do not see how we can properly resolve this case at this juncture. I think the appropriate course is to vacate the judgment of the State Court of Appeals and remand the case to that court for further consideration in light of the governing constitutional principle stated at the outset of this opinion. UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
David Isser GREENE, Appellant.

No. 94-2572.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Oct. 10, 1994.

Decided Nov. 29, 1994.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, David S. Doty, J., of mail fraud and providing prohibited object to federal prisoner, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals held that defendant who pled guilty to mail fraud and providing prohibited object to federal prisoner made sufficient objections to facts related in presentence report regarding amount of fraud and abuse of trust or use of special skill necessary to trigger trial court's obligation to hold evidentiary hearing.

Reversed and remanded.

PER CURIAM.

David Isser Greene, an Orthodox Jewish rabbi, appeals the district court's sentence imposed under the Federal Sentencing Guidelines (hereinafter U.S.S.G.). Greene pleaded guilty to mail fraud and to providing a prohibited object to a federal prisoner, stemming from his agreement to arrange a Jewish divorce (also known as a "get") for a federal prison inmate. Greene entered into a plea agreement which, among other things, set forth the sentencing guidelines recommendations of the parties that the amount of the fraud equaled $5,500 and that Greene did not abuse his position of trust or use a special skill.

The district court, however, rejected this sentencing guideline aspect of the plea agreement. Thereafter, the district court, without holding an evidentiary hearing and relying on and adopting the findings of the probation officer, determined that Greene intended to inflict a loss of approximately $50,000 and abused his position of trust or used a special skill at the time he perpetrated his scheme. The district court sentenced Greene to five months of imprisonment, five months of home detention and two years of supervised release.

Greene appeals, arguing that the district court erred by determining the amount of loss he intended to inflict and that he abused his position of trust without holding an evidentiary hearing. For the reasons that follow, we reverse and remand for resentencing.

I. BACKGROUND

Since 1988, appellant David Isser Greene, a thirty-one-year-old rabbi, has served as director of the Chabad-Lubavitch Hospitality House of Rochester, Minnesota. Initially, Greene provided volunteer services for federal prison inmates at the Rochester Federal Medical Center ("FMC Rochester"). In 1990, he became a contract rabbi at a weekly salary of $50, providing Jewish religious services to the inmates at FMC Rochester.

Samuel Dagan, an inmate at FMC Rochester, attended religious services arranged by Chabad-Lubavitch at FMC Rochester. Greene agreed to arrange a get for Dagan. A Jewish divorce requires that a document be specifically handwritten by a scribe and signed by two witnesses on the express direction of the husband.

According to Greene, Dagan independently agreed to contribute $50,000 to the Chabad-Lubavitch organization. Andrew Reisini, a paralegal for Dagan's attorney Michael Atkin, was handling Dagan's finances and stated that Greene had called Atkin, requesting a "contribution" on behalf of Dagan in the amount of "at least $2,000."

In February 1993, during a meeting between Dagan and Greene in the chapel at FMC Rochester, Greene confirmed Dagan's $50,000 pledge. Dagan represented that the money would soon be available because of an imminent settlement with a Connecticut 385 bank. On May 8, 1993, Reisini met with Greene at the Holiday Inn in Rochester and gave Greene $500 in cash. On May 23, 1993, Reisini sent Greene a $5,000 cashier's check payable to "Chabad-Lubavitch of Rochester, Rabbi Greene, Director." An envelope containing a $100 bill was included with the check. On May 25, 1994, Greene met with Dagan at FMC Rochester and gave him the envelope containing the $100 bill. During the meeting, Dagan signed the purported last page of a release that would make funds available from the Connecticut bank.

Greene advised Reisini that he was going to attend his sister's wedding and see to Dagan's divorce proceedings in Israel. Greene claimed that, while in New York before traveling to Israel, he would proceed with the detailed and intricate religious procedure of procuring the get, complicated by the fact that Dagan was in jail and his wife lived in Israel.

After Greene returned to the United States, he met with Reisini at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport. Reisini gave Greene a cashier's check made out to "Chabad-Lubavitch of Rochester, Minnesota" in the amount of $45,000. Greene was then arrested and charged in a four-count indictment alleging three felonies and one misdemeanor.

Greene pleaded guilty to mail fraud, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1341 and to smuggling U.S. currency into a federal prison, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1791(a)(1), (b)(4), and (d)(1)(E). Greene signed a plea agreement, agreeing to plead guilty to one felony count and one misdemeanor count. In the plea agreement, the parties specified the amount of loss for guidelines purposes at $5,500 and without any enhancement under U.S.S.G. § 3B1.3 for abuse of position of trust or use of special skill. The plea agreement stated that the position of the parties as to the applicable guidelines did not bind the court and that Greene could not withdraw his plea if the court rejected the recommendations of the parties regarding the sentencing factors.

The presentence report, however, found that the amount of loss was at least $50,000 and recommended that Greene's offense level be increased two points for the facts "suggesting" an abuse of a position of trust and use of a special skill. On April 27, 1994, Greene moved for an evidentiary hearing on the presentence report, objecting to the determination that the amount of loss equaled $50,000 and to the recommendation for a two point enhancement for abuse of trust or use of a special skill.

The district court, however, did not hold an evidentiary hearing, and stated that an evidentiary hearing is only necessary or appropriate where there is a dispute over the facts. The district court concluded that, in this case, there was no dispute over the facts themselves, but a dispute over the application of the facts to the law. Therefore, the district court deemed an evidentiary hearing unnecessary. At sentencing, the district court, adopting the conclusions of the presentence report, determined the amount of fraud at $50,000 and increased Greene's offense level by two points for abuse of a position of trust and use of a special skill.

The district court determined that the factual record reflected that Greene demanded $50,000 to obtain a get and the presentence report asserts that a get actually costs between $200 and $500 to obtain. The court, therefore, concluded that Greene intended to inflict a loss of approximately $50,000. (Sentencing Tr. at 5-7). Although mentioned at oral argument but not raised as an issue on appeal, counsel representing Greene on appeal, but not representing him at the guilty plea or sentencing hearing, questioned whether a high fee for a divorce which was later obtained can amount to fraud.

Greene urged that the amount of loss should be reduced by the expense he incurred by traveling to Israel to obtain the get. The district court noted that the trip coincided with his sister's wedding, but even if the court accepted Greene's premise, the guideline calculation would remain the same. (Sentencing Tr. at 6-7). In addition, the district court concluded that a two level enhancement was appropriate because Greene had abused a position of trust as a contract employee of the Bureau of Prisons and because his special skills as a rabbi made it 386 significantly easier for him to commit the crime. (Sentencing Tr. at 7-9).

As already stated, the district court sentenced Greene to five months of imprisonment, five months of home detention and two years of supervised release under the split-sentence provision of U.S.S.G. § 5C1.1(d)(2). If Greene's objections were sustained, however, his appropriate sentence would fall within a sentencing range of zero to six months. Greene then filed a request for release pending appeal. We granted his request for release and expedited his appeal.

II. DISCUSSION

[1] The parties agree that the district court denied Greene an evidentiary hearing. This appeal thus focuses on whether Greene made a sufficient objection to facts related in the presentence report which would trigger an obligation to hold an evidentiary hearing.

In United States v. Hammer, 3 F.3d 266, 272 (8th Cir.1993), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 114 S.Ct. 1121, 127 L.Ed.2d 430 (1994), we held that unless a defendant has admitted the facts alleged in a presentence report, the presentence report is not evidence and not a legally sufficient bases for making findings on contested issues of fact. The Hammer court also determined that:

> [i]f a defendant objects to factual allegations in a presentence report, the Court must either state that the challenged facts will not be taken into account at sentencing, or it must make a finding on the disputed issue. See Fed.R.Crim.P. 32(c)(3)(D). If the latter course is chosen, the government must introduce evidence sufficient to convince the Court by a preponderance of the evidence that the fact in question exists.

Id. at 272-73 (quoting United States v. Streeter, 907 F.2d 781, 791-92 (8th Cir.1990)).

We first address whether Greene properly set forth his objections to the factual findings of the presentence report, requiring the court to hold an evidentiary hearing under Hammer. Greene made a timely written objection to the factual accuracy of the presentence report under the procedure established in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota Local Rule 83.10(f). Nevertheless, at the sentencing hearing, the district court explicitly rejected Greene's request for an evidentiary hearing to determine the amount of loss attributable to Greene's conduct and to determine whether Greene abused his position of trust.

The Government argues that Greene did not preserve his objections because he failed to explicitly object at the sentencing hearing to the factual findings of the district court and of the presentence investigation. In addition, the Government claims that by stipulating to the written plea agreement, Greene admitted to facts tantamount to a $50,000 loss and to abuse of trust and use of a special skill. We disagree.

Here, the district court erred by assuming that no dispute over the facts existed, but only a dispute over the application of the law to the facts. In addition to filing written objections, Greene's counsel specifically requested an evidentiary hearing on the presentence report. This placed in dispute the facts and inferences to be drawn from the facts.

[2][3] In this case, the record reflects that Greene objected to the presentence report in a timely fashion and requested an evidentiary hearing. The government bears the burden of proof on the disputed issues because they relate factors which would enhance the sentence. As Hammer instructs, once a defendant objects to the presentence report, the court must either make a finding as to whether the disputed fact exists or state that it will not take the disputed fact into account. Id. at 273. If the sentencing court chooses to make a finding with respect to the disputed facts, it must do so on the basis of evidence, and not the presentence report. Id. Hammer emphasizes that the court, not the probation officer, must, upon an appropriate record, be the fact-finder where a dispute exists.

On this record before us on appeal, the district court did not follow the legal requirements set forth in Hammer. Although the district court addressed Greene's objections at the sentencing hearing, the court did not hold an evidentiary hearing at all. Instead, the district court accepted the factual narrative 387 plus ultimate facts and conclusions arrived at by the probation officer in the presentence report, that Greene intended to inflict a loss of $50,000 and abused his position of trust or used a special skill.

Accordingly, we reverse David Isser Greene's sentence and remand for an evidentiary hearing by the district judge to find the amount of loss Greene intended to inflict and to determine whether Greene abused his position of trust or used a special skill pursuant to U.S.S.G. § 3B1.3.

UNITED STATES, Petitioner,
v.
Milton Dean BATCHELDER.

No. 78-776.

Argued April 18, 1979.
Decided June 4, 1979.

Defendant's conviction of violating a provision of Title IV of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 prohibiting previously convicted felons from receiving a firearm that has traveled in interstate commerce was affirmed by the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, 581 F.2d 626, but the Court ordered the defendant's sentence reduced from five to a maximum of two years. Certiorari was granted. The Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Marshall, held that: (1) the defendant was properly sentenced to five years under Title IV, even though his conduct also violated a similar provision of Title VII of the Omnibus Act, which provided for a maximum two-year sentence, and (2) as so construed, the statutory provisions at issue were not void for vagueness, did not violate equal protection or due process on the theory that they allowed the prosecutor unfettered discretion in selecting which of two penalties to apply, nor did they impermissibly delegate to the executive branch the Legislature's responsibility to fix criminal penalties.

FN* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

114 Respondent was found guilty of violating 18 U.S.C. § 922(h), which is part of Title IV of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe *2199 Streets Act of 1968 (Act). That provision prohibits previously convicted felons from receiving a firearm that has traveled in interstate commerce. The District Court sentenced respondent under 18 U.S.C. § 924(a) to five years' imprisonment, the maximum term authorized for violation of § 922(h). The Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction but remanded for resentencing. Noting that the substantive elements of § 922(h) and 18 U.S.C.App. § 1202(a), which is contained in Title VII of the Act, are identical as applied to a convicted felon who unlawfully receives a firearm, the court interpreted the Act to allow no more than the 2-year maximum sentence provided by § 1202(a).

Held: A defendant convicted of violating § 922(h) is properly sentenced under § 924(a) even though his conduct also violates § 1202(a). Pp. 2201-2205.

(a) Nothing in the language, structure, or legislative history of the Act suggests that because of the overlap between §§ 922(h) and 1202(a), a defendant convicted under § 922(h) may be imprisoned for no more than the maximum term specified in § 1202(a). Rather, each substantive statute, in conjunction with its own sentencing provision operates independently of the other. Pp. 2201-2202.

(b) The Court of Appeals erroneously relied on three principles of statutory interpretation in construing § 1202(a) to override the penalties authorized by § 924(a). The doctrine that ambiguities in criminal statutes must be resolved in favor of lenity is not applicable here since there is no ambiguity to resolve. Nor can § 1202(a) be interpreted as implicitly repealing § 924(a) whenever a defendant's conduct might violate both sections. Legislative intent to repeal must be manifest in the " 'positive repugnancy between the provisions.' " United States v. Borden Co., 308 U.S. 188, 199, 60 S.Ct. 182, 188, 84 L.Ed. 181. In this case, the penalty provisions are fully capable of coexisting because they apply to convictions under different statutes. Finally, the maxim that statutes should be construed to avoid constitutional questions offers no assistance here, since this principle applies only when an alternative interpretation is fairly possible from the language of the statute. There is simply no basis in 115 the Act for reading the term "five" in § 924(a) to mean "two." Pp. 2202-2203.

(c) The statutory provisions at issue are not void for vagueness because they unambiguously specify the activity proscribed and the penalties available upon conviction. Although the statutes create uncertainty as to which crime may be charged and therefore what penalties may be imposed, they do so to no greater extent that would a single statute authorizing alternative punishments. So long as overlapping criminal provisions clearly define the conduct prohibited and the punishment authorized, the notice requirements of the Due Process Clause are satisfied. Pp. 2203-2204.

(d) Nor are the statutes unconstitutional under the equal protection component or Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment on the theory that they allow the prosecutor unfettered discretion in selecting which of two penalties to apply. A prosecutor's discretion to choose between §§ 922(h) and 1202(a) is not "unfettered"; selectivity in the enforcement of criminal laws is subject to constitutional constraints. Whether to prosecute and what charge to file or bring before a grand jury are decisions that generally rest in the prosecutor's discretion. Just as a defendant has no constitutional right to elect which of two applicable federal statutes shall be the basis of his indictment and prosecution, neither is he entitled to choose the penalty scheme under which he will be sentenced. Pp. 2204-2205.

(e) The statutes are not unconstitutional as impermissibly delegating to the Executive Branch the Legislature's responsibility *2200 to fix criminal penalties. Having clearly informed the courts, prosecutors, and defendants of the permissible punishment alternatives available under each statute, Congress has fulfilled its duty. P. 2205.

Andrew J. Levander, Washington, D.C., for petitioner, pro hac vice.

Charles A. Bellows, Chicago, Ill., for respondent.

Mr. Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

At issue in this case are two overlapping provisions of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (Omnibus Act). [FN1] 116 sBoth prohibit convicted felons from receivingfirearms, but each authorizes different maximum penalties. We must determine whether a defendant convicted of the offense carrying the greater penalty may be sentenced only under the more lenient provision when his conduct violates both statutes.

FN1. 82 Stat. 197.

I

Respondent, a previously convicted felon, was found guilty of receiving a firearm that had traveled in interstate commerce, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 922(h). [FN2] The District Court sentenced him under 18 U.S.C. § 924(a) to five years' imprisonment, the maximum term authorized for violation of § 922(h). [FN3]

FN2. In pertinent part, 18 U.S.C. § 922(h) provides: "It shall be unlawful for any person--"(1) who is under indictment for, or who has been convicted in any court of, a crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year; "(2) who is a fugitive from justice; "(3) who is an unlawful user of or addicted to marihuana or any depressant or stimulant drug . . . or narcotic drug . . .; or "(4) who has been adjudicated as a mental defective or who has been committed to any mental institution; "to receive any firearm or ammunition which has been shipped or transported in interstate or foreign commerce."

FN3. Title 18 U.S.C. § 924(a) provides in relevant part: "Whoever violates any provision of this chapter . . . shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, and shall become eligible for parole as the Board of Parole shall determine."

The Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction but, by a divided vote, remanded for resentencing. 581 F.2d 626 (CA7 1978). The majority recognized that respondent had been indicted and convicted under § 922(h) and that § 924(a) permits five years' imprisonment for such violations. 581 F.2d, at 629. However, noting that the substantive elements *117 of § 922(h) and 18 U.S.C.App. § 1202(a) are identical as applied to a convicted felon who unlawfully receives a firearm, the court interpreted the Omnibus Act to allow no more than the 2-year maximum sentence provided by § 1202(a). 581 F.2d, at 629. [FN4] In so holding, the Court of Appeals relied on three principles of statutory construction. Because, in its view, the "arguably contradict [ory]" penalty provisions for similar conduct and the "inconclusive" legislative history raised doubt whether Congress had intended the two penalty provisions to coexist, the court first applied the doctrine that ambiguities in criminal legislation are to be resolved in favor of the defendant. Id. at 630. 2201 Second, the court determined that since § 1202(a) was "Congress' last word on the issue of penalty," it may have implicitly repealed the punishment provisions of § 924(a). 581 F.2d, at 630. Acknowledging that the "first two principles cannot be applied to these facts without some difficulty," the majority also invoked the maxim that a court should, if possible, interpret a statute to avoid constitutional questions. Id., at 630-631. Here, the court reasoned, the "prosecutor's power to select one of two statutes that are identical except for their penalty provisions" implicated "important constitutional protections." Id., at 631.

> FN4. Section 1202(a) states: "Any person who--"(1) has been convicted by a court of the United States or of a State or any political subdivision thereof of a felony, or "(2) has been discharged from the Armed Forces under dishonorable conditions, or "(3) has been adjudged by a court of the United States or of a State or any political subdivision thereof of being mentally incompetent, or "(4) having been a citizen of the United States has renounced his citizenship, or "(5) being an alien is illegally or unlawfully in the United States, "and who receives, possesses, or transports in commerce or affecting commerce, after the date of enactment of this Act, any firearm shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both." 18 U.S.C.App. § 1202(a).

*118 The dissent found no basis in the Omnibus Act or its legislative history for engrafting the penalty provisions of § 1202(a) onto §§ 922(h) and 924(a). 581 F.2d, at 638-639. Relying on "the long line of cases . . . which hold that where an act may violate more than one criminal statute, the government may elect to prosecute under either, even if [the] defendant risks the harsher penalty, so long as the prosecutor does not discriminate against any class of defendants," the dissent further concluded that the statutory scheme was constitutional. Id., at 637.

We granted certiorari, 439 U.S. 1066, 99 S.Ct. 830, 59 L.Ed.2d 30 (1979), and now reverse the judgment vacating respondent's 5-year prison sentence.

II

[1] This Court has previously noted the partial redundancy of §§ 922(h) and 1202(a), both as to the conduct they proscribe and the individuals they reach. See United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 341-343, and n.9, 92 S.Ct. 515, 519-20, 30 L.Ed.2d 488 (1971). However, we find nothing in the language, structure, or legislative history of the Omnibus Act to suggest that because of this overlap, a defendant convicted under § 922(h) may be imprisoned for no more than the maximum term specified in § 1202(a). As we read the Act, each substantive statute, in conjunction with its own sentencing provision, operates independently of the other.

Section 922(h), contained in Title IV of the Omnibus Act, prohibits four categories of individuals from receiving "any firearm or ammunition which has been shipped or transported in interstate or foreign commerce." See n.2, supra. Persons who violate Title IV are subject to the penalties provided by § 924(a), which authorizes a maximum fine of $5,000 and imprisonment for up to five years. See n.3, supra. Section 1202(a), located in Title VII of the Omnibus Act, forbids five categories of individuals from "receiv[ing], possess [ing], or transport[ing] in commerce or affecting commerce . . . any firearm." This same section authorizes a maximum fine of *119 $10,000 and imprisonment for not more than two years. See n.4, supra.

While §§ 922 and 1202(a) both prohibit convicted felons such as petitioner from receiving firearms [FN5] each Title unambiguously specifies the penalties available to enforce its substantive proscriptions. Section 924(a) applies without exception to "[w]hoever violates 2202 any provision" of Title IV, and § 922(h) is patently such a provision. See 18 U.S.C., ch. 44; 82 Stat. 226, 234; S.Rep. No. 1097, 90th Cong., 2d Sess., 20-25, 117 (1968); U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1968, p. 2112. Similarly, because Title VII's substantive prohibitions and penalties are both enumerated in § 1202, its penalty scheme encompasses only criminal prosecutions brought under that provision. On their face, these statutes thus establish that § 924(a) alone delimits the appropriate punishment for violations of § 922(h).

FN5. Even in the case of convicted felons, however, the two statutes are not coextensive. For example, Title VII defines a felony as "any offense punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year, but does not include any offense (other than one involving a firearm or explosive) classified as a misdemeanor under the laws of a State and punishable by a term of imprisonment of two years or less." 18 U.S.C.App. § 1202(c)(2). Under Title IV, "a crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year," 18 U.S.C. § 922(h)(1), excludes "(A) any Federal or State offenses pertaining to antitrust violations, unfair trade practices, restraints of trade, or other similar offenses relating to the regulation of business practices . . ., or "(B) any State offense (other than one involving a firearm or explosive) classified by the laws of the State as a misdemeanor and punishable by a term of imprisonment of two years or less." 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20). In addition, the Commerce Clause elements of §§ 922(h) and 1202(a) may vary slightly. See Barrett v. United States, 423 U.S. 212, 96 S.Ct. 498, 46 L.Ed.2d 450 (1976); Scarborough v. United States, 431 U.S. 563, 571-572, 97 S.Ct. 1963, 1968, 52 L.Ed.2d 582 (1977).

That Congress intended to enact two independent gun control statutes, each fully enforceable on its own terms, is confirmed by the legislative history of the Omnibus Act. Section 922(h) derived from § 2(f) of the Federal Firearms Act of *120 1938, 52 Stat. 1251, and § 5 of that Act, 52 Stat. 1252, authorized the same maximum prison term as § 924(a). Title IV of the Omnibus Act merely recodified with some modification this "carefully constructed package of gun control legislation," which had been in existence for many years. Scarborough v. United States, 431 U.S. 563, 570, 97 S.Ct. 1963, 1967, 52 L.Ed.2d 582 (1977); see United States v. Bass, supra, 404 U.S., at 343 n.10, 92 S.Ct., at 520; 15 U.S.C. §§ 902, 905 (1964 ed.).

By contrast, Title VII was a "last-minute" floor amendment, "hastily passed, with little discussion, no hearings, and no report." United States v. Bass, supra, at 344, and n.11, 92 S.Ct., at 520; see Scarborough v. United States, supra, 431 U.S., at 569-570, and n.9, 97 S.Ct., at 1967. And the meager legislative debates involving that amendment demonstrate no intention to alter the terms of Title IV. Immediately before the Senate passed Title VII, Senator Dodd inquired whether it would substitute for Title IV. 114 Cong.Rec. 14774 (1968). Senator Long, the sponsor of the amendment, replied that § 1202 would "take nothing from" but merely "add to" Title IV. 114 Cong.Rec. 14774 (1968). Similarly, although Title VII received only passing mention in House discussions of the bill, Representative Machen made clear that the amendment would "complement . . . the gun-control legislation contained in title IV." Id., at 16286. Had these legislators intended to pre-empt Title IV in cases of overlap, they presumably would not have indicated that the purpose of Title VII was to complement Title IV. See Scarborough v. United States, supra, at 573, 97 S.Ct., at 1968. [FN6] *121 These discussions, together with the language and structure of the Omnibus Act, evince Congress' clear understanding that the two Titles would be applied independently. [FN7]

FN6. Four months after enacting the Omnibus Act, the same Congress amended and re-enacted Titles IV and VII as part of the Gun Control Act of 1968. 82 Stat. 1213. This latter Act also treats the provisions of Titles IV and VII as independent and self-contained. Title I of the Gun Control Act amended Title IV, compare 82 Stat. 225 with 82 Stat. 1214, and Title III of the Gun Control Act amended Title VII. Compare 82 Stat. 236 with 82 Stat. 1236. The accompanying legislative Reports nowhere indicate that the sentencing scheme of § 1202(a) was to govern convictions under § 922. See H.R.Conf.Rep. No. 1956, 90th Cong., 2d Sess., 31, 34 (1968); S.Rep. No. 1501, 90th Cong., 2d Sess., 21, 37 (1968); U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1968, p. 4410.

FN7. The anomalies created by the Court of Appeals' decision further suggest that Congress must have intended only the penalties specified in § 924(a) to apply to violations of § 922(h). For example, a person who received a firearm while under indictment for murder would be subject to five years' imprisonment, since only § 922(h) includes those under indictment for a felony. 18 U.S.C. § 922(h)(1). If he received the firearm after his conviction, however, the term of imprisonment could not exceed two years. Similarly, because § 922(h) alone proscribes receipt of ammunition, a felon who obtained a single bullet could receive a 5-year sentence, while receipt of a firearm would be punishable by no more than two years' imprisonment under § 1202(a). In addition, the Court of Appeals' analysis leaves uncertain the result that would obtain if a sentencing judge wished to impose a maximum prison sentence and a maximum fine for conduct violative of both Titles. The doctrine of lenity would suggest that the $5,000 maximum of § 924(a) and the 2-year maximum of § 1202(a) would apply. However, if the doctrine of implied repeal controls, arguably the $10,000 fine authorized by § 1202(a) could be imposed for a violation of § 922(h). See infra, at 2203.

2203 In construing § 1202(a) to override the penalties authorized by § 924(a), the Court of Appeals relied, we believe erroneously, on three principles of statutory interpretation. First, the court invoked the well-established doctrine that ambiguities in criminal statutes must be resolved in favor of lenity. E. g., Rewis v. United States, 401 U.S. 808, 812, 91 S.Ct. 1056, 1059, 28 L.Ed.2d 493 (1971); United States v. Bass, 404 U.S., at 347, 92 S.Ct., at 522; United States v. Culbert, 435 U.S. 371, 379, 98 S.Ct. 1112, 55 L.Ed.2d 349 (1978); United States v. Naftalin, 441 U.S. 768, 778-779, 99 S.Ct. 2077, 2084, 60 L.Ed.2d 624 (1979); Dunn v. United States, 442 U.S., at 112-113, 99 S.Ct., at 2197. Although this principle of construction applies to sentencing as well as substantive provisions, see Simpson v. United States, 435 U.S. 6, 14-15, 98 S.Ct. 909, 913-914, 55 L.Ed.2d 70 (1978), in the instant case there is no ambiguity to resolve. Respondent unquestionably violated § 922(h), and § 924(a) unquestionably permits five years' imprisonment for such a violation. That § 1202(a) provides different penalties for essentially the same conduct is no justification for taking liberties with unequivocal statutory *122 language. See Barrett v. United States, 423 U.S. 212, 217, 96 S.Ct. 498, 501, 46 L.Ed.2d 450 (1976). By its express terms, § 1202(a) limits its penalty scheme exclusively to convictions obtained under that provision. Where as here, "Congress has conveyed its purpose clearly, . . . we decline to manufacture ambiguity where none exists." United States v. Culbert, supra, 435 U.S., at 379, 98 S.Ct., at 1117.

Nor can § 1202(a) be interpreted as implicitly repealing § 924(a) whenever a defendant's conduct might violate both Titles. For it is "not enough to show that the two statutes produce differing results when applied to the same factual situation." Radzanower v. Touche Ross & Co., 426 U.S. 148, 155, 96 S.Ct. 1989, 1993, 48 L.Ed.2d 540 (1976). Rather, the legislative intent to repeal must be manifest in the " 'positive repugnancy between the provisions.' " United States v. Borden Co., 308 U.S. 188, 199, 60 S.Ct. 182, 188, 84 L.Ed. 181 (1939). In this case, however, the penalty provisions are fully capable of coexisting because they apply to convictions under different statutes.

Finally, the maxim that statutes should be construed to avoid constitutional questions offers no assistance here. This " 'cardinal principle' of statutory construction . . . is appropriate only when [an alternative interpretation] is 'fairly possible' " from the language of the statute. Swain v. Pressley, 430 U.S. 372, 378 n.11, 97 S.Ct. 1224, 1228, 51 L.Ed.2d 411 (1977); see Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62, 52 S.Ct. 285, 296, 76 L.Ed. 598 (1932); United States v. Sullivan, 332 U.S. 689, 693, 68 S.Ct. 331, 334, 92 L.Ed. 297 (1948); Shapiro v. United States, 335 U.S. 1, 31, 68 S.Ct. 1375, 1391, 92 L.Ed. 1787 (1948). We simply are unable to discern any basis in the Omnibus Act for reading the term "five" in § 924(a) to mean "two."

III

In resolving the statutory question, the majority below expressed "serious doubts about the constitutionality of two statutes that provide different penalties for identical conduct." 581 F.2d, at 633-634 (footnote omitted). Specifically, the court suggested that the statutes might (1) be void for vagueness, (2) implicate "due process and equal protection interest[s] in avoiding excessive prosecutorial discretion and in *123 obtaining equal justice," and (3) constitute an impermissible delegation of congressional authority. Id., at 631-633. We find no constitutional infirmities.

It is a fundamental tenet of due process that "[n]o one may be required at peril of life, liberty or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes." Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453, 59 S.Ct. 618, 619, 83 L.Ed. 888 (1939). A criminal statute is therefore invalid if it "fails to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that his contemplated conduct is forbidden." 2204 United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612, 617, 74 S.Ct. 808, 812, 98 L.Ed. 989 (1954). See Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391-393, 46 S.Ct. 126, 127-128, 70 L.Ed. 322 (1926); Papachristou v. Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156, 162, 92 S.Ct. 839, 843, 31 L.Ed.2d 110 (1972); Dunn v. United States, 442 U.S., at 112-113, 99 S.Ct., at 2197. So too, vague sentencing provisions may post constitutional questions if they do not state with sufficient clarity the consequences of violating a given criminal statute. SeeUnited States v. Evans, 333 U.S. 483, 68 S.Ct. 634, 92 L.Ed. 823 (1948); United States v. Brown, 333 U.S. 18, 68 S.Ct. 376, 92 L.Ed. 442 (1948); cf. Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 86 S.Ct. 518, 15 L.Ed.2d 447 (1966).

The provisions in issue here, however, unambiguously specify the activity proscribed and the penalties available upon conviction. See supra, at 2201-2202. That this particular conduct may violate both Titles does not detract from the notice afforded by each. Although the statutes create uncertainty as to which crime may be charged and therefore what penalties may be imposed, they do so to no greater extent than would a single statute authorizing various alternative punishments. So long as overlapping criminal provisions clearly define the conduct prohibited and the punishment authorized, the notice requirements of the Due Process Clause are satisfied.

[2][3] This Court has long recognized that when an act violates more than one criminal statute, the Government may prosecutes *124 under either so long as it does not discriminate against any class of defendants. See United States v. Beacon Brass Co., 344 U.S. 43, 45-46, 73 S.Ct. 77, 79, 97 L.Ed. 61 (1952); Rosenberg v. United States, 346 U.S. 273, 294, 73 S.Ct. 1152, 1163, 97 L.Ed. 1607 (1953) (Clark, J., concurring, joined by five Members of the Court); Oyler v. Boles, 368 U.S. 448, 456, 82 S.Ct. 501, 505, 7 L.Ed.2d 446 (1962); SEC v. National Securities, Inc., 393 U.S. 453, 468, 89 S.Ct. 564, 572, 21 L.Ed.2d 668 (1969); United States v. Naftalin, 441 U.S., at 778, 99 S.Ct., at 2084. Whether to prosecute and what charge to file or bring before a grand jury are decisions that generally rest in the prosecutor's discretion. See Confiscation Cases, 7 Wall. 454, 19 L.Ed. 196 (1869); United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 693, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3100, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974); Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 364, 98 S.Ct. 663, 668, 54 L.Ed.2d 604 (1978).

The Court of Appeals acknowledged this "settled rule" allowing prosecutorial choice. 581 F.2d, at 632. Nevertheless, relying on the dissenting opinion in Berra v. United States, 351 U.S. 131, 76 S.Ct. 685, 100 L.Ed. 1013 (1956), [FN8] the court distinguished overlapping statutes with identical standards of proof from provisions that vary in some particular. 581 F.2d, at 632-633. In the court's view, when two statutes prohibit "exactly the same conduct," the prosecutor's "selection of which of two penalties to apply" would be "unfettered." Id., at 633, and n.11. Because such prosecutorial discretion could produce "unequal justice," the court expressed doubt that this form of legislative redundancy was constitutional. Id., at 631. We find this analysis factually and legally unsound.

FN8. Berra involved two tax evasion statutes, which the Court interpreted as proscribing identical conduct. The defendant, who was charged and convicted under the felony provision, argued that the jury should have been instructed on the misdemeanor offense as well. The Court rejected this contention and refused to consider whether the defendant's sentence was invalid because in excess of the maximum authorized by the misdemeanor statute. The dissent urged that permitting the prosecutor to control whether a particular act would be punished as a misdemeanor or a felony raised "serious constitutional questions." 351 U.S., at 139-140, 76 S.Ct., at 691.

[4] Contrary to the Court of Appeals' assertions, a prosecutor's discretion to choose between §§ 922(h) and 1202(a) is not *125 "unfettered." Selectivity in the enforcement of criminal laws is, of course, subject 2205 to constitutional constraints. [FN9] And a decision to proceed under § 922(h) does not empower the Government to predetermine ultimate criminal sanctions. Rather, it merely enables the sentencing judge to impose a longer prison sentence than § 1202(a) would permit and precludes him from imposing the greater fine authorized by § 1202(a). More importantly, there is no appreciable difference between the discretion a prosecutor exercises when deciding whether to charge under one of two statutes with different elements and the discretion he exercises when choosing one of two statutes with identical elements. In the former situation, once he determines that the proof will support conviction under either statute, his decision is indistinguishable from the one he faces in the latter context. The prosecutor may be influenced by the penalties available upon conviction, but this fact, standing alone, does not give rise to a violation of the Equal Protection or Due Process Clause. Cf. Rosenberg v. United States, supra, 346 U.S., at 294, 73 S.Ct., at 1163 (Clark, J., concurring); Oyler v. Boles, supra, 368 U.S., at 456, 82 S.Ct., at 505. Just as a defendant has no constitutional right to elect which of two applicable federal statutes shall be the basis of his indictment and prosecution neither is he entitled to choose the penalty scheme under which he will be sentenced. See U.S.Const., Art. II, §§ 2, 3; 28 U.S.C. §§ 515, 516; United States v. Nixon, supra, 418 U.S., at 694, 94 S.Ct., at 3100.

FN9. The Equal Protection Clause prohibits selective enforcement "based upon an unjustifiable standard such as race, religion, or other arbitrary classification." Oyler v. Boles, 368 U.S. 448, 456, 82 S.Ct. 501, 506, 7 L.Ed.2d 446 (1962). Respondent does not allege that his prosecution was motivated by improper considerations.

C

Approaching the problem of prosecutorial discretion from a slightly different perspective, the Court of Appeals postulated that the statutes might impermissibly delegate to the Executive Branch the Legislature's responsibility to fix criminal penalties. *126 See United States v. Hudson, 7 Cranch 32, 34, 3 L.Ed. 259 (1812); United States v. Grimaud, 220 U.S. 506, 516-517, 519, 31 S.Ct. 480, 482-483, 484, 55 L.Ed. 563 (1911); United States v. Evans, 333 U.S., at 486, 68 S.Ct., at 636. We do not agree. The provisions at issue plainly demarcate the range of penalties that prosecutors and judges may seek and impose. In light of that specificity, the power that Congress has delegated to those officials is no broader than the authority they routinely exercise in enforcing the criminal laws. Having informed the courts, prosecutors, and defendants of the permissible punishment alternatives available under each Title, Congress has fulfilled its duty. See United States v. Evans, supra, at 486, 492, 495, 68 S.Ct., at 636, 639, 640.

Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is Reversed.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,

WALLACH, et al., Defendants,
Rusty Kent London, Eugene Robert Wallach, a/k/a "E. Robert (Bob) Wallach," and Wayne Franklyn Chinn, Defendants-Appellants.

Nos. 181-183, Dockets 89-1544, 89-1563 and 89-1575.

United States Court of Appeals,
Second Circuit.

Argued Oct. 23, 1990.

Decided May 31, 1991.
As Amended Aug. 13, 1991.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, Richard Owen, J., of racketeering, mail fraud, interstate transportation of stolen property, and conspiracy to violate the federal conflict of interest law and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Meskill, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) fact that all officers and directors of corporation agreed to payments to defendants did not preclude finding of fraud; (2) even if defendants were entitled to payment from the corporation for purposes other than the stated purposes of the payments, they could be found to have defrauded the corporation; but (3) perjury of government witness required reversal of all convictions.

Reversed and remanded.

Altimari, Circuit Judge, filed a concurring opinion.

MESKILL, Circuit Judge:

This appeal presents several questions, the dispositive one being whether the perjured testimony of a key government witness requires a reversal of the convictions. The appellants seek to overturn judgments of conviction entered in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, following a sixteen week jury trial, Owen, J., presiding. The jury returned verdicts against co-defendants Eugene Robert Wallach (Wallach), Rusty Kent London (London) and Wayne Franklyn Chinn (Chinn). Wallach was convicted of engaging in a pattern of racketeering activity, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1961 et seq., two counts of interstate transportation of stolen property, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 2314 and 2, and one count of conspiracy to violate the federal conflict of interest law and to defraud the United States, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371. London was convicted of one count of engaging in a pattern of racketeering activity, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1961 et seq., one count of conspiracy to engage in a pattern of racketeering activity, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1962(d), three counts of interstate transportation of stolen property, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 2314 and 2, four counts of mail fraud, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 1341 and 2, one count of securities fraud, in violation of 15 U.S.C. §§ 78j(b), 78ff, 18 U.S.C. § 2, and 17 C.F.R. § 240.10b-5, and one count of aiding and abetting false statements, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 1001 and 2. Chinn was convicted of one count of engaging in a pattern of racketeering activity, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1961 et seq., one count of conspiracy to engage in a pattern of racketeering activity, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1962(d), two counts of interstate transportation of stolen property, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 2314 and 2, five counts of mail fraud, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 1341 and 2, one count of securities fraud, in violation of 15 U.S.C. §§ 78j(b), 78ff, 18 U.S.C. § 2, and 17 C.F.R. § 240.10b-5, and two counts of making false statements, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1001.

Wallach was sentenced to a total of six years imprisonment, fined $250,000, and ordered to forfeit $425,000. London was sentenced to a total of five years imprisonment, fined $250,000, and ordered to forfeit approximately $1.24 million. Chinn was sentenced to a total of three years imprisonment, 450 fined $100,000, and ordered to forfeit approximately $1.16 million. Regarding these forfeiture amounts, the district court adjudged London and Chinn jointly and severally liable for $1.14 million of the total amount that each man was individually assessed.

Defendants attack their convictions on several grounds. We reverse all the convictions and remand for a new trial.

BACKGROUND

The convictions subject to challenge stem from the defendants' dealings with the now defunct entity known as Wedtech Corporation (Wedtech). Over a period of years, each of the defendants engaged in a series of transactions with Wedtech. At trial, the government contended and the jury found in a number of instances that the conduct of each defendant constituted a criminal offense. Defendants concede that they engaged in transactions with Wedtech, but they submit that as a matter of law their convictions cannot be sustained. Defendants advance several theories to support their position. Due to the complexity of this case and to ease understanding of the issues presented, we assume the accuracy of the government's facts as they relate to the charges in the indictment. We, therefore, begin our discussion by outlining the government's version of the facts. The facts are developed further in connection with our discussion of the defendants' legal arguments.

A. Facts

Wedtech began as a small metal parts manufacturer in the South Bronx, New York. During its infancy, Wedtech was known as the Welbilt Tool & Die Company (Welbilt). Welbilt was a privately held entity founded by John Mariotta, an individual of Puerto Rican descent. In 1975, Welbilt was accepted into the Small Business Administration's (SBA) "Section 8(a)" program, under which businesses owned by economically and socially disadvantaged minorities are eligible for government contracts without competitive bidding. In August 1983, Welbilt made a public offering of its stock and changed its name to Wedtech. (All subsequent references will be to Wedtech.)

Government contracts--primarily defense department contracts--were the lifeblood of Wedtech's economic survival. Most of these contracts were obtained under Wedtech's Section 8(a) status. In 1980, Wedtech sought to be awarded a Department of the Army contract for the production of small engines, but the Army and Wedtech could not agree to the financial terms of the contract. Wedtech officers concluded that the exercise of political influence might assist the corporation in obtaining the contract. To that end, Wedtech embarked on a lobbying effort.

In 1981, Wedtech officials were introduced to defendant Wallach, a lawyer and a close personal friend of Edwin Meese, III (Meese), then Counselor to President Ronald Reagan. After meeting the Wedtech officials, Wallach visited the company's facilities and agreed to assist the company in obtaining the sought-after defense contracts by contacting his friend Meese. From May 1981 until the end of 1984, Wallach sent several memoranda to Meese or his subordinates regarding the award of the small engine contract and other Wedtech matters. Ultimately, in September 1982, the Army awarded the small engine contract to Wedtech at a contract price of approximately $27 million.

Wallach reported to the Wedtech officers that his efforts were primarily responsible for the contract award. During this lobbying effort, Wallach received no compensation from Wedtech, although he was reimbursed for his expenses.

Throughout his relationship with Wedtech, Wallach often dealt with Mario Moreno (Moreno) and Anthony Guariglia (Guariglia). Moreno, who originally joined Wedtech in 1978 as a consultant, became an officer in 1981 and eventually rose to become vice-chairman of Wedtech's board of directors. Guariglia, a certified public accountant, joined Wedtech in May 1983 as vice-president and controller. Guariglia went on to become Wedtech's president and a member of its board of directors.

451 Given his apparently successful lobbying effort on the small engine contract, Wallach, in late 1982, approached Wedtech officials and requested $200,000 as payment for his continued services during the last few months of 1982 and for services he would render in 1983. In December 1982, Wallach sent a proposed consulting agreement to Wedtech. Wedtech officers advised Wallach that the company was experiencing financial problems and that the agreement would not be executed until the company's financial situation improved. As an alternative, in March 1983, Wedtech officers promised to give Wallach one percent of the corporation's stock; Wedtech planned to make an initial public offering (IPO) of its stock later that year. Wallach continued his relationship with Wedtech and assisted the company with its plans to go public. Wedtech, in need of working capital in the months preceding the IPO, sought and obtained a $3 million bridge loan from Bank Leumi Trust Company (Bank Leumi). As a condition of this loan, Bank Leumi insisted that Wedtech's other creditors agree to subordinate their rights to ensure that Bank Leumi would be protected in the event of Wedtech's default.

One of the creditors, the Economic Development Agency (EDA), an agency within the Department of Commerce, refused to subordinate its priority position. In response, Wallach initiated a new lobbying effort directed at securing EDA's agreement. Wallach enlisted the assistance of Meese and members of his staff in an effort to obtain EDA's cooperation. In July 1983, EDA agreed to the subordination. Wedtech obtained the necessary bridge loan from Bank Leumi and its IPO took place in August 1983.

1. Wedtech's $125,000 Payment and Wallach's Letter

After completion of the public offering, Wallach approached Wedtech officers and renewed his request for $200,000. Wallach, at Wedtech's request, agreed to accept $125,000 for his lobbying efforts. Wedtech officials then asked Wallach to submit a letter which would explain that the payment was for services rendered in connection with the public offering. On September 7, 1983, Wallach sent such a letter to Guariglia. That letter read as follows:

> Dear Tony:
>
> Congratulations to all upon the success of the public offering. It is well deserved.
>
> As we discussed, my fee for consultation relative to the registration and public offering is $125,000.
> It is a great privilege to work closely with you and your very estimable colleagues at Wedtech.

Wedtech rendered full payment on the same date. Attributing the payment to services provided in connection with the public offering enabled Wedtech to utilize a more favorable accounting treatment. Specifically, had the true purpose of the payment been accurately reported, Wedtech would have been required to report the full amount as an expense and to deduct it from the corporation's earnings for the year in which the payment was made. Attributing the payment to the public offering permitted Wedtech to capitalize the amount of the payment--thereby avoiding the need to deduct the entire amount as an expense in one tax year. Such treatment had the effect of inflating Wedtech's profits per share and resulted in the inclusion of false information in Wedtech's SEC filings.

2. $300,000 Prepayment for 1985-86 and the UPSCO Letter

In January 1984, Wedtech entered into a written agreement with Wallach for his consulting services. Wallach was to receive $150,000 per year to be paid quarterly. However, at Wallach's request the full sum was paid in February of 1984. In September 1984, Wallach and Wedtech officers entered into a verbal agreement whereby Wallach would receive $300,000 as a prepayment for services he was to render in the years 1985 and 1986. After discussions between the parties, it was agreed that Wallach would submit a letter attributing this payment to services performed in connection with Wedtech's acquisition of 452 a shipyard, the Upper Peninsula Shipbuilding Company (UPSCO), located in Michigan. UPSCO had been acquired by Wedtech during the summer months of 1984. On October 26, 1984, Wedtech issued to Wallach a check in the amount of $300,000. In a letter dated November 6, 1984, Wallach attributed the payment to services he performed in connection with the UPSCO acquisition. This letter read, in pertinent part, as follows:

> Re: Upper Peninsula Shipbuilding Company
> Dear Tony:
> I am acknowledging receipt of the check which I have received from the Company. I am, of course, delighted to have played a role in assisting the Company's acquisition of this very desirable new venture. We all share substantial optimism about the increased potential which the remarkable facilities provide to Wedtech.

This letter, like the earlier "public offering letter," misrepresented the true basis for the payment and resulted in Wedtech's earnings being artificially inflated and in the filing of false reports with the SEC. Furthermore, the payment was structured in this manner after Wallach informed Guariglia and Moreno that he anticipated receiving an appointment to a position in the United States Department of Justice under his friend, then-Attorney General Meese. Wallach had advised Guariglia and Moreno that he wished to continue to lobby for Wedtech's interests while a full-time government officer.

Wallach never obtained a federal position. During 1984 and 1985, however, he continued his lobbying efforts for the benefit of Wedtech. Indeed, he played a role in assisting the company to obtain renewals of a Navy contract for the manufacture of pontoons--temporary piers for the loading and unloading of ships. The total value of these renewals was approximately $108 million.

3. Wallach Introduces London and Chinn

In April 1985, Wallach introduced defendants London and Chinn to the officers of Wedtech. London, a specialist in real estate and financial management, and Chinn, a financial analyst specializing in stocks, first met in 1978 and worked on a number of transactions together. London owned and did business through two corporate entities known as International Financial Consulting and Investments, Inc. (IFCI) and National Consulting and Management, Inc. (NCMI). Similarly, Chinn owned and acted through a corporation known as Financial Management International, Inc. (FMI). [FN1] Wallach believed that London and Chinn could assist Wedtech. A business relationship soon developed between Wedtech and these financial analysts. On June 10, 1985, Wedtech entered into a written retention agreement (Retention Agreement) with London and Chinn. In August of 1985, Chinn was made a director of Wedtech.

> FN1. The indictment refers to Chinn's corporation as Financial Management International, Inc. (FMI). The government in its brief makes reference to a Chinn corporation named Financial Management and Consulting, Inc., yet utilizes the abbreviation FMI. Because we believe this second reference to be nothing more than a typographical error and in light of the language of the indictment, any reference in this opinion to FMI refers to Financial Management International, Inc.

According to the terms of the Retention Agreement, London and Chinn were to provide financial advice and improve Wedtech's image in the investment community. In return, London and Chinn were each to receive 50,000 shares of Wedtech common stock and reimbursement for expenses. On June 19, 1985, London and Chinn entered into a second agreement with Wedtech's five main officers--John Mariotta, Fred Neuberger, Lawrence Shorten, Mario Moreno and Anthony Guariglia. Under this agreement, London and Chinn were to take steps to increase the value of Wedtech's stock. Ultimately, they were to sell the restricted stock that was held by the five officers. As compensation, the officers agreed to pay London and Chinn ten percent (10%) of any increase in the value 453 of the stock above the then-market price of $13 per share. This second agreement became known as the "Ten Percent Agreement." Chinn later assigned his interest under this agreement to IFCI, London's corporation.

a. Six Checks Totaling $99,999.98

Wallach, during the summer of 1985, had requested additional compensation for his lobbying services. Wedtech agreed to pay Wallach an additional $150,000, but due to a cash deficiency sought to structure the payment over time. To avoid making any payments to Wallach during a period when it was anticipated that he would be holding a federal government position, Wallach, London, Chinn, Guariglia and Moreno agreed to conceal the payments by having Wedtech pay the funds to IFCI.

In July of 1985, and continuing through January 1986, Wedtech made a series of payments to London's corporation, IFCI. Specifically, Wedtech issued one check in the amount of $58,333.33 and five others, each in the amount of $8,333.33--totaling $99,999.98. These payments were made in response to an invoice submitted by London which sought $150,000 for consulting services related to Wedtech's attempt to sell a tug barge system. The payments were made to IFCI to facilitate the funneling of Wedtech monies to Wallach. London would pay the taxes and then forward the balance in cash to Wallach. Because the invoice that London submitted characterized the $150,000 as relating to the sale of the tug barge--a capital asset--Wedtech accountants were able to capitalize, as opposed to expense, the costs, thereby artificially inflating Wedtech's income per share.

b. December 1985 Agreement: Secondary Public Offering

In December 1985, Wedtech officers agreed to enter into an agreement with London to assist the corporation with its second public offering, scheduled for January 1986. The agreement called for London to receive $1 million as compensation for his services. Chinn was a silent party to this agreement. The purpose of the agreement was to get London and Chinn to create a demand for the newly issued stock by "parking" it. Additionally, London and Chinn were to pay $100,000 as a kickback to Guariglia to ensure their receipt of the $1 million. Wedtech officers also paid to London and Chinn $114,000 in related expenses. Thus, the total sum involved was $1.14 million. Finally, London, Chinn and Guariglia agreed that the $1 million would be paid to London's corporation, IFCI, and that, in turn, Chinn's share would be channelled to him via his corporation, FMI, and that Wallach was to receive a twenty percent share of the $1 million payment. This mode of disbursing the funds was adopted in order to avoid the SEC mandated disclosure of the payment to Chinn, a Wedtech director. The registration statement that was filed in connection with the public offering made no mention of this $1.14 million payment. Similarly, the final prospectus that was mailed to shareholders omitted any reference to the payment. In the spring of 1986, Wedtech's outside counsel discovered that a payment had been made. Accordingly, a committee was organized to investigate the fee. In response to committee inquiries, London denied that he had shared the fee, and he attributed the payment to marketing services he allegedly had rendered and would continue to render in connection with a metallic coating process that Wedtech had developed. The committee eventually decided to characterize the fee to comport with this new explanation.

4. Wedtech's Final Days

In the summer of 1986, Wedtech's operations became the subject of numerous federal investigations. On December 26, 1986, Wedtech, finding itself unable to meet its financial obligations, filed for bankruptcy. On January 26, 1987, Moreno and Guariglia entered into cooperation agreements with the government, and on January 30, 1987, each man pleaded guilty to certain criminal charges. Moreno and Guariglia were the government's primary witnesses against the defendants, Wallach, London and Chinn.

454 C. The Indictment

On October 17, 1988, Wallach, London and Chinn were charged in a twenty-one count Superseding Indictment: Count One charged all three defendants with engaging in a pattern of racketeering activity, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1961 et seq. Count Two charged all three defendants with a conspiracy to engage in the pattern of racketeering activity charged in Count One, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1962(d). These two RICO counts detailed six acts of racketeering. Racketeering Acts One and Two charged Wallach with fraudulently obtaining from Wedtech checks in the amount of $125,000 and $300,000, respectively, and transporting those checks in interstate commerce. Racketeering Act Three charged all three defendants with fraudulently obtaining from Wedtech six checks totaling $99,999.98 and transporting those checks in interstate commerce. Racketeering Act Four charged London and Chinn with defrauding Wedtech of $240,000 through an illegal kickback scheme that constituted mail fraud, commercial bribery and securities fraud. Racketeering Act Five charged London and Chinn with fraudulently obtaining from Wedtech two checks totaling $1.14 million in a scheme that involved interstate transportation of the property taken by fraud, mail fraud, commercial bribery and securities fraud. Racketeering Act Six charged Chinn with committing mail fraud by fraudulently obtaining more than $20,000 in fictitious business expense payments from Wedtech.

Counts Three, Four, and Six through Eighteen charged one or more of the defendants with substantive offenses that mirrored the six racketeering acts charged in Count One. Count Five charged all three defendants with conspiring to defraud the United States of Wallach's honest and faithful services and to violate 18 U.S.C. § 203, the federal conflict of interest statute, by agreeing to prepay Wallach for services he was to render on behalf of Wedtech while a full-time government employee, all in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371. Count Nineteen charged Chinn with making false statements on a Form S-1 (Registration Statement) filed with the SEC, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1001. Count Twenty charged London with aiding and abetting Chinn's filing of the Form S-1 false statements, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 1001 and 2. Count Twenty-one charged Chinn with making false statements on a "personal financial statement" filed by Wedtech with the Small Business Administration, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1001.

D. The Verdict

After a sixteen week trial, the jury began its deliberations on August 2, 1989. On Saturday, August 5, 1989, the fourth day of deliberations, juror number nine called in sick. Judge Owen, after speaking with the sick juror, directed that the remaining eleven jurors continue their deliberations pursuant to Fed.R.Crim.P. 23(b). On August 8, 1989, the eleven member jury returned its verdicts.

1. Eugene Robert Wallach

Wallach was convicted on Count One (substantive RICO), on Counts Three and Four (interstate transportation of two fraudulently obtained checks), and on Count Five (conspiracy to violate the conflict of interest law and to defraud the United States). He was acquitted on Count Two (RICO conspiracy) and Count Six (interstate transportation of checks totaling $99,999.98). In connection with his conviction on Count One (substantive RICO), the jury found Racketeering Acts One and Two (interstate transportation of two checks) to have been proven, but not Act Three (interstate transportation of checks totaling $99,999.98).

Wallach was sentenced to concurrent terms of six years imprisonment on each of Counts One and Four, five years imprisonment on Count Five, and one year imprisonment on Count Three. The sentences imposed on Counts Three and Five were to run consecutively and to be served concurrently with the sentence imposed on Counts One and Four. Thus, the total term of imprisonment was six years. Wallach was also fined $250,000 on Count One and ordered to forfeit $425,000.

455 2. Rusty Kent London

London was convicted on Counts One (substantive RICO), Two (RICO conspiracy), Six (interstate transportation of checks totaling $99,999.98), Ten through Fifteen (interstate transportation of checks totaling $1.14 million and mail fraud), Seventeen (securities fraud), and Twenty (aiding and abetting false statements). He was acquitted on Counts Five (conspiracy to defraud the United States and to violate the conflict of interest law), Seven through Nine, and Sixteen. Regarding the RICO convictions, the jury found Racketeering Act Three and portions of Racketeering Act Five to have been proven but not Racketeering Act Four and portions of Act Five.

London was sentenced to concurrent terms of five years imprisonment on each of Counts One, Two, Six, Ten through Fifteen, Seventeen, and Twenty. A fine of $250,000 was imposed on Count One and London was ordered to forfeit $1,239,999.98. Judge Owen ordered that London and Chinn were jointly and severally liable for $1.14 million of the total amounts that each man had been ordered to forfeit.

3. Wayne Franklyn Chinn

Chinn was convicted on Counts One (substantive RICO), Two (RICO conspiracy), Ten through Fifteen (interstate transportation of checks totaling $1.14 million and mail fraud), Seventeen through Nineteen, and Twenty-one (false statements). He was acquitted on Counts Five through Nine and on Count Sixteen. The jury found Racketeering Act Six and parts of Act Five to have been proven but not Racketeering Acts Three, Four and portions of Act Five.

Chinn was sentenced to concurrent terms of three years imprisonment on each of Counts One, Two, Ten through Fifteen, Seventeen through Nineteen, and Twenty-one. He was fined $100,000 and ordered to forfeit $1,160,133.39. The forfeiture order was subject to the same conditions as London's forfeiture order.

DISCUSSION

The defendants collectively and individually advance numerous arguments attacking their convictions. To simplify the analysis, our discussion relates to all of the defendants unless otherwise noted.

A. The Perjury Issue

The government's primary witnesses against the defendants were Moreno and Guariglia. Both men testified pursuant to cooperation agreements with the government. Because Moreno had perjured himself in a prior proceeding, the jury was instructed to evaluate his testimony carefully. No such instruction was given relative to Guariglia's testimony. These two witnesses provided the foundation upon which the prosecution built its entire case. They offered the only testimony that directly linked the defendants with the admittedly illegal conduct of Wedtech. Indeed, their testimony was, to say the least, critical to the government.

The defendants argue that their convictions must be reversed because Guariglia perjured himself during the course of his testimony at trial. The government concedes that Guariglia committed perjury. Indeed, on June 26, 1990, Guariglia was indicted and charged with committing perjury during the course of the trial of the instant case. [FN2] Guariglia's perjury related to his testimony on direct examination that he had stopped his compulsive gambling in the summer of 1988. Specifically, Guariglia testified that he had not gambled from the summer of 1988 to the time of the trial in June 1989. He further testified that he stopped gambling at the direction of prosecutors in the Southern District of New York and because he recognized that he was "hooked" on gambling.

> FN2. At the time of oral argument the charges against Guariglia had not been resolved. We have since been notified that Guariglia was convicted on February 27, 1991, after a jury trial, of two counts of perjury committed during the course of the trial below.

On cross-examination, Guariglia admitted that he had signed gambling markers totaling $65,000 at the Tropicana, an Atlantic City casino, in September and October of 1988. Guariglia, however, continued to 456 maintain that he had not gambled on those occasions. On redirect, Guariglia offered an explanation for his drawing of the markers. Regarding the $15,000 in markers drawn on September 18, 1988, Guariglia testified that he drew the markers and cashed in the chips to pay off some previous markers which he believed he owed. He further stated that when he attempted to render payment he learned that no markers were outstanding and accordingly put the $15,000 in cash in his pocket. As to his conduct on October 26, 1988, Guariglia testified that he had signed markers and obtained chips in the amount of $50,000. He asserted, however, that he did not gamble. Instead, he stated that he gave the chips to a personal friend named Marshall Koplitz.

In response to Guariglia's testimony on redirect, the defendants proffered the testimony of John Copriviza, the assistant cage manager at the Tropicana Casino in Atlantic City. Defense counsel also disclosed to the government certain Tropicana records known as "player rating slips" which identified Guariglia as having placed bets on October 26, 1988. The government objected to the testimony of Copriviza and the introduction of the records under Fed.R.Evid. 608(b), arguing that the records and testimony were extrinsic evidence offered to impeach Guariglia's credibility and therefore subject to exclusion. The district court sustained the government's objection.

The question of Guariglia's perjury was again presented to the district court in the context of defendants' motion for a new trial. At that time the government conceded that Guariglia had committed perjury during the trial, but maintained that it learned of the perjury in December 1989, well after the completion of the trial. During the hearing of March 23, 1989, the government acknowledged that information establishing that Guariglia had gambled in Puerto Rico in November 1988 and that he had operated a stationery supply business illegally was obtained from an individual named Ira Cohen. Once the government corroborated this information, Guariglia was arrested for violating the terms of his bail, and defense counsel were notified of the perjury. [FN3]

> FN3. Assistant United States Attorney Baruch Weiss filed an "Affirmation" in response to the defendants' new trial motion which outlined the information that was learned from Mr. Cohen and the steps that the government took in response thereto.

[1] Whether the introduction of perjured testimony requires a new trial depends on the materiality of the perjury to the jury's verdict and the extent to which the prosecution was aware of the perjury. With respect to this latter inquiry, there are two discrete standards of review that are ultilized. Where the prosecution knew or should have known of the perjury, the conviction must be set aside " 'if there is any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the judgment of the jury.' " Perkins v. LeFevre, 691 F.2d 616, 619 (2d Cir.1982) (quoting United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 103, 96 S.Ct. 2392, 2397, 49 L.Ed.2d 342 (1976)); see also Sanders v. Sullivan, 863 F.2d 218, 225 (2d Cir.1988) (question is whether the jury's verdict "might" be altered); Annunziato v. Manson, 566 F.2d 410, 414 (2d Cir.1977). Indeed, if it is established that the government knowingly permitted the introduction of false testimony reversal is "virtually automatic." United States v. Stofsky, 527 F.2d 237, 243 (2d Cir.1975) (citing Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264, 269, 79 S.Ct. 1173, 1177, 3 L.Ed.2d 1217 (1959)), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 819, 97 S.Ct. 66, 50 L.Ed.2d 80 (1976). Where the government was unaware of a witness' perjury, however, a new trial is warranted only if the testimony was material and "the court [is left] with a firm belief that but for the perjured testimony, the defendant would most likely not have been convicted." Sanders, 863 F.2d at 226; see also United States v. Seijo, 514 F.2d 1357, 1364 (2d Cir.1975) (The test " 'is whether there was a significant chance that this added item, developed by skilled counsel ... could have induced a reasonable doubt in the minds of enough of the jurors to avoid a conviction.' ") (citations omitted).

Here, in an opinion and order dated April 11, 1990, the district court concluded that it 457 was unnecessary to hold an evidentiary hearing to determine whether when Guariglia testified the government knew that he was lying. The district court found that there was "neither allegation nor evidence that the prosecution had any knowledge" of Guariglia's perjury. Accordingly, the district court applied the more demanding standard adopted in Sanders and concluded that the perjurious testimony was immaterial to the guilt or innocence of the defendants and that the jury's decision would not have been different. The district judge stated:

> The testimony was not material: Guariglia's gambling and skimming did not bear on the defendants' guilt or innocence only on Guariglia's credibility. And here, these instances of falsehood would have been merely minor, cumulative additions to the massive mound of discredit heaped upon Guariglia over several days of both direct and cross-examination.

[2] Defendants submit that the government was aware of the perjury and that the district court ignored the facts on this issue. According to defendants, the prosecution should have been aware of the perjury once Guariglia was cross-examined and admitted having purchased gambling chips at an Atlantic City casino on two occasions in the fall of 1988. Instead, the prosecution sought to rehabilitate the witness on redirect, permitting Guariglia to testify that he had bought the chips but that he had not gambled, even after defense counsel disclosed to the government written records from the Tropicana Casino reflecting that Guariglia had gambled. We agree with the defendants that the government should have been aware of Guariglia's perjury.

Although the record demonstrates that the prosecution did not "sit on its hands" after becoming aware that Guariglia may have perjured himself, we are not satisfied that the government properly utilized the available information. Confronted with Guariglia's admission that he had been to the Tropicana on two occasions during the fall of 1988, the government asserts, and we do not doubt, that it questioned Guariglia extensively regarding these trips to Atlantic City. The government also contacted the individuals who purportedly were with Guariglia on those occasions and was advised that Guariglia had not gambled. Finally, the record indicates that the government made some effort to contact individuals at the Tropicana. The extent and nature of the last inquiry is unclear and the failure of the district court to conduct any inquiry on this point provides us with little assistance.

In light of Guariglia's acknowledged history of compulsive gambling, we believe that given the inconsistencies in his statements the government should have been on notice that Guariglia was perjuring himself. Yet, instead of proceeding with great caution, the government set out on its redirect examination to rehabilitate Guariglia and elicited his rather dubious explanation of what had happened. Defendants placed before the government and the court powerful evidence that Guariglia was lying. Although this information was not formally admitted into evidence, it nonetheless cast a dark shadow on the veracity of Guariglia's statements. We fear that given the importance of Guariglia's testimony to the case, the prosecutors may have consciously avoided recognizing the obvious--that is, that Guariglia was not telling the truth.

Guariglia was the centerpiece of the government's case. Had it been brought to the attention of the jury that Guariglia was lying after he had purportedly undergone a moral transformation and decided to change his ways, his entire testimony may have been rejected by the jury. It was one thing for the jury to learn that Guariglia had a history of improprieties; it would have been an entirely different matter for them to learn that after having taken an oath to speak the truth he made a conscious decision to lie. While the jury was instructed that Moreno was an acknowledged perjurer whose testimony should be weighed carefully, no such instruction was given relative to Guariglia's testimony. Accordingly, because we are convinced that the government should have known that Guariglia was committing perjury, all the convictions must be reversed.

[3] 458 Even assuming that the government had no knowledge of the perjury at the time of trial, we believe that reversal would still be warranted. The government acknowledges that it received additional information concerning the falsity of Guariglia's testimony in December 1989, months after the trial's conclusion. Specifically, the government learned that Guariglia had gambled in Puerto Rico in November 1988 and that he had been involved in another illegal scheme during the period of his cooperation with the government. This additional information in itself provides a sufficient basis for granting the defendants a new trial. We reach this conclusion cognizant that a motion for a new trial on the basis of newly discovered evidence " '[is] granted only with great caution ... in the most extraordinary circumstances.' " Sanders, 863 F.2d at 225 (quoting United States v. DiPaolo, 835 F.2d 46, 49 (2d Cir.1987)); see Stofsky, 527 F.2d at 243.

Where newly discovered evidence demonstrates that a principal government witness committed perjury, we must determine "whether the jury probably would have altered its verdict had it known of the witness' false testimony.Stofsky, 527 F.2d at 246. In Seijo, 514 F.2d at 1357, a case involving newly discovered evidence of perjured testimony, we reversed a conviction on facts strikingly similar to those now before us. WhileSeijo involved prosecutorial neglect, its reasoning and analysis is nonetheless helpful to our resolution of the instant case. SeeSeijo, 514 F.2d at 1364.

In Seijo, a cooperating witness, when asked on cross-examination whether he had ever been convicted of a drug offense, answered untruthfully that he had never been convicted of such an offense. Although the prosecution had no reason to know that the response was untruthful at the time it was given, we, nevertheless, reversed the defendant's conviction.4 In so doing, we emphasized that despite the presence of other impeaching material during the trial the disclosure of the witness' false statement would have had a tremendous impact on the jury's credibility assessment of the witness. Id.

> FN4. The proscutor is Seijo had no actual knowledge of the perjury. An FBI sheet noting the prior conviction had been sent to the prosecutor's office, but was misfiled; the prosecutor never saw it. Seijo, 514 F.2d at 1363. This mistake, while innocent, contributed to the trial error.

In the instant case, the district court found the evidence of Guariglia's perjury inconsequential because it was merely cumulative, providing one more basis for challenging Guariglia's credibility. In Seijo, we rejected this same reasoning. We noted that the witness had been subjected to direct and cross-examination and that he had admitted cooperating with the fovernment, using opium, and being addicted to and selling heroin. Despite these admissions, we concluded that his denial of a prior marijuana conviction had 'a different and more serious bearing. In this aspect, it cannot be said to constitute merely cumulative impeaching material."Id. at 1363 (emphasis added). As we emphasized: 'The taint of [the]false testimony is not erased because his untruthfulness affects only his credibility as a witness. 'The jury's estimate of the truthfulness and reliability of a given witness may well be determinative of guilt or innocence.' "Id. at 1364 (quoting Napue, 360 U.S. at 269 , 79 S.Ct. at 1177).

Subsequent to our decision in Seijo, we recognize that these same concerns merit careful attention even in situations where the government has not contributed to the error-either through neglect or intentional misconduct-in permitting a witness' perjury. Stofsky, 527 F.2d at 246. '[A] witness's credibility could very well [be]a factor of central importance to the jury, indeed every bit as important as the factual elements of the crime itself." Id. (citingSeijo, 514 F.2d at 1363-64) (other citations omitted.) Therefore, we concluded: 'Upon discovery of previous trial perjury by a government witness, the court should decide whether the jury probably would have altered its verdict if it had the opportunity to appraise the impact of the newly-discovered evidence not only upon the factual elements of the government's case but also upon the credibility of the government's case but also upon the credibility of the government's witness." Id.

Applying that analysis here, we conclude as a matter of law that had the jury been aware of Guariglia's perjury it probably would have acquitted the defendants. Guariglia's false testimony regarding his gambling directly calls into question the veracity of the rest of his statements. Guariglia's testimony was essential to the government's case; indeed, he tied all the pieces together. And, as we have emphasized, he was the only witness who the jury was led to believe had undergone a radical moral transformation. Moreover, the 459 government through its redirect and in its closing argument made much of Guariglia's motive for telling the truth. One of the prosecutors stated in closing:

> The government submits to you that Mr. Moreno and Mr. Guariglia are credible witnesses and you should credit their testimony for a number of reasons. First of all, they have confessed to their crimes, they have admitted their crimes, and they have pleaded guilty to serious felony counts. They entered into cooperation agreements with the government and those agreements are in evidence....
> You heard the terms of those agreements when they testified. If they perjured themselves, if they give false testimony in this trial, then the deal is off. They can be prosecuted for every crime they committed and everything they have said in interviews with the U.S. Attorney's office and every trial they have testified in their testimony can be used against them. That I submit gives them a powerful motive to tell the truth when they testified at this trial.

(emphasis added). While vouching for a witness' credibility alone is not ordinarily a basis for reversal, these comments provide one more reason to set aside the jury's verdict. In sum, we reverse the convictions because after reviewing the record we are left "with a firm belief that but for the perjured testimony, the defendant[s] would most likely not have been convicted." Sanders, 863 F.2d at 226 (applying the Stofsky probability standard).

Defendants advance numerous other challenges to their convictions. Although our decision on the perjury issue is itself a sufficient basis for disposing of these appeals, the likelihood of a new trial suggests that we should also address some of the other arguments urged by the defendants. We limit our analysis to those issues that directly challenge the validity of the indictment or the legal viability of the government's theory underlying any of the charges.

B. The Indictments and the U.S. Attorney's Bias

The defendants challenge the authority and motives of the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York. Specifically, they offer two reasons in support of their contention that the indictment in this case was improperly obtained.

First, they assert that the Independent Counsel (IC) appointed to investigate former Attorney General Edwin Meese had exclusive prosecutorial jurisdiction over the conduct that is charged in the underlying indictment. Second, defendants contend that the prosecutors were inherently biased because they wanted either to protect or to attack Meese. We find these claims to lack merit.

1. The Independent Counsel

[4] Defendants argue that once the IC was appointed to investigate the conduct of then-Attorney General Meese, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York was divested of jurisdiction over any matter that related to Meese without first obtaining written authorization from the IC pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 597(a). Section 597(a) gives the IC exclusive prosecutorial jurisdiction over matters referred to him unless he otherwise agrees in writing.

On February 2, 1987, Independent Counsel James McKay was appointed pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 593(b) to conduct an investigation of Franklyn Nofzinger and his relationship with Wedtech. On May 11, 1987, Deputy Attorney General Burns sent a letter to McKay requesting that he accept the referral of an investigation of Attorney General Meese. McKay accepted the referral and both the Department of Justice and McKay petitioned the Independent Counsel Court (ICC) for an order further defining McKay's responsibilities. On August 18, 1987, the ICC issued its order. It provided:

> Independent Counsel James C. McKay shall have jurisdiction to investigate ... whether ... any ... provision of the federal criminal law, was violated by Mr. Meese's relationship or dealings at any time from 1981 to the present with any of the following: Welbilt Electronics Die Corporation/ Wedtech Corporation ...; Franklin C. Nofzinger; E. Robert Wallach; W. Franklyn Chinn; and/or Financial Management International, Inc.

(emphasis added). Defendants read this order and the Burns referral letter as having vested the IC with exclusive jurisdiction over their relationships with Wedtech. Thus, they argue when prosecutors from the Southern District of New York appeared before the Grand Jury on May 28 and 29, 1987, they did so without jurisdiction. Defendants stress that it was not until December 21, 1987, that the IC formally referred, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 597(a), the authority to indict to the Southern District.

460 Defendants' interpretation of the ICC's order directing the investigation of Meese fails to appreciate the order's plain language. It was only Meese's conduct that Independent Counsel McKay was charged with responsibility to investigate. By its terms, the order did not preclude other investigations of Wedtech, Wallach or Chinn. The government did not need the IC's authorization to seek an indictment in the Southern District of New York. The decision to approach the IC only indicates that the prosecutors did not want to disrupt or to infringe on any aspect of the IC's ongoing investigation of Meese. The Southern District prosecutors' prudence is not a basis for concluding that they lacked the requisite authority to act.

2. Prosecutorial Bias and Conflict of Interest

[5] Defendants further argue that every Department of Justice (DOJ) prosecutor was inherently biased in some way due to the alleged involvement of the DOJ's top official, then-Attorney General Meese. Thus, the defendants submit, the U.S. Attorneys in the Southern District of New York were not "disinterested prosecutors" as required by the Due Process Clause. These sweeping arguments are completely lacking in merit. The only case law that defendants rely on to support their position involves individual prosecutors who were discovered to have had an actual interest in the outcome of a case. Additionally, the argument that every DOJ employee was somehow tainted because of the alleged involvement of Meese is incredible and simply the product of speculation. Defendants point to nothing that demonstrates the existence of any bias or prejudice. Finally, even assuming the existence of some bias, defendants have in no way established that they were prejudiced by any conflict of interest. See Wright v. United States, 732 F.2d 1048, 1056 n. 8 (2d Cir.1984) (extent of prejudice that must be shown depends on what stage proceedings have reached), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1106, 105 S.Ct. 779, 83 L.Ed.2d 774 (1985).

C. The Mail Fraud Charges

1. Counts Twelve Through Fifteen

Counts Twelve through Fifteen charged London and Chinn with mail fraud in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1341. Each of these counts also included a charge of aiding and abetting in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2. The charges in Counts Twelve through Fifteen related to certain mailings made by London in furtherance of his purported scheme with Chinn to obtain $1.14 million from Wedtech. London and Chinn submit that these charges are legally insufficient because the government only alleges a fraudulent taking of intangible rights--interests that do not rise to the level of "property" within the meaning of the mail fraud statute.

The government's theory was that London and Chinn used the mails to further a scheme designed to funnel Wedtech funds to Chinn through his entity FMI, to pay a $100,000 kickback to Guariglia, and to pass a twenty percent share of the $1 million to Wallach. The alleged scheme began when Moreno and Guariglia agreed to pay London and Chinn $1 million for their services in connection with Wedtech's secondary public offering. Guariglia, in a side deal, was to receive a $100,000 kickback. The $1 million was to be paid from Wedtech to London's corporation, IFCI. London would then make a payment to Chinn's entity, FMI. The payment was structured in this fashion because Chinn was a director of Wedtech at the time; if he had received the payment directly, it would have to have been reported on SEC disclosures. After the offering was completed, Guariglia authorized an additional disbursement to London of $140,000 for expenses. Thus, the total sum involved was $1.14 million.

London sent an invoice to Wedtech attributing the $1.14 million fee to services rendered in connection with Wedtech's secondary public offering. The prospectus for the secondary public offering was mailed to Wedtech shareholders and failed to disclose that Chinn, a Wedtech director, was receiving part of the $1.14 million payment. Later, when the payments were discovered, London sent letters to Wedtech's outside 461 counsel which mischaracterized the purpose of the payments and the true recipients.

[6][7][8] The federal mail fraud statute prohibits an individual from "devis [ing] or intending to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud, or for obtaining money or property by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises." 18 U.S.C. § 1341. The essential elements of a mail fraud violation are (1) a scheme to defraud, (2) money or property, and (3) use of the mails to further the scheme. See McNally v. United States, 483 U.S. 350, 356, 107 S.Ct. 2875, 2879, 97 L.Ed.2d 292 (1987); United States v. Pisani, 773 F.2d 397, 409 (2d Cir.1985). To establish the existence of a scheme to defraud, the government must present proof that the defendants possessed a fraudulent intent. United States v. Schwartz, 924 F.2d 410, 420 (2d Cir.1991); United States v. Starr, 816 F.2d 94, 98 (2d Cir.1987). And although money or property must be the object of the scheme, McNally, 483 U.S. at 358-59, 107 S.Ct. at 2880-81, the government is not required to show that the intended victim was actually defrauded. The government need only show that the defendants contemplated some actual harm or injury. Starr, 816 F.2d at 98; United States v. Regent Office Supply Co., 421 F.2d 1174, 1180 (2d Cir.1970).

[9] London and Chinn submit that Wedtech received services in return for the payments and that, therefore, the shareholders were not defrauded of any property. As we explain below in connection with our discussion of the charges under the National Stolen Property Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2314, providing alternative services does not defeat a fraud charge because the fact remains that the corporation and its shareholders did not receive the services that they believed were being provided. In addition, the defendants contend that the only property alleged to have been taken was the shareholders' intangible "right to control" how Wedtech's money was spent. They argue that the Supreme Court's holding in McNally, 483 U.S. 350, 107 S.Ct. 2875, precludes a mail fraud charge based on the alleged taking of such intangible property rights. We disagree.

In McNally, the Supreme Court reversed a mail fraud conviction that was predicated on the charge that the defendant had defrauded the citizens of a state of their intangible right to "honest and impartial government." Id. at 355, 107 S.Ct. at 2879, but see 18 U.S.C.A. § 1346 (legislatively overruling McNally). London and Chinn maintain that Wedtech and its shareholders, like the citizens in McNally, were not deprived of any tangible property rights and, therefore, prosecution under the mail fraud statute is impermissible. Defendants misread the Supreme Court's opinion in McNally.

Furthermore, defendants' definition of "property" is too narrowly drawn.

In Carpenter v. United States, 484 U.S. 19, 108 S.Ct. 316, 98 L.Ed.2d 275 (1987), the Supreme Court clarified its decision in McNally. The Court declared: "McNally did not limit the scope of § 1341 to tangible as distinguished from intangible property rights." Id. 484 U.S. at 25, 108 S.Ct. at 320. Indeed, the Court recognized that its holding was quite specific: "We held in McNally that the mail fraud statute does not reach 'schemes to defraud citizens of their intangible rights to honest and impartial government,' and that the statute 'is limited in scope to the protection of property rights.' " Id. (citations omitted). In upholding a mail fraud conviction, the Carpenter Court recognized that the Wall Street Journal 's confidential business information--an intangible interest--constituted property within the statute's purview. Id. Thus, the central focus of our inquiry is whether under the government's theory any property right was taken or placed at risk of loss as a result of the defendants' alleged scheme; if no property right was involved, the mail fraud charges cannot survive.

The indictment charged that the victims of the alleged "scheme and artifice" were Wedtech and its shareholders who were defrauded of the $1.14 million in payments as well as the "right to control" how the money was spent. In addition, those who 462 purchased Wedtech stock as part of the secondary offering were alleged to be victims. London and Chinn maintain that these alleged victims were not deprived of any property right. The corporation and shareholders, according to London and Chinn, were in fact benefitted as a result of their efforts to enhance the value of the corporation's stock. Moreover, they claim that it is only the directors and officers of a corporation who are charged with the responsibility for managing the entity and that, therefore, the shareholders could not have been deprived of any property interest because they possess no "right to control" how corporate funds are spent.

[10][11] At the outset, we recognize that a corporation can only act through its agents--officers and directors. It is the directors who are charged with the responsibility for managing the affairs of a corporation. Diamond v. Oreamuno, 29 A.D.2d 285, 287, 287 N.Y.S.2d 300, 302 (1st Dep't 1968), aff'd, 24 N.Y.2d 494, 301 N.Y.S.2d 78, 248 N.E.2d 910 (1969). Generally, the role of shareholders in governing the conduct of the corporation is minimal and limited to fundamental decisions such as the election of directors or the approval of extraordinary matters like mergers, a sale of substantially all corporate assets, dissolutions and amendments of the articles of incorporation or the corporate bylaws. See R. Clark, Corporate Law § 3.1.1, at 94 (1986); see also N.Y.Bus.Corp.L. §§ 703, 903, 909 (McKinney 1991); 1 Fletcher Cyclopedia of the Law of Private Corporations § 30, at 553 (Perm. ed. 1990) (hereinafter "Fletcher "). Thus, the shareholders have no legal right to control the day-to-day affairs of a corporation. Moreover, shareholders do not hold legal title to any of the corporation's assets. Instead, the corporation--the entity itself--is vested with the title. 5A Fletcher § 2213, at 323. " '[T]he corporation in respect of corporate property and rights is entirely distinct from the stockholders who are the ultimate or equitable owners of its assets.' " 5303 Realty Corp. v. O & Y Equity Corp., 64 N.Y.2d 313, 323, 486 N.Y.S.2d 877, 884, 476 N.E.2d 276, 283 (1984) (quoting Brock v. Poor, 216 N.Y. 387, 401, 111 N.E. 229, 234 (1915)).

[12] While shareholders have neither a right to manage the corporation nor a right to hold title to corporate property, their ownership of stock in the corporation is nonetheless a property interest. Although the stock certificates may be the only physical (tangible) manifestation of this property, the ownership interest that the certificates represent plainly is "property." "[S]hares of stock are property, but they are intangible and incorporeal property existing only in abstract legal contemplation." 11 Fletcher § 5097, at 92. There are, however, other incidents accompanying the property interest that a stockholder owns.

The government asserts that the actions taken by the defendants denied the shareholders the "right to control" how corporate assets were spent--an intangible property interest. The "right to control" has been recognized as a property interest that is protected by the mail fraud statute. See, e.g., United States v. Biaggi, 909 F.2d 662, 687 (2d Cir.1990) (Defense Department's right to control contract awards protected by mail fraud statute), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 1102, 113

L.Ed.2d 213 (1991); United States v. Shyres, 898 F.2d 647, 652 (8th Cir.) (corporation deprived of right to control spending when officers awarded contracts to outside contractor and received a kickback), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 69, 112 L.Ed.2d 43 (1990); United States v. Kerkman, 866 F.2d 877, 880 (6th Cir.) (same), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 110 S.Ct. 95, 107 L.Ed.2d 59 (1989); see also McNally, 483 U.S. at 360, 107 S.Ct. at 2881 (suggesting that conviction may have been affirmed if jury had been "charged that to convict it must find that the Commonwealth [of Kentucky] was deprived of control over how its money was spent"). Despite the recurrent references to a "right to control," we think that use of that terminology can be somewhat misleading and confusing. Examination of the case law exploring the "right to control" reveals that application of the theory is predicated on a showing that some 463 person or entity has been deprived of potentially valuable economic information. See United States v. Little, 889 F.2d 1367, 1368 (5th Cir.1989) (concealment of economically material information can constitute mail fraud), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 110 S.Ct. 2176, 109 L.Ed.2d 505 (1990). Thus, the withholding or inaccurate reporting of information that could impact on economic decisions can provide the basis for a mail fraud prosecution.

A stockholder's right to monitor and to police the behavior of the corporation and its officers is a property interest. This incident of stock ownership represents one way that a shareholder can protect the value of his or her investment. The maintenance of accurate books and records is of central importance to the preservation of this property interest. "The stockholders' right of inspection of the corporation's books and records rests upon the underlying ownership by them of the corporation's assets and property" and is an incident of "ownership of the corporate property." 5A Fletcher § 2213, at 323. Indeed, given the important role that information plays in the valuation of a corporation, the right to complete and accurate information is one of the most essential sticks in the bundle of rights that comprise a stockholder's property interest.

The importance of this right to information is recognized by the statutes and rules that govern the operation of a publicly held corporation. Indeed, the officers of a publicly held corporation are legally obligated to keep and to maintain books and records which "accurately and fairly reflect the transactions and dispositions of the assets" of the corporation. 15 U.S.C. § 78m(b)(2)(A); 17 C.F.R. § 240.1362-1; cf. United States v. Siegel, 717 F.2d 9, 14 (2d Cir.1983) (mail fraud violation when "a fiduciary fails to disclose material information 'which he is under a duty to disclose to another under circumstances where the non-disclosure could or does result in harm to the other' ") (citations omitted). The provision of complete information protects a shareholder's investment--a clear property interest. In the event that a stockholder disagrees with a corporation's actions, steps can be taken to prevent such further activity or the shares can be sold. When intentionally deprived of accurate information regarding how corporate assets are being spent, a shareholder's investment is placed at great risk. If corporate officers and directors, and those acting in concert with them, were free to conceal the true nature of corporate transactions, it is conceivable that the assets of the corporation could be so dissipated as to render a shareholder's investment valueless.

London and Chinn also submit that Wedtech and its shareholders received valuable services in return for the payments that were made, and therefore, the shareholders were not defrauded. The provision of alternative services does not defeat a mail fraud prosecution. As Judge Learned Hand eloquently explained many years ago in response to a similar argument:

> Civilly of course the action would fail without proof of damage, but that has no application to criminal liability. A man is none the less cheated out of his property, when he is induced to part with it by fraud, because he gets a quid pro quo of equal value. It may be impossible to measure his loss by the gross scales available to a court, but he has suffered a wrong; he has lost his chance to bargain with the facts before him. That is the evil against which the [mail fraud] statute is directed.

United States v. Rowe, 56 F.2d 747, 749 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 286 U.S. 554, 52 S.Ct. 579, 76 L.Ed. 1289 (1932).

[13] Where, as here, it is alleged that London and Chinn, in concert with Wedtech insiders, set up a scheme to conceal the true nature of their dealings and the ultimate recipients of the payments, we conclude that a mail fraud charge can be sustained. By using the mails to submit false invoices and other inaccurate information, these defendants intentionally sought to misrepresent the nature of the transactions in which they were involved. These misrepresentations permitted the officers to pay out large sums from the corporation to undisclosed individuals for what were purportedly improper purposes, while maintaining 464 the facade that these payments were in furtherance of legitimate corporate goals. By concealing this information, the value of Wedtech stock was obscured and the shareholders and the corporation were deprived of the opportunity to make informed decisions.

[14] Finally, we cannot accept defendants' argument that the directors and officers of the corporation have the authority to act on behalf of the shareholders and the corporation and that therefore a criminal fraud cannot be perpetrated when all the officers are participants in the scheme. Defendants would have us endorse a theory of criminal law that would effectively grant corporate officials and third-parties working in concert with them a license to loot the corporate treasury as long as they were all in on the scheme. We decline to do so. Such a theory completely fails to recognize and to protect the property interests of the shareholders and the corporation. As we have stated on a prior occasion, once a property right is found to exist, section 1341's language " ' "any scheme or artifice to defraud" is to be interpreted broadly.' " United States v. Evans, 844 F.2d 36, 40 (2d Cir.1988) (quoting McNally, 483 U.S. at 356, 107 S.Ct. at 2879); see also Durland v. United States, 161 U.S. 306, 313-14, 16 S.Ct. 508, 40 L.Ed. 709 (1896). As one member of our Court has noted in a different context, "[t]he issuance of checks falsely prepared to reflect the performance of non-existent services is a fraud on someone, ultimately the shareholders, who are deprived of an opportunity to know how corporate funds are being spent." United States v. Weiss, 752 F.2d 777, 794 (2d Cir.) (Newman, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 944, 106 S.Ct. 308, 88 L.Ed.2d 285 (1985). We accordingly conclude that the government advanced a viable theory of fraud under the mail fraud statute.

2. Count Eighteen

Count Eighteen charged Chinn individually with committing mail fraud in connection with his submission of credit card receipts for reimbursement. According to the government, Chinn had a side deal, which was approved by Guariglia and one other Wedtech official, whereby Chinn was permitted to spend up to $100,000 annually for personal expenses on his Wedtech corporate credit cards. During the thirteen month period from September 1985 through November 1986, Chinn utilized his Wedtech credit cards for his personal benefit by purchasing approximately $23,000 in goods and services. The indictment charged that the mail fraud occurred when Diners Club and American Express mailed monthly account statements to Wedtech for payment. Chinn attacks these charges on two grounds: (1) the mailings were made by the credit card companies not by Chinn, and (2) he reiterates the argument that no "property" protected by the mail fraud statute was taken. We do not find either argument to be persuasive.

In support of his first argument, Chinn argues that the Supreme Court's holdings in Parr v. United States, 363 U.S. 370, 80 S.Ct. 1171, 4 L.Ed.2d 1277 (1960), and United States v. Maze, 414 U.S. 395, 94 S.Ct. 645, 38 L.Ed.2d 603 (1974), demonstrate that such allegations cannot support a mail fraud charge. In Parr, the Court held that two employees who used their school district credit cards to obtain gasoline and other services for their personal use could not be prosecuted for mail fraud simply because the oil companies involved ultimately submitted the bills to the school district for payment. The Court reasoned that the mailings were not in furtherance of the scheme because the perpetrators had already gotten what they wanted. 363 U.S. at 392-93, 80 S.Ct. at 1184. Similarly, in Maze, the individual charged had stolen his roommate's credit card and proceeded to embark on a traveling spree. The Maze Court concluded that the subsequent mailing of the credit card billings could not provide a basis for conviction under the mail fraud statute because the success of the defendant's scheme in no way depended on the mailings. Indeed, as the Court noted, the mailings actually increased the probability that the defendant would be detected. 414 U.S. at 402-03, 94 S.Ct. at 649-50.

465 Despite the superficial similarity among the cases, we find the instant case distinguishable from Parr and Maze. Here, the government's theory was that Chinn had entered into an agreement with Guariglia and other Wedtech insiders, wherein Chinn's compensation would be increased by as much as $100,000 per year. The fundamental question is whether the mailings were "incident to an essential part of the scheme." Parr, 363 U.S. at 390, 80 S.Ct. at 1183 (quoting Pereira v. United States, 347 U.S. 1, 8, 74 S.Ct. 358, 362, 98 L.Ed. 435 (1954)). Discussing the proper focus of such mail fraud challenges, the Supreme Court recently declared:

> We also reject [the] contention that mailings that someday may contribute to the uncovering of a fraudulent scheme cannot supply the mailing element of the mail fraud offense. The relevant question at all times is whether the mailing is part of the execution of the scheme as conceived by the perpetrator at the time, regardless of whether the mailing later, through hindsight, may prove to have been counterproductive and return to haunt the perpetrator of the fraud.... Those who use the mails to defraud proceed at their peril.

Schmuck v. United States, 489 U.S. 705, 715, 109 S.Ct. 1443, 1449-50, 103 L.Ed.2d 734 (1989) (emphasis added).

[15] We conclude that under the government's theory the credit card billings were central to the scheme and essential to its continued success. This was not to be a "one shot" proposition. See id. at 711, 109 S.Ct. at 1448. Rather, the intention of the scheme was to enhance Chinn's compensation by paying him periodically for personal expenses that he incurred. Such payments were to be made under the guise of reimbursements for business related expenses. Therefore, unlike the situations in Parr and Maze, the credit card billings not only were anticipated by Chinn, but also were essential to the success of the scheme. In Parr and Maze, the alleged perpetrators had no intention of continuing to communicate with the victims of their fraud. Here, however, the government's theory is that Chinn had expressly agreed with Guariglia that an additional $100,000 in compensation would be forthcoming through payments that would be disguised as reimbursements for business related expenses. Absent the regular credit card company mailings, Wedtech could not have treated these payments as reimbursements for business expenses and Chinn's ability to continue to receive the payments would have come to an end. It thus cannot be said that " '[t]he scheme ... had reached [its] fruition' " once Chinn received the goods and services which he charged on the Wedtech accounts. Parr, 363 U.S. at 393, 80 S.Ct. at 1184 (quoting Kann v. United States, 323 U.S. 88, 94, 65 S.Ct. 148, 150, 89 L.Ed. 88 (1944)). The government's theory underlying Count Eighteen is legally sufficient.

[16] Likewise, Chinn's second argument that no "property" was taken lacks merit. As we previously explained, the intentional submission of inaccurate or incomplete billing invoices can provide the basis for a mail fraud prosecution. That reasoning is equally applicable here. Moreover, Chinn was a director of Wedtech at the time of these alleged improper payments. As such he owed a fiduciary duty to the corporation and its shareholders to disclose fully the true purpose of the payments he received. See Siegel, 717 F.2d at 14 (fiduciary's failure to disclose material information can provide basis for mail fraud violation). Instead, Chinn, with Guariglia's cooperation, concealed the payments by masking them as business expenses, thereby perpetrating a fraud on Wedtech and its shareholders.

D. The National Stolen Property Act Charges

London, Wallach and Chinn were each charged with violating the National Stolen Property Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2314 (the Act) and with aiding and abetting violations of the Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2. Section 2314 prohibits the interstate transportation of "any goods, wares, merchandise, securities or money" valued at $5,000 or more by individuals who knew the property to have been "stolen, converted, or taken by fraud." 18 U.S.C. § 2314. Counts Three 466 and Four charged Wallach with violating the Act by transporting across state lines two checks in the amounts of $125,000 and $300,000, respectively. Count Six charged all three defendants with violating the Act by transporting a series of checks totaling $99,999.98 across state lines. Both Wallach and Chinn were acquitted of the charges in Count Six. Counts Ten and Eleven charged London and Chinn with violating the Act by transporting two checks totaling $1.14 million across state lines.

In relation to all these charges, the government's theory was that through misrepresentation and deception London, Wallach and Chinn defrauded Wedtech and its shareholders. The product of this fraud was the receipt of Wedtech property, namely, the face value of the checks. Specifically, the government alleged that the false invoice and the false letter submitted by Wallach, in connection with his receipt of the checks for $125,000 and $300,000, amounted to a "fraud" on Wedtech and its shareholders. Similarly, it was alleged that London and Chinn fraudulently obtained corporate funds by providing false and misleading information. These activities, the government charged, coupled with subsequent interstate transportation of the relevant checks, resulted in violations of the Act.

Defendants challenge the viability of these charges. Their arguments parallel, in large part, those advanced in connection with the mail fraud charges. We conclude, as we did with respect to the mail fraud charges, that the National Stolen Property Act charges are legally sufficient.

[17][18][19] To obtain a conviction under the National Stolen Property Act, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt the following elements: (1) the defendant transported property, as defined by the statute, in interstate commerce, (2) the property was worth $5,000 or more, and (3) the defendant knew the property was "stolen, converted or taken by fraud." Dowling v. United States, 473 U.S. 207, 214, 105 S.Ct. 3127, 3131, 87 L.Ed.2d 152 (1985); see United States v. Vontsteen, 872 F.2d 626, 630 (5th Cir.1989); United States v. Stack, 853 F.2d 436, 438-39 (6th Cir.1988). The government charged that the defendants transported the Wedtech checks in interstate commerce knowing them to have been procured by fraud. While the definition of fraud is generally the same under the mail fraud statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1341, and under the Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2314, see, e.g., United States v. Kibby, 848 F.2d 920, 922-23 (8th Cir.1988), there are two significant differences between the offenses. First, to establish a violation of section 2314 the government must prove that the defendant was actually successful in defrauding his intended victim of property in excess of $5,000--actual pecuniary harm must be shown. United States v. Lennon, 751 F.2d 737, 744 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1100, 105 S.Ct. 2324, 85 L.Ed.2d 842 (1985). In contrast, to obtain a conviction under section 1341, the government need only prove an intent to defraud; actual success of the scheme to defraud is not an essential element of the crime. See United States v. Gelb, 881 F.2d 1155, 1162-63 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 110 S.Ct. 544, 107 L.Ed.2d 541 (1989). Second, to obtain a conviction under section 2314 the government need not prove that the defendant actually participated in the scheme to defraud someone of property; proof that the defendant knew the property to have been stolen or procured by fraud is sufficient. Stack, 853 F.2d at 439.

Defendants maintain, as they did with respect to the mail fraud charges, that no fraud was committed because each of them provided valuable services to Wedtech even if these services were not accurately disclosed at the time payment was sought. We find little merit in this argument. The mere fact that the defendants may have performed some other services than those specified in their invoices and letters is irrelevant to the issue whether a fraud was perpetrated; the corporation and its shareholders did not receive the services stipulated in the documentation provided by the defendants. By providing misleading information, the defendants concealed essential facts from the corporation and its shareholders, facts which if disclosed might 467 have led to the relevant payments being recouped and any similar future payments being halted. See Starr, 816 F.2d at 98; Regent Office Supply, 421 F.2d at 1182.

Relying on Dowling, 473 U.S. 207, 105 S.Ct. 3127, the defendants also argue that the charges for violating section 2314 are legally insufficient because no physical property crossed state lines. In Dowling, the Supreme Court reviewed a section 2314 conviction which was based on the interstate transportation of bootleg phonograph records which had been manufactured and distributed without the consent of those who owned the copyrights to the musical compositions performed on the records. The Court reasoned that the phonograph records themselves had not been stolen or procured by fraud, only the songs performed on the records were being improperly used. In reversing the convictions, the Court held that the statute does not apply to wholly intangible property interests such as those possessed by a copyright holder. Id. at 216-17, 105 S.Ct. at 3133 ("[T]he provision seems clearly to contemplate a physical identity between the items unlawfully obtained and those eventually transported."). The Court concluded that a copyright, like other forms of intellectual property, lacks the physical characteristic that the statute contemplates. Id. at 217-18, 105 S.Ct. at 3133.

In reaching this conclusion, the Court placed emphasis on the special nature of federal copyright law. Id. at 217, 105 S.Ct. at 3133. Specifically, a copyright holder does not enjoy complete and inviolable control over the use of his or her work. Id. The Copyright Act comtemplates, in limited circumstances, that others can make use of copyrighted information without obtaining the holder's permission. Id. Because federal law permits such intrusions, the Court reasoned: "[T]he property rights of a copyright holder have a character distinct from the possessory interest of the owner of simple 'goods, wares, [or] merchandise,' for the copyright holder's dominion is subjected to precisely defined limits." Id. Given the distinct nature of copyrights, the Court noted that interference with a copyright "does not easily equate with theft, conversion, or fraud." Id.

The Dowling Court found additional support for its decision when it examined the history of the Act. The Court determined that section 2314 originally was adopted to criminalize conduct which absent its interstate characteristic would ordinarily have been left to the states to regulate. Because Congress had exclusive power over the area of copyrights, whether or not interstate commerce was involved, the Court stated that it would be "implausible to suppose that Congress intended to combat the problem of copyright infringement" when it passed section 2314. Id. at 220-21, 105 S.Ct. at 3135. The Court, therefore, held that section 2314 could not provide the basis for a prosecution stemming from the interstate transportation of copyrighted material.

The defendants argue that the reasoning of Dowling is directly applicable because the only property alleged to have been transported with knowledge that it was procured by fraud was the shareholders' "right to control" and their related interest in not having the earnings of the company artificially inflated. The defendants contend that these property interests, like the copyrights in Dowling, are entirely incorporeal and cannot provide the basis for a section 2314 conviction. We, however, do not find Dowling to be controlling.

In contrast to the situation in Dowling, the defendants herein were charged simply with transporting checks across state lines knowing them to have been procured through fraud. Each check at issue had a value that exceeded $5,000. The checks, unlike the copyrights in Dowling, without a doubt constitute physical property within the meaning of the statute. Moreover, the defendants' acquisition and transportation of that property wholly deprived Wedtech of the use and benefit of those funds; such a complete deprivation does not occur in the context of a copyright infringement. Finally, neither state nor federal law permits the assets of a corporation to be dissipated by corporate officials and those acting in concert with them for undisclosed 468 purposes. As we made clear in our discussion of the mail fraud charges, the intentional provision of false and inaccurate financial information can constitute a fraud. A direct product of this fraud, under the government's theory, was the checks that were issued in payment for the services noted in the various invoices and letters submitted by the defendants. We are convinced that such allegations state a viable charge under the National Stolen Property Act.

[20] Furthermore, we reiterate that the participation of Wedtech officers in this alleged scheme does not rule out the existence of fraud. Defendants contend that because the officers and directors of Wedtech were aware of everything that had transpired and willingly disbursed the relevant funds there can be no violation of the statute. In short, they assert that one cannot acquire by fraud what one has been voluntarily given. As this Circuit has recognized: "Because the concept of 'stolen' property requires an interference with the property rights of its owner, property that has been transported, ... or otherwise disposed of, with the consent of the owner cannot be considered 'stolen' within the meaning of §§ 2312-2315." United States v. Bennett, 665 F.2d 16, 22 (2d Cir.1981).

The linchpin of the defendants' argument is that shareholders possess no right to control the day-to-day operations of a corporation and no possessory interest in corporate property. Notwithstanding the truth of these premises, shareholders do have a right to receive accurate and complete information and they are the beneficial owners of corporate assets. As we discussed in connection with the mail fraud charges, when false information is intentionally provided to the corporation, a fraud on the corporation and its shareholders is committed. Any monies dispersed to satisfy these false invoices, in our opinion, also have been procured by fraud.

In this regard, we find the Sixth Circuit's reasoning in United States v. Gullett, 713 F.2d 1203 (6th Cir.1983), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 1069, 104 S.Ct. 973, 79 L.Ed.2d 211 (1984), to be persuasive. In Gullett, two partners in an accounting firm engaged in a scheme in which clients of the firm wrote checks to the firm for services that were never performed. In turn, the clients took a tax deduction and ultimately shared in the proceeds of the checks. The defendants, the accounting firm partners, attacked their section 2314 convictions asserting that the officers of the allegedly defrauded corporations had used their "agency powers to write checks for the purpose of generating cash to benefit the corporations." Id. at 1210. The Sixth Circuit rejected this argument stating: "This explanation ... ignores the parade of phony invoices and fictitious payees which were created in order to deceive uninvolved corporate officers and shareholders." Id. The Gullett Court further explained:

> Although corporate officers with broad agency powers authorized and participated in the scheme, the officers necessarily made false entries on the books of their corporations in order to secure the corporate payments. These false entries deliberately misrepresented the nature of the transactions to the corporation as an entity and hence to its owners, the shareholders, and its directors. In reliance on these false statements, the corporation made the payments. The defendants knew the invoices and documents were false and that the corporations would rely on them to make payments. Thus the basic elements of fraud--misrepresentation and detrimental reliance--are present.

Id. at 1211.

The defendants contend that Gullett is inapposite and should not be relied on because there not all the officers of the corporations involved were a party to the scheme. Here, they argue that the government does not contend that any Wedtech officers or directors were not aware of what was happening. We think that this argument completely misses the mark. Officers and directors owe a duty to the corporation and its shareholders. If all the officers and directors become a party to a scheme to use corporate assets improperly, the resulting injury to the entity and its owners--the 469 shareholders--is no less than when only some of the officers are involved. Officers and directors do not have a license to plunder corporate treasuries acting individually or collectively. The defendants, according to the government, were completely aware that Wedtech's officers were requesting false invoices so as to mislead the corporation and its shareholders regarding the true purposes for the payments. In this respect, the defendants were knowing parties to this concealment, and their submission of the requested documentation made the scheme possible. As we once stated in a mail fraud prosecution, "regardless of the fact that higher officials directed the wrongful acts, the harm was no less injurious to the corporation." Weiss, 752 F.2d at 785.

The defendants advance one other argument to attack the validity of the section 2314 charges. They maintain that the Act does not unambiguously apply to the specific conduct charged in the indictment and therefore these charges should not be permitted to stand. They urge application of the "rule of lenity," which requires that "ambiguity concerning the ambit of criminal statutes should be resolved in favor of lenity." Rewis v. United States, 401 U.S. 808, 812, 91 S.Ct. 1056, 1059, 28 L.Ed.2d 493 (1971). The rule recognizes that legislatures and not the courts should define criminal liability. Liparota v. United States, 471 U.S. 419, 427, 105 S.Ct. 2084, 2089, 85 L.Ed.2d 434 (1985). "Application of the rule of lenity ensures that criminal statutes will provide fair warning concerning conduct rendered illegal and strikes the appropriate balance between the legislature, the prosecutor, and the court in defining criminal liability." Id. We conclude that application of the rule of lenity is unwarranted in this case.

[21] Application of the rule of lenity is warranted only where the statute's language or intended purpose is unclear. Quite recently the Supreme Court, in rejecting a similar challenge to another aspect of section 2314 stated: "This Court has never required that every permissible application of a statute be expressly referred to in its legislative history." Moskal v. United States, --- U.S. ----, ---- , 111 S.Ct. 461, 467, 112 L.Ed.2d 449 (1990). The Court further noted that in adopting section 2314 "Congress' general purpose [was] to combat interstate fraud," and emphasized that the statute should be broadly construed. Id. 111 S.Ct. at 468. In view of the government's theory with respect to the section 2314 charges, we fail to see the merit in defendants' argument. Defendants are alleged to have knowingly participated in a scheme which resulted in monies being disbursed from Wedtech ostensibly for services that, in fact, had not been performed or for the benefit of individuals whose identity was concealed. Any property derived from such conduct and then transported across state lines plainly falls within the purview of section 2314. Accordingly, we conclude that the theory advanced by the government is sufficient to support the section 2314 charges and that the rule of lenity does not apply.

E. Count Five: The Conspiracy Charge

Count Five of the indictment charged Wallach with conspiracy, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371. The government charged that the conspiracy had two objects: (1) to defraud the citizens of the United States of their right to Wallach's honest and faithful services, and (2) to violate 18 U.S.C. § 203, which prohibits the receipt of or the agreement to receive any compensation for services to be rendered at a time when the intended recipient is an officer of the United States. Wallach attacks the legal sufficiency of these charges. Because of our decision to reverse all the convictions, we do not address Wallach's evidentiary challenges. We limit our discussion to Wallach's legal argument that only those individuals who actually become federal officials can be charged with conspiring to violate Section 203.

Section 203(a)(2) is aimed at preventing the corruption of public officials. During the relevant time period, the statute provided in pertinent part:

> (a) Whoever, otherwise than as provided by law for the proper discharge of 470 official duties, directly or indirectly receives or agrees to receive, or asks, demands, solicits, or seeks, any compensation for any services rendered or to be rendered either by himself or another--
>
> ....
>
> (2) at a time when he is an officer or employee of the United States in the executive, legislative, or judicial branch of the Government, or in any agency of the United States ...
>
> in relation to any proceeding, application, request for a ruling or other determination, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other particular matter in which the United States is a party or has a direct and substantial interest, before any department, agency ... or any civil, military, or naval commission.

18 U.S.C. § 203(a) (1982).

Wallach never became a federal official or employee. Wallach, therefore, argues that mere anticipation of obtaining a position in the federal government provides a legally insufficient basis to maintain a prosecution under section 203. Essentially, Wallach argues that a person cannot conspire to violate a substantive statute when the substantive statute does not reach that person. Even assuming the correctness of Wallach's initial premise, we find his arguments to be unpersuasive as they relate to a conspiracy charge.

[22][23][24][25] "It is well settled that the law of conspiracy serves ends different from, and complementary to, those served by criminal prohibitions of the substantive offense." United States v. Feola, 420 U.S. 671, 693, 95 S.Ct. 1255, 1268, 43 L.Ed.2d 541 (1975). The law of conspiracy serves two independent values: (1) it protects society from the dangers of concerted criminal activity, and (2) it serves a preventive function by stopping criminal conduct in its early stages of growth before it has a full opportunity to bloom. Id. at 693-94, 95 S.Ct. at 1268. As the applicable law has been summarized:

> The law of conspiracy identifies the agreement to engage in a criminal venture as an event of sufficient threat to social order to permit the imposition of criminal sanctions for the agreement alone, plus an overt act in pursuit of it, regardless of whether the crime agreed upon actually is committed. Criminal intent has crystallized, and the likelihood of actual, fulfilled commission warrants preventive action.

Id. at 694, 95 S.Ct. at 1268 (citations omitted). Thus, to establish the existence of a conspiracy the government need only establish the existence of an agreement and an overt act in furtherance of the agreement. United States v. Giordano, 693 F.2d 245, 249 (2d Cir.1982). "Whether the substantive crime itself is, or is likely to be, committed is irrelevant." United States v. Rose, 590 F.2d 232, 235 (7th Cir.1978), cert. denied, 442 U.S. 929, 99 S.Ct. 2859, 61 L.Ed.2d 297 (1979). Conspiracy is a crime separate and apart from the substantive offense that is the object of the conspiracy. Because it is the conspiratorial plan itself that is the focus of the charge, the illegality of the agreement is not dependent on the actual achievement of its goal. Giordano, 693 F.2d at 249. Indeed, "it does not matter that the ends of the conspiracy were from the beginning unattainable." Id.; see also United States v. Petit, 841 F.2d 1546, 1550-51 (11th Cir.) (conviction for conspiring to receive stolen goods which had been transported by an interstate carrier affirmed even though goods themselves had not been stolen), cert. denied sub nom. Fernandez v. United States, 487 U.S. 1237, 108 S.Ct. 2906, 101 L.Ed.2d 938 (1988); United States v. LaBudda, 882 F.2d 244 (7th Cir.1989) (conviction for conspiring to sell stolen U.S. Savings Bonds proper even though government had not proven that bonds were in fact stolen). Impossibility, therefore, is not a defense to a conspiracy charge. See W. LaFave & A. Scott, Criminal Law 545-46 (2d ed. 1986). "[I]t is the intent of the defendants to violate the law which matters, not whether their conduct would actually violate the underlying substantive statute." LaBudda, 882 F.2d at 248 (citing cases). The central question becomes whether the government's proof could establish 471 that the accused planned to commit a substantive offense which, if attainable, would have violated a federal statute, and that at least one overt step was taken to advance the conspiracy's purpose. Giordano, 693 F.2d at 249.

[26] Under the government's theory, Wallach agreed with Guariglia and other Wedtech officers to continue to lobby on behalf of Wedtech once he obtained a position within the federal government. In addition, the government contends that in contemplation of Wallach becoming a federal official a $300,000 advance payment was made to avoid any appearance of impropriety and to conceal Wallach's agreement to continue to lobby on behalf of Wedtech while holding a federal office. The parties to the agreement believed that Wallach would soon be a federal official and they structured their dealings accordingly. Thus, the government's theory encompasses the two essential elements of a viable conspiracy charge--agreement and overt act. At a retrial, a jury will have the ultimate responsibility for determining whether the government's evidence actually proves beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of these two elements. Under Wallach's approach, however, a charge of conspiring to violate section 203 could only be maintained if one of the parties involved actually was a federal official at the time of the agreement. We reject this interpretation.

Section 203 is aimed at limiting corruption within the federal government by safeguarding the integrity of the public administration. As the Supreme Court has explained:

> Conflict of interest legislation is "directed at an evil which endangers the very fabric of a democratic society, for a democracy is effective only if the people have faith in those who govern, and that faith is bound to be shattered when high officials and their appointees engage in activities which arouse suspicions of malfeasance and corruption."

Crandon v. United States, 494 U.S. 152, ---- n. 20, 110 S.Ct. 997, 1005 n. 20, 108 L.Ed.2d 132 (1990) (quoting United States v. Mississippi Valley Generating Co., 364 U.S. 520, 562, 81 S.Ct. 294, 315, 5 L.Ed.2d 268 (1961)). To achieve its purpose, the statute precludes federal employees from receiving any compensation from private parties for providing services in connection with any matter in which the United States has an interest. See United States v. Evans, 572 F.2d 455, 480 (5th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom. Tate v. United States, 439 U.S. 870, 99 S.Ct. 200, 58 L.Ed.2d 182 (1978). A conspiracy to engage in conduct violative of the substantive statute is equally threatening to the integrity of the governmental apparatus that section 203 seeks to protect. Thus, recognizing the legitimacy of a conspiracy charge even when none of the alleged parties to the agreement is as yet a federal official is entirely consistent with section 203's purpose and intent.

[27] By its very nature, conspiracy law often is aimed at reaching behavior that is intended to take place at a future time and in many instances attainment of the conspiracy's object turns on certain conditions being met or satisfied. See Note, Conditional Objectives of Conspiracies, 94 Yale L.J. 895, 899 (1985). In our view, where such a situation is involved, the relevant question is whether the alleged conspirators subjectively believed that the conditions necessary for attaining the objective were likely to be fulfilled. See generally id. at 905-06. This approach appropriately focuses on the actual intent of the alleged parties to the conspiracy. The mere happenstance that Wallach's purported goal of obtaining such employment was not realized should not in our view insulate him from such a charge. Accordingly, we see no bar to the charge of conspiracy to violate section 203.

Wallach was also charged with conspiring to defraud the citizens of the United States of his honest and loyal services. We see no need to discuss in detail Wallach's arguments relating to this aspect of Count Five. However, in the event of a retrial, the district court should clarify the instructions relating to this particular charge by making it absolutely clear that the "honest and loyal" services at issue are those of 472 Wallach himself and not those of Meese. By making this minor adjustment in the language of the instructions, any ambiguity should be removed and the potential for misinterpretation by the jury significantly lessened.

F. The District Court's Evidentiary Rulings

[28] Wallach asserts that the district court improperly permitted the government to introduce evidence regarding prior incidents of conduct. He submits that under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) and under Rule 403 this evidence should have been excluded. Although we have adopted an "inclusionary approach" to the introduction of similar act evidence as long as the evidence is not being introduced to show propensity, United States v. Brennan, 798 F.2d 581, 589 (2d Cir.1986), a district court must be careful to consider the cumulative impact of such evidence on the jury and to avoid the potential prejudice that might flow from its admission. See United States v. Peterson, 808 F.2d 969, 974 (2d Cir.1987) (probative value must exceed potential for prejudice); 2 J. Weinstein & M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence, ¶ 404[08] (1990).

[29] The evidence at issue involved a showing that Wallach accepted $150,000 to lobby Meese to obtain the support of the United States for a Mid-East pipeline. The evidence proffered and ultimately introduced showed that Wallach, through a series of transactions, one of which involved Chinn, received the $150,000 and did not disclose it on his income tax returns. The government argued that this evidence of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" was probative of Wallach's intent in his dealings with Wedtech. The district court found this evidence relevant to show that Wallach's concealment of the Wedtech payments was not innocent. We see no error in the introduction of this evidence. The district court, however, also permitted the prosecution to delve into other instances of Wallach's conduct.

During the cross-examination of Wallach's character witnesses, the government was permitted to introduce evidence concerning Wallach's performance as a personal injury attorney in the California case of Bert v. Wenzel. Specifically, the government questioned the witnesses' knowledge about Wallach's handling of this personal injury case in which two young children were severely burned. The government's evidence focused on Wallach's agreement to settle the case for $1.7 million and to retain $1 million as his fee. The settlement was approved over the objections of the children's parents by then-California State Judge, Eugene Lynch. At the time of the approval, Wallach had been encouraging Meese to recommend Lynch for an appointment to the federal bench. The district court concluded the government had shown a "good faith basis" for inquiry into the matter.

[30] Under Fed.R.Evid. 405, the government is permitted to ask questions of character witnesses concerning their knowledge of specific instances of the defendant's conduct. 22 C. Wright & K. Graham, Federal Practice & Procedure, § 5268, at 609-11 (1978). This is because the defense essentially has placed character in issue. However, the reason the rules of evidence limit the extent to which such collateral character evidence is admissible is to ensure that the jury does not convict the defendant for conduct with which he has not been charged. 22 Federal Practice & Procedure, § 5239, at 437-38.

[31] Although the Bert v. Wenzel evidence may have been technically admissible, we believe that a district court must proceed with caution and carefully evaluate the cumulative effect of such evidence on a jury. The district court always has the authority and discretion to exclude such evidence under the balancing test mandated by Fed.R.Evid. 403. Here, with particular reference to the Bert v. Wenzel evidence, our concern has been elevated by the manner in which the prosecution argued this evidence to the jury. The prosecutor made a blatant effort to prejudice the jury in his appeal for vengeance by inviting the jurors to stand in the shoes of the parents of the children involved in the case. He also characterized Wallach's behavior 473 as an "outrage." This was overzealous advocacy. These comments were unnecessary and in our view quite prejudicial. Wallach was not on trial for his conduct concerning the personal injury case.

While some limited inquiry into this matter may have been probative of the scope of knowledge on which Wallach's character witnesses were operating, we believe that inquiry into the entire matter was expanded well beyond the bounds of propriety and relevance. Thus, in the event of a retrial, steps should be taken to confine the use of such evidence to its intended purpose--challenging the basis for the character witnesses' opinions.

G. The Remaining Issues

We have considered the other arguments advanced by the defendants but choose to address at this time only those that are likely to recur at a retrial.

CONCLUSION

Because we believe that the perjury of one of the government's key witnesses infected the trial proceedings and interfered with the jury's ability to weigh his testimony, we reverse all the convictions. Additionally, our review of defendants' other arguments leads us to conclude that the charges advanced in the indictment are legally sufficient. Accordingly, we reverse all the judgments of conviction and remand for a new trial.

ALTIMARI, Circuit Judge, concurring:

I cannot subscribe to the notion that the Assistant United States Attorneys ("AUSAs") who represented the government in this case should have known that Anthony Guariglia was committing perjury at the time of trial. I do agree, however, that reversal is warranted despite the fact that the government had no knowledge of Guariglia's perjury. Accordingly, I write separately to express my views on these issues.

The idea that the government would knowingly rely on false testimony in obtaining a conviction is repugnant to the very concept of ordered liberty and is perhaps the most grievous accusation that can be levelled against a prosecutor. See Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264, 269, 79 S.Ct. 1173, 1177, 3 L.Ed.2d 1217 (1959); see also Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78, 88, 55 S.Ct. 629, 633, 79 L.Ed. 1314 (1935). A review of the entire record including the post-argument submissions [FN1] leaves me with the firm conviction that the AUSAs properly discharged the obligations of their office. Therefore, in contrast to the majority, I do not believe that "a virtual automatic reversal" of the defendants' convictions is mandated. United States v. Stofsky, 527 F.2d 237, 243 (2d Cir.1975), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 819, 97 S.Ct. 66, 50 L.Ed.2d 80 (1976).

FN1. I note with displeasure that much of the information regarding Guariglia's perjury and the government's response to that perjury was presented in a series of post-argument letters to the Court. As this Court has previously stressed, such submissions are looked upon with extreme disfavor. See United States v. Bortnovsky, 820 F.2d 572, 575 (2d Cir.1987) (per curiam). However, it was the defendants who initiated the submissions, to which the government merely responded.

To appreciate fully what the prosecutors knew about the admission of Anthony Guariglia's perjurious testimony, it is important to understand when and how this matter initially arose. During vigorous cross-examination, defense counsel confronted Guariglia with documents, obtained from the Tropicana Casino in Atlantic City, indicating that Guariglia had signed three markers totalling $15,000 in September 1988 and one $50,000 marker in October 1988. These markers provided strong circumstantial evidence that, despite his testimony to the contrary and despite the requirements of his cooperation agreement, Guariglia had gambled after the summer of 1988. On re-direct examination, Guariglia reiterated that he had not gambled. Instead, he claimed that he had exchanged the markers totalling $15,000 for cash and had used the $50,000 marker to obtain chips for Marshal Koplitz, a friend and business associate.

Certainly, if the government had simply accepted at face value Guariglia's somewhat 474 dubious explanation, a legitimate question might be raised about the prosecutors' conduct. However, this is not what occurred. Rather, in the midst of trial, the AUSAs extensively questioned Guariglia about the events in Atlantic City and the truthfulness of his testimony. Moreover, in an attempt to ascertain the truth or falsity of Guariglia's story, the AUSAs located and interviewed Koplitz and another individual who was with Guariglia in Atlantic City. Both verified Guariglia's version of events. Additionally, the prosecutors--albeit with limited success--attempted to contact and interview

Tropicana Casino officials. Thus, it seems to me that the AUSAs did all that was reasonable to assure that they were neither relying on false testimony nor permitting false testimony to go uncorrected. Cf. Stofsky, 527 F.2d at 244 ("We do not employ the omniscience of a Monday morning quarterback as the standard for determining what investigation should have been made by the government.").

It should also be realized that when the government did obtain meaningful evidence that Guariglia had perjured himself at trial, the AUSAs did not hesitate in undertaking an investigation and prosecution that ultimately resulted in Guariglia's perjury conviction. To my mind, this is a further illustration that throughout the proceedings the AUSAs sought to learn--not avoid or ignore--the truth.

Thus, I believe that the critical issue on this appeal is whether Guariglia's perjury is so material that "the jury probably would have altered its verdict if it had had the opportunity to appraise the impact [of the perjury] not only upon the factual elements of the government's case but also upon the credibility of the government's witness." Stofsky, 527 F.2d at 246. In considering this issue, the district court concluded that "this additional brace of wrongdoings, if known to the jury, would not in any way have had the slightest effect upon its verdict." United States v. Wallach, 733 F.Supp. 769, 771 (S.D.N.Y.1990). This conclusion was based on Judge Owen's consideration of a broad array of factors:

> The testimony was not material: Guariglia's gambling and skimming did not bear on the defendants' guilt or innocence, only on Guariglia's credibility. And here, these instances of falsehood would have been merely minor, cumulative additions to the massive mound of discredit heaped upon Guariglia over several days of both direct and cross-examination. The jury heard that Guariglia's past included: bribery of numerous government officials, including Congressmen Biaggi and Garcia, Richard D. Ramirez of the Navy, Gordon Osgood of the Army, Jerrydoe Smith of the Postal Service, Peter Neglia of the Small Business Administration and Vito Castellano of the National Guard; commercial bribes to bank officials and a Con Edison employee; countless false filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Small Business Administration and the Internal Revenue Service; the use of kickbacks, frauds and the use of the 'FHJ slush fund' to steal $1,624,702 from Wedtech; the payment of over $500,000 in illegal payoffs to union officials for labor peace; the fabrication of a Navy telex to inflate Wedtech's apparent profit; concealing ill-gotten gains in nine foreign bank accounts; false statements to District Attorney Morgenthau and his staff when the investigation began, and, during the course of the investigation, obtaining a false Swedish passport. The defendants also brought out post-cooperation wrongdoing in connection with tax irregularities, arguable continued gambling in Atlantic City, and continued failure to make restitution to the Wedtech shareholders....

Id. at 771-72.

While the foregoing recitation is undeniably powerful, it is also somewhat misleading, because it fails to take proper account of the unique and oftentimes devastating impact of a witness perjuring himself in front of a jury. While disclosure of such perjury might not transform the jury's image of the witness from paragon to knave, see United States v. Gilbert, 668 F.2d 94, 96 (2d Cir.1981), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 946, 475 102 S.Ct. 2014, 72 L.Ed.2d 469 (1982), it may provide the proverbial straw that broke the camel's back. See, e.g., United States v. Seijo, 514 F.2d 1357, 1364 (2d Cir.1975). Indeed, as the majority cogently explains, Guariglia was an essential witness at trial and, while there may have been heated argument over his credibility and misdeeds, his ongoing perjury had not been revealed to the jury.

In sum, I agree with the majority's conclusion that reversal of the convictions is warranted. But I do so solely on the ground that "the jury probably would have altered its verdict" had it been aware of Guariglia's on-going perjury. Stofsky, 527 F.2d at 246. In all other respects, I concur in the majority's well-reasoned opinion.

Subject: handwriting analyses for Foster note . . .

Can someone give me a full written run-down on all handwriting analyses that have been done of documents written by Foster in comparing them to the Foster note. In particular, who did analyses (was there analysis done in 1993, 1994, and 1995??); when; with what documents; were they originals; do we still have the original documents? We need to have this organized before the Senate goes charging down the same path next week.

Re: Foster Investigation Issues

As you are aware, the investigators are currently performing a comprehensive review of the Foster death investigation. We hope to provide a report by the end of January which summarizes the results of the investigation with particular focus on identifying unresolved issues, possible areas for further investigation, and conflicts, inconsistencies and ambiguities in statements of various witnesses. We are reviewing FD-302s, FGJ transcripts, transcripts of Congressional testimony, lab reports, Park Police reports, and physical evidence. We are also closely examining the commentaries of those in the media and general public who have become expert in the Foster matter (e.g., Hugh Sprunt & Chris Ruddy).

This memo provides my preliminary thoughts regarding this process. I believe certain decisions about the nature and scope of the investigation must be made fairly soon if we hope to draw this matter to a successful conclusion in the next few months. Outlined below are issues I believe must be addressed at this time.

(1) Mission

The report of the Fiske investigation does not define the scope and objectives of that investigation. I believe this was a serious mistake. It seems to me the mission of the Fiske investigation may have been much more limited than that presumed by its many critics. Although I have no first-hand information in this regard, I believe the Fiske people may have viewed their mission as being quite specific. That limited mission might have been stated as follows: By the earliest possible date, make a determination based on the information then available (eight months after the fact) whether the initial conclusion of the Park Police that Mr. Foster committed suicide in Ft. Marry Park was reasonable and consistent with the evidence. However, some might argue their mission was broader. Did their mission also require that they conclusively rule out even the outside possibility of foul play? Did their mission require them to determine beyond a reasonable doubt that the suicide had nothing to do with Whitewater? Were they required to ascertain exactly what factors drove Mr. Foster to suicide? The Fiske investigation succeeded if it was intended only a means of testing the general viability of the Park Police conclusions. It failed if its mission was broader in scope.

Unfortunately, we do not know the exact nature of the Fiske mission because the report is silent in this regard. I am reminded of controversies which have arisen in the past regarding FBI background investigations. The Bureau is very careful to avoid claiming our background investigations invariably uncover any and all problems in a person's background no matter how hidden they might be. Instead, we say only that we perform a reasonably thorough check into the person's past. What is reasonably thorough? The White House and our other clients are fully aware of the formula we use in each of these cases (e.g., number of references and associates interviewed, scope in terms of years) so there can be no squabble later if we happen to miss something. (A second similarity of this investigation to background investigations is that, to a large degree, the accuracy of the investigation's results depends upon how forthcoming and honest interviewees choose to be.)

Normal criminal cases are self-defined by the resulting prosecutions. A criminal investigation is sufficiently thorough if the crimes charged are proven beyond a reasonable doubt. This is true even though it may be that the defendant was actually guilty of plenty of other crimes not proven through the investigation.

Certain issues and theories about Mr. Foster's death may never be resolved by our investigation no matter how thorough we are. To the extent possible, we should consider defining the scope of our investigation in such a way that no reasonable person would expect us to provide answers to these riddles. We should also consider setting the scope of our investigation now, well before we publish our report. Otherwise, we risk criticism that we tailored the investigation's objectives after-the-fact to fit the results we were able to produce. It may also be prudent at this time to advise Congress, and perhaps even the media, in general terms of what we believe our mission to be. Through such an airing we could gauge whether others agree with our views on the proper scope of the investigation, or, on the other hand, determine whether some adjustment might be in order.

Defining the scope of the investigation at this time will also help us draw the case to a close. It seems to me that we could investigate certain questions about Mr. Foster's death indefinitely without ever reaching a resolution. If such questions are excluded from our mandate, we would be in a position to avoid these wild goose chases and instead concentrate time and resources on those matters which definitely fall within the defined scope of the case.

Due to the passage of time since July 1993, it may be that our mission must necessarily be more limited than might have been the case had we begun our investigation shortly after Mr. Foster's death.

We should undertake the process of defining our mission during the next month while the current review is ongoing. This process should occur naturally as we begin identifying unresolved questions and possible areas for further inquiry. Each such question should first be examined to determine whether it, and related topics, should be included in our mandate. Decisions in this regard should not be based on the amount of effort which would be required to resolve the matter, or on the likelihood of success, but rather on principled decisions as to what should, and should not, be included in our mission.

I will give a couple of examples at this time to illustrate the point. Many of us agree with the conclusion of the Fiske report that one of the Park Police officers or EMS personnel responding to the scene must have disturbed the body before the polaroid pictures were taken. This explains the contact stain on the face as well as the inconsistencies between the photographs and the CW's statements. Resolving this issue would require substantial additional investigation and probably require that we obtain some type of additional cooperation from a Park Police officer and/or EMS employee. (It may be that we will never conclusively resolve this inconsistency regardless of the amount of additional investigation we perform.) A related question which may also require further investigation involves the possibility that some of the polaroids taken by the Park Police are now missing. Again, we will not be able to resolve this mystery without help from a cooperative witness.

A second example of the type of investigation which may, or may not, be within our mandate involves the question of why Mr. Foster may have committed suicide. Simply put, are we obligated to determine exactly why Mr. Foster may have been depressed and therefore susceptible to a suicidal impulse, or is it enough to demonstrate that he was depressed without drawing conclusions about the reasons for his depression.

Before undertaking this additional investigation, we must ask ourselves whether resolution of these issues is essential to our mission. Apparently, the Fiske office decided there was not a need to push these issues since their report does nothing more than speculate regarding the origin of the contact stain, says nothing regarding the possibility of missing polaroids, and does not thoroughly examine the potential reasons underlying his apparent depression. I will not outline here the arguments on both sides of these issues, but I do believe these questions can only be answered by analyzing them in terms of a frame of reference provided by a clear definition of our mission.

(2) Merger of Foster Death & Papers Investigations

I believe these investigations are inextricably bound together and should be merged. I also believe we should consider issuing a combined report for the two areas.

The subject matters of the two investigations are linked in three ways:

* First, the possibility that materials in Mr. Foster's office may have been disturbed by White House staffers could relate to "state of mind" issues. Could there have been a note or other documents in his office which clearly revealed his intent to take his life and/or reasons underlying that decision?

* Second, Mr. Sprunt and others have linked the death investigation to the "papers" investigation. We may need to follow suit if we intend to address the legitimate concerns of citizens such as Mr. Sprunt.

* Third, the ability of the Park Police to perform the original investigation was directly affected by the conduct of the White House staff. The Park Police should have been allowed to seal the office and thereafter review each and every document contained therein to determine whether any of the documents held clues about Mr. Foster's intent. (Any clearance problems could have been handled fairly easily.) I believe the White House staff's conduct impacted the ability of the Park Police to conduct the death investigation professionally. I further believe we should address this in our report.

(3) Timing of the Report

I know there are reasons why we would prefer to finish our work and issue a report as quickly as possible. I feel strongly, however, that this investigation, and particularly the report, are much too important to rush. As you will see below, there are many areas for possible investigation which we must consider in the next month or so. We either need to investigate each area as thoroughly as possible or make a defensible decision as to why each lies outside the scope of our case. The work of the proposed independent review panel will also prolong the investigation. I know from personal experience that it will take these experts quite a long time to become familiar with all the facts developed in the investigation to date. I predict it will be late Spring or early Summer before we are ready to issue a report. Perhaps such a timetable should be revealed to Congress or others at this time in an attempt to relieve pressures which would be created by an earlier, arbitrary deadline.

(4) Issues/Areas needing Investigation

As part of the ongoing review, we have already identified numerous areas which might require further investigation. Decisions regarding each will need to be made. Are these issues within the scope of our investigation? Do we have the resources/time to conduct the investigation in question? Are there other factors precluding the investigation (e.g., lack of cooperation from the family or the White House)?

Listed below is a sampling of the issues/questions identified so far:

* Foster Finances---As previously suggested, a comprehensive investigation of the Foster financial situation may be in order. There is indication the family was having some problems in this regard. Also, severe financial problems are often found to be a contributing factor in suicides.

* Time Lines---Several accurate time lines should be prepared. One should document all of Mr. Foster's business and personal activities for several weeks prior to his death and anticipated activities for several weeks following his death. A detailed time line recording the relevant activities of all persons associated with the case should also be prepared for the period of a few days before and after the death. Finally, a detailed timeline regarding July 20th should be prepared.

* Car---We have a number of questions relating to Mr. Foster's car and its contents. It may be appropriate to talk to the family regarding the normal locations of the map, oven mit and other items, as well as what the children observed that morning. We might also talk to the Park Police regarding the photographs they took. Were the photos taken before any of the items in the car were moved? Also, we may need to resolve the questions regarding the inconsistent statements concerning the briefcase, winecoolers and suit jacket.

* Work Matters---A logical area of inquiry might involve the matters Mr. Foster was handling at work. Were any of them causing him stress or other types of problems? In this regard, further discussions about the planned meeting with Mr. Lyons concerning Travelgate, the unexplained meeting with Marcia Scott, and the proposed reorganization of the White House may be in order. Included in this general area would be questions about his work on the Clinton blind trusts, Health Care task force issues, and the failed nominations.

* Rose Conflicts---The Rose conflicts, the missing billing records, and the question of Rose/Hillary's work for Madison may all be relevant to Mr. Foster's state of mind.

* Gun---We have discussed a plan of action regarding the gun. Perhaps the gun could be linked to the Foster family by showing that a revolver like the one in question was a part of Foster Sr.'s collection, that that revolver was given to Foster Jr., and that it is now unaccounted for within the Foster family. We also want to show the codicil did not list all of Foster Sr.'s guns. We could do this by showing there are guns which came from Foster Sr. which were not listed in the codicil.

* Unexplained Absences---Mr. Foster's unexplained, unusual absences from work on July 19 and 20 may need to be explored. His activities during those times may directly relate to his death.

* Hairs & Fibers---Many people have opined that we should seek to compare the hair and fibers found on Mr. Foster to known samples. We need to know going into this process that we risk not being able to match these items to any known source, or, on the other hand, proving nothing more than the fact that he had been in his home, office and car, and that he had come into contact with a hair of a relative or acquaintance at some unknown point in time.

* Knowledge of the Hale Search---There has been some indication Mr. Foster might have learned of the Hale search shortly before his death. Could this have been a factor?

* Park Police Issues---We have identified a number of issues regarding the handling of the death scene by the Park Police to include questions about the following: Was the body disturbed prior to the photos causing the contact stain and a change of the position of the hands from palms down to palms up; Were the car keys taken from the body at some point prior to their being "found" at the hospital; How was the car accessed; Were items in the car disturbed before the photos were taken; and, Are polaroids missing.

* People in Park---There were reports of people in the park during the afternoon of July 20 who have not been identified. It may be necessary to do everything possible to identify and interview these individuals. On the other hand, it could be argued this inquiry is not critical in that there may have been numerous people in and out of the park that afternoon who did not see Mr. Foster and have nothing material to contribute to the investigation.

* Maryland Weekend---There have been inconsistent statements regarding the Maryland weekend particularly with respect to Mr. Foster's demeanor. Do we need to follow this and reinterview certain people and attempt to identify and interview others with whom Mr. Foster came into contact that weekend?

* White House Interviews---Immediately following Mr. Foster's death certain White House personnel expressed shock that Mr. Foster would have committed suicide. Later, these same people uniformly said that, indeed, Mr. Foster had seemed depressed. We might consider following these inconsistencies to determine whether there may have been some effort to coordinate stories about Mr. Foster's depression and, importantly, possible reasons for such depression.

ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER was interviewed in the offices of her attorney, JAMES HAMILTON, who is associated with the law firm of Swidler & Berlin, 3000 K Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. ELIZABETH FOSTER, who is also known as LISA FOSTER, is the widow of VINCENT W. FOSTER, JR., former Deputy Counsel to the President, who will be referred to as FOSTER in the remainder of this report of interview. Also participating in the interview of LISA FOSTER was RODERICK C. LANKLER, Deputy Counsel, Office of the Independent Counsel, Washington, D.C. After LISA FOSTER was advised of the identities of the interviewing agents and the nature of the interview, she furnished the following information:

LISA FOSTER arrived in Washington, D.C. to set up a permanent residence for her family on June 5, 1993. After her arrival, she and FOSTER went jogging along Rock Creek Parkway in the vicinity of Dumbarton Oaks. FOSTER appeared to LISA FOSTER to be jogging at his normal pace that day. After they finished jogging, LISA FOSTER and FOSTER went to a small neighborhood store, purchased orange juice and bagels, and went home and had breakfast. LISA FOSTER recalls that day as being a day of fun and one of their best days together in recent times.

When LISA FOSTER and FOSTER still lived in Arkansas, FOSTER used to jog approximately three to four times per week. LISA FOSTER also began to play tennis at that time. LISA FOSTER and FOSTER would frequently go to a nearby track where each of them would jog at his or her own pace.

When LISA FOSTER saw FOSTER after she arrived in Washington, D.C., she believed that he appeared awful. She believed that most of the weight which FOSTER had lost by that time had been lost prior to his arrival in Washington, D.C.

How much did they see each other Jan-June didn't lose much weight '93

On June 8, 1993, LISA FOSTER noticed that FOSTER was emotionally down and was slumped in his chair just as his father had been when his father was ill. LISA FOSTER recalls that FOSTER always was worried and stressed. FOSTER told LISA FOSTER that nothing at the White House was going right and he mentioned the example of the ZOE BAIRD nomination.

LISA FOSTER recalls that FOSTER did go jogging on Monday, July 19, 1993 but did not go jogging on July 20, 1993.

FOSTER complained to LISA FOSTER that he was suffering from insomnia, but he did not want to take sleeping pills because he was afraid that he would become addicted to them. FOSTER would get up in the morning and say to LISA FOSTER that he had not slept at all. FOSTER's typical work day began at 8:00 or 8:30 a.m. and continued until 9:30-10:00 p.m.

LISA FOSTER is aware that FOSTER had his blood pressure checked at the White House infirmary on or about July 16, 1993. FOSTER had complained to LISA FOSTER that his heart had been pounding. LISA FOSTER recalls that the blood pressure reading taken on FOSTER on July 16, 1993 did not sound particularly high. FOSTER told her that the White House medical personnel had taken his blood pressure again the same day, approximately ten minutes after the first reading. LISA FOSTER recalls that the initial blood pressure reading was approximately 160/100 and that the later reading was approximately 140/90. After FOSTER related the results of these blood pressure readings to LISA FOSTER, she told him that she would call DR. LARRY WATKINS, their family physician back in Little Rock, Arkansas. LISA FOSTER is not aware of any other time when FOSTER may have gone to have his blood pressure checked. LISA FOSTER is aware that FOSTER's father had suffered a stroke and his mother takes medication for high blood pressure.

LISA FOSTER is not aware of any history of depression within the FOSTER family. No one has ever mentioned such a family history to LISA FOSTER. LISA FOSTER is aware that an aunt of FOSTER had some sort of problem and never got married, but LISA FOSTER is not aware of any more specific information about the nature of this problem.

LISA FOSTER is not aware of FOSTER ever having been treated for depression previously or having had medication for depression prescribed for him.

When asked why she and her son called FOSTER's office at the White House on several occasions to ask about FOSTER's well-being, LISA FOSTER responded that she used to call her husband when he worked at the Rose Law Firm all the time, especially if she wanted money. VINCENT FOSTER was very quiet, and LISA FOSTER may have called his secretary just to get a better feel for his condition and state of mind. LISA FOSTER believes that her son, VINCENT W. FOSTER, III, may have called BERNARD NUSSBAUM, Counsel to the President, to confirm whether NUSSBAUM would be speaking to a group of legal aides who were working on Capitol Hill. VINCENT W. FOSTER, III was working for Arkansas Senator DALE BUMPERS at the time and was interested in trying to attend such a speech by NUSSBAUM. LISA FOSTER does not specifically recall any other occasions when she may have called FOSTER's office.

state of mind concerns

When LISA FOSTER was asked whether FOSTER ever experienced anxiety as a component of his depression, she responded by recalling the night that ZOE BAIRD withdrew from consideration to become Attorney General of the United States. LISA FOSTER recalls that FOSTER came to bed at approximately 2:30 a.m. and he was sweating profusely and just sick. FOSTER felt that everyone was criticizing him, even at home. FOSTER did not enjoy being in the public eye. As an indication of FOSTER's anxiety, LISA FOSTER cites the fact that he told her that he didn't have time to do the taxes. LISA FOSTER recalls that he began to start more of his sentences with the phrase "I just can't handle...." While the FOSTER family was still living in Little Rock, if FOSTER became anxious, he would just go out to his swimming pool in the backyard and work by the pool, particularly if there was a trial approaching. FOSTER was very intense. If an upcoming trial involved a major case, then preparation for that trial would be all that FOSTER would do. FOSTER had a one-track mind when he was preparing for or engaged in a trial. Once FOSTER began working at the White House, there were no breaks in his effort and also no successes. FOSTER was used to always winning, and LISA FOSTER does not recall any instances of FOSTER losing before he joined the administration.

FOSTER has had panic attacks in the past and LISA FOSTER thinks that he had one at least five years ago. At that time, FOSTER told LISA FOSTER that his heart was acting up. FOSTER had a heart monitor attached to him for 24 hours but no abnormalities were found. FOSTER also told LISA FOSTER that he was afraid to speak before crowds, and he said that his knees would shake under such circumstances. LISA FOSTER counseled him to work through his anxiety and ignore its effects simply by anticipating he would feel anxious whenever he spoke before a crowd. LISA FOSTER recalls that when FOSTER spoke before a crowd, he would sweat and turn slightly green in color. LISA FOSTER believes that FOSTER's commencement speech at the University of Arkansas Law School is a very good example of how FOSTER appeared when he was suffering such an anxiety attack. LISA FOSTER recalls that he appeared very stiff while making that address. LISA FOSTER recalls three other occasions when FOSTER appeared to be suffering from some sort of panic attack. On one such occasion, FOSTER called the FOSTER residence in Little Rock and left a recorded message on the answering machine about the need for him to resign from the Little Rock Country Club because of its alleged discriminatory practices. LISA FOSTER recalls that the sound of FOSTER's voice on the tape made her believe that FOSTER had been crying. The other two occasions when FOSTER sounded choked up and tense were when the Branch Davidian complex near Waco, Texas had burned, and the occasion of the issuance of the White House report on the Travel Office affair in which FOSTER was reprimanded.

LISA FOSTER does not recall any incidents in which FOSTER was hospitalized for physical or mental ailments. She recalls that FOSTER once cut his chin and received stitches as an outpatient. She cannot recall any other instances when FOSTER received care at a hospital.

FOSTER was greatly affected by the death of his father, VINCENT FOSTER, SR. FOSTER did not sob when his father died, but he also did not remain unaffected by the death. FOSTER cared for his father during the last few months of his father's life when he was suffering from cancer. LISA FOSTER recalls that she and FOSTER were told by the doctors that FOSTER's father would live approximately six to eighteen months. As soon as the FOSTER family left Arkansas and arrived in Michigan for a vacation, they learned that FOSTER's father was dying. FOSTER attempted to return to Arkansas from Michigan quickly, but he did not arrive home in time to be with his father before his father passed away. After the funeral for FOSTER's father had been held, FOSTER returned to Michigan with the intention of spending spend time with his family. Instead, he used his time with the family in Michigan to write thank you notes to people who had offered condolences to the other members of his family and himself.

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER, On 5/9/94, Page 5

LISA FOSTER did have contact with DR. LARRY WATKINS subsequent to FOSTER's death. DR. WATKINS was the first person she called after she learned of her husband's death. She called DR. WATKINS the night of July 20, 1993 and asked him what in the hell happened. She also asked DR. WATKINS, "Could it have been the pill?" DR. WATKINS responded to LISA FOSTER that the pill could not have been the cause of the suicide and he further stated that FOSTER's depression must have been acute. DR. WATKINS is an internist who provided full physical examinations to both LISA FOSTER and FOSTER every two years.

In speaking with DR. WATKINS, LISA FOSTER learned that FOSTER had called DR. WATKINS and told him that he thought he was fighting depression. DR. WATKINS related to LISA FOSTER that he had then called in a prescription for an anti-depressant drug. LISA FOSTER did not know ahead of time that FOSTER was going to call DR. WATKINS, and she did not overhear the conversation between FOSTER and DR. WATKINS.

When LISA FOSTER was asked whether it would have been uncharacteristic of FOSTER to reach out to someone regarding a problem such as depression, she replied that FOSTER would have reached out if he were really scared or were at home rather than at the White House. During one conversation, FOSTER told LISA FOSTER that SHEILA (FOSTER's sister, SHEILA ANTHONY) says sometimes that "it" is chemical. FOSTER did not explain to LISA FOSTER what he was referring to when he talked about "it" or "this thing." LISA FOSTER did not understand what his reference meant when he referred to it as being chemical. LISA FOSTER offered to call a doctor for FOSTER but he said that he would make the call.

FOSTER had a prescription for a sleeping pill called Restoril (phonetic). LISA FOSTER had filled a new prescription for this sleeping pill, but she is now unable to find the pills. LISA FOSTER believes that FOSTER threw the pills away so that she would not be able to consume them once she learned of his death.

Prior to FOSTER's death, SHEILA ANTHONY never mentioned depression to LISA FOSTER in relation to FOSTER.

When asked whether FOSTER had ever approached LISA FOSTER for help in dealing with his problem with depression, LISA FOSTER recalls that he mentioned his depression to her on approximately July 16, 1993. LISA FOSTER then arranged to go away for the weekend with FOSTER to the Tidewater Inn on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. LISA FOSTER made all the arrangements for the weekend and asked FOSTER to be home by 3:00 p.m. that Friday, which was July 16, 1993. Instead, FOSTER arrived home at approximately 4:00 p.m., and she and FOSTER had to drive through terrible traffic to reach the inn. Because FOSTER appeared to be under stress to her, LISA FOSTER offered to drive. FOSTER agreed to have her drive, but there was no opportunity to pull over and change drivers so FOSTER ended up driving the entire way to the Tidewater Inn.

LISA FOSTER has no knowledge of any available records which might indicate that her husband had previously received psychiatric counseling.

FOSTER did not experience either stress or depression while he was studying in law school. FOSTER never had to study at night because he was able to do his studying during the morning hours prior to class. After rising in the morning and driving LISA FOSTER to her place of employment, FOSTER would return home and study.

FOSTER did not attend his graduation from law school for a number of reasons. FOSTER graduated during the middle of the school year, i.e., in the month of January. Because of the timing of his graduation and because FOSTER had already begun work at the Rose Law Firm in Little Rock, Arkansas, FOSTER would have had to take off time from work in order to attend graduation. Other reasons why the FOSTERS did not attend the graduation were that the trip back to Fayetteville, Arkansas would have involved significant expenses and LISA FOSTER was pregnant at the time. LISA FOSTER recalls that the graduation ceremony was nothing special because it was conducted as part of the same ceremony held for other schools within the University.

LISA FOSTER has many copies of the text of FOSTER's commencement address to the University of Arkansas School of Law. She also has a copy of the videotape of that address by FOSTER. The text of FOSTER's speech is contained in the most recent copy of the University of Arkansas Law Review.

During the last few months of his life, FOSTER was reading such books as The Making of a President, Ross Perot's book, a book entitled Putting People First, and other books, titles unrecalled, on the subject of ethics. LISA FOSTER is unable to recall the titles of any of the books which FOSTER may have been reading for pleasure just prior to his death.

FD-302a (Rev. 11-15-83)

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER, On 5/9/94, Page 7

LISA FOSTER and her family did employ housekeepers in their residences in both Little Rock and Washington. In Little Rock, LISA FOSTER employed a housekeeper for approximately 22 years. In Washington, LISA FOSTER employed a woman named LORETTA SEARS who came to clean the FOSTER residence once a week. SEARS had worked for the tenants who had resided previously in the FOSTER house. LISA FOSTER does not believe that SEARS ever saw FOSTER because he typically left for work prior to her arrival at the house and he always returned home after SEARS had already departed.

When asked whether NUSSBAUM had given her an envelope in his office at the White House, LISA FOSTER responded yes, that he had given her a number of torn pieces of yellow in a white envelope. The envelope was already in the office when LISA FOSTER arrived there. NUSSBAUM showed the contents of the envelope to LISA FOSTER, and he assembled the pieces of yellow paper so that she could read the writing on it. NUSSBAUM had already had a transcript prepared of the content of this note. LISA FOSTER believes that she saw this torn note on the evening of July 26, 1993. When she saw the note, LISA FOSTER recognized the writing as being the handwriting of FOSTER. LISA FOSTER was not allowed to touch the note, and there was no other envelope or note.

LISA FOSTER's attorney, JAMES HAMILTON, interjected at this point in the interview that he had been at the White House when LISA FOSTER examined the note.

LISA FOSTER is not aware of any other note relating to the death of FOSTER.

LISA FOSTER is not aware of any personal or family reason which would account for FOSTER researching medical malpractice issues. First Lady HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON had asked FOSTER to write the malpractice section of the newly proposed health care plan. In addition, one of FOSTER's first legal cases had been a case involving medical malpractice.

FD-302a (Rev. 11-15-83)

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER . On 5/9/94 . Page 8

LISA FOSTER is not aware of any indication, nor does she suspect, that her husband had become aware of anything illegal or highly damaging to either the CLINTONS or the White House which would have presented him with irreconcilable pressures. LISA FOSTER notes that FOSTER never told her anything about his clients.

FOSTER never expressed any concern to LISA FOSTER about either Whitewater or Madison Guaranty Savings & Loan. LISA FOSTER had never even heard of either of these entities at that point in her life.

When asked to furnish an opinion as to what FOSTER may have been working on that caused him stress or might explain his condition of depression, LISA FOSTER responded that the Travel Office fiasco may have been the source of the stress. She noted that if the Travel Office had been the only difficulty facing FOSTER, it would not have been so bad. At one point, FOSTER called the family together and warned his family that the next six months might be particularly difficult. Toward the end of his life, FOSTER had no sense of joy or elation at work. The Branch Davidian incident near Waco, Texas was also causing him a great deal of stress. LISA FOSTER believes that FOSTER was horrified when the Branch Davidian complex burned. FOSTER believed that everything was his fault. On such issues as the ZOE BAIRD nomination and gays in the military, it seemed that the White House Counsel's Office was not doing a particularly good job, although LISA FOSTER felt that the attorneys themselves were doing good work. FOSTER was extremely fond of NUSSBAUM. If either President CLINTON or NUSSBAUM was being criticized, FOSTER felt that he was also being criticized. FOSTER was very happy about the nominations of JANET RENO as Attorney General of the United States and RUTH BADER GINSBURG as a Supreme Court Justice.

At this point in the interview, HAMILTON interjected that he sat next to Justice GINSBURG when she was first nominated for her position, and he noted that FOSTER was very touched by Justice GINSBURG's speech.

LISA FOSTER stayed home and did not attend the nomination ceremony for Justice GINSBURG.

LISA FOSTER is not aware of what may have been in her husband's office at the White House that led White House staff to search FOSTER's office immediately after her husband's death. LISA FOSTER also does not know anything about what may have caused NUSSBAUM to conduct an official search of her husband's office in a manner which excluded investigators from law enforcement agencies.

FD-302a (Rev. 11-15-83)

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER, On 5/9/94, Page 9

LISA FOSTER is not exactly aware of what role her husband played in the firing of the seven individuals from the White House Travel Office. FOSTER was distressed because he felt that if he had spoken first with WILLIAM KENNEDY, who was also an attorney in the White House Counsel's Office, then the Federal Bureau of Investigation would not have been called into the case. However, no one heeded FOSTER's advice on this matter.

LISA FOSTER is aware that FOSTER was compiling a list of attorneys to represent him regarding the White House Travel Office matter. FOSTER wanted to have an attorney represent him because he did not have time to do his work at the White House and prepare a defense for himself. LISA FOSTER recalls that Senator DOLE had written a letter on July 15, 1993 requesting a Congressional investigation of the Travel Office matter. VINCENT W. FOSTER, III had attended a Senate Judiciary Committee meeting when an investigation of the Travel Office matter was called for but the motion to conduct such an investigation was tabled. VINCENT FOSTER, III told LISA FOSTER about the proposal for Congressional hearings, but she did not think that it was a big deal.

LISA FOSTER does not think that FOSTER contacted any of the attorneys on the list of attorneys which had been furnished to him by BERYL ANTHONY. LISA FOSTER is aware that FOSTER contacted her attorney, JAMES HAMILTON, as well as attorney JAMES LYONS and, although she was not privy to the conversations, she believes that these conversations related to the Travel Office matter.

FOSTER had not kept a diary during the course of his relationship with LISA FOSTER. He used to keep trip logs whenever the family went on vacation. At the end of each day of a trip, FOSTER would write down what the family had done that day while on vacation. However, FOSTER did not keep such notes when he was at home or in relation to his work. LISA FOSTER believes that FOSTER may have begun to keep a diary on election night of

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER, On 5/9/94, Page 10

1992 because he believed that from that time period forward would be a period worth remembering.

LISA FOSTER does not believe it would have been uncharacteristic of her husband to maintain such a diary because he was very excited about the formation of the new administration. As an indication of this excitement, she notes that he chose to write about election night, the inauguration, and the nomination of Attorney General JANET RENO.

LISA FOSTER's daughter, LAURA FOSTER, was the primary driver of the Honda automobile which was found at Fort Marcy Park, Virginia on July 20, 1993. The Honda automobile belonged to LAURA FOSTER and also to one of LISA FOSTER's sons. The son and daughter shared the automobile. LAURA FOSTER had used the Honda while she was attending Vanderbilt University and then had driven it to Washington. The Honda automobile was the only car which FOSTER and LAURA FOSTER had with them in Washington until LISA FOSTER arrived with the other family members and with the Lexus automobile owned by their family.

It was not only typical for FOSTER to drive the Honda to work at the White House, it was imperative.

The contents found in the Honda on July 20, 1993, e.g., the cigarette pack, beer cans, and corkscrew, belonged to LISA FOSTER's son. FOSTER himself did not smoke. FOSTER's sons had gone to the beach the weekend preceding July 20, 1993, and the refuse from the weekend was still in the passenger compartment of the Honda when it was searched by police at Fort Marcy Park.

The Honda is no longer in the possession of LISA FOSTER because she sold the car to her brother-in-law, who in turn is leasing the car to her brother in Nashville, Tennessee.

LISA FOSTER describes the color of the Honda as taupe or grayish. She further describes it as a light color.

FOSTER had not made specific plans for the weekend which followed his death. He had spoken with LISA FOSTER about going away for that weekend and about coming home early from work so they could get an early start on the weekend. LISA FOSTER had talked to him about trying to go away every weekend. They had spoken about trying to go to Pennsylvania the following weekend but had not made any reservations.

FD-302a (Rev. 11-15-83)

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER, On 5/9/94, Page 11

There were no domestic problems between LISA FOSTER and FOSTER during the entirety of their twenty-five year relationship.

In terms of people in whom her husband would confide, LISA FOSTER believes that he would have confided in herself and his sister, SHEILA ANTHONY. FOSTER would also be likely to confide in his children, particularly his daughter LAURA. FOSTER would also confide in his son, VINCENT FOSTER, III, and he would have confided in his father if his father were still alive.

On the evening of July 19, 1993, LISA FOSTER cooked dinner at home. When FOSTER returned home from work, he came into the house and smiled at LISA FOSTER while saying that a quarter to eight was not bad. LISA FOSTER responded to him that she was thinking that he would be home at 6:30 or 7:00 p.m. That night, FOSTER received a call from President CLINTON, who invited FOSTER to come to the White House to watch a movie. When FOSTER turned down the invitation from the President, LISA FOSTER was happy. She prepared scallops for all of the family members except for her son BRUGH, who was eating spaghetti.

FOSTER did not mention any conversations from earlier in the day of July 19, 1993 which might have disturbed him.

LISA FOSTER has some knowledge of three letters which were sent out by FOSTER from his office on July 19, 1993. LISA FOSTER is aware of a letter from FOSTER to his mother regarding some leases for mineral rights. LISA FOSTER only saw this letter after FOSTER's death because, as a result of FOSTER's mother signing the letter, LISA FOSTER inherited the mineral rights. LISA FOSTER does not recall exactly how she saw these mineral leases. One of the remaining two letters may have been for payment of a life insurance premium, but LISA FOSTER does not recall whether she or FOSTER mailed this letter.

FOSTER had never spoken to LISA FOSTER about visiting Fort Marcy Park in the past, and she had never heard of the park prior to her husband's death.

FD-302a (Rev. 11-15-83)

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER, On 5/9/94, Page 12

LISA FOSTER does not know whether VINCENT FOSTER ever visited Fort Marcy Park prior to the day of his death but she doubts it.

LISA FOSTER has no idea what her husband did after he left the White House on July 20, 1993. She has checked both gas receipts and credit card receipts, but no purchases or other clues have been identified.

LISA FOSTER had no contact, including telephone calls, with her husband after he left their home on the morning of July 20, 1993. LISA FOSTER recalls one unusual event that morning which was that FOSTER asked her what she was going to be doing that day. It was uncommon for FOSTER to ask her about her plans, and it was also memorable to her that he asked because she was unusually busy that day.

LISA FOSTER is not aware of FOSTER returning home after leaving his office at the White House on July 20, 1993. It is her opinion that he did not return home on that date.

LISA FOSTER is not aware of any particular local spots frequented by FOSTER, such as restaurants or bars, which might assist investigators in attempting to trace FOSTER's activities on July 20, 1993. A Washington restaurant, La Tomate, was the only place where FOSTER would eat out during the business day.

On July 20, 1993, LISA FOSTER played tennis at approximately 8:30 a.m. At 11:45 a.m., she attended a meeting relating to multiple sclerosis. Prior to attending the meeting, LISA FOSTER woke her son so that he could drive her to the meeting. DONNA KAY MCLARTY had also invited LISA FOSTER out. LISA FOSTER had been in Washington for approximately six weeks, but she and MCLARTY had not seen each other much, so they agreed to go to a restaurant at the Four Seasons Hotel for lunch. At approximately 3:30 p.m., LISA FOSTER and MCLARTY took a taxi back to FOSTER's house. From there, LISA FOSTER and MCLARTY went to the MCLARTY residence where their respective sons met with each other. At approximately 5:00 p.m., LISA FOSTER returned home and called the White House to speak to her husband. LISA FOSTER thought that it was NANCY HEMREICH's week to be at the office, but she was told by DEBORAH GORHAM that HEMREICH's week would be the following week. GORHAM told LISA FOSTER that FOSTER was unavailable to come to the phone.

When asked whether she had made a remark about FOSTER putting the gun in his mouth, LISA FOSTER replied that when she was notified of his death, someone kept saying that FOSTER had shot himself in the head. LISA FOSTER recalls that she was very concerned about how FOSTER had shot himself because she was trying to imagine what he looked like and wondering whether he had suffered. She further said that she was concerned about whether he had blown his head off.

FOSTER had never spoken with LISA FOSTER before about suicide and he had never attempted suicide before. LISA FOSTER believes that her husband took his life because he was so terribly depressed.

LISA FOSTER has no doubts that her husband took his own life and she had no such doubts on the night of July 20, 1993.

LISA FOSTER was concerned about the autopsy being performed on her husband because she wanted to know his mental state at the time that he died. She also wanted to know if he had taken the sleeping pills or if he had been consuming alcohol or was drunk. She did not have any influence or input into causing the autopsy to be conducted so promptly.

In terms of other drugs which may have been prescribed for FOSTER in the past, LISA FOSTER is aware of the sleeping pill Restoril having been prescribed. She also recalls that an antibiotic was prescribed for FOSTER in approximately December 1992. LISA FOSTER recalls that Feldene was prescribed for treatment of FOSTER's tennis elbow.

LISA FOSTER is aware that her husband took one 50 milligram dose of Trazadone on the evening of July 19, 1993 because she told her husband to take one pill and she watched him take it. She does not know if he took any sleeping pills on that evening. On the morning of July 20, 1993, FOSTER told LISA FOSTER that he did not go out for a jog because it would take him too long to cool off. LISA FOSTER notes that her house has only one bathroom for such a large family. She notes further that, due to her relatively early departure from home on July 20, 1993, there were several family members attempting to use the single bathroom during the same period of time.

At the time of her husband's death, LISA FOSTER had some Valium which had been prescribed for her. However, at that time, she was not aware of any Valium pills missing from her prescription.

At this point in the interview, LISA FOSTER was asked to examine a pair of eyeglasses which had been found in Fort Marcy Park on July 20, 1993. LISA FOSTER held the glasses, examined them, and then stated that the eyeglasses appeared to be those of her husband. LISA FOSTER noted that the tips of the stems of the eyeglasses had bite marks on them, which was an observation consistent with one of her husband's habits. FOSTER had frequently chewed on the tips of his eyeglasses as a nervous habit.

LISA FOSTER then examined a revolver which had been brought to the interview by the interviewing agents. FOSTER examined the revolver, which had also been found at Fort Marcy Park on July 20, 1993, and stated that she believed it may be a gun which she formerly saw in her residence in Little Rock, Arkansas.

LISA FOSTER then examined a photocopy of a handwritten note which has previously been identified as having been written by her late husband. LISA FOSTER believes that the original note was written on or about July 11, 1993. LISA FOSTER is not entirely certain of this date and believes that the note was written sometime during the period between July 4 and July 20, 1993. She believes that the note was written by FOSTER in their Washington residence on a day when there were a number of young people in her house. Her son was working as a Senate aide and there were a number of other aides visiting him on that day. LISA FOSTER invited FOSTER to go with her to the store, but he declined to accompany her. FOSTER was upstairs in bed, alternately trying to sleep and work. LISA FOSTER suggested to FOSTER that he write down everything that "they" did wrong. She suggested to FOSTER that he go on the offensive and not continue to take responsibility for every mistake which was made in the White House. FOSTER agreed with LISA FOSTER's suggestion, and he sat up in bed and appeared energized. FOSTER told LISA FOSTER that he had not resigned yet, and he said that he had already written his opening argument in his defense. LISA FOSTER believes that the torn note which was found was actually FOSTER's opening argument in the event he had to testify before Congress.

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER , On 5/9/94 , Page 15

Although LISA FOSTER did not view or read the note on the day that FOSTER appeared to be energized by her remarks, she is confident that the comments written in the note were written on that same day. LISA FOSTER knows that FOSTER was upset about the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) being called in regarding the Travel Office matter, but she does not believe that FOSTER believed that the FBI had lied. People know that representatives of the media were getting deals through the White House Travel Office. LISA FOSTER is aware that people knew of these deals, but she herself knew nothing about FOSTER's remarks in the note pertaining to the Republicans or the usher's office. LISA FOSTER believes that FOSTER was concerned about excessive costs being incurred by the usher's office, but FOSTER never discussed these matters with her.

On Tuesday night, July 13, 1993, FOSTER spoke with LISA FOSTER about resigning. LISA FOSTER encouraged him to stay in his position in the White House Counsel's office. She advised him that Congress would take a recess in August 1993. LISA FOSTER then suggested to FOSTER that he should stay in his current post until Christmas of 1993. LISA FOSTER understood clearly that FOSTER was speaking about the Travel Office when he was speaking of his depression and his concerns.

LISA FOSTER is aware of the whereabouts of some ammunition which was kept at the FOSTER residence in Little Rock prior to her husband's death. She recalls finding a number of shotgun shells in the top drawer of her dresser. She also recalls that there were a number of shotgun shells kept in a closet. In searching her house, LISA FOSTER found a number of 20 gauge and 12 gauge shotgun shells, some .22 caliber ammunition, and possibly some small handgun ammunition. LISA FOSTER does not recall seeing any such ammunition at her house in Washington, D.C.

LISA FOSTER believes that she may have seen the handgun which she examined previously during the interview at her residence in Washington. LISA FOSTER recalls that as she was packing her belongings in Little Rock in preparation for coming to Washington, D.C., she found a handgun inside a travel trunk which had been packed by FOSTER prior to his departure for Washington. Specifically, as LISA FOSTER was packing in Little Rock, she came across a silver-colored gun, which she then packed in with her other property. When LISA FOSTER unpacked the gun in

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER, On 5/9/94, Page 16

Washington, FOSTER saw the gun and commented on it. LISA FOSTER had not had a prior conversation with FOSTER about bringing a gun to Washington, D.C., but she argued with FOSTER when the gun was unpacked. LISA FOSTER told FOSTER that she did not want any guns in her house in Washington.

LISA FOSTER is not aware of any photographs which may be kept in Arkansas which would depict the guns owned by FOSTER's late father. She is only aware of snapshots of family members going hunting.

LISA FOSTER is not aware of any records from the elder MR. FOSTER's estate which might describe the firearms he had owned. She is aware of a handwritten note from the elder MR. FOSTER regarding the disposition of his property after he passed away. According to this note, all of the elder MR. FOSTER's guns were left to FOSTER and a diamond was left to LISA FOSTER. After the funeral for FOSTER's father, FOSTER went down to his father's house and retrieved the guns. LISA FOSTER believes that there were approximately three to five handguns included in the guns retrieved by her husband. She believes that her husband obtained all of the guns which were left by FOSTER's father.

LISA FOSTER does not know where her husband kept the guns left to him by his father while the FOSTERS were still living in Little Rock.

LISA FOSTER believes that the shotguns from the estate of the elder MR. FOSTER are currently in the possession of her brother-in-law, who is the husband of her sister. SHARON BOWMAN, FOSTER's sister, has one handgun. LISA FOSTER believes that BERYL ANTHONY has one of the handguns from the estate here in Washington, D.C., but she has not asked ANTHONY that specific question.

FOSTER himself did not like guns. FOSTER's father had given guns to LISA FOSTER's sons, which displeased LISA FOSTER. LISA FOSTER also knows that FOSTER kept a gun in a closet in their home in Washington, D.C. LISA FOSTER was aware of the location of one gun inside her residence in Washington and she found that gun still in its usual location on the night of July 20, 1993. The gun which she found on that date was not the silver gun which she had earlier found in the trunk in Little Rock. LISA FOSTER believes that the gun found at Fort Marcy Park may be the silver gun which she brought up with her other belongings when she permanently moved to Washington. LISA FOSTER does not know with certainty, but she suspects that there were some bullets at the house in Washington, D.C.

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER, On 5/9/94, Page 17

Sometime within the last two weeks prior to July 20, 1993, LISA FOSTER told FOSTER to remove the guns from their house in Washington. FOSTER told LISA FOSTER not to remark about the guns in front of the boys. LISA FOSTER believes that she may have told her husband twice during that time to remove the guns, but she never checked to see if the guns had actually been removed.

LISA FOSTER assumes that ammunition was given to her husband in conjunction with his receipt of the guns from his father's gun collection, but she does not know for certain. She never knew FOSTER to buy any ammunition except for shotgun shells when he went hunting.

To the best of LISA FOSTER's knowledge, FOSTER never carried a handgun in his automobile. She never knew FOSTER to carry a gun with him to work. FOSTER parked his automobile in slot 16 on Executive Boulevard West whenever he was at the White House. LISA FOSTER knows that the trunks of vehicles are checked when the vehicles are driven onto the White House grounds. When not in use, the Honda was typically parked on the street adjacent to the FOSTER residence while the FOSTER family's Lexus was parked in a space behind their house.

LISA FOSTER believes that the guns which were brought by her family from Little Rock to Washington were transported on the moving van with their other belongings.

LISA FOSTER does not know where her husband might have obtained the two loose bullets which were discovered in the handgun found at Fort Marcy Park.

LISA FOSTER is not aware of any background information regarding her husband's possession of guns which could assist in tracing the gun found in his hand at Fort Marcy Park. SHARON BOWMAN told LISA FOSTER that FOSTER's father kept a gun by his bed while he was still living, and LISA FOSTER believes that that gun may be the same revolver she was shown by the interviewing agents.

FD-302a (Rev. 11-15-83)

LR-35063

Continuation of FD-302 of ELIZABETH BRADEN FOSTER, On 5/9/94, Page 18

FOSTER's father served in the United States Navy during the World War II period and may have been stationed in California.

It is difficult for LISA FOSTER to believe that FOSTER may have come home on July 20, 1993 to get a gun.

LISA FOSTER still remembers her last contact with FOSTER on the morning of July 20, 1993 in their kitchen. She recalls that FOSTER was standing very stiffly in the kitchen prior to departing for work. LISA FOSTER now believes that he may have had the gun with him in his briefcase at that time. FOSTER did not kiss her goodbye before he left for work, but she notes that his not kissing her was not unusual for him. She believes that her son was at home and sleeping until approximately 2:00 p.m. on that afternoon. However, she has not questioned her son about whether he was asleep that afternoon because she has not wanted to expose her children to too many of the circumstances of their father's death.

LISA FOSTER believes that FOSTER was suffering from a major depression which was brought about by working too hard for such a long period of time away from his family. She believes that no one loved his children more than her husband.

FOSTER was unable to attend the ceremony in which the Arkansas Bar Association named him the Lawyer of the Year because he had to go to Boston, Massachusetts that same day to interview Judge STEPHEN BREYER. Judge BREYER was a candidate for a vacancy on the United States Supreme Court, but he was bedridden as a result of a traffic accident.

At this point in the interview, Attorney JAMES HAMILTON interjected that he had traveled to Boston to interview Judge BREYER with FOSTER on that occasion.

LISA FOSTER believes that FOSTER thought he would be able to attend the Arkansas Bar Association ceremony up until the very last minute. Both LISA FOSTER and FOSTER were very upset that they were unable to attend. She believes that his inability to attend the ceremony would have weighed very heavily on FOSTER and would have caused him to feel embarrassed before his peers in Arkansas.

At the conclusion of the interview, HAMILTON, on behalf of LISA FOSTER, again asked that the original handwritten note which had been torn up be turned over to LISA FOSTER at the conclusion of the investigation. HAMILTON also reiterated his request that a photograph of the note not be released by the Office of the Independent Counsel should such a request be received under the Freedom of Information Act.

OIC-302 (Rev. 8-19-94)

OFFICE OF THE INDEPENDENT COUNSEL

Date of transcription 9/4/95

ELIZABETH "LISA" BRADEN FOSTER was interviewed at the offices of Swidler & Berlin, 3000 K St. NW, by Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr, Deputy Independent Counsel Mark Tuohey, Associate Independent Counsel Hickman Ewing, and Associate Independent Counsel Brett Kavanaugh. Also present during the interview was LISA FOSTER'S attorney, James Hamilton of Swidler & Berlin.

LISA FOSTER was advised of the nature and purpose for the interview by Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr. At various times during the interview, LISA FOSTER requested that certain statements be kept confidential to protect her family's privacy. Per direction of Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr, those statements were not documented.

LISA FOSTER stated that she is convinced that her husband committed suicide; VINCENT FOSTER (who shall be denoted throughout this document as FOSTER) was not murdered. LISA FOSTER does not specifically know the reasons why her husband took his life, and is not sure that she will ever know for certain. However, LISA FOSTER has no doubts regarding the suicide finding, and stated that she simply wants to go on with her life. LISA FOSTER expressed her discontent regarding the continued misinformation and exaggeration in the media, and its effect on her family and children.

LISA FOSTER stated the VINCENT FOSTER, JR. was right-handed.

The FOSTERS rented their home in Little Rock to Candy and Bill Lyle. LISA FOSTER left Little Rock during June 4th and 5th of 1993. The Lyles moved into the residence immediately after she left. There were some items that were left in the residence; one of the bedrooms was used as storage for the FOSTERS' items. There were some boxes of FOSTER'S containing items from his office at the ROSE LAW FIRM, some of these boxes were transported to D.C. LISA FOSTER stated that there was "no mystery" relating to these boxes, it was simply "stuff" from his office. There was an old file cabinet in the attic of the residence containing old personal documents. Also, there was a trunk that FOSTER packed, but did not take to D.C. LISA FOSTER stated that she has no knowledge of anyone from the ROSE LAW FIRM at the house after she left; specifically, LISA FOSTER had no knowledge of GEORGE JERNIGAN at the residence, and stated that she hardly knows JERNIGAN.

The FOSTERS moved into a much smaller residence in D.C. There were five of them living in the D.C. residence, with one bathroom; the living conditions were very cramped. LISA FOSTER recalled using graph paper to plan the placement of furniture in the residence. Enough furniture was left at the Little Rock residence for them to live there as well. The FOSTERS lived in a "very crowded situation" in D.C. LAURA FOSTER'S bedroom was FOSTER'S dressing room. He also dressed in the hall closet.

LISA FOSTER stated that the only records that FOSTER kept at their home in Little Rock were family tax records. In D.C., LISA FOSTER recalled boxes of personal documents and documents from the transition in administrations, including notebooks and copies of documents; "nothing significant".

At this point in the interview, JAMES HAMILTON stated that LISA FOSTER had certain miscellaneous records from the ROSE LAW FIRM, which were previously in the possession of VINCENT FOSTER. LISA FOSTER and HAMILTON examined the documents pursuant to a subpoena from the Inspector General of the FDIC. Some of these documents were produced in response to the subpoena. The ROSE LAW FIRM asserted a privilege on others, which the FDIC accepted.

The box of transition documents were brought home by VINCENT FOSTER a couple of weeks prior to his death. The box was labeled "Transition" in his handwriting.

In response to a question, LISA FOSTER stated that she is familiar with JIM GUY TUCKER.

LISA FOSTER stated that she is not familiar with JERRY PARKS, and then asked "Is he the one that got murdered"? LISA FOSTER could recall no conversations between PARKS and her husband.

OIC-302a (Rev. 8-19-94)

During the weekend prior to his death, FOSTER talked of quitting his job. However, he could not return to Little Rock because of the embarrassment it would cause him. LISA suggested that they could simply buy a boat and live on it. When they returned home from the Eastern Shore, VINCE talked with their son BRUGH about purchasing a boat. LISA FOSTER stated that FOSTER had not previously discussed buying a boat and had no familiarity with boats.

Finances were not a significant problem for the FOSTERS. Trust funds had previously been established for the children. The FOSTERS also owned stock in a variety of companies, including Wal Mart, Dillards, Federal Express, and Al-Tel/Systematics. LISA FOSTER recalled having stock in Mid-Life Investors, but stated that they never made any money. Regardless, VINCENT FOSTER was not particularly interested in investments, and did not follow the stock market. LISA FOSTER stated that "all he (FOSTER) ever did was work."

LISA FOSTER recalled a mistake on their automatic debit for Exxon charges through the White House Credit Union. They received overdraft notices from the credit union. There were also mistakes relating to ATM withdrawals. Subsequently, they requested weekly statements from the credit union to monitor the account more closely.

LISA FOSTER stated that a KINKO'S copying expense was for their personal tax records. FOSTER normally handled all aspects of the family's taxes. However, at one point, FOSTER simply said "I can't handle it," referring to the preparation of their tax returns. LISA and BRUGH attempted to help FOSTER with the tax preparation by handling some of the necessary copying. LISA FOSTER stated that she wanted to do everything she could to relieve some of FOSTER'S stress. LISA FOSTER stated that she tried to take care of everything at home.

The move to D.C. was a tremendous strain on LISA FOSTER; she had to handle everything. The logistics and coordination for the family move, and the details of renting the Little Rock residence were overwhelming. FOSTER was unable to return to Little Rock to help move the family. WEBB HUBBELL returned to help SUZY HUBBELL, but FOSTER would not leave his job at the WHITE HOUSE.

OIC-302a (Rev. 8-19-94)

LISA FOSTER could not specifically recall her husband ever mentioning "WHITEWATER." However, "everything was a problem" for FOSTER.

VINCENT FOSTER never voiced concerns regarding a "personal versus Presidential work conflict"; LISA FOSTER could not recall her husband expressing an ethical conflict with his work for the President.

LISA FOSTER did not recall her husband expressing concerns regarding a shortage of attorney's in the WHITE HOUSE COUNSEL'S OFFICE. However, he was concerned about the shortage of administrative support. VINCENT FOSTER'S secretary at the ROSE LAW FIRM had been with him a long time; FOSTER was used to excellent support personnel.

Subsequent to the WHITE HOUSE TRAVEL OFFICE reprimands, FOSTER was hurt that KENNEDY was disciplined, and that he wasn't. LISA FOSTER stated that she had heard that HILLARY CLINTON had ordered the firing of the WHITE HOUSE TRAVEL OFFICE employees, but LISA was not certain how she learned this information.

On a Saturday, two weekends prior to his death, FOSTER was in their bedroom trying to work and nap alternatively. There were a lot of kids in the house; it was crowded, noisy, and hot. FOSTER may have taken a sleeping pill the night before. FOSTER was brooding about his problems. He was consumed by the possibility of Senate Hearings concerning the Travel Office matter. LISA FOSTER thought the whole matter was "silly"; blown out of proportion. FOSTER was doing a good job; he was working very hard. LISA FOSTER did not think that he should blame himself for all of these mundane and superfluous matters. She told him to write down everything that was bothering him, to show him how comparatively insignificant they were. FOSTER immediately sat up and said "You're right." He picked up a legal pad and started writing. He seemed re-energized. LISA left the room. LISA was convinced that FOSTER would see how he was "blowing things out of proportion." LISA did not ever see what FOSTER wrote on the paper, but assumes it was the note that was found a week after his death.

FOSTER was prescribed an anti-depressant, Restoril, by Dr. Watkins. LISA was taking Valium at that time. There was a full bottle of Valium in the house; she had refilled the prescription for FOSTER.

FOSTER never specifically told LISA that he was depressed. However, when she looks back at all of the events during that time, it makes sense that FOSTER was suffering from depression. Particularly when noting that Dr. Watkins prescribed an anti-depressant, and that he took one of those pills the night before his death. LISA stated that she was present when he took the pill.

LISA FOSTER stated that FOSTER had never expressed any fear for his life. LISA had no knowledge of FOSTER ever being threatened, nor any reason why FOSTER would carry a gun to work.

FOSTER was somewhat paranoid about telephone conversations; he was often concerned that the phone might be tapped, or that others were listening to his conversations.

LISA FOSTER stated that she is convinced that FOSTER'S biggest concern was the Travel Office matter.

The FOSTERS received the Washington Post at home.

The weekend prior to his death, FOSTER and LISA went away for the weekend to Maryland's Eastern Shore. At first, FOSTER was very positive about the idea; he thought it would be a good opportunity to relax. However, the first night in the hotel he became upset, and was very emotional. He simply was unable to place his concerns in a proper perspective. He remained upset throughout the weekend. He complained of indigestion. They spent most of the weekend with the HUBBELLS at the CARDOZO'S house. The CARDOZOS were friends of the HUBBELLS. They were very active that weekend; tennis, golf, boating. FOSTER mainly stayed by their pool reading. FOSTER had a couple of beers and seemed to relax a little.

The evening that they returned home, FOSTER telephoned JIM LYONS, an attorney friend of FOSTER'S, who he relied on for legal advice. FOSTER was on the phone with LYONS for almost half an hour. LISA assumed it was about work, specifically the Travel Office matter.

The next morning, LISA told FOSTER to go jogging and that she would fix breakfast. She told FOSTER that they were going away every weekend until he started feeling better.

The following day (the day of his death), FOSTER didn't jog. He told LISA that it took too long to cool off afterwards.

LISA FOSTER did not think that FOSTER was aware of WEBB HUBBELL'S problems. LISA stated that FOSTER may not have committed suicide if he knew that HUBBELL may have needed him. Also, LISA did not think that FOSTER would have accepted his position at the White House if he knew of HUBBELL'S problems. FOSTER would have wanted to stay at the ROSE LAW FIRM to do what he could for HUBBELL.

The night before his death, FOSTER came home from work a little earlier than usual. However, he received a telephone call from the President. LISA recalled seeing a "smirk" on FOSTER'S face as he spoke with the President. Afterward, FOSTER told LISA that the President had wanted him to return to the White House to watch a movie with him and HUBBELL. FOSTER put his arm around LISA and told her that he told the President no. FOSTER did not say what the movie was, or who else was there besides HUBBELL. It was not uncommon for the President to invite friends to see movies at the White House; usually 10 to 12 people would be present for a show, which usually took place on Saturday evenings.

LISA FOSTER wanted FOSTER to be more "normal"; to take more time for himself and his family.

LISA FOSTER had no knowledge of any appointment that FOSTER had with the President for the day following his death.

On the day of VINCENT FOSTER'S death, he did not kiss LISA goodbye when he left for work. LISA recalled FOSTER standing very stiffly with his briefcase just prior to leaving. FOSTER didn't turn around to say goodbye, he simply walked out. LISA considered this somewhat odd, but given his behavior during the past month, LISA simply dismissed it to FOSTER being uptight about work.

LISA FOSTER was shown a dark brown leather briefcase, which was obtained from VINCENT FOSTER'S office. LISA identified the briefcase as the same one that FOSTER had when he left their residence on the day of his death.

OIC-302a (Rev. 8-19-94)

NANCY HERNREICH'S birthday was that week. LISA knew HERNREICH from ARKANSAS. LISA did not personally know MARSHA SCOTT.

LISA FOSTER stated that FOSTER was a perfectionist. A good example of this was the speech he wrote for the University of Arkansas Law School Commencement. FOSTER wrote and rewrote the speech. He made corrections to it and rewrote it again. Then he corrected his corrections.

LISA FOSTER stated that it was normal for FOSTER to take the onions off of his hamburgers.

After LISA FOSTER had been notified of her husband's death, she retrieved a handgun that was stored on a shelf in her closet, under her sweatshirts. The handgun was in an old leather "case". There were other handguns in the closet in LAURA FOSTER'S room. The handguns were placed there when they unpacked after the move. LISA thought that one of the handguns was silver. LISA FOSTER stated that she is completely unfamiliar with the guns, and had no interest in them, other than to try and convince FOSTER to get them out of the house. LISA FOSTER stated that she may have gone into LAURA'S closet to look for the guns after FOSTER'S death. LISA may have said that they (the guns) were not there.

LISA FOSTER does not recall looking for a note after FOSTER'S death, but she may have. LISA FOSTER is unable to specifically recall many of the events immediately after FOSTER'S death.

LISA FOSTER does not personally know CRAIG LIVINGSTONE.

The day after FOSTER'S death, LISA spoke with BERNIE NUSSBAUM. He told her that he should have let him (FOSTER) quit, or forced him to quit. LISA told NUSSBAUM that FOSTER would have killed himself anyway.

LISA FOSTER had no knowledge of the existence of the note until she returned to D.C., subsequent to FOSTER'S funeral. NUSSBAUM telephoned her, and told her about it.

LISA FOSTER stated that she is unfamiliar with FOSTER'S clients. LISA had no knowledge of SYSTEMATICS or AL-TEL.

Continuation of OIC-302 of ELIZABETH "LISA" BRADEN FOSTER, On 4/7/95, Page 8

LISA FOSTER did not know where FOSTER was during the hours immediately prior to his death.

LISA FOSTER thought that FOSTER owned three handguns. She located one after his death, and does not know what happened to the others.

SHARON BOWMAN, FOSTER'S sister, was travelling to D.C. for a visit on the day of his death.

FOSTER was very serious about the criticism he was receiving in the newspapers. At one point, LISA recalled FOSTER taking a newspaper out of her hands and throwing it away.

LISA FOSTER recalled FOSTER taking Monday off, the week before his death. LISA considered this very unusual for FOSTER.

LISA FOSTER was shown a green pot holder-type mitt, which was obtained from the glove compartment of the vehicle FOSTER drove to FT. MARCY park. LISA identified the mitt as an item from their kitchen. A Swiss exchange student gave it to the family as a gift. LISA had no knowledge of how it came to be in the vehicle.

LISA FOSTER was also shown a white envelope which contained the registration to the family's Lexus sedan. LISA had no knowledge of the circumstances pertaining to the registration, envelope, or post-it note attached to the registration. Lisa stated that the writing on the envelope is similar to FOSTER'S, and that he was responsible for obtaining a vehicle inspection for the Lexus.

LISA FOSTER was unsure of where FOSTER normally carried his wallet, but thought that he usually carried it in the backpockets of his pants.

At the conclusion of the interview, LISA FOSTER stated that she has no doubt that her husband took his own life at FT. MARCY PARK as a result of the enormous pressure that he put on himself. FOSTER blamed himself for all of the CLINTON administration's problems. LISA FOSTER stated that there were lessons to be learned from the way FOSTER lived and died.

On November 8, 1995 writer telephonically contacted Mrs. LISA FOSTER at her residence located at 5414 Stonewall Drive, Little Rock, Arkansas, telephone number FOIA(b) 6. After returning writer's call FOSTER advised that her maid, RUNELL MCCLAIN would be available for an interview at 1:00 P.M. on Friday November 10, 1995. Writer offered to conduct the interview either at MCCLAIN's home or at the Office of the Independent Counsel (OIC) in Little Rock however; FOSTER suggested that the interview be conducted at the FOSTER residence.

On 11/10/95 SA CLEMENTE interviewed RUNELL MCCLAIN at the FOSTER residence. At the conclusion of the interview SA CLEMENTE requested that MCCLAIN advise FOSTER that the interview was over. As FOSTER was showing SA CLEMENTE to the door, FOSTER apologized for being curt with SA CLEMENTE in their telephone conversations on November 8, 1995. FOSTER further explained that she was upset at the time because she had just received a subpoena from the OIC. FOSTER asked SA CLEMENTE if he would like to see the subpoena and she then handed him a Federal Express envelope which contained a letter from OIC to her attorney regarding a requested document production. FOSTER further stated that she was tired of all of this and that she had thought this was all supposed to be over by now. SA CLEMENTE apologized for the continued intrusion and stated that we were simply doing a thorough investigation.

FOSTER then asked SA CLEMENTE if MCCLAIN had been able to identify the gun. SA CLEMENTE responded no and FOSTER asked if SA CLEMENTE had the gun with him. SA CLEMENTE responded yes to which FOSTER replied, "Can I see it". SA CLEMENTE responded, "Yes, but didn't you get a chance to see it previously?", to which FOSTER replied that she did not recall. FOSTER went on to explain that when they came to her house in Little Rock to show the gun to her children, she was so upset and emotional at the time that she does not believe that she even looked at the gun. All she remembers is the Park Police showing her pictures of a gun that looked small and dark.

SA CLEMENTE then showed FOSTER the gun that was found on July 20, 1993 in VINCE FOSTER, JR.'s hand at Fort Marcy Park. LISA FOSTER then asked if she could touch the gun, which she did, after which she stated, "I don't know what all the mystery is about, I swear this is the gun that I unpacked." VINCE FOSTER, JR. had a footlocker he was planing to bring with him to Washington, D.C., but he never got around to packing it. When LISA FOSTER went to Washington, D.C., she took what was in the footlocker, boxed it and brought it to Washington with her. VINCE FOSTER, JR. had a gun and three hardcover books, one of which was "THE MAKING OF A PRESIDENT", in the footlocker. LISA FOSTER then stated, "I swear it was this gun, only it looked lighter in the front part. I thought it had a black handle and the front was silver."

FOSTER described the gun from the footlocker as looking like a "cowboy" gun, not "squared-off" like the other gun that they had in the house at the time. LISA FOSTER recalls that when she and VINCENT FOSTER, III were in the basement unpacking the boxes they had moved from Little Rock to Washington, D.C., VINCE FOSTER, III found the gun and said, "Oh shit, what is this doing here." LISA FOSTER didn't pay much attention to the gun because she is as afraid of guns as she is of snakes. LISA FOSTER seems to remember the front of the gun looking lighter. However, when the light plays off of the gun a certain way, it does seem silvery to her. LISA FOSTER stated that if she had been asked to draw a picture of the gun, it would have looked just like this one.

At this point, LISA FOSTER left the room and on her own volition telephoned VINCENT FOSTER, III at his office in Atlanta, Georgia and returned saying that VINCENT FOSTER, III remembers unpacking a Colt, but LISA FOSTER does not know the difference between a semi-automatic and a revolver and therefore did not ask her son to describe the type of Colt he unpacked. LISA FOSTER recalls telling VINCE FOSTER, JR. several times to get rid of the guns while they were living in Washington, D.C. LISA FOSTER also recalls that VINCE FOSTER, JR. got mad because she had mentioned the guns in front of their children. LISA FOSTER believes that VINCE FOSTER, JR. took a gun or guns from his father's office to keep them from his mother in case she got depressed after the death of her husband.

LISA FOSTER recalls having two different types of guns in the house in Washington, D.C. One of these guns looked like a "cowboy" gun, the other one looked "squared- off." FOSTER stated that she still had the thing that slides into the handle of the "squared-off" gun. When asked, she produced a magazine from a .45 cal semi-automatic pistol containing one .45 caliber jacketed round. LISA FOSTER stated that she specifically remembers packing, in Little Rock, and unpacking in Washington, D.C., the "cowboy" gun. However, LISA FOSTER does not recall exactly how the "squared-off" gun got to Washington, D.C. LISA FOSTER does recall however, hiding the "squared-off" gun under her sweatshirts on the shelf in her closet. The second gun (the "cowboy" gun) had been kept by VINCENT FOSTER, JR. so far back in the closet that LISA FOSTER could not reach it.

After the U.S. Park Police told LISA FOSTER about VINCE FOSTER, JR.'s death, LISA FOSTER and WEBSTER L. HUBBELL searched the closet for the two guns. They found the .45 caliber semi-automatic in its holster on the shelf under LISA FOSTER's sweatshirts. The snap of this holster was so rusted that LISA FOSTER could not open it. VINCE FOSTER, JR. did not know that this gun was hidden there. LISA FOSTER and HUBBELL never found the other gun which LISA FOSTER describes as the dark "cowboy" gun that VINCE FOSTER, JR. kept further back in the closet.

When Mr. LANKLER, OIC, and Special Agent WILLIAM COLOMBELL, FBI, came to the FOSTER residence to show the FOSTER children the gun, LISA FOSTER was so upset that she does not recall if she even looked at it. It was too soon after VINCE FOSTER JR.'s death and all of the investigators were telling her about hair and fibers and semen stains and she was very upset. Now that LISA FOSTER looks at the gun without emotions, she remembers the black handle with the lighter front part and the elongated front. LISA FOSTER stated that it just seemed lighter when she saw it in the footlocker, but that it's funny what tricks your memory will play. SA CLEMENTE asked LISA FOSTER whether her son VINCENT FOSTER, III recalled unpacking a Colt revolver or a Colt semi-automatic to which LISA FOSTER responded by suggesting that SA CLEMENTE show the gun to VINCE FOSTER, III. LISA FOSTER requested that SA CLEMENTE call VINCE FOSTER, III, speak to him about the gun, and then go show it to him.

LISA FOSTER stated that she was trying to go on with her life and that her children were also trying to go on with their lives. She had just finished boxing up all of VINCE FOSTER, JR.'s papers and books and she really did not want to look through all of this again. SA CLEMENTE responded that he understood her frustration, to which LISA FOSTER responded that she would much rather have us (the Office of the Independent Counsel) go through every paper in the house, than have to look through all those papers again herself.

LISA FOSTER volunteered that she would never allow an exhumation of VINCE FOSTER, JR.'s body, adding that she would never allow her children to be put through that ordeal.

RE: Telephone Call from Chris Ruddy

DATE: Friday, May 26, 1995

Chris Ruddy called me at about 6:00 p.m. on Thursday, May 25. He had called and left approximately 8-12 messages for me in the previous two days.

Most of the conversation involved Ruddy ranting and raving about various matters. His only question to me regarding the investigation was whether I had heard of Carolyn Huber. I felt like saying, "Of course I have heard of Carolyn Huber, you idiot" but resisted the temptation and said only that I would not be able to confirm whether I had heard of particular individuals because that might indicate whether they were involved in the investigation.

Ruddy then made a number of points, which I generally listened to without responding:

1. He will be running a couple of articles next week, and I sense that at least one of them will concern the documents issue (and I also sense that Carolyn Huber may figure in at least one article).

2. Ruddy appeared as a guest on the Gordon Liddy show for a half-hour on May 25.

3. The full-page Accuracy in Media advertisement will appear in the Washington Post and New York Times on Sunday, June 4.

4. Ruddy said that Foster's death is the classic staged suicide. Ruddy thinks he knows how it all happened. When I asked him to tell me his theory/facts, he refused.

5. He said that Mark is not beyond redemption; that Mark is a left-winger but so was Miguel and left-wingers may distrust the police more than conservatives, which is good in this investigation.

6. He thinks Inslaw, Whitewater, the Travel Office, and Waco are unconnected to Foster's death and are red herrings.

7. He thinks Jerry Seper is in bed with the Park Police, so much so that Seper should receive a pension from the Park Police.

8. He likes Hick, but does not think Hick is as involved in the Foster investigation as is necessary.

9. He does not think that Ken plays much of a role in the Foster investigation and that in any event Ken is not a prosecutor.

Here is the "short version."

Brett

In recent weeks, some members of the media and of the public have raised questions about the resignation of former Associate Independent Counsel Miguel Rodriguez and this Office's investigation into the death of former Deputy White House Counsel Vincent W. Foster, Jr. This Office's investigation into Mr. Foster's death has been, is being, and will continue to be conducted in a thorough, aggressive, and professional manner. I have been personally involved in all major decisions regarding the direction and scope of that investigation. Because the investigation is continuing before a federal grand jury, I will not comment on its substance; I can provide assurances, however, as to its continued thoroughness and professionalism.

Hick - I believe that this or any other statement makes it open season on this issue. Something along the lines of this will encourage Miguel to speak his mind. All I have seen from Ruddy et al so far strikes me as speculation and conjecture. My personal belief is that Miguel has not said much. He will if this goes out. BF

Ken, Mark, Bill, Hick:

Here is a draft press statement. Alex Azar, Steve Kubiatowski, and John Bates have provided edits and comments. We all have serious doubts whether this kind of statement is a good idea. That is especially true of the fourth paragraph.

If you want a statement shorter than this draft statement, perhaps some variation of the first and third paragraphs would be sufficient.

Brett

In recent weeks, some members of the media and of the public have raised questions about the resignation of former Associate Independent Counsel Miguel Rodriguez and this Office's investigation into the death of former Deputy White House Counsel Vincent W. Foster, Jr. Prior to offering his resignation to me in January, Mr. Rodriguez had been involved in this Office's investigation of Mr. Foster's death.

In the wake of Mr. Rodriguez's resignation, some have stated that this Office's investigation into Mr. Foster's death has been thwarted by a senior member of my staff and that the investigation is not being conducted in a thorough manner designed to elicit the truth. Mr. Rodriguez made similar statements to me in offering his resignation in January. At that time, I took his statements seriously and became personally and actively involved in investigating them. In so doing, I was assisted by numerous members of my staff, including many seasoned prosecutors and my Ethics Counsel, Professor Samuel Dash. After carefully reviewing and investigating Mr. Rodriguez's allegations, I found them to be without any merit whatsoever, as did every member of my staff who reviewed the matter.

The investigation into Mr. Foster's death has been, is being, and will continue to be conducted in a thorough, aggressive, and professional manner. I am fully satisfied that no one on my staff has thwarted or attempted to thwart the investigation of Mr. Foster's death. I have been personally involved in all major decisions regarding the direction and scope of that investigation. Because the investigation is continuing before a federal grand jury, I will not comment on its substance; I can provide assurances, however, as to its continued thoroughness and professionalism.

During my review of Mr. Rodriguez's allegations, I ultimately concluded not only that his allegations were unfounded but that, in the course of the investigation into Mr. Foster's death, Mr. Rodriguez had not conducted himself with the professionalism I demand of myself and of each member of my staff. I therefore accepted his offer to resign.

Subject: November 29, 1994 Meeting Concerning Foster Death Matter And Supplemental Investigation Prior to Grand Jury

Present for this meeting were Mark Tuohey, Brett Kavanaugh, Jeff Greene and me. The meeting was convened to discuss my review of the Foster death materials.

I began by citing my earlier memorandum indicating independent review observations, in summary. I explained that (1) the Fiske counsel report conclusions are not fully supported by the existing record and that the report contains misstatements and supposed facts that are inconsistent with the record; (2) there is not "overwhelming" evidence in the existing record to support voluntary discharge of the weapon in suicide or to support that VF was alone the afternoon of his death; and, (3) there is not "overwhelming" evidence to support the report's conclusions regarding motivation for suicide. Before any discussion, Tuohey disagreed.

I.

Regarding motivation, generally, I pointed out that numerous "state of mind" issues are inconsistent with suicide.

First, VF did not intimate suicide and facts indicate VF was not intent on fatally harming himself; indeed, VF indicated to a number of individuals that he was optimistic about work-related events to come and that he was planning future family events.

Second, the gravity of VF's apparent involvement in the travel office and usher matters did not indicate VF was in a dire predicament. The spirit of writing about the travel office, indicated Lisa Foster (LF), was optimistic and an effort to prepare for an offensive stance, i.e. that VF did not commit impropriety regarding the travel office. Moreover, I pointed out that those persons working closest to VF on the travel office matter indicated that VF was not obsessed with the matter. White House staffers Neel and Nolan declared that it was out of VF's hands. VF was not implicated in the travel office matter (or even the usher matter); the magnitude of the matters was, at worst, ethical violations by Clinton administration officials and supposedly embezzlement by non-Clinton administration officials. Others conducted the review of the travel office matter -- GAO and (internally by) McLarty and Panetta;[1] the matters had been out of VF's hands for at least four weeks; and, to the extent VF

[1]The travel office matter involved the firing of seven career White House personnel for supposed mismanagement and embezzlement. This impropriety was "revealed" by Clinton's cousin who was "planted" in the travel office. This cousin was later put in charge of the travel office.

The White House and then the GAO issued separate reports on the travel office matter. News reports pointed out issues presented by the separate reports.

First, the GAO concluded that no laws were violated but certain conduct created "appearances" of impropriety and conflicts of interest. Can such appearances be gleaned from the White House review? For example, on the afternoon of Thursday, May 13, 1993 "[HRC] told [VF] that she heard about problems in the travel office." The GAO report did not mention HRC's conversation and provided no insight into HRC's source for these complaints. On the same day, HRC also asked McLarty "about the situation in the travel office." The GAO report ignored this discussion as well. Again, on May 13, 1993, "[VF] subsequently informed [HRC] that Peat Marwick was going to conduct a review of the [travel office matter]." The GAO report provided no information about this conversation either.

Second, the GAO's report stated WK - who initiated contact with the FBI concerning the travel office matter - told the FBI "that the matter was 'directed at the highest levels' in the White House." It remains unclear what Kennedy meant?

Third, the White House review described the firing of the travel office employees "as a result of a review conducted as part of the Vice President's National Performance Review." That is also the claimed reason the White House hired Peat Marwick to audit the office. However, the GAO report states "[a] representative of the Vice President's office informed us [GAO] that . . . [the audit] was not conducted under the auspices of the NPR."

And fourth, Peat Marwick began its audit on May 14, 1993. This is the same day HRC reportedly "urged that action be taken to get 'our people' into the travel office."

CR3-----Miguel Rodriguez----- was upset, he was upset regarding William Kennedy's (WK) reprimand (as indicated in the internal McLarty/Panetta report). These facts were not pointed out by Fiske counsel.[2]

Third, I pointed out that there were additional matters on VF's mind that indicated VF's ability to cope with variables and stress, which matters were not addressed by Fiske counsel. These matters may not be disputed and at least include: (1) the blind trust; (2) the 1992 taxes, which taxes involved Whitewater concerns; (3) VF's wife, recently in Washington, D.C.; (4) the FBI's director was being replaced (after the FBI had not been accommodating to the White House on the travel office investigation); (5) new personnel in the counsel's office (Sloan and Castleton); (6) VF's weekend with Hubbell; (7) VF's visiting sister; and (8) financial concerns,[3] which concerns were demonstrated by VF's special authorization of release of financial statements, every Friday, to LF via VF's secretary.

[2]Fiske counsel also failed to consider: (1) the travel office matter involved David Watkin's (DW) staff and, specifically, Patsy Thomasson (PT); (2) the usher matter involved HRC and her staff, including Maggie Williams (MW); (3) both matters involved allegations concerning loosely managed money (the travel office from the press corp. and the usher's office from private donations); (4) money was allegedly mishandled in both matters resulting in controversy; (5) the legal counsel's office was called into each matter; (6) while VF was doing damage control on the travel office matter and usher matter, he learned certain facts (and possibly improprieties); (7) VF was involved in assessing the White House's actions; (8) VF was found dead; (9) PT and MW are in VF's office searching the evening of VF's death; and (10) DW requests PT to search and MW goes to the White House and searches after speaking with HRC. Against this background, the torn paper makes a distinction between the Clinton Administration's loyal staff and others. Also against this background, there are allegations that the Clintons received cash prior to moving to Washington, D.C. through Madison Guarantee -- closed due to loosely managed money.

[3]VF's secretary (Deborah Gorham) was "absolutely" certain VF had no financial difficulty. According to Gorham, the financial statement request was made merely because the Foster family checking account in Washington, D.C. was overdrawn. If such witnesses are correct about the Foster's not having financial trouble, VF's financial concerns may instead be his desire to monitor his account to ensure that, for example, no mysterious deposits (or withdrawals) were made or merely to ensure the Washington, D.C. account was not overdrawn again.

LR3-----Miguel Rodriguez-----MR

Fourth, apparently on VF's mind were private conversations VF had, at length, with two blonde females (Marsha Scott and Susan Thomases) prior to VF's death. Neither female can recall details of her conversation with VF. Neither female, however, indicated that her conversation with VF caused VF dire concern. Although Fiske counsel identified that such conversations occurred, no probe of the conversations was conducted. Thomases claimed attorney client privilege regarding her conversations with VF. I have advocated, however, that she has no such privilege and/or VF had no such privilege. I strongly recommended further exploration on her (and Robert Lyon's) dealings with VF and the privilege issues.

And fifth, on the day of VF's death -- in Arkansas -- the search warrant for Hale's office was executed. However, while VF's Rolodex contained Hale's telephone number, there is no indication that VF knew of the search or that VF was preoccupied by events concerning investigation of Hale. Later in Arkansas, reportedly, documents VF had worked on were removed from Rose law firm storage and were destroyed.

II.

In addition to "state-of-mind" inconsistencies, I reminded Tuohey that several issues -- VF's 1 1/2 days off the previous week, VF's weekend association with Hubbell (contrasted to the account by LF), VF's conversation with WJC and Lyons, and VF's concern for media attention in connection with the taxes (Whitewater) -- remained.

In addition, telephone logs from the counsel's office are incomplete. Betsy Pond, Nussbaum's secretary, said VF may have had a private phone line. Even if VF did not have a private line, was there more than one line into VF's office? Only one line, to date, has been investigated. Fiske counsel did not follow through in its investigation of these issues.

Tuohey agreed with my decision to investigate these issues but cautioned that no one in Little Rock and none of the Foster family members were to be contacted until he was further briefed on areas.

III.

I pointed out that little is known about VF's final week of activity involving WJC, Hubbell, Scott, Thomases, and Lyons. Regarding these individuals, I had pointed out the following.

Sunday and prior July 18, 1993	Monday July 19, 1993	Tuesday July 20, 1993	Wednesday July 21, 1993
-VF took 1 1/2 days off during this prior week. -During prior week, VF had met with Thomases (HRC's lawyer) at her hotel room and again for lunch with "friends."	-VF's office contained personal Clinton family documents including 1992 tax documents and Whitewater documents.	-No one admits to know what work related tasks VF did in morning or what he was to do in afternoon. -VF death -Thomases seen in VF's office searching	-Lyons came to Washington, D.C. supposedly to discuss with VF only travel office matters.
-VF took weekend vacation with Hubbell in attendance.	-VF had been working on Whitewater issues with Riki Seidman and with a paralegal (VF is concerned about tax related media attention says paralegal).	-Scott in White House the late evening.
-Upon return on Sunday, VF has conversation with Lyons and conversation with WJC. -While VF is not implicated in the travel office matter or the Usher matter, VF is fully involved in the 1992 tax matter (involving Whitewter), which taxes must be filed imminently. -Lyons is not involved in the travel office matter but is fully involved in the tax matter. -Lyons and Foster agree to meet on Wednesday, July 21, 1993.	-VF meets with Scott for a long private discussion. -Hubbell is with WJC at White House and they call VF, supposedly only to invite him to watch a movie and not to discuss pending matters. -Pending matters undisputedly include taxes, blind trust, and weekend. -O'Neil sees Susan Thomases in VF's office on the night of death.

Also, I reminded Tuohey that it seemed odd that WJC and Hubbell called for VF to come over on the eve before VF's death. Neither WJC nor Hubbell can recall details (except as to the movie invitation).[4] [4]Ironically, the proposed movie was "In The Line of Fire," which movie involved a person's loyalty to the Office of the President and the person's willingness to sacrifice his life for the President. Also ironic is that VF's corpse was found under a cannon's line of fire.

[redacted]

IV.

I raised other issues occurring in the period before VF's death, and particularly Monday, July 19, 1993 (the day after VF and LF supposedly returned from vacation).

Specifically, I pointed out that cancelled checks indicate a home security system payment, medical lab report payment, radiology center payment and pediatric center payment, all within four weeks of VF's death. Tuohey acknowledged the need to investigate these expenses and a Kinko expense. Regarding the "Kinko" expense, I pointed out that, sometime on July 19, 1993, LF wrote a check to "Kinko's" for approximately $19.00. What was being copied (or purchased)? Did the Fosters leave documents to be reproduced over the weekend? None of these expenditures were explored by Fiske counsel.

I pointed out that the credit card receipts indicated that the Fosters checked out on Monday, July 19, 1993, and not Sunday. I will investigate this issue as well as the telephone records at the lodging. Moreover, some of VF's credit cards and other papers in his wallet have never been investigated. VF's wallet was returned to the legal counsel's office on the night VF died. See infra.

V.

Regarding the period before VF's death, I posed the following question: how did VF acquire the unidentified loaded weapon?

First, there was no definitive evidence that the bullets or weapon found at the death scene were linked to VF prior to July 20, 1993 -- the day of VF's death.

Second, I pointed out that on the day of VF's death, once VF left his residence, he was not observed to return. Thus, assuming VF's possession of the weapon on the 20th was voluntary and purposeful, VF either took it with him to the White House (carrying it from his residence on his person or in his car) or he acquired it after leaving the White House at 1:10 p.m. (acquired it from somewhere outside of his residence). At the present time, there is no evidence to believe there was another residence or area VF maintained. If VF did not go at 1:10 p.m. to a private place where he stored the weapon and his possession of the weapon was voluntary and purposeful, then VF must have had the loaded weapon on his person at the White House or it was unattended in his vehicle at the White House.

LL3 -----Miguel Rodriguez----- MR3

Third, even if VF was voluntarily and purposely carrying the loaded unidentified weapon on the day of his death, his motivation necessitating carrying a loaded weapon is unclear. In this regard, there is presently insufficient evidence of VF's intentions when he left his residence. On one hand, VF said no goodbyes and VF was not described to be morose or otherwise fatalistic when he departed family members. The lack of unusual behavior by VF is consistently reported by legal counsel staff in interview "notes" made by USPP. See infra. On the other hand, there is a lot of, apparently surprising, after the fact "state-of-mind" rhetoric from some friends and family that VF was mentally disturbed. Prior to VF's death, however, there is no direct non-testimonial evidence (medical/psychiatric reports of treatment[5] or even consultation[6]) for such a mental imbalance. Despite the after the fact rhetoric, VF is described by friends and family as the last anyone could imagine committing suicide and as a virtual well-spring of strength.

And fourth, as previously stated, while the weapon found at death has not been conclusively identified as belonging to VF or even the Foster family, VF did have a weapon -- his own weapon -- in his Washington, D.C. home. Fiske counsel did not determine if VF's weapon, found in the Foster's Washington, D.C. home, was registered. We then discussed the following questions:

[5]According to VF's sister, VF was very anxious and concerned about his security clearance. In this regard, VF's sister stated that she tried to persuade VF to speak with a psychiatrist about job related anxiety. VF reportedly told his sister that he was concerned about revealing confidential information, placing the psychiatrist in jeopardy, and VF leaving a trail to medical help. Despite these concerns, VF supposedly accepted from his sister three psychiatrist names and telephone numbers. Also, despite VF's concerns about being linked to psychiatrists, VF apparently wrote the names and telephone numbers onto White House stationery and then loosely carried this writing in his daughter's car or in his wallet. See infra. And, despite VF's concerns about being linked to psychiatric help, each psychiatrist was demonstrably called from VF's office, which calls were boldly billed to VF's home phone number. Oddly, VF never personally spoke to any psychiatrist. Also oddly, VF billed the calls to his home phone instead of using his home phone telephone card (which he carried in his wallet) or a pay phone. Thus, in spite of VF's reported concerns, VF left a clear trail to each of the psychiatrists, while never speaking to any one psychiatrist.

[6]The Foster family physician reportedly spoke with VF the night before his death and prescribed medication for supposed depression; VF reportedly described himself to the doctor as anxious and as not being able to sleep.

(1) why would VF "surepticiously" get an unidentified gun (and where could he get two bullets only) to commit an "obvious" act of suicide when VF had his own weapon at his bedside, and (2) whose weapon did VF possess in his hand upon his death?

In sum, at the present time, there is insufficient evidence to conclude (1) how VF acquired the unidentified loaded weapon -- assuming his possession of it was voluntary and purposeful; and (2) it is not possible to conclude when, or why VF came to possess the loaded unidentified weapon. Against this background, I pointed out that it was odd that David Watkins and Bruce Lindsay, each upon receiving notice of VF's death (independent from the other), immediately inquired if the weapon was identified.[7] LF, upon notification, oddly immediately asked if the gun was placed in his mouth (as if this were a signal to her of some kind). LF was described as angry upon notification.

VI.

I next addressed the manner of VF's death. In doing so, I disputed that the weapon found in VF's hand was discharged from VF's hand.[8] Arguendo, I also disputed how the weapon was discharged: voluntarily or discharged in some other manner.

I pointed out that for voluntary discharge, according to how the weapon was found, VF must have held the weapon in a peculiar backwards position. Also, VF must have held the weapon in a manner that caused (along his index finger and thumb/finger webbing) an unusual amount of gun powder residue.

[7]I speculated that if Watkins and Lindsay were already aware VF had died and the manner of death (or the location of death assuming suicide) was the object of a cover-up, Watkins and Lindsay would be waiting for confirmation that an unidentified weapon was located and planted.

[8]On one hand, of the first two individuals to see the corpse, neither W5 nor Fornshill saw a weapon in VF's right hand. Fornshill was the 1st response person to the corpse. On the other hand, Hall, the 2nd response person, glanced at what he thought was a gun but Hall could not describe it. Gonzales, the 3rd response person to the corpse, only saw what he believed to be the cylinder of a gun and disputed the photographs supposedly representing VF's arm position and the location of the gun in VF's hand. Gonzales did not describe the cylinder until he had seen a picture, thereafter he said it appeared to be a revolver. Arthur, the 4th response person, believed there was a different gun (a clip loading gun) than that depicted in the photograph that he was shown. Similarly, Wacha and Iacone saw a different gun (a silver gun).

(A later meeting -- with a D.C. forensic scientist who observed a photo of the gun powder hand residue -- revealed that such an amount of residue indicated numerous firings of the weapon. At this meeting, Greene agreed that numerous firings could be an explanation for such residue.) This gun powder residue is not only questionable due to amount but is also questionable due to its thumb/index finger placement on VF's right hand. See infra.

The backwards position of the weapon -- for a voluntary suicide discharge -- would have required a firm grip on the revolving cylinder with the right hand (with thumb through the trigger guard) and a firm grip on the gun handle by the left hand. The weapon is not small or of slight weight. However, on this humid summer day, though the weapon was found untouched in the clutch of VF's right hand (VF's thumb jammed in the trigger and guard), no fingerprints, partials or even smudges were found on the weapon. Also, no prints were found even though VF supposedly held the weapon tightly enough not to break or even chip his teeth upon discharge. Apparently, this would mean VF, supposedly contemplating his life, did not have moisture or sweat on his hands as he held the loaded weapon in his mouth.

Contrary to my position, Tuohey and Greene did not find these facts troubling. I added that the FBI latent examiner stated to me that the weapon appeared clean or wiped when he received it from the USPP. I also reported that agent Colombell had stated to me that (1) by the USPP's own admission to him, the USPP's latent test was rushed, (2) a "taping" of the entire weapon to recover prints possibly destroyed prints, partials or smudges, if any existed, and (3) the weapon was processed without the proper chain of custody transfer from the USPP scene evidence collector.

VII.

I pointed out that, on July 20, 1993, VF had a normal morning at work. "Notes" from initial USPP interviews, conducted immediately after VF died, revealed the following. VF's secretary, Deborah Gorham, stated that she noticed "nothing different from normal in [the] last week." Gorham said there was "nothing unusual in his [VF's] mood that morning" and it was "normal for him [VF] to be quiet." Pond, Nussbaum's secretary, stated that she observed "no depression" and that there had been "no difference in VF's emotional state." Pond added that she was "unaware of any weight loss." Months later, Pond confided to another White House staffer that VF really seemed OK when he left at 1:10 p.m. on July 20, 1993. Nussbaum similarly detected "no unusual behavior" prior to VF leaving the counsel's office at 1:10 p.m. on July 20, 1993. Moreover, the USPP notes indicate that at 12:17 p.m. on the 20th -- less than one hour before VF leaves the counsel's office -- VF was actively working and returned Brant Buck's telephone call (presumably concerning the blind trust matter). Buck was out. VF nevertheless had a brief conversation with Buck's secretary, Linda Johnson. The USPP notes indicate that, according to Johnson, VF "appeared to be normal" and "nothing [was] out of the ordinary." Gordan Rather, (VF's long time friend and a partner at Bruce Lindsay's firm) also tried to communicate with VF on the day of his death. Rather stated that based on his past dealings with VF and, having personally met with him only 4 months earlier, "[VF] was the same Vince [Foster] he has always known" and Rather offered that "[VF] was a very impressive person." These initial interview statements were not addressed by Fiske counsel in its final report.

Subsequent FBI interviews of these witness and other legal counsel staff indicate that, contrary to earlier statements, VF was preoccupied and not fully responsive on the morning of his death. White House and legal counsel staff all -- oddly in these later interviews -- used similar descriptions of VF's preoccupied manner. Against this background, I reminded Tuohey that the legal counsel's office admitted that the secretaries had been "prepared". Also, with the exception of Colombell, FBI agents who I interviewed stated that, across the board, the counsel's office staff appeared to be incomplete or false in response to questions.

VIII.

I pointed out that while one secretary was unsure if VF left with his coat and a briefcase and another was sure he had no briefcase when he left with his coat, a legal counsel office clerk, Castleton, recalled that VF left with both a briefcase and coat.[9] Also, VF took a beeper, which beeper was supposedly off when USPP arrived to VF's corpse. VF's intent to return is also demonstrated by his statement upon leaving: "I'll be back". Moreover, I pointed out that it was odd that VF appeared to be in a hurry or, at least, to be on a time schedule, i.e. VF appeared to have somewhere to go. This is demonstrated by the manner in which he left, how he ate and the manner in which he acquired his lunch. On the other hand, after a subsequent interview by Colombell regarding how VF acquired his lunch, Castleton stated that he was not sent by VF to hurry VF's lunch along.

---

[9]At least four non-law enforcement, i.e. non-USPP, personnel observed a briefcase with VF's coat in the Ft. Marcy parking lot. Witnesses (Hall, Gonzalez and W5) observed the briefcase in VF's locked vehicle after the witnesses had observed VF's body. Hall and Gonzalez described the briefcase as black. Photos taken of VF's vehicle on July 20, 1993 -- in the Ft. Marcy parking lot -- depict a black briefcase on parking lot asphalt between VF's car and an adjacent responding USPP vehicle. W2 stated that he observed a briefcase at a time prior to discovery of VF's death. Moreover, the existing record is clear that VF had at least two briefcases. Indeed, PT searched one briefcase, Lindsay recalled two briefcases, and Nussbaum searched a different briefcase than that searched by PT. The briefcase searched by Nussbaum was later turned over to OIC. Fiske counsel only concluded one briefcase existed and failed to probe observations of a briefcase with VF's coat in the Ft. Marcy parking area.

IX.

On the day of VF's death, during the afternoon, I pointed out that LF was occupied by Watson's wife. (VF apparently was at odds with Watson because of the travel office matter.)

At approximately the time VF's corpse was being photographed by USPP, LF was seen and talked to by neighbors as she worked on her front yard. I advocated interviewing the neighbors at least concerning: conversations with Foster family members, dealings with VF, security concerns the Fosters may have expressed and regarding whether the Fosters stated their sentiments about being in Washington, D.C. Fiske counsel only interviewed neighbors in connection with Craig Livingstone's claimed presence in the neighborhood on the 21st morning.

X.

I next focused on Ft. Marcy park generally.

I stated that the FBI refused to provide me with a scale map and a map indicating all maintenance roads. I pointed out that I walked a maintenance road from the second cannon area (where VF's corpse was found) and that there was at least one additional, supposedly pedestrian only, entrance to the park (this second entrance is closer to the second cannon than the main entrance). The second entrance has a parking area. There is no evidence that this second entrance and parking area was secured or investigated at the time VF's corpse was processed by USPP. Fiske counsel has not investigated any aspects of this second entrance and it is not indicated in any FBI reports or USPP reports. It appears Congress did not know of the second entrance and second parking area. Since VF's death, it appears a fence has been erected at this second entrance and the area between the second cannon and the maintenance road has been altered.

[redacted].

As part of our general discussion, Greene, upon examining USPP on-the-scene polaroid photos, observed that the photos depict an unusual darkness background. Kavanaugh had also made this observation. By contrast, the body was found and photographed between 6:15 p.m. and 7:00 p.m. on a clear summer day.[10] (I investigated these photos with the assistance of paralegal Lucia Rambusch. See infra.)

Also, as part of our general discussion, I pointed out that -- although taken -- no 35mm photos were successfully developed and although there were at least five photographers, only 18 polaroid photos were provided by USPP to OIC.[11] The USPP provided OIC 18 "polaroid copies" of 18 polaroid photos and no 35mm photos of the death scene. The original polaroids were also provided. Both the original polaroids and the polaroid copies are of poor quality, depicting poor color and blurred, bleached objects. Obviously, the polaroid copies are even more distorted

[10]At this point, I described the day according to the existing record: it was a hot, humid, July afternoon, the parkway traffic was crawling, and there was a clear sky.

[11]The following USPP were observed as polaroid photographers: Braun (VF's vehicle in Ft. Marcy parking lot), Edwards (VF corpse), Simonello (VF corpse), Ferstl (VF corpse), Rolla (VF corpse). Only photos from Braun, Edwards and Simonello have been received by OIC. Significantly, Ferstl's polaroids (which OIC does not possess) were taken before the special (Criminal Investigation Branch (CIB)) team -- Braun, Siminello and Rolla -- arrived. The gun in VF's hand supposedly changed color and position after this special team arrived and the glasses were also found after this special team arrived. Braun supplied 5 photos, Edwards supplied 5 photos, and Simonello supplied 8 photos. Ferstl estimated he took at least 7 photos but none have been provided. Witnesses observed Rolla taking polaroid photos but none have been provided. Regarding the polaroids, the original emulsion package numbers indicate at least 4 packages (minimum of 10 per package) of film was used (excluding an apparent 5th package for Ferstl's 7 photos). Thus, OIC does not have all polaroids.

At least, Simonello took 35 mm photos (in addition to polaroids). Other USPP may have taken 35 mm photos. However, none of his 35 mm photos resulted in a clear depiction -- the camera was improperly set and each frame was over-exposed. Despite the claimed best efforts and technology of the FBI, the existing 35 mm photos are useless.

than the original polaroids.[12] I also pointed out to Greene that the terrain and foliage depicted does not match in each picture. The second cannon appears only in one on-the-scene polaroid photo (wherein only the top of VF's head is barely discernable), despite the cannon being approximately 10 feet from the corpse. Also, VF's glasses are depicted in a strange arrangement, found completely folded approximately 20 feet from the head of VF's corpse, with no spatter or prints/partials/smudges. The glasses are found, after an unsuccessful preliminary search, by Simonello, USPP, who specially arrived from the USPP station in Anacostia over 30 minutes after the body was discovered.[13]

XI.

I then specifically focused on the first time Ft. Marcy park is possibly linked to VF.

I reported that at approximately 2:30 p.m. a witness (W1) driving on the G.W. Parkway observed an out-of-state Japanese-type metallic colored car dart, cut into, the Ft. Marcy parking area. The driver of the metallic colored car, says W1 during an initial interview, was alone and was a white male. W1 only saw the rear of the metallic colored car. W1 initially believed the car to possess out-of-state (Arkansas or Ohio) plates. However, when shown a photo of the rear of VF's car, W1 is confident that it was not VF's car. W1 stated that the car that cut him off was a different color and that the metallic colored car displayed a different type plate than VF's car. Despite a subsequent FBI interview by Colombell in which W1 supposedly cut back on his confidence in his recollections, W1 steadfastly maintained it was an Arkansas, or similarly identified plate on the car and that it was not VF's car, as depicted.

[12]Moreover, only polaroid copies of original polaroids were analyzed by FBI lab technicians in blood spatter analysis and also by the forensic scientist team relied upon by Fiske counsel. Apparently, blow-ups of "polaroid copies of polaroid originals" were shown to EMT witnesses. All witnesses will thus have bases on "new evidence" to formulate their refreshed recollection, including the forensic scientist team relied upon by Fiske counsel. I have already taken successful steps in this direction.

[13]After preliminary review of some photos, Tuohey had to leave for a short time, then Kavanaugh left for a short time. Both counsel then returned and then again left at different times, as needed, during the afternoon. I continued with Greene and the counsel as each was present.

Although Tuohey's position (and the Fiske report) was contrary, I pointed out that VF was thus not identified by car at that time. Indeed, W1 could have observed anyone with out-of-state plates driving into the park, even someone who VF was to meet or who was otherwise coming to the scene. Indeed, a metallic colored car was later seen next to VF's car in the Ft. Marcy parking area. See infra. Despite W1's disagreement, that the metallic car was VF's car, Fiske counsel only stated that they were "unable" to conclude time of arrival of the car.

XII.

I pointed out that, in fact, the first time VF's car was observed at Ft. Marcy Park was at approximately 4:30 p.m. At that time, a witness (W2) stopped at Ft. Marcy park to urinate.

W2 saw VF's car parked where it was later found -- at a front (approximately 4th) parking space as one enters the lot. W2 walked along the side of VF's car. W2 saw, "draped over the driver's seat", VF's coat and VF's leather briefcase on the passenger side seat. W2 specifically recalled the presence of VF's briefcase. W2 clearly identified VF's car. In addition, W2 recalled a dark metallic Japanese type car near the front of the parking lot, i.e. near where VF's car was parked at 4:30 p.m. There was a dark complexion male in the car watching W2. In fact, as W2 walked near VF's car, the male in the metallic colored car got out of his metallic colored car and stood next to it.

The USPP, the FBI and Fiske counsel did not attempt to investigate the metallic colored car or its occupant. W2's recollection of the occupant as a person watching him as he was next to VF's car is not recounted in the Fiske report. Further, Fiske counsel did not address this witness' account of the metallic car in its public report.

XIII.

I next discussed W3 and W4. These witnesses, with intent to picnic, arrived at the park in one car at approximately 5:00 - 5:30 p.m. While reports stated W3 and W4 were in a white Nissan sedan, no pictures of the car exist. (What does the registration say?) W3 and W4 were seated in their car, backed into a space at the far end of the lot. W3 stated that she observed 4 people in the park before they (W3 and W4) were contacted by responding personnel. W3, as they pulled into the parking area, saw a dark haired male with no shirt sitting in the driver's seat of VF's car; she saw W5 and his van, see infra; she saw a sedan driven by a shaggy haired male pull into the lot and then pull out; and she later saw a big and burly dark haired male in jeans in the lower park area (after W3 and W4 left their car to picnic). W4 stated he recalled at least 3 persons. W4 saw a shaggy haired blond male working under VF's car hood; W4 saw W5 and W5's white van, see infra; and a jogger type white male in the lower park area (after W3 and W4 left their car to picnic. The witnesses' USPP interview is contrary on each and every point. W3 boldly claimed, after reviewing the USPP interview report by USPP Braun, that the USPP report was flatly "untrue". Oddly, these two witnesses names, addresses, phone numbers and SSN were on David Watkins' White House stationery. Subsequent interviews resulted in one of the two witnesses stating wine coolers were in the witnesses' own car and that their car was a white 4-door Nissan with blue interior.

W3's and W4's recounting, on the other hand, of the white van, (belonging to W5 -- the confidential witness) is consistently reported.[14]

Later, W3 and W4 are found picnicking in another area of the park, an opposite end from the corpse.

Even though W3 and W4 corrected the USPP interview report with their later (FBI) statements, Fiske counsel did not state W3's and W4's observations of persons working on VF's car and sitting in VF's car. The observations occurred immediately before W5 observed VF's corpse, i.e. VF was already dead.

IVX.

W5, a confidential witness, was the next person to arrive at the Ft. Marcy parking area. W5 arrived at approximately 5:30 p.m. W5 was consistently observed by W3 and W4. W5 upon arriving in a white van, threw trash away and then walked the upper, north, path searching for a private area to urinate. W5 found his way to the second cannon area. W5 stated that he was familiar with Ft. Marcy park, having been to the park on a previous occasion. About the time (or after) W5 urinated, he saw the corpse. He went over to the corpse and stood approximately three feet from VF's head. W5 stared at VF, the corpse, for several minutes. W5 also observed a wine cooler type bottle, half-consumed, next to VF's body. W5 believed that there were wine cooler stains on VF's shirt. (Later review of autopsy photos indicated that VF's shirt was wet and cleaned in spots, i.e., there is a wet spot detected on the shirt in the area depicted as containing a purplish spot.) W5 observed a trampled area below the corpse looking down from the berm. W5 left the scene and returned to the parking area. Upon returning to the parking area, W5 looked into VF's vehicle, the brown Honda, and observed VF's coat, briefcase, and tie. W5 then left the parking area and went to another park, Turkey Run park, and notified park workers who relayed this information at approximately 5:50 p.m.

[14]Here, I digressed and offered the following observation, based on my reading of the entire death and document records: witness accounts were consistently reported (as re-interviewed) on issues suggesting suicide but inconsistently reported on other issues.

XV.

Review of emergency vehicle dispatch logs indicate that the medic unit called, Medic 1, was dispatched at 6:03 p.m. At the same time, an Engine crew, Engine 1, was dispatched form the same fire house, Station 1. The dispatch logs also indicate that the medic unit and engine unit were packed up and on their way back to the station from Ft. Marcy at 6:37 p.m. Thereafter, the dispatch logs indicate that the U.S. Park Police (USPP) requested an ambulance to transport the body at 7:45 p.m. The ambulance unit was on scene at Ft. Marcy park to transport the body at 8:16 p.m. Thus, the USPP were in exclusive control of VF's corpse from 6:37 p.m. to after 8:00 p.m. Thus, there is no evidence that anyone other than USPP personnel (excepting Dr. Haut who arrived at 7:40 p.m.) were in Ft. Marcy park or anywhere near the death scene for approximately 1 1/2 hours.

XVI.

W6, a white female driving a Mercedes, arrived at the entrance of Ft. Marcy park at approximately 6:00 p.m. W6 was experiencing car trouble and abandoned her vehicle at the entrance to Ft. Marcy park. As she left her vehicle, she left the Mercedes' emergency lights on. W6 then walked into the Ft. Marcy parking area from the GW Parkway entrance. On the way, W6 observed a well-dressed white male sitting in a white Honda. The white male was looking at papers in the white Honda. The white male made comments to her, asking her if he could help her. He then started his engine and followed her into the park. Eventually, he went past her and into the parking area where he turned his vehicle around and then exited the parking area. W6 continued into the parking lot area, specifically, the upper parking lot area. W6 does not know what cars were in the lower parking lot area, e.g., W3 and W4's white Nissan. W6 observed at the upper parking lot area, VF's Honda and also a dark blue (metallic?) car. W6, not being able to find a public telephone, then walked back out of the Ft. Marcy parking lot area and proceeded to walk on the right shoulder of the G.W. Parkway.

XVII.

When the emergency vehicles arrived at approximately 6:10 p.m., there were supposedly only two vehicles in the Ft. Marcy parking area. The brown Honda, VF's car, and the white Nissan at the lower parking area (the vehicle used by W3 and W4).

Some emergency personnel recall there being a red or reddish Honda also present in the parking lot area or entrance area. Also, emergency personnel differ in their recollection of USPP arrival. In fact, USPP Fornshill arrived at the scene at approximately 6:10 p.m. It is unclear from the existing record whether Fornshill arrived before or after the emergency vehicles.

When the USPP vehicle and the emergency personnel got together, they decided to split into two teams to search for the reported corpse. The north path was pursued by Team 2, comprised of Gonzalez, Hall and USPP Fornshill. The lower (Pimmit Run) path, i.e. southern path, was investigated by the Engine 1 crew (Pisani, Iacone, and Wacha) and Arthur, EMT. Team 1, the Engine 1 crew and Arthur, passed W3 and W4 as they moved on the Pimmit Run path in the direction of the Potomac river. Upon notification from dispatch that Team 2 had found the corpse, Team 1 retraced their steps and saw W3 and W4 a second time. When Team 1 arrived in the parking area, USPP were in the area but not observed in the parking area.

Then, Team 1 personnel all went to the death scene area. In particular, Team 1 passed Team 2 on the way to the death scene and Team 1 received instruction on how to get to the death scene as they passed Team 2. Gonzalez (and Hall) before returning from the death scene, indicated the DOA status of the body to dispatch. As Gonzales and Hall were leaving the death scene area at cannon area 2, Gonzalez and Hall saw USPP personnel enter cannon area 2. Fornshill, however, stated that these personnel were other EMT or emergency personnel. In other words, Fornshill did not recognize these persons any more than Gonzalez and Hall recognized these persons.

XVIII.

Regarding Team 2, I explained that when Fornshill arrived at the corpse, it was approximately 6:10 p.m. Fornshill arrived with Hall nearby, then Hall rushed over, and seconds later, Gonzalez rushed over. Thus, the only USPP officer, of all seven responding personnel present and searching, located the corpse. When Hall rushed over, pursuant to Fornshill's shout of discovery, Hall saw and heard a person in orange moving swiftly away behind bushes on the maintenance path/road immediately below the berm and corpse. In a later re-interview, Hall supposedly cut back on his initial statement and said he may have seen and heard a car on Chain Bridge Road. Chain Bridge Road, however, was approximately 100 yards away and Hall did not know Chain Bridge Road even existed. At the time, Hall was so sure of his observations on the park's path/road immediately below the berm, that he told Fornshill "there's someone down there."[15]

Gonzalez, upon rushing to the corpse, observed that the body was in a laid out position with no blood on the ground. The pictures show no blood on the ground. Gonzalez checked for a pulse but did not move the head or the body. Neither Hall nor Fornshill moved the body; similarly, no one present observed the other move the head or the body. The upper right side of VF's shirt, however, was spattered with blood and "unidentified" debris. (Why was the debris not identified?) Later interviews indicated the witnesses believed it to be vomit or dried, coagulated blood. Gonzalez, a paramedic, believed the decedent suffered a bullet wound to the head (with an entry point from the neck's bloody area?).

I reminded Tuohey that only two identical sets of 18 polaroid photographs were provided to OIC. One photo clearly depicts a dark, burnt appearing, blood area on VF's neck. The D.C. medical examiner who observed the photo stated that, if the picture were cropped and without knowing more, the burnt blood patch looked like a bullet hole or puncture wound. Based on my own experience and training, I am confident the traumatized area was caused by a "stun-gun" or "tazer" type weapon.

In addition, I pointed out that the third EMT to the body, EMT Arthur, concluded that there was a puncture wound or bullet wound on VF's neck. I offered that such wound(s) would explain the upper right shoulder blood. Arthur is also a "paramedic" EMT.

Regarding the trauma to the neck area, I jumped forward to an autopsy photograph depicting the right side of the neck. I offered my opinion that two puncture like wounds can be observed. The D.C. Medical Examiner similarly observed the appearance of crater-like indentations on the right side of the neck. The examiner stated that such could be caused by a foreign object folded into the neck upon transport. However, due to the burnt blood area observed and photographed at the scene, it is illogical that such occurred during transport. The autopsy report does not identify trauma to the neck.

[15]Attached hereto is a reproduction of a diagram [redacted] The diagram depicts Ft. Marcy Park and the paths traveled by Team 1 and Team 2 vis-a-vis the cannon areas and corpse.

Against this background, the neck area and the original photographs have not been investigated by Fiske counsel.

IXX.

I next offered to provide the following written summary of USPP and emergency personnel (FBI 302) statements.

Apt, USPP, responding to the Ft. Marcy Park scene, stated that she received the call to respond at approximately 6:00 p.m. Apt recalled that before going into the parking lot, she took information regarding the abandoned Mercedes "on the entrance ramp" to the park. When she arrived at the Ft. Marcy parking lot Apt saw Spetz, USPP, interviewing the picnicking couple, W3 and W4. Apt then said she went to the death scene "immediately" with Rolla, Braun and Simonello, USPP. At the death scene, Apt saw Edwards, Ferstl, and Hodakievic. Apt saw Edwards "completing" taking polaroid pictures. Apt then saw Rolla "commence" taking polaroid pictures. She also saw Simonello taking 35 mm pictures of the corpse. Apt supposedly took careful notes of the death scene. Apt made observations of the corpse from a series of vantage points. It is unclear if Apt's notes were obtained by OIC. Apt provided her notes to Rolla after she returned to the USPP Anacostia substation. Apt says no one touched/moved corpse until deputy medical examiner Haut arrived, which was at approximately 7:40 p.m.

Arthur, EMT, in his first interview stated that he had been present for numerous suicide investigations and approximately 20 have been by gun shot. Arthur stated that Gonzales, EMT, and Hall, EMT, arrived at the parking lot together. Arthur separated from Hall and Gonzales by forming teams. On the scene, Arthur stated that during his team's search, they discovered two people together, later identified was W3 and W4. Arthur told a female uniformed USPP of W3 and W4. Gonzalez and Hall were running en route back to the parking area when Arthur started out in the direction of the corpse. Arthur stated that he later arrived at the area where the corpse was discovered. In fact, Arthur was the 3rd EMT to respond to the scene and observe the corpse. Arthur recalled seeing blood on the right shoulder and shirt area of the corpse. He also observed a bullet wound (possibly .45 caliber) on the right side of the neck under the jaw line. Arthur stated that the neck area had a small caliber bullet hole under the jaw line about halfway between the ear and the tip of the chin before seeing any pictures and before contact by law enforcement. Arthur also observed the gun in VF's right hand and that the gun barrel was "half-way" under VF's thigh. Arthur stated that he was at VF's right side near VF's head when he observed VF's neck and that he was approximately two to three feet from VF's right hand. Arthur believes that the gun that he saw was a "straight-barrel" 9 mm

"clip-loading" pistol. Arthur stated that he believed the bullet hole on the neck area to be caused by a different caliber weapon. Arthur stated that he did not touch or move VF at the death scene and further Arthur stated that he was not aware of anyone else touching the corpse.

Ashford, EMT, was assigned to take the corpse to the morgue at Fairfax Hospital. Upon arriving at the parking area, Ashford recalled seeing a number of USPP vehicles and a reddish Honda. Similarly, Arthur had observed a red car with its hazard lights blinking in the Ft. Marcy parking area. Ashford also saw a black cadillac in the parking area. When the corpse was lifted, Ashford saw no blood. Ashford could not recall USPP helping to lift the corpse. Ashford classified the death as homicide. Ashford saw the hospital physician examine the corpse by taking a pulse.

Lt. Bianchi, FCFRD fire fighter, was the officer-in-charge on Truck 1, with Jacobs (driver) and Makuch. When the Truck 1 team got to the death scene, the corpse was already in the body bag. Lt. Bianchi observed that Ashford and Harrison did not have blood on their clothes even though they had lifted the body. Lt. Bianchi had the body bag opened so that he could put a tag on VF's toe. Lt. Bianchi stated that Truck 1 got to Ft. Marcy at 8:00 p.m. Lt. Bianchi was aware of Ashford's "homicide" conclusion and of Arthur's statements. Due to these statements a gag order was made pursuant to existing policy. The gag order only applied when FCFRD personnel when they were on duty. Lt. Bianchi observed that VF's car was open when he arrived at approximately 8:00 p.m. Lt. Bianchi observed a 10-inch diameter pool of blood where he "assumed" VF's head had been located. However, by this time the corpse had been rolled, moved and carried to a body bag.

Braun, USPP, was at USPP Anacostia substation with Apt and Rolla when the call came in regarding a corpse at Ft. Marcy. Braun instructed that on-scene USPP should close the park gate. Braun arrived between 6:30 and 6:45. Braun recalled the Mercedes at the park entrance, VF's car and the car of W3 and W4. Braun saw Spetz questioning W3 and W4 when she arrived. Braun recalled Lt. Gavin on the scene. Lt. Gavin was the shift commander, and Gavin left quickly after Braun arrived. Braun, Rolla and Apt waited for Simonello to arrive. Braun walked to scene with Rolla, Apt, and Simonello. Braun saw the revolver in VF's hand when she arrived. Braun saw Rolla take polaroids, Simonello take 35 mm, and she knew that Rolla found the glasses. Braun said all pictures were taken prior to the corpse being moved, touched or disturbed. Rolla then checked the corpse for car keys. (Braun and Rolla later had to go to the morgue with Rolla to get the keys.) Braun went back to VF's car and found VF's coat with wallet (containing White House id). Lt. Gavin, said Braun, confirmed advisement of the White House's identification for VF between 7:30 and 7:45 p.m. En route to the hospital, Braun was notified that Watkins wanted to go with USPP to the Foster residence. Either Braun or Rolla allowed the hospital to permit Livingstone and Kennedy to identify the corpse. Braun gave no times for any actions. When Braun, Rolla and Watkins arrived at the Foster residence, LF and Laura Foster were present, with sisters Sheila Anthony and Bowman. LF said/asked "whether her husband had put the gun in his mouth." Braun and Rolla left after WJC arrived. Hubbell was also present at the Foster residence. As Braun was departing, Watkins promised to seal VF's office. During the drive to the Foster residence, Watkins supposedly told Braun that VF was upset about the travel office matter. Why did Braun and Rolla agree to give notice under such conditions, i.e. where the officers had no control?

Hodakievic, USPP, happened to be near Ft. Marcy Park at 6:00 p.m., although she was off duty. After hearing of the corpse, Hodakievic went to Ft. March park. Hodakievic saw the abandoned Mercedes "on the entrance ramp". Hodakievic saw an EMT team in the parking area; she then went to the death scene. Sgt. Edwards, USPP, and Ferstl, USPP, were at death scene when Hodakievic arrived. No one else was present. Hodavievic was briefed by Sgt. Edwards and shown polaroids taken by Edwards (or possibly Ferstl). Edwards told her that VF had a revolver. Hodakievic walked around the corpse, but she did not observe a gun and she did not see blood. No one escorted Hodakievic to the death scene. (How did she get there?) Hodakievic was at the death scene for 10 minutes when Rolla, Braun and Apt arrived. Hodakievic escorted Haut to the death scene. (Who called Haut, why and at what time?) When Haut arrived only Rolla, Braun and Apt were present at the death scene. (Where were Edwards and Gavin?) Prior to this, Hodakievic only saw Rolla touch the corpse to check VF's pockets. She overhead Rolla tell Haut that the exit wound was behind the head. She saw VF's head raised so that Haut could see the exit wound and blood under VF's head. Hodakievic said that additional photos exist -- that were taken and shown by Edwards to her. (She knows other photos exist because those photos shown to her by the FBI were different than those she saw on the scene.)

Sgt. Edwards, USPP, by coincidence,[16] overheard radio of the corpse at Ft. Marcy park. He arrived at 6:20 p.m. Edwards had come from the USPP Communications Center on Ohio Drive, Washington, D.C. Sgt. Edwards said other USPP were already at the death scene when he arrived. (How did he get to the scene that fast?) When Edwards got to the death scene, he specifically recalled Fornshill and Ferstl being present. Edwards sent Fornshill back to the G.W. Parkway/CIA gate. Edwards claimed blood was "running" down the side of the mouth. Edwards did not touch the corpse and did not see anyone touch the corpse. Edwards saw Ferstl take polaroids. Edwards was still at the death scene when Braun, Rolla and Simonello arrived. Edwards saw 35 mm photos being taken by Simonello. Edwards left only after the corpse was removed.

[16]Fornshill, Hodakievic, Spetz, and Edwards (and Gavin?) all were available by apparent coincidence.

Ferstl, USPP, was assigned "patrol of the G.W. Parkway" when, at approximately 6:15 p.m., the dispatcher told him to go to Ft. Marcy regarding the corpse. En route, Ferstl heard Fornshill say -- over the radio -- he was responding too. Ferstl stated his arrival was at approximately 6:30 p.m. Ferstl recalled the Mercedes at the entrance. Ferstl saw VF's car and he saw a second car at the back of the parking area. When Ferstl arrived Fornshill was already at the death scene, with the two EMT's. Ferstl saw no one touch the corpse, the blood was not fresh. Ferstl saw no blood from nose and none on the shirt. Ferstl saw a gun in VF's right hand, but he gave no description. Ferstl said Fornshill told him there was a gun, but Fornshill said he never saw a gun. Ferstl left for crime scene tape. Ferstl did not see any evidence (glasses) in the area or any "wine bottles" when he returned and taped the area. (Thus, the area was taped off immediately. As Ferstl returned to the scene to tape it, EMT's were leaving. (In fact, all the EMT's left the parking lot area at 6:37 p.m.) Ferstl admits that he took polaroid photos, at least 7 photos; Ferstl stated the corpse was not moved when he returned with tape. Edwards arrived after Ferstl had taken the 7 photos and had taped off the area. Ferstl gave his photos to Edwards.[17] Edwards sent Ferstl away (as he had sent Fornshill away earlier) when the special team of Braun, Rolla and Simonello arrived. Then, after cursory review of death scene, Braun left with Ferstl to the parking area, where Braun found White House identification. Ferstl also assisted Spetz in interviewing W3 and W4.

Fornshill, USPP (Glen Echo Substation), coincidentally, was asked to work an overtime detail near Ft. Marcy park. Between 5:50 and 6:00 p.m., Edwards gave him permission to respond to the corpse at Ft. Marcy park. (Who called whom, and how could Fornshill get permission before the 911 call?) The sector or beat officer could not respond, so Fornshill did? (Who was the beat officer, what is the sector, what is the substation, how many substations, where, how many personnel?) (Wasn't Ferstl the beat officer?) Fornshill's "instructions" were to join up with the EMT personnel. Fornshill found the corpse. (How did Edward's know of EMT personnel? Did Fornshill have special or additional information from Edwards?) Fornshill did not see blood on face or shirt -- just a trickle of dried blood on corner of mouth. Fornshill did not see a weapon, and Fornshill saw no one touch the corpse. Fornshill said that after the EMT's pronounced VF dead, 2 or 3 additional EMT's arrived. (However, Gonzalez and Hall said it was USPP that arrived and specifically a short fat blonde female. Thus, when Gonzalez and Hall left they believed only USPP were still on scene; when Fornshill stood away, he thought he was leaving the corpse to EMT's. In fact, Arthur was still on his way because Arthur passes Gonzalez and Hall.) The next persons to arrive were Edwards and Ferstl (together?). Edwards then ordered Fornshill back to his CIA/G.W. Parkway post. Thus when Fornshill left, he believed he was leaving the body to 2-3 EMT's plus Edwards and Ferstl. Fornshill stated that he was only at the death scene less then 10 minutes. Fornshill only stated he saw the coat in VF's car. (Was he even asked about the briefcase? Was the car locked? and, who was present at the car?)

[17]Edwards apparently showed these photos to Hodakievic, plus Edwards' own photos. Later, I suggested, after the corpse was staged with the revolver brought by Braun, Simonello and Rolla. New photos were taken and thus Ferstl's were never produced to OIC. This explained the different arm/body distance, gun/hand positions, Hodakievic's problems with the photos, Ferstl's missing photos and EMT problems with the photos (and their observation of a different gun).

Lt. Gavin,[18] USPP, was the shift commander who arrived at park between 6:30 - 6:45 p.m. Fornshill and Edwards were at the corpse when he arrived; Ferstl and Hodakievic were in the parking area. Hodakievic directed Gavin to the corpse. The EMT personnel had already left the corpse and were also in the parking area. Gavin saw the Mercedes in the entrance ramp, VF's car and he denied he saw a "white Nissan." Gavin saw no blood on shirt and no blood from nose. He recalled a gun. Gavin saw all 13 death scene photos. Gavin said that he stayed for 30 - 45 minutes and that during the time he was there, no White House identification was discovered. (This is completely inconsistent with Ferstl and Braun as to finding of White House identification.) "Within 10 minutes" of getting the notice from Braun regarding White House id, Gavin called Burton who asked if the gun was registered and who owned the gun. Watkins then called Gavin and made similar inquiry. Gavin kept rough notes of calls, but OIC does not have the originals. Gavin's notes indicate "engine warm on vehicle."

[18]Both Sgt. Edwards and Gavin, both commanders-in-charge the evening of the death, were transferred, after handling the death scene, to USPP in Glencoe, Georgia. Braun was promoted to Sergeant.

Gonzalez, EMT, responded in Medic 1 from FCFRD. Daylight was visible. Gonzalez saw the Mercedes, white Nissan, VF's car and the USPP car that came just after Medic 1. Dispatch had instructed that the corpse was near a cannon. Forhsnill (and Hall) got to the corpse first, seconds later Gonzalez arrived. VF "suffered a gunshot wound to the head." Gonzalez was not initially asked about an entry point. Gonzalez did not touch VF; but, he looked into VF's mouth and saw blood. Hall was with Gonzalez and may have touched the corpse. Gonzalez and Hall departed and then saw VF's car. As Gonzalez and Hall were departing, a "second" USPP in uniform and then "other investigators" began to arrive. In the car, Gonzalez saw a tie, coat and a "black briefcase." USPP officers were gathering around VF's vehicle. (Who were these officers?) No Fairfax County PD were at the scene. Once it was determined to be a death, FCFRD SOP required an ambulance unit. However, while the EMT's left at 6:37 p.m., no USPP call for an ambulance was made until 7:45 p.m. Gonzalez saw 3-4 photos and believed VF's hand was in a different position. On the second interview, Gonzalez said: there was no trauma to the neck and no puncture wounds to the neck; Gonzalez, however, did not observe the lower portion of VF's neck; Gonzalez could "only see the cylinder of the gun"; little blood was under the head; and he did observe blood on the shoulder. There was vomit and blood on VF's shoulders. Gonzalez estimated that VF had been dead 2-4 hours. Gonzalez did not comment on rigor mortis.

Iacone, EMT, was the officer in charge of Engine 1, which was assigned to Station 1 in McLean. Engine 1 was dispatched for a "shooting victim" at Ft. Marcy park. Arthur and the Engine 1 crew went in one direction, possibly toward Dead Run Creek/Pimmit Run. Engine 1 crew consisted of Pisani, Iacone and Wacha. While searching the woods, Iacone learned from dispatch that Gonzalez' team had found the corpse. Iacone and his entire group arrived at the corpse. Iacone did not recall observing any blood. He saw a gun in VF's hand, a revolver. He did not see an entrance wound. After Iacone's crew left, the EMT's went to the parking area. Iacone did not indicate who the EMT's left at the death scene. Iacone saw the coat "hanging" inside VF car. Hall and Iacone tried the doors, but the car was locked. Iacone told the USPP that the coat matched the pants on the corpse. (Does Iacone know if the car was opened before they left the parking area?) (Did Iacone see the briefcase?) Iacone recalled W3 and W4, both coming and going to Pimmit Run. When Iacone and his team arrived at the death scene, USPP (more than one) had already "secured the scene." Iacone is sure the gun was silver in color and different from the pictures he saw from the FBI.

Harrison, EMT, was the driver of the ambulance dispatched to pick up the corpse. USPP were waiting for the ambulance at the parking area. A USPP helped Harrison and Ashford lift the corpse. Harrison and Ashford were at top portion of the corpse. Harrison saw no blood at the scene. There were 6-7 USPP officers at the death scene. Harrison did not see blood on the body or on the ground area. No blood was on Harrison or Ashford. The weather was clear.

Hall, EMT, said that USPP were already on site when Medic 1 arrived. Hall and Gonzalez went with USPP while the other emergency personnel (from Engine 1) went with Arthur. The only USPP present, Fornshill, located the corpse first. (Was it staged? Did USPP know where to go? Was the USPP leading them?) There was gun in hand. No description was given by Hall because be could barely see the gun. Hall checked for pulse. No blood was on the corpse shirt or body, except droplets. VF's right hand was under VF's right thigh. Hall "heard" someone in the woods and then saw someone in an orange vest moving in the woods. When the EMT's returned to the parking area, Hall looked into the windows of VF's car and saw the coat, black briefcase and perhaps a tie. On a second interview, Hall said that he saw someone moving in the trees surrounding VF's body. In his second interview, Hall responded affirmatively to the suggestion that maybe it was a car on Rt. 123. Hall stated that USPP were the next people to the corpse, even before Gonzalez.

Jacobs, EMT, was the driver of Truck 1, which truck was dispatched to help transport the corpse to the hospital. The corpse was already in the body bag when Jacobs arrived at the death scene. Medic 1 and Engine 1 had departed before Jacobs, in Truck 1, arrived. Jacobs heard Hall say the gun and gun hand were under the thigh. Jacobs saw VF's car, but did not say if she looked into the car.

Makuch, EMT, was on Truck 1, driven by Jacobs. The corpse was already in the body bag when Makuch arrived at the death scene. Markuch did not look into VF's car.

Pisani, EMT, was the driver of Engine 1. The Engine 1 crew went with Arthur "toward the Potomac River". Pisani's search team saw "a male and female in the woods," both going and returning from the Pimmit Run trail. USPP were in the parking lot area when the couple came out of the woods (about the same time Pisani's team returned and went toward corpse?). Pisani described the day as very warm, temperature in the 90's, humidity of 80%, daylight was visible. Pisani's team traveled to the death scene with a USPP officer. At the death scene, Arthur went to the corpse and "may" have checked the pulse. Pisani said he heard Arthur say there was a gun. Pisani never saw a gun. Pisani saw blood on VF's shoulder, but no blood on VF's face. Pisani did not see anyone move the corpse. Pisani did not see glasses on the scene. Pisani did not see any blood on the ground around the body. Pisani was shown pictures and he disagreed that they accurately depicted the body. Pisani's team then went back to the parking area, where Pisani, Iacone and Wacha all looked into VF's car. Apparently, Pisani was not asked what he saw in the car.

Rolla, USPP, was designated the "primary investigator" for this matter by Braun. (What does this mean? Was Rolla a rookie, with no experience? It was his first death notification.) Rolla, apparently, was the investigator at the death scene. Braun was responsible for the parking area. Rolla, Braun and Apt arrived at approximately 6:35 p.m. "Orientation" by Ferstl occurred when they arrived at the parking area. Ferstl's briefing included: (1) VF "died of self inflicted gunshot wound to the head"; (2) corpse was "tentatively identified as Vincent Foster, Little Rock, Arkansas;" and (3) the Honda belonged to VF. (How could Ferstl know Vincent Foster's name if the identification is in the car?) After orientation in parking area, Rolla, Apt, Ferstl, and Hodakievic go to the death scene, where Edwards and Spetz are already present. Edwards gave Rolla polaroid photos and then briefed Rolla: (1) the corpse had not been touched, and (2) the area had been taped off. Rolla claimed there was blood under the head, but stated that the head was not moved. Rolla claimed blood was on upper right shoulder of shirt; it was wet but drying. Rolla took his polaroid photos within "15 minutes after arriving at the death scene." (Since Rolla arrived at parking area at 6:35 and then immediately went to death scene, photos must have been completed by 7:00 p.m. Moreover, Edwards already took his before Rolla arrived, so Edwards' and Ferstl's photos are before 6:45 p.m.) Rolla photographed the glasses approximately 15 feet from corpse's feet (21 feet from VF's head). (In such dense foliage, how did glasses get that far down hill?) Rolla claimed that VF was still warm with no signs of rigor mortis. Rolla stated there was extreme heat that day. Rolla claimed the body was dead 2-3 hours. Rolla looked for keys in VF's pockets, but did not find them. The search for keys and all touching of the corpse occurred only after all photos were taken. Rolla emphasized this 3 times. Rolla reviewed the polaroids and said they were true and accurate. (How does Rolla explain 35 mm photos and the absent emulsion numbered polaroids?) Rolla found a wine cooler bottle (but failed to collect it?). Haut arrived at 7:45 p.m. At that time, the corpse was rolled. Rolla claimed to find and feel an exit wound and to see a wet spot at the crotch. Rolla removed VF's beeper, Seiko watch, and one ring. Rolla does not mention the gun. Haut watched as Rolla and two ambulance persons put the corpse in a body bag. Rolla went to the parking area, where Braun was still engaged in car inventory. Rolla said Simonello took photos (35 mm) of the car. VF's coat was neatly "folded over the back of the front passenger seat". Rolla saw the White House identification. Rolla said there was a paper with names of 3 Washington, D.C. physicians in the car (not in VF's wallet). Rolla said that he and Braun left at 8:45 p.m. to get keys for VF's car. (Is there a record of the keys being turned over from the hospital morgue?) Gavin called Rolla, after Rolla had obtained the keys, to contact Watkins. Then Gavin told Rolla to call Kennedy. Rolla gave morgue at hospital the okay to let Kennedy and Livingstone see the corpse. Rolla and Braun picked up Watkins and went to Foster residence, where two sisters and Hubbell were waiting. Laura Foster was met first, then she called her mother, LF. Rolla heard LF ask "did he [VF] put it in his mouth." No search of the residence occurred that evening; Rolla believed Laura Foster searched for VF's gun in the house. Rolla and Braun left after WJC arrived; they had been there approximately 45 minutes. Berl Anthony later told Rolla that his wife, Sheila Anthony, gave VF the list of 3 psychiatrists. Rolla reviewed VF's diary, 10-15 handwritten pages. Rolla got a letter to a bank to use as a handwriting exemplar. (Where is the exemplar?) Rolla said the autopsy (and the latent gun examination) was hurried because the White House wanted it.

Simonello, USPP, learned of the corpse at Ft. Marcy "shortly after 6:00 p.m." and he arrived at the parking area at approximately 6:30 p.m. (Where did he come from?) Simonello then "immediately proceeded" to the death scene. Simonello was designated the evidence technician. Already at the death scene were Edwards, Rolla, Apt, Ferstl, Braun and Hodakievic. (Thus, no one other than USPP were present at the death scene.) Simonello stated that within "approximately 15 minutes after arriving at the death scene, he took a series of 35 mm photographs, approximately 24 in number" (including some of Ft. Marcy parking area). During his interview, Simonello stated at least twice, emphatically, that all 35 mm photos were taken before the corpse was touched and before the gun was removed from the corpse. Simonello was advised by Rolla of the revolver in the corpse's right hand, and then Simonello saw that the corpse had a revolver in the right hand. Simonello observed blood on the corpse's face and right shoulder. He claimed there was a blood transfer pattern. When Simonello did touch the corpse, he noticed little rigor. (But, Simonello later said there was so much rigor that he may have destroyed prints in getting the gun from VF's hand). Simonello took possession of the glasses. (Glasses weren't observed before the arrival of Simonello, Braun and Rolla.) None of the USPP were asked about the second entrance, the path below, the maintenance road below or how the corpse got there. Simonello specifically stated that he photographed the area under the corpse, the pool of blood under the corpse. Simonello stated there were no signs of rigor in the fingers. Simonello stated that the gun was processed without his release of it, and that the processing was hurried because the White House wanted it processed. (Simonello told Colombell that the gun was mishandled during latent examination.) Simonello also collected the torn paper, gave it to Lockheart, US Capitol

Police, with a 1 page supposed known exemplar (bank letter). Lockheart, said Simonello, concluded the two were written by VF. (Why didn't USPP use the 15 pages of the diary, the diary is handwritten?) Simonello has the known sample used for comparison. Simonello stated that contamination of evidence resulted in the different powder on evidence.

Spetz, USPP, was at the Glen Echo station at 5:30 p.m. when Spetz overheard the dispatcher calling Ferstl to respond to the corpse at Ft. Marcy park. Ferstl was at the Glen Echo station too. (Doesn't this contradict Ferstl's statement of being on patrol on the G.W. parkway?) Ferstl and Spetz, in different cars, went to parking area. Spetz said that Ferstl and she were the second and third USPP, respectively, to arrive; Fornshill was the first. Spetz saw Mercedes "on the ramp" and she observed 2 cars: VF's car and a white Nissan, Maryland tag WFL154. When Spetz arrived EMT's were coming back into the parking area. (Unclear which EMT's, but one EMT said he "did not think it was a suicide, adding words to the effect that he'd seen a number of suicides and the body was 'too clean.'" Spetz later said that there were several USPP cars in the parking area, and she did not see Ferstl; thus she "assumed" Ferstl and other officers went to the death scene. Spetz decided on her own to look in the park for the occupants of the parking lot vehicles. Spetz stated she found W3 and W4 sitting, and talking on a blanket. Spetz said W3 and W4 said they saw a white van in the parking lot area. Spetz could not recall other comments made by W3 and W4. She interviewed them together. Spetz made no written report, but she did take notes. (Which notes are her notes, even if OIC has the notes?) Spetz said she briefed Braun; Spetz said she did not go to the death scene; Spetz said she then left. (It is unclear if VF's car was opened when Spetz was present.) What did Spetz see in the two cars?

Wacha, EMT, was on Engine 1. Pisani was the driver, Iacone was the officer-in-charge, and Arthur joined them to make search team 1. Wacha saw 3 cars in the parking lot: VF's car, a car that was running (no one inside), and a car she cannot recall to describe. Search team 1 found a "couple", W3 and W4. Wacha said her team went to the corpse after the radio message. Wacha said several USPP were present when they arrived. (Where were Gonzalez and Hall, was it the same USPP at the death scene that went with Gonzalez and Hall, did she pass Gonzalez (and Hall) on the way?) Wacha saw blood on VF's shirt and face. Wacha looked into VF's car and saw coat. (Was Wacha asked about briefcase?) Wacha saw no local police at the scene. Wacha shouted to W3 and W4 to ask if they were OK. Did not see "clothes flying." Wacha and her group passed Hall (also Gonzalez?) on the way to the death scene. Wacha saw no blood on the ground or area around the body. Wacha saw a silver colored revolver in the corpse's hand. Wacha thought she saw a cylinder. Wacha thought the gun was very large, possibly a .45 caliber. Wacha was shown photos. (Unclear if she disagreed with the photos.)

XX.

Before returning to further discussion of USPP processing of the corpse, I briefly returned to the weapon evidence.

First, the weapon was not observed by W5 when he initially arrived at the corpse. See supra. W5 saw the corpse's hands with "palms up".

Second, the polaroid photographs depict the gun at different distances to the side of the body. By contrast, EMT's Hall, Gonzales, Arthur and Iacone (i.e. all EMTs to inspect the body, said it was tucked under VF's side. Also, the following EMTs said the gun was silver: Iacone and Wacha. Gonzales and Hall were not asked to describe the color. Why would the USPP move the gun (moving the gun and hand to photograph them would constitute tampering with the evidence). I stated my belief that the gun hand was clearly moved, and the pictures also indicate no gun was present.

Third, the position of the gun -- with thumb jammed between trigger guard and trigger -- is odd. How did VF hold the weapon, if VF's possession and discharge of it was voluntary? The powder residue on VF's hand is in a trace line consistent with normal discharge of the weapon according to forensic pathology texts; however, the gun must have been held backwards and thus the line should be on the other side of VF's right hand. How is it possible for VF's hand to have the powder pattern depicted in the photo -- if he held the gun backwards (as he must have given the thumb's jammed position). Also, the pathologists' report stated that powder is observed (by photo only) on the lower face; but, consistent with the large amount of right hand powder residue, the powder should also have been, at least, on the upper face.

Fourth, as previously stated, the evidence does not conclusively establish that the weapon recovered from VF's right hand was, in fact, the fatal instrument. In this regard, (a) the gun apparently was not the property of the Foster family; (b) no prints were found on the weapon (or even partials or smudges); (c) despite supposedly being in VF's mouth, no saliva or blood was recovered from a swab of the barrel of the weapon;[19] (d) powder residue on the lower face, if any, was not tested; (e) (vaporized lead and fine particulate lead) powder residue on the shirt, while consistent, cannot be conclusively linked to the weapon; (f) (ball smokeless) powder on VF's glasses merely "could have come" from the bullet and casing found; (g) the hand powder residue (smoke) was not found on the glasses (smokeless) (despite being next to each other upon discharge); (h) while one type (ball smokeless) of gun powder residue is found on the glasses, another type (not ball-shaped) of gun powder residue is found in VF's mouth; (i) the same type of (smokeless) powder on the glasses (which is different from that powder on shirt and in mouth) is found on VF's shoes and socks; (j) the fatal bullet is never found; and (k) the exit wound has not been measured to determine if caused by a .38 caliber bullet.

And fifth, additional bullets to the weapon were not found in the Foster home or in the extended Foster family's possession. Indeed, other bullets that could have been fired from the weapon (recently found -- 1 1/2 years after the death), bear different identification markings. VF's fingerprints were not on these bullets. (Where are the remaining bullets -- or, alternatively, where did VF get only two bullets?)

XXI.

Regarding physical evidence, first, latent print analysis of evidence is incomplete. None of the 4 prints found outside of VF's car have been positively identified. The print on the underside of the gun handle has not been identified. The palm print on the torn note has not been identified. The latents of only three individuals have been used for comparison: Simonello, Owen and VF. Against this background, all evidence was processed (and apparently cleaned) by the USPP before being turned over to the FBI. See supra.

Second, "the blonde to light brown head hairs of caucasian origin which are dissimilar to the head hairs in the [ ] known head hair sample from Vincent Foster" have not been identified. These hairs were found from VF's T-shirt, pants and belt and socks and shoes.

And third, the FBI lab report indicated that semen on VF's boxer shorts was found to be excreted by VF. Greene flatly stated that under no circumstances is semen released upon a suicide caused by a fatal bullet to the head.

Moreover, the swab could merely reflect contact with VF's hand, which contact is not disputed.

To All Prospective Auction Bidders:

We are looking forward to having you at the ECS Eagle Auction! Please take a few minutes to read this letter which contains pertinent information concerning the auction.

1. INVITATION - This is self-explanatory. Please pass this on to a friend!

2. RESERVATION CARD - It is vital that you fill this out immediately and mail, along with your check, to Millie Young. This will secure your place at a table for the wonderful HORS D'OEUVRE BUFFET--best seating will be assigned as reservations and money are received. Cards must be filled out in full. There will be 10 people per table, and we would encourage you to sit with another couple or group for a really fun-packed evening. If you are planning to sit with friends, you must indicate this on your Reservation Card. You might want to send in one check to cover all reservations. If checks are mailed separately, make sure that you indicate with whom you would like to sit on all Reservation Cards.

3. PROGRAM - Please take some time between now and March 23rd to familiarize yourself with items to be auctioned, as well as the Rules and Procedures of the auction. There will be between 450-500 items to be auctioned, and it will be impossible for you to wait until that evening to view or decide on which items you would like to place a bid.

REMEMBER, YOU MUST BRING THIS PROGRAM WITH YOU THE NIGHT OF THE AUCTION.

See you at Woodland Hills on March 23rd at 6:00pm! ! !

Re: Patrick J. Knowlton
Whitewater Grand Jury witness

Dear Gentlemen:

On Thursday, October 24, Agent Bradford served Mr. Knowlton at his home with a Subpoena to testify before the Grand Jury on Wednesday, November 1, at 12:00 noon.

During the time Mr. Knowlton spent in public that evening, he was continuously followed and repeatedly harassed. A dozen or more men walked towards him, or came from behind, and then gave him a purposeful, timed stares. He was followed on the street, into the drug store, into two restaurants, and home. He was also trailed by car. This orchestrated harassment continued throughout the following day, perpetrated by at least two dozen people.

I relayed this information to Agent Bransford when I was able to reach him on Monday. I asked that Mr. Knowlton be protected by the FBI, and possibly relocated. He declined. Agent Bransford stated that the FBI has neither followed nor harassed Mr. Knowlton, and that it appears unlikely that any harm will come to Mr. Knowlton. Agent Bradsford also stated that he believed Mr. Knowlton's account.

Mr. Knowlton was followed on Monday and Tuesday.

My client and I were disappointed by the decision not to protect the witness Subpoenaed by the Office of Independent Counsel.

We are asking that the FBI take an active interest in Mr. Knowlton's safety.

Sincerely,

John H. Clarke

Dear Mr. Ewing:

Is the request that Dr. Henry Lee examine and evaluate the evidence in the Vincent Foster death a sign that the aggressive reinvestigation of this case did not end with the departure of Miquel Rodriguez? I hope so. But Dr. Lee is busy with 375 homicide cases, and he cannot be expected to come up with answers to the many questions that hang like a dark cloud over Foster's death.

To facilitate his task, I strongly suggest that you arrange to have Rodriguez brief Lee and explain what these questions are. I also suggest that you recommend that Rodriguez be asked to resume the vigorous grand jury investigation he was conducting.

RE: Foster Issues

DATE: June 6, 1995

As Dr. Lee prepares to give us advice, this seemed an appropriate time to outline my thoughts about the major steps we can and should take to complete our factfinding on the Foster death investigation. Dr. Lee will no doubt have further thoughts and may tell us that some of my proposed major steps are unnecessary or wasteful, but I thought it nonetheless might be useful to outline my ideas.

As I have stated before, the Foster death investigation can be divided into two related but distinct issues: (1) state of mind; and (2) physical evidence (which includes death scene observations, blood, forensic evidence, ballistics, etc.).

As I said in my last memo, we have made progress from the Fiske investigation on Foster's state of mind -- although we have not entirely solved that issue. Indeed, assuming arguendo a suicide, we still have not discovered a single triggering event that led to the death. Nor do we have a true suicide note.

With respect to the physical evidence, we have employed investigatory tools and procedural steps that were not utilized by the Fiske team. The most prominent example is our use of the grand jury in questioning witnesses who were at the scene or the autopsy. Nonetheless, it is important to recognize that these extra investigative tools have not as yet yielded any significant substantive results. (Indeed, if anything, some issues are more confused than ever thanks to witnesses making statements in the grand jury somewhat inconsistent with prior statements.)

In any event, the two most important issues to resolve in this case are rather obvious: (1) where was the fatal shot fired; and (2) who fired it.

It seems that the best way to determine where the shot was fired would be to find the bullet. If the bullet is in the park, then it seems to me that we would have established beyond a reasonable doubt that the shot was fired in the park. The Fiske team and the FBI conducted a rather elaborate search of the park for the bullet. Nonetheless, they did not go as far as they could have gone. As is stated on page 56 of the Fiske report, "[t]he FBI Lab's search for the bullet focused on the most likely area for the bullet to have come to rest . . . It would have been enormously time-consuming, costly, and in all likelihood unproductive, to have searched the entire Park for the bullet" (emphasis added). Dr. Lee in our initial meeting suggested a broader search of the park, including of the trees in the park. I strongly recommend (subject to his continued agreement) that we pursue this tack. I also recommend that we get Ed Lueckenhoff intimately involved in implementing it because there is substantial resistance from the Washington FBI on this subject.[1]

As to who fired the gun, we should try to establish an individual's link to the gun. The best way to do that would be to determine ownership/possession of the gun as of July 20, 1993. Because no Foster family members can positively identify the gun and the gun cannot be traced, I believe the best remaining way to establish ownership of the gun would be to identify the person whose fingerprint is on the underside of the grip handle. We know that it is not Foster's fingerprint. We are currently attempting to determine whether it is Foster's father's fingerprint by having the military records center perform a search. If that does not turn up a match, we will have to go back to the drawing board on this issue.

Two other areas that are matters of some controversy -- although probably of lesser relevance -- are the identity of the person whose hairs were found on Foster's clothes and the identity of the carpets and/or furniture that were the source of the carpet fibers on Foster's clothes. Until Dr. Lee informed me otherwise, I believed that we could not match the hairs to any particular person because we do not have the roots from the hairs. That turns out to be incorrect. I therefore recommend (subject to Dr. Lee's concurrence) that we consider obtaining hair samples from Laura Foster; it we do not obtain a match with her hair, we can discuss how to proceed further. As to the carpet fibers, I recommend (subject to Dr. Lee's concurrence) that we implement a plan of obtaining carpet fibers from the various places that Foster was located on July 20: his house, his car, and the White House.

Finally, while not necessarily relevant to the Foster death as opposed to the Foster documents investigation, we can do more to determine the identity of the partial palm print on the Foster note. I recommend that we obtain palm prints from various people who we know touched the note. If we do not obtain a match from any of them, I recommend that we obtain palm prints from persons who we suspect touched the note. (We do not have Foster's palm prints, but we may also want to think of ways to determine whether we can lift a palm print of Foster's from any documents or items in Lisa Foster's possession.)

[1] Dr. Lee also noted that there may be other ways to establish that the shot was fired in the park; for example, by blowing up the scene pictures to determine whether there was any blood spatter on the surrounding leaves.

Conclusion

As Dr. Lee pointed out, we are likely to make progress over past investigations not by interviewing people who have already been interviewed but by reexamining the physical evidence to see what else can be learned from it. With that in mind and subject to change based on Dr. Lee's advice, the above listed items are the remaining major steps I propose we take with respect to the death investigation.

RE: Vincent Foster and the Whitewater Development Corporation

DATE: August 17, 1995

This memorandum summarizes the evidence about Vincent Foster's involvement in Whitewater matters, including his involvement in the tax treatment of Whitewater on personal Clinton returns and corporate Whitewater returns. The summary is based primarily on the documents from Foster's office that deal with Whitewater, supplemented by some testimonial evidence. This memorandum is not intended as any kind of final analysis, but only as a preliminary analysis so that we are all on the same page.

There is little doubt that Foster and others such as Yoly Redden were concerned prior to April 15, 1993, that the Clintons could be audited and required to pay more taxes if they claimed a loss with respect to the Whitewater investment on their 1992 personal tax returns. But as of this point, I believe the suggestion or implication made by newspersons in recent weeks (based on no more material than we possess) that Foster suffered continuing distress over Whitewater and/or was driven to commit suicide in whole or in part because of the Clintons' Whitewater investment, or their tax treatment of the investment, is quite far-fetched, as I will explain below. (I nonetheless caution that my analysis here is based on what I now know; there always could be some smoking gun document or testimony that has been destroyed or never given to this Office.)

Background

The Whitewater issue arose in March 1992 as the result of a news article by Jeff Gerth in the New York Times. (This article was in Foster's files at the time of his death.) The article was based in part on an interview with Jim McDougal and suggested, among other things, that the Clintons had improperly deducted at least $5,000 on their personal tax returns in 1984 and 1985 for interest paid on a portion of at least $30,000 in bank loan payments that Whitewater made for them. In addition, the article suggested that McDougal heavily subsidized the Whitewater investment, insuring that the Clintons were under little financial risk.

When the story broke in 1992, Governor Clinton stated at a press conference that he believed he had lost about $25,000 in the Whitewater investment. The campaign then commissioned Jim Lyons to do a report on the investment. He did so, and concluded that the Clintons had lost nearly $59,000 on the investment, but also noted that the Clintons had taken certain improper deductions totalling $5,133 in 1984 and 1985 on their personal tax returns. (Because of their age, those improper deductions did not need to be repaid, but the Clintons did repay them in late 1993.) The story lay dormant for the remainder of the campaign and until late 1993 when it became known that the documents from Foster's office included Whitewater documents.

The basic issues remain to this day, however. Indeed, the New York Times editorial of Sunday, August 13, 1995, is not much different from earlier stories written about the Clintons' Whitewater investment and tax treatment of it. The Clintons have admitted they took improper deductions in the 1980's; the question remains whether they knowingly did so. And questions remain about the extent of the Clintons' risk in the Whitewater investment and about the extent of their contributions to the investment.

Foster's Involvement

The documents in Foster's office reveal that Foster's involvement in Whitewater breaks down into three distinct categories:

(1) sale of the Clintons' interest in Whitewater to Jim McDougal in December 1992;
(2) treatment of Whitewater on the Clintons' personal tax returns in April 1993; and
(3) filing of delinquent Whitewater corporate tax returns in June 1993.

The news stories in recent weeks (e.g., "can of worms") have focused on the second of these issues.

1. Sale of Interest in Whitewater to Jim McDougal

After the election in 1992, the Clintons decided to sell their interest in Whitewater to Jim McDougal. Foster's notes of a November 24, 1992, meeting with Foster, Lyons, Lindsey, Tisdale, and Hubbell show that a number of issues were discussed at that time, including:

(a) executive orders on the gag rule, gays in the military, and the reduction of White House staff;

(b) a Presidential retreat; and

(c) personal finances, including Whitewater and blind trust versus diversified trust.

It appears that Jim Blair was to take the lead for the Clintons in transferring their interest to McDougal. According to a Foster memo to file written on December 30, 1992, Blair intended to meet with McDougal and McDougal's attorney on December 22, 1992, to close the sale. Little Rock was fogged in, however, so Foster took the transfer agreement to Sam Heuer's office at Blair's request. The agreement stated that the Clintons would transfer their interest in Whitewater to McDougal for $1000. There was some discussion at the meeting about preparation of the delinquent corporate tax returns, but ultimately Heuer and McDougal signed the transfer agreement. The agreement stated that "Grantee [McDougal] warrants that all tax returns due for the period of Grantors' ownership of the stock being transferred shall be filed forthwith, and Grantee warrants that he shall cause said returns to be filed forthwith."

On December 23, 1992, Foster wrote a letter to accountant Yoly Redden enclosing the signed agreement and asking her to prepare the delinquent corporate tax returns for WWDC. The letter stated that "the Corporation will determine independently whether the returns are accurate and take the responsibility for filing them." Mrs. Clinton and Jim Blair were blind-copied on this letter. Also on December 23, 1992, Foster sent Jim Blair a copy of the transfer agreement.

On December 24, 1992, a $1000 check payable to the Clintons was mailed to Foster by Sam Heuer.

2. Preparation and Filing of Clintons' 1992 Taxes in April 1993

Having sold their interest in Whitewater for $1000, the Clintons had to decide how to treat the $1000 on their 1992 taxes. Did they have a gain or loss to report?

Foster received a letter on April 2, 1993, from Yoly Redden enclosing a draft of the Clintons' federal and state returns. It stated: "If I receive additional documentation from Mr. Patten of Patten, McCarthy & Associates in Denver, we may be able to claim a $10,000 to $15,000 loss in the disposal of Whitewater stock. The present return reflects no gain or loss on the disposal. I will let you know if a loss can be claimed. I realize that we need to take the most conservative approach possible and that was the position taken in the return."

On April 5, 1993, Foster sent a letter to Bob Barnett of Williams & Connolly enclosing the draft returns. The letter discusses several issues, but says the following about Whitewater: "At this point, there is no gain or loss reflected from the sale of the interest in Whitewater Development Corporation. The local accountant thus far has been unable to obtain documentation of payments to or for the benefit of the Corporation in excess of the stock sales price. This could change, however, in the next few days. Enclosed is a copy of the analysis by Jim Lyons and his forensic accountants on the Whitewater financial issues. There was an erroneous tax deduction taken in a prior year which was intended to be accounted for in this return."

On April 6, 1993, Foster sent a letter to Barnett with various supporting documents, including various federal and state returns and financial disclosure statements. Included is "a memorandum from the Media Research Office concerning news articles about financial and tax issues which were published during the campaign, including specifically articles about Whitewater Development Company. The memorandum also includes articles concerning the tax returns filed by the Bushes and the Quayles in 1989. I have confirmed that the Whitewater Development Company has not filed tax returns in recent years." It appears that this letter and the enclosures were likely sent in response to a phone call from Barnett.

On April 6, 1993, Yoly Redden sent a letter to Foster covering a few issues and concluding, "I should be calling you tomorrow afternoon concerning Whitewater."

Barnett apparently had another accountant review the returns in his office on April 6, 1993. That accountant prepared a letter dated April 7, 1993. The letter discusses a number of issues and says the following about Whitewater:

> I guess the treatment of the Whitewater investment will be a very sensitive item. I read the press reports you made available to me and it seems that the opposition was contending that the Clintons' investment in Whitewater was such that they had an opportunity to realize half of the profits if the project was successful but were protected against losses if the project was unsuccessful. The President responded that they had lost at least $25,000.
>
> The return currently shows that disposition of the investment on Schedule D at a cost of $1,000 and a sales price of $1,000 and no gain or loss. It seems to me that this treatment bolsters the opponents' position. That is, they claim he was protected against loss -- the President said he incurred a significant loss -- the return shows no loss.
>
> Judging from the return I assume that the Clintons are not expecting to get tax benefit from the loss. I further assume, based on the President's response as reported in the press, that they did not receive any proceeds upon disposition of the investment. [This was not true; thus, the remainder of this paragraph does not follow. BK] Thus, it appears that the $1,000 of proceeds on Schedule D is for cosmetic purposes. If that is the case, wouldn't the best course of action be to simply not report anything on the return. I am not aware of any provision in the tax law that requires one to claim all losses that have been incurred. And even if there were such a provision, the present method of reporting does not report the loss that the President says was incurred.

Barnett faxed a copy of this letter to Foster on April 7, 1993.

On Foster's handwritten notes that are undated (but likely are some time from April 7 to April 12) and list a number of different issues with respect to the draft returns, such as "pay Keough" and "use of name Rodham," Foster notes the following: "Options: FN -- cost in excess but not documented yet $1000 gain." He also wrote notes to "call Sam Heuer, Jim Lyons."

On April 12, Foster sent a one-page FAX to Yoly Redden stating: "Insert re: WWDC: The estimated basis substantially exceeds the sales price; however, because of the unavailability of complete documentation, no basis is claimed."

On April 12, Redden wrote a letter to Foster. It is unclear whether this letter is before or after the above FAX. It states as follows:

> I am enclosing summary workpapers on Whitewater to document the assumed loss of $5,878.35. These include the report from Patten, McCarthy detailing their findings of an estimated investment of $68,880.07, workpapers that we had in our Whitewater file of payments made on behalf of Whitewater, deductions taken on tax returns, and lists prepared possibly by Carolyn Huber concerning the same items.
> I still recommend that we do not attach any statement to the tax return concerning Whitewater other than the listing of the sale of stock. We have a minimum basis of $500, which was the amount allocated on the corporate books as 50 percent of the capital stock. Because of the numerous problems with Whitewater records and the commingling of funds with other companies and individuals, I believe many explanations may have to be made if we claim a loss. I do not believe we should claim a gain, because the Clintons did suffer a loss, and that should be the implication in closing the transaction. . . .

Handwritten notes that are undated say the following: "Worst case -- IRS audits return, disallows $1000 loss -- press says 'you said you invested $25,000 and couldn't even prove 1000.'" (I am not sure these notes are in Foster's handwriting, but I might have an analysis done. All other notes referenced in this memo appear clearly to be Foster's handwriting.)

On Foster's handwritten notes that are undated but were probably taken at some time from April 7 through 13 and that appear to reflect one or more conversations with at least Yoly Redden, Norris Weese, and Jim Lyons, Foster wrote the following:

Q's

1. What was nature of deductions
   A. How deduct interest/principal payments for corp.?

2. Can you use contributions which predated incorporation?

3. Contribution/advancements of $68,900 to the McD

On Foster's handwritten notes that are undated but were probably written at some time from April 7 through April 13, Foster made a list of various issues related to the returns, including "pay Keough," "Chelsea's return," and "California return." There also are notes about Whitewater. It is unclear, but these notes appear to reflect conversations with Yoly Redden and Ricki Seidman.

On April 15, 1993, Redden wrote a letter to Foster enclosing an original and a copy of the 1992 Arkansas return "which [she] revised to allocate to the President $500 of the gains from the sale of the Whitewater stock. I am sorry for the inconvenience of so many revisions."

The returns treated Whitewater as a $1000 gain with a 0 basis, so the only real concern over the returns' treatment of Whitewater was whether the press would seize upon those returns as an indication that the Clintons' statements during the campaign about the extent of their investment in Whitewater were incorrect. There was, however, no risk of an IRS audit on these returns, at least on the basis of their treatment of Whitewater.

As it turned out, the press had very little to say about these returns. I found only two articles mentioning the returns, both on Monday, April 19. The Washington Post reported as follows:

> They also reported a $1000 gain from the sale of their interest in Whitewater Development Corp., a land deal that became an issue last spring after disclosure that a partner, James McDougal, had been the head of a troubled state-chartered savings and loan. Spokeswoman Ricki Seidman said the Clintons sold their half-interest in the unsuccessful 230-acre Ozark Mountain resort development back to McDougal and his wife. Though the Clintons said they lost thousands of dollars on the investment, they listed its initial value for tax purposes as zero. "They decided to take the most conservative position," Seidman said. "The IRS needs extensive documentation to establish basis and not all the documentation was available, so they declined to show the loss."

USA Today reported as follows: "The Clintons sold their interest in Whitewater Development, a company they and another couple created in 1978 to develop land in Arkansas' Ozark Mountains. The Clintons reportedly sank $69,000 into the project. They sold their interest in December for $1000, leaving a loss of $68,000, which they apparently claimed in previous years." The USA Today story was obviously somewhat inaccurate.

3. Whitewater Corporate Tax Returns

I have found very little documentation in Foster's files relating to the preparation of the Whitewater corporate tax returns. It appears that, consistent with the December 1992 sale, Jim Blair took the lead on this issue. Foster did receive a letter on June 23, 1993, from Yoly Redden stating "I am enclosing copies of the letters that were sent to Mr. Blair today, together with the income tax returns of Whitewater Development Company. Please let me know if you need copies of these returns for your files."

This letter suggests that Foster did not even see the returns before they were filed and that Foster was not involved in the filing of the Whitewater corporate tax returns. That is appropriate because it is difficult to see how he ethically could have been substantially involved in such matters for a corporation while a government attorney.

Conclusions

That summarizes the evidence we possess from Foster's office related to Whitewater. It seems likely that Foster, as well as Seidman, Barnett, Redden, and Lyons, were aware by April 15, 1993, if not earlier: (1) that it would be difficult for the Clintons to prove with documentation that the Clintons had contributed to, and therefore lost as much money on, Whitewater as the Lyons report had claimed (but note that this was stated publicly at the time of the 1993 tax returns); (2) that it might even be difficult for the Clintons to prove (although it did not appear that they would ever have to) that they were at risk of loss in the Whitewater investment; and (3) that the Clintons claimed improper deductions on their personal tax returns in the 1980's (which they conceded, at least in part, during the campaign).

In my view, any suggestion based solely on this evidence that Whitewater was a contributing cause of Foster's distress in July 1993 is quite far-fetched. Why would Foster kill himself or even feel uneasy about the filing of tax returns that had been handled properly and had generated no controversy over Whitewater? I could see that he may well have held his breath upon the filing of the returns in April because they could have generated press reexamination of the Lyons report and old tax returns, but in fact it created no controversy whatsoever. Indeed, this appears to have been one of the few issues that Foster handled in the White House that did not go wrong.

Perhaps Foster was such a worrier that he thought that it could someday come to light that the Clintons knowingly had taken improper deductions in the 1980's or really were at no risk of any loss in the Whitewater investment. But that does not make much sense because those allegations had already been made, and had not resulted in any continued problem for the Clintons. And even if such allegations were renewed and even investigated, there was no possibility of criminal liability given the statute of limitations. Moreover, because the documentation relating to Whitewater was so spotty, it would be at least as difficult to prove such allegations in a civil tax or congressional proceeding as it was to disprove the allegations in the personal tax returns. More to the point, even if I am wrong about all of this, would a person kill himself because of the potential tax problems related to returns of someone else that were filed many years ago and with respect to which the person played no role? It seems unlikely.

In sum, absent more evidence, the "Whitewater contributed to Foster's death" allegations make little sense to me, although I am willing to listen to contrary views. Nonetheless, in the event that we write a report discussing state of mind, I do not think we are qualified to say what issues in effect caused his suicide. The best we can do is to point out the issues that Foster was working on and/or those issues that reasonably could have caused Foster concern at one point or another. With respect to Whitewater, we can say simply that in April 1993, the treatment of Whitewater in the tax returns was an issue of some sensitivity and difficulty that appears from the written record to have caused Foster (as well as others) some degree of concern.

SUBJECT: DISCREPANCY LIST

The following list is my last comprehensive outline of all of the noted discrepancies, inconsistencies, and problems that have been identified in the Vincent W. Foster death investigation to date. The outline is broken down into the following areas: U.S. Park Police, Emergency Medical Technicians (EMTs), the White House, Northern Virginia Medical Examiner, Miscellaneous, and Forensic Examinations. Although mostly the same as the previous list of 6/21/95, there are a few additions, particularly under USPP and Medical Examiner:

I. U.S. Park Police
A. No gunshot residue samples of the decedent's hands.
B. Lack of complete documentation of the gunshot residues on the left hand.
C. Poorly diagrammed death scene; lack of measurements.
D. No photo log; no documentation regarding who took what photographs, and the total number of photos.
1. Edwards initialed Ferstl's photographs.
2. Ferstl is unsure of the exact number of photographs he took with Edwards camera.
E. Death scene 35mm photos did not develop.
F. No documentation regarding the initial search of the decedent's vehicle at the death scene- no inventory.
G. Photo of an unidentified briefcase next to a U.S.P.P. vehicle.
H. Decedent's pager returned too soon; no records obtained regarding previous pages.
I. Suicide weapon processed with dust prior to other laboratory exams.
1. No latent prints of any kind; value/no-value.
J. Inconsistent statements regarding moving and searching the body. (Rolla, Braun, Simonello, Hodakaviec)
K. Inconsistent and poorly documented autopsy.
1. Morrissette's report.
2. No gunshot residue samples from hands.
3. No fingernail clippings/scrapings.

4. No major case prints of decedent.
5. No photo of left hand.
6. Possible contamination of evidence subsequent to autopsy at M.E.'s Office.
7. Inconsistent statements regarding what was done to the body prior to autopsy.
8. No description of body and clothing prior to autopsy.

L. Possible contamination of evidence at U.S. Park Police facility.
M. Poor interview and documentation of witnesses at death scene (Doody and Feist).
N. Photo of an unidentified white male wearing plainclothes at death scene.
O. Inconsistent statements regarding vehicle doors being locked/unlocked. (Braun, Rolla, Hodakievic, Simonello, Gavin)
P. All photographs not produced pursuant to initial subpoena.
Q. Inadequate and incomplete metal detector search by the USPP. (Operators had no prior experience or training)
R. Eyeglasses and revolver lifts contain trace evidence.
S. Case was closed prior to completion of laboratory exams.
T. Inconsistent statements of Officer Watson, Jeff McGaughey, and Braun regarding Watson's and McGaughey's actions/observations at the scene.
1. Watson is the Special Forces officer that responded to the scene.
U. Watson did not notify Gavin, as requested by Braun at approximately 7:30 p.m.
V. No neighborhood investigation.
1. Did not obtain video from Saudi residence of second entrance.
W. Incorrect number of torn pieces of note in Simonello's report.
X. No documentation of the latent prints of value that were obtained from the decedent's vehicle.
1. The prints were identified by the FBI Lab.
Y. Incomplete search of the decedent's vehicle.
1. Numerous items were not taken as evidence; they were later obtained by OIC FBI agents.

II. Inconsistent statements and observations of Fairfax County Fire and Rescue personnel.
A. Wound on neck (Arthur: .45 cal. bullet hole.)
B. Gun under thigh.
C. Wound on upper right front of skull (Gonzales).
D. Briefcase in vehicle.
E. Unidentified person in woods (Hall).
F. Vehicle doors locked.
G. Death scene photos do not accurately depict scene.
H. Two unidentified white males walking from death scene.
I. Color of gun was silver.
J. Type of gun was semiautomatic pistol (Arthur).
K. Statements of initial paramedics at scene regarding their actions are inconsistent with Fairfax County paramedic protocols.

L. Report coded as a homicide (Ashford).

III. Medical Examiner

A. X-rays

1. Autopsy report indicates x-rays were taken.

2. Morrissette's report indicates Beyer told him x-rays were taken.

B. All individuals present at autopsy not indicated on autopsy report.

C. No photographs of decedent's left hand.

D. Inconsistent statements regarding removal of decedent's tongue and palate.

E. Inconsistent "on-scene" times reported for Dr. Haut; 7:40 pm and 7:15.

F. Stomach contents; no definitive digestion time, or positive identification.

G. "Cross-hatched" lines in autopsy diagram- discrepancy between Dr. Luke's autopsy review and 7/13/95 conversation with Dr. Beyer.

IV. White House

A. Foster's office unsecured until 7/21/93, approximately 10:10 a.m.

1. Patsy Thomasson, Maggie Williams, Bernie Nussbaum search Foster's office.

B. Confidential trash bag removed and replaced.

C. Nussbaum enters office; removes small photo.

D. Pond rearranges papers on Foster's coffee table.

E. Exclusive initial review of documents by Nussbaum.

F.Torn note found one week later in briefcase previously searched by Nussbaum.

G. Note not released to investigators until the following week; a day after it was discovered.

V. Miscellaneous

A. CW's inconsistencies.

1. positioning of decedent's hands.

2. no gun.

3. winecoolers and briefcase in vehicle.

4. trampled area around death scene.

5. does not see white car occupied.

B. Inconsistencies between Doody and Feist's statements.

1. Inconsistencies between USPP interviews and FBI interviews of Doody and Feist.

2. Their statements re- other people at the park were "completely ignored" by Fiske investigators.

C. No initial investigation of the park's "second entrance".

D. No one heard a gunshot.

E. The gun exemplifies a "drop gun".

F. No matching ammo at the decedent's residence.

G. The decedent's grip on the gun was not the simplest nor the easiest to shoot himself in the mouth.

H. The decedent never previously spoke of suicide.

I. The decedent had no particular obsession, "dire predicament", or one thing that would have put him over the edge.

J. The decedent had dealt with stress before.

K. The suicide weapon has never been positively identified as belonging to the decedent, or the decedent's father.

1. Family members have been unable to reliably and conclusively identify the gun.

L. Lisa Foster's initial spontaneous question "was the gun in his mouth?".

M. Five unaccounted for hours between the time the decedent left work and was discovered dead.

N. Lack of blood at death scene.

O. No bullet.

P. No cadaveric spasm causing decedent to clench gun.

Q. The gun did not fly out of the decedent's hand.

R. No chipped teeth noted by M.E.

S. No flashburns inside mouth noted by M.E.

T. The mortician lost the original embalming report and diagram.

U. The decedent's glasses were discovered 13' downslope from his body.

V: The positioning of the body is inconsistent with suicide; body neatly laid out; "as if it was in a coffin".

W. Fairfax Hospital Laboratory Supervisor statement re-gunshot wound to middle of head.

X. Helen Dickey telephone call to Roger Perry.

Y. Committed suicide at an unfamiliar location.

Z. No suicide note.

A1. No previous mention of suicide.

B1. Ate lunch prior to committing suicide.

C1. Jeff McGaughey's statements are inconsistent with Officer Watson's.

D1. USSS memo of SA Scott Marble, dated 7/20/93, re-decedent's body discovered in his car, and revolver recovered in car.

E1. Other witnesses were in the park (Ruddy article of 6/14/95).

1. Several men wearing orange vests.

2. Several people who entered the park through the rear entrance and encountered police.

F1. Enhanced photographed depicts a wound on neck.

G1. Not an independent investigation (Ruddy article of 6/19/95).

1. Tuohey conflicts.

2. Colombell oppositon/resistance.

H1. Eyeglasses found 13' from body.

VI. Forensic Examinations

A. Unidentified latent print inside grip of suicide weapon.

B. Unidentified blonde head hairs.

C. Unidentified carpet fibers.

D. Unidentified stain on shirt. (Dr. Lee).

E. Unidentified gunpowder in scrapings.

F. The decedent's head was moved.

G. No blood on suicide weapon.

H. No soil on shoes. (mica flakes)
I. Large semen stain in the decedent's underwear.
J. Blood flowed uphill (video).
K. Excavation of site disputed.
L. Possible blood on handkerchief (Item 4a)
M. Inconsistent vegetation at death scene.
N. Polaroid photos depict decedent's hand in different positions.
O. FBI Lab relied on third generation photographs for their examinations; copies of copies.

SUBJECT: DISCREPANCY LIST

The following list is offered as a comprehensive and itemized outline of all of the noted discrepancies, inconsistencies, and problems that have been identified in the Vincent W. Foster death investigation to date. The outline is broken down into the following areas: U.S. Park Police, Emergency Medical Technicians (EMTs), the White House, Northern Virginia Medical Examiner, Miscellaneous, and Forensic Examinations.

I. U.S. Park Police

A. No gunshot residue samples of the decedent's hands.

B. Lack of complete documentation of the gunshot residues on the left hand.

C. Poorly diagrammed death scene; lack of measurements.

D. No photo log; no documentation regarding who took what photographs, and the total number of photos.

E. Death scene 35mm photos did not develop.

F. No documentation regarding the initial search of the decedent's vehicle at the death scene- no inventory.

G. Photo of an unidentified briefcase next to a U.S.P.P. vehicle.

H. Decedent's pager returned too soon; no records obtained regarding previous pages.

I. Suicide weapon processed with dust prior to other laboratory exams.

J. Inconsistent statements regarding moving and searching the body. (Rolla, Braun, Simonello, Hodakaviec)

K. Inconsistent and poorly documented autopsy.

1. Morrissette's report.
2. No gunshot residue samples.
3. No fingernail clippings/scrapings.
4. No major case prints of decedent (palms, sides and tops of fingers).
5. No photo of left hand.
6. Possible contamination of evidence subsequent to autopsy at M.E. Office.

1- Tuohey
1- Kavanaugh
1- Gillis

4. trampled area around death scene.
5. does not see white car occupied.

B. Inconsistencies between Doody and Feist's statements.

C. No initial investigation of the park's "second entrance".

D. No one heard a gunshot.

E. The gun exemplifies a "drop gun".

F. No matching ammo at the decedent's residence.

G. The decedent's grip on the gun was not the simplest nor the easiest to shoot himself in the mouth.

H. The decedent never previously spoke of suicide.

I. The decedent had no particular obsession, "dire predicament", or one thing that would have put him over the edge.

J. The decedent had dealt with stress before.

K. The suicide weapon has never been positively identified as belonging to the decedent.

L. Lisa Foster's initial spontaneous question "was the gun in his mouth?".

M. Five unaccounted for hours between the time the decedent left work and was discovered dead.

N. Lack of blood at death scene.

O. No bullet.

P. No cadaveric spasm causing decedent to clench gun.

Q. The gun did not fly out of the decedent's hand.

R. No chipped teeth noted by M.E.

S. No flashburns inside mouth noted by M.E.

T. The mortician lost the original embalming report and diagram.

U. The decedent's glasses were discovered 13' downslope from his body.

VI. Forensic Examinations

A. Unidentified latent print on note.

B. Unidentified latent print inside grip of suicide weapon.

C. Unidentified blonde head hairs.

D. Unidentified carpet fibers.

E. Unidentified stain on shirt. (shirt being resubmitted to lab)

F. Unidentified gunpowder in scrapings from decedent's shoes and socks, and the paper that they were dried on.

G. The decedent's head was moved.

H. No blood on suicide weapon.

I. No soil on shoes. (mica flakes)

J. Large semen stain in the decedent's underwear.

Subject: FOSTER DEATH INVESTIGATION
SUMMARY OF PHYSICAL EVIDENCE

The following is a comprehensive summary of the physical evidence in this case. This summary does not include the items obtained during the search of Ft. Marcy Park on 4/4/94, since none of the items were determined to be relevant to this investigation. Preliminary examination by Dr. Lee indicates the possibility of the presence of blood on the USPP latent lifts from the glasses and revolver, as noted in my memo documenting my meeting with him on 6/9/95. My memo of 6/12/95 identifies the particular locations and amounts of hairs, fibers, and latent prints. Additionally, my memo of 3/2/95, which documents our meeting with the laboratory examiners, contains information regarding the nature of the forensic examinations and some of the conclusions that can be drawn from the results.

I) Death Scene Observations.
A) The decedent was lying face-up on an approximate 45 degree sloped embankment, with his head toward the top of the slope. The location was consistently described to be near the "second cannon".
B) The decedent was wearing a white shirt. Blood stains are only observed on the right shoulder and neck area, and around the right rib cage area.
C) Blood trails are observed on the decedent's face.
D) The decedent's arms were at his sides. The right hand was around the cylinder of a black revolver.
1) right thumb trapped between trigger and inside edge of trigger guard.
2) one blood droplet on right index finger above second joint.
3) apparent gunshot residues along the outside edge of the right index finger, in close proximity to the cylinder gap of the weapon.

4) The hammer of the revolver had to be cocked to remove the weapon from the hand (indicates that the revolver was cocked when the thumb was inserted).

5) The decedent's hand was flexible (gun was not tightly gripped).

E) Prescription glasses were collected approximately 13' downslope from the decedent's feet.

F) When the body was rolled, a large pool of blood was observed where the head had been resting.

1) Additionally, a larger area of blood was observed where the decedent's back was in contact with the ground, which coincided with blood stains observed on the back of the decedent's shirt.

2) A gunshot wound was observed at the back of the decedent's head.

G) The area was not searched for blood, other than by sight.

1) No blood was visually seen on surrounding vegetation.

H) The decedent was still wearing his jewelry and pager.

1) The pager had been manually turned off.

2) The decedent's wallet and identification were located in his unlocked vehicle.

a) The wallet contained $292 and various credit cards.

I) The weapon was unloaded at the USPP office.

1) The hammer was down on a fired .38 caliber casing.

2) An unfired .38 cal. bullet was in the next chamber.

a) Colt revolvers rotate clockwise. The unfired bullet was in the next chamber to be rotated into firing position.

3) The serial number from the crane of the revolver cylinder (356555) was traced to the Seattle Hardware Co., Seattle, WA., 9/14/13.

a) The serial number on the frame of the revolver (355055) was traced to the Gus Habich Co., Indianapolis, IN., 12/29/13.

b) Consistent with describing the weapon as an antique or family heirloom.

J. The following items were taken as evidence at the location of the body on 7/20/93:

a) eyeglasses- 13' downslope from the decedent's feet. (Simonello).

b) revolver- from the decedent's right hand (Simonello).

c) Seiko wrist watch- from decedent's left wrist (Rolla). Returned to Cliff Sloan on 7/21/93.

d) Pager- from decedent's right waist area (Rolla). Returned to Cliff Sloan on 7/21/93.

e) Silver ring with large white stone- from decedent's right ring finger (Rolla). Returned to Cliff Sloan on 7/21/93.

f) Gold colored ring with inscription "E.B.B. to V.W.F. 4-20-68" - from decedent's left ring finger (Rolla). Returned to Cliff Sloan on 7/21/93.

K. The following items were taken as evidence from the decedent's vehicle in the Ft. Marcy parking lot:

a) Brown leather wallet containing identification, credit cards, miscellaneous papers, and photos- from decedent's suit jacket pocket (Braun- Rolla). Returned to Cliff Sloan on 7/21/93.

(1) one of the papers in the wallet was a list of psychiatrists.

b) Black suit jacket- from front passenger seat of decedent's vehicle (Braun).

c) Blue silk tie with swans- on top of coat on front passenger seat (Braun).

d) White House Identification- under coat on front passenger seat (Braun).

e) Miscellaneous papers- from glove box, trunk, and door (Braun).

L. Photos.

1. 35mm photos taken by Simonello were underexposed, and did not develop.

2. 5 Polaroid photos of the death scene initialed by Edwards, probably taken by Ferstl.

3. 8 Polaroid photos of the death scene taken by Rolla.

4. 5 Polaroid photos of the decedent's car at the Ft. Marcy parking lot taken by Braun.

M. The following items were taken as evidence from the decedent's right front pants pockets at the Fairfax Hospital Morgue on 7/20/93:

a) one key ring marked "Cook Jeep Sales" (Braun).

b) one key ring marked "Vince's Keys" (Braun). Returned with vehicle on 7/27/93.

II. Autopsy

A. Observations.

1. Cause of death: perforating gunshot wound mouth - head, no other trauma noted.

a. No evidence of abrasions, lacerations, contusions, or bone fractures (other than that associated with the head wound).

b. No evidence of teeth fractures or chipping.

2. Apparent gunpowder residues on both index fingers; more pronounced on right hand.

3. Abundant gunpowder residues on the soft palate of the mouth.

4. Toxicology was negative for alcohol and drugs.

B. The following items were taken as evidence subsequent to the autopsy at the Northern Virginia Medical Examiner's Office on 7/21/93. The items of clothing were placed into one bag and transported to the US Park Police Anacostia Office:

a) white colored, long-sleeved, button-down shirt (Johnson).

b) white colored, short-sleeved t-shirt (Johnson).

c) white colored boxer shorts (Johnson).

d) blue-gray colored pants with black colored belt (Johnson).

e) a pair of black colored socks (Johnson).

f) a pair of black colored dress shoes, size 11M (Johnson).

g) known hairs of Vincent Foster, Jr. (Johnson).

h) known blood of Vincent Foster, Jr. (Johnson).
i) known fingerprints of Vincent Foster, Jr. (Johnson).

The clothing was set out to dry on three pieces of brown wrapping paper, which were layed out on the floor of the USPP photo developing room. On 7/26/93, the items were packaged in separate containers and placed in the USPP evidence locker.

C. Autopsy documentation.

1. Diagrams (Beyer).
2. 5 microscopic slides containing sections of the soft palate, brain, heart, lung, and liver (Beyer).
3. 5 paraffin blocks, 3 of soft palate (Beyer).
4. 13 Polaroid photographs (Beyer).
5. 14 35mm photographs (Beyer).
6. 35 mm photos (Hill).

III. Vehicle search.

A. The following items were obtained from a search of Foster's grey Honda Accord at the USPP impound lot on 7/21/93 by Officer E.J. Smith, and stored at the USPP evidence room:

1. Rand McNally Washington, D.C. map.
2. sunglasses.
3. "Happy Birthday card to Tom".
4. piece of white paper with red writing.
5. box of "The DeLuxe Check Printers, with four checkbooks in the name of Laura Foster.
6. clear plastic envelope with Insurance Identification Card listed to Vincent or Elizabeth Foster, Policy number 10094177-01, exp. 8/6/90.
7. one Sierra Nevada beer bottle (from inside white and green bag).
8. one Miller Lite beer can.
9. empty container of Marlboro Lites cigarettes.
10. one Kaopectate bottle.
11. one Clos Du Bois corkscrew.
12. Contents of front ashtray:
    a. 35 pennies, two quarters, one nickel, a Compton's Foodland disk, a $100 Estados Unidos Mexicanos coin dated 1985.
    b. Chevron credit card.
    c. Texaco credit card.
    d. a guitar pick.

B. 35 mm photos were taken of the vehicle during the search (Smith).

C. The vehicle was processed for latent prints with negative results (Smith).

1. Four of these latent prints were later identified by the FBI Laboratory as being of comparison value.

D. The following items were obtained from the law firm of Sharp & Lankford by SA Russell Bransford on 6/16/94. The items were in the decedent's grey Honda Accord at the time it was released by the USPP. The items were removed from the car by William Kennedy.

The items were subsequently stored at the OIC-DC Office:

1. coffee mug
2. container of jellybeans
3. black eyeglass pouch with Rayban sunglasses
4. green kitchen mitt
5. one pair of brown moccasins
6. one blue audiocassette carryingcase with 12 music tapes
7. two hardcover books:
   a. Speak Up With Confidence, by Jack Valenti
   b. 2,000 Famous Legal Quotations, by M. Frances McNamara
8. Tysons Center directory
9. Potomac Mills directory
10. Eastern U.S. area map
11. one yellow envelope containing papers pertaining to the Honda Accord.
12. one White House envelope, hand addressed in pencil to William Kennedy, containing an Arkansas vehicle registration for a 1992 Lexus 300, with an attached post-it note.

IV) The note.

A. On 7/27/93 at 9:30 pm, numerous pieces of small yellow lined paper were obtained from Bernard Nussbaum by Det. Megby of the USPP.

B. On 7/28/93, the note was reconstructed and photographed (Simonello).

C. On 7/30/93, the note was released to SA Scott Salter, FBI.

D. On 8/5/93, the note was returned to the USPP.

V) On 3/21/94, all of the above items from the death scene, vehicle search, autopsy, and the note were released to the Office of the Independent Counsel (Colombell 302 of 3/21/94). The items were subsequently provided to the FBI Laboratory on 3/24/94.

VI) In December 1994, Sharon Bowman (decedent's sister) provided five .38 caliber rounds that were obtained from the Foster residence in Hope, AK.

VII) Approximately one week after Foster's death, Deborah Gorham located a copy of his life insurance policy in the middle drawer of his desk.

VI) FORENSIC EXAMINATIONS

A. The note.

1. one latent palm print of value was developed, and subsequently positively compared to the known prints of Bernie Nussbaum.
2. the handwriting was positively compared to the known writing of Vincent W. Foster, Jr. by the U.S. Capitol Police and the FBI.
3. one unidentified blue wool fiber.
4. no indented writing.
5. insufficient DNA for exam.

B. The vehicle.
1. four latent prints of value (as identified by the FBI Lab).
2. two latent prints of value from a business card which was part of the miscellaneous papers removed from the car.
a. one of the prints was positively compared to the known prints of Simonello (USPP).
3. one latent fingerprint on a white envelope.
4. four latent fingerprints from a pink envelope.
5. one latent palm print from a greeting card.

C. Revolver.
1. no latent prints on outside.
a. one partial latent fingerprint on underside of grip (unable to compare with decedent' known prints).
2. no blood. *-USPP latent lifts
3. decedent's DNA on muzzle.
4. no alteration of serial number.

D. White, long-sleeved shirt.
1. positive reaction for gunpowder gunshot residue (ATF and FBI).
2. ball shaped gunpowder
3. decedent's blood.
a. the only stains on the shirt are blood and sodium rhodizonate.
4. no semen.
5. no hairs dissimilar to the decedent/suitable for comparison.
6. unidentified fibers (3).
7. no coherent soil.
8. mica particles.

E. Fired cartridge case.
1. fired from the revolver.
2. several pieces of ball smokeless powder.
3. no latent prints.

F. Unfired cartridge.
1. similar to fired cartridge in caliber, manufacturer, and headstamps.
2. contained ball smokeless powder.
3. no latent prints.

G. Eyeglasses.
1. one piece of ball smokeless powder.
2. no blood. (USPP latent lifts).
3. insufficient DNA for exam.
4. no latent prints.

H. Paper that decedent's clothes were set out on to dry at USPP.
1. ball shaped gunpowder.
2. one dissimilar gunpowder particle (perforated disk shaped, from a fired cartridge)

3. no hairs dissimilar to decedent's/suitable for comparison.
4. unidentified fibers (approx. 20).
5. no coherent soil.
6. mica particles.

I. Known blood of the decedent.
1. Trace amounts of trazodone, diazapam/nordiazapam.

J. Known hair of the decedent.
1. No drugs.

K. T-shirt.
1. ball shaped gunpowder
2. decedent's blood.
3. no semen.
4. unidentified head hairs.
5. unidentified fibers (2).
6. no coherent soil.
7. mica particles.

L. Socks and shoes.
1. one dissimilar gunpowder particle (flattened ball shaped from an unfired cartridge).
2. blood of unknown origin on one shoe.
3. no blood on the socks and the other shoe.
4. unidentified head hairs.
5. unidentified fibers (approx. 17 short fibers).
6. no coherent soil.
7. mica particles.

M. Known tissue samples from decedent's soft palate.
1. no unconsumed gunpowder particles- no ball shaped gunpowder.

N. Belt and pants
1. human blood, too limited to identify, on belt.
2. unconfirmed blood on pants.
3. no semen on pants.
4. unidentified head hairs.
5. unidentified fibers (numerous small/short fibers- all on one microscope slide).
6. no coherent soil.
7. no gunpowder residues (ATF & FBI).
7. mica particles.

O. Shorts.
1. unconfirmed human blood.
2. semen (DNA matched to decedent).
3. no hairs dissimilar to decedent's/suitable for comparison.
4. unidentified fiber (1).
5. no coherent soil.
6. mica particles.

P. Jacket.
1. no blood.
2. no semen.
3. no hairs dissimilar to decedent/suitable for comparison.
4. unidentified fibers (8 total from jacket, tie, handkerchief scrapings).
5. no coherent soil.
6. no mica.

Q. Handkerchief.
1. unconfirmed blood.
2. no semen.
3. unidentified fibers (8 total from jacket, tie, handkerchief scrapings).

R. Tie.
1. no blood.
2. no semen.
3. no hairs dissimilar to decedent/suitable for comparison.
4. unidentified fibers (8 total from jacket, tie, handkerchief scrapings).
5. no coherent soil.
6. no mica.

S. Brown wrapping paper, white filter paper, and white wrapping paper from around revolver.
1. no blood.
2. no DNA exam conducted (decedent's DNA on muzzle of revolver).

T. Miscellaneous papers from decedent's car.
1. unidentified DNA on an envelope (flap and stamp).
2. insufficient DNA for exam on other paper items.
3. indented writing ("VU Parking Ticket") on Ty Tippet business card. No indented writing on any other items.

U. Miller Lite beer can.
1. insufficient DNA for exam.

V. Sierra Nevada beer bottle.
1. insufficient DNA for exam.

W. .38 caliber ammunition provided by Sharon Bowman.
1. four rounds are of the same manufacture (Remington) as the rounds found in the revolver.
a. two of these rounds are lead round nosed bullets; the same as the unfired round in the revolver, but manufactured at a different time.
2. one bullet was a lead round nosed cartridge, but made by a different manufacturer.
3. all of these rounds were capable of being fired from the revolver.

re: "Safe House"

1. I was advised on the afternoon of May 2 by .... that the alleged "safe house" was located in Merrywood on the Potomac, a development located 100-200 yards from the back entrance to Fort Marcy Park.

The house was in the name of FNU Wallace, an attorney close to Bill Clinton. Or, the house was jointly in Wallace's and Foster's names.

The caller told me he did not know how good this information was, but wanted to pass it on.

2. I asked the caller where it was physically in relation to Fort Marcy. I told him there was a subdivision west of the Park. He simply repeated that it was 100-200 yards from the back entrance.

I got the impression that the caller was not familiar with the layout of the Park or the surrounding area.

3. The caller called me back at 8:33 am on Wed., May 3, leaving a voice mail: I have some more specifics on the safe house. I called this person back at 12:02 pm and left my name and number.

4. At 2:45 pm this person advised:

The house is on Dogwood Street. It leads to a deadend in a cul-de-sac. It is in Fairfax County.

On the left in the back of the cul-de-sac is a big white two story house. It abuts Fort Marcy Park. This development is about 300 yards from the park.

There is a Larry Wallace, who is a big shot attorney.

Again, this information may not be accurate.

THE DEATH OF VINCENT FOSTER. WHAT REALLY HAPPENED?

--Jeremiah Films

This video was produced by the same people who produced "The Clinton Chronicles." It begins with a statement to the effect, "The following information is documented and true." Some of the highlights of this video are as follows:

INTRODUCTION

The Citizens for Honest Government presents: "The Death of Vince Foster. What really happened?"

I. PART ONE - THE INCONSISTENCIES

1 - very little blood at scene

2 - Foster's head assumes four different positions after death

3 - no skull fragments found at the scene

4 - gun found in Foster's hand

5 - gun found in wrong hand

6 - Foster's fingerprints not on gun

7 - powder residue suggests Foster did not fire gun

8 - powder on Foster's clothing did not match gun

9 - gun not positively identified as Foster's

10 - fatal bullet never located

11 - no gunshot heard

12 - no dust found on Foster's shoes

Six pieces of evidence which indicate it is likely Foster did not die in the park.

1. Very little blood
2. Four different head positions
3. No skull fragments
4. No bullet
5. No gunshot reported
6. No dust on shoes

Three pieces of evidence which indicate it is more than likely Foster did not fire gun himself.

1. Gun still in hand
2. Gun in wrong hand
3. Untraceable weapon used

II. PART II - THE COVER-UPS

A.

1. Falsified position of the body - a second crime scene created that night

2. White House demanded key evidence, and park police gave it to them. This included papers, etc., given back.

B. Was Foster suicidal?

Initially - "Absolutely not." The secretary said there was nothing unusual. Bill Clinton said there was nothing unusual.

But the Fiske report said that he was depressed, he organized his desk, he paid bills, he was apparently stiff that morning, and he was apparently distracted.

Everyone fell in line that he was depressed.

Hillary Clinton said on April 22, 1994, "No one had a clue. Neither did the people who spent the weekend with him."

Day of death - no suicide indications

1. Drove children to work
2. No final words
3. No final preparations

4. Arrived on time
5. Worked conscientiously
6. Set up future appointments
7. Ate lunch
8. Read the newspaper
9. Checked out a pager
10. Said he would return later
11. Wrote no suicide note

Dr. Beyer gave very inconsistent statements.

Bill Clinton gave conflicting versions of Foster's state of mind.

III. PART III - THE RAID ON FOSTER'S OFFICE

Ending quote by Webb Hubbell, July 20, 1993: "Don't believe a word you hear; it was not a suicide."

RE: Foster Documents/Office/Note Investigation

DATE: June 15, 1995

The following is a tentative schedule for the Foster documents investigation, including for decisions on possible indictments. This schedule assumes no significant new information is developed in the next three months.

July 7, 1995

-- completion of all grand jury appearances and major interviews.

July 17-28, 1995

-- Senate Hearings (tentative dates).

August 1995

-- attorney and agent evaluation of evidence and of Senate hearings.
-- follow-up interviews if necessary.
-- preparation of internal report/memorandum regarding the investigation and possible indictments.

September 6, 1995

-- circulation to all OIC attorneys of internal report/memorandum, including recommendations regarding possible indictments.

September 7-15, 1995

-- indictment decisions.

[Note: I anticipate that the Foster death investigation will conclude later than the Foster documents investigation, in large part because we still have various ideas and theories to pursue in the Foster death investigation.]

RE: DOJ OPR Report on Travel Office

DATE: May 31, 1995

FOSTER

URGENT

Chairman Clinger plans to hold hearings on the Travel Office affair as soon as practicable. He has requested from the Department of Justice the Department's OPR Report on the Travel Office. The Department (Peggy Irving) has contacted me to determine whether we object to release of the OPR report. THE DEPARTMENT NEEDS AN ANSWER IMMEDIATELY.

I recommend that we not object to release of the Travel Office report. I see no danger that release of this report would hinder or impede our investigation of Mr. Foster's state of mind. Indeed, I think it possible that congressional inquiry may further illuminate the involvement of Mr. Foster and others, including the First Lady, in the Travel Office affair.

Mr. Fiske had objected to release of the OPR report while his investigation of the Foster death was proceeding. I do not believe that should alter our decision, however. Much of the information regarding Mr. Foster in the OPR Travel Office report is now public by means of the Fiske report and other news articles. Therefore, we are not in an identical situation to Mr. Fiske with respect to the OPR report. In addition, even were that not the case, I would still recommend that we adopt a position different from the one adopted by Mr. Fiske. It seems to me that we need to be cautious in dealing with Congress, and resist Congress only when it "really matters." This seems an especially tangential matter over which to incur the wrath of Congress. If we object to congressional inquiry into any matter in which Mr. Foster was involved, we would object to inquiry into the Travel Office, WACO, gays in the military, etc. In my opinion, that is not a posture that we should adopt.

RECOMMENDATION: I call Peggy Irving and tell her that we do not object to release of the OPR report on the Travel Office.

Please give me an answer today if possible.

RE: Foster Issues

DATE: May 8, 1995

This seems an appropriate time for a few brief thoughts on the Foster investigations.

1. The Foster death investigation can be divided into two related but distinct issues: (1) state of mind; and (2) for lack of a better term, physical evidence (which includes death scene observations, blood, forensic evidence, ballistics, etc.). In my opinion, we have made progress from the FBI/Fiske investigation on Foster's state of mind -- although we have not entirely solved that riddle. I do not believe, however, that we have yet made significant advances on the physical evidence, in large part because the FBI and Mr. Fiske did a fairly thorough job on that aspect of the investigation and seemed to answer the questions that could be answered.

To the extent, therefore, that we write a public report on the physical evidence, such a report is likely to be largely repetitive of the Fiske report. And I have serious doubts about the wisdom of or necessity for a public report on the Foster physical evidence if, as now would be the case, that report does little more than rehash the Fiske report. (If we solve the gun issue, that would be a significant breakthrough, but we have yet to do so.)

In any event, this is something to keep in mind as we continue the Foster death investigation.

2. For the next 6-8 weeks, Chuck Regini and Jeff Greene will continue the investigation/review of the Foster physical evidence and will attempt to complete the factfinding on it. To assist them, I recommend that we retain an independent pathologist; despite all of his qualifications, Dr. Hirsch unfortunately cannot be viewed as truly independent because of his work on the Fiske investigation.

3. During the next 6-8 weeks, I will attempt to complete the factfinding on the Foster office/documents investigation and the Foster state of mind investigation. One major task for me during this period will be to review at the White House the documents from Mr. Foster's office. In addition, I have a number of additional grand jury witnesses on the Foster documents investigation.

RE: Foster Documents Investigation -- Grand Jury Schedule

As of this date, we have interviewed 42 witnesses in the grand jury on the Foster documents investigation. We thus have completed the grand jury phase of this investigation -- with two exceptions. First, we may interview [redacted] in the grand jury at some point depending on his status in Little Rock investigations. Second, we will have a few questions to ask [redacted] when he appears in the grand jury on White House-Treasury contacts issues.

Absent significant new developments, I plan to circulate a prosecution memorandum by Monday, August 21, if at all possible.

Attached is a list of the grand jury witnesses.

SUBJECT: DISCREPANCY LIST

The following list is offered as a comprehensive and itemized outline of all of the noted discrepancies, inconsistencies, and problems that have been identified in the Vincent W. Foster death investigation to date. The outline is broken down into the following areas: U.S. Park Police, Emergency Medical Technicians (EMTs), the White House, Northern Virginia Medical Examiner, Miscellaneous, and Forensic Examinations.

I. U.S. Park Police

A. No gunshot residue samples of the decedent's hands.

B. Lack of complete documentation of the gunshot residues on the left hand.

C. Poorly diagrammed death scene; lack of measurements.

D. No photo log; no documentation regarding who took what photographs, and the total number of photos.

E. Death scene 35mm photos did not develop.

F. No documentation regarding the initial search of the decedent's vehicle at the death scene- no inventory.

G. Photo of an unidentified briefcase next to a U.S.P.P. vehicle.

H. Decedent's pager returned too soon; no records obtained regarding previous pages.

I. Suicide weapon processed with dust prior to other laboratory exams.

J. Inconsistent statements regarding moving and searching the body. (Rolla, Braun, Simonello, Hodakaviec)

K. Inconsistent and poorly documented autopsy.

1. Morrissette's report.
2. No gunshot residue samples from hands.
3. No fingernail clippings/scrapings.
4. No major case prints of decedent (palms, sides and tops of fingers).
5. No photo of left hand.
6. Possible contamination of evidence subsequent to autopsy at M.E. Office.
7. Inconsistent statements regarding what was done to the body prior to autopsy.
8. No description of body and clothing prior to autopsy.

1-Starr
1 Tuohey
1- Kavanaugh
1- Gillis
1-29D-LR-35063

L. Possible contamination of evidence at U.S. Park Police facility.

M. Poor interview and documentation of witnesses at death scene (Doody and Feist).

N. Photo of an unidentified white male wearing plainclothes at death scene.

O. Inconsistent statements regarding vehicle doors being locked/unlocked. (Braun, Rolla, Hodakievic, Simonello, Gavin)

P. All photographs not produced pursuant to initial subpoena.

Q. Inadequate and incomplete metal detector search by the USPP. (Operators had no prior experience or training)

II. Inconsistent statements and observations of Fairfax County Fire and Rescue personnel.

A. Wound on neck (Arthur: .45 cal. bullet hole.)

B. Gun under thigh.

C. Wound on upper right front of skull (Gonzales)>

D. Briefcase in vehicle.

E. Unidentified person in woods (Hall).

F. Vehicle doors locked.

G Death scene photos do not accurately depict scene.

H. Two unidentified white males walking from death scene.

I. Color of gun was silver.

J. Type of gun was semiautomatic pistol (Arthur).

K. Statements of initial paramedics at scene regarding their actions are inconsistent with Fairfax County paramedic protocols.

L. Report coded as a homicide (Ashford).

III. Medical Examiner

A. X-rays

1. Autopsy report indicates x-rays were taken.

2. Morrissette's report indicates Beyer told him x-rays were taken.

B. All individuals present at autopsy not indicated on autopsy report.

C. No photographs of decedent's left hand.

D. Inconsistent statements regarding removal of decedent's tongue and palate. (see I.7)

E. Inconsistent "on-scene" times reported for Dr. Haut; 7:40 pm and 7:15.

F. Stomach contents; no definitive digestion time, or positive identification.

IV. White House

A. Foster's office unsecured until 7/21/93, approximately 10:10 a.m.

B. Confidential trash bag removed and replaced.

C. Nussbaum enters office; removes small photo.

D. Pond rearranges papers on Foster's coffee table.

E. Exclusive initial review of documents by Nussbaum.

F.Torn note found one week later in briefcase previously searched by Nussbaum.

G. Note not released to investigators until the following week; a day after it was discovered.

V. Miscellaneous
A. CW's inconsistencies.
1. positioning of decedent's hands.
2. no gun.
3. winecoolers and briefcase in vehicle.
4. trampled area around death scene.
5. does not see white car occupied.
B. Inconsistencies between Doody and Feist's statements.
C. No initial investigation of the park's "second entrance".
D. No one heard a gunshot.
E. The gun exemplifies a "drop gun".
F. No matching ammo at the decedent's residence.
G. The decedent's grip on the gun was not the simplest nor the easiest to shoot himself in the mouth.
H. The decedent never previously spoke of suicide.
I. The decedent had no particular obsession, "dire predicament", or one thing that would have put him over the edge.
J. The decedent had dealt with stress before.
K. The suicide weapon has never been positively identified as belonging to the decedent.
L. Lisa Foster's initial spontaneous question "was the gun in his mouth?".
M. Five unaccounted for hours between the time the decedent left work and was discovered dead.
N. Lack of blood at death scene.
O. No bullet.
P. No cadaveric spasm causing decedent to clench gun.
Q. The gun did not fly out of the decedent's hand.
R. No chipped teeth noted by M.E.
S. No flashburns inside mouth noted by M.E.
T. The mortician lost the original embalming report and diagram.
U. The decedent's glasses were discovered 13' downslope from his body.
V. Body neatly laid out; "as if it was in a coffin".

VI. Forensic Examinations
A. Unidentified latent print on note.
B. Unidentified latent print inside grip of suicide weapon.
C. Unidentified blonde head hairs.
D. Unidentified carpet fibers.
E. Unidentified stain on shirt. (shirt being resubmitted to lab)
F. Unidentified gunpowder in scrapings from decedent's shoes and socks, and the paper that they were dried on.
G. The decedent's head was moved.
H. No blood on suicide weapon.
I. No soil on shoes. (mica flakes)
J. Large semen stain in the decedent's underwear.
K. Blood flowed uphill (video).
L. Excavation of site disputed.

re: Homicide Consultants

Due to the continued concerns and questions regarding whether we have done everything possible in the Foster death investigation, specifically with regards to the physical evidence, a possible recommendation would be to obtain the services of a panel of "outside" homicide experts/consultants. The consultants would primarily be used to review all of the interviews and physical evidence to identify any potential investigative leads or forensic examinations that we may have overlooked. Additionally, the consultants could be asked to formulate a conclusion as to whether the evidence overwhelmingly indicates suicide, and whether we have been able to conclusively rule out homicide. Also, if it is still an issue, the consultants could address the findings and conclusions in the Western Journalism Center report of 4/27/95.

I would recommend a panel of at least three consultants for the review. The following is a list of experienced, well-respected homicide consultants:

Henry Lee
Vernon Geberth
Ronald Holmes
Dr. James Fox, Northeatern University, Criminology Dept.
Robert Hazelwood
Vincent DiMaio

I am familiar with all of the above individuals from their various articles and books about death investigations, and forensic techniques in death investigations. Their teachings and theories are the most modern, and consistent with "real-life" death investigations, that I am familiar with. I can obtain additional names from Behavioral Sciences, if necessary.

OIC-302 (Rev. 8-19-94)

OFFICE OF THE INDEPENDENT COUNSEL

Date of transcription 6/29/95

KYLE ERIC CHADWICK was interviewed in a conference room in the offices of the Office of the Independent Counsel (OIC), 1001 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Suite 480 North, Washington, D.C. (WDC). After being advised of the official identity of the interviewing agent and the nature of the interview, CHADWICK provided the following information:

In late April or early May of 1993, while CHADWICK was a first year law student at Stanford Law School in California, he heard about an opportunity to serve as an unpaid intern in the White House Counsel's Office (WHCO) in WDC. CHADWICK knew that Associate White House Counsel CHERYL MILLS had attended Stanford Law School, and he faxed a copy of his resume to her at the White House. Because CHADWICK could not afford to travel to WDC to be interviewed for an internship position, he was interviewed over the telephone by MILLS and Associate White House Counsel BETH NOLAN. There was a two to three week interlude between CHADWICK's interview and his receipt of an offer of an internship.

CHADWICK arrived in WDC in early June, possibly during the first week of June, to begin his internship at the White House. CHADWICK does not recall the exact date when he began his internship. The summer was divided into two internship sessions, and there were five to six interns working in the WHCO in each of the two sessions. MILLS was generally the supervisor over the WHCO interns. While the interns were designated as working for specific people on the WHCO staff, the interns rotated roles and worked for a number of people during their internships. The interns were given fairly discrete legal questions to work on. They would typically be asked to write memoranda answering specific questions posed by members of the WHCO staff. Some of the interns were also given the opportunity to research policy decisions.

Some of CHADWICK's work involved photocopying of statutes which were relevant to matters under consideration by WHCO staff. The assignments given to interns were generally channeled through MILLS to ensure that the workloads assigned to each of the interns were fairly equal. Each of the interns was given a telephone and a desk at which to work. CHADWICK's desk was in an area resembling a reception area in the Old Executive Office Building (OEOB). The area in which his desk was located was next door to the suite where NOLAN and Associate White House Counsel WILLIAM H. KENNEDY III had their offices. CHADWICK did not perform any vetting work for administration nominees.

CHADWICK served at the White House for eight weeks. His first four weeks were spent working for MILLS, the next two were spent working for NOLAN, and CHADWICK worked his last two weeks for Deputy White House Counsel VINCENT W. FOSTER, Jr. FOSTER died during CHADWICK's second week working for FOSTER. CHADWICK's last day of work at the White House was the Friday following FOSTER's death, i.e., July 23, 1993.

When CHADWICK first arrived at the White House, there was an orientation meeting for the WHCO interns conducted by FOSTER and White House Counsel BERNARD W. NUSSBAUM. There was a marked contrast in the personalities of NUSSBAUM and FOSTER. NUSSBAUM was talkative and gestured quite a bit as he spoke. FOSTER was very tightly controlled and had the appearance of a highly successful president of a small town bank. FOSTER also had an air of real propriety, and he told the interns that most of the matters on which he worked at the WHCO were of such a nature that he could not even discuss them with his wife.

CHADWICK only spoke with FOSTER in person once during the two weeks of CHADWICK's assignment to FOSTER. This conversation occurred early in CHADWICK's first week working for FOSTER, and it occurred in FOSTER's office in the West Wing of the White House. CHADWICK had tried to telephone FOSTER on CHADWICK's first day working for FOSTER to obtain his work assignments, but CHADWICK was unable to reach FOSTER. CHADWICK believes he may have then met with FOSTER on Tuesday of that week (July 13, 1993). FOSTER told CHADWICK that he had some health care-related work that he wanted CHADWICK to perform. This work involved finding sources of information and locating and making copies of state statutes which were relevant to health care issues. FOSTER held out a few newspaper clippings which related to health care as an example of what he had in mind. FOSTER was eating lunch in his office during this conversation, and CHADWICK only spent approximately five minutes or a little more with

FOSTER. FOSTER seemed intent on CHADWICK comprehending what it was that FOSTER wanted CHADWICK to do. This was the only occasion when CHADWICK spoke with FOSTER in FOSTER's office. There were other occasions when CHADWICK might encounter FOSTER in a hallway, but on such occasions CHADWICK and FOSTER would just exchange greetings.

FOSTER's physical appearance during this conversation seemed about the same as CHADWICK recalled it having been during the orientation meeting. CHADWICK does not recall observing any changes in FOSTER's personality or physical appearance during the time that CHADWICK knew FOSTER.

CHADWICK usually had a difficult time reaching FOSTER by telephone because FOSTER was so busy. When CHADWICK completed an assignment for FOSTER, CHADWICK would usually send the completed product to FOSTER via inter-office mail or CHADWICK would place the work product in an envelope and leave it with a guard at the West Wing.

On the morning of July 20, 1993, CHADWICK called FOSTER regarding the project on which CHADWICK was working, which involved the photocopying of statutes. CHADWICK was unsuccessful in reaching FOSTER so he left a message asking FOSTER to call him. CHADWICK recalls receiving a telephone message slip which indicated that FOSTER had returned CHADWICK's call at approximately 12:40 p.m., at a time when CHADWICK must have been away from his desk. CHADWICK called FOSTER back and was put through to FOSTER. FOSTER said that he wanted a copy of the complete statute which CHADWICK had located rather than just the portion FOSTER had earlier requested. FOSTER commented in words to the effect that, It seems like a good statute, don't you think? CHADWICK did not know how to respond to this question since he has rarely attempted to characterize a statute. CHADWICK felt at the time that FOSTER seemed "distracted" since FOSTER had asked a question which seemed so out of character for him. FOSTER was usually very businesslike and direct in his conversations with CHADWICK, and FOSTER did not discuss personal matters with CHADWICK or ask for CHADWICK's opinions.

CHADWICK does not recall any other details of this telephone conversation with FOSTER. FOSTER did not say anything else in the conversation which CHADWICK regarded as remarkable or memorable. CHADWICK does not recall FOSTER's voice or speech sounding any different than usual.

The statute about which FOSTER had asked for CHADWICK's opinion was a Florida statute relating to people waiving their right to sue for tort after suffering certain types of injuries. The statute had relevance to both health care issues and to tort reform.

FOSTER also seemed to be distracted on one other occasion when FOSTER asked CHADWICK to obtain a copy of a book written by a Harvard University professor, whom CHADWICK believes to have been PAUL WEILER. The book related to health care issues. When CHADWICK inquired about obtaining a copy of the book for FOSTER, he learned that a copy had already been sent to the WHCO. CHADWICK believes FOSTER forgot that the WHCO was already in receipt of the book.

CHADWICK did not have personal contact with FOSTER at all on July 20, 1993, and he did not observe FOSTER at all on that day. The office space in which CHADWICK was located was on the first floor and south side of the OEOB. Because of the location of CHADWICK's office, CHADWICK would not have been able to observe FOSTER leaving the West Wing of the White House.

Several days after FOSTER's death, CHADWICK went to lunch with MILLS in the White House mess. This lunch meeting was on the day the FOSTER note was released to the media, but the note had not yet been released at the time of the meeting. MILLS did not offer any insights into FOSTER's death other than to say that FOSTER had been under a lot of pressure.

CHADWICK did not travel to Little Rock with other White House staff members, and he did not attend FOSTER's funeral. CHADWICK knows of no information or events which should have warned White House officials that FOSTER might take his own life.

There were two male interns who worked for FOSTER during the early part of the internship period. GEORGE CANNON was one of these males, but CHADWICK is unable to recall the name of the other intern.

(At this point in the interview, CHADWICK was asked about a number of former WHCO interns by name.) CHADWICK furnished the following information:

OIC-302a (Rev. 8-19-94)

29D-OIC-LR-35063

JONATHAN KOPP was possibly a full-time employee of the WHCO and may have been attending law school at Georgetown University at night. KOPP was already serving at the WHCO prior to the arrival of the WHCO interns, and he had possibly been there during the entire spring of 1993. KOPP guided the WHCO interns around the White House on their first day there.

MATTHEW FOGELSON would have worked for FOSTER at some point. CHADWICK believes FOGELSON was attending law school at New York University.

URSULA HALL was a female who attended the North Texas School of Law.

DANIEL RAPPORT was a student at Yale University.

DANA HYDE had been a student at Hastings College of Law prior to becoming a WHCO intern. CHADWICK had met HYDE once before when she was working for the presidential campaign of Governor BILL CLINTON. HYDE spoke of possibly transferring to attend law school at either Georgetown University or George Washington University. CHADWICK does not know if she actually transferred.

There was one other intern but CHADWICK is unable to recall the name of this person. CHADWICK believes this intern attended law school at either Vanderbilt University or possibly the University of Arkansas.

On further reflection by CHADWICK, DANA HYDE may have been one of the interns who served in the second eight week internship session during the summer of 1993.

GEORGE CANNON and the unknown male worked for FOSTER the first two weeks of the internship period. It is possible that DANIEL RAPPORT worked for FOSTER during the second two week block of the first summer session. CHADWICK cannot recall who worked for FOSTER the third two week block of the internship period. There was no inherited work which was passed on from, for example, FOSTER's intern in the third block to the intern in the fourth block (CHADWICK). The fact that CHADWICK tried to contact FOSTER on CHADWICK's first day of being assigned to FOSTER reflects that CHADWICK was attempting to get his work assignments.

OIC-302a (Rev. 8-19-94)

29D-OIC-LR-35063

Continuation of OIC-302 of KYLE ERIC CHADWICK, On 6/29/95, Page 6

On July 21, 1993, CHADWICK learned of FOSTER's death the preceding night. CHADWICK was living with his brother in Rockville, Maryland at the time. At approximately 8:00 a.m., CHADWICK was getting ready for work and listening to National Public Radio when he heard the hourly summary of the top news stories. The top story mentioned the death of the Deputy White House Counsel. CHADWICK had not received notification of FOSTER's death from anyone at the White House either that morning or the night before.

Once CHADWICK arrived at the White House that morning, there was still never a formal announcement of FOSTER's death. It was as if it was assumed that everyone knew of FOSTER's death. The full-time attorneys on the WHCO staff had a meeting that day in a conference room in the OEOB. CHADWICK does not know if this meeting occurred in the morning or afternoon. The interns and the detailee attorneys from other agencies who were serving on the WHCO staff were not invited to attend this meeting. As the full-time WHCO attorneys left the room following the meeting, they were very quiet and appeared grief-stricken. CHADWICK does not recall specifically who attended this meeting, but he does not recall observing anyone leaving the meeting who was not an attorney or at least a member of the WHCO staff. CHADWICK does not recall CRAIG LIVINGSTONE attending this meeting.

CHADWICK had very little contact with LIVINGSTONE. LIVINGSTONE addressed the interns on their first day at the White House and cautioned them about proper handling of documents. CHADWICK would occasionally see LIVINGSTONE in passing, such as in the halls. CHADWICK has never spoken with LIVINGSTONE about LIVINGSTONE's activities following FOSTER's death.

CHADWICK did not attend the address by President CLINTON to White House employees, and he does not recall being invited to attend it, although he did hear about it after it had occurred.

CHADWICK cannot recall the name of an unpaid woman who worked at a desk immediately outside MILLS's office. This woman spoke about her interest in obtaining full-time work at the White House, but CHADWICK doubts that she would have been hired because she had a poor attitude.

JENNIFER MILLER was an assistant to Associate White House Counsel RON KLAIN. MILLER had just finished her first year of law school at Stanford. Currently, MILLER may be taking some time off from her law school studies to participate in the CLINTON presidential campaign.

Neither KLAIN nor Associate White House Counsel CLIFF SLOAN had receptionists working for them.

CHADWICK has been unable to locate the written telephone message slip which notified CHADWICK of the return call from FOSTER on July 20, 1993. He had retained the slip for some time but he was unable to find it prior to the instant interview. Without viewing the slip, CHADWICK cannot recall with certainty what time FOSTER returned CHADWICK's call, but it was no more than five minutes either before or after 12:40 p.m. CHADWICK knows of one more place where this message slip may be, and he will advise the interviewing agent if he locates the slip.

CHADWICK has no knowledge or reason to believe that FOSTER's death was anything other than a suicide.

CHADWICK is not currently employed since he is studying to take the bar examination. A background investigation is currently being conducted on CHADWICK because he will be going to work at the United States Department of Justice in the Office of Legal Counsel.

Based on observation and interview, CHADWICK is described as follows:

RE: Foster Death Investigation

DATE: May 15, 1995

The following are the steps that Mark, Hickman, John, and I discussed today as possibilities for our continuing investigation of the physical evidence (as contrasted to state of mind).

1. Fingerprint on Gun

We are currently attempting to obtain Mr. Foster Sr.'s fingerprints from the military records center. If that proves fruitless, we may attempt to find his fingerprints from the Foster home in Hope. (If the fingerprint on the underside of the grip matched Mr. Foster Sr., that obviously would be a very significant step in our investigation.)

2. Carpet Fibers

We may obtain carpet fibers from various sources and attempt to match them to the fibers found on Foster. The possible sources are (a) his car; (b) the White House; and (c) his house in Georgetown.

3. Search of Park for Bullet

We may search the entire park for the bullet.

4. Stains on Shirt

The FBI lab is currently testing Foster's shirt to determine what if any material other than blood was present on the shirt.

5. Palm Print on Note (more relevant to Foster documents investigation)

We may try to match the palm print on the note to Foster's palm print. To do so, we would need to find a palm print from Foster. That would not be easy, but we can consult the lab and/or experts on the possibilities in this regard.

If we could not obtain a Foster palm print or if the prints did not match, we might obtain palm prints from various other persons in logical order: (1) the Park Police officers who handled the note; (2) Neuwirth, Gorham, Pond, Tripp, and Nussbaum; and (3) Williams, Castleton, and Thomasson.

re: "Safe House"

1. I was advised on the afternoon of May 2 by .... that the alleged "safe house" was located in Merrywood on the Potomac, a development located 100-200 yards from the back entrance to Fort Marcy Park.

The house was in the name of FNU Wallace, an attorney close to Bill Clinton. Or, the house was jointly in Wallace's and Foster's names.

The caller told me he did not know how good this information was, but wanted to pass it on.

2. I asked the caller where it was physically in relation to Fort Marcy. I told him there was a subdivision west of the Park. He simply repeated that it was 100-200 yards from the back entrance.

I got the impression that the caller was not familiar with the layout of the Park or the surrounding area.

3. The caller called me back at 8:33 am on Wed., May 3, leaving a voice mail: I have some more specifics on the safe house. I called this person back at 12:02 pm and left my name and number.

4. At 2:45 pm this person advised:

The house is on Dogwood Street. It leads to a deadend in a cul-de-sac. It is in Fairfax County.

On the left in the back of the cul-de-sac is a big white two story house. It abuts Fort Marcy Park. This development is about 300 yards from the park.

There is a Larry Wallace, who is a big shot attorney.

Again, this information may not be accurate.

RE: Foster Investigations

DATE: March 4, 1995

At Friday's meeting in Washington, decisions were made regarding certain aspects of the Foster death investigation. I will summarize those decisions and then list other points for discussion at our next team meeting.

Decisions

1. The Foster state of mind investigation necessarily must be a balance of thoroughness against reasonableness. Striking that balance, Ken concluded that it would be inappropriate at this juncture to issue a subpoena to the White House for "all documents to, from, or referring or relating to Vincent W. Foster, Jr." Such a subpoena remains a future option, however.

2. The goal of the Foster death investigation is to attempt to determine to as high a degree of certainty as is reasonably possible whether Foster's death was a homicide or a suicide. One factor to consider in making that determination is Foster's state of mind prior to his death. A troubled state of mind would be probative of suicide; a healthy state of mind would be probative of homicide. Of course, a particular state of mind is not definitive proof of suicide or homicide, but it nonetheless is a standard factor to weigh in death investigations.

With that in mind, the Travel Office is an important issue. It is well documented that the Travel Office concerned Foster a great deal. The episode seems to have bothered him in two different ways. First, he was angry and upset at the press, the FBI, and the White House for the manner in which they portrayed the events surrounding the firing of the Travel Office employees and the subsequent reprimands of various White House officials. Second, he appears to have been concerned about the possibility of congressional hearings on the Travel Office.

With respect to Foster's concern about potential congressional hearings, it is incumbent upon us to determine the precise nature of his concern about the potential hearings. Foster's brother-in-law Beryl Anthony has speculated that there might have been facts about the Travel Office that were not publicly known and that Foster did not want to reveal to Congress and the public. For that reason, it is necessary that we carefully examine all of the facts surrounding the firings of the Travel Office employees.

At this point, however, it is important to note that we are not investigating the Travel Office for the purpose of determining whether any individual inside or outside the White House violated any federal criminal law in connection with the firing of Travel Office employees. Of course, if we discover credible evidence of criminal wrongdoing with respect to the Travel Office firings during the course of the Foster investigation, we might initiate such an investigation. If so, we would immediately inform the Public Integrity Section because of their pending case against Billy Dale, which might have to be suspended under 28 U.S.C. § 597. We also would apply for an expansion of jurisdiction.

In light of the above, it would be appropriate at this juncture to issue a subpoena to the White House for (1) all documents to or from Foster referring or relating to the Travel Office; (2) all documents that both were within Foster's office on July 20, 1993, and refer or relate to the Travel Office; and (3) all documents referring or relating both to Vincent W. Foster and to the Travel Office.

For next team meeting

1. (Foster death) Given the above discussion, we should discuss whether it would be appropriate to issue a subpoena to the White House for all documents referring or relating to the Travel Office affair. Alternatively, we perhaps could issue a subpoena for all H. Clinton, Kennedy, Watkins, Thomasson, Livingstone, and McLarty documents referring or relating to the Travel Office.

2. (Foster death) Because Vince Foster apparently consulted Jim Hamilton, Jim Lyons, and Susan Thomases about the Travel Office in the week prior to his death, we should discuss whether to request a waiver of attorney-client privilege from the executor of Foster's estate (John Sloan).

3. (Foster documents and Foster death) We should discuss whether to subpoena the White House for all documents that were within Vince Foster's office, on his computer, within his secretary's office space, on his secretary's computer, or in the Counsel's safe on July 20, 1993. If we do not issue such a subpoena, we implicitly will have accepted the Nussbaum view of privilege and relevance as to Foster's office. If the White House objects to such a subpoena -- as I am sure it will -- we may want to offer a compromise whereby they would collect all such documents and I would review them. But we need to review them all -- regardless of the sensitivity of such documents.

4. (Foster documents and Foster death) We should discuss whether to issue a subpoena or request to Jim Hamilton and Lisa Foster for all documents that were within Vince Foster's office, on his computer, within his secretary's office space, on his secretary's computer, or in the Counsel's safe on July 20, 1993.

5. (Foster documents) We should discuss whether to subpoena from the White House all e-mail, calendars, diaries, and message logs for the following people for the period July 15-July 30, 1993: Kennedy, Lindsey, McLarty, Burton, Williams, Gergen, Thomasson, Livingstone, Scott, Neuwirth, Sloan, Nussbaum, Watkins, Quinn, Kennedy, Mills, Cerda, Nolan, Gearan, Klain.

6. (Foster death) We should obtain or review Foster's diary and any and all of Foster's calendars. We should also inquire about whether he used e-mail. Some of these documents have previously been reviewed by the FBI, but I would like to examine them. (White House, Lisa Foster, or Hamilton in possession).

7. (Foster death) We should discuss whether to issue subpoenas to Foster's mother, Lisa Foster, Foster's children, Foster's siblings, and Foster's friends for documents that might shed light on Foster's state of mind or their perceptions of Foster's state of mind (e.g., letters from Foster, letters to each other before or after Foster's death, notes, personal diaries, etc.). I would be uneasy issuing such subpoenas, but I would be more uneasy making definitive conclusions about Foster's state of mind without reviewing these relevant documents.

RE: Summary of Foster Meeting on 6-15-95

DATE: June 16, 1995

We discussed the following at our meeting on Thursday, June 15.

1. We will search the park. Ed and [redacted] will coordinate this plan with the FBI lab people and Henry Lee. There is a very high chance that the bullet now is in the same place that it landed on July 20, 1993. That being the case, our attitude should be to do whatever is feasible to find the bullet -- whether that includes searching beyond the park or searching trees. If we find the bullet, that would help to prove place of death, which is an important issue.

2. We will attempt to determine whether a Foster family fingerprint is on the inside of the gun. We may perform a fingerprint search of the Foster home in Hope to obtain prints. In addition, Ed and [redacted] agreed to think and consult FBI fingerprint experts about other ways to obtain prints of Foster's father. I encourage Ed and [redacted] to consult with the very best fingerprint people in the Bureau to resolve this crucial issue. (We have been using an FBI agent named Hupp; the lack of clarity of his fingerprint reports frankly gives me less than full confidence that he is one of the best Bureau fingerprint examiners.)

3. We agreed to have the IRS perform a full financial analysis of Foster. Ed will take the lead in coordinating this with the IRS. [redacted] and I will ensure that we gather all existing financial information about Foster for the IRS.

4. We agreed to track down all of Foster's foreign travel. It should not be difficult to obtain immediate information regarding all of Foster's foreign travel. Ed and [redacted] will coordinate this step.

5. We will investigate an alleged Swiss bank account that was in Foster's name. Ed and [redacted] will consult with Mark in coordinating this investigatory step.

6. [redacted]

FOIA(b)7 - (C)
FOIA(b)6

in an investigation of this sort. At our meeting, however, this was more theory and speculation than a proposed investigatory step. Indeed, no one suggested any concrete steps to pursue in this regard.

[redacted] For obvious reasons, that is a delicate issue, one we should discuss in detail before that interview occurs.

Summary of My Views at this Stage

At this point, I am satisfied that Foster was sufficiently discouraged or depressed to commit suicide. (Of course, that does not establish that he did in fact commit suicide.) I base my conclusion on the fact that Foster was found with a list of three psychiatrists in his wallet, the fact that Foster obtained a prescription on July 19 for an anti-depressant, and the many witness interviews describing his state of mind in the days and weeks preceding his death.

As to exactly what fact or facts were causing Foster to be discouraged or depressed, we have some answers, but there may well be more than we have learned at this point. I would be very interested to hear suggestions from any of you about concrete investigatory steps that we could pursue to discover other possible sources of Foster's discouragement or depression. (A full financial analysis was one such good idea; as noted above, we will pursue that suggestion.)

As to the physical evidence, there are several steps that we and Dr. Lee are currently pursuing -- some of which are discussed above. If we establish (1) that the gun was a Foster gun and (2) that the shot was fired in the park, then I think we can be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Foster committed suicide in Fort Marcy Park. These two issues are therefore crucial to the bottom line, and I think we should devote extraordinary efforts to resolving them.

SUBJECT: DISCREPANCY LIST

The following list is offered as a comprehensive and itemized outline of all of the noted discrepancies, inconsistencies, and problems that have been identified in the Vincent W. Foster death investigation to date. The outline is broken down into the following areas: U.S. Park Police, Emergency Medical Technicians (EMTs), the White House, Northern Virginia Medical Examiner, Miscellaneous, and Forensic Examinations.

I. U.S. Park Police

A. No gunshot residue samples of the decedent's hands.

B. Lack of complete documentation of the gunshot residues on the left hand.

C. Poorly diagrammed death scene; lack of measurements.

D. No photo log; no documentation regarding who took what photographs, and the total number of photos.

E. Death scene 35mm photos did not develop.

F. No documentation regarding the initial search of the decedent's vehicle at the death scene- no inventory.

G. Photo of an unidentified briefcase next to a U.S.P.P. vehicle.

H. Decedent's pager returned too soon; no records obtained regarding previous pages.

I. Suicide weapon processed with dust prior to other laboratory exams.

J. Inconsistent statements regarding moving and searching the body. (Rolla, Braun, Simonello, Hodakaviec)

K. Inconsistent and poorly documented autopsy.

1. Morrissette's report.

2. No gunshot residue samples from hands.

3. No fingernail clippings/scrapings.

4. No major case prints of decedent (palms, sides and tops of fingers).

5. No photo of left hand.

6. Possible contamination of evidence subsequent to autopsy at M.E. Office.

7. Inconsistent statements regarding what was done to the body prior to autopsy.

8. No description of body and clothing prior to autopsy.

Subject: FBI LAB REPORT ADDENDUM

After meeting with DR. HENRY LEE and representatives of the OIC, the FBI Laboratory agreed to issue an addendum to their previous lab report (dated May 9, 1994) concerning soil and fiber evidence found on the shoes and clothing VINCENT W. FOSTER, JR. This addendum details the prior findings of the FBI Lab with greater specificity. In a criminal case, this kind of specificity is usually provided through the testimony of FBI scientists when the evidence is presented at trial. The FBI Lab has provided this information at this time to assist the OIC in making its report on FOSTER'S death.

The following is a summary of the attached addendum:

-In its original examination of FOSTER'S dress shirt, t-shirt, boxer shorts, suit pants, belt, socks, shoes and the paper these items had been wrapped in, the FBI Lab found trace amounts of loose, unconsolidated soil.

-These trace amounts of loose, unconsolidated soil do not amount to "coherent soil," which is soil that is held together as part of the same mass.

-Only "coherent soil" can be used to make a soil comparison because it is reasonable to conclude that soil that is held together as part of the same mass, originated from the same source or location. Conversely, loose, unconsolidated soil can not reasonably be said to have originated from a single source or location.

-When the sample of loose, unconsolidated soil is limited to trace amounts, additional uncertainty is introduced into the determination of source or origin of the sample.

-Mica was present in the trace amounts of loose, unconsolidated soil found on or with the above items.

-This soil could have originated from the micaceous soil found at Fort Marcy Park, however, since the sample is small and not "coherent" no definitive source determination can be made.

Subject: Slack for the President?

After reflecting this evening, I am strongly opposed to giving the President any "break" in the questioning regarding the details of the Lewinsky relationship -- unless before his questioning on Monday, he either (i) resigns or (ii) confesses perjury and issues a public apology to you. I have tried hard to bend over backwards and to be fair to him and to think of all reasonable defenses to his pattern of behavior. In the end, I am convinced that there really are none. The idea of going easy on him at the questioning is thus abhorrent to me.

What has especially convinced me of the appropriateness of obtaining his "full and complete" testimony regarding the precise details of the relationship are the sheer number of his wrongful acts. The President has disgraced his Office, the legal system, and the American people by having sex with a 22-year-old intern and turning her life into a shambles -- callous and disgusting behavior that has somehow gotten lost in the shuffle. He has committed perjury (at least) in the Jones case. He has turned the Secret Service upside down. He has required the urgent attention of the courts and the Supreme Court for frivolous privilege claims -- all to cover up his oral sex from an intern. He has lied to his aides. He has lied to the American people. He has tried to disgrace you and this Office with a sustained propaganda campaign that would make Nixon blush.

He should be forced to account for all of that and to defend his actions. It may not be our job to impose sanctions on him, but it is our job to make his pattern of revolting behavior clear -- piece by painful piece -- on Monday. I am mindful of the need for respect for the Office of the President. But in my view, given what we know, the interests of the Office of the President would be best served by our gathering the full facts regarding the actions of this President so that the Congress can decide whether the interests of the Presidency would be best served by having a new President. More to the point: Aren't we failing to fulfill our duty to the American people if we willingly "conspire" with the President in an effort to conceal the true nature of his acts?

* * *

In light of all of that, I suggest at least some questions along the following lines (I leave the best phrasing to others).

Did you tell Monica Lewinsky that she should deny the nature of the relationship that you and she had?

If Monica Lewinsky says that you agreed to lie about your relationship with her, would she be lying?

Would Monica Lewinsky be lying if she said that you told her after her name appeared on the witness list: "You could always say you were coming to see Betty or that you were bringing me letters"?

If Monica Lewinsky says that you inserted a cigar into her vagina while you were in the Oval Office area, would she be lying?

If Monica Lewinsky says that you had phone sex with her on approximately 15 occasions, would she be lying?

If Monica Lewinsky says that on several occasions in the Oval Office area, you used your fingers to stimulate her vagina and bring her to orgasm, would she be lying?

If Monica Lewinsky says that she gave you oral sex on nine occasions in the Oval Office area, would she be lying?

If Monica Lewinsky says that you ejaculated into her mouth on two occasions in the Oval Office area, would she be lying?

If Monica Lewinsky says that on several occasions you had her give her oral sex, made her stop, and then ejaculated into the sink in the bathroom off the Oval Office, would she be lying?

If Monica Lewinsky says that you masturbated into a trashcan in your secretary's office, would she by lying?
