The United States of America, by Kenneth W. Starr, Independent Counsel, respectfully submits this Memorandum in support of the admissibility of testimony regarding a previous conspiracy between Defendant Jim Guy Tucker and David L. Hale. Counsel for Tucker did not object to co-defendant Susan H. McDougal's ("McDougal") counsel's line of questioning on cross examination which elicited Hale's testimony regarding this conspiracy. Further, the questions McDougal's counsel asked Hale and the answers elicited to those questions implied that Hale's testimony regarding the charged conspiracy defied common sense and was therefore incredible. The United States has the right to clarify the facts for the jury and attempt to dispel the doubts McDougal's counsel attempted to cast on Hale's testimony. Having stood by silently and benefited from a co-defendant's cross examination, Tucker may not now object to the government's effort to set the record straight on the basis of unfair "prejudice."

Hale should be permitted to describe the prior conspiracy to the jury.

ARGUMENT

A. Counsel for Susan H. McDougal attempted to impeach Hale by implying it was unreasonable for Hale to Jim Guy Tucker knew they were agreeing to commit crimes

On cross examination, counsel for Defendant Susan H. McDougal asked Hale the following series of questions:

Q: So then there at this meeting -- you weren't social friends with Jim McDougal, were you?

A: No.

Q: And you knew that Jim Guy Tucker was a former prosecuting attorney, didn't you?

A: And congressman and Attorney General.

Q: I was going to get to that.

A: Yes, sir.

Q: Thank you. And you knew that you had been a chief prosecuting attorney?

A: Yes, sir, that's correct.

Q: Wouldn't you agree it's kind of risky for someone to just out of the clear blue throw up a criminal scheme to somebody that's a chief prosecuting attorney? That's a kind of risky proposition for somebody, isn't it, that had never dealt with them on a criminal scheme before, just out of the clear blue?

A: Well, we had --

Q: Yes or no? Wouldn't that be a risky proposition?

A: It wasn't the first time.

Q: Oh, okay. Prior criminal schemes between you and Jim McDougal?

A: Not Jim McDougal, no, sir.

(Tr. 4180-81) (emphasis added).

Plainly, this line of questioning presupposed that Hale and Tucker had "never dealt with [each other] on a criminal scheme before," and sought to give the jury the impression that a reasonable person would not propose a criminal scheme to persons he had never conspired with before, particularly where two of the conspirators had law enforcement backgrounds. Needless to say, counsel did not pursue Hale's truthful reply, that "[i]t wasn't the first time." Having been led to believe that the charged conspiracy was proposed "out of the blue," the jury is entitled to hear Hale's testimony to the contrary.

Hale would testify that in 1983, Tucker asked Hale to lend money from Capital Management Services ("CMS") to Tucker's former congressional aide, John Niven, who was in financial straits, but who owned a vacation lake home. The lake home had been financed by Savers Federal Savings & Loan, which was demanding payment on the mortgage from Niven. Tucker told Hale he would arrange for James B. McDougal to have Madison Guaranty Savings & Loan ("MGSL") assume the mortgage on the lake home and pay off Savers, which was accomplished. Tucker then formed two shell corporations, Greenfield Properties, Inc., which Tucker put in his own name, and Niven Real Estate, which was in Niven's name. CMS then loaned Niven Real Estate $80,000 for the stated purpose of "working capital;" however, the proceeds were misapplied to pay off Niven's personal debts, among other things. Niven conveyed the lake home to Greenfield Properties, and Tucker conveyed the stock of Greenfield Properties to Hale, who used the lake home to his own benefit. Hale's testimony to this effect would demonstrate that Tucker had conspired with Hale on at least one previous occasion to obtain fraudulent loans from CMS to their own benefit and to the benefit of their associates.

The United States is entitled "to correct false inferences left by defense counsel after cross-examination" of a witness. United States v. Womochil, 778 F.2d 1311, 1316 (8th Cir. 1985). This ability is all the more important where the "false inference" is that a defendant did no previous wrong. Id. Tucker objects to permitting the United States to rebut the false impression caused by his co-defendant's questioning. However, the time to object was when counsel for McDougal elicited the purportedly unfairly prejudicial information. The Seventh Circuit has addressed this issue squarely:

> Although it was Sullivan's co-defendant Cain who elicited the response from Montgomery which 'opened the door' for the government, Sullivan acquiesced in Cain's cross-examination and thus waived his right to prohibit the government's exploration of the matter on redirect examination. Sullivan could not sit back, let the "door opening" evidence come in unchallenged during cross-examination, and then assert that the government's redirect examination on that issue provided testimony which was unfairly prejudicial under Rule 404(b).

United States v. Sullivan, 911 F.2d 2, 7-8 (7th Cir. 1990). Having benefited from his co-defendant's cross-examination and the false impression it left with the jury that the charged conspiracy came "out of the blue," Tucker may not not object to the government's effort to set the record straight. And in any event, Tucker may not object under Rule 404(b). Defendants received notice of the government's intention to introduce evidence regarding the Niven deal at paragraph 12 of its 404(b) letter dated February 28, 1996.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the United States should be permitted to conduct redirect examination of David L. Hale regarding a previous conspiracy involving Defendant Jim Guy Tucker.

THE COURT: Mr. Sutton?

MR. SUTTON: I don't have any trouble with the document. I would like for it to be left for identification.

THE COURT: Okay. What is the government's position.

MR. BENNETT: We have no objection to it remaining identified as Tucker 218.

THE COURT: All right.

CROSS EXAMINATION

BY MR. SUTTON:

Q. Now, you were saying, however, that you were aware of that, that a hundred percent of the stock was acquired?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And were you aware or were you knowledgeable as to who the directors of the company were at the time that was done?

A. No, sir.

Q. Was Ken Koone one of them?

MR. BENNETT: Objection. The witness has just testified he doesn't know who the directors were and reading through a laundry list off of this document that is not in evidence is not going to permit the truthful testimony of this witness who has already said he doesn't know.

MR. SUTTON: I can cross examine the witness by leading questions.

THE COURT: Yes. Overruled, go ahead.

BY MR. SUTTON:

Q. Did you know whether Ken Koone was one of them?

A. I knew Mr. Koone, I knew he was associated with Mr. Hale and with the insurance company. I did not know his position with the insurance company.

Q. Is he a political figure?

A. He has been at times, yes, sir.

Q. In the Republican party?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Running for office now?

MR. BENNETT: Your Honor, I don't quite see the relevance of this. I know Mr. Sutton thinks it's important to mention the name of every Republican who has come into play in any way in this case, but I don't see how it's relevant that Mr. Koone is now running for political office as a Republican. This is a document that purports to be dated back in 1989, and I simply fail to see the relevance.

MR. SUTTON: It's not important to me, I'll withdraw it.

THE COURT: Beg your pardon?

MR. SUTTON: It's not important to me, I'll withdraw.

MR. BENNETT: Would you instruct the jury to disregard?

THE COURT: Yes. Disregard the question and any comments pertaining to Mr. Koone's running for a position.

CROSS EXAMINATION

MR. SUTTON: And may I approach the witness?

THE COURT: Yes.

BY MR. SUTTON:

Q. I want to show you a transcript from those proceedings.

MR. BENNETT: Which proceeding, Counsel?

MR. SUTTON: Grand jury. And the copy that you gave me was not numbered, but I have numbered it, and the way I have numbered them, I'm looking at page 2, to begin with.

and over to the fact that Jim Guy Tucker was a lawyer and that he was a lawyer for David Hale, he was a lawyer for Jim McDougal and these companies from time to time. Do you remember that? Jim Guy Tucker is a lawyer, but he was not functioning as a lawyer for these companies in these transactions that we're talking about in this case.

I want to call to your attention that in the Dean Paul deal that they put up on the board and said was a fraudulent deal and they got $500,000.00 of money into Capital Management as a result of that deal, there was a lawyer who had to do an opinion to send in to the SBA to say that that was legal and all of that was okay and that they ought to get new funds from the SBA to do that. That was this lawyer right here, Bob Leslie (indicating). Sat in the next office to David Hale. H did the opinion that said all of that was legal. In this case with this kind of thing going on, he's going to do it again. He's going to say that this is okay, and that they are entitle to get money based on $275,000.00 of new money that's coming i to Capital Management from that woman's account. He is going to endorse that 275,000-dollar check as president of Liberty Mortgage. He's going to get it, instead of using it for Liberty Mortgage, he's going to endorse it and give it right back to David Hale. Now, if you don't know that there's something wrong with that, you know, you don't know very much as a lawyer. And then he's going to do an opinion to say that that's all okay.

Now, my client, Jim Guy Tucker, has been charged, criminally, on some of the things that you've heard about. An to my knowledge, this man has not been charged with anything. He was former Chairman of the Republican Party in Arkansas.

I'm going to now go back with you and talk to these specific things that have been brought against my client and the Governor of the State of Arkansas, Jim Guy Tucker, and to tell you that this started, as I said, in the summer of 1993, because when David Hale was caught in the things that I have just shown you, there was no way out except for someone who wa very, very clever. The broker in the matter was a lawyer and broker, but he was not that clever, and he pled guilty for his part and went to jail. The lawyer in the part pled guilty and he's kind of rethinking his now and thinking about withdrawing his plea of guilty. But David Hale, after he had consulted three lawyers, caught in this mess, began to leak to the press and leak to the U.S. Attorney's Office that he might give evidence against some big people in order to save his skin. " might deliver to you the President of the United States, and I might deliver to you the Governor of the State of Arkansas." And as Mr. Heuer has stated, the U.S. Attorney, who is no dummy, in effect, said, "Buzz off". But that story was kept going, kept pushing until an independent prosecutor, Office of Independent Counsel, was created, and they heard something the liked. It had a ring of things that they liked. And the gist of this is going to go back and take you back where I want to take you now, into the period of the '80s.

In the period of the '80s there had been certain laws passed. Almost everybody agrees now, those laws were a mistake. But the purpose of them at the time was good, if the had worked well, been all right, but the purpose was to loosen up the savings and loans and put some money in circulation, an that was the era of the '80s. And you know something about that. Those were the biggest financial disasters that this country has seen in many a time. Ladies and gentlemen, Madiso Savings & Loan, Madison Guaranty Savings & Loan was little bitty, I mean it was really infinitesimally small. Right here in Arkansas we had FirstSouth, which was big; we had First Federal, which was big, old; we had Savers, which was big and old, and on and on and on, one savings and loan institution after another went under as a result of these policies. Even in the case of Madison Guaranty Savings & Loan, which as Mr. Heuer has pointed out, went under three years after Jim McDougal, I think most experts would tell you that it had to d with vicious sways back and forth on rather complex things involved in the cost of money, interest rates, and that sort o thing. But, anyway, that was the '80s. I want to talk about Jim Guy Tucker in the '80s.

In 1982, after he had been defeated by Bill Clinton in hi

UNITED STATES Of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Russell PREVATTE and Robert A. Soy, Defendants-Appellants.
Nos. 92-3370, 92-3535.
United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.
Argued June 10, 1993.
Decided Feb. 15, 1994.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Indiana, Rudy Lozano, J., of maliciously destroying property by means of explosive, resulting in death, and conspiracy, and were sentenced to life imprisonment. Defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals, Ripple, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) other acts evidence respecting burglaries was admissible, and (2) district court committed plain error in sentencing defendants to life imprisonment without jury direction.

Remanded for resentencing.

At trial, the district court determined that the uncharged crimes in issue are probative in proving defendants' motive as well as their preparation and plan in committing a series of burglaries and/or robberies. The defendants' motive behind the uncharged crimes of burglary and robbery is financial gain which is the same motive for the conspiracy charged in the indictment.

Tr. IV at 503-04. The defendants treat this justification as ruse; they argue that "the stated motive, that of 'financial gain' is next to useless in determining whether it was more likely that these Defendants committed the burglaries and the bombings." Appellant Soy's Br. at 15.

[5] In the context of Rule 404(b), we believe that district courts should approach a general claim of "financial gain" as a motive with great circumspection. In this case, however, we cannot say that the district court's determination can be characterized fairly as an abuse of discretion. In light of the early successes of this group, the district court was entitled to conclude that knowledge of the motive of financial gain would aid the jury in understanding the reasons for the formation and continuance of the bombing-burglary scheme at issue. In the summer of 1990, Prevatte, Williams, and Bergner burglarized M & G Metals in Chicago. Each gained approximately $300 for one night's work. The following summer, Williams and Prevatte stole $1000 from the Wolf Lake Park. After unsuccessfully trying to raid the safe at the Whiting License Branch, Prevatte, Soy, and Bergner successfully absconded with $20,000 from Nick's Liquors in Hammond. On the record, the jury would be entitled to reason that the group, encouraged by the result of these earlier endeavors, became more audacious and attempted other burglaries. As the group expanded its horizons, it did not limit itself to the methods with which it began. The defendants tested the concept of cutting telephone wires at the Currency Exchange in Hammond and eventually branched out into bombings as diversionary tactics. We cannot say, therefore, that the motive of financial gain, as evidenced by these earlier acts, was without significance to the jury's assessment. In any event, these incidents were also admissible as evidence of modus operandi, scheme, and background. [FN8]

FN8. Three acts listed by defendants do not fit easily into the above categories. First, Jerry Williams testified to Prevatte's theft of a jet ski and their commission of two instances of insurance fraud. Although somewhat more attenuated than the burglaries listed above, these acts do establish the affiliation of the parties in the conspiracy and the reasons why the alleged conspiracy may have formed. In addition, we agree with the government that these acts are admissible because defendant Prevatte opened the door. Counsel for defendant Prevatte conceded that the specific instances mentioned could be validly admitted outside the scope of 404(b) so long as one of the defendants opened the door. This occurred during defendant Prevatte's cross-examination of Williams. On cross, Williams was questioned regarding why he cooperated with the activities of Prevatte and Soy; specifically counsel inquired if they had something on Williams. The counsel for the government on redirect simply resumed this line of questioning to clarify a point already made by counsel for Prevatte.

777 [6][7] With respect to two acts of uncharged misconduct, we believe that the government failed to establish admissibility. The government introduced one of these acts during the testimony of Officer Thomas of the Hammond Police Department. Officer Thomas testified to pulling over Prevatte in the Lever Brothers Credit Union parking lot for having an expired registration. The relevance of this incident to the crimes at issue is tenuous at best. Nevertheless, we do not think that the defendants were in any way prejudiced by its introduction. In a transcript of over 2000 pages, this incident was described in less than six. In addition, counsel for the defendants brought out on cross that the police officer's concern for criminal activity was unfounded, that no burglary implements were found in the car, and that both defendants were very cooperative with the police. These added elements, in conjunction with the general limiting instruction given by the

v.
Ronald S. SULLIVAN, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 89-2233.

United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.

Argued Dec. 15, 1989.

Decided Aug. 28, 1990.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Indiana, Rudy Lozano, J., of racketeering, conspiring to engage in racketeering activity, four counts of bribery, and conspiring to defraud United States. He appealed. The Court of Appeals, Kanne, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence that administrative assistant of defendant, who was administrator of city job-creating program under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA), solicited bribe from contractor was admissible to show defendant's plan or intent to operate agency through pattern of bribery and corruption; (2) defendant, by failing to object to cross-examination of prosecution witness by codefendant's counsel which "opened the door" for testimony on redirect examination implying that defendant had accepted uncharged bribe, waived right to object to Government's follow-up questioning eliciting such evidence; and (3) evidence established that defendant had hidden ownership interest in corporation which allegedly received bribes, and thus supported convictions of four counts of bribery.

Before CUDAHY, EASTERBROOK and KANNE, Circuit Judges.

KANNE, Circuit Judge.

An eleven-count indictment was returned against Ronald S. Sullivan and two others charging them with crimes relating to the operation of a municipal government agency which administered a job-training program. The seven counts against Sullivan charged him with racketeering, conspiring to engage in racketeering activity, four counts of bribery, and conspiring to defraud the United States. A jury convicted him on all counts. Sullivan appeals his convictions. We affirm.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

Sullivan was placed in charge of a program which had the worthy goal of providing training and employment to disadvantaged and unemployed individuals in Gary, Indiana. Unfortunately, Sullivan's personal goals were not as worthy. The Gary Manpower Administration ("GMA") was organized in 1974 as an agency of the City of Gary to administer the (now-repealed) federal Comprehensive Employment and Training Act ("CETA"). GMA disbursed CETA funds to contractors who provided job-training programs. Sullivan was the administrator of GMA from 1974 until 1983 when the agency began phasing out.

Several steps to ensure that CETA funds were properly disbursed to quality contractors were supposed to be employed by GMA. The solicitation of bids for contracts was to be well publicized. Contracts were to be awarded after bids were evaluated by several committees and individuals. The performance of contracts was to be monitored by an independent monitoring unit. However, Sullivan and others in GMA were able to subvert these accountability procedures and control the disbursement of the CETA funds. The solicitation of bids was not publicized. The awarding of contracts was essentially at the sole discretion of Sullivan. The monitoring process was also undermined. For example, the head of the monitoring unit in the late 1970's, Shirley Montgomery, complained to Sullivan about contractors not complying with contract requirements. Sullivan took no action. Montgomery then made the mistake of complaining to Sullivan about the absenteeism of a GMA employee, Sheila Quarles. Soon thereafter, Sullivan transferred Montgomery and placed Quarles in charge of the monitoring unit. Not coincidentally, Quarles was Sullivan's girlfriend.

In 1979, Leonard Perkins and Carl Deloney formed a business partnership known as Plus, Ltd. After its formation, Plus was awarded a contract for a CETA training program. Before the first payment under the contract was made, Carl Deloney advised Perkins that there was a "cost of doing business in Gary." Carl Deloney told him that to do business in Gary money had to be paid to Sullivan. Perkins complied. He gave kickback money to Carl Deloney who then gave it to Sullivan.

Subsequently, more kickbacks were made to Sullivan in exchange for the awarding of contracts to Plus. Perkins 5 began recording the payments, with certain codes, on checkbook stubs. In addition to having Carl Deloney deliver the kickbacks, Perkins delivered some payments to Sullivan personally. Perkins later learned that a Joe Cain also had to be paid. Cain was the director of operations of GMA and second in command to Sullivan. Perkins quit making the payments in 1981. After he stopped paying the kickbacks Perkins continued to submit bids but was not awarded any more contracts.

After his association with Perkins ended, Carl Deloney formed a company called VOTEC to carry out training contracts with GMA. When Carl died in 1982, his wife Bernice Deloney took over VOTEC. Just before he left GMA in September, 1981, Cain helped form and finance a company called DECAR.

In the fall of 1982, Sullivan and others began exploring the possibility of leasing the Visions Lounge and Gazebo Restaurant in the Sheraton Hotel in downtown Gary. Sullivan, Cain, Deloney and others met on two occasions and a new corporation called DVR was formed to lease the operation of the lounge and restaurant. To satisfy state liquor license requirements, the ownership of the corporation was publicly represented to be 60% owned by Cain through DECAR and 40% by Deloney through VOTEC. However, there was evidence showing that the actual ownership of DVR was one-third each by Sullivan, Deloney and Cain.

VOTEC and DECAR were awarded large contracts and increases by Sullivan while GMA was being phased out in 1982. The claims for payment submitted by VOTEC showed that many of its trainees were placed at either VOTEC, DVR or the Gazebo Restaurant. Indeed, some of these people testified that they either had never worked for these entities or had not been placed in full-time jobs.

In August of 1982, Adlee Hodges, the manager of training programs for GMA, was told by Sullivan that her position was being phased out because of lack of funding. However, Sullivan told her that she could continue working for GMA by becoming a contractor. Although Hodges had no business experience, she formed a job-training company with the help of Fred McKinney, the fiscal officer of GMA. Soon thereafter she submitted a proposal to GMA. Hodges was awarded a contract for $84,702.00 with the condition that she hire a friend of Sullivan. GMA provided furniture for Hodges's office and also assisted in moving the furniture. Hodges hired Sullivan's friend and her company was subsequently awarded more contracts. Later, Sullivan told Hodges that there was a way for contractors to say "thank you" for contracts. Soon thereafter, Hodges received a call from Sullivan's administrative assistant telling her to pay $2,000.00 to DVR. Hodges delivered a check to GMA for that amount payable to DVR.

During the course of his tenure as head of GMA, Sullivan, accompanied by Fred McKinney, made a trip to Sullivan's bank. Consistent with his "entrepreneurial skills" and in the tradition of other public officials who receive payback for favors bestowed, Sullivan produced a shoebox containing $31,500.00 in cash. Sullivan used these funds to open an account for two of his corporations.

II. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

In 1989, a federal grand jury returned an eleven-count indictment against Sullivan, Cain and Deloney. Count One charged Sullivan and the co-defendants with conducting an enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activities in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c). The count alleged thirty-three acts of racketeering in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 201(b) and (c). Count Two charged Sullivan and the co-defendants with conspiring to conduct an enterprise through a pattern of racketeering in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1962(d). Counts Three, Five, Seven and Nine charged Sullivan with being a public official and soliciting and accepting something of value for himself or another in return for being influenced in the performance of an official duty, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 201(c). Count Eleven charged Sullivan and the co-defendants 6 with conspiring to defraud the United States in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371.

Sullivan entered a plea of not guilty. After a jury trial, Sullivan was found guilty on all counts. He was sentenced to three years of imprisonment on Counts One and Two, and to two years of imprisonment on the remaining counts, with all sentences to run consecutively. In addition, Sullivan was fined a total of $55,000.00.

III. DISCUSSION

Sullivan raises a variety of issues on appeal but the primary focus is on evidentiary rulings concerning the testimony of two witnesses, Adlee Hodges and Shirley Montgomery.

A. Evidentiary Rulings

Two government witnesses, Hodges and Montgomery, were permitted to testify to certain conversations regarding Sullivan. Sullivan claims that the testimony of Hodges was admitted contrary to the requirements of Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b). Similarly, he claims that the testimony of Montgomery, although initially blocked under 404(b), was ultimately admitted in violation of that rule.

[1] On review of a decision to admit evidence, we will rarely disturb the district court's exercise of discretion and will reverse only for an abuse of discretion. United States v. Zapata, 871 F.2d 616, 621 (7th Cir.1989); United States v. Beasley, 809 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir.1987); United States v. Byrd, 771 F.2d 215, 219 (7th Cir.1985).

1. Testimony of Adlee Hodges

[2][3] Sullivan claims that the testimony of Hodges concerning the solicitation of a bribe by a Sullivan aide should have been excluded under Rule 404(b). [FN1] Evidence of other crimes not charged in the indictment may be admitted under Rule 404(b) only if: (1) the evidence is directed toward establishing a matter in issue other than the defendant's propensity to commit the crime charged; (2) the evidence shows that the other act is similar enough and close enough in time to be relevant to the matter in issue; (3) there is sufficient evidence to support a finding by the jury that the defendant committed the similar act; and (4) the probative value of the evidence is not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. United States v. Monzon, 869 F.2d 338, 344 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 109 S.Ct. 2087, 104 L.Ed.2d 650 (1989); United States v. Manganellis, 864 F.2d 528, 531-32 (7th Cir.1988); Zapata, 871 F.2d at 620. The rule excludes evidence of "other crimes" to show conformity with character, but permits the admission of such evidence for another purpose such as to show intent or plan.

> FN1. Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) reads: Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident.

Adlee Hodges testified that Sullivan told her there were ways for contractors to say "thank you" for being awarded contracts. Soon thereafter, she received a call from Sullivan's administrative assistant--Lisa Chapa. Before allowing the substance of Hodges's conversation with Chapa to be introduced into evidence, the district court evaluated the proffered testimony under the four-part test and found it to be admissible. Hodges then testified that Chapa told her that she was to contribute $2,000.00 to a closeout party for GMA and to make the check payable to DVR. Hodges knew that Sullivan had an ownership interest in DVR, and she delivered the $2,000.00 check to Chapa at GMA.

As the district court determined, the evidence was directed toward establishing the issue of Sullivan's plan or intent to operate GMA through a pattern of bribery and corruption. The evidence was similar to and virtually contemporaneous with the other acts of bribery solicitation by Sullivan. The evidence could support a jury finding that Sullivan committed the act and its probative value was not substantially 7 outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Thus, we hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion by admitting this evidence.

2. Testimony of Shirley Montgomery

[4] Late in 1981, the Private Industry Council was incorporated. It had independent authority to approve certain kinds of CETA contracts without going through GMA. Shirley Montgomery was the head of the Council.

During its case-in-chief, in the course of the direct examination of Montgomery, but out of the presence of the jury, the government made an offer of proof that she was offered a bribe by Avatus Stone, owner of a company that had contracts with GMA. The government proffered that Stone told Montgomery that he would pay her "enough money to retire" if she would get his contract approved by the Council. Montgomery further indicated in the offer of proof that when she refused, Stone told her "you are certainly stupider than Ron [Sullivan] and Fred McKinney." The court considered the admissibility of this evidence under the Rule 404(b) test. The court determined that the evidence was not sufficient to show Sullivan committed a similar act and it would be unfairly prejudicial to Sullivan to admit the testimony.

After the court initially ruled that the proffered testimony would be inadmissible, counsel for co-defendant Cain informed the court that on cross-examination he intended to elicit from Montgomery the fact that she testified to the grand jury that Stone offered her a bribe. Cain's counsel stated that this questioning would lay a foundation for him to impeach Montgomery by calling Stone as a witness to deny making the bribe. The court informed counsel for the defendants that Cain's cross-examination might "open the door" on this matter and allow the government to pursue the bribe conversation in detail on redirect examination. Significantly, Sullivan raised no objection to the course outlined by co-defendant Cain.

The government then concluded Montgomery's testimony without any mention of the bribe conversation with Stone. The jury was excused for the day. The judge met with the attorneys and Cain's counsel reiterated his intention to ask Montgomery whether she told the grand jury that Stone attempted to bribe her. Again, no objection was raised by Sullivan. The next morning the judge again met with counsel outside the presence of the jury and Cain's counsel repeated his intention to pursue the matter for the purpose of impeachment. The court then ruled: [FN2]

> FN2. This procedure utilized by the court for making an advanced ruling on the admissibility of evidence was in accordance with Fed.R.Evid. 103(c).

> It is the court's position right now, unless I hear argument otherwise, gentlemen, that I have no choice but to allow [Cain's counsel] to go into it for the purpose [of impeachment]. Are there going to be any objections?

Notwithstanding the court's indication of its position regarding the admissibility of the Stone-Montgomery bribe conversation and call for any objections, Sullivan remained silent. On cross-examination, Cain's counsel, without objection from Sullivan, elicited from Montgomery her statement that Stone offered her a bribe. As expected, on redirect examination the government sought to bring out the rest of the conversation about the bribe.

> Q What did he say?
> A Told me if I would get a contract passed through my Board of Directors that he would give me enough money to retire; I wouldn't ever have to work again.
> Q What did you tell him?
> A I told him he--there was no way he could do that. You know, I did not--would not take myself and try to present to the board why we should do a contract with him with all of his contracts showed that he did not do what he was supposed to do, having done contracts with Gary Manpower for a long time; that he did not--I *8 could not show the council performance where people had gone through his training and had been placed, and I would not subject myself to what I knew I would get from my council.

Q So you said no deal, I won't take it?
A That's right.
Q What did he say to you?
A Told me how dumb and stupid I--
MR. GERMANN (Sullivan's Counsel): Objection.
MR. MILNER (Government Counsel): Excuse me, ma'am.
MR. GERMANN: Objection, Your Honor, two reasons. One, for the reasons that I had indicated earlier yesterday, and secondly, beyond the scope of cross examination of Mr. Jones (Cain's counsel).
THE COURT: With regards to what was mentioned earlier I gave counsel an opportunity to object earlier; they did not. That's overruled and it's overruled insofar as being outside the scope of cross examination. That was gone into.
MR. MILNER:
Q What did--what did Mr. Jones say to you when you told him you didn't want the bribe?
A Mr. Stone.
Q Mr. Stone, I'm sorry?
A Told me how stupid I was, how dumb and stupid I was, and he was certainly glad that Ron and Fred McKinney wasn't dumb as I was.

The issue presented is whether, by failing to interpose any objection to the cross-examination by Cain's counsel, which "opened the door" for the redirect examination testimony that implied that Stone had bribed Sullivan, Sullivan waived his right to object to the government's follow-up questioning. The court had repeatedly warned counsel for the defendants and finally ruled that the pursuit of Stone's purported bribe of Montgomery on cross-examination would open the door for redirect examination by the government on that issue. Once the subject of the bribe offer was before the jury, the court reasoned that it would be unfair to prohibit the government from exploring the matter further. It was clear to all trial participants, including Sullivan, exactly what additional testimony would be given by Montgomery on redirect examination.

Although it was Sullivan's co-defendant Cain who elicited the response from Montgomery which "opened the door" for the government, Sullivan acquiesced in Cain's cross-examination and thus waived his right to prohibit the government's exploration of the matter on redirect examination. Sullivan could not sit back, let the "door opening" evidence come in unchallenged during cross-examination, and then assert that the government's redirect examination on that issue provided testimony which was unfairly prejudicial under Rule 404(b). The response was not beyond the scope of the cross-examination. The district court did not abuse its discretion in overruling Sullivan's objection and allowing the government to pursue the full conversation between Montgomery and Stone on redirect examination.

[5] Even if this were not the case, any error in the admission of this brief statement would have been harmless. The only testimony the government elicited in this area dealing with Sullivan was that single answer to the question of Stone's response when Montgomery refused the bribe: "Mr. Stone ... told me how stupid I was, how dumb and stupid I was, and he was certainly glad that Ron and Fred McKinney wasn't dumb as I was." The adverse effect of Montgomery's testimony on Sullivan was slight given the single response which merely cast an inference of wrongdoing compared to the substantial amount of other evidence introduced against Sullivan. In addition, Sullivan was actually aided by Stone's rebuttal testimony which served to offset that of Montgomery. Stone denied having any conversation about bribes with her, denied paying any bribes with regard to GMA, and accused Montgomery of soliciting bribes.

B. Sufficiency of the Evidence

1. Standard of Review

An appellant challenging the sufficiency of the evidence to support a jury verdict *9 bears a "heavy burden" in his attempt to overturn the verdict. United States v. Nesbitt, 852 F.2d 1502, 1509 (7th Cir.1988), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 1015, 109 S.Ct. 808, 102 L.Ed.2d 798 (1989). We review all the evidence and all reasonable inferences drawn therefrom in the light most favorable to the government. Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 80, 62 S.Ct. 457, 469, 86 L.Ed. 680 (1942);

United States v. Vega, 860 F.2d 779, 793 (7th Cir.1988). We must uphold a conviction if, "after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt." Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319, 99 S.Ct. 2781, 2789, 61 L.Ed.2d 560 (1979) (emphasis in original); United States v. Grier, 866 F.2d 908, 922 (7th Cir.1989).

2. The Bribery Counts

[6] Sullivan argues that the evidence was insufficient to support his convictions under 18 U.S.C. § 201(c) [FN3]--the four bribery counts. These counts related to payments by Cain and Deloney to DVR. Specifically, Sullivan challenges the sufficiency of the evidence on the element of soliciting or receiving something of value. The government introduced evidence to show Sullivan's ownership interest in DVR and his attempts to gain political favor with Gary city officials who wanted to prevent the closing of the downtown Sheraton Hotel. Sullivan received nothing of value, he argues, because he was not an employee of DVR and any political stature or influence which he gained is intangible and cannot be considered as "anything of value" under the statute.

> FN3. As applicable to Sullivan, 18 U.S.C. § 201(c) reads: Whoever, being a public official or person selected to be a public official, directly or indirectly, corruptly asks, demands, exacts, solicits, seeks, accepts, receives, or agrees to receive anything of value for himself or for any other person or entity, in return for: (1) being influenced in his performance of any official act; or (2) being influenced to commit or aid in committing, or to collude in, or allow, any fraud, or make opportunity for the commission of any fraud, on the United States; or (3) being induced to do or omit to do any act in violation of his official duty.

This argument must fail. We need not address the assertion that an intangible, such as the enhancement of political influence or stature, does not qualify as something of "value" under the statute. Regardless of the claim of intangible benefits, there was sufficient evidence for the jury to find that Sullivan had a very tangible hidden ownership interest in DVR. He received tangible value from the payments made to DVR. For instance, the manager of the Visions Lounge testified that Sullivan acknowledged that he was a one-third owner of the operation. Later, Cain confirmed to the manager that the lounge was owned by Sullivan, Deloney and Cain. Deloney told a tax advisor that Sullivan, Cain and he were each one-third owners of DVR. In addition, Sullivan was one of the signatories on the bank accounts of DVR. The determination that Sullivan had an ownership interest in DVR was one for the jury and there was substantial evidence presented to support that proposition. Because the evidence was sufficient to support the other elements of the bribery counts as well, we affirm the convictions.

3. The Racketeering and Racketeering Conspiracy Counts

Sullivan was convicted in Count One of conducting an enterprise through a pattern of racketeering activity under 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c) and in Count Two of conspiring to conduct such an enterprise under 18 U.S.C. § 1962(d). He argues that his conviction on Count One should fail because that charge required, pursuant to the jury instruction given, that at least one act of bribery occur after June 22, 1983. This argument, however, is contingent on our finding insufficient evidence to support the four bribery convictions because they were the charged racketeering acts which occurred after June 22, 1983. Sullivan's challenge to Count Two is also contingent on the success of his challenge to the bribery convictions. Because we affirmed the bribery convictions, these arguments are unavailing and the evidence is sufficient to 10 support the convictions on Counts One and Two.

4. The Conspiracy to Defraud the United States Count

[7] Count Eleven charged Sullivan, Cain and Deloney with conspiracy to defraud the United States in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371. The count alleged Sullivan, Cain and Deloney, by agreement, formed DVR and financed it through the use of CETA funds. Sullivan challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict because, he argues, the evidence did not show that he knew DECAR and VOTEC were receiving CETA funds to which they were not entitled. However, the evidence of Sullivan's control over the distribution of CETA funds, the dubious placement of trainees by VOTEC and DECAR, the discussions regarding the formation of DVR, the contribution of funds to DVR by VOTEC and DECAR, and Sullivan's relationship with Cain and Deloney combined to provide substantial evidence from which the jury could infer his knowledge and participation in the conspiracy. The money which DECAR and VOTEC funnelled to DVR came from GMA as CETA funds. Thus, there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

C. Admission of Evidence of Cash in a Shoebox

[8] Sullivan argues that the district court erred by admitting testimony of McKinney that he saw Sullivan take a shoebox containing $31,500 in cash from his office to open two bank accounts for his corporations. The district court admitted the evidence over Sullivan's objection that it was unduly prejudicial under Federal Rule of Evidence 403.

As we previously stated, we give much deference to a district court's determination to admit evidence and will reverse only for abuse of discretion. Zapata, 871 F.2d at 621; United States v. Jackson, 886 F.2d 838 (7th Cir.1989); United States v. Allen, 798 F.2d 985, 1001 (7th Cir.1986). Here, the district judge did not abuse his discretion in balancing the relevancy of the evidence with any danger of unfair prejudice. Much of the evidence against Sullivan was to establish that Perkins paid substantial bribes to Sullivan, both in person and through Carl Deloney. The evidence which disclosed a large amount of cash maintained in a shoebox was highly probative of the bribe payments, and served to corroborate the testimony of Perkins. Its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of any prejudice to Sullivan.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the convictions of Ronald Sullivan are

AFFIRMED.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Ramon Vasquez MORENO, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 80-1280.

United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.
Unit A

June 30, 1981.

Defendant was convicted before the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas at Brownsville, James DeAnda, J., of possession of marijuana with intent to distribute and conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Jerre S. Williams, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence on the possession count was sufficient to show that defendant had joint dominion or control over the marijuana, and (2) in light of other testimony given by government witness without objection connecting defendant's brother specifically and defendant's family in general with past marijuana transactions, and considering the statements and actions of the trial court during the Government's redirect examination of the aforesaid witness, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting into evidence references during the witness' redirect examination to the past marijuana dealings of defendant's brothers.

In light of other testimony given by government witness without objection connecting defendant's brother specifically and defendant's family in general with past marijuana transactions, and considering the statements and actions of the trial court during the Government's redirect examination of the aforesaid witness, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting into evidence references during the witness' redirect examination to the past marijuana dealings of defendant's brothers. Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, §§ 401(a)(1), 406, 21 U.S.C.A. §§ 841(a)(1), 846; Fed.Rules Evid. Rules 403, 403 comment, 28 U.S.C.A.

311 Phil Harris, Weslaco, Tex., for defendant-appellant.

James R. Gough, Asst. U. S. Atty., Houston, Tex., for plaintiff-appellee.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas.

Before BROWN, THORNBERRY and JERRE S. WILLIAMS, Circuit Judges.

JERRE S. WILLIAMS, Circuit Judge:

Ramon Vasquez Moreno, appellant, was convicted by a jury of possession of marijuana with intent to distribute it in violation of 21 U.S.C. s 841(a)(1) (1976), and of conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute it in violation of 21 U.S.C. ss 841(a)(1) and 846 (1976). Appellant now appeals these convictions on two grounds: (1) the alleged insufficiency of the evidence on the possession count; and (2) the error allegedly committed by the district court in admitting into evidence certain references to the past marijuana dealings of appellant's brothers. Since we find that the evidence was sufficient to sustain appellant's conviction on the possession count, and that the district court did not abuse its discretion on the evidentiary point, we affirm.

I. Facts

Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the government, Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 80, 62 S.Ct. 457, 469, 86 L.Ed. 680 (1942), the facts are as follows.

Appellant operated Moreno's Gulf Service Station in Los Fresnos, Texas, located in the Rio Grande Valley of Texas. According to the uncorroborated testimony of Johnny Lee Guidry, an unindicted co-conspirator, appellant, while at his service station on August 16, 1977, told Guidry to load 1,936 pounds of marijuana which was owned by appellant's brother, Carlos Moreno. The marijuana, contained in burlap sacks, and the tractor-trailer, upon which the marijuana was to be loaded, were concealed in a shed located about 20 miles away in Las Llesgas, Texas. Carlos Moreno also owned the tractor-trailer. Surprisingly, the record does not reflect the ownership of the shed.

Guidry, Juan Vasquez, and a third, unidentified person drove to the shed and loaded the sacks containing the marijuana onto the trailer, covering the sacks with grain and the trailer itself with a tarpaulin. Upon completing these tasks, the three men returned to appellant's service station and informed appellant that the trailer had been loaded. Guidry and the other two men were to be paid $200.00 each by either Carlos or Ramon Moreno for their work. Payment was to be made after the marijuana had reached its destination of Austin, Texas, and payment therefor had been received.[FN1]

FN1. None of these men received payment for his services because the marijuana never reached its destination.

When the day turned to night, Guidry, Juan Vasquez, Julian Henry Garza, Paulino Pena, and Vicente Arredondo went to the shed and connected the trailer to the tractor. Then, Arredondo, driving the marijuana-ladened tractor-trailer, and Pena and Garza, following in an automobile, left the shed for Austin. The latter two men were supposed to call Ramon Moreno, appellant here, to report whether the tractor-trailer had gotten through the border patrol checkpoint in Sarita, Texas, located between Las Llesgas and Austin. After the tractor-trailer departed, Guidry and Vasquez returned to appellant's service station. Pena and Garza eventually called the service station, 312 informing everyone that the border patrol agents at the border patrol checkpoint had discovered the marijuana. The next morning, appellant, his brother Carlos, Guidry, Pena, Garza, and two or three other people met at appellant's service station and discussed the preceding night's events.

Appellant, along with three other codefendants,[FN2] was indicted for conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute it, and for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute it. Appellant was convicted on both counts. He does not challenge the sufficiency of the evidence on the conspiracy count. He does, however, challenge the sufficiency of the evidence on the possession count. He further contends that both of his convictions should be reversed on the ground that the district court committed reversible error in permitting the government to elicit on its redirect examination of Guidry references to the past marijuana dealings of appellant's brothers. We address each contention separately.

FN2. Julian Henry Garza, Juan Vasquez, and Paulino Pena.

II. Sufficiency of the Evidence

Appellant contends that the evidence was insufficient to support his conviction for the substantive offense of possession of marijuana with intent to distribute it. He argues that there was insufficient evidence to show that he "possessed" the marijuana, and claims that he instead was a mere messenger who simply conveyed an instruction from his brother Carlos to Guidry. Appellant notes that the only testimony relating to him was that of Guidry, whose testimony was given as part of a plea bargaining agreement in connection with a previous conviction for possession of cocaine.

[1] The standard of review in a criminal case when the issue is the sufficiency of the evidence is whether the jury could have reasonably found that the evidence was inconsistent with every reasonable hypothesis of innocence. United States v. Rodgers, 624 F.2d 1303, 1306 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, -- U.S. --, 101 S.Ct. 1360, 67 L.Ed.2d 342 (1981); United States v. Witt, 618 F.2d 283, 284 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, --U.S. --, 101 S.Ct. 234, 66 L.Ed.2d 107 (1980). In applying this standard, we must consider the evidence and all reasonable inferences therefrom in a light most favorable to the government. Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 62 S.Ct. 457, 86 L.Ed. 680 (1942); United States v. Thompson, 603 F.2d 1200, 1204 (5th Cir. 1979).

[2] We note at the outset that the absence of corroboration of Guidry's testimony regarding appellant does not by itself bar conviction. Generally, a conviction may be based solely upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice if the testimony is not incredible or otherwise insubstantial on its face. United States v. Garner, 581 F.2d 481, 486, n. 2 (5th Cir. 1978); United States v. Kelley, 559 F.2d 399, 400 (5th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1000, 98 S.Ct. 644, 54 L.Ed.2d 497 (1977).

[3] It is well settled that possession of a controlled substance with the intent to distribute it, in violation of 21 U.S.C. s 841(a)(1) (1976), may be either actual or constructive. United States v. Martinez, 588 F.2d 495, 498 (5th Cir. 1979); United States v. Felts, 497 F.2d 80, 82 (5th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1051, 95 S.Ct. 628, 42 L.Ed.2d 646 (1974).

[4][5] As with actual possession, constructive possession may be exclusive or joint, United States v. Martinez, 588 F.2d at 498, and is susceptible of proof by circumstantial as well as direct evidence. United States v. Maspero, 496 F.2d 1354 (5th Cir. 1974). Constructive possession may be shown by "ownership, dominion or control over the contraband itself, or dominion or control over the premises or the vehicle in which the contraband was concealed." United States v. Martinez, 588 F.2d at 498, quoting United States v. Salinas-Salinas, 555 F.2d 470, 473 (5th Cir. 1977). "(M)ere presence in the area where the narcotic is discovered or mere association with the person who does control the drug or the property where it is located, is insufficient to support a finding of possession." United 313 States v. Stephenson, 474 F.2d 1353, 1355 (5th Cir. 1973) (citations omitted).

Since there is no evidence that appellant was ever in actual, physical possession of the marijuana, his conviction for possession may stand only if the evidence establishes constructive possession. Having carefully reviewed the record, we find that the evidence is sufficient to establish that appellant had dominion or control over the marijuana throughout the transaction. While at his service station, appellant instructed Guidry to go to the shed and load the marijuana into the tractor-trailer. Either appellant or his brother Carlos was to pay Guidry and the other men who participated in the operation for their work in loading and delivering the marijuana. After the men loaded the marijuana, they immediately returned to appellant's service station and informed appellant that the loading had been performed. When the tractor-trailer departed for its intended destination, the participants who remained in Los Fresnos congregated at appellant's service station that night. Further, it was appellant who was to receive the telephone call from Pena and Garza informing everyone whether the tractor-trailer managed to get past the border patrol station without the marijuana being discovered.[FN3] Finally, appellant's service station was the location at which the participants in this distribution scheme, including appellant, met the morning after the marijuana was discovered.

FN3. The record does not indicate who actually received the telephone call.

[6][7] From this evidence, the jury could have reasonably concluded beyond a reasonable doubt that, instead of being a mere "messenger," appellant was an integral part of the narcotics distribution operation and that he enjoyed a close and continuous working relationship with those, such as his brother Carlos or Guidry, who may have had actual physical possession of the marijuana. This evidence is sufficient to show that he had joint dominion or control over the drug. See United States v. Candanoza, 431 F.2d 421, 424-25 (5th Cir. 1970); Cazares-Ramirez v. United States, 406 F.2d 228, 233-34 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 926, 90 S.Ct. 933, 25 L.Ed.2d 106 (1970); United States v. McGruder, 514 F.2d 1288, 1290 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1057, 96 S.Ct. 790, 46 L.Ed.2d 646 (1976); cf. United States v. Stephenson, 474 F.2d 1353, 1355 (5th Cir. 1973) (insufficient working relationship found). Not only did appellant instruct and monitor the progress of the men who had actual possession of the marijuana, but he, along with his brother Carlos, also had the authority and the responsibility to pay them for their services. Physical custody of narcotics by an employee or agent whom one dominates, or whose actions one can control, is sufficient to constitute constructive possession by the principal. United States v. Maroy, 248 F.2d 663 (7th Cir. 1957), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 931, 78 S.Ct. 412, 2 L.Ed.2d 414 (1958); United States v. Hernandez, 290 F.2d 86, 90 (2d Cir. 1961).

We accordingly cannot say that, as a matter of law, reasonable conclusions other than guilt could be drawn from the evidence viewed most favorably to the government. We will not disturb the jury verdict on the possession count.

III. Admissibility of Evidence

Appellant's second contention on appeal is that the district court erred in allowing the prosecution to elicit, over objection, testimony from government witness Guidry concerning past marijuana dealings of appellant's brothers. After having carefully reviewed the context in which this testimony was given, and having considered the nature of similar testimony given earlier during the course of Guidry's testimony, we find that this contention is without merit.

During the cross-examination of Guidry by counsel for one of the codefendants in this case, counsel elicited the fact that Guidry had loaded marijuana approximately fifty times in the preceding four or so years. Defense counsel for some of the codefendants then conducted a general attack on Guidry's credibility by attempting to show a disparity between Guidry's memory of past loadings and his memory of the 314 transaction that is the subject of the prosecution in this case. Counsel for one codefendant asked Guidry to recount some of the specifics of his past loadings, such as the number of sacks involved in each transaction and the incidents in which he had not received payment for his services. Guidry had noticeable difficulty recalling these facts, even though he could do so with respect to the transaction at hand. Defense counsel then asked Guidry, without objection from appellant's counsel, whether it was true that Guidry could remember the names of only some of the people with whom he had worked in past marijuana transactions. He then elicited the fact that Guidry could not recall the names of everyone with whom he had worked in the past transactions. Counsel for another codefendant continued this line of attack, eliciting the fact that the transaction involved in this case was one of only a very few transactions with respect to which Guidry could recall specific people, and the only one about which he had made specific identifications to law enforcement authorities. The purpose behind all of this cross-examination, of course, was to suggest that Guidry's unusually good memory as to the marijuana transaction involved in this case was either mistaken, fabricated by Guidry, or coached by the government.

On redirect examination,[FN4] government counsel asked Guidry whether the occasions 315 on which he had loaded marijuana in the past, as Guidry had testified he had done on cross-examination, had been for "the same Moreno family." Appellant's attorney's objection was overruled on the ground that the government was referring to Carlos Moreno, appellant's brother, whose name, according to the court, "(had) been bandied around in this case both by the defense and the prosecution " Record, vol. 2, at 86. Government counsel responded affirmatively to the court's query whether Carlos Moreno was indeed the subject of the government's question. The government then narrowed its question to one concerning Carlos Moreno, asking whether any arrests had arisen in any of Carlos Moreno's past transactions. After asking a few questions about a Carlos Berrera from Mexico, the government then asked Guidry, over defense counsel's objection, whether he became involved with Carlos Moreno when he (Guidry) first began to engage in marijuana transactions. An ensuing discussion between defense counsel and the court on the propriety of the questioning prevented Guidry from ever answering the question. Then, over defense counsel's objection, the government elicited the fact that Guidry knew a Eugenio Moreno, that Eugenio Moreno was "(o)ne of the brothers," and that Guidry had "work(ed) for him at the same time (he had) worked for Carlos Moreno." Record, vol. 2, at 88. At this point, the court sustained appellant's attorney's objection to any further questions along this line. The court stated that the government had been permitted to ask about the names of people in past transactions, but that it was not to inquire into the specifics of any past transaction.

FN4. The relevant portion of the government's redirect examination of Guidry proceeded as follows: BY MR. DE LUNA: Q Now, Mr. Guidry, you were asked on cross-examination about all of these many times you have loaded marijuana before. Do you recall that? A Yes. Q Was that for the same Moreno family? A Yes, it was. MR. WEISFELD: We will object to that. There is one man here at trial and there is not the Moreno family. I am representing Ramon Moreno and that's it. THE COURT: Well, Carlos Moreno's name has been bandied around in this case both by the defense and the prosecution, and I will overrule the objection. I assume that's what he is referring to. MR. DE LUNA: Yes, sir. BY MR. DE LUNA: Q And as you were working for Mr. Moreno, at the time for Carlos Moreno, the tractor-trailers you loaded, did some of them get busted? A This one did. Q But at any of the other times you have been asked about, did some of the others get busted? A I don't believe so. Q Is that the reason strike that. You testified there were some people also from the Mexican side involved. Do you know a person by the name of Carlos Berrera? A Yes, I do. Q Who is that? A A person that I used to get pot from, marijuana. Q Where is he from? A Matamoros. At least he lives there. Q Now, when you first became involved in these marijuana deals, did you become involved with Carlos Moreno? A Would you repeat that? MR. WEISFELD: Your Honor, we will object to the continued examination along this line. It has nothing to do with the case THE COURT: Well, he has been asked on cross about various transactions and had been berated because he didn't remember some of the names, and I guess he is trying to go into those matters. I will overrule your objection. MR. MORENO (counsel for a codefendant): If it please the Court, with all due respect, those questions were addressed to the matter of impeachment, whether or not this witness was telling the truth. It doesn't go to the issue of what happened here on August 16 and 17 of 1977. THE COURT: Well, defense counsel went into it. I am going to overrule the objection. BY MR. DE LUNA: Q Do you know Eugenio Moreno? A Yes, I do. Q Who is he? A One of the brothers. MR. WEISFELD: Your Honor, may we approach the Bench, please? THE COURT: No, sir. I will let you approach the Bench during the recess. BY MR. DE LUNA: Q Did you work with him? A Yes, I had. Q Did you work for him at the same time you worked for Carlos Moreno? A Yes, I have. MR. WEISFELD: Would you note our exception to this line of questioning, Your Honor? THE COURT: I don't mind him mentioning other names because I think he was asked on cross. MR. DE LUNA: They opened the door, Your Honor. THE COURT: Well, I am not going to open the door. We are going to try these defendants and nobody else, Mr. De Luna. MR. DE LUNA: Judge, they questioned that he couldn't remember the other people, and I am asking him if he remembers the other people. THE COURT: That's fine. You have asked him, but don't go into any other transactions because I have sustained the objection. MR. DE LUNA: That's fine. BY MR. DE LUNA: Q Do you know whether Eugenio Moreno is related to Ramon Moreno? THE COURT: I will sustain the objection. The jury will not consider that for any purpose whatsoever. Don't go into it any more, Mr. De Luna, please.

The basis of appellant's objection to Guidry's testimony apparently was that the testimony was irrelevant and that, even if relevant, its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice that it presented. See Fed.R.Evid. 403.

[8] Contrary to appellant's first assertion, Guidry's testimony connecting appellant's two brothers with past marijuana transactions in which he had engaged was relevant to the case. It was relevant to the extent that it tended to rehabilitate the credibility of Guidry's memory after it was somewhat impeached on cross-examination by the several questions of two defense counsel concerning Guidry's inability to remember most of the people with whom he had worked in past marijuana transactions.

[9] The more difficult question, however, is whether the relevance of this testimony was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. "Unfair prejudice," within the meaning of Rule 403 of the Federal Rules of Evidence, means "an undue tendency to suggest decision on an improper basis, commonly, though not necessarily, an emotional one." Fed.R.Evid. 403, Advisory Committee's Note. The process of balancing the probative value of evidence against its potential prejudicial effect is within the discretion of the trial judge, whose determination is to be upheld unless an abuse of discretion is found. United States v. Jackson, 576 F.2d 46, 49 (5th Cir. 1978); United States v. McRae, 593 F.2d 700, 707-08 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 862, 100 S.Ct. 128, 62 L.Ed.2d 83 (1979); United States v. Vitale, 596 F.2d 688, 689 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 868, 100 S.Ct. 143, 62 L.Ed.2d 93 (1979).

316 Viewed in isolation, without considering his entire testimony, Guidry's testimony on redirect examination concerning appellant's brothers appears to have posed some danger of unfair prejudice in that it could have led the jury to convict appellant either because he was somehow "guilty by association" or because he was a member of a family that had dealt with marijuana in the past.

Nevertheless, it was within the district court's discretion to determine both whether the evidence presented "an undue tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis," Fed.R.Evid. 403, Advisory Committee's Note (emphasis added), and, even if it did, whether this unfair prejudice substantially outweighed the probative value of the evidence. Fed.R.Evid. 403; United States v. McRae, 593 F.2d at 707. After carefully reviewing the record as a whole and the dialogue during the redirect examination of Guidry in particular, we hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in allowing into evidence Guidry's testimony concerning the past marijuana transactions of appellant's brothers.

In the first place, Guidry's testimony on redirect examination about appellant's brothers was largely cumulative to testimony elicited by defense counsel themselves on cross-examination. Earlier, during cross-examination by counsel for one of appellant's codefendants, Guidry testified, without objection from appellant's counsel, that he had loaded marijuana for Carlos Moreno in the past. Guidry further testified on cross-examination, again without objection, that one difference between the transaction involved in this case and past transactions in which he had been involved was that, in the transaction involved here, "(t)he Morenos had their own trailer now." Guidry then added that "(t)hey had used other people's trailers." Like his testimony during redirect examination, this testimony strongly suggests that at least some members of the Moreno family have been involved in marijuana transactions in the past. In fact, on direct examination Guidry testified, without objection from defense counsel or further elaboration by Guidry, that appellant himself had "sent" Guidry to the shed in Las Llesgas "before." Guidry's testimony on redirect examination regarding appellant's brothers thus was largely cumulative of his earlier testimony. The trial court apparently recognized this fact to some extent when it noted during the government's redirect examination of Guidry that "Carlos Moreno's name has been bandied around in this case both by the defense and the prosecution " Record, vol. 2, at 86. The trial court properly could view this cumulative effect as significantly reducing any unfair prejudice Guidry's testimony on redirect examination may have had. See United States v. Jackson, 576 F.2d at 49, n. 5. If there were prejudice, it was created largely by defense counsel themselves in their cross-examination of Guidry.

In addition to the largely cumulative effect of Guidry's redirect examination testimony, any unfair prejudice caused by this testimony was further reduced by the trial court's statements and actions during the testimony. When Guidry testified that he had loaded marijuana for "the same Moreno family" before, the court narrowed "the Moreno family" to Carlos Moreno, about whose past marijuana dealings there already had been substantial testimony. Further, after allowing the government to ask a few questions about appellant's brother Eugenio, the court cut off any further questions along that line and instructed the jury not to consider "for any purpose whatsoever" the government's question whether Eugenio Moreno was related to appellant. The court properly allowed the government to inquire into the names of people in past transactions. This questioning was a direct response to the trial strategy of defense counsel, who had first asked questions concerning names. Beyond this inquiry into names, however, the court did not permit the government to delve into the specifics of any past transaction.

[10] Accordingly, in light of the other testimony given by Guidry without objection connecting appellant's brother Carlos specifically and appellant's family in general with past marijuana transactions, and 317 considering the statements and actions of the trial court during the government's redirect examination of Guidry, we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in admitting into evidence the references during Guidry's redirect examination to the past marijuana dealings of appellant's brothers. See United States v. Brown, 482 F.2d 1226 (8th Cir. 1973) (rehabilitation of attacked memory with testimony regarding narcotics traffic and habits of narcotics dealers in area); United States v. Vaughn, 486 F.2d 1318 (8th Cir. 1973) (after impeachment suggesting improbability, rehabilitation showing recent similar heroin transactions by other persons allowed).

Since we reject both of appellant's contentions on this appeal, we affirm his conviction on both counts.

AFFIRMED.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Gary HALBERT, Appellant.
No. 78-3278.
United States Court of Appeals,
Ninth Circuit.
Argued Sept. 4, 1979.
Submitted Jan. 28, 1980.
Decided March 6, 1981.

The United States District Court for the Central District of California, Malcolm M. Lucas, J., convicted defendant of mail fraud in connection with scheme to market items commemorating the Nation's Bicentennial, and defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals held that: (1) prosecutor's references to guilty pleas of codefendants were permissible; (2) reversal was required by lack of appropriate instructions to jury on limited purpose for which guilty pleas could be used; (3) materiality of misrepresentations was clearly established by the evidence, and thus failure to instruct on materiality was not error; (4) evidence was sufficient for jury; (5) employment of alias could evidence fraudulent activity under mail fraud statute; (6) trial judge did not substantive evidence of guilt. Baker v. United States, supra, 393 F.2d at 614. Furthermore, introduction of the guilty plea as evidence of credibility requires that the plea be brought to the jury's attention, but does not sanction allowing the subject to be disproportionately emphasized or repeated.

B.

Applying the principles we have outlined to this case, the issues are two: (1) did the prosecution offer the evidence of the guilty pleas for a permissible purpose such as establishing witness credibility and (2) if the purpose was legitimate, did the trial court's instructions adequately explain to the jury the purpose for which the evidence could be used.

[8] Reviewing the record here, we find that the prosecutor carefully limited his inquiries about the guilty pleas. On direct examination, questioning did no more than elicit the fact that guilty pleas were entered. No editorial comment or unnecessary elaboration occurred. The brief questioning about the existence of the pleas was clearly relevant as evidence bearing on the witnesses' credibility.

1006 [9] The prosecutor was also within his rights on this record in asking Bucklan on redirect again about his guilty plea. On cross examination, defense counsel had elicited numerous statements that Bucklan lacked intent to defraud and that he believed that he would be able to fulfill the promises he and Halbert had made to the customers they allegedly defrauded. On redirect, Bucklan admitted in response to the prosecutor's questions that he was aware that false statements were made to customers and he had pleaded guilty to a crime requiring such knowledge. This questioning was intended to dispel any impression of unwitting misrepresentation and the suggestion that the actions of defendant and the witness were innocent. This was not improper or undue reiteration of the guilty plea.

[10] Similarly, reference to the pleas in the prosecution's closing argument was in response to comments by the defense. Defense counsel discussed the guilty pleas in his closing argument, contending that Bucklan and Halbert lacked intent to defraud:

> Now, I think you must consider that statement (Bucklan's lack of intent) in light of the facts, and both Mr. Culbertson and Mr. Bucklan said that, and I think that puts into proper perspective their pleas of guilty to one count and their making a deal, because they got up here and said, when presented by the government, that they hadn't done any wrong, so there are a lot of reasons why people can do things when it is to their advantage.

The prosecutor responded:

> (The defense) has referred to (Bucklan and Culbertson) as the government's star witnesses. Well, I can't say that I'm too happy with that. When you are presenting the evidence of a crime, you have to present the evidence of

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Luis BELTRAN-RIOS, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 88-5279.

United States Court of Appeals,
Ninth Circuit.

Argued and Submitted May 2, 1989.

Decided July 6, 1989.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, Judith Nelson Keep, J., of importation of controlled substance and possession of controlled substance with intent to distribute, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Fletcher, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) drug courier profile evidence was admissible to rebut defense efforts to characterize defendant as "poor simple farmer," and (2) duress defense instruction did not improperly make immediate surrender element of defense.

Permitting police officer's drug courier profile testimony did not violate defendant's confrontation rights despite his contention that testimony was in part based on information obtained from DEA and that admission of such hearsay testimony thus deprived defendant of effective opportunity to confront adverse witnesses through cross-examination; officer himself had 16 years' experience and had worked on hundreds of drug cases, and defendant had ample opportunity to cross-examine officer about his opinion. Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of California.

Before FLETCHER, NELSON and NORRIS, Circuit Judges.

FLETCHER, Circuit Judge:

Beltran-Rios was convicted of importation of a controlled substance and possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute. He appeals the conviction, contending that the district court erred in allowing the Government to introduce expert testimony describing the "profile" characteristics of drug couriers, and that the jury instruction on the elements of Beltran's duress defense was erroneous.

We affirm.

I.
FACTS

At approximately 9:00 a.m. on February 16, 1988, Luis Beltran-Rios entered the pedestrian inspection area of the Calexico, California Port of Entry. Customs Agent Donald Hylton performed a pat-down search of Beltran and found three small packages of heroin in Beltran's shoes. Beltran was placed under arrest, and was questioned by Customs and DEA agents. During the course of this questioning, Beltran gave several conflicting explanations for the presence of heroin in his shoes.

On February 22, 1988, a two count indictment was filed in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, charging Beltran with violations of 21 U.S.C. §§ 952, 960 (importation of a controlled substance) and 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1) (possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute). On February 26, Beltran pleaded not guilty. Beltran filed a motion to suppress physical evidence as well as statements he made to Customs and DEA agents. The district court denied this motion after an April 25 hearing. A jury trial began on May 17, 1988.

Beltran offered duress as his major defense at trial. Beltran argued that he brought heroin into the United States 1210 against his will because an individual named Jesus Holguin Lopez approached him and demanded that he do so. Lopez allegedly threatened to kill Beltran or his family if he did not comply. Beltran presented testimony from a Father Augustin Gonzalez-Magana attesting to Beltran's good reputation and Lopez's reputation as a dangerous drug trafficker. In his opening statement, defense counsel also emphasized Beltran's vulnerability to Lopez's threats, portraying Beltran as a simple, poor farmer. Counsel pursued a related theme in cross-examination, questioning witnesses about Beltran's appearance in an effort to emphasize that Beltran dressed poorly, and did not display flashy or expensive jewelry.

Allegedly to rebut the "poor simple farmer" theme, the Government introduced expert testimony describing the characteristics of the typical drug courier, or "mule." The Government's expert witness, Deputy Sheriff Jose Moreno-Nava, testified that mules were generally poor, sympathetic-looking individuals, who went into the drug courier trade because it is the only way for such individuals to make money quickly. This testimony was admitted over defense counsel's objection.

After the presentation of the evidence, counsel and the trial judge conferred concerning the instructions. The judge indicated that she would not give the defendant's proposed duress instruction, but would give a modified version of the Ninth Circuit Model Jury Instruction on duress. Defense counsel objected, contending that the instruction improperly introduced a requirement of prompt surrender to the authorities as an element of the defense.

On May 20, 1988, the jury returned a verdict of guilty on both counts. On July 11, 1988, Beltran was sentenced to 33 months in custody, and a term of three years of supervised release. This appeal follows. We have jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291.

II.
DISCUSSION

A. Admission of Nava's Testimony

Over the objection of defense counsel, the district court permitted Nava to testify about the characteristics of the typical drug courier. Nava testified that "[y]our typical mule would be a poorer individual, who does not wear flashy clothes or jewelry, and is, like I say, in the--he's the bottom of the totem pole in the organization but he is a paid individual by that organization." Reporter's Transcript (RT) vol. II at 275. [FN1] Beltran argues that admission of this testimony was an abuse of discretion because the use of such profiles is of limited probative value and is extremely prejudicial. The district court has broad discretion to admit or exclude expert testimony. The court's decision to admit Nava's "drug courier profile" testimony therefore is reviewed for abuse of discretion. United States v. Gillespie, 852 F.2d 475, 478 (9th Cir.1988).

FN1. The trial judge instructed the jury to disregard the portion of Nava's testimony in which he stated that "[t]he individual that is generally doing the muling is an older individual...." RT at 274.

[1] The use of criminal profiles as evidence of guilt in criminal trials has been severely criticized. As the Eleventh Circuit has pointed out,

> [d]rug courier profiles are inherently prejudicial because of the potential they have for including innocent citizens as profiled drug couriers.... Every defendant has a right to be tried based on the evidence against him or her, not on the techniques utilized by law enforcement officials in investigating criminal activity. Drug courier profile evidence is nothing more than the opinion of those officers conducting an investigation.... [W]e denounce the use of this type of evidence as substantive evidence of the defendant's innocence or guilt.

United States v. Hernandez-Cuartas, 717 F.2d 552, 555 (11th Cir.1983). Similarly, in Gillespie, 852 F.2d at 479-80, we found the admission of the testimony of a clinical psychologist describing the common characteristics *1211 of child molesters to be reversible error.

The hostility exhibited by the lower courts to the use of criminal profiles as substantive evidence of guilt is not undermined by the Supreme Court's recent decision in United States v. Sokolow, --- U.S. ----, ----, 109 S.Ct. 1581-1586, 104 L.Ed.2d 1 (1989). Sokolow merely establishes that a law enforcement official may make an investigative stop based on observed behavior consistent with DEA drug courier profiles. There is no indication that the Court's approval of profiles to help establish reasonable suspicion warranting further investigation extends to use of profile evidence at trial. Beltran's argument that such profiles generally have no place as substantive evidence of guilt at trial is still valid.

[2] The Government, while conceding that profile testimony is generally undesirable as evidence of guilt, argues that Nava's testimony was permissible in this case because defense counsel "opened the door" to this line of questioning by emphasizing Beltran's apparent poverty. The record clearly demonstrates defense counsel's efforts to raise an inference that Beltran was not a drug courier because his life-style was inconsistent with that line of business. In cross-examination of the Government's first witness, Customs Agent Donald Hylton, the following exchange took place:

> Mr. Ainbinder: Does he [Beltran] look essentially the same as he did on the 16th?
> A: Yes.
> Q: You don't remember any gold rings on his fingers?
> A: No. I can't recall any--
> Q: Rolex watches?
> A: No, sir.
> Q: Gold chains?
> A: No.
> Q: Expensive jewelry, that kind of thing?
> A: No.
> Q: And as you inspected him in secondary and then in the pat-down area, I take it you went through his things pretty carefully?
> A: Yes.
> Q: Did you find any large amounts of money?
> A: No.

RT vol. I at 182.

Defense counsel pursued a similar line of questioning in cross-examination of DEA Agent Eddie Marquez:

> Q: Now, I would like you to take a look at Mr. Beltran as he is seated here today. I know his exact clothing is a little different, but does he appear to be about the same as he was on the 16th of February?
> A: Yes, he was.
> Q: He's not missing any thing like expensive jewelry or something--
> A: No, sir.
> Q: Same simple sort of clothes?
> A: Yes.
> Q: And as he sits here today, is that the same calm look you saw when you entered in the little detention room?
> A: Yes.
> Q: Now, you said he had a lot of receipts. Have you gone through them all?
> A: Yes. I have made xerox copies of everything.
> Q: And what we see in those receipts are literally years of collections. Years. Isn't there?
> A: That's correct.
> Q: Now, in those receipts is there anything to reflect purchases of things like T.V.'s?
> A: None.
> Q: Automobiles?
> A: None.
> Q: Anything to reflect bank accounts with large sums of money?
> A: Not that I could tell.

Q: Investments in stocks, bonds or certificates of deposit?
A: No sir.
Q: No documents showing the purchase of a number of head of cattle recently?
1212 A: Not recently. I know there is one said how many he may have owned, but I don't recall exactly.
Q: No purchase of jewelry or that kind of thing?
A: No sir.
Q: You had a chance to go through the rest of Mr. Beltran's things. Do you recall at any time, can you tell us today, did he have a large amount of cash on him?
A: I don't believe he did.
RT vol. II at 235-37.

The purpose of this questioning is clear--counsel is trying to suggest to the jury that Beltran is not part of a smuggling operation because he lacks the accoutrements of wealth associated with such a profitable activity. In light of this testimony, the district court concluded that the Government should have an opportunity to rebut the inference that defense counsel was trying to raise.

What I am going to do is allow limited inquiry. I am worried about too much prejudice on it.... So at least I think by having everybody look, you had him stand up, did he have on gold chains, did he appear wealthy, did he have a lot of cash, I think at least it would be proper to say that most of the couriers that they see, that he's aware of are not wealthy and wearing gold chains. They are not on that end of the distribution scheme. Because there's been a suggestion raised by you that, because he's not in gold chains and having a lot of money, he's clearly not involved.

RT vol. II at 271-72. The Government then elicited the testimony from Deputy Nava that Beltran challenges here.

We previously have allowed the Government to introduce otherwise excludable testimony when the defendant "opens the door" by introducing potentially misleading testimony. See e.g., United States v. Segall, 833 F.2d 144, 148 (9th Cir.1987) (defense counsel's introduction of cross-examination evidence creating a false impression that defendant retained in her bank account funds under investigation "opened the door" to re-direct testimony that only a fraction of that money was retained); United States v. Giese, 597 F.2d 1170, 1188-90 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 979, 100 S.Ct. 480, 62 L.Ed.2d 405 (1979) (defense testimony relating to 18 books owned and read by defendant suggesting his left-wing but non-violent, non-revolutionary political views "opened the door" to cross-examination on other books defendant had sold, owned or read).

This type of rebuttal testimony may include criminal profile testimony. For example, in United States v. Taylor, 716 F.2d 701 (9th Cir.1983), the defendant, Steven Pressler, who was convicted of conspiracy to manufacture amphetamines, argued that the trial court erred in not sustaining his objections to certain questions asked by the Government at trial. Pressler's role in the amphetamine manufacturing enterprise was apparently limited to picking up necessary chemicals at a chemical supply store. On cross-examination, defense counsel asked the DEA agent witness whether drug manufacturers use third parties to pick up chemicals to insulate themselves from detection. On re-direct, the prosecuting attorney asked the witness whether, in his experience, these third parties are always, sometimes, or never involved in the illegal manufacturing operation. The witness replied that, in his experience, "innocent" third parties were not used to pick up chemicals. We found that defense counsel "opened the door" to that line of questioning. 716 F.2d at 710.

However, the case most closely on point is the Second Circuit's decision in United States v. Khan, 787 F.2d 28 (2d Cir.1986). In Khan, the defendant, a Pakistani accused of selling narcotics in the U.S., argued that the trial court erred in allowing the introduction of "irrelevant and unfairly prejudicial" expert testimony about heroin trafficking in Pakistan. The expert witness, a DEA agent, testified that (1) heroin was extremely inexpensive in Pakistan; (2) it was common for Pakistani dealers to advance heroin to each other without immediate payment; (3) heroin dealers in Pakistan, like other Pakistanis, wore the same 1213 national dress--pantaloon, baggy pants, and a knee length top. 787 F.2d at 34.

The appellate court ruled that this evidence was relevant, and that it was within the discretion of the trial court to allow it. The court noted that > suggesting that he was a poor man.... The expert testimony was relevant to rebut Khan's arguments to the jury and show that (1) Khan did not need a large sum of money to deal in large amounts of heroin in Pakistan, and (2) even if Khan had made a great deal of money in the heroin trade, it would not necessarily show from the manner of his dress.

Id.

Although Beltran is correct that this type of profile evidence is potentially dangerous, the cases suggest that it is permissible in certain limited circumstances. The district court determined that Nava's testimony was necessary to rebut the inference that defense counsel attempted to create. The district court was aware of the potential prejudice, and attempted to keep it at a minimum by sustaining several objections, and striking one portion of Nava's testimony from the record. We conclude that the district judge did not abuse her discretion. [FN2]

> FN2. We emphasize that the holding in this case is a relatively narrow one. The Government may introduce profile testimony of this sort only to rebut specific attempts by the defense to suggest innocence based on the particular characteristics described in the profile.

B. Witness Confrontation

[3] Beltran also argues that Nava's drug courier profile testimony, which was based in part upon information obtained from DEA officials, was hearsay, and that admission of this testimony deprived Beltran of an effective opportunity to confront adverse witnesses through cross-examination. Whether Beltran's sixth amendment right to confront witnesses against him was violated is a question of law, reviewed de novo. United States v. McConney, 728 F.2d 1195 (9th Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 824, 105 S.Ct. 101, 83 L.Ed.2d 46 (1984). Beltran's confrontation argument is without merit.

Nava testified that in his sixteen years as a law enforcement official, he has worked on hundreds of drug cases, with as many as four hundred directly involving smuggling of drugs into the United States. RT vol. II at 251. He also testified that he worked as an undercover agent in Mexico for two years, and that he personally had received drugs from couriers on as many as one hundred occasions. Id. at 263. Thus, his opinion about the typical characteristics of drug couriers is derived largely from personal experience. [FN3] Defense counsel unquestionably had ample opportunity to cross-examine Nava about his expert opinion, and the sources of information upon which that opinion was based. This is a sufficient basis upon which to reject Beltran's confrontation clause argument.

> FN3. To the extent that Nava's testimony was based upon information obtained other than through personal observation, it was permissible, being based upon information of the type reasonably relied upon by experts in forming expert opinions. See United States v. Golden, 532 F.2d 1244 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 842, 97 S.Ct. 118, 50 L.Ed.2d 111 (1976) (holding it proper to admit DEA agent's testimony about market value of heroin where that testimony was based in part upon information obtained from other undercover agents; such information is of the type reasonably relied upon by experts determining prevailing prices in clandestine markets). Beltran does not dispute that Nava is an expert on narcotics smuggling.

C. The Duress Instruction

[4] Before a defendant is entitled to an instruction on the defense of duress, he must establish a prima facie case of the three elements of that defense: (1) an immediate threat of death or serious bodily injury; (2) a well-grounded fear that the threat will be carried out; and (3) lack of a reasonable opportunity to escape the threatened harm. United States v. Jennell, 749 F.2d 1302, 1305 (9th Cir.1984), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 837, 106 S.Ct. 114, 88 L.Ed.2d 93 (1985); United States v. Contento-Pachon, 723 F.2d 691, 693 (9th Cir.1984). We noted in Jennell that a fourth 1214 element is also sometimes required; the defendant must submit to the proper authorities after attaining a position of safety. 749 F.2d at 1305. However, this fourth element has independent significance only in prison escape cases. Id.

[5] The district court gave the following instruction relating to duress:

> The defendant has offered evidence to show that at the time the crime charged in the indictment was committed, defendant was in fear of his life and the lives of his mother and sister.

A defendant is not guilty of a crime if the defendant participated in it only because of a belief with good reason:
1. That defendant or his family would suffer immediate and serious injury or death if the defendant did not participate; and
2. That defendant had no other reasonable way of escaping such immediate injury or death.
The Government must prove the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. To do so, the Government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt either one of the two following elements:
1. That when the defendant committed the crime, defendant did not have a reasonable belief that serious and immediate injury would follow, or
2. That at that time defendant had a reasonable opportunity to escape such serious and immediate injury or death. In evaluating a reasonable opportunity to escape, you may consider whether defendant took the opportunity to escape the threatened harm by submitting to authorities at the first reasonable opportunity.

RT vol. II, at 522-23 (emphasis added). Beltran argues that this instruction is erroneous because it permits the Government to satisfy its burden of proof by showing that Beltran did not immediately surrender to the proper authorities upon his initial entry in to the United States. Beltran insists that the highlighted language in the instruction imports a fourth element into the duress defense that is inappropriate outside the context of prison escape cases. Jury instructions are considered as a whole to determine if they are misleading or inadequate. United States v. Burgess, 791 F.2d 676, 680 (9th Cir.1986). The trial judge has substantial latitude in tailoring the instructions, and challenges to the formulation adopted by the court are reviewed for abuse of discretion. Id.

The major flaw of Beltran's argument is that the instruction as given does not make submission to the authorities an independent fourth element to a duress defense. The instruction quite clearly invites the jury to consider submission to the authorities as one factor in evaluating the third prong of the duress defense, lack of reasonable opportunity to escape. Nothing in the wording of the instruction suggests that failure to submit to the authorities precludes a finding of duress.

Considering submission to the authorities as an element of opportunity to escape does not appear to be inconsistent with Ninth Circuit authority on duress. As we noted in Contento-Pachon:

> In cases not involving escape from prison there seems to be little difference between the third basic requirement that there be no reasonable opportunity to escape the threatened harm and the obligation to turn oneself in to the authorities on reaching a point of safety. Once a defendant has reached a position where he can safely turn himself in to the authorities he will likewise have a reasonable opportunity to escape the threatened harm.

723 F.2d at 695 (emphasis added). See also Jennell, 749 F.2d at 1305 (quoting Contento-Pachon). The challenged instruction appears to embody fairly the view expressed in Jennell and Contento-Pachon; as a practical matter, whether the defendant submits to the proper authorities at the first reasonable opportunity is closely related to whether the defendant has a reasonable opportunity to escape the threatened harm. Taken as a whole, the duress instruction does not appear to be misleading, and the trial judge did not abuse her discretion in adopting this particular formulation.

*1215 III. CONCLUSION

Under the circumstances of this case, the district court's carefully considered decision to allow testimony describing the profile characteristics of drug couriers was not an abuse of discretion. The defendant's right to confront witnesses against him was not abridged. The district court's formulation of the jury instructions on duress was not misleading, and was within the discretion of the district court.

innocence.' " Williams, 45 F.3d at 1484 (quoting Zafiro v. United States, 506 U.S. 534, 113 S.Ct. 933, 122 L.Ed.2d 317 (1993)). "Neither a mere allegation that defendant would have a better chance of acquittal in a separate trial, nor a complaint of the 'spillover effect' [of damaging evidence] is sufficient to warrant severance." United States v. Levine, 983 F.2d 165, 167 (10th Cir.1992) (quotations omitted).

[32] We conclude Defendant has failed to show the requisite prejudice warranting severance. As we have stated, the facts of this case were not so intricate as to render the jury unable to segregate the evidence associated with each defendant's individual actions. See supra part III.B.2. Moreover, the district court minimized any possible prejudice by instructing the jury that "[i]t is your duty to give separate and individual consideration to the evidence as it relates to each individual defendant [and] leav[e] out of consideration entirely any evidence admitted solely against some other defendant or defendants." See 435 Vol. I, Tab 96, p. 6; Zafiro, 113 S.Ct. at 938 ("[L]imiting instructions ... often will suffice to cure any risk of prejudice."). Under these circumstances, we conclude the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying Defendant's motion to sever.

V. 404(b) Evidence

[33] Defendants Edwards and Lawrence contend the district court erred in admitting evidence of prior bad acts pursuant to Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). We review the district court's decision to admit evidence under Rule 404(b) for an abuse of discretion. United States v. Patterson, 20 F.3d 809, 812 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 115 S.Ct. 128, 130 L.Ed.2d 72 (1994).

During trial, the government moved to admit excerpts from testimony given by Edwards and Lawrence as government witnesses at an unrelated 1991 cocaine conspiracy trial in the Northern District of Oklahoma. The excerpts included testimony in which Edwards and Lawrence testified that they had known each other for at least five or six years and became involved in the cocaine business in 1986. Edwards testified that he had purchased two to three kilograms of cocaine from Lawrence in 1986 and began purchasing cocaine in Los Angeles and Houston for resale in Tulsa, in 1988. Lawrence testified that he and Edwards had made two or three trips to Houston to purchase cocaine, and would place the cocaine inside a spare tire before returning to Tulsa.

[34] The government offered the prior testimony in order to rebut Defendants' contention that they were not involved in a cocaine conspiracy with each other and with J. Grist. Thus, under Rule 404(b), the government contended that the prior testimony showed knowledge of the charged conspiracy and an absence of mistake. Defendants objected to the admission of the testimony contending that even if the evidence was admitted for a proper purpose under Rule 404(b), the evidence was more prejudicial than probative and should be excluded. The district court overruled the objection stating that "[i]t's the view of the Court that such evidence of prior statements, activities would ... go to the issues of motive, knowledge, opportunity, and absence of mistake or accident, and would therefore be appropriate." [FN11] Vol. XI at 804. The court therefore admitted the prior testimony.

FN11. Defendant Lawrence appears to suggest that the district court erred in admitting the prior testimony because it failed to articulate the specific purpose for which the evidence was admitted, but instead merely restated the language of Rule 404(b). We disagree.
We have held that "a broad statement merely invoking or restating Rule 404(b) will not suffice" to identify the specific purpose for which a district court admitted Rule 404(b) evidence. United States v. Kendall, 766 F.2d 1426, 1436 (10th Cir.1985), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 1081, 106 S.Ct. 848, 88 L.Ed.2d 889 (1986). However, even if the district court fails to specifically articulate the basis for admission, the error is harmless as long as a proper purpose is apparent from the record. United States v. Record, 873 F.2d 1363, 1373 (10th Cir.1989). As our analysis indicates, the specific purpose for admitting the prior testimony in the instant case is apparent from the record.

[35] Defendants contend the district court improperly admitted the prior testimony under Rule 404(b) because the evidence related to events which occurred in 1988 and was thus too remote in time to the events charged in the instant case. Consequently, Defendants contend that the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial impact. [FN12]

FN12. Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) provides:
Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident.

Evidence of a defendant's prior crimes, wrongs, or acts is "admissible only for limited purposes and only when various prerequisites are satisfied." United States v. Robinson, 978 F.2d 1554, 1558 (10th Cir.1992), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 1855, 123 L.Ed.2d 478 (1993). Rule 404(b) requires that trial court shall, upon request, instruct the jury that the evidence of similar acts is to be considered only for the proper purpose for which it was admitted. United States v. Johnson, 42 F.3d 1312, 1315 (10th Cir.1994) (quotation omitted). " 'We have previously recognized the highly probative value of uncharged prior acts evidence to show motive, intent, knowledge or plan in the context of a conspiracy prosecution.' " United States v. Easter, 981 F.2d 1549, 1554 (10th Cir.1992) (quoting United States v. Record, 873 F.2d 1363, 1375 (10th Cir.1989)), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 2448, 124 L.Ed.2d 665 (1993). This is particularly true where the uncharged acts are similar in method to the charged conspiracy and sufficiently close in time. Id.

(1) the evidence must be offered for a proper purpose; (2) the evidence must be relevant; (3) the trial court must make a Rule 403 determination of whether the 436 probative value of the similar acts is substantially outweighed by its potential for unfair prejudice; and (4) pursuant to Fed.R.Evid. 105, the

Here, Defendants' prior acts involved their joint efforts regarding distribution of cocaine purchased in and transported from Houston, Texas--a similar scheme with which Defendants were eventually charged--and were sufficiently close in time to the charged conduct. See United States v. Wint, 974 F.2d 961, 967 (8th Cir.1992) (narcotics offense committed five years earlier was "reasonably close in time" to charged offense), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 1001, 122 L.Ed.2d 151 (1993); United States v. Drew, 894 F.2d 965, 970 (8th Cir.) (evidence of defendant's participation in running drug house three years earlier to offense in question probative of issues of intent, knowledge, and plan), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1089, 110

S.Ct. 1830, 108 L.Ed.2d 959 (1990). In this context, the prior acts evidence was highly relevant to show Defendants' knowledge of the plan or scheme to possess and distribute cocaine. Furthermore, the prior acts evidence rebutted Defendants' claim that they were not involved in a cocaine conspiracy with each other. See Easter, 981 F.2d at 1554 (upholding the admission of prior acts evidence under similar circumstances).

In addition, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its potential for unfair prejudice. Although the district court did not explicitly rule on the prejudicial impact of the evidence, the court admitted the evidence following Defendants' objections based upon prejudice. Thus, "we can assume the judge weighed the prejudicial impact against the probative value of the evidence", Patterson, 20 F.3d at 814, before making the final determination to admit the prior testimony. Because "[w]e are required to give the trial court 'substantial deference' in Rule 403 rulings", id. (quoting Easter, 981 F.2d at 1554), we will not disturb the district court's implicit determination regarding the probative value of the evidence. See id. Moreover, the district court's jury instructions included an instruction limiting the use of the prior acts evidence. Under these circumstances, we conclude the district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the prior acts evidence pursuant to Rule 404(b).

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Earl D. DREW, a/k/a Derrick/Dereck Drew, Appellant.

v.
Dennis Edward DREW, Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Hampton David STEWART, Jr., a/k/a Snookie, Appellant.
Nos. 88-2661, 88-2662 and 88-2668.
United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.
Submitted June 12, 1989.
Decided Jan. 17, 1990.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri, Scott O. Wright, Chief Judge, for conspiracy and substantive offenses arising out of operation of drug house. Defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals, Bowman, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence supported one defendant's conviction for using or carrying firearm sufficient evidence to find that Earl Drew participated in the operation of a drug house, that a gun was present at the drug house and in Drew's possession and control, and that Drew "use[d]" a firearm during the commission of a drug trafficking crime.

C.

Earl Drew raises two separate issues concerning the government's closing argument. 969 We review the trial court's rulings on objections to statements made in closing argument under an abuse of discretion standard. United States v. Flynn, 852 F.2d 1045, 1055 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 109 S.Ct. 511, 102 L.Ed.2d 546 (1988).

First, appellant again invokes his theory on the meaning of "use" under the firearm statute in arguing that the government misstated the law in closing argument thereby denying appellant his due process rights under the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution. [FN2] Because we find Drew's interpretation of the law as requiring an actual or threatened discharge of a firearm contrary to any plausible reading of s 924, [FN3] we obviously find no error in the government's failure to present appellant's version of the law to the jury during closing argument.

FN2. In our opinion, the challenged portion of the government's closing argument, cut short by appellant's objection at trial, was rather generous in its inclusion of appellant's theory of the gun's purpose:

And you need not find that that was the only possible use for the gun. I mean, you might use it to protect yourself, you might use it for target shooting, you might use it to do whatever you want to do for sport, for show, whatever, but if one day a week or one night a week he used that gun to protect those drugs, to protect his money or to protect himself when he came to the door early in the morning, and you've heard testimony that that's what it was about--.

Tr. Vol. 4 at 11.

FN3. We note that appellant's objection at trial, that "[a]nyone in this country can protect themselves with a [hand]gun in the morning when someone comes to the door at 4:00 [a.m.]," Tr. Vol. 4 at 11-12, happens to be an incorrect statement of the law in several localities in this country including the seat of federal government. See D.C.Code Ann. s 6-2312(4) (1989 Repl.Vol.).

[5] Appellant's second complaint with the closing argument is that government counsel misstated the law by describing "beyond a reasonable doubt" as equivalent to being "sure" or "certain." The relevant definitions given by Webster's Third New International Dictionary (unabridged) (1981), for "certain" are: "not to be doubted as a fact: INDISPUTABLE ... given to or marked by complete assurance and conviction, lack of doubt ... through or as if through infallible knowledge." Id. at 367. And those for "sure" are: "assured in mind: having no doubt ... marked by ... feelings of confident certainty and conviction esp. of the rightness of one's judgment ... objectively certain: admitting of no doubt ... marked by unquestionable fact, verity, or substantiation." Id. at 2299.

To the extent that the words "sure" and "certain" differ in meaning from "beyond a reasonable doubt," it is not the defendant who should be protesting: the definitions of "sure" and "certain" appear to encompass even doubts that do not merit the qualifier "reasonable." Although we think prosecutors would be well advised to avoid trying to explain to the jury the meaning of "beyond a reasonable doubt" (this is a function properly performed only by the trial judge), the error here favored the defendants and was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. We therefore decline to reverse on this ground.

Earl Drew next contends that evidence of his drug dealing prior to the period covered in the indictment was improperly admitted. The admissibility of prior bad acts evidence is governed by Rule 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident.

The decision to admit evidence of prior bad acts is within the sound discretion of the trial judge, see, e.g., United States v. Gustafson, 728 F.2d 1078, 1083 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 979, 105 S.Ct. 380, 83 L.Ed.2d 315 (1984), subject only to an abuse of discretion standard of review by this Court. United States v. Bowman, 798 F.2d 333, 337 (8th Cir.1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1043, 107 S.Ct. 906, 93 L.Ed.2d 856 970 (1987). Indeed, "reversal is only commanded when 'it is clear that the questioned evidence has no bearing upon any of the issues involved.' " United States v. Thompson, 503 F.2d 1096, 1098 (8th Cir.1974) (quoting Wakaksan v. United States, 367 F.2d 639, 645 (8th Cir.1966), cert. denied, 386 U.S. 994, 87 S.Ct. 1312, 18 L.Ed.2d 341 (1967)). We find no reason to reverse the District Court's ruling.

There is no question that the evidence of appellant's prior narcotics transactions has some bearing on his guilt in the charged narcotics offenses as showing, among other things, opportunity, intent, preparation, and plan. That this evidence is relevant to a material issue raised is not even challenged by appellant.

[6] While conceding that evidence of his previous narcotics transactions was relevant on a material issue, appellant argues that three other requirements for admission were not met. Appellant first claims that his previous operation of a drug house was not sufficiently close in time to the charged offense. See United States v. Marshall, 683 F.2d 1212, 1215 (8th Cir.1982). Government witness Frank Biondo testified that Drew had operated a drug house as far back as 1985 and that at some point in 1986 the operation moved to a different house. His testimony did not suggest, however, that there had been any significant interruption in Drew's operation of drug houses.

[7] Although proximity in time combined with similarity in type of crime virtually guarantees admittance of prior bad acts evidence, see, e.g., United States v. Anderson, 879 F.2d 369, 378 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 110 S.Ct. 515, 107 L.Ed.2d 516 (1989), these are only factors tending to negate the possibility that the evidence was improperly introduced to "prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). The ultimate question always remains whether the evidence "is admissible to prove any relevant issue other than the character of the defendant or his propensity toward criminal activity." United States v. McDaniel, 773 F.2d 242, 247 (8th Cir.1985).

We have frequently sustained the admission of prior bad acts evidence without so much as a passing mention of closeness in time and similarity of the prior act to the charged offense when it was relevant to an issue other than the character of the defendant, such as motive, intent, or absence of mistake. See United States v. Felix, 867 F.2d 1068, 1072 (8th Cir.1989); United States v. Pierce, 792 F.2d 740, 743 (8th Cir.1986). In the case of "signature" crimes, or "other crimes by the accused so nearly identical in method as to earmark them as the handiwork of the accused," C. McCormick, McCormick on Evidence s 190(3), at 559 (E. Cleary 3d ed. 1984), the time factor is obviously much less important than in the typical 404(b) case. Evidence offered to prove motive by showing the existence of a larger plan, on the other hand, could properly include evidence of a wholly different prior bad act committed in connection with the charged offense. Id. See, e.g., Grandison v. State, 305 Md. 685, 735-36, 506 A.2d 580, 605, cert. denied, 479 U.S. 873, 107 S.Ct. 38, 93 L.Ed.2d 174 (1986) (indictment in federal narcotics case admissible in state prosecution for hiring an assassin to kill witness in federal case). Proximity in time and similarity of conduct are only factors that may be considered by the trial judge in deciding whether to admit evidence of prior bad acts; they are not requirements for admission.

Moreover, whether under the rubric of "intent," "knowledge," or "common plan or scheme," we have repeatedly upheld the admission of prior drug transactions in cases charging narcotics violations. See, e.g., United States v. Haynes, 881 F.2d 586, 590 (8th Cir.1989); United States v. Maichle, 861 F.2d 178, 180 (8th Cir.1988); United States v. Norton, 846

F.2d 521, 524 (8th Cir.1988). We may add Drew's case to the list without delving into the precise timing of his prior drug dealings which, in any event, apparently continued straight up to, indeed through, the time period of the charged conspiracy.

971 [8] Drew next argues that the evidence of his prior drug dealing did not satisfy the "clear and convincing" standard, which until recently was the requirement for such evidence in this Circuit. More than one month before Drew went to trial, however, the Supreme Court rejected the "clear and convincing" standard, holding that evidence of prior bad acts may be admitted "if there is sufficient evidence to support a finding by the jury that the defendant committed the [prior acts]." Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681, 685, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 1499, 99 L.Ed.2d 771 (1988); see also id. at 685 n. 2, 108 S.Ct. at 1499 n. 2 (distinguishing requirements for admission of such evidence among the circuits). The government's evidence of Drew's prior drug transactions consisted of the testimony of Frank Biondo, one of the government's principal witnesses throughout the trial. We cannot say the District Court abused its discretion in admitting this evidence under either the "clear and convincing" standard or the Huddleston standard.

Finally, Drew invokes the residual complaint available under Rule 403 of the Federal Rules of Evidence that the "probative value [of the evidence was] substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice." Fed.R.Evid. 403.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Wayne WOMOCHIL, Appellant.

No. 84-2591.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Sept. 10, 1985.

Decided Dec. 9, 1985.
Rehearing and Rehearing En Banc Denied Jan. 30, 1986.

Defendant was convicted of conspiring to distribute cocaine and of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, in the United States District Court for the District of Nebraska, Clarence Arlen Beam, J., after that same court had denied suppression motions, 579 F.Supp. 804, and defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Floyd R. Gibson, Senior Circuit Judge, held that: (1) incriminating statement attributed to declarant by another person in witness' presence was admissible under the coconspirator hearsay exception; (2) otherwise inadmissible testimony was admissible on redirect examination to correct false impression left by defendant on cross-examination; and (3) alleged prosecutorial misconduct did not require mistrial.

Affirmed.

Wayne Womochil appeals from a final judgment entered by the district court [FN1] on a jury verdict finding him guilty of one count of conspiring to distribute cocaine in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 846, and one count of possessing cocaine with intent to distribute in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1). The district court sentenced Womochil to twelve years in prison on each count, to be served concurrently, and ordered him to pay a $5,000 fine on each count. Womochil, who had been indicted along with ten other defendants, makes several arguments on appeal, centering on the admission of certain evidence and the allegedly improper conduct of the prosecutor. Finding none of Womochil's arguments to be of merit, we affirm the district court's judgment.

FN1. The Honorable C. Arlen Beam, United States District Judge for the District of Nebraska.

The indictment against Womochil and the other defendants resulted from a three-year investigation, jointly conducted by local and state law enforcement personnel as well as the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), into illegal narcotics transactions in the Omaha, Nebraska area. The investigation was intended to uncover the identity of the "king pin" suppliers of cocaine in the area; that is, those persons responsible for distributing cocaine to individual sellers. After investigators had used conventional methods such as surveillance, pen register devices, and the use of informants, confidential sources, and undercover officers, the County Attorney for Douglas County, Nebraska applied to Douglas County District Court Judge James Murphy for electronic surveillance authorization. On July 13, 1982, the date of the application, Judge Murphy authorized the wiretaps for a period of thirty days from the date of hook-up, without terminating when the described communications were first obtained. Those phones authorized by Judge Murphy to be intercepted by wiretap included defendant Ronald Bartrem's residential line, two Omaha businesses' lines, and a dental laboratory. Upon applications supported by affidavits, thirty-day extensions of the interceptions were granted on August 12, September 10, October 19, and November 17 of 1982.

In addition to these telephone interceptions, the Douglas County attorney also sought and was granted authority on July 29, 1982 to place an electronic device, or "bug," in defendant Bartrem's apartment and at the dental laboratory. The bugs were used to monitor conversations between Bartrem and co-defendant Joseph J. Bongiorno in regard to the sale of cocaine. Subsequent extensions of this authorization kept the bugging devices in use through November 28, 1982. In brief, the evidence obtained through the use of the wiretaps and bugs disclosed that Womochil originally distributed cocaine to Harry Gilbert, who in turn distributed the cocaine to Bartrem and Bongiorno. Bartrem and Bongiorno, acting as partners, then distributed the cocaine to other individuals. Later in the conspiracy Womochil bypassed Gilbert to distribute cocaine directly to Bartrem, who bought the cocaine on behalf of himself and Bongiorno.

I. Denial of Womochil's Motion to Suppress Evidence Obtained by Interception of Wire and Oral Communications

Womochil, along with several of his co-defendants and other defendants in related 1313 cases, filed a pretrial motion to suppress the evidence obtained by use of the wiretaps and bugs. The district court denied all such motions in United States v. Van Horn, 579 F.Supp. 804 (D.Neb.1984). On appeal Womochil argues that the district court's denial of his motion to suppress was improper for several reasons. First, Womochil contends that because the wiretaps were granted by a county judge upon application by the county attorney, the validity of the court authorization of the wiretaps should be determined by Nebraska law. Second, Womochil asserts that all of the authorization orders were invalid because the government failed to establish in the affidavits supporting its applications that normal investigative procedures had been used without success and without the prospect of success in the future. Third, Womochil argues that the authorization orders failed to comply with both state and federal statutes because they did not limit the interceptions to a period long enough to achieve the objective of the authorization. Fourth, Womochil maintains that because the Nebraska wiretap statute allows only officers of the state or a political subdivision thereof to make the interceptions, the FBI agents were improperly authorized to participate in the wiretaps. Finally, Womochil contends that the government made no attempt to minimize the interception of personal, "non-criminal" calls.

The district court thoroughly addressed and disposed of all of these arguments in its published opinion. See Van Horn, 579 F.Supp. at 809-817. We have carefully considered all of Womochil's contentions in regard to the propriety of the electronic surveillance conducted in this case, as well as the district court's exhaustive response to these contentions. We see no need to reiterate or elaborate on the district court's well-reasoned discussion. Womochil does not point to any flaws in the district court's opinion; indeed, he does not even cite to that opinion in his brief. We therefore affirm the district court's denial of Womochil's motion to suppress the evidence obtained by use of the wiretaps and bugs.

II. Admission of Alleged Hearsay Evidence

Womochil next assigns as error the district court's admission of certain statements, which he contends constituted hearsay because they were not the statements of a coconspirator, nor were they made in the course of the conspiracy or in furtherance of it. Womochil asserts that impermissible hearsay testimony was admitted on two occasions at trial. The first occurrence of the testimony to which Womochil objects was on direct examination of Gilbert Lascala, an alleged coconspirator of Bongiorno's, Bartrem's, and Womochil's. The prosecutor questioned Lascala about whether he had ever discussed with Bartrem or Bongiorno their sources of cocaine:

> Q: Did [Bongiorno] say who [Bartrem] was getting it from?
> A: On one occasion there he said he was getting it from--
>
> Mr. Gallup (Womochil's defense counsel): Oh, just a moment, Judge, that's hearsay.
> THE COURT: Overruled.
> Q: Did [Bongiorno] say from whom he was getting his--Ronald Bartrem was getting his cocaine?
>
> A: He said he was getting it from his brother-in-law or a cousin or an uncle or somebody like that.
> Mr. Gallup: I want to object again to that and move for a mistrial.

Transcript at 640-41. After a conference at the bench and an inchambers hearing the next day, the district court overruled the defendant's mistrial motion and permitted Lascala's answer to stand.

Because the evidence before this point in the trial had already established that Womochil was Bartrem's brother-in-law, Womochil alleges that this testimony was devastating to his case, despite the district court's comment to the contrary. He contends that because Lascala's testimony concerned a statement not made by Bartrem, but attributed to Bartrem by Bongiorno, the statement was inadmissible hearsay. Further, Womochil alleges that nofoundation 1314 was laid as to when the alleged conversation between Lascala and Bongiorno took place; such foundation would have to establish that the conversation took place during the conspiracy or it would not have been admissible.

[1] We think Womochil's contentions are without merit, and that the testimony in question was admissible under Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(E) as the statement of a coconspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. For an out-of-court statement to be admitted against a defendant under the coconspirator exception of Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(E), the Government must show by a preponderance of independent evidence that a conspiracy existed, that the defendant and the declarant were members of the conspiracy, and that the statement was made during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. United States v. Helmel, 769 F.2d 1306, 1312 (8th Cir.1985);

United States v. Johnson, 767 F.2d 1259, 1271 (8th Cir.1985). Womochil does not contend that a conspiracy did not exist, or that Bongiorno, Bartrem, and Lascala were not coconspirators. Rather, Womochil asserts that the Government failed to show by a preponderance of independent evidence that he was a member of the conspiracy, or that the statement was made during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

[2][3] The district court's determination as to the admissibility of coconspirator's statements under Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(E) will not be reversed unless it is clearly erroneous. United States v. DeLuna, 763 F.2d 897, 909 (8th Cir.1985) (quoting United States v. Singer, 732 F.2d 631, 636 (8th Cir.1984)). We are satisfied that the Government proved by a preponderance of the evidence that Womochil was a member of the conspiracy in question. Janet Meadows, a former girlfriend of Gilbert's, testified as to Womochil's frequent visits to Gilbert's house, during which Womochil and Gilbert would meet behind closed doors in Gilbert's bedroom, where Gilbert kept cocaine. Law enforcement agents testified that Womochil was observed on one occasion at the dental laboratory that served as a locus of the drug transactions, and at a meeting at or near a drugstore with other coconspirators. Womochil's own statements recorded pursuant to the wiretaps, admissible under Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(A) as admissions of a party-opponent, also constitute independent evidence of his role in the conspiracy. Further, Russell Rockwell testified that he had delivered a paper sack containing something from Womochil to Bartrem (see Section III below). Also, Officer Griffith, on cross-examination by defense counsel, testified as to his theory of Womochil's role in the conspiracy.

[4] As for the "in the course of" requirement, contrary to Womochil's assertion Lascala testified that his conversation with Bongiorno took place during the course of the conspiracy. As well, Bongiorno's statement to Lascala was made in furtherance of the conspiracy. "Statements of a coconspirator identifying a fellow coconspirator as his source of controlled substances is in furtherance of the conspiracy and therefore admissible." United States v. Anderson, 654 F.2d 1264, 1270 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1127, 102 S.Ct. 978, 71 L.Ed.2d 115 (1981). See also United States v. Fitts, 635 F.2d 664, 666 (8th Cir.1980); United States v. Carlson, 547 F.2d 1346, 1362 (8th Cir.1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 914, 97 S.Ct. 2174, 53 L.Ed.2d 224 (1977). Finally, we disagree with Womochil's contention that because the statement as to Bartrem's source of cocaine was not made by Bartrem, but attributed to him by Bongiorno, it was inadmissible hearsay. See, e.g., Carlson, 547 F.2d at 1361-62 (court admitted, under Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(E), testimony of DEA Agent Nelson that another DEA agent told him that coconspirator Dahl stated that his source of cocaine was defendant Hofstad). In sum, we cannot say that the district court's decision to admit Lascala's testimony was improper.

The second point in the testimony which Womochil alleges involved impermissible hearsay occurred during redirect examination of Lascala by the Government:

1315 Q: Mr. Gallup [Womochil's defense counsel] asked you on Cross Examination whether Ronald Bartrem had told you he had gotten his cocaine from Harry Gilbert; is that right?
A: Right.
Q: And what did Ronald Bartrem tell you?
THE COURT: Excuse me--
Mr. Gallup: I am going to object to that * * * *

Transcript at 702-03. Womochil claims that on cross-examination of Lascala, Womochil's defense counsel questioned him solely about statements he had made to the FBI when they came to see him in the penitentiary. No inquiry was made on cross-examination, Womochil asserts, as to Lascala's conversations with Bartrem in the penitentiary. Thus, because defense counsel had not opened the door to permit evidence of conversations between Lascala and Bartrem, Womochil contends that the court erred in admitting the prosecutor's questions in regard to such conversations.

In admitting the testimony in question, the district court determined after a hearing out of the presence of the jury that the prosecutor's question about Lascala's conversations with Bartrem was necessary to correct a false impression left by defense counsel on cross-examination. Specifically, prior to cross-examining Lascala, defense counsel voir dired him out of the presence of the jury in regard to Defense Exhibit 401, a statement made by Lascala to the FBI. During this voir dire defense counsel elicited from Lascala a statement that Bartrem had told him while they were in Leavenworth that he had gotten cocaine from Womochil and then later from Gilbert. On cross-examination of Lascala in front of the jury, however, defense counsel repeatedly left the impression that Lascala had told the FBI that Gilbert alone had been Bartrem's cocaine source. The district court, therefore, allowed the prosecutor on redirect examination to correct this false impression by bringing out Lascala's complete statement as to Bartrem's source of cocaine.

[5] The scope of redirect examination is within the sound discretion of the district court, United States v. McDaniel, 773 F.2d 242, 246 (8th Cir.1985); United States v. Foley, 683 F.2d 273, 276-77 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1043, 103 S.Ct. 463, 74 L.Ed.2d 613 (1982), and we will reverse the district court only upon a showing of abuse of its discretion. United States v. Taylor, 599 F.2d 832, 839 (8th Cir.1979). We find no such abuse of the district court's discretion in its decision to allow the Government to clear up the false impression created on cross-examination as to Lascala's testimony. This court has repeatedly allowed the use of otherwise inadmissible evidence on redirect examination to clarify or complete an issue opened up by defense counsel on cross-examination. See, e.g., United States v. Young, 553 F.2d 1132, 1135 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 959, 97 S.Ct. 2686, 53 L.Ed.2d 278 (1977) (and cases cited therein).

III. Alleged Prosecutorial Misconduct

We next address Womochil's argument that the district court erred in denying his many motions for mistrial based on the prosecutor's alleged misconduct. In support of his contention Womochil cites to specific incidents during the trial in which he asserts that the prosecutor employed "illegal tactics." The first such incident occurred on direct examination of Government witness Russell Rockwell. Rockwell had previously pleaded guilty to violating 21 U.S.C. § 843(b) (1984), by telephoning Womochil on November 8, 1982 and telling Womochil he had delivered cocaine to Bartrem. At trial Rockwell testified that he had delivered a package to Bartrem at Womochil's request. The questioning which Womochil finds objectionable was as follows:

> Q: Do you remember ever telling anyone that it was cocaine that was in that sack that you were taking to Ronald Bartrem?
> Mr. Gallup: I am going to object to that, your Honor, there is no proper and sufficient foundation and I object to that and I move for a mistrial.
>
> *1316 THE COURT: Yes, sustained on foundation.
>
>
> Q: Well, Mr. Rockwell, do you ever remember telling anyone that you had told Mr. Womochil on the phone that you had delivered cocaine to Ronald Bartrem?
>
>
> THE COURT: Overruled. He may answer if he can.
>
> A. When I pleaded * * * *
> Mr. Gallup: I object. That is not responsive and I move for a mistrial * * * *

Transcript at 908-09. After a conference at the bench out of the hearing of the jury the court held that insufficient foundation had been laid as to Rockwell's knowledge of what was in the package. The court sustained the objection to the question, directing the jury to disregard it, but overruled the motion for a mistrial. After this ruling by the court, the questioning continued:

> Q: At the time that you carried the sack to Ronald Bartrem, did you have an opinion at that time as to what was in the sack?

Transcript at 913. Defense counsel's objection to this question was again sustained by the court.

The second instance of alleged prosecutorial misconduct occurred after Womochil's defense counsel had used Officer Griffith's affidavits, prepared in support of an application for a wiretap order, in cross-examining the police officer. The prosecutor then offered the affidavits, Defendant's Exhibit 404, into evidence; Womochil's objection was sustained. Womochil then moved for a mistrial based on the prosecutor's "continually offering inadmissible items." The court did not grant the motion.

Womochil next asserts that the prosecutor acted improperly during redirect examination of FBI Agent Murphy. On cross-examination of Murphy the following exchange took place between Womochil's defense counsel and Murphy:

> Q: * * * And [Womochil] has never, to your knowledge, ever been arrested or accused of drug trafficking or drug violations of any type up until this particular case, isn't that true?

A: Do you mean by official process accused of it?
Q: Yes.
A: Not that I'm aware of.

Transcript at 126-27. Shortly thereafter, on redirect, the prosecutor questioned Agent Murphy as follows:

Q: Agent Murphy, you indicated that you never learned that prior to this case that Mr. Womochil had gone through the official process of being charged on another narcotics-related matter.
A: That's correct, yes.
Q: That's not to say that you hadn't received other information with respect to Wayne Womochil and previous dealings with narcotics?
Mr. Gallup: I am going to object to that, it's incompetent, immaterial and irrelevant and goes beyond the scope of the Cross Examination.
THE COURT: Overruled.
Q: And have you received other information?
A: Oh, yes. Yes, many times.
Q: What has been the nature of that information?
Mr. Gallup: The same objection, hearsay, incompetent, immaterial and irrelevant.

Transcript at 128. The prosecutor ultimately withdrew the last question, conceding that it called for hearsay. The record does not show, however, that Womochil moved for a mistrial in connection with Murphy's testimony.

As his final examples of prosecutorial misconduct Womochil points to certain questions asked by the prosecutor of Officer Griffith on redirect examination, the answers to which were referred to in the Government's closing argument. As stated 1317 above, on cross-examination of Griffith defense counsel used Exhibit 404, consisting of affidavits and applications for wiretap orders, to impeach him by showing he had made prior inconsistent statements in the exhibit. The Government contends that the net result of this attack on Griffith's testimony was to leave the jury with the impression that the exhibit contained the latest and best information, and that Griffith's opinions brought out on cross-examination were unreliable insofar as they contradicted the exhibit. The court permitted the prosecutor on redirect, over Womochil's objection, to ask Griffith whether various individuals who had been subjects of the narcotics investigation had been interviewed since the affidavits were written. The court subsequently overruled Womochil's motion for a mistrial based on this questioning of Griffith. Later, in his summation of the evidence, the prosecutor referred to Griffith's testimony that further investigation, including interviews with Bartrem and Cenon Ortiz, was conducted after the affidavits and wiretap applications were made. Womochil's objection and mistrial motion were overruled, although the court cautioned the jury to "decide the case upon the evidence that is before you and not what in Final Argument counsel have said the evidence might be." Womochil contends that the Government's closing argument allowed the jury to infer that Bartrem and Ortiz had implicated him in their interviews.

[6][7] At the outset we note that the district court has broad discretion in determining whether a defendant has been so prejudiced as to require a mistrial. United States v. Robinson, 774 F.2d 261 at 277 (8th Cir.1985); United States v. Panas, 738 F.2d 278, 285 (8th Cir.1984). We conclude that the instances of alleged prosecutorial misconduct cited by Womochil neither individually nor collectively rise to the requisite level of prejudice to warrant a mistrial. The question directed to Rockwell as to statements he had made concerning the contents of the package delivered was never answered. We cannot say that the mere asking of an improper question prejudiced Womochil's case. See Robinson, at 277; United States v. Givens, 712 F.2d 1298, 1301 (8th Cir.1983), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1009, 104 S.Ct. 1005, 79 L.Ed.2d 237 (1984). Likewise, Womochil's contention that the Government's proffer of Defendant's Exhibit 404 into evidence prejudiced his case is without merit. Finally, the Government's lines of questioning of Agent Murphy and Officer Griffith on redirect examination were necessary to correct false inferences left by defense counsel after cross-examination of these witnesses. In Agent Murphy's case, defense counsel opened the door to questions about whether the agent had ever received information as to Womochil's involvement with narcotics by creating the false impression on cross-examination that Womochil had never come under suspicion with respect to drugs. As to Officer Griffith's testimony, the questioning as to investigations conducted subsequent to his writing the affidavits in support of the wiretap applications helped correct the inference left on cross-examination that those affidavits contained the most current and correct information available. As we discussed above in Section II, when defense counsel leaves a false impression after cross-examining a witness, the court may allow the use of otherwise inadmissible evidence on redirect to clarify the issue. Young, 553 F.2d at 1135. Because the questioning of Officer Griffith was not in error, the prosecutor's reference to the officer's testimony in his summation was likewise permissible. The trial court has broad discretion in controlling the substance of closing arguments. United States v. Lewis, 759 F.2d 1316, 1350 (8th Cir.1985); United States v. Nabors, 761 F.2d 465, 470 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 106 S.Ct. 148, 88 L.Ed.2d 123 (1985). The district court's caution to the jury to decide the case based on the evidence and not on the final argument cured any potential error. See Llach, 739 F.2d 1322 at 1330 (8th Cir.1984); United States v. Schwartz, 655 F.2d 140, 142 (8th Cir.1981). In sum, the district court 1318 did not abuse its discretion in denying Womochil's motions for mistrial.

IV. Conclusion

This court by previous order has denied Womochil's request for a second opportunity to present oral argument, due to the failure of his attorney, Alan P. Caplan, to appear on the date originally scheduled. In rendering this opinion we have given full consideration to the arguments presented in Womochil's brief to this court. Finding none of those arguments to be of merit, however, we affirm his conviction.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Lynn M. FINCH, Appellant.

No. 93-1560.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Oct. 14, 1993.

Decided Jan. 25, 1994.
Rehearing and Suggestion for Rehearing En Banc Denied March 3, 1994.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the District of North Dakota, Rodney S. Webb, Chief Judge, of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and possession with intent to distribute. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Morris Sheppard Arnold, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) convictions were supported by sufficient evidence; (2) prosecutor's statements in closing argument were not impermissible; (3) admission of photograph was harmless; and (4) in determining amount of controlled substance involved in offense for sentencing purposes, trial court properly considered amounts of cocaine involved in counts that did not result in conviction but were part of conspiracy.

Affirmed.

Before MORRIS SHEPPARD ARNOLD, Circuit Judge, HEANEY and ROSS, Senior Circuit Judges.

230 MORRIS SHEPPARD ARNOLD, Circuit Judge.

A grand jury indicted Lynn M. Finch and five others charging them with one count of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and conspiracy to possess cocaine with intent to distribute it in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 846, and forty-five substantive counts of distribution or possession of cocaine in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1). Twelve of the forty-five substantive counts charged Finch with possession or distribution of cocaine, each in connection with different shipments of cocaine spaced approximately one month apart. The five other conspirators either pleaded guilty or agreed to plead guilty before Finch's trial. A jury convicted Finch of conspiracy and one substantive count, acquitted her of two substantive counts, and were undecided on the remaining nine substantive counts. The trial court [FN1] sentenced Finch to fifteen months in prison, the final six months of which are to be served in a halfway house, followed by three years of supervised release. Finch appeals the convictions and the sentence.

FN1. The Honorable Rodney S. Webb, United States District Judge for the District of North

I.

Finch challenges the sufficiency of the evidence with respect to both convictions. She argues that her conviction for conspiracy should be reversed because the jury convicted her of only one act of buying or selling cocaine. Since evidence of only a single purchase or sale of cocaine is not evidence of a conspiracy, she argues, the evidence did not support the conviction. She further argues that in order to have convicted her of the substantive count, the jury must have believed the government's principal witness, Brian Solum, an unindicted co-conspirator who had agreed to cooperate with the government; but, her argument continues, since the jury acquitted her of two substantive counts, and failed to agree on a verdict regarding the other counts, the jury must have also disbelieved Solum. She is, therefore, making two different but related claims, and is conflating two distinct issues. One claim is that the convictions should be reversed because they are inconsistent with both the acquittals and the failure to reach verdicts on the other counts. The second claim is that the convictions should be reversed because the evidence is insufficient to support them. These claims raise different issues and we therefore review them separately. See United States v. Powell, 469 U.S. 57, 67, 105 S.Ct. 471, 478, 83 L.Ed.2d 461 (1984); United States v. Suppenbach, 1 F.3d 679, 681 (8th Cir.1993).

Finch apparently finds the jury's verdict infirm because it is inconsistent for two reasons. First, if the jury disbelieved the testimony so thoroughly that it acquitted on two counts, and did not find the testimony credible enough to agree to convict on nine counts, there could not have been sufficient evidence to convict Finch of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and one count of possession with intent to distribute cocaine. Second, if the jury acquitted or could not reach a verdict on all but one of the counts of possession with intent to distribute, there could not have been sufficient evidence to convict Finch of conspiracy to distribute cocaine. The jury's verdicts, according to Finch's argument, are therefore inconsistent, and the convictions should be vacated. Our review of the record reveals, however, that the evidence against Finch was probably strongest for the count on which she was convicted, and probably weakest for the counts of which she was acquitted.

[1][2][3] Even if the verdicts were inconsistent, moreover, we would still refuse to reverse the convictions because of the role of the jury and its verdict in our legal system. It is well established that consistency of a jury's verdicts is not necessary. Dunn v. United States, 284 U.S. 390, 393, 52 S.Ct. 189, 190-91, 76 L.Ed. 356 (1932) (Holmes, J., for a majority of 8-1); see also Powell, supra, 469 U.S. at 63, 105 S.Ct. at 476 (Rehnquist, J., for a unanimous Court) (reaffirming Dunn); Suppenbach, supra, 1 F.3d at 681. "That the verdict may have been the result of compromise, or of a mistake on the part of the jury, is possible. But verdicts cannot be upset by speculation or inquiry into such 231 matters." Dunn, supra, 284 U.S. at 394, 52 S.Ct. at 191. The jury here may have acquitted Finch of certain counts and failed to reach verdicts on other counts in order to exercise lenity or to mitigate punishment. Although such an exercise of power is impermissible, it is nevertheless not reviewable. Dunn, supra, 284 U.S. at 393, 52 S.Ct. at 190-91; Powell, supra, 469 U.S. at 65-66, 105 S.Ct. at 476-77. Juries in common-law courts have exercised this impermissible power for eight hundred years. T. Green, Verdict According to Conscience (1985). Even where verdicts are clearly inconsistent, we will not invade the province of the jury; indeed, the Supreme Court will not allow such an invasion. Powell, supra, 469 U.S. at 57, 105 S.Ct. at 471. A criminal defendant "is afforded protection against jury irrationality or error by the independent review of the sufficiency of the evidence," a review properly undertaken by the appellate courts. Powell, supra, 469 U.S. at 67, 105 S.Ct. at 478. It is to that review that we now turn.

[4] The government presented evidence of twenty shipments of cocaine that took place over approximately twenty months. The government alleged that twelve of these involved Finch. The evidence relevant to the conviction for conspiracy, as Finch herself points out, is all of the evidence, not just the evidence relevant to the substantive count for which she was convicted. Powell, supra, 469 U.S. at 67, 105 S.Ct. at 478; Jackson v.

Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319, 99 S.Ct. 2781, 2789, 61 L.Ed.2d 560 (1979). When we review Finch's conviction for conspiracy, therefore, we consider all of the evidence presented at trial, not just the evidence relating to the one substantive offense for which she was convicted. "We will reverse 'only if we conclude that a reasonable fact-finder must have entertained a reasonable doubt about the government's proof of one of the offense's essential elements.' " United States v. Rogers, 982 F.2d 1241, 1244 (8th Cir.1993) (quoting United States v. Ivey, 915 F.2d 380, 383 (8th Cir.1990)), cert. denied sub nom. Philipp v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 3017, 125 L.Ed.2d 706 (1993).

[5] Finch is correct that proof of a buyer-seller relationship without more is not sufficient to prove a conspiracy. United States v. Prieskorn, 658 F.2d 631, 633 (8th Cir.1981). We have held that it is proper for a trial court to refuse to instruct the jury explicitly that proof of a buyer-seller relationship is insufficient to prove a conspiracy where the evidence did not support such an instruction because there was evidence of distribution of large amounts of cocaine over a significant period of time. United States v. Turner, 975 F.2d 490, 497 (8th Cir.1992), cert. denied sub nom. Dowdy v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 1053, 122 L.Ed.2d 360 (1993). We have also held that a court's refusal to give such an instruction was not plain error where the circumstances of the single sale of cocaine at issue suggested that the cocaine had been purchased for resale. United States v. Hamell, 931 F.2d 466 (8th Cir.) (sale of eighty-two grams of ninety percent pure cocaine), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 347, 116 L.Ed.2d 286 (1991).

[6][7] Because we consider all of the evidence presented at trial, we consider here evidence of Finch's role in the distribution of twelve shipments of cocaine. Finch testified at trial, denying any involvement in any conspiracy. Solum and others testified that Finch took part in the purchase and distribution of cocaine. The testimony of an accomplice alone may be sufficient to convict a defendant if the testimony is not incredible or insubstantial on its face. United States v. Starcevic, 956 F.2d 181, 185 (8th Cir.1992). We do not find Solum's testimony to be incredible or insubstantial, and we note, moreover, that his was not the only testimony that incriminated Finch. There was evidence to show Finch's involvement in the purchase of cocaine from Las Vegas, Nevada, and its subsequent distribution in the Fargo area. There was evidence to show that by pooling their resources the participants in North Dakota obtained cocaine more efficiently than they could have had they been acting alone, and more efficiently than Solum had done when he was purchasing smaller quantities of the drug. There was evidence that Finch knew that in addition to Solum, there were others who participated in the 232 purchasing of cocaine from a source in Las Vegas and its subsequent distribution. There was evidence showing that the amounts involved in the shipments and distribution were greater than necessary for personal use. There was sufficient evidence, therefore, for the jury to have concluded that there was indeed a conspiracy and that Finch was one of the conspirators. We affirm the conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

[8][9] Finch's conviction for possession with intent to distribute must be affirmed for similar reasons. Solum's testimony was not facially incredible or insubstantial. It is true that the credibility of Solum and other witnesses as well as that of Finch was at issue. But it is the jury's role to assess the credibility of witnesses. The evidence was sufficient for a jury to find Finch guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

II.

[10][11] Finch makes four other arguments in her appeal. She maintains, first, that the convictions should be reversed because the prosecutor improperly vouched for the government's evidence and attacked Finch's trial counsel during the government's closing argument. We must therefore examine the allegedly improper statements "within the context of the entire trial to determine first whether the remarks were in fact improper, and second whether the remarks were so offensive so as to deprive the defendant of a fair trial." United States v. Eldridge, 984 F.2d 943, 946 (8th Cir.1993) (citing United States v. Young, 470 U.S. 1, 105 S.Ct. 1038, 84 L.Ed.2d 1 (1985)). Finch is challenging the propriety of the government's statements in its closing argument that a witness was telling the truth, that the defense attorney was trying to mislead the jury, and that the evidence showed that Finch was guilty. (Finch objected at trial to only the first of these.) One witness (Solum) was truthful, the government argued, because he did not testify that Finch had been involved in and knew about all the shipments of cocaine, but rather testified to her relatively limited involvement. The government argued that Finch's attorney was trying to mislead the jury by drawing attention to facts not relevant to and not inconsistent with Finch's involvement in the conspiracy. Finally, the government summarized the evidence by stating that the evidence showed that Finch was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Read in context there is nothing impermissible about the government's statements: the government was merely arguing that the jury should accept its interpretation of the evidence rather than the defendant's interpretation. We do not find such statements to be improper.

Finch next asserts that a photograph of one of her friends using cocaine was improperly admitted into evidence. The photograph had been provided to the government by Roxanne Claerbout, one of its witnesses. The first reference to the photograph at trial occurred when Finch cross-examined Claerbout at length about a photograph that she had supplied to the government in connection with this case. The government neither had introduced the photograph as evidence nor had examined Claerbout about it. On re-direct examination the government introduced the photograph as evidence over Finch's objection. Claerbout testified that the photograph had been taken at a party about six years before the trial and depicted two individuals, one of whom was snorting cocaine. Finch was not depicted in the photograph and, according to Claerbout's testimony, did not attend the party; neither of the people in the photograph testified at trial. The trial court concluded that the photograph was admissible because Finch had established its relevance by examining the witness about it.

[12] Finch's purpose in examining Claerbout about the photograph remains unclear. Questions about the photograph may have been part of Finch's impeachment of Claerbout's credibility. Indeed, Claerbout at first denied having given the government any photographs, then admitted that she had, and finally admitted that she had a "memory problem." On the other hand, however, Finch may have been attempting to lead the jury to the conclusion that the government failed to introduce the photograph because of the government's own misconduct or because 233 it contained exculpatory evidence. We believe that the trial court's conclusion that the photograph was admissible merely because Finch had opened the door to such evidence is a misapprehension of the law, although a common one. Cross-examination of a witness about a particular topic does not necessarily open the door to re-direct examination and additional evidence relating to that topic. Hamilton v. Nix, 809 F.2d 463, 469 (8th Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 483 U.S. 1023, 107 S.Ct. 3270, 97 L.Ed.2d 768 (1987). The evidence introduced must rebut something that had been elicited on cross-examination. Id.

[13] Here, as in Hamilton, the evidence admitted on re-direct examination does not seem to rebut anything, except perhaps an inference of prosecutorial misconduct. It does not seem to rehabilitate the witness since it confirms what she testified to on cross-examination, namely that she gave the government a photograph that did not depict Finch. Although the evidence might have been admitted to rebut an inference of wrong-doing, the government did not make such an argument at trial and the court did not admit it for such a reason. We are convinced, however, that admitting the photograph and the related testimony was harmless because a picture of two people, neither of whom was a witness at the trial, using cocaine at a party that Finch did not attend could hardly have incriminated or prejudiced Finch.

Finch's final contention is that her sentence is improper because it was determined in part by looking at conduct that the trial court should not have considered. She argues that her sentence should be determined only by considering the amount of cocaine involved in the substantive count for which she was convicted, that the other substantive counts should not have been considered, and that she should not have been held responsible for the total amount of cocaine involved in the conspiracy because the total amount was not foreseeable.

[14][15] Finch was convicted of conspiracy to distribute cocaine in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 846. Punishment under Section 846 is the same as the punishment specified for the substantive offense that was the object of the conspiracy. The substantive offense here, distribution of a controlled substance, is proscribed in Section 841(a), and the punishment specified in Section 841(b) depends on the amount of the controlled substance involved in the offense. 21 U.S.C. § 841. When the punishment depends on the amount of the controlled substance involved in the offense, that amount need be proven only by a preponderance of the evidence. United States v. Payne, 940 F.2d 286, 292 (8th Cir.1991), cert. denied sub nom. Bogan v. United States, ---U.S. ---, 112 S.Ct. 616, 116 L.Ed.2d 638 (1992), and sub nom. Ransom v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 1589, 118 L.Ed.2d 307 (1992). Relevant conduct includes all acts committed during the commission of the offense for which Finch was convicted as well as all reasonably foreseeable acts of others in furtherance of the jointly undertaken criminal activity. U.S.S.G. § 1B1.3(a). Finch was convicted of conspiracy to distribute cocaine as well as one count of distribution of cocaine. Thus, the amounts of cocaine for which Finch can be held responsible need not have been proven beyond a reasonable doubt, and the trial court, therefore, could have considered the amounts of cocaine involved in the counts that did not result in conviction because they were part of the conspiracy.

The conspiracy in this case involved twenty shipments of cocaine over twenty months and a total amount of cocaine well in excess of two kilograms. Finch was indicted for her participation in twelve of these shipments. Eleven of the twelve involved between 112 and 168 grams of cocaine; the twelfth involved 252 grams. Finch's shares of the shipments were between seven and forty-two grams of each of the first eleven, and between twenty-eight and fifty-six grams of the twelfth. The trial court did not hold Finch responsible for the two shipments that were the subject of the counts of which she was acquitted, and held her responsible only for the lowest amount of the range established for each of the other shipments. Thus, the trial court calculated that the total amount of cocaine for which Finch was responsible was 91 grams, that is, nine shipments of seven grams and one shipment of 28 grams. This 234 results in a base offense level of 16. U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1(c)(14). The trial court reduced the offense level to 12 because Finch was a minimal participant in the overall conspiracy. U.S.S.G. § 3B1.2. The trial court found Finch's criminal history category to be category III, having found five criminal history points. This results in a sentencing range of fifteen to twenty-one months; the trial court imposed a sentence of fifteen months. We find that the evidence adequately supported the trial court's finding that Finch was responsible for conspiring to distribute a total of ninety-one grams of cocaine, and find no error in the trial court's calculation of the sentence.

We note that the government suggests in its brief that the trial court improperly calculated the base offense level because Finch should have been held responsible not only for the amount of cocaine she actually possessed or distributed, but for the total amount of cocaine foreseeably involved in the conspiracy. The government did not, however, appeal the sentence, and we therefore decline to reach this issue.

III.

For the reasons given, we affirm Finch's conviction and sentence.

Reed Wayne HAMILTON, Appellant,
v.
Crispus NIX, Warden, and Attorney General of the State of Iowa, Appellees.
No. 84-2089.
United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.
Submitted May 15, 1986.
Decided Jan. 12, 1987.

Petitioner, who had been convicted in state court of first-degree murder and voluntary manslaughter, filed federal petition for writ of habeas corpus. The United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa, Harold D. Vietor, Chief Judge, denied relief, and petitioner appealed. The Court of Appeals, 781 F.2d 619, Lay, Chief Judge, vacated and remanded. On the state's petition for rehearing en banc, the Court of Appeals, Bowman, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) identity and testimony of defendant's mother and her companion tending to inculpate defendant was admissible under independent source rule; (2) admission of marijuana defendant allegedly stole from victim was harmless error; (3) allegedly improper remarks by prosecutor during opening statement and in closing argument did not deprive petitioner of fair trial; and (4) sufficient circumstantial evidence supported finding of guilty the police. The State concedes that the marijuana was not admissible under either the independent source, attenuation, or inevitable discovery exception.

[5][6] At trial the State sought to justify the admission of the marijuana on the ground that the defense had "opened the door" to its admission by cross-examining Maxine Hamilton about her activities in regard to the suitcase of marijuana. The trial judge admitted the marijuana as "rebuttal testimony." The State does not explain in its brief exactly what evidence or testimony it sought to rebut by introducing the marijuana. Nor are we able to discern from the trial transcript a proper reason for its admission as rebuttal evidence. Therefore, we hold that its admission into evidence was error. Compare Agnello v. United States, 269 U.S. 20, 46 S.Ct. 4, 70 L.Ed. 145 (1925) and United States v. James, 555 F.2d 992 (D.C.Cir.1977) with Walder v. United States, 347 U.S. 62, 74 S.Ct. 354, 98 L.Ed. 503 (1954). Our review of the entire trial transcript convinces us, however, that the error was harmless. There was strong circumstantial evidence to permit the jury to conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that Hamilton had robbed Pappas of marijuana. See Part III, infra. The marijuana itself added little if anything to the State's case. Thus, it was harmless error to admit it into evidence. See Milton v. Wainwright, 407 U.S. 371, 92 S.Ct. 2174, 33 L.Ed.2d 1 (1972).

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellant,
v.
Donald Wesley TAYLOR, Defendant-Appellee.
UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Steven Wayne PRESSLER, and Donald Wesley Taylor, Defendant-Appellants.

Nos. 81-1769, 81-1770 and 81-1785.

United States Court of Appeals,
Ninth Circuit.

Argued and Submitted Sept. 17, 1982.

Decided Sept. 23, 1983.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Arizona, William P. Copple, J., of conspiracy to manufacture amphetamines and attempt to manufacture amphetamines. Both defendants appealed, and the Government appealed from the dismissal of a dangerous special drug offender notice it filed against one defendant. The Court of Appeals, Boochever, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) there was probable cause for the issuance of a warrant to search one defendant's home; (2) the detention of a codefendant during the execution of the warrant to search the house and vehicle could not be justified as being incident to the execution of the search; (3) the initial handcuff detention of the codefendant did not amount to an arrest without probable cause; (4) it was not necessary to grant the codefendant's motion for a severance; (5) the codefendant's confrontation rights were not violated; (6) the evidence was sufficient to sustain the conviction of the codefendant, despite his claim that he was merely an unwitting errand runner; (7) the jury was inadequately instructed on the substantial step requirement, mandating reversal of the attempt conviction; and (8) the dangerous special drug offender notice was properly dismissed.

Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Fletcher, Circuit Judge, concurred in the result with an opinion.

Before FLETCHER and BOOCHEVER, Circuit Judges, and KENYON, [FN*] District Judge.

FN* The Honorable David V. Kenyon, United States District Judge for the Central District of California, sitting by designation.

BOOCHEVER, Circuit Judge:

Donald Wesley Taylor and Steven Wayne Pressler were convicted of conspiracy to manufacture amphetamines and attempt to manufacture amphetamines. The Government and both defendants appeal. Taylor contends that the search of his residence was illegal because the information contained in the affidavit offered in support of the warrant failed to establish probable cause. Pressler contends that: (1) the trial court erred in denying his motion to suppress because his arrest was based on less than probable cause, (2) his trial should have been severed from Taylor's trial, (3) the district court committed reversible error by allowing certain questions during cross-examination, and (4) the evidence was insufficient to support his convictions. Both defendants contend that: (1) the trial court erred in allowing the Government to comment on the contents of two chemical bottles that were labeled but never analyzed, and (2) under the facts of this case, the jury instruction on attempt was inadequate. The Government appeals the dismissal of the "Dangerous Special Drug Offender" notice it filed against Taylor.

FACTS

The essence of the Government's case was that Taylor was operating, or attempting to make operable, an amphetamine laboratory at his home in Camp Verde, Arizona. Taylor has a ten-year history of being involved in the illegal manufacture of amphetamines. Pressler's principal role in the scheme appears to have been to pick up previously ordered chemicals at a chemical supply store.

The Government's investigation commenced when orders were placed at a Phoenix chemical supply store for chemicals used in manufacturing amphetamines. The first two orders were placed by a woman who identified herself as Carla Delwish, the maiden name of Taylor's wife. Personnel at the chemical supply store notified the Drug Enforcement Administration ("DEA") that orders had been placed for suspect chemicals. Although the first two orders were placed by Carla Delwish, a man later identified by a store employee as Pressler picked up the chemicals. The second time Pressler came to the store to pick up the chemicals, he also picked up several chemical supply catalogues and ordered additional chemicals.

In late January of 1981, based on the information obtained from the chemical supply store, DEA agents secured a warrant authorizing them to hide a "beeper" tracking device in a box containing the chemicals ordered by Pressler. On February 2, 1981, Sharon Coley (Taylor's sister) picked up the beeper box and brought it to her home. Sometime between February 13th and 18th, the beeper box was removed from Coley's home to Taylor's home. Prior to the time the beeper box was moved, the DEA agents watching Coley's house observed Taylor transfer boxes from the house to Taylor's vehicle. Also prior to the date the beeper box was moved, Pressler visited the chemical supply store again to inquire about expensive laboratory glassware.

705 On February 20, 1981, DEA and state agents executed search warrants at the residences of Coley and Taylor. The principal evidence found at Coley's home were receipts for the chemicals she and Pressler had picked up and a radio scanner tuned to a DEA channel.

Prior to executing the warrant for Taylor's home, the police and DEA agents borrowed a firetruck, disguised themselves as firemen and told residents that a propane truck had overturned nearby. They also had volunteer firemen man a roadblock while dressed as emergency medical technicians. The Government claims this was done as a safety precaution because of the explosive nature of the chemicals they suspected were being stored at the house, but testimony at trial indicates that this was done as a ruse to get Taylor to vacate his house.

Before execution of the search warrant, Taylor and Pressler attempted to drive away from the house, but were stopped and arrested. Taylor was arrested at gunpoint when he stepped out of his vehicle.

The parties give differing accounts of Pressler's arrest. It is clear that another officer approached the vehicle while Taylor was being arrested and told Pressler to raise his hands and step out. Pressler failed to comply until the officer repeated his order several times. The Government states in its brief that Pressler became "verbally uncooperative" when he stepped out so the agent ordered him to lie face down in a ditch and handcuffed him. The Government further states that several minutes later, a second agent approached Pressler, recognized Pressler from a description given by an employee at the chemical supply house as the person who had picked up the chemicals, and arrested him.

The record supports Pressler's contention that he did not become "verbally uncooperative", as the Government describes it, until after he was handcuffed face down in the ditch.

The agents proceeded to search Taylor's residence and seized hundreds of items, including some of the chemicals necessary to manufacture amphetamines, Taylor's handwritten formulas for producing controlled substances, and miscellaneous laboratory equipment. Agents failed to find any already-produced amphetamines or a working laboratory.

Taylor and Pressler were charged in a four count indictment with conspiring to manufacture amphetamines during two separate time periods, attempt to manufacture amphetamines (21 U.S.C. §§ 841(a)(1), 846 (1976)), and use of a firearm during the commission of a felony (18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1) (Supp. V 1981)). After a nine-day trial, both defendants were convicted of one of the two conspiracy charges and the attempt charge and acquitted on the other two counts. Pressler was sentenced to concurrent sentences of five years on each count, of which only the first six months had to be spent in prison. Taylor received sentences of five years imprisonment on the conspiracy count, followed by five years of probation on the attempt count.

I.
Search Warrant

Taylor contends that the warrant to search his house, yard, and vehicle was based on less than probable cause because the information in the supporting affidavit was either stale or was obtained from tracking the beeper device. The argument is meritless because the information obtained from tracking the beeper was not constitutionally infirm and amply corroborated the allegedly stale information.

[1][2][3] The validity of a search warrant depends upon the sufficiency of what is found within the four corners of the underlying affidavit. United States v. Martinez, 588 F.2d 1227, 1234 (9th Cir.1978). An affidavit is sufficient if it establishes probable cause; that is, if the stated facts would reasonably allow a magistrate to believe that the evidence will be found in the stated location. Id. Thus, contrary to Taylor's contention, the affidavit need not establish that it was "more likely than not" that evidence would be found or preclude other 706 innocent interpretations for the activities at his house. The affidavit need only "enable the magistrate to conclude that it would be reasonable to seek the evidence in the place indicated by the affidavit." United States v. Hendershot, 614 F.2d 648, 654 (9th Cir.1980).

[4] Deference is accorded to a magistrate's decision to issue a warrant. Martinez, 558 F.2d at 1234. Three "types" of information were offered in support of the search warrant in this case. First, the agent gave detailed information regarding Taylor's involvement in manufacturing amphetamines over the previous ten years. Second, the agent's affidavit incorporated the previous affidavit made by the same agent to obtain the warrant to install and track the beeper device. The beeper affidavit described the suspicious transactions at the chemical supply store and included an expert chemist's opinion that the chemicals were "probably" being used to manufacture illegal drugs. Third, the agent detailed the information derived from tracking the beeper to Coley's and Taylor's homes.

[5][6] The information regarding Taylor's previous drug history was relevant in that it was consistent with the agent's and police chemist's opinions regarding the suspicious activities detailed in the two affidavits. Taylor's claim that the agent's information was stale overlooks the fact that the affidavit disclosed that the beeper still signalled that the box of precursor chemicals was at Taylor's residence the day the warrant was sought.

Taylor's contention that the electronic beeper violated his privacy rights in his home has been answered by United States v. Knotts, --- U.S. ----, 103 S.Ct. 1081, 75 L.Ed.2d 55 (1983), and United States v. Brock, 667 F.2d 1311 (9th Cir.1982). In Knotts, the Supreme Court held that the tracking of a warrantless beeper placed in a drum of chloroform was neither a "search" nor a "seizure" within the meaning of the fourth amendment. 103 S.Ct. at 1087. There could be no expectation of privacy where the automobile transporting the drum was in plain view while on public thoroughfares or where the drum was open to observation while in the "open fields" while on private property. Id. 103 S.Ct. at 1085-86. The Court did not reach the issues of the warrantless installation of the beeper, id. 103 S.Ct. at 1084 n. *, or of the permissibility of monitoring the movement of the beeper while within the private residence. Id. 103 S.Ct. at 1087. These questions have been answered in this circuit by Brock.

[7] In Brock, this court upheld the warrantless [FN1] installation and monitoring of a beeper in a can of precursor, non-contraband chemicals. 667 F.2d at 1322. The court held that monitoring the device after it was carried into a private residence was not a "search" due to the minimal degree of intrusion. Id. at 1321-22. There can be no fourth amendment objection to the use of the beeper in the present case because a warrant for its installation was obtained. [FN2]

> FN1. We agree with Judge Adams, concurring in Brock, that it is certainly the better practice for the Government to obtain a warrant from a magistrate before installing and monitoring beeper devices. 667 F.2d at 1324-25 (Adams, J., concurring). In this case, such a warrant was obtained.
> FN2. The beeper was not used to monitor movement of the chemicals within the house, so that issue is not before us.

[8] The facts before the magistrate were sufficient to establish probable cause to believe that evidence of drug-related activity would be found at Taylor's residence.

II.
Motion to Suppress

Pressler argues that: (1) Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 101 S.Ct. 2587, 69 L.Ed.2d 340 (1981), is inapplicable because it was unnecessary to detain him during the execution of the warrant to search Taylor's house and vehicle; (2) the initial handcuffed detention constituted an arrest without probable cause, not a stop as permitted 707 by Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 88 S.Ct. 1868, 22 L.Ed.2d 889 (1968); and (3) the officers lacked probable cause to arrest.

The district court denied the suppression motion. It found that the first officer's "detention" of Pressler was justified under Michigan v. Summers and that there was probable cause for arrest by the time the second officer became involved. A clearly erroneous standard of review is applied to the historical facts found by the trial court. As to the determination of probable cause, we reach the same result under either a clearly erroneous standard or de novo review. We shall consider each of the points raised by Pressler.

A. Detention Incident to Execution of a Search Warrant

[9] The district court upheld Pressler's detention under Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 101 S.Ct. 2587, 69 L.Ed.2d 340 (1981), as a seizure incident to the execution of a search warrant. In Summers, the Supreme Court held that "for Fourth Amendment purposes, ... a warrant to search for contraband founded on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to detain the occupants of the premises while a proper search is conducted." 452 U.S. at 705, 101 S.Ct. at 2595. The Court noted that the detention constituted a "seizure" without probable cause. Id. at 696, 101 S.Ct. at 2590.

The applicability of Summers presents a close question. Initially we note that there is no merit to Pressler's attempt to distinguish Summers on the grounds that he lacked an interest in the premises subject to the warrant sufficient for standing and was not at the premises when detained. The Court clearly framed Summers in terms of "occupants", not owners, and explicitly found no constitutional significance in the fact that some of the "occupants" were seized on the sidewalk as they were leaving the house. Id. at 702 n. 16, 101 S.Ct. at 2594 n. 16.

On the other hand, however, much of the justification for the rule announced in Summers is inapplicable to Pressler's situation. In Summers, the "occupants" were kept in or brought back into the house being searched and kept there throughout the search or at least until the police discovered sufficient evidence to justify arresting them. The Court discerned two governmental purposes justifying the detention: (1) "preventing flight in the event that incriminating evidence is found", id. at 702, 101 S.Ct. at 2594, and (2) facilitating "the orderly completion of the search" by the presence of the occupants of the premises, id. at 703, 101 S.Ct. at 2594. The second purpose is based on the notion that the "self-interest [of the detained individuals] may induce them to open locked doors or locked containers to avoid the use of force that is not only damaging to property but may also delay the completion of the [search]." Id.

It is clear from the first officer's testimony at the suppression hearing that neither of these purposes motivated his detention of Pressler. Nor was Pressler's detention likely to advance either governmental purpose articulated in Summers, especially the second. Unlike the individuals in Summers, Pressler was not detained in or adjoining the place being searched and was obviously in no position to facilitate the orderly completion of the search of Taylor's home while lying handcuffed face down in a ditch some distance from the house. [FN3]

> FN3. Although the Government does not argue the point, it is plausible that Pressler might have been taken to Taylor's house during the search but for the second officer formally arresting him shortly after the initial seizure. Nothing in the record, however, suggests that the officers intended to do so.

We conclude that the detention of Pressler cannot be justified on the basis of Michigan v. Summers.

B. Terry Stop

Using the ruse described above, law enforcement officers had evacuated Taylor's neighborhood. Taylor and Pressler eventually left Taylor's house in Taylor's truck, 708 Taylor driving. When, within a short distance, Taylor spotted one of the officers, Agent Teague, Taylor stopped the truck, got out, and approached Teague to ask what was happening. Officers on the scene had been warned that prior experience with Taylor indicated that he was likely to be dangerous. Teague stopped Taylor at gunpoint, while another agent, Gamble Dick, approached the vehicle with his gun drawn and aimed at Pressler, who was seated in the passenger seat of the truck. Agent Dick ordered Pressler to raise his hands. Pressler did not comply, but made furtive movements with his hands inside the vehicle. Dick again ordered Pressler to raise his hands, and again Pressler did not comply. Finally, Pressler complied the third time the officer gave him the order. Dick directed Pressler to lie face down in a ditch where he was handcuffed and frisked. Within a very short time, Agent Checkoway arrived on the scene. Checkoway recognized Pressler as the person who had picked up chemicals ordered by "Delwish" and had inquired at the chemical company about purchasing expensive laboratory glassware. Pressler also volunteered to the officers that he lived at Taylor's house, which was the repository of the chemicals and the site of the suspected drug laboratory. Checkoway formally arrested Pressler.

We consider each of the actions taken by the officers toward Pressler: Agent Dick's armed approach, the handcuffing, and the arrest. In our view, the initial detention and handcuffing of Pressler were justified as a Terry stop. Subsequently, when Agent Checkoway formally arrested Pressler he had probable cause to do so.

[10][11] The law enforcement officers had a legitimate investigatory purpose in stopping Taylor, founded suspicion that he was manufacturing amphetamines, as had been detailed in the affidavit in support of the search warrant. When the officers stopped Taylor and his apparent confederate, Pressler, to question them, we believe that the officers were justified in drawing their weapons in self-protection. The Supreme Court has recognized "that the policeman making a reasonable investigatory stop should not be denied the opportunity to protect himself from attack by a hostile suspect." Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143, 146, 92 S.Ct. 1921, 1923, 32 L.Ed.2d 612 (1972). [FN4] The purpose of a Terry stop is "to allow the officer to pursue his investigation without fear of violence". Adams, 407 U.S. at 146, 92 S.Ct. at 1923. Earlier on the day in question, Agent Dick and the other officers on the scene had attended a briefing where they had been told that Taylor was dangerous and were warned that others with Taylor should also be considered dangerous.

> FN4. We are now concerned with more than the governmental interest in investigating crime; in addition, there is the more immediate interest of the police officer in taking steps to assure himself that the person with whom he is dealing is not armed with a weapon that could unexpectedly and fatally be used against him. Certainly it would be unreasonable to require that police officers take unnecessary risks in the performance of their duties. American criminals have a long tradition of armed violence, and every year in this country many law enforcement officers are killed in the line of duty, and thousands more are wounded. Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 23, 88 S.Ct. 1868, 1881, 22 L.Ed.2d 889 (1967).

Pressler argues that United States v. Strickler, 490 F.2d 378 (9th Cir.1974), mandates a different result. In Strickler, the police were watching a house where they expected cocaine to be delivered. The police observed a car drive past the house twice, the unknown occupants of the car looking in the direction of the house the first time. Later at some distance from the house police cars surrounded the car and one of the officers pointed a gun at the occupants of the car and ordered them to raise their hands. The court stated that it could not equate the armed approach to a surrounded vehicle whose occupants have been commanded to raise their hands with the brief investigatory stop authorized by Terry and Adams. 490 F.2d at 380. On the facts of the case, though, it is clear that the drawing of weapons would not have been permissible for other grounds: the police 709 had no legitimate fear for their safety and only tenuous reasons to believe that the occupants of the car were involved in the drug transaction. In the present case, the law enforcement agents had strong evidence of drug activity and valid reason to fear for their safety.

[12] The handcuffing and frisk of Pressler for weapons was similarly justified. Twice Pressler had disobeyed an order to raise his hands, and he made furtive movements inside the truck where his hands could not be seen. At this point Agent Dick found it wise to frisk Pressler for weapons. Because there were two suspects and only two or three officers on the scene, Agent Dick deemed it prudent to have Pressler lie down and be handcuffed during the frisk. We have previously held that the use of handcuffs, if reasonably necessary, while substantially aggravating the intrusiveness of an investigatory stop, do not necessarily convert a Terry stop into an arrest necessitating probable cause. United States v. Bautista, 684 F.2d 1286, 1289 (9th Cir.1982). See United States v. Thompson, 597 F.2d 187, 190 (9th Cir.1979). Likewise, requiring the suspect to lie down while a frisk is performed, if reasonably necessary, does not transform a Terry stop into an arrest.

[13] After frisking Pressler, the officers required him to remain in this prone, handcuffed position for three to five minutes before he was formally placed under arrest by Agent Checkoway. During this time, Pressler was "extremely verbally abusive" and "quite rowdy". It was not necessary for the officers to remove Pressler's handcuffs or to return Pressler to his feet immediately upon completing the frisk. The restrictions eliminated the possibility of an assault or attempt to flee, particularly if an arrest became imminent, as indeed it did. See Bautista, 684 F.2d at 1290.

C. The Arrest

[14] When Agent Checkoway arrived on the scene, he consulted with other officers, recognized Pressler, and formally placed Pressler under arrest. Checkoway recognized Pressler as matching the description of a person who had picked up drug precursor chemicals ordered by "Delwish", and had inquired about purchasing laboratory glassware. The description included height, weight, age, hair color and length, and beard type. The courier was also described as wearing a Harley-Davidson belt buckle. Pressler fit the description in all respects. In addition, Checkoway knew of Pressler's claim of also living at Taylor's trailer home, which was the repository of the chemicals and drug formulae and the suspected site of the drug laboratory. In all, we conclude that Agent Checkoway possessed probable cause to arrest Pressler.

We therefore affirm the district court denial of the motion to suppress.

III.
Severance

[15] Pressler contends that the trial court committed reversible error in refusing to sever his trial from Taylor's. The issue concerns testimony given by a DEA agent regarding statements allegedly made by Taylor and Pressler while the agent was driving the two defendants to the police station to be booked. According to agent Parra, Taylor said that he had considered shooting it out with the law enforcement agents but had decided against it because he felt that he had not done anything wrong. He convinced Pressler to come out peacefully and they unloaded their guns. Agent Parra stated further that Pressler had said that he favored shooting it out with the law enforcement officers but that he had agreed with Taylor and decided against it. Pressler also allegedly said that he did not trust law enforcement officers and that it had been his experience that they could not be trusted. At trial, Pressler testified that he never made the statement to agent Parra about preferring to shoot it out, but was unable to question Taylor about the conversation with agent Parra because Taylor chose not to testify, as was his right.

710 The general rule is that defendants jointly charged are jointly tried. See United States v. Gay, 567 F.2d 916, 919 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 999, 98 S.Ct. 1655, 56 L.Ed.2d 90 (1978). This rule is applicable in conspiracy cases. United States v. Escalante, 637 F.2d 1197, 1201 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 856, 101 S.Ct. 154, 66 L.Ed.2d 71 (1980). Fed.R.Crim.P. 14 provides, however, that the trial court may grant a severance when it appears that a defendant would suffer significant prejudice from a joint trial.

Pressler argues that his trial should have been severed from Taylor's, citing Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123, 88 S.Ct. 1620, 20 L.Ed.2d 476 (1968) and Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415, 85 S.Ct. 1074, 13 L.Ed.2d 934 (1965). Bruton is inapplicable here because Taylor's statement that Pressler wanted to shoot it out with the police was merely cumulative to Agent Parra's testimony that Pressler had given the same information. Pressler cross-examined Agent Parra about the conversation. Pressler took the stand and denied that the conversation took place. We therefore affirm the denial of severance.

IV.
Improper Questioning at Trial

[16] Pressler contends that the trial court committed reversible error in not sustaining his objections to certain questions asked by the Government at trial. First, the prosecutor asked Pressler whether, when re-arrested on May 7, 1981, in the presence of DEA agents he had told his girlfriend to tell Taylor to "get out of there". The prosecutor also asked Pressler if he had told a DEA agent that he lived at the Taylor residence. Pressler denied making these statements, and the Government did not offer testimony from the agents in question to support the questions. Pressler relies on County of Maricopa v. Maberry, 555 F.2d 207 (9th Cir.1977). He contends that his confrontation rights were violated by the Government's failure to recall the agents who overheard the statements so as to rebut Pressler's denial of having made them. We disagree. The statements made in this case were not nearly so inflammatory as those in Maberry. See United States v. Jones, 592 F.2d 1038, 1044 n. 9 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 441 U.S. 951, 99 S.Ct. 2179, 60 L.Ed.2d 1056 (1979) (pointing out that Maberry was a case in which the complained of questioning was highly "prejudicial", clearly "improper", and "unethical").

[17] The second line of allegedly objectionable questioning involved DEA Agent Henderson's testimony. On cross-examination, defense counsel asked the DEA agent whether or not drug manufacturers use "intermediaries" or "third parties" to pick up chemicals so as to insulate themselves from detection. On re-direct, the prosecuting attorney asked the witness whether, in his experience, these third parties are always, sometimes, or never involved in the illegal manufacturing operation. The witness answered that, in his experience, "innocent" third parties were not used to pick up chemicals. We find that defense counsel "opened the door" to this line of questioning, see United States v. Millican, 424 F.2d 1038, 1039-40 (5th Cir.1970), and that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting the question. Fed.R.Evid. 611(a).

V.
Sufficiency of the Evidence

[18] Pressler next contends that there was insufficient evidence to support a conviction on either count. In addressing this contention, the reviewing court determines whether the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to the Government, would permit any rational trier-of-fact to conclude that the defendant was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 318-19, 99 S.Ct. 2781, 2788, 61 L.Ed.2d 560 (1979); United States v. Nelson, 419 F.2d 1237, 1241 (9th Cir.1969).

Pressler argues that the evidence, even when viewed under the appropriate standard, failed to show that he was something more than an unwitting errand runner. He contends that the Government did no more 711 than pile inference upon inference to persuade the jury that he was a major actor, rather than an "unsuspecting pawn", in Taylor's scheme.

The difficulty with Pressler's argument is that the reviewing court must respect the exclusive province of the jury to determine the credibility of witnesses, resolve evidentiary conflicts, and draw reasonable inferences from proven facts. See United States v. Ramos, 558 F.2d 545, 546 (9th Cir.1977). There was sufficient evidence to support the verdicts against Pressler. There was testimony, inter alia, that Pressler picked up the suspect chemicals ordered by Taylor's wife; that he later secured a catalogue of chemicals and inquired about purchasing expensive laboratory glassware (he failed to claim any legitimate use for the glassware at trial); that he periodically resided at Taylor's house, where extensive precursor chemical supplies and laboratory equipment were found; and that he made the incriminating statement about wanting to shoot it out with police.

VI.
Admission of and Reference to Unanalyzed Chemical Exhibits

Taylor, joined by Pressler (by incorporation), contends the trial court abused its discretion in admitting and allowing the Government to refer to two chemical containers that were labeled, but the contents of which were never chemically tested. Defendants contend that there was inadequate foundation to admit the exhibits.

[19][20][21][22] The contention is meritless. First, the defendants' failure to object to one of the two exhibits precludes reversal absent plain error. Fed.R.Evid. 103(a)(1), (d). Second, the Government laid an adequate foundation by identifying the exhibits as filled containers labeled "platinum oxide" and "hydrogen" that were seized at Taylor's residence. See Fed.R.Evid. 901. The fact that the exhibits were never analyzed goes to their weight as evidence, not their admissibility. See United States v. Brewer, 630 F.2d 795, 801-02 (10th Cir.1980). Third, once the exhibits were admitted it was not improper for the prosecution to argue that in all likelihood the contents matched the label. Finally, given the extensive number of chemical exhibits introduced at trial, it seems unlikely that the admission of these two exhibits, even if improper, was prejudicial error. We therefore find no reversible error.

VII.
The Convictions of Attempt

[23] The defendants were convicted of both attempt and conspiracy under 21 U.S.C. § 846. They contend that the trial court did not adequately instruct the jury on attempt. In United States v. Snell, 627 F.2d 186, 187 (9th Cir.1980) (per curiam), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 957, 101 S.Ct. 1416, 67 L.Ed.2d 382 (1981), this court stated that a conviction for attempt requires proof of culpable intent and conduct constituting a substantial step toward commission of the crime that strongly corroborates that intent. In the case before us, the district court instructed the jury on attempt that:

> To "attempt" an offense means willfully to do some act in an effort to bring about or accomplish something the law forbids to be done.
> An act is done willfully if done voluntarily and intentionally and with the specific intent to do something the law forbids; that is to say, with bad purpose either to disobey or to disregard the law.

This instruction was taken verbatim from 1 E. Devitt & C. Blackmar, Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, § 14.21, at 437 (3d ed. 1977). [FN5]

> FN5. In United States v. Conway, 507 F.2d 1047, 1052 (5th Cir.1975), the Fifth Circuit held that the first paragraph of the instruction, standing alone, instructed the jury accurately on the applicable law. The contention made in Conway was that the instruction "gave an inadequate definition of the word 'attempt' ", defendant citing no authority. The contention was apparently not made that the instruction failed to require a substantial step. Moreover, in Conway the defendant had failed to object and so the court reviewed for plain error. In the present case, a timely objection was made, accompanied by a suggested alternative instruction.

712 The instruction given nowhere discussed the substantial step requirement. The instruction merely required "some act" in an effort to bring about or accomplish a forbidden object. "Some act" could include an act of mere preparation, which does not constitute a substantial step. E.g., United States v. Manley, 632 F.2d 978, 987 (2d Cir.1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1112, 101 S.Ct. 922, 66 L.Ed.2d 841 (1981). Counsel objected to the instruction and submitted a requested instruction distinguishing between mere preparation and an overt act likely to result in the commission of the offense. We therefore hold that on the facts of this case the jury instruction was inadequate, and reverse each of the defendants' convictions of attempt. [FN6]

> FN6. We are also disturbed by an ambiguity in the statute that the defendants were convicted of violating. A single section of title 21 makes "attempt or conspiracy" to violate the Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act a crime. 21 U.S.C. § 846. The statute seems to create only a single offense, denominated "attempt or conspiracy". The facts of this case indicate only a single course of action. We acknowledge that, under some circumstances, Congress may have intended separate punishment for attempt and conspiracy under section 846. Conceivably, a conspiracy to manufacture followed by a later, separate attempt to manufacture could constitute separately punishable offenses. For example, if two people agreed to manufacture amphetamines and ordered a chemical to further that purpose, the requirements of conspiracy would be met. If a year later one of them built a laboratory, assembled all necessary ingredients and started the manufacturing process but was apprehended before completing it, punishment might be permissible for the conspiracy and the attempt. But here, in contrast, there is but a single course of criminal conduct. Normally this case would be suitable for application of the doctrine of lenity whereby a "Court will not interpret a federal criminal statute so as to increase the penalty that it places on an individual when such an interpretation can be based on no more than a guess as to what Congress intended." Whalen v. United States, 445 U.S. 684, 695 n. 10, 100 S.Ct. 1432, 1440 n. 10, 63 L.Ed.2d 715 (1980) (quoting Ladner v. United States, 358 U.S. 169, 178, 79 S.Ct. 209, 214, 3 L.Ed.2d 199 (1958)). See also Busic v. United States, 446 U.S. 398, 406-07, 100 S.Ct. 1747, 1752-53, 64 L.Ed.2d 381 (1980) ("ambiguity concerning the ambit of criminal statutes should be resolved in favor of lenity"); United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 347, 92 S.Ct. 515, 522, 30 L.Ed.2d 488 (1971). It is unnecessary for us to resolve this issue, however, in view of our reversal of the convictions for attempt.

Special Drug Offender Notice

Prior to trial, the Government filed a notice with the district court clerk pursuant to 21 U.S.C. § 849(a) (1976) that Taylor was a dangerous special drug offender as defined by section 849(e)(3) (1976). Two days into the nine-day trial, the clerk's office inadvertently brought the notice to the attention of the judge presiding over Taylor's trial rather than to the attention of the district's chief judge. The trial judge continued to preside over the trial, and did not notify the parties of the problem until the notice was unsealed when the guilty verdicts were returned. At that point, the trial judge recused himself, and reassigned all further proceedings to another judge. The second judge dismissed the notice, finding that 21 U.S.C. § 849(a) imposes strict liability on the Government to insure that the trial judge does not learn of the notice prematurely. Section 849(a) provides, in relevant part:

> In no case shall the fact that the defendant is alleged to be a dangerous special drug offender be an issue upon the trial of such felonious violation, be disclosed to the jury, or be disclosed before any plea of guilty or nolo contendere or verdict or finding of guilty to the presiding judge without the consent of the parties.

The Government concedes that section 849(a) was violated, but contends the error was harmless because: (1) the judge learned only that a notice had been filed, not its contents, (2) the disclosure did not affect the trial judge's impartiality, and (3) the violation was attributable to the clerk's office, not the Government. None of these is relevant.

[24] As noted by the second district judge, section 849(a) unambiguously provides 713 that it is the "fact" of the notice, not the supporting details, that "shall" not be disclosed prematurely. See United States v. Bailey, 537 F.2d 845, 849 (5th Cir.1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1051, 97 S.Ct. 764, 50 L.Ed.2d 767 (1977).

[25] The Government's contention that the disclosure did not affect the trial judge is pure speculation. As the district court in United States v. Tramunti, 377 F.Supp. 6, 10 (S.D.N.Y.1974), modified on other grounds, 513 F.2d 1087 (2d Cir.1975), noted in rejecting the same argument:

> [w]hether or not I believe that I was at all consciously or subconsciously influenced by having seen the notice before the verdict, I do not feel free to ignore the clear provisions of Section 849. The potential penalties to which Section 849 subjects a defendant are very grave indeed, and in seeking to have them imposed the government must precisely follow all of the procedural safeguards which the section requires.

Finally, while the Government was not directly responsible for the violation, it was certainly better situated than Taylor to have prevented its occurrence. Moreover, the Government offers no cogent reason why the defendant should bear the effects of the mistake regardless of whose fault the mistake was.

The dismissal of the special drug offender notice is affirmed.

CONCLUSION

Each defendant's conviction of conspiracy is AFFIRMED. Each defendant's conviction of attempt is REVERSED. The dismissal of the special drug offender notice as to Taylor is AFFIRMED.

FLETCHER, Circuit Judge, concurring:

I concur in the result, and I join all of the majority opinion except Part VII. I write separately on the effect of conviction of both attempt and conspiracy under 21 U.S.C. § 846. Although I agree that the sentences imposed for attempt must be vacated, I rest my conclusion on a different reason.

21 U.S.C. § 846 (1976) provides that

> Any person who attempts or conspires to commit any offense defined in this subchapter is punishable by imprisonment or fine or both which may not exceed the maximum punishment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the attempt or conspiracy.

The statute thus prescribes punishment for one who "attempts or conspires" to commit any offense defined in the subchapter. Based on a given course of conduct, a defendant may be convicted of the section 846 offense if a jury unanimously agrees that the Government has proven the elements of either attempt or conspiracy. But a defendant may not be punished for both attempt and conspiracy based on a single course of conduct merely because the elements of both offenses are present.

To be sure, there will be situations where multiple punishments under section 846 will be proper. Such instances will arise when a defendant "attempts or conspires" to violate the drug laws on two completely separate occasions. For example, a defendant who engages in a conspiracy to manufacture and sell amphetamines that ends, and who later separately attempts by himself to manufacture and sell the substance, could be separately punished for two distinct violations of section 846.

The instant case does not present such a situation. The defendants acted in concert for the purpose of setting up an amphetamine laboratory in Taylor's home. Based on this conduct, they were found guilty of conspiracy. The statute does not authorize additional punishment for "attempt" based on the same conduct. I would vacate the attempt sentences without reference to the jury instruction given.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Martin TUCHOW and Louis Farina, Defendants-Appellants.

Nos. 84-1350, 84-1364.

United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.

Argued Oct. 30, 1984.

Decided July 19, 1985.

Defendants were convicted before the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, John F. Grady, J., of violations of the Hobbs Act, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Coffey, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) district court did not err when it allowed receipt of "other acts" evidence; (2) testimony of victims was properly admitted under state of mind exception to hearsay rule; (3) while district court erred in not giving limiting instruction regarding statements made by coconspirator prior to time defendant joined extortion conspiracy, error was harmless; (4) evidence was sufficient to support convictions for conspiracy to extort money in connection with application for building permit; (5) evidence was sufficient to sustain convictions for attempted extortion; (6) evidence was sufficient to sustain defendant's conviction for attempting to extort $25,000 from partnership which applied for building permit; (7) instruction with respect to issue of representation evidence was not improper; and (8) case would be remanded to allow defendants their right to allocution at sentencing hearing.

Affirmed and remanded.

I.

The majority of the evidence introduced at trial was gathered through the use of taped conversations between Jack Walsh, the government's key witness, and the defendants Tuchow and Farina. On appeal, the defendants dispute the inferences to be drawn from the statements recorded on tape.

Shortly after Jack Walsh purchased a home remodeling company named J.C. Construction in 1979, the FBI approached Walsh and informed him that they had evidence of his participation in a bank fraud. Because of this evidence, Walsh agreed to cooperate with the FBI which was conducting several other fraud investigations in Chicago in late 1979. To aid in these investigations, the FBI placed listening and recording devices throughout Walsh's office and in his telephone. In early 1980, Walsh learned of the Kenton Court condominium rehabilitation project 859 from a friend in the construction business and immediately contacted Kaplan, a partner in the project to express his interest in the rehabilitation venture. The other individuals who comprised the Kenton Court partnership were Messrs. Radek and Golding, both of whom testified at trial. After examining the project's blueprints, Walsh concluded that the project did not meet the City of Chicago building code requirements as the building did not have enough fire exits (although he apparently did not inform the Kenton partners of his observations). [FN2] Walsh then contacted the FBI and told them that he needed a building permit for a job which, in his opinion, did not meet the Chicago building code requirements and that he would contact a friend, the defendant Farina, to get the permit "fixed."

FN2. After his initial meeting with Tuchow, Walsh entered into a contract with the Kenton partners on June 9, 1980 to act as the general contractor for the condominium rehabilitation project.

On May 20, 1980, Walsh called Farina and arranged to meet with him at a Chicago restaurant on the following day, May 21, 1980. When he met Farina on May 21, Walsh told him that he needed his help "in getting a building permit through" since the building had "some violations in it." Walsh testified that Farina promised to help for a $2,000 fee and warned Walsh that "now this may cost you a little more you know, whatever the situation takes." Farina, who at the time was the Deputy Commissioner of Sanitation for the City of Chicago, then suggested that he would have to bring the ward committeeman for the area, the defendant Tuchow, into the deal. Later during this May 21 conversation, Farina made several incriminating statements referring to the expected payoffs, including "for God's sake, don't tell people what you give me" and "I'll take it from here. Cause I wanna drop the money first." On June 3, Walsh again met with Farina and gave him $2,000, which was supplied to Walsh by the FBI; and at that time Farina warned Walsh not to show the money or it would "kill us all." Farina then telephoned Tuchow's office and told Tuchow that he had a client with a building permit problem for Tuchow and told him that "since it's in your ward, I think you should handle it." [FN3] When Walsh again met with Farina on June 4, at Farina's office in city hall, Farina explained to Walsh that he had spoken with several of his contacts who had indicated that Tuchow was not powerful enough to obtain the building permit. Farina suggested that Walsh wait until Farina was elected alderman in the fall, however, Walsh declined and asked to see Tuchow, to which Farina responded "if you want to take that chance, we'll take it." Farina and Walsh then walked to Tuchow's office. On the way Farina asked Walsh for another $1,000 for Tuchow and he also informed Walsh that it could cost "at least $10,000" to obtain the building permit.

FN3. Farina further explained to Walsh "he'll take it from there. He'll take it from there, and that's it .... We got the right connection. Now if he can't do it, nobody can do it." Farina also told Walsh not to use his name with anyone because of the FBI investigations taking place in Chicago at that time.

Farina and Walsh arrived in Tuchow's office, where Tuchow explained that his price for the building permit "won't be exorbitant, but it will be substantial." Tuchow also informed Walsh that others would have to be involved. After the meeting, Farina told Walsh that it would cost more than the $10,000 he had previously quoted and that he needed another $1,000 to get Tuchow "going on finding out whoever he has to find out to fix the permit."

On June 11, after receiving money from the FBI, Walsh gave Farina $1,000 to be passed on to Tuchow. During this meeting, Farina again cautioned Walsh not to mention any names since two other aldermen had recently been convicted for fixing a building permit. Farina told Walsh that Tuchow's fee for help in obtaining the permit would be approximately $1,000 per condominium unit or $47,000.

860 In the meantime, the Kenton Court partnership had applied for a Federal Housing and Urban Development loan guarantee commitment of $1.5 million to help finance the project. The application for the guarantee needed to be submitted by June 27, 1980. Thus, Radek, one of the partners in the project, met with Walsh during the week of June 11th to express his concern about the time it was taking to obtain the building permit. Walsh reassured Radek that he would obtain the permit since he had earlier paid money to Farina and Tuchow; Radek responded that he did not believe any payments were necessary since the project was legitimate. On June 25, Tuchow called Walsh and told him that it looked as if the permit would go through. Walsh explained to Tuchow the emergency facing the Kenton Court partners concerning the HUD deadline and Tuchow responded that he would supply Walsh with a letter the next day authorizing Walsh to begin demolition work. During the conversation, Walsh told Tuchow that Farina had quoted a price of $47,000 for Tuchow's assistance; Tuchow responded by asking whether he (Walsh) had given Farina the $1,000 payment and Walsh answered in the affirmative.

Later that day Walsh spoke with Golding, one of the Kenton Court partners, and explained that he had made payoffs to various officials for the project and that more money was expected. On June 26, Walsh went to City Hall to pick up the letter authorizing the demolition work. Tuchow and Walsh began to discuss the fee to be paid and Tuchow stated that "well, Louis shouldn't be setting prices .... I don't think I discussed that with him"; he then stated "I think Louie [Farina] misunderstood me. I told him a job like this here, to get you cleared in everything to go ahead. Got to be worth at least fifty up front." Tuchow then inquired, "when can some of this come in" to which Walsh replied, "when you want it." Walsh then agreed to pay Tuchow the following week after Tuchow returned from vacation. Walsh, Tuchow, and Noonan, an employee in the City's building department, then arranged for a demolition authorization letter to be issued the next day.

It was at this time that the FBI caught wind that Walsh was involved in another bank fraud scheme and directed him to withdraw from the Kenton Court project. As a result, Walsh informed Farina and Tuchow that he could not go forward with the deal because the Kenton partners were not willing to pay Tuchow's fee and refused to repay Walsh the money he had already paid out. Tuchow responded "that's okay, we'll just stop the job." Tuchow also informed Walsh that he did not want to deal with the partnership because "I don't even know them." Tuchow then explained to Walsh that he had put him in a bad spot since he (Tuchow) had already promised "the guy over there" (supposedly referring to Noonan) "a lot more than a couple of grand." Walsh apologetically offered that "if it takes 5 ... if it takes 10 uh, I'll do that and I don't wanna, I don't wanna embarrass myself." Tuchow accepted the $10,000 offer, "if you can get me 10 ... I'll just have to spread that around." In another conversation that same day, Walsh asked Tuchow what would happen if the Kenton partnership attempted to obtain a permit on its own and Tuchow responded "It's up to them ... if they want to go out, they won't get it though."

Over the next several weeks, Walsh began to make periodic payments on the $10,000 promise. On July 24 Walsh made a $2,000 payment to Tuchow and on July 30 he made a $1,000 payment. On October 21, Walsh made another $1,000 payment to Tuchow. During this meeting Walsh asserted that he had paid Tuchow $4,000, $3,000 directly and $1,000 through Farina. Tuchow expressed his frustration to Walsh about Farina's greed explaining that Farina had only given Tuchow $500 of the $1,000 payment intended for Tuchow, while he (Tuchow) had fairly split the proceeds of an earlier payment with Farina.

Sometime in mid-July, 1980, after Walsh informed the Kenton Court partners that he was withdrawing as the general contractor 861 from the project, one of the partners, Radek, went to City Hall in an attempt to obtain the building permit. There he met Noonan, an employee in the City Building Department, who refused to issue a permit to Radek. Noonan told Radek that the permit had been paid for and was in Walsh's name. When Radek offered to pay the $250.00 permit fee, Noonan told Radek that he could only obtain the permit if Walsh agreed to the transfer. Noonan, testifying at trial, stated that he had been instructed by Tuchow not to authorize any transfer of the building permit at that time. Golding, called by the government as a hostile witness, testified that at a Kenton Court partnership meeting they agreed to contact Tuchow to see what could be done concerning obtaining the building permit. [FN4] During Golding's meeting with Tuchow, Tuchow demanded $50,000, but the partnership refused to pay this amount. Golding and Tuchow subsequently settled on a $25,000 payment which was to be characterized as a legal fee. Golding, in his testimony to the Grand Jury which was later admitted at trial, told Tuchow that he felt as if he was being extorted to which Tuchow replied that he needed the money "to take care of some people." In the fall of 1980, the Kenton partnership retained another general contractor to begin work on the project. After the general contractor told Golding that the plans were inadequate, Golding responded by telling the contractor not to worry about it since he had "people downtown that would take care of it." [FN5] Late in the fall of 1980, after the partnership had agreed to pay Tuchow $25,000, the building permit was issued by the building department.

FN4. Golding testified that the idea to contact Tuchow came from one of his son's friends who is an attorney in Chicago and had ties to Tuchow.

FN5. The trial court judge allowed in this evidence since it was offered not to prove the truth of the matter asserted but rather to prove the fact that the statements were made by Golding in order to establish his state of mind. The jury was instructed that it was to consider the testimony in that light.

[1] Based upon this evidence the Grand Jury returned a seven-count indictment. In Count I, Tuchow was indicted for conspiring to extort money from the Kenton Court partnership and from Jack Walsh. Tuchow was also indicted for separate acts of attempting to extort money from the Kenton Court partnership (Count VII) and from Jack Walsh (Counts IV, V, and VI). Farina was also indicted for conspiring with Tuchow to extort money (Count I) and two separate acts of extortion of money (Counts II, III). The jury returned a verdict of guilty on all seven counts. Tuchow was sentenced to concurrent terms of eight years while Farina was sentenced to concurrent terms of four years on each of the counts contained within the indictment.

During the trial, over the defendants' objections, the district court judge allowed certain "other acts" evidence under Fed.R. of Evid.Rule 404(b). On appeal, both defendants claim that the "other acts" evidence was improperly admitted. Further, Tuchow alleges that the district court erred in admitting hearsay evidence of taped conversation between Farina and Walsh prior to Walsh being introduced to Tuchow. The defendants' other grounds for reversal include claims that there was insufficient evidence to support the charges of conspiracy and attempted extortion and further that the evidence was insufficient to establish a nexus between interstate commerce and the extortion payments made by Walsh (Counts IV, V, VI).

A. "Other Acts" Evidence.

Both Farina and Tuchow complain that the district court erred when it allowed receipt of "other acts" evidence under Fed.R.Evid. Rule 404(b). [FN6] Specifically, Tuchow 862 argues that the court erred when it received in evidence a tape recorded conversation between Tuchow and his barber, a Mr. Herzog, wherein Tuchow allegedly offered to bribe a municipal court judge to dismiss a speeding ticket. Farina also argues that the court erred in admitting a taped conversation between himself and Walsh wherein Farina agreed to find a government job for Walsh's nephew for $2,500 and fix a drunken driving ticket for Walsh's uncle for $1,000.

FN6. Rule 404(b) states: "Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of a mistake or accident."

"According to Rule 404(b), evidence of other acts cannot be introduced to establish the defendant's bad character or to show his propensity to commit the act in question simply because he committed a similar act in the past."
United States v. Chaimson, 760 F.2d 798 (7th Cir.1985). Rather, this "other acts" evidence is admissible only if:
"(1) The evidence is directed toward establishing a matter in issue other than the defendant's propensity to commit the crime charged, (2) the evidence shows that the other act is similar enough and close enough in time to be relevant to the matter in issue ..., (3) the evidence is clear and convincing, and (4) the probative value of the evidence is not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice."
Id. at 804, quoting United States v. Shackleford, 738 F.2d 776, 779 (7th Cir.1984); see also United States v. Stump, 735 F.2d 273, 275 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 105 S.Ct. 203, 83 L.Ed.2d 134 (1984); United States v. Kane, 726 F.2d 344, 348 (7th Cir.1984).

[2] Herzog testified that he contacted Tuchow after receiving a speeding ticket in late 1980. In one of the conversations, Tuchow told Herzog that he had discovered the name of the presiding judge on the case and offered to "give him a little, you know, something." In a later conversation, he told Herzog that he had talked to the judge and instructed Herzog to tell the court clerk that "Mr. Tuchow is your lawyer and he's going to try to get out here [to the court]." Tuchow also stated that "the judge got your name, so he will take care of it." Herzog testified that Tuchow did not represent him as an attorney during his traffic court appearance and that he could not remember the outcome of the case.

Rule 404(b) states that other acts evidence may "be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, [or] intent ...." At trial, Tuchow did not deny the fact that he discussed and received money for his efforts in obtaining the building permit. Rather, he characterized these discussions with Walsh and Golding during opening argument and throughout the trial as legitimate exchanges concerning his attorney fees for representing their interests in obtaining the building permit. Intent became an issue once Tuchow characterized his discussions as a legitimate exchange concerning his attorney fees. See United States v. Price, 617 F.2d 455, 459 (7th Cir.1979) (issue of intent raised during opening argument opens the door to Rule 404(b) evidence). Since Tuchow's defense at trial related directly to the issue of his intent, the discussion between Herzog and Tuchow where Tuchow contemplated bribing a trial court judge in order to fix a traffic ticket was relevant in assessing Tuchow's characterization of his discussions with Walsh and the members of the Kenton partnership. Thus, the first factor in assessing the admissibility of evidence under Rule 404(b) is satisfied.

This "other act" evidence is also "similar enough and close enough in time to be relevant ...." The conversations with Herzog occurred in late 1980, during the period the application for the building permit was pending. Tuchow contends that the conversations concerned what could be characterized as a bribery attempt and since he was prosecuted for extortion and not bribery his conversations with Herzog were too dissimilar for purposes of comparison. We disagree. Tuchow's defense rested on his assertion that his relationship between Walsh and the Kenton partnership was only one of attorney and client. The government sought to prove that Tuchow 863 did not regard this relationship as anything approximating an attorney-client relationship. In this regard, evidence of his conversation with Herzog concerning bribing a municipal court judge to fix Herzog's traffic ticket was relevant as Tuchow had proposed to take care of the problem not by legitimately representing Herzog at his trial but by contacting the judge and "giving the judge a little something," which Herzog believed to mean money. The similarity between this conduct and Tuchow's discussions with Walsh and Golding over his "fee" for helping them obtain a building permit is that Tuchow did not undertake to represent these parties as an attorney, but sought to improperly influence particular governmental decisions, whether it be handling a traffic ticket or obtaining a building permit, through the use of money. Both the "other act" evidence and offense charged in this case focused on the conduct of Tuchow. Both acts concerned discussions of distributing money in order to influence an office holder's actions. "The degree of similarity is relevant only insofar as the acts are sufficiently alike to support an inference of criminal intent .... The prior acts need not be duplicates of the one for which the defendant is now being tried." See United States v. Radseck, 718 F.2d 233, 236-37 (7th Cir.1983) citing United States v. O'Brien, 618 F.2d 1234, 1238 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 858, 101 S.Ct. 157, 66 L.Ed.2d 73 (1980). [FN7]

FN7. Tuchow compares this case to United States v. Dothard, 666 F.2d 498 (11th Cir.1982), which held, in part, that admission of other acts evidence constituted reversible error. Dothard involved a defendant who allegedly falsely filed a United States Army Reserve Enlistment Form; however, the defendant in that case denied filling out the form and denied any knowledge of the false answer by the person who did in fact fill out the form. Thus, that case is readily distinguishable since the defendant Dothard denied the act of filling out the form itself. In this case, Tuchow does not deny the discussions concerning the money to be paid for his help in obtaining the building permit. Rather, it is the characterization of those discussions, which directly impacts upon Tuchow's intent and, thus, his guilt or innocence. See also, Shackleford, 738 F.2d at 782.

The third factor to be considered under Rule 404(b) is whether evidence of the other acts was clear and convincing. In this case, the conversations between Herzog and Tuchow were recorded on tape and Herzog testified that he logically assumed Tuchow's reference to "giving the judge a little something" meant money. Tuchow argues that since Herzog was in fact fined by the trial court for his speeding offense, albeit minimally, there is no evidence that a bribe took place. However, the government offered this evidence not to establish the fact that the defendant had completed an act of bribery, but to demonstrate that Tuchow believed, as he told Herzog, that he was capable of fixing the case. The fact that Tuchow's statements were recorded on tape provided direct evidence of the other act evidence and, thus, the clear and convincing standard was met in this case. See United States v. Dolliole, 597 F.2d 102, 107 (7th Cir.1979) (direct evidence of defendant's participation in other acts satisfies the clear and convincing standard); see also, United States v. Hyman, 741 F.2d 906, 913 (7th Cir.1984).

[3] Finally, if all the other factors are satisfied, the judge must also be convinced that any prejudice from admission of this evidence is outweighed by its probative value. This determination, involving a Fed.R.Evid. Rule 403 determination balancing the prejudice against the evidence's relevance, is reversible only if the district court abused its discretion. See, e.g., United States v. Falco, 727 F.2d 659, 665 (7th Cir.1984); United States v. Weidman, 572 F.2d 1199, 1201-02 (7th Cir.1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 821, 99 S.Ct. 87, 58 L.Ed.2d 113 (1978). In this case the district court conducted a separate hearing, weighed all of the evidence and, after admitting the evidence, specifically instructed the jury as to the limitations on its use. In our review of the record, we find no abuse of discretion. [FN8] Thus, we hold that Herzog's testimony 864 and the taped conversations between Herzog and Tuchow were properly received in evidence under Rule 404(b).

> FN8. Tuchow also argues that the district court judge failed to make an explicit finding under Rule 403 and thus the fourth factor under the Rule 404(b) analysis is lacking. However, as this court stated in United States v. Hyman, 741 F.2d 906 (7th Cir.1984), the "trial court's evidentiary rulings are 'within its sound discretion and must be accorded great deference ....' Further, we have refused repeatedly to require a mechanical recitation of Rule 403's formula, on the record, as a prerequisite to admitting evidence under Rule 404(b)." Id. at 913 (citations omitted). When the correct reasons for the ruling are apparent on the record, we will not presume the wrong ones. See United States v. Price, 617 F.2d 455, 460 (7th Cir.1979).

Farina claims that the trial judge erred when he allowed in evidence of tape recorded conversations between Farina and Walsh concerning an agreement that Farina would arrange a job in city government for Walsh's nephew for $2,500 and would fix a drunk driving citation for Walsh's uncle for $1,000. These conversations were recorded on tape and took place in late 1980 and early 1981.

[4] Farina's intent, just as Tuchow's, also was an issue at trial. In a Hobbs Act prosecution, "the government is required to prove criminal intent on the part of the accused." United States v. Price, 617 F.2d 455, 460 (7th Cir.1979). At trial, Farina did not dispute the fact that discussions took place concerning the exchange of money; rather, he disputed the meaning to be attached thereto. One of Farina's defenses was that he was not engaged in any conspiracy with Tuchow; rather, as suggested in his counsel's opening argument, Farina was merely "conning" Walsh out of some money. Id. at 459 (issue of intent raised during opening argument opens the door to Rule 404(b) evidence during government's case-in-chief); Shackleford, 738 F.2d at 781 (evidence of other acts may be admissible during government's case-in-chief where defendant raises issue of intent). [FN9] The evidence that Farina obtained a job for Walsh's nephew for $2,500 and fixed a drunk driving ticket for another $1,000 was relevant in establishing that Farina did not intend to "con" Walsh. This evidence indicated, similar to obtaining the job for Walsh's nephew and fixing the drunk driving ticket, that Farina intended to follow through on his promise to help Walsh obtain the building permit. Thus, the "other acts" evidence was relevant in establishing his intent to engage in a conspiracy with Tuchow in order to obtain the illegal permit.

> FN9. During trial, the defense counsel cross-examined Walsh attempting to demonstrate that Farina did not intend to engage in a conspiracy with Tuchow as he (Farina) believed he was simply introducing Walsh to Tuchow in order for the two to establish an attorney-client relationship. During closing argument, Farina's counsel argued that Farina did not act with an unlawful intent since Farina believed that he was introducing Walsh to Tuchow so that Walsh could obtain legitimate legal services from Tuchow. This line of defense was developed after introduction of the other acts evidence.

conduct of bribing government officials is indistinguishable from obtaining an illegal building permit from government officials. Finally, the district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the "other acts" evidence. The court properly instructed the jury regarding the parameters within which this evidence could be considered, concluding with: "it is very important that you understand the very limited purpose of this evidence; first consider it only as to the defendant Farina; secondly, consider it only on the question of what Farina's knowledge and intent were in the case that is on trial here ...." Although Farina argues that the time occupied at trial concerning the "other acts" evidence (45 pages of transcript) was much greater than the time spent proving his direct involvement in the crimes charged in the indictment (30 pages of transcript), the point where so much other act evidence was introduced as to prejudice his defense was not reached in this case. Thus, the district court did not 865 err in admitting evidence of Farina's previous bribes under Rule 404(b). [FN10]

FN10. Tuchow argues that because the district court allowed in "other acts" evidence as to Farina, the district court should have granted Tuchow's motion for severance of his trial. However, a motion for severance under Fed.R.Crim.P. Rule 14 is committed to the discretion of the district court and its decision will only be reversed upon a "strong showing of prejudice" to the moving defendant. United States v. Dalzotto, 603 F.2d 642, 646 (7th Cir.1979). The defendants must show that their joinder deprived them of a fair trial. United States v. Percival, et al., 756 F.2d 600, 610 (7th Cir.1985). After a review of the record, we hold that the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the severance motion given the clear language contained in the court's limiting instructions that the evidence as to Farina's other acts was to be considered against Farina only. See id.

B. State of Mind Testimony.

Tuchow was also indicted for and convicted of attempting to extort $25,000 from the Kenton Court partnership (Count VII). At trial, the government introduced the testimony of Golding and Radek, two partners in the partnership, under the state of mind exception to the hearsay rule, Fed.R.Evid. Rule 803(3). [FN11] The jury was also instructed that the testimony of Radek and Golding was offered to establish their state of mind at the time of the extortion attempt during the summer of 1980 and not to prove any of the matters asserted therein.

FN11. Federal Rule of Evidence 803(3) provides: "The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness: "(3) Then existing mental, emotional, or physical condition.--Statement of the declarant's then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation or physical condition (such as intent, claim, motive, design, mental feeling, pain, and bodily health), but not including a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed unless it relates to the execution, revocation, identification or terms of the declarant's will."

One of the conversations that Tuchow found particularly objectionable occurred on June 19, 1980 between Walsh and Radek. Walsh testified that during this conversation he informed Radek that he had paid money to Tuchow and Farina to obtain the permits. Radek responded that he did not believe that the partnership had to pay bribe money since the deal was legitimate. Tuchow also objected to Radek's testimony that Walsh had told him that he (Walsh) had paid $2,000 to Farina and $1,000 to Tuchow; Radek further testified that since he believed the deal was legitimate there was no need for the partnership to make payments to city officials. Radek also testified that he went to the building commissioner's office to obtain the permit but that Mr. Noonan, an employee in the city's building department, denied him the permit explaining that a fee had been paid for the permit and he would need a document from Walsh assigning the permit to him. Radek offered to pay the $250.00 fee for the permit, but Noonan refused to accept the offer. Radek returned to his office and discussed the deal with one of his partners, a Mr. Kaplan, while expressing his belief that the building permit was being blocked because certain promised payments had not been made. The defendants objected to this testimony as inadmissible hearsay. Finally, Tuchow objected to introduction of a taped conversation between Walsh and Golding on June 25, 1980, discussing Walsh's progress in obtaining the building permit. During this conversation, Walsh told Golding that he had to "drop a little here and drop a little there," to which Golding responded

"oh I know that" and "you don't get nothing done in Chicago without that." Walsh also explained to Golding that he had to pay $2,000 to Farina and $1,000 to Tuchow and Golding responded "oh, yeah. Everybody is on our side." [FN12]

FN12. The text of the conversation is as follows: WALSH: "You know how the situations work down at City Hall, so I wound up uh I hadda drop a uh two grand to Louie and then a thousand to Marty and then uh, you know, to get the show on the road. So I'm drop, you know, and then uh he came back with another figure. I said look, you do what you have to do and get this baby goin so we get some uh work done there. Now the Alderman is definitely interested in seeing that thing improved. GOLDING: "Oh, yeah. Everybody is on our side. WALSH: "So what happened is that Marty, Marty is the committeeman there. GOLDING: "Humm. WALSH: "So how can you beat it? GOLDING: "Yeah. WALSH: "You know he's my guy. GOLDING: "Marty Tuchow? WALSH: "Tuchow, yeah."

866 [8] In a Hobbs Act prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 1951, the government must establish not only the victim's state of mind at the time of the alleged extortion but also the intent of the defendant.

"In a Hobbs Act prosecution for extortion under color of official right, the government must prove that the victim paid money to the defendant because of the defendant's official position. Evidence of the victim's state of mind is thus an essential element of the government's case. See United States v. Braasch, 505 F.2d 139, 151 (7th Cir.1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 910, 95 S.Ct. 1561, 43 L.Ed.2d 775 (1975). In addition the government must prove criminal intent on the part of the accused. See United States v. Adcock, 558 F.2d 397, 402 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 921, 98 S.Ct. 395, 54 L.Ed.2d 277 (1977)."

Price, 617 F.2d at 459. Radek's and Golding's testimony that they believed they were being extorted established the victim's state of mind and thus one of the elements of the offense. [FN13]

FN13. Further, the testimony of Radek and Golding was relevant evidence as to Tuchow's intent. Certainly, if Radek and Golding testified that they believed the requested payments were for legitimate lawyer fees, Tuchow's claim of innocence would seem to be reasonable. Conversely, if they believed payments were being made because the defendants were city officials and that more payments were being demanded this would provide relevant evidence as to whether Tuchow viewed his demand for payment as an extortion attempt or as legitimate lawyer fees.

[9][10] Tuchow, however, specifically complains that since it was Walsh who conveyed the information to Radek and Golding as to the progress made in obtaining the building permit, it was not he, but Walsh who induced their states of mind and thus this testimony should not have been allowed as it was untrustworthy. Admittedly, if Walsh had been Tuchow's agent or had Tuchow spoken directly to Golding and Radek, then their testimony would have been admissible under Fed.R.Evid. Rule 801(d)(2)(A) as an admission of a party opponent. [FN14] However, Golding's and Radek's testimony definitely reflected their state of mind at the time of the alleged extortion attempts during the summer of 1980 and thus was admissible under Fed.R.Evid. Rule 803(3). Tuchow's complaint that the information which induced their state of mind was relayed to Golding and Radek by Walsh rather than Tuchow is of no consequence since the essential information--that Tuchow had requested payments be made in order to get the permit and that more payments would be required--was correctly conveyed by Walsh to Radek and Golding as evidenced in the taped conversations between Tuchow and Walsh and Farina and Walsh. [FN15] The indicia of reliability, 867 which is not present in many hearsay situations, is certainly provided in the taped conversations revealing the details of the extortion scheme. Because the record indicates that the information concerning the payments made to Tuchow and Farina was accurately conveyed to them, it is clear that their "state of mind" was induced by accurate information. Contrary to Tuchow's assertion that such evidence effectively directs the verdict against him, this evidence establishes only one of the elements of the crime--the victim's state of mind. The defendant can still defend his case by demonstrating he did not have the requisite intent. Accordingly, we hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in allowing this state of mind evidence to be introduced at trial. [FN16]

FN14. Tuchow cites United States v. Summers, 598

F.2d 450 (5th Cir.1979) to support his position that Golding's and Radek's testimony should have been excluded. In Summers, testimony detailing conversations between an FBI informant and one of the victims of the defendant's extortion scheme was admitted at trial. The Fifth Circuit held that the district court erred in admitting this evidence, but found the error to be harmless given the abundance of properly admitted evidence establishing guilt. Our case is distinguishable from Summers on two grounds. First, the Summers decision noted that the evidence of the conversations was offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted therein and thus should have been excluded as hearsay. In this case, as the jury was instructed by the district court, the evidence was not offered to prove the truth of what was asserted by Radek's and Golding's statements, but rather to prove the victims' state of mind. Further, Summers did not analyze whether the evidence would have been admissible under the hearsay exception for state of mind evidence, Fed.R.Evid. Rule 803(3). In this case, the evidence was clearly admitted to demonstrate the state of mind of the victims, Golding and Radek, two partners in the Kenton Court Partnership.

FN15. As detailed in the fact section of this opinion, the taped conversations between Tuchow and Walsh demonstrate that Tuchow demanded that an additional $47,000 be paid by Walsh and the partnership. Further, Tuchow asked Walsh whether he had paid the $1,000 to Farina intended for Tuchow. This information was correctly conveyed by Walsh to the Kenton partners. In fact, the only misinformation conveyed by Walsh to Radek was the fact that he made payments to Tuchow and Farina totalling $5,000, when in fact he had spent only $3,000 at the time.

FN16. Tuchow also complains of the limiting instruction given to the jury prior to its consideration of the state of mind evidence. The contested portion of the instruction is as follows: "Now, one of the questions you are going to have to decide ... is were these legal fees ... or were they extortion payments that were being requested? "Now, what they were depends in large part upon the intent of these defendants ... [t]hat is really the principal question that you are going to have to decide.... "One of the things that is relevant to that question is what was the state of mind of these developers. What was the effect of what was said on their minds? "Now you have heard tapes and you are going to hear some more tapes now that have a bearing on that latter question: What was going on in the mind of Mr. Golding when this $25,000 was being discussed ...? "Now that doesn't mean that this is necessarily the same way Tuchow regarded it, or Farina regarded it. It doesn't mean that at all. He might have had a misunderstanding. That would be, of course, for you to decide, but it is, nonetheless, relevant for you to know or hear evidence of what it was these people were saying at the time." The judge completed the instruction by cautioning the jury that certain of the taperecorded statements were not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted but only to indicate the state of mind of the declarant. Tuchow's argument that this instruction somehow prejudiced his case is meritless for two reasons. First, although he objected to the introduction of the evidence he never registered any objection to the language used by the court in the limiting instruction. Second, contrary to Tuchow's suggestion, this instruction did not direct a verdict against Tuchow; rather, the jury was properly instructed that the developer's state of mind may provide some evidence as to whether Tuchow intended the demanded payments to truly represent his attorney fees. See supra, note 15. Thus, this instruction did not unfairly prejudice Tuchow's defense in any respect.

C. Hearsay Conversations.

[11] Tuchow contends that the district court erred when it admitted evidence of taped conversations between Farina and Walsh that occurred prior to the establishment of the conspiracy between himself and Farina. Specifically, Tuchow complains that Farina introduced Walsh to Tuchow on June 4, 1980, and the referred to cited conversations (May 21 and June 3) took place prior to the time Tuchow became a part of the conspiracy through his contacts with Farina. Tuchow argues that the evidence constitutes hearsay when used against him and that the coconspirator exception to the hearsay rule does not apply because he was not a member of the conspiracy at the time of conversations between Walsh and Farina; thus, the district court should have at least given a limiting instruction explaining to the jury that these statements could not be considered as evidence of Tuchow's involvement because he had not as of that date joined the conspiracy. The statements that Tuchow specifically complains of occurred during the taped conversations of May 21 and June 3, 1980 between Farina and Walsh. During the meeting on May 21, Farina told Walsh that it would cost Walsh $2,000 to bring someone in to handle obtaining the permit. Farina also instructed Walsh not to mention the terms of their deal to anyone, "for God's sake, don't tell people what you give me." Farina then advised Walsh that he would "take it from there. Cause I wanna drop the money first." Finally, on June 3, emploring "Don't ever show it, don't ever, please," Farina told Walsh that the $2,000 868 payment should be kept out of Walsh's business records. The government argues that these conversations were not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted (see Fed.R.Evid. Rule 801(c)), and thus do not constitute hearsay. Accordingly, the government contends that these statements were admissible against Tuchow. Anderson v. United States, 417 U.S. 211, 219-20, 94 S.Ct. 2253, 2260-61, 41 L.Ed.2d 20 (1974). [FN17]

FN17. In making its ruling on the admissibility of the co-conspirator statements, the court stated at the end of the trial: "I think there are very few so-called co-conspirator exception statements in this case. Offhand I can't think of any, but there probably are some. Most of the material to which objection was made as hearsay was not in my view hearsay because it wasn't offered for the truth of what was asserted; but if there were any statements which were offered for the truth of the assertions contained therein, then I find that by the greater weight of the evidence, those statements were made by one or the other of the alleged co-conspirators in furtherance of the conspiracy and during the course of the conspiracy and, therefore, they are admissible against each of the defendants." (Tr. 1133).

In this case, Tuchow does not analyze whether the testimony he challenged was being offered to assert the truth of the matter therein or whether it was offered simply as proof of some other matter. Specifically, the statements the defendants complain of relating to Farina's instructions to Walsh not to tell anyone of the pending deal and not to reflect on his records any of the payments made to Farina, including Farina's request for a $2,000 payment, were offered by the government for the sole purpose of explaining the nature and scope of the secretive and conspiratorial scheme to obtain the building permit and to establish the conspiracy itself. [FN18] See United States v. Magnus, 743 F.2d 517, 522 (7th Cir.1984). In Magnus, our court held that statements made by the coconspirator prior to the time he joined the conspiracy were admissible as non-hearsay evidence since the statements were not offered to prove the truth of the statements offered, but rather to set forth the illegality, nature and scope of the anticipated conspiratorial scheme. See also, United States v. Bobo, 586 F.2d 355, 372 (5th Cir.1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 976, 99 S.Ct. 1546, 59 L.Ed.2d 795 (1979).

FN18. Indeed, as stated in United States v. Gibson, 675 F.2d 825, 834 (6th Cir.1982), the proffered "statement was not hearsay under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(c): it was not offered to show that the substance of [the declarant's] utterance was either true or false. Indeed a suggestion or an order is not subject to verification at all because such utterances do not assert facts." In this case, since Farina's instructions to Walsh were not offered to prove the truth of the matters asserted therein, they did not assert facts subject to verification. Thus, these statements were not hearsay.

Further, in United States v. Santiago, 582 F.2d 1128, 1134 (7th Cir.1978), this court held that if a conspiracy is established by a preponderance of the evidence, statements made by one co-conspirator during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy may be admissible against another co-conspirator. Id. at 1134. In United States v. Coe, 718 F.2d 830 (7th Cir.1983), we explained that our ruling in Santiago did not change the law in this circuit that where the defendant later became a member of the conspiracy statements made by a co-conspirator during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy were admissible against the defendant to demonstrate the nature and objectives of the conspiracy which he subsequently joined. Id. at 839; [FN19] see also Magnus, 743 F.2d at 521; United States v. Harris, 729 F.2d 441, 448 (7th Cir.1984).

FN19. In Coe, the defendant Coe and a government informant had extensive discussions as to a possible drug deal. It was not until an April 15, 1982 telephone conversation that Coe told the informant that he (Coe) had obtained a buyer. The court held that evidence of the conversations between the > informant and Coe prior to April 15 could not be admitted under the co-conspirator rule, Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2)(E), against the defendants who later joined the conspiracy since this was insufficient evidence to establish a "joint venture" or conspiracy between Coe and the informant prior to this date. See Coe, 718 F.2d at 840.

In this case, the taped conversations clearly establishes that on May 20 Walsh 869 called Farina to arrange a meeting to discuss obtaining a building permit and that on May 21 Farina and Walsh met and entered into an agreement to obtain the illegal building permit. During the first portion of the May 21 conversation, Walsh told Farina that he needed help in "getting a building permit through" since the building had "some violations in it." Farina agreed to help if Walsh paid him $2,000. He also told Walsh that it would probably "cost you a little more ...." As required by our Coe decision, the necessary conspiracy or "joint venture" (for evidentiary purposes) between Farina and Walsh, the government informant, was established by a preponderance of the evidence at this point. Coe, 718 F.2d at 835, 840; United States v. Gil, 604 F.2d 546, 549 (7th Cir.1979). Thus, the subsequent statements made on May 21 and June 3 by Farina revealing the secretive and illegal nature of the conspiracy to obtain the building permit were admissible. Coe, 718 F.2d 839. However, we request that in the future district courts give a limiting instruction stating that while such statements may be used as evidence revealing the nature and objective of the conspiracy, such statements should not be used as independent evidence establishing the defendant's participation in the conspiracy. The fact such an instruction was not given in this case, however, was harmless error since the independent evidence establishing that Tuchow joined the conspiracy was overwhelming. See the discussion in Section III-A of this opinion.

III.

A. Sufficiency of the Evidence--Conspiracy.

[12] Tuchow and Farina both contend that there was insufficient evidence to support their conviction for conspiracy to extort money under the Hobbs Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1951. Tuchow argues that the evidence failed to establish proof of an agreement between Farina and himself and that based upon the evidence presented, it was reasonable to infer that he was acting only as an attorney representing his client in obtaining a building permit. Farina also argues that he merely introduced Walsh to Tuchow as an attorney who could represent Walsh in obtaining the building permit. The indictment in this case charged that "Martin Tuchow and Louis Farina, defendants herein, and divers [sic] other persons known and unknown to the Grand Jury, did knowingly, willfully and unlawfully ... conspire ... to commit extortion ...." In order to establish a conspiracy, the government must prove that there was an agreement between two or more persons to commit an unlawful act, that the defendant was a party to the agreement, and that an overt act was committed in furtherance of the agreement by one of the coconspirators. See, e.g., United States v. Roman, 728 F.2d 846, 859 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 104 S.Ct. 2360, 80 L.Ed.2d 832 (1984); United States v. Mayo, 721 F.2d 1084, 1088 (7th Cir.1983).

[13] Tuchow's defense at trial was that he was simply charging a fee for his professional services in helping Walsh and the Kenton partnership obtain a building permit. However, sufficient evidence was introduced to rebut this defense and establish, beyond a reasonable doubt, that an illegal conspiracy existed between Tuchow and Farina. During a June 3, 1980 phone conversation between Farina and Tuchow, Farina explained that he had a "client" with a building permit problem and that "since it's in your [Tuchow's] ward, I think you should handle it and advise." Farina then told Walsh, "he'll take it from there, and that's it .... We got the right connection." The next day, Farina introduced Walsh to Tuchow in Tuchow's office. Tuchow told Walsh that his fee "won't be exorbitant, but it will be substantial," and that additional fees would be necessary in order to obtain the building permit, "if I'm gonna take this over, there might be somebody else involved, you know .... We're grown men." Prior to this June 4 meeting, Farina informed Walsh that he would need $1,000 to pay to Tuchow and after the meeting Farina told Walsh that the fee for the permit would be considerably higher 870 than the $10,000 previously quoted to Walsh. On June 11, Walsh gave Farina $1,000 to pass along to Tuchow. Farina also told Walsh that the cost to obtain the building permit would be approximately $47,000. During a later taped conversation on June 25, Tuchow asked Walsh whether he had given Farina the $1,000 and Walsh indicated that he had done so. The following day when Walsh went to City Hall to obtain the demolition authorization letter, Tuchow affirmed that his fee would be approximately $50,000 and that while the usual practice was to "pay up front" Tuchow would accept the payment at a later date since Walsh was Farina's friend. Finally, during a taped conversation in October of 1981, Tuchow told Walsh that Farina had given him only $500.00 of the initial $1,000 payment made in early June and that he (Tuchow) had given Farina $500.00 from one of the payments that Walsh had made in July.

Given the volume of evidence in the form of taped conversations between Walsh and Tuchow as well as between Walsh and Farina, the jury was justified in rejecting Tuchow's specious claim that the $50,000 payment represented his attorney fees for his help in obtaining a simple building permit. When viewed in the light most favorable to the government, there is more than sufficient evidence in this case to support both Tuchow's and Farina's convictions for conspiracy. See Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 80, 62 S.Ct. 457, 469, 86 L.Ed. 680 (1942).

B. Interstate Commerce.

Tuchow next asserts that there was insufficient evidence introduced at trial to support his convictions under Counts IV, V, and VI charging him with attempted extortion [FN20] since Walsh was no longer involved in the Kenton Court project when he made payments to Tuchow and thus there could be no effect on interstate commerce. The Hobbs Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1951(a), provides that anyone who "in any way or degree obstructs, delays or affects commerce or the movement of any article or commodity in commerce" violates the terms of the Act. The three counts contained in the indictment charged that on July 24, 30, and October 21, 1980, Tuchow did "attempt to affect commerce ... by extortion as defined in Title 18 United States Code section 1951(b)(2), in that ... Tuchow did ... unlawfully obtain [$1,000] from Jack Walsh and J.C. Construction Co. ... said consent being induced by the wrongful use of fear of economic harm and under color of official right." [FN21]

FN20. The indictment apparently charged attempted extortion since Walsh used FBI supplied money to pay off Tuchow. See United States v. Rindone, 631 F.2d 491, 493 (7th Cir.1980).

FN21. Walsh paid Tuchow $1,000 on July 30 and October 21, 1980 and paid Tuchow $2,000 on July 24, 1980.

Walsh testified that besides performing construction work, J.C. Construction Company also did window and window frame replacements, and that the window materials were ordered from firms outside of the state of Illinois. However, the construction portion of the business, except for the Kenton Court project, had not landed a construction or remodeling contract during 1980, although Walsh testified that he continued to bid on projects until late 1980 when the company went out of business. When Walsh withdrew as the general contractor for the Kenton Court project, he was replaced by another general contractor who ordered a significant amount of supplies from outside of Illinois.

[14] Tuchow concedes that the required interstate commerce nexus needed to establish federal jurisdiction in this case is de minimis. See United States v. Mattson, 671 F.2d 1020, 1024 (7th Cir.1982) (holding that the Hobbs Act proscribes not only illegal acts that have an actual effect on interstate commerce, but also "threatened or potential effects which never materialized because extortionate demands are met"); see also United States v. Glynn, 627 F.2d 39, 41 (7th Cir.1980); United States v. Price, 617 F.2d 455, 457 (7th Cir.1979). Nevertheless, Tuchow contends 871 that no actual effect on interstate commerce was demonstrated in this case since Walsh's J.C. Construction Company was not viable as it had obtained only one construction contract, the Kenton Court project, during the time in which Walsh owned the company. [FN22] Tuchow further contends that any potential effect on interstate commerce was negated when the FBI directed Walsh to withdraw in early July from the Kenton Court project, prior to the time the actual extortion payments were made. [FN23]

FN22. Walsh purchased J.C. Construction Co. sometime in 1980.

FN23. Tuchow relies on United States v. Elder, 569 F.2d 1020 (7th Cir.1978), where our court held that the required interstate commerce nexus was not established where the indictment charged a continuing extortion and the company allegedly extorted had earlier ceased to purchase any materials outside of Illinois and had decided to dissolve during the time of the alleged extortion. For the reasons explained in this section of the opinion, the Elder decision is inapposite in this case.

Tuchow's interpretation of the indictment in this case is much too narrow since he limits his argument to the fact that Walsh and J.C. Construction Company's trade in interstate commerce was not affected by his actions. Counts IV, V, and VI of the indictment in this case charged that Tuchow attempted to "affect interstate commerce" when he extorted money from Walsh. [FN24] The indictment does not charge that Walsh and J.C. Construction Company's trade in interstate commerce was affected. Rather, all counts contained in the indictment allege that Tuchow (and Farina) had attempted by their actions to affect commerce, one of the requisite elements of the offense.

FN24. The evidence presented at trial and the instruction given to the jury concerning the required nexus between the extortion payments and the effect on interstate commerce are consistent with the theory that by blocking the building permit, Tuchow affected interstate commerce. The interstate commerce instruction given at trial for all counts charged in the indictment is as follows: "You may find that the interstate commerce element of the charge is satisfied if you find beyond a reasonable doubt: "That some of the materials which were to be used in the rehabilitation of the Kenton Court project originated or would have originated outside the state of Illinois. "In order to satisfy this element of the offense, the government need not prove that the defendant knew or intended that his actions would or could affect commerce. It is only necessary that the natural consequences of the defendant's acts would have been to probably or potentially affect commerce in any minimal way or degree. This instruction embodies the "direct" effect theory (versus the indirect or "depletion-of-assets" theory) in explaining the required interstate commerce nexus. See United States v. Mattson, 671 F.2d 1020, 1023 n. 1 (7th Cir.1982). The defendant neither objected to nor proposed any other instruction detailing the required effect on interstate commerce.

[15][16] The evidence in this case, when viewed in the light most favorable to the government, demonstrates that during the fall of 1980, when Walsh continued making extortion payments to Tuchow, Tuchow attempted to block the Kenton Court partnership's efforts to obtain a building permit. It was established at trial that the project, which was undertaken by another general contractor in the fall of 1980 shortly after Walsh withdrew, cost approximately $1.5 million and was built with over $400,000 of materials from outside of Illinois. In July, 1980, after Walsh indicated to Tuchow that he was withdrawing from the rehabilitation project, Tuchow expressed his dissatisfaction and told Walsh that he owed him money because of various commitments Tuchow had already made to other city employees. Walsh then agreed to pay Tuchow $10,000 of the original $50,000 negotiated payment. [FN25] During this conversation, Walsh informed Tuchow that the partnership was not willing to pay Tuchow's demanded fee, nor were they willing to reimburse Walsh for the money already spent. When Walsh asked Tuchow what would happen if the partnership attempted to obtain 872 the building permit, Tuchow responded, "it's up to them .... They won't get it through." Further, Noonan testified that sometime during July and October Tuchow instructed him not to authorize any transfer of the building permit. [FN26] Tuchow apparently believed that by holding up the permit during this time he was helping Walsh regain the money that Walsh had paid to Tuchow. Further, Tuchow had earlier expressed reluctance to deal with the Kenton Court partnership since he did not know the partners involved and he preferred to deal with Walsh. The logical inference from this evidence is that by blocking the permit during the fall of 1980 Tuchow was attempting to force the partnership not only to reimburse Walsh for the money Walsh already had spent, but also to force the partners to keep Walsh as their general contractor. [FN27] Certainly, the jury might very well have reasoned that Tuchow's order to block the partnership's efforts to obtain the permit during the period when Walsh was making these payments to Tuchow had a potential direct effect of interfering with the project and interstate commerce. Mattson, 671 F.2d at 1024; Rindone, 631 F.2d at 493. [FN28]

FN25. Under the Hobbs Act, as long as the payment is made to an official because of his position, an act of extortion, as defined in 18 U.S.C. § 1951(b)(2), is committed. See, e.g., United States v. Schmidt, 760 F.2d 828, 830 (7th Cir.1985); United States v. Rindone, 631 F.2d 491, 495 (7th Cir.1980).

FN26. During the conversation in which Tuchow and Walsh agreed on the $10,000 payment, Tuchow told Walsh that Walsh's withdrawing from the project had put him (Tuchow) in a "bad spot" because "I got Pat Noonan to go ahead and do that for me [issue the permit] on a promise...."

FN27. The transcript of the taped conversation between Walsh and Tuchow which occurred on October 1, 1980, reveals: TUCHOW: "See, here's where we stand with that right now. The permit's in your name. What's your company? WALSH: "J.C. Construction. TUCHOW: "J.C. Construction. And the permit is in your name. If you wanna give them your permit you can assign it to them. WALSH: "That's what I thought. TUCHOW: "Now, if they wanna go with somebody else they've got to start from scratch. They cannot get your permit. I already went up there to make sure. WALSH: "Okay, okay. TUCHOW: "I wanna put you in a position where at least let'em come to you. WALSH: "Yeah. Okay, that's what I thought too. TUCHOW: "That's exactly."

FN28. In his brief, Farina adopts by incorporation Tuchow's argument that his conviction under Counts II and III must be reversed as interstate commerce was not affected by his actions. Although not clearly set forth in his brief, we reject his apparent challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence on these counts. His indictment charges that he affected commerce when he extorted money from Walsh on June 3 and 11. At this time Walsh was clearly acting on behalf of the Kenton Court partnership which was about to invest considerable sums of money in the rehabilitation project. As indicated, the project did eventually use over $400,000 of materials from outside the State of Illinois. Thus, Farina's actions did have a potential effect on interstate commerce.

C. Kenton Court Partnership.

[17] Count VII of the indictment charged that Tuchow attempted to extort $25,000 from Golding and the Kenton Court partnership. Tuchow again argues that his relationship with Golding was one of an attorney and client and thus there was insufficient evidence to support the jury's verdict under Count VII.

In the late summer of 1980, Golding met with Tuchow in an attempt to obtain the building permit. During their initial meeting Tuchow originally demanded $50,000; however, Tuchow agreed to accept a $25,000 payment instead. Tuchow points to the fact that Golding, who testified as a hostile witness for the government, considered the requested $25,000 payment as a legal fee for Tuchow's work in representing the partnership in related real estate and tax matters. However, this testimony was contradicted by Golding's earlier Grand Jury testimony wherein Golding testified that he never hired Tuchow as his attorney; that he believed he was being extorted by Tuchow's request for $25,000; and that be believed the partnership would not have obtained the permit but for Tuchow's help. Further, Golding testified that Tuchow told him that he needed the $25,000 to "take care of some people." After the partners agreed to pay this amount, the building permit was finally issued to their new general contractor late in the fall 873 of 1980. Viewing the evidence presented in the light most favorable to the government, sufficient evidence was introduced to affirm Tuchow's conviction on this extortion count.

IV.

Tuchow next argues that he was deprived of a fair trial because of the court's unprovoked hostility and bias toward his defense counsel. He also claims that the jury was improperly instructed with respect to the issue of reputation evidence and that he was denied his right of allocution as required by Fed.R.Crim.P. 32(a)(1).

The defendant argues that the court expressed such hostility toward his attorney at trial that his defense was unduly prejudiced. The first incident occurred when Tuchow's attorney objected to Art Radek's testimony concerning what Walsh had told Radek during an earlier meeting. The court instructed the jury that this evidence was not being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted in Walsh's statements made to Radek, but was instead offered to prove the fact that the statements had been made. The court explained to Tuchow's attorney that "I understand your objection is continuing." Tuchow's attorney then made a series of objections during Radek's testimony regarding other conversations that Radek had with Walsh, Noonan, and Kaplan. The court instructed counsel that its same ruling applied to these conversations. After another objection, the court and Tuchow's attorney engaged in the following exchange:

MR. CROWLEY: "Your Honor, I don't know if it is necessary for me to repeat the objection as to each one of these separate conversations.
THE COURT: "No, it isn't.
MR. CROWLEY: "All right.
THE COURT: "And this is almost entirely nonhearsay anyway, and to the extent it might have some material that requires an instruction to the jury, I have given that instruction.
MR. MURTAUGH: "Just so the record is clear, Mr. Farina joins in the objection.
THE COURT: "Yes, all right. Now, the point of handling these things in advance is to avoid interrupting the flow of the testimony. Now, let's not interrupt the flow of the testimony unnecessarily to raise objections that I have already indicated are standing objections.
The record is clear, proceed.
MR. CROWLEY: "Your Honor, so that the record is clear, I have a standing objection--
THE COURT: "The record is clear. Proceed, Mr. Schweitzer.
MR. CROWLEY: "All right, thank you.
BY MR. SCHWEITZER:
"Q: Sir. when did you speak--
THE COURT: "The record was clear before we ever entered into this courtroom, and you know it. "Proceed."

The second incident occurred during the cross-examination of Herzog, a witness who testified as to Tuchow's "other acts" during the time of the alleged extortion. During this cross-examination, Tuchow's counsel began to ask Herzog whether he knew if Tuchow was married, had any children, and if he was aware that Tuchow had gone to law school late in life. At this point, the trial court judge interrupted (apparently the government's attorney was already on his feet ready to object) and informed Tuchow's attorney that he was not going to allow this line of questioning since it was not within the scope of direct examination. When Tuchow's counsel attempted to explain what he was trying to accomplish, the judge then requested a sidebar "to see what the next question is going to be." Tuchow's attorney told the court that "I am going to go to a different area, your Honor." And the court responded "I'm going to have to screen the questions if I cannot trust you to ask proper questions. Come on over." At the sidebar Tuchow's counsel argued that since the government attorney had asked Golding if he knew whether Tuchow was a lawyer and a ward committeeman he was also entitled to ask 874 Golding questions about Tuchow's status. The district court told Tuchow's counsel that his questions had nothing to do with what was asked during direct examination and that if he did ask such questions he would "sit" on the attorney "good and hard ... in the presence of the jury ...."

[18] After reviewing the record, we conclude that the judge's statements made in the presence of the jury fail to rise to a level of prejudicial error. As to the first incident, after the initial encounter between the judge and defense counsel, concerning counsel's continuing objection, the defense counsel explained to the district court that he had misunderstood that the district court considered his objections to be continuing throughout Radek's testimony. After hearing this explanation the district court apologized to defense counsel for the misunderstanding and then later explained to the jury that "I am satisfied that Mr. Crowley ... was not being intentionally disruptive. I apologized to him at that time for the remark I made, and I now request that you too disregard that remark." The judge's original remarks did not appear to be harsh and his subsequent apology to defense counsel and explanation to the jury certainly eliminated any possible prejudice.

[19] As to the second occurrence, it appears that defense counsel was attempting to introduce evidence of Tuchow's background through Herzog, as Tuchow elected not to testify in this case. The defense counsel breached the boundary of permissible cross-examination since these questions were well beyond the scope of direct examination. A trial court must necessarily be granted wide latitude in determining the proper scope of cross-examination, see, e.g., United States ex rel. Blackwell v. Franzen, 688 F.2d 496, 500 (7th Cir.1982), and in this case the district court determined that the defense counsel's cross-examination exceeded the permissible boundary. While the district court's comment in front of the jury that he would have to "screen defense counsel's questions if I cannot trust you to ask proper questions" appears, in isolation, to be a harsh admonishment, our review of the record reveals that this single comment taken in the context of the entire three-week long trial, in which the proof of guilt was substantial, failed to prejudice the defendant's case. See United States v. Sennett, 505 F.2d 774, 779 (7th Cir.1974); cf. United States v. Blakey, 607 F.2d 779, 788 (7th Cir.1979). [FN29]

> FN29. Tuchow further alleges that the district court's treatment of the defense counsel's objections during trial, as compared to that of the government's, indicated an unfavorable slant toward the government's case. However, after reviewing the record, and specifically those areas of concern to the defendant, we find his argument to be without merit.

[20] Tuchow also claims that the jury was improperly instructed with respect to the issue of reputation evidence. During trial Tuchow had several witnesses testify as to his good character. The contested jury instruction read in part:

> "The circumstances may be such that evidence of good character may alone create a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt, or although without it the other evidence would be convincing. However, evidence of good reputation should not constitute an excuse to acquit the defendant, if the jury, after weighing all the evidence including the evidence of good character is convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty of the crime charged in the indictment."

Tuchow relies on United States v. Leigh, 513 F.2d 784 (5th Cir.1975), where the Fifth Circuit ruled that similar language as that italicized above was improper and constituted reversible error. However, in United States v. Picketts, 655 F.2d 837, 842 (7th Cir.1981), we distinguished the Leigh case and held that the same instruction as given in this case was proper. See also United States v. Hyman, 741 F.2d 906, 910-11 (7th Cir.1984) citing Picketts with approval. While we would ask that district courts use the Seventh Circuit Pattern Instruction which does not employ the "excuse to acquit" language, the fact that such language 875 is used in the instruction does not constitute reversible error as long as the phrase "including the evidence of good character" is included in the instruction. Picketts, 655 F.2d at 842; see also Fed.Crim. Jury Instructions of the Seventh Circuit, § 3.15 (1980).

[21] Finally, we hold that since both the government and the defendants agree that Tuchow and Farina were denied the right of allocution under Fed.R.Crim.P. 32(a)(1)(C) at the sentencing hearings, this case must be remanded back to the district court to allow the defendants the opportunity to make a statement on their own behalf before the sentence is imposed.

V.

We affirm the defendants' convictions on all counts and remand this case back to the district court to allow the defendants an opportunity to exercise their right of allocution.

MEMORANDUM OF THE UNITED STATES IN SUPPORT OF ADMISSION OF TESTIMONY OF DANNY R. PITTS AND MARSHALL GRANT REGARDING STATEMENTS OF JOHN HALEY AND LETTERS WRITTEN ON BEHALF OF TUCKER BY HALEY

The United States of America, by Kenneth W. Starr, Independent Counsel, respectfully submits this Memorandum of Law in support of the admission of testimony by witnesses Danny R. Pitts and Marshall Grant -- representatives of the Resolution Trust Corporation -- as well as certain letters received by Pitts and Grant. Defendant Jim Guy Tucker, through the oral and written communications of his personal attorney, John H. Haley, made admissions to Pitts and Grant in discussions regarding Tucker's outstanding $260,000 personal loan from Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association ("MGSL").

Pitts and Grant should be permitted to testify as to these statements, and the relevant documents should be admitted into evidence. Tucker specifically authorized his attorney, Haley, to communicate with Pitts and Grant regarding this debt and attempt to resolve any RTC claims against Tucker. As Tucker's authorized agent and attorney, Haley's written and oral statements to Pitts and Grant constitute admissions of a party-opponent -- Tucker -- and are not hearsay.

BACKGROUND

Pitts and Grant were employees of Financial Conservators, Inc. ("FCI") of Tulsa, Oklahoma. FCI contracted with the Resolution Trust Corporation ("RTC") to attempt to recover unpaid commercial loans made by financial institutions held in receivership by the RTC, including Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan Association ("MGSL"). Among the outstanding debts FCI assigned Grant and Pitts to collect was a personal loan for $260,000 extended by MGSL to Tucker. In January 1992, Pitts contacted Tucker personally with regard to this debt. (Exh. 1) Over the next year, Haley communicated with Grant and Pitts on Tucker's behalf both orally and through written correspondence concerning Tucker's liability. (Exhs. 2 & 3) Tucker settled with the RTC in March 1993.

ARGUMENT

A. Haley's statements to Grant and Pitts constitute admissions of a party-opponent

As Tucker's attorney, specifically representing and speaking for Tucker, Haley's statements to representatives and agents of the RTC, in the course of Tucker's negotiations with the RTC, are not hearsay and are admissible as admissions of a party-opponent. Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2) states that "[a] statement is not hearsay if . . . [t]he statement is offered against a party and is . . . a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship." Plainly, Haley was Tucker's agent, authorized to make statements to the RTC on Tucker's behalf regarding Tucker's indebtedness to the RTC. See Letter, John H. Haley to Marshall K. Grant (Nov. 25, 1992) (Exhibit 3) ("Jim Guy Tucker has asked me to explore the possibilities of a settlement with you.").

Statements made by an attorney employed by a party-opponent in the course of representing his client in a particular matter therefore do not constitute hearsay, as attorneys are authorized to make statements and are considered agents of the party-opponent. See, e.g., Michael H. Graham, Federal Practice and Procedure § 6723 (1992) ("An attorney may, of course, act as an ordinary agent and as such make evidentiary admissions admissible against his principal, Rule 801(d)(2)(C) and (D)") (note omitted, collecting cases); McCormick on Evidence § 259 at 163-64 (4th ed. 1992) ("These admissions occur, for example, in letters or oral conversations made in the course of efforts for the collection or resistance of claims, or settlement negotiations, or the management of any other business in behalf of the client.") (note omitted, collecting cases).

The Eighth Circuit recognizes that statements of attorneys speaking on behalf of their clients do not constitute hearsay. United States v. Ojala, 544 F.2d 940, 946 (8th Cir. 1976) ("the statements were made in an unequivocal manner by one who was acting as appellant's attorney at the time, and . . . they referred to a matter within the scope of the attorney's authority"); United States v. Scott, 804 F.2d 104, 108 (8th Cir. 1986) (following Ojala). As the cases collected in the treatises cited above illustrate, the federal courts consistently follow the same rule. See also, e.g., United States v. Brandon, 50 F.3d 464, 468-69 (7th Cir. 1995) (defendant's attorney's written response to subpoena admissible as admission of party-opponent under Fed. R. Evid. 801(d)(2)(D); statement did not implicate assistance of counsel, self-incrimination or privilege issues); United States v. Martin, 773 F.2d 579, 583-84 (4th Cir. 1985) (defendant's attorney's statements to IRS auditor admissible; attorney "was authorized to make statements concerning [defendant's] taxes in the scope of his representation").

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the United States submits that the testimony of Marshall Grant and Danny R. Pitts regarding statements of John Haley, Defendant Jim Guy Tucker's attorney, made in the course of Haley's representation of Tucker concerning Tucker's debts to the RTC, should be admitted into evidence. Similarly, the Court should admit the letters written by Haley to representatives of the RTC in the course of that representation.

Subject: Rule 408 Issue

Communication with FCI began when they contacted Tucker personally by telephone in 1/92. Communication continued by phone, in person, and by letters until the debt was settled in 3/93.

The admissions we want to introduce by Tucker and Haley were in the course of these discussions, the goal of which was to settle the outstanding obligation. They include admissions that (1) the loan was tied to other financing; (2) Tucker did not want to buy the property; and (3) Tucker agreed to buy the property at an inflated price in order to obtain other financing.

Tucker may claim that Fed. R. Evidence 408 prohibits admission of "conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations." It would be very useful for us to have a case that stands for the proposition that although such statements are inadmissible in civil suits over the amount or legitimacy of the debt, they are admissible in collateral litigation in which the issue is not the legitimacy of the debt but the motivation for creating it. The Rule is not intended to immunize a defendant from criminal liability for statements that he makes in the course of settlement negotiations. The commentary to the Rule provides little help, however.

We are using this evidence to prove that (1) Tucker agreed to take out the loan only because it was tied to other financing within the scope of the conspiracy; (2) he did not ever intend to repay the loan personally; and (3) he knew the property was overvalued when he bought it.

Madison bought the 34 acres in 10/85 for $18,800. Tucker bought the property less than one month later for $125,000. As 2/3 owner of CSW Corporation Tucker bought the CSW utility in 2/86 for $1.2 million with 100% financing; $150,000 from CMS and $1.05 million from MGSL. By 7/86, CSW was insolvent and unable to make payments on its loans. Ultimately, the CSW loan balance was cut in half in 10/87. Tucker set up Southloop Construction Corp. as a subsidiary of CSW in 6/87 and then "sold" the 34 acre property to Southloop in 10/87. He obtained an additional $100,000 cash by arranging for Southloop to mortgage the property to CMS, which therefore had some $360,000 in debt against it.

When it came time to pay what was owed on the original $260,000 loan and he believed the scrutiny was over, Mr. Tucker gave an explanation of this loan that was completely inconsistent with the representations he previously had made to the MGSL Board, to his own law partners, to FHLBB examiners, and to auditors. His admissions reveal the true nature of the conspiracy. They also are inconsistent with the representations of Mr. Tucker in this courtroom, where he said that he was in good financial condition and didn't need to borrow money from Madison:

1. Mr. Sutton told jury in his opening statement that Mr. Tucker had willingly repaid his loans and that there was no fraud involved. We will prove that Mr. Sutton was mistaken. Mr. Tucker did not willingly repay the $260,000 loan, and he admitted that there was fraud involved.

2. Mr. Brown stated in his cross -examination of Mr. Denton that Mr. Tucker was in good financial condition in the fall of 1985. That also is untrue. Mr. Tucker admitted that he agreed to purchase property for an inflated price in return for financing that he needed from MGSL.

This is strong probative evidence of Mr. Tucker's intent in his own words and the words of his authorized agent. The jury deserves to hear the truth and F.R.E. 408 does not exclude such highly probative evidence.

FN20. Cf. United States v. Beechum, 582 F.2d 898 (5th Cir.1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 920, 99 S.Ct. 1244, 59 L.Ed.2d 472 (1979):
The standard for the admissibility of extrinsic offense evidence is that of [Fed.R.Evid.] 104(b): "the preliminary fact can be decided by the judge against the proponent only where the jury could not reasonably find the preliminary fact to exist."
582 F.2d at 913.

[14] In light of our discussion regarding the similarity of the prior acts to the acts in issue here, we find the other acts to be sufficiently "similar in kind and reasonably 450 close in time to the charge at trial" to be admissible. See United States v. Two Eagle, 633 F.2d 93, 96 (8th Cir.1980). We find no error in the trial court's admission of evidence of prior acts.

VI. Local 238's Settlement Agreement with the NLRB.

[14] Before criminal charges were filed by the Department of Justice, the NLRB began an investigation into the activities of Local 238 at the D & A construction site. The investigation ended when the NLRB and Local 238 entered into a formal settlement stipulation, whereby Local 238 agreed to cease its disputed activities at the D & A site, and refund the fees paid by certain non-union drivers. Local 238 expressly noted in the stipulation that it was not admitting that it had violated the National Labor Relations Act.

At trial the government offered into evidence two exhibits containing the settlement agreement, and the testimony of an NLRB attorney concerning the circumstances surrounding the agreement. The trial court admitted the evidence over the defendants' objections.

The defendants argue on appeal that evidence of the settlement stipulation was irrelevant and immaterial, since the defendants were not parties to the agreement, and therefore should not have been admitted. Defendants also contend that evidence of the settlement stipulation was inadmissible under Fed.R.Evid. 408. [FN21] The government counters that the defendants, on cross-examination of drivers who had received the refunds, placed in issue the circumstances surrounding the refunds, and therefore the government was entitled to introduce evidence of the settlement stipulation to explain fully the circumstances in which Local 238 made the refunds. [FN22]

FN21. That rule provides:
Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. This rule also does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

Fed.R.Evid. 408.

FN22. The government also argues on appeal that the defendants did not object on the ground that admission of the evidence would violate rule 408, and therefore the issue is not preserved for appeal. See Fed.R.Evid. 103(a)(1). Because we find that the evidence was admissible even assuming the defendants properly objected, we need not reach this issue.

To determine whether the trial court properly admitted evidence of the settlement stipulation, we must decide first, whether the evidence was relevant to an issue in the lawsuit, and second, whether rule 408 prohibited admission of the evidence.

During the trial, on direct examination, the government asked driver J.W. Coon whether the money he used to pay Local 238's fee came from his own pocket or whether he was reimbursed for it. Coon responded that he was not "reimbursed" until some time later, when Local 238 mailed him a check refunding the fee he had paid at the D & A site.

The prosecutor asked another driver, Charles Boyd, whether he had received anything from Local 238 after he had paid the fee and had left the D & A site. Boyd responded that he was uncertain whether he had received a newsletter or anything similar, but Local 238 had sent him a refund of the fees he had paid. The prosecutor followed this response with a question as to whether Boyd had ever received anything else from Local 238, and whether he wanted to be a member of Local 238. On cross-examination, defense counsel asked Boyd whether he had sent the refund to the trucking company that had paid the fee. Boyd responded that when he received the 451 refund he was no longer associated with the trucking company that paid the fee, so he kept the refund.

On the direct examination of Charles Higgs, another driver, the prosecutor asked him if he knew why he received a refund from the union, and if he knew from whom he had received the refund. Higgs answered "no" to both questions. On cross-examination, defense counsel showed Higgs a copy of the refund check, whereupon Higgs stated that he received the refund from the defendant Wilford, and from Local 238.

Subsequent to this testimony, the prosecutor sought to introduce evidence of the settlement stipulation "to explain the situation involving those [refunds], why the [refunds] were made, who they went to, the amount, and generally [to] explain to the jury under what circumstances [these refunds were] made to these truck drivers...."

Because the defense counsel placed the refunds in issue, the government was entitled to explain to the jury the circumstances surrounding the refunds. The prosecutor's questions on direct examination to drivers Coon and Boyd were not intended to examine whether and why the drivers had received refunds; the prosecutor inquired of Coon whether he had been reimbursed for the fee he had paid, and inquired of Boyd whether he had received any materials or benefits from Local 238, and whether he wanted to be a member of Local 238. When defense counsel on cross-examination inquired of the drivers whether they had kept the refunds themselves, and elicited a response from Higgs that the refund had come from Local 238 and the defendant Wilford, he placed in issue the matter of under what circumstances the refunds were made. As a result, the government was entitled to show that the refunds in fact stemmed from an agreement by Local 238 with the NLRB. Thus, we conclude the evidence of the settlement stipulation was relevant to an issue in the lawsuit.

We also find that rule 408 does not bar admission of the evidence. That rule provides that evidence of compromise or offers to compromise "is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount." The rule expressly states that it "does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose...." Fed.R.Evid. 408. In this case evidence of the settlement stipulation was offered to explain the circumstances surrounding the refunds, not to show that Local 238 violated the National Labor Relations Act. The defendants were further protected from any inference of guilt by the provision in the stipulation which stated that Local 238 did not admit to any violation by entering into the stipulation.

We therefore conclude that the trial court properly admitted evidence of the settlement stipulation.

VII. Denial of the Defendants' Request for Surrebuttal.

The defendants argue that a witness presented by the government during its rebuttal brought forward new facts not raised earlier, and that the defendants were entitled to present evidence on surrebuttal to counter the witness' testimony and to impeach his credibility. The trial court sustained the government's objection to surrebuttal by the defendants.

The witness, an investigator for the NLRB, testified as to his observation of events taking place at the Pittsburgh-Des Moines Steel Co. site (discussed in section V supra). The government's stated purpose in offering the investigator's testimony was to show the similarity of the Pittsburgh-Des Moines incident to the incident for which the defendants were being tried. The defendants argue that they were entitled to present evidence in surrebuttal

v.
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD, Respondent.
No. 82-1719.
United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.
Submitted April 12, 1983.
Decided Oct. 4, 1983.

A petition was filed seeking review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board finding that an employer committed numerous unfair labor practices in connection with strike. The Court of Appeals, Bright, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) the employer was not denied a fair hearing on the unfair labor practice charges; (2) the sending of a letter was not an unfair labor practice where the letter did not necessarily operate as a discharge letter; (3) the denial of seniority to returning strikers was an unfair labor practice; (4) the employer's withdrawal of recognition converted an economic strike to an unfair labor practice strike; (5) the record supported the finding that the employer attempted to coerce an employee into restricting his participation in organizational activities; and (6) although after November 1, because the subject matter on the picket signs remained the same, and the strikers affirmed that they would not return until the Union and V-H agreed on a contract.

[12] Whatever goals the strikers hoped to accomplish by striking, V-H's withdrawal of recognition clearly prolonged the strike, because it put an end to contract negotiations. To our knowledge, this strike has never been formally settled, and that failure is directly attributable to V-H's premature withdrawal of recognition. Substantial evidence therefore supports the Board's finding of conversion to an unfair labor practice strike on November 1.

D. Lindhorst.

V-H disputes the Board's finding that it violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) by making Lindhorst's reinstatement conditional on his resignation from union office. V-H contends that the violation is not supported by substantial evidence, but even if it were, V-H argues, the backpay award was inappropriate, because the complaint charged a violation of section 8(a)(1) only. [FN6]

FN6. In fact, at the hearing, the general counsel specifically denied that the Board sought backpay for Lindhorst on section 8(a)(3) grounds. We address the Board's failure to seek relief under section 8(a)(3) in our discussion of the appropriate remedy, Section E, infra.

[13] With respect to the Board's findings of fact, this issue turns entirely on credibility determinations. The Board specifically 277 credited Lindhorst's version of the reinstatement offer, and we find no ground for overturning the Board's credibility determinations in this case. The question has arisen also whether evidence relating to the reinstatement discussions should have been admitted at all, since one might characterize the discussions as compromise negotiations within the scope of Fed.R.Evid. 408. [FN7] But Rule 408 excludes evidence of settlement offers only if such evidence is offered to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim under negotiation. To the extent that the evidence is offered for another purpose, and to the extent that either party makes an independent admission of fact, the evidence is admissible.

FN7. Under 29 U.S.C. s 160(b), the NLRB must conduct its hearings in accordance with the Federal Rules of Evidence, "so far as [is] practicable." But though the federal rules carry great weight, they do not absolutely bind on the NLRB. See, e.g., NLRB v. Maywood Do-Nut Co., Inc., 659 F.2d 108, 110 (9th Cir.1981) (per curiam).

[14] In this case, the demand that Lindhorst resign his union office arose in the context of negotiations to settle his discharge grievance. The discharge claim is not at issue in this proceeding. Accordingly any statements V-H made in the course of the negotiations are not excludable under Rule 408. With the admission of those statements, the record clearly supports the finding that V-H attempted to coerce Lindhorst into restricting his participation in organizational activities, in violation of section 8(a)(1).

E. Remedy.

V-H contends that the remedy the NLRB imposed is punitive, not remedial, and therefore should not be enforced. V-H argues that Lindhorst is not entitled to backpay from October 3, and that none of those still on strike should receive either backpay or reinstatement. We think the remedy was overbroad with respect to Lindhorst, but not with respect to the other strikers.

[15][16] The NLRB's general counsel charged V-H on Lindhorst's account under section 8(a)(1) only, and specifically denied at the hearing that it sought backpay for Lindhorst from the time of the October 3 resignation demand. See n. 6 supra. The NLRB erred in awarding backpay and reinstatement from October 3, because the strike had not been abandoned at that point, and did not become an unfair labor practice strike until November 1. From November 1, however, all strikers including Lindhorst are entitled to reinstatement and backpay. V-H argues that the strikers who never abandoned the strike are not entitled to reinstatement or backpay. We disagree. V-H itself guaranteed that the strike would never be resolved when it withdrew its recognition of the Union. It cannot now escape responsibility for its unfair labor practices by arguing that the strikers did not settle, since V-H's refusal to negotiate is itself part of the reason they still remain on strike.

III. Conclusion.

We enforce the Board's order in part and deny enforcement in part, in accordance with this opinion.

James T. CRUES, Appellant,
v.
KFC CORPORATION, Appellee.
No. 84-2317.
United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.
Submitted April 12, 1985.
Decided July 16, 1985.

Action was filed for fraudulent misrepresentation in connection with purchase of restaurant franchise. On posttrial motions, the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, William N. Hungate, J., 546 F.Supp. 217, held, inter alia, that franchise had failed to submit evidence of legal malice sufficient to support punitive damages claim, that evidence of lost profits was not speculative, and that franchisee was liable for unpaid royalties. Both parties appealed. Following remand by the Court of Appeals, 729 F.2d 1145, the District Court, William S. Bahn, Magistrate Judge, entered judgment on jury verdict in favor of franchisor, and franchisee appealed. The Court of Appeals, John R. Gibson, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) instruction that jury could find that, even if franchisee had reasonably relied compromise under Fed.R.Evid. 408.

[6] [7] [8] The admission of this evidence is grounds for reversal only if the district court abused its discretion. There is abundant support for the court's decision. First, the evidence introduced by KFC was cumulative; Crues had proved the offer during his case-in-chief. Second, the initial offer was made more than three years before the lawsuit was filed. Rule 408 applies only to an offer to compromise a "claim," and it is not clear that Crues had a claim against KFC in August 1977. To the contrary, his actions at that time showed his intent to proceed with the fish franchise. That the same offer was made after litigation commenced is not a reason to exclude proof of the offer in its initial context. Third, Crues cites no federal cases holding that Rule 408 applies to admissions of compromise against the offeree. The rule is concerned with excluding proof of compromise to show liability of the offeror. C. McCormick, McCormick on 234 Evidence s 264, at 712 (E. Cleary 3d ed. 1984). KFC submitted the offer to show that Crues was unreasonable in relying on the initial representation in continuing the fish operation. This use of evidence violates neither the spirit nor the letter of Rule 408. See Vulcan Hart Corp. v. NLRB, 718 F.2d 269, 277 (8th Cir.1983).

IV.

[9] Finally, we deal with the issue of costs. On September 7, 1984, KFC filed a bill of costs for $7,628.74 with the district court. On September 9,

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Dec. 11, 1990.

Contract vendee brought breach of contract suit against vendor for unreasonably withholding its consent to resale of property. The United States District Court for the District of South Dakota, Donald J. Porter, Chief Judge, entered judgment on jury verdict in favor of contract vendor, and vendee appealed. The Court of Appeals, Wollman, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) letters exchanged during settlement negotiations were admissible to rebut testimony that vendor never gave reasons for conditions it imposed on its consent to proposed resale, and (2) refusal to admit testimony of certified public accountant, who would have testified as to adverse tax consequences of vendor's proposals for obtaining its consent, was not error.

FN* The HONORABLE DANIEL M. FRIEDMAN, United States Senior Circuit Judge for the Federal Circuit, sitting by designation.

WOLLMAN, Circuit Judge.

Ella Freidus appeals from the district court's [FN1] judgment entered upon a jury verdict in favor of the First National Bank of Council Bluffs, Iowa, in Freidus' diversity suit for breach of contract. We affirm.

FN1. The Honorable Donald J. Porter, Chief Judge, United States District Court for the District of South Dakota.

I.

In 1987, Freidus, a resident of New York, purchased farm land in South Dakota from the bank on a contract for deed. In the summer of 1988, the bank commenced foreclosure because Freidus' annual payment was late. The parties settled the foreclosure action in March 1989. The settlement stipulation increased the interest rate on the contract from 7% to 8.5% and deleted the 60-day grace period on missed payments. Freidus collected a portion of the settlement money paid to the bank from a one-year lease of the land with an option to purchase held by Danielski Farming and Harvesting.

Upon reinstatement of the contract, Freidus requested consent from the bank to sell the land to Danielski as required by paragraph 16 of the contract for deed, which provides in part:

> Assignment. [Freidus] shall not assign this Contract or any interest therein, or any interest of the property purchased hereunder unless [the bank] first consents to such assignment in writing, which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld.

The bank responded to Freidus' request with terms for the sale in an April 20, 1989, letter that proposed that:

> (1) The bank would receive Danielski's down payment in the year of sale, approximately $400,000, and would credit that against the balance due on the contract.
> (2) The remaining balance on Freidus' contract would be reamortized to provide for a market rate of interest, not less than 10.5%, and the bank would receive all Danielski's payments until Freidus discharged its obligation to the bank in full.
> (3) Freidus would pay the bank a 1% processing fee and reimburse the bank for costs and attorney's fees.

Freidus perceived this proposal as an unreasonable refusal to consent to the sale of the land to Danielski and sued the bank for breach of contract. On May 9, 1989, the bank sent another letter indicating the bank's final position on consent to the sale would allow the interest rate to remain at 8.5% and require half of the down payment in the year of sale.

In August 1989, the parties attempted to settle the litigation through a series of letters. The proposed settlement was conditioned upon completing the sale to Danielski. In December 1989, Danielski refused to close the transaction because of delay and changes to the contract. The case went to trial in March 1990. The jury found that the bank had not withheld consent to the sale unreasonably, and the district court entered judgment for the bank.

II.

Freidus argues that several evidentiary rulings by the district court constituted an abuse of discretion. We give substantial deference to the district court's rulings on the admissibility of evidence, and we will not find error in the absence of a clear showing of abuse of discretion. Harris v. Mallinckrodt, Inc., 886 F.2d 170, 171 (8th Cir.1989).

[1] Freidus first challenges the district court's admission into evidence of two letters, Exhibits 19 and 20, exchanged during settlement negotiations between the parties in August 1989. Under Federal Rule of *795 Evidence 408, documents manifesting an attempt to settle litigation are not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of a claim or its amount. Rule 408 does not, however, exclude "evidence offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution." Fed.R.Evid. 408.

The bank offered Exhibits 19 and 20 to rebut the testimony of Jacob Freidus, Ella's husband and agent. Jacob Freidus testified that the bank never gave any reason for its conditions on consent to the sale, "even up to this date," meaning to the date of trial. Exhibit 19, a letter from the bank's attorney to Freidus' attorney, explained the financial information the bank required before accepting Danielski as the assignee of Freidus' interest in the land. Exhibit 20, a letter from Freidus' attorney to the bank's attorney, outlined Freidus' understanding of alternative ways to bring Danielski to close the sale and requested concessions from the bank on the interest rate and other terms. The district court reasoned that the letters "negativ[ed] a contention of undue delay" by Freidus, and therefore admitted the letters under Rule 408.

We conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the challenged exhibits. The jury could well find that the letters, when read together, constituted a plausible explanation for the bank's unwillingness to immediately accede to Freidus' requested consent to assignment of her interest in the contract. Without question, the letters served to rebut Jacob Freidus' testimony that "even up to this date" the bank had failed to give any reasons for the conditions it had imposed on giving its consent, testimony that left unrebutted would have been devastating to the bank's position that it had not unduly delayed giving its consent. Accordingly, the challenged evidence was properly admissible under Rule 408.

[2] Freidus next argues that the district court should have admitted the testimony of a certified public accountant explaining the potentially adverse tax consequences of the bank's April and May proposals. We agree with the district court that the relevance of such evidence was tenuous at best. Federal Rule of Evidence 403 permits a district court to exclude otherwise admissible evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger that the evidence might confuse the issues or mislead the jury. We recognize the wide discretion placed in, and the deference that must be given to, a trial judge in making a ruling under Rule 403, Hicks v. Mickelson, 835 F.2d 721, 726 (8th Cir.1987), and accordingly will not disturb the district court's ruling here.

Finally, Freidus contends that the district court abused its discretion in revising jury instruction 13A and in answering a question from the jury as it did. We disagree with Freidus' contention that the instruction misdirected the jury. In fact, instruction as given is not materially different from Freidus' proposed instruction. Freidus' challenge to the district court's answer to the jury's question is without merit.

The district court's judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Jack R. PREWITT and Joseph V. Smillie, Defendants-Appellants.

Nos. 93-3153, 93-3796.

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit.

Argued June 9, 1994.

Decided Aug. 29, 1994.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Indiana, Sarah Evans Barker, Chief Judge, of mail fraud as either principals or aiders and abettors, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Shabaz, District Judge, sitting by designation, held that: (1) trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted statements defendant made during compromise negotiations with Securities Division of the Indiana Secretary of State's Office, and (2) defendant's prior mail fraud convictions were admissible.

Affirmed.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

On October 28, 1992 defendants Joseph V. Smillie, Jack R. Prewitt and Donald F. Leuck were indicted by a federal grand jury in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Indiana on five counts of mail fraud as either principals or aiders and abettors pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §§ 1342 and 2. The case was assigned to the Honorable Sarah Evans Barker, United States District Judge.

The motion of defendant Jack R. Prewitt to dismiss the indictment against him was denied by the district court on March 16, 1993. The motion of defendant Joseph V. Smillie to sever his trial was denied on January 21, 1993, renewed on March 19, 1993, and once again denied on March 22, 1993.

Trial commenced March 22, 1993, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty on all counts on March 26, 1993. On August 11, 1993 Prewitt filed a motion to vacate convictions and/or motion to dismiss indictment which was denied by the district court on August 26, 1993. Defendants Smillie and Prewitt appeal their convictions.

438 FACTS

Defendant Jack R. Prewitt was indicted on June 6, 1988 in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Indiana on charges of mail fraud and filing a false tax return in Case No. S CR 88-37. On March 8, 1990, he was indicted in said district on mail fraud charges in Case No. S CR 90-11. On May 2, 1990 he pled guilty to two counts of mail fraud and one count of filing a false tax return pursuant to a plea agreement which contained the following language:

> The United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Indiana agrees that no further charges will be brought against me in the Northern District of Indiana arising out of my dealings in Mid-Continent, the Riley Agency or Chubb Insurance Group or any other affiliated companies.

On September 11, 1990 Thomas O. Plouff, Assistant United States Attorney for the Northern District of Indiana, advised defendant's attorney Patrick A. Tuite that the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana was investigating alleged criminal conduct by defendant Prewitt that victimized individuals in both the Northern and Southern Districts of Indiana. Plouff stated that his office would abide by the plea agreement and not prosecute defendant Prewitt in the Northern District of Indiana for any of this activity. Postal Inspector Thomas Burnham was employed in Indianapolis, Indiana, and investigated defendant Prewitt's activities in both the Northern and Southern Districts of Indiana.

On October 22, 1990 defendant Prewitt was convicted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Indiana for two counts of mail fraud and one count of filing a false tax return pursuant to his aforesaid guilty plea. He was sentenced to concurrent prison terms of three years on the mail fraud counts and a sentence of three years probation on the tax count.

In 1987 defendant Jack V. Smillie founded Sterling American Financial Group, Inc. (Sterling), a corporation intended to oversee a group of businesses related to the insurance industry. Between December 1989 and April 1990 defendant Smillie, defendant Prewitt and Donald F. Leuck made a series of sales presentations to prospective investors in Sterling.

The Securities Division of the Indiana Secretary of State's Office began an investigation of Sterling in March 1990. The Division issued a cease and desist order against the defendants and Sterling on April 2, 1990. After receiving this order Sterling ceased doing business and commenced settlement and compromise efforts with the Securities Division. Defendant Smillie was interviewed by investigators from the Division on May 15, 1990 and July 2, 1990.

According to the October 28, 1992 indictment defendant Smillie withdrew approximately $281,000 of the $282,000 which Sterling had received from investors between December 1989 until May 1990. The majority of these funds were used for the personal benefit of defendants Smillie, Prewitt and Leuck.

At trial investors testified concerning their interactions with Sterling. Postal Inspector Burnham offered a number of financial records into evidence. Robert Lott, an Investigator for the Indiana Securities Division, testified concerning statements made to him by defendant Smillie on May 15, 1990 and July 2, 1990. At the first interview defendant Smillie stated that only operating expenses had been paid from the Sterling bank account. During the July 2, 1990 interview defendant Smillie acknowledged that a number of Sterling checks represented payments for his own use and benefit for a total of approximately $32,000.

Both defendants testified at trial. The district court admitted certified copies of the judgment and commitment orders of defendant Prewitt's prior mail fraud convictions with a limiting instruction that they should be considered only against defendant Prewitt and only on the question of his intent, plan, knowledge or absence of mistake or accident.

William Stalnaker, the President of Prime Financial Partners in Phoenix, Arizona, testified for the defense. He confirmed that he had discussions with Sterling about a business relationship designed to market 419 439 trusts. The district court did not allow Stalnaker to testify to that commission which would have been earned had binding contracts for the purchase of the trust been entered into. The court concluded such testimony would be too speculative.

MEMORANDUM

[1] Defendants Smillie and Prewitt and appeal their convictions challenging evidentiary decisions made by the district court. The district court's decisions admitting or excluding evidence will be reviewed for abuse of discretion giving the district court great deference. United States v. Wilson, 973 F.2d 577, 580 (7th Cir.1992).

[2] Defendant Smillie principally contends that the district court abused its discretion in admitting his statements made during compromise negotiations with the Securities Division in violation of Rule 408, Federal Rules of Evidence. The district court admitted statements made on May 15 and July 2, 1990 by defendant Smillie to investigators for said division.

> Rule 408 provides in pertinent part as follows:
> Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible.

[3] The clear reading of this rule suggests that it should apply only to civil proceedings, specifically the language concerning validity and amount of a claim. Rule 11(e)(6) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure is of no help to this defendant. It applies to the inadmissibility of pleas, plea discussions, and related statements in criminal cases.

Nothing in Rule 408 specifically prohibits the receipt of evidence in criminal proceedings concerning the admissions and statements made at a conference to settle claims of private parties. United States v. Gonzalez, 748 F.2d 74, 78 (2d Cir.1984). The public interest in the prosecution of crime is greater than the public interest in the settlement of civil disputes. Id. Rule 408 should not be applied to criminal cases. United States v. Baker, 926 F.2d 179 (2d Cir.1991). The trial court did not abuse its discretion when admitting defendant Smillie's statements made to Investigator Lott on May 15 and July 2, 1990.

Defendant Prewitt claims that the district court abused its discretion in excluding certain testimony by witness Stalnaker. Defendant Prewitt asked Stalnaker what commission would have been earned had binding contracts been entered into for the purchase of the trust. The district court did not allow this testimony because it would be speculative. This was not an abuse of discretion.

Defendant Prewitt claims that his prior mail fraud convictions in the Northern District of Indiana should not have been admitted. Rule 404(b), Federal Rules of Evidence provides as follows:

> (b) Other crimes, wrongs or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident ...

[4] Evidence of prior crimes, wrongs or acts is only admissible if:

> (1) [I]t is a matter in issue other than the defendant's propensity to commit the offense charged; (2) it is similar enough and close enough in time to be relevant to the matter in issue; (3) it is clear and convincing; and (4) its probative value is not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Lennartz, 948 F.2d 363, 366 (7th Cir.1991); United States v. Shackleford, 738 F.2d 776, 779 (7th Cir.1984).

Pursuant to proffer and balancing the district court admitted defendant Prewitt's two prior convictions of mail fraud to prove intent, 440 knowledge and plan. The jury was provided a limiting instruction upon its admission.

[5] The prior convictions were admissible because their probative value concerning intent, knowledge and plan was not outweighed by any possible prejudice to defendant Prewitt. United States v. Torres, 977 F.2d 321, 328 (7th Cir.1992). The trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting defendant Prewitt's prior convictions.

[6] Defendant Smillie further argues that the district court erred in denying his renewed motion for severance. He must show that the district court actually prejudiced him by depriving him of a fair joint trial. United States v. Hamilton, 19 F.3d 350 (7th Cir.1994).

[7][8] Defendant Smillie argued for severance because the evidence of Prewitt's two prior federal convictions for mail fraud was so prejudicial as to deprive him of a fair trial. To show actual prejudice defendant must show that one of the following was present:

> (1) conflicting and irreconcilable defenses; (2) a massive and complex amount of evidence that makes it almost impossible for the jury to separate evidence as to each defendant; (3) a codefendant's statement that incriminates the defendant; and (4) a gross disparity of evidence between the defendants.

United States v. Clark, 989 F.2d 1490, 1499 (7th Cir.1993). Defendant has not shown any of these circumstances to be present. The jury could easily separate the evidence as it applied to each defendant including defendant Prewitt's prior convictions and were so instructed by the district court. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant Smillie's motion for severance.

[9] Defendant Prewitt principally argues that the district court erred in denying his motion to dismiss the indictment. The district court's ruling on a motion to dismiss the indictment is a ruling on a question of law and is subject to de novo review. United States v. Furlett, 974 F.2d 839, 841 (7th Cir.1992).

Defendant Prewitt argues that his plea agreement in the Northern District of Indiana precluded the charges from being brought against him in this case.

On its face the plea agreement is unambiguous. It bound only the United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Indiana from bringing charges in the Northern District of Indiana arising from defendant Prewitt's dealings with Mid Continent, the Riley Agency or Chubb Insurance Group or any other affiliated companies.

Defendant Prewitt argues that any other affiliated companies includes Sterling. Whether or not any other affiliated companies includes Sterling is not material to whether the plea agreement precluded the Southern District of Indiana from charging defendant Prewitt. The agreement precluded only prosecution in the Northern District of Indiana.

The September 11, 1990 letter written by Thomas O. Plouff prior to sentencing of Prewitt in the Northern District of Indiana clarifies the extent of the plea agreement. It advises defendant's counsel of the pending investigation in the Southern District of Indiana, his intent to abide by the plea agreement and not to prosecute defendant for any of the alleged criminal activity in the Northern District of Indiana. Prior to sentencing defendant Prewitt knew there was a strong possibility of future prosecution in the Southern District of Indiana and that the plea agreement only precluded Northern District of Indiana prosecutions.

Defendant Prewitt emphasizes that Postal inspector Thomas Burnham investigated both cases and that some of the activity for which he was indicted in the Southern District of Indiana occurred in the Northern District of Indiana. The record indicates, however, that three investors resided in the Southern District of Indiana and the charges in the Southern District arose from an investigation distinct from the Northern District of Indiana investigation. The plea agreement provided that defendant Prewitt would not be charged in the Northern District of Indiana for any of his dealings with Mid-Continent, the Riley Agency or Chubb Insurance Group or any other affiliated companies. 441 The government complied with this agreement.

[10] The agreement did not preclude state charges or charges in other federal district courts. The agreement was not binding on the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana. See United States v. Ingram, 979 F.2d 1179, 1185 (7th Cir.1992), cert. denied, --- U.S. ---, 113 S.Ct. 1616, 123 L.Ed.2d 176 (1993). The denial of defendant's motion to dismiss the indictment was not an error of law.

Defendant Prewitt contends that the trial court erred by denying his August 11, 1993 motion to vacate the convictions and dismiss the indictment because the conduct used to enhance his offense level was utilized in both the Northern District of Indiana and here in violation of United States v. McCormick, 992 F.2d 437 (2d Cir.1993). The Northern District of Indiana conviction was not a sentencing guidelines case. The district court properly denied Prewitt's motion to vacate the convictions and dismiss the indictment because defendant did not suffer any double jeopardy violations. He was convicted and sentenced for separate crimes.

CONCLUSION

The district court did not abuse its discretion or err as a matter of law. Accordingly, the convictions of defendants Smillie and Prewitt are

AFFIRMED.

Lenders brought suit against corporate guarantor of underlying indebtedness and guarantor's principal for their alleged breach of guaranty agreements and fraud in connection with loans. Plaintiffs also sought to hold corporate principal personally liable by piercing corporate veil. On party's cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court, Shadur, J., Senior District Judge, held that: (1) parol evidence was not admissible to contradict express terms of continuing, absolute and unconditional guaranty; (2) corporate veil would be pierced in order to hold principal personally liable on guaranty; but (3) material questions of fact as to whether lenders justifiably relied on information contained in private placement memorandum, without taking steps to interest of completeness this Court has determined that genuine issues of material fact exist as to the precise time at which Kolson and Weinsteins discovered or should have discovered that they had been wronged. Hence the Vembu-Robex motion for summary judgment on the basis of the Illinois statute of limitations for fraud actions would have had to be denied in all events.

1332 SUPPLEMENT TO MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER [FN1]

FN1. Except for its recapitulation of the shorthand references to the parties litigant, this supplement will not repeat--but will utilize--defined terms in the Opinion.

This Court's November 28, 1994 memorandum opinion and order (the "Opinion") (1) determined that Rajan Vembu ("Vembu") and Robex USA, Ltd. ("Robex") were jointly and severally liable to Rob Kolson ("Kolson") and Eric and Irwin Weinstein (collectively "Weinsteins") in the principal sum of $150,000 plus interest and (2) directed the parties to submit interest calculations by November 29, to permit the entry of a final judgment on November 30. [FN2] Each side's counsel has timely provided such calculations, and this supplement to the Opinion reflects the resolution of their competing positions.

FN2. That timetable was not at all as hurried as the dates in the text would suggest. On November 23 this Court's chambers had advised counsel for each side of the decision that this Court had reached as to liability (at that time the lengthy Opinion was in the typing process) and also told counsel of their need to submit the interest calculations. Because of the intervention of the Thanksgiving holiday it was November 28 before the Opinion became available for signing and distribution.

Because the five promissory notes at issue have always been available to both sides (and they formed part of the record on the cross-motions for summary judgment), it is hardly surprising that the parties have not quarreled as to the notes' respective principal amounts and dates of issue, their collective extended date of maturity (December 15, 1989) and their prematurity (10% per annum) and postmaturity (13% per annum) interest rates. Instead, the litigants' interest calculations differ by more than $75,000 solely as a consequence of their dispute as to whether the notes bear only simple interest or interest compounded annually.

Neither side had even mentioned that facet of the interest calculation in their briefing of the summary judgment motions (indeed, the Kolson-Weinsteins GR 12(M) statement did not even include an assertion as to the amount that they claimed to be due (including interest), although their Mem. 23 did spell out the principal and interest figures on a basis that was derived via the compound interest route). Accordingly it was this Court that addressed the subject for the first time (Opinion 1331 n. 31), by correctly stating the Illinois rule that simple interest would apply in the absence of an agreement for compounding. [FN3]

FN3. Each note's provision that speaks of an interest rate simply in "per annum" terms is intrinsically ambiguous, for that could reflect either an old-style simple interest calculation or the more modern recognition that the true cost represented by the loss of the use of money requires compounding. What Opinion 36 n. 31 referred to as the Illinois rule is like most default rules in the law--it reflects what the law will presume in the absence of an express agreement between the parties.

Now counsel for Kolson and Weinsteins bring forward two documents that they say evidence just such an agreement:

1. On September 10, 1991 Kolson wrote a letter to Sylvester Whey, stating that he was writing at Vembu's request asking for a schedule of proposed debt reduction. After setting out the principal amounts and dates of the five notes, Kolson said in part:

The principal amount totals $150,000. The notes accrue interest at a rate of 10% compounded annually until December 15, 1989, and at a rate of 13% thereafter.

Immediately after that Kolson stated the amount of his calculations "which you are welcome to check"--and those calculations plainly reflected a fully compounded figure.

2. Another letter, this one addressed to Kolson and Weinsteins on November 11, 1992, was written by Sylvester Whey's Madison, Wisconsin lawyer Larry Libman of the Axley Brynelson law firm (with copies of the letter shown as having been sent to both Vembu and Sylvester Whey). That letter reflected and enclosed a proposed agreement between Sylvester Whey on the one hand and Kolson and Weinsteins on the other, which acknowledged the existing default in payment of the five notes and set out a proposed arrangement for the future liquidation of that obligation by payment of a percentage of Sylvester Whey's future cash flow. Among the recitals to that agreement was a statement of the then outstanding balance 1333 that clearly reflected far more than a simple interest calculation--indeed, the figure was obviously the product of compounding:

WHEREAS, as of October 31, 1992, the total outstanding balance, including principal and accrued interest, which is owed to the Lenders by SWPI on the Loan is $290,000.00 (the "Loan Balance")....

Counsel for Vembu and Robex counter that the documents on which Kolson and Weinsteins seek to rely cannot represent any agreement between the parties with regard to interest (Mem. 2). They point out that Kolson's letter is purely unilateral and that the document that had been enclosed with the letter from Sylvester Whey's lawyer was a "proposed settlement agreement [that] is not signed by any party involved in this litigation and must not be considered in determining whether the interest calculation be simple interest or compounded annually" (id. 2-3).

There is no dispute as to the authenticity of the two documents--where the parties part company is rather as to legal effect of those documents. As for the first document, Vembu and Robex are entirely correct: It sets out only Kolson-Weinsteins' understanding and intention (Kolson was also acting as the agent for Weinsteins in writing the letter), so it could not by itself constitute the necessary agreement. But as for the second document, Vembu and Robex are just as clearly wrong: It plainly satisfies the need for a showing of Sylvester Whey's agreement that the notes called for compound interest.

Fed.R.Evid. ("Rule") 408 is the well-known embodiment, plus an extension, of the common law rule that sought to encourage the settlement of disputes by rendering settlement offers as such inadmissible to show liability for, or the amount of, a claim. Where the second sentence in the following quotation from Rule 408 goes beyond the common law rule is in also excluding from admissibility statements that are made during negotiations for compromise: [FN4]

Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible.

Where the Vembu-Robex argument goes astray in its implicit invocation of Rule 408 (although their current memorandum cites no authority in support of their position, they obviously seek to rely on the rule of law that excludes evidence of the types described in the Rule) is that in this instance neither the validity nor the amount of the claim was in dispute (thus the proposed agreement's "WHEREAS" recital that immediately preceded the one quoted earlier in this supplement said "for various reasons, [Sylvester Whey] has been unable to pay the Loan as required under the Loan Documents and is technically in default under the Loan Documents"). Instead the parties' then-active settlement negotiations dealt only with the time and mechanism for payment of the undisputed claim. In that respect the last two sentences in the following quotation from 2 Weinstein & Berger P 408[01], at 408-12 to 408-13 (footnotes omitted) might well have been written for this very case (see also the cases cited there):

The Advisory Committee Note also states that "the effort ... to induce a creditor to settle an admittedly due amount for a lesser sum" would not further the underlying policy of the rule and is therefore not protected. Yet a careful distinction must be made between a frank disclosure during the course of negotiations--such as "All right, I was negligent. Let's talk about damages" (inadmissible)--and the less frequent situation where both the validity of the claim and the amount of damages are admitted--"Of course, I owe you the money, but unless you're willing to settle for less, you'll have to sue me for it" (admissible). Likewise, an admission of liability made during negotiations concerning the time of payment and involving neither the 1334 validity nor amount of the claim is not within the rule's exclusionary protection.

Hence the earlier-quoted "WHEREAS" recital as to the total outstanding balance, including accrued interest, amounting to $290,000 comes squarely within the category of statements that are defined as nonhearsay and are rendered admissible by Rule 801(d)(2)(D):

The statement is offered against a party and is ... (D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship....

Attorney Libman was unquestionably Sylvester Whey's agent, and his statements were equally unquestionably made in the scope and during the existence of the agency relationship. [FN5] And the key statement here, the amount of accrued interest, was not made in the course of an offer of settlement but was rather a recital of an acknowledged fact--and so it represents a classic example of an admission (what at common law used to be termed the "admission against interest" exception to the hearsay rule, but has now been expanded by the Rule 801(d)(2) definition of nonhearsay). This Court is then entitled to consider that admission, which binds Vembu and Robex (see n. 5).

FN5. Robex as guarantor of Sylvester Whey's obligations is subject to liability that is coterminous with Sylvester Whey's. And Vembu's derivative obligation, either through piercing Robex' corporate veil or as that corporation's alter ego, is of course exactly the same. Hence the earlier-quoted argument by the Vembu-Robex lawyer that the 1992 document was not signed by either Vembu or Robex is entirely empty: They stand in the shoes of Sylvester Whey, and that corporation was and is bound by its lawyer's admission. Thus Vembu and Robex are equally bound.

In summary, Kolson and Weinsteins have demonstrated the necessary agreement of the parties for the compounding of interest. Because Vembu and Robex have not contested the accuracy of the Kolson-Weinsteins calculations if their legal theory is correct, this Court orders that judgment be entered in favor of Kolson and Weinsteins and against Vembu and Robex jointly and severally in the sum of $150,000 in principal plus $221,437.04 in interest, for a total judgment amount of $371,437.04.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Donald E. MEADOWS, Defendant-Appellant.
No. 78-5572.
United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.
July 13, 1979.

Defendant was convicted before the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, Richard C. Freeman, J., of obtaining by fraud funds which were the subject of a grant pursuant to the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Tuttle, Circuit Judge, held that trial court committed reversible error in submitting jury instruction which, applying law to the facts, stated merely that "fraud may result from statements of half-truths or the concealment of material facts," without more, since trial court thereby understated principal of law by failing to remind jury of the intent required to convict.

Reversed and remanded.

Godbold, Circuit Judge, concurred in part and dissented in part and filed opinion.

Control when he continued to claim the extra paychecks at City Hall for several months, and that the City relied on this misrepresentation by continuing to issue the duplicate checks. It would not be unreasonable for the jury to assume that if Meadows had left the checks unclaimed, the city would have realized the error and stopped issuing the checks. Alternatively, the jury could have found that, by failing to inform the proper city officials that he was no longer working at the Bureau of Pollution Control and was receiving paychecks from Black World, Meadows concealed a material fact; thus ensuring that the city would continue to issue the paychecks and that he would continue to benefit from the city's initial mistake. Although it is clear that Meadows made no false inducements to obtain the extra paychecks initially, his conduct in continuing to pick them up with knowledge of the obvious error came sufficiently within the broad sweep of 18 U.S.C. s 655 to go to the jury.

IV. RULE 408 OFFER TO COMPROMISE.

[3] Meadows contends that the trial court committed reversible error by admitting certain statements he made to a government official when he was confronted 989 with the fact of the overpayments, on the grounds that the statements were part of compromise negotiations and should have been excluded on the basis of Rule 408, Federal Rules of Evidence.[FN3] We disagree.

FN3. Rule 408 provides:

> Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. This rule also does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

These statements occurred in an interview between Meadows and a program analyst for the Labor Department named Goldsmith. Goldsmith had received a memorandum from Meadows' CETA supervisor with Black World, which indicated that Meadows had complained because he had not received his full bonus check. Goldsmith reviewed the records and found that while Meadows' Black World bonus check was deficient, Meadows had received a full bonus check from the Bureau of Pollution Control, and moreover, had been carried simultaneously on two departments' payrolls for several months. Based on these discoveries, Goldsmith decided to hold Meadows' checks and when Meadows came to Goldsmith's office, he was confronted with the problem. When testifying for the government on direct examination, Goldsmith stated that Meadows' immediate response was an admission that he knew after the first check that there was some sort of administrative error causing the duplicate checks to be issued, but declared that "if you were stupid enough or somebody else makes the mistake, I felt that I could benefit from it." On cross-examination, the defense counsel brought out that Meadows subsequently agreed to a repayment schedule.

Although the government contends that Rule 11(b), Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, rather than Rule 408, Federal Rules of Evidence, governs the issue since this is a criminal case, we assume the applicability of Rule 408 to govern the admission of related civil settlement negotiations in a criminal trial. F.R.Evid. 1101(b), See Ecklund v. United States, 159 F.2d 81 (6th Cir. 1947). We do not, however, find any violation of the rule. We do not feel that Meadows' remark to Goldsmith that he knew the checks were issued by mistake was in any sense an offer to compromise a claim. The conversation occurred during an informal investigation of the situation; thus, there was no claim to compromise at the time the two first met. The prosecution merely made use of a direct admission with respect to Meadows' intent, which is, of course, probative evidence of his state of mind. Although the testimony concerning the repayment schedule might otherwise have been barred by rule 408 as a settlement offer, this testimony was solicited by the defense counsel on cross-examination. We reject the appellant's contention that it was "forced" to introduce this testimony of the repayment schedule; it appears to us to be a calculated, tactical defense decision.

V. SUPPLEMENTAL CHARGE.

As we stated earlier, the jury requested additional instructions on the definition of fraud during the course of its deliberations. In response, the court merely repeated the small portion of its original charge describing the law of fraud and its application to these facts. The supplemental instructions contained no reference to the burden or quantum of proof, presumption of innocence, or any other matter necessarily favorable to the defendant. The defense counsel objected and requested some additional balancing instruction, but the trial court refused. The jury returned its verdict of guilty within fifteen minutes. Since the case will have to be retried, it may be helpful to comment on the procedure followed.

990 It is well-established that in giving additional instructions to a jury; particularly in response to inquiries from the jury, a court must be especially careful not to give an unbalanced charge. Although the failure to give any presumption of innocence instruction does not mandate reversal in all criminal appeals, Kentucky v. Whorton, --- U.S. ----, 99 S.Ct. 2088, 60 L.Ed.2d 640 (1979), the particular significance of a supplemental charge when a

v.
Albert BAKER and Paul Mazzilli, Defendants,
Paul Mazzilli, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 500, Docket 89-1320.

United States Court of Appeals,
Second Circuit.

Decided Feb. 13, 1991.

Defendant was convicted of offenses arising out of his possession of stolen electronic equipment following a trial in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, 848 F.2d 384, reversed on grounds of improper cross-examination by the trial judge. On remand, the defendant was convicted in the District Court, Joseph M. McLaughlin, J., of one count of possessing stolen goods and one count of receiving stolen goods, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals held that: (1) evidentiary rule dealing with compromise evidence applied only to civil litigation and did not bar evidence of defendant's prearrest attempt to make a "deal" involving possible criminal charges; (2) evidence was sufficient to support finding that defendant knew that merchandise was stolen; and (3) Government was properly allowed to present rebuttal evidence that invoices produced by defendant for stolen items could be purchased by the general public and were not documents from a real company.

Affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded.

Before VAN GRAAFEILAND, WINTER and WALKER, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

Paul Mazzilli appeals from a judgment entered after a jury trial in the Eastern 180 District convicting him of one count of possessing stolen goods, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 659, and one count of receiving stolen goods, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2315. This trial was his second on the present indictment, his previous conviction having been reversed on grounds of improper cross-examination by the first trial judge. United States v. Mazzilli, 848 F.2d 384 (2d Cir.1988). On this appeal, he asserts multiple grounds for reversal, all but one of which are meritless. The government concedes that his conviction on both counts is multiplicitous. We therefore vacate the Section 2315 conviction and remand for resentencing on the Section 659 conviction alone.

In November 1986, two truck trailers full of portable stereos, televisions, telephones, and electronic toys destined for North Carolina were stolen from a trucking yard in East Brunswick, New Jersey. Acting on information received from Albert Baker, the FBI began to investigate Mazzilli, a New York City firefighter and operator of a small video rental store in Brooklyn, in connection with the missing electronic equipment.

Special Agents Andrew Conlin and Coleen Nichols visited the home of Mazzilli's father in Brooklyn, where they encountered Mazzilli himself. Upon questioning, Mazzilli led the agents to the basement of the house, which was filled with boxes of the stolen electronic equipment. As the agents seized custody of the goods, Mazzilli asked Nichols whether she knew an FBI agent named George Hanna. After Nichols answered affirmatively, Mazzilli explained that he had heard that "Hanna has made deals for other people in the past" and "has a reputation in the neighborhood for making deals." Mazzilli proposed to Nichols that she "speak with George to see if ... maybe we can get together and make some sort of deal for myself."

[1] Mazzilli contends that the district court erred in admitting Nichols's testimony about what Mazzilli said to her. He claims that Fed.R.Evid. 408 precludes admission of his statements to Nichols. We disagree.

> Rule 408 states:
> Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. This rule also does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

We believe it fairly evident that the Rule applies only to civil litigation. The reference to "a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount" does not easily embrace an attempt to bargain over criminal charges. Negotiations over immunity from criminal charges or a plea bargain do not in ordinary parlance constitute discussions of a "claim" over which there is a dispute as to "validity" or "amount." Moreover, Fed.R.Crim.P. 11(e)(6) explicitly addresses the exclusion of plea bargain negotiations and limits the statements excluded to those made to an "attorney" for the government. The very existence of Rule 11(e)(6) strongly supports the conclusion that Rule 408 applies only to civil matters. We therefore hold that Rule 408 did not preclude testimony as to Mazzilli's statements to Nichols.

[2] We may quickly dispose of Mazzilli's other arguments. The evidence that Mazzilli could identify only as "Joey" the person from whom he purchased the stolen electronic equipment on extremely favorable terms, that he was unaware of any invoice for those goods until a "Global Imports" invoice was produced sometime after 181 the agents discovered the stolen goods in his father's basement, and that he tried to arrange a "deal" with the FBI when confronted by the government investigators, was more than sufficient to allow the jury to conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that Mazzilli knew that the merchandise was stolen. See Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319, 99 S.Ct. 2781, 2789, 61 L.Ed.2d 560 (1979).

[3] Permitting the government to present evidence in rebuttal that "Global Imports" invoices could be purchased by the general public and were not documents from a real company was within the discretion of the trial judge, see United States v. Casamento, 887 F.2d 1141, 1172 (2d Cir.1989), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 110 S.Ct. 1138, 107 L.Ed.2d 1043 (1990), because the rebuttal bore directly on the issues raised by the invoice introduced by Mazzilli. See United States v. Neary, 733 F.2d 210, 220 (2d Cir.1984). None of Mazzilli's claims of prosecutorial misconduct could have affected the outcome of the case. Finally, not only was a conscious avoidance charge proper, but, given Mazzilli's claimed ignorance that the goods were stolen in the face of such highly suspicious circumstances, this was a paradigmatic case in which to give such an instruction. See United States v. Mang Sun Wong, 884 F.2d 1537, 1541-43 (2d

The government concedes, however, that Mazzilli's convictions for possession of stolen goods and receiving stolen goods are multiplicitous and should be merged. See United States v. DiGeronimo, 598 F.2d 746, 749-51 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 886, 100 S.Ct. 180, 62 L.Ed.2d 117 (1979). We thus affirm the conviction for possession under Section 659, vacate the conviction for receipt under Section 2315, and remand the case for resentencing on the Section 659 conviction alone. See United States v. Sappe, 898 F.2d 878, 882 (2d Cir.1990).

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Charles MCCORKLE and Katherine McCorkle, Defendants.

No. 93 C 6528.

United States District Court, N.D. Illinois, Eastern Division.

July 7, 1994.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

CONLON, District Judge.

1 The United States ("the government") sues Charles McCorkle ("Charles") and his wife, Katherine McCorkle ("Katherine"), (collectively "the McCorkles") to collect Charles' alleged outstanding income tax liabilities for the years 1966, 1967 and 1968. Both the McCorkles and the government move in limine to exclude certain evidence at trial.

The McCorkles move in limine to bar evidence concerning (1) Charles' 1975 misdemeanor conviction for failure to file income tax returns; (2) rescission of the 1986 settlement agreement between Charles and the government for mutual mistake of fact; (3) the civil action captioned United States of America v. Charles McCorkle, et al., 84 C 4674 (N.D.Ill.); (4) the testimony of Robert Kern; (5) the testimony of any government agent or employee regarding Charles' alleged assignment of income to Katherine; and (6) Katherine's income and lifestyle from 1986 to date. The government moves in limine to bar the McCorkles from offering any evidence or making any arguments with respect to the knowledge, opinions, or conclusions of Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") personnel.

DISCUSSION

Motions in limine are generally disfavored. This court excludes evidence on a motion in limine only if the evidence is clearly not admissible for any purpose. See Hawthorne Partners v. AT & T Technologies, Inc., 831 F.Supp. 1398, 1400 (N.D.Ill.1993). If evidence is not clearly inadmissible, evidentiary rulings must be deferred until trial so questions of foundation, relevancy, and prejudice may be resolved in context. Id. at 1401. Thus, denial of a motion in limine does not mean that all evidence contemplated by the motion will be admitted at trial. Rather, denial of the motion in limine means only that without the context of trial the court is unable to determine whether the evidence in question should be excluded. See United States v. Connelly, 874 F.2d 412, 416 (7th Cir.1989). Both the McCorkles' and the government's motions in limine fail to meet this rigorous standard and must be denied.

First, the McCorkles seek to exclude any mention of Charles' 1975 criminal conviction for failure to file federal income taxes. Although Charles' conviction would be admissible since it involved dishonesty or false statements, see Fed.R.Evid. 609(a)(2), mention of the conviction is barred by Fed.R.Evid. 609(b) because the conviction is more than ten years old. However, Charles transferred his 80 percent stock interest in McCorkle Reporters to Katherine in 1975, the same year as his criminal conviction. Thus, the criminal conviction may be admissible under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b), which allows evidence of other crimes, because it may be probative of Charles' motive or plan to transfer his assets to Katherine in order to reduce his liability to the government.

Second, the McCorkles seek to prevent the government from advancing the legal theory that the settlement agreement is void due to mutual mistake. The McCorkles contend that the government's mutual mistake theory is new, and they profess uncertainty regarding the factual basis for this legal theory. However, the McCorkles were on notice that mutual mistake is a ground for rescinding the settlement agreement. Under 26 U.S.C. § 7122, both parties are bound by a compromise agreement except upon a showing of "(1) falsification or concealment of assets by the taxpayer, or (2) mutual mistake of a material fact sufficient to cause a contract to be reformed or set aside." 26 C.F.R. § 301.7122-1(c) (1993). Thus, the government may attempt to prove at trial that Charles' failure to disclose his 1975 transfer of his 80 percent stock interest in McCorkle Reporters to Katherine in his Form 433 constituted a fraudulent concealment. Alternatively, the government may seek to rescind the settlement based on mutual mistake, arguing that since Charles inadvertently omitted the transfer from his Form 433 and the government had no knowledge of the transfer, the settlement agreement is based on an inaccurate portrait of Charles' ability to pay and must be rescinded.

2 Third, the McCorkles seek to exclude all documents relating to the government's 1984 case against the McCorkles that resulted in the 1986 settlement agreement, United States of America v. Charles McCorkle, et al., 84 C 4674 (N.D.Ill). The McCorkles do not submit these documents--trial briefs, the final pretrial order, correspondence containing settlement negotiations, etc.--with their motion in limine, so the court is unable to determine the admissibility of specific documents. It is premature to exclude all these documents since some or all of them may shed light on the parties' intent when they entered the 1986 settlement agreement.

The McCorkles' reliance on Fed.R. Evid 408 to exclude these documents is misplaced. Rule 408 precludes evidence of settlement discussions in a particular case from being mentioned at the trial of that case (with certain exceptions). However, Rule 408 does not bar settlement information in one case from admissibility in another case. Here, the settlement discussions that resulted in the 1986 settlement agreement may be relevant to determining whether that agreement must be rescinded.

Fourth, the McCorkles seek to exclude the testimony of Robert Kern ("Kern"), the government lawyer in the 1984 case. The McCorkles contend the government did not disclose that it would call Kern as a witness before listing him as a trial witness, despite interrogatories propounded on the government that should have elicited this information. The McCorkles argue that Kern must be barred from testifying at trial because they have not had an opportunity to depose him. The government counters that the McCorkles did not propound interrogatories seeking the identities of government witnesses; instead, the government contends that the McCorkles themselves identified Kern as an individual with information relevant to this case. The government also avers that it offered to make arrangements for a telephone deposition of Kern, but the McCorkles responded that a deposition was unnecessary because all the information that could be ascertained from Kern was available in other government documents. Thus, the McCorkles' questionable assertion of unfair surprise at Kern's inclusion in the government's witness list does not appear to create undue prejudice.

Fifth and sixth, the McCorkles seek to exclude information relating to Katherine's income and lifestyle from both government agents and employees and other sources. However, one of the main issues in this case is whether Charles improperly assigned his income to Katherine after the 1986 settlement agreement. Information about Charles' work responsibilities and remuneration is relevant to whether Charles' salary was commensurate with his job. Similarly, information about Katherine's work responsibilities and remuneration is relevant to whether Katherine's salary was commensurate with her job. The government seeks to show that Charles earned too little and Katherine earned too much; information about Katherine's income and lifestyle is relevant to these inquiries.

3 The government's motion in limine also fails. The government appears primarily concerned with excluding the notes from the IRS investigation conducted by Harold Taggert ("Taggert") in connection with the settlement agreement and Charles' Form 433. Taggert's notes summarize his investigation as follows:

> T/P [taxpayer] has transferred nearly everything to his wife.
> ... the four corps [corporations] were transferred between 1975 & 1977. Accurate Reporting now belongs to Sherman Katz and Nadine Gorski is the sole officer; Chicago Reporting Co. is 100% owned by Katherine McCorkle as is McCorkle Court Reporters and Official Records, Inc. These are basically service corps. It would be difficult to challenge the transfer in return for a small amount of money....

McCorkles' Resp. at 2. The government advances two arguments in its attempt to preclude Taggert's notes and other unspecified government documents and testimony. First, the government contends that the McCorkles may not offer evidence or argument that the government is estopped from denying the actions or knowledge of IRS employees, including Taggert. Second, the government invokes the deliberative process privilege.

First, it is correct that parties cannot usually raise estoppel arguments against the government. See Heckler v. Community Health Serv., 467 U.S. 51, 60-61 (1984). The government contends that since Taggert was not authorized to compromise Charles' tax liabilities, Taggert's knowledge that Charles had transferred assets to Katherine is irrelevant. Government's Mot. at 2. The government contends that allowing Taggert's testimony would amount to an attempt to improperly estop the government based on the actions of one government employee. Id. However, admitting evidence regarding the government's knowledge about Charles' financial situation at the time it entered into the settlement agreement is not equivalent to granting a government employee the power to bind the government to a legal position.

The government may not disavow the actions of its employees entirely. Knowledge possessed by a government agent with a duty to disclose is imputed to the government. Martin v. Consultants & Administrators, Inc., 966 F.2d 1078, 1096 (7th Cir.1992), citing In re "Agent Orange" Product Liability Litigation, 597 F.Supp. 740, 796 (E.D.N.Y.1984), aff'd, 818 F.2d 145 (2d Cir.1987). Thus, the challenged evidence may show what Taggert or another government agent--and therefore the government itself--knew about Charles' 1975 transfer of his 80 percent interest in McCorkle Reporters to Katherine at the time of the settlement agreement. The McCorkles may attempt to use this evidence to rebut the government's mutual mistake theory.

Second, the deliberative process privilege protects communications that are part of the decision-making process of a government agency, i.e., communications made prior to and during an agency determination. United States v. Farley, 11 F.3d 1385, 1389 (7th Cir.1993) (citations omitted). However, what the government knew is not equivalent to its deliberations. Evidence regarding the government's knowledge of Charles' transfer of his 80 percent interest in McCorkle Reporters to Katherine or other information about Charles' financial situation is not protected from disclosure by the deliberative process privilege.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Thomas E. HAUERT, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 93-3171.

United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.

Argued Sept. 7, 1994.

Decided Nov. 14, 1994.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, William T. Hart, J., of tax evasion and failure to file tax returns, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Wellford, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence of defendant's conduct during prior income tax audit was admissible to show that he knew what the law was and his legal duty thereunder; (2) lay opinion testimony regarding defendant's beliefs about propriety of his filing returns and paying taxes was excludable; (3) jury was adequately instructed on good-faith defense; and (4) charged misconduct by prosecutor was not reversible error.

Affirmed.

Before POSNER, Chief Judge, and EASTERBROOK and WELLFORD, [FN*] Circuit Judges.

FN* The Honorable Harry W. Wellford, United States Circuit Judge for the Sixth Circuit, sitting by designation.

WELLFORD, Circuit Judge.

After conviction by a jury in the district court for tax evasion (violation of 26 U.S.C. 199 § 7201) and for failure to file tax returns for the calendar years 1988 through 1991 (violation of 26 U.S.C. § 7203), defendant, Thomas E. Hauert, has appealed his convictions and sentences to this court. Conceding that he had failed to file federal income tax returns since 1986, Hauert first maintains that the district court erred "in allowing the government to introduce evidence of defendant's compromise and settlement negotiations in a 1984 civil tax case." Next, he asserts error by the trial judge in "denying defendant an opportunity to present lay opinion testimony ... relevant to the issue of good faith." Hauert also challenges certain jury instructions given by the district court applicable to his claimed "good faith" defense. He avers, moreover, prosecutorial misconduct denying him a fair trial, and, finally, that the government erroneously shifted the burden of proof from the prosecution. We discuss these grounds of Hauert's appeal seriatim.

I. BACKGROUND

Hauert worked regularly for the Caterpillar Company for many years including the years in question, and received payment for his earnings that mandated filing a federal income tax return for each of the years in contention, unless "excused" from criminal liability for his failure to file by reason of his so-called "good faith misunderstanding of the law" defense. This court is aware at the outset that we decided in 1989, after argument in 1988, that an "objectively reasonable standard" was to be applied in this type of criminal tax liability situation involving charges of tax evasion and failure to file federal income tax returns. United States v. Cheek, 882 F.2d 1263, 1265 (7th Cir.1989), cert. granted, 493 U.S. 1068, 110 S.Ct. 1108, 107 L.Ed.2d 1016 (1990), vacated, 498 U.S. 192, 201, 111 S.Ct. 604, 610, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991) (eliminating "objectively reasonable standard"). The tax years 1980 through 1986 were involved in the Cheek case.

[FN1]

> FN1. Since the government concedes that Cheek principles, as enunciated by the Supreme Court in 1991, do not retroactively apply to all the tax years at issue in this indictment, we are not called upon to decide any possible retroactivity problem. We must apply Cheek, then, to all the issues involved in this case by reason of Hauert's "good faith misunderstanding of the law" defense.

II. EVIDENCE OF PRIOR TAX SETTLEMENT

Hauert was audited by the Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") because of certain partnership income purportedly attributable to him in 1980 or 1981. During the course of the IRS' audit for those years, Hauert asserted in a letter that "I have abandoned my constitutional challenge for those years." Hauert claims that allowing the government to introduce this and other evidence of his dealings with IRS agents indicating an abandonment of any constitutional challenge to the taxability of his Caterpillar earnings was prejudicial error. There was also evidence admitted at trial, over defendant's objection, of his signing settlement documents in 1984 foregoing a contention that his wages or salary were not taxable.

Hauert does not contest that evidence of his prior compliance with the laws he later claimed to misunderstand in earlier tax years is not admissible. This evidence is relevant to his actual subjective intent and his understanding of his income tax obligations to file and to pay tax on earnings from employment. Defendant argues that the evidence of his conduct during the income tax audit during 1984 is "irrelevant," "cumulative," and "contrary to policy concerning settlement."

Defendant's reliance on United States v. Robertson, 582 F.2d 1356 (5th Cir.1978), in support of the above contention, is misplaced. Robertson, not a tax case, involved a drug charge and admissions made by a defendant to DEA agents in a parking lot. The Robertson court discussed FED.R.CRIM.P. 11(e)(6) and FED.R.EVID. 410 with regard to admissibility of statements " 'in connection with, and relevant to' an offer to plead guilty." 582 200 F.2d at 1364 (emphasis added). Among other things, in overruling defendant's contentions in that case, the en banc court observed that "[c]ourts have been very reluctant to allow an accused to withdraw a guilty plea merely on allegations of a misunderstanding resulting from an accused's purely subjective beliefs." Id. at 1367.

Nor do we believe that FED.R.EVID. 408 is of assistance to defendant in respect to this assertion of error. Among other things, while generally proscribing admissibility of "conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations," this rule adds that it "does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations," and also "when the evidence is offered for another purpose." See FED.R.EVID. 408. In adopting this language, the Conference Committee Report explained that "evidence of facts disclosed during compromise negotiations is not inadmissible." See H.R.CONF.REP. No. 1597, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 6 (1974), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 7098, 7099.

The purpose of the evidence in question was to show Hauert's knowledge and intent regarding his obligation to report and pay taxes on his Caterpillar (and other) earnings. As stated in Cheek, "in deciding whether to credit [defendant's] good-faith belief claim, the jury would be free to consider any admissible evidence from any source showing that [defendant] was aware of his duty to file a return and to treat wages as income." Cheek, 498 U.S. at 202, 111 S.Ct. at 611. The evidence involving the earlier years may not have been admissible to show Hauert's civil tax liability in those earlier years or to his claims or the government's claims in the context of civil tax liability. This evidence was admissible under Rule 408 for "another purpose" in this case. See United States v. Birkenstock, 823 F.2d 1026, 1028 (7th Cir.1987).

As stated in a case cited by defendant, "Federal Rule of Evidence 408 permits evidence of settlement agreements for purposes other than proving liability." United States v. Hays, 872 F.2d 582, 588-89 (5th Cir.1989). [FN2] The evidence in question was admitted to show whether Hauert knew "what the law is" and his "legal duty" thereunder. See Cheek, 498 U.S. at 202, 203 n. 8, 111 S.Ct. at 611 n. 8. We find that the district court was acting within its sound discretion by admitting the evidence at issue. See also United States v. Farmer, 924 F.2d 647 (7th Cir.1991); Breuer Elec. Mfg. Co. v. Toronado Sys. of Am., Inc., 687 F.2d 182 (7th Cir.1982).

FN2. Hays, also not a tax case, held that district courts have wide discretion in determining relevancy under Rule 401. Hays, 872 F.2d at 587. Hays also indicated that evidence that defendant was engaged in conspiratorial conduct could not be admitted under Rule 408 by introducing evidence of prior settlement agreements between defendant and others alleged to be co-conspirators. Id. at 589. Hays is otherwise distinguishable from the instant case, in our view.

We are not persuaded by Hauert's contentions in this regard.

III. LAY OPINION TESTIMONY

[2][3] Hauert recognizes "the special limitations imposed upon opinion evidence by expert witnesses under Rule [FED.R.EVID.] 704(b)," and thus does not appeal the district court's decision to preclude a proffered psychiatric opinion that he was "credible, sincere and manifests a good faith belief" with respect to IRC obligations. He argues, however, that it was prejudicial error under FED.R.EVID. 701 and 704(a) to prevent such testimony from lay witnesses who were fellow employees and long-time friends. In particular, Hauert sought to present these witnesses to attest to his sincerity about his income tax beliefs. He relies upon the following language of FED.R.EVID. 701:

> If the witness is not testifying as an expert, the witness' testimony in the form of opinions or inferences is limited to those opinions or inferences which are (a) rationally based on the perception of the witness and (b) helpful to a clear understanding of the witness' testimony or the determination of a fact in issue.

See FED.R.EVID. 701.

Hauert also relies upon that portion of FED.R.EVID. 704(a), which permits opinion evidence embracing an ultimate issue. The district court ruled that the lay opinion evidence sought to be introduced was substantially 201 the same as the proffered expert evidence, which was barred under FED.R.EVID. 704(b). The district court barred such lay opinion testimony dealing with defendant's subjective sincerity, motivation, knowledge, or state of mind. The district court did not prevent the lay witnesses from testifying about the context of their association and contact with Hauert, but foreclosed their opinions about his sincerity and "good faith" belief. The government maintains that issue should be governed by Rule 701, rather than Rule 704, although it, of course, agrees with the result reached by the district court. Rule 701 deals generally with "opinion testimony by lay witnesses." Although a lay witness may, in appropriate circumstances, give an opinion on an "ultimate issue," we agree that the basic inquiry with respect to the district court's evidentiary rulings on lay witness testimony is governed by FED.R.EVID. 701.

In offering the testimony of these witnesses, defendant's lawyer described them as "credibility witnesses," and then there was discussion about FED.R.EVID. 608, regarding opinion about defendant's reputation, and limiting their testimony to opinion of Hauert's character and reputation as to truthfulness. Defendant's attorney objected to being limited so as not to ask these witnesses about Hauert's "sincerity." Defendant's attorney added that these witnesses had "numerous conversations and interactions" with Hauert "on the issue of taxation, and have formulated opinions as to whether he is sincere and believes his statements." The district court ruled, however, without specific reference to Rule 701, that these witnesses would not, under the circumstances, be permitted to give opinions about defendant's "mental state or condition constituting any element of the crime charged ... a totally subjective matter." The district court summarized its ruling by concluding that lay witness opinion testimony on Hauert's "state of mind" or the sincerity of his "good faith" defense "is not appropriate."

Defendant's counsel made no further specific proffer as to the content of the proposed testimony nor did he offer any witness outside the presence of the jury to make a record of it. These five witnesses did testify to Hauert's reputation for truthfulness, his employment, and his active church involvement. Witness Holman testified that Hauert was a "sincere and honest person." Witness Dobsczyle added that Hauert was "one of the most truthful, honest people that I have ever met." Witness Acosta, a close friend, supplemented the opinion of truthfulness to state: "I don't think you could find anybody that would say a bad thing about him." [FN3]

> FN3. Acosta also was permitted to testify, outside the jury's presence, that he had accompanied Hauert to an IRS office and that Hauert pursued many income tax questions that were not answered, but the district court reserved a ruling on the admissibility of this testimony. Hauert's counsel made no further motion to introduce this testimony before the jury.

On the issue of lay opinion testimony concerning Hauert's knowledge of tax law requirements, we agree with the opinion in United States v. Rea, 958 F.2d 1206, 1216 (2d Cir.1992), that opinion testimony on a party's knowledge of the law "in most instances ... will not meet the requirements of Rule 701." If offered, then, to show Hauert's knowledge, or lack thereof, about filing returns and reporting wages and other receipts as income, we believe the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying lay testimony to this effect.

The opinion testimony introduced by defendant that Hauert was "honest, sincere," and a good person generally did come into evidence. That evidence bore upon his "good faith" defense. Whether the evidence would be, as required by Rule 701, "helpful to a clear understanding" of Hauert's testimony and position is essentially a matter of sound judgment and within the discretion of the district court. "[U]ltimately, the question of whether a lay opinion falls into the category of 'meaningless assertion' or whether that opinion actually will help the jury decide an issue in the case is a judgment call for the district court." United States v. Allen, 10 F.3d 405, 415 (7th Cir.1993).

We consider here a ruling on admissibility of lay witness opinion, testimony about a defendant's state of mind, his intent or belief with particular reference to Rule 701(b)-- 202 whether the evidence would be "helpful to a clear understanding" of the issues by a jury. United States v. Guzzino, 810 F.2d 687, 699 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 481 U.S. 1030, 107 S.Ct. 1957, 95 L.Ed.2d 529 (1987). While the district court's analysis was not as clear as we would have liked, we find no abuse of discretion, no clear error, in the preclusion of this lay opinion evidence under the circumstances of this case. We believe that by the nature of a tax protestor case, defendant's beliefs about the propriety of his filing returns and paying taxes, which are closely related to defendant's knowledge about tax laws and defendant's state of mind in protesting his taxpayer status, are ordinarily not a proper subject for lay witness opinion testimony absent careful groundwork and special circumstances not present here. [FN4] In this case, such testimony was not helpful to the jury.

> FN4. Even if such lay witness opinion evidence were deemed helpful and relevant by the district judge, he may still consider, under FED.R.EVID. 403, whether such evidence should be excluded as "substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice ... or [the] needless presentation of cumulative evidence." See FED.R.EVID. 403.

IV. JURY INSTRUCTIONS

[4] Citing Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 111 S.Ct. 604, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991), defendant objects to the district court's instruction on the government's burden to prove that he acted "willfully" with respect to his charged violations of the income tax laws. [FN5] Hauert argued the Cheek case rationale to the jury, maintaining that his knowledge and belief are based upon subjective standards ("this calls for you [the jury] to enter into the mind and mental processes of this man"). The district court's instructions did not use the word, "subjective standard," as to Hauert's claim of good faith belief, but used the following language:

> FN5. In his closing argument, Hauert's counsel stated that the government had to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that "Mr. Hauert has willfully and with the intention to disobey the law done certain things."

If the defendant, in good faith, believed that tax laws did not require that he file individual tax returns for a particular year, then any failure to file any income tax return for that year cannot be found to be willful, even if such belief was incorrect. Similarly, if the defendant in good faith believed that under the law he did not have any income tax obligation for a particular year, > then any failure to pay income taxes for that year cannot be found to be willful, even if such belief was incorrect.

> However, a disagreement with the tax laws or a personal belief that the tax laws are unconstitutional, no matter how earnestly believed, will not negate willfulness. It is the duty of all citizens to obey the law whether they agree with it or not.

Cheek referred to the holding of United States v. Murdock, 290 U.S. 389, 54 S.Ct. 223, 78 L.Ed. 381 (1933), that "defendant was entitled to an instruction with respect to whether he acted in good faith based on his actual belief." Cheek, 498 U.S. at 200, 111 S.Ct. at 610. Cheek also referred to United States v. Pomponio, 429 U.S. 10, 97 S.Ct. 22, 50 L.Ed.2d 12 (1976) (per curiam), that the statutory language "required a finding of bad purpose or motive." Cheek, 498 U.S. at 200, 201, 111 S.Ct. at 609, 610. Cheek concluded that "the standard for the statutory willfulness requirement is the 'voluntary, intentional violation of a known legal duty.' " Id. at 201, 111 S.Ct. at 610. Cheek, in our opinion, does not mandate the use of the word "subjective" or words "subjective standard" as argued by defendant. It does require the elimination of the words, "objectively reasonable," id., as applied to a willful violation of a known legal duty.

The district court did eliminate any reference in its instructions to an objectively reasonable standard or to the measure of the conduct of a reasonable taxpayer. We believe the instructions given, taken as a whole, conform to the Supreme Court's requirements in Cheek:

> In the end, the issue is whether, based on all the evidence, the Government has proved that the defendant was aware of the duty at issue, which cannot be true if the jury credits a good-faith misunderstanding 203 and belief submission, whether or not the claimed belief or misunderstanding is objectively reasonable.

Id. at 202, 111 S.Ct. at 611.

The jury was adequately instructed about defendant's good faith belief defense, a belief "that tax laws did not require that he file individual tax returns for a particular year." The district court also instructed the jury that if the government failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he had no such good faith belief, his failure to file a return or pay income taxes for a particular year was not a "willful" violation of his duty. The district court instructed the jury that the government was required to prove a "willful" violation, one that was "voluntary and intentional."

We are not prepared to adopt the reasoning of United States v. Pabisz, 936 F.2d 80, 83 (2d Cir.1991), that the district court, in dealing with the good faith defense, must either instruct the jury to consider "whether [defendant] subjectively believed that he did not need to file income tax returns or pay taxes," or "that defendant's beliefs need not be objectively reasonable." Pabisz may be distinguishable, however, because the prosecutor urged the jury to consider whether defendant "had to know objectively if whether [sic] he had to file," [FN6] and that was not done in this case. Id. (emphasis added).

> FN6. In Pabisz, the prosecutor also argued that defendant's beliefs were "totally unreasonable." Pabisz, 936 F.2d at 83. United States v. Powell, 936 F.2d 1056 (9th Cir.1991), also cited by defendant, is distinguishable because the district court there instructed the jury that to succeed in their good faith defense, defendants had to have an "objectively reasonable belief." Id. at 1061. (Powell was subsequently amended and superseded at 955 F.2d 1206 in light of Cheek).

[5] Nor do we find the district court's instructions on the definition of a known duty to be in error as contended by defendant. Finally, we find no error in the court's instruction that "[n]o person can intentionally avoid knowledge by closing his or her eyes to information or facts which would otherwise have been obvious." See, e.g., United States v. Ramsey, 785 F.2d 184, 190 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1186, 106 S.Ct. 2924, 91 L.Ed.2d 552 (1986). [FN7] We do not agree with defendant that this instruction shifted the burden of proof to the defendant. United States v. White, 794 F.2d 367, 371 (8th Cir.1986).

> FN7. The facts of this case " 'support the inference that the defendant was aware of a high probability of the existence of the fact in question [tax liability] and purposely contrived to avoid learning all of the facts.' " United States v. de Francisco-Lopez, 939 F.2d 1405, 1409 (10th Cir.1991) (quoting United States v. Alvarado, 838 F.2d 311, 314 (9th Cir.1987), cert. denied, 487 U.S. 1222, 108 S.Ct.

We have examined the district court's instructions in their totality. We are not persuaded by defendant's contentions that these instructions dealing with good faith, willfulness and knowledge were "equivocal, conflicting and inaccurate." We, therefore, reject the assignment of error that we must reverse because of prejudicial error in the jury instructions.

V. PROSECUTORIAL MISCONDUCT

A. Argument

[6] Defendant recites a litany of actions by the prosecutor in this case, including principally, a "personal appeal to the jury" and "emphasis on each citizen's duty to pay income taxes." We have reviewed the record carefully and find no reversible error in this respect. In particular, we note no error in arguing that Hauert is "subject to the tax laws ... just like the rest of us." The issue raised by defendant was not the constitutionality or the validity of the tax laws; rather, he claimed that in "good faith" he did not believe that these laws were applicable to him, and that he did not "willfully violate these laws with respect to the criminal charges made against him."

[7] Hauert also complains that the prosecutor reminded the jury that if they were not convinced that Hauert was acting in good faith, Hauert would be "vindicated" in his contentions and would be getting "a free ride." The fact is that Hauert essentially was claiming that he should not be treated like others because of his own peculiar "good faith" convictions about not being under a 204 duty to file tax returns and pay taxes in the fashion most taxpayers do.

If the prosecutor overstated the theme of the effect of vindication in some respects and urged that Hauert not go "home free," we are not convinced that such error, if any, was prejudicial in the context of the entire trial. We are satisfied, in short, that the prosecutor's conduct did not deprive Hauert of a fair trial, although we do not condone the prosecutor's impugning of defendant's patriotism. Defendant concedes that improper argument "rarely rise [s] to the level of reversible error," and we think it has not risen to that level here. As in Moylan v. Meadow Club, Inc., 979 F.2d 1246, 1251 (7th Cir.1992), "[w]e do not believe that counsel's characterizations in this case, even if untoward, were sufficiently egregious to require reversal of the verdict."

B. Gabe Thompson Episode

[8] Defendant admitted during his testimony that his friend and co-employee, Gabe Thompson, tutored him and persuaded him to reach his position on non-taxability of his wages and in not filing income tax returns. He claims it was reversible error for the prosecutor to ask him if he knew whether Thompson was convicted of income tax evasion. Defendant's prompt objection was sustained. We, again, find no reversible error in this respect. Indeed, we express no opinion as to whether such evidence may have been admissible under the circumstances of this case. The believability of Thompson, a close friend, associate and advisor, may well have been an appropriate subject of cross-examination. The district court precluded any answer and perhaps should have advised the jury that whether Thompson was convicted of tax evasion had no direct bearing on the guilt or innocence of defendant Hauert. The mere asking of this question is not, however, a basis for reversing Hauert's conviction.

C. Other Prosecutorial Conduct

[9] Hauert claims that the government attempted to shift the burden of proof in this case. The district court, however, gave the following clear instruction about the burden of proof:

> The indictment in this case is a formal method of accusing the defendant of a crime and placing him on trial. It is not evidence against the defendant and does not create any inference of guilt.
>
> The defendant is presumed to be innocent of the charges. This presumption remains with the defendant throughout every stage of the trial and during your deliberations on the verdict, and is not overcome unless from all the evidence in the case you are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty.
>
> The government has the burden of proving the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, and this burden remains on the government throughout the case. The defendant is not required to prove his innocence or to produce any evidence.

The district court further charged the jury that the government had to prove that defendant's actions were willful. The prosecutor made a misstatement of the law in argument indicating that Hauert had to convince the jury that he had a good faith belief, but added immediately: "If you think he has a good faith belief, then you are right, he is home free." Defendant's objection to this misstatement was promptly sustained by the trial court. The prosecution told the jury that they might consider whether Hauert's claim of good faith was "reasonable," [FN8] and reiterated the erroneous statement that defendant had to convince the jury of his good faith belief. Although this was an incorrect 205 argument, the district court's instructions made it clear that the burden of proof remained with the government throughout. We find no reversible error by reason of the prosecutor's misstatement.

> FN8. See United States v. Cheek, 3 F.3d 1057, 1063 (7th Cir.1993), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 114 S.Ct. 1055, 127 L.Ed.2d 376 (1994). Cheek was convicted again by the jury after remand of his case by the Supreme Court. After the Supreme Court's 1991 decision in Cheek, one commentator observed: [T]he high Court's affirmance of the subjective standard will no doubt embolden at least some factions of the tax protestor movement into continuing their struggle ... [F]uture defendants [will] continue to attempt to circumvent the tax laws, and then defend their actions on the basis of beliefs subjectively held in good faith. Anthony Michael Sabino, Revising the Willfulness Standard for Federal Tax Crimes: The Road from Bishop to Cheek, 11 REV.LITIG. 1, 42 (1991).

For the reasons indicated, we AFFIRM the jury verdict and the judgment of the district court. The writer must add that Justice Blackmun's dissent in Cheek evidences considerable prescience: "This Court's opinion, today, I fear, will encourage taxpayers to cling to frivolous views of the law in the hope of convincing a jury of their sincerity." Cheek, 498 U.S. at 210, 111 S.Ct. at 615.

Chapter 5 Relevancy and Its Limits

s 5314. ---- OTHER

The listing of permissible uses of compromise evidence in Rule 408 is illustrative, not exhaustive. [FN1] Any use of such evidence that is beyond the scope of the rule is permissible even if not mentioned; for this reason it has been suggested that the last sentence is superfluous. [FN2] In determining the admissibility of evidence offered for some other purpose, courts will have to consider the language that delineates the scope of the rule [FN3] as well as the policy that supports it. [FN4] Reliance on common law precedents is risky because to some extent the Advisory Committee sought to change the pre-existing law. [FN5] Even where there was no explicit change in the common law rule, the shift in the underlying rationale may cast doubt on the vitality of the precedents. Often the old cases rely on a mixture of relevance and hearsay analysis that yields results quite different from those one might expect under a privilege analysis. For example, if the offer of compromise was used to show the effect of the offer on some third person or to prove a state of mind of the offeror other than consciousness of liability, [FN6] the evidence was admissible. [FN7] But since the use of the evidence for this purpose might tend to deter the making of offers of compromise, a pure privilege rationale would suggest that the evidence ought to be excluded.

A good illustration of the difficulty of reconciling prior authority with the language of Rule 408 is the use of compromise evidence to show agency, ownership, or control. [FN8] For example, suppose the issue is whether the driver of the car that struck the plaintiff was an employee of the defendant corporation and evidence is offered that the corporation tried to settle the plaintiff's claim for damage arising out of the accident. [FN9] The evidence was admissible at common law, perhaps because courts felt that the evidence was less ambiguous when offered for this purpose than as evidence of consciousness of fault, [FN10] perhaps because the implied assertion of agency was seen as an independent fact, [FN11] or perhaps as a result of a flawed analogy to the subsequent repairs and other crimes rules. [FN12] But whatever the ground, some writers have assumed that the same result would follow under Rule 408. [FN13] This is difficult to justify. It would seem that in proving agency, the plaintiff is attempting to prove the validity of his claim of respondeat superior. [FN14] It can be argued that the identity of the offeror is a prerequisite to compromise negotiations and not a part of them so that the rule is not applicable, [FN15] but the argument is weak both in terms of the language of the rule and its policy. [FN16]

Fortunately, it is not always this difficult to reconcile the common law cases with the language of Rule 408. Perhaps the largest group of precedents involves the use of compromise evidence where compromise is the basis for the claim rather than circumstantial evidence of the validity of the claim. [FN17] For example, if suit is brought for breach of the settlement contract, Rule 408 does not prevent the plaintiff from proving the agreement. [FN18] By parity of reasoning, the same result should follow when the defense to the original claim is predicated on a compromise; [FN19] e.g., when the defendant pleads the compromise as a release, [FN20] accord and satisfaction, [FN21] or novation. [FN22] Although it can be argued that this use of the compromise involves proof of the "invalidity of the claim", it does so not by using the compromise as circumstantial evidence of the opponent's belief in the invalidity of the claim but as proof of an act whose legal effect is to extinguish his right to recover. [FN23] Similarly, compromises with third persons can be proved when their legal effect is to release the defendant from liability or to reduce the amount of damages he must pay. [FN24]

Rule 408 is also inapplicable when the claim is based upon some wrong that was committed in the course of the settlement discussions; [FN25] e.g., libel, assault, breach of contract, unfair labor practice, and the like. [FN26] Hence, if an insurer is sued for having breached its obligations under an indemnity policy by failing to make a reasonable settlement within policy limits, [FN27] Rule 408 does not prevent the plaintiff from proving his case; wrongful acts are not shielded because they took place during compromise negotiations. [FN28] Similarly, if an attorney sues to recover the value of his services in settling the case, he can show the nature of the negotiations. [FN29] And if a party's rights to costs are affected by his opponent's refusal to compromise this can be proven. [FN30] Finally, if the compromise agreement is itself illegal [FN31]--for example, where an antitrust claim is settled by making the plaintiff a member of the conspiracy--evidence of this is admissible under Rule 408.

Another category of permissible use involves cases in which the compromise activities result in a waiver of or an estoppel to assert some procedural or substantive right. [FN32] Here the evidence is offered not to prove the state of mind of the offeror but to explain conduct of the recipient of the offer. [FN33] So, for example, if the failure to demand the retraction of a libellous statement, or to mitigate damages, or to exhaust contract remedies is excused by compromise activities, they may be shown. [FN34] The use of compromise evidence to show the revival of a debt barred by the statute of frauds or statute of limitations may also fall under this category. [FN35]

The issue which has generated the most disagreement is whether compromise evidence may be used as a form of prior inconsistent statement to impeach a witness who testifies in a contrary fashion. [FN36] At common law, statements of fact made in compromise negotiations were admissible as evidence of liability. [FN37] So there was little reason to consider their use as prior inconsistent statements. [FN38] The same ambiguity that made an offer of compromise inadmissible to show consciousness of liability would also tend to defeat its use for impeachment. [FN39] Hence, statements that the common law did not admit compromise evidence for impeachment purposes cannot be taken at face value. [FN40]

The issue is of considerably greater significance now that Rule 408 makes evidence of statements made in the course of compromise negotiations inadmissible to prove the validity or invalidity of the claim. [FN41] A federal judge has argued that such statements are admissible to impeach, apparently on the theory that the use of the statement for impeachment purposes does not involve proof of liability or invalidity "substantively." [FN42] This analysis is not very convincing unless one takes the view that the rule does not forbid the use of compromise evidence to prove an evidentiary fact that tends to prove liability. [FN43] Moreover, it seems to rest on analogy to the hearsay rule and its distinction between "substantive" evidence and "impeachment," which is not wholly apt in the present context. [FN44]

Professors Louisell and Mueller take the same position: "Rule 408 does not bar statements in settlement talks when offered to impeach at trial." [FN45] Although it is possible that this is a reference to impeachment by showing of bias, [FN46] the context suggests otherwise. [FN47] They base their conclusion on a paragraph in the Advisory Committee's objection to the House version of Rule 408: [FN48] A further point raised by [government agencies] is that the result of extending the compromise principle to include statements of fact would be encouragement of the making of misrepresentations during the course of settlement negotiations by eliminating responsibility therefore. Of course that is not the case. Reference to the language of the rule discloses that its protection applies only when the evidence is offered for the purpose of establishing liability for or invalidity of a claim. This looks more like a calculated effort to obscure the issue than an endorsement of use of negotiation statements for impeachment purposes. [FN49] The argument to which this paragraph is a response is equally opaque but is subject to the interpretation that the "responsibility" alluded to is criminal liability for the false statement, [FN50] a use for which the compromise evidence would be admissible on the grounds stated by the Advisory Committee. [FN51]

Professors Redden and Saltzburg take the contrary position, stating that except where the person being impeached is not a party to the action, courts should "decide against admitting statements made during settlement negotiations as impeachment evidence." [FN52] Their position is based on the policy of the rule: "Opening the door to impeachment evidence on a regular basis may well result in more restricted negotiations." [FN53] But this argument ignores an equally important policy: "the end that truth may be ascertained." [FN54] A party who is impeached at trial by an inconsistent statement made during settlement negotiations, in the absence of some mistake, must have been lying at one time or the other. It is difficult to see why the law would care to encourage falsehood in either venue. [FN55] The purpose of Rule 408 is to foster "complete candor" between the parties, [FN56] not to protect false representations. [FN57]

Since the language of the rule cuts one way, policy another, and the legislative intent is unclear, courts will have to decide the question as best they can. [FN58] In this situation, it would seem that the injunction in Rule 102 to interpret the rules so as to foster the values of "fairness" and "truth" [FN59] should lead courts to conclude that prior inconsistent statements in the course of settlement negotiations should be admitted to impeach a party who testifies. [FN60] If so, then only the fact the statement was made should be admitted, not that it was made during settlement negotiations. The latter fact would still be barred by Rule 408 since it is unnecessary for the purpose for which the evidence is admitted. [FN61]

A related question concerns the admissibility of compromise evidence offered to show "spoliation" of a civil case. [FN62] The explicit provision in Rule 408 only applies to attempts to obstruct "a criminal investigation or prosecution." [FN63] Suppose, however, that the defendant should reach a compromise with one plaintiff that requires him to conceal or destroy evidence that would assist the other plaintiff to prove his case. [FN64] Though it is difficult to justify as a matter of policy, the fact that Rule 408 has a provision that limits the use of such evidence to cases where a criminal prosecution is the target might lead to the conclusion that the drafters intended to exclude the evidence in the example posed. [FN65] However, a better interpretation would be that an agreement to spoliate the case against another does not involve a "valuable consideration" [FN66] because of its illegality and is therefore beyond the protection of the rule for that reason. [FN67]

In addition to those cases in which compromise evidence is admissible because it is beyond the scope of Rule 408, there are also cases in which other rules permit it to be used. For example, it may come in as a preliminary fact for the admissibility of other evidence under Rule 104(a) [FN68] or to explain a statement taken out of context under Rule 106. [FN69] In addition, it is possible that the Erie doctrine may make the evidence admissible in some cases in which state law supplies the rule of decision. [FN70]

FN1. Not exhaustive Advisory Committee's Note, Rule 408.

FN2. Superfluous See N.Y. Trial Lawyers, Recommendation and Study of the Proposed Federal Rules of Evidence, 1970, p. 25, reprinted in 2 P.L.I., Federal Civil Practice 4th, 1972, p. 287 (suggesting deletion of the last sentence "since the first sentence of the rule clearly sets forth the limited purpose for which such evidence is inadmissible.").

FN3. Scope See ss 5303-5309.

FN4. Policy See s 5302.

FN5. Change pre-existing law The major changes were the expansion of the common law rule to cover completed compromises and statements made during negotiations. Ibid.

FN6. Other state of mind 2 Chamberlayne, The Modern Law of Evidence, 1911, s 1450.

FN7. Admissible The admissibility to show the state of mind of another follows from the hearsay notion that statements offered to show the effect on the hearer are not offered for the truth of the matter asserted. When offered to show some state of mind other than consciousness of liability, the evidence usually did not have the ambiguity that was the ground for exclusion under the relevance rationale.

FN8. Agency or control See Lloyd v. Thomas, C.A.7th, 1952, 195 F.2d 486, 491; Fidelity & Cas. Co. v. Southwest Bell Telephone Co., C.A.8th, 1944, 140 F.2d 724, 727; cf. National Battery Co. v. Levy, C.A.8th, 1942, 126 F.2d

FN9. Example See also the dog-bite hypothetical case used in s 5307, text at note 66.

FN10. Less ambiguous Though it does not seem plausible today, courts may have thought, in the heyday of rugged individualism, that a person was more likely to make an offer of compromise even though he did not believe his actions were blameworthy than he would be to pay damages for the acts of another when there was reason to doubt his responsibility for those acts.

FN11. Independent fact See s 5307.

FN12. Flawed analogy The other crimes rule and the subsequent repair rule bar evidence only as proof of conduct in the first case and negligence in the second; hence, evidence to prove the identity of the actor is admissible under those rules. See s 5286; vol. 22, s 5246.

FN13. Same result under 408 2 Louisell & Mueller, Federal Evidence, 1978, p. 299; 2 Weinstein & Berger, Weinstein's Evidence, 1975, pp. 408-26.

FN14. Prove validity See s 5308.

FN15. Not part of compromise See s 5304.

FN16. Policy It seems difficult to argue that one would be deterred from making an offer of compromise by admissibility to prove direct liability but not when used to show vicarious liability.

FN17. Basis for claim Compare Model Code of Evidence, Rule 309(4) and U.R.E. 52(b), quoted s 5301 nn. 28, 29.

FN18. Breach of settlement See s 5308.

FN19. Defense on compromise See generally 2 Chamberlayne, The Modern Law of Evidence, 1911, s 1442.

FN20. Release Reporter's Note, Prop.Vt.R.Ev. 408.

FN21. Accord and satisfaction Cal.Evid.Code s 1152 does not bar evidence of a compromise offered as proof of an accord and satisfaction. Moving Picture Machine Operators Union Local No. 162 v. Glasgow Theatres, Inc., 1970, 86 Cal.Rptr. 33, 37, 6 Cal.App.3d 395 (dictum).

FN22. Novation The Wisconsin drafters added "accord and satisfaction, novation, or release" to the last sentence of Rule 408. See Wis.Stats.Ann. s 904.08, quoted in s 5031 n. 33.

FN23. Legal effect Under the hearsay analysis used at common law, the opponent's admission is offered not for the truth of the matter asserted but as legally operative conduct. See discussion under Rule 801.

FN24. Third persons Reporter's Note, Prop.Vt.R.Ev. 408: "Note that the rule is not intended to change Quesnel v. Raleigh * * * which held that any amount paid by a joint tortfeasor could be shown in mitigation of damages, nor to alter the more general proposition that unqualified release of one joint tortfeasor releases the others. These doctrines do not involve circumstantial use of the settlement which the rule seeks to prevent * * *."

FN25. Wrong in settlement This is because Rule 408 only bars the use of compromise evidence to prove the validity or invalidity of the claim that was the subject of the compromise, not some other claim. See s 5308.

FN26. Unfair labor practice This list is suggested by a former member of the Advisory Committee, 2 Weinstein & Berger, Weinstein's Evidence, 1975, pp. 408-28.

FN27. Failure to settle Ehrhardt, Florida Evidence, 1977, p. 92.

FN28. Wrongful acts not shielded Perhaps the most dramatic illustration of this is Fletcher v. Western Nat. Life Ins. Co., 1970, 89 Cal.Rptr. 78, 10 Cal.App.3d 376, where the court held that Cal.Evid.Code s 1152 did not exclude evidence of intentional infliction of emotional harm brought about when an insurer "embarked upon a concerted course of conduct to induce plaintiff to surrender his insurance policy or enter into a disadvantageous 'settlement' of a nonexistent dispute by means of false and threatening letters and the employment of economic pressure based upon his disabled and, therefore impecunious, condition (the very thing insured against) * * *."

FN29. Attorney's fees McCormick, Evidence, Cleary ed. 1972, s 274, p. 664.

FN30. Costs Rule 408 does not apply to a determination by the trial court as to whether to allow pre-judgment interest because of the defendant's refusal to settle. Iberian Tankers v. Gates Constr. Corp., D.C.N.Y.1975, 388 F.Supp. 1190, 1192. See also 2 Chamberlayne, The Modern Law of Evidence, 1911, p. 1836.

FN31. Illegal compromise Overseas Motors, Inc. v. Import Motors Ltd., Inc., D.C.Mich.1974, 375 F.Supp. 499 (dictum).

FN32. Waiver or estoppel If the conduct of the opponent in compromise is such as to constitute a waiver or estoppel with respect to some procedural right, it is probably also sufficient to estop him from asserting Rule 408 to bar proof of the conduct. See generally vol. 21, s 5039.

FN33. Explain conduct 2 Chamberlayne, The Modern Law of Evidence, 1911, p. 1836.

FN34. Mitigation or exhaustion Warner Constr. Corp. v. City of Los Angeles, 1970, 466 P.2d 996, 1104 n. 12, 2 Cal.3d 285, 297 n. 12, 85 Cal.Rptr. 444, 452 n. 12 (dictum; applying Cal.Evid.Code s 1152).

FN35. Revival of debt 2 Weinstein & Berger, Weinstein's Evidence, 1975, pp. 408-28; cf. Model Code of Evidence, Rule 309(4) and U.R.E. 52(b), quoted in s 5031 nn. 28, 29, both of which treat this use as an exception to the rule. For a criticism of the Model Code's treatment of this issue, see Likert, Precautionary Measures and Compromises, 1945 Wis.L.Rev. 399, 401.

FN36. Inconsistent statement Distinguish the use of the compromise to impeach by showing a bias in the witness toward the offeror, admissible because it is offered to show the effect of the compromise on the state of mind of the witness, not as evidence of consciousness of liability by the offeror. See s 5311. Distinguish also the use of the fact that the party had made an inconsistent claim, admissible because Rule 408 covers offers of compromise, not claims. See s 5304.

FN37. Statements of fact See ss 5302, 5307.

FN38. Little reason A statement in a settlement offer that certain bonds were owned by the defendant should have been admitted to impeach his testimony at trial that his son was the owner. U.S. v. Tuschman, C.A.6th, 1969, 405 F.2d 688.

FN39. Defeat use 2 Chamberlayne, The Modern Law of Evidence, 1911, p. 1827.

FN40. Did not admit Compare Wigmore's ambiguous treatment of the question. 4 Wigmore, Evidence, Chadbourn rev. 1972, s 1062, n. 1.

FN41. Now inadmissible See ss 5307, 5308.

FN42. "Substantively" See Redden & Saltzburg, Federal Rules of Evidence Manual, 2d ed. 1977, p. 179.

FN43. Evidentiary fact If the witness testifies to facts that are relevant to the validity or invalidity of the claim, evidence that impairs his credibility would also seem to bear on the same ultimate issue. One can escape this reading only by arguing that Rule 408 excludes statements only when offered as direct proof of the ultimate issue, not as circumstantial evidence in a line of proof that leads to validity or invalidity. For reasons stated in s 5308, this does not appear to be a proper interpretation of the rule.

FN44. Not wholly apt The purpose of the hearsay rule is to prevent the testimonial use of extrajudicial statements; the policy of that rule is satisfied when the use of the statement does not require any inference as to the truth of the matter asserted. In the context of prior inconsistent statements, this distinction is cast, in terms of "substantive use" and use for "impeachment" because in that context the use for impeachment does not require the testimonial use of the statement. But this distinction makes no sense even with other uses of hearsay statements for impeachment; for example, one could not prove that a witness was biased by a hearsay statement; i.e., one could not prove that a witness was biased by a hearsay statement of some third person to that effect. Rule 408, however, does not exclude statements made during settlement negotiations because of the fear that they will be used testimonially but because it is thought that admitting the statement will tend to discourage "freedom of communication" that is necessary for successful compromises. See Advisory Committee's Note, Rule 408. There is no reason to suppose that a party will be any less deterred from making the statement if it is only used for purposes of impeachment.

FN45. "Rule 408 does not bar" 2 Louisell & Mueller, Federal Evidence, 1978, p. 277.

FN46. Impeachment by bias A footnote appended to the quoted statement refers the reader to their discussion of impeachment by bias. Id. at n. 29.

FN47. Context The quoted statement purports to be a paraphrase of the Advisory Committee's argument referred to in the text; that argument is clearly not aimed at impeachment for bias, whatever it may mean.

FN48. Objection to House version Senate Hearings, p. 59.

FN49. Obscure "Responsibility" is surely an unusual way to characterize the susceptibility of a witness to impeachment by prior inconsistent statements. One suspects that the drafter of this paragraph felt that the government had clumsily attempted to raise a difficult question that the Advisory Committee did not want to or could not answer and therefore seized upon the inartfulness of his opponent as a device for evading the issue.

FN50. Criminal liability "I am aware of no criminal penalties for factual misrepresentations made during negotiations to settle a controversy between two private parties. On the other hand there is a strong public policy, implemented by various criminal sanctions, of discouraging false statements to federal Government agencies. * * * I do not suggest that enactment of Rule 408 would encourage direct violations of these criminal statutes. But the public policy they express would certainly be undermined by assuring taxpayers that, unless criminal intent can be shown, they have no responsibility for the accuracy of any factual representations they may make in the course of settlement negotiations with the Internal Revenue Service." 2 House Hearings, p. 302 (letter from General Counsel of the Treasury).

FN52. "Decide against" Redden & Saltzburg, Federal Rules of Evidence Manual, 2d ed. 1977, p. 172.

FN53. "Restricted negotiations" Ibid.

FN54. "Truth ascertained" See Rule 102.

FN55. Either venue Since most falsehoods in negotiations would probably favor the party making them, it is doubtful that the opponent would ever care to use them to impeach an honest statement at trial. Hence, most cases in which the issue is likely to arise will be cases in which the party attempts to mislead his opponent with a spurious candor in negotiations or honestly admits a weakness during negotiations and attempts to cover it with a lie at trial.

FN56. "Complete candor" Comment, Cal.Evid.Code s 1152. This section was the model for the provision in Rule 408 barring evidentiary use of negotiation statements.

FN57. False representations It might be claimed that the argument in the text fails to distinguish between the party who takes the stand on his own to testify contrary to his statement in negotiations and one who is called by the opponent for the express purpose of using the statement to impeach him if he does not testify in accordance with it. But the notion that the law ought to distinguish between a person who lies to carry his own burden of proof and one who testifies falsely so as to deny his opponent the right to prove his case seems to be based upon a supposedly outmoded theory of the nature of trials. Cf. discussion of "discoverable evidence" in s 5310.

FN58. Courts decide It would certainly seem to be an anomalous result if Rule 408 is interpreted to admit evidence of a compromise to show a possible reason for a witness to falsify under the rubric of "bias," despite the fact that this may unfairly prejudice the party's case, see s 5311, while a statement made in negotiations offered to show that the witness did lie is excluded, despite the lack of any unfairness to the party.

FN59. "Fairness" and "truth" See vol. 21, ss 5023, 5026.

FN60. Admitted to impeach Of course, if the party objecting to the statement was not a party to the compromise, he has no standing to object. See s 5315.

FN61. Unnecessary There would be no need to adhere to this distinction if the existence of compromise negotiations had already been disclosed to the jury for some other purpose permitted by Rule 408.

FN62. "Spoliation" See generally vol. 22, s 5178.

FN63. "Criminal investigation" See s 5313.

FN64. Conceal or destroy Rule 408 would not prevent the plaintiff from showing that the evidence was destroyed, but this will do him little good if he cannot show that it was done at the defendant's behest.

FN65. Intended to exclude Unless, of course, the agreement involved testimony the other plaintiff was to give; presumably the agreement would then be admissible to show "bias or prejudice." See s 5311.

FN66. "Valuable consideration" See s 5305.

FN67. That reason Alternatively, it can be argued that the evidence is admissible because it proves the invalidity of the defense not by an inference from the defendant's desire to settle the related case but as an inference from his desire to spoliate the present case.

FN68. Preliminary fact See vol. 21, s 5055.

FN69. Out of context See vol. 21, s 5078.

FN70. Erie doctrine See s 5315.

s 5314. PERMISSIBLE USES--OTHER

FN1. Not exhaustive To explain absence of settling party: Kennon v. Slipstreamer, Inc., C.A.5th, 1986, 794 F.2d 1067, 1070; Belton v. Fibreboard Corp., C.A.5th, 1984, 724 F.2d 500, 505 (offered by settling plaintiff); Peterson v. Little-Giant Glencoe Portable Elevator Corp., Minn.1985, 366 N.W.2d 111 (midtrial settlement). To show knowledge: Johnson v. Hugo's Skateway, C.A.4th, 1992, 974 F.2d 1408, 1413 (of racial hostility); Breuer Electric Mfg. v. Toronado Systems of American, C.A.7th, 1982, 687 F.2d 182, 185 (awareness of issues); U.S. v. Gilbert, C.A.2d, 1981, 668 F.2d 94, 97 (of securities laws). Rule 408 does not bar use of settlement negotiations to prove the workings of the settling defendant's scheme. Broadcort Capital Corp. v. Summa Medical Corp., C.A.10th, 1992, 972 F.2d 1183, 1194 n. 16. District court did not err in admitting evidence of indemnity agreement to show that two parties were not adverse to each other. Brocklesby v. U.S., C.A.9th, 1985, 767 F.2d 1288, 1293. One court has held that evidence of a prior compromise is excluded under Rule 408 without any attention to the purpose for which the evidence was sought to be admissible. Playboy Enterprises, Inc. v. Chuckleberry Publishing, Inc., D.C.N.Y.1980, 486 F.Supp. 414, 423. Ariz.R.Ev. 408 did not prevent the use of settlement between buyer and seller to determine whether it constituted a default by one party or a mutual recission where this fact was relevant to amount of commission due broker who had arranged the deal that was subject of dispute. Campbell v. Mahany, App.1980, 620 P.2d 711, 127 Ariz. 332. Evidence of defendant's prior settlement with class of which plaintiff was a member is not inadmissible under Cal.Evid.Code s 1154 when offered to prove that punitive and deterrent effects of exemplary damages had already been satisfied. Lemer v. Boise Cascade, Inc., 1980, 165 Cal.Rptr. 555, 107 Cal.App.3d 1. Evidence of compromise is admissible to show that employer's failure to pay was intentional and not inadvertent. Miller v. Component Homes, Inc., Iowa 1984, 356 N.W.2d 213, 216. Evidence of settlement offer of $85,000 is admissible to show why plaintiff thought that $10,000 repair to plane was inadequate. Dodson Aviation v. Rollins, 1991, 807 P.2d 1319, 1324, 15 Kan.App.2d 314. A similar statement appears in the Comment to Prop.N.Y.Evid.Code s 408. Personal injury plaintiff's settlement of prior injury claims was relevant to show preexisting injury but was properly excluded as likely to confuse the jury in case where prior injury had been conceded. Callihan v. Burlington Northern, Inc., 1982, 654 P.2d 972, 976, 201 Mont. 350. Shimola v. Cleveland, 1992, 625 N.E.2d 626, 630, 89 Ohio App.3d 505 (settlement of earlier suit on same issue admissible to show background of current dispute). Testimony that a client authorized his attorney to try to settle is not inadmissible under Rule 408 when offered to prove the client was aware of the claim. Cannell v. Rhodes, 1986, 509 N.E.2d 963, 967, 31 Ohio.App.3d 183. Gilman v. Towmotor Corp., 1992, 621 A.2d 1260, 1264, 160 Vt. 116 (admissible where it would be unfair and prejudicial to exclude).

But see Court assumes that list in last sentence of Rule 408 is exclusive and does not allow evidence of settlement of state court action against a third person to offset prejudice caused by admission into evidence of the pleading in that action. Vincent v. Louis Marx & Co., Inc., C.A.1st, 1989, 874 F.2d 36, 42.

FN2. Superfluous Since the third sentence of Rule 408 was either superfluous or redundant, its omission from a revision of the rule did not change its meaning. Harriman v. Maddocks, Me.1986, 518 A.2d 1027, 1031.

FN4. Policy Policy of Rule 408 precludes use of letters in settlement negotiations to satisfy the statute of frauds. Trebor Sportswear Co., Inc. v. The Limited Stores, Inc., C.A.2d, 1989, 865 F.2d 506, 510. Social policy of antitrust laws made it clear that Rule 408 was not intended to exclude proof of nolo contendere pleas to antitrust violation offered to show that defendant would engage in anticompetitive behavior if permitted to acquire the plaintiff. Crouse-Hinds Co. v. Internorth, Inc., D.C.N.Y.1980, 518 F.Supp. 413. Letters offering settlement and copy of movie "Poltergeist" delivered with plaintiff's demand letter were properly admitted where objections were inadequate to alert trial court that Rule 408 was being invoked. Haney v. Purcell Co., Inc., Tex.App.1990, 796 S.W.2d 782, 789.

FN6. Other state of mind Evidence of settlement of prior police brutality by city was admissible under Rule 408 to show that city was aware of practice to support "condoned custom" theory of liability. Spell v. McDaniel, C.A.4th, 1987, 824 F.2d 1380, 1400. Court assumes that Rule 408 would not bar use of document prepared for compromise negotiations to prove that party had notice of alleged defects in building. Ramada Development Co. v. Rauch, C.A.5th, 1981, 644 F.2d 1097, 1107.

FN7. Admissible In civil rights action against city for the shooting death of plaintiff's son, evidence of settlement negotiations between city and mother of another person beaten by the same officer were admissible to show knowledge of the officer's dangerous propensities. Gagliardi v. Flint, C.A.3d, 1977, 564 F.2d 112, 116. Evidence of settlement offer was admissible to prove mental state of employer in a suit for discrimination. Bulaich v. A.T. & T. Information Systems, 1989, 778 P.2d 1031, 1037, 113 Wn.2d 254.

FN8. Agency or control Statements in settlement negotiations by the defendant's insurance agent were not admissible under Rule 408 to show that plaintiff was an employee of defendant. Sortino v. Miller, 1983, 335 N.W.2d 284, 214 Neb. 592.

FN12. Flawed analogy Court assumes that since other crimes rule would not bar use of defendant's disregard of property rights of others to show intent in instant outrage, evidence of settlement of claims for such wrongs evidence is also admissible under Rule 408. Bradbury v. Phillips Petroleum Co., C.A.10th, 1987, 815 F.2d 1356, 1364. This overlooks the fact that the only way proof of settlement of other claims proves defendant's contempt for the law is through an assumption that the claims settled were valid, exactly the inference prohibited by Rule 408. Rule 404(b) on the other hand does not prohibit proof of bad acts offered to prove intent rather than conduct.

FN17. Basis for claim This seems to have been overlooked in Duse v. International Business Machines, D.C.Conn.1990, 748 F.Supp. 956, 962 (Rule 408 bars plaintiff's suit for interference with his attempt to settle dispute with third party). One court seems to have used Rule 408 to prevent one party from proving statements they claimed were a repudiation of the contract. Conroy v. Book Automation, Inc., Minn.App.1987, 398 N.W.2d 657, 660.

FN18. Breach of settlement Rule 408 would not bar evidence of settlement offered to prove breach of settlement agreement. Cates v. Morgan Portable Bldg. Corp., C.A.7th, 1985, 780 F.2d 683, 691.

FN19. Defense on compromise B & B Investment Club v. Kleinart's, Inc., D.C.Pa.1979, 472 F.Supp. 787 (to defeat corporate officer indemnity claim by showing not successful "on the merits").

FN21. Accord and satisfaction Welched accord and satisfaction was admissible in suit on original contract. Tag Resources v. Petroleum Well Services, Tex.App.1990, 791 S.W.2d 600, 606.

FN22. Novation West's Ann.Cal.Evid.Code s 1152 does not bar evidence of settlement of another lawsuit when offered as evidence of an account stated. Truestone, Inc. v. Simi West Industrial Park II, 1984, 209 Cal.Rptr. 757, 764, 163 Cal.App.3d 715.

FN24. Third persons Evidence of insurer's settlement with insured would not be barred by Rule 408 when offered to show that payment was voluntary and thus not a proper element of damages in subrogation claim against tortfeasor.

Weir v. Federal Insurance Co., C.A.10th, 1987, 811 F.2d 1387, 1395. Rule 408 does not bar evidence of compromise of claim with third person to show costs that had been incurred by partners. Jensen v. Westberg, App.1988, 772 P.2d 228, 236, 115 Idaho 1021.

But see Wardell v. McMillan, Wyo.1992, 844 P.2d 1052, 1065 (admissibility not required by comparative negligence law).

FN25. Wrong in settlement Rule 408 does not bar the use of an affidavit submitted in settlement negotiations to impose Rule 11 sanctions. Eisenberg v. University of New Mexico, C.A.10th, 1991, 936 F.2d 1131, 1134. Evidence of settlement negotiations was properly admitted under Rule 408 on the issue of whether party acting on behalf of defendant had interfered with efforts of plaintiff to mitigate damages. Urico v. Parnell Oil Co., C.A.1st, 1983, 708 F.2d 852, 855. Rule 408 does not exclude evidence of settlement negotiations in proceeding under Civil Rule 23(e) to obtain judicial approval of class action settlement. In re General Motors Corporation Engine Interchange Litigation, C.A.7th, 1979, 594 F.2d 1106, 1124 n. 20. In action for malicious prosecution, evidence of insurer's statements in settlement negotiations were admissible to show that it filed an action in name of its insured that it knew to be meritless as a method of strongarming plaintiff into a settlement. Bradshaw v. State Farm Auto Ins., 1988, 758 P.2d 1313, 1322, 157 Ariz. 411. Trial judge properly ruled that letter sent to insurance company by lawyer was not admissible as proof of an attempt to inflate client's damages. Petersen v. State Farm Auto Ins. Co., La.App.1989, 543 So.2d 109, 115. Rule 408 permits use of statements in negotiation to show that release was signed as a result of fraud. Harriman v. Maddocks, Me.1986, 518 A.2d 1027, 1031. For a case in which the court used Rule 408 to prevent the plaintiff from proving what it claimed was the repudiation of the contract by the defendant, see Conroy v. Book Automation, Inc., Minn.App.1987, 398 N.W.2d 657, 660. Rule 408 did not bar use of evidence of settlement negotiations to prove that parties were fraudulently induced to enter agreement. Gorman v. Soble, 1982, 328 N.W.2d 119, 120 Mich.App. 831. Rule 408 does not bar proving representations made during settlement negotiations when these are the basis of claims of fraud being sued on. Portland Savings & Loan Association v. Bernstein, Tex.App.1985, 716 S.W.2d 532, 537. For an illustration of the sort of heavy-handed tactics that ought not to be shielded by Rule 408, see Goodman, All The Justice I Could Afford, 1983, p. 58 (employer opposed fired employee's claim for unemployment compensation benefits as tactic to coerce agreement on settlement of age discrimination action).

FN27. Failure to settle White v. Western Title Ins. Co., 1985, 221 Cal.Rptr. 509, 518, 40 Cal.3d 870, 710 P.2d 309; Pattison v. Valley Forge Ins. Co., La.App.1992, 599 So.2d 873, 877 (but excludible under Rule 403); Gelinas v. Metropolitan Property & Liability Ins. Co., 1988, 551 A.2d 962, 968, 131 N.H. 154; U.S. Fire Ins. Co. v. Millard, Tex.App.1993, 847 S.W.2d 668, 672. Offers to settle entire case were not admissible to refute bad faith claim with respect to only one element. Martin v. Principal Casualty Ins. Co., Colo.App.1991, 835 P.2d 505, 511. After a thorough review of the conflicting cases from other jurisdictions, court holds that a defendant cannot introduce evidence of its own offer to settle to mitigate a claim for punitive damages. Ettus v. Orkin Exterminating Co., Inc., 1983, 665 P.2d 730, 233 Kan. 555. Settlement negotiations are admissible in defense of claim for attorney's fees for failure to make a timely tender under an uninsured motorists policy. Benoit v. State Farm Auto Ins. Co., La.App.1992, 602 So.2d 53, 55. Rule 408 does not bar proof of settlement offers and discussions in a suit for wrongful failure to settle by insurer. Gelinas v. Metropolitan Property & Liability Ins. Co., 1988, 551 A.2d 962, 968, 131 N.H. 154.

FN28. Wrongful acts not shielded Rule 408 does not shield wrongful acts during settlement negotiations; a party can prove that he or she was induced to sign by fraudulent misrepresentations. Harriman v. Maddocks, Me. 1986, 518 A.2d 1027, 1031.

FN34. Mitigation or exhaustion Evidence of settlement negotiations was admissible to prove the plaintiff's failure to mitigate damages. Bhandari v. First National Bank of Commerce, C.A.5th, 1987, 808 F.2d 1082, 1103. Evidence of settlement negotiations was admissible to show that defendant's insurer had interfered with efforts of plaintiff to mitigate damages. Urico v. Parnell Oil Co., C.A.1st, 1983, 708 F.2d 852, 855. Rule 408 does not bar introduction of employer's offer to take back employee to prove failure to mitigate damages for wrongful discharge. Thomas v. Resort Health Related Facility, D.C.N.Y.1982, 539 F.Supp. 630. Rule 408 does not bar admission of offer to return converted property to show mitigation of damages. McKenzie v. Tom Gibson Ford, Inc., 1988, 749 S.W.2d 653, 657, 295 Ark. 326. Evidence of insurance company settlement offer was not admissible to show that plaintiff could have had money to repair truck and thus mitigate consequential damages. Waseca Sand & Gravel, Inc. v. Olson, Minn.App.1985, 379 N.W.2d 592, 594.

FN36. Inconsistent statement Where plaintiff claimed that another baseless libel suit had been settled, evidence that the suit had in fact been abandoned when the defendant agreed to publish a letter-to-the-editor it would have published anyway was admissible to impeach. American Family Life Assur. Co. v. Teasdale, C.A.8th, 1984, 733 F.2d 559, 568. After canvassing competing views, court holds that statements made in settlement negotiations may be admitted to impeach testimony given at trial. Davidson v. Beco Corp., App.1986, 733 P.2d 781, 786, 112 Idaho 560. Evidence of negotiations with insurance carrier could be admitted under Minn.R.Ev. 408 as impeachment of trial testimony concerning the loss. In re Commodore Hotel Fire and Explosion, Minn.1982, 324 N.W.2d 245. Defense offer to get "get" for $25,000 was admissible to show that refusal to obtain divorce was based on monetary rather than religious considerations. Burns v. Burns, 1987, 538 A.2d 438, 440, 223 N.J.Super. 219. A.B.A. Litigation Sec., Emerging Problems Under The Federal Rules of Evidence, 1983, p. 78.

FN52. "Decide against" After one-sided review of the literature, court concludes that letter in which defendant claimed that its mandatory retirement program was legal could not be used to impeach testimony of executives at trial that there was no such program. E.E.O.C. v. Gear Petroleum, Inc., C.A.10th, 1991, 948 F.2d 1542, 1545. "The clear import of the Conference Report as well as the general understanding among lawyers is that such conduct or statements may not be admitted for impeachment purposes." M. Graham, Handbook of Federal Evidence, 1981, pp. 255-256 (emphasis in original). This is the position taken in Tenn.R.Ev. 408, discussed in s 5301, note 33, this SUPPLEMENTnt. For a somewhat evasive embrace of this position, see Waltz & Huston, The Rules of Evidence in Settlement, 1981, 5 Litigation 11, 16 (courts should "almost never" admit compromise evidence to impeach).

FN56. "Complete candor" Cal.Evid.Code s 1155 justified exclusion of evidence of statement made by defendant's agent during settlement negotiations that would have impeached direct testimony of another agent. C & K Engineering Contractors v. Amber Steel Company, Inc., 1978, 151 Cal.Rptr. 323, 23 Cal.3d 1, 587 P.2d 1136.

FN58. Courts decide Court assumes that evidence of settlement from others was admissible to impeach the plaintiff's testimony that he could not afford needed surgical procedure. Williams v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., C.A.5th, 1989, 875 F.2d 501, 504. F.R.Ev. 408 codifies a trend in the caselaw that permits evidence of settlement to be used to impeach. County of Hennepin v. AFG Industries, Inc., C.A.8th, 1984, 726 F.2d 149, 153. Court opines that First Circuit would not allow use of compromise statements for impeachment. Derderian v. Polaroid Corp., D.C.Mass.1988, 121 F.R.D. 9, 12 n. 1. Evidence that lawyer referred to purported will as a "shopping list" during settlement negotiations was admissible to impeach his testimony that he had never made such a reference. Matter of Estate of O'Donnell, 1991, 803 S.W.2d 530, 531, 304 Ark. 460. Almost all courts have held that statements made in compromise negotiations can be used for impeachment. Davidson v. Beco Corp., 1987, 753 P.2d 1253, 1255, 114 Idaho 107 (collecting cases). Rule 408 does not bar use of compromise evidence when offered to impeach. El Paso Electric Co. v. Real Estate Mart, Inc., App.1982, 651 P.2d 105, 109, 98 N.M. 570. Opinion, though vague, suggests that court is not sure if evidence of compromise ought to be admitted to impeach. Hursh Agency, Inc. v. Wigwam Homes, Inc., Wyo.1983, 664 P.2d 27, 36. It has been suggested that the rule should be amended to preclude the use of evidence for impeachment purposes. Kirkpatrick, Reforming Evidence Law in Oregon, 1980, 59 Ore.L.Rev. 43, 67.

FN60. Admitted to impeach Settlement documents were admissible to impeach by specific contradiction testimony that the bank never gave reasons for its actions regarding foreclosure. Freidus v. First National Bank of Council Bluffs, C.A.8th, 1991, 928 F.2d 793, 795. Where husband testified he was not aware of award of spousal maintenance until he was ordered to pay it, evidence of settlement agreement providing for award was admissible to impeach. DeForest v. DeForest, App.1985, 694 P.2d 1241, 1247, 143 Ariz. 627. The Rule 102 rationale is adopted in Davidson v. Beco Corp., 1987, 753 P.2d 1253, 114 Idaho 107 and Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Arkansas Sheriff's Boys' Ranch, 1983, 655 S.W.2d 389, 280 Ark. 53. A prior inconsistent statement made during settlement negotiations should be admitted only if it strongly suggests that the witness has lied or if prejudice is likely to be slight. Davidson v. Beco Corp., App.1986, 733 P.2d 781, 787, 112 Idaho 560. Where plaintiff testified at trial that he never got any closer than 40 feet to escaped hamburgers-on-the-hoof, admission in demand letter that he came within ten feet of the steer was admissible to impeach him. Davidson v. Prince, Utah App.1991, 813 P.2d 1225, 1233 n. 9. This position is approved in Blakely, Article IV: Relevancy and Its Limits, 1983, 20 Hous.L.Rev. 151, 242.

FN64. Conceal or destroy Court assumes that Mary Carter agreement would be admissible under Rule 408 in Soria v. Sierra Pacific Airlines, Inc., 1986, 726 P.2d 706, 717, 111 Idaho 594. There is an exception to rule excluding evidence of settlement for "Mary Carter" agreements; i.e., agreements where party to the settlement continues in case as a pretended adversary while in fact having an interest in the putative adversary's victory. Turner v. Monsanto Co., Tex.App.1986, 717 S.W.2d 378, 380 (but finding agreement at issue did not qualify). Rule 408 does not bar revealing to jury that directed verdict on plaintiff's claim against one defendant was pursuant to a settlement in which that defendant had an interest in the plaintiff's recovery from remaining defendant. Sampson v. Karpinski, 1986, 515 A.2d 1066, 1069, 147 Vt. 315.

FN67. That reason Trial court properly admitted statement of cab company official on arriving on the scene of accident involving cab that he would give the other driver money "to forget about the incident." Frias v. Valle, 1985, 698 P.2d 875, 877, 101 Nev. 219 (apparently assuming Rule 408 did not apply).

FN68. Preliminary fact In determining trustworthiness of hearsay, the court can consider that party compromised a claim in reliance thereon despite Rule 408 as that rule does not apply to preliminary fact determinations under Rule 104. In re Japanese Electronic Products Antitrust Litigation, C.A.3d, 1983, 723 F.2d 238, 275, decision reversed on other grounds 1986, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 475 U.S. 574, 89 L.Ed.2d 538.

Chapter 5 Relevancy and Its Limits

s 5313. ---- OBSTRUCTION OF JUSTICE

The last permissible use suggested by the Advisory Committee is "proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution." [FN1] The scope and rationale of this provision is uncertain, in part because of the ambiguity in the common law rule. As codified by Wigmore, that rule was: In a criminal case, the accused's offer to pay value to a complaining witness for avoiding prosecution, being contrary to public policy, is receivable as evidence of an admission. [FN2] In his treatise, Wigmore speaks of this conduct as being admissible against an accused because it would be an "unlawful act" to "settle" the prosecution. [FN3] McCormick, however, attempted to distinguish between legitimate plea bargaining and attempts to "buy off" the prosecution. [FN4] The Advisory Committee Note seems to have followed McCormick's analysis: "An effort to 'buy off' the prosecution or a prosecuting witness in a criminal case is not within the policy of the rule of exclusion." [FN5]

However, this reliance on McCormick still leaves it unclear (a) exactly what sort of conduct is being proscribed, and (b) what evidentiary uses of that conduct are permissible. To illustrate, suppose a case in which the plaintiff has accused the defendant of violating the antitrust laws, both in testimony before a grand jury and in a civil suit filed against him. Which of the following acts is an attempt to "buy off" the prosecution?: (1) The defendant offers the plaintiff one million dollars to settle the civil action; (2) The defendant offers the prosecution a guilty plea, and a promise to make restitution of one million dollars to the victim in return for a favorable sentencing recommendation; (3) The defendant offers the plaintiff one million dollars to (a) leave the country, or (b) change his testimony, or (c) attempt to convince the prosecutor to drop criminal charges, or (d) write a favorable letter to the sentencing judge. There are countless other variations and the case may be made even more difficult by supposing, as sometimes occurs, that the government has both a civil claim for damages resulting from the criminal conduct and a duty to prosecute for the crime. However, the foregoing examples should suffice to portray the range of conduct that may be arguably claimed to be an attempt to "buy off" the prosecution.

Assuming that the conduct is that proscribed by the rule, in which of the following instances is it admissible?: (1) The evidence is offered against the defendant in a criminal prosecution for obstruction of justice; (2) The evidence is offered against the defendant in the criminal antitrust trial; (3) The evidence is offered against the defendant in the civil antitrust trial. Notice that the answer to the first question becomes much simpler if the evidence is admissible only in a criminal prosecution in which the conduct in question is the basis for the charges. In such cases the admissibility of the evidence would be determined by the same law that determines the criminality of the conduct.

Since the answer to the second question may simplify matters with respect to the first, let us begin with it. It is possible to read the last clause of Rule 408 as applying only to the case in which the claimed "compromise activities" are the basis of criminal charges against the party. [FN6] The evidence would be admissible in such a case because it is not being offered to prove the validity or invalidity of the claim being compromised; [FN7] in other words, the trier of fact is not being asked to treat the offer as an implied admission with respect to the underlying claim. [FN8] Although it simplifies the rule and some commentators seem to have accepted it, [FN9] this reading is difficult to reconcile with either Wigmore or McCormick's version of the common law rule or with policy.

In his proposed codification of the common law rule, Wigmore phrased it as making the attempt to compromise "receivable as evidence of an admission." [FN10] This language is not apt as a description of the use of the evidence to prove the charged crime in a prosecution for obstruction of justice; for such purposes the evidence would not be hearsay and there would be no reason to describe it as an "admission." [FN11] Moreover, the cases cited as authority for the rule in his treatise appear to be cases in which the evidence was admitted in a prosecution for the underlying charge, not obstruction of justice cases. [FN12] McCormick's discussion of the rule makes it clear that he views it as making the attempt to obstruct the prosecution admissible as spoliation evidence in a prosecution for the underlying offense. [FN13] Accordingly, some of the commentators have read Rule 408 as also permitting this. [FN14]

But if these writers are correct in their interpretation, then the rationale for admitting evidence of obstruction must be different than would be the case if it were only admissible in a prosecution for obstruction; evidence that the defendant attempted to "buy off" the victim in the case on trial is clearly being offered to prove the validity or invalidity of the claim. [FN15] The reason for admitting the evidence, at least under the privilege analysis of the rule, must be that it is not the policy of the rule to encourage such conduct; [FN16] or in other words, that the attempt to buy off a criminal prosecution is not a legitimate "compromise" and is not within the meaning of that term as used in the rule. [FN17] However, if this is the justification for admitting obstruction evidence, there does not seem to be any reason to limit such use to criminal prosecutions. [FN18] If the evidence would be admissible as proof of spoliation in the criminal case, surely it should also be admitted to prove the spoliator's lack of belief in his contentions in a civil case that involves the same event.

This brings us back, then, to our first question: the meaning of "an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution." Here the common law cases must be used with some caution. [FN19] Some of them go back to the days in which there were no public officers charged with ferreting out crime and deciding which cases should be prosecuted; [FN20] since the enforcement of the criminal law was so dependent on the initiative of the victim or other concerned citizens, it is not surprising to find courts asserting the impropriety of attempts to "settle" a criminal case and railing about "compounding" of crimes. [FN21] Even in more recent times courts have been reluctant to acknowledge the legitimacy of "plea bargaining" by public officials. [FN22] Obviously the meaning of "obstruct" should be based on contemporary institutions and values, not the needs of another day.

Given the importance of negotiated dispositions in the administration of both civil and criminal justice, it seems obvious that a bona fide effort to settle either a civil or a criminal case is not "an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution." Rule 410 makes it clear that the policy of the Evidence Rules is to protect, not to inhibit plea bargaining. [FN23] While the Wisconsin drafters have suggested that their version of Rule 408 would make admissible any effort to settle a criminal prosecution other than with the court or the prosecuting attorney, [FN24] this seems unrealistic. [FN25] The attitude of the victim is often controlling in the disposition of criminal cases, particularly for minor crimes. [FN26] So long as the discussions with the victim are within the limits of propriety, [FN27] there seems to be little reason to treat them as efforts to obstruct justice.

Similarly, if the act of the defendant gives rise to both civil and criminal liability, a legitimate attempt to compromise the civil claim should be protected under Rule 408. [FN28] While even a legitimate settlement of the civil claim can have some influence on the way in which the victim testifies in the criminal case, the fact that this can be shown under the provision of Rule 408 making compromise evidence admissible to prove bias or prejudice [FN29] of the witness should discourage efforts to make over-generous settlements of related civil litigation in an effort to soften-up the witness. Of course, if an express or implied provision of the offer of compromise requires some interference with the criminal case, [FN30] evidence of this would be admissible in either the civil or the criminal case.

Courts should have little difficulty in most cases in differentiating between genuine compromises that are protected by the rule and those acts that are designed to obstruct a criminal prosecution. [FN31] Any offer or agreement that involves the bribery of police or prosecutorial officers, that requires the party to testify in a particular fashion or to assert a privilege in the criminal trial, that calls for the destruction or concealment or fabrication of evidence of guilt or innocence, or that requires the intimidation or harassment of witnesses is not protected by Rule 408. [FN32] Similarly, any statement in compromise negotiations that suggests such an agreement or that reveals that an obstruction of justice has taken place is also admissible. [FN33]

FN1. "Obstruct prosecution" Although the Uniform Rules had no reference to this use, it has been asserted that such evidence would be admissible under U.R.E. 52. Falknor, Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility, 1956, 10 Rutgers L.Rev. 574, 594.

FN2. "Contrary to public policy" Wigmore, Code of Evidence, 3d ed. 1942, s 1001 (emphasis in original).

FN3. "Unlawful act" "In a criminal prosecution, the accused's offer to pay money or otherwise to 'settle' the prosecution will be received against him, because that mode of stopping or obstructing the prosecution would be an unlawful act, and good policy could not encourage that mode of dealing with a criminal charge; * * *" 4 Wigmore, Evidence, Chadbourn rev. 1972, s 1061, p. 46 (emphasis in original).

FN4. "Buy off" McCormick, Evidence, 1954, s 251, pp. 542-543.

FN5. "Not within policy" Advisory Committee's Note, Rule 408.

FN6. Basis of charges One simply reads "proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution" as meaning only when those facts are the ultimate issues in a case.

FN7. Validity or invalidity In addition, it can be argued that the illegality of the proposed consideration means that it is not a "valuable consideration" under the rule. See s 5305.

FN8. Underlying claim See s 5308.

FN9. Commentators accept Waltz, The New Federal Rules of Evidence, 2d ed. 1975, p. 35; Schmertz, Relevance and Its Policy Counterweights: A Brief Excursion Through Article IV of the Proposed Federal Rules of Evidence, 1974, 33 Fed.B.J. 1, 17-18. It is also possible to read these writers as saying that the attempt to buy off the victim is admissible in the criminal action but not in the related civil action.

FN10. "An admission" See text at note 1 above.

FN11. Not hearsay While the attempt to buy off the case would constitute a "statement" by the defendant, that statement is not being used testimonially but as proof of the ultimate facts of the case; i.e., it is not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. See discussion under Rule 801.

FN12. Not obstruction cases 4 Wigmore, Evidence, Chadbourn rev. 1972, s 1061, p. 46 n. 13.

FN13. Spoliation After stating that the common law compromise rule did not exclude evidence of attempts to "buy off" a criminal prosecution, McCormick continues: "Indeed, we have seen that it is classed as an implied admission and received in evidence as such." The footnote to this sentence is a cross-reference to his discussion of the doctrine of spoliation. McCormick, Evidence, Cleary ed. 1972, s 274, p. 665. For discussion of spoliation evidence, see vol. 22, s 5178.

FN14. Rule 408 permits 2 Louisell & Mueller, Federal Evidence, 1978, p. 297. It is also possible to read the writers cited in note 9 above, as reaching the same conclusion.

FN15. Validity being proved Since the civil plaintiff has no authority to compromise the criminal claim, efforts to settle that claim with him would not be within the rule for that reason. See s 5303. If the compromise can be characterized as an attempt to settle the civil claim, that claim is, of course, a different claim than the criminal claim. However, in order to be relevant in the criminal case, the civil compromise must be used first to infer the offeror's belief in the validity of the civil claim. See s 5308.

FN16. Not within the policy Cf. Advisory Committee's Note, Rule 408, quoted in the text at note 5 above.

FN17. Not "compromise" See s 5306.

FN18. Limit to criminal cases As seems to be argued by the writers cited in note 9 above.

FN19. Caution Cf. Slough, Relevancy Unraveled, 1957, 5 U.Kan.L.Rev. 675, 721, stating the common law rule this way: "For reasons quite apparent, in a criminal prosecution, offers to pay money or settle with the prosecution are generally received against the offeror."

FN20. No professional enforcement Friedman, A History of American Law, 1973, pp. 252-253.

FN21. "Compounding" See, e.g., State v. Soper, 1839, 16 Me. 293, 295; State v. Givens, 1911, 70 S.E. 162, 87 S.C. 525.

FN22. "Plea bargaining" See generally, Rosett & Cressey, Justice By Consent, 1976, pp. 53-58.

FN23. Protect plea bargaining See Advisory Committee's Note, Rule 410.

FN24. Court or prosecuting attorney Judicial Council Committee's Note, Wis.Stats.Ann. s 904.08 ("offers other than to the court or to the prosecuting attorney * * * to settle a criminal prosecution remain admissible;").

FN25. Unrealistic Very often in minor disputes in which the police are called, the officers will attempt to bring the parties to some private resolution rather than arrest or cite someone; if this is unsuccessful, then the criminal sanction is invoked. It seems ironic that under the Wisconsin interpretation, an attorney would be viewed as acting illegitimately for engaging in conduct that is quite common and thought unexceptionable when done by a rookie policeman.

FN26. Attitude of victim One of the authors once had the unhappy duty of prosecuting a criminal case that arose from the attempt of the defendant to operate a dog kennel as a nonconforming use in a rural area where his neighbors had prevailed upon the local authorities to alter the zoning laws after the kennel operation began. The judge who would have tried the case was elected by the voters of the affected area while the district attorney had a wider constituency that included a number of newspapers in neighboring communities that had been critical of the efforts of local officials to oust the kennel. Needless to say, the prosecutors in that case would have been only too happy to have had the defendant negotiate a settlement with the "victims"--even if it meant buying them off.

FN27. Limits of propriety In at least one area known to the authors, the practice of defense counsel dealing directly with the victim is so common that it is the subject of well-understood ground rules covering such matters as when and from whom consent to talk with the victim should be obtained, who may be present, and in what cases such negotiations are permissible.

FN28. Protected under Rule 408 2 Louisell & Mueller, Federal Evidence, 1978, p. 296; 2 Weinstein & Berger, Weinstein's Evidence, 1975, pp. 408-14.

FN29. Bias or prejudice See s 5311.

FN30. Interference required McCormick, Evidence, Cleary ed. 1972, s 274, p. 666 (compromise rule applies to efforts to settle civil liability "if no agreement to stifle the criminal prosecution is involved").

FN31. Little difficulty The tough cases are those in which the agreement requires the person to do something that he could legitimately do, but might not do if he had not agreed to do so; e.g., write a truthful letter urging leniency in sentencing or assert a privilege not to testify. It would seem that where the question is not one of direct prohibition of these practices but rather of their admissibility as evidence, courts can afford to be excessively scrupulous. Compare, for example, the question of payments to witnesses in excess of the statutory witness fee, which are admissible in evidence even if not forbidden. If the party's motivations are pure, he could not be much prejudiced by the introduction of such evidence.

FN32. Not protected See McCormick, Evidence, Cleary ed. 1972, s 273. Of course, by the terms of Rule 408, the practice must be aimed at obstruction of the criminal case, not of some related civil trial. While a party might attempt to interfere with a civil case by an act of spoliation, it would seldom be the case that he would enter into an agreement with his opponent to suppress evidence. See also s 5314.

FN33. Negotiation statements Since this use of the evidence is based on the policy of not protecting acts of spoliation, it would seem that the rule should not apply to statements proposing or admitting such acts.

s 5313. PERMISSIBLE USES--OBSTRUCTION OF JUSTICE

FN4. "Buy off" Agreement by which one principal of corporate defendant agreed not to financially support defense or to voluntarily testify and to assign any benefits he might receive from corporate counterclaim to defendants was not an attempt to buy off a witness. FN14. Rule 408 permits In mail fraud prosecution, evidence that the defendant told the victim she would return the stolen dolls to her if victim would drop the fraud charges was not inadmissible under Rule 408 since it was an effort to obstruct a criminal charge, not a bona fide settlement of civil case. U.S. v. Peed, C.A.4th, 1983, 714 F.2d 7.

FN31. Little difficulty Where there was no civil suit pending and the defendant offered to return loot in exchange for dropping of charges by victim, this was akin to effort to obstruct justice and not a settlement protected by Rule 408. U.S. v. Peed, C.A.4th, 1983, 714 F.2d 7, 9.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
James L. HAYS and Weldon J. Hays, Defendants-Appellants.

No. 88-1366.

United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.

April 25, 1989.

Defendants were convicted of conspiracy, misapplication of funds and making false entries in the records of federally insured savings and loan association by the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas, Jerry Buchmeyer, J., by jury verdict. Defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals, Johnson, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) admission of evidence involving events leading up to inception of savings and loan association, which had been granted provisional charter, impermissibly affected substantial rights of defendants; (2) error in admitting evidence pertaining to unidentified coconspirator named in indictment was not harmless; and (3) erroneous admission of evidence regarding settlement agreement entered into between defendants and federally insured savings and loan association was not harmless.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge:

Defendants-appellants James L. Hays and Weldon J. I. FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

In 1982, an appellant-defendant in this case, James Hays, became the president of Lancaster First Federal Savings and Loan Association (hereinafter Lancaster) in Lancaster, Texas. Prior to assuming that position, James Hays, a former Texas Savings and Loan bank examiner, had been Lancaster's vice-president and a member of its board. James Hay's son, Weldon Hays, also a former Texas Savings and Loan bank examiner and the other appellant-defendant in this case, likewise was involved in the savings and loan business as an employee at Lancaster and also as president of the Colony Savings and Loan (hereinafter Colony). This appeal arises from the criminal convictions of James and Weldon Hays for improper activities regarding certain loans and deposits involving the Lancaster's funds. What follows is a brief description of the loans and deposits which are relevant to the issues presented by this appeal.

A. The Loans

1. "Hubbard I"

In early 1982, Francis Allen Clark (hereinafter Clark), a real estate developer, met Paul Jensen (hereinafter Jensen), the president of Mountain West Mortgage Company (hereinafter Mountain West), a mortgage brokerage company. Mountain West did not actually fund mortgages, but rather was in the business of putting together 584 borrowers and lenders. As a result of Clark's acquaintance with Jensen, Clark tendered to Mountain West a proposal to purchase and develop a 22 1/2 acre tract of land near Lake Ray Hubbard near Dallas. Responding favorably to Clark's proposal, Jensen, through Mountain West, arranged the necessary financing for the venture from Lancaster. Accordingly, Lancaster loaned Clark $1.5 million and the land was purchased on July 22, 1982. In attendance at the closing were Jensen, Clark and James Hays. It was at that time that James Hays first met Clark. Thereafter, Mountain West and Clark formed Lake Ray Hubbard, Ltd., LL, a limited partnership, to pursue development of the Lake Ray Hubbard property.

2. "Hubbard II"

In August 1982, Lancaster made another loan, this time for construction on the 22 1/2 acre Lake Ray Hubbard tract which was previously purchased and described above. The proceeds of the Hubbard II loan, also in the amount of $1.5 million, went to another newly formed limited partnership, Lake Ray Hubbard Ltd. I. Lake Ray Hubbard Ltd. I was to provide the necessary construction on the Lake Ray Hubbard property. The partnership distribution of Lake Ray Hubbard Ltd. I was as follows: Clark, a general partner held 45.5% interest; Mountain West, a limited partner held 45.5% interest; James Hays, a limited partner held 4% interest; [FN1] and Richard Randall, a limited partner held 5% interest.

FN1. It is interesting to note that James Hays' capital contribution to the partnership was $10.00. It is also worth noting that the partnership agreement was not signed until after the closing of the August 1982 loan.

3. "Plano"

Later in 1982, Lancaster loaned Plano Ltd. I, another limited partnership, $3,000,000 for the purchase of a twenty-eight acre tract near Plano, Texas. Plano Ltd. I was structured as follows: Clark, a general partner held 41% interest; First Financial Mortgage Corporation, [FN2] a limited partner held 41% interest; James Hays, a limited partner held 4% interest; and Richard Randall, a limited partner held 10% interest. Allegedly, this loan was overfunded by approximately $300,000. [FN3]

FN2. First Financial Mortgage Corporation had three directors: Paul Jensen, Weldon Hays, and Van Zannis.

FN3. Two other loans made by Lancaster to two other limited partnerships, Lake Meadows, Ltd. I and Lake Meadows, Ltd. II, are not discussed here as both defendants were acquitted of any criminal conduct in connection with those loans.

4. "HLH Joint Venture Loans"

In August 1982, a partnership was formed by Weldon Hays, William O. Henry and Lawrence Moffitt as equal partners. Known as HLH Joint Venture, the partnership was created to purchase and develop land. Allegedly, Weldon Hays had been brought into the partnership by Henry and Moffitt because Weldon Hays had the ability to procure the necessary financing and appraisals through his father, James Hays, who was then president of the Lancaster. The HLH partnership agreement provided that any two of the three partners could sign documents for the partnership.

The loans made by Lancaster to the HLH Joint Venture were as follows: the first loan was for $1,000,000 and was made in August 1982; the second loan was for $840,000 and was made in December 1982; and the third loan was for $380,000 and was made in January 1983. The $1,000,000 loan was allegedly overfunded by $423,016 and the $380,000 loan by $19,782.

Weldon Hays never signed any of the loan agreements, although the other two partners did. According to the Government, the conspicuous absence of Weldon Hays' signature on the loan agreements reflected an intent to conceal his partnership interest in the HLH Joint Venture. Ultimately, the HLH Joint Venture was dissolved and Weldon Hays was paid $245,330 for his interest in the partnership.

B. The Deposits

Some time after Weldon Hays left his position as an examiner with the Texas 585 Savings and Loan Department, he was approached by an individual by the name of Harry Hunsicker (hereinafter Hunsicker). Hunsicker, a real estate appraiser and investor, owned a shopping center in the Colony, a suburban community near Dallas. Seeking a new tenant for his shopping center, Hunsicker convinced Weldon Hays that the Colony needed its own savings and loan association which could be housed in Hunsicker's shopping center. It would be called the Colony Federal Savings and Loan.

After receiving advice from a regulatory consultant, Weldon Hays sought to acquire a provisional charter for his new savings and loan. The requisites for a provisional charter are not particularly cumbersome and are in fact, remarkably simple. First, marketing studies are required. Those studies must reflect that a new savings and loan association is not only needed in the community but that its presence would not have an adverse impact. Next, organizers must pledge $250,000 in deposits as protection against losses by initial depositors until insurance is obtained from the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation (FSLIC). The organizers' pledges are then attached to an application for a provisional charter to the Federal Home Loan Bank (hereinafter FHLB). Upon approval by the regional FHLB, the application is forwarded to the FHLB Board in Washington where, upon final approval, a provisional charter is issued. After the issue of the provisional charter, the organizers have six months to obtain deposits in the amount of $2,000,000 from 1,000 depositors, seventy-five percent of whom must be from the institution's market area. When the above requirements are met, and the appropriate insurance premiums are paid to the FSLIC, the new savings and loan may engage in a full range of services.

The Colony met the above described initial requirements and was granted a provisional charter. Unfortunately, however, Weldon Hays and the other organizers of the Colony were unable to meet the depository requirements for an unqualified charter. A six month extension was sought and granted. Nevertheless, Colony failed to secure the necessary deposits and the provisional charter expired. It was thereafter surrendered by Weldon Hays on November 4, 1982. Significantly, some $400,000 of Lancaster's funds were deposited in Colony before its demise even though the deposits of Colony had not been, nor ever were, federally insured.

C. Wheelers, Dealers or Conspirators?

The Government charged James and Weldon Hays with illegally receiving pecuniary benefits in connection with the above described loans. Those benefits are as follows: On September 9, 1982, First Financial Mortgage Company (hereinafter First Financial) paid James and Weldon Hays each $15,000 in fees earned by First Financial on the Plano loan. Later, on October 14, 1982, First Financial paid James Hays $12,500 for loan expenses on the Hubbard II loan. Additionally, James and Weldon Hays were paid $44,400 in commissions from First Financial for the HLH Joint Venture loans. On December 30, 1982, Lancaster issued a check that was signed and approved by James Hays in the amount of $22,008 to First Financial. That check was then used to purchase another check in the amount of $22,008 which was payable to Weldon Hays. Despite receiving these benefits, James Hays, on January 11, 1983, signed a "representation letter" in which he failed to disclose his receipt of fees as well as his ownership interest in an entity to which Lancaster had loaned money.

In addition to the above mentioned benefits in connection with the loans made by Lancaster, the government charged Weldon and James Hays with receiving other improper benefits as a result of their savings and loan activities. Namely, in October 1982, $46,000 of Lancaster's funds were used to purchase two Cadillacs which were used by James and Weldon Hays. Moreover, Weldon Hays used his Cadillac before he was employed by Lancaster and the automobile was later purchased by the HLH Joint Venture from Lancaster. Finally, as mentioned previously, Weldon Hays received $245,330 for his interest in the 586 HLH Joint Venture Partnership upon its dissolution.

On October 28, 1987, a federal grand jury returned an eleven count indictment against James Hays and Weldon Hays. Count 1 of the indictment charged James and Weldon Hays under 18 U.S.C. § 371 with conspiring to violate 18 U.S.C. §§ 657 and 1006. The remaining ten counts charged James Hays with the misapplication of funds belonging to a savings and loan institution, making false entries and the illegal receipt of loan proceeds in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 657 and 1006. Weldon Hays was charged with aiding and abetting in all of the above counts with the exception of Count 9.

The defendants entered pleas of not guilty to all counts. A jury trial ensued during which the Government called forty-one witnesses and offered somewhere in the neighborhood of 300 exhibits. Thereafter, the jury found James Hays guilty on all counts of the indictment except for Counts 5 and 6. Weldon Hays was convicted on all counts with which he was charged except for Counts 5 and 6. James Hays was sentenced to five years' imprisonment on both Counts 1 and 2 with the sentences to run consecutively. On each of the remaining counts, James Hays was sentenced to five years' imprisonment with the sentences to run concurrently with each other and the Count 1 sentence. James Hays was fined $60,000. Weldon Hays was sentenced in an identical manner, except that his fine was assessed at $55,000. The defendants thereafter timely appealed.

II. DISCUSSION

On appeal the appellants contend that the district court made a substantial number of evidentiary rulings that were in error. Specifically, appellants contend that the trial court improperly allowed the Government to introduce an overwhelming amount of irrelevant evidence. They also argue that even if some of the challenged evidence was relevant, that it was highly prejudicial, and as such was improperly admitted under Fed.R.Evid. 403. As a second assignment of error, the appellants maintain that the repeated references to, and extraordinary emphasis that was placed upon, their alleged violations of civil banking regulations was a violation of their constitutional rights to due process of law under the fifth amendment. Because we conclude that the appellants' first point of error has merit and warrants reversal, we do not reach appellants' second point of error.

The appellants argue the district court erred in allowing into evidence some 200 pages of testimony and numerous exhibits which had no bearing on the charges alleged in the indictment. To determine whether the evidence challenged by the appellants was, in fact, irrelevant, recourse must be had to the wording of the indictment. As the appellants correctly contend, under the indictment, the Government needed only to establish the existence of the Hubbard I loan, the Hubbard II loan, the Plano loan, the HLH Joint Venture loans, the representation letter signed by James Hays, and the existence of a conspiratorial relationship between James Hays, Weldon Hays, and Paul Jensen. The appellants urge that had the Government been limited to introducing only the evidence necessary to establish those facts, then the length of the trial would have been reduced substantially and the number of exhibits which were introduced would have been cut by almost one third. More importantly, the appellants contend that the introduction of such irrelevant and prejudicial evidence was reversible error.

As defined by the Federal Rules of Evidence, relevant evidence is that evidence which has "any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence." Fed.R.Evid. 401. Evidence which meets this broad standard is known as "logically relevant" evidence. The Federal Rules of Evidence further provide that "[a]ll relevant evidence is admissible," and that "[e]vidence which is not relevant is not admissible." Fed.R.Evid. 402.

In determining whether evidence should be admitted or excluded on the basis of 587 relevancy, however, the trial court's decision does not always turn upon a simple determination that the standard enunciated in Rule 401 is satisfied. Instead, the focus may turn to a determination of whether the proferred evidence is "legally relevant." Fed.R.Evid. 403 provides that "[relevant] evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence." Thus, while the trial court's discretion in admitting evidence under Rule 401 is necessarily quite broad, Rule 403 requires a balancing of interests to determine whether logically relevant evidence is also legally relevant evidence.

[1] In reviewing the district court's rulings on matters of relevancy, this Court is guided by the principle that district courts have wide discretion in determining relevancy under Rule 401. The district court's decision will not be disturbed absent a substantial abuse of discretion. United States v. Brown, 692 F.2d 345, 349 (5th Cir.1982). Similarly, the decision of the district court with regard to the admissibility of evidence under the standards set forth in Rule 403 is subject to considerable deference. In the absence of an abuse of discretion, the district court's ruling on matters involving Rule 403 will not be overruled. United States v. Kalish, 690 F.2d 1144, 1155 (5th Cir.1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1108, 103 S.Ct. 735, 74 L.Ed.2d 958 (1983).

Nevertheless, our review of erroneous evidentiary rulings in criminal trials is necessarily heightened. As the Supreme Court has instructed, evidence in criminal trials must be "strictly relevant to the particular offense charged." Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241, 247, 69 S.Ct. 1079, 1083, 93 L.Ed.2d 1337 (1949). "The admission of irrelevant facts that have a prejudicial tendency is fatal to a conviction, even though there was sufficient relevant evidence to sustain the verdict." United States v. Allison, 474 F.2d 286, 289 (5th Cir.1973) (citing Williams v. United States, 168 U.S. 382, 18 S.Ct. 92, 42 L.Ed. 509 (1897)). Thus, when viewing the error alleged, we must examine the consequences of the error in light of the entirety of the proceedings. To that end, we are constrained to take into account "what effect the error had or reasonably may be taken to have had upon the jury's decision." Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 764, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 1247, 90 L.Ed. 1557 (1946). While we realize that it is indeed a rare case that is reversed on the basis of erroneous evidentiary rulings under Fed.R.Evid. 401 and 403, we nevertheless emphasize that we are bound to zealously guard against emasculation of the important protections that those rules afford the defendants in criminal cases.

We turn now to the record and the challenged evidence. That evidence may be divided into three categories: 1) evidence which involves the events leading up to the inception of Colony, 2) evidence which concerns the activities of Paul Jensen, and 3) evidence regarding a settlement agreement between the Hays and Lancaster. We first address the evidence which was introduced by the Government concerning Colony.

Specifically the challenged testimony accused Weldon Hays of generating fictitious lists of depositors, forging pledges, receiving a clandestine salary and engaging in other misconduct relative to the formation of Colony. We fail to see how these matters relate to the specific offenses charged in the indictment since the charged offenses occurred years later and were in connection with Lancaster. According to 588 the indictment, James and Weldon Hays conspired to misapply Lancaster's funds, not Colony's funds. The indictment alleged conspiracy to make false entries in Lancaster's books, not Colony's books. The indictment alleged misapplication of Lancaster's funds and making false entries in Lancaster's books, not Colony's. Accordingly, the only glimmer of possible relevance of this testimony to the offenses charged is fleeting at best. Thus, we must conclude that its admission was error.

[3] A review of the record leaves us with the distinct impression that the Government's motive in introducing such evidence was to attack the character of Weldon and James Hays. As such, the admission of the evidence was also violative of Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). Likewise, a review of the record leaves us with the impression that the evidence was cumulative, unduly prejudicial and inflammatory. Had the evidence been restricted to a limited number of witnesses, or had the testimony taken a more modest number of pages of the record, the result might have been different. However, such was not the case. Under the appropriate standard of review, and on this record, we are unable to conclude that the error had no effect, or only a slight effect on the jury's decision. Kotteakos, 328 U.S. 750, 66 S.Ct. 1239. Having so concluded, we must view the error as having impermissibly affected substantial rights of the defendants. Id.

[4] Next, we focus on the evidence pertaining to Paul Jensen. Although never explicitly recognized as such by the district court, a review of the record in light of the indictment leaves the clear impression that Paul Jensen was one of the "unidentified co-conspirators" named in the indictment. Unlike the Colony evidence, the evidence concerning Paul Jensen was in the form of several hundred pages of exhibits accessible to the members of the jury during their deliberations. Among those pages could be found Paul Jensen's income tax return revealing a gross income of several million dollars, documentation of a federal investigation of several of Jensen's companies, evidence that Jensen was being investigated by a Federal Grand Jury assisted by a prosecutor in the instant case, and accounting records which showed that Jensen, through Snowball Investments, had issued a check for $272,000 to Colony. The check was purportedly to cover losses incurred by Colony, and the $272,000 was taken as a personal deduction by Jensen against his income tax obligations.

While the $272,000 matter is logically relevant to the conspiracy charges since Colony could not pay

Lancaster its deposits without that money, the evidence gleaned from the other several hundred pages was, in large part, irrelevant. The information contained in those pages served merely to assassinate the character of Paul Jensen, and in so doing, indirectly assassinate the character of James and Weldon Hays. The Hays contend that such "guilt by association" is improper. The Government on the other hand argues that the evidence was necessary in order for the jury to understand the "scope of the conspiracy" and how the appellants were able to misapply Lancaster's funds.

While we are inclined to view the evidence regarding Jensen as less improper than the evidence regarding Colony addressed above, we nevertheless are unable to conclude that the error did not impermissibly affect the jury's deliberations as contemplated by Kotteakos given the voluminous quantity of the exhibits and the nature of their content. Nor are we prepared to say that the jury would have found James and Weldon Hays guilty even in the absence of that evidence. See United States v. Lay, 644 F.2d 1087, 1091 (5th Cir.1981).

[5] Finally, the appellants complain the Government was improperly allowed to introduce evidence regarding a settlement agreement entered into between James Hays, Weldon Hays and Lancaster. Additionally, the appellants argue that the district court committed reversible error by allowing the Government to read several excerpts from civil depositions in which James and Weldon Hays state their reasons for entering into the settlement agreement. Federal Rule of Evidence 408 permits 589 evidence of settlement agreements for purposes other than proving liability, such as demonstrating the prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or establishing the obstruction of a criminal investigation. The Government does not contend that it offered this evidence for any of the permissible purposes contemplated by Rule 408. Rather, the Government urges that evidence of the settlement agreement assisted the jury in its understanding of the breadth of the conspiracy. In our view, this purpose stands at direct odds with the clear mandates of Rule 408, and therefore the admission of the evidence regarding the settlement agreement between the Hays and Lancaster was error.

[6] As the appellants correctly contend in brief, and as the framers of Rule 408 clearly contemplated, the potential impact of evidence regarding a settlement agreement with regard to a determination of liability is profound. It does not tax the imagination to envision the juror who retires to deliberate with the notion that if the defendants had done nothing wrong, they would not have paid the money back. Accordingly, we cannot say that the admission of the evidence of the Hays' settlement with Lancaster did not affect their substantial rights under the plain error standard first enunciated in Kotteakos.

III. CONCLUSION

Having concluded that much of the challenged evidence introduced by the Government during the course of the trial of the appellants was admitted erroneously, and having determined that the cumulative effect of that evidence was prejudicial and affected substantial rights of the defendants, we are constrained to reverse the convictions. Because we have so concluded, we do not reach appellants' arguments regarding the violation of their due process rights under the fifth amendment.

Chapter 5 Relevancy and Its Limits

s 5302. POLICY OF RULE 408

The common law rule on the admissibility of statements made in an effort to reach some non-litigious resolution of a controversy was based on the distinction between "express" and "implied" admissions. [FN1] The general rule, as Wigmore would have codified it, was: An offer by one party to the other, i.e. if by a plaintiff to accept compensation, and if by a defendant, to make compensation, being open to the inference that it proceeds only from a desire to end controversy and not from a concession of the correctness of the opponent's case, is not an implied admission, and is not receivable. [FN2] But, on the other hand, an "express admission, though made in course of negotiations for settlement of a claim, is receivable." [FN3]

But if courts were in agreement on the nature of the rule, there was no such consensus on its justification. The rationale for the rule has varied from time to time and place to place. The writers have recognized at least three reasons for excluding evidence of compromise: relevance, implied contract, and privilege. [FN4] This theoretical question has a significant practical impact because the underlying theory will shape the application of the rule to particular cases and will have profound consequences for the procedure to be used in administering the rule. [FN5]

Like the rule dealing with evidence of subsequent repairs, [FN6] the rule on evidence of compromise was originally approached from the direction of the hearsay rule. [FN7] The oldest justification, [FN8] what Wigmore called the "true reason", [FN9] for the rule was that such evidence was irrelevant. When the proponent offered evidence of an offer of compromise, he was seen as offering an out-of-court statement, not for the truth of the matter asserted, but to prove an implied statement that the offeror believed that his case was weak. But the courts rejected the implication, [FN10] pointing out that even a party who believed that he would win at trial might be willing to pay something to "buy peace" and avoid the expense of litigation. This justification did not apply when the admission was express rather than implied; hence "independent" admissions of fact were received in evidence. [FN11]

In England, the relevance theory was soon displaced by a contract rationale. [FN12] If the offeror prefaced the presentation of his compromise proposal with the magic words "without prejudice" [FN13] this created a unilateral implied contract that the offer and related matter was not to be used in evidence. [FN14] Although a few American cases adopted the contract theory, [FN15] most courts followed Wigmore in rejecting it. [FN16]

A third and most recent justification for the rule excluding evidence of offers of compromise argues that the rule is one of privilege, [FN17] not relevance. Under this rationale, exclusion is based on the strong public policy favoring negotiated resolution of disputes. [FN18] Since parties may be inhibited in making offers of compromise by the fear that these will be used against them if the compromise efforts fail, the law alleviates that fear and encourages the making of offers of compromise by making them privileged. [FN19] Although Wigmore rejected this reasoning, arguing that it did not serve to explain the cases and that another privilege was not needed, [FN20] McCormick argued strongly in favor of this justification, [FN21] convincing a few courts [FN22] and most of the other writers. [FN23]

There is another justification for the rule, one that has received much less attention than the first three. This is "fairness" to the person who offers a compromise. [FN24] Litigants are often exhorted to settle and the willingness to compromise one's difference is usually considered a virtue. The person who attempts to settle a claim he believes to be well-founded is likely to feel that it is not fair that his opponent should be permitted to introduce evidence of his good deed to support an inference that he is insincere in pressing his case. [FN25] This sense of unfairness may be stronger if he believes that his opponent has lured him into making the offer. Although the argument has merit, fairness will not serve as the sole justification for the rule since courts usually bar evidence of compromise without any inquiry into the motives of the offeror, [FN26] thus protecting not only the person who attempts a good faith compromise but also parties whose motives will not bear scrutiny. [FN27]

However, none of the other three justifications for excluding evidence of compromise is without its defects. Although the relevance theory may serve to explain most of the cases, it has been criticized for the artificiality of the distinction between "express" and "implied" admissions. [FN28] It has been pointed out that often the implication that the offeror does not believe in his case is quite strong; [FN29] e.g., when he offers to pay all that his opponent demands minus his costs of suing to recover it. Moreover, an express admission of fact may sometimes be made not out of a belief in its truth but only as a device to encourage agreement. If, as the relevance theory would seem to suggest, the admissibility of the evidence of compromise should turn on the intent of the person making the offer, [FN30] it is difficult to see why that is not a preliminary fact best left to the jury to determine. [FN31]

The English contractual theory eliminated the problem of determining intent [FN32] by making admissibility turn on whether the party making the offer used the phrase "without prejudice." [FN33] If the words were used, then the courts would exclude not only the offer but also any statements of fact made in connection with it. [FN34] However, the contract theory did not explain all of the cases in which the English courts had excluded evidence of compromise negotiations. [FN35] Moreover, the talismanic use of "without prejudice" has been thought too mechanical [FN36] and unfair to an unsophisticated person attempting to compromise disputes without legal assistance. [FN37]

The privilege theory appeals to many writers because it promises better protection for statements of fact made during compromise negotiations. [FN38] It eliminates the need for the court to search for the intent of the parties [FN39] or for the parties to cast their statements in any particular form. [FN40] Finally, it justifies giving the task of determining admissibility to the judge rather than the jury. [FN41] The major difficulty with the privilege theory is that it depends upon an assumption of fact that has never been empirically demonstrated, [FN42] viz., that exclusion of the evidence is required in order to settle cases. This seems like a dubious assumption with respect to the proposed expansion of the rule to cover independent statements of fact since the common law courts seem to have settled many cases while admitting such statements in evidence. Moreover, it has never been satisfactorily explained why the policy of favoring settlement should prevail over the policy of admitting all relevant evidence. [FN43] Finally, the privilege rationale can produce unjust results [FN44] unless it is tempered by a series of exceptions that will be as difficult to administer as the relevance theory.

Because the Advisory Committee had earlier abandoned Wigmore's concept of "legal relevance" [FN45] in favor of a broad definition of relevance coupled with a discretionary power to exclude, it would have been very difficult to explain Rule 408 as an application of the doctrine of relevance. Hence, the Advisory Committee's Note embraces McCormick's rationale, [FN46] making the rule, in the words of the Reporter, a "species of privilege." [FN47] This change in the underlying rationale makes it somewhat misleading to state, as one former member of the Advisory Committee has, that the rule states "the generally accepted" law. [FN48] Adoption of the privilege rationale has a number of implications for the administration of Rule 408. First, since it is no longer a question of relevance, disputed preliminary facts are to be decided by the judge, [FN49] not the jury. Second, if the rule is truly one of privilege, it can be argued that an offer of compromise or statements made in compromise negotiations cannot be used to prove preliminary facts that support the admissibility of other evidence. [FN50] Third, the privilege rationale restricts the scope of the rule by limiting the number of people who can invoke it;

[FN51] anyone can object to irrelevant evidence, but if the party who made the offer is willing to have it introduced, the privilege rationale does not provide any basis for objections by others. [FN52] Finally, it may be argued that the privilege theory means that the offers of compromise are not discoverable because of the exception in Civil Rule 26(b)(1) for "privileged" matter. [FN53]

But the Advisory Committee did more to the common law rule than merely shift its underlying rationale. [FN54] Rule 408 expands the common law prohibition on the use of evidence of offers of compromise to encompass as well any statements or conduct made during compromise negotiations. This change was justified on the grounds that "the practical value of the common law rule has been greatly diminished by its inapplicability to admissions of fact", a limitation that had "an inevitable effect" on "freedom of communication with respect to compromise." [FN55] But the Advisory Committee offered no empirical support for these claims and, so far as is known, none exists. [FN56] Nor did the Committee trouble to explain why, under its privilege rationale, it was thought necessary for parties to make statements of fact in conducting compromise negotiations. [FN57]

The Advisory Committee also felt that it was necessary to expand the common law rule in order to eliminate "controversy over whether a given statement falls within or without the protected areas." [FN58] But it would seem that changing the size of the protected area would have little impact on the extent of controversy as to just where its borders were. [FN59] Moreover, since the Advisory Committee chose to follow the example of California [FN60] rather than the other prior codifications, all of which found no reason to change the common law rule, [FN61] there is very little by way of precedent to guide courts in determining just what statements and conduct are to be protected by Rule 408.

Therefore, in interpreting Rule 408, courts will be unable to rely on any policy of codifying the common law. [FN62] Rule 408 will require a good deal of careful interpretation because the novel phrasing of the rule, [FN63] some expansive claims for its scope, [FN64] and the uncertain meaning of the Congressional alteration [FN65] of the rule all provide ammunition for claims that the rule makes other changes in the pre-existing law on the use of evidence of compromise. [FN66] The policy of Rule 408 is best described as one of confused reform.

FN38. Statements of fact Exclusion of express statements of fact is incompatible with the relevance theory. 4 Wigmore, Evidence, Chadbourn rev. 1972, s 1061, p. 39 n. 5. Although it is sometimes said that the privilege theory requires protection for statements of fact made during compromise negotiations, see e.g., Falknor, Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility, 1956, 10 Rutgers L.Rev. 574, 593, this is true only if such statements are necessary to reach a compromise, a point usually assumed rather than demonstrated.

FN42. Not empirically demonstrated Bell, Admissions Arising Out of Compromise--Are They Irrelevant?, 1953, 31 Texas L.Rev. 239, 252.

FN43. Policy of admission Courts admitting evidence of independent statements of fact often did so on grounds that the policy of admission prevailed over the justifications for exclusion. See, e.g., Gagne v. New Haven Road Constr. Co., 1934, 175 A. 818, 87 N.H. 163.

FN44. Unjust results For example, suppose that in the course of compromise negotiations, one party threatens to follow a "scorched earth" method of defense, conceding that this opponent can win but promising to prolong the litigation so as to make the victory very expensive. It is difficult to see why the law would want to encourage such threats. One method to permit the introduction of such statements is to argue that the statement was not made "in compromise" because there was no real dispute. See s 5306. But this reopens the issue of subjective intent of the party, a question that the broader rule of exclusion was supposed to foreclose.

FN45. Abandoned Wigmore See vol. 22, s 5162.

FN46. McCormick's rationale See Advisory Committee's Note, Rule 408 (citing McCormick, Evidence, 1954, ss 76, 251). As previously mentioned, McCormick's argument for the privilege rationale has been deleted in the revision of the book. The states adopting the rule have been less explicit, see Committee Commentary, No.Dak.R.Ev. 408, or have argued that the rule can be justified on both relevance and privilege grounds. See Reporter's Note, Prop.Vt.R.Ev. 408. The Model Code also favored the privilege rationale. See Comment, Model Code of Evidence, Rule 309. FN52. No basis for objection McCormick, Evidence, 1954, s 76.

FN53. Not discoverable Prior to the effective date of the Evidence Rules, one court relied on the Wigmorean rationale in holding that settlement negotiations were discoverable. Oliver v. Committee for the Re-election of the President, D.C.D.C., 1975, 66 F.R.D. 553, 556. One writer has asserted that the same result would follow under Rule 408, but without any supporting argument. Phillips, A Guide to the Proposed Ohio Rules of Evidence, 1978, 5 Ohio North.L.Rev. 28, 39.

FN54. Did more Most of the state codifiers have recognized that in adopting Rule 408 they were altering the pre-existing law. See, e.g., Sponsor's Note, Fla.Evid.Code s 90.408; Comment, Minn.R.Ev. 408; Committee Commentary, No.Dak.R.Ev. 408. See also, Ehrhardt, Florida Evidence, 1977, p. 91; Clarke, Montana Rules of Evidence: A General Survey, 1978, 39 Mont.L.Rev. 79, 109.

FN55. "Freedom of communication" Advisory Committee's Note, F.R.Ev. 408.

FN56. None exists Similar unsupported claims are made in behalf of the equivalent provisions in the California Evidence Code. See Comment, Cal.Evid.Code s 1152.

FN57. Necessary to make In the experience of one of the authors, the most memorable of such statements run along the lines: "Sure, we know that X is true but have fits trying to prove it." In if the case goes to trial you will such cases it would seem that the policy of avoiding a waste of valuable court time in trying undisputed issues of fact would be more important than the policy of encouraging compromise. The only persons who would be deterred from making such statements are those who are attempting to conduct a war of attrition against an impecunious adversary. There would seem to be little reason to encourage such bad faith efforts at settlement.

FN58. "Protected area" Advisory Committee's Note, F.R.Ev. 408. For similar arguments, see Judicial Council Committee's Note, Wis.Stats.Ann. s 904.08; Waltz, The New Federal Rules of Evidence, 1975, pp. 33-34.

FN59. Little impact Under the common law rule, one could make a colorable claim for exclusion only if the statement was hypothetical in form or so connected with the offer of compromise that proof of the admission would prove the offer. Rule 408 saves courts the trouble of looking at such questions, but now requires courts to decide whether or not a statement or conduct was "made in compromise negotiations", an issue that can be raised at least as frequently as the claim for exclusion under the common law rule. See s 5307.

FN60. California The California precedents are not very helpful because of the propensity of courts in that state to disregard the Code and decide cases in accordance with pre-existing caselaw. See, e.g., Moving Picture Machine Operators Union Local No. 162 v. Glasgow Theatres, Inc., 1970, 86 Cal.Rptr. 33, 6 Cal.App.3d 395.

FN61. No reason to change The Model Code, the Uniform Rules of Evidence, and the state codes based thereon all, with the sole exception of California, left the common law rule unchanged. See s 5301. But see, N.J.Sup.Ct., Committee on Evidence, Report, 1963, p. 99 (stating that N.J.R.Ev. 52 would exclude evidence of statements made in compromise negotiations).

FN62. Policy The Advisory Committee's Note also points out that the rule is intended to change the common law rule with respect to completed compromises. See s 5303.

FN63. Novel phrasing Rule 408 does not resemble any of the prior codifications, though it borrows bits and pieces from some of them. The distinctive feature of Rule 408 is its attempt to provide an illustrative list of permissible uses of evidence of compromise, a listing that is strangely incomplete. See ss 5310-5314.

FN64. Expansive claims The most extravagant claims for the scope of the rule can be found in 2 Louisell & Mueller, Federal Evidence, 1978, pp. 271-272, 280-282.

FN65. Congressional alteration See ss 5301, 53110.

FN66. Other changes E.g., changes in the meaning of the requirement that the claim be one that is "disputed." See s 5306.

Rule 408. Compromise and Offers to Compromise

s 5302. POLICY OF RULE 408

FN1. Common law rule Offers to compromise are generally inadmissible to prove liability, but they are admissible for other purposes. Petersen v. State Farm Auto Ins. Co., La.App.1989, 543 So.2d 109, 115 (collecting state cases). For a case in which state law had not dealt with what seems like a fairly obvious issue under the rule, thus illustrating the rudimentary nature of the "common law" on use of compromise evidence, see Cleere v. United Parcel Service, Inc., Okl.App.1983, 669 P.2d 785. Smith & Phelps, District of Columbia Annotations to the Proposed Federal Rules of Evidence, 1973, 32 Fed.B.J. 270, 301-303. Illinois law is considered in Note, Post-Accident Repairs and Offers of Compromise: Shaping Exclusionary Rules to Public Policy, 1979, 10 Loy.U.(Chi.) L.Rev. 487, 495.

4. Three reasons There are several reasons for excluding evidence of compromise; among these are relevance and public policy of encouraging settlements. Miller v. Component Homes, Inc., Iowa 1984, 356 N.W.2d 213. The relevance and instrumental rationales are embraced in Czuj v. Toresco Enterprises, 1989, 570 A.2d 1049, 239 N.J.Super. 123.

FN7. Hearsay rule For an opinion holding, probably erroneously, that evidence of settlement is not hearsay under the modern codes, see Wyatt by Caldwell v. Wyatt, 1987, 526 A.2d 719, 721, 217 N.J.Super. 580.

FN12. Contract rationale Coote, "Without Prejudice" Communications--Another Red Light for Practitioners, 1979 N.Z.L.J. 87.

FN17. Rule of privilege Rule 408 does not create a privilege within the meaning of state freedom of information act. Guy Gannett Publishing Co. v. University of Maine, Me.1989, 555 A.2d 470, 472.

FN18. Public policy Winchester Packaging, Inc. v. Mobil Chemical Co., C.A.7th, 1994, 14 F.3d 316, 320 (expressing some doubt about the rationale); Lytle v. Stearns, 1992, 830 P.2d 1197, 1203, 250 Kan. 783; DeTienne Associates v. Montana Rail Link, 1994, 869 P.2d 258, 262, 264 Mont. 16; Delicious Foods v. Millard Warehouse, 1993, 507 N.W.2d 631, 640, 244 Neb. 449; Haderlie v. Sondgeroth, Wyo.1993, 866 P.2d 703, 713.

FN25. Insincere claim An additional justification for excluding evidence of settlements of the fear that a juror may think that the plaintiff has already received adequate compensation so that further award from remaining defendants is unjustified. Byerly v. Madsen, 1985, 704 P.2d 1236, 1240, 41 Wn.App. 495.

FN33. "Without prejudice" Accord: Czuj v. Toresco Enterprises, 1989, 570 A.2d 1049, 239 N.J.Super. 123.

FN46. McCormick's rationale N.J.R.Ev. 52 rejects Wigmore's rationale in favor of that of McCormick. Wyatt by Caldwell v. Wyatt, 1987, 526 A.2d 719, 722, 217 N.J.Super. 580. Rule 408 reflects a belief that offer to compromise does not necessarily reflect strength of case and a desire to encourage compromise. Fireman's Fund Insurance Co. v. BPS Co., 1985, 491 N.E.2d 365, 372, 23 Ohio App.3d 56. The Advisory Committee's Note is paraphrased in Commentary, Ore.R.Ev. 408. The Comment to Prop.N.Y.Evid.Code s 408 adds another novel basis for the rule; it suggests that liability is an opinion of law that the party is not qualified to express and is therefore irrelevant.

FN50. Stipulations In re Cluck, D.C.Tex.1993, 165 B.R. 1005, 1009 (Rule 408 not applicable to stipulation that was basis of Tax Court final judgment).

FN52. No basis for objection One court has held that the defendant has standing to object to evidence of plaintiff's settlements with third persons. Kennon v. Slipstreamer, Inc., C.A.5th, 1986, 794 F.2d 1067, 1071. The contrary position is taken over vigorous dissent in Kennon v. Slipstreamer, Inc., C.A.5th, 1986, 794 F.2d 1067, 1071.

FN54. Did more Accord: Derderian v. Polaroid Corp., D.C.Mass.1988, 121 F.R.D. 9, 11.

FN57. Necessary to make For the justice of the rule, see Stanley v. DeCesere, Me.1988, 540 A.2d 767, 770 (in suit between builder and homeowner, Rule 408 precludes builders admission of shoddy construction made during settlement talks).

FN62. Policy Brazil, Protecting The Confidentiality of Settlement Negotiations, 1988, 39 Hast.L.J. 955. For an excellent summary of Rule 408 which highlights some of the problems in its interpretation, see Waltz & Huston, The Rules of Evidence in Settlement, 1981, 5 Litigation 11. Chapter 5 Relevancy and Its Limits

s 5301. STATUTORY HISTORY

Rule 408 apparently gave the Advisory Committee little difficulty. Unlike most of the other rules, it remained unchanged [FN1] from the time it first appeared in the Preliminary Draft [FN2] until it was finally promulgated by the Supreme Court. [FN3]

The history of the rule in Congress is a much different story. It was initially labeled "noncontroversial" [FN4] and the first subcommittee draft of the rules did not propose any changes. [FN5] But controversy erupted when several government agencies launched an attack [FN6] on the provision in the rule that required the exclusion of admissions of fact made during settlement negotiations. [FN7] The thrust of these objections was that in the administrative handling of disputes between the Government and citizens, e.g., in a tax case, it was often difficult to say just when investigation stopped and efforts to settle began. [FN8] It was feared that a taxpayer might concede a number of facts to government investigators, then claim that these admissions were made during settlement negotiations. [FN9] It was argued that at best this meant that the government would have to go after the information again, perhaps through formal discovery. [FN10] At worst, the government lawyers claimed that the rule might be read as permitting the taxpayer to deny what he had once admitted, without fear of impeachment, [FN11] and even immunizing documents that had been disclosed to government investigators during what a court later determined to be settlement negotiations rather than investigation. [FN12]

The Hungate subcommittee responded to these fears by amending Rule 408. [FN13] First, the second sentence of the rule was changed so that the quasi-privilege only applied to admissions or opinions of liability and not to statements of fact. [FN14] Second, a new sentence was added to make clear that the rule did not require exclusion of information disclosed during settlement negotiations, but only applied to the statements made at that time. [FN15] Finally, the last sentence of the rule was amended to no apparent purpose. [FN16] The full committee endorsed these changes, relying on the arguments of the government lawyers. [FN17] The House approved the amended rule without debate. [FN18]

The House amendments underwent a spirited attack in the Senate. The Advisory Committee charged that the sponsoring agencies wished to use settlement negotiations to elicit admissions from unsophisticated parties, [FN19] pointing out that in the case of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission this was a violation of statute. [FN20] The draftsmanship of the amendments was also criticized, [FN21] one commentator going so far as to say that the House had reduced the law to "hopeless confusion." [FN22] Finally, it was argued that the House had undermined the policy of the rule--to encourage compromise--by writing back into the rule the common law provisions on the use of admissions made during negotiations. The Senate agreed with these arguments by changing Rule 408 to its present form. [FN23] The Senate version was then accepted by the House. [FN24]

The admissibility of offers of compromise was covered in only two of the 19th Century codes; [FN25] the Field Code [FN26] incorporated the American common law rule and India Evidence Act codified the English version of the rule. [FN27] Both the Model Code [FN28] and the Uniform Rules [FN29] of Evidence were based on the common law. Most of the states adopting the Uniform Rules made no change in the provision dealing with offers of compromise, [FN30] but California provided the model for Rule 408 by expanding the Uniform Rule to include statements made in compromise negotiations. [FN31] Many of the states adopting the Evidence Rules have adopted Rule 408 verbatim, [FN32] but others have drafted their own provision [FN33] or enacted Rule 408 of the Uniform Rules of Evidence, Second. [FN34]

FN1. Unchanged In accordance with a general change in the numbering system, the rule went from Rule 4-08 in the Preliminary Draft to Rule 408 in the Revised Draft. See Prop.F.R.Ev. 408, 1971, 51 F.R.D. 315, 353.

FN2. Preliminary Draft Prop.F.R.Ev. 4-08, 1969, 46 F.R.D. 161, 237-238: "Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution."

FN3. Promulgated See Prop.F.R.Ev. 408, 1973, 56 F.R.D. 183, 226-227.

FN4. "Noncontroversial" 1 House Hearings, p. 190.

FN5. First draft Committee Print, H.R. 5463, June 28, 1974, 2 House Hearings at p. 155.

FN6. Agency attack See 2 House Hearings, p. 301 (letter from General Counsel of the Treasury), p. 311 (letter from General Counsel of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission), p. 345 (Justice Department analysis of proposed bill).

FN7. Settlement negotiations See s 5307.

FN8. Difficult to say "Carrying the example of tax litigation further, it should be noted that settlement negotiations are undertaken at different levels and are so often interwoven with the investigative process (in the Internal Revenue Service) and the discovery process (in the federal courts) that one could anticipate considerable litigation is [sic] to what statements were submitted as part of the investigative or discovery procedures." 2 House Hearings, p. 345.

FN9. Taxpayer claim "Under this rule the trial of a criminal tax case could deteriorate into a series of motions, hearings, and rulings by the Court upon taxpayers (defendant) objection(s) that each document, statement or admission was submitted only in furtherance of compromise negotiations. * * * On the civil side there would be the threshold problem of defining the point where compromise negotiations begin. The second sentence of Rule 408 would undoubtedly have the undesirable effect of generating controversies as to whether statements of fact were 'made in compromise negotiations' or not. I can foresee the argument by taxpayers that any statements made by them to revenue agents during the course of an audit were for the purpose of compromising the agent's proposed adjustments to their reported tax liabilities. * * * The administrative consideration of the issues raised on audit of tax returns is so often partly investigative and partly settlement oriented that any privilege accorded to statements of fact made in compromise negotiations might well be a severe handicap to the later development of facts in litigation of tax cases." 2 House Hearings, p. 301.

FN10. Go after again "Factual information obtained during conciliation attempts is normally of type which would be subject to later discovery, and admissible, in connection with litigation following an unsuccessful conciliation process. At the very least, the Proposed Rule may be detrimental to the Commission's enforcement efforts by requiring it to initiate costly, duplicative and time consuming discovery proceedings to obtain information which it already has in its possession." 2 House Hearings, p. 311.

FN11. Deny without fear "But * * * public policy * * * would certainly be undermined by assuring taxpayers that, unless criminal intent can be shown, they have no responsibility for the accuracy of any factual representations they may make in the course of settlement negotiations with the Internal Revenue Service." 2 House Hearings, p. 302. "* * * [T]he proposed rule would encourage frivolous and misleading, if not outright false, representations in the settlement process." 2 House Hearings, p. 345.

FN12. Immunizing "Our objection to the Rule is that it * * * could also be interpreted as meaning the exclusion of pre-existing documents submitted in connection with settlement proceedings." 2 House Hearings, p. 345. "It may reasonably be anticipated that employers and unions charged with violations will withold as much information as possible from Commission investigators and then make it available during conciliation in an attempt to immunize themselves from the presentation of such information during litigation." 2 House Hearings, p. 311.

FN13. Amending Rule 408. See 2 House Hearings, p. 367.

FN14. Second sentence The amendment was as follows (new matter shown in italics, deleted material in strikeover): "Evidence of admissions of liability or opinions given during compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible." Ibid.

FN15. New sentence "Evidence of facts disclosed during compromise negotiations, however, is not inadmissible by virtue of having been first disclosed in those negotiations." Ibid.

FN16. No apparent purpose The initial clause was amended as follows (new matter in italics, deletions in strikeover): "This rule does not require exclusion when evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is offered for another purpose, such as * * *." Ibid.

FN17. Endorsed House Report, p. 8: "Under existing federal law evidence of conduct and statements made in compromise negotiations is admissible in subsequent litigation between the parties. The second sentence of Rule 408 as submitted by the Supreme Court proposed to reverse that doctrine in the interest of further promoting non-judicial settlement of disputes. Some agencies of government expressed the view that the Court formulation was likely to impede rather than assist efforts to achieve settlement of disputes. For one thing, it is not always easy to tell when compromise negotiations begin, and informal dealings end. Also, parties dealing with government agencies would be reluctant to furnish factual information at preliminary meetings; they would wait until 'compromise negotiations' began and thus hopefully effect an immunity for themselves with respect to the evidence supplied. In light of these considerations, the Committee recast the Rule so that admissions of liability or opinions given during compromise negotiations continue inadmissible, but evidence of unqualified factual assertions is admissible. The latter aspect of the Rule is drafted, however, so as to preserve other possible objections to the introduction of such evidence. The Committee intends no modification of current law whereby a party may protect himself from future use of his statements by couching them in hypothetical conditional form."

FN18. Approved without debate 1974, 120 Cong.Rec. 2370.

FN19. Elicit admissions "I think maybe a crude but nevertheless true statement of the objective sought to be reached by the letters from those two departments, and by the Department of Justice, is simply that they want to use statements made by somebody trying to settle a dispute with the Government to make out a case against him if his efforts to settle the dispute fail." Senate Hearings, p. 49 (testimony of Professor Cleary, Reporter for the Advisory Committee).

FN20. Violation of statute Senate Hearings, p. 59.

FN21. Draftsmanship Senate Hearings, pp. 59-60.

FN22. "Hopeless confusion" Senate Hearings, p. 269.

FN23. Agreed with arguments Senate Report, p. 10: "This rule as reported makes evidence of settlement or attempted settlement of a disputed claim inadmissible when offered as an admission of liability or the amount of liability. The purpose of this rule is to encourage settlements which would be discouraged if such evidence were admissible. "Under present law, in most jurisdictions, statements of fact made during settlement negotiations, however, are expected from this ban and are admissible. The only escape from admissibility of statements of fact made in a settlement negotiation is if the declarant or his representative expressly states that the statement is hypothetical in nature or is made without prejudice. Rule 408 as submitted by the Court reversed the traditional rule. It would have brought statements of fact within the ban and made them, as well as an offer of settlement, inadmissible. "The House amended the rule and would continue to make evidence of facts disclosed during compromise negotiations admissible. It thus reverted to the traditional rule. The House committee report states that the committee intends to preserve current law under which a party may protect himself by couching his statements in hypothetical form. The real impact of this amendment, however, is to deprive the rule of much of its salutary effect. The exception for factual admissions was believed by the Advisory Committee to hamper free communication between parties and thus to constitute an unjustifiable restraint upon efforts to negotiate settlements--the encouragement of which is the purpose of the rule. Further, by protecting hypothetically phrased statements, it constituted a preference for the sophisticated, and a trap for the unwary. "Three States which had adopted rules of evidence patterned after the proposed rules prescribed by the Supreme Court opted for versions of rule 408 identical with the Supreme Court draft with respect to the inadmissibility of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations. "For these reasons, the committee has deleted the House amendment and restored the rule to the version submitted by the Supreme Court with one additional amendment. This amendment adds a sentence to insure that evidence, such as documents, is not rendered inadmissible merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations if the evidence is otherwise discoverable. A party should not be able to immunize from admissibility documents otherwise discoverable merely by offering them in a compromise negotiation."

FN24. Accepted by House Conference Report, p. 6: "The House bill provides that evidence of admissions of liability or opinions given during compromise negotiations is not admissible, but that evidence of facts disclosed during compromise negotiations is not inadmissible by virtue of having been first disclosed in the compromise negotiations. The Senate amendment provides that evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is not admissible. The Senate amendment also provides that the rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. "The House bill was drafted to meet the objection of executive agencies that under the rule as proposed by the Supreme Court, a party could present a fact during compromise negotiations and thereby prevent an opposing party from offering evidence of that fact at trial even though such evidence was obtained from independent sources. The Senate amendment expressly precludes this result. The Conference adopts the Senate amendment."

FN26. Field Code N.Y.Comm. on Practice & Pleading, Code of Civil Procedure, 1850, s 1863: "An offer of compromise is not an admission that any thing is due; but admissions of particular facts, made in negotiation for a compromise, may be proved, unless otherwise agreed at the time."

FN27. English version India Evidence Act, 1972, s 23: "In civil cases no admission is relevant, if it is made either upon an express condition that evidence of it is not to be given, or under circumstances from which the Court can infer that the parties agreed together that evidence of it should not be given." See also, Stephen, Digest of the Law of Evidence, 1870, pp. 27-28.

FN28. Model Code Model Code of Evidence, Rule 309: "(1) Subject to Paragraphs (3) and (4) hereof, evidence that a person has paid or furnished money or any other thing or has offered or promised to do so on account of any loss or damage of any kind sustained or claimed to have been sustained, whether or not in compromise of a claim, is inadmissible as probative of any matter tending to establish his civil liability for the loss or damage or any part of it. "(2) Evidence that a person has accepted or offered or promised to accept a sum of money or any other thing in satisfaction of a claim is inadmissible as tending to establish the invalidity of the claim or of any part of it. "(3) Evidence that a person has partially satisfied an asserted claim of another on demand of the other without questioning the validity of the claim is admissible as tending to prove the validity of the claim. "(4) Evidence of a debtor's promise to pay all or part of his preexisting debt is admissible as tending to prove the creation of a new duty on his part, or a revival of his preexisting duty, to pay all or part of the debt." See also, Missouri Bar, Prop.Mo.Evid.Code s 9.03: "a. Evidence that a person has offered to pay or has paid money or has offered to give or has given anything of value or has performed or agreed to perform any act in compromise of any claim or cause of action asserted or lodged against him is inadmissible either as an admission or proof of any matter tending to establish his civil liability upon such claim or cause of action, and is inadmissible generally, except 1. when the fact of such offer of compromise or compromise is relevant to a controverted issue being tried, including, by way of example but not exclusively, when a compromise agreement itself is directly in issue between the parties, and when the amount paid in compromise is relevant to the amount of damages that may be recovered, or 2. when the fact of such offer of compromise or compromise affects either the credibility of a non-party witness or the weight to be given to his testimony, in which event such evidence may be used by way of impeachment on cross-examination by the adverse party or to rehabilitate the witness on redirect examination. "b. Nothing in this section contained shall be construed to exclude fact admissions or statements against interest made as a part of, or in connection with, an offer of compromise or a compromise agreement."

FN29. Uniform Rules U.R.E. 52: "Evidence that a person has, in compromise or from humanitarian motives furnished or offered or promised to furnish money, or any other thing, act or service to another who has sustained or claims to have sustained loss or damage, is inadmissible to prove his liability for the loss of damage or any part of it. This rule shall not affect the admissibility of evidence (a) of partial satisfaction of an asserted claim on demand without questioning its validity, [FNa] as tending to prove the validity of the claim, or (b) of a debtor's payment or promise to pay all or a part of his pre-existing debt as tending to prove the creation of a new duty on his part, or a revival of his pre-existing duty." *In the official print this word is spelled "valadity." See N.C.C.U.S.L., Handbook, 1953, p. 192. U.R.E. 53: "Evidence that a person has accepted or offered or promised to accept a sum of money or any other thing, act or service in satisfaction of a claim, is inadmissible to prove the invalidity of the claim or any part of it."

FN30. U.R.E. states Kan.Stats.Ann. ss 60-452, 60-453, and Utah R.Ev. 52, 53 are identical with the Uniform Rules, note 29, above. N.J.R.Ev. 52(1) is identical with U.R.E. 52. N.J.R.Ev. 52(2) reads: "Evidence that the defendant offered to plead guilty of a lesser offense or upon terms, is inadmissible against him in that criminal proceeding." N.J.R.Ev. 53: "Evidence that a person has in compromise accepted, or offered or promised to accept, a sum of money or any other thing, act, or service in satisfaction of a claim, is inadmissible to prove the invalidity of the claim or any part of it, but it is admissible to prove an accord and satisfaction or other material fact."

(b) This section does not affect the admissibility of evidence of: (1) Partial satisfaction of an asserted claim or demand without questioning its validity when such evidence is offered to prove the validity of the claim; or (2) A debtor's payment or promise to pay all or a part of his pre-existing debt when such evidence is offered to prove the creation of a new duty on his part or a revival of his pre-existing duty." Alaska R.Ev. 408: "Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. This rule also does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution, but exclusion is required where the sole purpose for offering the evidence is to impeach a party by showing a prior inconsistent statement."

Fla.Evid.Code s 90.408: "Evidence of an offer to compromise a claim which was disputed as to validity or amount, as well as any relevant conduct or statements made in negotiations concerning a compromise, is inadmissible to prove liability or absence of liability for the claim or its value."

Nevada

Nev.Rev.Stats. s 48.105 is substantially the same as the Advisory Committee's version of Rule 408, note 1, above: "1. Evidence of: (a) Furnishing or offering or promising to furnish; or (b) Accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. "2. This section does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution."

New Mexico

N.Mex.R.Ev. 408 was originally identical with the Advisory Committee's version of Rule 408, note 1, above. See, 1973, 84 N.Mex. xxxix. In 1976 it was amended to conform with the Congressional version of the rule. See, 1976, 88 N.Mex. 851.

North Dakota

No.Dak.R.Ev. 408: "Evidence of (1) furnishing, offering, or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting, offering, or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of the claim or any other claim. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. Exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations is not required. This rule does not require exclusion if the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, disproving a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution."

Oklahoma

12 Okla.Stats.Ann. s 2408 is identical with F.R.Ev. 408 except for the following changes: the last clause of the first sentence reads "liability for the claim, invalidity of the claim or the amount of the claim."; the word "likewise" is omitted from the second sentence; the word "section" rather than "rule" is used in the last two sentences; the phrase "discoverable evidence" rather than "any evidence otherwise discoverable" appears in the third sentence; the word "revealed" rather than "presented" is used in the third sentence; the word "including" replaces the phrase "such as" in the fourth sentence; and the phrase "proof of" is used instead of "proving" in the fourth sentence.

Vermont

Prop.Vt.R.Ev. 408 is identical with U.R.E.2d 408, note 34 below, but adds the third sentence from F.R.Ev. 408.

Washington

Wash.R.Ev. 408 is identical with F.R.Ev. 408, except that it uses the word "negating" rather than "negativing" in the last sentence.

Wisconsin

Wis.Stats.Ann. s 904.08 is the same as the Advisory Committee's version of Rule 408, note 1, above, except that in the list of permissible uses in the last sentence the words "proving accord and satisfaction, novation or release" are added after the word "delay", and the words "compromise or" are inserted before "obstruct."

Wyoming

Wyo.R.Ev. 408 is identical with F.R.Ev. 408, except that the third sentence has been deleted.

FN34. U.R.E.2d See Ark.R.Ev. 408, Me.R.Ev. 408. U.R.E.2d 408 is a modification of the Advisory Committee's version of Rule 408 (additions shown in italics, deletions shown in strikeover): "Evidence of (1) furnishing, offering, or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting, offering, or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for, or invalidity of, or amount of the claim or any other claim. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require exclusion if the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution." 1975, 13 U.L.A., p. 216.

Rule 408. Compromise and Offers to Compromise

s 5301. STATUTORY HISTORY

FN17. Endorsed One court has cited and quoted this report as if it referred to Rule 408 as it was finally adopted. Eisenberg v. University of New Mexico, C.A.10th, 1991, 936 F.2d 1131, 1134.

FN30. U.R.E. states New Jersey and Utah have now adopted the Federal Rules of Evidence. See notes 32 and 33, below. N.J.R.Ev. 52 has now been interpreted to exclude statements made during compromise negotiations. Czuj v. Toresco Enterprises, 1989, 570 A.2d 1049, 239 N.J.Super. 123.

FN33. Drafted own

Idaho Ida.R.Ev. 408 is identical with U.R.E.2d 408, note 34 in the main volume, but inserts the third sentence of F.R.Ev. 408 concerning "otherwise discoverable" evidence presented during settlement negotiations.

Indiana Ind.R.Ev. 408 is identical with F.R.Ev. 408, except that it omits the sentence on "otherwise discoverable" evidence and adds this sentence at the end: "Compromise negotiations encompass alternative dispute resolution."

Maine Effective January 31, 1985, Me.R.Ev. 408 was amended to read: "(a) Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromise or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of the claim or any other claim. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is also not admissible on any substantive issue in dispute between the parties. "(b) Evidence of conduct or statements by any party or mediator at a court-sponsored domestic relations session is not admissible for any purpose." The words "or in mediation" in the last sentence of Me.R.Ev. 408 were added, effective February 15, 1993. It has been suggested that the failure to include the third sentence in the original (dealing with permissible uses) may have been an oversight, though one that does not affect the meaning of the rule. Harriman v. Maddocks, Me.1986, 518 A.2d 1027, 1031.

Louisiana La.Evid.Code Art. 408(A) is identical with F.R.Ev. 408, except that the clause "in a civil case" is added at the beginning, "a valuable consideration" is replaced by "anything of value", "rule" is replaced by "Article" in two places, and "discoverable" is replaced by "admissible" in the second sentence. La.Evid.Code

Art. 408(B) reads: "This Article does not require the exclusion in a criminal case of evidence of the actions or statements described in Paragraph A, above, or of a giving or offer to give anything of value by the accused in direct or indirect restitution to a victim." La.Evid.Code, Art. 413: "Any amount paid in settlement or by tender shall not be admitted into evidence unless the failure to make a settlement or tender is an issue in the case."

Massachusetts Prop.Mass.R.Ev. 408 is identical with F.R.Ev. 408, except that the third sentence is deleted and in the first sentence after the phrase "prove liability for" is amended to read: "invalidity of, or amount of the claim or any other claim."

New Hampshire N.H.R.Ev. 408: "Evidence of (1) a settlement with or the giving of a release or covenant not to sue to or, (2) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish or accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising a disputed claim with one or more persons liable in tort for the same injury to person or property or for the same wrongful death shall not be introduced in evidence in a subsequent trial of an action against any other tortfeasor to recover damages for the injury or wrongful death. Upon the return of a verdict, the court shall inquire of the attorneys for the parties the amount of the consideration paid for any settlement, release or covenant not to sue, and shall reduce the verdict by that amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. However, this rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise admissible merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. This rule does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for a purpose other than the proof of liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution."

New Jersey N.J.R.Ev. 408: "When a claim is disputed as to validity or amount, evidence of statements or conduct by parties or their attorneys in settlement negotiations, including offers of compromise, shall not be admissible to prove liability for, or invalidity of, or amount of the claim. Such evidence shall not be excluded when offered for another purpose; and evidence otherwise admissible shall not be excluded merely because it was disclosed during settlement negotiations."

New York Prop.N.Y.Evid.Code, 1991, s 408: "Evidence of (a) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (b) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove civil or criminal liability for, invalidity of, or the amount of the claim or any other claim. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This section does not, however, require the exclusion of evidence existing before the compromise negotiations merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. This section also does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving the bias or prejudice of a witness, controverting a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution."

North Carolina N.C.R.Ev. 408 is identical with F.R.Ev. 408, except that the words "evidence of" are added before the words "statement" in the second sentence.

Oregon Ore.R.Ev. 408: "Compromise and offers to compromise. (1)(a) Evidence of furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. "(b) Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. "(2)(a) Subsection (1) of this section does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. "(b) Subsection (1) of this section also does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negating a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution." The drafters of this provision say that it is based on the federal rule but has been restructured "for the sake of clarity." Commentary, Ore.R.Ev. 408.

Puerto Rico P.R.R.Ev. 22(B): "Evidence that a person has furnished or offered or promised to furnish or that a person has accepted or offered or promised to accept money or any other thing in compromising a claim is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or part of it. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for other purposes."

Tennessee Tenn.R.Ev. 408 is identical with F.R.Ev. 408, except that it deletes the phrase "or promising" from 408(1) and (2), adds the phrase "whether in the present litigation or related litigation" after the word "claim" in the first sentence and adds "which claim" before "was disputed" and after that phrase adds "or was reasonably expected to be disputed", modifies "claim" by the phrase "a civil" and adds "or a criminal charge or its punishment" at the end of the first sentence. In the third sentence "actually obtained during discovery" replaces "otherwise discoverable." At the end of the last sentence, this is added: "however, a party may not be impeached by a prior inconsistent statement made in compromise negotiations."

Texas Tex.R.Ev. 408 is identical with F.R.Ev. 408, except that in the last sentence the phrase "or interest" is inserted after "prejudice" and the phrase "or a party" is inserted after the word "witness." Tex.R.Cr.Ev. 408 is identical with Tex.R.Ev. 408. Blakely, Article IV: Relevancy and Its Limits, 1983, 20 Hous.L.Rev. 151, 221.

Vermont Vt.R.Ev. 408 has been amended by inserting the phrase "including mediation" after the word "negotiations" in the second sentence. Vt.R.Ev. 408 alters F.R.Ev. 408 is several respects. In the first sentence, "or" is replaced with a comma in three places, "its amount" is changed to "the amount of the claim" and the phrase "or any other claim" is added at the end. In the third sentence, "discoverable" is changed to "obtainable from independent sources." The description of Prop.Vt.R.Ev. 408 that appears in the main volume is inaccurate. The third sentence was not a copy of F.R.Ev. 408 but was an amendment in the same form that appears in the version of the Vermont rule as promulgated.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Maynard John VERDOORN et al., Appellants.

Nos. 75--1644, 75--1659 and 75--1665.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Dec. 12, 1975.

Decided Jan. 13, 1976.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Iowa, Edward J. McManus, Chief Judge, of conspiracy and possession of an interstate shipment of beef, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Stephenson, Circuit Judge, held, inter alia, that the evidence was sufficient to support one defendant's conviction of both possession and conspiracy; that severance of the prosecutions was properly denied; and that an instruction given with respect to the inference which might be drawn from the possession of recently stolen property was proper.

Affirmed.

P. D. Furlong, Sioux City, Iowa, for Van Maanen.

Gary E. Wenell, U.S. Asst. Atty., Sioux City, Iowa, for appellee.

Before GIBSON, Chief Judge, and STEPHENSON and WEBSTER, Circuit Judges.

STEPHENSON, Circuit Judge.

These appeals are taken from jury convictions of three appellants who were charged in Count I with conspiracy (18 U.S.C. s 371) and in Count II with possession (18 U.S.C. s 659) arising out of the theft and possession of an interstate shipment of beef. In addition, the two Verdoorn appellants were charged in Count III with transporting a stolen semi-trailer in interstate commerce (18 U.S.C. s 2314) and in Count IV with receiving and concealing beef knowingly stolen while moving in interstate commerce (18 U.S.C. s 2315).[FN1] The district court[FN2] imposed concurrent sentences under Title 18, U.S.C. s 4208(a)(2), as follows: Albert Leon Van Maanen, three years; Maynard John Verdoorn, five 105 years; and David Verdoorn, four years. The appeals raise numerous pretrial and trial errors which will be considered seriatim. We affirm the convictions.

FN1. A fourth defendant, Eugene Heck, was convicted on Count V, charging possession of stolen beef from the same shipment, but did not appeal. Co-conspirator LeRoy Miller pled guilty to a possession count the first day of the trial and testified in behalf of the prosecution.

FN2. The Honorable Edward J. McManus, Chief Judge, Northern District of Iowa, presiding.

In summary, the evidence favorable to the government discloses that appellants David Verdoorn and Maynard John Verdoorn (referred to in the record as John or Maynard) and co-conspirator LeRoy Miller on January 19, 1975, went to a truck terminal in the Council Bluffs, Iowa, area and stole a semi-trailer load of 232 beef quarters originating in Grand Island, Nebraska, and to be delivered to Buffalo, New York. They transported the stolen tractor and trailer loaded with beef to the Sioux City, Iowa, area. Thereafter, a portion of the stolen beef was delivered to co-defendant Eugene Heck, who owned and operated a retail meat store; a portion was stored on a farm owned by appellant Van Maanen; and the remaining part of the load was transferred onto another trailer and stored at a truck stop parking lot in North Sioux City, South Dakota. On January 28, 1975, all three appellants and co-conspirator LeRoy Miller loaded a portion of the meat from a storm cellar on appellant Van Maanen's farm onto a truck for the purpose of transporting it to a prospective buyer. After leaving the farm with the meat, appellant Maynard Verdoorn was arrested, and about the same time appellant Van Maanen and co-conspirator Miller were also arrested. Appellant David Verdoorn was arrested a couple of days later.

Appellant Van Maanen in his testimony denied any knowledge concerning the theft of the meat or the storage of the stolen meat on his farm. Appellant David Verdoorn denied any knowledge or participation in the theft or possession of the meat in question. Appellant Maynard Verdoorn did not testify. Both Verdoorns called witnesses for the purpose of establishing alibi defenses with respect to various events described by government witnesses. In this appeal only appellant Van Maanen attacks the sufficiency of the evidence to support his conviction.

[1] Van Maanen's contention that the court erred in not sustaining his motion for judgment of acquittal because there was insufficient evidence to support his conviction on either the conspiracy or possession count merits little discussion. We, of course, in reviewing the record, must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the jury's verdict and accept as established all reasonable inferences therefrom which support the verdict. United States v. Baumgarten, 517 F.2d 1020, 1026--27 (8th Cir. 1975).

The government's evidence, direct and circumstantial, as to the existence of the conspiracy in this case was strong. 'Moreover, once the government has established the existence of a conspiracy, even slight evidence connecting a particular defendant to the conspiracy may be substantial and therefore sufficient proof of the defendant's involvement in the scheme.' United States v. Overshon, 494 F.2d 894, 896 (8th Cir. 1974). Here the testimony of co-conspirator LeRoy Miller alone was sufficient to establish appellant Van Maanen's participation in both the conspiracy and the substantive charge of knowingly having in his possession on his farm the meat which he knew had been stolen. Miller's credibility was for the jury. In addition, his testimony was corroborated by other evidence in the case.

Van Maanen urges that the trial court erred in denying his motion for severance and separate trial made prior to trial. The motion to sever, in substance, claimed that two of the defendants had prior convictions for similar offenses and this would deprive him of a fair and impartial trial; that evidence might be introduced which was inadmissible as to him; and that there was a misjoinder of defendants and offenses in the indictment.

[2] The misjoinder allegation is devoid of merit. The indictment charged and the record discloses that all of the defendants had 'participated in the same act or transaction or in the same series of acts or transactions constituting an offense or offenses' which constituted 106 'parts of a common scheme or plan' in conformity with Fed.R.Crim.P. 8(a) and (b). Scruggs v. United States, 450 F.2d 359, 363 (8th Cir. 1971).

[3][4][5] Appellant Van Maanen did not renew his pretrial motion for a separate trial either at the close of the government's case or at the close of all the evidence. Such failure ordinarily constitutes a waiver of the severance claim. United States v. West, 517 F.2d 483, 484 (8th Cir. 1975); United States v. Porter, 441 F.2d 1204, 1212 (8th Cir. 1971). In any event, we are satisfied that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for a separate trial. United States v. Scott, 511 F.2d 15 (8th Cir. 1975). In the absence of a showing of real prejudice to an individual defendant, persons charged in a conspiracy shall be tried together. United States v. Hutchinson, 488 F.2d 484, 492 (8th Cir. 1973). Here there was no such showing of prejudice.

[6] Appellant Van Maanen claims the court erred in denying his motion to suppress the evidence obtained from the storm cellar for the reason that his spouse, who gave the consent for the search, was not advised of her constitutional rights nor permitted to talk to her attorney prior to the search. The record fails to support this claim.

Special Agent Oxler testified that during the early morning hours of January 29, 1975, he conversed with Mrs. Van Maanen at the Van Maanen farm and that he informed her of her constitutional rights that 'she had a right to refuse at any time, to prevent us from going on her property.' She refused to sign a form with respect thereto without consulting her attorney but said 'she would have no objection whatsoever to us looking at the outbuildings located on their farm.' In fact, Mrs. Van Maanen herself testified, 'I said, 'Feel free to search the house, the out of doors, whatever pleases. I have nothing to hide. " She admitted furnishing the agent with a flashlight because the batteries in his flashlight were out, and she also turned the outside lights on. She recalled that 'he (the agent) said the main thing they were interested in was the cave and I told him to go ahead and look.' Her authority to consent to the search is not contested. United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164, 94 S.Ct. 988, 39 L.Ed.2d 242 (1974). The trial court properly denied the motion to suppress.

[7] All of the appellants urge that the trial court erred in denying their motion for mistrial based on alleged inconsistent statements made by Special Agent O'Kuniewicz. Appellants' complaint is that at trial the special agent identified David Verdoorn as being in the area of the Van Maanen farm, whereas in the preliminary hearing he testified he could not identify and individual in 'that area' that night. The government argues that the testimony was not actually inconsistent because the 'area' involved was not defined. The matter does not merit further discussion. Assuming there was some inconsistency in the testimony, this is a matter for the jury to weigh in crediting the testimony of the witness. The motion for mistrial is devoid of merit.

[8] Appellants David Verdoorn and Maynard Verdoorn assert trial court error in giving Instruction 15A with respect to the inference which may be drawn from possession of property recently stolen. The instruction follows the suggested instruction set out in I E. Devitt & C. Blackmar, Federal Jury Practice and Instructions s 13.11 (2d ed. 1970, Supp.1974). The instruction cautions that 'recently' is a relative term; the longer the period of time since the theft, the more doubtful becomes the inference. It reminds the jury that, in the exercise of constitutional rights, the accused need not take the stand and testify. There may be opportunities to explain possession by showing other facts and circumstances, independent of the testimony of the defendant. It cautions, 'You will always bear in mind that the law never imposes upon a defendant in a criminal case the burden or duty of calling any witnesses or producing any evidence.'

107 The instruction is similar to that approved by the Supreme Court in Barnes v. United States, 412 U.S. 837, 840 n. 3, 93 S.Ct. 2357, 37 L.Ed.2d 380 (1973); United States v. Neville, 516 F.2d 1302 (8th Cir. 1975); United States v. Garofalo, 496 F.2d 510 (8th Cir. 1974); United States v. Tucker, 486 F.2d 1040 (8th Cir. 1973). We are satisfied the proper instruction was given in this case.

[9][10] Appellants David Verdoorn and Maynard Verdoorn claim the trial court erred in refusing to admit evidence with respect to plea bargaining by representatives of the government with each of the defendants. It should first be noted that this contention is not made with respect to co-conspirator Miller. The trial court properly permitted counsel to thoroughly cross-examine Miller with respect to his guilty plea and his expectations as to leniency in view of his plea and testimony in behalf of the government. Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150, 92 S.Ct. 763, 31 L.Ed.2d 104 (1972); United States v. Gerard, 491 F.2d 1300 (9th Cir. 1974). Appellants contend they should have been permitted to show that all defendants were offered possible reduced counts and/or lighter sentences in exchange for their testimony. Appellants theorize that this evidence would challenge the credibility of the government's entire case, i.e., disclose the lengths to which the government went in attempting to obtain vital testimony to prosecute its case, and thus this evidence should have been admitted. We disagree.

Plea bargaining is sanctioned by recent amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. See Fed.R.Crim.P. 11(e) (effective December 1, 1975). Further, Fed.R.Crim.P. 11(e)(6) (effective August 1, 1975) provides for the general inadmissibility of offers to plea and related statements in connection therewith. Under the rationale of Fed.R.Evid. 408, which relates to the general inadmissibility of compromises and offers to compromise, government proposals concerning pleas should be excludable.

Plea bargaining has been recognized as an essential component of the administration of justice. 'Properly administered, it is to be encouraged.' Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257, 92 S.Ct. 495, 30 L.Ed.2d 427 (1971). If such a policy is to be fostered, it is essential that plea negotiations remain confidential to the parties if they are unsuccessful. Meaningful dialogue between the parties would, as a practical matter, be impossible if either party had to assume the risk that plea offers would be admissible in evidence.

[11] Finally, appellant Maynard Verdoorn, who exercised his right not to testify, contends that Instruction 15A, with reference to the inference which may be drawn from possession of property recently stolen, did not properly apprise the jury of his presumption of innocence and his right not to testify or present evidence and consequently shifted the burden of proof from the government to appellant. We have already discussed the propriety of this instruction. The jury was fully informed that defendant need not testify or produce any evidence. In another instruction (Instruction 4) the court gave the standard instruction on the presumption of innocence accorded a defendant and the burden resting on the government to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. No further instructions were requested by appellant. Appellant's contention is without merit.

We are satisfied that each of the defendants received a fair trial, no error of law appears, and the verdicts of guilt are amply supported by the evidence.

Can we give it a little more of an advocate's tone? Judge Howard always errs in favor of allowing liberal action by the defense. If we tell him he has broad discretion to let them do something, they'll do it; so there's no point in filing anything.

E.g.: Let's give some reasons why it's a bad idea to have a mini-trial on each witness, apart from just time-consuming: distracting the jury; intimidating other witnesses who learn they will be open to attack on anything in their entire lives, etc.

hit the rules of evidence hard, that the only proper impeachment is prior convictions or some limited specific acts of misconduct but theyt may only be inquired of on cross and cannot be proven by extrinsic evicence remeber we may want to get in susans employment records. the big thing is to prevent the cross examination of hale for every fly speck on the wall. for instance steqlling the widdres money as so eloquently described by brother sutton in opening statemnt.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Nancy Irene MARTZ, a/k/a Nancy Lebo, Appellant.

No. 91-3205.

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Feb. 12, 1992.

Decided May 18, 1992.
Rehearing and Rehearing En Banc Denied July 8, 1992.

Defendant was convicted of distributing LSD by the United States District Court for the Northern District of Iowa, David R. Hansen, J., and she appealed. The Court of Appeals, Magill, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) defendant was bound by government witness' answer, and could not introduce extrinsic evidence of witness' plea bargaining with government in unrelated case, and (2) district court judge could calculate total weight of LSD involved in defendant's offense by extrapolating weight of lightest known unit across dosage units.

FN* THE HONORABLE EARL R. LARSON, Senior United States District Judge for the District of Minnesota, sitting by designation.

MAGILL, Circuit Judge.

Nancy Irene Martz appeals her conviction and sentence for distributing LSD. Martz alleges the district court [FN1] erred in refusing to allow her to admit a California court document into evidence to impeach a key government witness. Martz also contests the district court's sentence, claiming the computation of the amount of LSD involved was erroneous. We affirm.

FN1. The Honorable David R. Hansen was a United States District Judge for the Northern District of Iowa at the time judgment was entered. He was appointed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit on November 18, 1991.

I.

Postal inspectors executed a search warrant on June 26, 1990, and opened a first-class letter addressed to Paul Richard Smith in Charles City, Iowa. The letter, mailed from Oakland, California, contained 500 dosage units of LSD on blotter paper. Smith was arrested and agreed to cooperate in the ongoing investigation. Smith, acting with federal authorities in Iowa, twice wrote to Martz in Oakland requesting to purchase LSD. On both occasions, Smith received the requested LSD blotter sheets in return.

Martz was arrested and charged with three counts of distributing LSD, three counts of using the United States mails to distribute LSD, and one count of conspiracy to distribute LSD. A jury convicted Martz on all counts. The district court attributed 187.9 grams of LSD to Martz for an offense level of 36. The court found that Martz was the manager of a criminal enterprise involving more than five persons and increased Martz' offense level by three to 39. The judge also denied a two-level reduction for acceptance of responsibility. This put the total offense level at 39. With a criminal history in category I, Martz had a sentencing range of 262 to 327 months. The district court sentenced her to 288 months in prison and five years of supervised release.

A. Impeachment of Smith

During Smith's testimony, Martz' attorney cross-examined Smith about the plea agreement Smith had reached with federal prosecutors. Martz also sought to introduce evidence of two prior guilty pleas Smith had entered in California and Utah. [FN2] Martz contended the documents would show Smith's knowledge of how cooperating with authorities could aid Smith in his own criminal case.

FN2. The two documents included the certified record of an unrelated 1987 criminal case from California. In that case, Smith pleaded guilty to two drug possession misdemeanors while two felony drug charges were dismissed. The other document laid out Smith's guilty plea to a Utah felony which resulted in other related charges being dropped.

The district court allowed questioning about the prior pleas to the extent they demonstrated Smith's knowledge of the benefits of plea agreements and his concomitant incentive to aid prosecutors. Smith admitted in testimony that he had been charged with drug crimes in California, but he denied that he received a reduction in charges. Smith testified outside the jury's presence that he never entered a plea agreement in California, but merely pleaded guilty to two misdemeanors. The district court sustained the government's objection to the introduction of the California plea document. The court found that since the California plea required no cooperation or testimony from Smith, it gave Smith no incentive to cooperate with prosecutors and had no bearing on Smith's potential bias or prejudice. Therefore, the California document was excluded under Rule 608(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence, which precludes the use of extrinsic evidence to prove specific instances of conduct to attack the witness' credibility. On appeal, Martz asserts the district court erred in refusing to allow introduction of the California document to impeach Smith.

[1][2][3] 789 Rule 608(b) gives the court discretion to allow questioning during cross-examination on specific bad acts not resulting in the conviction for a felony if those acts concern the witness' credibility. United States v. Hastings, 577 F.2d 38, 40-41 (8th Cir.1978). The rule, however, forbids the use of extrinsic evidence to prove that the specific bad acts occurred. Fed.R.Evid. 608(b). The purpose of barring extrinsic evidence is to avoid holding mini-trials on peripherally related or irrelevant matters. Carter v. Hewitt, 617 F.2d 961, 971 (3d Cir.1980) (citing 3A Wigmore on Evidence, § 979 at 826-27 (Chadbourn rev. ed. 1970)). The introduction of extrinsic evidence to attack credibility, to the extent it is ever admissible, is subject to the discretion of the trial judge. United States v. Capozzi, 883 F.2d 608, 615 (8th Cir.1989), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 918, 110 S.Ct. 1947, 109 L.Ed.2d 310 (1990).

[4][5] The district court allowed Martz to cross-examine Smith about prior guilty pleas he had made and whether he had come to realize the benefits of cutting deals with prosecutors in the past. But in conducting this questioning, Martz was required to "take his answer." Capozzi, 883 F.2d at 615; McCormick on Evidence § 42 at 92 (3d ed. 1984). While documents may be admissible on cross-examination to prove a material fact, United States v. Opager, 589 F.2d 799, 801-02 (5th Cir.1979), or bias, United States v. James, 609 F.2d 36, 46 (2d Cir.1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 905, 100 S.Ct. 1082, 63 L.Ed.2d 321 (1980), they are not admissible under Rule 608(b) merely to show a witness' general character for truthfulness or untruthfulness. United States v. Whitehead, 618 F.2d 523, 529 (4th Cir.1980); James, 609 F.2d at 46. The credibility determination pertinent to the Martz trial concerned whether Smith would lie in his testimony against Martz to receive favorable treatment from prosecutors. The issue was not whether Smith, in fact, received a reduced sentence in California for pleading guilty to two misdemeanors, or whether the charges were merely dropped by prosecutors on account of lack of evidence, crowded court dockets, or other unrelated reasons. Martz' attorney argued to the district court that "a sufficient record has been made at least to establish a question for the jury at least as to whether or not a plea bargain was entered into and whether or not the defendant received the benefit of the bargain." Tr. at 192. This argument represents exactly the type of mini-trial over a collateral matter that Rule 608(b) forbids.

Martz relies on Carter, 617 F.2d 961, for the proposition that documents admitted as evidence during cross-examination of the witness do not violate Rule 608(b). Carter 's holding was much narrower. In Carter, [FN3] the Third Circuit admitted the letter in question only after the witness admitted its authenticity. The court specifically held that extrinsic evidence could not be admitted after a witness denied a charge.

> FN3. In Carter, a prison inmate sued prison officials in a § 1983 action stemming from an alleged beating. On cross-examination of the plaintiff, defense attorneys introduced a letter written by the plaintiff they allege outlined a scheme to encourage inmates to file false brutality charges against prison officials. Carter, 617 F.2d at 964-65.

> [I]f refutation of the witness's denial were permitted through extrinsic evidence, these collateral matters would assume a prominence at trial out of proportion to their significance. In such cases, then, extrinsic evidence may not be used to refute the denial, even if this evidence might be obtained from the very witness sought to be impeached.

Carter, 617 F.2d at 970. Therefore, the district court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit the California plea document into evidence.

B. Sentence

Martz contests her sentence based on the district court's computation of the total weight of the LSD involved. Martz contends the district court should have compiled the total weight by using the Typical Weight Per Unit Table contained in application note 11 of U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1. Utilizing this table, Martz argues, would have resulted in an offense level of 28 rather than 36.

[6] The district court attributed 33,800 dosage units of LSD to Martz and that figure is not contested on this appeal. In 790 computing the total weight, the district court correctly included the weight of the drug-laced blotter paper. Chapman v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 1919, 1922, 114 L.Ed.2d 524 (1991); United States v. Bishop, 894 F.2d 981, 985 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 106, 112 L.Ed.2d 77 (1990). The court, however, noted that blotters that were tested contained varying weights, ranging from .00692 grams per dose to .0055 grams per dose. The actual weight of only 1800 of the dosage units was known. Applying the rule of lenity, the district court attributed the lightest known weight to all dosage units and arrived at a total of 185.9 grams (33,800 doses times .0055 grams). The court added to that figure two liquid grams of LSD that were not applied to blotter paper but were attributed to Martz. [FN4] The resulting total was 187.9 grams.

> FN4. The district court rejected the government's argument that blotter paper weight should be added to the two grams of liquid LSD merely because Martz' pattern was always to sell LSD on blotter paper.

[7] Martz argues that the district court should have applied the weight listed in the Typical Weight Per Unit Table contained in application note 11 of U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1. This table reveals a per-unit weight for LSD of .05 milligrams and would result in a total weight of 1.69 grams for the 33,800 doses. Adding in the two grams of liquid LSD and the 11 grams of LSD listed in the indictment would total 14.69 grams of LSD. This computation would have given Martz a base offense level of 28.

The district court's determination that extrapolating the lightest-known unit across the dosage units is a more reliable estimate than using the Typical Weight Per Unit Table was not erroneous. Application note 11 to U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1, itself, notes its inaccuracy and cautions that it should only be used when a more reliable estimate of weight is unavailable.

> If the number of doses, pills, or capsules but not the weight of the controlled substance is known, multiply the number of doses, pills, or capsules by the typical weight per dose in the table below to estimate the total weight of the controlled substance.... Do not use this table if any more reliable estimate of the total weight is available from case-specific information.

The note provides further that the table does not include the weight of the carrying mechanism.

> For controlled substances marked with an asterisk [including LSD], the weight per unit shown is the weight of the actual controlled substance, and not generally the weight of the mixture or substance containing the controlled substance. Therefore, use of this table provides a very conservative estimate of the total weight.

U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1 & comment. (n.11). Since all of these doses were on blotter paper, the weight of the blotter paper and the LSD obviously provides a more reliable estimate than the naked drug itself.

In Bishop, 894 F.2d at 987, we upheld the estimate of a total amount of LSD based on the district court's extrapolating the lightest known weight over the total number of dosage units, including those that were unrecovered. Martz attempts to distinguish Bishop by arguing that the sample of blotter paper tested in her case did not constitute a representative sample. Unlike Bishop, the blotter paper in this case did not come from the same source at the same time. Nevertheless, the district court found that there was adequate case-specific information to estimate the total weight by extrapolating the lightest known weight over all the doses.

Random testing of drugs may be sufficient for sentencing purposes. United States v. Johnson, 944 F.2d 396, 404-05 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 646, 116 L.Ed.2d 663 (1991). In Johnson, this court refused to adopt the requirement that a representative sample of drugs from each independent source be tested. See also United States v. Follett, 905 F.2d 195, 196-97 (8th Cir.1990) (estimate of drug weight permissible in plea agreement although no LSD blotters were 791 recovered and weighed), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 2796, 115 L.Ed.2d 970 (1991).

While there may arise situations where a sample is too small or too arbitrary to extrapolate fairly over a large number of dosage units that come from disparate sources, this is not such a case. First, all of the dosage units came from Martz. Martz' bare assertion that some of the blotter sheets may have been prepared by someone else is not enough to discredit the finding that the dosage units all were distributed by Martz, consisted of LSD-laced blotter paper, and were similar in appearance. Second, in order to reduce her offense level even one step to 34, Martz would have to show that the average weight of the dosage units weighed about half of the lightest known dosage unit (.0029 compared to .0055). See U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1(c). The evidence does not show that such a wide variance is possible since the known weights were clustered at . 0055 to .00692. Moreover, a cursory review of LSD blotter weights from other cases reveals that .0055 rests at the bottom of the logical range. Compare United States v. Marshall, 908 F.2d 1312, 1316 (7th Cir.1990) (en banc) (per-dose weights of .0057 grams and .00964 grams), aff'd sub nom. Chapman v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 1919, 114 L.Ed.2d 524 (1991); United States v. Bishop, 704 F.Supp. 910 (N.D.Iowa 1989) (per-dose weight of .0075 grams), aff'd, 894 F.2d 981 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 106, 112 L.Ed.2d 77 (1990); United States v. Andress, 943 F.2d 622 (6th Cir.1991) (per-dose weight of .0065 grams), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 1192, 117 L.Ed.2d 433 (1992); United States v. Leazenby, 937 F.2d 496 (10th Cir.1991) (per-dose weight of .0060 grams); United States v. Larsen, 904 F.2d 562 (10th Cir.1990) (per-dose weight of .0061 grams), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 2800, 115 L.Ed.2d 973 (1991); United States v. Elrod, 898 F.2d 60 (6th Cir.) (per-dose weight of .0055 grams), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 104, 112 L.Ed.2d 74 (1990); United States v. Rose, 881 F.2d 386 (7th Cir.1989) (per-dose weight of .0154 grams); United States v. DiMeo, 753 F.Supp. 23 (D.Me.1990) (per-dose weight of .0069 grams), aff'd without opinion, 946 F.2d 880 (1st Cir.1991). Therefore, we find that the district court did not err in determining that extrapolating the lightest known weight over all the dosage units was a more reliable estimate than using the bare drug weight found in the table.

II.

We find that the district court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit extrinsic evidence to impugn a witness' credibility. Further, we find that the district court properly calculated Martz' sentence. The decision below, therefore, is affirmed.

HEANEY, Senior Circuit Judge, dissenting.

In my view, Nancy Martz should have been permitted to introduce into evidence two documents which established that the government informant was lying when he testified that he had not entered into plea agreements in state courts in California and Utah. With respect to drug related offenses in those states, the exhibits were not offered to prove that Smith had prior drug convictions, but rather to attack his credibility. Smith's credibility was crucial--his testimony was essential to Martz's conviction. The admission of these documents could have been accomplished quickly, and it would not have given rise to a mini-trial.

Although the Carter case well supports Martz's position, the majority distinguishes Carter on the grounds that the document in that case was admitted only after the witness admitted its authenticity. Here, however, the trial court did not ever question Smith as to the authenticity of the plea agreement. If faced with questioning about the previous plea agreements, Smith may well have backed off his previous statements, and his credibility would have been damaged.

I also believe that the majority errs in affirming the sentence. This court, over 792 my dissent, recently held en banc that we must follow policy statements and commentary to bring about consistency in sentencing. United States v. Kelley, 956 F.2d 748, 756 (8th Cir.1992) (en banc). One would think that we would be bound by that decision where the policy statement or commentary requires a shorter sentence as well as where it requires a longer sentence.

But, apparently this is not to be the case even though the application note here is clear and precise: "If the number of doses ... but not the weight of the controlled substance is known, multiply the number of doses ... by the typical weight per dose in the table below to estimate the total weight of the controlled substance." U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1 (Application Note 11). The weight of each dose was not known; thus, the table had to be used.

Unlike the majority, I do not believe extrapolation would be proper in this case. Unlike the situation in Bishop, the blotter paper here did not come from the same source at the same time. United States v. Bishop, 894 F.2d 981, 987 (8th Cir.1990). Moreover, the amount of blotter paper weighed was a small fraction (approximately five percent) of the total amount attributed to Martz. Under these circumstances, the district court did not have enough "case-specific information" from which to make a "more reliable estimate of the total weight." U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1 (Application Note 11). Compare United States v. Shabazz, 933 F.2d 1029, 1034 (D.C.Cir.1991) (use of table in Note 11 not required where defendant conceded estimated weight of dilaudid pills was accurate, and where estimated weight was supported by data from Physicians Desk Reference, the manufacturer, and the DEA).

The majority opinion buttresses the district court's findings by favorably comparing the district court's calculation of the average weight per dose of the dosage unit (.0055 grams) to LSD blotter weights set forth in reported cases from other circuits. See ante at 791. Although the majority's review is interesting, I do not see how findings of fact from other cases can constitute "case-specific" evidence to support the district court's findings of fact in this case.

The majority also reports that a wide variance in blotter paper weights would not be possible in this case "because the known weights were clustered at .0055 to .00692." See ante at 791. With all due respect, I think this reasoning is circular: because only three samples were taken, there is no way to know whether there was a wide variance between blotter paper weights, yet the limited sample is used as proof that there was not a wide variance in weights. Moreover, there was a wide variance between even the three samples--the heaviest sample was almost twenty-five percent heavier than the lightest sample.

While it would have taken a short time to accurately determine the weight per dose, the government did not make this effort. Thus, the court was obligated to follow the table.

UNITED STATES.

No. 182.

Supreme Court of the United States

Argued Dec. 17, 18, 1952.

Decided Feb. 2, 1953.

Defendants were convicted in the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, of unlawful possession of goods stolen while in interstate commerce and of further transporting such goods in interstate commerce, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, 196 F.2d 886, affirmed, and certiorari was granted by the Supreme Court on limited questions concerning production and admission of documentary evidence tending to impeach the testimony of a prosecution witness. The Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Jackson, held that where defendants' accomplice, who gave implicating testimony, admitted on cross-examination that between time of his apprehension and final implicating statement to Government, he had made several statements not implicating defendants, when foundation was laid and it was shown that specific statements were in Government's possession, and no privilege was asserted, denial of defendants' motion to produce such statements for inspection was error.

Judgment reversed.

FN4. 344 U.S. 813, 73 S.Ct. 33.

The Government proved that film being shipped from Rochester, New York, to Chicago, Illinois, was stolen from a truck in Chicago and that part of it later had been recovered in Detroit. To implicate the two petitioners, it relied principally on one Marshall, who, in Detroit, had pleaded guilty to unlawful possession of the film. Marshall testified that he and a codefendant, Swartz, who died before trial, on several occasions had driven from Detroit to Chicago and back. On each visit they had stopped at petitioner Gordon's Chicago jewelry store. On one trip, according to Marshall, Gordon accompanied them to a garage in that city and there Gordon and a man resembling MacLeod helped to load into into Marshall's car film that was stacked in the garage. A week later, Marshall said, he and Swartz again called on Gordon, when the latter sent them to see 'Ken' at an address which he wrote on a piece of paper. At this address, MacLeod identified himself as 'Ken,' and again the three men loaded film from the garage into Marshall's car.

416 Partial corroboration of Marshall was supplied by a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent, who had been watching the garage. He testified that on the latter occasion he saw Marshall and Swartz drive up to MacLeod's address, whereupon MacLeod removed an old truck from the garage. Later, Swartz and Marshall drove away with film cartons stacked on the back seat of Marshall's car.

Both petitioners took the stand and denied complicity in the theft and knowledge that the film was stolen. While their physical movements as recited by them were not materially different from those related by government witnesses, petitioners gave a different and innocent version of the relationship of their acts to the criminal transactions. Gordon testified that the deceased Swartz was a business acquaintance who asked on the first visit if Gordon knew of a garage where a truck could be temporarily stored. Gordon called MacLeod, who was his partner in a rooming-house venture, and told him that he would send two men over who wished to use a garage back of the rooming house. MacLeod testified that he had not known *372 either of the men before they placed a truck in the garage and that, at their request he had helped load film from the truck into Marshall's car merely as a favor.

On cross-examination, Marshall admitted that between his apprehension and his final statement to the Government, which implicated petitioners, he had made three or four statements which did not. Petitioners requested the trial judge to order the Government to produce these earlier statements. The request was denied. Marshall also admitted that, one week before he made any statement incriminating petitioners, he had pleaded guilty to unlawful possession of the film in a federal court in Detroit. He was still unsentenced and no date for sentencing had been set, although nine months had elapsed since this plea was received. He denied that he had received 417 any promise of immunity or threats which would influence him to testify as he did. Petitioners then sought to introduce from the transcript of the Detroit proceeding this statement made to Marshall by the federal district judge: 'Very well, the plea of guilty is accepted. Now, I am going to refer your case to the Probation Department for presentence report. I think I should say to you, as I said to your lawyer yesterday when he and Mr. Smith called upon me in chambers yesterday morning, that it seemed to me that if you intended to plead guilty and expected a recommendation for a lenient sentence or for probation from the Probation Department, that it would be essential that you satisfy the Probation Department that you have given the law enforcement authorities all the information concerning the merchandise involved in this proceeding. * * * I am not holding out any promises to you, but I think you would be well advised to tell the probation authorities the whole story even though it might involve others.' This was excluded on the objection that it was immaterial.

[1] The trial judge in his charge and the Court of Appeals in its opinion [FN5] recognized that, where, as here, the Government's case may stand or fall on the jury's belief or disbelief of one witness, his credibility is subject to close scrutiny. But the question for this Court is whether rejection of petitioners' two efforts to impeach the credibility of Marshall did not withhold from the jury information necessary to a discriminating appraisal of his trustworthiness to the prejudice of petitioners' substantial rights. The two issues stand on somewhat different grounds.

FN5. 196 F.2d 886, 888.

The request by the accused to order production of Marshall's earlier statements was cast in terms of obtaining access to documentary evidence rather than an offer *418 that would require a ruling on its admissibility. But the Government apparently concedes, as we think it must, that if it would have been prejudicial error for the trial judge to exclude these statements, had the defense been able to offer them, it was error not to order their production. The relation of admissibility to production for inspection is by no means settled in the various jurisdictions, but we conclude that the Government does not concede enough. Demands for production and offers in evidence raise related issues but independent ones, and production may sometimes be required though inspection may show that the document could properly be excluded.

[2] In the absence of specific legislation, questions of this nature are governed 'by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience.' [FN6] Apparently, earlier common law did not permit the accused to require production of such documents. [FN7] Some state jurisdictions still recognize no comprehensive right to see documents in the hands of the prosecution merely because they might aid in the preparation or presentation 373 of the defense. [FN8] We need not consider such broad doctrines in order to resolve this case, which deals with a limited and definite category of documents to which the holdings of this opinion are likewise confined.

FN6. Funk v. United States, 290 U.S. 371, 54 S.Ct. 212, 78 L.Ed. 369; Fed.Rules Crim.Proc. rule 26, 18 U.S.C.A.

FN7. 6 Wigmore on Evidence, s 1859g.

FN8. 2 Wharton's Criminal Evidence (11th ed.) s 785.

[3] By proper cross-examination, defense counsel laid a foundation for his demand by showing that the documents were in existence, were in possession of the Government, were made by the Government's witness under examination, were contradictory of his present testimony, and that the contradiction was as to relevant, important and material matters which directly bore on the main *419 issue being tried: the participation of the accused in the crime. The demand was for production of these specific documents and did not propose any broad or blind fishing expedition among documents possessed by the Government on the chance that something impeaching might turn up. [FN9] Nor was this a demand for statements taken from persons or informants not offered as witnesses. [FN10] The Government did not assert any privilege for the documents on grounds of national security, confidential character, public interest, or otherwise.

FN9. As to the pretrial discovery stage, compare Fed.Rules Civ.Proc. rule 34, 28 U.S.C.A., with the narrower provisions of Fed.Rules Crim.Proc. rule 16.

FN10. In Goldman v. United States, 316 U.S. 129, 62 S.Ct. 993, 86 L.Ed. 1322, the notes sought to be inspected had neither been used in court, nor was there any proof that they would show prior inconsistent statements.

Despite some contrary holdings on which the courts below may have relied, we think their reasoning is outweighed by that of highly respectable authority in state and lower federal courts in support of the view that an accused is entitled to the production of such documents. [FN11] Indeed, we would find it hard to withstand the force of Judge Cooley's observation in a similar situation that 'the state has no interest in interposing any obstacle to the disclosure of the facts, unless it is interested in convicting accused parties on the testimony of untrustworthy persons.' [FN12] In the light of our reason and experience, the better rule is that upon the foundation that was laid the court should have overruled the objections which the Government advanced and ordered production of the documents.

FN11. Asgill v. United States, 4 Cir., 60 F.2d 776; United States v. Krulewitch, 145 F.2d 76, 79, 156 A.L.R. 337; People v. Davis, 52 Mich. 569, 18 N.W. 362; State v. Bachman, 41 Nev. 197, 168 P. 733; People v. Schainuck, 286 N.Y. 161, 164, 36 N.E.2d 94; People v. Walsh, 262 N.Y. 140, 186 N.E. 422.

FN12. People v. Davis, 42 Mich. 569, 573, 18 N.W. 362, 363.

*420 [4][5] The trial court, of course, had no occasion to rule as to their admissibility, and we find it appropriate to consider that question only because the Government argues that the trial judge, in the exercise of his discretion, might have excluded these prior contradictory statements and since that would not have amounted to reversible error, it was not such to decline their production. We think this misconceives the issue. It is unnecessary to decide whether it would have been reversible error for the trial judge to exclude these statements once they had been produced and inspected. [FN13] For production purposes, it need only appear that the evidence is relevant, competent, and outside of any exclusionary rule; for rarely can the trial judge understandingly exercise his discretion to exclude 374 a document which he has not seen, and no appellate court could rationally say whether the excluding of evidence unknown to the record was error, or, if so, was harmless. The question to be answered on an application for an order to produce is one of admissibility under traditional canons of evidence, and not whether exclusion might be overlooked as harmless error.

FN13. We note in passing that the rules relating to impeachment by prior self-contradiction, which provide that such contradiction may be shown only on a matter material to the substantive issues of the trial, contain within themselves a guarantee against multiplication and confusion of issues. Therefore the discretion of the trial judge in excluding otherwise admissible evidence of this type is not as wide as it is in the vague and amorphous area of cross-examination of character witnesses. See Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469, 69 S.Ct. 213, 93 L.Ed. 168.

[6][7] The Court of Appeals affirmed on the ground that Marshall's admission, on cross-examination, of the implicit contradiction between the documents and his testimony removed the need for resort to the statements and the admission was all the accused were entitled to demand. We cannot agree. We think that an admission that a contradiction is contained in a writing should not bar admission of the document itself in evidence, providing *421 it meets all other requirements of admissibility and no valid claim of privilege is raised against it. [FN14] The elementary wisdom of the best evidence rule rests on the fact that the document is a more reliable, complete and accurate source of information as to its contents and meaning than anyone's description and this is no less true as to the extent and circumstances of a contradiction. We hold that the accused is entitled to the application of that rule, not merely because it will emphasize the contradiction to the jury, but because it will best inform them as to the document's impeaching weight and significance. [FN15] Traditional rules of admissibility prevent opening the door to documents which merely differ on immaterial matters. The alleged contradictions to this witness' testimony relate not to collateral matters but to the very incrimination of petitioners. Except the testimony of this witness be believed, this conviction probably could not have been had. Yet, his first statement was that he got the film from Swartz; his first four statements did not implicate these petitioners and his fifth did so only after the judicial admonition we will later consider. The weight to be given Marshall's implication of the petitioners was decisive. Since, so far as we are now informed by the record, we think the statements should have been admitted, we cannot accept the Government's contention based on a premise that the court was free to exclude them. It was error to deny the application for their production.

FN14. 3 Wigmore on Evidence, s 1037; 3 Wharton's Criminal Evidence (11th ed.) s 1309.

FN15. The best evidence rule is usually relied upon by one opposing admission, on the ground that the evidence offered by the proponent does not meet its standards. Its merit as an assurance of the most accurate record possible commends its extension to this unique situation where it is the proponent who seeks to rely on it.

[8] The second effort to impeach Marshall was to offer parts already quoted from the transcript of proceedings *422 in Detroit. Although Marshall admitted pleading guilty to the offense and that nine months later he was still unsentenced, he denied that he had received either promises or threats. The transcript would have shown the jury that a federal judge, who still retained power to fix his sentence, in discussing Marshall's expectation of a 'recommendation for a lenient sentence or for probation' had urged him to tell all he knew, 'even though it might involve others.' Involvement of others, whom Marshall had not theretofore mentioned, soon followed. We think the jury should have heard this warning of the judge, which was an addition to the matter brought out on cross-examination. The question for them is not what the judge intended by the admonition, nor how we, or even they, construe its meaning. We imply no criticism of it, and he expressly stated that he was holding out no promise. But the question for the jury is what effect they think these words had on the mind and conduct of a prisoner whose plea of guilty put him in large measure in the hands of the speaker. They might have regarded it as an incentive to involve others, and to supply a motive for Marshall's testimony other than a duty to recount the facts as best he could remember them. Reluctant as we are to differ with an experienced trial judge 375 on the scope of cross-examination, the importance of this witness constrains us to hold that the transcript was erroneously excluded.

[9][10] We believe, moreover, that the combination of these two errors was sufficiently prejudicial to require reversal. The Government, in its brief, argues strongly for the widest sort of discretion in the trial judge in these matters and urges that even if we find error or irregularity we disregard it as harmless [FN16] and affirm the conviction. We *423 are well aware of the necessity that appellate courts give the trial judge wide latitude in control of cross-examination, especially in dealing with collateral evidence as to character. Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469, 69 S.Ct. 213, 93 L.Ed. 168. But this principle cannot be expanded to justify a curtailment which keeps from the jury relevant and important facts bearing on the trustworthiness of crucial testimony. Reversals should not be based on trivial, theoretical and harmless rulings. But we cannot say that these errors were unlikely to have influenced the jury's verdict. We believe they prejudiced substantial rights and the judgment must be reversed.

FN16. Fed.Rules Crim.Proc. rule 52 admonishes us that 'Any error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial rights shall be disregarded.'

Reversed.

v.
William A. FENSTERER.

No. 85-214.

Nov. 4, 1985.

Defendant was convicted in state court of murder, and he appealed. The Delaware Supreme Court, 493 A.2d 959, reversed, and certiorari was sought. The Supreme Court held: (1) that admission of testimony of prosecution's expert witness who was unable to recall the basis for his opinion did not deny defendant his Sixth Amendment right to confrontation where he was able to demonstrate to the jury that the witness could not recall the theory upon which his opinion was based and was able to suggest to the jury that the witness had relied on a theory which the defense expert considered baseless, and (2) admission of testimony did not deprive defendant of due process.

Reversed and remanded.

Justice Stevens filed an opinion concurring in the judgment.

Justice Marshall dissented from summary disposition.

*16 292 PER CURIAM.

In this case, the Delaware Supreme Court reversed respondent William Fensterer's conviction on the grounds that the admission of the opinion testimony of the prosecution's expert witness, who was unable to recall the basis for his opinion, 293 denied respondent his Sixth Amendment right to confront the witnesses against him. 493 A.2d 959 (1985). We conclude that the Delaware Supreme Court misconstrued the Confrontation Clause as interpreted by the decisions of this Court.

I

Respondent was convicted of murdering his fiancee, Stephanie Ann Swift. The State's case was based on circumstantial evidence, and proceeded on the theory that respondent had strangled Swift with a cat leash. To establish that the cat leash was the murder weapon, the State sought to prove that two hairs found on the leash were similar to Swift's hair, and that one of those hairs had been forcibly removed. To prove these theories, the State relied on the testimony of Special Agent Allen Robillard of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

At trial, Robillard testified that one of the hairs had been forcibly removed. He explained that, in his opinion, there are three methods of determining that a hair has forcibly *17 been removed: (1) if the follicular tag is present on the hair, (2) if the root is elongated and misshaped, or (3) if a sheath of skin surrounds the root. However, Robillard went on to say that " 'I have reviewed my notes, and I have no specific knowledge as to the particular way that I determined the hair was forcibly removed other than the fact that one of those hairs was forcibly removed.' " Id., at 963. On cross-examination, Agent Robillard was again unable to recall which method he had employed to determine that the hair had forcibly been removed. He also explained that what he meant by "forcibly removed" was no more than that the hair could have been removed by as little force as is entailed in " 'brushing your hand through your head or brushing your hair.' " Pet. for Cert. 7. The trial court overruled respondent's objection that the admission of Robillard's testimony precluded adequate cross-examination unless he could testify as to which of the three theories he relied upon, explaining that in its view this objection went to the weight of the evidence rather than its admissibility.

The defense offered its own expert in hair analysis, Dr. Peter DeForest, who agreed with Agent Robillard that the hairs were similar to Swift's. Doctor DeForest testified that he had observed that one of the hairs had a follicular tag. He also testified that he had spoken by telephone with Robillard, who advised him that his conclusion of forcible removal was based on the presence of the follicular tag. App. to Pet. for Cert. D-2. Doctor DeForest then proceeded to challenge the premise of Robillard's theory--that the presence of a follicular tag indicates forcible removal. According to Dr. DeForest, no adequate scientific study supported that premise, and a follicular tag could be attached to hairs that naturally fall out.

On appeal, the Delaware Supreme Court reversed respondent's conviction on the authority of the Confrontation Clause. Nothing that "[t]he primary interest secured by the Clause is the right of cross-examination," 493 A.2d, at 963, *18 the court reasoned that "[e]ffective cross-examination and discrediting of Agent Robillard's opinion at a minimum required that he commit himself to the basis of his opinion." Id., at 964 (footnote omitted). Absent such an acknowledgment of the basis of his opinion, the court believed that "defense counsel's cross-examination of the Agent was nothing more than an exercise in futility." Ibid. Since the court could not rule out the possibility that Robillard could have been "completely discredited" had he committed himself as to the theory on which his conclusion was based, it held that respondent "was denied his right to effectively cross-examine a key state witness." Ibid. Accordingly, the court reversed without reaching respondent's additional claim that Robillard's testimony was inadmissible under the pertinent Delaware Rules of Evidence. We now reverse the Delaware Supreme Court's holding that Agent Robillard's inability to recall the method whereby he arrived at his opinion rendered the admission of that opinion violative of respondent's 294 rights under the Confrontation Clause.

This Court's Confrontation Clause cases fall into two broad categories: cases involving the admission of out-of-court statements and cases involving restrictions imposed by law or by the trial court on the scope of cross-examination. The first category reflects the Court's longstanding recognition that the "literal right to 'confront' the witness at the time of trial ... forms the core of the values furthered by the Confrontation Clause." California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 157, 90 S.Ct. 1930, 1934, 26 L.Ed.2d 489 (1970). Cases such as Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980), and Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74, 91 S.Ct. 210, 27 L.Ed.2d 213 (1970), gave rise to Confrontation Clause issues "because hearsay evidence was admitted as substantive evidence against the defendants." Tennessee v. Street, 471 U.S. 409, 413, 105 S.Ct. 2078, 2081, 85 L.Ed.2d 425 (1985). Cf. Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123, 88 S.Ct. 1620, 20 L.Ed.2d 476 (1968).

19 The second category of cases is exemplified by Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 318, 94 S.Ct. 1105, 1111, 39 L.Ed.2d 347 (1974), in which, although some cross-examination of a prosecution witness was allowed, the trial court did not permit defense counsel to "expose to the jury the facts from which jurors, as the sole triers of fact and credibility, could appropriately draw inferences relating to the reliability of the witness." As the Court stated in Davis, supra, at 315, 94 S.Ct., at 1110, "[c]onfrontation means more than being allowed to confront the witness physically." Consequently, in Davis, as in other cases involving trial court restrictions on the scope of cross-examination, the Court has recognized that Confrontation Clause questions will arise because such restrictions may "effectively ... emasculate the right of cross-examination itself." Smith v. Illinois, 390 U.S. 129, 131, 88 S.Ct. 748, 750, 19 L.Ed.2d 956 (1968).

This case falls in neither category. It is outside the first category, because the State made no attempt to introduce an out-of-court statement by Agent Robillard for any purpose, let alone as hearsay. Therefore, the restrictions the Confrontation Clause places on "the range of admissible hearsay," Roberts, supra, at 65, 100 S.Ct., at 2538, are not called into play.

[1] The second category is also inapplicable here, for the trial court did not limit the scope or nature of defense counsel's cross-examination in any way. The Court has recognized that "the cross-examiner is not only permitted to delve into the witness' story to test the witness' perceptions and memory, but [also] ... allowed to impeach, i.e., discredit, the witness." Davis, 415 U.S., at 316, 94 S.Ct., at 1110. But it does not follow that the right to cross-examine is denied by the State whenever the witness' lapse of memory impedes one method of discrediting him. Quite obviously, an expert witness who cannot recall the basis for his opinion invites the jury to find that his opinion is as unreliable as his memory. That the defense might prefer the expert to embrace a particular theory, which it is prepared to refute with special vigor, is irrelevant. " 'The main and essential purpose of confrontation is to secure 20 for the opponent the opportunity of cross-examination.' " Id., at 315-316, 94 S.Ct., at 1109-10 (quoting 5 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 1395, p. 123 (3d ed. 1940) (emphasis in original)). Generally speaking, the Confrontation Clause guarantees an opportunity for effective cross-examination, not cross-examination that is effective in whatever way, and to whatever extent, the defense might wish. See Roberts, 448 U.S., at 73, n. 12, 100 S.Ct., at 2543, n. 12 (even where the only opportunity the defense has to cross-examine the declarant is at a preliminary hearing, except in "extraordinary cases" where defense counsel provided ineffective representation at the earlier proceeding, "no inquiry into 'effectiveness' is required"). This conclusion is confirmed by the fact that the assurances *295 of reliability our cases have found in the right of cross-examination are fully satisfied in cases such as this one, notwithstanding the witness' inability to recall the basis for his opinion: the factfinder can observe the witness' demeanor under cross-examination, and the witness is testifying under oath and in the presence of the accused. See id., at 63, n. 6, 100 S.Ct., at 2537-38, n. 6.

[2] We need not decide whether there are circumstances in which a witness' lapse of memory may so frustrate any opportunity for cross-examination that admission of the witness' direct testimony violates the Confrontation Clause. In this case, defense counsel's cross-examination of Agent Robillard demonstrated to the jury that Robillard could not even recall the theory on which his opinion was based. Moreover, through its own expert witness, the defense was able to suggest to the jury that Robillard had relied on a theory which the defense expert considered baseless. The Confrontation Clause certainly requires no more than this.

Although Green, supra, involved a witness who professed a lapse of memory on the stand, that case lends no support to respondent. In pertinent part, Green was a case in which a minor named Porter informed a police officer of a transaction in which he claimed Green supplied him with drugs. At trial, Porter professed to be unable to recall how he obtained *21 the drugs. The prosecution then introduced Porter's prior inconsistent statements as substantive evidence. Green, 399 U.S., at 152, 90 S.Ct., at 1932. This Court held that "the Confrontation Clause does not require excluding from evidence the prior statements of a witness who concedes making the statements, and who may be asked to defend or otherwise explain the inconsistency between his prior and his present version of the events in question, thus opening himself to full cross-examination at trial as to both stories." Id., at 164, 90 S.Ct., at 1938. However, the Court also concluded that, in the posture of that case, it would be premature to reach the question "[w]hether Porter's apparent lapse of memory so affected Green's right to cross-examine as to make a critical difference in the application of the Confrontation Clause...." Id., at 168, 90 S.Ct., at 1940. In this connection, the Court noted that even some who argue that "prior statements should be admissible as substantive evidence" believe that this rule should not apply to "the case of a witness who disclaims all present knowledge of the ultimate event," because "in such a case the opportunities for testing the prior statement through cross-examination at trial may be significantly diminished." Id., at 169, n. 18, 90 S.Ct., at 1940-41, n. 18 (citations omitted).

We need not decide today the question raised but not resolved in Green. As Green's framing of that question indicates, the issue arises only where a "prior statement," not itself subjected to cross-examination and the other safeguards of testimony at trial, is admitted as substantive evidence. Since there is no such out-of-court statement in this case, the adequacy of a later opportunity to cross-examine, as a substitute for cross-examination at the time the declaration was made, is not in question here.

[3][4] Under the Court's cases, then, Agent Robillard's inability to recall on the stand the basis for his opinion presents none of the perils from which the Confrontation Clause protects defendants in criminal proceedings. The Confrontation Clause includes no guarantee that every witness called by the *22 prosecution will refrain from giving testimony that is marred by forgetfulness, confusion, or evasion. To the contrary, the Confrontation Clause is generally satisfied when the defense is given a full and fair opportunity to probe and expose these infirmities through cross-examination, thereby calling to the attention of the factfinder the reasons for giving scant weight to the witness' testimony. Accordingly, we hold that the admission into evidence of Agent Robillard's opinion 296 did not offend the Confrontation Clause despite his inability to recall the basis for that opinion.

[5] The Delaware Supreme Court also appears to have believed that the prosecution breached its "serious obligation not to obstruct a criminal defendant's cross-examination of expert testimony," 493 A.2d, at 963, seemingly because the prosecution knew in advance that Agent Robillard would be unable to recall the basis for his opinion when he testified at trial. While we would agree that Robillard's testimony at the voir dire examination must be taken to have alerted both the prosecution and the defense to his lapse of memory, see App. to Brief in Opposition A-1, we do not think the prosecution was obliged to refrain from calling Robillard unless it could somehow refresh his recollection. Whether or not, under state law, Robillard's opinion should have been admitted into evidence, nothing in the Federal Constitution forbids the conclusion reached by the trial court in this case: that the expert's inability to recall the basis for his opinion went to the weight of the evidence, not its admissibility. See United States v. Bastanipour, 697 F.2d 170, 176-177 (CA7 1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1091, 103 S.Ct. 1790, 76 L.Ed.2d 358 (1983). That being so, the prosecution's foreknowledge that its expert would be unable to give the precise basis for his opinion did not impose an obligation on it, as a matter of due process, to refrain from introducing the expert's testimony unless the basis for that testimony could definitely be ascertained. We need not decide whether the introduction of an expert opinion with no basis could ever be so lacking in reliability, and so prejudicial, as to *23 deny a defendant a fair trial. The testimony of Dr. DeForest, suggesting the actual basis for Robillard's opinion and vigorously disputing its validity, utterly dispels any possibility of such a claim in this case.

The petition for certiorari is granted, the judgment of the Delaware Supreme Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Justice MARSHALL dissents from this summary disposition, which has been ordered without affording the parties prior notice or an opportunity to file briefs on the merits. See Maggio v. Fulford, 462 U.S. 111, 120-121, 103 S.Ct. 2261, 2265-66, 76 L.Ed.2d 794 (1983) (MARSHALL, J., dissenting); Wyrick v. Fields, 459 U.S. 42, 51-52, 103 S.Ct. 394, 397-98, 74 L.Ed.2d 214 (1982) (MARSHALL, J., dissenting).

Justice BLACKMUN would grant certiorari and give this case plenary consideration.

Justice STEVENS, concurring in the judgment.

Summary reversal of a state supreme court's application of federal constitutional strictures to its own police and prosecutors in novel cases of this kind tends to stultify the orderly development of the law. Because I believe this Court should allow state courts some latitude in the administration of their criminal law, [FN1] I voted to deny certiorari. Cf. California v. Carney, 471 U.S. 386, 395, 105 S.Ct. 2066, 2071, 85 L.Ed.2d 406 (1985) (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

> FN1. In California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 171, 90 S.Ct. 1930, 1941-1942, 26 L.Ed.2d 489 (1970), THE CHIEF JUSTICE wrote separately "to emphasize the importance of allowing the States to experiment and innovate, especially in the area of criminal justice." He correctly observed that "neither the Constitution as originally drafted, nor any amendment, nor indeed any need, dictates that we must have absolute uniformity in the criminal law in all the States." Id., at 171-172, 90 S.Ct., at 1941-42.

On the merits, I find the issue much closer to the question reserved in California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 168-170, 90 S.Ct. 1930, 1940-41, 26 L.Ed.2d 489 *24 (1970), than does the Court. The question reserved in Green concerned the admissibility of an earlier out-of-court statement by the witness Porter of which Porter 297 disclaimed any present recollection at the time of trial. [FN2] The question decided by the Court today concerns the admissibility of an earlier out-of-court conclusion reached by a witness who disclaims any present recollection of the basis for that conclusion. The reasons for carefully reserving the question in Green persuade me that this case should not be decided without full argument. Nevertheless, because the Court has granted certiorari and decided to act summarily, because I am not persuaded that the Federal Constitution was violated, and because the State Supreme Court remains free to reinstate its judgment on the basis of its interpretation of state law, I reluctantly concur in the judgment.

> FN2. "Whether Porter's apparent lapse of memory so affected Green's right to cross-examine as to make a critical difference in the application of the Confrontation Clause in this case is an issue which is not ripe for decision at this juncture" (footnote omitted). UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Jack Lee SCROGGINS, Defendant-Appellant.
No. 90-2580.
United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.
Argued Feb. 28, 1991.
Decided Aug. 2, 1991.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court, Central District of Illinois, Richard Mills, J., of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and was sentenced to 33 months in prison. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Ripple, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) trial court did not abuse its discretion in prohibiting defendant from questioning key government witness regarding possible sex change operation; (2) there was sufficient evidence that defendant was integral part of cocaine distribution conspiracy to support his conviction; (3) evidence did not establish that defendant agreed to be involved only in small-scale sales such that 140 grams of cocaine involved in final transaction before his arrest could not be considered in sentencing; but (4) record of sentencing proceedings left uncertain whether sentencing increased to 20 because of his possession of a firearm. His criminal history category was I, resulting in a sentencing range of thirty-three to forty-one months. The court sentenced Mr. Scroggins to thirty-three months.

ANALYSIS

A. Challenges to Conviction

1. Pretrial motions

[1] In his brief, Mr. Scroggins touches on several alleged errors by the district court in its handling of the pretrial motions concerning NA's possible sex change operation. In essence, his position is that the district court abused its discretion by foreclosing potential avenues of impeachment of NA, a key witness against Mr. Scroggins. He acknowledges, however, that "the sexual orientation of a witness generally will not be the subject of proper impeachment." Appellant's Br. at 28 (citing United States v. Colyer, 571 F.2d 941, 946 n. 7 (5th Cir.) (homosexual orientation irrelevant to credibility), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 933, 99 S.Ct. 325, 58 L.Ed.2d 328 (1978); Fed.R.Evid. 608). Mr. Scroggins insists 421 that he "sought to inquire of [NA] as to her sexual identity not for the purposes of impugning her moral character but rather to determine whether she was masquerading as a woman when she in fact was not." Id. at 28-29.

We find no abuse of discretion on the record before us. The district court is authorized to "exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to ... protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment." Fed.R.Evid. 611(a). Even if we were to acknowledge that NA's sexual identity had any potential relevance to her credibility, we would not conclude that the court erred in protecting NA from the much more obvious potential of such harassment and embarrassment. [FN1] Furthermore, Mr. Scroggins had ample opportunity to attack NA's credibility on other, more relevant, grounds. For example, on cross-examination, NA acknowledged that her recommended sentence pursuant to her plea agreement was contingent on her testifying against Mr. Scroggins--the only remaining defendant who had not pled guilty or had charges dismissed. With such obvious impeachment material available to Mr. Scroggins, the district court certainly was not obligated to permit a line of questioning that was more likely to distract the jury than to inform it of relevant evidence.

FN1. Cf. United States v. Masters, 924 F.2d 1362, 1368 (7th Cir.) (no reversible error when district court limited cross-examination concerning witness' acknowledged habit of wearing women's underwear in case in which female victim's body had been found without panties; details of the "fetish would have been spicy, but peripheral to the issues because there was no suggestion that violence was an aspect of the fetish"), cert.

denied, --- U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 2019, 114 L.Ed.2d 105 (1991). The cross-examination prohibited in regards to NA's sexual identity was much more peripheral than the cross-examination that this court held properly limited in Masters.

2. Sufficiency of evidence

Mr. Scroggins contends that the government failed to present sufficient evidence to sustain his conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine. As this court has noted many times, those who raise sufficiency of evidence challenges bear a "heavy burden." E.g., United States v. Valencia, 907 F.2d 671, 676 (7th Cir.1990). "The test is whether, after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the government, 'any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt.' " United States v. Pritchard, 745 F.2d 1112, 1122 (7th Cir.1984) (quoting Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319, 99 S.Ct. 2781, 2789, 61 L.Ed.2d 560 (1979) (emphasis in original)); accord United States v. Lamon, 930 F.2d 1183, 1190 (7th Cir.1991).

[2][3][4] As Mr. Scroggins acknowledges, a defendant indicted for conspiracy also may be convicted on an aiding and abetting theory. See United States v. Galiffa, 734 F.2d 306, 312 (7th Cir.1984). Because the jury was so instructed, we shall examine the evidence in terms of aiding and abetting

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Evonna Victoria JOHNSON, Appellant.

No. 91-3694.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted May 12, 1992.

Decided July 10, 1992.

Defendant was convicted of possession with intent to distribute cocaine base after jury trial in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, Paul A. Magnuson, J. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Wollman, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) disallowing cross-examination of police witness for impeachment purposes on collateral issue of internal police investigation resulting in officer's suspension was not abuse of discretion; (2) disallowing cross-examination of prosecution witnesses about investigation of defendant's estranged husband to demonstrate motive for officers to testify falsely against defendant was not abuse of discretion; and (3) exclusion of evidence of potential penalty codefendant faced by claiming it was she who had thrown crack cocaine out window and not defendant was not abuse of discretion.

Affirmed.

WOLLMAN, Circuit Judge.

Evonna V. Johnson appeals from her conviction for possession with intent to distribute 766 cocaine base, in violation of 21 U.S.C. 841(a)(1). We affirm.

I.

On February 13, 1991, Minneapolis police officers executed a search warrant at Johnson's residence. The first officer to enter the residence testified that he saw two black females--Johnson and Demellon Horton--in the home. After the officers entered the home, Johnson was seen running into the bedroom and throwing a red pantyhose bag out of the window.

The police seized the red bag, which contained thirteen grams of cocaine base, and arrested Johnson. Following her conviction, Johnson was sentenced to 120 months' imprisonment. She now appeals from three evidentiary rulings made by the district court.

II.

"The admissibility of evidence is primarily a determination to be made by the district court ..., and [we] will not substitute its judgment unless there has been an abuse of discretion." United States v. Abodeely, 801 F.2d 1020, 1022 (8th Cir.1986) (citation omitted).

[1] Johnson first argues that the district court abused its discretion by excluding evidence that one of the government's witnesses, Officer Doran, had been suspended from the police department for three days without pay in May 1991 for having left in-service training without permission, having worked on an off-duty job during a period of in-service training, and having lied to his supervisor about when he had reported to the off-duty job. Defense counsel sought to introduce the letter of suspension, pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 608(b), to impeach Doran's credibility. [FN1] The district court refused to admit the letter and refused to allow defense counsel to cross-examine Doran about the substance of the letter.

FN1. Although the record does not reflect defense counsel's offer of the letter of suspension, we accept counsel's representation that he offered it under Rule 608(b).

[2] Federal Rule of Evidence 608(b) does not permit specific instances of a witness' conduct to be proved by extrinsic evidence. United States v. Martz, 964 F.2d 787, 788-89 (8th Cir.1992). "The purpose of barring extrinsic evidence is to avoid mini-trials on peripherally related or irrelevant matters." [FN2] Id. To the extent that such evidence is ever admissible, the introduction of extrinsic evidence to attack credibility is subject to the discretion of the trial court. Id. at 788-89; United States v. Capozzi, 883 F.2d 608, 615 (8th Cir.1989), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 918, 110 S.Ct. 1947, 109 L.Ed.2d 310 (1990). Given the broad discretion granted to the trial court and Rule 608(b)'s stricture against the introduction of such evidence, we conclude that the district court did not err in refusing to admit the letter of suspension.

FN2. The government states that it would have offered evidence to show that Doran was exonerated on the charges contained in the letter and that thus there would have been a "mini-trial" on this collateral issue.

Although Rule 608(b) states that specific instances of past conduct "may, however, in the discretion of the court, ... be inquired into on cross-examination," the district court did not allow defense counsel to inquire into the circumstances surrounding Doran's suspension. The district court did, however, allow the prosecution to impeach Ms. Horton, who testified that it was she who threw the cocaine base out of the window, with a pending charge of giving a false name to a police officer.

Defense counsel objected to the government's attempt to impeach Ms. Horton with the testimony that she had given a false name to the police, arguing that that evidence should be ruled inadmissible in view of the district court's earlier ruling prohibiting cross-examination regarding Doran's suspension. The district court resolved the apparent inconsistency by concluding that the two situations did not "fall in the same category." The court noted that when the police questioned Horton at Johnson's residence, she gave them a false name; when 767 the police arrested Horton on another occasion, she gave the police a false name. The district court determined that evidence of Doran's internal suspension, in contrast, was "totally unrelated" to the issues involved in Johnson's trial.

As an additional reason for its ruling, the district court stated that "[i]nternal affairs investigations must, need to and have to reside within police departments." The court added that "a minor ... investigation report, ... should not be the public subject of cross examination of the witness at every time that he testifies [after] making an arrest."

[3] We conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion by disallowing questioning on the collateral issue of the internal police investigation. See Martz, at 788-89. We do not concur, however, in the district court's observation that the results of the investigations of the internal affairs of police departments must in all cases be ruled inadmissible for impeachment purposes. There may indeed be situations in which evidence from such internal investigations will bear heavily on the credibility of a testifying police officer. In such situations, a district court should deem itself free to allow such inquiries during cross-examination.

[4] Johnson next argues that the district court erred by excluding evidence that would have established a motive for the police officers to testify falsely against her. Johnson sought to cross-examine prosecution witnesses about the investigation and prosecution of Johnson's estranged husband, Richard McElrath. Defense counsel sought to demonstrate that the police department's desire to insure McElrath's conviction was intense enough to provide a motive for the officers to testify falsely against Johnson for the purpose of coercing her into cooperating with them in the case against McElrath. After hearing defense counsel's offer of proof, the district court determined that this evidence was irrelevant.

Having reviewed the record, we conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion by excluding this evidence. Among other things, the investigation and prosecution of McElrath was based upon a search of a residence different from that searched in the present case. Additionally, McElrath was already in federal custody at the time Johnson's house was searched and she was arrested. Although evidence against McElrath was later suppressed by another court, the officers' reports regarding their arrest of Johnson had already been filed and their testimony before the grand jury already given at the time the suppression order was entered. Thus, their search of Johnson's residence and their account of the circumstances of her arrest could not have been motivated by any perceived need for further evidence against McElrath.

[5] Finally, Johnson argues that the district court abused its discretion by excluding evidence of the potential penalty Ms. Horton faced by claiming that it was she who had thrown the crack out of the window. By establishing that Ms. Horton was aware that the penalty for possessing thirteen grams of crack was a sentence of not less than five years' imprisonment, Johnson sought to bolster Ms. Horton's credibility, on the assumption that no one would expose herself to that severe a penalty unless she had in fact committed the act giving rise to that penalty. The district court sustained the government's objection to this line of questioning.

Although the district court might well have decided to admit this proffered testimony, cf. Fed.R.Evid. 804(b)(3) (statement tending to subject declarant to criminal liability not excluded by hearsay rule), we conclude that it did not abuse its discretion by excluding this evidence.

We express our appreciation to appointed counsel for his zealous efforts on Johnson's behalf, both at trial and on appeal.

The judgment of conviction is affirmed.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Ibukun O. MAYOMI, Defendant-Appellant.
No. 87-2658.
United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.
Argued Nov. 10, 1988.
Decided May 1, 1989.

Defendant was convicted before the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Harry D. Leinenweber, J., of one count of attempted possession of heroin with intent to distribute, one count of possession of heroin with intent to distribute, and seven counts of importation of controlled substance. On his appeal, the Court of Appeals, Coffey, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) detention of defendant's mail which was received at private mail box service was justified by FBI agent's reasonable suspicion that mail contained heroin; (2) length of time letters were held prior to issuance of search warrant was reasonable; and (3) district court did not abuse its discretion in precluding cross-examination regarding identity of informant who initially contacted the FBI with information that accidentally opened envelope defendant lacks sufficient facts to support his speculative assertion that St. John's veracity should be called into question. In any event, we agree with the statement of the Tenth Circuit that:

"the Supreme Court's decision in Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 59, 77 S.Ct. 623, 627, 1 L.Ed.2d 639 (1957), ... acknowledged the public's interest in protecting the identity of confidential informants in order to encourage the flow of information necessary in criminal prosecutions.... [T]he public's interest, as recognized in Roviaro, imposes procedural requirements and evidentiary burdens on a defendant who requests the disclosure of the confidential informant."

United States v. Bloomgren, 814 F.2d 580, 584 (10th Cir.1987). Because the defendant failed to comply with the procedural requirements set forth in Franks, supra, he has waived the issue on appeal. We refuse to consider his attack on the search warrant in the context of his argument that the district court abused its discretion in limiting the cross-examination of the government witnesses.

[4] We reach a similar conclusion regarding the defendant's contention that the district court erred in precluding cross-examination of Ashton on his relationship with Agent St. John in investigations prior to the present case. "[T]he decision to not allow cross-examination of a witness concerning investigations other than those related to the case on trial falls within the discretion of the district court." Silva, 781 F.2d at 110 (citing United States v. Murphy, 768 F.2d 1518, 1536 (7th Cir.1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1012, 106 S.Ct. 1188, 89 L.Ed.2d 304 (1986)).

In this case, the district judge ruled not to allow questioning about Ashton's relationship with St. John in previous FBI investigations because defense counsel failed to establish that such questioning was either necessary or relevant to the real issues in the case: namely, whether the defendant knowingly attempted to possess, possessed and imported heroin. Both at trial and on appeal the defendant argues that this line of questioning was relevant and necessary because the absence of information on Ashton's prior relationship with the FBI made it impossible for the jury to reach an informed decision regarding Ashton's credibility. We disagree.

The Supreme Court, in Delaware v. Fensterer, 474 U.S. 15, 20, 106 S.Ct. 292, 295, 88 L.Ed.2d 15, 19 (1985) (per curiam), stated that "the Confrontation Clause guarantees an opportunity for effective cross-examination, not cross-examination that is effective in whatever way, and to whatever extent, the defense might wish." (Emphasis in original). The record reflects that Mayomi's attorney cross-examined Ashton extensively on his encounters with 1057 the defendant at Scanner Services, the details of how and when he accidentally cut open the first envelope found to contain brown heroin, and his subsequent cooperation with the FBI in its investigation of the defendant.

From our review of the record we are convinced that the district court afforded the defendant ample opportunity to elicit sufficient information from Ashton concerning his involvement in this case such that the jury could make an informed decision regarding his credibility as a witness. [FN9] The question of whether Ashton had been involved in previous FBI investigations was, at best, only marginally relevant to the central issues in this case and a sojourn into this matter would have served only to confuse the jury on those issues. [FN10] As Delaware v. Van Arsdall, supra, teaches, a district court has wide latitude to impose reasonable limits on cross-examination based on concerns of this nature. Accordingly, we hold that it was not an abuse of discretion for the district court to preclude cross-examination of Ashton on this issue.

FN9. In fact, as we noted in note 3, supra, Mayomi's attorney failed to take full advantage of the opportunity he had by failing to ask Ashton whether he had cut open the first envelope at the direction of the FBI.

FN10. We note that the defendant's attempt to challenge the veracity of Ashton, as well as that of the government on a matter that should have been brought to the attention of the court in a Franks motion, see supra note

8, was nothing more than an attempt to confuse the jury on the real issues set for trial--namely, whether the defendant knowingly possessed, attempted to possess, and imported heroin. We caution trial counsel that such "fishing expeditions" are not viewed favorably by this court. Given the already overcrowded dockets of the federal judiciary, if the defendant actually had information that Ashton had been involved in previous FBI investigations, he should have made a proper offer of proof in the district court.

Even if we were to agree with the contention that the district court had abused its discretion in limiting the scope of the defendant's cross-examination of Ashton, which we do not, the Supreme Court has held that violations of the Confrontation Clause are subject to harmless error analysis. Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. at 681, 106 S.Ct. at 1436, 89 L.Ed.2d at 684. In light of the overwhelming evidence against Mayomi regarding his involvement in the importation and possession of heroin, we hold that any error in limiting the defendant's cross-examination of Ashton, with respect to either the identity of the informant or Ashton's previous involvement, if any, in FBI investigations, was harmless.

UNITED STATES, Appellee,
v.
Mushtaq MALIK, a/k/a Mushtaq Ahmed,
Defendant, Appellant.

No. 90-1549.

United States Court of Appeals,
First Circuit.

Heard Jan. 9, 1991.

Decided March 18, 1991.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, Frank H. Freedman, Chief Judge, of conspiring to import, and importing, heroin. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Breyer, Chief Judge, held that: (1) District Court was justified in forbidding defendant to cross-examine key government witnesses about one witness' terrorist activities and affiliation with radical organizations; (2) government agent's testimony about defendant's statements about prior involvement in smuggling scheme was admissible; and (3) agent's testimony that he understood defendant to claim that he was famous heroin smuggler was admissible.

Affirmed.

District court was justified in forbidding narcotics defendant to ask key government witnesses about one witness' alleged terrorist activities and affiliations with radical political groups, notwithstanding defendant's contentions that such limitation prevented him from developing defense theory--defendant merely "played along" with witness in narcotics transaction in effort to get one group's money back and further revolutionary plot to overthrow foreign government--and that line of questioning would also have helped to impeach witness; defense theory was not clearly developed at time of cross-examination or even during defendant's presentation of evidence, trial court could have determined that impeachment value of membership in radical organizations was small, and questions about membership in such organizations might introduce prejudicial, emotional issue into trial that could distract jury.

Mushtaq Malik appeals his convictions for conspiring to import, and importing, heroin. 21 U.S.C. §§ 952(a), 963; 18 U.S.C. § 2. He makes several evidence-related claims, the most important of which concerns limitations the trial judge imposed on Malik's counsel's efforts to impeach a key witness through cross-examination about the witness's past activities involving the Palestine Liberation Organization, the Jordanian government, and the FBI. After reading the entire record, we conclude that all Malik's claims are without legal merit, and we affirm the convictions.

I.
Facts

The government's evidence consisted primarily of taped phone conversations between Malik and Malik's coconspirator Samir Houchaimi, the testimony of Samir Houchaimi, and the testimony of Drug Enforcement Administration Agent William Powers. On the basis of those tapes and 19 that testimony, a jury might reasonably have found facts such as the following:

In late 1986 or early 1987 Malik and Samir Houchaimi met in Karachi, Pakistan, and discussed heroin trading. In September 1987 they agreed upon a heroin smuggling scheme: Malik was to advance the necessary money and to make eight kilograms of heroin available in Cyprus; Houchaimi was to smuggle the heroin into the United States and sell it. Soon thereafter Malik telephoned his source in Northern Pakistan (named Zahir Shah), identified himself as the "Black Prince," and ordered eight kilograms of heroin. Houchaimi went to Northern Pakistan, met Shah, paid him $6000 and took the heroin (in suitcases with false sides) to Malik's house in Karachi. Malik then had it transferred to the nearby house of his associates, Kassim and Muneera Ghaffar. Muneera Ghaffar then brought seven kilograms of the heroin to Cyprus where she gave it to Houchaimi, who had come to Cyprus separately.

On January 24, 1988, Houchaimi flew to the United States with 2.2 kilograms of heroin hidden in his luggage. He smuggled the heroin through customs in New York, flew on to Chicago, returned the next day to New York, and spent the next two weeks trying to sell the heroin. Eventually, he phoned a man he had met in prison who agreed to buy the heroin and asked Houchaimi to come to Springfield, Massachusetts, to deliver it. On February 6, 1988 Houchaimi went to Springfield, where he was arrested with the 2.2 kilograms of heroin. Houchaimi then confessed all and agreed to co-operate with the government.

At the government's request Houchaimi repeatedly phoned Malik and tried to lure him into meeting with Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Powers who, pretending to be an underworld figure called "Costa," supposedly would pay for Houchaimi's heroin and offer to buy more. The highly incriminating taped phone calls reveal Malik, for example, complaining about Houchaimi's tardiness in paying for the 2.2 kilograms of heroin (Malik said Shah was pressuring him for money), speaking at length about large heroin and hashish shipments (apparently using codewords such as "jackets" to refer to the shipments), and asking Houchaimi to explain his arrest (which Houchaimi said concerned only minor immigration offenses). Malik refused to travel to the United States or to Europe, but he agreed to meet "Costa" in Rio de Janeiro.

Malik met with "Costa" (Agent Powers) and "Costa's bodyguard" (another agent) in Rio on March 29, 1988. "Costa" showed Malik $200,000 in cash. Malik told "Costa" he was the "Black Prince," he talked to "Costa" about the heroin in Cyprus, and he discussed plans for future shipments. After the meeting ended, Brazilian police arrested Malik and sent him to the United States for trial.

II.
Limitations on Cross-Examination

[1] Malik argues that the district court should not have limited his counsel's cross-examination of the government's two key witnesses (Houchaimi and Powers) by forbidding him to ask them about Houchaimi's terrorist activities and related affiliations with the Palestine Liberation Organization and other organizations. He says that the limitation prevented him from developing the theory of his defense. That theory explained his conduct and the tape recordings by arguing that he and Houchaimi were members of a group trying to overthrow the President of Pakistan, that Houchaimi had run off with $500,000 of the group's money, and that he (Malik) was simply playing along with Houchaimi, pretending to agree with his remarks about drug smuggling and bragging in front of "Costa" (following to a script supplied by Houchaimi's son), all in order to get back the group's money and to further the revolutionary plot. Malik adds that the line of questioning would also have helped impeach Houchaimi.

[2] The legal question is whether or not the trial judge exceeded his powers to limit cross-examination in order to avoid prejudice, confusion, and unnecessary waste of time. A trial judge has "wide latitude" to 20 impose such limits. See United States v. Twomey, 806 F.2d 1136, 1139 (1st Cir.1986) ("a trial judge retains wide latitude to impose reasonable limits [on cross-examination] in order to avoid prejudice to a party or confusion of the issues") (citing Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 679, 106 S.Ct. 1431, 1435, 89 L.Ed.2d 674 (1986)). But, those limits must be reasonable, which is to say that they must not prevent the defendant from providing the jury with essential information about key events and sufficient information to make a "discriminating appraisal" of a witness's motives and possible bias. See id. at 1140 (stating that a trial judge's imposition of restrictions will be reversed "only if the jury is left without 'sufficient information concerning formative events to make a "discriminating appraisal" of a witness's motives and bias' ") (quoting United States v. Campbell, 426 F.2d 547, 550 (2d Cir.1970)).

Our reading of the record convinces us that the district court, in this case, acted well within the scope of its lawful powers, for the following reasons. First, in context, at the point Malik's counsel tried to pursue the cross-examination in question, its relevance was not clear. After the event, and particularly in his brief in this court, counsel has argued that Malik's story amounted to a claim that he was playing along with Houchaimi and that he really did not intend to smuggle drugs. At the time of cross-examination, however, and in his offer of proof, he had not developed the theory very clearly. Indeed, he seemed to be saying either that Malik wanted to show that he had engaged in drug smuggling in order to get back the money that Houchaimi allegedly took from the revolutionary group, or perhaps that Houchaimi was lying to get revenge on Malik for reasons arising from some past association.

> MR. FERRARONE [Malik's counsel]: ... My defense is going to be, while my client was in prison, [Houchaimi] made many many representations to him that he would involve himself in the attempt to kill Zia ul Haq, and that is the reason why my client became involved with this man, because my client was particularly interested in that and produced a large amount of money from many people in order to see this particular thing.
>
> That is why I need to involve myself in this PLO business and I am not fishing, Your Honor. I have an actual theory of defense that I need to present and that what happened was he took the money from a lot of people and he used it on drugs, and my client, realizing that he had been involved with this person, thought that the only way he was going to receive any money back and being able to repay the sixteen people who were involved in this thing, was to do anything he could to get the money back.
> This is the theory in a nutshell, and if I don't get the opportunity to cross examine him on this, I will never be able to adequately present this defense.

Tr. Vol. III, p. 75. The trial court's response to this offer indicates that the court understood this story merely as a recital of events leading up to the conspiracy to import heroin, rather than a version of events under which Malik never formed an intention to conspire to import heroin. The court stated:

> Why don't you simply ask him one point blank question, as a result of previous relations with Mr. Malik did he attempt to get involved in this particular conspiracy.

Id. If this was a misimpression, counsel for Malik made no attempt to correct it; instead, after one more attempt to ask Houchaimi about a conspiracy to harm Zia ul Haq, to which an objection was sustained, he asked the following question:

> As a result of your previous relations with Mr. Malik did you attempt to get him involved in a conspiracy to bring heroin into the United States so that, if caught, you could seek revenge against him for any previous relationships you may have had with him in the past?

Tr. Vol. III, p. 76. Houchaimi answered "Sir, Your Honor, I swear to God that my relationship with Mr. Malik was pure heroin and that is it." Id. The cross-examination 21 then went on to other, unrelated matters.

Not only did counsel for Malik not make clear during his cross-examination of Houchaimi that Malik's defense would be that he never intended to smuggle drugs, he did not make it clear later in the trial either. During Malik's presentation of evidence, counsel continued to argue that Malik's defense was that he had smuggled drugs in order to recover the stolen money. He told the jury, for example:

> So that in a nutshell is what Mr. Malik's testimony is going to be about. He is not going to argue to you, ladies and gentlemen, that at some point he didn't--at some point--at any point he never knew there was--that Mr. Colonel Houchaimi was involved in trafficking drugs. Because he did know that, and he's going to say he did know that. But he is going to tell you that he had an absolute necessity, he had absolute justification that he had to seize this opportunity, because this was going to be his one and only opportunity to get out of that country, and to attempt to at least recover some of the enormous funds that they had given to the Pakistan--that they had given to Colonel Houchaimi to effect the job that Colonel Houchaimi had promised to do. Tr. Vol. IV, p. 74. Moreover, Malik testified as follows:

> Q. At any point while you were in prison with him, did you have a discussion with Mr. Houchaimi regarding the transportation of heroin to the United States for sale?
>
> A. Absolutely not. We don't believe in this thing. We don't believe in heroin because we don't like it. And we don't do it.
>
> Q. But sir, you will admit that you were involved in dealing with heroin in the course of this transaction; is that correct?
>
> A. It didn't leave me any choice. It was a matter of life and death. It was a matter of life and death of those political people. They were being involved because of my poor judgment. And I had no other choice except to talk to get in touch with him.

Tr. Vol. IV, pp. 118-19. Finally, counsel, in his closing statement, added:

> MR. FERRARONE: Finally I just ask you to take a look at the testimony of Mr. Malik himself. You heard him tell me to sit down. No, no, I will explain....
> And he addressed you frontly and he said this is why I did it. This is why I did it. I was pressed from both sides. I was pressed by Colonel--pressed by General Zia, and I was pressed by my own people. I had given Colonel Houchaimi half a million dollars to do a job, a political job. That you and I know quite well Colonel Houchaimi is undoubtedly capable of doing.

Tr. Vol. VI, p. 135. Since "motive"--at least a "recovery-of-stolen-funds motive"--is not ordinarily a defense to a drug-smuggling charge, and since counsel did not clearly explain any more direct connection, we believe the district court could reasonably have considered that the proposed line of questioning lacked significant probative value for the defense.

Second, the trial court could reasonably have thought that the added impeachment value of the "terrorist" organization membership questions was small. Malik's counsel had already elicited from Houchaimi the facts that he had often smuggled heroin into the United States; that he had previously been arrested and convicted and obtained a significantly reduced sentence in return for co-operating with the government; that the government had promised him significant leniency in return for his co-operation in the present case; and that he had used aliases and false passports. The defense had caught him lying about a phone call from Chicago to New York; and it showed him to be highly evasive about remembering extensive foreign travel all documented in his passport. As we have noted, the court permitted counsel to ask Houchaimi if he had tried to involve Malik in drug smuggling to "seek revenge" for a "previous relationship," which Houchaimi denied. The court might reasonably conclude 22 that, say, PLO membership was not obvious proof of significantly worse character or willingness to lie.

Third, at the same time, the court might reasonably conclude that questions about membership in the PLO or other revolutionary groups would introduce a potentially prejudicial, emotional issue into the trial that could distract the jury from the evidence and facts directly related to guilt or innocence of the crime with which Malik was charged.

These three sets of considerations, taken together, lead us to conclude that the trial court's refusal to permit Malik to cross-examine on this issue did not violate Malik's constitutional right to confront witnesses, nor did it exceed the scope of a trial court's lawful trial-management powers. See Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 679, 106 S.Ct. 1431, 1435, 89 L.Ed.2d 674 (1986) ("trial judges retain wide latitude insofar as the Confrontation Clause is concerned to impose reasonable limits on ... cross-examination based on concerns about, among other things, harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, the witness' safety, or interrogation that is repetitive or only marginally relevant").

III.
Other Issues

[3] 1. After Malik testified, the government called back Agent Powers, who said, among other things, that Malik (during the Rio meeting) had told him the following story about his (Malik's) previous involvement in a heroin-smuggling scheme with two men named Reaz Rage and Ahmed Abass:

> ... Mr. Rage double-crossed Mr. Malik and Mr. Abass and sold the heroin without their knowledge to a foreign buyer, then told them that the heroin had been seized by the Pakistani authorities.

> However, Mr. Malik found out about this, and he and Mr. Abass decided that Mr. Rage should be killed. And Mr. Abass in fact asked Mr. Malik if he could have permission to kill Mr. Rage. As a result of that, with Mr. Malik's permission, according to Mr. Malik, Mr. Abass went to the hotel that Mr. Rage was staying and attempted to enter the room. But was not let in. He then fired, using a rifle, fired shots through the door, severely wounded Mr. Rage.
> When Mr. Malik found out about this and found out Mr. Rage had not died as a result of the attack, he immediately contacted an associate of his in the military, and got Mr. Rage to a military hospital so that he couldn't be interviewed by the local authorities. And when Mr. Rage recovered, he advised Mr. Rage that if he ever returned to Pakistan, he would have Mr. Abass finish the job.

Tr. Vol. VI, pp. 6-7. Malik argues that the government used this "admission" to Powers to show that he (Malik) had previously participated in a bad act, which in turn helped to show his bad character; and that Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) forbids the government's introduction of evidence for this purpose.

[4] The short conclusive answer to this claim is that Rule 404(b) forbids the introduction of evidence that is "relevant only because it shows bad character;" it permits the introduction of evidence that shows bad character when a party introduces that evidence for other, legitimate reasons. United States v. Ferrer-Cruz, 899 F.2d 135, 137 (1st Cir.1990) (citing numerous cases). Here, the government introduced the evidence for a legitimate purpose. Malik had testified that he was a kind of "freedom fighter" who had not previously smuggled heroin. He specifically testified, "We don't believe in heroin because we don't like it. And we don't do it." Tr. Vol. IV, p. 119. Malik's statement to Powers is inconsistent with his previous testimony; it amounts to a "prior inconsistent statement," admissible for impeachment purposes. See United States v. Barrett, 539 F.2d 244, 254 (1st Cir.1976) ("To be received as a prior inconsistent statement, the contradiction need not be 'in plain terms. It is enough if the proffered testimony, taken as a whole, either by what it says or by what it omits to say, affords some indication that the fact was different from the testimony of the 23 witness whom it is sought to contradict.' ") (quoting Commonwealth v. West, 312 Mass. 438, 440, 45 N.E.2d 260, 262 (1942)). Therefore, it overcomes the hurdle of Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). Moreover, the inconsistency was an important one in the context of the trial, for it showed that Malik had told Powers a story close to the polar opposite of his trial testimony; and, for that reason, we believe the trial court could reasonably conclude that the statement's "probative value" outweighed its potential "prejudicial effect." See United States v. Griffin, 818 F.2d 97, 101 (1st Cir.) (an appellate court will reverse a trial court's Rule 403 determination only in "exceptional circumstances"), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 844, 108 S.Ct. 137, 98 L.Ed.2d 94 (1987).

[5] Finally, as Malik now points out, he was entitled to a limiting instruction, making clear how the jury should use the testimony. However, Malik did not ask for such an instruction. Counsel might well have concluded that, in the context of the trial, such an instruction would not prove very helpful. In any event, whether a party wishes such an instruction, or wishes to forego the instruction (thereby calling less attention to the statement) is primarily a matter for counsel to decide at trial. And, we do not find the circumstances here so special that the court's failure to provide such an instruction sua sponte amounted to "plain error." The circumstances present in the two cases cited by Malik were quite different. See United States v. DeGeratto, 876 F.2d 576, 584 (7th Cir.1989) (suggesting in dictum that even had certain evidence been admissible under Rule 404(b), the trial court's failure to give a limiting instruction would have been plain error); Dawson v. Cowan, 531 F.2d 1374, 1377 (6th Cir.1976) (finding plain error in the failure to give a limiting instruction regarding evidence of a prior conviction for attempted rape where the defendant was facing both a principal charge of attempted rape and a habitual offender charge).

[6] 2. During the Rio meeting (a tape recording of which the government played for the jury) Powers said to Malik: "Your friend says you are the Black Prince." Malik said he was. The government then asked Powers (testifying live before the jury) what he understood the "Black Prince" to be. Over objection the district court ruled that Powers "may testify what he believes it to be." And, Powers said "I believe the black prince to be a very famous heroin smuggler." Tr. Vol. III, p. 144.

Malik argues that Powers's answer is inadmissible hearsay, for it is not based on Powers's previous personal acquaintance with a famous drug smuggler named the Black Prince, but reflects only what other persons told Powers out of court about the activities of someone called the Black Prince. However, the conclusive answer to this claim is that the court did not admit the statement for its truth (i.e. that Malik was the drug smuggler called the Black Prince). Rather, the court admitted the statement in order to show what Powers understood the words "black prince" to mean, as Malik used them. In other words, the statement was admitted to throw light on Powers's state of mind when Malik asserted that he was the Black Prince. See, e.g., United States v. DeVincent, 632 F.2d 147, 151 (1st Cir.) (holding that certain out-of-court statements were not hearsay because they were admissible "for their effect on the hearer"), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 986, 101 S.Ct. 405, 66 L.Ed.2d 249 (1980); J. Weinstein & M. Berger, 4 Weinstein's Evidence ¶ 801(c)(1), at 801-94 to 801-96 (1990) (utterances offered to show effect on state of mind are not hearsay).

Nor did the district court have to suppress Powers's answer under Fed.R.Evid. 403. Powers's state of mind was relevant because the jury could not fully understand the conversation at the Rio meeting without knowing that Powers wanted to apprehend a heroin smuggler believed to be calling himself the Black Prince, and therefore wanted to see whether Malik identified himself by that name. Nor could it fully appreciate Powers's subsequent statements and actions during the conversation without knowing that, once Malik had identified himself as the Black Prince, Powers believed himself to be dealing with a "very 24 famous heroin smuggler." Of course, Malik's counsel could have cross-examined Powers at trial about his understanding of the meaning of those words. Given this legitimate use of the evidence, the court could reasonably have concluded that the probative value of the evidence outweighed any prejudicial effect. See, e.g., United States v. Simon, 842 F.2d 552, 555 (1st Cir.1988) (district courts have "considerable leeway" in conducting Rule 403 balancing).

[7] 3. Malik also objects to the district court's having permitted the following questions and answers during the government's cross-examination of Malik.

> Q. In 1982, sir, a conference of law enforcement officers was held in Wiesbaden, Germany, and the subject of that meeting was your narcotics trafficking; isn't that right?
> MR. FERRARONE: Objection, Your Honor.
> THE WITNESS: Please. Let him. Please, sit down. He's in dark, doesn't know. I want to help this gentleman. Repeat your question, sir.
> [Question repeated.]
> A. I'm not a reporter that I should know, that I had to cover that conference. I'm not in the government to cover.
> ....
> Q. Wasn't it true, sir, you bragged to a member of British Customs Service that two hours later, you knew everything that was said in that conference?
> A. I think it's baseless. You are trying to put me on the spot.

Tr. Vol. V., p. 159-60 (brackets in original). Malik says that the references to the Wiesbaden conference, tending to show that Malik is a famous heroin smuggler, were prejudicial or otherwise improper.

The short answer to Malik's claim is that no one objected to the question about Wiesbaden (as repeated); and, given Malik's own instruction to his counsel, the trial court could reasonably conclude that counsel did not intend to object. In any event, the questions were proper (assuming that the government had good reason to believe that the facts the questions assumed were true, see, e.g., United States v. Silverstein, 737 F.2d 864, 868 (10th Cir.1984)). Malik's reaction to news of the conference--bragging about his knowledge--is inconsistent with the normal reaction of a person who had never been involved in heroin smuggling, as he had previously testified. It was therefore admissible to impeach him. See p. 22, supra. The information about the nature of the conference is needed to explain the question and to show why the bragging reaction is inconsistent with his previous testimony. Whether or not the "prejudice" involved outweighs "probative value" under Fed.R.Evid. 403 is, as we have said, a matter primarily for the trial court, not this court; and, given the nature of the defense (the "freedom fighter/no previous connection with heroin" claim), we cannot overturn the district court's judgment in this respect.

For these reasons the judgment of the district court is

United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.

Argued Oct. 3, 1994.

Decided March 8, 1995.
Rehearing and Suggestion for Rehearing En Banc Denied April 19, 1995.

Defendants were convicted of drug conspiracy offenses by the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Charles R. Norgle, Sr., J., and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Engel, Circuit Judge, sitting by designation, held that: (1) denial of defendants' request for disclosure of tapes regarding their participation in separate gambling conspiracy was not abuse of discretion; (2) conspirator was properly charged, for sentencing purposes, with entire volume of drugs involved in overall conspiracy, based on his frequent large purchases over long period of time; and (3) forfeiture of conspirator's house was not excessive fine.

Denial of narcotics defendants' request for disclosure of tapes relating to their participation in separate gambling conspiracy, to assist them in arguing that they were not involved in drug ring but only in separate gambling conspiracy, was not abuse of district court's discretion, where defendants did receive and offered into evidence several tapes made during drug investigation of conversations limited to gambling, disclosure of additional tapes would allegedly jeopardize ongoing gambling investigation, and other tapes would not undermine evidence regarding defendants' participation in narcotics activity and no reasonable probability existed that disclosure would have changed outcome of trial.

The five defendants in this case appeal the convictions and sentences arising out of a sizeable Chicago-based cocaine conspiracy spanning several years. Because we feel that the vast weight of the evidence supports the convictions and the sentences and that any possible error was harmless, we affirm.

Victor Plescia headed the conspiracy, which began during or before 1986. He sent couriers, including chief prosecution witness Nickalos Rizzato and defendant Anthony Grossi, and he went himself many times to Miami, where he had a cocaine supplier. Rizzato made at least ten trips over several years to pick up over 50 kilograms of cocaine, and as many trips carrying cash to pay the Miami supplier. In 1988, with an initial investment of $40,000, Frank Bonavolante began to finance cocaine purchases in return for a share of the resale profits. After Plescia or a courier brought the cocaine to Chicago, Camillio Grossi and his son, Anthony Grossi, or others distributed it in street-use quantities. When Bonavolante or Plescia wanted cocaine for their own use, Plescia got it from one of the Grossis. Plescia also set up deals between the Grossis and others, including Norman Demma, who regularly bought quantities of cocaine for redistribution, sometimes on credit.

Federal officials began to investigate the drug ring in 1989. With the aid of a confidential informant, the officers identified Plescia as the leader of the conspiracy. An undercover agent met with Plescia to arrange a drug purchase, and Plescia told the agent a considerable amount of detail about the operation. With the accumulating evidence against Plescia, federal agents applied for and received permission for Title III electronic surveillance of Plescia's mobile phone and pager. Surveillance agents recorded many conversations between the defendants in which Plescia coordinated the activity of the conspiracy. The wiretap in place, officers stopped a coconspirator named Kevin Geiger after he met with Plescia. The police then recorded the activity as Plescia called and paged the other four defendants, warning them that Geiger had been stopped with narcotics and telling them to lay low for a while. Plescia did not then reach Demma, despite calling his residence numerous times. In paging Bonavolante, Plescia used the code number 8, which Rizzato testified indicated drug-related activity.

Once the conspiracy resumed normal operations, the federal agents recorded a series of phone conversations in which Demma told Plescia he wanted to purchase more cocaine, Plescia called Anthony Grossi to check availability, then Plescia called back Demma at his residence and set up the drug transaction. The transaction, observed by federal agents, occurred in a parking lot where Plescia and Demma parked before entering a cafe. Afterward, federal agents pursued and caught Demma, who had thrown the cocaine out of his car during the chase. Then they let him go and monitored the burst of communications among the defendants. Demma immediately called Plescia to warn him that the agents followed them and may have bugged Plescia's phone or pager. Plescia again called Bonavolante and the Grossis to warn them of the attention from drug enforcement officers, and Plescia agreed to replace Demma's lost cocaine. When the U.S. had established the roles and identities of the people involved in the conspiracy and had sufficient evidence against them, all five were arrested, indicted, and tried.

The five defendants were tried in one proceeding with two juries, one for Plescia, Anthony Grossi, and Demma and one for Bonavolante and Camillio Grossi. Each defendant had separate counsel. The juries returned verdicts of guilty against all defendants, on most counts. All five were convicted of conspiring to traffic in narcotics and of various counts of using a telephone or pager to facilitate their drug business. All of the defendants now appeal, claiming that numerous reversible errors occurred.

We have considered all the arguments offered by the defendants, and we find sufficient merit for discussion in only a few. We will briefly mention and dismiss some other claims in Section IV of this opinion.

I. The Gambling Tapes

[1] Bonavolante and Camillio Grossi argue that the trial judge committed reversible 1457 error in denying them access to and use of certain evidence which they believe to be exculpatory. During and preceding the drug conspiracy, Bonavolante directed an illegal gambling conspiracy in which Camillio Grossi and Plescia were involved. Federal agents separately investigated the gambling conspiracy, again using Title III electronic surveillance, and recorded twelve conversations between Bonavolante and others not involved in the drug ring. One of the tapes mentioned Camillio Grossi's role in the gambling operation. Bonavolante and Grossi defended in the drug prosecution by claiming that their activities, while illegal and conspiratorial, were limited to gambling, not drugs. They wished to offer the twelve tapes of gambling conversations as evidence to counter the government's tapes in which the defendants allegedly held drug-related conversations; in both sets of conversations, the speakers primarily used general language such as "thing," "the stuff," "that guy," and "anything" as well as a euphemism about "groceries" and "a quarter of salami." However, the gambling investigation had not been completed at the time of this trial, and disclosure of the tapes would have jeopardized the separate investigation and prosecution. The trial judge ruled that the U.S. need not disclose the tapes to the defendants. The U.S. disclosed the tapes to the defendants on appeal, after disclosure posed no danger to the other investigation.

Bonavolante and Camillio Grossi claim that the tapes tended to exculpate them, and that therefore they had a right to them under Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963). They cite as support for their claim a Ninth Circuit case, United States v. Abascal, 564 F.2d 821 (9th Cir.1977). The government in that case argued that real estate language used in a taped conversation referred to LSD, and the defendant wanted to present other taped conversations using similar language which actually concerned real estate deals. The Abascal court held that suppression of the defense's tapes represented prejudicial error as to the charges of use of a telephone to further illegal activity. 564 F.2d at 830. That case is easily distinguishable, however, because the district court in Abascal had improperly suppressed the evidence as hearsay (564 F.2d at 830), whereas here, the court balanced the defendants' interests against the government's very real interest in keeping the tapes confidential. Thus, Bonavolante and Grossi must make a stronger case than did the defendant in Abascal to justify reversal of the ruling.

[2][3][4][5] We review the district court's ruling, made after an in camera review of the material, for an abuse of discretion. "When a criminal defendant seeks access to confidential informant files, we rely particularly heavily on the sound discretion of the trial judge to protect the rights of the accused as well as the government." United States v. Phillips, 854 F.2d 273, 277 (7th Cir.1988). To win a new trial, defendants must prove that there is a reasonable probability that disclosure of the evidence would have changed the outcome of the trial. United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, 682, 105 S.Ct. 3375, 3383, 87 L.Ed.2d 481 (1985). Such a reasonable probability exists if the evidence undermines confidence in the outcome. Phillips, 854 F.2d at 277.

The defendants characterize the suppressed tapes as groundbreaking, likely to have convinced the jury that Grossi and Bonavolante limited their criminal activity to gambling and that they were simply swept up with the others, admittedly their friends and associates, who were the real cocaine conspirators. Yet the defendants did receive, and did admit into evidence several tapes made during the drug investigation of conversations limited to gambling. Bonavolante and Grossi fail to explain how the suppressed tapes differed significantly from these, or how the suppressed tapes could have augmented the admitted tapes except by volume. Thus the defendants were able to present their gambling defense without the suppressed tapes. The government admitted that both had been involved in a gambling conspiracy, and it admitted freely that several of the tapes from the drug investigation exclusively concerned gambling. The defendants presented their gambling defense using these and the "substitution theory" described below, and the jury rejected it. Moreover, the suppressed tapes were too 1458 obscure and confusing to be effectual. Almost all of the so-called "code" words used in the suppressed tapes are generalities, and the taped conversations are vague and rambling in the extreme. Bonavolante and Grossi would have had to stage a miniature gambling trial simply to explain the suppressed tapes. We find it difficult to see how the tapes could have improved the defendants' case perceptibly, much less how they might have changed the outcome in the face of the government's evidence.

Further, even if the defendants had not had similar evidence to present, we do not believe that the gambling tapes are effectively exculpatory. Despite the defendants' characterizations, the drug tapes primarily involve not code words, which require a prior agreement to acquire their secret meaning, but non-specific words like "thing," "anything," "stuff," "friend," and "guy." These words were given meaning by the speakers' conspiracy, as the government demonstrated by their actions before and after the calls. As such, their meaning cannot be refuted by a demonstration that at another time, the words had been used to mean something else; that is the very nature of such generalities, that they mean different things at different times. If someone says "that thing" and points at something, then the act of pointing provides a context for the generic word, which then means the object pointed at--until someone points at something else.

When "code" words rather than generalities appeared on the government's tapes, the government did not claim to have broken the code; rather, it demonstrated by the defendants' observed actions before and immediately after the calls that the "code" words must have referred to drugs. The probative value of the government's tapes lay not in the actual words, but in the way the conversations interacted with drug activity observed by the agents. For example, the U.S. introduced a taped conversation in which Demma spoke with Plescia and asked for "a quarter." As defense counsel points out, "a quarter" could refer to gambling paraphernalia or orders. In this case, however, Plescia told Demma he would make some inquiries, hung up, immediately called Camillio Grossi and asked for "a quarter of salami." Grossi replied, "Groceries like last time." Later that afternoon, Grossi delivered 125 grams of cocaine to Plescia, who delivered it in turn to Demma. These actions strongly indicate that the three defendants had just set up a drug transaction, and that "a quarter of salami" meant a quantity of cocaine. Tapes on which Bonavolante and gambling conspirators used the word "groceries" in other contexts, even about Grossi, would not undermine a jury's conclusion that in the Demma-Plescia-Grossi conversations, the defendants were talking about drugs, particularly because the suppressed conversations were all held with other people, several months before the taped drug conversations. Sometimes the word "groceries" means food, even to a drug conspirator.

The other tapes do not offer another context for the drug conversations, but are distinguishable precisely because they are set in another context. Even if the tapes were exculpatory, they would not suffice to undermine our confidence in the verdict. The trial judge had discretion to admit or suppress the gambling tapes, and we hold that he did not abuse that discretion.

II. Sentencing

[6][7] All five defendants challenge their sentences. All except Camillio Grossi were sentenced according to U.S. Sentencing Guideline § 2D1.1, which holds a drug conspirator accountable in sentencing "for all drug transactions that he was aware of or that he should have reasonably foreseen." United States v. Edwards, 945 F.2d 1387, 1394 (7th Cir.1991). The defendants claim that the trial judge attributed excessive quantities of cocaine to the conspiracy and to each conspirator. This court will not reverse a sentence unless it is based on a clearly erroneous drug volume. United States v. Mojica, 984 F.2d 1426, 1443 (7th Cir.1993).

Rizzato, the chief prosecution witness and one of the drug couriers, provided most of the information regarding the quantity of cocaine handled by the drug ring. He testified that he made at least ten trips to Florida to pick up cocaine, and that while most trips he carried 5 kilograms, on one occasion he 1459 picked up 10 kilograms. He also testified that he was not the only courier, that Anthony Grossi made at least one trip to pick up cocaine, and that another courier made several trips. He also testified that Plescia often went to Florida to pay for or pick up cocaine. Accordingly, the trial court held that the conspiracy was responsible for more than 50, but less than 150, kilograms of cocaine.

[8] Plescia, as head of the drug ring, was held responsible for the drug volume of the entire conspiracy, and was sentenced in the 50 to 150 kilogram sentencing range. He argues on appeal that the record only supports a finding of 45 kilograms, but his rationale is flawed. He points out that Rizzato admitted to having lied in the past, concludes that Rizzato's word alone is untrustworthy, and concedes that motel slips and mileage records corroborate eight trips to pick up 5 kilograms of cocaine and one to pick up 10 kilograms for a total of 45 kilograms. However, it is not for us to judge the credibility of witnesses. The defendants did their best to impeach Rizzato, including gaining his admission of previous lies, but the jury still found Rizzato credible, as did the trial court. The jury and the trial judge are best qualified to judge the credibility of witnesses appearing before them. Rizzato testified to having brought at least 55 kilograms from Florida to Chicago, and other couriers transported indefinite quantities beyond that amount. We affirm Plescia's sentence.

[9] Bonavolante argues that since he did not join the conspiracy until 1988, he should not be held accountable for the entire volume handled by the conspiracy. We have earlier held that "The judge may sentence a late entrant on the basis of all the drugs distributed only if the earlier distributions occurred as part of the conspiracy to which the defendant agreed." Edwards, 945 F.2d at 1397. That seems to be the case here. In any event, we need not reexamine the question whether a conspirator may be held accountable for drug distributions before the conspirator joined the ring, for there is evidence of more than ten trips by different couriers to Florida to purchase cocaine after Bonavolante joined the conspiracy. Since Rizzato testified that he never picked up less than 5 kilograms of cocaine per trip, it is reasonable to infer that different conspirators picked up over 50 kilograms of cocaine after Bonavolante joined the conspiracy. Given Bonavolante's status as financier with whom Plescia split the profits, the quantity was reasonably foreseeable to him.

[10] The trial court found that more than 20 kilograms of cocaine were reasonably foreseeable to Anthony Grossi. Since Rizzato, the Title III tapes, and the DEA agents' observation of Anthony's activities all indicate that he was an active participant in both the transportation and the distribution of cocaine and that he and Camillio Grossi worked together in holding and distributing the drugs, we find the trial court's conclusion amply supported by the record.

Unlike his codefendants, Camillio Grossi incurred his sentence under 21 U.S.C. § 841(b)(1)(A), because he had a prior conviction for a felony drug offense. That statute imposes a minimum sentence of 240 months if any previously convicted felon commits another offense involving more than 5 kilograms of cocaine. Since this mandatory minimum sentence exceeds the Guidelines range (188-235 months) for conviction for a felony drug offense involving more than 50 kilograms, the evidence need indicate only that over five kilograms of cocaine were reasonably foreseeable to Camillio Grossi. The evidence demonstrates Grossi's active role as a regular distributor of cocaine and easily supports his sentence.

For the reasons given, we affirm the sentences of these four defendants. We consider Demma's sentence below.

III. Demma's Conspiracy Conviction and Sentence

[11][12] Norman Demma argues on appeal, as he did at trial, that he was never a member of the conspiracy but merely in a buyer-seller relationship with Plescia. Demma correctly states that a buyer-seller transaction alone cannot support a conviction for conspiracy to distribute narcotics. United States v. Townsend, 924 F.2d 1385, 1394 (7th Cir.1991). Demma argues that his transactions 1460 with Plescia were isolated, and that neither had an interest in the other's drug activities beyond each purchase. However, the evidence against Demma indicates a significantly greater relationship between Demma and Plescia than Demma argues now.

[13][14][15] Our circuit has held numerous times that "Evidence of frequent and repeated transactions, especially when credit arrangements are made, can support a conspiracy conviction. United States v. Dortch, 5 F.3d 1056 (7th Cir.1993), cert. denied, ---- U.S. ----, 114 S.Ct. 1077, 127 L.Ed.2d 394 (1994); United States v. Fort, 998 F.2d 542, 546 (7th Cir.1993); United States v. Edwards, 945 F.2d 1387, 1398, cert. denied, 503 U.S. 973, 112 S.Ct. 1590, 118 L.Ed.2d 308 (1992); [United States v. Sergio, 934 F.2d 875, 869 (7th Cir.1991)]." United States v. Fagan, 35 F.3d 1203, 1206 (7th Cir.1994). A purchaser of drugs for redistribution need not be accountable as an employee to the seller for a jury to find that the purchaser had joined in and furthered a conspiracy to distribute narcotics.

> It was up to the jury to determine whether [the defendant] had an ongoing relationship with other members of the conspiracy which would support the conclusion that he joined the agreement to distribute cocaine to the Windtramps. The jury was given a buyer-seller instruction; its verdict demonstrates that it rejected that interpretation of the facts. We cannot agree that the jury's conclusion was irrational or unsupported by > probative evidence. Indeed, the evidence of an ongoing relationship in this case is even stronger than the evidence held to be sufficient in Fort. In Fort, there was only one completed transaction and a promise of future deals. [998 F.2d] at 543. Here, [the defendant] completed three transactions, and trial testimony established that a fourth would have occurred if the Windtramps had been able to locate him. This evidence suggests prolonged cooperation, indicating trust and "implying something more than a series of spot dealings at arm's length between dealers who have no interest in the success of each other's enterprise."

Dortch, 5 F.3d at 1066, quoting United States v. Lechuga, 994 F.2d 346, 349 (7th Cir.1993) (en banc). The Townsend court adds, "Evidence that the parties must negotiate the terms of every transaction, seek to maximize their gains at the expense of others, or engage in other forms of opportunistic behavior at the expense of the group, suggests that the transaction costs among the group are high and counsel against a finding of conspiracy between the members." Townsend, 924 F.2d at 1395.

In this case, Demma had bought cocaine from Plescia for years, ending only when the government broke up the drug ring. Demma bought in distribution quantities, not merely for personal use, and he arranged another purchase every three weeks to a month. On two occasions during the investigation, Plescia gave Demma cocaine on credit. Moreover, agents found Demma's home telephone number on a sheet of paper in Plescia's bedroom when they searched it. When Geiger, who was involved in the drug ring but apparently had no other connection with Demma, was stopped by DEA agents, Plescia called Demma's home six times in an attempt to warn him. Plescia also called Demma later at his home to set up a drug deal involving cocaine with a street value of $50,000. Nor was the relationship one-sided; after being chased and stopped by DEA agents, Demma called Plescia to warn him that DEA agents might be following him or might have wiretapped Plescia's phone or pager. Demma's long-term relationship with Plescia and his drug ring contradicts the claim that Demma was merely a casual buyer. Rather, the evidence supports the jury's conclusion that Demma was a conspirator with an interest in the success of the ring, who acted in furtherance of its illegal goals.

Moreover, this court established in Townsend that "limited participation can be probative of limited agreement" (924 F.2d at 1402) which nonetheless constitutes conspiracy, even if it is a more limited conspiracy than that charged by the government. Plainly, Demma's interaction with Plescia individually rises to the level of an ongoing agreement sufficient to constitute a conspiracy to distribute the drugs actually sold to and distributed by Demma. Townsend held that even if 1461 the evidence supported conviction for a different conspiracy than the one with which the defendant was charged and indicted, this court will affirm the conviction. 924 F.2d at 1402. Whether the Demma-Plescia agreement was a separate conspiracy or a part of the larger conspiracy run by Plescia is relevant to Demma's sentence, but the evidence fully justifies his conviction for conspiracy.

[16] Demma's sentencing challenge, however, merits a closer examination. The judge sentenced Demma, like Plescia and Bonavolante, according to the entire volume of cocaine, more than 50 kilograms. Demma argues on appeal that he should not be held responsible for the entire volume of cocaine turned over by the larger conspiracy run by Plescia. Demma was involved in the conspiracy from its early days, making monthly or more frequent transactions over a period of years. He knew Plescia well, and since Plescia was willing to describe the scope of the drug ring to an undercover agent trying to buy cocaine, it is more likely than not that Demma knew the approximate volume of drugs Plescia bought and sold. Demma also knew Rizzato, the courier, and Camillio Grossi. However, Demma distributed relatively small quantities, and the government does not claim that he handled 50 kilograms himself.

[17][18][19] The scope of conspirators' liability is determined by the scope of the agreement they actually entered, not necessarily by the total volume of a larger conspiracy. "Townsend requires a trial court to scrutinize the agreement that an individual defendant entered into to determine whether he actually agreed to become involved in a conspiracy to distribute a given quantity of drugs.... Townsend makes clear that conspiracy law contains an important limiting principle--namely, that conspiracy liability cannot exceed the scope of a defendant's agreement to further criminal activity." Edwards, 945 F.2d at 1396. While Demma clearly conspired to distribute illegal narcotics, his relative independence suggests that he may have conspired with Plescia to distribute some lesser amount than that distributed by the larger drug ring.

Our past decisions offer some guidance. In Townsend, an independent marijuana purchaser-dealer was held to be a conspirator in the overall marijuana conspiracy, but not the related cocaine and heroin conspiracies involving many of the same coconspirators. 924 F.2d at 1402. We see a closer parallel to Demma in United States v. Auerbach, 913 F.2d 407 (7th Cir.1990). The defendant in Auerbach claimed, like Demma, that as one of several purchasers from a drug ring, he did not take part in the larger conspiracy. This court disagreed.

> The evidence established that Helish dealt continuously with [his supplier] throughout the spring and summer of 1985. His purchases were not discrete transactions requiring limited contact with the conspiracy; rather, they required an ongoing relationship that soured only when Helish failed to move the marijuana fast enough.... "[I]f each [defendant retailer] knew, or had reason to know, that other retailers were involved ... in a broad project for the smuggling, distribution and retail sale of narcotics, and had reason to believe that their own benefits derived from the operation were probably dependent upon the success of the entire venture, the jury could find that each had, in effect, agreed to participate in the overall scheme." United States v. Grier, 866 F.2d 908, 924 (7th Cir.1989).... "While the parties to the agreement must know that others are participating in the conspiracy, they neither have to personally know the individuals involved nor do they have to participate in every facet of the conspiracy scheme."

Auerbach, 913 F.2d at 415, quoting United States v. Adamo, 882 F.2d 1218, 1224 (7th Cir.1989). In Edwards, 945 F.2d at 1400, this court affirmed the conspiracy conviction of "an insubstantial supplier who made a late entrance into the conspiracy," reversing his sentence only in consideration of the short period of his participation.

[20] Here, Demma's frequent large purchases over a long time made his venture dependent to a considerable extent upon the success of Plescia's operation. As the Auerbach court noted, " 'Separate conspiracies exist when each of the conspirators' agreements 1462 has its own end, and each constitutes an end in itself.' ... Here, there was no divergence between [the defendant]'s aims and those of the conspiracy; both sought to get the same [narcotics] into the hands of users on the street." 913 F.2d at 416. We affirm Demma's sentence, determined with reference to the volume of drugs involved in the overall Plescia conspiracy.

[21][22] Finally, Demma challenges the forfeiture of his house, calling it inappropriate under forfeiture law and an excessive fine in violation of the Excessive Fines Clause of the Constitution. We find without extended discussion that the forfeiture was proper. Forfeiture of real estate is appropriate where the property is used in any way to facilitate any drug-related offense, unless the connection between the offense and the property is "incidental and fortuitous." United States v. 916 Douglas Ave., 903 F.2d 490, 493 (7th Cir.1990). The government claimed the house primarily on the basis of one phone call made by Plescia to Demma at his house in which the two set up a large cocaine transaction. There is no doubt that Demma used the privacy of his home to conduct drug-related business over the telephone, and he apparently gave his home number to Plescia so that he and others could contact Demma. The connection in this case is not incidental and fortuitous, but a fitting situation for forfeiture.

[23] Because Demma did not make his Excessive Fines argument until this appeal, we review only for plain error. United States v. Olano, ---U.S. ----, ----, 113 S.Ct. 1770, 1777, 123 L.Ed.2d 508 (1993). No such error appears in this case. Although the Supreme Court has not articulated a clear standard by which to judge claims of excessive fines, Justice Scalia in a concurrence wrote, "the question is not how much the confiscated property is worth, but whether the confiscated property has a close relationship to the offense." Austin v. United States, --- U.S. ----, ----, 113 S.Ct. 2801, 2815, 125 L.Ed.2d 488 (1993) (Scalia, J., concurring). See also Alexander v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 2766, 125 L.Ed.2d 441 (1993). We have already found such a connection, and even if we consider how much the property was worth, Demma's claim fails. While Demma attacks the forfeiture of the house for one lone phone call, the government replies that Demma's equity in his one-half interest in the house was worth around $30,000, while the drug deal arranged in the phone call concerned $50,000 worth of cocaine. Nor is there any reason to believe that this was most likely the only drug deal made from Demma's home. The government's power of forfeiture over the property used in illegal drug transactions is one of its harsher powers, but the fine levied on Norman Demma in this case is far from an extreme example of its use.

IV. Other Contentions

The remainder of the defendants' arguments merit little discussion, so we briefly mention only a few. Several of the issues which defendants raise now were not properly preserved for appeal. An important example involves the defendants' expert witness on tapes and tape recordings. Plescia claims now that the expert testimony was crucial to Plescia's argument that the Title III surveillance tapes recorded by the government had been tampered with and should not be trusted. However, the pre-trial hearing on this issue revealed that the witness did not then intend to testify that he believed the tapes had been changed. His testimony regarding the technical aspects of the tapes was specialized and confusing, and the inferences Plescia wished to draw were speculative. Nonetheless, the district court did not then exclude the testimony. Instead, he invited the defendants to bring the witness to the stand during trial, so the judge could hear the questions and the government's objections before ruling on admissibility. The defendants never called their expert to the stand, and thus they waived their claim that his testimony should have been permitted. United States v. Addo, 989 F.2d 238, 242 (7th Cir.1993).

Similarly, Demma claims now that the court improperly refused to re-open the proofs at the end of the trial to allow him to testify. However, just after his lawyer made the motion, in the judge's chambers with only his own counsel and the judge, Demma refused 1463 to testify. Several times during the trial, Demma had been informed of his right to testify, he had discussed the issue with his lawyer at some length, and he always refused, thereby waiving the right.

[24][25] Only Anthony Grossi preserved the argument for suppression of the Title III tapes. He argues that the district court should have suppressed the tapes because the government failed to seal them in a timely manner upon expiration of the permitted surveillance period as required by 18 U.S.C. § 2518(8)(a). That section provides:

> Immediately upon the expiration of the period of the order [authorizing the surveillance], or extensions thereof, ... recordings [made of the electronic surveillance] shall be made available to the judge issuing such order and sealed under his directions.

To determine whether the tapes should have been suppressed, "we must consider whether the Government established good cause for the sealing delays that occurred in this case." United States v. Ojeda Rios, 495 U.S. 257, 265, 110 S.Ct. 1845, 1850, 109 L.Ed.2d 224 (1990). The government notes first that because a second surveillance period followed the first, it was treated as an extension of the first, preventing any need for sealing between the periods. United States v. Carson, 969 F.2d 1480, 1488 (3d Cir.1992). Second, the government reasonably explains the delay between the periods as necessary to draft the Title III surveillance request affidavit and to get the request processed by the federal bureaucracy. Third, the government points out that it did seal the tapes two weeks after the end of the first period in a good-faith effort to comply with the statute in the face of an innocent delay in processing the request for a second surveillance period. We believe that the government has provided good cause for the delay and has fulfilled the demands of the sealing statute.

[26][27] Other of the defendants' contentions are simply unsuccessful. Defendants argue that the Title III electronic surveillance was improper under 18 U.S.C. § 2518(1)(c) because investigators had enough evidence without it and/or could have obtained sufficient evidence through ordinary investigative techniques. However, "[o]ur Circuit recognizes that 'the government's burden of establishing its compliance with [subsection 2518(1)(c)] is not great,' and that the requirement that the government exhaust 'normal investigative procedures' be reviewed in a 'practical and common-sense fashion.' " United States v. Zambrana, 841 F.2d 1320, 1329 (7th Cir.1988) (citations omitted). From a practical perspective, the defendants' claim fails. Even if it were true that the government could have prosecuted Plescia without the tapes, the wiretaps both allowed the government to ascertain the extent and structure of the conspiracy and provided enough evidence to convict these five, the key players in the drug ring.

It would have been far more difficult or impossible to determine the extent of their involvement, such as Bonavolante's role as financier, by merely observing transactions from a distance.

Plescia argues that tapes of his conversations with an informant, who did not testify at trial, should have been suppressed as hearsay. The informant's statements, however, were not offered for their truth, but only to give context to Plescia's own self-incriminating words. See United States v. Davis, 890 F.2d 1373, 1380 (7th Cir.1989).

[28] The chief witness for the prosecution was the courier Rizzato, a Chicago police officer on disability who had been involved in the conspiracy from the beginning, with a brief hiatus from 1988 to 1989. The defendants claim that they were improperly limited in their attempts to impeach him several ways. First, they cross-examined him regarding several lies he had told while under oath in the past, lies with considerable detail and specificity. He admitted that he had in the past lied while under oath, and he admitted that his lies had been creative and detailed. However, the trial court refused to allow cross-examination into the details of the lies because their prejudicial effect would outweigh any probative value. Fed.R.Evid. 403. In fact, Rizzato had lied several times in telling people that he had killed African-American gang members in retaliation for the murder of his brother, also a Chicago police officer, by African-American gang 1464 members. Rizzato had also lied while under oath at a hearing in the Chicago Police Department regarding his positive drug test for cocaine. Rizzato had claimed that a woman he had met when feeling lonely and depressed had slipped him the drug, which he had thought was something else.

[29] "[T]rial judges retain wide latitude ... to impose reasonable limits on such cross-examination based on concerns about, among other things, harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, the witness' safety, or interrogation that is repetitive or only marginally relevant." Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 679, 106 S.Ct. 1431, 1435, 89 L.Ed.2d 674 (1986). Given that Rizzato freely admitted on the stand that he had lied in detailed ways while under oath, and given the prejudicial effect a claim of the murder of African-American gang members would have, we feel that further cross-examination into the details was unnecessary, probably prejudicial, and properly precluded. Rizzato willingly admitted his criminal activity while a police officer, his drug use, and the lies he told to conceal his illegal acts, and the jury found his frequently corroborated testimony credible regardless.

[30] The trial judge also prevented the defendants from cross-examining Rizzato regarding certain anti-depressive and anti-anxiety medication, including Prozac, which he was taking at the time of trial and when the events he described had occurred. The defendants argue that these drugs could have affected Rizzato's perception and memory, but they did not offer any expert testimony regarding the effects of the medications either generally or on Rizzato. The trial judge correctly ruled that line of cross-examination more prejudicial and confusing than useful for impeachment, particularly because Prozac had often been mentioned negatively in popular media at that time.

[31] Camillio Grossi and Bonavolante further attack the trial judge's decision not to allow their follow-up questions regarding Rizzato's brother-in-law, Carlo Plescia, in support of his defense theory that Rizzato had replaced Carlo Plescia, the real financier of the drug ring, with Grossi and Bonavolante, leader of a gambling ring, in an attempt to protect his sister's husband. Since Rizzato had testified that he did not remember the statement about which Bonavolante wanted to question him, follow-up questions were improper. Bonavolante and Grossi were not prejudiced, because Rizzato fully described his relationship with Carlo Plescia and implicated him in the drug conspiracy and because the defendants were able to present their substitution theory elsewhere.

[32] Camillio Grossi and Bonavolante also wished to call a witness to testify that Rizzato told him he intended to substitute them for Carlo Plescia. However, the witness, who was also involved in the conspiracy, stated that he would plead the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination on cross-examination. The government demonstrated in a hearing that the witness would effectively preclude its impeachment of him for considerable bias and previous inconsistent statements by claiming the Fifth. The district court may refuse to permit a witness to testify when that witness' right against self-incrimination precludes effective cross-examination. United States v. Herrera-Medina, 853 F.2d 564, 567-68 (7th Cir.1988). The trial judge therefore properly refused to allow the witness to testify. Further, the defendants were not greatly disadvantaged. The witness could only have tried further to impeach Rizzato, but he could not have proven the substitution theory, because Rizzato's statements to the witness would represent impermissible hearsay if offered for their truth.

[33][34][35] Plescia argues that the judge should have declared a mistrial because a DEA officer, mistaking him for another officer, asked him a question about the cocaine present as an exhibit. Plescia did not respond in any way. The judge questioned the jurors and determined that there is no indication that any juror overheard the very brief interaction. The judge properly instructed the jury immediately thereafter to consider only the evidence formally presented in the trial. A defendant is entitled to a new trial only if there is a "reasonable possibility" that the jury's verdict has been affected by material not properly admitted into 1465 evidence. United States v. Davis, 15 F.3d 1393, 1413 (7th Cir.1994). We review the district court's ruling for an abuse of discretion, "and, as an appellate court sitting one step removed from the trial, we shall reverse the district court's decision only if we have a very strong conviction of error." United States v. Sanders, 962 F.2d 660, 669 (7th Cir.1992) (citations omitted). We find that the district court committed no error, because there is no reasonable possibility that the jury was affected by the exchange.

This was a long and complex trial. In such a trial it is almost inevitable that some error or at least questionable ruling may occur during the course of it. It is equally true, however, that the adverse impact upon a jury of such rulings, where otherwise isolated, is diminished in proportion to the length of the trial so that "while every additional day of trial increases the possibility of error, it correspondingly reduces the risk that any single error may have prejudicial effect upon the result." Cf. In re Beverly Hills Fire Litigation, 695 F.2d 207, 227 (6th Cir.1982). That observation is particularly true here. As a whole, the trial was conducted in an orderly fashion and with conscientious regard for the defendants' rights. Nothing we have seen in the record here undermines our belief that the defendants received a fair trial, were properly found guilty and were sentenced appropriately. Accordingly, we AFFIRM.

David J. TOWNSEND, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 93-2463.

United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.

Aug. 25, 1994.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, Melinda Harmon, J., of evading excise taxes on gasoline. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Reynaldo G. Garza, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence was sufficient to support finding that defendant took affirmative acts of tax evasion; (2) evidence was sufficient to support finding that defendant acted willfully in evading payment of excise taxes; and (3) district court did not abuse its discretion by restricting cross-examination, for purpose of impeaching credibility, of employee of defendant's company concerning employee's conduct in allegedly falsifying company's corporate records.

Affirmed.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas.

Before REYNALDO G. GARZA, SMITH and PARKER, Circuit Judges.

REYNALDO G. GARZA, Circuit Judge:

Defendant was convicted under I.R.C. § 7201 for evasion of excise tax. The district court found a tax deficiency, affirmative acts constituting tax evasion, and that defendant acted willfully. For the reasons discussed below we affirm.

I. Introduction

This case involves the use of a fraudulent Form 637 in an attempt to circumvent federally imposed excise tax. In 1987 federal law imposed an excise tax of nine cents on each gallon of gasoline sold for highway use. A 265 wholesale distributor of gasoline holding a valid "Registration for Tax-Free Transactions," or Form 637, could purchase gasoline free of the excise tax. A Form 637 enables a distributor to purchase gas tax-free and sell it tax-free to a registered wholesaler or retailer. The distributor becomes liable for the excise tax if it sells to an unregistered buyer. In this case Appellant fraudulently presented a Form 637 to several distributors, purchased the gas, and then promptly sold the gas to an unregistered buyer.

II. Background

David Townsend, the inventor of a gasoline oxygenating product, moved his California-based fuel blending business (Anafuel) to Houston, Texas in 1986. Townsend, with Lloyd Maxwell, Lamar Maxwell, David Maxwell, Don Maxwell, and Arthur Maxwell formed Petrolife, Inc. (Petrolife), a gasohol blending company. Appellant Townsend was named chief executive officer, Lloyd Maxwell was named the secretary-treasurer and chief financial officer, and Lamar Maxwell was named president.

In November of 1986 Petrolife decided to apply for a Form 637. Signed by Lloyd Maxwell as chief financial officer and dated November 20, 1986, the form was submitted to the IRS. IRS Agent Mike Grayson met with Lloyd Maxwell and Charles Crockett, a Petrolife employee, to discuss the application. Agent Grayson explained the requirements of the Form 637 and told them that it could take several months to obtain approval. Petrolife decided that they were not prepared to disclose all the necessary financial information required for approval at that time. Consequently, the application was deferred. Mr. Crockett was to retain Petrolife's copies of the application until the corporation was ready to reapply. Petrolife never reapplied for the Form 637.

Subsequently, Appellant asked Mr. Crockett for the application. Mr. Crockett handed the application to him under the assumption that he was seeking to reapply for approval. Later that day Townsend showed Mr. Crockett the Form 637 and said that he had obtained a registration number and the signature of the IRS district director. [FN1]

> FN1. Mr. Crockett testified that he was surprised that Townsend was able to procure approval of the Form 637 so quickly and seemingly without leaving the building. It was his understanding that it could take several months to obtain approval.

In July of 1987 Townsend contacted Jetero, a gasoline distributor, and expressed interest in making a purchase. Jetero met with Townsend and discussed forms Jetero required before fuel could be supplied. Townsend provided the necessary forms, including the fraudulent Form 637. These forms listed Petrolife as a manufacturer selling gasohol and listed Petrolife/Anafuel as the purchaser. Upon receipt of the required forms Jetero commenced supplying the fuel tax-free. The Jetero invoices were addressed to "Petrolife, Attn: David J. Townsend."

A total of 264,030 gallons of gasoline were purchased from Jetero in August of 1987.

Townsend also contacted Crown, another gasoline distributor, expressing his desire to purchase gasoline. After he provided the requested documentation, including the fraudulent Form 637, Crown began supplying gasoline. The checks used to pay for the gas listed Petrolife/Anafuel as purchaser. A total of 161,679 gallons of gasoline were purchased from Crown in August of 1987.

The gasoline supplied by Jetero and Crown was shipped to Mr. Chehade Boulos, a service station operator. The funds used by Townsend were drawn from an account opened in the name of Anafuel at the Lone Star Bank. Mr. Boulos would make deposits to this account in exchange for the gasoline shipments. The bank would then issue cashier checks, which were used to pay Crown and Jetero. Basically, Townsend used the funds prepaid by Mr. Boulos to make the payments to Crown and Jetero.

No taxes were paid by Townsend or Petrolife on the gasoline sold to Mr. Boulos. [FN2] By using the fraudulent Form 637 and purchasing gas through an Anafuel account, Townsend acted without the knowledge or 266 consent of the other officers of Petrolife. When Mr. Crockett became aware of Appellant's transactions he informed Mr. Lloyd Maxwell of his intention to inform the IRS. Mr. Maxwell approved.

FN2. Mr. Boulos testified that he thought the taxes were included in the purchase price of the gasoline.

IRS Agent Grayson became aware of the fraudulent Form 637 during a routine inspection of Jetero's records. Agent Grayson immediately knew the form was invalid. First, he knew that Petrolife's Form 637 had never been approved. Second, the registration number did not correspond to the numbers issued by the Houston office. Third, the signatures on the form were not signed properly. Agent Grayson spoke with Mr. Gonzales, the owner of Jetero, concerning the problem. Mr. Gonzales told Appellant that the registration number was invalid. Townsend responded rather angrily that the number was correct. Later he told Mr. Gonzales that he had a new temporary number. Notwithstanding the temporary number, Mr. Gonzales refused to sell any more gasoline to Townsend on advice of the IRS.

IRS Agent Vitz took over the investigation. Agent Vitz observed the same inconsistencies in the Petrolife Form 637 and therefore contacted Townsend. On September 5, 1987 Agent Vitz requested more information regarding the application. Townsend promised that the information would be forthcoming. After receiving no new information, Agent Vitz paid a visit to his office. Townsend again stated that the registration number was a temporary number issued by the Houston office. But no temporary numbers had issued in 1987.

Agent Taylor met with Townsend and showed him the fraudulent Form 637 and asked if he had ever seen this form. Townsend replied that Mr. Crockett had presented this form to him but that he, Townsend, had never given it to anyone.

On May 20, 1992 a grand jury indicted Townsend for attempting to evade federal excise taxes in violation of I.R.C. § 7201. Townsend was convicted by a jury before Honorable Melinda Harmon in March of 1993. He was sentenced to 14 months in prison and three years supervised release; he was fined $10,000 and specially assessed $50.

Townsend appeals the district court's rulings on four bases. The first basis asserted is whether there was sufficient evidence to support a conviction. Second is whether the district court abused its discretion in limiting Appellant's cross-examination of certain witnesses. The third basis is whether the district court abused its discretion in allowing opinion testimony concerning Appellant's liability on federal excise tax. The fourth basis Appellant urges is whether the district court erred in failing to include a proposed jury instruction in the charge. For reasons discussed below, we affirm the decision of the district court.

III. Discussion

1. Sufficiency of the Evidence to Support the Conviction

[1][2] The standard of review for sufficiency of evidence appeals is whether a rational fact finder could find the essential elements constituting the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. United States v. Nixon, 816 F.2d 1022, 1029 (5th Cir.1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1026, 108 S.Ct. 749, 98 L.Ed.2d 762 (1988). In viewing the evidence under the rational fact finder standard, this Court is obliged to take all inferences reasonably drawn from the evidence in the light most favorable to the verdict. United States v. Molinar-Apodaca, 889 F.2d 1417, 1423 (5th Cir.1989).

[3][4] To prove a violation of I.R.C. § 7201 the government must prove (1) the existence of a tax deficiency, (2) an affirmative act constituting an evasion or attempted evasion of the tax, and (3) that the defendant acted willfully. Sansone v. United States, 380 U.S. 343, 351, 85 S.Ct. 1004, 1010, 13 L.Ed.2d 882 (1965); United States v. Wisenbaker, 14 F.3d 1022, 1024 (5th Cir.1994). The first issue that must be addressed is whether there was a tax deficiency. Wisenbaker, 14 F.3d at 1024. Excise taxes for the quarter ending September 30, 1987 were due and owing in the amount of $38,313.81 [FN3] on 267 the gasoline bought from Crown and Jetero and resold to Mr. Boulos. The existence of a tax deficiency was not contested by Appellant. However, Appellant did take issue as to who owed the tax. He claims that Petrolife owed the tax and he therefore could not be convicted of evading tax of another. This is clearly wrong. I.R.C. § 7201 provides that it is a violation for "any person" to willfully attempt to evade or defeat "any tax." I.R.C. § 7201 is not limited to prosecutions of those who evade taxes that they may owe themselves, but rather it encompasses prosecutions of any person who attempts to evade the tax of anyone. See id. at 1024-25. It is the act of evasion that is proscribed; adopting the limited reading Appellant asserts would severely restrict if not defeat the purpose of the statute.

FN3. A total of 425,709 gallons of gasoline was bought and resold: 264,030 gallons from Jetero and 161,679 gallons from Crown. The deficiency arose automatically when the tax became due at the end of the quarter and no excise tax return was filed.

[5] The second issue that must be determined is whether Appellant committed an affirmative act of tax evasion. Id. at 1024. Townsend contends that the government failed to prove this element. Taken in the light most favorable to the verdict, the evidence reveals that Townsend committed numerous affirmative acts. Townsend prepared a fraudulent Form 637 that contained two forged signatures and a fabricated registration number. He presented the fraudulent Form 637 to Crown and Jetero in furtherance of his tax-free transaction. He also arranged for the purchase and subsequent sale of gasoline to Mr. Boulos, an unregistered retailer. Townsend signed a customer card agreement enabling him to purchase tax-free gasoline from Crown and signed a federal excise tax exemption certificate required by Jetero, certifying that he was registered to purchase tax-free gasoline. He arranged for the purchase to be made with cashiers checks that were paid from funds deposited by Mr. Boulos into an account opened in the name of Anafuel over which Townsend's son had signature authority. Subsequent to the purchase and sale, Townsend told Agent Taylor that he had never presented the Form 637 to anyone when in fact he had. Finally, he told Agent Vitz that he had obtained a temporary registration number, which turned out to be fabricated. Taking this evidence as true establishes beyond a reasonable doubt that Townsend took affirmative acts of tax evasion.

[6] The final issue in which this Court must inquire is whether Appellant acted willfully. Id. at 1024. The U.S. Supreme Court has recognized that the term "willfully" connotes a voluntary, intentional violation of a known legal duty. United States v. Pomponio, 429 U.S. 10, 12, 97 S.Ct. 22, 23, 50 L.Ed.2d 12 (1976). I.R.C. § 7201 imposes that duty and the evidence taken in the light most favorable to the verdict establishes that Appellant acted willfully in violation of this duty. Townsend was experienced in the motor fuels industry and demonstrated familiarity with legal duties imposed by the federal tax scheme. He was no proverbial babe in the woods. He obtained and fraudulently completed a Form 637 and presented it to distributors. Townsend manifested knowledge that his actions were unlawful by attempting to hide them from both Jetero and the IRS agents. Finally he attempted to conceal the gasoline transactions by conducting them through a non-Petrolife bank account. Therefore, the evidence established a tax deficiency, revealed affirmative acts constituting an attempt to evade the excise tax, and demonstrated that Townsend acted willfully.

2. Cross-Examination of Government Witnesses

[7][8][9][10][11] Appellant argues that the district court erred in restricting his cross-examination of various government witnesses regarding (a) falsification of corporate records, (b) bad business practices, and (c) testimony that Townsend was personally liable for excise tax. The applicable Federal Rules of Evidence are 403, 404(b), and 608(b). [FN4] "The admission or exclusion of evidence at trial is a matter committed to the discretion of the trial court." United States v. Moody, 903 268 F.2d 321, 326 (5th Cir.1990). We review the trial court's ruling under the abuse of discretion standard. Id. If we find that an abuse of discretion has occurred we view the error under the harmless error doctrine. Id. The right and opportunity to cross-examine an adverse witness is guaranteed by the sixth amendment. Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 678-79, 106 S.Ct. 1431, 1435, 89 L.Ed.2d 674; Moody, 903 F.2d at 329. However, the trial court is given "wide latitude" in imposing reasonable restraints upon defendant's right to cross-examination. Moody, 903 F.2d at 329. [FN5]

FN4. Appellant asserts due process violations yet cites only evidentiary authority. Accordingly, we will address each issue under the Federal Rules of Evidence.

FN5. The trial court may not place the witness's character or reputation for veracity outside the scope of inquiry. Moody, 903 F.2d at 329; See generally United States v. Garza, 754 F.2d 1202, 1206 (5th Cir.1985).

A. Falsification of Corporate Records

[12] Townsend contends that the district court abused its discretion in overly restricting the cross-examination of Mr. Crockett and Mr. Maxwell concerning their conduct in allegedly falsifying Petrolife's corporate records. Townsend claims that Mr. Crockett's deposition indicated that the records were falsified in anticipation of bankruptcy and the IRS investigation. Appellant sought to introduce this evidence in hopes of impeaching their testimony. Rule 608(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence provides that a witness may be questioned about specific instances of conduct, in the discretion of the trial court, to attack the witness's reputation for truthfulness. Rule 403 requires the trial court to balance the dangers of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading the jury, or waste of time against the probative value of the evidence.

[13] The district court found that Mr. Crockett's deposition did not support Appellant's assertion that the corporate minutes were falsified. The district court disputed Appellant's contention of falsification finding a lack of evidence to support this line of questioning. [FN6] Furthermore, the district court held that admitting the evidence would only serve to mislead and confuse the jury, and prolong the trial. This Court will reverse a decision of the trial court in excluding or admitting evidence only upon a showing that the trial court abused its discretion in weighing the probative value of the evidence against its prejudicial effect. United States v. York, 888 F.2d 1050, 1056 (5th Cir.1989). Because Appellant cannot show an abuse of discretion we affirm the district court's decision to exclude this evidence.

FN6. The district court found that the corporate minutes had not been kept up to date and it was unclear from the deposition what, if any, part of the minutes were not true. Based on Mr. Crockett's explanation of the deposition, the court found insufficient evidence of fraud.

[14] Appellant also contends that the evidence of falsification demonstrates Mr. Crockett's and Mr. Maxwell's propensity, motive, and opportunity to falsify the Form 637. The motives for falsification, Townsend asserts, were for personal and corporate gain and self-vindication. He claims that these motives were the same as those that allegedly led Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Crockett to apply for the Form 637 and to testify against Townsend. Further, Townsend contends that the scheme to falsify the corporate records was "sufficiently similar if not identical to the offense of falsifying a Form 637."

Rule 404(b) provides that a defendant may offer through extrinsic evidence or by cross-examination similar bad acts, crimes, or wrongs to show motive, opportunity, intent, and the like. [FN7] However, under Rule 404(b), evidence of crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible if offered to prove the character of a witness in order to show that the witness acted in conformity therewith on a particular occasion. As discussed above, the district court did not find a scheme or plan to falsify the corporate records, thereby refuting the reasons Appellant proffered for introducing the evidence. Furthermore, Appellant's brief indicates that the evidence was introduced for purposes of showing conformity rather than motive or intent in direct contravention to Rule 404(b). Appellant alleged 269 that the "scheme to falsify documents to mislead or defraud the bankruptcy court and the IRS was sufficiently similar if not identical to the offense of falsifying a Form 637." Therefore, this Court affirms the district court's decision in excluding the evidence. Because the district court did not commit error, we do not reach application of the harmless error doctrine.

FN7. See also United States v. Luffred, 911 F.2d 1011, 1015 (5th Cir.1990) (holding that prior bad acts may be relevant under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) to prove that a witness had the opportunity and ability to concoct a fraudulent or deceitful scheme).

B. Bad Business Practices

[15] Townsend also contends that the district court erred in curtailing his cross-examination of Mr. Boulos. Appellant asserts that Mr. Boulos's alleged bad business practices would reveal his motive and intent to use Townsend's son to set up a bank account. Mr. Boulos, Appellant contends, failed to timely pay his bills, "bounced" checks, and sold substandard gasoline. The unauthorized use of the bank account circumvented a credit check by Crown and Jetero in furtherance of the tax evasion scheme. Under 404(b) evidence of crimes, bad acts, or wrongs are admissible to prove intent or opportunity. However, the district court found no evidence showing that Mr. Boulos knew of or aided Townsend in the tax evasion scheme.

[16] Townsend asserts that Mr. Boulos was also guilty of tax evasion if he knowingly carried out the scheme to buy gas tax-free. These facts would serve to impeach Mr. Boulos under 608(b). Rule 608(b) provides that specific acts of misconduct, though they cannot be proved by extrinsic evidence, may be elicited on cross-examination to impeach the credibility of a witness. But again Rule 403 serves to temper the otherwise unreigned use of 608(b). The district court did not find that Mr. Boulos participated in any scheme of tax evasion and therefore excluded this testimony. The district court did not abuse its discretion because trivial acts, such as untimely payment, should be excluded, absent evidence of a fraudulent scheme, because the dangers of confusing the issues and misleading the jury substantially outweigh any minor probative value the testimony would have.

C. Evidence of Townsend's liability for the excise tax

[17] Townsend contends that the district court abused its discretion in prohibiting cross-examination into areas of the Comptroller's decision and Mr. Maxwell's letter, dated March 27, 1989. The Comptroller held that Petrolife rather than Townsend was liable for state excise tax. In the Maxwell letter Mr. Maxwell allegedly expressed the desire to align himself with the IRS's position in order to avoid Petrolife's tax liability. Appellant contends that he had a right to impeach the witness and reveal the motivation and bias of Mr. Maxwell's adversarial testimony. Appellant has failed to show any evidence in the record indicating an arrangement under which Mr. Maxwell would receive any benefit for cooperating with the government. The district court found, under Rule 403, that the probative value of the testimony was substantially outweighed by the danger of confusion of the issues. Because Appellant has failed to show that the district court abused its discretion, we affirm the district court on this point. York, 888 F.2d at 1056; see also United States v. Sutherland, 929 F.2d 765, 777 (1st Cir.) cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 83, 116 L.Ed.2d 56 (1991) (holding that appellant failed to demonstrate a basis for suspecting bias other than a conclusory allegation).

[18] Agent Vitz testified that Townsend was liable for the excise tax. Appellant contends that he had a right to cross-examine Agent Vitz concerning the Maxwell letter and the Comptroller's decision holding Petrolife liable for state excise tax. The district court excluded this testimony under Rule 403. We find no error requiring reversal. Anyone who willfully evades a tax is in violation of I.R.C. § 7201 regardless of who owed the tax. [FN8] Thus, exclusion of testimony that Townsend was not personally liable was harmless error.

FN8. As discussed supra all that is required to establish a violation of I.R.C. § 7201 is proof beyond a reasonable doubt of a tax deficiency, affirmative acts of evasion, and willfulness.

3. Expert Testimony

The government called Agent Vitz as a summary witness and an expert on excise 270 tax. Agent Vitz testified that Townsend became liable for the excise tax when he sold it to Mr. Boulos. Agent Vitz also calculated the tax deficiency owed on the gas sold to Mr. Boulos. Appellant contends that the district court erred in admitting this testimony because it interfered with the jury's function, it was inadmissible under Fed.R.Evid. 704(b), and it was inadmissible under Fed.R.Evid. 403.

[19][20] The admissibility of expert testimony rests within the sound discretion of the district court and will be reversed only upon a clear showing of abuse of discretion. United States v. Charroux, 3 F.3d 827, 833 (5th Cir.1993). Rule 703 provides that a qualified expert may testify in the form of an opinion if scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact in understanding the evidence. To qualify as an expert, the witness must have specialized knowledge or training such that his or her testimony will assist the fact finder in the determination of a fact issue. United States v. Bourgeois, 950 F.2d 980, 987 (5th Cir.1992). Agent Vitz's training in accounting and experience in tax prosecutions qualifies him as an expert. There is no evidence that the district court abused its discretion in accepting Agent Vitz as an expert as Townsend failed to object to Agent Vitz's qualifications. Accordingly, we will address the substance of his testimony rather than his qualifications.

[21] Appellant contends that Agent Vitz's testimony was an usurpation of the jury's role in violation of Rule 704(b). Rule 704(b) states that an expert shall not testify with respect to the mental state of a defendant in a criminal trial. Agent Vitz did not opine that Townsend intended to file a fraudulent Form 637, rather he testified that the form was invalid. Agent Vitz did not express an opinion about Appellant's state of mind. Accordingly, his testimony was not excludable under Rule 704(b). United States v. Webster, 960 F.2d 1301, 1308-09 (5th Cir.) cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 355, 121 L.Ed.2d 269 (1992).

[22] Rule 403 operates to exclude otherwise admissible evidence if the probative value is substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effects. Appellant contends that Agent Vitz's testimony was prejudicial. Testimony presented by the government will invariably be prejudicial to a criminal defendant. But Rule 403 only excludes evidence that would be unfairly prejudicial to the defendant. Here, the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effects. Agent Vitz testified as to the existence of a tax deficiency, an element required for a successful prosecution under I.R.C. § 7201. He also opined that Townsend was personally liable on the excise tax. This arguably has probative value. Someone would be more likely to evade their own tax rather than another's. Because this testimony was probative and not unfairly prejudicial, we find no error.

4. Jury Instructions

[23] Appellant requested the district judge to instruct the jury that it could find him liable for a violation of I.R.C. § 7201 only if he personally owed the taxes. The district court refused, instructing the jury that it could convict the defendant for attempting to evade taxes owed by another. Appellant cries foul.

[24][25][26] The standard of review is abuse of discretion. United States v. Chaney, 964 F.2d 437, 444 (5th Cir.1992). A conviction will not be reversed unless the instructions failed to correctly state the law. United States v. Coleman, 997 F.2d 1101, 1105 (5th Cir.1993), cert. denied, --- U.S. ---, 114 S.Ct. 893, 127 L.Ed.2d 86 (1994). The issue this Court must decide is whether the district court abused its discretion by refusing the proposed instruction. A refusal to deliver a requested jury instruction is reversible error only if the proposed instruction was (1) substantively correct, (2) not substantively covered in the jury charge, and (3) concerned an important issue in the trial, such that failure to give the requested instruction seriously impaired the defendant from presenting a defense. United States v. Mollier, 853 F.2d 1169, 1174 (5th Cir.1988).

The actual jury charge correctly stated the law. The instruction traced I.R.C. § 7201 and informed the jury that they could convict 271 Townsend for evading Petrolife's tax liability. See United States v. Troy, 293 U.S. 58, 55 S.Ct. 23, 79 L.Ed. 197 (1934); United States v. Wisenbaker, 14 F.3d 1022, 1026-27 (5th Cir.1994). Appellant's proposed instruction was not substantively correct. Appellant contends that the jury should have been instructed to find Townsend guilty only if he personally owed the tax. Because I.R.C. § 7201 proscribes evasion of any tax, this instruction fails the first prong of the test. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's ruling.

For the above stated reasons the defendant's conviction is AFFIRMED.

Christopher Stacy POOL, Petitioner/Appellant,
v.
Earl B. DOWDLE, Respondent/Appellee.

No. 86-2172.

United States Court of Appeals,
Ninth Circuit.

Argued and Submitted April 13, 1987.

Decided Dec. 15, 1987.

Defendant who had previously been convicted of aggravated assault on police officer petitioned for habeas relief. The United States District Court for the District of Arizona, Earl H. Carroll, J., accepted magistrate's recommendation and dismissed petition without evidentiary hearing. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Noonan, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) exclusion of police detective's expert testimony, regarding proper procedure to be used by undercover officer in identifying himself to suspect, did not deprive defendant charged with aggravated assault of Sixth Amendment right to present defense, and (2) exclusion of evidence regarding police department's discipline of officer did not deprive defendant of constitutional right to cross-examine witnesses against him.

Affirmed.

Nelson, Circuit Judge, concurred in part and dissented in part and filed opinion.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Arizona.

Before HUG, NELSON and NOONAN, Circuit Judges.

NOONAN, Circuit Judge:

Christopher Stacy Pool appeals the denial of his petition for habeas corpus. His case has been ably argued on appeal, but we affirm the decision of the district court.

FACTS AND PROCEEDINGS

In 1982 Pool was a thirty-year-old produce salesman. He was out on bail pending trial for assault. He had been convicted in 1977 of possessing marijuana and had served a three year sentence of probation.

On the evening of February 19, 1982, Pool was driving his father's Toyota in a deserted part of Yuma County, accompanied by his friend Brian Twist. Twist had invited Pool to go rabbit-hunting and Pool had brought a gun with him; but Twist suggested that Pool first aid him in planting two marijuana plants and as they drove they looked for a place to plant the plants.

Paul Connolly, a deputy sheriff of Yuma County, was working that night for a private employer, Camille Allec, patrolling for pay to catch thieves in Allec's citrus groves. Connolly had worked in this capacity for two years and had made about thirty stops or arrests. He drove a "beat up" Yuma County Sheriff Department's 1969 Ford pickup truck, not readily identifiable as a police vehicle. He himself was wearing levis, boots, and his uniform shirt with gold letters and gold circles on the arms and his police badge and name plate; he was also wearing a gun and gunbelt.

Connolly passed Pool in the Toyota and made a U-turn to follow him, eventually finding the Toyota parked on a rural road. Connolly parked head-on with the Toyota. There was no street lighting. Connolly's own lights lit up the car, and he saw two people in the front seat and the plants in the rear. Connolly radioed his number, his location, the license number of the Toyota and the fact that it had marijuana in it to the Sheriff's Department. He then turned on the red grill lights of his truck, walked in front of these lights and approached the driver's side of the Toyota.

According to his testimony at the trial, Connolly had his flashlight in his right hand and shined the light into the truck. He saw the driver reach for his midsection and noticed a bulge on his right side. He ordered both driver and passenger to put their hands on the dashboard. He heard the driver say "fucking pig." He saw the top two inches of an automatic pistol. With his right hand--his shooting hand--occupied with the flashlight, Connolly believes he threw the light into the car. He yelled and dove into the bushes, down a bank. As he dove, or just before, he heard the pop of a shot. He rolled twice, then turned, and fired back twice at headlights that turned out to be his own. One bullet was later found to have damaged the truck's radiator, the other to have ricocheted off, leaving a dent. After his two shots, he crawled into a small hole. About 20 minutes later, Deputy Will Brooks drove up. The Toyota had gone. Connolly came out of the hole and told Brooks that "two Indians just took a shot at me and are armed with a .45 or .9 mm."

At the trial, Pool and Twist testified that they were blinded by Connolly's lights. 779 When Connolly told them to place their hands on the dashboard, Pool was scared and reached for the gun. As he pulled up the gun he was hit in the face with the flashlight. To this extent, Pool and Twist's testimony was not contrary to Connolly's. Pool, however, denied saying anything to Connolly except "Get back" as he, Pool, put his hands on his gun, and both Pool and Twist maintained that they did not recognize Connolly as a police officer. On the critical issue of the shooting, Pool testified that before he fired he heard "a cannon blast" in his car and thought, "This man is trying to kill me." He then "cocked the gun and stuck it out the window and fired a shot at the same time trying to start the car." As he drove off, Pool heard "at least two shots." Twist's testimony as to the events was vague and not such as to inspire confidence in his memory or veracity. In his own words, he was "in total confusion."

Pool was charged with the crime of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon. His defense was that he acted with justification. His first trial ended in a hung jury. In the second trial, the judge charged the jury that Pool was justified if two conditions were satisfied: that a reasonable person in his situation would have believed that physical force was immediately necessary to protect against another's use or attempted use of unlawful physical force; and that he used or threatened no more physical force than would have appeared necessary to a reasonable person in his situation. No objection was made to this standard instruction. The case was sent to the jury at 6:12 p.m. and at 7:26 p.m. the jury returned a verdict of guilty.

Douglas W. Keddie, the trial judge, denied a motion for a new trial on July 13, 1982. He sentenced Pool to nine years in prison. Pool appealed to the Arizona Court of Appeals, attacking the admission of the marijuana and evidence of his bail status. He also challenged a limitation put on the cross-examination of Connolly and Brooks and the exclusion of expert testimony on proper procedures for a police stop. Other errors assigned were the denial of a directed verdict; denial of a motion to change the judge who was accused by Pool of prejudice; error in the jury instruction on Pool's bail status; and error in rejecting Pool's proffered instructions on retreat. The Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction; the Supreme Court of Arizona refused to review.

Pool, represented by new counsel, applied for habeas corpus. A magistrate recommended that his petition be dismissed without an evidentiary hearing. The district court accepted this recommendation and on March 10, 1986 denied the petition. Pool appealed to this court.

ISSUES

Pool presses two claims:

First, Pool maintains he was denied his rights under the Sixth Amendment "to present a defense." Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 19, 87 S.Ct. 1920, 1923, 18 L.Ed.2d 1019 (1967). He sought to put on the stand a detective from the City of Yuma Police Department who as an expert would testify as to the proper police procedure to be used by an undercover officer identifying himself. The detective had testified at the first trial which ended in a deadlocked jury; Judge Keddie, who presided at both trials, stated that by the time of the second trial he had been persuaded by the prosecutor's objections that the testimony was irrelevant and that the jury did not need it to understand the situation. Pool contends that the detective's testimony "directly rebutted the theory of the government's case that a reasonable person would have identified Mr. Connolly as a police officer."

Second, Pool points to matter that Judge Keddie's rulings precluded both juries from hearing: Five days after the encounter with Pool, Connolly was reprimanded for not reporting that he had been working for two years for pay for a private employer and using the county's truck and gas; also for not giving "an adequate answer" to the Sheriff's inquiry as to why the Sheriff had not been informed. Connolly was docked "100 hours of comp time" to compensate for the gas and wear and tear on the truck. 780 The reprimand was to stay in his file one year.

The reprimand became an issue when defense counsel wanted to show that Connolly had lied to defense counsel in his pretrial statements. As part of that proof, defense counsel sought to introduce the reprimand. Judge Keddie interpreted the pretrial statements made by Connolly to defense counsel as ambiguous and did not believe the reprimand relevant to Connolly's credibility. Accordingly, he refused to allow examination on either the reprimand or the statements to counsel.

On appeal to this court, Pool urges that cross-examination on the reprimand was necessary to bring out bias against Pool on Connolly's part. As expressed by Pool's brief:

> Connolly had a motive and bias to testify falsely, not only to ingratiate himself with his superiors, but also to put a good face on his activities on the evening of the alleged crime, and ultimately, to get back at Mr. Pool .... [He] may reasonably have hoped that his reprimand would be suspended if he cooperated in the prosecution.

Pool argues further that Connolly's reprimand could be interpreted as a reprimand for equivocating when questioned by the Sheriff and in this way would also have a bearing on his credibility. Denial of the opportunity to attack Connolly's credibility is, Pool maintains, a violation of the right "to be confronted with witnesses against him." United States Constitution, Amendment VI; Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 94 S.Ct. 1105, 39 L.Ed.2d 347 (1974).

We review anew the legal issues presented to the district court. Chatman v. Marquez, 754 F.2d 1531 (9th Cir.1985).

[1] First. The admissibility of expert testimony is normally in Arizona as elsewhere a matter of discretion for the trial judge. State v. Williams, 132 Ariz. 153, 160, 644 P.2d 889 (1982). Expert testimony is unnecessary if the jury is qualified without such testimony to determine the issue intelligently. State v. Chapple, 135 Ariz. 281, 292-93, 660 P.2d 1208 (1983). We do not find Arizona's application of these standard doctrines to have violated the Sixth Amendment. If the jury believed Connolly, the jury would have found that Pool knew he was police because he used the opprobrious street term for a policeman. If the jury believed Pool himself, the jury would have found that Pool fired after being shot at by Connolly. Without expert testimony the jury would have known that such an approach by Connolly would not constitute proper police procedure. If the jury did not believe Pool, the expert's testimony would not have helped him. No constitutional error was committed in excluding the testimony. In any event, the expert testimony would have been cumulative and was not "a major part of the attempted defense." Perry v. Rushen, 713 F.2d 1447, 1453 (9th Cir.1983).

[2] Second, as to the reprimand: the observation in it that Connolly's answer was "inadequate" does not show that he was a liar; the observation merely means that he did not have a good explanation. That the Sheriff's Department already had a good idea of Connolly's practice is evident from the arrests he had made in the past and the police communications he used; it is a reasonable inference that the reprimand came about because of the publicity. In ruling on peripheral evidence, a trial court must have a range of discretion within which a mistake, if there is one, is not automatically constitutional error. Police discipline of a police witness may be the only evidence of possible bias and so severe in degree that a motive to lie may be created. Cf. United States v. Garrett, 542 F.2d 23 (6th Cir.1976). In Pool's case, the existence of the reprimand in Connolly's file would not have significantly increased his desire to ingratiate himself with his superiors. He had already lost "the comp time." The reprimand was to be removed from the file within nine months of the trial. Every police officer, it may be supposed, looks better with a certain kind of superior if his testimony leads to a conviction. This possible reason for discounting police testimony is not materially enhanced 781 by the presence of a mild, soon-to-be extinguished censure. Finally, that the encounter with Connolly had led to the reprimand would not have shown that Connolly had a different degree of bias against Pool than the jury already knew that he had. The jury knew from Connolly's own lips that Pool had put him to flight, driven him into a hole, and led him to shoot up his own vehicle. If the jury did not infer from this story that Connolly could have little love for the defendant, a bureaucratic censure would not have changed the jury's view of Connolly's animus. No constitutional right was denied in limiting the cross-examination in this regard. Unlike Davis v. Alaska where a traditional method of impeaching a witness was denied by the trial court, there was here only a remote and peripheral challenge to Connolly's credibility.

AFFIRMED.

NELSON, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

Pool sought to introduce expert testimony relevant to whether he recognized Connolly as an officer. The expert witness would have explained the standard police procedures used by officers to identify themselves to frightened suspects. From this evidence, the jury might have inferred that reasonable people do not always recognize police officers. This insight might have led the jury to conclude that Pool did not recognize Connolly as an officer because Connolly failed to use the standard procedure to identify himself.

Excluding the relevant expert testimony was constitutionally valid. The sixth amendment does not require the admission of all relevant evidence. Rather, courts may constitutionally exclude evidence if society's interest in fair and efficient trials outweighs the defendant's interest in presenting the evidence. Perry v. Rushen, 713 F.2d 1447, 1451-52 (9th Cir.1983), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 838, 105 S.Ct. 137, 83 L.Ed.2d 77 (1984). In this case, the state's interest in excluding evidence on collateral issues was legitimate. The trial court could reasonably have feared that the expert testimony would divert the jury's attention from the issue of Pool's guilt to the collateral issue of Connolly's improper method of identifying himself.

Against the State's interest in preventing jury confusion we must weigh Pool's interest in presenting the evidence. This was quite small. The jury could have concluded that Pool did not recognize Connolly as an officer from other much more direct evidence, such as the darkness, the shining headlights, Connolly's clothes, and Connolly's failure verbally to identify himself. The inference from the expert testimony to the conclusion that Pool did not recognize Connolly as a police officer was indirect and problematic. I therefore conclude that the trial court reasonably excluded the relevant expert testimony. I agree that no sixth amendment violation occurred.

I disagree, however, that excluding evidence and cross-examination on Connolly's reprimand was constitutionally permissible. The confrontation clause secures a defendant's right to cross-examine witnesses in order to expose their motivation for testifying. Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 316-17, 94 S.Ct. 1105, 1110-11, 39 L.Ed.2d 347 (1974). Although this right does not preclude trial judges from imposing "limits on defense counsel's inquiry into the potential bias of a prosecution witness," Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 106 S.Ct. 1431, 1435, 89 L.Ed.2d 674 (1986), neither does it allow the trial court to prohibit all inquiry into the possibility that an event might have furnished the witness with a motive for favoring the prosecution. See id.

In this case, Pool sought to cross-examine Connolly on evidence "about an event that the State conceded had taken place and that a jury might reasonably have found furnished the witness a motive for favoring the prosecution in his testimony." Van Arsdall, 106 S.Ct. at 1435. The jury might have found that the reprimand gave Connolly a motive to lie based on any one of several reasonable inferences. Having learned that officer Connolly was punished for his moonlighting, the jury might have concluded that Connolly sought to regain his lost comp. time, or to avoid more severe action by helping the prosecution to obtain 782 a conviction. The jury might also have realized that the officer would have reason to make his infraction seem less serious to his superiors by avoiding the further charge that in addition to moonlighting and using state property without permission, he handled the arrest inappropriately. Finally, learning that Connolly had been sanctioned, and presumably that the department would no longer permit Connolly to earn the extra income using department property, the jury might have developed further reason to suspect that Connolly disliked Pool and had reason to seek revenge. Because a jury might have found that the reprimand gave Connolly an incentive to lie, excluding the evidence and precluding all cross-examination on the issue violated Pool's confrontation clause rights. See United States v. Garrett, 542 F.2d 23 (6th Cir.1976).

Although trial courts may exclude cumulative evidence of bias, see, e.g., United States v. Jackson, 756 F.2d 703 (9th Cir.1985) (allowing limitation of cross-examination regarding a witness's paid cooperation with law enforcement officials because evidence had already been admitted regarding the witness's payment in exchange for cooperation), the evidence of bias excluded in this case was not cumulative. Other facts might have suggested that Connolly had reason to dislike Pool. But these other facts are not cumulative of the additional and independent motive for lying created by the reprimand. To the contrary, the reprimand constitutes an independent incentive for Connolly to lie. Pool had a constitutional right to expose this incentive for the jury.

I would reverse Pool's conviction based on this constitutional error. I cannot conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the error was harmless. See Van Arsdall, 106 S.Ct. at 1438. The case was based largely on Connolly's testimony, and therefore on his credibility. Because his testimony was important, not cumulative, and uncorroborated, and because the prior trial ended in deadlock, indicating that the prosecution's case was not overwhelmingly strong, even a small increase in the evidence of Connolly's bias might have altered the outcome of this case.

Brian DICKERSON, Plaintiff-Appellant,
v.
DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Defendant-Appellee.
No. 92-1458.
United States Court of Appeals,
Sixth Circuit.
Argued Jan. 19, 1993.
Decided April 30, 1993.

Newspaper editor requested, pursuant to Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), release of record on investigation conducted by Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) into disappearance more than 15 years earlier of former union official. After FBI denied request, editor brought suit to compel Department of Justice to produce records. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, George LaPlata, J., denied relief, and editor appealed. The Court of Appeals, David A. Nelson, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) Vaughn index was not required, and (2) records came within FOIA exemption for records compiled for law enforcement purposes whose disclosure could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings.

Affirmed.

Beckwith, District Judge, sitting by designation, delivered separate concurring opinion.

Batchelder, Circuit Judge, delivered separate dissenting opinion.

Before: NELSON and BATCHELDER, Circuit Judges; and BECKWITH, District Judge. [FN*]

FN* The Honorable Sandra S. Beckwith, United States District Judge for the Southern District of Ohio, sitting by designation.

DAVID A. NELSON, Circuit Judge.

Pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act--a statute which, subject to certain exceptions, makes federal government records available to anyone who asks for them--plaintiff Brian Dickerson requested the release of records on an investigation conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation into the disappearance of Jimmy Hoffa, former president of the Teamsters Union.

Citing 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A), which exempts from disclosure "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings," the government denied the request. Mr. Dickerson brought suit in the Eastern District of Michigan to compel the Department of Justice to produce the records. The district court (La Plata, J.) ultimately decided that production was not required.

In making its decision the district court focused on the question whether a "concrete prospective law enforcement proceeding" [FN1] could still be discerned--i.e., whether there was still a reasonable chance that someone would be prosecuted in connection with Mr. Hoffa's disappearance. Based on affidavits of several FBI officials and an in camera review of FBI file documents assembled for the purpose of briefing one of the affiants on the status of the investigation, the district court found that "the investigation into Hoffa's disappearance is active and continuing, with the clear direction of future criminal proceedings being instituted." The court further found that disclosure of the requested documents could reasonably be expected to interfere with such proceedings. The court made these findings without having required the government to provide a document-by-document analysis of the files.

The issues presented on appeal are (1) whether the district court abused its discretion in not insisting on a full document-by-document analysis and in limiting its in camera review to the briefing materials; (2) whether the district court dealt correctly with the factual side of the case; and (3) whether the district court ought to have found that at least some non-public portions of the investigatory files were not protected *1428 from disclosure. Resolving each of these issues in favor of the government, we shall affirm the judgment of the district court.

I

Jimmy Hoffa disappeared in Detroit, Michigan, on July 30, 1975. It is widely believed that he was abducted and killed. Mr. Hoffa's disappearance led to an FBI investigation that has not, to date, resulted in any criminal proceedings being brought.

The investigation is documented in two large files, one maintained in the FBI's field office in Detroit and the other at FBI headquarters in Washington. At the time with which we are concerned in this proceeding the headquarters file consisted of 67 volumes and the field office file consisted of 332 volumes.

On July 25, 1989, counsel for the Detroit Free Press, a newspaper that employs plaintiff Dickerson in an editorial capacity, sent sweeping Freedom of Information Act requests on the Hoffa investigation to Justice Department and FBI officials in Detroit and Washington. When the requests were denied, Mr. Dickerson sued the Department of Justice under 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), which gives federal district courts jurisdiction to order the production of agency records withheld improperly. This section of the statute, which places the burden of sustaining non-disclosure on the government, directs the court to determine the matter de novo. It also provides that the court "may examine the ... agency records in camera to determine whether such records or any part thereof shall be withheld under any of the exemptions set forth in [5 U.S.C. § 552(b)]...."

The Department of Justice filed an answer admitting that there were no pending criminal proceedings directly relating to Mr. Hoffa's disappearance, but asserting that no documents had been improperly withheld. Both parties subsequently moved for summary judgment.

The plaintiff's summary judgment motion was accompanied by newspaper articles referring to a statement by Kenneth P. Walton, a retired head of the FBI's Detroit field office, to the effect that although he knew who had murdered Jimmy Hoffa, there would never be a prosecution because of the government's unwillingness to disclose confidential sources. The Justice Department filing was accompanied by "declarations," or affidavits, in which two FBI headquarters officials, Angus B. Llewellyn and Jim E. Moody, attested that the Hoffa investigation was still pending.

The Llewellyn declaration went on to give a general description of the contents of the investigatory files, categorizing the records by source or function. The declaration also sought to explain why law enforcement records contained in the files were exempt from production not only under subsection (7)(A) of 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), but also under subsection (7)(C) (exempting such records if they "could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy"); subsection (7)(D) (exempting them if they "could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source"); and subsection (7)(E) (exempting them if they "would disclose techniques and procedures for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions ... if such disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law").

The Moody declaration focused on the (7)(A) exemption. The declaration explained, among other things, that

> "The files responsive to plaintiff's [Freedom of Information Act] request contain documents detailing the FBI's theories regarding the case, investigative leads we're pursuing (and those we don't consider worthy of pursuit), information furnished by confidential sources, information indicating whom the prime suspects are considered to be, techniques being utilized by the FBI in this investigation, interviews of third parties and cooperating witnesses, results of laboratory and polygraph examinations, and suggestions as to how to proceed with this investigation."

The Moody declaration stated that the FBI was continuing its efforts to develop information for use in criminal proceedings, and the declaration sought to show why production of 1429 the records could reasonably be expected to interfere with such proceedings.

In January of 1991 the district court denied both of the motions for summary judgment on the ground that there was a material issue of fact concerning the prospect of future enforcement proceedings. The Justice Department moved for reconsideration, supporting its motion with a declaration executed by William M. Baker, the Assistant Director of the FBI in charge of the agency's Criminal Investigation Division.

Mr. Baker declared under penalty of perjury that it was his responsibility to determine whether the investigation into the Hoffa disappearance should be pursued; that in his judgment the investigation warranted the continuing efforts of the FBI; that he had allocated continued FBI resources to the investigation; that he believed "that the person(s) responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance can be identified and prosecuted;" and that public disclosure of the information in the Hoffa file could reasonably be expected, for reasons specified in the declaration, to interfere with enforcement proceedings against those responsible for the disappearance. Mr. Baker further declared that the statement attributed to the former field office head "did not reflect and does not reflect official FBI policy."

[1] In response to the motion for reconsideration plaintiff Dickerson filed a reply brief stating that Mr. Baker's declaration was essentially identical to one he had filed in a Freedom of Information Act suit brought in a federal district court in Missouri by Mr. Hoffa's daughter, Barbara Crancer. The brief pointed out that the declaration had not dissuaded the district court in Missouri from ordering the government to submit a Vaughn index on the smaller of the two Hoffa files, [FN2] and it noted that FBI Director William Sessions had testified before a Senate Subcommittee that it is "doubtful" that the government will ever have sufficient evidence to bring to trial those responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance. [FN3]

FN2. A "Vaughn index," which takes its name from a technique developed in Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974), is a document-by-document index, specially prepared for litigation purposes, in which the agency describes the contents of its records and the reasons why each of the disputed items is claimed to be exempt from disclosure. See Osborn v. Internal Revenue Service, 754 F.2d 195, 196 (6th Cir.1985), and the cases there cited, for a statement of the criteria such an index must meet. The requirement for a Vaughn index in Mrs. Crancer's case was subsequently upheld by a divided three judge panel of the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, see In re Department of Justice, 950 F.2d 530 (8th Cir.1991), but the panel decision has been vacated in connection with the granting of a rehearing en banc. See Order at 950 F.2d 538. As of this writing the en banc court has not announced its decision.

FN3. The Justice Department later submitted an official transcript of the subcommittee hearing showing that Director Sessions had declined to comment on the likelihood of indictments being obtained, and that it was Oliver B. Revell, Executive Assistant Director-Investigations, and not Director Sessions, who made the "doubtful" comment.

Plaintiff Dickerson's reply brief further advised the court that the Missouri proceedings had disclosed the existence of two categories of documents that might quickly reveal the status of the Hoffa investigation: documents containing the results of high level strategy conferences, with synopses of the investigation to date, and memoranda updating the Director of the FBI on the status of the investigation. The plaintiff's brief suggested that the court conduct an in camera review of all documents in these two categories. Since the Missouri court had already ordered the Justice Department to prepare a Vaughn index on the 68-volume file from FBI headquarters in Washington, plaintiff Dickerson suggested that the Department should be ordered to produce a copy of that index as well.

In the meantime, plaintiff Dickerson had served notice of the depositions of FBI Director Sessions and declarants Llewellyn, Moody and Baker, and the Justice Department had moved for a stay of discovery. The motion was referred to a magistrate judge, who conducted two telephone conferences on the matter.

In the course of the first conference the Justice Department indicated a willingness to go through the headquarters file and segregate, 1430 for in camera review by the court, all documents in the two categories singled out by the plaintiff. Government counsel later confirmed with declarant Moody, Chief of the FBI's Organized Crime Unit, that such documents had not yet been physically segregated. Mr. Moody disclosed to counsel, however, and counsel disclosed at the second telephone conference with the magistrate judge, that Moody already had a file of documents, culled from the field office records in Detroit, that contained an update on the Hoffa investigation. This file had recently been assembled on Mr. Moody's own initiative to prepare him to testify if he should be ordered to give his deposition. The Moody file had not been put together with the idea of turning it over to the court for in camera review, counsel explained, but the government offered to make it available to the court for that purpose, along with all documents in the two categories specified by the plaintiff.

The magistrate judge expressed an interest in keeping the scope of any in camera review manageable, and counsel for plaintiff Dickerson agreed that the district judge would be more likely to undertake such a review if the quantity of materials were not excessive. The telephone conference led to an order in which the magistrate judge directed that the Moody file be sent to Michigan for possible in camera inspection by District Judge La Plata. The plaintiff's request to depose the four FBI officials was deferred in the meantime.

Judge La Plata concluded that with the addition of Assistant Director Baker's declaration, the declarations alone might be sufficient. In view of the testimony before the Senate subcommittee, however, and in view of the length of time that had elapsed since Mr. Hoffa's disappearance, Judge La Plata elected to review the Moody file (consisting of some 335 pages) in its entirety.

Having completed a careful and thorough review of the Moody file in camera, the court expressed itself as "satisfied beyond any doubt" that the investigation was active, that it was continuing, and that it was directed toward the institution of criminal proceedings. Because the court likewise found that disclosure of the documents sought by plaintiff Dickerson and his newspaper could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings, the court entered summary judgment in favor of the Department of Justice. A subsequent motion for reconsideration was denied, and this appeal followed.

[2] Law enforcement records cannot "reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings," it has been suggested, unless there is at least "a reasonable chance that an enforcement proceeding will occur...." Nevas v. Dept. of Justice, 789 F.Supp. 445, 448 (D.D.C.1992). [FN4] We agree, and we turn first to the procedure followed by the district court in preparing itself to determine the likelihood that enforcement proceedings might still occur in the Hoffa case. (The court's determination of the likelihood that disclosure of the requested documents might interfere with any such proceedings also has a procedural aspect, and we shall touch on this at the same time.)

FN4. Even where exemption (7)(A) has become inapplicable, however, records compiled in the course of the investigation may still be exempt if production could be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy or disclose the identity of a confidential source, or if production would disclose law enforcement techniques and procedures that could be expected to risk circumvention of the law in other cases. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C), (D), and (E). In the case at bar the district court made no determination as to the applicability of these sections, and we shall confine our analysis to exemption (7)(A).

[3] Although requested to follow the lead of the district court in Missouri in ordering the compilation of a Vaughn index on the FBI headquarters file, Judge La Plata did not do so. Plaintiff Dickerson maintains that the court committed reversible error in granting the government's summary judgment motion without having had the benefit of such an index.

Depending on the nature of the case, the use of a Vaughn index may have obvious advantages from the perspective of one or another of the litigants or from the perspective of the courts. See, for example, Ingle v. 1431 Dept. of Justice, 698 F.2d 259 (6th Cir.1983), where we indicated that a Vaughn index makes the playing field more nearly level for the party seeking disclosure, facilitates effective appellate review, and may obviate any need for the courts to review documents in camera. In the context of a case that did not involve exemption (7)(A), we have said that a Vaughn index should be obtained in "most" Freedom of Information Act cases. Osborn v. Internal Revenue Service, 754 F.2d 195, 197 (6th Cir.1985).

As we subsequently explained in a Vaughn decision of our own, however, Osborn created no hard and fast rule with respect to Vaughn indices as such. Vaughn v. United States, 936 F.2d 862, 867 (6th Cir.1991). The government must provide sufficient information in sufficient detail to enable the court "to make a reasoned, independent assessment of the claim of exemption," but no particular method of doing so is mandated; "[a] court's primary focus must be on the substance, rather than the form, of the information supplied by the government to justify withholding requested information." Id. The Supreme Court has consistently taken what it terms "a practical approach" to Freedom of Information Act matters, see John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. 146, 157, 110 S.Ct. 471, 477, 107 L.Ed.2d 462 (1989), and this circuit tries to do the same.

Where exemption (7)(A) is concerned, as a practical matter, it is often feasible for the courts to make "generic determinations" about interference with enforcement proceedings. See NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 223-24, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2317-18, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978). [FN5] In many (7)(A) cases, at least, affidavits of the sort presented by the government here would seem to provide an adequate basis for making such determinations.

FN5. The plaintiff in Robbins Tire was seeking disclosure of witness statements taken by the National Labor Relations Board. The plaintiff contended that such statements could be withheld under exemption (7)(A) only upon a showing of a particularized risk of interference with a particular enforcement proceeding. The Supreme Court rejected the contention that no "generic determinations" of likely interference could ever be made, concluding instead that "Congress did not intend to prevent the federal courts from determining that, with respect to particular kinds of enforcement proceedings, disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records while a case is pending would generally 'interfere with enforcement proceedings.' " Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. When Robbins Tire was decided, exemption (7)(A) required a showing that disclosure "would" interfere with enforcement proceedings. Congress subsequently amended the statute by dropping the word "would" and replacing it with the current formula, which protects law enforcement records to the extent that disclosure "could reasonably be expected to interfere...." (Emphasis supplied.) See Pub.L. 99-570, § 1802(a) (1986). This statutory change strengthens the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court in Robbins Tire, of course.

[4] The case at bar may be somewhat unusual in that here the district court was initially uncertain whether an actual enforcement proceeding was still being contemplated and whether the "purpose and point" of the investigation that generated the records in question had "expired." See Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 232, 98 S.Ct. at 2322, referring to legislative history indicating that "with the passage of time, ... when the investigation is all over and the purpose and point of it has expired, [disclosure] would no longer be an interference with enforcement proceedings and there ought to be disclosure." But insofar as the question to be resolved by the courts is whether actual enforcement proceedings are still being contemplated, it does not seem to us that valuable time should normally have to be spent on the preparation and analysis of a Vaughn index. As a practical matter, affidavits by people with direct knowledge of and responsibility for the investigation usually ought to suffice.

Here the district court believed that the government's affidavits might be sufficient standing alone to support a finding on whether the point and purpose of the investigation had expired, but the court nonetheless felt the need for a reality check of some kind. The Moody file seemed like a sensible place to start, and we think it was clearly within the court's discretion to begin there. If the Moody file had turned out not to be helpful, the court could obviously have moved on to an in camera inspection of the two groups of 1432 documents that both parties had suggested the court might wish to examine. After reviewing all of the documents in the Moody file, however, the court concluded that there was no need to go further. We too have reviewed the Moody file in its entirety, and we see no abuse of discretion in the district court's decision on this score.

Plaintiff Dickerson argues that the decision to review only documents "hand-picked" by the government deprived him of the benefits of the adversary process. But the materials in the Moody file were selected, as we have seen, for briefing Mr. Moody on the status of the investigation, and not for submission to the court for review by it in camera. The idea of a court review of the Moody file in isolation originated with the magistrate judge, not with the government. The review process was necessarily non-adversarial, to be sure, but the process would have been equally non-adversarial if the documents under review had included the additional materials the government had said it was willing to turn over to the court.

The approach developed by the magistrate judge was designed in part to avoid a situation in which the district judge might have felt constrained to review more documents in camera than he would have wanted to see. This approach makes sense to us. The adversaries could and did present arguments on the sufficiency of the affidavits that formed the government's main line of defense, [FN6] and review of any documents in camera might well have been deemed superfluous; we think it was reasonable for the magistrate judge to offer Judge La Plata the documents that had already been segregated, and we think it was reasonable for Judge La Plata to decide, after reviewing them, that he had seen all he needed to see in order to make a proper decision.

FN6. Plaintiff Dickerson complains about the failure of the district court to hear oral argument, but each side had ample opportunity to present its case through briefs. In addition, of course, there were two telephone conferences with the magistrate judge.

[5] The district court was correct, we believe, in its finding on the likelihood of a criminal prosecution being brought.

It is clear, as we read the record, that the Hoffa investigation remains active. In the judgment of Assistant Director Baker--the person whose responsibility it is to determine whether the investigation should still be pursued, and, if so, what FBI resources should be devoted to it--the investigation warrants the FBI's continued efforts to bring to trial those responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance.

Mr. Baker has allocated continued FBI resources to the Hoffa investigation, according to his declaration, and the declaration says that the investigation "is ongoing and still absorbs FBI management and field agent resources on a regular basis." The documents in the Moody file are consistent with Mr. Baker's representation that the Hoffa investigation remains active.

The fact that the investigation is continuing does not mean that a prosecution will definitely be brought, of course, but the Baker declaration says that FBI criminal investigations often result in enforcement proceedings many years after the crimes were committed. "[W]ith the passage of time," Mr. Baker continues, "persons with knowledge of Mr. Hoffa's disappearance may feel more free to disclose critical information to law enforcement officers." Attesting to a "belief that the person(s) responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance can be identified and prosecuted," Mr. Baker says that he "would not knowingly permit scarce FBI resources to be devoted to a futile investigation."

FBI retiree Walton and Executive Assistant Director Revell may consider it doubtful whether anyone will ever be brought to trial in the Hoffa case, and they may be right. Neither of them is responsible for deciding whether it is worthwhile to continue the investigation, however, and the official who does have that responsibility--Assistant Director Baker--obviously believes that there is still a reasonable prospect of a prosecution being brought. No court is likely to be able to match Mr. Baker's expertise on that kind *1433 of question, and, like the district court, we are disposed to defer to his judgment.

The district court was also correct, we believe, in its finding that production of the records sought by plaintiff Dickerson could reasonably be expected to interfere with a future prosecution.

In some contexts, the Supreme Court has said, the most obvious risk of interference with enforcement proceedings is that witnesses will be coerced or intimidated into changing their testimony or not testifying at all. Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 239, 98 S.Ct. at 2325. The declarations of Messrs. Llewellyn and Moody both demonstrate that witness intimidation is a genuine concern in the Hoffa investigation--an investigation that the FBI has designated a "Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization-La Cosa Nostra Labor Racketeering Investigation." If the perpetrators of the crime knew what investigative leads the FBI is pursuing, who the prime suspects are, and the nature of the evidence gathered to date, as one of the affidavits explains, they "could take steps to destroy or tamper with evidence, intimidate witnesses or construct a false alibi...."

In organized crime investigations such as this one, moreover, it has been the experience of declarant Moody, the chief of the Organized Crime Section of the FBI's Criminal Investigation Division, that informants can provide information critical to the successful conclusion of the investigation. Public disclosure of the Hoffa investigation files, Mr. Moody has declared, would discourage such individuals from coming forward.

Another important issue, particularly in homicide cases, has to do with the corroboration of evidence. Verification of statements given by future witnesses becomes harder, Mr. Moody has indicated, where the factual information developed in the investigation has entered the public domain.

In addition, the record before us shows that the Hoffa files contain information regarding other pending and prospective criminal proceedings. The prospect of interference with such enforcement proceedings is not without significance.

Although the government has the burden of showing that production of the records could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings, the mere fact that the burden of justifying non-disclosure rests with the government does not illuminate the question of how heavy the burden is. See Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 224, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. Having regard to the important public interest that exemption (7)(A) was designed to protect, having regard to the fact that the language of the exemption has been broadened by Congress to protect records that "could" be expected to interfere, as opposed to records that "would" interfere, and having regard to the obvious risks that public disclosure of these active investigation files would entail, we agree with the district court that the burden with respect to interference has been met in this case.

[6] The Llewellyn declaration characterizes the documents in the Hoffa investigation files as follows:

"Documents setting forth leads to be conducted.
Documents containing information received from confidential informants.
Information and documents provided by local law enforcement.
Interviews of third parties and cooperating witnesses.
Public source information such as newspaper clippings and press releases.
Public and sealed court documents.
Laboratory reports setting forth results of examinations.
Polygraph worksheets and reports."

To the extent that public source information and public judicial materials are included in the files, the government has agreed to make the relevant documents available to plaintiff Dickerson. All that is in controversy here is the non-public portions of the files.

Plaintiff Dickerson candidly acknowledges, in a footnote toward the end of his principal brief, that it is open to the government to justify the assertion of a (7)(A) exemption on a "category-of-document" basis rather than 1434 by proceeding document by document. He points out, however, that there is no blanket exemption for investigatory files as such, and he argues that we should at least remand the case with instructions that the government be required to segregate and produce all nonexempt material. In support of this suggestion he quotes the last sentence of 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), which says that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection."

It is doubtless true that by deleting large portions of the information contained in the Hoffa files, the government could render whatever was left useless to any law-breaker. (And useless to plaintiff Dickerson and his newspaper, we might add.) But the words "reasonably segregable" must be given a reasonable interpretation, particularly where information or records compiled for law enforcement purposes are concerned. On the record before us we do not believe that the prospects for finding any "reasonably segregable" non-public portions of the Hoffa files that could properly be made public are such as to justify the remand that plaintiff Dickerson seeks.

The judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED.

BECKWITH, District Judge, concurring.

I.

I concur with Judge Nelson's results and his reasoning. I write separately, because I am convinced that more compelling grounds exist for exempting the Department of Justice's Hoffa file than that which was the basis of the district court's decision.

In the Llewellyn declaration, the Department of Justice cited at least three exemptions from the Freedom of Information Act in addition to exemption 7(A) of 5 U.S.C. § 522(b). The first such exemption is 7(C), the exemption for information, the disclosure of which "could reasonably be expected to be an unwanted invasion of personal privacy." The second is exemption 7(D) for information that "could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source." The third such exemption is 7(E), the exemption for information that "would disclose techniques and procedures for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions ... [when] such disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law."

Apparently, the trial court considered each of the cited exemptions. Nevertheless, that court rested its decision entirely on exemption 7(A), concluding that the Department of Justice was engaged in an ongoing investigation directed toward the potential institution of criminal proceedings. Judge Nelson has properly confined his analysis to a review of the trial court's decision based upon exemption 7(A). I agree that the contents of the Moody file sufficiently support the trial court's conclusion that the contents of the Hoffa file are exempt under 7(A). The question is a close one, however, as is illustrated by the dissent.

My review of the Moody file suggests that each of the four exemptions discussed above supports the nondisclosure of some or all of the documents in the Hoffa file. Had the district court based its decision on all four exemptions, the correctness of the decision would have been beyond question and our review would have been much simpler.

II.

My review of the Moody file further suggests that the various exemptions are so intertwined, overlapping, and inextricable that virtually nothing from the Hoffa file could be revealed without jeopardizing the integrity of the investigation, confidential source identity, various individuals' privacy, and law enforcement investigative techniques. For this reason, the trial court could not have ordered a Vaughn index without risking inadvertent release of exempt and sensitive information.

There being no constitutional outline for the manner in which a trial court must approach its analysis of a government claim of exemption from the Freedom of Information Act, it cannot be said that the trial court in this instance failed to independently, adequately, and objectively assess the validity of the government's claim. The trial court was 1435 under no obligation to follow Plaintiff's proffered procedure when another effective option was available. For that reason, I cannot agree with the dissent's criticism of the trial court's failure to order the production of an index.

BATCHELDER, Circuit Judge, dissenting.

I.

Over the past seventeen years, the Department of Justice has compiled a file of nearly four hundred volumes of documents on the disappearance of Jimmy Hoffa, a man, and a mystery, surely needing no introduction. Appellant Brian Dickerson, who happens to be editor of a major Detroit newspaper, has exercised the privilege Congress has given the public to request access to the documents in this file. While granting this privilege, Congress has also recognized that good government, in some circumstances, requires secrecy. Nonetheless, it has placed the burden of showing the need for secrecy on government agencies wishing to protect certain documents from public scrutiny. Since I believe the Government has fallen woefully short in carrying its burden, I dissent.

II.

The Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA" or "the Act"), 5 U.S.C. § 552, enables citizens regardless of status to gain access to government documents, thus " 'open[ing] agency action to the light of public scrutiny.' " Vaughn v. United States, 936 F.2d 862, 865

(6th Cir.1991) (quoting Department of Justice v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of Press, 489 U.S. 749, 772, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 1481, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989)); see also John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. 146, 151, 110 S.Ct. 471, 475, 107 L.Ed.2d 462 (1989) (" '[The Act] seeks to permit access to official information long shielded unnecessarily from public view and attempts to create a judicially enforceable public right to secure such information from possibly unwilling official hands.' " (quoting EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 80, 93 S.Ct. 827, 832, 35 L.Ed.2d 119 (1973)). The Act's purpose is " 'to ensure an informed citizenry, vital to the functioning of a democratic society, needed to check against corruption and to hold the governors accountable to the governed.' " John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475 (quoting NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 242, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2327, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978)). It requires " 'full agency disclosure unless information is exempted under clearly delineated statutory language.' " Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 865 (quoting Department of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 360-61, 96 S.Ct. 1592, 1599, 48 L.Ed.2d 11 (1976)). The exemptions are to be "narrowly construed." Id. " '[T]hese limited exemptions do not obscure the basic policy that disclosure, not secrecy, is the dominant objective of the Act.' " John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475 (quoting Rose, 425 U.S. at 361, 96 S.Ct. at 1599). To avoid releasing requested documents, the Government must prove that the documents sought fit a specific statutory exemption; the person making the request bears no burden of showing that such documents may not be withheld. Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 866 (citing Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 109 S.Ct. 2841, 106 L.Ed.2d 112 (1989)).

A. Existence of an ongoing law enforcement proceeding.

In reviewing a District Court's decision under the FOIA, the Court of Appeals must "determine first whether the District Court had an adequate factual basis for its decision, and second, decide whether upon that basis the court's decision was clearly erroneous." Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 866 (citing Ingle v. Department of Justice, 698 F.2d 259, 267 (6th Cir.1983)). I agree with the majority that the record shows that the FBI has continued to pursue the Hoffa disappearance investigation and that officials believe that eventual prosecution is not out of the question. William M. Baker, the Assistant Director of the FBI in charge of the Criminal Investigative Division, who apparently has the authority to decide whether to continue the investigation, made a sworn declaration to that effect, and that is good enough to establish the existence of "a concrete prospective law enforcement proceeding."

1436 B. Interference with an ongoing law enforcement proceeding.

While the existence of such an ongoing proceeding is necessary to a finding of exemption under § 522(b)(7)(A), Bevis v. Department of State, 801 F.2d 1386, 1389 (D.C.Cir.1986), [FN1] showing that such a proceeding indeed exists does not serve to exempt the entire file on the proceeding. Id. The Government also must prove that the documents, if released, could interfere with enforcement proceedings. Here, the Government essentially did nothing more than assure the reviewing court that all 400 volumes on Hoffa relate to their enforcement efforts, and recite (using language remarkably similar to statutory and case language) the harms that will result from any disclosure save for press clippings. It has not met its further burden of proof.

> FN1. To restate, § 522(b)(7)(A) exempts "investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes ... to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings." The earlier version of this provision exempted such records where production "would" interfere with enforcement. See North v. Walsh, 881 F.2d 1088, 1098 n. 14 (D.C.Cir.1989) ("This change 'relieves the agency of the burden of proving to a certainty' that > disclosure will interfere with enforcement proceedings, 'but does not otherwise alter the test.' ") (quoting Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 816 F.2d 730 (D.C.Cir.), modified on reh'g, 831 F.2d 1124 (1987), rev'd on other grounds, 489 U.S. 749, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989)). The Congress has lessened the Government's burden, but the causal connection between specific documents and potential interference still must be established; the statute still does not permit "blanket assertions" such as the Government has made here.

FOIA cases seem to pit citizen suspicion against government defensiveness. The fact that one side knows the entire truth and the other must guess at it (as, indeed, must the judge) requires adherence to procedures meant to inform the court as to the nature of government documents without revealing their actual contents, and to retain as much fairness in the adversary proceeding as possible given the imbalance of information. See Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d 972, 977 (9th Cir.1991), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 3013, 120 L.Ed.2d 886 (1992) (quoting Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820, 824 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974) (" 'This lack of knowledge by the party seeking disclosure seriously distorts the traditional adversary nature of our legal system.' ").

The majority places great emphasis on the "public interest that exemption 7(A) was designed to protect" and the "obvious risks that public disclosure of these ... files would entail." I do not quarrel with the majority's observation that the release of documents containing, for example, the names of witnesses and informants might well lead to witness intimidation and destruction of evidence by those implicated in an ongoing investigation. Indeed, in enforcement exemption cases, "the interests of the adversary process may be outweighed by the agency's legitimate interest in secrecy." Campbell v. Department of Health & Human Services, 682 F.2d 256 (D.C.Cir.1982).

However, I believe the majority understates the Government's burden of showing that specific documents in its possession contain sensitive information. The majority admits that "the mere fact that the burden of justifying nondisclosure rests with the government does not illuminate the question of how heavy the burden is," and notes that Congress "broadened" exemption 7(A) from covering only records which "would" be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings to those records which "could" be expected to interfere. While I recognize that Congress loosened up the standard somewhat from the seemingly unprovable "would interfere" standard to the more reasonable "could interfere," I certainly do not believe that in amending the statute Congress changed the underlying premise of the Act, that " 'disclosure, not secrecy, is the dominant objective of the Act.' " John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475 (quoting Rose, 425 U.S. at 361, 96 S.Ct. at 1599). Permitting the Government to satisfy its burden by simply assuring the court that all of the requested papers in a giant, seventeen year old file relate in some way to an ongoing investigation, as I think happened here, potentially robs the Act of all effectiveness in attaining this objective.

1437 This Circuit has recognized that the focus of a FOIA case is the contents of the documents requested, not the purpose for which the Government possesses them. The Act grants disclosure exemptions for documents containing information which would most likely harm an ongoing investigation in a specific way if made public. Thus, > a court must have sufficiently detailed information regarding the contents of withheld documents along with reasoning for the application of specific FOIA exemptions to enable the court to make an independent assessment of both the contents of the documents in issue and the applicability of any asserted exemptions.

Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 869. The court may not grant " 'blanket exemptions' for Government records simply because they were found in investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes." Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. The Government "must demonstrate specifically how each document or category of documents, if disclosed, would interfere with the investigation." Campbell, 682 F.2d at 265 (emphasis added). The trial court has considerable discretion as to what procedures it uses to decide whether certain documents are exempt from disclosure, but whatever procedure the court chooses must suffice to produce enough evidence on which to rule, and to produce a record an appeals court can consult to review the decision. Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 869.

Reading the majority opinion may leave one with the distinct impression that we really have no idea what information lurks in the massive Hoffa file. That impression would be correct. The record presented us does not allow this court to make the requisite independent assessment of whether each document or category of documents would interfere with the Government's enforcement efforts. Obviously, the Government need not produce each and every document for the judge to decide whether its contents merit exemption from release. The Government's submissions may describe the documents by categorizing them according to their content and nature, Bevis v. Department of State, 801 F.2d 1386, 1389 (D.C.Cir.1986); the indexing and categorizing of documents, particularly where the requested documents are voluminous, is preferred to in chambers inspections, Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 866. While courts have smiled on the use of Vaughn indices in sorting out large volumes of documents, and in their discretion sometimes ordered such indices produced, so long as the Government provides sufficiently specific and detailed information to permit the court to make a reasoned determination, "no particular method ... is mandated." Id. at 867.

Just because the Act does not mandate a particular method does not mean that any method will do. The Llewellyn declaration, which the majority believes adequately provides a categorization of the documents in the file, falls short in two respects. First, categories such as "information and documents provided by local law enforcement" and "public and sealed court documents" are not "sufficiently distinct to allow a court to determine, as to each category, whether the specific claimed exemption(s) are properly applied." Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 868. The court must be able " 'to trace a rational link between the nature of the document and the alleged likely interference.' " Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389 (quoting Crooker v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, 789 F.2d 64, 67 (D.C.Cir.1986)).

Second, even though a few of Mr. Llewellyn's categories, such as "documents containing information from confidential informants," more appropriately describe materials that fit the exemption, I do not believe the Government's task ends there with respect to showing that the documents it seeks to keep secret fit in those clearly exempt categories. A category alone gives no clue as to the content of the documents it purportedly encompasses; therefore it does not provide "adequate detail and justification" to satisfy the claimed exemption. Id. at 869. While our decision in Vaughn is careful not to prescribe specific methods, I think our opinion in that case, which affirmed the exemptions claimed there, describes considerably more effort on the part of the affiant than we see here. The affiant in Vaughn did assign the documents to rather general categories, but she > 1438 also indicated, by page number, which of the 1,000+ documents were included in each of the categories. For each of the categories, [the affiant] then discusses the legal grounds and exemptions upon which the government relies in withholding the specific documents contained within each category. Attached to her affidavit is an exhibit which summarizes, by document page number, the exemption(s) relied on for withholding each of the 1,000+ pages.

Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 868 (emphasis added). This passage, it seems to me, illustrates the rule that the Government must demonstrate that the contents of identifiable documents actually fit the exemption claimed. The record here does not allow us to see how this fit has been made. For example, while the Government has told us that the Hoffa file contains informant interviews, which comes as no surprise, it has not explained even in broad terms which specific documents those are, how many there are, or anything else to prove that the Government is not making a blanket representation, but has reviewed those documents and has good reason to believe that releasing any of them could harm the ongoing investigation. [FN2] See Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389 ("[T]he FBI must itself review each document to determine the category in which it properly belongs. Absent such individual scrutiny, the categories would be no more than smaller versions of the 'blanket exemptions' disapproved by Congress in its 1974 amendment of FOIA.").

> FN2. A word on the "Moody file." Our decision in Vaughn makes it clear that in camera review of documents is not favored, particularly where the Government chooses to proceed using categories of documents, rather than presenting all the documents it seeks to exempt to the reviewing court. See Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 868-69. The Government admits that the documents in this file were compiled to help Agent Moody prepare his affidavit, and does not suggest that the documents somehow represent others in the Hoffa file. Allowing us to peek at a few documents from the Hoffa file does nothing to prove that the rest of the file is exempt.

Our decision in Vaughn, following fairly straightforward Supreme Court precedent, requires that the Government make a choice in arguing for exemption from FOIA disclosure. It may present the court with a highly detailed Vaughn index, it may create more general exempt categories and then show how each document fits into them, or it may haul the entire file into chambers for hands-on review by the judge; the last of these, as I have explained, we have strongly discouraged. By holding in this case that the Government has met its burden of showing the entire Hoffa file to be exempt under § 522(b)(7)(A), the majority leaves FOIA law in this Circuit with the worst of all worlds. The Government has defined several general categories of documents, not all of them properly exempt, and then handed the court an admittedly nonrepresentative packet of secret documents to inspect in chambers. Neither effort sufficed to show how each and every document in the Hoffa file fits the proffered statutory exemption; the two methods taken together do not add up to a proper or sufficient showing. I am at a loss to reconcile the majority's opinion either with our Vaughn decision or with the Supreme Court's teachings on FOIA law.

C. Segregability of portions of the file.

I also disagree with the majority's conclusion that the Government has adequately shown that none of the Hoffa file, save for "public" documents such as newspaper clippings, is "reasonably segregable" under § 522(b). This provision requires the Government to release "any materials that do not properly fall within a legitimately withheld category." Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1390. Since I do not think the Government adequately showed what the Hoffa file contains, I certainly do not think it adequately demonstrated that none of this immense file falls outside of the statutory exemptions, as the statute itself requires. The Act does not ask the Government to judge the "prospects" of segregating non-exempt material, it commands the Government to segregate its files if at all possible. Both the statute and the caselaw indicate that Congress was largely unconcerned with the administrative burdens it was imposing on government agencies, but placed a higher value on openness. It is not our place to reorder Congress's priorities. Neither, might I add, is it our place to judge whether the material a citizen requests from the Government is "useless."

1439 III.

It is difficult to ignore the fact that the documents Mr. Dickerson has requested may contain the secrets to Jimmy Hoffa's disappearance. One may be predisposed in favor of government secrecy or against, or may approve or disapprove of investigative reporting by the media. However, in enacting FOIA, Congress has chosen to value government disclosure over government convenience and economy, and chosen not to favor or disfavor certain persons or their reasons for asking the Government to disclose documents. Here, a private citizen has made a specific request. Congress has placed a heavy burden on the government agency wishing to keep the requested documents secret, and that burden has not been met. While it may well be that the Hoffa file should remain a secret, I do not believe that the Government has yet proven why. I dissent.

Brian DICKERSON, Plaintiff-Appellant,
v.
DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Defendant-Appellee.

No. 92-1458.

United States Court of Appeals,
Sixth Circuit.

Argued Jan. 19, 1993.

Decided April 30, 1993.

Newspaper editor requested, pursuant to Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), release of record on investigation conducted by Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) into disappearance more than 15 years earlier of former union official. After FBI denied request, editor brought suit to compel Department of Justice to produce records. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, George LaPlata, J., denied relief, and editor appealed. The Court of Appeals, David A. Nelson, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) Vaughn index was not required, and (2) records came within FOIA exemption for records compiled for law enforcement purposes whose disclosure could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings.

Affirmed.

Beckwith, District Judge, sitting by designation, delivered separate concurring opinion.

Batchelder, Circuit Judge, delivered separate dissenting opinion.

DAVID A. NELSON, Circuit Judge.

Pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act--a statute which, subject to certain exceptions, makes federal government records available to anyone who asks for them--plaintiff Brian Dickerson requested the release of records on an investigation conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation into the disappearance of Jimmy Hoffa, former president of the Teamsters Union.

Citing 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A), which exempts from disclosure "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings," the government denied the request. Mr. Dickerson brought suit in the Eastern District of Michigan to compel the Department of Justice to produce the records. The district court (La Plata, J.) ultimately decided that production was not required.

In making its decision the district court focused on the question whether a "concrete prospective law enforcement proceeding" [FN1] could still be discerned--i.e., whether there was still a reasonable chance that someone would be prosecuted in connection with Mr. Hoffa's disappearance. Based on affidavits of several FBI officials and an in camera review of FBI file documents assembled for the purpose of briefing one of the affiants on the status of the investigation, the district court found that "the investigation into Hoffa's disappearance is active and continuing, with the clear direction of future criminal proceedings being instituted." The court further found that disclosure of the requested documents could reasonably be expected to interfere with such proceedings. The court made these findings without having required the government to provide a document-by-document analysis of the files.

FN1. The phrase originated with Senator Hart, a supporter of Freedom of Information Act amendments adopted in 1974. See 120 Cong.Rec. 17033 (1974), quoted in NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 232, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2322, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978).

The issues presented on appeal are (1) whether the district court abused its discretion in not insisting on a full document-by-document analysis and in limiting its in camera review to the briefing materials; (2) whether the district court dealt correctly with the factual side of the case; and (3) whether the district court ought to have found that at least some non-public portions of the investigatory files were not protected *1428 from disclosure. Resolving each of these issues in favor of the government, we shall affirm the judgment of the district court.

I

Jimmy Hoffa disappeared in Detroit, Michigan, on July 30, 1975. It is widely believed that he was abducted and killed. Mr. Hoffa's disappearance led to an FBI investigation that has not, to date, resulted in any criminal proceedings being brought.

The investigation is documented in two large files, one maintained in the FBI's field office in Detroit and the other at FBI headquarters in Washington. At the time with which we are concerned in this proceeding the headquarters file consisted of 67 volumes and the field office file consisted of 332 volumes.

On July 25, 1989, counsel for the Detroit Free Press, a newspaper that employs plaintiff Dickerson in an editorial capacity, sent sweeping Freedom of Information Act requests on the Hoffa investigation to Justice Department and FBI officials in Detroit and Washington. When the requests were denied, Mr. Dickerson sued the Department of Justice under 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), which gives federal district courts jurisdiction to order the production of agency records withheld improperly. This section of the statute, which places the burden of sustaining non-disclosure on the government, directs the court to determine the matter de novo. It also provides that the court "may examine the ... agency records in camera to determine whether such records or any part thereof shall be withheld under any of the exemptions set forth in [5 U.S.C. § 552(b)]...."

The Department of Justice filed an answer admitting that there were no pending criminal proceedings directly relating to Mr. Hoffa's disappearance, but asserting that no documents had been improperly withheld. Both parties subsequently moved for summary judgment.

The plaintiff's summary judgment motion was accompanied by newspaper articles referring to a statement by Kenneth P. Walton, a retired head of the FBI's Detroit field office, to the effect that although he knew who had murdered Jimmy Hoffa, there would never be a prosecution because of the government's unwillingness to disclose confidential sources. The Justice Department filing was accompanied by "declarations," or affidavits, in which two FBI headquarters officials, Angus B. Llewellyn and Jim E. Moody, attested that the Hoffa investigation was still pending.

The Llewellyn declaration went on to give a general description of the contents of the investigatory files, categorizing the records by source or function. The declaration also sought to explain why law enforcement records contained in the files were exempt from production not only under subsection (7)(A) of 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), but also under subsection (7)(C) (exempting such records if they "could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy"); subsection (7)(D) (exempting them if they "could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source"); and subsection (7)(E) (exempting them if they "would disclose techniques and procedures for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions ... if such disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law").

The Moody declaration focused on the (7)(A) exemption. The declaration explained, among other things, that

> "The files responsive to plaintiff's [Freedom of Information Act] request contain documents detailing the FBI's theories regarding the case, investigative leads we're pursuing (and those we don't consider worthy of pursuit), information furnished by confidential sources, information indicating whom the prime suspects are considered to be, techniques being utilized by the FBI in this investigation, interviews of third parties and cooperating witnesses, results of laboratory and polygraph examinations, and suggestions as to how to proceed with this investigation."

The Moody declaration stated that the FBI was continuing its efforts to develop information for use in criminal proceedings, and the declaration sought to show why production of 1429 the records could reasonably be expected to interfere with such proceedings.

In January of 1991 the district court denied both of the motions for summary judgment on the ground that there was a material issue of fact concerning the prospect of future enforcement proceedings. The Justice Department moved for reconsideration, supporting its motion with a declaration executed by William M. Baker, the Assistant Director of the FBI in charge of the agency's Criminal Investigation Division.

Mr. Baker declared under penalty of perjury that it was his responsibility to determine whether the investigation into the Hoffa disappearance should be pursued; that in his judgment the investigation warranted the continuing efforts of the FBI; that he had allocated continued FBI resources to the investigation; that he believed "that the person(s) responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance can be identified and prosecuted;" and that public disclosure of the information in the Hoffa file could reasonably be expected, for reasons specified in the declaration, to interfere with enforcement proceedings against those responsible for the disappearance. Mr. Baker further declared that the statement attributed to the former field office head "did not reflect and does not reflect official FBI policy."

[1] In response to the motion for reconsideration plaintiff Dickerson filed a reply brief stating that Mr. Baker's declaration was essentially identical to one he had filed in a Freedom of Information Act suit brought in a federal district court in Missouri by Mr. Hoffa's daughter, Barbara Crancer. The brief pointed out that the declaration had not dissuaded the district court in Missouri from ordering the government to submit a Vaughn index on the smaller of the two Hoffa files, [FN2] and it noted that FBI Director William Sessions had testified before a Senate Subcommittee that it is "doubtful" that the government will ever have sufficient evidence to bring to trial those responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance. [FN3]

FN2. A "Vaughn index," which takes its name from a technique developed in Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974), is a document-by-document index, specially prepared for litigation purposes, in which the agency describes the contents of its records and the reasons why each of the disputed items is claimed to be exempt from disclosure. See Osborn v. Internal Revenue Service, 754 F.2d 195, 196 (6th Cir.1985), and the cases there cited, for a statement of the criteria such an index must meet. The requirement for a Vaughn index in Mrs. Crancer's case was subsequently upheld by a divided three judge panel of the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, see In re Department of Justice, 950 F.2d 530 (8th Cir.1991), but the panel decision has been vacated in connection with the granting of a rehearing en banc. See Order at 950 F.2d 538. As of this writing the en banc court has not announced its decision.

FN3. The Justice Department later submitted an official transcript of the subcommittee hearing showing that Director Sessions had declined to comment on the likelihood of indictments being obtained, and that it was Oliver B. Revell, Executive Assistant Director-Investigations, and not Director Sessions, who made the "doubtful" comment.

Plaintiff Dickerson's reply brief further advised the court that the Missouri proceedings had disclosed the existence of two categories of documents that might quickly reveal the status of the Hoffa investigation: documents containing the results of high level strategy conferences, with synopses of the investigation to date, and memoranda updating the Director of the FBI on the status of the investigation. The plaintiff's brief suggested that the court conduct an in camera review of all documents in these two categories. Since the Missouri court had already ordered the Justice Department to prepare a Vaughn index on the 68-volume file from FBI headquarters in Washington, plaintiff Dickerson suggested that the Department should be ordered to produce a copy of that index as well.

In the meantime, plaintiff Dickerson had served notice of the depositions of FBI Director Sessions and declarants Llewellyn, Moody and Baker, and the Justice Department had moved for a stay of discovery. The motion was referred to a magistrate judge, who conducted two telephone conferences on the matter.

In the course of the first conference the Justice Department indicated a willingness to go through the headquarters file and segregate, 1430 for in camera review by the court, all documents in the two categories singled out by the plaintiff. Government counsel later confirmed with declarant Moody, Chief of the FBI's Organized Crime Unit, that such documents had not yet been physically segregated. Mr. Moody disclosed to counsel, however, and counsel disclosed at the second telephone conference with the magistrate judge, that Moody already had a file of documents, culled from the field office records in Detroit, that contained an update on the Hoffa investigation. This file had recently been assembled on Mr. Moody's own initiative to prepare him to testify if he should be ordered to give his deposition. The Moody file had not been put together with the idea of turning it over to the court for in camera review, counsel explained, but the government offered to make it available to the court for that purpose, along with all documents in the two categories specified by the plaintiff.

The magistrate judge expressed an interest in keeping the scope of any in camera review manageable, and counsel for plaintiff Dickerson agreed that the district judge would be more likely to undertake such a review if the quantity of materials were not excessive. The telephone conference led to an order in which the magistrate judge directed that the Moody file be sent to Michigan for possible in camera inspection by District Judge La Plata. The plaintiff's request to depose the four FBI officials was deferred in the meantime.

Judge La Plata concluded that with the addition of Assistant Director Baker's declaration, the declarations alone might be sufficient. In view of the testimony before the Senate subcommittee, however, and in view of the length of time that had elapsed since Mr. Hoffa's disappearance, Judge La Plata elected to review the Moody file (consisting of some 335 pages) in its entirety.

Having completed a careful and thorough review of the Moody file in camera, the court expressed itself as "satisfied beyond any doubt" that the investigation was active, that it was continuing, and that it was directed toward the institution of criminal proceedings. Because the court likewise found that disclosure of the documents sought by plaintiff Dickerson and his newspaper could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings, the court entered summary judgment in favor of the Department of Justice. A subsequent motion for reconsideration was denied, and this appeal followed.

[2] Law enforcement records cannot "reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings," it has been suggested, unless there is at least "a reasonable chance that an enforcement proceeding will occur...." Nevas v. Dept. of Justice, 789 F.Supp. 445, 448 (D.D.C.1992). [FN4] We agree, and we turn first to the procedure followed by the district court in preparing itself to determine the likelihood that enforcement proceedings might still occur in the Hoffa case. (The court's determination of the likelihood that disclosure of the requested documents might interfere with any such proceedings also has a procedural aspect, and we shall touch on this at the same time.)

FN4. Even where exemption (7)(A) has become inapplicable, however, records compiled in the course of the investigation may still be exempt if production could be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy or disclose the identity of a confidential source, or if production would disclose law enforcement techniques and procedures that could be expected to risk circumvention of the law in other cases. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C), (D), and (E). In the case at bar the district court made no determination as to the applicability of these sections, and we shall confine our analysis to exemption (7)(A).

[3] Although requested to follow the lead of the district court in Missouri in ordering the compilation of a Vaughn index on the FBI headquarters file, Judge La Plata did not do so. Plaintiff Dickerson maintains that the court committed reversible error in granting the government's summary judgment motion without having had the benefit of such an index.

Depending on the nature of the case, the use of a Vaughn index may have obvious advantages from the perspective of one or another of the litigants or from the perspective of the courts. See, for example, Ingle v. 1431 Dept. of Justice, 698 F.2d 259 (6th Cir.1983), where we indicated that a Vaughn index makes the playing field more nearly level for the party seeking disclosure, facilitates effective appellate review, and may obviate any need for the courts to review documents in camera. In the context of a case that did not involve exemption (7)(A), we have said that a Vaughn index should be obtained in "most" Freedom of Information Act cases. Osborn v. Internal Revenue Service, 754 F.2d 195, 197 (6th Cir.1985).

As we subsequently explained in a Vaughn decision of our own, however, Osborn created no hard and fast rule with respect to Vaughn indices as such. Vaughn v. United States, 936 F.2d 862, 867 (6th Cir.1991). The government must provide sufficient information in sufficient detail to enable the court "to make a reasoned, independent assessment of the claim of exemption," but no particular method of doing so is mandated; "[a] court's primary focus must be on the substance, rather than the form, of the information supplied by the government to justify withholding requested information." Id. The Supreme Court has consistently taken what it terms "a practical approach" to Freedom of Information Act matters, see John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. 146, 157, 110 S.Ct. 471, 477, 107 L.Ed.2d 462 (1989), and this circuit tries to do the same.

Where exemption (7)(A) is concerned, as a practical matter, it is often feasible for the courts to make "generic determinations" about interference with enforcement proceedings. See NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 223-24, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2317-18, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978). [FN5] In many (7)(A) cases, at least, affidavits of the sort presented by the government here would seem to provide an adequate basis for making such determinations.

FN5. The plaintiff in Robbins Tire was seeking disclosure of witness statements taken by the National Labor Relations Board. The plaintiff contended that such statements could be withheld under exemption (7)(A) only upon a showing of a particularized risk of interference with a particular enforcement proceeding. The Supreme Court rejected the contention that no "generic determinations" of likely interference could ever be made, concluding instead that "Congress did not intend to prevent the federal courts from determining that, with respect to particular kinds of enforcement proceedings, disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records while a case is pending would generally 'interfere with enforcement proceedings.' " Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. When Robbins Tire was decided, exemption (7)(A) required a showing that disclosure "would" interfere with enforcement proceedings. Congress subsequently amended the statute by dropping the word "would" and replacing it with the current formula, which protects law enforcement records to the extent that disclosure "could reasonably be expected to interfere...." (Emphasis supplied.) See Pub.L. 99-570, § 1802(a) (1986). This statutory change strengthens the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court in Robbins Tire, of course.

Here the district court believed that the government's affidavits might be sufficient standing alone to support a finding on whether the point and purpose of the investigation had expired, but the court nonetheless felt the need for a reality check of some kind. The Moody file seemed like a sensible place to start, and we think it was clearly within the court's discretion to begin there. If the Moody file had turned out not to be helpful, the court could obviously have moved on to an in camera inspection of the two groups of 1432 documents that both parties had suggested the court might wish to examine. After reviewing all of the documents in the Moody file, however, the court concluded that there was no need to go further. We too have reviewed the Moody file in its entirety, and we see no abuse of discretion in the district court's decision on this score.

Plaintiff Dickerson argues that the decision to review only documents "hand-picked" by the government deprived him of the benefits of the adversary process. But the materials in the Moody file were selected, as we have seen, for briefing Mr. Moody on the status of the investigation, and not for submission to the court for review by it in camera. The idea of a court review of the Moody file in isolation originated with the magistrate judge, not with the government. The review process was necessarily non-adversarial, to be sure, but the process would have been equally non-adversarial if the documents under review had included the additional materials the government had said it was willing to turn over to the court.

The approach developed by the magistrate judge was designed in part to avoid a situation in which the district judge might have felt constrained to review more documents in camera than he would have wanted to see. This approach makes sense to us. The adversaries could and did present arguments on the sufficiency of the affidavits that formed the government's main line of defense, [FN6] and review of any documents in camera might well have been deemed superfluous; we think it was reasonable for the magistrate judge to offer Judge La Plata the documents that had already been segregated, and we think it was reasonable for Judge La Plata to decide, after reviewing them, that he had seen all he needed to see in order to make a proper decision.

FN6. Plaintiff Dickerson complains about the failure of the district court to hear oral argument, but each side had ample opportunity to present its case through briefs. In addition, of course, there were two telephone conferences with the magistrate judge.

[5] The district court was correct, we believe, in its finding on the likelihood of a criminal prosecution being brought.

It is clear, as we read the record, that the Hoffa investigation remains active. In the judgment of Assistant Director Baker--the person whose responsibility it is to determine whether the investigation should still be pursued, and, if so, what FBI resources should be devoted to it--the investigation warrants the FBI's continued efforts to bring to trial those responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance.

Mr. Baker has allocated continued FBI resources to the Hoffa investigation, according to his declaration, and the declaration says that the investigation "is ongoing and still absorbs FBI management and field agent resources on a regular basis." The documents in the Moody file are consistent with Mr. Baker's representation that the Hoffa investigation remains active.

The fact that the investigation is continuing does not mean that a prosecution will definitely be brought, of course, but the Baker declaration says that FBI criminal investigations often result in enforcement proceedings many years after the crimes were committed. "[W]ith the passage of time," Mr. Baker continues, "persons with knowledge of Mr. Hoffa's disappearance may feel more free to disclose critical information to law enforcement officers." Attesting to a "belief that the person(s) responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance can be identified and prosecuted," Mr. Baker says that he "would not knowingly permit scarce FBI resources to be devoted to a futile investigation."

FBI retiree Walton and Executive Assistant Director Revell may consider it doubtful whether anyone will ever be brought to trial in the Hoffa case, and they may be right. Neither of them is responsible for deciding whether it is worthwhile to continue the investigation, however, and the official who does have that responsibility--Assistant Director Baker--obviously believes that there is still a reasonable prospect of a prosecution being brought. No court is likely to be able to match Mr. Baker's expertise on that kind *1433 of question, and, like the district court, we are disposed to defer to his judgment.

The district court was also correct, we believe, in its finding that production of the records sought by plaintiff Dickerson could reasonably be expected to interfere with a future prosecution.

In some contexts, the Supreme Court has said, the most obvious risk of interference with enforcement proceedings is that witnesses will be coerced or intimidated into changing their testimony or not testifying at all. Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 239, 98 S.Ct. at 2325. The declarations of Messrs. Llewellyn and Moody both demonstrate that witness intimidation is a genuine concern in the Hoffa investigation--an investigation that the FBI has designated a "Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization-La Cosa Nostra Labor Racketeering Investigation." If the perpetrators of the crime knew what investigative leads the FBI is pursuing, who the prime suspects are, and the nature of the evidence gathered to date, as one of the affidavits explains, they "could take steps to destroy or tamper with evidence, intimidate witnesses or construct a false alibi...."

In organized crime investigations such as this one, moreover, it has been the experience of declarant Moody, the chief of the Organized Crime Section of the FBI's Criminal Investigation Division, that informants can provide information critical to the successful conclusion of the investigation. Public disclosure of the Hoffa investigation files, Mr. Moody has declared, would discourage such individuals from coming forward.

Another important issue, particularly in homicide cases, has to do with the corroboration of evidence. Verification of statements given by future witnesses becomes harder, Mr. Moody has indicated, where the factual information developed in the investigation has entered the public domain.

In addition, the record before us shows that the Hoffa files contain information regarding other pending and prospective criminal proceedings. The prospect of interference with such enforcement proceedings is not without significance.

Although the government has the burden of showing that production of the records could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings, the mere fact that the burden of justifying non-disclosure rests with the government does not illuminate the question of how heavy the burden is. See Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 224, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. Having regard to the important public interest that exemption (7)(A) was designed to protect, having regard to the fact that the language of the exemption has been broadened by Congress to protect records that "could" be expected to interfere, as opposed to records that "would" interfere, and having regard to the obvious risks that public disclosure of these active investigation files would entail, we agree with the district court that the burden with respect to interference has been met in this case.

[6] The Llewellyn declaration characterizes the documents in the Hoffa investigation files as follows:

"Documents setting forth leads to be conducted.
Documents containing information received from confidential informants.
Information and documents provided by local law enforcement.
Interviews of third parties and cooperating witnesses.
Public source information such as newspaper clippings and press releases.
Public and sealed court documents.
Laboratory reports setting forth results of examinations.
Polygraph worksheets and reports."

To the extent that public source information and public judicial materials are included in the files, the government has agreed to make the relevant documents available to plaintiff Dickerson. All that is in controversy here is the non-public portions of the files.

Plaintiff Dickerson candidly acknowledges, in a footnote toward the end of his principal brief, that it is open to the government to justify the assertion of a (7)(A) exemption on a "category-of-document" basis rather than 1434 by proceeding document by document. He points out, however, that there is no blanket exemption for investigatory files as such, and he argues that we should at least remand the case with instructions that the government be required to segregate and produce all nonexempt material. In support of this suggestion he quotes the last sentence of 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), which says that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection."

It is doubtless true that by deleting large portions of the information contained in the Hoffa files, the government could render whatever was left useless to any law-breaker. (And useless to plaintiff Dickerson and his newspaper, we might add.) But the words "reasonably segregable" must be given a reasonable interpretation, particularly where information or records compiled for law enforcement purposes are concerned. On the record before us we do not believe that the prospects for finding any "reasonably segregable" non-public portions of the Hoffa files that could properly be made public are such as to justify the remand that plaintiff Dickerson seeks.

The judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED.

BECKWITH, District Judge, concurring.

I.

I concur with Judge Nelson's results and his reasoning. I write separately, because I am convinced that more compelling grounds exist for exempting the Department of Justice's Hoffa file than that which was the basis of the district court's decision.

In the Llewellyn declaration, the Department of Justice cited at least three exemptions from the Freedom of Information Act in addition to exemption 7(A) of 5 U.S.C. § 522(b). The first such exemption is 7(C), the exemption for information, the disclosure of which "could reasonably be expected to be an unwanted invasion of personal privacy." The second is exemption 7(D) for information that "could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source." The third such exemption is 7(E), the exemption for information that "would disclose techniques and procedures for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions ... [when] such disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law."

Apparently, the trial court considered each of the cited exemptions. Nevertheless, that court rested its decision entirely on exemption 7(A), concluding that the Department of Justice was engaged in an ongoing investigation directed toward the potential institution of criminal proceedings. Judge Nelson has properly confined his analysis to a review of the trial court's decision based upon exemption 7(A). I agree that the contents of the Moody file sufficiently support the trial court's conclusion that the contents of the Hoffa file are exempt under 7(A). The question is a close one, however, as is illustrated by the dissent.

My review of the Moody file suggests that each of the four exemptions discussed above supports the nondisclosure of some or all of the documents in the Hoffa file. Had the district court based its decision on all four exemptions, the correctness of the decision would have been beyond question and our review would have been much simpler.

II.

My review of the Moody file further suggests that the various exemptions are so intertwined, overlapping, and inextricable that virtually nothing from the Hoffa file could be revealed without jeopardizing the integrity of the investigation, confidential source identity, various individuals' privacy, and law enforcement investigative techniques. For this reason, the trial court could not have ordered a Vaughn index without risking inadvertent release of exempt and sensitive information.

There being no constitutional outline for the manner in which a trial court must approach its analysis of a government claim of exemption from the Freedom of Information Act, it cannot be said that the trial court in this instance failed to independently, adequately, and objectively assess the validity of the government's claim. The trial court was 1435 under no obligation to follow Plaintiff's proffered procedure when another effective option was available. For that reason, I cannot agree with the dissent's criticism of the trial court's failure to order the production of an index.

BATCHELDER, Circuit Judge, dissenting.

I.

Over the past seventeen years, the Department of Justice has compiled a file of nearly four hundred volumes of documents on the disappearance of Jimmy Hoffa, a man, and a mystery, surely needing no introduction. Appellant Brian Dickerson, who happens to be editor of a major Detroit newspaper, has exercised the privilege Congress has given the public to request access to the documents in this file. While granting this privilege, Congress has also recognized that good government, in some circumstances, requires secrecy. Nonetheless, it has placed the burden of showing the need for secrecy on government agencies wishing to protect certain documents from public scrutiny. Since I believe the Government has fallen woefully short in carrying its burden, I dissent.

II.

The Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA" or "the Act"), 5 U.S.C. § 552, enables citizens regardless of status to gain access to government documents, thus " 'open[ing] agency action to the light of public scrutiny.' " Vaughn v. United States, 936 F.2d 862, 865 (6th Cir.1991) (quoting Department of Justice v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of Press, 489 U.S. 749, 772, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 1481, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989)); see also John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. 146, 151, 110 S.Ct. 471, 475, 107 L.Ed.2d 462 (1989) (" '[The Act] seeks to permit access to official information long shielded unnecessarily from public view and attempts to create a judicially enforceable public right to secure such information from possibly unwilling official hands.' " (quoting EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 80, 93 S.Ct. 827, 832, 35 L.Ed.2d 119 (1973)). The Act's purpose is " 'to ensure an informed citizenry, vital to the functioning of a democratic society, needed to check against corruption and to hold the governors accountable to the governed.' " John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475 (quoting NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 242, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2327, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978)). It requires " 'full agency disclosure unless information is exempted under clearly delineated statutory language.' " Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 865 (quoting Department of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 360-61, 96 S.Ct. 1592, 1599, 48 L.Ed.2d 11 (1976)). The exemptions are to be "narrowly construed." Id. " '[T]hese limited exemptions do not obscure the basic policy that disclosure, not secrecy, is the dominant objective of the Act.' " John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475 (quoting Rose, 425 U.S. at 361, 96 S.Ct. at 1599). To avoid releasing requested documents, the Government must prove that the documents sought fit a specific statutory exemption; the person making the request bears no burden of showing that such documents may not be withheld. Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 866 (citing Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 109 S.Ct. 2841, 106 L.Ed.2d 112 (1989)).

A. Existence of an ongoing law enforcement proceeding.

In reviewing a District Court's decision under the FOIA, the Court of Appeals must "determine first whether the District Court had an adequate factual basis for its decision, and second, decide whether upon that basis the court's decision was clearly erroneous." Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 866 (citing Ingle v. Department of Justice, 698 F.2d 259, 267 (6th Cir.1983)). I agree with the majority that the record shows that the FBI has continued to pursue the Hoffa disappearance investigation and that officials believe that eventual prosecution is not out of the question. William M. Baker, the Assistant Director of the FBI in charge of the Criminal Investigative Division, who apparently has the authority to decide whether to continue the investigation, made a sworn declaration to that effect, and that is good enough to establish the existence of "a concrete prospective law enforcement proceeding."

1436 B. Interference with an ongoing law enforcement proceeding.

While the existence of such an ongoing proceeding is necessary to a finding of exemption under § 522(b)(7)(A), Bevis v. Department of State, 801 F.2d 1386, 1389 (D.C.Cir.1986), [FN1] showing that such a proceeding indeed exists does not serve to exempt the entire file on the proceeding. Id. The Government also must prove that the documents, if released, could interfere with enforcement proceedings. Here, the Government essentially did nothing more than assure the reviewing court that all 400 volumes on Hoffa relate to their enforcement efforts, and recite (using language remarkably similar to statutory and case language) the harms that will result from any disclosure save for press clippings. It has not met its further burden of proof.

FN1. To restate, § 522(b)(7)(A) exempts "investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes ... to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings." The earlier version of this provision exempted such records where production "would" interfere with enforcement. See North v. Walsh, 881 F.2d 1088, 1098 n. 14 (D.C.Cir.1989) ("This change 'relieves the agency of the burden of proving to a certainty' that disclosure will interfere with enforcement proceedings, 'but does not otherwise alter the test.' ") (quoting Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 816 F.2d 730 (D.C.Cir.), modified on reh'g, 831 F.2d 1124 (1987), rev'd on other grounds, 489 U.S. 749, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989)). The Congress has lessened the Government's burden, but the causal connection between specific documents and potential interference still must be established; the statute still does not permit "blanket assertions" such as the Government has made here.

FOIA cases seem to pit citizen suspicion against government defensiveness. The fact that one side knows the entire truth and the other must guess at it (as, indeed, must the judge) requires adherence to procedures meant to inform the court as to the nature of government documents without revealing their actual contents, and to retain as much fairness in the adversary proceeding as possible given the imbalance of information. See Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d 972, 977 (9th Cir.1991), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 3013, 120 L.Ed.2d 886 (1992) (quoting Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820, 824 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974) (" 'This lack of knowledge by the party seeking disclosure seriously distorts the traditional adversary nature of our legal system.' ").

The majority places great emphasis on the "public interest that exemption 7(A) was designed to protect" and the "obvious risks that public disclosure of these ... files would entail." I do not quarrel with the majority's observation that the release of documents containing, for example, the names of witnesses and informants might well lead to witness intimidation and destruction of evidence by those implicated in an ongoing investigation. Indeed, in enforcement exemption cases, "the interests of the adversary process may be outweighed by the agency's legitimate interest in secrecy." Campbell v. Department of Health & Human Services, 682 F.2d 256 (D.C.Cir.1982).

However, I believe the majority understates the Government's burden of showing that specific documents in its possession contain sensitive information. The majority admits that "the mere fact that the burden of justifying nondisclosure rests with the government does not illuminate the question of how heavy the burden is," and notes that Congress "broadened" exemption 7(A) from covering only records which "would" be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings to those records which "could" be expected to interfere. While I recognize that Congress loosened up the standard somewhat from the seemingly unprovable "would interfere" standard to the more reasonable "could interfere," I certainly do not believe that in amending the statute Congress changed the underlying premise of the Act, that " 'disclosure, not secrecy, is the dominant objective of the Act.' " John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475 (quoting Rose, 425 U.S. at 361, 96 S.Ct. at 1599). Permitting the Government to satisfy its burden by simply assuring the court that all of the requested papers in a giant, seventeen year old file relate in some way to an ongoing investigation, as I think happened here, potentially robs the Act of all effectiveness in attaining this objective.

1437 This Circuit has recognized that the focus of a FOIA case is the contents of the documents requested, not the purpose for which the Government possesses them. The Act grants disclosure exemptions for documents containing information which would most likely harm an ongoing investigation in a specific way if made public. Thus, > a court must have sufficiently detailed information regarding the contents of withheld documents along with reasoning for the application of specific FOIA exemptions to enable the court to make an independent assessment of both the contents of the documents in issue and the applicability of any asserted exemptions.

Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 869. The court may not grant " 'blanket exemptions' for Government records simply because they were found in investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes." Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. The Government "must demonstrate specifically how each document or category of documents, if disclosed, would interfere with the investigation." Campbell, 682 F.2d at 265 (emphasis added). The trial court has considerable discretion as to what procedures it uses to decide whether certain documents are exempt from disclosure, but whatever procedure the court chooses must suffice to produce enough evidence on which to rule, and to produce a record an appeals court can consult to review the decision. Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 869.

Reading the majority opinion may leave one with the distinct impression that we really have no idea what information lurks in the massive Hoffa file. That impression would be correct. The record presented us does not allow this court to make the requisite independent assessment of whether each document or category of documents would interfere with the Government's enforcement efforts. Obviously, the Government need not produce each and every document for the judge to decide whether its contents merit exemption from release. The Government's submissions may describe the documents by categorizing them according to their content and nature, Bevis v. Department of State, 801 F.2d 1386, 1389 (D.C.Cir.1986); the indexing and categorizing of documents, particularly where the requested documents are voluminous, is preferred to in chambers inspections, Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 866. While courts have smiled on the use of Vaughn indices in sorting out large volumes of documents, and in their discretion sometimes ordered such indices produced, so long as the Government provides sufficiently specific and detailed information to permit the court to make a reasoned determination, "no particular method ... is mandated." Id. at 867.

Just because the Act does not mandate a particular method does not mean that any method will do. The Llewellyn declaration, which the majority believes adequately provides a categorization of the documents in the file, falls short in two respects. First, categories such as "information and documents provided by local law enforcement" and "public and sealed court documents" are not "sufficiently distinct to allow a court to determine, as to each category, whether the specific claimed exemption(s) are properly applied." Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 868. The court must be able " 'to trace a rational link between the nature of the document and the alleged likely interference.' " Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389 (quoting Crooker v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, 789 F.2d 64, 67 (D.C.Cir.1986)).

Second, even though a few of Mr. Llewellyn's categories, such as "documents containing information from confidential informants," more appropriately describe materials that fit the exemption, I do not believe the Government's task ends there with respect to showing that the documents it seeks to keep secret fit in those clearly exempt categories. A category alone gives no clue as to the content of the documents it purportedly encompasses; therefore it does not provide "adequate detail and justification" to satisfy the claimed exemption. Id. at 869. While our decision in Vaughn is careful not to prescribe specific methods, I think our opinion in that case, which affirmed the exemptions claimed there, describes considerably more effort on the part of the affiant than we see here. The affiant in Vaughn did assign the documents to rather general categories, but she 1438 also indicated, by page number, which of the 1,000+ documents were included in each of the categories. For each of the categories, [the affiant] then discusses the legal grounds and exemptions upon which the government relies in withholding the specific documents contained within each category. Attached to her affidavit is an exhibit which summarizes, by document page number, the exemption(s) relied on for withholding each of the 1,000+ pages.

Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 868 (emphasis added). This passage, it seems to me, illustrates the rule that the Government must demonstrate that the contents of identifiable documents actually fit the exemption claimed. The record here does not allow us to see how this fit has been made. For example, while the Government has told us that the Hoffa file contains informant interviews, which comes as no surprise, it has not explained even in broad terms which specific documents those are, how many there are, or anything else to prove that the Government is not making a blanket representation, but has reviewed those documents and has good reason to believe that releasing any of them could harm the ongoing investigation. [FN2] See Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389 ("[T]he FBI must itself review each document to determine the category in which it properly belongs. Absent such individual scrutiny, the categories would be no more than smaller versions of the 'blanket exemptions' disapproved by Congress in its 1974 amendment of FOIA.").

FN2. A word on the "Moody file." Our decision in Vaughn makes it clear that in camera review of documents is not favored, particularly where the Government chooses to proceed using categories of documents, rather than presenting all the documents it seeks to exempt to the reviewing court. See Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 868-69. The Government admits that the documents in this file were compiled to help Agent Moody prepare his affidavit, and does not suggest that the documents somehow represent others in the Hoffa file. Allowing us to peek at a few documents from the Hoffa file does nothing to prove that the rest of the file is exempt.

Our decision in Vaughn, following fairly straightforward Supreme Court precedent, requires that the Government make a choice in arguing for exemption from FOIA disclosure. It may present the court with a highly detailed Vaughn index, it may create more general exempt categories and then show how each document fits into them, or it may haul the entire file into chambers for hands-on review by the judge; the last of these, as I have explained, we have strongly discouraged. By holding in this case that the Government has met its burden of showing the entire Hoffa file to be exempt under § 522(b)(7)(A), the majority leaves FOIA law in this Circuit with the worst of all worlds. The Government has defined several general categories of documents, not all of them properly exempt, and then handed the court an admittedly nonrepresentative packet of secret documents to inspect in chambers. Neither effort sufficed to show how each and every document in the Hoffa file fits the proffered statutory exemption; the two methods taken together do not add up to a proper or sufficient showing. I am at a loss to reconcile the majority's opinion either with our Vaughn decision or with the Supreme Court's teachings on FOIA law.

C. Segregability of portions of the file.

I also disagree with the majority's conclusion that the Government has adequately shown that none of the Hoffa file, save for "public" documents such as newspaper clippings, is "reasonably segregable" under § 522(b). This provision requires the Government to release "any materials that do not properly fall within a legitimately withheld category." Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1390. Since I do not think the Government adequately showed what the Hoffa file contains, I certainly do not think it adequately demonstrated that none of this immense file falls outside of the statutory exemptions, as the statute itself requires. The Act does not ask the Government to judge the "prospects" of segregating non-exempt material, it commands the Government to segregate its files if at all possible. Both the statute and the caselaw indicate that Congress was largely unconcerned with the administrative burdens it was imposing on government agencies, but placed a higher value on openness. It is not our place to reorder Congress's priorities. Neither, might I add, is it our place to judge whether the material a citizen requests from the Government is "useless."

1439 III.

It is difficult to ignore the fact that the documents Mr. Dickerson has requested may contain the secrets to Jimmy Hoffa's disappearance. One may be predisposed in favor of government secrecy or against, or may approve or disapprove of investigative reporting by the media. However, in enacting FOIA, Congress has chosen to value government disclosure over government convenience and economy, and chosen not to favor or disfavor certain persons or their reasons for asking the Government to disclose documents. Here, a private citizen has made a specific request. Congress has placed a heavy burden on the government agency wishing to keep the requested documents secret, and that burden has not been met. While it may well be that the Hoffa file should remain a secret, I do not believe that the Government has yet proven why. I dissent.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Appellant.

Nos. 91-2080, 91-2164.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted May 11, 1992.

Decided Aug. 5, 1993.

Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) suit was brought. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, Stephen Nathaniel Limbaugh, J., required government to provide Vaughn index covering each document sought. Appeal was taken. The Court of Appeals, 950 F.2d 530, affirmed. En banc rehearing was granted. The Court of Appeals, Wollman, Circuit Judge, held that Vaughn index could not be required.

Writ of mandamus issued, orders vacated, and case remanded.

Vaughn index could not be required for law enforcement records allegedly exempt from disclosure under Freedom of Information Act (FOIA); thus, district court should not have required government, after identifying each document, to provide detailed justification statement covering each refusal to release agency records or portions. 5 U.S.C.A. § 552(b)(7)(A).

In In re Department of Justice, 950 F.2d 530 (8th Cir.1991) (Crancer I), a panel of this court upheld the district court's order requiring the government to provide a Vaughn [FN1] index after the government had invoked Exemption 7(A) of the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A) (1988). We granted the government's suggestion for rehearing en banc and vacated the panel's decision. We now issue a writ of mandamus, vacate the challenged order, and remand the case to the district court for further proceedings.

I.

In 1987, Barbara Ann Crancer filed a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request with the Department of Justice. Crancer sought the release of certain information uncovered during the investigation conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation into the disappearance of her father, Jimmy Hoffa, the former president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. The FBI's investigation has resulted in the accumulation of more than 13,800 pages of records relating to Hoffa's disappearance.

The Department denied Crancer's request on the basis of Exemption 7(A), contending that the Hoffa FBI file contains "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes," the release of which "could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A).

After exhausting her administrative remedies, Crancer brought suit to compel the Department to provide her with the documents she had requested. During the pendency of her suit, Crancer filed a second, broader request seeking any and all materials relating to the FBI's investigation into Hoffa's disappearance. After this request was administratively denied by the Department, also on the basis of Exemption 7(A), Crancer amended her complaint to include her second request.

The Department moved for summary judgment on the basis of the claimed exemption. The district court ordered the Department to provide Crancer with a Vaughn index so that she could effectively oppose the government's pending motion. The court's order required the Department to produce an "itemized, indexed inventory of every agency record or portion thereof responsive to plaintiff's FOIA request," together with a "detailed justification statement covering each refusal to release [an] agency record[ ] or portions thereof." D.Ct. Order of July 27, 1990, at 1. The Department asked the court to reconsider its order directing the production of the Vaughn index. This request was denied. The Department then requested that the district court modify its earlier order and allow the Department to provide a categorical description of the documents contained in the Hoffa FBI file. The Department submitted a list of nine categories of documents and an affidavit describing the potential interference with enforcement proceedings that would result if it were required to compile a Vaughn index. The district court denied this request and ordered the Department to submit the Vaughn index to a magistrate judge for in camera review.

In lieu of submitting a Vaughn index, the Department asked the magistrate judge to review the actual documents in camera. The magistrate judge denied this request, but extended the time period in which the Vaughn index was to be submitted. The Department then asked the district court to 1305 reconsider the magistrate judge's order or, in the alternative, to certify the matter for interlocutory appeal. These requests were also denied.

The Department then sought relief from this court, asserting jurisdiction under the collateral order doctrine, Cohen v. Beneficial Indus. Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 69 S.Ct. 1221, 93 L.Ed. 1528 (1949), or the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(b).

In Crancer I, the panel asserted jurisdiction under the All Writs Act and upheld the district court's order requiring the preparation of a Vaughn index. The panel first determined that the Department could not be required to provide a specific factual showing and explanation describing why each document is exempt. It went on to hold, however, that the Department could be required to make a specific factual showing to demonstrate why each document belongs in a certain category, along with an explanation describing why the category itself is exempt from disclosure.

II.

[1] We first examine whether, and the basis upon which, we have jurisdiction to hear this case.

We possess discretionary writ-issuing authority under the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(b). As noted by the panel in Crancer I, mandamus is "available only in those exceptional circumstances amounting to a judicial usurpation of power." In re Ford Motor Co., 751 F.2d 274, 275 (8th Cir.1984).

The panel determined that:

> [The Department's] argument is a novel one and has not been directly addressed by any court. If [the Department] is correct in its contention that the district court lacked authority to order a Vaughn index, then a writ would be the proper remedy. Because the issue of whether the writ is available is intertwined with the merits of this interlocutory matter, we must decide whether the district court had authority to require a Vaughn-type index in these circumstances.

Crancer I, 950 F.2d at 532 (citation omitted). We agree with the panel's analysis and believe that this case presents a unique situation. Thus, we conclude that we have jurisdiction to decide the question whether the district court's order directing the Department to produce a Vaughn index in the face of the Department's invocation of Exemption 7(A) constituted a judicial usurpation of power.

III.

[2] "The basic purpose of FOIA is to ensure an informed citizenry, vital to the functioning of a democratic society, needed to check against corruption and to hold the governors accountable to the governed." NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 242, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2327, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978). Consistent with this policy of broad disclosure, the government is required to release all requested information upon the demand of any member of the public. Id. at 221, 98 S.Ct. at 2316; see also Curran v. Department of Justice, 813 F.2d 473 (1st Cir.1987); Irons v. FBI, 811 F.2d 681, 685 (1st Cir.1987). Congress fashioned certain explicit exemptions from disclosure, however, in order to preserve vital government policies and, in some cases, to protect individuals. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-)9; see also Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 220-21, 98 S.Ct. at 2316 ("Congress carefully structured nine exemptions from the otherwise mandatory disclosure requirements in order to protect specified confidentiality and privacy interests.").

[3] Once information is requested under FOIA, therefore, the government must provide the information unless it determines that a specific exemption applies. Likewise, the government bears the burden of demonstrating that the claimed exemption applies. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). The district court must determine de novo whether the government has satisfied its burden. Id.

In the face of a claimed statutory exemption, district courts have sometimes required the government to provide a Vaughn index. "This indexing procedure is perceived as necessary to permit the district court and the requesting party to evaluate the [government's] decision to withhold records and to ensure its compliance with the mandates of the FOIA." Barney v. IRS, 618 F.2d 1268, 1272 (8th Cir.1980) (per curiam).

[4] Exemption 7(A) of FOIA provides that the act "does not apply to matters that are--* * * (7) records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information (A) could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings[.]" 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A). The government contends that the courts have interpreted this exemption differently from other FOIA exemptions, with the result that a district court may not order the production of a Vaughn index when Exemption 7(A) is invoked.

In NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978), the Supreme Court addressed the burden that the government must bear when asserting Exemption 7(A). In that case, the FOIA requester, an employer, sought from the National Labor Relations Board all statements made by potential witnesses prior to a Board hearing on the employer's unfair labor practices. Id. at 216, 98 S.Ct. at 2314. On appeal, the employer argued that the district court had erred by not requiring the government to make an individualized showing that each withheld document fit within the limits of Exemption 7(A). The Supreme Court rejected this argument, interpreting Exemption 7(A) of FOIA to require the government to prove that "with respect to particular kinds of enforcement proceedings, disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records while a case is pending would generally 'interfere with enforcement proceedings.' " Id. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324.

In support of its ruling, the Supreme Court noted that:

> [t]here is a readily apparent difference between [Exemption 7(A)] and [Exemptions 7(B)-(D)]. The latter [exemptions] refer to particular cases ... and thus seem to require a showing that the factors made relevant by the statute are present in each distinct situation. By contrast, since [Exemption 7(A)] speaks in the plural voice about "enforcement proceedings," it appears to contemplate that certain generic determinations might be made.

437 U.S. at 223-24, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. The Court then examined Exemption 7's legislative history, which appeared to confirm the Court's observation regarding the distinguishing characteristic of Exemption 7(A). Id. at 224-34, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. The Court further noted that had Congress intended that "the Government in each case show a particularized risk to its individual 'enforcement proceedin[g],' " it could have done so. Id. at 234, 98 S.Ct. at 2323.

The Court also addressed Congress's 1974 amendment of Exemption 7(A). This amendment was designed "to eliminate 'blanket exemptions' for Government records simply because they were found in investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes." Id. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. The Court's discussion of President Ford's veto of the 1974 amendment and the subsequent congressional override is instructive for our present analysis. The President was concerned that the 1974 amendment to Exemption 7(A) "would require the Government to 'prove ...--separately for each paragraph of each document--that disclosure "would" cause' a specific harm" to enforcement proceedings. Id. at 235, 98 S.Ct. at 2323 (citation omitted). Congressional supporters of the amendment termed the President's interpretation of the amendment " 'ludicrous,' " stating that the " 'burden is substantially less than we would be led to believe by the President's message.' " Id. (citation omitted). [FN2]

> FN2. For further discussion of the legislative history of the 1974 amendment to Exemption 7(A), see Federal Bureau of Investigation v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 626, 102 S.Ct. 2054, 2061, 72 L.Ed.2d 376 (1982); Campbell v. Department of Health and Human Serv., 682 F.2d 256, 261-63 (D.C.Cir.1982).

The Court concluded that although the 1974 amendment to Exemption 7(A) was designed 1307 to eliminate blanket exemptions for records found in investigatory files, Congress did not intend that generic determinations of those materials entitled to Exemption 7(A) protection could never be made. Rather, the government must demonstrate, and courts must determine, whether "disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records ... would generally 'interfere with enforcement proceedings.' " Id. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. In other words, Congress intended that certain types or categories of investigatory records be withheld under Exemption 7(A) because disclosure of documents within those categories generally would interfere with enforcement proceedings.

With this understanding, post-Robbins Tire courts have made these determinations generically, category-of-document by category-of-document. In Barney v. IRS, for example, we were confronted with the question whether, in the wake of Robbins Tire, the government was required to provide a Vaughn index after the government invoked Exemption 7(A). 618 F.2d 1268 (8th Cir.1980) (per curiam). We held that "[t]o sustain its burden of showing documents were properly withheld under exemption 7(A) the government had to establish only that they were investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes and that production would interfere with pending enforcement proceedings." Id. at 1272-73. The Barney court bolstered its conclusion by emphasizing that "[u]nder exemption 7(A) the government is not required to make a specific factual showing with respect to each withheld document that disclosure would actually interfere with a particular enforcement proceeding." Id. at 1273 (citing Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 234-35, 98 S.Ct. at 2323).

Congress amended Exemption 7 in 1986 to lessen the burden on the government in establishing the application of Exemption 7(A). Freedom of Information Reform Act of 1986 (FIRA), Pub.L. No. 99-570, § 1802, 100 Stat. 3207, 3207-48 (1986). Whereas under the 1974 version of Exemption 7(A), the government bore the burden of showing that the production of the requested law enforcement records "would interfere with enforcement proceedings," under the 1986 version the government need only show that the production of law enforcement records or information "could reasonably be expected to interfere with law enforcement proceedings."

In 1989, the Supreme Court revisited the government's burden under Exemption 7, this time focusing on the use of categorical determinations under Exemption 7(C), which covers documents whose production "could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." United States Dep't of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989) ("Reporters Committee "). In Reporters Committee, a group of journalists requested that the FBI disclose an individual's computerized criminal history file, known colloquially as the person's "rap sheet." The Supreme Court held that the production of rap sheets "as a categorical matter" could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of a citizen's privacy. Id. at 780, 109 S.Ct. at 1485.

The Court discussed its earlier approval of a categorical approach to Exemption 7(A) in Robbins Tire. The Court noted that it had based its ruling in Robbins Tire on the perception that Exemption 7(A)'s reference to the plural "enforcement proceedings" supported a categorical approach when 7(A) was invoked, in contrast to the singular references in the other subsections of Exemption 7, which seemed to suggest a case-by-case balancing. Finding that "[j]ust as one can ask whether a particular rap sheet is a 'law enforcement record' that meets the requirements of [Exemption 7(C)], so too can one ask whether rap sheets in general ... are 'law enforcement records' that meet the stated criteria," the Court concluded that its approval of a categorical approach for Exemption 7(A) applied with equal force to the other subsections in Exemption 7. Id. at 779, 109 S.Ct. at 1485. Because the Court found that the disclosure of computerized compilations of an individual's criminal history could always be expected to constitute an invasion of an individual's privacy, it held that rap sheets as a category are exempted from disclosure under FOIA. Id. at 780, 109 S.Ct. at 1485.

The Court also supported its holding that a categorical approach was appropriate for Exemption 7(C) as well as 7(A) by pointing to 1308 the 1986 amendment. The Court stated that the amended 7(C), which like 7(A) had changed from the more stringent "would" to the more flexible "could reasonably be expected to," was enacted "to give the Government greater flexibility in responding to FOIA requests for law enforcement records or information." Id. at 777 n. 22, 109 S.Ct. at 1484 n. 22. The Court further noted that the amendment was designed to "replace a focus on the effect of a particular disclosure 'with a standard of reasonableness ... based on an objective test.' " Id. This reasonableness standard, the Court concluded, "amply supports a categorical approach to the balance of private and public interests in Exemption 7(C)." Id. The Court's conclusion concerning the effect of the amendment applies with equal force to Exemption 7(A), given the Court's conclusion that all of the Exemption 7 subsections should be interpreted similarly with respect to the use of categorical justifications.

Recently, the Court further explained its categorical approach in United States Dep't of Justice v. Landano, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 2014, 124 L.Ed.2d 84 (1993). Seeking to support a claim that the government had failed to disclose exculpatory evidence in his earlier criminal case, Landano sought all of the FBI files connected with the police officer's murder for which Landano had been convicted. After releasing a portion of its files, the FBI withheld certain documents on the grounds that they were exempt under Exemption 7(D), which applies to law enforcement records or information whose production "could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source." The district court largely rejected the government's categorical explanations and held that the FBI had to articulate "case-specific reasons for non-disclosure" of all information other than records pertaining to regular FBI informants. Id., --- U.S. at ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2018. The Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit affirmed, holding that the government had to provide detailed explanations relating to each alleged confidential source in order to justify nondisclosure under Exemption 7(D). Id., ---U.S. at ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2019.

The Supreme Court reversed and remanded. The Court first rejected the government's argument that it is entitled to a presumption under FOIA that all FBI sources are confidential and that any records relating to FBI sources should be presumptively exempt from disclosure. The Court noted that the government's proposed presumption was not rebuttable, as argued by the government, but amounted to an irrebuttable presumption or blanket exemption that found no support in the language or legislative history of Exemption 7(D). Id., --- U.S. at ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2023.

The Court, however, did not agree with the Third Circuit's requirement that the government must provide a detailed justification relating to each alleged confidential source. To the contrary, the Court stated that the government could point to categories of documents, the circumstances surrounding which would support the inference that the sources to whom they pertained were confidential. Id., --- U.S. at ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2023. For example, the Court suggested that "paid informants normally expect their cooperation with the FBI to be kept confidential," implying that the government need only present a category of documents relating to paid informants, whose production could reasonably be expected to disclose the informant's identity, in order to justify nondisclosure under Exemption 7(D). Id. As a second example, the Court opined that eyewitnesses to a gang-related murder could also probably be presumed to be confidential. Id. The Court concluded that such a generic, categorical approach best articulated Congress's intent "to provide ' " 'workable' rules" ' of FOIA disclosure." Id. (citing Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 779, 109 S.Ct. at 1485).

Thus, we conclude that the Supreme Court has consistently interpreted Exemption 7 of FOIA (specifically so far subsections 7(A), 7(C), and 7(D)) to permit the government to proceed on a categorical basis in order to justify nondisclosure under one of Exemption 7's subsections. See Landano, --- U.S. at ---- - ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2023-24; Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 779-80, 109 S.Ct. at 1485; Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 241-43, 98 S.Ct. at 2326-27. The Court's interpretation 1309 of Exemption 7 and Congress's intent in enacting it has been strengthened by the 1986 amendment, which provided for greater flexibility and lessened the government's burden. See Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 777 n. 22, 109 S.Ct. at 1484 n. 22.

Our interpretation of Exemption 7(A) in Barney mirrors the Supreme Court's interpretation. Moreover, consistent with the teachings of Robbins Tire, our analysis in Barney is in accord with the principle that " 'the inherent nature of the requested documents is irrelevant to the question of exemption.' " Curran, 813 F.2d at 474 (quoting Irons v. FBI, 811 F.2d 681, 685 (1st Cir.1987)). This interpretation is consistent with decisions from other circuits. See, e.g., Lewis v. IRS, 823 F.2d 375, 378 (9th Cir.1987); Curran, 813 F.2d at 475; Church of Scientology of Calif. v. IRS, 792 F.2d 146, 152 (D.C.Cir.1986); Campbell, 682 F.2d at 265. [FN3]

FN3. The panel attempted to distinguish these cases on the ground that the appellate courts were reviewing district court decisions that had found Vaughn indices not to be required. Crancer I, 950 F.2d at 534. We find this reasoning unpersuasive. Whatever the procedural posture, the Supreme Court has made clear that the government does not have to provide fact-specific information with respect to each document to justify its claim that Exemption 7(A) applies. As demonstrated, the actual contents of the documents are not relevant when the propriety of Exemption 7(A) is in dispute. See Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2323. Rather, the government may meet its burden by showing how disclosure of each category of documents would likely interfere with the investigation. Id.

The District of Columbia Circuit, which originally developed the Vaughn index, has succinctly explained the relationship between Exemption 7(A), as interpreted by Robbins Tire, and the use of Vaughn indices:

> [w]hen ... a claimed FOIA exemption consists of a generic exclusion [such as Exemption 7(A)], dependent upon the category of records rather than the subject matter which each individual record contains, resort to a Vaughn index is futile. Thus, in NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., [citation omitted], the Supreme Court upheld, without any provision of a Vaughn index, the Labor Board's refusal to provide under FOIA witness statements obtained in the investigation of pending unfair labor practice proceedings. A Vaughn index would have served no purpose since ... [Exemption 7(A)] did not require a showing that each individual document would produce such interference, but could rather be applied generically, to classes of records such as witness statements.

Church of Scientology, 792 F.2d at 152 (Scalia, J.).

In light of the above discussion, the district court's order for a Vaughn index in the present case appends an additional requirement to Exemption 7(A) that exceeds the bounds of the statute as interpreted by the Supreme Court and this court. The district court's order required the government, after identifying each document, to provide a "detailed justification statement covering each refusal to release said agency records or portions thereof." D.Ct. Order of July 27, 1990, at 1. This goes beyond the categorical explanations that the Supreme Court in Robbins Tire held to be sufficient to justify nondisclosure under Exemption 7(A).

[5] In sum, the government bears the burden of establishing that Exemption 7(A) applies. And under Robbins Tire, Exemption 7(A) does not require that the government produce a fact-specific, document-specific, Vaughn index in order to satisfy that burden. The contents of the requested documents are irrelevant. It is the particular categories of documents, and the likelihood that the release of documents within those categories could reasonably be expected to threaten enforcement proceedings, on which the court must focus. The district court, therefore, acted beyond the scope of its authority when it ordered the Department to produce a Vaughn index.

IV.

[6] "Although generic determinations are permitted, and the government need not justify its 7(A) refusal on a document-by-document basis, there must nevertheless be some minimally sufficient showing." Curran, 813 F.2d at 475. To satisfy its burden with regard to Exemption 7(A), the government must define functional categories of documents; 1310 it must conduct a document-by-document review to assign documents to proper categories; and it must explain to the court how the release of each category would interfere with enforcement proceedings. [FN4] See Bevis v. Department of State, 801 F.2d 1386, 1389 (D.C.Cir.1986).

FN4. We express no opinion as to whether the > categorical index submitted by the Department in this case satisfies the Bevis paradigm. The proceeding below was, for all intents and purposes, focused only on whether the district court could order a Vaughn index. On remand, the Department should submit its categorical index and affidavits in accordance with the principles set forth in this opinion.

[7] If the generic index submitted by the government is not sufficient to sustain the 7(A) exemption, then the district court may request more specific, distinct categories so that it may more easily determine how each category might interfere with enforcement proceedings. See Campbell, 682 F.2d at 265. Indeed, this is what the court ordered in Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1390. "The chief characteristic of an acceptable taxonomy should be functionality--that is, the classification should be clear enough to permit a court to ascertain 'how each .. category of documents, if disclosed, would interfere with the investigation.' " Curran, 813 F.2d at 475 (citing Campbell, 682 F.2d at 265).

[8] If the categories remain too general, the district court may also examine the disputed documents in camera to make a first hand determination. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B); Lewis, 823 F.2d at 378; see also Cleary v. FBI, 811 F.2d 421, 423 (8th Cir.1987) (in camera examination in 7(C) and (D) exemption case); Parton v. United States Dep't of Justice, 727 F.2d 774 (8th Cir.1984); Cox v. United States Dep't of Justice, 576 F.2d 1302 (8th Cir.1978).

In Dickerson v. Department of Justice, 992 F.2d 1426 (6th Cir.1993), the plaintiff sought the release of information from the Hoffa FBI file and requested a Vaughn index. The district court accepted the government's categorical index, examined certain documents in camera, and granted summary judgment to the government on the basis of Exemption 7(A). The court stated that it was "satisfied beyond any doubt that the investigation into Hoffa's disappearance is active and continuing, with the clear direction of future criminal proceedings being instituted." Dickerson v. Department of Justice, No. 90-CV-60045-AA, 1991 WL 337422 (E.D.Mich. July 31, 1991).

On appeal, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reviewed the file that had been submitted to the district court and concluded that the district court had not abused its discretion in ruling that there was no need to go beyond the documents that the FBI had submitted. Dickerson, 992 F.2d at 1431-32. The court of appeals also held that the district court was correct in finding that the FBI's investigation remains active and that it was directed toward the institution of criminal proceedings. Id. at 1432. Further, the Sixth Circuit held that the district court was correct "in its finding that production of the records sought by plaintiff Dickerson could reasonably be expected to interfere with a future prosecution." Id. at 1433.

[9] In the present case, the district court was apparently of the belief that the Department was not asserting Exemption 7(A) in good faith or that it had not individually reviewed the requested documents to place them in their functional categories. While the district court may not order a Vaughn index as an aid to its review, it still must satisfy itself that the requested documents have been properly withheld. The Department's failure to demonstrate that the sought-after documents relate to an ongoing investigation or could reasonably be expected to interfere with future law enforcement proceedings will carry with it the loss of the 7(A) exemption. In that regard, we note that although the Sixth Circuit's affirmative holding on that issue in Dickerson will not be binding on the district court on remand, that holding does give credence to the Department's assertion of the 7(A) exemption in the present case.

In summary, Congress enacted Exemption 7(A) to prohibit interference in an ongoing criminal investigation. The Supreme Court's decision in Robbins Tire to allow generic category-by-category classifications in Exemption 7(A) cases, rather than detailed fact- 1311 specific explanations on a document-by-document basis, serves an important interest: "[p]rovision of the detail which a satisfactory Vaughn Index entails would itself probably breach the dike." Curran, 813 F.2d at 475. "Withal, a tightrope must be walked [in Exemption 7(A) cases]: categories must be distinct enough to allow meaningful judicial review, yet not so distinct as prematurely to let the cat out of the investigative bag." Id. In short, we will not allow the cure, Exemption 7(A), to "become the carrier of the disease." Id.

The writ of mandamus prayed for is issued. The orders directing the production of a Vaughn index are vacated, and the case is remanded to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

McMILLIAN, Circuit Judge, with whom RICHARD S. ARNOLD, Chief Judge, joins, dissenting.

"Free people are, of necessity, informed; uninformed people can never be free." Sen. Judiciary Comm., Freedom of Information, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. 3 (1963) (remarks of Sen. Edward Long).

As discussed below, although I agree with much of the analysis in the majority opinion, I do not agree that the district court exceeded the scope of its authority when it ordered the Department of Justice (hereinafter the government) to prepare a Vaughn index of FBIHQ file 9-60052, the FBI's investigatory file concerning the investigation into the disappearance and presumed murder of Teamsters president Jimmy Hoffa in July 1975. Accordingly, I would deny the petition for writ of mandamus.

COLLATERAL ORDER

First, I do not agree that we have appellate jurisdiction to review the government's appeal, No. 91-2164. As discussed below, the term "Vaughn index" is derived from Vaughn v. Rosen, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 340, 484 F.2d 820 (1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974), and a Vaughn index is typically a detailed affidavit which "permit[s] the court system effectively and efficiently to evaluate the factual nature of disputed information." Id., 484 F.2d at 826. In my view, the district court order in the present case requiring the preparation of a Vaughn index was essentially a discovery order in this FOIA litigation. Discovery orders are "generally not appealable as collateral orders even when they are attacked as burdensome." Hinton v. Department of Justice, 844 F.2d 126, 131 (3d Cir.1988). The Vaughn index is not an end in itself; by definition, the Vaughn index does not itself disclose anything of substance. "[A] Vaughn index does not accord a requester any of the substantive relief [the requester] seeks.... Rather, the [Vaughn] index is a tool for determining the requester's substantive rights [under FOIA]." Id. at 130.

It is true that "[the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA)] was not intended to supplement or displace rules of discovery." John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. 146, 153, 110 S.Ct. 471, 475, 107 L.Ed.2d 462 (1989). However, the present case involves only the FOIA requests themselves. It is a discrete civil action. The FOIA is not being used here as a discovery tool to supplement or displace discovery in connection with other litigation, for example, other criminal or civil proceedings. In discovery proceedings the issue is whether the information sought is relevant and necessary; however, in FOIA litigation the only issue is whether the agency has properly withheld the information sought under one of the specific statutory exemptions. See, e.g., North v. Walsh, 279 U.S.App.D.C. 373, 881 F.2d 1088, 1095 (1989) (FOIA request seeking documents from Office of Independent Counsel concerning on-going criminal investigation of plaintiff).

I also do not agree that the district court order is appealable under the final collateral order exception. Hinton v. Department of Justice, 844 F.2d at 131. Collateral orders are appealable if (1) the order conclusively decides the disputed issue, (2) the issue is entirely distinct from the merits of the case, and (3) the order would be effectively unreviewable if the appeal were postponed until the issuance of a final order. Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 437 U.S. 463, 468, 98 S.Ct. 2454, 2457, 57 L.Ed.2d 351 (1978); Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 546, 69 S.Ct. 1221, 1225, 93 L.Ed. 1528 (1949). At this point in the present case, the district court has only ordered the preparation of a Vaughn index and has yet to 1312 conclusively decide the merits of the government's claim of exemption under Exemption 7(A). The district court agreed to consider the Vaughn index in camera; the district court has not even decided whether or not to disclose the Vaughn index itself to the public or counsel for plaintiff. As noted above, the preparation of a Vaughn index "does not accord a requester any of the substantive relief [he or she] seeks." Id. at 130. The substantive relief the requester wants is access to the government's records, not the preparation of or access to the Vaughn index of those records. The preparation of a Vaughn index is only a preliminary or preparatory step. As was noted by the panel majority opinion,

the present case

> is unique because it is not a review of a district court's order that documents be disclosed, nor is it a review of a district court's decision that documents are exempt from disclosure. [The present] case asks us to determine what a district court may do while deciding whether documents are or are not exempt from disclosure.

950 F.2d at 533.

MANDAMUS

In the present case the government does not argue the district court abused its discretion in ordering a Vaughn index; the government argues the district court lacked the authority to order a Vaughn index. The government has thus presented the issue in terms of the power or authority of the district court. The government argues that Exemption 7(A) is different from other FOIA exemptions and that the district court can never require the preparation of a Vaughn index when the government agency invokes Exemption 7(A). As noted by the panel majority opinion, this is a novel argument that squarely challenges the authority of the district court to act. 950 F.2d at 532. Because the government has presented its argument in terms of the district court's authority to act, and not in terms of whether or not the district court abused its discretion, I agree that, under these unique circumstances, we have jurisdiction to review the district court order by petition for writ of mandamus.

THE VAUGHN INDEX

A healthy distrust of government, and a corresponding suspicion of government secrecy, is the underlying premise of FOIA. FOIA "seeks to permit access to official information long shielded unnecessarily from public view and attempts to create a judicially enforceable public right to secure such information from possibly unwilling official hands." EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 80, 93 S.Ct. 827, 832, 35 L.Ed.2d 119 (1973). "The basic purpose of FOIA is to ensure an informed citizenry, vital to the functioning of a democratic society, needed to check against corruption and to hold the governors accountable to the governed." NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 242, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2327, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978) (Robbins). FOIA's "general philosophy [is] 'full agency disclosure unless information is exempted under clearly delineated statutory language.' " Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 360-61, 96 S.Ct. 1592, 1599, 48 L.Ed.2d 11 (1976), citing S.Rep. No. 813, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 3 (1965). " 'Congress realized that legitimate governmental and private interests could be harmed by release of certain types of information,' and therefore provided the 'specific exemptions under which disclosure could be refused.' " John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475, citing FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 621, 102 S.Ct. 2054, 2059, 72 L.Ed.2d 376 (1982). The statutory exemptions are to be narrowly construed, Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. at 361, 96 S.Ct. at 1599, the district courts review the claim of exemptions de novo, and the burden of justifying nondisclosure, that is, the burden of establishing that the information requested is protected from disclosure by a specific exemption, is on the agency. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B).

As noted by the panel majority opinion, the district court's responsibility to review de novo the government's claimed exemptions is complicated by the fact that "ordinarily a government agency, and not the court, has access to the documents in question." 950 F.2d at 533. "The party requesting the disclosure must rely upon his [or her] adversary's representations as to the material withheld, and the court is deprived of the benefit of informed advocacy to draw its attention to the weaknesses in the withholding 1313 agency's arguments." Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d 972, 977 (9th Cir.1991), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 3013, 120 L.Ed.2d 886 (1992). This is the precise difficulty at the heart of the present case and it is also what precipitated the invention of the Vaughn index.

> [I]t is anomalous but obviously inevitable that the party with the greatest interest in obtaining disclosure is at a loss to argue with desirable legal precision for the revelation of the concealed information. Obviously, the party seeking disclosure cannot know the precise contents of the documents sought; secret information is, by definition, unknown to the party seeking disclosure....
> In a very real sense, only one side to the controversy (the side opposing disclosure) is in a position confidently to make statements categorizing information, and this case provides a classic example of such a situation.

Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d at 823-24. Thus, in FOIA litigation, the plaintiff, the party seeking disclosure, is placed in the awkward and frustrating position of speculating about the likely contents of documents that it has never seen.

In Vaughn v. Rosen the plaintiff was a law professor doing research on the Civil Service Commission. The professor sought disclosure of the evaluations of certain government agencies' personnel management programs and certain other special reports of the Bureau of Personnel Management. The government claimed that the documents contained information of a personal nature about the government agency employees and that disclosure would constitute an invasion of the employees' personal privacy. The court of appeals noted that the plaintiff's lack of knowledge necessarily meant that he quite literally did not know, and therefore could not inform the court, whether or not the government's factual characterization of the documents as containing information of a personal nature was accurate. Id., 484 F.2d at 824. The court of appeals observed that the plaintiff's lack of knowledge not only hampered his ability to litigate in the district court (he was essentially limited to arguing that the exemption is very narrow and that the general nature of the documents sought made it unlikely that they contained personal information), but

> The problem is compounded at the appellate level. In reviewing a determination of exemption, an appellate court must consider the appropriateness of a trial court's characterization of the factual nature of the information. Frequently trial courts' holdings in FOIA cases are stated in very conclusory terms, saying simply that the information falls under one or another of the exemptions to [FOIA]. An appellate court, like the trial court, is completely without the controverting illumination that would ordinarily accompany a request to review a lower court's factual determination; it must conduct its own investigation into the document. The scope of inquiry will not have been focused by the adverse parties and, if justice is to be done, the examination must be relatively comprehensive. Obviously, an appellate court is even less suited to making this inquiry than is a trial court.

Id., 484 F.2d at 824-25. The FOIA requester in the present case is in the same position as the law professor in Vaughn v. Rosen.

The Vaughn v. Rosen court concluded that, contrary to the intent of Congress, FOIA "actually encourage[d] the Government to contend that large masses of information are exempt, when in fact part of the information should be disclosed." Id., 484 F.2d at 826. Not only did FOIA contain "no inherent incentives that would affirmatively spur government agencies to disclose information," id., but "since the burden of determining the justifiability of a government claim of exemption currently falls on the court system, ... [FOIA] encourage[d] agencies automatically to claim the broadest possible grounds for exemption for the greatest amount of information." 1314 Id. These concerns compelled the Vaughn v. Rosen court to develop what has become known as the Vaughn index in order to "(1) assure that a party's right to information is not submerged beneath governmental obfuscation and mischaracterization, and (2) permit the court system effectively and efficiently to evaluate the factual nature of disputed information." Id.

As noted by the panel majority opinion,

950 F.2d at 533 (citations omitted). "Specificity is the defining requirement of the Vaughn index and affidavit; affidavits cannot support summary judgment [upholding the government's claimed exemption] if they are 'conclusory, merely reciting statutory standards, or if they are too vague or sweeping.' " King v. United States Department of Justice, 265 U.S.App.D.C. 62, 830 F.2d 210, 219 (1987) (footnotes omitted). "To accept an inadequately supported exemption claim 'would constitute an abandonment of the trial court's obligation under the FOIA to conduct a de novo review.' " Id. Whether the government's affidavit or affidavits constitute an adequate Vaughn index is a question of law reviewed de novo. Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d at 978, citing Binion v. United States Department of Justice, 695 F.2d 1189, 1193 (9th Cir.1983).

Preparation of the Vaughn index does more than require the government agency to review and classify the documents in question. The resulting Vaughn index is more than a litigation tool that the FOIA requester can use to challenge the government's withholding of those documents. It is important to remember that requiring the government agency to prepare a Vaughn index > forces the government to analyze carefully any material withheld, it enables the trial court to fulfill its duty of ruling on the applicability of the exemption, and it enables the adversary system to operate by giving the requester as much information as possible, on the basis of which he [or she] can present his [or her] case to the trial court.

Lykins v. Department of Justice, 233 U.S.App.D.C. 349, 725 F.2d 1455, 1463 (1984). "The index thus functions to restore the adversary process to some extent, and to permit more effective judicial review of the agency's decision." Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d at 977-78; see also Davis v. CIA, 711 F.2d 858, 861 (8th Cir.1983), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1035, 104 S.Ct. 1307, 79 L.Ed.2d 705 (1984).

ROBBINS DECISION

As has already been discussed, Exemption 7(A) is the law enforcement exemption and provides that disclosure is not required of "matters that are ... investigatory records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A). In the present case the government argues the district court lacked the authority to require the preparation of a Vaughn index because a Vaughn index is not required when Exemption 7(A) is invoked, citing Robbins, 437 U.S. at 223-24, 234-36, 98 S.Ct. at 2317-18, 2323. In Robbins the FOIA plaintiff was an employer seeking disclosure of witness statements prior to an unfair labor practice hearing. Following a contested representation election, the regional director of the NLRB filed an unfair labor practice charge against the employer for pre-election actions. A hearing was scheduled. Prior to the hearing, the employer sought disclosure of all potential witnesses' statements collected by the NLRB during its investigation. The regional director denied the request on the ground that the witness statements were exempt from disclosure under several FOIA exemptions, 1315 in particular Exemption 7(A). The employer appealed to the NLRB General Counsel. However, before the expiration of FOIA's 20-day response period, 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), the employer filed a FOIA action in federal district court, seeking disclosure of the witness statements and an injunction against holding the hearing until the documents had been disclosed. The NLRB argued that witness statements were exempt from disclosure under Exemption 7(A) because their production would interfere with an enforcement proceeding, the pending unfair labor practice hearing. The district court disagreed and ordered the NLRB to produce the witness statements.

The issue whether Exemption 7(A) was generic, or categorical, or case-specific emerged on appeal. The court of appeals rejected the NLRB's categorical or generic approach and concluded that the 1974 legislative history demonstrated that Exemption 7(A) was available only after a specific evidentiary showing of the possibility of actual interference in an individual case. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co. v. NLRB, 563 F.2d 724, 728 (5th Cir.1977). The court of appeals rejected the NLRB's arguments that the premature revelation of its case through the production of the witness statements before the hearing was the kind of interference that would justify nondisclosure and that pre-hearing production of witness statements would discourage potential witnesses from making statements at all. Id. at 729-31. The court of appeals acknowledged that the possibility of "interference" in the form of witness intimidation by the employer during the period between disclosure of the witness statements to the employer and the hearing, but held that the NLRB had failed to demonstrate that the witness statements were exempt because it had not introduced any evidence that witness intimidation was likely in this particular case. Id. at 732. But see, e.g., Title Guarantee Co. v. NLRB, 534 F.2d 484, 491 (2d Cir.) (holding statements of employees and union representatives obtained in NLRB investigation exempt from disclosure under Exemption 7(A) until completion of administrative and judicial proceedings), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 834, 97 S.Ct. 98, 50 L.Ed.2d 99 (1976).

The Supreme Court reversed. The Court endorsed the generic, or categorical, interpretation of Exemption 7(A) and held that "witness statements in pending unfair labor practice proceedings are exempt from FOIA disclosure at least until completion of the Board's hearing." 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. First, the Court noted that the language of the exemption, specifically the plural reference to "enforcement proceedings," suggested that "certain generic determinations" might be made under Exemption 7(A). Id. at 224, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. The Court concluded that the early legislative history supported this interpretation, id. at 225-26, 98 S.Ct. at 2318-19 (referring to Sen. Humphrey's concerns in 1966 about the need to protect statements of agency witnesses from disclosure prior to agency proceedings, specifically witnesses in unfair labor practice proceedings), as well as the reported decisions until 1974. Id. at 226, 98 S.Ct. at 2319 (citing cases). The Court also noted that the legislative history of the 1974 amendment of Exemption 7 showed "[t]hat the 1974 Congress did not mean to undercut the intent of the 1966 Congress with respect to Senator Humphrey's concern about interference with pending NLRB enforcement proceedings." Id. at 232, 98 S.Ct. at 2322; see id. at 226-32, 98 S.Ct. at 2319-22 (noting background of 1974 amendment, particularly Congressional disapproval of several D.C.Cir. decisions upholding "blanket exemptions" for all government records contained in investigatory files that had been compiled for law enforcement purposes; 1974 amendment changed scope of exemption from "files" to "records" and enumerated specific purposes and objectives of exemption).

The Court concluded that "Congress did not intend to prevent the federal courts from determining that, with respect to particular kinds of law enforcement proceedings, disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records while a case is pending would generally 'interfere with enforcement proceedings.' " Id. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. The Court agreed that "[t]he most obvious risk of interference with enforcement proceedings in this context is that employers or, in some cases, unions will coerce or intimidate employees and others who have given statements, in an effort to make them change their testimony 1316 or not testify at all." Id. at 239, 98 S.Ct. at 2325. In addition, prehearing disclosure of witnesses' statements "would disturb the existing balance of relations in unfair labor practice proceedings," id. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324, especially since, "[h]istorically, the NLRB has provided little prehearing discovery in unfair labor practice proceedings and has relied principally on statements such as those sought here to prove its case." Id. The Court also noted that the use of FOIA as the mechanism for providing a litigant with earlier and greater access to the agency's case than the litigant would otherwise have was likely to cause substantial delays in the administrative process and thus interfere with enforcement proceedings. Id. at 237-38, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. [FN5]

FN5. As noted by the majority opinion, at 1307 supra, the Supreme Court recently affirmed the Robbins categorical approach in United States Dep't of Justice v. Landano, --- U.S. ----, ----, ---- - ----, 113 S.Ct. 2014, 2021, 2023-24, 124 L.Ed.2d 84 (1993) (rejecting blanket exemption for "all" FBI sources as confidential for purposes of Exemption 7(D); however, "more narrowly defined circumstances" may support inference of confidentiality, for example, generic category of paid informants). See also United States Dep't of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989) (holding "rap sheets" constituted generic category of law enforcement records which could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy within meaning of Exemption 7(C)). I do not dispute the continued validity of the Robbins categorical approach. What is in dispute in the present case is whether, as a threshold matter, we know enough about the nature of the records in question to review the accuracy of the government's > classification of the records into generic categories. I submit that we do not.

APPLICATION OF EXEMPTION 7(A)

I do not think Robbins supports the government's argument in the present case. As noted by the panel majority opinion, after Robbins endorsed the generic, or categorical, application of Exemption 7(A), many courts of appeals > altered their views on the need for a Vaughn index when Exemption 7(A) is involved. The rationale underlying these post-Robbins decisions has been that a Vaughn index is unnecessary because the government is permitted to demonstrate interference based on categories of documents and need not demonstrate interference with enforcement proceedings on a document-by-document basis. E.g., Church of Scientology v. IRS, 792 F.2d 146, 152 (D.C.Cir.1986) (Scalia, J.); Barney v. IRS, 618 F.2d 1268, 1273 (8th Cir.1980) (per curiam). Moreover, in each of these cases, the appellate court was reviewing a district court's decision not to require a Vaughn index when the government had already provided adequate descriptions of the documents sought, as well as adequate explanations as to how the particular types of documents at issue could interfere with law enforcement proceedings.

> At no time, however, has an appellate court suggested that Robbins alters the district court's statutory obligation to review the claimed exemption's applicability. Robbins does not allow for exemption merely because documents appear in a law enforcement agency's file. When an agency relies upon Robbins and offers categorical justifications for exemption under Exemption 7(A), the agency must still review each document individually.... The district court is well within its authority to verify that the agency has actually examined and properly categorized each document. It may accomplish this task by requiring an affidavit that describes, on a document-by-document basis, the documents in the file, the categories into which each document is placed, and a description of how disclosure of each category of documents might interfere with enforcement proceedings. Robbins merely prevents a district court from ordering a document-by-document explanation as to how each document will interfere with enforcement proceedings. In other words, though the district court cannot require the government to justify its decision to deny disclosure on a document-by-document basis, it can require the government to justify its chosen categorization on a document-by-document basis. 950 F.2d at 533-34 (parenthetical omitted from Barney citation; citations omitted; footnote omitted).

In Robbins it was not disputed that the documents in question were in fact witness 1317 statements. Nor was it disputed in Robbins that, at least in general, disclosure of witness statements prior to the unfair labor practice proceeding could interfere with that proceeding. What was disputed was whether the agency could rely on that generality or whether the agency had to make a specific factual showing that disclosure of those particular witness statements would interfere with that particular proceeding. Similarly, in Barney v. IRS, there was no dispute about the categorization of the documents in question; the district court and this court were "satisfied that the government's affidavits adequately described the documents, the categories to which they belonged, and the possible harms of disclosure." 950 F.2d at 534, citing 618 F.2d at 1272-73 (witness statements, documentary evidence, IRS agent's work papers, internal agency memoranda). See Curran v. Department of Justice, 813 F.2d 473, 476 (1st Cir.1987) (apparent from agency affidavit that agency conducted individualized, document-by-document search, subdivided records into types and then into functional categories).

The same cannot be said in the present case. Here, the parties disputed not only the nature of the individual documents, but also the type of category used by the government, as well as the appropriate categorization or placement of the documents into particular categories. This basic lack of agreement about the nature and categorization of the documents distinguishes the present case from Robbins and Barney.

In the present case, the district court required preparation of a Vaughn index, and in response the government filed several public affidavits or declarations and a document which it captioned a "categorical index." The district court was clearly not satisfied with the government's response. As noted by the penal majority opinion, "[t]he district court's dissatisfaction [with the government's response was] understandable given the government's blanket assertion that all 13,800 documents, accumulated over a 15-year span, fit neatly into nine categories described over the course of five pages." Id. at 535; cf. Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d at 978 (noting the FBI's use of "boilerplate" explanations drawn from a "master" FOIA response). Furthermore, the district court believed that the FOIA requester had raised serious questions about the validity of the government's search and categorization of the documents. Id. Compare Curran v. Department of Justice, 813 F.2d at 476 (district court found no reason to impugn good faith of agency). The district court also concluded that it needed additional information "about each document, not only to verify that the government has fulfilled its obligation to examine each document, but also to enable it to understand or challenge the categories created by the government." 950 F.2d at 535.

By requiring the preparation of a Vaughn index in the present case, the district court was attempting to develop an adequate record. Only the government knows what is in the Hoffa file; the FOIA requester and the district court do not know, much less this court. As noted above, the record indicates only that the file consists of at least 13,800 pages in 70 volumes; the file is almost certainly larger now. Some of these pages are public source material which the government has already made available to the FOIA requester. According to the categorical index, which consists of a total of five double-spaced pages, each and every page falls within one of nine categories, the disclosure of which could reasonably be expected to interfere with law enforcement proceedings. The district court's dissatisfaction with the categorical index was directed more at the procedural and substantive accuracy of the government's classification of individual pages than at the categories identified by the government. (The majority opinion expresses no opinion on the sufficiency of the Baker affidavit and the categorical index. See supra at 1309 n. 4 supra.) In any event, as noted by the panel majority opinion, the district court's concern about whether all the documents are described by the government's categories cannot be resolved merely by requiring more specific or more detailed categories. 950 F.2d at 535.

In my view, assuming for purposes of analysis that the government's categories are sufficiently specific, the district court acted within its authority in requiring the government to verify that it had actually examined and accurately categorized each document. 1318 Indeed, it was its duty to do so. King v. United States Department of Justice, 830 F.2d at 219 (acceptance of inadequately supported exemption claim "would constitute abandonment of the trial court's obligation under FOIA to conduct a de novo review"). The district court did not know (and we do not know) whether the government's categorization of the documents was correct or, for that matter, whether the government had examined each document individually. The district court decided that, without a Vaughn index, it could not verify whether there was a correlation between the documents and the categories. Because all the documents necessarily fall into exempt categories, unless the district court can verify that each document has been examined and accurately categorized, the Robbins categories will become "no more than smaller versions of the 'blanket exemptions' disapproved by Congress in its 1974 amendments of FOIA." Bevis v. Department of State, 255 U.S.App.D.C. 347, 801 F.2d 1386, 1389 (1986), citing Robbins, 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324.

As noted by the panel majority opinion, preparation of a Vaughn index in the present case does not require the government to demonstrate document-by-document how disclosure of each document could reasonably be expected to interfere with pending law enforcement proceedings. 950 F.2d at 535. Like the district court and the panel majority, I accept the category-by-category approach. What I do not accept is the government's conclusory assertions that each and every document in the Hoffa file falls within one of its nine categories. In other words, what is disputed, and what the district court sought to verify by requiring the preparation of a Vaughn index, is whether the government's categorization of each document is accurate. Without such a record, the FOIA requester cannot test the government's claim of exemption, the district court cannot conduct the required de novo review of the government's decision not to disclose (without undertaking the arduous task of actually reviewing the documents itself), and this court cannot conduct a meaningful review of the district court's decision.

It should be noted that the district court could decide to modify its order requiring the government to prepare a Vaughn index for the entire Hoffa file. In the proceedings before the district court, the government argued that preparation of a Vaughn index for the entire Hoffa file would be inordinately time-consuming and would necessarily divert scarce resources from other law enforcement activities. The district court could require the government to prepare a Vaughn index for a representative sample of the documents in the Hoffa file. "Representative sampling is an appropriate procedure to test an agency's FOIA exemption claims when a large number of documents are involved." Bonner v. United States Department of State, 289 U.S.App.D.C. 56, 928 F.2d 1148, 1151 (1991); accord The Washington Post v. United States Department of Defense, 766 F.Supp. 1, 15 (D.D.C.1991).

Alternatively, the district court could decide to conduct an in camera review of a representative sample of the documents in the Hoffa file. In camera review is discretionary. Robbins, 437 U.S. at 224, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. Limited in camera review might be particularly helpful in the present case. "[A] finding of bad faith or contrary evidence is not a prerequisite to in camera review; a trial judge may order such an inspection 'on the basis of an uneasiness, on a doubt [the judge] wants satisfied before [taking] responsibility for a de novo determination.' " Meeropol v. Meese, 252 U.S.App.D.C. 381, 790 F.2d 942, 958 (1986), citing Ray v. Turner, 190 U.S.App.D.C. 290, 587 F.2d 1187, 1195 (1978). One district judge and one appellate panel have examined in camera a selection made by the government of the documents contained in the Hoffa file and concluded that those documents established that the criminal investigation into Hoffa's disappearance is active and continuing and that production of those records could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings. Dickerson v. Department of Justice, No. 90-CV-60045-AA, 1991 WL 337422, slip op. at 5-6 (E.D.Mich. July 31, 1991), aff'd, 992 F.2d 1426 (6th Cir.1993).

For the reasons set forth above, I would hold the district court has the authority to require the government to prepare a Vaughn index even when Exemption 7(A) is invoked 1319 and would deny the government's application for writ of mandamus.

WASHINGTON POST COMPANY, Appellant,
v.
UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, et al.

No. 88-5037.

United States Court of Appeals,
District of Columbia Circuit.

Argued Oct. 17, 1988.

Decided Dec. 16, 1988.

Newspaper sought access to report compiled by outside directors of drug selling company from Department of Justice under the Freedom of Information Act. The United States District Court for the District of Columbia, Norma Holloway Johnson, J., granted the Government summary judgment on its claims the report was protected from disclosure under FOIA exemptions, and the newspaper appealed. The Court of Appeals, Mikva, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) FOIA exemption shielding material specifically exempted from disclosure by another statute did not preclude disclosure of the report based on federal criminal rule prohibiting government attorney from disclosing matters occurring before grand jury; (2) FOIA exemption shielding information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to extent production of such information could reasonably be expected to constitute unwarranted invasion of personal privacy did not preclude disclosure of the report, as none of the privacy interests encompassed by that exemption would be implicated by disclosure of the report; and (3) to withstand challenge to applicability of FOIA exemption shielding information compiled for law enforcement purposes to extent production would deprive person of right to fair trial or impartial adjudication, Government bears burden of showing that trial or adjudication is pending or truly imminent and that it is more probable than not that disclosure of the material sought would seriously interfere with fairness of those proceedings.

Opinion for the Court filed by Circuit Judge MIKVA.

MIKVA, Circuit Judge:

The Washington Post Company ("Post") is pursuing access to a report, compiled by outside directors of Eli Lilly and Company ("Lilly"), from the Department of Justice ("Department") under the Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA"). The Department claims that the document is protected from disclosure under four of the Act's exemptions, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3), (4), (7)(B), (7)(C) (1982 & Supp.1988). The district court granted the government summary judgment on all four grounds, and the Post appeals. We reverse the court's decision 99 193 as to the applicability of exemption (3) and (7)(C), remand the record for a determination of whether the requirements of (7)(B), as discussed below, are met in this case, and retain the case as to exemption (4). The district court concluded that the report was commercial information that fell within exemption (4) because it was confidential or, in the alternative, privileged as a "self-evaluative report." We need not address this less precedent-bound question unless exemption (7)(B) is found not to be applicable. If, however, it is determined that the report is not shielded under exemption (7)(B), we will decide the exemption (4) question at that time.

I. BACKGROUND

In 1982, Eli Lilly introduced an arthritis drug, benoxaprofen, under the brand name Oraflex, but withdrew it a few months later, after reports of deaths and other severe adverse reactions. The company faced several product liability suits, an investigation by the Food and Drug Administration ("FDA") and a threatened shareholder derivative suit. In December 1982, Lilly's board of directors established a special committee of outside directors which, with the help of an outside law firm, began an investigation. The committee was charged with evaluating the company's development and marketing of the drug and determining whether the company had any claims against employees or others and, if it did, whether it would be in its best interests to pursue them.

Soon after, the Department, at the request of the FDA, began its own investigation. There apparently had been numerous deaths and other severe reactions in other countries attributed to Oraflex. Lilly did not report these reactions to the FDA, either in its application for permission to distribute Oraflex in this country or afterward. Nor did Lilly include liver failure, kidney failure or jaundice--the reactions that had occurred overseas--in its Oraflex labels as possible adverse reactions. If Lilly knew of these deaths and other severe reactions, through reports from its foreign subsidiaries or otherwise, it was subject to federal prosecution for not reporting this information to the FDA and for not including it on labels of Oraflex distributed in the United States.

On July 8, 1983, the Department made a written request to Lilly for certain documents, including any investigations conducted by Lilly that concerned reports of adverse reactions made by Lilly's foreign subsidiaries to its U.S. headquarters or that concerned Lilly's reporting of these adverse reactions to the FDA. Lilly decided to cooperate with the Department, after the Department assured it in writing that material made available would remain confidential and any third-party requests, including FOIA ones, would be resisted. When the special committee's report, entitled "Report and Recommendations of the Special Committee of the Board of Directors of Eli Lilly and Company Concerning the Development and Marketing of Oraflex," was completed in October 1983, Lilly submitted it to the Department. The Department's investigation proceeded apace, and in March 1984, the Department impanelled a grand jury to consider indictments of the company and possibly individuals.

Lilly's open letters and reports to shareholders announced the special committee's report and the Department and grand jury investigations. A Post reporter, covering the Oraflex story, first requested a copy of the report under FOIA in April 1984. The Department denied the request on exemption (3), (7)(A) and 7(C) grounds, but on administrative appeal, the department refused to disclose the report on exemption (4) and 7(B) grounds. The Post filed this suit to compel production, but the district court below granted summary judgment for the Department on all four grounds asserted in its motion: exemptions (3), (4), (7)(B) and (7)(C).

II. DISCUSSION

A. Exemption (3)

statute." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3). The court below found that Federal Rule of *100 194 Criminal Procedure 6(e) protects Lilly's report because it prohibits an attorney for the government from disclosing "matters occurring before the grand jury." Fed.R.Crim.P. 6(e). The court found that the report was a matter occurring before the grand jury because the report was subpoenaed by the grand jury in September 1984, was used by government lawyers to question witnesses before the jury, and was available to the jurors. Our review compels the conclusion that exemption (3) has no bearing on this case.

This court has consistently held that Rule 6(e) does not draw a "veil of secrecy" over all documents about activity investigated by the grand jury or even all documents revealed to the grand jury. SEC v. Dresser Industries, Inc., 628 F.2d 1368, 1382 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 993, 101 S.Ct. 529, 66 L.Ed.2d 289 (1980). The relevant inquiry is whether the document would reveal the inner workings of the grand jury, such as witness names, or the substance of testimony or the direction and strategy of the investigation. See Fund for Constitutional Government v. National Archives, 656 F.2d 856, 869-70 (D.C.Cir.1981). Moreover, the document itself must reveal the inner workings; the government cannot immunize a document by publicizing the link. See Senate of Puerto Rico v. Department of Justice, 823 F.2d 574, 583 (D.C.Cir.1987).

The report at issue here was in existence almost five months before the grand jury was impanelled. It had a purpose wholly separate from grand jury deliberations, as it was commissioned by a private corporation to evaluate that corporation's past conduct, defenses, liabilities and potential civil claims against others. Nor would the report have revealed anything whatsoever about the grand jury's deliberations had the government not disclosed the report's role in those deliberations. When the Post first requested disclosure of the report, it was not yet before the grand jury. That the grand jury subpoenaed it five months later and that it used the report to question witnesses would not be known by the Post today had the Department not recounted the report's grand jury role in this litigation.

Therefore, we hold that exemption (3) does not constitute a ground for denying the Post's FOIA request. We find not only that the Department has failed to show that disclosure would reveal the grand jury's inner workings; we find that such a showing could not be made on these facts. The government's decision to persist in arguing this basis for denial, on appeal, despite this court's 1987 decision in Senate of Puerto Rico v. Department of Justice, was questionable at best.

B. Exemption (7)(C)

[2] Exemption (7)(C) exempts "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C). We need not dwell on whether the special committee's report is information compiled for law enforcement purposes. The Post concedes that it is. But we find that none of the privacy interests encompassed by (7)(C) would be implicated by disclosure of the special committee's report.

[3] The disclosures with which the statute is concerned are those of "an intimate personal nature" such as marital status, legitimacy of children, identity of fathers of children, medical condition, welfare payments, alcoholic consumption, family fights, and reputation. Sims v. CIA, 642 F.2d 562, 574 (D.C.Cir.1980). Information relating to business judgments and relationships does not qualify for exemption. See id. at 575. This is so even if disclosure might tarnish someone's professional reputation. See Cohen v. EPA, 575 F.Supp. 425, 429 (D.D.C.1983). The report that the Post seeks here would not reveal anything of a private nature about any employees mentioned, as it is an investigation and assessment of the business decisions of Lilly employees during the development and marketing of a commercial product. It may be that such a report, if it accused *101 195 individual employees of having committed a crime, would implicate the privacy interest of personal honor. But there is no reason to assume that this report accuses anyone of breaking the law and the government does not so allege.

[4] Nonetheless, it is true that the protection accorded reputation would generally shield material when disclosure would show that an individual was the target of a law enforcement investigation. See

Fund for Constitutional Government v. National Archives, 656 F.2d 856, 866 (D.C.Cir.1981). The report in question does not, however, in itself identify any particular employees as targets of the Department's investigation. Since the report was prepared by Lilly for its own business purposes, the inclusion of a name in the special committee's report does not divulge whether the individual was a target of any law enforcement investigation or even whether the individual was considered, by law enforcement personnel, to have any relevance to their inquiry.

C. Exception (7)(B)

Exemption (7)(B) exempts "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes" to the extent that production "would deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or an impartial adjudication." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(B). It is settled that the report satisfies the first part of this definition. The legitimacy of the Department's invoking (7)(B) turns on the meaning and applicability of the second portion of the exemption.

What is required to establish that production of a document being sought under FOIA would deprive a person of a right to a fair trial is a question of first impression for this court. In framing a test, we write on a virtually clean slate. Few courts have decided (7)(B) questions and the legislative history on this provision is scant. The wording of the statute is all Congress has given us to work with. See United States Department of Justice, Attorney General's Memorandum on the 1974 Amendments to the Freedom of Information Act 8 (1975) [hereinafter "A.G. Mem."], reprinted in House Comm. on Gov. Operations and Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 94th Cong., 1st Sess., Freedom of Information Act and Amendments of 1974 Source Book, at 518 (1975) [hereinafter "Sourcebook"]. The exemption was enacted as part of the FOIA amendments of 1974. Congress replaced the old section (7), which protected any investigatory record not otherwise available, with the six tightly drawn categories of protection listed in § 552(b)(7). The wording of the second of those categories, now (7)(B), survived intact and without debate from the floor amendment by Senator Philip Hart.

We begin this analysis, as we must, within the framework that precedent does provide. FOIA is to be interpreted with a presumption favoring disclosure and exemptions are to be construed narrowly. See Department of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 361, 96 S.Ct. 1592, 1599, 48 L.Ed.2d 11 (1976). The burden of proof rests on the party who seeks to prevent disclosure. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 79, 93 S.Ct. 827, 832, 35 L.Ed.2d 119 (1973). That burden cannot be met by mere conclusory statements; the agency must show how release of the particular material would have the adverse consequence that the Act seeks to guard against. See Campbell v. HHS, 682 F.2d 256, 259 (D.C.Cir.1982).

The Attorney General's Memorandum on the 1974 Amendments, of interest whether or not due deference, interpreted the exemption as protecting the rights of private persons, including corporations, and applying to both civil and criminal proceedings as well as agency adjudications. The exemption, according to the Attorney General, was meant to prevent disclosures from conferring an unfair advantage upon one party to an adversary proceeding or leading to prejudicial publicity in pending cases that might inflame jurors or distort administrative judgment. See A.G. Mem. at 9, Sourcebook at 519.

The few cases that have addressed (7)(B) as a ground for withholding documents have rejected it as inapplicable because one or another threshold element was not established. 102 196 In Playboy Enterprises, Inc. v. Department of Justice, 516 F.Supp. 233, 246 (D.D.C.1981), aff'd in pertinent part, 677 F.2d 931 (D.C.Cir.1982), the district court rejected the ground because no proceedings were pending. Two district courts have found (7)(B) grounds inapplicable because the government failed to show that publicity would be so prejudicial as to deprive someone of a fair trial or impartial adjudication. See Associated General Contractors of America v. Small Business Administration, 1 Gov't Disclosure Cas. (P-H) ¶ 79,119, at 79,158 (D.D.C. Oct. 1, 1979) (finding proffer inadequate to show extent of publicity and prejudice that would result); Education/Instruccion, Inc. v. Department of Housing and Urban Development, 471 F.Supp. 1074, 1078 (D.Mass.1979) (holding that administrative adjudicator's seeing investigative report could not vitiate impartiality as law permits investigator to sit as adjudicator on same matter).

Perhaps the major value of the Attorney General's Memorandum, in conjunction with this sparse case law, is to emphasize the wide variety of persons and proceedings but narrow range of situations to which (7)(B) applies. As with all FOIA exemptions, (7)(B) is limited to protecting material only where release would bring about the adverse consequence that Congress sought to prevent.

[5][6] Today, we hold that to withstand a challenge to the applicability of (7)(B) the government bears the burden of showing: (1) that a trial or adjudication is pending or truly imminent; and (2) that it is more probable than not that disclosure of the material sought would seriously interfere with the fairness of those proceedings. Where the government is denying access to material generated by someone else, as here, the government must be able to confirm, to its own satisfaction, whether by affidavit or otherwise, that (1) and (2) above are satisfied.

[7][8] Whether the first and second prong of this test are satisfied is, in the first instance, for the district court to ascertain. The record before us in this case does not contain the factual findings necessary to resolve the question, and we therefore remand the record for a determination of this point. The court below did find that there were no longer any criminal proceedings pending or imminent, as the Department of Justice had accepted a guilty plea from Lilly and a nolo contendere plea from the Chief Medical Officer of Lilly Research Laboratories and planned no further indictments. The court also found that the parties asserted that four civil product liability cases were pending. But the status of those or other civil cases at this point is not clear. The Department's brief deferred entirely to Lilly on this question. Lilly merely asserted, in a footnote, that there was litigation pending, without specification. Such an unsupported assertion, from a non-government party, does not rise to the level of proof necessary to satisfy the first prong of a (7)(B) exemption.

[9][10] Even if Lilly were faced with current litigation arising from its marketing of Oraflex, it would not automatically follow that disclosure of the report would deprive Lilly of a fair trial. The second prong is not a redundancy but requires separate findings. Congress made the threshold of (7)(B) higher than for most of the other exemptions for law enforcement material. Whereas (7)(A), (C), (D) and (F) permit records to be withheld if release "could reasonably be expected to" cause a particular evil, (7)(B) requires that release "would" deprive a person of fair adjudication. § 552(b)(7)(A)-(F). It may be that release of the document to the Post could be expected to lead to publicity which was not just disadvantageous to Lilly but of a nature and degree that judicial fairness would be compromised. It may be that disclosure through FOIA would furnish access to a document not available under the discovery rules and thus would confer an unfair advantage on one of the parties. The trial court, on remand, is best situated to consider whether the facts here are sufficient to meet (7)(B)'s second prong.

*103 197 III. CONCLUSION

Accordingly, we remand the record to the district court for a determination of whether the Department of Justice is entitled, under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(B), to withhold the "Report and Recommendations of the Special Committee of the Board of Directors of Eli Lilly and Company Concerning The Development and Marketing of Oraflex" which was requested by The Washington Post. In addition, we reverse the district court's findings that exemptions (3) and (7)(C) permit the Department of Justice to resist The Washington Post's FOIA request.

The record is forthwith remanded to the district court for further proceedings, consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Nos. 81-1907, 81-1922.

United States Court of Appeals,
District of Columbia Circuit.

Argued Nov. 19, 1981.

Decided Jan. 22, 1982.

Plaintiff filed a proceeding against the Federal Bureau of Investigation relying on provisions of the Freedom of Information Act and the Privacy Act. The United States District Court for the District of Columbia, 508 F.Supp. 751, Barrington D. Parker, J., held that certain documents were not the result of any legitimate law enforcement purpose, and thus ordered their disclosure. The FBI appealed. The Court of Appeals, Harry T. Edwards, Circuit Judge, held that federal agencies, including the FBI, must meet the threshold requirements of the exemption from disclosure for investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes before they may withhold requested documents on the basis of any of its subparts, and that the FBI sufficiently established that those documents were exempt from disclosure as investigatory records, even though methods used by the FBI in its counterintelligence program may have been improper.

Reversed and remanded.

In Freedom of Information Act action seeking FBI records, district court incorrectly distinguished documents concerning FBI's counterintelligence program from other documents for which it found law enforcement purpose, even though methods frequently used by FBI in its counterintelligence activities offered ready distinction from more typical means of law enforcement, since exemption for investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes refers to purposes rather than to methods. 5 U.S.C.A. §§ 552, 552(b)(7).

409 18 Appeals from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia (D.C.Civil Action No. 78-1688).

Before MacKINNON, ROBB and EDWARDS, Circuit Judges.

Opinion for the Court filed by Circuit Judge HARRY T. EDWARDS.

HARRY T. EDWARDS, Circuit Judge:

This case is a logical sequel to the decision of this Circuit a little more than a year ago in Abramson v. Federal Bureau of Investigation, 658 F.2d 806 (D.C.Cir.1980), cert. granted, 452 U.S. 937, 101 S.Ct. 3079, 69 L.Ed.2d 951 (1981) (No. 80-1735). In Abramson we held, inter alia, that documents in the possession of the Federal Bureau 410 19 of Investigation ("FBI") must satisfy the threshold language of Exemption 7 of the Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA") [FN1]-"investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes"- before any of the constituent parts of Exemption 7 may be asserted as a basis for nondisclosure of agency records requested under the Act.[FN2] Abramson, 658 F.2d at 811-12. Because the District Court in Abramson found that certain of the requested records (i.e., "name check" summaries) were compiled solely for political purposes, and because the Government did not challenge that finding on review, see id. at 810-11, that case presented the question of whether the threshold language of Exemption 7 was to have any application to the FBI. Based on the plain meaning of section (b)(7) of FOIA, we held that it did.

FN1. 5 U.S.C. s 552 (1976 & Supp. IV 1980).

FN2. Exemption 7 of the Freedom of Information Act provides: (b) This section does not apply to matters that are-.... (7) investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such records would (A) interfere with enforcement proceedings, (B) deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or an impartial adjudication, (C) constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, (D) disclose the identity of a confidential source and, in the case of a record compiled by a criminal law enforcement authority in the course of a criminal investigation, or by an agency conducting a lawful national security intelligence investigation, confidential information furnished only by the confidential source, (E) disclose investigative techniques and procedures, or (F) endanger the life or physical safety of law enforcement personnel. 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(7) (1976) (emphasis added).

The decision in Abramson, however, did not reach one of the principal questions raised by this appeal. Because the Government did not challenge the finding in Abramson that the records at issue were not compiled for law enforcement purposes, we had no occasion to pass upon the appropriate judicial test for determining whether documents held by the FBI are indeed "investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes." This case, however, requires us to express and apply such a test.

In this case, Elmer G. ("Geronimo") Pratt, a former officer of the Black Panther Party, requested from the FBI all documents and records filed under his name and all other records containing his name or pertaining to him. Through his original request to the FBI, administrative appeals within the agency, and his action in the District Court, Pratt has obtained over 1,200 documents in whole or in part. At issue on this appeal is the proper treatment to be accorded twenty documents, all of which were generated by the FBI's Counter-Intelligence Program ("COINTELPRO") activities directed at the Black Panther Party.

The District Court held that the disputed documents were not the result of "any legitimate law enforcement purpose," Pratt v. Webster, 508 F.Supp. 751, 761 (D.D.C.1981), and hence did not satisfy the Exemption 7 threshold. Although we note that certain of these documents evince illegal FBI practices, we are constrained to find that the records sought derived at least in part from a purpose to enforce and prevent violations of the criminal laws. In light of this finding, we must reverse the decision of the District Court denying the Government's requests for nondisclosure. We remand so that the District Court may consider the proper application of the subparts of Exemption 7 to the twenty documents in question.

I. BACKGROUND

A. Factual Background

During the late 1960s, plaintiff-appellee Pratt was the Deputy Minister of Defense for the Southern California Branch of the Black Panther Party ("BPP"). During the late 1960s and early 1970s the Black Panther Party was the object of intensive scrutiny by the FBI as an allegedly subversive, and potentially violent, domestic organization.[411 FN3] *20 Pratt's position in the BPP made his activities a likely subject of concern and surveillance by the FBI.

FN3. See generally Senate Select Comm. to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities, Final Report, S.Rep.No.755, 94th Cong., 2d Sess., Book III at 185-223 (1976) (hereinafter cited as Church Committee Report) (chapter titled "The FBI's Covert Action Program To Destroy The Black Panther Party"), reprinted in Jt.App. at 316-34.

On July 28, 1972, Pratt was found guilty of murder and robbery in a California state court and, on August 28, 1972, he was sentenced to a term of life imprisonment, which he is presently serving in San Quentin Prison.[FN4] The murder for which Pratt was convicted occurred on December 18, 1968, in Santa Monica, California. Pratt has consistently maintained his innocence of that crime, claiming that on the night of the murder he was attending a meeting with BPP officials in Oakland, California, several hundred miles from Santa Monica.

FN4. The fact that Pratt is presently incarcerated, of course, in no way alters or diminishes his rights under FOIA. See 5 U.S.C. s 552(a)(3) (1976); Moorefield v. Secret Service, 611 F.2d 1021, 1023 n.2 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 909, 101 S.Ct. 283, 66 L.Ed.2d 139 (1980).

Based in part on his belief that the FBI possessed documents that would verify his presence in Oakland on December 18, 1968, and thus substantiate his alibi, Pratt filed two FOIA requests with the FBI. Complaint PP 3, 8, 12, 25, reprinted in Jt.App. at 7-9, 12. On June 5, 1976, Pratt requested then FBI Director Clarence Kelley to provide him with:

> All files, records, memoranda, or other data or materials filed under my name or obtainable by your agency by searching through other files and materials for documents which contain my name.

On May 20, 1977, the FBI released 499 partially expurgated pages to Pratt. Pratt appealed certain deletions within the agency and, on September 8, 1977, he made a supplemental request for "any records pertaining to him which may be contained in the Bureau's files concerning" five named organizations and twenty-two named individuals.

Through his supplemental request and the processing of his administrative appeals, Pratt eventually obtained access to over 1,000 documents, totaling several thousand pages. The FBI deleted portions of many of these documents, claiming that the deletions were justified by Exemptions 1, 2, 7(C), 7(D), 7(E) and 7(F) of FOIA.[FN5] Because Pratt and his counsel believed that the deletions made in the released documents did not comply with FOIA and that the FBI had not fully searched its files, Pratt instituted this action in the District Court seeking to compel a further search and full disclosure.

FN5. FOIA Exemptions 1 and 2 provide: (b) This section does not apply to matters that are-(1)(A) specifically authorized under criteria established by an Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy and (B) are in fact properly classified pursuant to such Executive order; (2) related solely to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency. 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(1), (2) (1976). (Exemption 7 is set out in note 2 supra.)

B. Proceedings in the District Court

The District Court directed the FBI to submit affidavits, pursuant to Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974), indexing and explaining the agency's deletions. The court determined that the first Vaughn index was inadequate and ordered the FBI to submit new and more detailed Vaughn filings. These were submitted in November 1979.

On April 6, 1979, while the District Court proceedings were pending, Congressman Paul McCloskey requested the FBI "to determine whether there is any evidence in the files to indicate the possibility of Pratt's innocence or doubt as to Pratt's guilt" of the December 18, 1968 Santa Monica murder. In response to Congressman McCloskey's request, the FBI conducted a search 412 21 of its California field offices.[FN6] On June 18, 1980, as a result of this search, the FBI released to Pratt 1,290 pages of previously withheld documents.

FN6. The FBI searched only its Washington, D. C. Headquarters files in response to Pratt's FOIA requests. Because Pratt was advised of this during the processing of his administrative appeals and did not make a separate disclosure request to each field office, the District Court held that the FBI's failure to expand its original search to all field offices did not make the search irresponsive. Pratt v. Webster, 508 F.Supp. 751, 762 (D.D.C.1981).

On February 15, 1980, the FBI moved for summary judgment based on its second Vaughn index and the completeness of its document production. On February 12, 1981, the District Court denied the FBI's motion for summary judgment. Pratt v. Webster, 508 F.Supp. 751 (D.D.C.1981). The District Court ordered all documents containing redactions based on Exemptions 1 and 7(E) submitted for in camera review. 508 F.Supp. at 756-58, 760-61. The deletions from partially disclosed documents based on Exemptions 2, 7(C) and 7(D) were upheld, id. at 758-60, with the exception of nine documents generated by COINTELPRO activities. The District Court held that these COINTELPRO documents could not "reasonably be considered or interpreted as generated through any legitimate law enforcement purpose," and hence could not "be redacted pursuant to exemption (b)(7)." Id. at 761. Finally, the District Court ordered the agency to explain certain inadequacies in its search of FBI Headquarters files and expanded the scope of Pratt's FOIA suit to include all documents generated by COINTELPRO concerning Pratt. Id. at 762-64.

In response to an Order of the District Court, dated February 13, 1981, the FBI identified for the court sixteen COINTELPRO documents contained in the June 1980 release of documents from the search of FBI California field offices. The FBI also submitted an affidavit and index seeking to justify deletions from twelve of these documents. The agency sought reconsideration of the court's earlier ruling that COINTELPRO documents were not "compiled for law enforcement purposes" and hence not within Exemption 7's purview; in the alternative, the agency claimed that Exemption 6 of FOIA [FN7] justified the deletions in the additional sixteen and in the original nine COINTELPRO documents.

FN7. FOIA Exemption 6 provides: This section does not apply to matters that are-.... (6) personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(6) (1976).

In a June 16, 1981 Memorandum Opinion, the District Court ordered the release of material from five documents that had been expurgated based on an Exemption 1 claim. Deletions from fifty-seven other documents based on Exemption 1 and from two documents based on Exemption 7(E) were approved after in camera review. Pratt v. Webster, --- F.Supp. ----, Civ. No. 78-1688, Memorandum Opinion at 2-4 (D.D.C. June 16, 1981), reprinted in Jt. App. at 336-38. The District Court also sought further explanation of the scope of the agency's document search. Id. at 5-9, reprinted in Jt.App. at 339-43. Finally, the District Court refused to alter its previous ruling on the applicability of Exemption 7 to COINTELPRO documents, accepted a deletion from one COINTELPRO document based on Exemption 6, and sought further description of the proposed deletions from four other COINTELPRO documents. Id. at 9-12, reprinted in Jt.App. at 343-46.

On August 7, 1981, the District Court approved the deletion of identifying information from one additional COINTELPRO document based on the FBI's Exemption 6 claim. The District Court also ordered release of the remaining COINTELPRO documents in their entirety, denied the Government's request for a stay of disclosure pending appeal, and granted summary judgment to the defendants in all remaining aspects of the case. Pratt v. Webster, --- F.Supp. ----, Civ. No. 78-1688 (D.D.C. Aug. 7, 1981), reprinted in Jt.App. at 377-80.

413 22 The Government appealed to this court from the District Court's Memorandum Opinion and Order of June 16, 1981 and from its Order of August 7, 1981. We issued a stay of the ordered disclosure of the COINTELPRO documents pending appeal. Pratt v. Webster, No. 81-1907 (D.C.Cir. Aug. 14, 1981) (per curiam). On appeal the Government challenges only the District Court's disclosure order with respect to the twenty disputed COINTELPRO documents. [FN8] Thus, the proper treatment of these twenty documents under FOIA Exemptions 6 and 7 is the only issue before us.

FN8. The COINTELPRO documents at issue on appeal are document numbers 22, 519, 520, 521, 521a, 522, 522a, 524, COINT-2, COINT-3, COINT-4, COINT-6, COINT-7, COINT-8, COINT-10, COINT-11, COINT-12, COINT-13, COINT-14, and COINT-15. Document numbers 523, COINT-1, COINT-5, COINT-9, and COINT-16, also generated by COINTELPRO activities, have been released in their entirety. Documents COINT-7 and COINT-12 are apparently identical. Finally, because Pratt has not cross-appealed, the deletions of individual identities from documents 22 and COINT-4 approved by the District Court on the basis of Exemption 6 are not before us.

II. LEGAL ANALYSIS OF THE EXEMPTION 7 THRESHOLD

A. The Existence of an Exemption 7 Threshold for Law Enforcement Agencies

The Freedom of Information Act was enacted by Congress in 1966, and substantively amended in 1974 and 1976, in order to provide a statutory right of public access to documents and records held by agencies of the federal government. As such, FOIA embodies "a general philosophy of full agency disclosure unless information is exempted under clearly delineated statutory language." S.Rep.No.813, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 3 (1965). Subsection (a)(3) of the Act, under which Pratt has proceeded in this case, requires "each agency" to make available upon request any records it possesses "to any person." 5 U.S.C. s 552(a)(3) (1976).

The broad right of access and disclosure under FOIA is subject to nine exemptions set out in subsection (b), 5 U.S.C. s 552(b) (1976). See 5 U.S.C. s 552(c) (Supp. IV 1980). Like the rest of the Act, all but two of these exemptions on their face apply with equal force and effect to all federal agencies.[FN9]

FN9. One exemption and a part of another apply only to a limited set of agencies. Exemption 8 applies only to agencies "responsible for the regulation or supervision of financial institutions." 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(8) (1976). Exemption 7(D) allows all agencies to refuse to disclose the identity of a confidential source (if the exemption's threshold criterion is met), but also allows "a criminal law enforcement authority" conducting a criminal investigation and "an agency conducting a lawful national security intelligence investigation" to withhold all confidential information provided only by a confidential source. 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(7)(D) (1976). See note 39 infra. These two exemptions with specific agency applications are the exceptions that prove the rule of the general applicability of the other exemptions.

(1) In this case we are primarily concerned with the appropriate interpretation of one exemption, Exemption 7, as applied to a single agency, the FBI. There is no indication in the threshold language of Exemption 7 that it does not apply to documents held by the FBI. Rather, in all cases Exemption 7 protects from disclosure "investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that" one of the exemption's subparts applies. This statutory language on its face prescribes a three-part test for withholding information under Exemption 7: In order to be withheld, the material (1) must be an "investigatory record," (2) must have been "compiled for law enforcement purposes," and (3) must satisfy the requirements of one of the six subparts of Exemption 7.[FN10]

FN10. Abramson v. FBI, 658 F.2d 806, 811-12 (D.C.Cir.1980), cert. granted, 452 U.S. 937, 101 S.Ct. 3079, 69 L.Ed.2d 951 (1981). The Attorney General's Memorandum on the 1974 Amendments to the Freedom of Information Act, which was written to guide executive departments and agencies in the application of FOIA, adopted a similar separation between the Exemption 7 threshold and the exemption's subparts: Once it is determined that a request pertains to "investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes," the next question is whether release of the material would involve one of the six types of harm specified in clauses (A) through (F) of amended exemption 7. Attorney General's Memorandum on the 1974 Amendments to the Freedom of Information Act 6-7 (Feb. 1975) (emphasis added), reprinted in House Comm. on Government Operations & Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 94th Cong., 1st Sess., Freedom of Information Act and Amendments of 1974 (P.L. 93-502) Source Book: Legislative History, Texts, and Other Documents 516-17 (Jt.Comm.Print 1975) (hereinafter cited as 1975 Source Book).

414 23 The Government contends, however, that the FBI need not establish a law enforcement purpose for its investigatory files in order to qualify its records for redaction under the subparts of Exemption 7. It argues that "the threshold Exemption 7 criterion of 'investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes' was meant to define the FBI's files rather than limit the Bureau's potential access to the exemption." Appellants' Brief at 20. The Government primarily relies on two decisions by the First and Eighth Circuits, Kuehnert v. FBI, 620 F.2d 662 (8th Cir. 1980); Irons v. Bell, 596 F.2d 468 (1st Cir. 1979).[FN11] In those cases, the courts held:

FN11. The Government also relies on Abrams v. FBI, 511 F.Supp. 758 (N.D.Ill.1981), and on language in Church of Scientology v. Department of the Army, 611 F.2d 738, 748 n.5 (9th Cir. 1979), and Larouche v. Kelley, 522 F.Supp. 425, 437 (S.D.N.Y.1981). The Government frankly concedes, however, that the language in Church of Scientology and in Larouche is dicta. Appellants' Brief at 21, 26-27; see also note 30 infra.

> The character of the materials excluded under Exemption 7 at least suggests that "law enforcement purpose" is as much a description of the type of agency the exemption is aimed at as it is a condition on the use of the exemption by agencies having administrative as well as civil enforcement duties.

Irons, 596 F.2d at 474, quoted in part in Kuehnert, 620 F.2d at 666.

(2) The simplest response to the Government's contention that FBI records per se meet the threshold criterion of Exemption 7 is that that argument has been rejected by this Circuit in Abramson v. FBI, 658 F.2d 806 (D.C.Cir.1980), cert. granted, 452 U.S. 937, 101 S.Ct. 3079, 69 L.Ed.2d 951 (1981).[FN12] In Abramson we were confronted with a FOIA request to the FBI for a group of "name checks," i.e., "summaries of information from FBI files on certain public personalities which had been prepared pursuant to requests received from the White House." 658 F.2d at 808. The District Court in Abramson had held that the name checks were not compiled pursuant to any law enforcement purpose, but nevertheless applied Exemption 7(C) to prevent disclosure as "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(7)(C) (1976). We reversed, holding, inter alia, that documents in the possession of the FBI must nevertheless pass the Exemption 7 threshold before any of the six subparts in Exemption 7 may be applied to prevent disclosure. Id. at 811-12.

FN12. The issue directly before the Supreme Court this Term in FBI v. Abramson, 452 U.S. 937, 101 S.Ct. 3079, 69 L.Ed.2d 951, is not the question of the effect of FOIA Exemption 7's threshold language on documents held by the FBI. The Solicitor General's petition for certiorari to the Court identified the question presented as: "Does information contained in records compiled for law enforcement purposes and privileged from disclosure under Exemption 7(C) of FOIA lose that exempt status when it is incorporated into records compiled for purposes other than law enforcement?" 452 U.S. 937, 101 S.Ct. 3079, 69 L.Ed.2d 951 (1981). Thus, the Court is principally concerned in Abramson with the "pass through" issue of whether information once contained in an exempt document loses its exempt status when it is recompiled in an otherwise non-exempt document. Of course, the question presented in a petitioner's brief before the Supreme Court does not operate as a jurisdictional limit on the Court's authority to reach a proper disposition of a case. See Piper Aircraft Co. v. Reyno, --- U.S. ----, 102 S.Ct. 252, 261 n.12, 70 L.Ed.2d 252 (1981). Nevertheless, even if the Court should reach beyond the "pass through" issue in Abramson and decide that Exemption 7's threshold language has no application to FBI records, that decision would not affect the outcome of this case. See section III infra.

The Government argues that Abramson does not foreclose their contention that records held by the FBI per se satisfy the Exemption 7 threshold. Appellants' Brief 415 24 at 39-41. That argument is simply untenable. If the panel in Abramson had accepted the Government's per se argument, the documents held by the FBI would have passed the Exemption 7 threshold despite their lack of law enforcement purpose, and the court would have had to consider whether the District Court correctly ruled that Exemption 7(C) justified nondisclosure. Quite the contrary, the Abramson court did not reach the Exemption 7(C) question and reversed the District Court because, failing the Exemption 7 threshold, the "name check" summaries were improperly withheld under FOIA. See Abramson, 658 F.2d at 812. Thus, the Government's per se argument is foreclosed by the plain holding of this court in Abramson.[FN13]

FN13. The two arguments that the Government makes in an attempt to distinguish Abramson are wholly unconvincing. First, the Government notes that three months before the decision in Abramson this Circuit had stated that the question whether Exemption 7 applies to documents of a law enforcement agency not compiled pursuant to any law enforcement purpose was an open issue in this Circuit. Lesar v. Department of Justice, 636 F.2d 472, 486 n.83 (D.C.Cir.1980) (citing Irons v. Bell and Kuehnert v. FBI). Based on this observation the Government argues that the Abramson panel could not have intended to answer this open question since it failed to cite Lesar or the decisions of other Circuits in its written opinion. Appellants' Brief at 39-40. However, to contend that the issues a court decides are determined by the cases it fails to cite is absurd. Second, the Government argues that Abramson decided a different question than the one it now presents about the Exemption 7 threshold criterion. The Government observes that the Abramson panel decided the "pass through" question and that this issue is the one now pending before the Supreme Court. See note 12 supra. While this Circuit did decide the "pass through" question in Abramson, that was not the only issue presented. In fact, Abramson's brief in this court stated: The issue is whether the court and/or the government can withhold documents under any subpart of Section b(7) after a court has ruled that there was no law enforcement purpose with respect to the compilation of documents being withheld. Brief for Appellant at 14, Abramson v. FBI, 658 F.2d 806 (D.C.Cir.1980). The Supreme Court's review of only a single issue (in fact, the only issue pursued by the Government) does not deny the presence of others in this court's decision in the case. Notably, the Government has made no attempt to reconcile its per se argument in this case with either the language or the holding in Abramson.

The three-pronged test for Exemption 7 claims that the Abramson opinion sets out, 658 F.2d at 811-12, follows from the plain meaning of the statute, [FN14] is consistent with 416 25 this Circuit's judicial interpretations of Exemption 7 both before and after the 1974 amendments,[FN15] and was even adopted as the appropriate interpretation of the exemption in the Attorney General's Memorandum on the 1974 Amendments.[FN16] If the Government is now suggesting that arguments of public policy require that FOIA be rewritten, those arguments should be directed not to us, but to the Congress. [FN17] We continue to hold that federal agencies, including the FBI, must meet the threshold requirements of Exemption 7 before they may withhold requested documents on the basis of any of its subparts.

FN14. As we recently noted, "(r)esort to the legislative history of a statutory provision is not necessary when the meaning of the provision is plain from its language." Crooker v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms, 670 F.2d 1051, 1056 (D.C.Cir.1981) (en banc); accord, NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 223, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2317, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978). Even if we look beyond the statutory language to the legislative history, we find the Government's arguments unconvincing. The Government cites occasions in the legislative history in which the FBI's investigatory files are mentioned as examples of material covered by Exemption 7. Appellants' Brief at 30-34. This is not surprising, since the FBI's investigatory records are typically compiled for a law enforcement purpose, and since there is perhaps no better example of the usual application of Exemption 7. "No reference to the FBI or any other particular agency appears in the Act itself, however, and there is no indication that any agency is to be treated differently from another with respect to the (b)(7) exemption." Note, The Investigatory Files Exemption to the FOIA: The D. C. Circuit Abandons Bristol-Myers, 42 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 869, 874 (1974) (footnote omitted). Moreover, the Government has not cited and we have not found any direct suggestion in the legislative history that FBI records generated without any law enforcement purpose may be withheld under Exemption 7. The Government's legislative history argument-that Congress meant to describe FBI files by the threshold language of Exemption 7 rather than to limit the FBI's access to the exemption-further loses credibility on a close reading of the history. In 1973 committee hearings, for example, Assistant Attorney General Robert G. Dixon, Jr. of the Department of Justice Office of Legal Counsel suggested amending Exemption 7 to expand its reach: "If the act is to be amended, perhaps the time has come to put in an exemption expressly covering the files of the FBI and other Federal investigators working with the FBI." Hearings on H.R. 5425 and H.R. 4960 Before a Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Government Operations, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. 152 (1973). In 1974, of course, Congress did amend Exemption 7, but it did not expand the exemption's coverage as desired by Assistant Attorney General Dixon. In this case the Department of Justice now argues, without any explanation of Dixon's remarks, that Exemption 7 means exactly what Assistant Attorney General Dixon suggested and what Congress never enacted. We are unpersuaded.

Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 79-82 (D.C.Cir.1974); Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 489 F.2d 1195, 1198, 1202 (D.C.Cir.1973) (en banc), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 993, 94 S.Ct. 2405, 40 L.Ed.2d 772 (1974). See also Demetracopoulos v. FN16. See note 10 supra.

FN17. The First Circuit in Irons noted that there were "strong policy reasons" for accepting the Government's per se argument for FBI documents. Irons v. Bell, 596 F.2d 468, 474 (1st Cir. 1979). To the extent that the First Circuit reached its result based on arguments of public policy, we must respectfully disagree with its approach. This Circuit has consistently held that whether any government document should be disclosed or protected against disclosure is a matter of public policy for legislative determination. It is not for this court to rewrite a statute. Crooker v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms, 670 F.2d 1051, 1066-1067, 1075 (D.C.Cir.1981) (en banc).

B. The Definition of the Exemption 7 Threshold Test for Law Enforcement Agencies

Our conclusion that a threshold test exists for the application of FOIA Exemption 7 to documents held by law enforcement agencies is, however, only the beginning of our inquiry. The resolution of this case necessarily requires the expression of that threshold test and its application to the COINTELPRO documents presented here.[FN18]

FN18. The panel in Abramson was not required by the facts of that case to enunciate a test for the Exemption 7 threshold and did not attempt to do so. The District Court in that case declared that "there has been absolutely no showing that these particular records were compiled for law enforcement purposes." Abramson v. FBI, Civ. No. 77-2206, Order at 2 (D.D.C. Nov. 30, 1979), quoted in Abramson v. FBI, 658 F.2d 806, 811 (D.C.Cir.1980). The Government did not contest that conclusion on appeal, Brief for Appellees at 8 n.5, Abramson v. FBI, 658 F.2d 806, 811 (D.C.Cir.1980), and did not pursue that issue after the panel's decision. Petition for Rehearing and Suggestion for Rehearing en banc at 2 n.1, 4 n.5, Abramson v. FBI, 658 F.2d 806 (D.C.Cir.1980).

1. The Deference Accorded Law Enforcement Agencies Claiming a "Law Enforcement Purpose"

(3) While FOIA makes no distinction on its face between agencies whose principal function is criminal law enforcement and agencies with both law enforcement and administrative functions, it would be unnecessarily wooden to treat both groups identically when they claim Exemption 7 as a basis for withholding. In fact, courts often accord different treatment to Exemption 7 claims from different agencies. E.g., Church of Scientology v. Department of the Army, 611 F.2d 738, 748 (9th Cir. 1979); Irons v. Bell, 596 F.2d 468, 473 (1st Cir. 1979); Ramo v. Department of the Navy, 487 F.Supp. 127, 130-31 (N.D.Cal.1979), appeal docketed, No. 79-4791 (9th Cir. Aug. 6, 1981) (submission vacated pending Supreme Court decision in FBI v. Abramson); see Note, FOIA Exemption 7 and Broader Disclosure of Unlawful FBI Investigations, 65 Minn.L.Rev. 1139, 1145-49 (1981). This judicial development, most often taking the form of more exacting scrutiny of Exemption 7 claims by agencies whose principal function is not law enforcement, is well-grounded in congressional purpose, common 417 26 sense, and notions of judicial economy.[FN19] Three related justifications for the differential review can be posited.

FN19. The different treatment accorded to criminal law enforcement agencies under the Exemption 7 threshold is not inconsistent with our rejection of the Government's suggested per se approach for these agencies' Exemption 7 claims. The per se approach would totally eliminate any threshold requirement for criminal law enforcement agencies and make a mockery of the plain wording of the exemption. In contrast, treating law enforcement and mixed-function agencies differently under Exemption 7 does not judicially erase words from the statute.

First, Congress amended Exemption 7 of FOIA in 1974 in response to a series of decisions by this Circuit that had interpreted the exemption rigidly.[FN20] These decisions, if left to stand, threatened to exempt large portions of agency files whenever a label of "law enforcement purpose" and "investigatory file" could be attached to agency records.[FN21] In the view of the Congress, this result would have substantially undercut the Act's disclosure requirements, especially in the context of agencies with both general administrative and law enforcement functions. Congress' amendment of Exemption 7 in 1974 was intended to overrule those judicial decisions and, therefore, evinced in part an intent that the exemption not be read too broadly in its application to agencies with general administrative and regulatory functions. [FN22]

FN20. A brief exchange on the Senate floor between Senator Kennedy, the Floor Manager of the FOIA Amendments, and Senator Hart, the sponsor of the amendment to Exemption 7, identified the decisions as Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 489 F.2d 1195 (D.C.Cir.1973) (en banc), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 993, 94 S.Ct. 2405, 40 L.Ed.2d 772 (1974); Aspin v. Department of Defense, 491 F.2d 24 (D.C.Cir.1973); Ditlow v. Brinegar, 494 F.2d 1073 (D.C.Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 974, 95 S.Ct. 238, 42 L.Ed.2d 188 (1974); and Center for Nat'l Policy Review on Race and Urban Issues v. Weinberger, 502 F.2d 370 (D.C.Cir.1974). 120 Cong.Rec. 17,039-40 (1974), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 349.

FN21. On the floor of the Senate Senator Hart quoted from Center for Nat'l Policy Review on Race and Urban Issues v. Weinberger, 502 F.2d 370, 372 (D.C.Cir.1974) (footnote omitted): Recent decisions of this court construing exemption 7 have considerably narrowed the scope of our inquiry. The sole question before us is whether the materials in question are "investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes." Should we answer that question in the affirmative, our role is "at an end." See 120 Cong.Rec. 17,034 (1974), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 335-36.

FN22. In a Memorandum Letter inserted in the Congressional Record, Senator Hart sought to relieve opposing Senators' concerns about his proposed amendment's effect on the FBI and identified his primary concern as the unnecessary withholding of information by other regulatory agencies. Thus, my amendment more than adequately safeguards against any problem which might be raised for the (Federal) Bureau (of Investigation). The point is that the "law enforcement" exemption has been broadly construed to include any investigation by a government agency of a federally funded or monitored activity. The courts only require that the investigation might result in some government "sanction" such as a cutoff of funds-and not necessarily a prosecution. The investigations of auto defects, harmful children's toys, or federally-assisted hospitals could all be hidden completely from public view, and from criticism of government inaction or favoritism, unless my amendment is adopted. This is the danger which the ABA proposal seeks to correct. These are rarely FBI investigations. 120 Cong.Rec. 17,040 (1974), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 351. See also 120 Cong.Rec. 36,626 (1974), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 413-14 (remarks of Rep. Reid).

Second, in its 1974 amendment to Exemption 7, Congress set out six subparts to the exemption representing the potential harms that it believed justified nondisclosure of government investigatory records. These subparts, perhaps predictably, apply more extensively in criminal than in civil law enforcement. [FN23] Thus, the language of the exemption itself suggests a greater congressional concern with the secrecy of documents 418 27 held by agencies, such as the FBI, principally committed to criminal law enforcement. [FN24]

FN23. The language of FOIA Exemption 7 is set out in note 2 supra. Exemption 7(D), for example, explicitly allows more information to be withheld from documents compiled in the course of a criminal investigation than in a civil investigation, and Exemption 7(F), which seeks to protect law enforcement personnel, has more obvious application in the criminal context.

FN24. The Conference Committee on the 1974 amendments added to Exemption 7(D) the language that allows all information from a confidential source as well as the source's identity to be withheld in the case of criminal and lawful national security investigations. See note 39 infra. It also added Exemption 7(F), which exempts information that might endanger law enforcement personnel. These changes were made "to accommodate unusual requirements of some agencies such as the Federal Bureau of Investigation," 120 Cong.Rec. 34,162 (1974), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 378 (remarks of Rep. Moorhead, House Floor Manager), in response to concerns expressed by President Ford. See Letter from President Ford to Senator Kennedy (Aug. 20, 1974), and Letter from Senator Kennedy and Representative Moorhead to President Ford (Sept. 23, 1974), reprinted in 120 Cong.Rec. 33,158-59 (1974), and 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 368-72; H.R.Rep.No.1380, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 12-13 (1974) (Conference Report), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 229-30. The Congress' special concern for criminal law enforcement agencies was similarly expressed in other passages from the legislative history of the 1974 FOIA amendments. See, e.g., note 22 supra.

Third, courts can usually assume that government agencies act within the scope of their legislated authority. This assumption is not the product of wishful judicial thinking, but instead results from our observations over time that, despite occasional and regrettable lapses, government agencies typically go about their intended business. This experience has specific application to the court's consideration of FOIA Exemption 7 claims by different types of federal agencies.

(4) On the one hand, the assumption that a mixed-function agency is acting within the scope of its authority tells a court nothing about whether it has met the Exemption 7 threshold requirement of a "law enforcement purpose." Law enforcement, indeed, is often one of such an agency's proper functions, but other functions are also a major part of the agency's day-to-day business. Thus, a court must scrutinize with some skepticism the particular purpose claimed for disputed documents redacted under FOIA Exemption 7. Ramo v. Department of the Navy, 487 F.Supp. 127, 131 (N.D.Cal.1979), appeal docketed, No. 79-4791 (9th Cir. Aug. 6, 1981) (submission vacated pending Supreme Court decision in FBI v. Abramson). If courts accept a mixed-function agency's claims of "law enforcement purpose" without thoughtful consideration, the excessive withholding of agency records which Congress denounced and sought to avoid with the 1974 amendments might well result.

(5) On the other hand, the generally accurate assumption that federal agencies act within their legislated purposes implies that an agency whose principal mission is criminal law enforcement will more often than not satisfy the Exemption 7 threshold criterion.[FN25] Thus, a court can accept less exacting proof from such an agency that the purpose underlying disputed documents is law enforcement. This less exacting judicial scrutiny of a criminal law enforcement agency's purpose in the context of the FOIA Exemption 7 threshold is further bolstered by Congress' concern that inadvertent disclosure of criminal investigations, information sources, or enforcement techniques might cause serious harm to the legitimate interests of law enforcement agencies. [FN26]

FN25. The FBI is certainly one of the most obvious examples of such an agency. See 28 U.S.C. ss 531-537 (1976).

FN26. In support of Senator Hart's floor amendment that eventually became Exemption 7, Senator Kennedy commented: "(I)t seems to be that the amendment itself has considerable sensitivity built in to protect against the invasion of privacy, and to protect the identities of informants, and most generally to protect the legitimate interests of a law enforcement agency to conduct (a criminal) investigation ...." 120 Cong.Rec. 17,040 (1974), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 350.

Thus, we conclude that a court may apply a more deferential attitude toward the claims of "law enforcement purpose" made by a criminal law enforcement agency. The result of this conclusion is that our prior precedent identifying the standard for ascertaining law enforcement purpose vel 419 28 non of general regulatory and administrative agencies, while instructive, is not necessarily determinative of the issue for criminal law enforcement agencies. These specialized agencies require a separate standard of judicial review.

2. The "Law Enforcement Purpose" of Law Enforcement Agencies

On one of the few occasions that required this Circuit to ascertain the presence or absence of a "law enforcement purpose" for FOIA Exemption 7, in a case involving a mixed-function agency, the court drew a line between general agency oversight (including program monitoring) and agency investigations specifically directed at allegedly illegal activity. Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81-82 (D.C.Cir.1974).[FN27] At issue in Rural Housing Alliance was the disclosure of portions of a report by the Department of Agriculture's Inspector General regarding allegations of governmental housing discrimination in Florida. In expressing the "law enforcement purpose" test for the District Court to apply on remand, the court identified law enforcement investigations as "investigations which focus directly on specifically alleged illegal acts, illegal acts of particular identified officials, acts which could, if proved, result in civil or criminal sanctions." Id. at 81 (footnote omitted). The panel further stated: "The purpose of the 'investigatory files' is thus the crucial factor.... If the purpose of the investigation was ... an inquiry as to an identifiable possible violation of law, then such inquiry would have been 'for law enforcement purposes' whether the individual were a private citizen or a government employee." Id. at 82.[FN28]

FN27. While Rural Housing Alliance is of the same vintage as the four decisions of this Circuit that Congress overruled with the 1974 amendment of Exemption 7, see note 20 supra and accompanying text, it has retained its precedential value. Congress did not change the "law enforcement purpose" language in Exemption 7 that was the subject of Rural Housing Alliance ; instead Congress codified the exemption's policy concerns so that once a law enforcement purpose was found, the judicial inquiry was not "at an end." See note 21 supra.

FN28. This means of distinguishing investigations for law enforcement purposes from more routine oversight and monitoring has been termed the "special intensity" test. See, e.g., Gregory v. FDIC, 470 F.Supp. 1329, 1333-34 (D.D.C.1979), rev'd on other grounds, 631 F.2d 896 (D.C.Cir.1980) (per curiam); Note, FOIA Exemption 7 and Broader Disclosure of Unlawful FBI Investigations, 65 Minn.L.Rev. 1139, 1147 (1981).

Because we believe that a court may apply a more deferential standard with respect to claims of "law enforcement purpose" made by a criminal law enforcement agency, the test enunciated in Rural Housing is not adequate to dispose of the question at issue here. We must, therefore, consider alternative tests suggested by other courts.

The various courts that have rejected the per se argument, i.e., that all law enforcement agency files manifest a law enforcement purpose, have, quite naturally, each phrased their tests in slightly different language. For example, Judge Weinfeld has opined: "The appropriate test is whether the records indicate that the agency was gathering information with the good faith belief that the subject may violate or has violated federal law, or was merely monitoring the subject for purposes unrelated to enforcement of federal law." Lamont v. Department of Justice, 475 F.Supp. 761, 773 (S.D.N.Y.1979) (footnote omitted). The Northern District of California announced "a liberal test that would require that the FBI show a sufficient connection between the conduct of the investigation and legitimate concerns for maintaining national security or preventing criminal activity." Ramo v. Department of the Navy, 487 F.Supp. 127, 131 (N.D.Cal.1979), appeal docketed, No. 79-4791 (9th Cir. Aug. 6, 1981) (submission vacated pending Supreme Court decision in FBI v. Abramson).[FN29] 420 29 Shortly after the decision in Ramo, the Ninth Circuit stated that: "An agency which has a clear law enforcement mandate, such as the FBI, need only establish a 'rational nexus' between enforcement of a federal law and the document for which an exemption is claimed." Church of Scientology v. Department of Defense, 611 F.2d 738, 748 (9th Cir. 1979).[FN30] Chief Judge Peckham interpreted the language from Church of Scientology as requiring "that an agency with a clear law enforcement purpose ... need only be held to a minimal showing that the activity which generated the documents was related to the agency's function." Dunaway v. Webster, 519 F.Supp. 1059, 1076 (N.D.Cal.1981). Finally, Judge Weinfeld has tersely commented: "To meet this requirement an agency must demonstrate at least 'a colorable claim of a rational nexus' between activities being investigated and violations of federal law." Malizia v. Department of Justice, 519 F.Supp. 338, 347 (S.D.N.Y.1981) (footnote omitted).[FN31] FN29. The Court in Ramo apparently was willing to go further than some other courts have in discarding the "special intensity" test's requirement of a specific, alleged violation or a particular, suspected person. "To invoke the exemption, the (FBI) need not show that the files reflect a specific suspected violation of the law; however, it must show that the investigation was based on some legitimate law enforcement purpose." 487 F.Supp. at 131.

FN30. While the language from Church of Scientology quoted above clearly requires some Exemption 7 threshold test, even for FBI documents, the Government has cited a footnote from the same page of the opinion which suggests that the Ninth Circuit accepted the per se approach of Irons v. Bell and Kuehnert v. FBI. The footnote states in part: "Koch, however, is not persuasive because the agency involved was the FBI, for whom (sic) a separate showing of 'law enforcement purpose' is unnecessary." 611 F.2d at 748 n.5. As did the court in Dunaway v. Webster, 519 F.Supp. 1059, 1075-76 (N.D.Cal.1981), we interpret this apparent inconsistency in favor of the textual language.

FN31. Ironically, the language most often cited or quoted as part of the appropriate test for measuring the law enforcement purpose of a law enforcement agency-"a colorable claim of a rational nexus between the organizations and activities being investigated and violations of federal laws"-originated in Irons v. Bell, 596 F.2d 468, 472 (1st Cir. 1979). When the documents presented in Irons failed to meet even this threshold test, the First Circuit concluded that a criminal law enforcement agency need not meet any threshold requirement in order to avail itself of Exemption 7's subparts. Id. at 474. For the reasons noted above, we reject this position of the First Circuit as patently inconsistent with Exemption 7.

(6) As we read these various tests, however phrased, and consider the applicable language of FOIA (and the related legislative history), it appears inescapable to us that there are two critical conditions that must be met for a law enforcement agency to pass the Exemption 7 threshold. First, the agency's investigatory activities that give rise to the documents sought must be related to the enforcement of federal laws or to the maintenance of national security. To satisfy this requirement of a "nexus," the agency should be able to identify a particular individual or a particular incident as the object of its investigation and the connection between that individual or incident and a possible security risk or violation of federal law. The possible violation or security risk is necessary to establish that the agency acted within its principal function of law enforcement, rather than merely engaging in a general monitoring of private individuals' activities. While Congress intended that "law enforcement purpose" be broadly construed,[FN32] it was not meant to include investigatory activities wholly unrelated to law enforcement agencies' legislated functions of preventing risks to the national security and violations of the criminal 421 30 laws and of apprehending those who do violate the laws. See Lamont v. Department of Justice, 475 F.Supp. 761, 774-76 (S.D.N.Y.1979) (seventeen years of generalized monitoring unrelated to law enforcement).

FN32. The Exemption 7 "law enforcement purpose" includes both civil and criminal investigations and proceedings within its scope. See, e.g., Rural Hous. Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81 & n.46 (D.C.Cir.1974). Exemption 7(D)'s reference to "lawful national security intelligence investigation(s)" makes clear that it also extends beyond typical civil and criminal law enforcement. The Conference Report on the 1974 FOIA amendments commented: "(N)ational security" is to be strictly construed to refer to military security, national defense, or foreign policy. The term "intelligence" in section 552(b)(7)(D) is intended to apply to positive intelligence-gathering activities, counter-intelligence activities, and background security investigations by governmental units which have authority to conduct such functions. H.R.Rep.No.1380, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 13 (1974), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 230. See Stein v. Department of Justice, 662 F.2d 1245, 1260-61 (7th Cir. 1981).

Second, the nexus between the investigation and one of the agency's law enforcement duties must be based on information sufficient to support at least "a colorable claim" of its rationality. This second condition is deferential to the particular problems of a criminal law enforcement agency. Such an agency, in order to carry out its functions, often must act upon unverified tips and suspicions based upon mere tidbits of information. A court, therefore, should be hesitant to second-guess a law enforcement agency's decision to investigate if there is a plausible basis for its decision. Nor is it necessary for the investigation to lead to a criminal prosecution or other enforcement proceeding in order to satisfy the "law enforcement purpose" criterion. E.g., Bast v. Department of Justice, 665 F.2d 1251, 1254 (D.C.Cir.1981); Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 82 n.48 (D.C.Cir.1974); cf. Founding Church of Scientology, Inc. v. Regan, 670 F.2d 1158, 1161 (D.C.Cir.1981) (enforcement proceeding not required for operation of Exemption 7(D)).[FN33] Of course, the agency's basis for the claimed connection between the object of the investigation and the asserted law enforcement duty cannot be pretextual or wholly unbelievable. See Abramson v. FBI, 658 F.2d 806, 811 (D.C.Cir.1980), cert. granted, 452 U.S. 937, 101 S.Ct. 3079, 69 L.Ed.2d 951 (1981) (asserting appointment functions of Nixon White House as basis for "name checks" of individuals prominently associated with liberal causes).

FN33. We believe that the Third Circuit's conclusion that " 'law enforcement purposes' must relate to some type of enforcement proceeding, and one that is pending," Committee on Masonic Homes v. NLRB, 556 F.2d 214, 219 (3d Cir. 1977) (footnote omitted), has no application to an agency whose principal function is criminal law enforcement. Therefore, we also dismiss the First Circuit's concern, expressed in Irons v. Bell, 596 F.2d 468, 474 (1st Cir. 1979), that the need to shield legitimate law enforcement efforts from harmful FOIA disclosures might lead to frivolous prosecutions.

Thus, while our measure of a criminal law enforcement agency's "law enforcement purpose" is necessarily deferential, in recognition of the realities of these agencies' duties and the importance of their functions, it is not vacuous. In order to pass the FOIA Exemption 7 threshold, such an agency must establish that its investigatory activities are realistically based on a legitimate concern that federal laws have been or may be violated or that national security may be breached. Either of these concerns must have some plausible basis and have a rational connection to the object of the agency's investigation.

III. APPLICATION OF THE EXEMPTION 7 THRESHOLD IN THIS CASE

In this case the FBI averred that all of the records responsive to Pratt's FOIA request were "investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes." Affidavit of David S. Byerly at 7-10, 35 (Nov. 21, 1979), reprinted in Jt.App. at 79-82, 111. The District Court accepted this statement of purpose for all of the documents in the original production except for nine COINTELPRO documents, which it held "cannot reasonably be considered or interpreted as generated through any legitimate law enforcement purpose." Pratt v. Webster, 508 F.Supp. 751, 761 (D.D.C.1981). The District Court's February 13 Order led to the inclusion of sixteen additional COINTELPRO documents in this litigation, all of which had previously been identified during the field office search requested by Congressman McCloskey.[FN34] The District Court similarly concluded that none of these COINTELPRO documents satisfied the Exemption 7 threshold. With the exception of two passages deleted under Exemption 6 as "clearly unwarranted invasions of personal privacy," [FN35] the District Court ordered that 422 31 all twenty-five COINTELPRO documents be released in their entirety. With all respect for the District Court's otherwise exemplary handling of this case, we must disagree.

FN34. See note 6 and accompanying text supra.

FN35. See text at notes 7-8 supra.

At the outset, it is clear that the District Court singled out this handful of documents only because they were designated as "COINTELPRO" documents. See id. Document 22, labeled as a COINTELPRO document, was the only document found to lack a law enforcement purpose out of a particular file of 156 documents. This entire file was a national security file generated by an investigation "instituted as a result of the FBI receiving information that (Pratt) was engaged in activities which could involve a violation of" 18 U.S.C. ss 2383-2385 (1976), Affidavit of David S. Byerly at 8 (Nov. 21, 1979), reprinted in Jt.App. at 80. Documents 519 to 524 include eight documents, see note 8 supra, out of more than 400 referring to Pratt that were collected from investigatory files of other individuals or organizations by means of the FBI's "see" or cross references. The FBI averred that "(a)ll 'see' reference documents herein are investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes and were collected in the course of lawful national security investigations or other mandated investigations imposed by law." Affidavit of David S. Byerly at 35 (Nov. 21, 1979), reprinted in Jt.App. at 111. The District Court accepted the FBI's claim of law enforcement purpose for all of these documents except for the eight bearing the appellation "COINTELPRO." Pratt v. Webster, 508 F.Supp. at 759-61.

(7) We recognize, of course, that Exemption 7 refers to "records" rather than files, 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(7) (1976), and that the location of a non-exempt document in an investigatory file does not necessarily make that document exempt from FOIA's disclosure requirements. See 5 U.S.C. s 552(b) (1976). We believe, however, that the District Court distinguished these nine documents from the other documents contained in the same files not on the FOIA grounds of law enforcement purpose, but on the grounds of law enforcement method.

(8) The FBI's Counter-Intelligence Program has been the subject of congressional inquiry, see Church Committee Report, note 3 supra, and of individual litigation, see, e.g., Black Panther Party v. Smith, 661 F.2d 1243 (D.C.Cir.1981); Hobson v. Wilson, Civ. No. 76-1326 (D.D.C. Dec. 23, 1981) (judgment on verdict to anti-war demonstrators); Stern v. Richardson, 367 F.Supp. 1316 (D.D.C.1973). Those proceedings have established that COINTELPRO activities included the use of questionable, and at times illegal, methods. The documents at issue in this case also reveal questionable actions by the FBI to foment distrust and suspicion and to create and enhance dissension within the Black Panther Party. See Pratt v. Webster, 508 F.Supp. at 761; Jt.App. at 104-06, 113-41, 229-83. But whatever we may think of the FBI's methods, we cannot conclude therefrom that the COINTELPRO activities involved in this case lacked any law enforcement purpose.

The Church Committee Report's discussion of the FBI's actions against the BPP (offered by Pratt as Exhibit 1 to his May 21, 1981 Memorandum of Points and Authorities in Opposition to Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment, reprinted in Jt.App. at 316-34) quoted from a February 1968 FBI memorandum expanding the agency's program against what it termed "black nationalist groups," including the BPP. That memorandum described the program's goals as follows:

> 1. Prevent a coalition of militant black nationalist groups....
> 2. Prevent the rise of a messiah who could unify and electrify the militant nationalist movement ... Martin Luther King, Stokely Carmichael and Elijah Muhammad all aspire to this position....
> 3. Prevent violence on the part of black nationalist groups....

423 32 Church Committee Report, supra note 3, Book III at 187, reprinted in Jt.App. at 316. While many of the FBI's goals and methods in its COINTELPRO activities against the BPP give us serious pause, we believe that the third goal on this list-the prevention of violence-establishes that law enforcement was a "significant aspect" of the FBI's overall purpose. See Koch v. Department of Justice, 376 F.Supp. 313, 315 (D.D.C.1974).

(9) In particular, we believe that the documents at issue in this case evince law enforcement as a "significant aspect" of the FBI's purpose.[FN36] Document 22 is part of an investigatory file based on FBI concerns that Pratt might violate three specific provisions of the Criminal Code. From the record before us, we cannot conclude that that concern was implausible or irrational, especially since the District Court recognized the validity of that concern with respect to the other 155 documents in the file. Documents 519 to 524 were all found in the FBI's "see" reference files and, according to the Government's affidavits, were "investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes and were collected in the course of lawful national security investigations or other mandated investigations imposed by law." Affidavit of David S. Byerly at 35 (Nov. 21, 1979), reprinted in Jt.App. at 111. While this affidavit is indeed a "minimal showing," it appears sufficient to establish the FBI's concern for possible violations or security risks. See Dunaway v. Webster, 519 F.Supp. 1059, 1076 (N.D.Cal.1981). Our conclusion again is bolstered by the District Court's acceptance of the FBI's law enforcement purpose with respect to all other "see" reference documents.

FN36. We do not intimate that all COINTELPRO documents would pass the Exemption 7 threshold, or even that all COINTELPRO documents concerning the Black Panther Party would necessarily meet this test. Those issues simply are not before us. We are concerned in this case only with a handful of COINTELPRO documents located in general investigatory files of the FBI.

Documents COINT-1 to COINT-16 were located through the FBI's supplemental search for records concerning Pratt in the agency's California field offices. Several of these COINTELPRO documents are directly related to the documents disclosed from the previous search of FBI Headquarters. For example, document COINT-5 was apparently a supplement by the Los Angeles office to its previously dispatched document 520. See Jt.App. at 117-24, 240-41. In addition, the subject matter of these sixteen COINT documents is often the same as is found in documents 519 to 524. In short, these documents, but for their COINTELPRO label, are indistinguishable from other FBI documents for which the District Court found a law enforcement purpose. Moreover, these documents provide independent support for a claim of law enforcement purpose. Document COINT-1, for example, discusses cooperation with the Los Angeles Police Department in identifying violations of state and local laws, reports on the arrest of a BPP member for firearms violations, and identifies Pratt "as a possible bomb suspect." Jt.App. at 229-30.

(10) Thus, we conclude that the District Court incorrectly distinguished COINTELPRO documents from other documents for which it found a law enforcement purpose. While the methods frequently used by the FBI in its COINTELPRO activities offer a ready distinction from more typical means of law enforcement, FOIA Exemption 7 refers to purposes rather than to methods. Because law enforcement was a significant aspect of the FBI's purpose, we conclude that the District Court erred in holding that these documents failed to pass the Exemption 7 threshold. Accordingly, we reverse its holding in this regard.[FN37]

FN37. In defense of the District Court's decision, Pratt raises an issue not addressed by the court below. He contends that the COINTELPRO documents are not "investigatory records" and therefore fail to meet the Exemption 7 threshold criterion on this ground. Appellee's Brief at 19-27. Pratt takes an unusually narrow view of the meaning of "investigatory records," however, and his view was not shared by Congress. The Conference Report on the 1974 FOIA amendments noted that the term "intelligence" in Exemption 7(D) "is intended to apply to positive intelligence-gathering activities, counter-intelligence activities, and background security investigations by governmental units which have authority to conduct such functions." H.R.Rep.No.1380, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 13 (1974) (Conference Report), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 230. Exemption 7(D), of course, is operable only when a document satisfies both parts of the threshold and part 7(D) itself. Hence, Congress' definition of "intelligence" necessarily implies that the term "investigatory records" includes within its scope records generated by positive intelligence-gathering and counter-intelligence, as well as by a more typical criminal investigation. On this basis we conclude that the COINTELPRO documents at issue in this appeal, like the documents which surrounded them in the FBI's files, are "investigatory records" within the meaning of the Exemption 7 threshold.

424 33 Our conclusion that the twenty COINTELPRO documents at issue in this appeal [FN38] meet the Exemption 7 threshold criterion requires us to return the case to the District Court. On remand the District Court must determine whether the withholding of portions of the contested documents, which the Government seeks on the basis of Exemptions 7(C) and 7(D),[FN39] is justified.[FN40]

FN38. See note 8 supra.

FN39. Exemption 7(D) allows the deletion of the name of a confidential source and any information that would disclose the identity of a confidential source whenever a document is an "investigatory record ( ) compiled for law enforcement purposes." If the record was "compiled by a criminal law enforcement authority in the course of a criminal investigation, or by an agency conducting a lawful national security intelligence investigation,"

Exemption 7(D) also allows the withholding of "confidential information furnished only by the confidential source." 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(7)(D) (1976); see Radowich v. United States Attorney, 658 F.2d 957, 959 (4th Cir. 1981); Duffin v. Carlson, 636 F.2d 709, 712 (D.C.Cir.1980) (distinguishing two clauses of Exemption 7(D)). These additional requirements are more exacting than the threshold requirement of "law enforcement purpose," Dunaway v. Webster, 519 F.Supp. 1059, 1076, 1080 (N.D.Cal.1981), and, in the case of a national security intelligence investigation, may require a determination of the lawfulness of the investigation's methods. See H.R.Rep.No.1380, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 13 (1974) (Conference Report), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 230; 120 Cong.Rec. 34,167 (1974), reprinted in 1975 Source Book, supra note 10, at 391-92 (colloquy of Rep. Horton and Rep. Moorhead). We leave these issues for the District Court to consider on remand.

FN40. Our disposition of this case on Exemption 7 grounds makes it unnecessary for us to consider the Government's Exemption 6 claims. The Government has asserted Exemption 7(C) or Exemption 7(D) or both as a basis for the deletions from each of the thirteen documents for which it also asserts Exemption 6. Because everything that can be withheld on the basis of Exemption 6 as "a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" can also be withheld on the basis of 7(C) (if the threshold is met) as "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy," Exemption 6's application would not allow the deletion of any additional information from these COINTELPRO documents.

IV. CONCLUSION

Because of public interest in the effective disclosure of malfeasance by government agencies, we feel compelled to add a few words about the practical effect of our decision and about the means for redress of any alleged wrongs committed by federal agencies.

(11) FOIA requires disclosure of government records to the fullest extent possible and allows the withholding of only so much of the document as fits squarely within an enumerated exemption. In this case, for example, the Government primarily seeks only to delete the names of its FBI Special Agents and the identities of its confidential sources; the FBI's plans to increase discord within the Black Panther Party and to discredit its leaders have been revealed. The public's interest in the disclosure of government malfeasance is therefore not defeated by the FOIA exemptions or by our interpretation in this case of the reach of one of them.

Of course, nothing we say or hold represents our approval of the measures attributed to the FBI's Counter-Intelligence Program by the Church Committee Report, note 3 supra. The use of government force and deception to quash lawful political dissent and expression is antithetical to a democratic society. Where substantiated, we find these actions reprehensible.

(12) The proper and most effective means of redress for these actions, however, is not a FOIA action. While a suit under the Freedom of Information Act is an important mechanism for discovering the malfeasance of government agencies, see, e.g., Stern v. Richardson, 367 F.Supp. 1316 (D.D.C.1973) (disclosing existence of COINTELPRO), it can do no more than reveal these actions. FOIA is thus a useful supplement to, but not a substitute for, private damage actions by aggrieved individuals and political action by concerned citizens and their representatives. The Church Committee Report is a prime example of the latter, and 425 34 a recent case in the District Court for the District of Columbia exemplifies the former, Hobson v. Wilson, Civ. No. 76-1326 (D.D.C. Dec. 23, 1981).[FN41] Our holding in this case in no way limits access to either of these remedies.[FN42]

FN41. In Hobson a jury awarded more than $700,000 to seven community activists and an anti-war organization that had sued the FBI and the District of Columbia Police Department for illegal harassment and surveillance under COINTELPRO. See Jury Awards $711,937.50 to Demonstrators, Washington Post, Dec. 24, 1981, at 1, col. 3.

FN42. Although he does not disagree with the views expressed in the last two paragraphs of this section IV, Judge Robb believes the expression of these views is unnecessary to the decision.

V. DISPOSITION

For the foregoing reasons, we hold that the twenty COINTELPRO documents at issue in this appeal meet the "law enforcement purpose" criterion of the FOIA Exemption 7 threshold. As a result, we reverse the decision of the District Court in this regard and remand the case to the District Court for its consideration of the Government's claims for nondisclosure under Exemptions 7(C) and 7(D) and for any other proceedings consistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, et al., Defendants.

Civ. A. No. 89-84 SSH.

United States District Court,
District of Columbia.

Sept. 15, 1992.

Action was brought under Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) to compel disclosure of documents relating to requester's federal prosecution and resulting conviction. On motion of United States Attorney's Office (USAO) to dismiss complaint and Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI's) and Drug Enforcement Administration's (DEA's) motions for summary judgment, the District Court, Stanley S. Harris, J., held that: (1) District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction over action to compel USAO to disclose documents, and (2) FBI and DEA records were exempt from disclosure under FOIA.

Motions granted.

STANLEY S. HARRIS, District Judge.

Plaintiff filed suit in January 1989 under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) to compel disclosure of documents relating to his federal prosecution and resulting conviction. Defendant United States Attorney's Office (USAO) moves to have plaintiff's complaint dismissed, and defendants the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) seek summary judgment against plaintiff Epps. Upon consideration of defendants' motion, plaintiff's opposition, defendants' reply, and plaintiff's surreply, the Court grants the motion of the USAO, the FBI, and the DEA.

Background

Plaintiff seeks documents relating to a 1986 conviction. He argues that he was wrongly convicted and that he has a heightened need to obtain certain government documents to attempt to prove his innocence. In March of 1988, Epps sent a FOIA request to the Department of Justice requesting:

> from all law enforcement agenicies [sic] such as the F.B.I., D.E.A. and the Baltimore, [ ]City Police Dept. and any other agencies that participated in the investigations of case NO. Y-85-0547 that obtain any information such as papers Notes (rough) or transcribed in this investigation of U.S. v. Maurice C. Proctor and Lenny Epps Case No. Y-85-0547.

The USAO moves for dismissal of the portion of the complaint against it based on plaintiff's failure to have sought documents through the administrative process prior to filing this action. Defendants the FBI and the DEA, who have already responded to plaintiff's request, argue that they have produced all unprotected documents and portions of documents as required under the FOIA. Accordingly, the FBI and the DEA move for summary judgment with respect to the portions of the complaint against them.

Discussion

[1] The purpose of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552 is "to ensure an informed citizenry, vital to the functioning of a democratic society, needed to check against corruption and to hold the governors accountable to the governed." National Labor Relations Bd. v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 242, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2327, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978). Accordingly, the FOIA represents "a general philosophy of full agency disclosure." Department of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 360, 96 S.Ct. 1592, 1599, 48 L.Ed.2d 11 (1976) (quoting S.Rep. No. 813, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., 3 (1965)). However, there are nine exemptions to this general rule of disclosure, Baldrige v. Shapiro, 455 U.S. 345, 352, 102 S.Ct. 1103, 1108, 71 L.Ed.2d 199 (1982), and the burden is on the government to show that the requested information which it declines to produce is exempt. Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 755, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 1472, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989).

[2] To be entitled to summary judgment, each movant agency must "prove [ ] that no substantial and material facts are in dispute and that [it] is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 627 F.2d 365, 368 (D.C.Cir.1980). To meet this burden, the agency must "prove that each document that falls within the class requested either has been produced, is unidentifiable, or is wholly exempt from [the FOIA's] inspection requirements." National Cable Television Ass'n v. Federal Communications Comm'n, 479 F.2d 183, 186 (D.C.Cir.1973). In determining whether the agency has 790 satisfied this burden, the Court may rely solely on agency affidavits. See Goland v. CIA, 607 F.2d 339, 352 (D.C.Cir.), vacated in part on other grounds, 607 F.2d 339 (D.C.Cir.1978), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 927, 100 S.Ct. 1312, 63 L.Ed.2d 759 (1980). The affidavits, however, "must be 'relatively detailed' and nonconclusory." Id. (quoting Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820, 826 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974)).

[3] Because the primary purpose of the FOIA is to allow people to know what their government is doing, National Labor Relations Bd., 437 U.S. at 242, 98 S.Ct. at 2327, each requester is treated equally, regardless of his reason for requesting the information. National Ass'n of Retired Fed. Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 875 (D.C.Cir.1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078, 110 S.Ct. 1805, 108 L.Ed.2d 936 (1990).

I. United States Attorney's Office

[4] Although the USAO acknowledges assisting the FBI with plaintiff's FOIA request as to USAO-originated information, it argues that plaintiff did not make a direct request to it. Until this suit was filed, the USAO was unaware that plaintiff wished to obtain documents from it. Wright Declaration ¶ 3-5. Accordingly, the USAO moves that plaintiff's complaint be dismissed as to it because plaintiff seeks judicial review of a FOIA request that was never made. However, the USAO also states that it will now treat plaintiff's letter of March 15, 1988, as a request and respond accordingly. Wright Declaration ¶ 6.

[5] Under the FOIA, administrative remedies must be exhausted prior to judicial review. American Fed'n of Gov't Employees v. Department of Commerce, 907 F.2d 203, 209 (D.C.Cir.1990); Spannaus v. Department of Justice, 824 F.2d 52, 58 (D.C.Cir.1987); Stebbins v. Nationwide Mut. Ins. Co., 757 F.2d 364, 366 (D.C.Cir.1985). Accordingly, the USAO's motion is granted, and plaintiff's complaint against it is dismissed without prejudice for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Hymen v. Merit Sys. Protection Bd., 799 F.2d 1421, 1423 (9th Cir.1986), cert. denied, 481 U.S. 1019, 107 S.Ct. 1900, 95 L.Ed.2d 506 (1987); see Dettmann v. Department of Justice, 802 F.2d 1472, 1477 (D.C.Cir.1986).

II. Federal Bureau of Investigation/Drug Enforcement Administration

A. Exemption (b)(2)

[6] Exemption (b)(2) allows agencies to withhold documents "related solely to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(2). The FBI cites exemption (b)(2) to justify its deletion of "dates, amounts and method of payment on behalf of witnesses." Superneau Declaration ¶ 20. Plaintiff argues that payments to witnesses do not fall under exemption (b)(2) because witnesses are not personnel, and the payments are not internal.

To support its position, the FBI relies on Crooker v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms, 670 F.2d 1051 (D.C.Cir.1981) (en banc). In Crooker, the court defined the limits of exemption (b)(2) in a two-part test, holding that a document does not have to be disclosed if (1) it is "predominantly internal," and (2) "if disclosure significantly risks circumvention of agency regulations or statutes." Crooker, 670 F.2d at 1074. The exemption was further expanded in National Treasury Employees Union v. Customs Serv., 802 F.2d 525 (D.C.Cir.1986), in which the court stated that "[w]here disclosure of a particular set of documents would render those documents operationally useless, the Crooker analysis is satisfied whether or not the agency identifies a specific statute or regulation threatened by disclosure." National Treasury Employees Union, 802 F.2d at 530-31.

In the present case, the FBI has specifically stated that "this exemption was asserted where it was logically determined that harm could result to the FBI's investigative function." Superneau Declaration ¶ 20. From this statement it is reasonable to conclude that the FBI has met the "circumvention" test. However, it does not satisfy the "predominantly internal" requirement. 791 Crooker does not discuss payments to witnesses, nor do any of the District of Columbia Circuit cases which Crooker cites. Instead, Crooker addresses law enforcement training manuals and discusses cases which involve documents of a more internal nature than the witness payments in this case. See, e.g., Lesar v. Department of Justice, 636 F.2d 472 (D.C.Cir.1980) (concerning symbols used to refer to FBI informants); Cox v. Department of Justice, 601 F.2d 1 (D.C.Cir.1979) (per curiam) (concerning United States Marshals' manual giving details concerning weapons, handcuffs, and transportation of prisoners); Jordan v. Department of Justice, 591 F.2d 753 (D.C.Cir.1978) (en banc) (involving documents relating to guidelines for prosecutorial discretion); Vaughn v. Rosen, 523 F.2d 1136 (D.C.Cir.1975) (involving reports prepared by the Civil Service Commission to provide advice to agencies on how to improve their personnel programs). For this reason, the Court finds that the records requested involving specific payments made by the FBI to non-government informants are not "predominantly internal," and cannot be protected by exemption (b)(2).

[7] However, this does not end the inquiry. In 1986, Congress codified the "circumvention" test in Crooker, adding it to exemption (b)(7)(E). See Kaganove v. Environmental Protection Agency, 856 F.2d 884, 888-89 (7th Cir.1988), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 1011, 109 S.Ct. 798, 102 L.Ed.2d 789 (1989). The Court finds that exemption (b)(7)(E) applies here and that the FBI can withhold the requested information. Revealing the dates amounts and methods of making payments to witnesses > would disclose techniques and procedures for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions, or would disclose guidelines for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions [and] such disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law.

5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(E). See also Superneau Declaration ¶ 20; Summary Judgment Motion, p. 9.

[8] In addition, the DEA has asserted exemption (b)(2) to protect Geographical Drug Enforcement Program (G-DEP) and Informant Identifier codes, and Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs Information System (NADDIS) numbers. These codes and numbers are "internal DEA markings and phrases regarding the treatment of and distribution of DEA documents.... Suspects could easily decode this information and change their patterns of drug activities, so as to evade detection by the Drug Enforcement Administration." Magruder Declaration ¶ 20. These types of internal markings clearly are exempt under (b)(2). See Lesar, 636 F.2d at 485-86; Maroscia v. Levi, 569 F.2d 1000, 1001-02 (7th Cir.1977); Struth v. FBI, 673 F.Supp. 949, 959 (E.D.Wis.1987); Texas Instruments, Inc., v. Customs Service, 479 F.Supp. 404, 406-07 (D.D.C.1979).

B. Exemption (b)(3)

[9] Next, the FBI argues that information relating to the grand jury, including the identities of witnesses, the deliberations and questions of the jurors, and the strategy or direction of the investigation, should be protected under exemption (b)(3). [FN1] The FBI further argues that information obtained through the interception of a wire or oral communication is protected under the same exemption. Exemption (b)(3) permits nondisclosure of documents

> FN1. The Court notes that plaintiff denies any interest in material originating from the grand jury. Plaintiff's Opposition at 4.

> specifically exempted from disclosure by statute ..., provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matters to be withheld.

5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3).

Under Rule 6(e)(2) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, > 792 an attorney for the government, or any person to whom disclosure is made under paragraph (3)(A)(ii) of this subdivision shall not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury, except as otherwise provided for in these rules.

Fed.R.Crim.P. 6(e)(2). This rule has been found to satisfy the "statute" requirement of exemption (b)(3). Fund for Constitutional Gov't v. National Archives & Records Serv., 656 F.2d 856, 867 (D.C.Cir.1981). Therefore, the FBI does not have to reveal the information developed before the grand jury, including the identities of witnesses and the strategy or direction of the investigation. Fund for Constitutional Gov't, 656 F.2d at 869.

[10] As to the intercepted communications, the FBI argues that 18 U.S.C. 2511(2)(a)(ii) mandates nondisclosure. In Lam Lek Chong v. Drug Enforcement Admin., 929 F.2d 729 (D.C.Cir.1991), this Circuit found that 18 U.S.C. § 2517 exempts intercepted communications from disclosure under exemption (b)(3). Although it is unclear to the Court why the FBI focuses on § 2511(2)(a)(ii), which does not appear specifically to restrict disclosure by the FBI, the Court nevertheless finds withholding the information proper. Since §§ 2511 and 2517 broadly prohibit disclosure of this type of information, and the entire chapter was discussed generally in Lam Lek Chong, the Court is satisfied that this information is properly exempt from disclosure under (b)(3).

C. Exemption (b)(5)

[11] The FBI further argues that a draft affidavit containing United States Attorney work product can be withheld under exemption (b)(5). Exemption (b)(5) states that the government can withhold documents such as "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5).

This type of material is protected under exemption (b)(5), which is designed to protect the "decision making process of government agencies," National Labor Relations Bd. v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 150, 95 S.Ct. 1504, 1516, 44 L.Ed.2d 29 (1975), and to encourage "frank discussion of legal and policy issues." Wolfe v. Department of Health and Human Servs., 839 F.2d 768, 773 (D.C.Cir.1988) (en banc). This Circuit stated in Dudman Communications Corp. v. Department of the Air Force, 815 F.2d 1565 (D.C.Cir.1987), that > the key question in Exemption 5 cases [is] whether the disclosure of materials would expose an agency's decisionmaking process in such a way as to discourage candid discussion within the agency and thereby undermine the agency's ability to perform its functions.

Dudman, 815 F.2d at 1568. Disclosing the materials being withheld here, a draft affidavit, could have the effect that Dudman sought to avoid. Therefore, this document is properly exempt from disclosure under (b)(5).

D. Exemption (b)(6)

[12] The FBI also argues that autopsy photographs and felony arrest records should be protected from disclosure by exemption (b)(6), which allows the government to withhold "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6).

Unlike most FOIA exemptions, exemption (b)(6) requires a balancing of interests. Specifically, a court must weigh an individual's privacy interests in nondisclosure against the public's interest in disclosure to decide whether to allow the withholding of information under (b)(6). Horner, 879 F.2d at 874. To do this the Court must first decide whether or not a substantial privacy interest is involved. Horner, 879 F.2d at 874. If the Court finds such an interest, then it > must weigh that privacy interest in non-disclosure against the public interest in the release of the records in order to determine whether, on balance, disclosure 793 would work a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

Horner, 879 F.2d at 874-75.

In this case, an individual's interest in not having his or her autopsy photographs released to the public is substantial. Furthermore, the individual's family also has a substantial privacy interest in keeping their deceased relative's photographs out of the public realm. On the other hand, the public's interest in gaining access to these photographs is practically nonexistent when considered in light of the FOIA's purpose of exposing agency action to the public. Horner, 879 F.2d at 878-79. Therefore, the Court finds that the government may refuse to release the autopsy photographs. [FN2]

> FN2. The Court also notes that, in his opposition to the government's summary judgment motion, plaintiff denied any interest in autopsy photographs. Plaintiff's Opposition at 4.

[13] Although felony arrest records might also be properly withheld under exemption (b)(6), the Supreme Court has recently held that rap sheets categorically can be withheld under exemption (b)(7)(C). Reporters Comm., 489 U.S. at 780, 109 S.Ct. at 1485. Finding that the records requested here are essentially the same as the rap sheets requested in Reporters Comm., the Court has no need to analyze the disclosure of the felony arrest records under exemption (b)(6). Instead, the Court finds that this material is categorically exempt from disclosure under (b)(7)(C). Reporters Comm., 489 U.S. at 780, 109 S.Ct. at 1485.

E. Exemption (b)(7)(C)

[14] Next, the FBI argues that it does not have to reveal (1) the identities of FBI employees, (2) the identities of other federal government employees, (3) the identities and/or information about third parties who are mentioned in FBI investigative files, (4) the identities and/or information about individuals who are of investigative interest to the FBI, (5) the identities and/or information about third-parties who provided information to the FBI, and (6) the identities of state or local law enforcement personnel. Superneau Declaration ¶¶ 30-41. The DEA seeks protection for similar information including Epps's "accomplices, other defendants, informants, innocent third-parties, non-agent DEA personnel and third-parties [in] whom DEA has an investigative interest." Magruder Declaration ¶ 22. Both agencies rely on exemption (b)(7)(C), which excludes > records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production ... (C) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C).

[15] Exemption (b)(7)(C) requires the Court to balance the privacy interests in nondisclosure against the public interest in disclosure. Reporters Comm., 489 U.S. at 762, 109 S.Ct. at 1475. Case law from this and other circuits supports the exclusion of the type of information requested here. Lesar, 636 F.2d at 487-88 (exempting identities of agents, informants, and information about victims' family and associates); Johnson v. Department of Justice, 739 F.2d 1514, 1518-19 (10th Cir.1984) (exempting identities of FBI agents); New England Apple Council v. Donovan, 725 F.2d 139, 142-44 (1st Cir.1984) (exempting identities of Department of Labor Office of Inspector General officials and persons who gave information); Maroscia, 569 F.2d at 1002 (exempting identities of third-parties, FBI agents, and other law enforcement personnel). As one court has stated:

> One who serves his state or nation as a career public servant is not thereby stripped of every vestige of personal privacy, even with respect to the discharge of his official duties. Public identification of any of these individuals could conceivably subject them to harassment and annoyance in the conduct of their official duties and in their private lives.

Nix v. United States, 572 F.2d 998, 1006 (4th Cir.1978). Furthermore, plaintiff's unsubstantiated accusations of wrongdoing do not alter this result. Miller v. Bell, 661 F.2d 623, 630 (7th Cir.1981), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 960, 102 S.Ct. 2035, 72 L.Ed.2d 484 794 (1982). Accordingly, the Court finds that the information requested was compelled for law enforcement purposes and could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy. Therefore, the information was properly withheld.

[16] In addition, the FBI wants to withhold identities and information about confidential sources, and information provided under an assurance of confidentiality. It argues that exemption (b)(7)(D) allows this result. Exemption (b)(7)(D) allows nondisclosure of > records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production ... (D) could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source, including a State, local, or foreign agency or authority or any private institution which furnished information on a confidential basis, and, in the case of a record or information compiled by a criminal law enforcement authority in the course of a criminal investigation or by an agency conducting a lawful national security intelligence investigation, information furnished by a confidential source.

5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(D).

The FBI contends that the sources were confidential sources, arguing that the methods used by the agency when conducting interviews make it clear to the source that the information is being given confidentially.

> Based on my experience as an FBI agent, these factors almost universally create a situation during interviews in which it is clearly, albeit tacitly, understood by all concerned that the information to be provided during the interview is to be afforded maximum confidentiality.

Superneau Declaration ¶ 46. Although plaintiff disputes the sufficiency of this language, contending that the author lacks personal knowledge, his arguments must fail. This circuit recently analyzed the (b)(7)(D) exemption in Dow Jones & Co. v. Department of Justice, 917 F.2d 571 (D.C.Cir.1990), clarifying any doubt as to the application of the exemption.

> "The law of this circuit is that in the absence of evidence to the contrary, promises of confidentiality are inherently implicit when the FBI solicits information." As long as the department can show "that the information was solicited during the course of law enforcement investigations, the FBI raises the presumption that assurances were given" in exchange for the information.... Since the FBI typically promises confidentiality and rarely--if ever--will a source not desire it, only the starkest and most conclusive evidence of nonconfidentiality will rebut the presumption.

Dow Jones, 917 F.2d at 576-77 (citations omitted) (quoting Schmerler v. FBI, 900 F.2d 333, 337 (D.C.Cir.1990)). Therefore, the fact that the sources were interviewed by the FBI in the course of a law enforcement investigation raises the presumption that they were promised confidentiality, and it is plaintiff's burden to rebut this conclusion. Plaintiff has not met this burden.

Therefore, since the FBI acquired information from these sources during its investigation of Epps's criminal activities, both the names of the confidential sources and the information furnished by them can be withheld.

G. Exemption (b)(7)(E)

[17] The FBI further argues that under exemption (b)(7)(E) it can withhold (1) polygraph charts and lists of polygraph questions, (2) techniques used to protect and/or relocate witnesses, (3) information that, if revealed, would be tantamount to identifying the use of a technique, and (4) mechanics of investigation techniques. Superneau Declaration ¶¶ 53-57. The DEA argues that investigative techniques that are not commonly known to the general public, and that cannot be explained on the public record without being compromised, are also protected by (b)(7)(E). Magruder Declaration ¶ 26. Exemption (b)(7)(E) permits the withholding of > 795 records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production ... (E) would disclose techniques and procedures for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions, or would disclose guidelines for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions if such disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law.

5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(E).

This exemption is designed to allow the withholding of the type of information involved here. It protects law enforcement agencies from being required to provide information that might help criminals avoid apprehension. See American Soc'y of Pension Actuaries v. Internal Revenue Serv., 746 F.Supp. 188, 190 (D.D.C.1990). Revealing this information could reasonably be expected to compromise the effectiveness of the techniques and hamper law enforcement. Therefore, the FBI can withhold such information.

H. Exemption (b)(7)(F)

[18] Lastly, the FBI relies on exemption (b)(7)(F) to withhold the names and/or initials of FBI employees, other government employees, and state and local law enforcement officers. Superneau Declaration ¶¶ 58-63. The DEA seeks to withhold the "names and identities of DEA Special Agents, Supervisory Special Agents and other law enforcement officers" under the same exemption. Magruder Declaration ¶ 28. Exemption (b)(7)(F) provides nondisclosure of > records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production ... (F) could reasonably be expected to endanger the life or physical safety of any individual.

5 U.S.C. 552(b)(7)(F).

The same information withheld under exemption (b)(7)(C) may be withheld under exemption (b)(7)(F) to protect against risk of personal injury. Maroscia, 569 F.2d at 1002. Plaintiff and his associates have demonstrated violent tendencies, Superneau Declaration ¶ 59, and revealing the identities of federal agents and other law enforcement personnel could expose those people to harassment or physical injury. Superneau Declaration ¶ 60. These names and/or initials can be withheld to protect the safety of those involved in the Epps investigation.

Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, the Court grants the motion of the USAO, the FBI, and the DEA. The complaint is dismissed without prejudice as to the USAO for lack of subject matter jurisdiction for failure to exhaust administrative remedies. Because the Court finds that the affidavits of the FBI and the DEA adequately support that each item withheld is exempted from disclosure, the Court grants their summary judgment motion. Accordingly, the case is dismissed.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE; Janet Reno; U.S. Attorney's Office; Federal Bureau of Investigation; and Drug Enforcement Administration.

No. 92-5360.

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit.

April 29, 1993.

D.D.C., 801 F.Supp. 787.

AFFIRMED.

Before: WALD, RUTH B. GINSBURG and SILBERMAN, Circuit Judges.

ORDER

PER CURIAM.

1 Upon consideration of the motion for summary affirmance and the opposition thereto, it is ORDERED that the motion for summary affirmance be granted as to that portion of the September 15, 1992 order (the "September 15 order") which grants summary judgment as to the materials withheld by the Drug Enforcement Agency. The record supports the finding that the information withheld by this agency falls within the applicable exemptions to the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552, et seq. It is

FURTHER ORDERED that the motion for summary affirmance be denied as to that portion of the September 15 order which grants summary judgment as to the materials withheld by the Federal Bureau of Investigation ("FBI"). It is

FURTHER ORDERED, on the court's own motion, that the portion of the September 15 order which grants summary judgment as to the information withheld by the FBI be vacated. The Vaughn index (Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977 (1974)) submitted by the FBI is conclusory, and, particularly with respect to those documents withheld in their entirety, does not contain sufficient detail to render the district court's decision capable of meaningful review on appeal. See King v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 830 F.2d 210, 218 (D.C.Cir.1987). It is FURTHER ORDERED that the portion of the case pertaining to the information withheld by the FBI be remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this court's direction in Proctor v. United States Department of Justice, et al., Nos. 91-5305, et al. (D.C.Cir. Dec. 9, 1992) (case remanded based on FBI's representation that it intended to file a revised Vaughn index).

The Clerk is directed to withhold issuance of the mandate herein until seven days after disposition of any timely petition for rehearing. See D.C.Cir.Rule 15.

MEMORANDUM

JOHN GARRETT PENN, District Judge.

The plaintiff filed this action pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. The case is now before the Court on the motion to dismiss filed by the United States Marshals Service (USMS). After giving careful consideration to the motion, the opposition thereto, and the record in this case, the Court concludes that the motion should be granted.

This Court had entered an opinion and order granting the motions filed by the various defendants and dismissing the case. The Court of Appeals affirmed in part and reversed in part. See Farese v. United States Department of Justice, 826 F.2d 129 (D.C.Cir.1987) (Memorandum and Order). The appellate court affirmed with respect to all agencies named as defendants except for USMS and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The present motion relates only to the USMS.

With respect to the plaintiff's request addressed to the USMS, the Court of Appeals noted that the plaintiff had limited his claim to eleven pages being withheld by USMS. The agency had contended that the documents are exempt from disclosure pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6) ("personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy") and (7)(C) ("investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such records would ... constitute am unwarranted invasion of personal privacy") (Exemptions 6 and 7C).

The appellate court noted that USMS "neither submitted a Vaughn index to the eleven pages nor offered any more specific justification for the withholding of the documents." Court of Appeals Memorandum at 11. The court noted further that "[t]he mere fact that Farese was not referred to in the documents is not a reasonable basis for refusing to release the documents; indeed, the record indicates that Farese had requested documents referring to a named third party." Id.

In the present motion, captioned "Motion to Dismiss", but perhaps better described as a motion for partial summary judgment, USMS has filed two affidavits by Florastine P. Graham, Freedom of Information/Privacy Officer of the USMS. Ms. Graham has identified the eleven pages, setting forth their dates. After reading the Graham Affidavit dated October 20, 1987, and the attachments thereto [FN1], the Court is satisfied that the documents were compiled for law enforcement purposes. Ten of the pages relate to witness protection funding of several third party individuals who cooperated with the government in the criminal law enforcement process and one page relates to another third party individual. The one page refers to the *275 name, identifying data and arrest history of a third party individual. There is no reference to the plaintiff in the document. Ms. Graham notes that the disclosure of the document would subject the person to unwarranted public attention, harassment and criticism for having been associated with an official criminal investigation.

FN1. See in particular an earlier Graham Affidavit dated September 21, 1984 in which she describes the documents and states that they were compiled for law enforcement purposes. The September 21, 1984 affidavit was filed in Case No. 84-6179-CIV-JAG, United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida.

The remaining ten pages contain similar information reflecting "the names of several Witness Security Program participants, their entry dates into the Program, the number of family members, and the specific funds authorized and disbursed for the different services provided for the physical security of these witnesses and their families." Ms. Graham states that only three of the pages refer to a protected witness previously referred by name by the plaintiff. She goes on to note that the disclosure of the pages would reveal the identities of several persons who cooperated with the government in criminal law enforcement activities.

Nothing in the record of this case suggests that the Graham Affidavits are submitted in bad faith. Moreover, the Court can discern no public interest in disclosure which would outweigh the privacy interest in nondisclosure of the documents.

The plaintiff contends that the affidavits fail to fall within the standard required in these cases. This Court disagrees. USMS has described the documents and given the date of each document. The agency has set forth the nature of the documents and stated why the documents should be exempt from disclosure.

After weighing the above factors, the Court concludes that the USMS motion should be granted. There is simply no basis on which the Court can disagree with the defendant's contention that release of the documents would pose a possible danger to the persons named therein, or that release of the information might subject those persons to harassment. The potential danger is highlighted by the fact that the persons named therein participated with the government in criminal law enforcement and participated in the Witness Security Program.

The motion filed by USMS is granted and an appropriate order has been entered.

David L. Dougherty, Dept. of Justice, Civ. Div., with J. Ramsey Johnson, U.S. Atty., and John D. Bates, Asst. U.S. Atty., for defendant.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

CHARLES R. RICHEY, District Judge.

Before the Court are the Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment and the Plaintiff's Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment in this case under Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA"). 5 U.S.C. § 552. [FN1] After consideration of the filings by both parties, the applicable law, and the record herein, the Court shall grant the Defendant's Motion.

FN1. The above-captioned action was dismissed without prejudice on August 24, 1992, because the Plaintiff indicated that records involved in this action were the same records in dispute in another FOIA action brought by the Plaintiff in which the Court granted Summary Judgment for the Defendant. See Durham v. United States Postal Service, Civil Action No. 91-2234 (D.D.C. Nov. 25, 1992) (order granting summary judgment for the Defendant), aff'd No. 92-5511, 1993 WL 301151 (D.C.Cir. July 27, 1993) (order granting summary affirmance). The Plaintiff subsequently informed the Court that the two cases were not the same and this action was reopened. All motions filed before the dismissal are now properly before the Court.

431 I. BACKGROUND

of Kenneth Clark, a former Postal Service Carrier. He is requesting records pertaining to Clark's murder from the Defendant Executive Office for United States Attorneys ("EOUSA") under FOIA. He asks for all investigative records that pertain to himself relating to Clark's murder, the names of all suspects (including criminology reports on one particular suspect), and a waiver of any copying fees.

[1] In response to the Plaintiff's requests, EOUSA provided the Plaintiff with 103 pages in full. EOUSA released 62 pages with some information excised and withheld approximately 1,488 pages in full under certain FOIA Exemptions. See Defendant's Memorandum of Points and Authorities in Support of Defendant's Motion for Partial Summary Judgment. The Defendant has submitted three detailed declarations which describe the documents that were withheld and indicated under which FOIA exceptions those records fall. See Defendant's Motion for Partial Summary Judgment, Declaration of Virginia L. Wright ("Wright Declaration"); Declaration of Special Agent James L. Vermeersch ("Vermeersch Declaration"); and Declaration of Mary Otto ("Otto Declaration"). [FN2]

FN2. In its Order of July 1, 1992, the Court advised the Plaintiff that he needed to submit his own affidavits or other documentary evidence to contradict the factual assertions in Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment which were supported by documentary evidence. The Court indicated that if the Plaintiff failed to do so, the Court would adopt the Defendant's uncontradicted factual assertions as true. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(e); Neal v. Kelly, 963 F.2d 453, 456 (D.C.Cir.1992). To date, the Plaintiff has not submitted any affidavits or documentary evidence. The declarations submitted by the Defendant are detailed and non-conclusory, and the Court finds no evidence in the record that the agency is acting in bad faith. Therefore, the Court shall accept the Defendant's factual assertions as to their contents. See PHE, Inc. v. Department of Justice, 983 F.2d 248, 252-3 (D.C.Cir.1993).

[2] Because the Defendant has demonstrated that the withheld documents and information fall within FOIA Exemptions (b)(2), (b)(3), (b)(5), (b)(7)(C), (b)(7)(D), (b)(7)(F), the Court shall grant summary judgment for the Defendant. [FN3]

FN3. In his Complaint, the Plaintiff also requests this material under the Privacy Act of 1974, 5 U.S.C. § 552a (1988). However, the Plaintiff does not mention the Privacy Act in his other papers and the Defendants only briefly addresses that statute in their papers. The Court concludes that the Plaintiff also cannot receive the information he requested under the Privacy Act, as the information is contained in criminal law enforcement records. See Vermeersch Declaration, ¶ 21; Wright Declaration, ¶ 13. Such information is therefore exempt under 5 U.S.C. § 552a(j)(2), as implemented by 28 C.F.R. § 16.96 (1991) (FBI), and 28 C.F.R. § 16.81 (1991) (EOUSA).

II. EXEMPTION 2

[3][4][5] The Defendant invokes Exemption 2 to withhold from disclosure an informant's symbol number. [FN4] Under FOIA Exemption 2, material "related solely to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency" is exempted from disclosure. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(2). Exemption 2 permits withholding of information when disclosure would permit circumvention of a statute or agency regulation. Crooker v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms, 670 F.2d 1051, 1074 (D.C.Cir.1981). It is established law that the symbol numbers of informants fall within Exemption 2. See Lesar v. Department of Justice, 636 F.2d 472, 485-86 (D.C.Cir.1980) (informant codes "plainly fall within the ambit of Exemption 2"); Watson v. United States Department of Justice, 799 F.Supp. 193, 195 (D.D.C.1992) (DEA protection of Informant Identifier codes properly withheld as internal markings). Accordingly, the Court finds that the Defendant here properly withheld the informant source numbers under FOIA Exemption 2. [FN5]

FN4. Informant symbol numbers are used both to protect the confidentiality of an informant's identity, a precaution necessary in order for the agency to maintain the ability to attract informers, and to facilitate the routing of investigative documents to the proper files. Vermeersch Declaration, ¶ 23.

FN5. The Defendant alternatively claims FOIA exemption 7(C) for the informant source number. However, as the Court finds that such information is exempt under FOIA exemption 2, it is unnecessary to consider the applicability of 7(C).

*432 III. EXEMPTION 3

[6] The Defendant invokes Exemption 3 to justify its refusal to release 355 pages of grand jury records. Exemption 3 permits the withholding of information where:

> [a statute] requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or ... establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matters to be withheld.

5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3). The Defendant cites Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure as its justification for withholding "256 pages of transcripts of grand jury testimony, 96 grand jury subpoenas, 2 letters to grand jury witnesses, and a one-page draft memo from the grand jury foreman requesting evidence for inspection by the grand jury." Defendant's Motion for Partial Summary Judgment, Wright Declaration, ¶ 17.

[7] Rule 6(e) prohibits the disclosure of grand jury records which would "tend to reveal some secret aspect of the grand jury's investigation[;] such matters as 'the identities of witnesses or jurors, the substance of testimony, the strategy or direction of the investigation, the deliberations or questions of jurors, and the like.' " Senate of Puerto Rico v. United States Department of Justice, 823 F.2d 574, 582 (D.C.Cir.1987) (quoting SEC v. Dresser Industries, Inc., 628 F.2d 1368, 1382 (D.C.Cir.1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 993, 101 S.Ct. 529, 66 L.Ed.2d 289); see Fund for Constitutional Gov't v. National Archives & Records Serv., 656 F.2d 856, 867 (D.C.Cir.1981). The Court agrees that the information withheld by the Defendant here would enable the identification of witnesses or jurors, and would show the substance of testimony and the direction of the investigation. Accordingly, the Court finds that the grand jury records were properly withheld under FOIA Exemption 3.

[8] In addition to the grand jury records, the Defendant has also withheld three pages of tax records under this Exemption. [FN6] The relevant statute limiting disclosure of tax return information is 26 U.S.C. § 6103(a), which provides, inter alia, that returns and return information shall be confidential, and shall not be disclosed except as authorized by that title. As the tax information refers to a person other than the Plaintiff, there is no exception in that statute for its disclosure and the Court concludes that this material was properly withheld by the Defendant under this Exemption.

FN6. "Return information," as defined in 26 U.S.C. § 6103(b)(1)(2), encompasses the types of information included here. These records are a Certificate of Official Record, prepared by an Internal Revenue Service employee, regarding the individual income tax account of a third-party taxpayer; and two pages containing printed transcripts of account information of a third-party taxpayer including the taxpayer's name, address, social security number, adjusted gross income, taxable income, and exemptions. Otto Declaration, ¶¶ 8, 11.

IV. EXEMPTION 5

[9][10][11] The Defendant has invoked Exemption 5 to protect 507 pages of documents as work-product prepared by attorneys and other government personnel working under the prosecuting attorney's direction and supervision in the Defendant's criminal case. Wright Declaration, ¶ 18. [FN7] Exemption 5 permits the withholding of "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party ... in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). The Exemption encompasses "all civil discovery rules," Martin v. Office of Special Counsel, 819 F.2d 1181, 1185 (D.C.Cir.1987), and has been held to extend to criminal matters as well as civil. See Antonelli v. Sullivan, 732 F.2d 560, 561 (7th Cir.1983). The Exemption includes records not discoverable in litigation due to attorney work-product privilege, see NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149, 95 S.Ct. 1504, 1515-16, 44 L.Ed.2d 29 (1975), and thus any document prepared in anticipation of *433 litigation. See Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 509-10, 67 S.Ct. 385, 392-93, 91 L.Ed. 451 (1947). The work-product privilege exists even where the information has been shared with a third party so long as the party holds a common interest with the agency. See United States v. American Tel. and Tel. Co., 642 F.2d 1285, 1299 (D.C.Cir.1980).

FN7. Such documents include 1) a potential witness list, 2) interviews, 3) telephone messages, 4) opening and closing arguments, 5) trial notes, 6) evidentiary notes, 7) internal memoranda relating to the use of grand jury testimony and potential witness trial testimony, 8) letters to other Federal agencies and Departmental components regarding third-parties and their safety, and 9) draft pleadings. Wright Declaration, ¶¶ 18, 19.

The Defendant here represents that the materials withheld under this Exemption "reflect trial preparation, trial strategy, interpretations and personal evaluations and opinions regarding events pertinent to the criminal litigation in United States v. Ricky Durham." Wright Declaration, ¶ 19. As the documents withheld by the Defendant would not be available to a party in litigation with the Defendant agency, the Court concludes that these documents were properly withheld under FOIA Exemption 5. [FN8]

FN8. The Defendant claims that the documents are also protected under Exemptions 7(C), 7(D), and 7(F). However, as the Court finds that the records properly fall under Exemption 5, it need not reach the alternate claim.

V. EXEMPTIONS 7(C), (D), AND (F)

Pursuant to Exemption 7, the Defendant has withheld the names of confidential sources, agents, agency employees, and third parties mentioned in its investigatory files, and withheld 594 pages of records which it asserts contain information provided by confidential sources that might reveal their identities. Wright Declaration, ¶¶ 20, 22, 24; Vermeersch Declaration, ¶¶ 26, 36.

To qualify under Exemption 7, a document must 1) have been "compiled for law enforcement purposes" and 2) fall into one of six categories enumerated by that section. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7). The Defendant maintains that it compiled the information in the course of investigating the Plaintiff for the murder of the Postal Service employee, Kenneth Clark; for unlawful flight to avoid prosecution; and for drug trafficking. Wright Declaration, ¶ 12; Vermeersch Declaration, ¶¶ 15, 16. Therefore, the Court concludes that the Defendant has demonstrated that this material meets the first requirement that it was "compiled for law enforcement purposes."

As to the second prong, the Defendant claims that the withheld material here falls under 7(C), 7(D), and 7(F); the Court will consider each claim separately.

A. EXEMPTION 7(C)

[12] Under Exemption 7(C), the Defendant has withheld 29 pages of information to protect the names of third parties mentioned in its investigatory files. Vermeersch Declaration, ¶ 26; Wright Declaration, ¶ 20. Exemption 7(C) provides protection when the investigatory material "could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy...." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C).

[13][14] Exemption 7(C) requires a balancing of the named individual's personal privacy interest and the interest of the public in the disclosure of the information. United States Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 762, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 1476, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989); Stern v. FBI, 737 F.2d 84, 91 (D.C.Cir.1984). "It is generally recognized that the mention of an individual's name in a law enforcement file will engender comment and speculation and carries a stigmatizing connotation." Branch v. FBI, 658 F.Supp. 204, 209 (D.D.C.1987); see also Lesar, 636 F.2d at 488. The names of these individuals, while perhaps of interest to the Plaintiff, are not of interest to the general public. See Simon v. United States Department of Justice, 752 F.Supp. 14, 19, n. 5 (D.D.C.1990). Further, the goal of FOIA is to permit the public to scrutinize the activities of government; it is not intended to foster the dissemination of information gathered by the government about private citizens for the use of other citizens. KTVY-TV v. United States, 919 F.2d 1465, 1470 (10th Cir.1990).

The Defendant has also cited this Exemption to withhold the names and initials of employees and Special Agents of the FBI, the names of Postal Service Inspectors, and clerical employees of EOUSA. Vermeersch Declaration, ¶ 29; Wright Declaration, ¶ 20. Exemption 7(C) has been widely held to apply to the identities of federal, state and local law enforcement personnel mentioned in investigatory *434 files to protect such individuals from the potential harassment that could result from disclosure. See Lesar, 636 F.2d at 487-88; Johnson v. United States Department of Justice, 739 F.2d 1514, 1518-19 (10th Cir.1984); New England Apple Council, Inc. v. Donovan, 725 F.2d 139, 142 (1st Cir.1984); Nix v. United States, 572 F.2d 998, 1006 (4th Cir.1978).

For all these reasons, the Court concludes that the private privacy interests far outweigh the public interest in disclosure, and the Defendant properly withheld this information under Exemption 7(C).

B. EXEMPTION 7(D)

[15][16] The Defendant withheld 594 pages of records under this Exemption which it asserts contain 1) the identities of private citizens and law enforcement authorities who provided information to the Defendant under assurances of confidentiality, and 2) information provided by confidential sources that may enable identification of those sources. Wright Declaration, ¶ 22; Vermeersch Declaration, ¶ 36. [FN9]

FN9. Law enforcement agencies are "sources" within the meaning of 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(D). See Shaw v. Federal Bureau of Investigation, 749 F.2d 58, 62; Weisberg v. United States Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1492 (D.C.Cir.1984); Lesar, 636 F.2d at 491.

Exemption 7(D) provides protection for investigatory material which "could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source, ... or ... information furnished by a confidential source." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(D). The Defendant has indicated, and the Plaintiff has not contested, that the exchange of confidential information will be jeopardized if such confidentiality were breached, which in turn would cause damage to the agencies' ability to perform their tasks. Vermeersch Declaration, ¶ 39, Wright Declaration, ¶ 23. See Lesar, 636 F.2d at 491. Furthermore, the identity of a source is protected if, as is the case here, the source provides information under an express promise of confidentiality or under circumstances under which such a promise could be inferred. See Schmerler v. FBI, 900 F.2d 333, 337 (D.C.Cir.1990).

Accordingly, the Court concludes that these materials were properly withheld under Exemption 7(D).

C. EXEMPTION 7(F)

[17] The Defendant invokes this Exemption to delete the names of, and information that may be used to identify, third-parties. Wright Declaration, ¶ 24. Exemption 7(F) provides that investigatory information need not be disclosed if it "could reasonably be expected to endanger the life or physical safety of any individual." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(F). The Defendant alleges, and the Plaintiff does not refute, that these third-parties have knowledge about the crime in which the Plaintiff was involved, and that some have requested placement in the Federal Witness Protection Program. Given the Plaintiff's past violent behavior, the Court agrees with the Government that disclosure of the identity, or information enabling identification, of the individuals who assisted the government in its case against the Plaintiff could reasonably endanger their lives or physical safety. Accordingly, the Court finds that this material was properly withheld by the Defendant pursuant to this Exemption.

VI. PUBLIC RECORDS

[18][19][20] Finally, the Plaintiff has requested that the Defendant provide him with copies of 2,340 pages of public court records and to waive the copying fees because he is indigent. Even assuming, arguendo, that these records are subject to FOIA, the Plaintiff is not entitled to a waiver of the copying costs. FOIA provides for a waiver of fees where it is determined that disclosure is "in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of the operations or activities of the government and is not primarily in the commercial interest of the requester." 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii). The requester of the waiver has the "initial burden of identifying the public interest" in the information. National Treasury Employees Union v. Griffin, 811 F.2d 644, 647 (D.C.Cir.1987). The Plaintiff has failed to identify how it is in the public interest for the Defendant to provide him with free copies of documents that are easily accessible and available to everyone *435 else for a fee. [FN10] Accordingly, the Court determines that the Defendant is not required to provide the Plaintiff with copies of these court documents unless the Plaintiff remits the requisite fees.

FN10. The Court also notes that indigency alone does not constitute adequate grounds for a fee waiver. See Ely v. United States Postal Service, 753 F.2d 163, 165 (D.C.Cir.1985).

VII. CONCLUSION

Upon consideration of the Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment, the Plaintiff's Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment, and the applicable law, the Court finds that the Defendant is entitled to Judgment against the Plaintiff. The Court shall issue an order of even date herewith consistent with the foregoing Memorandum Opinion.

ORDER

Upon consideration of the Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment, the Plaintiff's Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment, and the applicable law, the record herein, and for the reasons articulated in the Court's Memorandum Opinion of even date herewith, it is, by the Court, this 17th day of August, 1993,

ORDERED that the Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment shall be, and hereby is, GRANTED; and it is

FURTHER ORDERED that the Plaintiff's Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment shall be, and hereby is, DENIED; and it is

FURTHER ORDERED that all other outstanding motions in the above-captioned case shall be, and are hereby, rendered MOOT; and it is FURTHER ORDERED that the above-captioned case shall be, and hereby is, DISMISSED from the dockets of this Court.

s 16.4 Responses by Components to Requests.

(a) In General. Except as otherwise provided in this section, the component that: (1) First receives a request for a record; and (2) has possession of the requested record is the component ordinarily responsible for responding to the request.

(b) Authority to Grant or Deny Requests. The head of a component, or his designee, is authorized to grant or deny any request for a record of that component.

(c) Initial Action by the Receiving Component. When a component receives a request for a record in its possession, the component shall promptly determine whether another component, or another agency of the Government, is better able to determine: (1) Whether the record is exempt, to any extent, from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA; and (2) whether the record, if exempt to any extent from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA, should nonetheless be released to the requester as a matter of discretion. If the receiving component determines that it is the component or agency best able to determine whether or not to disclose the record in response to the request, then the receiving component shall respond to the request. If the receiving component determines that it is not the component or agency best able to determine whether or not to disclose the record in response to the request, the receiving component shall either:

(i) Respond to the request, after consulting with the component or other agency best able to determine whether or not to disclose the record and with any other component or agency having a substantial interest in the requested record or the information contained therein; or

(ii) Refer the responsibility for responding to the request to the component best able to determine whether or not to disclose the record, or to another agency that generated or originated the record, but only if that other component or agency is subject to the provisions of the FOIA.

Under ordinary circumstances, the component or agency that generated or originated a requested record shall be presumed to be the component or agency best able to determine whether or not to disclose the record in response to the request. However, nothing in this section shall prohibit a component that generated or originated a requested record from referring the responsibility for responding to the request to another component, if the component that generated or originated the requested record determines that the other component has a greater interest in the requested record or the information contained therein.

(d) Law Enforcement Information. Whenever a request is made for a record containing information which relates to an investigation of a possible violation of criminal law or to a criminal law enforcement proceeding and which was generated or originated by another component or agency, the receiving component shall refer the responsibility for responding to the request to that other component or agency; however, such referral shall extend only to the information generated or originated by that other component or agency.

(e) Classified Information. Whenever a request is made for a record containing information which has been classified, or which may be eligible for classification, by another component or agency under the provisions of Executive Order 12356 or any other Executive Order concerning the classification of records, the receiving component shall refer the responsibility for responding to the request to the component or agency that classified the information or should consider the information for classification. Whenever a record contains information that has been derivatively classified by a component because it contains information classified by another component or agency, the component shall refer the responsibility for responding to the request to the component or agency that classified the underlying information; however, such referral shall extend only to the information classified by the other component or agency.

(f) Notice of Referral. Whenever a component refers all or any part of the responsibility for responding to a request to another component or to another agency, it ordinarily shall notify the requester of the referral and inform the requester of the name and address of each component or agency to which the request has been referred and the portions of the request so referred.

(g) Agreements Regarding Consultations and Referrals. No provision of this section shall preclude formal or informal agreements between components, or between a component and another agency, to eliminate the need for consultations or referrals of requests or classes of requests.

(h) Separate Referrals of Portions of a Request. Portions of a request may be referred separately to one or more components or to one or more other agencies whenever necessary to process the request in accordance with the provisions of this section.

(i) Processing of Requests that Are Not Properly Addressed. A request that is not properly addressed as specified in s 16.3(a) of this subpart shall be forwarded to the FOIA/PA Section, Justice Management Division, which shall forward the request to the appropriate component or components for processing. A request not addressed to the appropriate component will be deemed not to have been received by the Department of Justice until the FOIA/PA Section has forwarded the request to the appropriate component and that component has received the request, or until the request would have been so forwarded and received with the exercise of reasonable diligence by Department personnel. A component receiving an improperly addressed request forwarded by the FOIA/PA Section shall notify the requester of the date on which it received the request.

(j) Date for Determining Responsive Records. In determining records responsive to a request, a component ordinarily will include only those records within the component's possession and control as of the date of its receipt of the request.

s 16.5 Form and content of component responses.

(a) Form of Notice Granting a Request. After a component has made a determination to grant a request in whole or in part, the component shall so notify the requester in writing. The notice shall describe the manner in which the record will be disclosed, whether by providing a copy of the record to the requester or by making a copy of the record available to the requester for inspection at a reasonable time and place. The procedure for such an inspection shall not unreasonably disrupt the operations of the component. The component shall inform the requester in the notice of any fees to be charged in accordance with the provisions of s 16.10 of this subpart.

(b) Form of Notice Denying a Request. A component denying a request in whole or in part shall so notify the requester in writing. The notice must be signed by the head of the component, or his designee, and shall include:

(1) The name and title or position of the person responsible for the denial;

(2) A brief statement of the reason or reasons for the denial, including the FOIA exemption or exemptions which the component has relied upon in denying the request and a brief explanation of the manner in which the exemption or exemptions apply to each record withheld; and

(3) A statement that the denial may be appealed under s 16.8(a) and a description of the requirements of that subsection.

(c) Record Cannot be Located or Has Been Destroyed. If a requested record cannot be located from the information supplied, or is known or believed to have been destroyed or otherwise disposed of, the component shall so notify the requester in writing.

s 16.8 Appeals.

(a) Appeals to the Attorney General. When a request for access to records or for a waiver of fees has been denied in whole or in part, or when a component fails to respond to a request within the time limits set forth in the FOIA, the requester may appeal the denial of the request to the Attorney General within 30 days of his receipt of a notice denying his request. An appeal to the Attorney General shall be made in writing and addressed to the Office of Information and Privacy, United States Department of Justice, 10th Street and Constitution Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20530. Both the envelope and the letter of appeal itself must be clearly marked: "Freedom of Information Act Appeal." An appeal not so addressed and marked will be forwarded to the Office of Information and Privacy as soon as it is identified. An appeal that is improperly addressed will be deemed not to have been received by the Department until the Office of Information and Privacy receives the appeal, or would have done so with the exercise of reasonable diligence by Department personnel.

(b) Action on Appeals by the Office of Information and Privacy. Unless the Attorney General otherwise directs, the Director, Office of Information and Privacy, under the supervision of the Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Policy, shall act on behalf of the Attorney General on all appeals under this section, except that:

(1) In the case of a denial of a request by the Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Policy, the Attorney General or his designee shall act on the appeal, and

(2) A denial of a request by the Attorney General shall constitute the final action of the Department on that request.

(c) Form of Action on Appeal. The disposition of an appeal shall be in writing. A decision affirming in whole or in part the denial of a request shall include a brief statement of the reason or reasons for the affirmance, including each FOIA exemption relied upon and its relation to each record withheld, and a statement that judicial review of the denial is available in the United States District Court for the judicial district in which the requester resides or has his principal place of business, the judicial district in which the requested records are located, or the District of Columbia. If the denial of a request is reversed on appeal, the requester shall be so notified and the request shall be processed promptly in accordance with the decision on appeal.

s 16.26 Considerations in determining whether production or disclosure should be made pursuant to a demand.

(a) In deciding whether to make disclosures pursuant to a demand, Department officials and attorneys should consider:

(1) Whether such disclosure is appropriate under the rules of procedure governing the case or matter in which the demand arose, and

(2) Whether disclosure is appropriate under the relevant substantive law concerning privilege.

(b) Among the demands in response to which disclosure will not be made by any Department official are those demands with respect to which any of the following factors exist:

(1) Disclosure would violate a statute, such as the income tax laws, 26 U.S.C. 6103 and 7213, or a rule of procedure, such as the grand jury secrecy rule, F.R.Cr.P., Rule 6(e),

(2) Disclosure would violate a specific regulation,

(3) Disclosure would reveal classified information, unless appropriately declassified by the originating agency,

(4) Disclosure would reveal a confidential source or informant, unless the investigative agency and the source or informant have no objection,

(5) Disclosure would reveal investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes, and would interfere with enforcement proceedings or disclose investigative techniques and procedures the effectiveness of which would thereby be impaired,

(6) Disclosure would improperly reveal trade secrets without the owner's consent.

(c) In all cases not involving considerations specified in paragraphs (b)(1)-(b)(6) of this section, the Deputy or Associate Attorney General will authorize disclosure unless, in that person's judgment, after considering paragraph (a) of this section, disclosure is unwarranted. The Deputy or Associate Attorney General will not approve disclosure if the circumstances specified in paragraphs (b)(1)-(b)(3) of this section exist. The Deputy or Associate Attorney General will not approve disclosure if any of the conditions in paragraphs (b)(4)-(b)(6) of this section exist, unless the Deputy or Associate Attorney General determines that the administration of justice requires disclosure. In this regard, if disclosure is necessary to pursue a civil or criminal prosecution or affirmative relief, such as an injunction, consideration shall be given to:

(1) The seriousness of the violation or crime involved,

(2) The past history or criminal record of the violator or accused,

(3) The importance of the relief sought,

(4) The importance of the legal issues presented,

(5) Other matters brought to the attention of the Deputy or Associate Attorney General.

(d) Assistant Attorneys General, United States attorneys, the Director of the EOUST, United States trustees, and their designees, are authorized to issue instructions to attorneys and to adopt supervisory practices, consistent with this subpart, in order to help foster consistent application of the foregoing standards and the requirements of this subpart.

Leona WEBER, Plaintiff-Appellant,
v.
T. R. CONEY, U.S. Marshall, and J. A. "Tony" Canales, U.S. Attorney, etc., Defendants-Appellees.

No. 80-1656
Summary Calendar.

United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.
Unit A

March 9, 1981.

In Freedom of Information Act case, the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, Hugh Gibson, J., granted summary judgment in favor of the government, and plaintiff appealed. The Court of Appeals held that: (1) plaintiff did not make the required strong showing of necessity so as to be entitled to a writ of mandamus commanding district judges to vacate a docket entry transferring her case from one division to another; (2) plaintiff was not entitled to a de novo hearing on her complaint; (3) government's failure to answer the complaint within 30 days did not entitle plaintiff to a default judgment; and (4) district court properly granted government's motion for summary judgment, where government submitted affidavits that all the records in its possession had been delivered to plaintiff and plaintiff did not submit any affidavit or other response to the government's affidavits.

92 Leona Weber, pro se.

J. A. "Tony" Canales, U. S. Atty., Houston, Tex., for defendants-appellees.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas.

Before GEE, RUBIN and RANDALL, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

Some months ago appellant Weber requested, under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), a copy of all records kept by the United States Marshall and the "U.S. Justice Department" at Houston, Texas. Receiving replies that she deemed unsatisfactory, she filed suit, pro se, seeking injunctive relief directing defendants to disclose the requested information. The government's oral motion for an extension of time until January 1, 1979, in which to answer was granted on October 27, 1978. On December 29, 1978, the government filed a motion to dismiss or for summary judgment. After a hearing, the motion was granted. On this appeal, she seeks relief of various kinds. We deal with her claims seriatim.

I. Writ of Mandamus.

In her brief to us, Ms. Weber petitions the court to issue a writ of mandamus commanding District Judges Black and Gibson to vacate a docket entry transferring her case from Houston to the Galveston Division. She contends that Judge Black should be disqualified from hearing her case, that her case was improperly transferred by Judge Black to Judge Gibson's court in Galveston, that Judge Gibson's court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction, and that the judgment does not terminate the action because Judge "Gibson refuse(d) to hear the remaining issues."

[1][2] Mandamus is an extraordinary remedy that lies only to confine a lower court within its jurisdiction or to compel it to perform ministerial, not discretionary, functions. In re Evans, 524 F.2d 1004, 1007 (5th Cir. 1975). We have uniformly declined to issue the writ except upon a strong showing of necessity for its use. Steward v. West, 449 F.2d 324, 325 (5th Cir. 1971). For the reasons given below, such a showing has not been made here.

A. Disqualification of Judge Black.

[3] Ms. Weber's complaint to us that Judge Black should have disqualified himself in the case is wide of the mark in several respects. It is untimely because she filed the motion to disqualify about one year after the case was assigned to Judge Black, about four months after the case was transferred to Judge Gibson, and three days after Judge Gibson rendered a final judgment. See 28 U.S.C. s 144. It is moot and 93 frivolous because Judge Black did not decide her case.

B. Improper Transfer and Subject-Matter Jurisdiction.

[4][5][6] Next Ms. Weber contends, in essence, that the Gibson court lacked jurisdiction because a venue statute or local rule was violated in assigning the case there. Neither statute nor rule is jurisdictional. The FOIA places jurisdiction in the judicial district where complainant resides, not to particular courts within that district. 5 U.S.C. s 552(a)(4)(B). Any district court in the Southern District of Texas would have had jurisdiction to hear the complaints and proper venue under 28 U.S.C. s 1391(e)(4) or s 1404. Ms. Weber misconstrues section 1404. That section clearly provides that, for the convenience of parties and in the interest of justice, a district court may transfer any civil action to any other district or division where it might have been brought. Ms. Weber's action might have been brought in the Galveston Division. Moreover, the district court has wide discretion to determine whether to transfer for the convenience of parties and in the interest of justice. Bearden v. United States, 320 F.2d 99, 101 (5th Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 922, 84 S.Ct. 679, 11 L.Ed.2d 616 (1964). Our review discerns no abuse of discretion. Finally, Ms. Weber's voluntary appearance in the action waives the defects, if any, as to venue. Murphy v. Travelers Insurance Co., 534 F.2d 1155, 1159 (5th Cir. 1976). Although she protested the venue change in general terms when she appeared before the court, she concluded by stating, "I don't really oppose the venue because I would like to have a hearing in this case." She was granted a hearing forthwith.

C. Attorney's Fees.

[7][8] Ms. Weber argues that her claim is still pending because Judge Gibson failed to adjudicate her claim for attorney fees. She is mistaken; these were necessarily denied when the court dismissed her action and taxed its costs against her and when the court denied her motion for a hearing on that express subject and others by order of June 12, 1980. Such an award is not automatic but is left to the sound discretion of the trial court. Chamberlain v. Kurtz, 589 F.2d 827, 842 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 842, 100 S.Ct. 82, 62 L.Ed.2d 54 (1979). Ms. Weber had the opportunity to present her claims and did so at the hearing before Judge Gibson and in her reply to defendants' motion for summary judgment. The record neither indicates, nor has Ms. Weber shown, any abuse of discretion.

II. Appellate Issues.

Before us Ms. Weber claims a mandatory right to a de novo hearing, that the government must file an answer to her FOIA complaint, that she is entitled to a default judgment, and that the government was not entitled to summary judgment.

[9] The FOIA provides for a de novo determination on the issue of withholding records. 5 U.S.C. s 552(a)(4)(B). However, that provision presupposes the existence of records, and here the government, by affidavits, denies the existence of any requested records. In these circumstances summary judgment was appropriate, as we discuss below.

The FOIA also provides generally that, notwithstanding any other provision of law, a defendant must serve an answer within 30 days. 5 U.S.C. s 552(a)(4) (C). The key words are "30 days," not "answer." See H.R.Rep.No.93-876 and Conf.Rep.No.93-1200, 93d Cong., 2d Sess., reprinted in (1974) U.S.Code Cong. & Ad.News 6267 and 6285. Ms. Weber misunderstands section 552(a)(4)(C).

[10] Nor is Ms. Weber entitled to a default judgment because the government failed to "answer" in 30 days. Under 5 U.S.C. s 552(a)(4)(C), a defendant must answer or otherwise plead within 30 days unless the court otherwise directs for good cause shown. Ms. Weber claims that the court erred in not granting her show-cause order. As pointed out above, an "answer" is not the only response permitted under the FOIA. The government sought and obtained 94 an extension of time to answer, after which it filed a motion for summary judgment, which was granted. No "answer" was required.

[11] Ms. Weber next complains that the court erred in granting the motion for summary judgment. She contends generally that the court's order has a fatal inconsistency, that she was denied her right to take depositions, that the affidavits were defective, that the court violated Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(c) and (f), that there were fact issues in dispute, and that the hearing was "tainted." These complaints lack merit. The grant of summary judgment was correct because there was no genuine issue of material fact. All of the agencies involved stated, under oath, that all of the records in their possession had been delivered to Ms. Weber. Under Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(e), Ms. Weber may not rest on mere allegations or denials of pleadings; she must, by affidavit or other appropriate means, set forth specific facts establishing the existence of a genuine issue for trial or at the least showing why she cannot do so. For whatever reasons, Ms. Weber chose not to submit any affidavit or other appropriate response to the government's affidavits. The granting of the motion was proper.

Finally, Ms. Weber, by separate motion, asks that her appeal take precedence on the docket. Under Local Rule 19, a writ of mandamus and a FOIA request are to be given some preference in processing and disposition, and we have sought to act expeditiously.

AFFIRMED.

Jack URBAN, Appellant,
v.
UNITED STATES of America; Kansas Bureau of Investigation, Appellees.

No. 95-2386.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Oct. 6, 1995.

Decided Dec. 27, 1995.

Inmate sought results of his polygraph test under Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) from United States Attorney and was informed they did not have records. Inmate commenced action under FOIA. The United States District Court for the District of South Dakota, Richard H. Battey, Chief Judge, dismissed action as moot without requiring service on government. Inmate appealed. The Court of Appeals, Loken, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) action was not moot, and (2) United States Attorney's response was inadequate.

94 Appellant was not represented by counsel.

Bonnie P. Ulrich, Assistant U.S. Attorney, Sioux Falls, South Dakota, for appellees.

Before FAGG, LOKEN, and MORRIS SHEPPARD ARNOLD, Circuit Judges.

LOKEN, Circuit Judge.

South Dakota inmate Jack Urban appeals the district court's dismissal of his action to enforce a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request. The court dismissed Urban's complaint, prior to service, because "[n]onexistent records are impossible to produce." At least some of the requested materials almost certainly exist--the question is 95 whether they are in the possession or control of the United States Department of Justice. Because the government has not met its burden to demonstrate that it has complied with the statute, see Miller v. United States Dep't of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1382-83 (8th Cir.1985), we reverse.

Urban took a polygraph test in February 1994 as part of a plea agreement with the United States Attorney for the District of Kansas. The Kansas Bureau of Investigation (KBI) administered the test and reported to the U.S. Attorney that the test results indicated truthful cooperation with the government. In July 1994, Urban informally asked KBI for information and documents relating to the test results. KBI forwarded Urban's request to the U.S. Attorney, who wrote Urban's attorney advising "[t]he materials he requested will not be forthcoming."

Urban then sent a FOIA letter to the U.S. Attorney requesting "the results of my polygraph test" and "the polygrapher's resume." The U.S. Attorney did not answer this or a follow-up letter but instead forwarded the FOIA request to the Executive Office for the United States Attorneys. That Office responded to Urban that a search of the U.S. Attorney's office "has revealed no records." The Department of Justice Office of Information and Privacy rejected Urban's subsequent appeal on the ground that "appeals can only be taken from denials of access to records which exist and can be located in Department of Justice files." Acting pro se, Urban then commenced this action under FOIA, 5 U.S.C. §§ 552 et seq., which the district court dismissed as moot, without requiring service on the government.

[1][2] "In FOIA cases, mootness occurs when requested documents have already been produced." In re Wade, 969 F.2d 241, 248 (7th Cir.1992). That has not occurred in this case. Instead, the government claims it cannot locate the requested documents. FOIA obligates the government to produce documents within its "possession or control." Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136, 150-51, 100 S.Ct. 960, 969, 63 L.Ed.2d 267 (1980). When a government agency claims that it does not possess or control a requested document, the agency must show it fully discharged its statutory obligations by "conduct[ing] a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Weisberg v. United States Dep't of Justice, 705 F.2d 1344, 1351 (D.C.Cir.1983), followed in Miller, 779 F.2d at 1382. Thus, when the question is whether a requested document exists, or is outside the government's possession or control, an FOIA action is not moot, and dismissal prior to service will almost never be appropriate.

[3] In this case, the actions of KBI strongly suggest that one or more requested documents exist and are within the possession or control of the U.S. Attorney for the District of Kansas. In response to our order to show cause, the responsible Assistant U.S. Attorney submitted an affidavit stating that he "did not produce the requested documentation because it did not exist in the files of the United States Attorney's office." That is an inadequate answer. Urban has now spent nearly eighteen months seeking a copy of seemingly innocuous test results. His early requests got no response or a cryptic brush off. He has never been told why he is not entitled to the documents. And his attempt to invoke FOIA, a statute intended to foster greater access to government records, has instead fostered more paper shuffling and lame excuses.

There may be a legitimate reason why Urban is not entitled to the materials he requests, but none appears in this record. Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is reversed and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion, including, if necessary, an evidentiary hearing at which the responsible Assistant U.S. Attorney can testify as to whether the Department of Justice has possession or control of one or more of the requested documents.

Charles V. STEPHENSON, Plaintiff-Appellant,
v.
INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE, Atlanta, Georgia, and John W. Henderson, District Director, IRS Georgia, Defendants-Appellees.

No. 79-2685.

United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit.

Nov. 7, 1980.

Taxpayer who was subject of civil and criminal investigation brought Freedom of Information Act suit seeking release of documents. The United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, William C. O'Kelley, rendered summary judgment for Internal Revenue Service, and taxpayer appealed. The Court of Appeals, Fay, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) government affidavit describing the withheld documents in fairly detailed but generic terms and claiming that release would interfere with enforcement proceedings was insufficient basis on which to deny taxpayer's motion for detailed justification, itemization and indexing of the documents and summary judgment for the government; (2) where records do not exist, affidavits are probably not only sufficient but possibly the best method of verification; and (3) once it is shown that records and documents are in possession of the governmental agency, more is required and alternative procedures should be used, such as sanitized indexing, random or representative sampling in camera with the record sealed for review, oral testimony or combinations thereof.

Vacated and remanded with directions.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia.

Before RONEY, HILL and FAY, Circuit Judges.

FAY, Circuit Judge:

Appellant, Charles Stephenson, seeks reversal of the District Court's entry of summary judgment in favor of the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) in appellant's action for release of documents pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) 5 U.S.C. s 552(a) (1978). He also seeks reversal of the District Court's denial of appellant's 1142 motion for a detailed justification, itemization and indexing of all Internal Revenue Service documents withheld from disclosure to appellant pursuant to claimed exemptions under 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(3), 7(A), 7(C) (1978). We conclude here that the affidavits submitted by the Service provide an insufficient basis for such determinations. Therefore, the judgment of the trial court must be reversed and remanded.

I.

Appellant is the subject of civil and criminal investigations into his tax liabilities for the years 1975 through 1977. While these ongoing investigations by the Internal Revenue Service have not reached the prosecutorial stage, a substantial file has been developed.[FN1] The Service released 390 pages of documents covered by appellant's request under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. s 552 (1978).[FN2] Exemptions from release were asserted under 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(3), (7)(A), (7)(C) (1978) [FN3] as to some 313 pages of documents. Appellant then sought injunctive and declaratory relief in District Court.[FN4] The court initially granted appellant's motion under Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974) and ordered the filing of a detailed justification and index for the withholding of each document. However, on the Service's motion for reconsideration, supported by an affidavit of the IRS Special Agent conducting the ongoing investigations of appellant,[FN5] the District Court reversed its 1143 previous decision and denied appellant's motion for a Vaughn index.[FN6] Subsequently, the District Court granted appellee's motion for summary judgment [FN7] and denied appellant's motion for relief from judgment [FN8] and partial summary judgment. We have jurisdiction for this appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. s 1291 (1978).

FN1. The I.R.S. indicated that appellant's file consisted of 703 pages of documents. Brief for appellee at 2.

FN2. 5 U.S.C. s 552 (1978) provides: (a) Each agency shall make available to the public information as follows: (3) Except with respect to the records made available under paragraph (1) and (2) of this subsection, each agency, upon any request for records which (A) reasonably describes such records and (B) is made in accordance with published rules stating the time, place, fees (if any), and procedures to be followed, shall make the records promptly available to any person.

FN3. 5 U.S.C. s 552(b) (1978) provides: (b) This section does not apply to matters that are-(3) specifically exempted from disclosure by statute (other than section 552b of this title), provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matters to be withheld. (7) investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such records would (A) interfere with enforcement proceedings, (B) deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or an impartial adjudication, (C) constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, (D) disclose the identity of a confidential source and, in the case of a record compiled by a criminal law enforcement authority in the course of a criminal investigation, or by an agency conducting a lawful national security intelligence investigation, confidential information furnished only by the confidential source, (E) disclose investigative techniques and procedures, or (F) endanger the life or physical safety of law enforcement personnel.

FN4. 5 U.S.C. s 552(a)(4)(B) (1978) provides: On complaint, the district court of the United States in the district in which the complainant resides, or has his principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia, has jurisdiction to enjoin the agency from withholding agency records and to order the production of any agency records improperly withheld from the complainant. In such a case the court shall determine the matter de novo, and may examine the contents of such agency records in camera to determine whether such records or any part thereof shall be withheld under any of the exemptions set forth in subsection (b) of this section, and the burden is on the agency to sustain its action.

FN5. The affidavit provides in part: 1. I, Richard J. Gutierriz, am a special agent in the Criminal Investigation Division (formerly the Intelligence Division) of the Atlanta District Office of the Internal Revenue Service. 2. My responsibilities as a special agent in the Criminal Investigation Division include investigating the possibility of criminal violations of the Internal Revenue laws and related offenses. 4. In connection with my duties as a special agent, in November 1977, I was assigned the tax investigation of Charles V. Stephenson for the years 1975 and 1976. In May 1978, this investigation was expanded to include the 1977 tax year. The ongoing criminal tax investigation of Charles V. Stephenson is presently being conducted jointly with the assistance of a revenue agent in the Examination Division. 5. The joint investigation of Charles V. Stephenson involves potential criminal liability for possible violations of section 7203 of Title 26, 26 U.S.C. s 7203, involving the failure to file Federal income tax returns for the years 1975, 1976, and 1977. 6. I am familiar with the FOIA request made by Charles v. Stephenson, and with the documents which he has requested. 7. The documents requested by Charles V. Stephenson (those which were generated during the course of the joint investigation) which are presently in issue in this lawsuit consist of (1) memoranda of interviews with third parties, (2) records and information received from third parties relative to financial transactions with Charles V. Stephenson, (3) summonses and other documentary requests made to third parties, (4) internal memoranda requesting review of summonses, (5) internal memoranda which analyze the scope and direction of the investigation and reveal the strengths and weaknesses of the Government's case, such as fraud referral reports and investigative work plans, (6) revenue agent's workpapers, (7) special agent's workpapers, and (8) sworn statements of third parties. 8. I personally reviewed all of the documents requested by Charles V. Stephenson with Becky Brannan of the Disclosure Office.

Based on this review, it was determined that about 390 of the 650 pages of documents could be released without interfering with the joint investigation of Charles V. Stephenson. 9. I determined that the release of the documents referred to in # 7 above would interfere with the joint investigation of Charles V. Stephenson and with any potential criminal prosecution, by revealing the evidence against Charles V. Stephenson and the reliance placed by the Government on that evidence, the names of likely witnesses for the Government should Stephenson ultimately be indicted, the transactions being investigated, the direction of the investigation, and the scope and limits of the Government's investigation. To reveal the identity of third parties and potential witnesses contacted during the course of my investigation could subject these third parties and potential witnesses to harassment. Access to potential evidence could allow plaintiff to construct defenses and tamper with the evidence. 10. In addition to the documents referred to in # 7 above, the investigatory files on Charles V. Stephenson contained certain documents, which are also in issue in this litigation, reflecting the tax affairs of unrelated third parties. These documents consist of the Federal income tax returns (Form 1040) of a third taxpayer, checks and deposit slips reflecting financial information about third parties, and transcripts of account which contain tax information about third parties, including the taxpayer's identity, his social security number, and information about the taxpayer's account such as payments, credits, refunds, extensions filed, collection action and audit activity. Record, vol. I at 46-48.

FN6. The District Court's order denied appellant's motion based upon the exemption from disclosure in 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(7)(A) (1978) and the Supreme Court's decision in N.L.R.B. v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978). The order only refers to 260 pages of undisclosed documents and does not address any other exemptions under FOIA.

FN7. This motion was also supported by the affidavit of Special Agent Gutierrez. The order of the court found that, based upon this affidavit, 209 pages in question were exempt under 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(3) (1978) since disclosure would have been prohibited under 26 U.S.C. s 6103(b)(1), (b)(2)(A) (1979). Record, vol. I, at 155-56. This section of the I.R.C., in general, protects tax returns and return information from disclosure to third parties. The order, further found that, based on the same affidavit, the remaining 104 pages are exempt from disclosure pursuant to 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(7)(A) (1978). Record, vol. I, at 156-58.

FN8. The District Court, because appellant was proceeding pro se, disregarded appellant's improper denomination of his motion under Fed.R.Civ.P. 60(b) and addressed it as a motion for reconsideration.

[1][2][3] An appellate court has two duties in reviewing determinations under FOIA. [FN9] (1) We must determine whether the district court had an adequate factual basis for the decision rendered and (2) whether upon this basis the decision reached was clearly erroneous. See Church of Scientology v. U.S. Department of Defense, 611 F.2d 738, 742 (9th Cir. 1979). We find that based upon this record the District Court did not have an adequate basis and consequently that the court's factual conclusions and subsequent determinations were clearly erroneous, as admitted in the appellee's brief.[FN10]

FN9. Counsel advise, and it appears, that this is a case of first impression in the Circuit. However, several opinions of this Court have indicated the result we reach in this case, that in most situations blanket objections, mere conclusory allegations or affidavits will not suffice for disposition of FOIA claims. See Moorefield v. United States Secret Service, 611 F.2d 1021, 1023 (5th Cir. 1980); Sladek v. Bensinger, 605 F.2d 899, 907-08 (5th Cir. 1979) (Hill J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); Chamberlain v. Kurtz, 589 F.2d 827, 835 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 842, 100 S.Ct. 82, 62 L.Ed.2d 54 (1980); Kent Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 530 F.2d 612, 624 n.30 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 920, 97 S.Ct. 316, 50 L.Ed.2d 287 (1976).

FN10. We note with appreciation the candor of appellee's counsel in disclosing, in his brief and at oral argument, the erroneous basis for the District Court's decision as to 209 pages of documents held exempt under 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(3) (1978). Brief for Appellee at 11. This disclosure was consistent with the high ethical standards expected of counsel as officers of the Court.

FOIA provides that the district court shall determine de novo whether claimed exemptions are applicable.[FN11] The Act also leaves to the court's discretion whether to order an examination of the contents of the agency records at issue, in camera, in making this determination.[FN12] However, the legislative intent for exercise of this discretion is relatively clear.

FN11. See note 4 supra.

FN12. Id.

(t)he court may examine records in camera in making its determination under any of the nine categories of exemptions under section 552(b) of the law ... While in camera examination need not be automatic, in many situations it will plainly be necessary and appropriate. Before the court orders in camera inspection, the Government should be given the opportunity to establish by means of testimony or detailed affidavits that the documents are clearly exempt from disclosure. The burden remains on the Government under this law.

S.Rep. No. 1200, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 9 (1974), reprinted in (1974) U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News, pp. 6267, 6287-88 (Conference Report).[FN13]

FN13. This language substantially tracks the Supreme Court's opinion in E.P.A. v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 93, 93 S.Ct. 827, 839, 35 L.Ed.2d 119 (1973) the result of which, however, was specifically disapproved of in the conference report. In Mink the Supreme Court also noted that selective in camera inspection might be another method by which the District Court could apprise itself of the bona fides of the agency's claim of exemption. Id.

Appellant's contention that the court should order the IRS to submit a detailed index and justification for the withholding of the documents, as well as conduct an in camera review, derives from a line of D.C. Circuit opinions initiated by Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974) on appeal from remand, 523 F.2d 1136 (D.C.Cir.1975). The sole support initially offered by the government in Vaughn was a conclusory affidavit of the Director of the Bureau of Personnel Management Evaluation claiming exemption under 5 U.S.C. s 552(a)(3) (1970). 484 F.2d at 824. The use of affidavits created difficult problems of procedure and proof for the Vaughn court since the resolution of most FOIA disputes centers around the factual nature of the information sought and the statutory category asserted in response. Id. The Vaughn court observed that factual characterizations in affidavits may or may not be accurate. Id. at 824. Such concern has been conclusively justified in the present action.

1145 Of the 209 pages deemed exempt by the District Court as tax return information of third parties under 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(3) (1978) and 28 U.S.C. s 6103 (1979), Record, vol. I, at 155-56, it was subsequently discovered that, in fact, 156 pages consisted of checks and deposit slips comprising financial information (not related to tax returns) of third parties possibly exempt, if at all, only under 5 U.S.C. s 552(b)(7)(C) (1978). Brief for Appellee at 11. Therefore, the District Court was led astray in its determination by factual conclusions founded in an affidavit which described the withheld documents in fairly detailed but generic terms.[FN14]

FN14. See note 5 supra.

To avoid such a result, and mindful of the disadvantages of in camera review, the Vaughn court articulated an intermediate approach by requiring from the withholding agency an index and detailed justification for their claim. 484 F.2d at 825, 826-28. Subsequent decisions approved of variations on this basic approach such as, index and court examination of sample reports stipulated by both parties to be representative, see, e. g. Vaughn v. Rosen, 523 F.2d at 1139-40, use of detailed justifications alone where indexing would be inappropriate, see, e. g. Pacific Architects & Engineers, Inc. v. Renegotiation Board, 505 F.2d 383, 385 (D.C.Cir.1974), and random sample inspection of documents listed and described in an affidavit see, e. g. Ash Grove Cement Co. v. F. T. C., 511 F.2d 815, 816 (D.C.Cir.1975). See also, Lead Industries Association v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 88 (2nd Cir. 1979) (affidavit and index without in camera inspection).

[4][5][6][7][8] Such flexibility is consistent with the purposes of the Act and the role of the trial court in such actions. Resort to in camera review is discretionary, N. L. R. B. v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 224, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2318, 57 L.Ed.2d 159, 167 (1978), as is resort to a Vaughn index. However, as this case clearly demonstrates, in instances where it is determined that records do exist, the District Court must do something more to assure itself of the factual basis and bona fides of the agency's claim of exemption than rely solely upon an affidavit.[FN15] While we are aware of eminent decisions arguably to the contrary,[FN16] we remain unpersuaded. In situations where records do not exist, affidavits are probably not only sufficient but possibly the best method of verification. However, once it is established that records and documents are in the possession of the governmental agency, more is required. The facts of this case amply demonstrate the dangers inherent in reliance upon agency affidavit in an investigative context when alternative procedures such as sanitized indexing, random or representative sampling in camera with the record sealed for review, oral testimony or 1146 combinations thereof would more fully provide an accurate basis for decision.

FN15. In the area of FOIA disclosure of national security or classified information there appears to be a stronger presumption in favor of reliance upon agency affidavits. See, e. g. Weissman v. Central Intelligence Agency, 565 F.2d 692, 696-98 (D.C.Cir.1977); Bell v. United States, 563 F.2d 484, 486-87 (1st Cir. 1977). However, such affidavits must still meet a number of criteria and be subjected to critical analysis by the court. See, e. g. Hayden v. National Security Agency, 608 F.2d 1381, 1386-88 (D.C.Cir.1979) (appeal pending); Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 832-33 (D.C.Cir.1979); Church of Scientology v. U. S. Department of Defense, 611 F.2d 738, 742-743 (9th Cir. 1979). See also, Commentary, Freedom of Information: Judicial Review of Executive Security Classifications, 28 U.Fla.L.Rev. 551 (1976). We express no view on this point.

FN16. Appellee contends that Barney v. I. R. S., 618 F.2d 1268 (8th Cir. 1980) is precisely on point upholding a District Court's determination on facts and affidavits indistinguishable from the present case. Id. at 1270-73. However, the clearest point of distinction is that in the instant case the affidavit submitted resulted in a misunderstanding and led the District Court into error. With respect to the decisions of Crooker v. Office of Pardon Attorney, 614 F.2d 825, 828 (2nd Cir. 1980); Cox v. U. S. Department of Justice, 576 F.2d 1302, 1310-12 (8th Cir. 1978); Harvey's Wagon Wheel, Inc. v. N. L. R. B., 550 F.2d 1139, 1141-42 (8th Cir. 1976) in so much as they indicate reliance upon affidavit alone outside the area of national security classifications is adequate, we respectfully disagree. See also Irons v. Bell, 596 F.2d 468, 471, 476 (1st Cir. 1979).

III.

In light of the foregoing, we vacate the summary judgment and remand the case to the District Court with directions to conduct a fuller development of the factual basis for decision consistent with this opinion and its obligations under 5 U.S.C. s 552(a)(4)(B) (1978).

VACATED AND REMANDED.

v.
UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, DRUG ENFORCEMENT ADMINISTRATION, Defendant.

No. 94 Civ. 5108 (JGK).

United States District Court, S.D. New York.

March 5, 1995.

Claimant desiring to collaterally attack his conviction sought to compel Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) to disclose whether certain DEA agents had been investigated for perjury, mishandling information, or supplying false evidence. The District Court, Koeltl, J., held that: (1) under Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) exemption, no substantial public interest in disclosure existed to weigh against DEA agents' privacy interests; (2) to the extent claimant sought publicly available information, DEA had no duty under FOIA to compile such information; and (3) to the extent claimant sought publicly available information, DEA offered sufficient proof that no such information existed.

Summary judgment for defendant granted.

OPINION & ORDER

KOELTL, District Judge.

Each party has moved the Court for an order granting summary judgment. The complaint seeks information about several Drug Enforcement Administration ("DEA") agents pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA"). Prior to commencement of this action, the plaintiff, Gary Triestman, sought this information by administrative means, beginning in November, 1993. He seeks to know which, if any, of thirteen DEA agents have been "investigated in any capacity for alleged perjurious statements or mishandling of evidence, or the supplying of false evidence or testimony; and ... the particulars and outcome of those investigations." [FN1] Triestman seeks the information for use in a collateral attack on his conviction. Apparently, his position is that he pleaded guilty to a crime for which he is presently incarcerated, because, among other reasons, DEA agents fabricated evidence.

FN1. Triestman made this request in a letter dated November 1, 1993 to the Department of Justice and in two letters dated December 23, 1993 to the DEA.

On May 25, 1994, the Office of Information and Privacy ("OIP") issued a final denial of Triestman's FOIA request, after his appeal of an initial, undated denial by the DEA. Both denials refused either to acknowledge or to deny the existence of any documents responsive to the request. [FN2] The OIP based its decision on 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C), which provides an exemption from disclosure for "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7). It is undisputed that Triestman's FOIA request is a request for records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes. The OIP explained that Exemption 7(C) justifies a refusal to respond to the request, because "Lacking an individual's consent, proof of death, official acknowledgement of an investigation, or an overriding public interest, even to acknowledge the existence of such law enforcement records could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." Letter from Richard L. Huff, Co-Director OIP, to Gary Triestman, May 25, 1994 (upholding DEA's refusal to release information on appeal from the DEA decision).

FN2. In Beck v. U.S. Dep't. of Justice, 997 F.2d 1489 (D.C.Cir.1993), the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upheld the government's refusal to disclose whether any documents existed that were responsive to a request for documents constituting credible evidence that two DEA agents had previously engaged in wrongdoing. The court explained that, "A government employee has at least some privacy interest in his own employment records, an interest that extends to 'not having it known whether those records contain or do not contain' information on wrongdoing, whether that information is favorable or not." Beck, 997 F.2d at 1494 (citation omitted).

[1][2][3][4][5] Government employees have a privacy interest in not having their names disclosed in connection with investigations in which they are or were under scrutiny. See, e.g., Hunt v. FBI, 972 F.2d 286, 288 (9th Cir.1992). They also have privacy interests in their employment histories and performance evaluations and a strong privacy interest in not being wrongfully associated with criminal activity. Stern v. FBI, 737 F.2d 84, 91-92 (D.C.Cir.1984). However, exemption (b)(7)(C) applies only if a disclosure could 670 reasonably be expected to lead to an unwarranted invasion of privacy. The question of whether a reasonably expected invasion is warranted is to be resolved by determining whether the invasion of privacy is justified by weightier public interests in disclosure. See Massey v. FBI, 3 F.3d 620, 624 (2d Cir.1993) ("The exemption applies only if the invasion of privacy that would result from release of the information outweighs the public interest in disclosure") (citations omitted). No public interest outweighs the privacy interests of the DEA agents in this case. Here, the only interest significantly served by disclosure is the personal interest of the plaintiff, who seeks information for use in a collateral challenge to his conviction.

[6][7][8] In Brown v. FBI, 658 F.2d 71 (2d Cir.1981), the Court of Appeals held that under FOIA Exemption 6, which also requires an evaluation of the public interest in disclosure, [FN3] "[I]t must be remembered that it is the interest of the general public, and not that of the private litigant, that must be considered." Id. at 75 (citation omitted). The Court found that no such public interest is necessarily involved when a person requesting information seeks the information for the purpose of collaterally attacking a criminal conviction: [FN4]

FN3. Exemption 6 also requires a balancing of privacy interests against public interests in disclosure. It protects from disclosure "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of person privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6). Exemption 7(C) is more protective of privacy interests than Exemption 6. See U.S. Dep't. of Justice v. Reporters Comm. For Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 756, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 1473, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989) ("[T]he standard for evaluating a threatened invasion of privacy interests resulting from the disclosure of records compiled for law enforcement purposes is somewhat broader than the standard applicable to personnel, medical, and similar files").

FN4. The purpose for which a FOIA request is made does not determine whether an invasion of privacy is warranted. See U.S. Dep't. of Defense v. FLRA, --- U.S. ----, ----, 114 S.Ct. 1006, 1013, 127 L.Ed.2d 325 (1994). However, the interests to be served by that purpose may be probative of whether disclosure would serve a public interest.

Plaintiff states in his brief that he is pursuing this litigation hoping to obtain evidence sufficient to mount a collateral attack on his kidnapping conviction. That this is plaintiff's primary purpose will not necessarily prevent disclosure if there is a coincidental public purpose sufficient to overcome Ms. Shepardson's privacy interest. The court, however, cannot allow the plaintiff's personal interest to enter into the weighing or balancing process. "The FOIA is not intended to be an administrative discovery statute for the benefit of private parties." Columbia Packing Co. v. U.S. Dept. of Agriculture, 417 F.Supp. 651, 655 (D.Mass.1976).

Brown, 658 F.2d at 75.

[9] In Massey, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that the FBI had properly withheld information containing agents' names, under exemption (b)(7)(C), because no substantial public interest would have been served by disclosure. In making this determination, the court considered not only the purpose for which Massey sought the information, but also whether the information was probative of the agency's conduct. The court held that the information did not "reveal any significant information concerning the conduct and administration of FBI investigations" or the "agency's own conduct" and that the fact that Massey might be able to use the information in his efforts to overturn his criminal conviction did not give rise to a public interest. Massey, 3 F.3d at 625; see also, U.S. Dep't. of Defense v. FLRA, --- U.S. ----, 114 S.Ct. at 1012 ("[T]he only relevant 'public interest in disclosure' to be weighed in this balance [under the FOIA privacy exemptions] is the extent to which disclosure would serve the 'core purpose of the FOIA,' which is 'contribut[ing] significantly to public understanding of the operations or activities of the government' ") (citation omitted). Triestman has offered no evidence suggesting that either the DEA itself or the agents he has inquired about have engaged in wrongdoing in either his case or in others. This fact supports the conclusion that no substantial public interest would be served by disclosure. See Hunt, 972 F.2d at 288-90 (holding that there is not a strong public interest in "one isolated investigation, 671 no longer of any interest to anyone other than the party who instigated it," because "[t]he single file sought by Hunt will not shed any light on whether all such FBI investigations are comprehensive or whether sexual misconduct by agents is common.... The public interest in ensuring the integrity and the reliability of government investigation procedures is greater where there is some evidence of wrongdoing on the part of the government official") (citation omitted); Rojem v. U.S. Dep't. of Justice, 775 F.Supp. 6 (D.D.C.1991) (upholding non-disclosure of FBI information under exemption 7(C), because the information shed no light on the agency's performance of its statutory duties, there was no evidence of wrongdoing, and the fact that the plaintiff sought the information to challenge a conviction for which he received a death sentence was not, under the circumstances, sufficient to create the requisite public interest in disclosure).

In response to the OIP denial of his appeal and to the government's motion for summary judgment, Triestman argues that he now seeks only information responsive to his request that has previously been made public. Recognizing the privacy interests that would be implicated by the disclosure of non-public investigative reports, Triestman explains that his FOIA request should be construed as seeking "any information that was made public about the listed agents in question; i.e., in any proceeding, publication or press release, public statement issuances, legal or administrative case opened, that was available to any generally interested party or concerned citizen of the public." Pl.'s Mem. in Supp. of Mot. for Summ.J. at 2. Triestman alleges that the disclosure of such information cannot reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

[10] This was not the scope of Triestman's original request which plainly infringed on personal privacy and which now appears to have been abandoned. Nevertheless, there are additional reasons why the plaintiff's newly narrowed request for public documents under FOIA should be denied. First, to require an agency to collect and produce information that has already been made public would not further the general purpose of FOIA, which is to satisfy the citizens' right to know "what their government is up to." See U.S. Dep't. of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 773, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 1481, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989) ("This basic policy of ' "full agency disclosure unless information is exempted under clearly delineated statutory language," ' U.S. Dep't. of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. [352], at 360-361, 96 S.Ct. [1592], at 1599 [48 L.Ed.2d 11] [(1976)] (quoting S.Rep. No. 813, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., 3 (1965), indeed focuses on the citizens' right to be informed about 'what their government is up to' ").

In Freedberg v. U.S. Dep't. of the Navy, 581 F.Supp. 3 (D.D.C.1982), the court held that any information that was contained in the public record of a court-martial need not be produced under FOIA by the Department of the Navy:

> Insofar as documents sought are readily available in the public record, it is "abusive and a dissipation of agency and court resources" to make and process a claim for their disclosure. Crooker v. United States State Department, 628 F.2d 9 (D.C.Cir.1980). Once such documents are open for inspection by the general public, there is no longer any matter in controversy before the Court under FOIA. Misegades & Douglas v. Schuyler, 456 F.2d 255 (4th Cir.1972). Disclosure on that basis must be denied.

Freedberg, 581 F.Supp. at 4. FOIA's purpose is to provide the general public with information as to the workings of its government: "The statute was designed ' "to pierce the veil of administrative secrecy and to open agency action to the light of public scrutiny." ' " U.S. Dep't. of State v. Ray, 502 U.S. 164, 173, 112 S.Ct. 541, 547, 116 L.Ed.2d 526 (1991). FOIA does not obligate an agency to serve as a research service for persons seeking information that is readily available to the public.

[11] In some cases, there may be a question as to what form of prior disclosure is sufficient to make information readily available to the public. In Freedberg and in the cases the court relied on, Crooker and Misegades, the information sought by the plaintiffs 672 was readily available to them. In this case, the plaintiff's own characterization of the information that he seeks demonstrates that he seeks only information that is well within any definition of "public availability." The plaintiff describes the type of information that he seeks as "any information that was made public about the listed agents in question; i.e., in any proceeding, publication or press release, public statement issuances, legal or administrative case opened, that was available to any generally interested party or concerned citizen of the public." Pl.'s Mem. in Supp. of Mot. for Summ.J. at 2. Information that is available to any generally interested party or concerned citizen is information that is sufficiently available to relieve an agency of any duty to produce it under FOIA.

[12][13][14] Even if FOIA required agencies to search for, collect, and produce publicly available information, summary judgment for the government would still be appropriate in this case, because the government has provided sufficient proof that it has in fact searched for such documents and that there are no publicly available agency documents relating to investigations of the DEA agents [FN5] for allegedly making perjurious statements, mishandling evidence, or supplying false evidence or testimony. In a case in which the plaintiff seeks disclosure under FOIA, government affidavits attesting to the thoroughness of an agency search of its records and its results are presumptively valid. In Carney v. U.S. Dep't. of Justice, 19 F.3d 807 (2d Cir.1994), the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that on a motion by the government for summary judgment, if the government's affidavits are adequate on their face to merit judgment in the government's favor, summary judgment should be denied and the plaintiff permitted discovery only if the plaintiff makes a showing of bad faith sufficient to impugn the affidavits. Carney, 19 F.3d at 812. Such a showing must be based on more than mere speculation. Id. at 813. In Carney, the court of appeals upheld the district court's grant of summary judgment for the Department of Justice, finding that:

> FN5. The government has also shown that there are no publicly available responsive documents with respect to DEA agent Donald Abrahms. In his memoranda of law in support of his motion for summary judgment, Triestman requested that agent Abrahms be added to his FOIA request. The complaint does not mention agent Abrahms and there is no evidence that Triestman has exhausted administrative procedures with respect to him. The request for records relating to Abrahms must be denied for that reason. In addition, the request must be denied because the plaintiff seeks the same public documents which are not producible under FOIA and because the government has demonstrated a good faith and futile search for such documents.

> [T]he declarations are reasonably detailed and reveal that each of the DOJ subdivisions undertook a diligent search for documents responsive to Carney's requests. With respect to the withheld documents, the declarants describe the documents or classes of documents withheld and explain why they fall within an applicable exemption....
> An affidavit from an agency employee responsible for supervising a FOIA search is all that is needed to satisfy Rule 56(e); there is no need for the agency to supply affidavits from each individual who participated in the actual search. See Maynard [v. Central Intelligence Agency], 986 F.2d [547] at 560 [(1st Cir.1993)]; SafeCard [Services, Inc. v. Securities and Exchange Commission], 926 F.2d [1197] at 1201 [(D.C.Cir.1991)]. The DOJ's submissions thus were proper.

Carney, 19 F.3d at 813-14; see also, Doherty v. U.S. Dep't. of Justice, 775 F.2d 49, 53 (2nd Cir.1985) (holding that, "The Government's affidavits, under the circumstances of this case, provide an adequate factual basis to support its claims of exemption and thus, the District Court did not err in granting summary judgment without undertaking an in camera review of the documents").

[15] In this case, the Government has submitted a declaration by a DEA Paralegal Specialist, under the penalties of perjury, which declares that the DEA has checked its records and found that none of the individuals about whom the plaintiff requests information has been convicted of any wrongdoing, publicly disciplined or publicly investigated for any misconduct. In the circumstances 673 of this case, this is sufficient evidence that the public documents sought by the plaintiff do not exist.

In an effort to claim any victory, the plaintiff does not contest the adequacy of the government's representation. Rather, the plaintiff has cross moved for a declaratory judgment in his favor contending that the government has "effectively conceded to Plaintiff's complaint and provided him with the FOIA materials he has requested and that he is entitled to by law." The government conceded to no such position and represents that it has not provided him with any materials. The plaintiff is not entitled to a declaratory judgment. The government contended--correctly--that the plaintiff was not entitled to disclosure of the records he sought, either private or public, and when he limited his request to public records it argued--correctly again--that he was not entitled to such records under FOIA, but that in any event they did not exist.

For the foregoing reasons, the Court grants the defendant's motion for summary judgment. In this case, no substantial public interest in disclosure exists to be weighed under FOIA Exemption 7(C) against the privacy interests of the individual DEA agents. To the extent the plaintiff's FOIA request seeks information that is publicly available and arguably does not implicate the privacy interests of the agents, summary judgment for the defendant is appropriate, because there is no duty under FOIA to compile such information and, in addition, because the defendant has offered sufficient proof that no such information exists. The plaintiff's request for a declaratory judgment is denied.

SO ORDERED.

UNITED STATES DEPT. OF JUSTICE, et al., Defendants.

No. 86-2430-CIV.

United States District Court,

March 3, 1989.

On Motion to Compel Release of Unredacted Documents April 13, 1989.

Plaintiffs sought information, under Freedom of Information Act, from government agencies on Haitian nationals who had been returned to Haiti. The District Court, Dyer, Senior Circuit Judge, sitting by designation, held that: (1) plaintiffs failed to rebut agency's evidence that certain documents did not exist, and (2) agency was required to supply redacted information contained in documents forwarded to plaintiffs. On motion to compel, the court held that agency waived claimed exemptions that were not raised earlier.

Ordered accordingly.

MEMORANDUM ORDER ON PENDING MOTIONS

DYER, Senior Circuit Judge, sitting by designation.

THIS CAUSE was heard by the Court on various pending motions filed by the parties, and the Court hereby enters this Order pursuant to its rulings in open court on March 1, 1989.

I

This case is brought pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. sec. 552 (FOIA), under which plaintiffs seek from the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), the Executive Office for Immigration Review (EOIR) and the United States Department of State (State Dept.) disclosure of (1) an alleged list of 600 Haitians who had been returned to Haiti and not mistreated after their arrival; and (2) investigative trip reports made by INS investigators who have visited Haiti.

Several searches conducted by each agency yielded responses that no records were found which fit the FOIA request made by plaintiffs. Subsequently, the State Dept. located and turned over to the plaintiffs twenty-five (25) responsive documents. Of these, seventeen documents were redacted to exclude the names of the Haitian individuals contained therein. The State Dept. claimed that release of the excised information could result in an invasion of privacy and, accordingly, asserted an exemption under the Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA"), 5 USC sec 552(b)(6). [FN1] At all times, however, each agency has maintained that there exists no list of 600 Haitians returned to Haiti.

FN1. 5 U.S.C. sec. 552(b)(6) provides an exemption from disclosure for matters that are "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy."

II

There are two issues confronting the Court. The first issue concerns disclosure 504 requirements when an agency's asserts that its search uncovers no documents which satisfy an FOIA request. The second issue focuses on disclosure requirements when an agency claims that information excised from the released documents is exempt under the invasion of privacy exemption of sec. 552(b)(6).

A. Documents Claimed Not to Exist

The underlying principle in FOIA cases is that the requestor must show that an agency improperly withheld records. Kissinger v. Reporter's Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136, 150, 100 S.Ct. 960, 968, 63 L.Ed.2d 267 (1980). With respect to records that are claimed not to exist, affidavits are permissible and "possibly the best method of verification." Stephenson v. IRS, 629 F.2d 1140, 1145 (5th Cir.1980). An affidavit satisfies the "good faith" requirements of adequacy and completeness when it specifically documents the scope and methods undertaken for search and sets out the basis for the withholding of information. See Friedman v. F.B.I., 605 F.Supp. 306, 316 (N.D.Ga.1981). Once the agency demonstrates that its search was reasonable, the burden shifts to the requestor to rebut that evidence. Miller v. U.S. Dept. of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1383 (8th Cir.1985).

[1] In this instance, the INS has responded that it did not conduct investigatory trips to Haiti nor have, in its possession, investigative reports. It has also maintained, by its answer, that the list of six hundred Haitians does not exists. The record indicates that there was a proper and adequate search, as demonstrated by the affidavits of the FOIA personnel. The record fails to disclose that any documents have been improperly withheld of that they, indeed, exist. On the record, that principle has not been rebutted by the plaintiffs. In addition, the record indicates there have been no requests directed to EOIR, and, therefore, there is no issue before the Court in connection with that party.

B. Documents Edited & Released by the State Department

[2] Where a FOIA request triggers a claim of exemption under the Act, the burden is on the government agency to demonstrate the basis for nondisclosure. Thus, contrary to the agency's assertion, a justiciable issue remains to be decided, and that is the propriety of the State Dept.'s claim of exemption under sec. 552(b)(6), because "the District Court must do something more to assure itself of the factual basis and bona fides of the agency's claim of exemption than rely solely upon an affidavit." Stephenson v. IRS, 629 F.2d 1140 (5th Cir.1980).

[3][4] There is a presumption, under the FOIA, that documents held by a government agency are subject to disclosure. Currie v. IRS, 704 F.2d 523, 530 (11th Cir.1983). An agency cannot withhold material based on conclusory allegations of possible harm; it must show by specific, detailed proof that disclosure would defeat, rather than further, the purposes of the FOIA. See Mead Data Central, Inc. v. U.S. Dept. of Air Force, 566 F.2d 242, 260 (D.C.Cir.1977). In determining whether the disclosure constitutes a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, [FN2] the Court must "employ a balancing test, weighing an individual's right to privacy against the public right to disclosure of government information." Cochran v. United States, 770 F.2d 949, 955 (11th Cir.1985).

FN2. Under sec. 552(b)(6), the requested files must be "personnel", "medical", or "similar files". Because plaintiffs did not challenge this classification, the Court assumes that the names of returned Haitians are sufficiently personal in nature to satisfy the "similar file" requirement.

The degree of the invasion of privacy considers the potential harm to the individual from disclosure of the information. The critical aspect is that an invasion be actual rather than just theoretical; it must be more than a mere possibility. Dept. of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 380 n. 19, 96 S.Ct. 1592, 1608 n. 19, 48 L.Ed.2d 11 (1976). Moreover, an agency's promise of confidentiality to the submitter of information was found insufficient to defend against disclosure. Robles v. E.P.A., 484 F.2d 843, 846 (4th Cir.1973).

505 [5] As to the public interest involved in this case, this country's immigration policy supports a finding that the public has a legitimate interest in the safe relocation of returned Haitians.

Any invasion of privacy from the mere act of disclosure of names and addresses would be de minimis and little more than speculation. The promise of confidentiality by the State Dept. is only one factor to be considered and, in this case, is not determinative of the outcome. Thus, weighing the public interest against the private interest, the balance tilts in favor of disclosure of the names because any intrusion into the privacy of the Haitian nationals would be minimal.

III

For these reasons, it is hereby

ORDERED AND ADJUDGED that summary judgment is GRANTED in favor of INS and EOIR with respect to the FOIA information requests explained or shown to be non-existent. It is

FURTHER ORDERED AND ADJUDGED that the State Department is required, within fifteen days from this Court's ruling in open court, to supply the redacted information contained in the seventeen documents. Final judgment as to the State Department is withheld until this time period has expired and a showing has been made to the Court that the names have been furnished to the plaintiffs, and, if they have not, then the Court will take further appropriate action forthwith. [FN3]

FN3. The remaining pending motions in this case are DENIED without prejudice. Plaintiffs' request for this Court to enjoin INS deportation proceedings is also DENIED. This Court has no authority to enjoin those proceedings under the FOIA or the Administrative Procedure Act, Title 5 U.S.C. sec. 704-706.

DONE AND ORDERED.

ON MOTION TO COMPEL RELEASE OF UNREDACTED DOCUMENTS

THIS CAUSE having come before the Court, and the Court having heard argument of counsel on April 12, 1989, and considered the same, it is hereby ORDERED AND ADJUDGED that plaintiffs' motion for pro hac vice appearance of Neil D. Kolner, Esq. is GRANTED and it is

[6] FURTHER ORDERED AND ADJUDGED that defendants' motion to alter or amend is DENIED. After weighing the public interest in disclosure against the claim of exemption pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(6), this Court Ordered the STATE DEPARTMENT on March 2, 1989 to produce to plaintiffs, no later than March 16, 1989 as originally requested in plaintiff's June 15, 1985 Freedom of Information Act Request, unredacted copies of all documents in defendant's possession which satisfy plaintiff's request. Defendants did not comply but instead raised new arguments which the Court finds are wholly unfounded. Rather than exhibit due diligence the government has been neglectful in this matter by failing to raise these exemptions at the outset of this litigation. Consequently, the government has waived entitlement to those claims by invoking these belated exemptions after this Court's order requiring disclosure of the redacted information. See, e.g., Senate of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico v. Dept. of Justice, 823 F.2d 574, 580 (D.C.Cir.1987); Ryan v. Dept. of Justice, 617 F.2d 781, 782 (D.C.Cir.1980); Jordan v. Dept. of Justice, 591 F.2d 753 (D.C.Cir.1978) (en banc); Cotner v. U.S. Parole Comm., 747 F.2d 1016, 1018 (5th Cir.1984); Fendler v. Parole Comm., 774 F.2d 975, 978 (9th Cir.1985); American Broadcasting Co. v. U.S.I.A., 599 F.Supp. 765, 768 (D.D.C.1984); Donovan v. F.B.I., 633 F.Supp. 35 (S.D.N.Y.1986). The government has failed to point to any set of facts that would make this an "exceptional" case such that the waiver doctrine should not apply. See Jordan 591 F.2d at 780. Indeed, by its own admission at oral argument, the government agreed its motion contains nothing more than "new material." Thus, in its prior Order this Court did not overlook any basis in the record which would require a different conclusion. The government has only attempted 506 to "play cat and mouse by withholding its most powerful canon until after the district court has decided the case and then springing it on surprised opponents and the judge." Senate of the Commonwealth, 823 F.2d at 580, quoting Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp. v. Renegotiation Board, 482 F.2d 710, 722 (D.C.Cir.1973). For this reason, it is therefore

FURTHER ORDERED AND ADJUDGED that the STATE DEPARTMENT shall release the unredacted documents to plaintiffs no later than ten (10) days from this Court's oral ruling on April 12, 1989.

In re DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Petitioner.
Barbara Ann CRANCER, Appellee,
v.
UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Appellant.

Nos. 91-2080, 91-2164.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted May 11, 1992.

Decided Aug. 5, 1993.

Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) suit was brought. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, Stephen Nathaniel Limbaugh, J., required government to provide Vaughn index covering each document sought. Appeal was taken. The Court of Appeals, 950 F.2d 530, affirmed. En banc rehearing was granted. The Court of Appeals, Wollman, Circuit Judge, held that Vaughn index could not be required.

Writ of mandamus issued, orders vacated, and case remanded.

McMillian, Circuit Judge, dissented and filed opinion joined by Arnold, Chief Judge.

In In re Department of Justice, 950 F.2d 530 (8th Cir.1991) (Crancer I), a panel of this court upheld the district court's order requiring the government to provide a Vaughn [FN1] index after the government had invoked Exemption 7(A) of the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A) (1988). We granted the government's suggestion for rehearing en banc and vacated the panel's decision. We now issue a writ of mandamus, vacate the challenged order, and remand the case to the district court for further proceedings.

I.

In 1987, Barbara Ann Crancer filed a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request with the Department of Justice. Crancer sought the release of certain information uncovered during the investigation conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation into the disappearance of her father, Jimmy Hoffa, the former president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. The FBI's investigation has resulted in the accumulation of more than 13,800 pages of records relating to Hoffa's disappearance.

The Department denied Crancer's request on the basis of Exemption 7(A), contending that the Hoffa FBI file contains "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes," the release of which "could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A).

After exhausting her administrative remedies, Crancer brought suit to compel the Department to provide her with the documents she had requested. During the pendency of her suit, Crancer filed a second, broader request seeking any and all materials relating to the FBI's investigation into Hoffa's disappearance. After this request was administratively denied by the Department, also on the basis of Exemption 7(A), Crancer amended her complaint to include her second request.

The Department moved for summary judgment on the basis of the claimed exemption. The district court ordered the Department to provide Crancer with a Vaughn index so that she could effectively oppose the government's pending motion. The court's order required the Department to produce an "itemized, indexed inventory of every agency record or portion thereof responsive to plaintiff's FOIA request," together with a "detailed justification statement covering each refusal to release [an] agency record[ ] or portions thereof." D.Ct. Order of July 27, 1990, at 1. The Department asked the court to reconsider its order directing the production of the Vaughn index. This request was denied. The Department then requested that the district court modify its earlier order and allow the Department to provide a categorical description of the documents contained in the Hoffa FBI file. The Department submitted a list of nine categories of documents and an affidavit describing the potential interference with enforcement proceedings that would result if it were required to compile a Vaughn index. The district court denied this request and ordered the Department to submit the Vaughn index to a magistrate judge for in camera review.

In lieu of submitting a Vaughn index, the Department asked the magistrate judge to review the actual documents in camera. The magistrate judge denied this request, but extended the time period in which the Vaughn index was to be submitted. The Department then asked the district court to 1305 reconsider the magistrate judge's order or, in the alternative, to certify the matter for interlocutory appeal. These requests were also denied.

The Department then sought relief from this court, asserting jurisdiction under the collateral order doctrine, Cohen v. Beneficial Indus. Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 69 S.Ct. 1221, 93 L.Ed. 1528 (1949), or the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(b).

In Crancer I, the panel asserted jurisdiction under the All Writs Act and upheld the district court's order requiring the preparation of a Vaughn index. The panel first determined that the Department could not be required to provide a specific factual showing and explanation describing why each document is exempt. It went on to hold, however, that the Department could be required to make a specific factual showing to demonstrate why each document belongs in a certain category, along with an explanation describing why the category itself is exempt from disclosure.

II.

[1] We first examine whether, and the basis upon which, we have jurisdiction to hear this case.

We possess discretionary writ-issuing authority under the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(b). As noted by the panel in Crancer I, mandamus is "available only in those exceptional circumstances amounting to a judicial usurpation of power." In re Ford Motor Co., 751 F.2d 274, 275 (8th Cir.1984).

The panel determined that:

> [The Department's] argument is a novel one and has not been directly addressed by any court. If [the Department] is correct in its contention that the district court lacked authority to order a Vaughn index, then a writ would be the proper remedy. Because the issue of whether the writ is available is intertwined with the merits of this interlocutory matter, we must decide whether the district court had authority to require a Vaughn-type index in these circumstances.

Crancer I, 950 F.2d at 532 (citation omitted). We agree with the panel's analysis and believe that this case presents a unique situation. Thus, we conclude that we have jurisdiction to decide the question whether the district court's order directing the Department to produce a Vaughn index in the face of the Department's invocation of Exemption 7(A) constituted a judicial usurpation of power.

III.

[2] "The basic purpose of FOIA is to ensure an informed citizenry, vital to the functioning of a democratic society, needed to check against corruption and to hold the governors accountable to the governed." NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 242, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2327, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978). Consistent with this policy of broad disclosure, the government is required to release all requested information upon the demand of any member of the public. Id. at 221, 98 S.Ct. at 2316; see also Curran v. Department of Justice, 813 F.2d 473 (1st Cir.1987); Irons v. FBI, 811 F.2d 681, 685 (1st Cir.1987). Congress fashioned certain explicit exemptions from disclosure, however, in order to preserve vital government policies and, in some cases, to protect individuals. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-)9; see also Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 220-21, 98 S.Ct. at 2316 ("Congress carefully structured nine exemptions from the otherwise mandatory disclosure requirements in order to protect specified confidentiality and privacy interests.").

[3] Once information is requested under FOIA, therefore, the government must provide the information unless it determines that a specific exemption applies. Likewise, the government bears the burden of demonstrating that the claimed exemption applies. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). The district court must determine de novo whether the government has satisfied its burden. Id.

In the face of a claimed statutory exemption, district courts have sometimes required the

[4] Exemption 7(A) of FOIA provides that the act "does not apply to matters that are--* * * (7) records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information (A) could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings[.]" 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A). The government contends that the courts have interpreted this exemption differently from other FOIA exemptions, with the result that a district court may not order the production of a Vaughn index when Exemption 7(A) is invoked.

In NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978), the Supreme Court addressed the burden that the government must bear when asserting Exemption 7(A). In that case, the FOIA requester, an employer, sought from the National Labor Relations Board all statements made by potential witnesses prior to a Board hearing on the employer's unfair labor practices. Id. at 216, 98 S.Ct. at 2314. On appeal, the employer argued that the district court had erred by not requiring the government to make an individualized showing that each withheld document fit within the limits of Exemption 7(A). The Supreme Court rejected this argument, interpreting Exemption 7(A) of FOIA to require the government to prove that "with respect to particular kinds of enforcement proceedings, disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records while a case is pending would generally 'interfere with enforcement proceedings.' " Id. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324.

In support of its ruling, the Supreme Court noted that:

437 U.S. at 223-24, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. The Court then examined Exemption 7's legislative history, which appeared to confirm the Court's observation regarding the distinguishing characteristic of Exemption 7(A). Id. at 224-34, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. The Court further noted that had Congress intended that "the Government in each case show a particularized risk to its individual 'enforcement proceedin[g],' " it could have done so. Id. at 234, 98 S.Ct. at 2323.

The Court also addressed Congress's 1974 amendment of Exemption 7(A). This amendment was designed "to eliminate 'blanket exemptions' for Government records simply because they were found in investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes." Id. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. The Court's discussion of President Ford's veto of the 1974 amendment and the subsequent congressional override is instructive for our present analysis. The President was concerned that the 1974 amendment to Exemption 7(A) "would require the Government to 'prove ...--separately for each paragraph of each document--that disclosure "would" cause' a specific harm" to enforcement proceedings. Id. at 235, 98 S.Ct. at 2323 (citation omitted). Congressional supporters of the amendment termed the President's interpretation of the amendment " 'ludicrous,' " stating that the " 'burden is substantially less than we would be led to believe by the President's message.' " Id. (citation omitted). [FN2]

> FN2. For further discussion of the legislative history of the 1974 amendment to Exemption 7(A), see Federal Bureau of Investigation v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 626, 102 S.Ct. 2054, 2061, 72 L.Ed.2d 376 (1982); Campbell v. Department of

Health and Human Serv., 682 F.2d 256, 261-63 (D.C.Cir.1982).

The Court concluded that although the 1974 amendment to Exemption 7(A) was designed 1307 to eliminate blanket exemptions for records found in investigatory files, Congress did not intend that generic determinations of those materials entitled to Exemption 7(A) protection could never be made. Rather, the government must demonstrate, and courts must determine, whether "disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records ... would generally 'interfere with enforcement proceedings.' " Id. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. In other words, Congress intended that certain types or categories of investigatory records be withheld under Exemption 7(A) because disclosure of documents within those categories generally would interfere with enforcement proceedings.

With this understanding, post-Robbins Tire courts have made these determinations generically, category-of-document by category-of-document. In Barney v. IRS, for example, we were confronted with the question whether, in the wake of Robbins Tire, the government was required to provide a Vaughn index after the government invoked Exemption 7(A). 618 F.2d 1268 (8th Cir.1980) (per curiam). We held that "[t]o sustain its burden of showing documents were properly withheld under exemption 7(A) the government had to establish only that they were investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes and that production would interfere with pending enforcement proceedings." Id. at 1272-73. The Barney court bolstered its conclusion by emphasizing that "[u]nder exemption 7(A) the government is not required to make a specific factual showing with respect to each withheld document that disclosure would actually interfere with a particular enforcement proceeding." Id. at 1273 (citing Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 234-35, 98 S.Ct. at 2323).

Congress amended Exemption 7 in 1986 to lessen the burden on the government in establishing the application of Exemption 7(A). Freedom of Information Reform Act of 1986 (FIRA), Pub.L. No. 99-570, § 1802, 100 Stat. 3207, 3207-48 (1986). Whereas under the 1974 version of Exemption 7(A), the government bore the burden of showing that the production of the requested law enforcement records "would interfere with enforcement proceedings," under the 1986 version the government need only show that the production of law enforcement records or information "could reasonably be expected to interfere with law enforcement proceedings."

In 1989, the Supreme Court revisited the government's burden under Exemption 7, this time focusing on the use of categorical determinations under Exemption 7(C), which covers documents whose production "could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." United States Dep't of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989) ("Reporters Committee "). In Reporters Committee, a group of journalists requested that the FBI disclose an individual's computerized criminal history file, known colloquially as the person's "rap sheet." The Supreme Court held that the production of rap sheets "as a categorical matter" could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of a citizen's privacy. Id. at 780, 109 S.Ct. at 1485.

The Court discussed its earlier approval of a categorical approach to Exemption 7(A) in Robbins Tire. The Court noted that it had based its ruling in Robbins Tire on the perception that Exemption 7(A)'s reference to the plural "enforcement proceedings" supported a categorical approach when 7(A) was invoked, in contrast to the singular references in the other subsections of Exemption 7, which seemed to suggest a case-by-case balancing. Finding that "[j]ust as one can ask whether a particular rap sheet is a 'law enforcement record' that meets the requirements of [Exemption 7(C)], so too can one ask whether rap sheets in general ... are 'law enforcement records' that meet the stated criteria," the Court concluded that its approval of a categorical approach for Exemption 7(A) applied with equal force to the other subsections in Exemption 7. Id. at 779, 109 S.Ct. at 1485. Because the Court found that the disclosure of computerized compilations of an individual's criminal history could always be expected to constitute an invasion of an individual's privacy, it held that rap sheets as a category are exempted from disclosure under FOIA. Id. at 780, 109 S.Ct. at 1485.

The Court also supported its holding that a categorical approach was appropriate for Exemption 7(C) as well as 7(A) by pointing to 1308 the 1986 amendment. The Court stated that the amended 7(C), which like 7(A) had changed from the more stringent "would" to the more flexible "could reasonably be expected to," was enacted "to give the Government greater flexibility in responding to FOIA requests for law enforcement records or information." Id. at 777 n. 22, 109 S.Ct. at 1484 n. 22. The Court further noted that the amendment was designed to "replace a focus on the effect of a particular disclosure 'with a standard of reasonableness ... based on an objective test.' " Id. This reasonableness standard, the Court concluded, "amply supports a categorical approach to the balance of private and public interests in Exemption 7(C)." Id. The Court's conclusion concerning the effect of the amendment applies with equal force to Exemption 7(A), given the Court's conclusion that all of the Exemption 7 subsections should be interpreted similarly with respect to the use of categorical justifications.

Recently, the Court further explained its categorical approach in United States Dep't of Justice v. Landano, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 2014, 124 L.Ed.2d 84 (1993). Seeking to support a claim that the government had failed to disclose exculpatory evidence in his earlier criminal case, Landano sought all of the FBI files connected with the police officer's murder for which Landano had been convicted. After releasing a portion of its files, the FBI withheld certain documents on the grounds that they were exempt under Exemption 7(D), which applies to law enforcement records or information whose production "could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source." The district court largely rejected the government's categorical explanations and held that the FBI had to articulate "case-specific reasons for non-disclosure" of all information other than records pertaining to regular FBI informants. Id., --- U.S. at ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2018. The Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit affirmed, holding that the government had to provide detailed explanations relating to each alleged confidential source in order to justify nondisclosure under Exemption 7(D). Id., ---U.S. at ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2019.

The Supreme Court reversed and remanded. The Court first rejected the government's argument that it is entitled to a presumption under FOIA that all FBI sources are confidential and that any records relating to FBI sources should be presumptively exempt from disclosure. The Court noted that the government's proposed presumption was not rebuttable, as argued by the government, but amounted to an irrebuttable presumption or blanket exemption that found no support in the language or legislative history of Exemption 7(D). Id., --- U.S. at ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2023.

The Court, however, did not agree with the Third Circuit's requirement that the government must provide a detailed justification relating to each alleged confidential source. To the contrary, the Court stated that the government could point to categories of documents, the circumstances surrounding which would support the inference that the sources to whom they pertained were confidential. Id., --- U.S. at ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2023. For example, the Court suggested that "paid informants normally expect their cooperation with the FBI to be kept confidential," implying that the government need only present a category of documents relating to paid informants, whose production could reasonably be expected to disclose the informant's identity, in order to justify nondisclosure under Exemption 7(D). Id. As a second example, the Court opined that eyewitnesses to a gang-related murder could also probably be presumed to be confidential. Id. The Court concluded that such a generic, categorical approach best articulated Congress's intent "to provide ' " 'workable' rules" ' of FOIA disclosure." Id. (citing Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 779, 109 S.Ct. at 1485).

Thus, we conclude that the Supreme Court has consistently interpreted Exemption 7 of FOIA (specifically so far subsections 7(A), 7(C), and 7(D)) to permit the government to proceed on a categorical basis in order to justify nondisclosure under one of Exemption 7's subsections. See Landano, --- U.S. at ---- - ----, 113 S.Ct. at 2023-24; Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 779-80, 109 S.Ct. at 1485; Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 241-43, 98 S.Ct. at 2326-27. The Court's interpretation 1309 of Exemption 7 and Congress's intent in enacting it has been strengthened by the 1986 amendment, which provided for greater flexibility and lessened the government's burden. See Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 777 n. 22, 109 S.Ct. at 1484 n. 22.

Our interpretation of Exemption 7(A) in Barney mirrors the Supreme Court's interpretation. Moreover, consistent with the teachings of Robbins Tire, our analysis in Barney is in accord with the principle that " 'the inherent nature of the requested documents is irrelevant to the question of exemption.' " Curran, 813 F.2d at 474 (quoting Irons v. FBI, 811 F.2d 681, 685 (1st Cir.1987)). This interpretation is consistent with decisions from other circuits. See, e.g., Lewis v. IRS, 823 F.2d 375, 378 (9th Cir.1987); Curran, 813 F.2d at 475; Church of Scientology of Calif. v. IRS, 792 F.2d 146, 152 (D.C.Cir.1986); Campbell, 682 F.2d at 265. [FN3]

> FN3. The panel attempted to distinguish these cases on the ground that the appellate courts were reviewing district court decisions that had found Vaughn indices not to be required. Crancer I, 950 F.2d at 534. We find this reasoning unpersuasive. Whatever the procedural posture, the Supreme Court has made clear that the government does not have to provide fact-specific information with respect to each document to justify its claim that Exemption 7(A) applies. As demonstrated, the actual contents of the documents are not relevant when the propriety of Exemption 7(A) is in dispute. See Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2323. Rather, the government may meet its burden by showing how disclosure of each category of documents would likely interfere with the investigation. Id.

The District of Columbia Circuit, which originally developed the Vaughn index, has succinctly explained the relationship between Exemption 7(A), as interpreted by Robbins Tire, and the use of Vaughn indices:

> [w]hen ... a claimed FOIA exemption consists of a generic exclusion [such as Exemption 7(A)], dependent upon the category of records rather than the subject matter which each individual record contains, resort to a Vaughn index is futile. Thus, in NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., [citation omitted], the Supreme Court upheld, without any provision of a Vaughn index, the Labor Board's refusal to provide under FOIA witness statements obtained in the investigation of pending unfair labor practice proceedings. A Vaughn index would have served no purpose since ... [Exemption 7(A)] did not require a showing that each individual document would produce such interference, but could rather be applied generically, to classes of records such as witness statements.

Church of Scientology, 792 F.2d at 152 (Scalia, J.).

In light of the above discussion, the district court's order for a Vaughn index in the present case appends an additional requirement to Exemption 7(A) that exceeds the bounds of the statute as interpreted by the Supreme Court and this court. The district court's order required the government, after identifying each document, to provide a "detailed justification statement covering each refusal to release said agency records or portions thereof." D.Ct. Order of July 27, 1990, at 1. This goes beyond the categorical explanations that the Supreme Court in Robbins Tire held to be sufficient to justify nondisclosure under Exemption 7(A).

[5] In sum, the government bears the burden of establishing that Exemption 7(A) applies. And under Robbins Tire, Exemption 7(A) does not require that the government produce a fact-specific, document-specific, Vaughn index in order to satisfy that burden. The contents of the requested documents are irrelevant. It is the particular categories of documents, and the likelihood that the release of documents within those categories could reasonably be expected to threaten enforcement proceedings, on which the court must focus. The district court, therefore, acted beyond the scope of its authority when it ordered the Department to produce a Vaughn index.

IV.

[6] "Although generic determinations are permitted, and the government need not justify its 7(A) refusal on a document-by-document basis, there must nevertheless be some minimally sufficient showing." Curran, 813 F.2d at 475. To satisfy its burden with regard to Exemption 7(A), the government must define functional categories of documents; 1310 it must conduct a document-by-document review to assign documents to proper categories; and it must explain to the court how the release of each category would interfere with enforcement proceedings. [FN4] See Bevis v. Department of State, 801 F.2d 1386, 1389 (D.C.Cir.1986).

> FN4. We express no opinion as to whether the > categorical index submitted by the Department in this case satisfies the Bevis paradigm. The proceeding below was, for all intents and purposes, focused only on whether the district court could order a Vaughn index. On remand, the Department should submit its categorical index and affidavits in accordance with the principles set forth in this opinion.

[7] If the generic index submitted by the government is not sufficient to sustain the 7(A) exemption, then the district court may request more specific, distinct categories so that it may more easily determine how each category might interfere with enforcement proceedings. See Campbell, 682 F.2d at 265. Indeed, this is what the court ordered in Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1390. "The chief characteristic of an acceptable taxonomy should be functionality--that is, the classification should be clear enough to permit a court to ascertain 'how each .. category of documents, if disclosed, would interfere with the investigation.' " Curran, 813 F.2d at 475 (citing Campbell, 682 F.2d at 265).

[8] If the categories remain too general, the district court may also examine the disputed documents in camera to make a first hand determination. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B); Lewis, 823 F.2d at 378; see also Cleary v. FBI, 811 F.2d 421, 423 (8th Cir.1987) (in camera examination in 7(C) and (D) exemption case); Parton v. United States Dep't of Justice, 727 F.2d 774 (8th Cir.1984); Cox v. United States Dep't of Justice, 576 F.2d 1302 (8th Cir.1978).

In Dickerson v. Department of Justice, 992 F.2d 1426 (6th Cir.1993), the plaintiff sought the release of information from the Hoffa FBI file and requested a Vaughn index. The district court accepted the government's categorical index, examined certain documents in camera, and granted summary judgment to the government on the basis of Exemption 7(A). The court stated that it was "satisfied beyond any doubt that the investigation into Hoffa's disappearance is active and continuing, with the clear direction of future criminal proceedings being instituted." Dickerson v. Department of Justice, No. 90-CV-60045-AA, 1991 WL 337422 (E.D.Mich. July 31, 1991).

On appeal, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reviewed the file that had been submitted to the district court and concluded that the district court had not abused its discretion in ruling that there was no need to go beyond the documents that the FBI had submitted. Dickerson, 992 F.2d at 1431-32. The court of appeals also held that the district court was correct in finding that the FBI's investigation remains active and that it was directed toward the institution of criminal proceedings. Id. at 1432. Further, the Sixth Circuit held that the district court was correct "in its finding that production of the records sought by plaintiff Dickerson could reasonably be expected to interfere with a future prosecution." Id. at 1433.

[9] In the present case, the district court was apparently of the belief that the Department was not asserting Exemption 7(A) in good faith or that it had not individually reviewed the requested documents to place them in their functional categories. While the district court may not order a Vaughn index as an aid to its review, it still must satisfy itself that the requested documents have been properly withheld. The Department's failure to demonstrate that the sought-after documents relate to an ongoing investigation or could reasonably be expected to interfere with future law enforcement proceedings will carry with it the loss of the 7(A) exemption. In that regard, we note that although the Sixth Circuit's affirmative holding on that issue in Dickerson will not be binding on the district court on remand, that holding does give credence to the Department's assertion of the 7(A) exemption in the present case.

In summary, Congress enacted Exemption 7(A) to prohibit interference in an ongoing criminal investigation. The Supreme Court's decision in Robbins Tire to allow generic category-by-category classifications in Exemption 7(A) cases, rather than detailed fact- 1311 specific explanations on a document-by-document basis, serves an important interest: "[p]rovision of the detail which a satisfactory Vaughn Index entails would itself probably breach the dike." Curran, 813 F.2d at 475. "Withal, a tightrope must be walked [in Exemption 7(A) cases]: categories must be distinct enough to allow meaningful judicial review, yet not so distinct as prematurely to let the cat out of the investigative bag." Id. In short, we will not allow the cure, Exemption 7(A), to "become the carrier of the disease." Id.

The writ of mandamus prayed for is issued. The orders directing the production of a Vaughn index are vacated, and the case is remanded to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

McMILLIAN, Circuit Judge, with whom RICHARD S. ARNOLD, Chief Judge, joins, dissenting.

"Free people are, of necessity, informed; uninformed people can never be free." Sen. Judiciary Comm., Freedom of Information, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. 3 (1963) (remarks of Sen. Edward Long).

As discussed below, although I agree with much of the analysis in the majority opinion, I do not agree that the district court exceeded the scope of its authority when it ordered the Department of Justice (hereinafter the government) to prepare a Vaughn index of FBIHQ file 9-60052, the FBI's investigatory file concerning the investigation into the disappearance and presumed murder of Teamsters president Jimmy Hoffa in July 1975. Accordingly, I would deny the petition for writ of mandamus.

COLLATERAL ORDER

First, I do not agree that we have appellate jurisdiction to review the government's appeal, No. 91-2164. As discussed below, the term "Vaughn index" is derived from Vaughn v. Rosen, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 340, 484 F.2d 820 (1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974), and a Vaughn index is typically a detailed affidavit which "permit[s] the court system effectively and efficiently to evaluate the factual nature of disputed information." Id., 484 F.2d at 826. In my view, the district court order in the present case requiring the preparation of a Vaughn index was essentially a discovery order in this FOIA litigation. Discovery orders are "generally not appealable as collateral orders even when they are attacked as burdensome." Hinton v. Department of Justice, 844 F.2d 126, 131 (3d Cir.1988). The Vaughn index is not an end in itself; by definition, the Vaughn index does not itself disclose anything of substance. "[A] Vaughn index does not accord a requester any of the substantive relief [the requester] seeks.... Rather, the [Vaughn] index is a tool for determining the requester's substantive rights [under FOIA]." Id. at 130.

It is true that "[the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA)] was not intended to supplement or displace rules of discovery." John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. 146, 153, 110 S.Ct. 471, 475, 107 L.Ed.2d 462 (1989). However, the present case involves only the FOIA requests themselves. It is a discrete civil action. The FOIA is not being used here as a discovery tool to supplement or displace discovery in connection with other litigation, for example, other criminal or civil proceedings. In discovery proceedings the issue is whether the information sought is relevant and necessary; however, in FOIA litigation the only issue is whether the agency has properly withheld the information sought under one of the specific statutory exemptions. See, e.g., North v. Walsh, 279 U.S.App.D.C. 373, 881 F.2d 1088, 1095 (1989) (FOIA request seeking documents from Office of Independent Counsel concerning on-going criminal investigation of plaintiff).

I also do not agree that the district court order is appealable under the final collateral order exception. Hinton v. Department of Justice, 844 F.2d at 131. Collateral orders are appealable if (1) the order conclusively decides the disputed issue, (2) the issue is entirely distinct from the merits of the case, and (3) the order would be effectively unreviewable if the appeal were postponed until the issuance of a final order. Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 437 U.S. 463, 468, 98 S.Ct. 2454, 2457, 57 L.Ed.2d 351 (1978); Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 546, 69 S.Ct. 1221, 1225, 93 L.Ed. 1528 (1949). At this point in the present case, the district court has only ordered the preparation of a Vaughn index and has yet to 1312 conclusively decide the merits of the government's claim of exemption under Exemption 7(A). The district court agreed to consider the Vaughn index in camera; the district court has not even decided whether or not to disclose the Vaughn index itself to the public or counsel for plaintiff. As noted above, the preparation of a Vaughn index "does not accord a requester any of the substantive relief [he or she] seeks." Id. at 130. The substantive relief the requester wants is access to the government's records, not the preparation of or access to the Vaughn index of those records. The preparation of a Vaughn index is only a preliminary or preparatory step. As was noted by the panel majority opinion, > is unique because it is not a review of a district court's order that documents be disclosed, nor is it a review of a district court's decision that documents are exempt from disclosure. [The present] case asks us to determine what a district court may do while deciding whether documents are or are not exempt from disclosure.

the present case

950 F.2d at 533.

MANDAMUS

In the present case the government does not argue the district court abused its discretion in ordering a Vaughn index; the government argues the district court lacked the authority to order a Vaughn index. The government has thus presented the issue in terms of the power or authority of the district court. The government argues that Exemption 7(A) is different from other FOIA exemptions and that the district court can never require the preparation of a Vaughn index when the government agency invokes Exemption 7(A). As noted by the panel majority opinion, this is a novel argument that squarely challenges the authority of the district court to act. 950 F.2d at 532. Because the government has presented its argument in terms of the district court's authority to act, and not in terms of whether or not the district court abused its discretion, I agree that, under these unique circumstances, we have jurisdiction to review the district court order by petition for writ of mandamus.

THE VAUGHN INDEX

A healthy distrust of government, and a corresponding suspicion of government secrecy, is the underlying premise of FOIA. FOIA "seeks to permit access to official information long shielded unnecessarily from public view and attempts to create a judicially enforceable public right to secure such information from possibly unwilling official hands." EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 80, 93 S.Ct. 827, 832, 35 L.Ed.2d 119 (1973). "The basic purpose of FOIA is to ensure an informed citizenry, vital to the functioning of a democratic society, needed to check against corruption and to hold the governors accountable to the governed." NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 242, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2327, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978) (Robbins). FOIA's "general philosophy [is] 'full agency disclosure unless information is exempted under clearly delineated statutory language.' " Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 360-61, 96 S.Ct. 1592, 1599, 48 L.Ed.2d 11 (1976), citing S.Rep. No. 813, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 3 (1965). " 'Congress realized that legitimate governmental and private interests could be harmed by release of certain types of information,' and therefore provided the 'specific exemptions under which disclosure could be refused.' " John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475, citing FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 621, 102 S.Ct. 2054, 2059, 72 L.Ed.2d 376 (1982). The statutory exemptions are to be narrowly construed, Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. at 361, 96 S.Ct. at 1599, the district courts review the claim of exemptions de novo, and the burden of justifying nondisclosure, that is, the burden of establishing that the information requested is protected from disclosure by a specific exemption, is on the agency. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B).

As noted by the panel majority opinion, the district court's responsibility to review de novo the government's claimed exemptions is complicated by the fact that "ordinarily a government agency, and not the court, has access to the documents in question." 950 F.2d at 533. "The party requesting the disclosure must rely upon his [or her] adversary's representations as to the material withheld, and the court is deprived of the benefit of informed advocacy to draw its attention to the weaknesses in the withholding 1313 agency's arguments." Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d 972, 977 (9th Cir.1991), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 3013, 120 L.Ed.2d 886 (1992). This is the precise difficulty at the heart of the present case and it is also what precipitated the invention of the Vaughn index.

> [I]t is anomalous but obviously inevitable that the party with the greatest interest in obtaining disclosure is at a loss to argue with desirable legal precision for the revelation of the concealed information. Obviously, the party seeking disclosure cannot know the precise contents of the documents sought; secret information is, by definition, unknown to the party seeking disclosure....
> In a very real sense, only one side to the controversy (the side opposing disclosure) is in a position confidently to make statements categorizing information, and this case provides a classic example of such a situation.

Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d at 823-24. Thus, in FOIA litigation, the plaintiff, the party seeking disclosure, is placed in the awkward and frustrating position of speculating about the likely contents of documents that it has never seen.

In Vaughn v. Rosen the plaintiff was a law professor doing research on the Civil Service Commission. The professor sought disclosure of the evaluations of certain government agencies' personnel management programs and certain other special reports of the Bureau of Personnel Management. The government claimed that the documents contained information of a personal nature about the government agency employees and that disclosure would constitute an invasion of the employees' personal privacy. The court of appeals noted that the plaintiff's lack of knowledge necessarily meant that he quite literally did not know, and therefore could not inform the court, whether or not the government's factual characterization of the documents as containing information of a personal nature was accurate. Id., 484 F.2d at 824. The court of appeals observed that the plaintiff's lack of knowledge not only hampered his ability to litigate in the district court (he was essentially limited to arguing that the exemption is very narrow and that the general nature of the documents sought made it unlikely that they contained personal information), but

> The problem is compounded at the appellate level. In reviewing a determination of exemption, an appellate court must consider the appropriateness of a trial court's characterization of the factual nature of the information. Frequently trial courts' holdings in FOIA cases are stated in very conclusory terms, saying simply that the information falls under one or another of the exemptions to [FOIA]. An appellate court, like the trial court, is completely without the controverting illumination that would ordinarily accompany a request to review a lower court's factual determination; it must conduct its own investigation into the document. The scope of inquiry will not have been focused by the adverse parties and, if justice is to be done, the examination must be relatively comprehensive. Obviously, an appellate court is even less suited to making this inquiry than is a trial court.

Id., 484 F.2d at 824-25. The FOIA requester in the present case is in the same position as the law professor in Vaughn v. Rosen.

The Vaughn v. Rosen court concluded that, contrary to the intent of Congress, FOIA "actually encourage[d] the Government to contend that large masses of information are exempt, when in fact part of the information should be disclosed." Id., 484 F.2d at 826. Not only did FOIA contain "no inherent incentives that would affirmatively spur government agencies to disclose information," id., but "since the burden of determining the justifiability of a government claim of exemption currently falls on the court system, ... [FOIA] encourage[d] agencies automatically to claim the broadest possible grounds for exemption for the greatest amount of information." 1314 Id. These concerns compelled the Vaughn v. Rosen court to develop what has become known as the Vaughn index in order to "(1) assure that a party's right to information is not submerged beneath governmental obfuscation and mischaracterization, and (2) permit the court system effectively and efficiently to evaluate the factual nature of disputed information." Id.

> As noted by the panel majority opinion,

950 F.2d at 533 (citations omitted). "Specificity is the defining requirement of the Vaughn index and affidavit; affidavits cannot support summary judgment [upholding the government's claimed exemption] if they are 'conclusory, merely reciting statutory standards, or if they are too vague or sweeping.' " King v. United States Department of Justice, 265 U.S.App.D.C. 62, 830 F.2d 210, 219 (1987) (footnotes omitted). "To accept an inadequately supported exemption claim 'would constitute an abandonment of the trial court's obligation under the FOIA to conduct a de novo review.' " Id. Whether the government's affidavit or affidavits constitute an adequate Vaughn index is a question of law reviewed de novo. Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d at 978, citing Binion v. United States Department of Justice, 695 F.2d 1189, 1193 (9th Cir.1983).

Preparation of the Vaughn index does more than require the government agency to review and classify the documents in question. The resulting Vaughn index is more than a litigation tool that the FOIA requester can use to challenge the government's withholding of those documents. It is important to remember that requiring the government agency to prepare a Vaughn index > forces the government to analyze carefully any material withheld, it enables the trial court to fulfill its duty of ruling on the applicability of the exemption, and it enables the adversary system to operate by giving the requester as much information as possible, on the basis of which he [or she] can present his [or her] case to the trial court.

Lykins v. Department of Justice, 233 U.S.App.D.C. 349, 725 F.2d 1455, 1463 (1984). "The index thus functions to restore the adversary process to some extent, and to permit more effective judicial review of the agency's decision." Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d at 977-78; see also Davis v. CIA, 711 F.2d 858, 861 (8th Cir.1983), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1035, 104 S.Ct. 1307, 79 L.Ed.2d 705 (1984).

ROBBINS DECISION

As has already been discussed, Exemption 7(A) is the law enforcement exemption and provides that disclosure is not required of "matters that are ... investigatory records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A). In the present case the government argues the district court lacked the authority to require the preparation of a Vaughn index because a Vaughn index is not required when Exemption 7(A) is invoked, citing Robbins, 437 U.S. at 223-24, 234-36, 98 S.Ct. at 2317-18, 2323. In Robbins the FOIA plaintiff was an employer seeking disclosure of witness statements prior to an unfair labor practice hearing. Following a contested representation election, the regional director of the NLRB filed an unfair labor practice charge against the employer for pre-election actions. A hearing was scheduled. Prior to the hearing, the employer sought disclosure of all potential witnesses' statements collected by the NLRB during its investigation. The regional director denied the request on the ground that the witness statements were exempt from disclosure under several FOIA exemptions, 1315 in particular Exemption 7(A). The employer appealed to the NLRB General Counsel. However, before the expiration of FOIA's 20-day response period, 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), the employer filed a FOIA action in federal district court, seeking disclosure of the witness statements and an injunction against holding the hearing until the documents had been disclosed. The NLRB argued that witness statements were exempt from disclosure under Exemption 7(A) because their production would interfere with an enforcement proceeding, the pending unfair labor practice hearing. The district court disagreed and ordered the NLRB to produce the witness statements.

The issue whether Exemption 7(A) was generic, or categorical, or case-specific emerged on appeal. The court of appeals rejected the NLRB's categorical or generic approach and concluded that the 1974 legislative history demonstrated that Exemption 7(A) was available only after a specific evidentiary showing of the possibility of actual interference in an individual case. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co. v. NLRB, 563 F.2d 724, 728 (5th Cir.1977). The court of appeals rejected the NLRB's arguments that the premature revelation of its case through the production of the witness statements before the hearing was the kind of interference that would justify nondisclosure and that pre-hearing production of witness statements would discourage potential witnesses from making statements at all. Id. at 729-31. The court of appeals acknowledged that the possibility of "interference" in the form of witness intimidation by the employer during the period between disclosure of the witness statements to the employer and the hearing, but held that the NLRB had failed to demonstrate that the witness statements were exempt because it had not introduced any evidence that witness intimidation was likely in this particular case. Id. at 732. But see, e.g., Title Guarantee Co. v. NLRB, 534 F.2d 484, 491 (2d Cir.) (holding statements of employees and union representatives obtained in NLRB investigation exempt from disclosure under Exemption 7(A) until completion of administrative and judicial proceedings), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 834, 97 S.Ct. 98, 50 L.Ed.2d 99 (1976).

The Supreme Court reversed. The Court endorsed the generic, or categorical, interpretation of Exemption 7(A) and held that "witness statements in pending unfair labor practice proceedings are exempt from FOIA disclosure at least until completion of the Board's hearing." 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. First, the Court noted that the language of the exemption, specifically the plural reference to "enforcement proceedings," suggested that "certain generic determinations" might be made under Exemption 7(A). Id. at 224, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. The Court concluded that the early legislative history supported this interpretation, id. at 225-26, 98 S.Ct. at 2318-19 (referring to Sen. Humphrey's concerns in 1966 about the need to protect statements of agency witnesses from disclosure prior to agency proceedings, specifically witnesses in unfair labor practice proceedings), as well as the reported decisions until 1974. Id. at 226, 98 S.Ct. at 2319 (citing cases). The Court also noted that the legislative history of the 1974 amendment of Exemption 7 showed "[t]hat the 1974 Congress did not mean to undercut the intent of the 1966 Congress with respect to Senator Humphrey's concern about interference with pending NLRB enforcement proceedings." Id. at 232, 98 S.Ct. at 2322; see id. at 226-32, 98 S.Ct. at 2319-22 (noting background of 1974 amendment, particularly Congressional disapproval of several D.C.Cir. decisions upholding "blanket exemptions" for all government records contained in investigatory files that had been compiled for law enforcement purposes; 1974 amendment changed scope of exemption from "files" to "records" and enumerated specific purposes and objectives of exemption).

The Court concluded that "Congress did not intend to prevent the federal courts from determining that, with respect to particular kinds of law enforcement proceedings, disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records while a case is pending would generally 'interfere with enforcement proceedings.' " Id. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. The Court agreed that "[t]he most obvious risk of interference with enforcement proceedings in this context is that employers or, in some cases, unions will coerce or intimidate employees and others who have given statements, in an effort to make them change their testimony 1316 or not testify at all." Id. at 239, 98 S.Ct. at 2325. In addition, prehearing disclosure of witnesses' statements "would disturb the existing balance of relations in unfair labor practice proceedings," id. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324, especially since, "[h]istorically, the NLRB has provided little prehearing discovery in unfair labor practice proceedings and has relied principally on statements such as those sought here to prove its case." Id. The Court also noted that the use of FOIA as the mechanism for providing a litigant with earlier and greater access to the agency's case than the litigant would otherwise have was likely to cause substantial delays in the administrative process and thus interfere with enforcement proceedings. Id. at 237-38, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. [FN5]

FN5. As noted by the majority opinion, at 1307 supra, the Supreme Court recently affirmed the Robbins categorical approach in United States Dep't of Justice v. Landano, --- U.S. ----, ----, ---- - ----, 113 S.Ct. 2014, 2021, 2023-24, 124 L.Ed.2d 84 (1993) (rejecting blanket exemption for "all" FBI sources as confidential for purposes of Exemption 7(D); however, "more narrowly defined circumstances" may support inference of confidentiality, for example, generic category of paid informants). See also United States Dep't of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989) (holding "rap sheets" constituted generic category of law enforcement records which could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy within meaning of Exemption 7(C)). I do not dispute the continued validity of the Robbins categorical approach. What is in dispute in the present case is whether, as a threshold matter, we know enough about the nature of the records in question to review the accuracy of the government's > classification of the records into generic categories. I submit that we do not.

APPLICATION OF EXEMPTION 7(A)

I do not think Robbins supports the government's argument in the present case. As noted by the panel majority opinion, after Robbins endorsed the generic, or categorical, application of Exemption 7(A), many courts of appeals > altered their views on the need for a Vaughn index when Exemption 7(A) is involved. The rationale underlying these post-Robbins decisions has been that a Vaughn index is unnecessary because the government is permitted to demonstrate interference based on categories of documents and need not demonstrate interference with enforcement proceedings on a document-by-document basis. E.g., Church of Scientology v. IRS, 792 F.2d 146, 152 (D.C.Cir.1986) (Scalia, J.); Barney v. IRS, 618 F.2d 1268, 1273 (8th Cir.1980) (per curiam). Moreover, in each of these cases, the appellate court was reviewing a district court's decision not to require a Vaughn index when the government had already provided adequate descriptions of the documents sought, as well as adequate explanations as to how the particular types of documents at issue could interfere with law enforcement proceedings.

> At no time, however, has an appellate court suggested that Robbins alters the district court's statutory obligation to review the claimed exemption's applicability. Robbins does not allow for exemption merely because documents appear in a law enforcement agency's file. When an agency relies upon Robbins and offers categorical justifications for exemption under Exemption 7(A), the agency must still review each document individually.... The district court is well within its authority to verify that the agency has actually examined and properly categorized each document. It may accomplish this task by requiring an affidavit that describes, on a document-by-document basis, the documents in the file, the categories into which each document is placed, and a description of how disclosure of each category of documents might interfere with enforcement proceedings. Robbins merely prevents a district court from ordering a document-by-document explanation as to how each document will interfere with enforcement proceedings. In other words, though the district court cannot require the government to justify its decision to deny disclosure on a document-by-document basis, it can require the government to justify its chosen categorization on a document-by-document basis. 950 F.2d at 533-34 (parenthetical omitted from Barney citation; citations omitted; footnote omitted).

In Robbins it was not disputed that the documents in question were in fact witness 1317 statements. Nor was it disputed in Robbins that, at least in general, disclosure of witness statements prior to the unfair labor practice proceeding could interfere with that proceeding. What was disputed was whether the agency could rely on that generality or whether the agency had to make a specific factual showing that disclosure of those particular witness statements would interfere with that particular proceeding. Similarly, in Barney v. IRS, there was no dispute about the categorization of the documents in question; the district court and this court were "satisfied that the government's affidavits adequately described the documents, the categories to which they belonged, and the possible harms of disclosure." 950 F.2d at 534, citing 618 F.2d at 1272-73 (witness statements, documentary evidence, IRS agent's work papers, internal agency memoranda). See Curran v. Department of Justice, 813 F.2d 473, 476 (1st Cir.1987) (apparent from agency affidavit that agency conducted individualized, document-by-document search, subdivided records into types and then into functional categories).

The same cannot be said in the present case. Here, the parties disputed not only the nature of the individual documents, but also the type of category used by the government, as well as the appropriate categorization or placement of the documents into particular categories. This basic lack of agreement about the nature and categorization of the documents distinguishes the present case from Robbins and Barney.

In the present case, the district court required preparation of a Vaughn index, and in response the government filed several public affidavits or declarations and a document which it captioned a "categorical index." The district court was clearly not satisfied with the government's response. As noted by the penal majority opinion, "[t]he district court's dissatisfaction [with the government's response was] understandable given the government's blanket assertion that all 13,800 documents, accumulated over a 15-year span, fit neatly into nine categories described over the course of five pages." Id. at 535; cf. Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d at 978 (noting the FBI's use of "boilerplate" explanations drawn from a "master" FOIA response). Furthermore, the district court believed that the FOIA requester had raised serious questions about the validity of the government's search and categorization of the documents. Id. Compare Curran v. Department of Justice, 813 F.2d at 476 (district court found no reason to impugn good faith of agency). The district court also concluded that it needed additional information "about each document, not only to verify that the government has fulfilled its obligation to examine each document, but also to enable it to understand or challenge the categories created by the government." 950 F.2d at 535.

By requiring the preparation of a Vaughn index in the present case, the district court was attempting to develop an adequate record. Only the government knows what is in the Hoffa file; the FOIA requester and the district court do not know, much less this court. As noted above, the record indicates only that the file consists of at least 13,800 pages in 70 volumes; the file is almost certainly larger now. Some of these pages are public source material which the government has already made available to the FOIA requester. According to the categorical index, which consists of a total of five double-spaced pages, each and every page falls within one of nine categories, the disclosure of which could reasonably be expected to interfere with law enforcement proceedings. The district court's dissatisfaction with the categorical index was directed more at the procedural and substantive accuracy of the government's classification of individual pages than at the categories identified by the government. (The majority opinion expresses no opinion on the sufficiency of the Baker affidavit and the categorical index. See supra at 1309 n. 4 supra.) In any event, as noted by the panel majority opinion, the district court's concern about whether all the documents are described by the government's categories cannot be resolved merely by requiring more specific or more detailed categories. 950 F.2d at 535.

In my view, assuming for purposes of analysis that the government's categories are sufficiently specific, the district court acted within its authority in requiring the government to verify that it had actually examined and accurately categorized each document. 1318 Indeed, it was its duty to do so. King v. United States Department of Justice, 830 F.2d at 219 (acceptance of inadequately supported exemption claim "would constitute abandonment of the trial court's obligation under FOIA to conduct a de novo review"). The district court did not know (and we do not know) whether the government's categorization of the documents was correct or, for that matter, whether the government had examined each document individually. The district court decided that, without a Vaughn index, it could not verify whether there was a correlation between the documents and the categories. Because all the documents necessarily fall into exempt categories, unless the district court can verify that each document has been examined and accurately categorized, the Robbins categories will become "no more than smaller versions of the 'blanket exemptions' disapproved by Congress in its 1974 amendments of FOIA." Bevis v. Department of State, 255 U.S.App.D.C. 347, 801 F.2d 1386, 1389 (1986), citing Robbins, 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324.

As noted by the panel majority opinion, preparation of a Vaughn index in the present case does not require the government to demonstrate document-by-document how disclosure of each document could reasonably be expected to interfere with pending law enforcement proceedings. 950 F.2d at 535. Like the district court and the panel majority, I accept the category-by-category approach. What I do not accept is the government's conclusory assertions that each and every document in the Hoffa file falls within one of its nine categories. In other words, what is disputed, and what the district court sought to verify by requiring the preparation of a Vaughn index, is whether the government's categorization of each document is accurate. Without such a record, the FOIA requester cannot test the government's claim of exemption, the district court cannot conduct the required de novo review of the government's decision not to disclose (without undertaking the arduous task of actually reviewing the documents itself), and this court cannot conduct a meaningful review of the district court's decision.

It should be noted that the district court could decide to modify its order requiring the government to prepare a Vaughn index for the entire Hoffa file. In the proceedings before the district court, the government argued that preparation of a Vaughn index for the entire Hoffa file would be inordinately time-consuming and would necessarily divert scarce resources from other law enforcement activities. The district court could require the government to prepare a Vaughn index for a representative sample of the documents in the Hoffa file. "Representative sampling is an appropriate procedure to test an agency's FOIA exemption claims when a large number of documents are involved." Bonner v. United States Department of State, 289 U.S.App.D.C. 56, 928 F.2d 1148, 1151 (1991); accord The Washington Post v. United States Department of Defense, 766 F.Supp. 1, 15 (D.D.C.1991).

Alternatively, the district court could decide to conduct an in camera review of a representative sample of the documents in the Hoffa file. In camera review is discretionary. Robbins, 437 U.S. at 224, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. Limited in camera review might be particularly helpful in the present case. "[A] finding of bad faith or contrary evidence is not a prerequisite to in camera review; a trial judge may order such an inspection 'on the basis of an uneasiness, on a doubt [the judge] wants satisfied before [taking] responsibility for a de novo determination.' " Meeropol v. Meese, 252 U.S.App.D.C. 381, 790 F.2d 942, 958 (1986), citing Ray v. Turner, 190 U.S.App.D.C. 290, 587 F.2d 1187, 1195 (1978). One district judge and one appellate panel have examined in camera a selection made by the government of the documents contained in the Hoffa file and concluded that those documents established that the criminal investigation into Hoffa's disappearance is active and continuing and that production of those records could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings. Dickerson v. Department of Justice, No. 90-CV-60045-AA, 1991 WL 337422, slip op. at 5-6 (E.D.Mich. July 31, 1991), aff'd, 992 F.2d 1426 (6th Cir.1993).

For the reasons set forth above, I would hold the district court has the authority to require the government to prepare a Vaughn index even when Exemption 7(A) is invoked 1319 and would deny the government's application for writ of mandamus.

DICKERSON & HOFFA

Brian DICKERSON, Plaintiff-Appellant,
v.
DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Defendant-Appellee.

No. 92-1458.

United States Court of Appeals,
Sixth Circuit.

Argued Jan. 19, 1993.

Decided April 30, 1993.

Newspaper editor requested, pursuant to Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), release of record on investigation conducted by Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) into disappearance more than 15 years earlier of former union official. After FBI denied request, editor brought suit to compel Department of Justice to produce records. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, George LaPlata, J., denied relief, and editor appealed. The Court of Appeals, David A. Nelson, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) Vaughn index was not required, and (2) records came within FOIA exemption for records compiled for law enforcement purposes whose disclosure could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings.

Affirmed.

Beckwith, District Judge, sitting by designation, delivered separate concurring opinion.

Batchelder, Circuit Judge, delivered separate dissenting opinion.

Before: NELSON and BATCHELDER, Circuit Judges; and BECKWITH, District Judge. [FN*]

FN* The Honorable Sandra S. Beckwith, United States District Judge for the Southern District of Ohio, sitting by designation.

DAVID A. NELSON, Circuit Judge.

Pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act--a statute which, subject to certain exceptions, makes federal government records available to anyone who asks for them--plaintiff Brian Dickerson requested the release of records on an investigation conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation into the disappearance of Jimmy Hoffa, former president of the Teamsters Union.

Citing 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A), which exempts from disclosure "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings," the government denied the request. Mr. Dickerson brought suit in the Eastern District of Michigan to compel the Department of Justice to produce the records. The district court (La Plata, J.) ultimately decided that production was not required.

In making its decision the district court focused on the question whether a "concrete prospective law enforcement proceeding" [FN1] could still be discerned--i.e., whether there was still a reasonable chance that someone would be prosecuted in connection with Mr. Hoffa's disappearance. Based on affidavits of several FBI officials and an in camera review of FBI file documents assembled for the purpose of briefing one of the affiants on the status of the investigation, the district court found that "the investigation into Hoffa's disappearance is active and continuing, with the clear direction of future criminal proceedings being instituted." The court further found that disclosure of the requested documents could reasonably be expected to interfere with such proceedings. The court made these findings without having required the government to provide a document-by-document analysis of the files.

FN1. The phrase originated with Senator Hart, a supporter of Freedom of Information Act amendments adopted in 1974. See 120 Cong.Rec. 17033 (1974), quoted in NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 232, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2322, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978).

The issues presented on appeal are (1) whether the district court abused its discretion in not insisting on a full document-by-document analysis and in limiting its in camera review to the briefing materials; (2) whether the district court dealt correctly with the factual side of the case; and (3) whether the district court ought to have found that at least some non-public portions of the investigatory files were not protected 1428 from disclosure. Resolving each of these issues in favor of the government, we shall affirm the judgment of the district court.

I

Jimmy Hoffa disappeared in Detroit, Michigan, on July 30, 1975. It is widely believed that he was abducted and killed. Mr. Hoffa's disappearance led to an FBI investigation that has not, to date, resulted in any criminal proceedings being brought.

The investigation is documented in two large files, one maintained in the FBI's field office in Detroit and the other at FBI headquarters in Washington. At the time with which we are concerned in this proceeding the headquarters file consisted of 67 volumes and the field office file consisted of 332 volumes.

On July 25, 1989, counsel for the Detroit Free Press, a newspaper that employs plaintiff Dickerson in an editorial capacity, sent sweeping Freedom of Information Act requests on the Hoffa investigation to Justice Department and FBI officials in Detroit and Washington. When the requests were denied, Mr. Dickerson sued the Department of Justice under 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), which gives federal district courts jurisdiction to order the production of agency records withheld improperly. This section of the statute, which places the burden of sustaining non-disclosure on the government, directs the court to determine the matter de novo. It also provides that the court "may examine the ... agency records in camera to determine whether such records or any part thereof shall be withheld under any of the exemptions set forth in [5 U.S.C. § 552(b)]...."

The Department of Justice filed an answer admitting that there were no pending criminal proceedings directly relating to Mr. Hoffa's disappearance, but asserting that no documents had been improperly withheld. Both parties subsequently moved for summary judgment.

The plaintiff's summary judgment motion was accompanied by newspaper articles referring to a statement by Kenneth P. Walton, a retired head of the FBI's Detroit field office, to the effect that although he knew who had murdered Jimmy Hoffa, there would never be a prosecution because of the government's unwillingness to disclose confidential sources. The Justice Department filing was accompanied by "declarations," or affidavits, in which two FBI headquarters officials, Angus B. Llewellyn and Jim E. Moody, attested that the Hoffa investigation was still pending.

The Llewellyn declaration went on to give a general description of the contents of the investigatory files, categorizing the records by source or function. The declaration also sought to explain why law enforcement records contained in the files were exempt from production not only under subsection (7)(A) of 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), but also under subsection (7)(C) (exempting such records if they "could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy"); subsection (7)(D) (exempting them if they "could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source"); and subsection (7)(E) (exempting them if they "would disclose techniques and procedures for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions ... if such disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law").

The Moody declaration focused on the (7)(A) exemption. The declaration explained, among other things, that

> "The files responsive to plaintiff's [Freedom of Information Act] request contain documents detailing the FBI's theories regarding the case, investigative leads we're pursuing (and those we don't consider worthy of pursuit), information furnished by confidential sources, information indicating whom the prime suspects are considered to be, techniques being utilized by the FBI in this investigation, interviews of third parties and cooperating witnesses, results of laboratory and polygraph examinations, and suggestions as to how to proceed with this investigation."

The Moody declaration stated that the FBI was continuing its efforts to develop information for use in criminal proceedings, and the declaration sought to show why production of 1429 the records could reasonably be expected to interfere with such proceedings.

In January of 1991 the district court denied both of the motions for summary judgment on the ground that there was a material issue of fact concerning the prospect of future enforcement proceedings. The Justice Department moved for reconsideration, supporting its motion with a declaration executed by William M. Baker, the Assistant Director of the FBI in charge of the agency's Criminal Investigation Division.

Mr. Baker declared under penalty of perjury that it was his responsibility to determine whether the investigation into the Hoffa disappearance should be pursued; that in his judgment the investigation warranted the continuing efforts of the FBI; that he had allocated continued FBI resources to the investigation; that he believed "that the person(s) responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance can be identified and prosecuted;" and that public disclosure of the information in the Hoffa file could reasonably be expected, for reasons specified in the declaration, to interfere with enforcement proceedings against those responsible for the disappearance. Mr. Baker further declared that the statement attributed to the former field office head "did not reflect and does not reflect official FBI policy."

[1] In response to the motion for reconsideration plaintiff Dickerson filed a reply brief stating that Mr. Baker's declaration was essentially identical to one he had filed in a Freedom of Information Act suit brought in a federal district court in Missouri by Mr. Hoffa's daughter, Barbara Crancer. The brief pointed out that the declaration had not dissuaded the district court in Missouri from ordering the government to submit a Vaughn index on the smaller of the two Hoffa files, [FN2] and it noted that FBI Director William Sessions had testified before a Senate Subcommittee that it is "doubtful" that the government will ever have sufficient evidence to bring to trial those responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance. [FN3]

FN2. A "Vaughn index," which takes its name from a technique developed in Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974), is a document-by-document index, specially prepared for litigation purposes, in which the agency describes the contents of its records and the reasons why each of the disputed items is claimed to be exempt from disclosure. See Osborn v. Internal Revenue Service, 754 F.2d 195, 196 (6th Cir.1985), and the cases there cited, for a statement of the criteria such an index must meet. The requirement for a Vaughn index in Mrs. Crancer's case was subsequently upheld by a divided three judge panel of the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, see In re Department of Justice, 950 F.2d 530 (8th Cir.1991), but the panel decision has been vacated in connection with the granting of a rehearing en banc. See Order at 950 F.2d 538. As of this writing the en banc court has not announced its decision.

FN3. The Justice Department later submitted an official transcript of the subcommittee hearing showing that Director Sessions had declined to comment on the likelihood of indictments being obtained, and that it was Oliver B. Revell, Executive Assistant Director-Investigations, and not Director Sessions, who made the "doubtful" comment.

Plaintiff Dickerson's reply brief further advised the court that the Missouri proceedings had disclosed the existence of two categories of documents that might quickly reveal the status of the Hoffa investigation: documents containing the results of high level strategy conferences, with synopses of the investigation to date, and memoranda updating the Director of the FBI on the status of the investigation. The plaintiff's brief suggested that the court conduct an in camera review of all documents in these two categories. Since the Missouri court had already ordered the Justice Department to prepare a Vaughn index on the 68-volume file from FBI headquarters in Washington, plaintiff Dickerson suggested that the Department should be ordered to produce a copy of that index as well.

In the meantime, plaintiff Dickerson had served notice of the depositions of FBI Director Sessions and declarants Llewellyn, Moody and Baker, and the Justice Department had moved for a stay of discovery. The motion was referred to a magistrate judge, who conducted two telephone conferences on the matter.

In the course of the first conference the Justice Department indicated a willingness to go through the headquarters file and segregate, 1430 for in camera review by the court, all documents in the two categories singled out by the plaintiff. Government counsel later confirmed with declarant Moody, Chief of the FBI's Organized Crime Unit, that such documents had not yet been physically segregated. Mr. Moody disclosed to counsel, however, and counsel disclosed at the second telephone conference with the magistrate judge, that Moody already had a file of documents, culled from the field office records in Detroit, that contained an update on the Hoffa investigation. This file had recently been assembled on Mr. Moody's own initiative to prepare him to testify if he should be ordered to give his deposition. The Moody file had not been put together with the idea of turning it over to the court for in camera review, counsel explained, but the government offered to make it available to the court for that purpose, along with all documents in the two categories specified by the plaintiff.

The magistrate judge expressed an interest in keeping the scope of any in camera review manageable, and counsel for plaintiff Dickerson agreed that the district judge would be more likely to undertake such a review if the quantity of materials were not excessive. The telephone conference led to an order in which the magistrate judge directed that the Moody file be sent to Michigan for possible in camera inspection by District Judge La Plata. The plaintiff's request to depose the four FBI officials was deferred in the meantime.

Judge La Plata concluded that with the addition of Assistant Director Baker's declaration, the declarations alone might be sufficient. In view of the testimony before the Senate subcommittee, however, and in view of the length of time that had elapsed since Mr. Hoffa's disappearance, Judge La Plata elected to review the Moody file (consisting of some 335 pages) in its entirety.

Having completed a careful and thorough review of the Moody file in camera, the court expressed itself as "satisfied beyond any doubt" that the investigation was active, that it was continuing, and that it was directed toward the institution of criminal proceedings. Because the court likewise found that disclosure of the documents sought by plaintiff Dickerson and his newspaper could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings, the court entered summary judgment in favor of the Department of Justice. A subsequent motion for reconsideration was denied, and this appeal followed.

[2] Law enforcement records cannot "reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings," it has been suggested, unless there is at least "a reasonable chance that an enforcement proceeding will occur...." Nevas v. Dept. of Justice, 789 F.Supp. 445, 448 (D.D.C.1992). [FN4] We agree, and we turn first to the procedure followed by the district court in preparing itself to determine the likelihood that enforcement proceedings might still occur in the Hoffa case. (The court's determination of the likelihood that disclosure of the requested documents might interfere with any such proceedings also has a procedural aspect, and we shall touch on this at the same time.)

FN4. Even where exemption (7)(A) has become inapplicable, however, records compiled in the course of the investigation may still be exempt if production could be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy or disclose the identity of a confidential source, or if production would disclose law enforcement techniques and procedures that could be expected to risk circumvention of the law in other cases. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C), (D), and (E). In the case at bar the district court made no determination as to the applicability of these sections, and we shall confine our analysis to exemption (7)(A).

[3] Although requested to follow the lead of the district court in Missouri in ordering the compilation of a Vaughn index on the FBI headquarters file, Judge La Plata did not do so. Plaintiff Dickerson maintains that the court committed reversible error in granting the government's summary judgment motion without having had the benefit of such an index.

Depending on the nature of the case, the use of a Vaughn index may have obvious advantages from the perspective of one or another of the litigants or from the perspective of the courts. See, for example, Ingle v. 1431 Dept. of Justice, 698 F.2d 259 (6th Cir.1983), where we indicated that a Vaughn index makes the playing field more nearly level for the party seeking disclosure, facilitates effective appellate review, and may obviate any need for the courts to review documents in camera. In the context of a case that did not involve exemption (7)(A), we have said that a Vaughn index should be obtained in "most" Freedom of Information Act cases. Osborn v. Internal Revenue Service, 754 F.2d 195, 197 (6th Cir.1985).

As we subsequently explained in a Vaughn decision of our own, however, Osborn created no hard and fast rule with respect to Vaughn indices as such. Vaughn v. United States, 936 F.2d 862, 867 (6th Cir.1991). The government must provide sufficient information in sufficient detail to enable the court "to make a reasoned, independent assessment of the claim of exemption," but no particular method of doing so is mandated; "[a] court's primary focus must be on the substance, rather than the form, of the information supplied by the government to justify withholding requested information." Id. The Supreme Court has consistently taken what it terms "a practical approach" to Freedom of Information Act matters, see John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. 146, 157, 110 S.Ct. 471, 477, 107 L.Ed.2d 462 (1989), and this circuit tries to do the same.

Where exemption (7)(A) is concerned, as a practical matter, it is often feasible for the courts to make "generic determinations" about interference with enforcement proceedings. See NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 223-24, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2317-18, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978). [FN5] In many (7)(A) cases, at least, affidavits of the sort presented by the government here would seem to provide an adequate basis for making such determinations.

> FN5. The plaintiff in Robbins Tire was seeking disclosure of witness statements taken by the National Labor Relations Board. The plaintiff contended that such statements could be withheld under exemption (7)(A) only upon a showing of a particularized risk of interference with a particular enforcement proceeding. The Supreme Court rejected the contention that no "generic determinations" of likely interference could ever be made, concluding instead that "Congress did not intend to prevent the federal courts from determining that, with respect to particular kinds of enforcement proceedings, disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records while a case is pending would generally 'interfere with enforcement proceedings.' " Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. When Robbins Tire was decided, exemption (7)(A) required a showing that disclosure "would" interfere with enforcement proceedings. Congress subsequently amended the statute by dropping the word "would" and replacing it with the current formula, which protects law enforcement records to the extent that disclosure "could reasonably be expected to interfere...." (Emphasis supplied.) See Pub.L. 99-570, § 1802(a) (1986). This statutory change strengthens the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court in Robbins Tire, of course.

Here the district court believed that the government's affidavits might be sufficient standing alone to support a finding on whether the point and purpose of the investigation had expired, but the court nonetheless felt the need for a reality check of some kind. The Moody file seemed like a sensible place to start, and we think it was clearly within the court's discretion to begin there. If the Moody file had turned out not to be helpful, the court could obviously have moved on to an in camera inspection of the two groups of 1432 documents that both parties had suggested the court might wish to examine. After reviewing all of the documents in the Moody file, however, the court concluded that there was no need to go further. We too have reviewed the Moody file in its entirety, and we see no abuse of discretion in the district court's decision on this score.

Plaintiff Dickerson argues that the decision to review only documents "hand-picked" by the government deprived him of the benefits of the adversary process. But the materials in the Moody file were selected, as we have seen, for briefing Mr. Moody on the status of the investigation, and not for submission to the court for review by it in camera. The idea of a court review of the Moody file in isolation originated with the magistrate judge, not with the government. The review process was necessarily non-adversarial, to be sure, but the process would have been equally non-adversarial if the documents under review had included the additional materials the government had said it was willing to turn over to the court.

The approach developed by the magistrate judge was designed in part to avoid a situation in which the district judge might have felt constrained to review more documents in camera than he would have wanted to see. This approach makes sense to us. The adversaries could and did present arguments on the sufficiency of the affidavits that formed the government's main line of defense, [FN6] and review of any documents in camera might well have been deemed superfluous; we think it was reasonable for the magistrate judge to offer Judge La Plata the documents that had already been segregated, and we think it was reasonable for Judge La Plata to decide, after reviewing them, that he had seen all he needed to see in order to make a proper decision.

FN6. Plaintiff Dickerson complains about the failure of the district court to hear oral argument, but each side had ample opportunity to present its case through briefs. In addition, of course, there were two telephone conferences with the magistrate judge.

[5] The district court was correct, we believe, in its finding on the likelihood of a criminal prosecution being brought.

It is clear, as we read the record, that the Hoffa investigation remains active. In the judgment of Assistant Director Baker--the person whose responsibility it is to determine whether the investigation should still be pursued, and, if so, what FBI resources should be devoted to it--the investigation warrants the FBI's continued efforts to bring to trial those responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance.

Mr. Baker has allocated continued FBI resources to the Hoffa investigation, according to his declaration, and the declaration says that the investigation "is ongoing and still absorbs FBI management and field agent resources on a regular basis." The documents in the Moody file are consistent with Mr. Baker's representation that the Hoffa investigation remains active.

The fact that the investigation is continuing does not mean that a prosecution will definitely be brought, of course, but the Baker declaration says that FBI criminal investigations often result in enforcement proceedings many years after the crimes were committed. "[W]ith the passage of time," Mr. Baker continues, "persons with knowledge of Mr. Hoffa's disappearance may feel more free to disclose critical information to law enforcement officers." Attesting to a "belief that the person(s) responsible for Mr. Hoffa's disappearance can be identified and prosecuted," Mr. Baker says that he "would not knowingly permit scarce FBI resources to be devoted to a futile investigation."

FBI retiree Walton and Executive Assistant Director Revell may consider it doubtful whether anyone will ever be brought to trial in the Hoffa case, and they may be right. Neither of them is responsible for deciding whether it is worthwhile to continue the investigation, however, and the official who does have that responsibility--Assistant Director Baker--obviously believes that there is still a reasonable prospect of a prosecution being brought. No court is likely to be able to match Mr. Baker's expertise on that kind 1433 of question, and, like the district court, we are disposed to defer to his judgment.

The district court was also correct, we believe, in its finding that production of the records sought by plaintiff Dickerson could reasonably be expected to interfere with a future prosecution.

In some contexts, the Supreme Court has said, the most obvious risk of interference with enforcement proceedings is that witnesses will be coerced or intimidated into changing their testimony or not testifying at all. Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 239, 98 S.Ct. at 2325. The declarations of Messrs. Llewellyn and Moody both demonstrate that witness intimidation is a genuine concern in the Hoffa investigation--an investigation that the FBI has designated a "Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization-La Cosa Nostra Labor Racketeering Investigation." If the perpetrators of the crime knew what investigative leads the FBI is pursuing, who the prime suspects are, and the nature of the evidence gathered to date, as one of the affidavits explains, they "could take steps to destroy or tamper with evidence, intimidate witnesses or construct a false alibi...."

In organized crime investigations such as this one, moreover, it has been the experience of declarant Moody, the chief of the Organized Crime Section of the FBI's Criminal Investigation Division, that informants can provide information critical to the successful conclusion of the investigation. Public disclosure of the Hoffa investigation files, Mr. Moody has declared, would discourage such individuals from coming forward.

Another important issue, particularly in homicide cases, has to do with the corroboration of evidence. Verification of statements given by future witnesses becomes harder, Mr. Moody has indicated, where the factual information developed in the investigation has entered the public domain.

In addition, the record before us shows that the Hoffa files contain information regarding other pending and prospective criminal proceedings. The prospect of interference with such enforcement proceedings is not without significance.

Although the government has the burden of showing that production of the records could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings, the mere fact that the burden of justifying non-disclosure rests with the government does not illuminate the question of how heavy the burden is. See Robbins Tire, 437 U.S. at 224, 98 S.Ct. at 2318. Having regard to the important public interest that exemption (7)(A) was designed to protect, having regard to the fact that the language of the exemption has been broadened by Congress to protect records that "could" be expected to interfere, as opposed to records that "would" interfere, and having regard to the obvious risks that public disclosure of these active investigation files would entail, we agree with the district court that the burden with respect to interference has been met in this case.

[6] The Llewellyn declaration characterizes the documents in the Hoffa investigation files as follows:

"Documents setting forth leads to be conducted.
Documents containing information received from confidential informants.
Information and documents provided by local law enforcement.
Interviews of third parties and cooperating witnesses.
Public source information such as newspaper clippings and press releases.
Public and sealed court documents.
Laboratory reports setting forth results of examinations.
Polygraph worksheets and reports."

To the extent that public source information and public judicial materials are included in the files, the government has agreed to make the relevant documents available to plaintiff Dickerson. All that is in controversy here is the non-public portions of the files.

Plaintiff Dickerson candidly acknowledges, in a footnote toward the end of his principal brief, that it is open to the government to justify the assertion of a (7)(A) exemption on a "category-of-document" basis rather than 1434 by proceeding document by document. He points out, however, that there is no blanket exemption for investigatory files as such, and he argues that we should at least remand the case with instructions that the government be required to segregate and produce all nonexempt material. In support of this suggestion he quotes the last sentence of 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), which says that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection."

It is doubtless true that by deleting large portions of the information contained in the Hoffa files, the government could render whatever was left useless to any law-breaker. (And useless to plaintiff Dickerson and his newspaper, we might add.) But the words "reasonably segregable" must be given a reasonable interpretation, particularly where information or records compiled for law enforcement purposes are concerned. On the record before us we do not believe that the prospects for finding any "reasonably segregable" non-public portions of the Hoffa files that could properly be made public are such as to justify the remand that plaintiff Dickerson seeks.

The judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED.

BECKWITH, District Judge, concurring.

I.

I concur with Judge Nelson's results and his reasoning. I write separately, because I am convinced that more compelling grounds exist for exempting the Department of Justice's Hoffa file than that which was the basis of the district court's decision.

In the Llewellyn declaration, the Department of Justice cited at least three exemptions from the Freedom of Information Act in addition to exemption 7(A) of 5 U.S.C. § 522(b). The first such exemption is 7(C), the exemption for information, the disclosure of which "could reasonably be expected to be an unwanted invasion of personal privacy." The second is exemption 7(D) for information that "could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source." The third such exemption is 7(E), the exemption for information that "would disclose techniques and procedures for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions ... [when] such disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law."

Apparently, the trial court considered each of the cited exemptions. Nevertheless, that court rested its decision entirely on exemption 7(A), concluding that the Department of Justice was engaged in an ongoing investigation directed toward the potential institution of criminal proceedings. Judge Nelson has properly confined his analysis to a review of the trial court's decision based upon exemption 7(A). I agree that the contents of the Moody file sufficiently support the trial court's conclusion that the contents of the Hoffa file are exempt under 7(A). The question is a close one, however, as is illustrated by the dissent.

My review of the Moody file suggests that each of the four exemptions discussed above supports the nondisclosure of some or all of the documents in the Hoffa file. Had the district court based its decision on all four exemptions, the correctness of the decision would have been beyond question and our review would have been much simpler.

II.

My review of the Moody file further suggests that the various exemptions are so intertwined, overlapping, and inextricable that virtually nothing from the Hoffa file could be revealed without jeopardizing the integrity of the investigation, confidential source identity, various individuals' privacy, and law enforcement investigative techniques. For this reason, the trial court could not have ordered a Vaughn index without risking inadvertent release of exempt and sensitive information.

There being no constitutional outline for the manner in which a trial court must approach its analysis of a government claim of exemption from the Freedom of Information Act, it cannot be said that the trial court in this instance failed to independently, adequately, and objectively assess the validity of the government's claim. The trial court was 1435 under no obligation to follow Plaintiff's proffered procedure when another effective option was available. For that reason, I cannot agree with the dissent's criticism of the trial court's failure to order the production of an index.

BATCHELDER, Circuit Judge, dissenting.

I.

Over the past seventeen years, the Department of Justice has compiled a file of nearly four hundred volumes of documents on the disappearance of Jimmy Hoffa, a man, and a mystery, surely needing no introduction. Appellant Brian Dickerson, who happens to be editor of a major Detroit newspaper, has exercised the privilege Congress has given the public to request access to the documents in this file. While granting this privilege, Congress has also recognized that good government, in some circumstances, requires secrecy. Nonetheless, it has placed the burden of showing the need for secrecy on government agencies wishing to protect certain documents from public scrutiny. Since I believe the Government has fallen woefully short in carrying its burden, I dissent.

II.

The Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA" or "the Act"), 5 U.S.C. § 552, enables citizens regardless of status to gain access to government documents, thus " 'open[ing] agency action to the light of public scrutiny.' " Vaughn v. United States, 936 F.2d 862, 865 (6th Cir.1991) (quoting Department of Justice v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of Press, 489 U.S. 749, 772, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 1481, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989)); see also John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. 146, 151, 110 S.Ct. 471, 475, 107 L.Ed.2d 462 (1989) (" '[The Act] seeks to permit access to official information long shielded unnecessarily from public view and attempts to create a judicially enforceable public right to secure such information from possibly unwilling official hands.' " (quoting EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 80, 93 S.Ct. 827, 832, 35 L.Ed.2d 119 (1973)). The Act's purpose is " 'to ensure an informed citizenry, vital to the functioning of a democratic society, needed to check against corruption and to hold the governors accountable to the governed.' " John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475 (quoting NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 242, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2327, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978)). It requires " 'full agency disclosure unless information is exempted under clearly delineated statutory language.' " Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 865 (quoting Department of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 360-61, 96 S.Ct. 1592, 1599, 48 L.Ed.2d 11 (1976)). The exemptions are to be "narrowly construed." Id. " '[T]hese limited exemptions do not obscure the basic policy that disclosure, not secrecy, is the dominant objective of the Act.' " John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475 (quoting Rose, 425 U.S. at 361, 96 S.Ct. at 1599). To avoid releasing requested documents, the Government must prove that the documents sought fit a specific statutory exemption; the person making the request bears no burden of showing that such documents may not be withheld. Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 866 (citing Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 109 S.Ct. 2841, 106 L.Ed.2d 112 (1989)).

A. Existence of an ongoing law enforcement proceeding.

In reviewing a District Court's decision under the FOIA, the Court of Appeals must "determine first whether the District Court had an adequate factual basis for its decision, and second, decide whether upon that basis the court's decision was clearly erroneous." Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 866 (citing Ingle v. Department of Justice, 698 F.2d 259, 267 (6th Cir.1983)). I agree with the majority that the record shows that the FBI has continued to pursue the Hoffa disappearance investigation and that officials believe that eventual prosecution is not out of the question. William M. Baker, the Assistant Director of the FBI in charge of the Criminal Investigative Division, who apparently has the authority to decide whether to continue the investigation, made a sworn declaration to that effect, and that is good enough to establish the existence of "a concrete prospective law enforcement proceeding."

1436 B. Interference with an ongoing law enforcement proceeding.

While the existence of such an ongoing proceeding is necessary to a finding of exemption under § 522(b)(7)(A), Bevis v. Department of State, 801 F.2d 1386, 1389 (D.C.Cir.1986), [FN1] showing that such a proceeding indeed exists does not serve to exempt the entire file on the proceeding. Id. The Government also must prove that the documents, if released, could interfere with enforcement proceedings. Here, the Government essentially did nothing more than assure the reviewing court that all 400 volumes on Hoffa relate to their enforcement efforts, and recite (using language remarkably similar to statutory and case language) the harms that will result from any disclosure save for press clippings. It has not met its further burden of proof.

> FN1. To restate, § 522(b)(7)(A) exempts "investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes ... to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings." The earlier version of this provision exempted such records where production "would" interfere with enforcement. See North v. Walsh, 881 F.2d 1088, 1098 n. 14 (D.C.Cir.1989) ("This change 'relieves the agency of the burden of proving to a certainty' that disclosure will interfere with enforcement proceedings, 'but does not otherwise alter the test.' ") (quoting Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 816 F.2d 730 (D.C.Cir.), modified on reh'g, 831 F.2d 1124 (1987), rev'd on other grounds, 489 U.S. 749, 109 S.Ct. 1468, 103 L.Ed.2d 774 (1989)). The Congress has lessened the Government's burden, but the causal connection between specific documents and potential interference still must be established; the statute still does not permit "blanket assertions" such as the Government has made here.

government defensiveness. The fact that one side knows the entire truth and the other must guess at it (as, indeed, must the judge) requires adherence to procedures meant to inform the court as to the nature of government documents without revealing their actual contents, and to retain as much fairness in the adversary proceeding as possible given the imbalance of information. See Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d 972, 977 (9th Cir.1991), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 3013, 120 L.Ed.2d 886 (1992) (quoting Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820, 824 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977, 94 S.Ct. 1564, 39 L.Ed.2d 873 (1974) (" 'This lack of knowledge by the party seeking disclosure seriously distorts the traditional adversary nature of our legal system.' ").

The majority places great emphasis on the "public interest that exemption 7(A) was designed to protect" and the "obvious risks that public disclosure of these ... files would entail." I do not quarrel with the majority's observation that the release of documents containing, for example, the names of witnesses and informants might well lead to witness intimidation and destruction of evidence by those implicated in an ongoing investigation. Indeed, in enforcement exemption cases, "the interests of the adversary process may be outweighed by the agency's legitimate interest in secrecy." Campbell v. Department of Health & Human Services, 682 F.2d 256 (D.C.Cir.1982).

However, I believe the majority understates the Government's burden of showing that specific documents in its possession contain sensitive information. The majority admits that "the mere fact that the burden of justifying nondisclosure rests with the government does not illuminate the question of how heavy the burden is," and notes that Congress "broadened" exemption 7(A) from covering only records which "would" be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings to those records which "could" be expected to interfere. While I recognize that Congress loosened up the standard somewhat from the seemingly unprovable "would interfere" standard to the more reasonable "could interfere," I certainly do not believe that in amending the statute Congress changed the underlying premise of the Act, that " 'disclosure, not secrecy, is the dominant objective of the Act.' " John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. at 152, 110 S.Ct. at 475 (quoting Rose, 425 U.S. at 361, 96 S.Ct. at 1599). Permitting the Government to satisfy its burden by simply assuring the court that all of the requested papers in a giant, seventeen year old file relate in some way to an ongoing investigation, as I think happened here, potentially robs the Act of all effectiveness in attaining this objective.

1437 This Circuit has recognized that the focus of a FOIA case is the contents of the documents requested, not the purpose for which the Government possesses them. The Act grants disclosure exemptions for documents containing information which would most likely harm an ongoing investigation in a specific way if made public. Thus, > a court must have sufficiently detailed information regarding the contents of withheld documents along with reasoning for the application of specific FOIA exemptions to enable the court to make an independent assessment of both the contents of the documents in issue and the applicability of any asserted exemptions.

Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 869. The court may not grant " 'blanket exemptions' for Government records simply because they were found in investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes." Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. at 236, 98 S.Ct. at 2324. The Government "must demonstrate specifically how each document or category of documents, if disclosed, would interfere with the investigation." Campbell, 682 F.2d at 265 (emphasis added). The trial court has considerable discretion as to what procedures it uses to decide whether certain documents are exempt from disclosure, but whatever procedure the court chooses must suffice to produce enough evidence on which to rule, and to produce a record an appeals court can consult to review the decision. Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 869.

Reading the majority opinion may leave one with the distinct impression that we really have no idea what information lurks in the massive Hoffa file. That impression would be correct. The record presented us does not allow this court to make the requisite independent assessment of whether each document or category of documents would interfere with the Government's enforcement efforts. Obviously, the Government need not produce each and every document for the judge to decide whether its contents merit exemption from release. The Government's submissions may describe the documents by categorizing them according to their content and nature, Bevis v. Department of State, 801 F.2d 1386, 1389 (D.C.Cir.1986); the indexing and categorizing of documents, particularly where the requested documents are voluminous, is preferred to in chambers inspections, Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 866. While courts have smiled on the use of Vaughn indices in sorting out large volumes of documents, and in their discretion sometimes ordered such indices produced, so long as the Government provides sufficiently specific and detailed information to permit the court to make a reasoned determination, "no particular method ... is mandated." Id. at 867.

Just because the Act does not mandate a particular method does not mean that any method will do. The Llewellyn declaration, which the majority believes adequately provides a categorization of the documents in the file, falls short in two respects. First, categories such as "information and documents provided by local law enforcement" and "public and sealed court documents" are not "sufficiently distinct to allow a court to determine, as to each category, whether the specific claimed exemption(s) are properly applied." Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 868. The court must be able " 'to trace a rational link between the nature of the document and the alleged likely interference.' " Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389 (quoting Crooker v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, 789 F.2d 64, 67 (D.C.Cir.1986)).

Second, even though a few of Mr. Llewellyn's categories, such as "documents containing information from confidential informants," more appropriately describe materials that fit the exemption, I do not believe the Government's task ends there with respect to showing that the documents it seeks to keep secret fit in those clearly exempt categories. A category alone gives no clue as to the content of the documents it purportedly encompasses; therefore it does not provide "adequate detail and justification" to satisfy the claimed exemption. Id. at 869. While our decision in Vaughn is careful not to prescribe specific methods, I think our opinion in that case, which affirmed the exemptions claimed there, describes considerably more effort on the part of the affiant than we see here. The affiant in Vaughn did assign the documents to rather general categories, but she 1438 also indicated, by page number, which of the 1,000+ documents were included in each of the categories. For each of the categories, [the affiant] then discusses the legal grounds and exemptions upon which the government relies in withholding the specific documents contained within each category. Attached to her affidavit is an exhibit which summarizes, by document page number, the exemption(s) relied on for withholding each of the 1,000+ pages.

Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 868 (emphasis added). This passage, it seems to me, illustrates the rule that the Government must demonstrate that the contents of identifiable documents actually fit the exemption claimed. The record here does not allow us to see how this fit has been made. For example, while the Government has told us that the Hoffa file contains informant interviews, which comes as no surprise, it has not explained even in broad terms which specific documents those are, how many there are, or anything else to prove that the Government is not making a blanket representation, but has reviewed those documents and has good reason to believe that releasing any of them could harm the ongoing investigation. [FN2] See Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389 ("[T]he FBI must itself review each document to determine the category in which it properly belongs. Absent such individual scrutiny, the categories would be no more than smaller versions of the 'blanket exemptions' disapproved by Congress in its 1974 amendment of FOIA.").

> FN2. A word on the "Moody file." Our decision in Vaughn makes it clear that in camera review of documents is not favored, particularly where the Government chooses to proceed using categories of documents, rather than presenting all the documents it seeks to exempt to the reviewing court. See Vaughn, 936 F.2d at 868-69. The Government admits that the documents in this file were compiled to help Agent Moody prepare his affidavit, and does not suggest that the documents somehow represent others in the Hoffa file. Allowing us to peek at a few documents from the Hoffa file does nothing to prove that the rest of the file is exempt.

Our decision in Vaughn, following fairly straightforward Supreme Court precedent, requires that the Government make a choice in arguing for exemption from FOIA disclosure. It may present the court with a highly detailed Vaughn index, it may create more general exempt categories and then show how each document fits into them, or it may haul the entire file into chambers for hands-on review by the judge; the last of these, as I have explained, we have strongly discouraged. By holding in this case that the Government has met its burden of showing the entire Hoffa file to be exempt under § 522(b)(7)(A), the majority leaves FOIA law in this Circuit with the worst of all worlds. The Government has defined several general categories of documents, not all of them properly exempt, and then handed the court an admittedly nonrepresentative packet of secret documents to inspect in chambers. Neither effort sufficed to show how each and every document in the Hoffa file fits the proffered statutory exemption; the two methods taken together do not add up to a proper or sufficient showing. I am at a loss to reconcile the majority's opinion either with our Vaughn decision or with the Supreme Court's teachings on FOIA law.

C. Segregability of portions of the file.

I also disagree with the majority's conclusion that the Government has adequately shown that none of the Hoffa file, save for "public" documents such as newspaper clippings, is "reasonably segregable" under § 522(b). This provision requires the Government to release "any materials that do not properly fall within a legitimately withheld category." Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1390. Since I do not think the Government adequately showed what the Hoffa file contains, I certainly do not think it adequately demonstrated that none of this immense file falls outside of the statutory exemptions, as the statute itself requires. The Act does not ask the Government to judge the "prospects" of segregating non-exempt material, it commands the Government to segregate its files if at all possible. Both the statute and the caselaw indicate that Congress was largely unconcerned with the administrative burdens it was imposing on government agencies, but placed a higher value on openness. It is not our place to reorder Congress's priorities. Neither, might I add, is it our place to judge whether the material a citizen requests from the Government is "useless."

1439 III.

It is difficult to ignore the fact that the documents Mr. Dickerson has requested may contain the secrets to Jimmy Hoffa's disappearance. One may be predisposed in favor of government secrecy or against, or may approve or disapprove of investigative reporting by the media. However, in enacting FOIA, Congress has chosen to value government disclosure over government convenience and economy, and chosen not to favor or disfavor certain persons or their reasons for asking the Government to disclose documents. Here, a private citizen has made a specific request. Congress has placed a heavy burden on the government agency wishing to keep the requested documents secret, and that burden has not been met. While it may well be that the Hoffa file should remain a secret, I do not believe that the Government has yet proven why. I dissent.

§114.2 Prohibitions on contributions and expenditures.

(a) National banks, or corporations organized by authority of any law of Congress, are prohibited from making a contribution or expenditure, as defined in §114.1(a), in connection with election to any political office, including local, State and Federal offices, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any political office, including any local, State or Federal office.

(1) Such national banks and corporations may engage in the activities permitted by this part, except to the extent that such activity is foreclosed by provisions of law other than the Act.

(2) The provisions of this part apply to the activities of a national bank or corporation organized by any law of Congress in connection with both State and Federal elections.

(b) Any corporation whatever or any labor organization is prohibited from making a contribution or expenditure, as defined in §114.1(a) in connection with any Federal election.

(c) A candidate, political committee, or other person is prohibited from knowingly accepting or receiving any contribution prohibited by this section.

(d) No officer or director of any corporation or any national bank, and no officer of any labor organization shall consent to any contribution or expenditure by the corporation, national bank, or labor organization prohibited by this section.

§114.3 Disbursements for communications in connection with a Federal election to restricted class.

(a) General. (1) A corporation may make communications including partisan communications to its stockholders and executive or administrative personnel and their families on any subject. A labor organization may make communications including partisan communications to its members and executive or administrative personnel and their families on any subject. Corporations and labor organizations may also make the nonpartisan communications permitted under 11 CFR 114.4 to their restricted class or any part of that class. No corporation or labor organization may make contributions or expenditures for partisan communications to the general public in connection with a federal election and no national bank or corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress may make contributions or expenditures for partisan communications to the general public in connection with any election to any political office including any State or local office.

(2) An incorporated membership organization, incorporated trade association, incorporated cooperative or corporation without capital stock may communicate with its members and executive or administrative personnel, and their families, as permitted in 11 CFR 114.3 (a)(1) and (c), and shall re-

§ 441b. Contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations

(a) It is unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress, to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any political office, or for any corporation whatever, or any labor organization, to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election at which presidential and vice presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, Congress are to be voted for, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any of the foregoing offices, or for any candidate, political committee, or other person knowingly to accept or receive any contribution prohibited by this section, or any officer or any director of any corporation or any national bank or any officer of any labor organization to consent to any contribution or expenditure by the corporation, national bank, or labor organization, as the case may be, prohibited by this section.

(b) (1) For the purposes of this section the term "labor organization" means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.

(2) For purposes of this section and section 791 (h) of Title 15, the term "contribution or expenditure" shall include any direct or indirect payment, distribution, loan, advance, deposit, or gift of money, or any services, or anything of value (except a loan of money by a national or State bank made in accordance with the applicable banking laws and regulations and in the ordinary course of business) to any candidate, campaign committee, or political party or organization, in connection with any election to any of the offices referred to in this section, but shall not include (A) communications by a corporation to its stockholders and executive or administrative personnel and their families or by a labor organization to its members and their families on any subject; (B) nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns by a corporation aimed at its stockholders and executive or administrative personnel and their families, or by a labor organization aimed at its members and their families; and (C) the establishment, administration, and solicitation of contributions to a separate segregated fund to be utilized for political purposes by a corporation, labor organization, membership organization, cooperative, or corporation without capital stock.

(3) It shall be unlawful--

(A) for such a fund to make a contribution or expenditure by utilizing money or anything of value secured by physical force, job discrimination, financial reprisals, or the threat of force, job discrimination, or financial reprisal; or by dues, fees, or other moneys required as a condition of membership in a labor organization or as a condition of employment, or by moneys obtained in any commercial transaction;

(B) for any person soliciting an employee for a contribution to such a fund to fail to inform such employee of the political purposes of such fund at the time of such solicitation; and

(C) for any person soliciting an employee for a contribution to such a fund to fail to inform such employee, at the time of such solicitation, of his right to refuse to so contribute without any reprisal.

(4) (A) Except as provided in subparagraphs (B), (C), and (D), it shall be unlawful--

(i) for a corporation, or a separate segregated fund established by a corporation, to solicit contributions to such a fund from any person other than its stockholders and their families and its executive or administrative personnel and their families, and

(ii) for a labor organization, or a separate segregated fund established by a labor organization, to solicit contributions to such a fund from any person other than its members and their families.

(B) It shall not be unlawful under this section for a corporation, a labor organization, or a separate segregated fund established by such corporation or such labor organization, to make 2 written solicitations for contributions during the calendar year from any stockholder, executive or administrative personnel, or employee of a corporation or the families of such persons. A solicitation under this subparagraph may be made only by mail addressed to stockholders, executive or administrative personnel, or employees at their residence and shall be so designed that the corporation, labor organization, or separate segregated fund conducting such solicitation cannot determine who makes a contribution of $50 or less as a result of such solicitation and who does not make such a contribution.

(C) This paragraph shall not prevent a membership organization, cooperative, or corporation without capital stock, or a separate segregated fund established by a membership organization, cooperative, or corporation without capital stock, from soliciting contributions to such a fund from members of such organization, cooperative, or corporation without capital stock.

(D) This paragraph shall not prevent a trade association or a separate segregated fund established by a trade association from soliciting contributions from the stockholders and executive or administrative personnel of the member corporations of such trade association and the families of such stockholders or personnel to the extent that such solicitation of such stockholders and personnel, and their families, has been separately and specifically approved by the member corporation involved, and such member corporation does not approve any such solicitation by more than one such trade association in any calendar year.

(5) Notwithstanding any other law, any method of soliciting voluntary contributions or of facilitating the making of voluntary contributions to a separate segregated fund established by a corporation, permitted by law to corporations with regard to stockholders and executive or administrative personnel, shall also be permitted to labor organizations with regard to their members.

(6) Any corporation, including its subsidiaries, branches, divisions, and affiliates, that utilizes a method of soliciting voluntary contributions or facilitating the making of voluntary contributions, shall make available such method, on written request and at a cost sufficient only to reimburse the corporation for the expenses incurred thereby, to a labor organization representing any members working for such corporation, its subsidiaries, branches, divisions, and affiliates.

(7) For purposes of this section, the term "executive or administrative personnel" means individuals employed by a corporation who are paid on a salary, rather than hourly, basis and who have policymaking, managerial, professional, or supervisory responsibilities.

1. Constitutionality

Section of Federal Election Campaign Act prohibiting direct expenditure of corporate funds in connection with any election violated First Amendment as applied to nonprofit corporation which published newsletter urging readers to vote "pro-life" in upcoming primary election; corporation was formed for express purpose of promoting political ideas, had no shareholders or other persons with claim on its assets or earnings, and was not established by business corporation or labor union and did not accept contributions from such entities. Federal Election Com'n v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc., Mass. 1986, 107 S.Ct. 616, 479 U.S. 238, 93 L.Ed.2d 539.

This section limiting a noncapital stock corporation to soliciting "members" to contribute to a separate and segregated political campaign fund did not violate U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1 and restriction was justified by governmental purpose of insuring that substantial aggregations of wealth amassed by corporations were not converted to political "war chests" which could be used to incur political debts from legislators aided by those contributions and protecting individuals who paid money for purposes other than campaign support from having that money used to support candidates whom they might oppose, notwithstanding that this section restricts solicitation of corporations without great financial resources as well as the more fortunately situated. Federal Election Com'n v. National Right to Work Committee, Dist.Col.1982, 103 S.Ct. 552, 459 U.S. 197, 74 L.Ed.2d 364, on remand 716 F.2d 1401, 230 U.S.App.D.C. 283.

This section which authorized union political action committees to solicit members but which authorized corporate committees to solicit career employees in addition to shareholders did not violate equal protection in that this section bore substantial relation to important governmental interest in applying federal election laws evenhandedly to labor unions and corporations by recognizing that executive and administrative corporate employees share with stockholders stake in corporation's well-being and by taking into account structural differences of corporations and labor unions. International Ass'n of Machinists and Aerospace Workers v. Federal Election Commission, 1982, 678 F.2d 1092, 220 U.S.App.D.C. 45, affirmed 103 S.Ct. 335, 459 U.S. 983, 74 L.Ed.2d 379.

Person subject to Commission subpoena for investigation of allegations that national bank made loans, or permitted overdrafts, in connection with election and out of ordinary course of business would be allowed to attack constitutionality of provision of this section barring such contributions only insofar as this chapter prohibited such loans and overdrafts and would not be allowed to apply overbreadth doctrine to attack the rest of this chapter. Federal Election Commission v. Lance, C.A.Ga.1981, 635 F.2d 1132, appeal dismissed, certiorari denied 101 S.Ct. 3151, 453 U.S. 917, 69 L.Ed.2d 999.

Provision of subsec. (b) (4) (D) of this section permitting trade association or its segregated political fund to solicit contributions from stockholders and executives and administrative personnel of its member corporations and their families provided that the solicitation has been approved by member corporation and member corporation has not approved solicitation by any other trade association for the same calendar year did not deprive trade associations and political action committees of liberty without due process. Bread Political Action Committee v. Federal Election Commission, C.A.Ill.1980, 635 F.2d 621, reversed on other grounds 102 S.Ct. 1235, 455 U.S. 577, 71 L.Ed.2d 432, on remand 678 F.2d 46.

This section did not violate U.S.C.A. Const. Amends. 1, 5, or 9. Republican Nat. Committee v. Federal Election Commission, C.A.N.Y.1980, 616 F.2d 1, affirmed 100 S.Ct. 1639, 445 U.S. 955, 64 L.Ed.2d 231.

Provision of subsec. (b) (4) of this section restricting solicitation by nonstock corporations to members was not overbroad and did not infringe nonstock corporation's rights of free speech or association, inasmuch as government had a compelling interest in protecting integrity of federal elections justifying such limitation. Federal Election Commission v. National Right to Work Committee, D.C.D.C.1980, 501 F.Supp. 422, reversed 665 F.2d 371, 214 U.S.App.D.C. 215, reversed 103 S.Ct. 552.

2. Construction

Strict standards of definiteness had to be applied to former section 610 of Title 18 because the free dissemination of ideas might be inhibited thereunder. U.S. v. Chestnut, D.C.N.Y.1975, 394 F.Supp. 581.

If a strict construction was to be given to former section 610 of Title 18 making it unlawful for labor organization to make contribution or expenditure in connection with certain elections, it was not the degree of activity but the type of activity which would determine whether or not an expenditure had been made. U.S. v. Construction & General Laborers Local Union No. 264, D.C.Mo.1951, 101 F.Supp. 869.

3. Construction with other laws

Union member's claim for future injunctive relief under section 501 of Title 29 governing fiduciary responsibility of union officers was subject to the primary jurisdiction of the Federal Election Commission insofar as it was premised on former section 610 of Title 18, now this section. Gabauer v. Woodcock, C.A.Mo.1979, 594 F.2d 662, certiorari denied 100 S.Ct. 80, 444 U.S. 841, 62 L.Ed.2d 52.

Violation of former section 610 of Title 18 pertaining to political contributions by national banks was not a lesser included offense of a violation of section 656 of Title 18 pertaining to the willful misapplication of funds by a national bank officer. U.S. v. Barket, C.A.Mo.1975, 530 F.2d 181, certiorari denied 97 S.Ct. 308, 429 U.S. 917, 50 L.Ed.2d 282.

Former section 610 of Title 18, which prohibited corporate expenditures in campaigns for federal office and which stated that phrase "contribution or expenditure" should include any direct or indirect payment to any candidate, campaign committee, or political party or organization, supplemented rather than replaced the definition of section 591 of Title 18 of prohibited expenditures to require a partisan purpose. Ash v. Cort, C.A.Pa.1974, 496 F.2d 416, reversed on other grounds 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

Section 501 of Title 29 which prohibits unlawful conversion of union funds did not duplicate former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting contribution of labor union funds to the campaign of candidates for federal office with respect to campaign contributions as section 501 of Title 29 punishes union officers who "consent to" political contributions while former section 610 of Title 18 punished an officer who "abstracts or converts" union funds to use in federal political campaign. U.S. v. Boyle, 1973, 482 F.2d 755, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 166, certiorari denied 94 S.Ct. 593, 414 U.S. 1076, 38 L.Ed.2d 483.

4. Purpose

The evil at which Congress had struck in former section 610 of Title 18 was use of corporate or union funds to influence public at large (as distinguished, for instance, from union membership) to vote for particular candidate or particular party. U.S. v. International Union United Auto., Aircraft and Agr. Implement Workers of America (UAW-CIO), Mich.1957, 77 S.Ct. 529, 352 U.S. 567, 1 L.Ed.2d 563, rehearing denied 77 S.Ct. 808, 353 U.S. 943, 1 L.Ed.2d 763.

Intent of former section 610 of Title 18 was to permit expenditures from separate, segregated funds if the contributions to it were voluntary and to prohibit expenditures from a union's general treasury. U.S. v. Boyle, 1973, 482 F.2d 755, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 166, certiorari denied 94 S.Ct. 593, 414 U.S. 1076, 38 L.Ed.2d 483.

Under former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting any corporation or labor organization from making a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election for federal office, Congress intended to insure against officers proceeding in such matters without obtaining the consent of shareholders by forbidding all such expenditures. U.S. v. Lewis Food Co., C.A.Cal.1966, 366 F.2d 710.

Given the nature of free speech, the absolute prohibition of corporate contributions, as enunciated in former section 610 of Title 18, constitutes the least drastic means to achieve the congressional goal of protecting the integrity of the political process. Federal Election Commission v. Weinsten, D.C.N.Y.1978, 462 F.Supp. 243.

Interests reflected in former section 610 of Title 18 were to destroy the influence over elections which corporations exercised through financial contributions and to prevent corporate officers from using corporate funds for contributions to political parties without the consent of the stockholders. Miller v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., D.C.Pa.1975, 394 F.Supp. 58, affirmed 530 F.2d 964.

Purpose of former section 610 of Title 18, which proscribed any expenditure or contribution by a corporation or labor organization to a candidate, campaign committee, political party or organization in connection with any federal election, was to assure a popularly elected government for all the people in the United States and its main concern was to eliminate the effect of aggregated wealth on federal elections. Ash v. Cort, D.C.Pa.1972, 350 F.Supp. 227, affirmed 471 F.2d 811.

Purpose of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor unions from making political contributions was to prevent corruptive influences on elective process and to prevent use of general union funds to support ideas and candidates opposed by even slightest minority of union membership. U.S. v. Boyle, D.C.D.C.1972, 338 F.Supp. 1028.

Goals of regulating campaign financing in accordance with due process should be to promote an informed electorate, to insure that elected officials are responsive to needs of majority who elected them and, as far as possible, to prevent elected office from becoming exclusive prize of influential or rich. U.S. v. First Nat. Bank of Cincinnati, D.C.Ohio 1971, 329 F.Supp. 1251.

Purpose of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting corporations and labor unions from making political contributions was to prevent corporations and labor unions from controlling elections, and to protect union members from having union officials endorse candidates or attempt to influence voters which might be contrary to wishes of individual members. U.S. v. Anchorage Central Labor Council, D.C.Alaska 1961, 193 F.Supp. 504.

In enacting former section 610 of Title 18 making it unlawful for labor organization to make contribution or expenditure in connection with certain elections, Congress did not intend that an uncertain, insignificant amount should be considered as an expenditure and used as a basis for a criminal prosecution, and did not intend to deprive labor organization from making expenditures, if necessary, in connection with registration of voters. U.S. v. Construction & General Laborers Local Union No. 264, D.C.Mo.1951, 101 F.Supp. 869.

5. Retroactive effect

Even if provision of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting financing of establishment administration, and solicitation of contributions for voluntary political funds from general union monies was impliedly repealed by 1972 amendment, prosecution begun before amendment would not abate in view of section 109 of Title 1. Pipefitters Local Union No. 562 v. U.S., Mo.1972, 92 S.Ct. 2247, 407 U.S. 385, 33 L.Ed.2d 11.

Federal Election Commission's enforcement powers are not prospective only, but are retroactively applicable. Federal Election Commission v. Lance, C.A.Ga.1980, 617 F.2d 365, supplemented 635 F.2d 1132, appeal dismissed, certiorari denied 101 S.Ct. 3151, 453 U.S. 917, 69 L.Ed.2d 999.

The insertion in former section 610 of Title 18 of definition of the phrase "contribution or expenditure" to supplement definitions of "contribution" and "expenditure" did not make illegal conduct which had prior to 1972 amendments been legal. U.S. v. Chestnut, D.C.N.Y.1975, 394 F.Supp. 581.

6. State regulation or control

West's RCWA 41.04.230 which did not authorize state budget director to permit voluntary payroll deductions for employees for purpose of making direct contribution to political action committee of employees' labor associations was not in conflict with and therefore preempted by provisions of this chapter as this chapter affected federal elections only and as there was nothing in this chapter that required employer to establish payroll deduction plan for its own employees. Washington Ed. Ass'n v. Smith, 1981, 638 P.2d 77, 96 Wash.2d 601.

7. Power of Congress

Congress may legitimately regulate federal campaign financing. U.S. v. Boyle, 1973, 482 F.2d 755, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 166, certiorari denied 94 S.Ct. 593, 414 U.S. 1076, 38 L.Ed.2d 483.

Congress has constitutional power to prohibit contributions to be made by certain corporations in connection with any election at which, among others, representatives in Congress are to be voted for. U.S. v. Brewers' Ass'n, D.C.Pa.1916, 239 F. 163.

8. Duty of courts

Judiciary will not second guess a legislative determination as to need for prophylactic measures where corruption of election process is the evil feared and differing structures and purposes of different entities may require different forms of regulation of campaign financing in order to protect integrity of the electoral process. Federal Election Com'n v. National Right to Work Committee, Dist.Col.1982, 103 S.Ct. 552, 459 U.S. 197, 74 L.Ed.2d 364, on remand 716 F.2d 1401, 230 U.S.App.D.C. 283.

8A. Rules and regulations

Regulation of the Federal Election Commission (FEC) permitting corporations to prepare and distribute voter guides only if they are nonpartisan and do not engage in issue advocacy did not fall within statutory authority of section of the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) prohibiting corporations from using general treasury funds to make contributions or expenditures in connection with any federal election, as statute only prohibits an expenditure which constitutes "express advocacy." Faucher v. Federal Election Com'n, C.A.1 (Me.) 1991, 928 F.2d 468, certiorari denied 112 S.Ct. 79, 502 U.S. 820, 116 L.Ed.2d 52 .

Federal Election Commission (FEC) regulation prohibiting corporations from making any expenditures to publish voter guides went beyond FEC's power by focusing on issue advocacy; only express advocacy for election or defeat of identifiable candidate or candidates would be constitutionally within statutory prohibition against corporate expenditures to select candidates. Faucher v. Federal Election Com'n, D.Me.1990, 743 F.Supp. 64, affirmed 928 F.2d 468, certiorari denied 112 S.Ct. 79, 116 L.Ed.2d 52.

9. Separate and expenditure defined

Term "separate" in 1972 amendment of former section 610 of Title 18 relating to political contributions by corporations and unions was synonymous with "segregated"; term "threat" included creation of appearance of intent to inflict injury even without design to carry it out; and "dues, fees, or other monies required as a condition of membership in a labor organization or as a condition of employment" included contributions effectively assessed even if not actually required for employment or union membership. Pipefitters Local Union No. 562 v. U.S., Mo.1972, 92 S.Ct. 2247, 407 U.S. 385, 33 L.Ed.2d 11.

"Expenditure" within provision of former section 251 of this title prohibiting election contributions and expenditures was not a word of art, had no definitely defined meaning and applicability of word to prohibition of particular acts had to be determined from circumstances surrounding its employment. U.S. v. Congress of Industrial Organizations, 1948, 68 S.Ct. 1349, 335 U.S. 106, 92 L.Ed. 1849.

10. Contribution or expenditures within section

Nonprofit corporation's regular publication of newsletter did not entitle it to press exemption under Federal Election Campaign Act for its publication of "special edition" which urged readers to vote "pro-life" in upcoming primary election; "special edition" was not published through facilities of regular newsletter, was distributed to group 20 times size of newsletter's normal audience, and did not contain volume and issue number identifying it as one in continuing series of issues. Federal Election Com'n v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc., Mass. 1986, 107 S.Ct. 616, 479 U.S. 238, 93 L.Ed.2d 539.

1972 amendment to former section 610 of Title 18 relating to political contributions by corporations and unions permitted union officials to establish, administer, and solicit contributions for political fund, provided fund was separate and segregated and that contributions and expenditures not be financed through physical force, job discrimination, or financial reprisal or threat thereof, or through dues, fees, or other monies required as condition of membership in labor organization or as condition of employment. Pipefitters Local Union No. 562 v. U.S., Mo.1972, 92 S.Ct. 2247, 407 U.S. 385, 33 L.Ed.2d 11.

Corporation's multicandidate political action committee made expenditures for "political purposes" and complied with Federal Election Campaign Act when it contributed to candidates facing weak or absent opposition, contributed without regard to candidates' attitudes towards business, contributed to opposing candidates, contributed to election winners, and supported incumbents. Stern v. Federal Election Com'n, C.A.D.C.1990, 921 F.2d 296.

Determination of Federal Election Commission that senior citizens' picnic sponsored by congressman was nonpolitical event, so that corporate donations to event were not illegal, was not arbitrary or capricious in view of fact that no campaign contributions were solicited or accepted at event and that literature was not distributed. Orloski v. Federal Election Com'n, 1986, 795 F.2d 156, 254 U.S.App.D.C. 111.

Reverse checkoff procedure used in conjunction with payroll deduction plan to obtain contributions to political action committee established by State Education Association amply protected rights of dissenters and met jurisprudence test of voluntariness of contributions where membership in Association was not prerequisite to employment in public education system, Association member could check off to indicate that he or she did not agree to make contribution or could ask for refund of contribution and nothing in record indicated that dissenting Association members were subject to any recriminations within Association. Kentucky Educators Public Affairs Council v. Kentucky Registry of Election Finance, C.A.Ky.1982, 677 F.2d 1125.

Under this chapter, no part of monies of a union's segregated political fund should be comingled with regular dues money, even temporarily. American Federation of Labor and Congress of Indus. Organizations (AFL-CIO) v. Federal Election Commission, 1980, 628 F.2d 97, 202 U.S.App.D.C. 97, certiorari denied 101 S.Ct. 397, 449 U.S. 982, 66 L.Ed.2d 244.

The expenditure by a small labor organization of $111.14 to pay cost of political advertisement in daily newspaper of general circulation and of $32.50 to pay cost of political radio broadcast over commercial radio station advocating rejection of a candidate for Republican nomination for President and his defeat in Presidential election if nominated and rejection of six incumbent Congressmen as candidates for reelection and their defeat in Congressional election if nominated did not violate former section 610 of Title 18. U.S. v. Painters Local Union No. 481, C.A.Conn.1949, 172 F.2d 854.

Payment by corporation to associated political campaign fund was not reimbursement of solicitation expenses but rather was illegal contribution in violation of Federal Election Campaign Act where reimbursement was made more than 30 days after solicitation expenses were incurred, even though corporation claimed it had simply changed its mind and for fiscal reasons wanted to have campaign fund bear cost of solicitation as it originally had; motivation for making payment could not render payment lawful where it was untimely. Federal Election Com'n v. NRA Political Victory Fund, D.D.C.1991, 778 F.Supp. 62.

Membership solicitation letters mailed by women's rights group on issues of pay inequality, abortion, and equal rights did not represent express advocacy of election of particular candidates, and use of corporate funds in connection with those mailings thus did not violate Federal Election Campaign Act; letters could be regarded as discussions of public issues that by their nature invoked the names of certain politicians and did not provide explicit directives to vote against those politicians. Federal Election Com'n v. National Organization for Women, D.D.C.1989, 713 F.Supp. 428.

Essence of whether contribution to political fund is actually or effectively required for union membership in violation of this chapter is whether method of solicitation for fund is calculated to result in knowing free-choice donations; "knowing free-choice" donation means act intentionally taken and not the result of inaction when confronted with an obstacle. Federal Election Commission v. National Ed. Ass'n, D.C.D.C.1978, 457 F.Supp. 1102.

A corporation's payment to Senator's advertising firm of $12,000 for one month's services to Senator's campaign constituted a "contribution" to Senator's campaign notwithstanding contention that the term "contribution" as defined in former section 610 of Title 18 did not include the term "payment". U.S. v. Chestnut, D.C.N.Y.1975, 394 F.Supp. 581.

Labor unions' contributions or expenditures of money in connection with political campaigns must be from voluntarily financed segregated union funds. Evans v. American Federation of Television and Radio Artists, D.C.N.Y.1973, 354 F.Supp. 823, reversed on other grounds 496 F.2d 305, certiorari denied 95 S.Ct. 688, 419 U.S. 1093, 42 L.Ed.2d 687, rehearing denied 95 S.Ct. 1342.

Where corporation expended its general funds to pay for advertisement to communicate to public its views as to honest campaigns and elections, and its views as to a statement made by an unnamed candidate for election aimed at community of which it was a part, without advocating election of any particular person or party, payment for advertisement did not constitute an "expenditure" within former section 610 of Title 18 proscribing any expenditure or contribution by a corporation or labor organization to a candidate, campaign committee, political party or organization in connection with any federal election. Ash v. Cort, D.C.Pa.1972, 350 F.Supp. 227, affirmed, 471 F.2d 811.

Although former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor unions from making political contributions did not expressly preclude indirect contributions from general funds of union, legislative history of said section clearly indicated that Congress wished to prohibit any type of use of general union funds for designated purposes of said section, and this would include both a direct and/or an indirect contribution or expenditure. U.S. v. Boyle, D.C.D.C.1972, 338 F.Supp. 1028.

Expenditures do not violate prohibition on corporate campaign contribution if officers of corporation do not use corporation's funds to endorse candidates or attempt to influence voters which may be contrary to wishes of individual stockholder or if funds used are not general funds but funds voluntarily provided by stockholders or are general funds so used with consent of stockholders. U.S. v. Lewis Food Co., D.C.Cal.1964, 236 F.Supp. 849.

Labor union's payments to three employees, two of whom were regularly on payroll of union, one for a long period of time, and who devoted a considerable portion of their time to political activities, some of which activities, such as registration of voters and taking voters to polls, were for general benefit of those who were candidates and some of which were devoted exclusively to political interests of one candidate for Congress were not "expenditures" and "contributions" within former section 610 of Title 18 making it unlawful for labor organization to make "expenditure" or "contribution" in connection with certain elections. U.S. v. Construction & General Laborers Local Union No. 264, D.C.Mo.1951, 101 F.Supp. 869.

11. Membership organization

The 267,000 individuals solicited by nonprofit, noncapital stock corporation to contribute to corporation's segregated political campaign fund were not "members" within meaning of this section where, although membership cards were sent to those who either contributed or responded to questionaire, the solicitation letters made no reference to members, members played no part in operation or administration of the corporation, there was no indication that the asserted members exercised control over expenditure of their contributions and articles of incorporation and other publicly filed documents explicitly disclaimed existence of members. Federal Election Com'n v. National Right to Work Committee, Dist.Col.1982, 103 S.Ct. 552, 459 U.S. 197, 74 L.Ed.2d 364, on remand 716 F.2d 1401, 230 U.S.App.D.C. 283.

The term "members" in subsec. (b) (4) (C) of this section, creating exception to subsec. (b) (4) (A) of this section, declaring it unlawful for a corporation, or separate segregated fund established by corporation, to solicit contributions to such a fund from any person other than its shareholders and their families and its executives or other administrative personnel and their families, necessarily includes those individuals solicited by the National Right to Work Committee, a nonprofit corporation without capital stock that was formed to educate the public on and to advocate volunteer unionism. National Right to Work Committee, Inc. v. Federal Election Commission, 1981, 665 F.2d 371, 214 U.S.App.D.C. 215, reversed 103 S.Ct. 552, 459 U.S. 197, 74 L.Ed.2d 364, on remand 716 F.2d 1401, 230 U.S.App.D.C. 283.

State medical association was not embraced by phrase "membership organizations" in subsec. (b) (2) (c) of this section so as to fall within exemption for unlimited administrative support, the "membership organizations" language being only intended to rescue organizations that would otherwise fall within blanket prohibition of any election activity. California Medical Ass'n v. Federal Election Commission, C.A.Cal.1980, 641 F.2d 619, affirmed 101 S.Ct. 2712, 453 U.S. 182, 69 L.Ed.2d 567.

As used in membership exception to general prohibition of this section against corporate and union spending in connection with federal elections, allowing membership organizations, cooperatives, and corporations without capital stock to solicit their members, term "member" encompasses persons who have interests and rights in an organization similar to those of a shareholder in a corporation and a union member in a labor organization and the term at least denotes a formal relationship in which a person, whether specifically described as a member or not, has specified rights and obligations vis-a-vis an organization. Federal Election Commission v. National Right to Work Committee, D.C.D.C.1980, 501 F.Supp. 422, reversed 665 F.2d 371, 214 U.S.App.D.C. 215, reversed 103 S.Ct. 552, 459 U.S. 197, 74 L.Ed.2d 364, on remand 716 F.2d 1401, 230 U.S.App.D.C. 283.

12. Judicial elections

Former section 610 of Title 18 making it unlawful for any national bank to make a contribution in connection with any election to any political office was applicable to contributions to judicial elections. U.S. v. Clifford, D.C.N.Y.1976, 409 F.Supp. 1070.

13. State elections

If state law permits corporation to use corporate funds as contributions in state elections, shareholders are on notice that the funds may be so used and have no recourse under any federal provision. Cort v. Ash, Pa.1975, 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

Former section 610 of Title 18 making it unlawful for any national bank to make a contribution in connection with any election to any political office was applicable to state elections. U.S. v. Clifford, D.C.N.Y.1976, 409 F.Supp. 1070.

Assessment by local union of radio artists to oppose initiative measure appearing on ballot in state election did not violate former section 251 of this title, since such section could not interfere with state elections. De Mille v. American Federation of Radio Artists, Los Angeles Local, Cal.App.1946, 175 P.2d 851.

14. Intent

To prove a violation of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting political campaign contributions by national banks in making postelection contributions, there had to be proof of an intent to influence the election. U.S. v. Clifford, D.C.N.Y.1976, 409 F.Supp. 1070.

15. Offenses

Nonprofit corporation's publication and distribution of newsletter urging readers to vote "pro-life" in upcoming primary election was "express advocacy" subject to Federal Election Campaign Act's prohibition of direct expenditure of corporate funds in connection with any election; newsletter identified and provided photographs of specific "pro-life" candidates. Federal Election Com'n v. Massachusetts Citizens for Life, Inc., Mass. 1986, 107 S.Ct. 616, 479 U.S. 238, 93 L.Ed.2d 539.

Labor organization's use of union dues to sponsor commercial television broadcast designed to influence election to select certain candidates for Congress would be violative of former section 610 of Title 18. U.S. v. International Union United Auto, Aircraft and Agr. Implement Workers of America (UAW-CIO), Mich.1957, 77 S.Ct. 529, 352 U.S. 567, 1 L.Ed.2d 563, rehearing denied 77 S.Ct. 808, 353 U.S. 943, 1 L.Ed.2d 763.

Provision of former section 251 of this title making it unlawful for any corporation or labor organization to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with certain elections did not forbid publication, by corporations and unions, in regular course of conducting their affairs, of trade or union periodicals published regularly for members, stockholders or customers, expressing views on candidates or proposed measures in regular course of publication. U.S. v. Congress of Industrial Organizations, 1948, 68 S.Ct. 1349, 335 U.S. 106, 92 L.Ed. 1849.

Under section of the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) prohibiting corporations from using general treasury funds to make contributions or expenditures in connection with any federal election, the Federal Election Commission (FEC) does not have the authority to restrict issue advocacy; rather, the FEC may only restrict express advocacy. Faucher v. Federal Election Com'n, C.A.1 (Me.) 1991, 928 F.2d 468, certiorari denied 112 S.Ct. 79, 116 L.Ed.2d 52.

Though certain solicitations by nonprofit, noncapital stock corporation of persons for contributions to separate segregated political fund that it sponsored violated restrictions of this chapter on contributions or expenditures by corporations in connection with federal elections, those violations were not made in "defiance" or "knowing, conscious, and deliberate flaunting" of this chapter so as to warrant penalty assessment and requirement of refund by the corporation of funds solicited. National Right to Work Committee, Inc. v. Federal Election Com'n, 1983, 716 F.2d 1401, 230 U.S.App.D.C. 283.

Mere failure of corporation to collect debt owed by a national committee of political party for communication services provided by corporation at party convention would not violate prohibition of former section 610 of Title 18 against corporate campaign spending. Miller v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., C.A.Pa.1974, 507 F.2d 759, on remand 394 F.Supp. 58.

Fact that no candidate or party was named in corporation's ad and pamphlet did not place them outside scope of prohibition of former section 610 of Title 18 against corporate expenditures in campaigns for federal office. Ash v. Cort, C.A.Pa.1974, 496 F.2d 416, reversed on other grounds 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

Essential elements constituting violation of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor organizations from making contributions and expenditures to candidates for federal offices were (1) contribution or expenditure, (2) by a labor organization, (3) for purpose of active electioneering (4) in connection with an election for named federal offices. U.S. v. Pipefitters Local Union No. 562, C.A.Mo.1970, 434 F.2d 1116, adhered to 434 F.2d 1127, reversed in part, vacated in part on other grounds 92 S.Ct. 2247, 407 U.S. 385, 33 L.Ed.2d 11.

Where all members of labor organization having same pay scale paid same dues and political fund was established by members authorizing allocations from their dues to the fund, expenditures out of fund for political purposes would violate former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting utilization, for political purposes, of moneys secured by dues required as condition of membership in union. Barber v. Gibbons, D.C.Mo.1973, 367 F.Supp. 1102.

Corporation's advertisements employing rating system to show percentage of each incumbent officer's "votes cast in favor of constitutional principles" did not violate prohibition of former section 610 of Title 18 on corporate campaign contributions. U.S. v. Lewis Food Co., D.C.Cal.1964, 236 F.Supp. 849.

16. Persons liable

Indictment and conviction of labor union was not a condition precedent to indictment and conviction of its officers under former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor unions from making political contributions, and indictment against individual defendants charging conspiratorial and substantive violations of said section was not defective by reason of fact that labor union had not previously been indicted and convicted. U.S. v. Boyle, D.C.D.C.1972, 338 F.Supp. 1028.

17. Persons protected

Former section 610 of Title 18 was primarily concerned with corporations as a source of aggregated wealth and therefore of possible corrupting influence, and protection of ordinary stockholders was at best a secondary concern. Cort v. Ash, Pa.1975, 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

Shareholders are within class for whose protection prohibition of former section 610 of Title 18 against corporate political contributions was enacted. Miller v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., C.A.Pa.1974, 507 F.2d 759, on remand 394 F.Supp. 58.

18. Certification of constitutional questions

While there exists a serious question concerning the constitutionality under U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. 1 of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, former section 241 et seq. of this title, the instant panel did not have jurisdiction to resolve that issue but was obliged, under section 437h(a) of this title, to "* * * certify all questions of constitutionality of this Act [this chapter] to the United States court of appeals for the circuit involved, which shall hear the matter sitting en banc". Federal Election Commission v. Lance, C.A.Ga.1980, 617 F.2d 365, supplemented 635 F.2d 1132, appeal dismissed, certiorari denied 101 S.Ct. 3151, 453 U.S. 917, 69 L.Ed.2d 999.

19. Private right of action

Private cause of action by stockholder to secure derivative damage relief was not available under former section 610 of Title 18, but rather was available, if at all, under state law governing corporations. Cort v. Ash, Pa.1975, 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

Stockholders did not have private right of action against corporate directors to recover direct damages for alleged violations by the directors of former section 610 of Title 18. Miller v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., D.C.Pa.1975, 394 F.Supp. 58, affirmed 530 F.2d 964.

Former section 610 of Title 18 relating to political contributions by labor union did not authorize private right of action. McNamara v. Johnston, D.C.Ill.1973, 360 F.Supp. 517, certiorari denied 96 S.Ct. 1506, 425 U.S. 911, 47 L.Ed.2d 761, affirmed 522 F.2d 1157.

Penal sanctions provided for in former section 610 of Title 18, which proscribed any expenditure or contribution by a corporation or labor organization to a candidate, campaign committee, political party or organization in connection with any federal election, were exclusive, and no private cause of action was implied.

Ash v. Cort, D.C.Pa.1972, 350 F.Supp. 227, affirmed 471 F.2d 811.

20. Persons entitled to maintain action

Individual union members, who alleged that they suffered relative diminution in their political voices as direct result of discriminatory imbalance alleged to have resulted from enactment of this section which would likely be redressed by declaring this section unconstitutional, and individual stockholders, who alleged that use of corporate assets to establish and support corporate political action committees impinged upon their constitutional freedoms and would be eliminated by declaring this section unconstitutional, had standing to raise their U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 1 and 5 challenges to this section. International Ass'n of Machinists and Aerospace Workers v. Federal Election Commission, 1982, 678 F.2d 1092, 220 U.S.App.D.C. 45, affirmed 103 S.Ct. 335, 459 U.S. 983, 74 L.Ed.2d 379.

Plaintiff, who alleged, economic injury as a stockholder whose interest in corporation was worth less than it would be had defendant directors not caused challenged expenditures to be made, and further injury as a citizen and voter whose ability to secure a responsive federal government had been lessened, had standing to maintain action for an injunction and damages based on alleged violation of prohibition of former section 610 of Title 18 against corporate expenditures in campaigns for federal office. Ash v. Cort, C.A.Pa.1974, 496 F.2d 416, reversed on other grounds 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

Nonprofit membership corporation that accepted contributions from business corporations did not have standing to challenge Federal Election Campaign Act section that prohibited express advocacy by corporation for election or defeat of identifiable candidates; without explicit policy against contributions from corporations, risk would remain that nonprofit corporation would serve as conduit for direct spending by corporations. Faucher v. Federal Election Com'n, D.Me.1990, 743 F.Supp. 64, affirmed 928 F.2d 468, certiorari denied 112 S.Ct. 79, 502 U.S. 820, 116 L.Ed.2d 52.

21. Justiciability

Actions for declaratory and injunctive relief alleging that this chapter violated rights guaranteed by U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 1 and 5 by restricting solicitation of contributions to, and by, certain corporate and trade association political action committees or separate segregated funds, were nonjusticiable as a constitutional matter and inappropriate for adjudication as a prudential matter and, hence, were properly dismissed where, there was no enforcement threat or even certainty that parties would ever be at odds about interpretation of restriction where prohibition against solicitation activities, advisory opinions could be obtained from the Federal Election Commission and where there was no urgency of decision that outweighed the inadvisability of premature constitutional adjudication. Martin Tractor Co. v. Federal Election Commission, 1980, 627 F.2d 375, 200 U.S.App.D.C. 322, certiorari denied 101 S.Ct. 360, 449 U.S. 954, 66 L.Ed.2d 218.

Even if stockholders, who brought action against directors of corporation based on violations of prohibition of former section 610 of Title 18 against corporate expenditures in campaigns for federal office, had no live claim for injunctive relief after election, the dispute over damages rendered controversy justiciable. Ash v. Cort, C.A.Pa.1974, 496 F.2d 416, reversed on other grounds 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

22. Ripeness doctrine

Challenge to constitutionality of provision of this section on ground that it violated ex post facto clause was not ripe for review where it was not clear that no violations of this chapter in fact occurred after its enactment and it was not clear that criminal penalties would be sought against complainant. Federal Election Commission v. Lance, C.A.Ga.1981, 635 F.2d 1132, appeal dismissed, certiorari denied 101 S.Ct. 3151, 453 U.S. 917, 67 L.Ed.2d 999.

Action seeking declaratory judgment that committee on political education could make in-kind contributions to federal candidates using goods and services purchased at fair market value from organization with payments made in advance or within commercially reasonable period of time was not ripe for adjudication where Federal Election Commission had not been given opportunity to reconsider its decision that contributions amounted to illegal corporate contributions. Sierra Club v. Federal Election Com'n, D.C.D.C.1984, 593 F.Supp. 166.

23. Exhaustion of remedies

Citizen of stockholder objecting to alleged violations in future elections of former section 610 of Title 18 had to pursue statutory remedy of a complaint to the Federal Election Commission, under section 437d of this title, and invoke its authority to request the Attorney General to seek injunctive relief. Cort v. Ash, Pa.1975, 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

Action seeking declaratory judgment that committee on political education could make in-kind contributions to federal candidates using goods and services purchased at fair market value from organization with payments made in advance or within commercially reasonable period of time was barred by plaintiffs' failure to exhaust administrative remedies where plaintiffs did not seek reconsideration of Federal Elections Commission advisory opinion finding that methods proposed by plaintiffs would constitute illegal corporate contribution or demonstrate that reconsideration would be futile. Sierra Club v. Federal Election Com'n, D.C.D.C.1984, 593 F.Supp. 166.

24. Jurisdiction

Statutory remedy before Federal Election Commission was intended to govern all allegations of improper contributions in federal elections and the federal courts did not have jurisdiction of action by local union members to enjoin union officers from making contributions in alleged violation of former section 610 of Title 18. McNamara v. Johnston, C.A.Ill.1975, 522 F.2d 1157, certiorari denied 96 S.Ct. 1506, 425 U.S. 911, 47 L.Ed.2d 761.

United States district court had no jurisdiction to review executive decision to bring indictment against individual defendant charging violation of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor unions from making political contributions, but district court would decline jurisdiction even if it was present, where exercising jurisdiction would not only frustrate will of Congress in enacting said section but would also open up a Pandora's box in connection with administration of justice and proper enforcement of criminal laws. U.S. v. Boyle, D.C.D.C.1971, 338 F.Supp. 1025, motion denied 331 F.Supp. 1181.

25. Venue

In prosecution for knowingly causing another to accept or receive an illegal corporate campaign contribution, venue was proper in Southern District of New York, where recipient of check for illegal contribution deposited check in bank in that District, notwithstanding contention that venue was improper in that District because all defendant's conduct in causing acceptance or receipt of contribution was performed by him in Minnesota. U.S. v. Chestnut, D.C.N.Y.1975, 399 F.Supp. 1292, affirmed 533 F.2d 40, certiorari denied 97 S.Ct. 88, 429 U.S. 829, 50 L.Ed.2d 93.

26. Grand jury proceedings

Indictment charging substantive and conspiratorial violations of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor union from making political contributions was not subject to dismissal on ground of presence of an unauthorized person in grand jury room, where neither in memorandum of points and authorities in support of motion to dismiss nor at hearing on motion was any evidence produced substantiating claim. U.S. v. Boyle, D.C.D.C.1972, 338 F.Supp. 1028.

27. Indictment

Indictment alleging contribution or expenditure from general treasury of union or corporation in connection with federal election states offense. Pipefitters Local Union No. 562 v. U.S., Mo.1972, 92 S.Ct. 2247, 407 U.S. 385, 33 L.Ed.2d 11.

Indictment charging publication by labor union with union funds of weekly periodical which, in issue of certain date contained statement by union president urging that union members vote for certain candidate for Congress, and charging distribution of the particular issue in regular course to those accustomed to receive copies of the periodical, did not allege a violation of former section 251 of this title. U.S. v. Congress of Industrial Organizations, 1948, 68 S.Ct. 1349, 335 U.S. 106, 92 L.Ed. 1849.

Failure of indictment charging violation of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor organizations from making contributions and expenditures to candidates for federal offices to allege that payments to political and education fund established by labor union were involuntary was not fatal, since voluntariness would not be controlling on proof of gist of indictment that money in fund was in truth and in fact money belonging to labor union; however, issue of voluntariness, along with intention of donors as to ownership and control of fund, was relevant and material on issue of whether fund was property of union. U.S. v. Pipefitters Local Union No. 562, C.A.Mo.1970, 434 F.2d 1116, adhered to 434 F.2d 1127, reversed in part, vacated in part on other grounds 92 S.Ct. 2247, 407 U.S. 385, 33 L.Ed.2d 11.

Allegation in indictment that corporation made an "expenditure" in connection with election necessarily inferred an allegation that general corporate funds were used, and, entry of plea of not guilty, gave rise to question of fact as to source of corporate funds. U.S. v. Lewis Food Co., C.A.Cal.1966, 366 F.2d 710.

An indictment against corporations for conspiracy to make unlawful campaign contributions, need not allege that offense with the particularity of an indictment directly charging it as an offense. U.S. v. U.S. Brewers' Ass'n, D.C.Pa.1916, 239 F. 163.

Indictment which alleged that United States Senator's campaign manager, arranged payment by corporation of $12,000 to Senator's advertising firm in payment of one month's services to Senator's campaign was sufficient to state an offense against campaign manager for causing advertising firm to do that which, if done directly by him, would have constituted acceptance of illegal corporate campaign contribution. U.S. v. Chestnut, D.C.N.Y.1975, 394 F.Supp. 581.

Indictment charging conspiracy to violate former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor unions from making political contributions was not subject to dismissal on ground that it charged three distinct conspiracies, therefore making it duplicitous, where indictment charged a continuing conspiracy. U.S. v. Boyle, D.C.D.C.1972, 338 F.Supp. 1028.

Indictment charging that defendant corporation had made unlawful expenditures in connection with primary election was insufficient for failure to disclose whether expenditures violated wishes of a stockholder. U.S. v. Lewis Food Co., D.C.Cal.1964, 236 F.Supp. 849.

28. Bill of particulars

Defendant, charged with violation of former section 610 of Title 18 relating to expenditures by national bank in connection with an election, and with misapplication of funds by bank officer or employee, was entitled to a bill of particulars fully and fairly advising him of the details of the government's charges, in order that he might properly prepare whatever defense he might have under the circumstances, in order to avoid prejudicial surprise at trial. U.S. v. Barket, D.C.Mo.1974, 380 F.Supp. 1018.

29. Intervention

Even if union were able to allege a sufficient interest to warrant its intervention of right in corporation's action against the Federal Election Commission challenging corporate campaign contribution provision of this section, its claim for intervention of right would also fail because its interest was adequately represented by the Commission. Athens Lumber Co., Inc. v. Federal Election Com'n, C.A.Ga.1982, 690 F.2d 1364.

30. Double jeopardy

Following acquittal of corporate defendant on charge of making political contributions in violation of former section 610 of Title 18 [now covered by this section], appeal by the Government was precluded as violative of double jeopardy clause of U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. 5. U.S. v. Security Nat. Bank, C.A.N.Y.1976, 546 F.2d 492, certiorari denied 97 S.Ct. 1591, 430 U.S. 950, 51 L.Ed.2d 799.

President of international union was not placed twice in jeopardy by reason of conviction of having consented to unlawful contribution of labor union funds to the campaigns of candidates for federal office, unlawful conversion of union funds for purpose of making such contribution, and conspiracy to commit such offenses. U.S. v. Boyle, 1973, 482 F.2d 755, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 166, certiorari denied 94 S.Ct. 593, 414 U.S. 1076, 38 L.Ed.2d 483.

Fact that substantive counts were in part based on allegations underlying conspiracy charge in prosecution charging violation of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor unions from making political contributions did not constitute a violation of defendants' right under U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5 against being placed in double jeopardy. U.S. v. Boyle, D.C.D.C.1972, 338 F.Supp. 1028.

31. Limitations

Where indictment charging conspiratorial and substantive violations of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor unions from making political contributions indicated that last overt act occurred on or about June 10, 1969, indictment was founded well within the five-year period of limitation and was not barred. U.S. v. Boyle, D.C.D.C.1972, 338 F.Supp. 1028.

32. Speedy trial

Fact that five-year statute of limitations applicable to defendant's alleged illegal bank loan to political organizations was not due to expire until 13 months after indictment was filed did not foreclose defendant from asserting prejudice from preindictment delay. U.S. v. Barket, C.A.Mo.1976, 530 F.2d 189.

Where indictment which charged conspiratorial and substantive violations of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor unions from making political contributions and which was returned on Mar. 2, 1971 was superseded by a subsequent indictment which was returned on Oct. 4, 1971, and where only delay in case was caused by necessity of getting a transcript prepared from motions, hearings for which were held in September of 1971, in order to argue supplemental motions filed with respect to new indictment, case was proceeding in an orderly manner and defendants were not denied their constitutional rights to a speedy trial and due process. U.S. v. Boyle, D.C.D.C.1972, 338 F.Supp. 1028.

33. Motion to dismiss

In prosecution of corporation for making illegal campaign contributions and of corporate officer for consenting to same, factual issues concerning various alleged payments and possible illegal transfers between corporation and officer were part of general issue to be resolved only at trial, not on motions, such as motions to dismiss supported by affidavit that checks from corporation cleared bank more than five years prior to filing of information, five years being the limitation period. U.S. v. Andreas, D.C.Minn.1974, 374 F.Supp. 402.

34. Discovery and inspection

Government responses in prosecution of union and union officials for alleged violations of former section 610 of Title 18 to pretrial disclosure orders failed to comply with orders, in that composition of special political action fund was not disclosed, circumstances of contributions to fund were not disclosed, and alleged overt acts were not disclosed, warranting dismissal of indictment. U.S. v. Seafarers Intern. Union of North America, D.C.N.Y.1972, 343 F.Supp. 779.

Subpoena duces tecum issued against government prosecutors for production of such evidence in their possession as was being used in prosecutions of defendants for violation of former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor unions from making political contributions would be quashed, notwithstanding proffer of defendant establishing possibility that those who accepted or received alleged contributions were not being prosecuted, since proof of a violation by one who receives a contribution is of a wholly different character from that required to establish a violation by a donor, and defendants did not make a clear showing of relevance and materiality as required. U.S. v. Boyle, D.C.D.C.1971, 338 F.Supp. 1025, motion denied 331 F.Supp. 1181.

35. Summary judgment

In action by stockholder against directors of corporation based on alleged violation of prohibition of former section 610 of Title 18 against corporate expenditures in campaigns for federal office, material factual issue existed as to whether corporation's ad and pamphlet were nonpartisan, thus precluding summary judgment. Ash v. Cort, C.A.Pa.1974, 496 F.2d 416, reversed on other grounds 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

36. Presumptions

If "voluntary" and "involuntary" union funds are commingled and then a portion is expended for political purposes, it will be presumed that expenditures from commingled funds consisted of proportionate shares of the different types of money and it is irrelevant that the government show the source of all funds contributed to political campaigns if a substantial, or huge, portion of money in the funds was "involuntary" at the time of the contribution. U.S. v. Boyle, 1973, 482 F.2d 755, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 166, certiorari denied 94 S.Ct. 593, 414 U.S. 1076, 38 L.Ed.2d 483.

37. Burden of proof

Stockholders who brought derivative action against communications corporation and certain of its directors for failure to collect debt owed by national committee of political party for communication services provided at party's convention, and who alleged that failure to collect the debt was in violation of prohibition of former section 610 of Title 18 against corporate campaign spending, had burden of establishing nexus between alleged gift and a federal election. Miller v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., C.A.Pa.1974, 507 F.2d 759, on remand 394 F.Supp. 58.

In order to obtain conviction under former section 610 of Title 18, the government had to prove beyond reasonable doubt that a labor organization made a contribution or expenditure in connection with the specified federal election for purpose of active electioneering and that the defendant union officer consented to the making of the contribution. U.S. v. Boyle, 1973, 482 F.2d 755, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 166, certiorari denied 94 S.Ct. 593, 414 U.S. 1076, 38 L.Ed.2d 483.

38. Admissibility of evidence

In prosecution for knowingly causing another to accept or receive illegal corporate campaign contribution, proof of similar acts on defendant's part in accepting three other contributions was admissible as tending to show pattern of conduct on issues of knowledge and intent at time of events charged in indictment. U.S. v. Chestnut, D.C.N.Y.1975, 399 F.Supp. 1292, affirmed 533 F.2d 40, certiorari denied 97 S.Ct. 88, 429 U.S. 829, 50 L.Ed.2d 93.

39. Weight and sufficiency of evidence

Evidence in prosecution for having consented to unlawful contribution of labor union funds to campaigns of candidates for federal office was sufficient to establish that president of international union knew and approved of practice of having checks on union account made out to cash, deposited in personal accounts of members and contributions then made with personal checks and that president knew and approved of efforts to conceal source of the funds. U.S. v. Boyle, 1973, 482 F.2d 755, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 166, certiorari denied 94 S.Ct. 593, 414 U.S. 1076, 38 L.Ed.2d 483.

Evidence was sufficient to sustain conviction of causing another to accept or receive illegal corporate campaign contribution. U.S. v. Chestnut, D.C.N.Y.1975, 399 F.Supp. 1292, affirmed 533 F.2d 40, certiorari denied 97 S.Ct. 88, 429 U.S. 829, 50 L.Ed.2d 93.

In prosecution against union and its president and its secretary for contribution or expenditure of union funds in behalf of candidate for election to Congress, evidence was insufficient to show that expenditure was made by union on behalf of candidate in respect to purchase of gasoline and repair of automobiles. U.S. v. Construction & General Laborers Local Union No. 264, D.C.Mo.1951, 101 F.Supp. 869.

40. Questions for jury

Indictment alleging violation of prohibition of former section 610 of Title 18 against corporate campaign contributions by corporation's advertisements employing rating system to show percentage of each incumbent officer's "votes cast in favor of constitutional principles" was not dismissible as matter of law on ground that expenditures in question were not for an activity which constituted active electioneering, and indictment and advertisements presented jury question as to whether advertisements went beyond permissible bounds in that they were designed to influence public at large to vote for or against particular candidates. U.S. v. Lewis Food Co., C.A.Cal.1966, 366 F.2d 710.

41. Moot questions

Where basis of election controversy remains after the election and where the dispute is likely to reoccur, the case will not be found moot, even where prospective relief alone is sought. Ash v. Cort, C.A.Pa.1974, 496 F.2d 416, reversed on other grounds 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

42. Instructions

Jury should have been instructed in prosecution of union and its officers for conspiring to violate former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting union from making contribution or expenditure in connection with federal election with respect to issue of voluntariness of payments to fund, and giving instructions permitting jury to convict without finding that donations to fund had been actual or effective dues or assessments was plain error. Pipefitters Local Union No. 562 v. U.S., Mo.1972, 92 S.Ct. 2247, 407 U.S. 385, 33 L.Ed.2d 11.

43. Damages

There was no indication in legislative history of former section 610 of Title 18 which suggested a congressional intent to vest in corporate shareholders a federal right to damages for violation of said section. Cort v. Ash, Pa.1975, 95 S.Ct. 2080, 422 U.S. 66, 45 L.Ed.2d 26.

44. Injunction

Finding in stockholder's suit, brought on behalf of himself and of corporation, that plaintiff would not be irreparably harmed by denial of his request for preliminary injunction to enjoin corporation from furnishing funds for the publication and dissemination of a speech made by the corporation's president was not clearly erroneous despite contention that such publication and dissemination violated former section 610 of Title 18. Ash v. Cort, C.A.Pa.1973, 471 F.2d 811.

Injunction prohibiting corporation from repeating violation of Federal Election Campaign Act was appropriate where corporation maintained in open court that they had not violated federal election laws and refused to promise that they would not repeat transaction. Federal Election Com'n v. NRA Political Victory Fund, D.D.C.1991, 778 F.Supp. 62.

In action brought by the Federal Election Commission charging a corporation and its chief executive officer with violations of former section 610 of Title 18, plaintiff's demand for injunctive relief was not subject to dismissal. Federal Election Commission v. Weinsten, D.C.N.Y.1978, 462 F.Supp. 243.

Where suit against corporation for direct damages for violation of former section 610 of Title 18 was dismissed because no private right of action existed for direct damages and because plaintiff stockholders failed to satisfy jurisdictional amount requirement, additional claim for injunctive relief could not be maintained under the doctrine of pendent jurisdiction. Miller v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., D.C.Pa.1975, 394 F.Supp. 58, affirmed 530 F.2d 964.

45. Disbarment or suspension from practice

Engaging in covert, deceitful activities on behalf of reelection of President of United States, designed to sow confusion among candidates of opposing party, and convictions of conspiracy and distributing political campaign material not containing name of distributing person or organization warrants suspension for two years, probation for three subsequent years and passing professional responsibility examination. Segretti v. State Bar, Cal.1976, 544 P.2d 929, 126 Cal.Rptr. 793.

46. Scope of review

Evidence was required to be viewed in light most favorable to the government on appeal from conviction of labor union and officers for conspiring to violate former section 610 of Title 18 prohibiting labor organizations from making contributions and expenditures to candidates for federal office. U.S. v. Pipefitters Local Union No. 562, C.A.Mo.1970, 434 F.2d 1116, adhered to 434 F.2d 1127, reversed in part, vacated in part on other grounds 92 S.Ct. 2247, 407 U.S. 385, 33 L.Ed.2d 11.

47. Issues reviewable

Appellant would be allowed to challenge constitutionality of provision of this section despite his failure to do so in district court proceedings for enforcement of Commission subpoena. Federal Election Commission v. Lance, C.A.Ga.1981, 635 F.2d 1132, appeal dismissed, certiorari denied 101 S.Ct. 3151, 453 U.S. 917, 69 L.Ed.2d 999.

On appeal from dismissal of stockholders' derivative action against corporation and certain of its directors for failure to collect debt owed corporation by national committee of political party for communication services furnished by the corporation, direct federal cause of action would not be implied in favor of stockholders against directors for alleged violation of prohibition of former section 610 of Title 18 against corporate campaign spending and section 202(a) of Title 47 where federal law count was not included in complaint and there was no indication that question had ever been presented to district court. Miller v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., C.A.Pa.1974, 507 F.2d 759, on remand 394 F.Supp. 58.

END OF DOCUMENT

The UNITED STATES
v.
Patrick J. CLIFFORD et al.

No. 75--CR--654.

United States District Court,
E.D. New York.

March 3, 1976.

In prosecution arising out of an alleged conspiracy to cause a national bank to make illegal campaign contributions, defendants moved for dismissal of various counts of the indictment. The District Court, Costantino, J., held that statute making it unlawful for any national bank to make a contribution in connection with any election to any political office does not infringe First Amendment rights as applied to national banks; that statute applies to state judicial elections and applies to postelection contributions when made for the purpose of influencing the election; and that statute prohibiting any false statements in any matter within the jurisdiction of any federal department or agency applies to oral unsworn statements even when the defendant has not initiated the investigation.

Motions denied.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

COSTANTINO, District Judge.

The 22 count indictment in this case arises out of an alleged conspiracy to cause the Security National Bank to make illegal campaign contributions from 1966--1974. 18 U.S.C. §§ 610, 659, 1001.

Defendants have made various procedural motions. Since this court finds those motions to be without merit, they are denied.

Defendants have also moved for dismissal of various counts of the indictment on numerous grounds. Among the issues raised are (1) the constitutionality of § 610, (2) the applicability of § 610 to state elections, (3) the applicability of § 610 to judicial elections, (4) the applicability of § 610 to post-election contributions, and (5) the applicability of § 1001 to oral unsworn statements made to a bank examiner.

1. The Constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. § 610

Defendants argue that § 610 is an unconstitutional burden on freedom of speech in light of the recent Supreme Court opinion, Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 96 S.Ct. 612, 46 L.Ed.2d 659 ($75--436, Jan. 30, 1976). In that decision, the Supreme Court held that the expenditure provisions of portions of the Federal Election Campaign Act violated the First Amendment.

1072 [1][2] Buckley v. Valeo is distinguishable from the case at bar, however. The prohibitions of § 610 insofar as they apply to this case are specifically directed to national banks. Since Congress has chartered national banks it seems clear that Congress may exercise plenary regulatory powers over such institutions. It is concluded that § 610 insofar as it relates to contributions is a valid exercise of this power and does not infringe defendants' First Amendment rights.

Since the government has indicated at oral argument that its proof will be directed solely to the issue of contributions, this court need not decide whether the § 610 prohibition on expenditures by national banks is unconstitutional in light of Buckley v. Valeo.

Defendants have also argued that § 610 is unconstitutionally vague. The standard for determining whether a penal statute is unconstitutionally vague was enunciated in Connally v. Gen'l Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391, 46 S.Ct. 126, 127, 70 L.Ed. 322, 328 (1925):

> That the terms of a penal statute creating a new offense must be sufficiently explicit to inform those who are subject to it what conduct on their part will render them liable to its penalties, is a well-recognized requirement, consonant alike with ordinary notions of fair play and the settled rules of law. And a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application, violates the first essential of due process of law. (citations omitted)

[3] Having examined the statute in light of these standards, this court concludes that § 610 is not unconstitutionally vague.

[4] This court has given careful consideration to defendant Dowd's argument that the question of constitutionality should be certified to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2d Circuit pursuant to 2 U.S.C. § 437h. [FN1] A review of the language of that section and its legislative history has convinced this court, however, that the provisions of the section are not applicable to the case at bar. The Joint Explanatory Statement of the Committee on Conference, for this section states:

> FN1. 2 U.S.C. § 437h provides as follows: (a) The Commission, the national committee of any political party, or any individual eligible to vote in any election for the office of President of the United States may institute such actions in the appropriate district court of the United States, including actions for declaratory judgment, as may be appropriate to construe the constitutionality of any provision of this Act or of section 608, 610, 611, 613, 614, 615, 616, or 617 of Title 18. The district court immediately shall certify all questions of constitutionality of this Act or of section 608, 610, 611, 613, 614, 615, 616, or 617 of Title 18 to the United States court of appeals for the circuit involved, which shall hear the matter sitting en banc.

> Conference substitute
> The conference substitute generally follows the House amendment and makes it clear that these special judicial review provisions are available only for actions directed at determining the constitutionality of provisions of the Act and of provisions of title 18, United States Code, related to the activities regulated by the Act.
> 1974 U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News, p. 5664

The case at bar was not directed at determining the constitutionality of the Act. Rather this is a criminal action; the constitutional attack was raised by way of motion. There is no need for the expedited review provision of § 437h in a criminal action, since review may be had on appeal. Declaratory judgments regulate prospective actions; this criminal case deals with actions already taken. Accordingly, there is no reason for certifying the question to the Court of Appeals.

2. The Applicability of § 610 to state elections

[5] Defendants contend that § 610 should apply only to contributions made 1073 in connection with federal elections and not to state elections. They cite Ash v. Cort, 3 Cir., 496 F.2d 416, rev'd on other grounds, 422 U.S. 66, 95 S.Ct. 2080, 45 L.Ed.2d 26 (1975) for the proposition that the definitions contained in 18 U.S.C. § 591 limit the scope of s 610. Ash v. Cort was a civil case dealing with corporate contributions. The prohibitions against national banks in § 610 is different from the prohibition against other corporations in the same section, and the definitions in § 591 only apply 'except as otherwise specifically provided.' The language of § 610 applicable to the case at bar clearly provides otherwise: 'It is unlawful for any national bank . . . to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election to any political office . . .' (emphasis added). This language is even more significant in light of the more limited language used in the part of the section dealing with corporations in general:

> . . . or for any corporation whatever, or any labor organization to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or > Resident Commissioner to Congress are to be voted for, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any of the foregoing offices . . ..

The conclusion that the part of the section relating to national banks was meant to apply to all elections--state as well as federal--is further reinforced by reference to the legislative history. See S.Rep. No. 3056, 59 Cong. 1st Sess. p. 2:

> The effect of this provision is to make it unlawful for any corporation, (organized by authority of any laws of Congress), no matter what its character may be, to make a contribution 'in connection with any election to any political office' without regard to whether the election be national, State, county, township, or municipal. The congress has the undoubted right thus to restrict and regulate corporations of its own creation.

3. The Applicability of § 610 to judicial elections

[6] In arguing that § 610 should not be applied to contributions to judicial elections, defendants rely on two arguments: (1) the alleged failure in the past to prosecute for contributions to judicial elections and (2) a perceived distinction between judicial and political elections. These arguments are without merit.

[7] Assuming arguendo that no prosecution has ever been instituted for contributions to judicial office, this court must nevertheless interpret § 610 in light of its language and purpose. Defendants' argument apparently proceeds as follows: (1) no prosecutions have ever been instituted for judicial contributions, (2) there must have been occasions when the various United States Attorneys' offices were aware of bank contributions to judicial campaigns, (3) therefore, by failing to prosecute, the government indicated its belief that judicial campaigns were insulated from the section's prohibitions.

[8] Only two things need be said about this argument. First, this court is not prepared to speculate as to the reasons for the absence of similar prosecutions. Second, even if this court were able to discern the interpretation of this section by various United States Attorneys in the past, that interpretation would not be binding under the circumstances present here.

Defendants rely on Rosenthal v. Harwood, 35 N.Y.2d 469, 363 N.Y.S.2d 937, 323 N.E.2d 179 (1974) for the proposition that a distinction exists between political and judicial campaigns. To the extent that such a distinction is present in Rosenthal, however, it is based on the need to insulate judicial elections, more than any other election, from corruption or the appearance of corruption. The Court specifically held that 'public policy . . . mandates that insofar as practicable both selection for an performance 1074 in judicial office shall be free from political manipulation.' 363 N.Y.S.2d at 943, 323 N.E.2d at 183. It seems clear that this rationale requires, rather than precludes, application of § 610 to judicial elections.

In Buckley v. Valeo, supra, 424 U.S. at p. 26, 96 S.Ct. at p. 638, 46 L.Ed.2d at p. 692, the Supreme Court recognized that the primary purpose of the Federal Election Campaign Act was 'to limit the actuality and appearance of corruption . . ..' These public policy considerations clearly mandate that the words of the section--'any election to any political office'--be given their plain meaning. Accordingly, it is concluded that s 610 does apply to contributions made to judicial campaigns.

4. Applicability of § 610 to post election contributions

Defendant Clifford argues that Count 15 of the indictment must be dismissed because it alleges a contribution made after the election. Defendant contends that to establish a violation of § 610 some sort of 'active electioneering' must be proved, see, e.g., U.S. v. Boyle, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 166, 482 F.2d 755 (1973), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1076, 94 S.Ct. 593, 38 L.Ed.2d 483 (1973). The government has argued that the exclusion of postelection contributions from the language of § 610 would 'create a loophole so wide that it would consume the entire statute.'

[9][10] There appears to be merit to both propositions; the wording of the statute, at the time of the contribution was ambiguous. [FN2] This court must resolve the ambiguity in favor of lenity. Rewis v. U.S., 401 U.S. 808, 812, 91 S.Ct. 1056, 1059, 28 L.Ed.2d 493, 496 (1971); Bell v. U.S.,

349 U.S. 81, 83, 75 S.Ct. 620, 622, 99 L.Ed. 905, 910 (1955). It is therefore concluded that to prove a violation of s 610, under the circumstances of this case, an intent to influence the election must be proved. Cf. Miller v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 507 F.2d 759 (3d Cir. 1974); U.S. v. Lewis Food Co., 366 F.2d 710 (9th Cir. 1966).

> FN2. It is probable, although this court need not decide the issue, that by amending the last paragraph of § 610 in 1972, Congress has closed any loophole that existed.

This court, however, cannot conclude as a matter of law that the post-election contribution alleged in Count 15 was not made for the purpose of influencing the election. Resolution of that issue is within the province of a jury after hearing all the facts and circumstances surrounding the contribution. Accordingly, the motion to dismiss Count 15 is denied at this time.

5. The Applicability of 18 U.S.C. § 1001 to oral unsworn statements made to a Bank Examiner

[11] Counts 21 and 22 of the indictment charge defendant Clifford with making false statements in a matter within the jurisdiction of the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1001. Clifford argues that § 1001 does not apply to oral unsworn statements when the defendant has not initiated the investigation, citing U.S. v. Bedore, 455 F.2d 1109 (9th Cir. 1972).

The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, however, has construed § 1001 in very broad terms. See U.S. v. McCue, 301 F.2d 452 (2d Cir. 1962); U.S. v. Adler, 380 F.2d 917 (2d Cir. 1967). In McCue a conviction under § 1001 was upheld despite the fact that the investigation was not initiated by the defendant. In Adler the court noted that the word 'statement' as it appears in the statute has been interpreted to include oral statements not under oath. 380 F.2d at 922.

The 'exculpatory--no' cases are not applicable to the facts of this case. Accordingly the motion to dismiss Counts 21 and 22 is denied.

6. Powell's Motion to Dismiss

[12] Defendant Powell moves to dismiss Counts 3, 5, 9, 17 and 19 on the 1075 ground that, as a matter of law, he was not an active member of the conspiracy at the time the contributions charged in those counts were made. This motion is denied without prejudice. See Pinkerton v. U.S., 328 U.S. 640, 646, 66 S.Ct. 1180, 1183, 90 L.Ed. 1489, 1496 (1945). Hyde v. U.S., 225 U.S. 347, 369, 32 S.Ct.

793, 803, 56 L.Ed. 1114, 1127 (1912). 7. Clifford's Motion to dismiss because of undue delay in prosecution

This court cannot decide at this time whether or not there was prejudicial delay, for, as the brief on behalf of Mr. Clifford states, there 'may well be substantial' prejudice. (emphasis added) Rather than speculate as to whether there may or may not be prejudice during trial this court denies the motion without prejudice.

Accordingly, defendants' motions to dismiss are denied. Defendants' motions to strike 'surplusage' and to sever various counts of the indictment are also denied.

So ordered.

Ordinarily, absent compelling reasons, an interlocutory order, such as an order denying a motion to dismiss an indictment, is nonappealable; but where the appellant in good faith contends that another trial is barred by former jeopardy, the general rule does not apply, and the denial of the motion to dismiss is deemed appealable as a collateral order, within the "Cohen" doctrine. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1291.

Despite defendant's claim, predicated on the collateral estoppel principle of "Ashe v. 183 Thomas C. Walsh, St. Louis, Mo., for appellant.

Anthony Nugent, U.S. Asst. Atty., Kansas City, Mo., for appellee.

Before MATTHES, Senior Circuit Judge, LAY and STEPHENSON, Circuit Judges.

MATTHES, Senior Circuit Judge.

Alexander J. Barket has appealed from the order of the district court[FN*] denying his motion to dismiss Count I of a two-count indictment (our Appeal No. 75--1568). Alternatively, Barket filed a petition for writ of mandamus in this court (No. 75--1569) to compel the district court to dismiss Count I and discharge appellant. The appeal and petition for mandamus have been consolidated for briefing, argument, and opinion.

FN* The Honorable John W. Oliver.

Count I of the indictment charged that appellant, an officer of Civic Plaza National Bank, Kansas City, Missouri, consented to the expenditure of the bank's moneys in connection with the 1968 presidential election, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 610.[FN1]

FN1. In pertinent part s 610 provides: It is unlawful for any national bank, * * * to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any political office, * * * (A)nd every officer or director of any corporation, or officer of any labor organization, who consents to any contribution or expenditure by the corporation or labor organization, as the case may be, * * * shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and if the violation was willful, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

Before proceeding to an examination of the merits of the issues presented, a resume of the history of this case in the district court will serve to explain why this litigation is before us.

The two-count indictment was filed on May 9, 1974.[FN2] Count I charged that appellant 184 violated 18 U.S.C. s 610 by consenting to the contribution of $7,500 of Civic Plaza's money in connection with the 1968 election for presidential and vice presidential electors. Count II charged that, in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 656, appellant knowingly and without authorization misapplied $9,144 of the bank's funds by paying the money to Rudolph Zatezalo, for the purpose of making an unlawful political contribution.[FN3]

FN2. The original indictment in this action was filed on October 11, 1973. The first two counts charged appellant and the bank with the violations alleged here. The third count charged appellant with violating 18 U.S.C. s 1005. This indictment was dismissed on appellant's motion on November 23, 1973. The present indictment was subsequently filed, naming appellant alone as defendant. A separate information against the bank was also filed, but was dismissed by the trial court.

FN3. In pertinent part s 656 provides: Whoever, being an officer, director, * * * or connected in any capacity with any Federal Reserve bank, member bank, national bank or insured bank, * * * embezzeles, abstracts, purloins or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds or credits of such bank or any moneys, funds, assets or securities intrusted to the custody or care of such bank, * * * shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both * * *.

Both counts were based on the same transactions: an alleged payment of $9,144 from the bank to Zatezalo, as a bonus salary, and a contribution by Zatezalo of $7,500 to the presidential campaign of then Vice President Hubert Humphrey. [FN4] The government's theory is that appellant approved this payment to Zatezalo, without proper authorization, and so violated both s 656, by misapplying the bank's funds, and s 610 by consenting to an expenditure of bank funds for a presidential election.

FN4. The difference between the amount purportedly paid to Zatezalo ($9,144) and the amount of the alleged contribution ($7,500) apparently represented Zatezalo's increased income tax liability resulting from his receipt of the 'bonus.'

At a conference on January 28, 1975, the court ordered that the two counts be tried separately. It is unclear at whose instance this order was made.[FN5]

FN5. The court's memorandum of this conference reads: 'The government elected to try the s 656 counts in the two cases.' The government asserts that the court compelled it to sever the counts for trial, on motion of appellant.

In any event, after waiver of a jury trial, the case proceeded on Count II alone, the s 656 misapplication charge. At the close of the evidence, the trial judge granted appellant's motion for judgment of acquittal. In granting the motion, he discussed at length the strength of the government's evidence. Particularly, he said:

> The greatest difficulty, it seems to me, is proof and evidence to support any sort of finding that whatever the defendant may have done, he did for the purpose as alleged by the government 'to injure and defraud his bank' * * *.
> It is my judgment, and I find, that there was an equal failure of proof on the part of the government that the purpose of the defendant's action was the making of an 'illegal' political contribution.

The court then entered a 'not guilty' verdict.

Count I of the indictment, the s 610 charge, remained pending. Thereafter, appellant moved to dismiss this count on several grounds. He asserted first that to try him on Count I would violate the fifth amendment's proscription of double jeopardy, because the offense charged in Count I is identical to the offense charged in Count II. In his motion to dismiss appellant relied in part at least on Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, 90 S.Ct. 1189, 25 L.Ed.2d 469 (1970) to support this double jeopardy claim.[FN6] He asserted also that Count I fails to state an offense, and that s 610 is unconstitutional.

FN6. On appeal, appellant has receded from any claim that Ashe v. Swenson involves pure double jeopardy. He recognizes that Ashe dealt with collateral estoppel, and incorporated that doctrine into the double jeopardy clause of the fifth amendment.

The court denied appellant's motion to dismiss Count I and this appeal followed. 185 In denying the motion, the judge filed a written memorandum and order in which he stated inter alia:

In connection with the Section 656 charge contained in Count II of the indictment, the government was obligated to establish beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant, with intent to injure and defraud the bank of which he was an officer and director, willfully and knowingly misapplied $9,144.00 for the purpose of making an unlawful political contribution. The Section 610 charge alleged in Count I does not require proof of any factual data essential to a Section 656 conviction under Count II. The charge in Count I requires that the government prove beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant 'consented' to a $7,500 contribution made by the bank in violation of Section 610. That is an entirely different charge than Count II which alleged that the defendant had made an unidentified unlawful political contribution with money which he had converted from funds formerly owned by the bank.

Initially, we consider the question whether the order complained of is a 'final decision' appealable under 28 U.S.C. s 1291.

The parties disagree on this vital question. The appellant relies on Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 69 S.Ct. 1221, 93 L.Ed. 1528 (1949), and cases cited below from four courts of appeals in support of his contention that even though the order denying the motion to dismiss is collateral in nature, it should be treated as final and appealable. The government argues that the order does not fall within the ambit of the Cohen doctrine and submits that the four cases relied upon by the appellant the distinguishable. The government argues also that the double jeopardy and collateral estoppel issues can be determined after another trial and entry of a final judgment under 28 U.S.C. s 1291.

[1] Ordinarily, absent compelling reasons, an interlocutory order, such as an order denying a motion to dismiss an indictment, is non-appealable. Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., supra; Snodgrass v. United States, 326 F.2d 409 (8th Cir. 1964). However, where, as here, the appellant in good faith contends that another trial is barred by former jeopardy, this general rule does not apply. Rather, denial of the motion to dismiss is deemed appealable as a collateral order, within the doctrine of Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., supra. United States v. DeSilvio, 520 F.2d 247 (3d Cir. 1975); United States v. Beckerman, 516 F.2d 905 (2d Cir. 1975); United States v. Lansdown, 460 F.2d 164 (4th Cir. 1972); see also Thomas v. Beasley, 491 F.2d 507 (6th Cir. 1974); contra, United States v. Bailey, 512 F.2d 833 (5th Cir. 1975).[FN7]

FN7. We agree with the government that the factual contexts of the cases relied upon by appellant are dissimilar from the circumstances here. But central to all of the cases was a double jeopardy plea and, more importantly, whether that issue could be tested and determined on an appeal from an interlocutory judgment such as an appeal from a denial of a motion to dismiss.

[2] The denial of the motion to dismiss in this case has all the characteristics of a collateral order. These characteritics are enumerated by Professor Moore:

(1) (T)he order must be a final determination of a claim of right 'separable from, and collateral to,' rights asserted in the action;

(2) it must be 'too important to be denied review,' in the sense that it 'presents a serious and unsettled question'; and

(3) its review cannot, in the nature of the question that it presents, await final judgment because 'when that time comes, it will be too late effectively to review the * * * order and rights conferred * * * will have been lost, probably irreparably.'

186 9 J. Moore, Federal Practice P110.10, quoted in Roach v. Churchman, 457 F.2d 1101 (8th Cir. 1972).

[3] The order denying the motion to dismiss here is the trial court's final determination of appellant's double jeopardy claim. It is separable from the merits of the case. See United States v. Lansdown, supra, 460 F.2d at 171. As a question of constitutional right, it is too important to be denied review. Id.

[4] Most importantly, review of the double jeopardy claim cannot await final judgment. The double jeopardy prohibition is meant to spare a once-jeopardized defendant not only a subsequent conviction, but also a subsequent trial. It is designed to prevent the government from 'subjected (a defendant) to embarrassment, expense and orderal and compelling him to live in a continuing state of anxiety and insecurity, as well as enhancing the possibility that even though innocent he may be found guilty.' Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 187--88, 78 S.Ct. 221, 223, 2 L.Ed.2d 199 (1957); Accord United States v. Lansdown, supra, 460 F.2d at 171; United States v. Brown, 481 F.2d 1035, 1041 (8th Cir. 1973); see also Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, 90 S.Ct. 1189, 25 L.Ed.2d 469 (1970).

If this appeal is not heard now, appellant will lose his claimed right to be free from a second trial.[FN8] Review thus cannot await final judgment. We hold that the order is appealable, and in so holding, we emphasize that our conclusion is limited to double jeopardy cases.

> FN8. It makes no difference for appealability purposes, of course, whether appellant wins or loses on the merits. See, e.g., United States v. DeSilvio, supra (finding that order similar to the one here is appealable, and holding for appellee on merits).

Also, the other grounds for dismissal of the indictment advanced by appellant (failure to charge an offense and the unconstitutionality of s 610) can be heard, if necessary, on appeal from final judgment in the event there is another trial and conviction. Accordingly, we do not consider them now. We limit our consideration to appellant's double jeopardy and collateral estoppel claims.

And because we find the order appealable, we need not consider whether mandamus is appropriate.

Appellant in fact makes two separate double jeopardy arguments. First, he contends that the s 610 violation charged in Count I and the s 656 violation charged in Count II are the 'same offense,' so that his acquittal for the latter bars prosecution for the former. Secondly, he argues that the second prosecution is barred by the 'collateral estoppel' rule of Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, 90 S.Ct. 1189, 25 L.Ed.2d 469 (1970). We consider each argument in turn.

[5] Two statutes charge the same offense, for double jeopardy purposes, if the violation of each statute is proved by the same evidence. Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299, 52 S.Ct. 40, 76 L.Ed. 520 (1932); Kistner v. United States, 332 F.2d 978, 980 (8th Cir. 1964).

[6] Conviction of a bank officer under 18 U.S.C. s 656 requires proof that the officer wilfully misapplied funds for the benefit of himself or another person, for the purpose of defrauding or injuring the bank. This purpose to defraud or injure the bank is an important element of a s 656 offense. See United States v. Giordano, 489 F.2d 327, 330 (2d Cir. 1973).

Conviction under s 610, in contrast, requires proof that the defendant consented to the contribution or expenditure of the bank's funds in connection with an election. No purpose to defraud or injure the bank is required.

[7] There is a fundamental difference in purpose between the two statutes. The misapplication statute, s 656, is meant to protect the funds of banks with a federal relationship. '(C)ourts have generally held that the gist of the offense of willful misapplication is the conversion of funds of a federally insured 187 bank by one connected in some capacity with the bank either to his own use or to the use of a third person, with the intent to injure or defraud the bank.' United States v. Wilson, 500 F.2d 715, 720 (5th Cir. 1974). The political contribution statute, s 610, in contrast, has for one of its purposes the protection of the electoral process from the influence of corporate and union funds. See United States v. Auto Workers, 352 U.S. 567, 77 S.Ct. 529, 1 L.Ed.2d 563 (1952).

[8] Because of these different purposes, the two offenses contain different elements. As noted, s 656 requires a purpose to injure or defraud the bank; s 610 requires consent to a political contribution. Violations of the two statutes must be proved by different evidence. Therefore, the two counts here charge different offenses.[FN9] See United States v. Blockburger, supra.

> FN9. Appellant makes much of the government's assertion that it will introduce at trial on Count I the > same evidence used at the trial of Count II. The question before us is not, however, what evidence is to be used at trial. Rather, the question is what evidence is required to convict under the two statutes.

Appellant in reality is arguing not that the offenses are identical, but that the s 610 violation is a lesser included offense of the s 656 violation.

[9][10] One offense is a lesser included offense of another only if, in order to commit the greater offense, it is necessary to commit the lesser. See United States v. Eisenberg, 469 F.2d 156, 162 (8th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 410 U.S. 992, 93 S.Ct. 1515, 36 L.Ed.2d 190 (1973). Manifestly, there are many ways to misapply funds, in violation of s 656, without consenting to a political contribution in violation of s 610. It is thus possible to commit the greater offense without committing the lesser, and the lesser included offense doctrine is inapplicable.

The two counts, then, do not charge the same offense. Nor is the offense charged in Count I a lesser included offense of the offense charged in Count II. This aspect of the double jeopardy prohibition is thus inapplicable, and appellant's point is without merit.

[11] Appellant's second argument is based, not on pure double jeopardy, but on the 'collateral estoppel' principle of Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, 90 S.Ct. 1189, 25 L.Ed.2d 469 (1970). The Supreme Court there held that, where an issue of ultimate fact has been determined by a final judgment in a criminal case, to relitigate the issue in a subsequent trial for a different offense violates the double jeopardy prohibition. Appellant contends that the trial judge, in commenting on the weight of the government's evidence, decided certain factual issues in appellant's favor which would be crucial to a prosecution on Count I.

The statement referred to were made from the bench at the close of the evidence at the trial on Count II.[FN10] They lack the clarity which could be found in written findings of fact. It is therefore difficult to determine what factual issues the trial judge intended to resolve by the statements.

> FN10. Appellant did not request formal findings of fact, and none were made. See Fed.R.Crim.P. 23(c). The 'findings' referred to here were oral comments made in the disposition of the motion for judgment of acquittal. Because none forecloses an issue essential to Count I, it is not necessary to consider whether 'findings' of this kind can bring the Ashe v. Swenson rule into play.

As shown above, in ruling on the motion to dismiss which is now before us, the trial judge found that his disposition of Count II had not foreclosed any issues essential to the trial of Count I. We are not bound by this finding. Rather, we must make our own examination of the record, to see what factual issues were resolved in connection with the motion for judgment of acquittal, and which of these issues, if any, would be material to a s 610 prosecution. We note first that the one issue on which the trial court 188 unquestionably found a failure of proof is not essential to a s 610 proceeding. The court ruled that the government had failed to prove that appellant acted for the purpose of injuring and defrauding his bank. As observed, this is not an element of the s 610 offense, so that this finding does not preclude conviction under that statute.

Appellant relies on certain other 'findings' of the trial court to support his Ashe v. Swenson claim. He points, first, to the trial court's assertion that the evidence did not support a finding that appellant acted 'wilfully.' It is not at all clear what the trial judge meant by his use of the word 'wilful.' He might have meant to say that appellant did not act for the specific purpose of violating s 656, or to assert again that appellant did not act to injure the bank. If so, this 'finding' of lack of wilfulness is irrelevant to the s 610 charge.

Similarly, the court found that 'there was an equal failure of proof on the part of the government that the purpose of the defendant's action was the making of an 'illegal' political contribution.' This comment was made in the midst of a discussion of the requirement that a s 656 misapplication necessarily involve a conversion. The court emphasized the word 'illegal.' It might well have meant to say, not that the government failed to prove the political contribution, but that it failed to prove that the contribution resulted from an unauthorized, i.e., 'illegal,' conversion of bank funds. Conviction under s 610 does not require that the contribution of bank funds be unauthorized. If the sentence quoted is given this meaning, prosecution under s 610 remains possible.

Appellant asserts, finally, that the court found that the government failed to prove that appellant was 'tied' to the contribution in question. The record shows that the court did not in fact so find. Although it indicated that there was 'some difficulty' in tying the alleged contribution to appellant in light of certain documentary evidence, it did not expressly rule on the question. In the absence of a clearer declaration by the trial judge, we cannot say that the issue of appellant's participation in the contribution was resolved.

[12][13] In any Ashe v. Swenson case, the burden is on the defendant to show that the verdict or the findings of the court in the prior case necessarily foreclosed an issue essential to the subsequent prosecution. See United States v. Gugliaro, 501 F.2d 68, 70 (2d Cir. 1974). Appellant has not sustained this burden here. None of the statements referred to by appellant unambiguously forecloses issues essential to Count I.

Appellant has thus not shown that the prosecution of Count I is barred by the trial court's disposition of Count II, either under traditional double jeopardy standards or under the rule of Ashe v. Swenson. The trial court therefore did not err in denying the motion to dismiss.

The government has indicated that it will present at the trial of Count I the same evidence it produced at the trial of Count II. We assume that the trial court will provide both parties the opportunity to present additional evidence if they choose to do so.

The petition for writ of mandamus is denied. The order of the district court denying appellant's motion to dismiss is affirmed.

STEPHENSON, Circuit Judge (concurring and dissenting).

Assuming arguendo that the order of the district court denying appellant's motion to dismiss Count I is an appealable order I concur with parts II and III of the majority opinion.

However, I respectfully dissent from part I of the majority opinion because it is my view that the order denying dismissal of Count I is not a final decision appealable under 28 U.S.C. s 1291. I am in accord with the views expressed in United States v. Bailey, 512 F.2d 833 (5th Cir. 1975). Cf. United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 690--92, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974).

I would deny the petition for writ of mandamus for the reason that exceptional 189 circumstances justifying invocation of this extraordinary remedy do not exist. Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90, 95, 88 S.Ct. 269, 19 L.Ed.2d 305 (1967).

TITLE 2. THE CONGRESS
CHAPTER 14--FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGNS
SUBCHAPTER I--DISCLOSURE OF FEDERAL CAMPAIGN FUNDS

Current through P.L. 104-8, approved 4-17-95

§ 437g. Enforcement

(a) Administrative and judicial practice and procedure

(1) Any person who believes a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26 has occurred, may file a complaint with the Commission. Such complaint shall be in writing, signed and sworn to by the person filing such complaint, shall be notarized, and shall be made under penalty of perjury and subject to the provisions of section 1001 of Title 18. Within 5 days after receipt of a complaint, the Commission shall notify, in writing, any person alleged in the complaint to have committed such a violation. Before the Commission conducts any vote on the complaint, other than a vote to dismiss, any person so notified shall have the opportunity to demonstrate, in writing, to the Commission within 15 days after notification that no action should be taken against such person on the basis of the complaint. The Commission may not conduct any investigation or take any other action under this section solely on the basis of a complaint of a person whose identity is not disclosed to the Commission.

(2) If the Commission, upon receiving a complaint under paragraph (1) or on the basis of information ascertained in the normal course of carrying out its supervisory responsibilities, determines, by an affirmative vote of 4 of its members, that it has reason to believe that a person has committed, or is about to commit, a violation of this Act or chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26, the Commission shall, through its chairman or vice chairman, notify the person of the alleged violation. Such notification shall set forth the factual basis for such alleged violation. The Commission shall make an investigation of such alleged violation, which may include a field investigation or audit, in accordance with the provisions of this section.

(3) The general counsel of the Commission shall notify the respondent of any recommendation to the Commission by the general counsel to proceed to a vote on probable cause pursuant to paragraph (4) (A) (i). With such notification, the general counsel shall include a brief stating the position of the general counsel on the legal and factual issues of the case. Within 15 days of receipt of such brief, respondent may submit a brief stating the position of such respondent on the legal and factual issues of the case, and replying to the brief of general counsel. Such briefs shall be filed with the Secretary of the Commission and shall be considered by the Commission before proceeding under paragraph (4).

(4) (A) (i) Except as provided in clause (ii), if the Commission determines, by an affirmative vote of 4 of its members, that there is probable cause to believe that any person has committed, or is about to commit, a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26, the Commission shall attempt, for a period of at least 30 days, to correct or prevent such violation by informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion, and to enter into a conciliation agreement with any person involved. Such attempt by the Commission to correct or prevent such violation may continue for a period of not more than 90 days. The Commission may not enter into a conciliation agreement under this clause except pursuant to an affirmative vote of 4 of its members. A conciliation agreement, unless violated, is a complete bar to any further action by the Commission, including the bringing of a civil proceeding under paragraph (6) (A).

(ii) If any determination of the Commission under clause (i) occurs during the 45-day period immediately preceding any election, then the Commission shall attempt, for a period of at least 15 days, to correct or prevent the violation involved by the methods specified in clause (i).

(B) (i) No action by the Commission or any person, and no information derived, in connection with any conciliation attempt by the Commission under subparagraph (A) may be made public by the Commission without the written consent of the respondent and the Commission.

(ii) If a conciliation agreement is agreed upon by the Commission and the respondent, the Commission shall make public any conciliation agreement signed by both the Commission and the respondent. If the Commission makes a determination that a person has not violated this Act or chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26, the Commission shall make public such determination.

(5) (A) If the Commission believes that a violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26 has been committed, a conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission under paragraph (4) (A) may include a requirement that the person involved in such conciliation agreement shall pay a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of $5,000 or an amount equal to any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation.

(B) If the Commission believes that a knowing and willful violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26 has been committed, a conciliation agreement entered into by the Commission under paragraph (4) (A) may require that the person involved in such conciliation agreement shall pay a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of $10,000 or an amount equal to 200 percent of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation.

(C) If the Commission by an affirmative vote of 4 of its members, determines that there is probable cause to believe that a knowing and willful violation of this Act which is subject to subsection (d) of this section, or a knowing and willful violation of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26, has occurred or is about to occur, it may refer such apparent violation to the Attorney General of the United States without regard to any limitations set forth in paragraph (4) (A).

(D) In any case in which a person has entered into a conciliation agreement with the Commission under paragraph (4) (A), the Commission may institute a civil action for relief under paragraph (6) (A) if it believes that the person has violated any provision of such conciliation agreement. For the Commission to obtain relief in any civil action, the Commission need only establish that the person has violated, in whole or in part, any requirement of such conciliation agreement.

(6) (A) If the Commission is unable to correct or prevent any violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26, by the methods specified in paragraph (4) (A), the Commission may, upon an affirmative vote of 4 of its members, institute a civil action for relief, including a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order, or any other appropriate order (including an order for a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of $5,000 or an amount equal to any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation) in the district court of the United States for the district in which the person against whom such action is brought is found, resides, or transacts business.

(B) In any civil action instituted by the Commission under subparagraph (A), the court may grant a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order, or other order, including a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of $5,000 or an amount equal to any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation, upon a proper showing that the person involved has committed, or is about to commit (if the relief sought is a permanent or temporary injunction or a restraining order), a violation of this Act or chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26.

(C) In any civil action for relief instituted by the Commission under subparagraph (A), if the court determines that the Commission has established that the person involved in such civil action has committed a knowing and willful violation of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26, the court may impose a civil penalty which does not exceed the greater of $10,000 or an amount equal to 200 percent of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation.

(7) In any action brought under paragraph (5) or (6), subpenas for witnesses who are required to attend a United States district court may run into any other district.

(8) (A) Any party aggrieved by an order of the Commission dismissing a complaint filed by such party under paragraph (1), or by a failure of the Commission to act on such complaint during the 120-day period beginning on the date the complaint is filed, may file a petition with the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

(B) Any petition under subparagraph (A) shall be filed, in the case of a dismissal of a complaint by the Commission, within 60 days after the date of the dismissal.

(C) In any proceeding under this paragraph the court may declare that the dismissal of the complaint or the failure to act is contrary to law, and may direct the Commission to conform with such declaration within 30 days, failing which the complainant may bring, in the name of such complainant, a civil action to remedy the violation involved in the original complaint.

(9) Any judgment of a district court under this subsection may be appealed to the court of appeals, and the judgment of the court of appeals affirming or setting aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the district court shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in section 1254 of Title 28.

(10) Repealed. Pub.L. 98-620, Title IV, § 402(1)(A), Nov. 8, 1984, 98 Stat. 3357.

(11) If the Commission determines after an investigation that any person has violated an order of the court entered in a proceeding brought under paragraph (6), it may petition the court for an order to hold such person in civil contempt, but if it believes the violation to be knowing and willful it may petition the court for an order to hold such person in criminal contempt.

(12) (A) Any notification or investigation made under this section shall not be made public by the Commission or by any person without the written consent of the person receiving such notification or the person with respect to whom such investigation is made.

(B) Any member or employee of the Commission, or any other person, who violates the provisions of subparagraph (A) shall be fined not more than $2,000. Any such member, employee, or other person who knowingly and willfully violates the provisions of subparagraph (A) shall be fined not more than $5,000.

(b) Notice to persons not filing required reports prior to institution of enforcement action; publication of identity of persons and unfiled reports

Before taking any action under subsection (a) of this section against any person who has failed to file a report required under section 434(a) (2) (A) (iii) of this title for the calendar quarter immediately preceding the election involved, or in accordance with section 434(a) (2) (A) (i) of this title, the Commission shall notify the person of such failure to file the required reports. If a satisfactory response is not received within 4 business days after the date of notification, the Commission shall, pursuant to section 438(a) (7) of this title, publish before the election the name of the person and the report or reports such person has failed to file.

(c) Reports by Attorney General of apparent violations

Whenever the Commission refers an apparent violation to the Attorney General, the Attorney General shall report to the Commission any action taken by the Attorney General regarding the apparent violation. Each report shall be transmitted within 60 days after the date the Commission refers an apparent violation, and every 30 days thereafter until the final disposition of the apparent violation.

(d) Penalties; defenses; mitigation of offenses

(1) (A) Any person who knowingly and willfully commits a violation of any provision of this Act which involves the making, receiving, or reporting of any contribution or expenditure aggregating $2,000 or more during a calendar year shall be fined, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both. The amount of this fine shall not exceed the greater of $25,000 or 300 percent of any contribution or expenditure involved in such violation.

(B) In the case of a knowing and willful violation of section 441b(b)(3) of this title, the penalties set forth in this subsection shall apply to a violation involving an amount aggregating $250 or more during a calendar year. Such violation of section 441b(b)(3) of this title may incorporate a violation of section 441c(b), 441f, or 441g of this title.

(C) In the case of a knowing and willful violation of section 441h of this title, the penalties set forth in this subsection shall apply without regard to whether the making, receiving, or reporting of a contribution or expenditure of $1,000 or more is involved.

(2) In any criminal action brought for a violation of any provision of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26, any defendant may evidence their lack of knowledge or intent to commit the alleged violation by introducing as evidence a conciliation agreement entered into between the defendant and the Commission under subsection (a) (4) (A) of this section which specifically deals with the act or failure to act constituting such violation and which is still in effect.

(3) In any criminal action brought for a violation of any provision of this Act or of chapter 95 or chapter 96 of Title 26, the court before which such action is brought shall take into account, in weighing the seriousness of the violation and in considering the appropriateness of the penalty to be imposed if the defendant is found guilty, whether--

(A) the specific act or failure to act which constitutes the violation for which the action was brought is the subject of a conciliation agreement entered into between the defendant and the Commission under subparagraph (a) (4) (A);

(B) the conciliation agreement is in effect; and

(C) the defendant is, with respect to the violation involved, in compliance with the conciliation agreement.

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

References in Text

This Act, referred to in subsecs. (a) and (d), means the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended, as defined by section 431 of this title.

Prior Provisions

Provisions similar to those comprising subsec. (a) of this section were contained in section 308(d) of Pub.L. 92-225, Title III, Feb. 7, 1972, 86 Stat. 18 (section 438(d) of this title) prior to amendment of section 308 of Pub.L. 92-225 by Pub.L. 93-443.

1984 Amendment

Subsec. (a)(10). Pub.L. 98-620 struck out par. (10) which had provided that any action brought under subsec. (a) be advanced on the docket of the court in which filed, and put ahead of the other actions (other than other actions brought under this subsection or under section 437h of this title).

1980 Amendment

Pub.L. 96-187, § 108, substantially reworked the provisions of this section in order to facilitate the Commission's more expeditious handling of complaints, and the implementation of enforcement proceedings.

1976 Amendment

Subsec. (a). Pub.L. 94-283, § 109, generally reworked the provisions of subsec. (a) to reflect the enactment of sections 441a to 441j of this title and the repeal of sections 608 and 610 to 617 of Title 18 and to update the operations of the Commission.

Subsec. (b). Pub.L. 94-283, § 109, reenacted subsec. (b) without change.

Subsec. (c). Pub.L. 94-283, § 109, added subsec. (c).

Effective Date of 1984 Amendment

Amendment by Pub.L. 98-620 not to apply to cases pending on Nov. 8, 1984, see section 403 of Pub.L. 98-620, set out as a note under section 1657 of Title 28, Judiciary and Judicial Procedure.

1. Constitutionality

Those provisions of this section, prior to the 1976 amendment of this section by Pub.L. 94-283, which vested in the Federal Election Commission primary responsibility for conducting civil litigation in the courts of the United States for vindicating public rights violated the appointments clause of the Constitution, U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 2, § 2, cl. 2; such functions may be discharged only by persons who are officers of the United States within the meaning of the clause. Buckley v. Valeo, Dist.Col.1976, 96 S.Ct. 612, 424 U.S. 1, 46 L.Ed.2d 659, motion granted 96 S.Ct. 1153, 424 U.S. 936, 47 L.Ed.2d 727, on remand 532 F.2d 187, 174 U.S.App.D.C. 300.

Federal Election Commission's petition to enforce administrative subpoena requiring defendant to appear for a deposition and produce certain documents relative to an investigation of possible illegal contributions by two national banks to defendant's 1974 Georgia gubernatorial campaign was not barred by the ex post facto and due process clauses of the Constitution, since the proscription which the banks and defendant's campaign committee were suspected of violating has been in effect since 1907, since the statutory penalties for violation of this section are civil, not quasi-criminal in nature, and since it could not be assumed that any future Commission proceeding against the subjects of the investigation would necessarily depend solely on transactions that occurred before the 1976 enactment of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, former section 241 et seq. of this title. Federal Election Commission v. Lance, C.A.Ga.1980, 617 F.2d 365, supplemented 635 F.2d 1132, appeal dismissed, certiorari denied 101 S.Ct. 3151, 453 U.S. 917, 69 L.Ed.2d 999.

While former section 610 of Title 18 made no provision for civil damages, whereas this section now empowers the court to "impose a civil penalty" in an appropriate "civil action," such penalties are not "quasi criminal" in nature and thus are not barred by the Constitution's ex post facto clause, U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 1, § 9, cl. 3, for pre-1976 misconduct. Federal Election Commission v. Weinsten, D.C.N.Y.1978, 462 F.Supp. 243.

2. Construction with other laws

Findings concerning violations of federal election laws are governed by this section, while Commission's authority to make repayment determinations is derived from section 9007(b) of Title 26. Reagan-Bush Committee v. Federal Election Commission, D.C.D.C.1981, 525 F.Supp. 1330.

3. Mandatory nature of section

Use of word "may" in this section did not make provisions of this section permissible rather than mandatory, where Congress, which was concerned with remedy, provided for an exclusive civil remedy vested in Federal Election Commission, and then created one carefully limited exception, which provided for a "blend of administrative and judicial enforcement powers" and became available to complainant only when Commission had failed to obey directive of district court of District of Columbia. Walther v. Baucus, D.C.Mont.1979, 467 F.Supp. 93.

4. Discretion of Commission

Issue of whether a particular charge merits an investigation by the Federal Election Commission is a sensitive and complex matter calling for an evaluation of the credibility of the allegation, the nature of threat posed by offense, the resources available to agency, and numerous other factors: Congress has entrusted such matter to the discretion of the Commission and instructed the courts to interfere only when the Commission's actions are contrary to law. In re Federal Election Campaign Act Litigation, D.C.D.C.1979, 474 F.Supp. 1044.

5. Discretion of Attorney General

That upon request by the Federal Election Commission the Attorney General on behalf of the United States shall institute a civil action for relief does not establish that Congress intended to eliminate the discretion that has traditionally vested in the Attorney General. Buckley v. Valeo, 1975, 519 F.2d 821, 171 U.S.App.D.C. 172, affirmed in part, reversed in part on other grounds 96 S.Ct. 612, 424 U.S. 1, 46 L.Ed.2d 659.

6. Authority of Attorney General

Requirement of determination of probable cause by Federal Election Commission prior to directly referring matter without conciliation proceedings to the Attorney General does not in any manner curtail power of Attorney General to investigate and prosecute criminal violations of this chapter. U.S. v. Tonry, D.C.La.1977, 433 F.Supp. 620.

7. Conciliation agreement

Federal Election Commission's (FEC's) conciliation agreement with national political committee did not deal with regulation counting contribution against individual's per candidate limit and committee's per candidate limit if committee exercises direction and control over choice of candidate, and, thus, Commission could bring action alleging violation of regulation, even though agreement discussed Commission's settlement of the "matter" and in some contexts referred to entire series of transactions or occurrences raised by filed complaint as "matter." Federal Election Com'n v. National Republican Senatorial Committee, C.A.D.C.1992, 966 F.2d 1471.

Fact that conciliation agreement may be admitted to negate criminal intent or ameliorate sentence in a prosecution under this chapter did not require that persons violating this chapter be given opportunity to enter into conciliation agreement before criminal prosecution could be initiated, in view of provision of this section that if Commission finds probable cause to believe knowing and wilful violation has occurred, Commission may refer apparent violation to Attorney General without regard to requirement that Commission attempt conciliation. U.S. v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 701, C.A.Or.1979, 638 F.2d 1161, certiorari denied 100 S.Ct. 1026, 444 U.S. 1077, 62 L.Ed.2d 760.

8. Press entities

This chapter calls for a two step process when a substantial complaint is received alleging a violation of this chapter by a press entity; in first stage, until and unless press exemption is found inapplicable, Commission is barred from investigating substance of the complaint, but is permitted to investigate the two questions on which the exemption turns: whether press entity is owned by a political party or candidate and whether press entity was acting as a press entity in making distribution complained of; if Commission makes a finding of probable cause that press exemption did not apply to the circumstances, then and only then would investigation be permitted into whether a substantive violation had occurred. Reader's Digest Ass'n, Inc. v. Federal Election Commission, D.C.N.Y.1981, 509 F.Supp. 1210.

9. Prerequisites for investigation

Mere "official curiosity" will not suffice as basis for Commission investigation, since investigations may begin only if individual first files a signed, sworn, notarized complaint with Commission and Commission's duty thereafter is expeditiously to conduct confidential investigation of complaint. Federal Election Commission v. Machinists Non-Partisan Political League, 1981, 655 F.2d 380, 210 U.S.App.D.C. 267, certiorari denied 102 S.Ct. 397, 454 U.S. 897, 70 L.Ed.2d 213.

All that is required before seeking a subpoena under the Federal Election Campaign Act is that inquiry was proper, information sought is reasonably relevant to matter involved, and information requested be within broad scope of investigations once there had been finding of reason to believe a violation has occurred. Federal Election Com'n v. Citizens for Freeman, D.C.Md.1985, 602 F.Supp. 1250, appeal dismissed 767 F.2d 911.

10. Knowledge and willfulness

Where there was no evidence of any "knowing, conscious and deliberate flaunting" of this chapter by union in connection with its segregation of funds that could be used for direct contributions to candidates for federal elective office and those that were used for communications with union members and for nonpartisan voter registration, union considered itself to be in compliance with this chapter and routinely reported its interfund transfers to the very agency charged with enforcement of this chapter, and no decision had addressed issue whether transfers could be made from union's education fund to political contributions committee, union's violations of this chapter were not "knowing and willful" as required by subsec. (a) (6) (C) of this section upon which imposition of civil penalty against it was based. American Federation of Labor and Congress of Indus. Organizations (AFL-CIO) v. Federal Election Commission, 1980, 628 F.2d 97, 202 U.S.App.D.C. 97, certiorari denied 101 S.Ct. 397, 449 U.S. 982, 66 L.Ed.2d 244.

Despite fact that organization of professional educators violated this chapter by using "reverse check-off" system of collecting political contributions from its members, civil penalty was unwarranted, where violation was not in the nature of intentional disregard of rights of dissenting members through coercion, threats, and reprisals but was indirect infringement of those rights through excessive zeal in trying to have more efficient collection system and where expenses organization would incur in making refunds in accordance with court order would be sufficient penalty without adding fine to it. Federal Election Commission v. National Ed. Ass'n, D.C.D.C.1978, 457 F.Supp. 1102.

10A. Immunity

Associate general counsel for Federal Election Commission in charge of general counsel's enforcement section, whose responsibilities included ensuring consistent application of law in the enforcement area, was acting within outer perimeter of his official duties, and thus, was entitled to absolute immunity from liability for alleged assault and battery on paralegal specialist assigned to the enforcement section when the assistant general counsel tried to physically wrench confidential logbook from the paralegal, who, although he had authority to review contents of the logbook, was photocopying sheets from the logbook to gather evidence to controvert insubordination charges against him. Edwards v. Gross, D.D.C.1986, 633 F.Supp. 267.

11. Jurisdiction

Federal Election Commission is agency of United States government empowered with exclusive and primary jurisdiction with respect to administration, interpretation and civil enforcement of Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, §§ 301 et seq., 306(b)(1), 307(a), 309, as amended, 2 U.S.C.A. §§ 431 et seq., 437c(b)(1), 437d(a), 437g. Federal Election Com'n v. American Intern. Demographic Services, Inc., E.D.Va.1986, 629 F.Supp. 317.

Federal Election Commission's dismissal of complaint alleging that political action committees made illegal contributions to a campaign for primary election for nomination to a congressional seat, solely based on general counsel's first report, which urged dismissal based upon a misinterpretation of the facts, was arbitrary and capricious and thus contrary to law, in that there was undisputed evidence that case involved violation of at least $2,500, and more likely $3,600. Antosh v. Federal Election Com'n, D.C.D.C.1984, 599 F.Supp. 850.

Where Commission provided defendants with notice of investigation and alleged violations involving certain expenditures, including full description of factual and legal basis for allegations, and defendants received and had fair opportunity to review and respond to Commission's findings, and yet did not express willingness to negotiate by repeatedly refusing to concede liability and respond on merits to Commission's proposals, Commission acted in good faith in its initiation of suit and, thus, district court had subject-matter jurisdiction over portion of action alleging violations of this chapter. Federal Election Com'n v. National Rifle Ass'n of America, D.C.D.C.1983, 553 F.Supp. 1331.

This section permitting a person aggrieved by failure of Commission to act on a complaint within 90 days of filing to challenge that failure within 60 days of 90-day period should not be read as requiring final action on all cases within that period but should be read as being jurisdictional in nature and as giving district court power after such time to decide whether failure of agency to act is contrary to law, that is, whether it is arbitrary and capricious. Common Cause v. Federal Election Commission, D.C.D.C.1980, 489 F.Supp. 738.

District court was without subject matter jurisdiction to entertain plaintiff's suit seeking enforcement of federal election laws, since primary enforcement of election laws is entrusted by section 437c of this title to Federal Election Commission, and this chapter did not permit private citizens to bring direct suits against alleged violators of the laws. In re Federal Election Campaign Act Litigation, D.C.D.C.1979, 474 F.Supp. 1051.

Where, in case in which plaintiff claimed that congressman and his election committee received excessive contributions from labor organizations for congressman's 1978 senatorial campaign in violation of this section, complaint did not allege that there had been compliance with this section and, while plaintiff's complaint was dismissed by Federal Election Commission, and while a petition for review was filed in district court for District of Columbia, there had been no decision by such court, federal district court was without jurisdiction. Walther v. Baucus, D.C.Mont.1979, 467 F.Supp. 93.

12. Complaint

Federal Elections Commission complaint launching FECA investigation was adequate even though it did not identify by name the person or entity, unknown to complainant, that was alleged to have committed identified violation of Federal Election Campaign Act and did not present complete factual and legal account of alleged violation. Federal Election Com'n v. Franklin, E.D.Va.1989, 718 F.Supp. 1272, affirmed in part, vacated in part on other grounds 902 F.2d 3.

Complaint which alleged that contributions from OPE, the political arm of the AFL-CIO and individual political action committees of various unions which exceeded a total of $5,000 were contributions made by political action committees controlled by the same group of persons, thus making the contributions excessive, which alleged that various candidates had knowingly received those assertedly illegal contributions, and which alleged that Commission had not conducted an investigation stated a claim under the provision of this section permitting private parties to bring civil actions when the Commission fails to act. Walther v. Federal Election Commission, D.C.D.C.1979, 468 F.Supp. 1235.

13. Summary proceedings

Questions of the coverage of this chapter were inappropriate in summary proceeding to enforce the Federal Election Commission's subpoena for the Florida for Kennedy Committee documents. Federal Election Commission v. Florida for Kennedy Committee, D.C.Fla.1980, 492 F.Supp. 587.

14. Disclosure

Provision of subsec. (a) (4) (B) (i) of this section that "no information derived, in connection with any conciliation attempt by the Commission * * * may be made public" did not apply to materials supplied to the Commission before the conciliation process began. Federal Election Commission v. Illinois Medical Political Action Committee, D.C.Ill.1980, 503 F.Supp. 45.

14A. Investigations

Breach of confidentiality requirement for Federal Election Commission investigations, which resulted from one Commission employee reporting to media about credit card irregularities of presidential primary campaign, did not demonstrate bad faith on part of Commission in its investigation. Spannaus v. Federal Election Com'n, S.D.N.Y.1986, 641 F.Supp. 1520, affirmed 816 F.2d 670.

Federal Election Commission is authorized to institute investigations of possible violations of Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, § 301 et seq., as amended, 2 U.S.C.A. § 431 et seq. Federal Election Com'n v. American Intern. Demographic Services, Inc., E.D.Va.1986, 629 F.Supp. 317.

15. Discovery

Registered voter, contending that Commission acted contrary to law in dismissing complaints containing allegations of illegal campaign contributions by various unions to members of Congress, was not entitled to require unions to appear as third parties and to be deposed in respect to contributions, where acts of unions were neither relevant nor likely to lead to relevant information in that sole issue in case concerned decision of Commission to dismiss complaints against unions, and depositions involved unwarranted intrusion into political activities of unions that might well occur or otherwise interfere with their legitimate political activity in violation of U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. 1. Walther v. Federal Election Commission, D.C.D.C.1979, 82 F.R.D. 200.

16. Exhaustion of remedies

Exhaustion of administrative remedy under this chapter was not prerequisite to indictments under this chapter, even if administrative remedy applied to alleged violations occurring in 1974 prior to effective date of amendments providing for administrative remedy. U.S. v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 701, C.A.Or.1979, 638 F.2d 1161, certiorari denied 100 S.Ct. 1026, 444 U.S. 1077, 62 L.Ed.2d 760.

17. Declaratory judgment and injunction

Violator did not demonstrate sort of extraordinary intransigence and hostility toward the Federal Election Commission and the Federal Election Campaign Act which would support inference that he would remain likely to violate Act for remainder of his life and, thus, permanent injunctive relief was not justified, but rather injunction should have been limited to reasonable duration. Federal Election Com'n v. Furgatch, C.A.9 (Cal.) 1989, 869 F.2d 1256.

Injunction against political committees and their treasurer, prohibiting them from future violations of conciliation agreements entered into with Federal Election Commission, was appropriate, given that defendants had failed to act diligently in the past, did not face complex litigation, and presented possibility that they could commit further violations. Federal Election Com'n v. Committee of 100 Democrats, D.D.C.1993, 844 F.Supp. 1.

Nonprofit membership corporation's challenge to application of Federal Election Commission (FEC) regulation to corporation's proposed voter guide was not yet ripe for declaratory or injunctive relief to prevent enforcement action against 1990 voter guide where advisory opinion obtained from FEC dealt with corporation's 1988 voter guide, it was possible that minor changes in wording in proposed publication could preclude necessity for enforcement action, cost of voter guides would not exceed amount that triggered Attorney General's enforcement role, and it was possible that there would be no complaints and that FEC would find no violation in revised guides. Faucher v. Federal Election Com'n, D.Me.1990, 743 F.Supp. 64, affirmed 928 F.2d 468, certiorari denied 112 S.Ct. 79, 502 U.S. 820, 116 L.Ed.2d 52.

So long as Commission was investigating limited question whether in disseminating videotape of a computer reenactment of Senator Kennedy's accident at Chappaquidick, magazine publisher was acting in context of distribution of a news story through its facilities or whether it was acting in a manner unrelated to its publishing functions, so as to determine whether press exemption in this chapter was applicable, there was no basis to grant injunction sought by magazine publisher to enjoin Commission from proceeding with its investigation, in that press exemption in this chapter would not protect publisher if its dissemination of the tape had nothing to do with its press function as a magazine publisher. Reader's Digest Ass'n, Inc. v. Federal Election Commission, D.C.N.Y.1981, 509 F.Supp. 1210.

Injunctive relief against violations of spending limitations of this chapter was not warranted in that it was not shown that defendants did not act in good faith to attempt to cure violations, both parties acknowledged complexity of issues and facial ambiguity of at least some of the statutory provisions in question, and there was no indication that an injunction would be necessary in order to insure future compliance with contribution limits. Federal Election Commission v. California Medical Ass'n, D.C.Cal.1980, 502 F.Supp. 196.

In action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief against the Commission, alleging that it had failed to act timely on plaintiff's June 1978 complaint, charging that certain medical organizations had made financial contributions to candidates for federally elected office in excess of the $5,000 statutory limit, and to otherwise perform its statutory obligations, the carefully qualified conditions under which certain commission materials were being made available to plaintiffs did not make them public within the meaning of this chapter. Common Cause v. Federal Election Commission, D.C.D.C.1979, 83 F.R.D. 410.

18. Civil penalty

District court could assess $25,000 civil penalty for violations of Federal Election Campaign Act, though that assessment was essentially statutory maximum for expenditures involved in violation under circumstances, in view of evidence of absence of good faith, injury to public, violator's ability to pay, and necessity of vindicating authority of the Federal Election Commission; district court was free to conclude that absence of good-faith efforts by violator to undo or cure his violations was indicative of need for larger penalty to defer future wrongdoing and of need to vindicate FEC's authority, and serious nature of violations gave rise to presumption of serious public harm. Federal Election Com'n v. Furgatch, C.A.9 (Cal.) 1989, 869 F.2d 1256.

Federal Election Commission was entitled to penalty of $1,000 for violation of conciliation agreement by political committee and its treasurer; committee and treasurer were well aware of their obligation to file disclosure reports under the law and pursuant to conciliation agreement, yet they failed to do so. Federal Election Com'n v. Committee of 100 Democrats, D.D.C.1993, 844 F.Supp. 1.

Corporation which made illegal campaign contribution would be subject to penalty measured by costs incurred by Federal Election Commission in investigating prosecuting action, where record did not indicate the corporation was chronic violator of campaign finance law which needed stiff punishment. Federal Election Com'n v. NRA Political Victory Fund, D.D.C.1991, 778 F.Supp. 62.

Fine of $3,500 and injunction were appropriate remedy upon determination that mailing list company and its founder used Federal Election Commission tapes containing names of potential contributors to political organizations for commercial purposes in violation of Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, § 311(a)(4), as amended, 2 U.S.C.A. § 438(a)(4). Federal Election Com'n v. American Intern. Demographic Services, Inc., E.D.Va.1986, 629 F.Supp. 317.

Civil and criminal contempt citations were not imposed upon congressman's political committee or its treasurer for failure to obey default judgment directing them to file all outstanding reports required by Federal Election Campaign Act and to pay a civil penalty of $5,000, where treasurer, following entry of rule to show cause, filed all required reports and paid part of fine and proposed a schedule for the remainder, there were no underlying campaign financing improprieties or previously hidden misconduct, compliance came at great personal cost to treasurer, and treasurer's failings flowed largely from fact that he was unsophisticated in the ways of reporting under the Act. Federal Election Com'n v. Gus Savage for Congress '82 Committee, D.C.Ill.1985, 606 F.Supp. 541.

A civil penalty of $5,000 was reasonable and appropriate and would be imposed on each defendant for exceeding contribution limit of this chapter given complex constitutional and statutory questions surrounding case. Federal Election Commission v. California Medical Ass'n, D.C.Cal.1980, 502 F.Supp. 196.

19. Review by district court--Generally

Federal Election Commission's dismissal of Federal Election Campaign Act complaint due to deadlock in voting was judicially reviewable where FEC's General Counsel had recommended, due to Commission precedent, that Commission find "reason to believe" that violation had occurred and pursue complaint. Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Com'n, 1987, 831 F.2d 1131, 265 U.S.App.D.C. 372.

In reviewing decision of Federal Election Commission on issue of whether or not to investigate a sworn complaint alleging violations of the election laws, court must test Commission's decision according to standards commonly applied to judicial review of administrative decisions requiring reversal of agency action which is either arbitrary or capricious; sensitive nature of Commission's decision calls for judicial deference to the expertise of the agency which Congress has empowered to enforce the election laws. In re Federal Election Campaign Act Litigation, D.C.D.C.1979, 474 F.Supp. 1044.

20. ---- Arbitrary and capricious

Federal Election Commission's dismissal of portion of complaint alleging that political committee violated its contribution limits and reporting obligations when it treated contributions received as result of a mass-mailing as "earmarked" was arbitrary and capricious; candidates who ultimately received contributions were not "clearly identified" in the mailings and political committee exercised some "direction or control" over contributions at issue. Common Cause v. Federal Election Com'n, D.D.C.1990, 729 F.Supp. 148.

Factors which the court may consider in determining whether a failure of the Commission to act on a complaint is arbitrary and capricious include the credibility of the allegation, the nature of the threat posed, the resources available to the agency, and the information available to it, as well as the novelty of the issues involved. Common Cause v. Federal Election Commission, D.C.D.C.1980, 489 F.Supp. 738.

Federal Election Commission was not arbitrary or capricious in its decision not to investigate complaint alleging that certain political action committees were subject to same control and should have been regarded as one political committee for purpose of statutory $5,000 contribution limitation since complaint referred Commission to wrong statute, complaint did not state that any of candidates or their committees knowingly accepted donations from separate political action committees which were subject to the same control and did not present evidence that accused parties possessed knowledge of the illicit control, and since complaint, even when it stated valid charge, did so only in the most conclusory fashion. In re Federal Election Campaign Act Litigation, D.C.D.C.1979, 474 F.Supp. 1044.

21. ---- Contrary to law

In determining whether Commission's interpretation of section 441a of this title was contrary to law, task for court is not to interpret such provision as it thinks best, but rather a narrower inquiry into whether Commission's construction is sufficiently reasonable to be accepted by reviewing court; to satisfy this standard it is not necessary for court to find that agency's construction was the only reasonable one or even the reading the court would have reached if question had initially arisen in judicial proceeding. Federal Election Commission v. Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, Dist.Col.1981, 102 S.Ct. 38, 454 U.S. 27, 70 L.Ed.2d 23.

Federal Election Commission's decision is contrary to law if FEC has dismissed complaint as result of impermissible interpretation of law or if dismissal under permissible interpretation of law was arbitrary or capricious or abuse of discretion. Orloski v. Federal Election Com'n, 1986, 795 F.2d 156, 254 U.S.App.D.C. 111.

Judicial review of Federal Election Commission's decision not to investigate a complaint is deferential; court is to reverse agency only if agency's decision is contrary to law. Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Com'n, D.D.C.1990, 745 F.Supp. 742.

Commissioners' statement of reasons for preventing, by voting to deadlock, Federal Election Commission action on complaint that candidate and political action committee violated Federal Election Campaign Act was "sufficiently reasonable"; statement of reasons cited, inter alia, unequivocal denials by candidate and political action committee that they had collaborated in such fashion as to deprive political action committee's financial support of candidacy of its character as "independent expenditures," and disagreement with advisory opinion which served as basis for General Counsel's determining that political action committee's providing preaddressed envelopes in which contributions could be directly mailed to candidate and verified by "pledge card" was in-kind contribution. Stark v. Federal Election Com'n, D.D.C.1988, 683 F.Supp. 836.

Given extreme sensitivity of political expression and electoral process, failure of Federal Election Commission to pursue congressman's complaint expeditiously at all times in its handling of complaint weighed in favor of determination that delay in acting on complaint on or before eve of next congressional election was contrary to law. Rose v. Federal Election Com'n, D.C.D.C.1984, 608 F.Supp. 1.

Conduct of investigation by Commission into complaints of alleged violations of this chapter by an association and several of its state political action committees, and conciliation agreements which Commission entered into with association and its committees, were not contrary to law where, though time consumed by investigation was of an inordinate length, agreements resolved all but arguably one of the violations alleged by statutorily preferred method. Common Cause v. Federal Election Commission, D.C.D.C.1980, 489 F.Supp. 738.

21A. ---- Limitations

Sixty-day period for filing petition for review of Federal Election Commission decision to dismiss administrative complaint filed by treasurer of election campaign began to run on date of dismissal, rather than on later date on which treasurer actually received notice of dismissal. Spannaus v. Federal Election Com'n, C.A.D.C.1993, 990 F.2d 643.

Sixty-day limitations period for filing petitions for review of Federal Election Commission orders is jurisdictional and unalterable and cannot be circumvented by procedural devices; in particular, party who has failed to file for review within prescribed limitations period cannot obtain new filing period by simple expedient of filing new request for the same agency action. National Rifle Ass'n of America v. Federal Election Com'n, 1988, 854 F.2d 1330, 272 U.S.App.D.C. 121.

The 60-day period for seeking review of decision of Federal Election Commission dismissing an administrative complaint was not measured with reference to date on which Commission unanimously voted to accept conciliation agreements and close the file but, rather, from date on which the Commission approved the agreements and they became effective. Antosh v. Federal Election Com'n, D.C.D.C.1985, 613 F.Supp. 729.

22. Appellate review

District court's exercise of its discretionary authority in imposition of civil penalties under this chapter must be guided by sound legal principles and is subject to appellate review. American Federation of Labor and Congress of Indus. Organizations (AFL-CIO) v. Federal Election Commission, 1980, 628 F.2d 97, 202 U.S.App.D.C. 97, certiorari denied 101 S.Ct. 397, 449 U.S. 982, 66 L.Ed.2d 244.

23. Expeditious handling of complaint

The Federal Election Commission's handling of congressman's administrative complaint charging violations of the Federal Election Campaign Act and its position in congressman's subsequent litigation to compel FEC action were substantially justified and, therefore, FEC was not liable to congressman under the Equal Access to Justice Act, notwithstanding district court's granting summary judgment in favor of congressman on merits; FEC's attention to congressman's complaint was prompt and sustained, and FEC had no practical alternative to defending against congressman's suit to compel action due to congressman's advancing incorrect interpretation of FECA. Federal Election Com'n v. Rose, 1986, 806 F.2d 1081, 256 U.S.App.D.C. 395.

Federal Election Commission did not comply with statutory indication of speed with which it was required to act on congressman's complaint alleging unlawful practices during 1982 congressional campaign where Commission consumed approximately 172 days before it filed statement that it had "reason to believe" that violations had occurred and Commission allowed discovery to delay 1982 congressional election matter until it was competing with new 1984 election priorities. Rose v. Federal Election Com'n, D.C.D.C.1984, 608 F.Supp. 1.

24. Time of filing

Federal Election Commission's interpretation of statute [Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, § 309(a)(8)(B), as amended, 2 U.S.C.A. § 437g(a)(8)(B)] which measures period of filing petition for judicial review of Commission's dismissal of administrative complaint from "date of the dismissal," a procedural rather than substantive provision, deserved no special deference from district court. Common Cause v. Federal Election Com'n, D.D.C.1985, 630 F.Supp. 508.

25. Persons entitled to maintain action

Citizen who lived, worked and voted in Oklahoma lacked standing to contest failure of Federal Election Commission to act favorably upon his administrative complaint of political fund-raising improprieties in connection with reelection campaign of United States senator from Arizona. Antosh v. Federal Election Com'n, D.D.C.1986, 631 F.Supp. 596.

25A. Persons liable

Treasurer of political committees, as party to conciliation agreements settling violations of Federal Election Campaign Act, was personally liable for violation of such agreements. Federal Election Com'n v. Committee of 100 Democrats, D.D.C.1993, 844 F.Supp. 1.

26. Notice and opportunity for hearing

Federal Election Commission's determination that there had been no violation of Federal Election Campaign Act by corporate donations to picnic sponsored by congressman was not procedurally defective because of failure of FEC to give challenger opportunity to reply to challenged candidate's response to challenger's allegations. Orloski v. Federal Election Com'n, 1986, 795 F.2d 156, 254 U.S.App.D.C. 111.

Federal Elections Commission's inability to directly notify unknown respondent did not divest Commission of subject matter jurisdiction over investigation of Federal Election Campaign Act violation alleged in complaint on which Commission made reason to believe determination; Commission invited notice and opportunity to respond through attorney/private investigator hired by respondent, and there was no showing or suggestion of bad faith on part of Commission in launching investigation. Federal Election Com'n v. Franklin, E.D.Va.1989, 718 F.Supp. 1272, affirmed in part, vacated in part on other grounds 902 F.2d 3.

27. Sufficiency of notice

Letter by Federal Election Commission, which was sent to campaign committee for presidential primary and treasurer, which set forth sections of Federal Election Campaign Act and Presidential Primary Matching Payment Account Act that allegedly were violated, and which contained summary of factual allegations, satisfied Commission's obligation to notify campaign committee and treasurer regarding investigation of campaign. Spannaus v. Federal Election Com'n, S.D.N.Y.1986, 641 F.Supp. 1520, affirmed 816 F.2d 670.

28. Time of notice

Federal Election Commission was not required to notify campaign committee of presidential primary candidate that it sent questionnaires to some contributors to campaign committee, but was required to notify candidate only after Commission had made finding that there was reason to believe in existence of violation of Federal Election Campaign Act. Spannaus v. Federal Election Com'n, S.D.N.Y.1986, 641 F.Supp. 1520, affirmed 816 F.2d 670.

29. Remand

District court should have remanded, rather than deciding on merits, Federal Election Campaign Act complaint which Federal Election Commission dismissed in spite of FEC's General Counsel's contrary recommendation; while FEC was sending "conflicting messages" and appeared to be acting with an uneven hand when it dismissed complaint without explanation while leaving undisturbed apparently contradictory precedent, the Commission was entitled to a further opportunity to set its precedent in order so that it, and not a court of review, would serve as primary decision maker. 18 USC § 20 (e)(1) hist

PART E—RECEIPT OF STOLEN BANK PROPERTY

1. In general and present Federal law

This Part of title XI is designed to remedy a flaw in current 18 U.S.C. 2113(c). That statute punishes whoever receives, possesses, conceals, sells, or disposes of any property "knowing the same to have been taken from a bank, credit union, or any savings and loan association" in violation of the preceding subsection which proscribes theft from such financial institutions. The problem is that, in requiring knowledge that the property was taken "from a bank" or other federally insured institution, the section is unduly generous to wrongdoers. It does not permit a successful prosecution in cases in which the proof is overwhelming that the defendant acted culpably in that he possessed property he knew had been stolen but where no evidence exists to show that he knew it had been stolen "from a bank". Normally, it should not be necessary to prove scienter as to what is essentially a jurisdictional fact—here, that the property was stolen from a bank; and the inclusion of this gratuitous element in section 2113(c) has occasionally resulted in the unwarranted exoneration of the knowing receivers of stolen property.[1]

2. Provisions of the bill, as reported

Part E rewrites 18 U.S.C. 2113(c) making only one substantive change. In place of the existing requirement of knowledge that property was taken "from a bank", the bill requires only proof of knowledge that the property "has been stolen". Thus, it closes the loophole under which certain knowing receivers of property stolen from a bank have escaped conviction.

[1] See, e.g., United States v. Kaplan, 586 F.2d 980 (2d Cir. 1978); United States v. Tavoularis, 515 F.2d 1070 (2d Cir. 1975).

PART F—BANK BRIBERY

1. In general

This part revises and modernizes the statutory law dealing with bribery of bank officers. Sections 215 and 216 of title 18 presently cover the receipt of commissions or gifts by bank employees for procuring loans, but they are inadequate, unduly complex, and obsolete in many respects. For example, these sections do not reach bribery of employees of federally insured credit unions, or member banks of the Federal Home Loan Bank System, such as savings and loan associations, or of bank holding companies. The bill combines existing sections 215 and 216 to bring up to date the list of covered institutions and to make other improvements, including the prohibition of indirect as well as direct payments and an increase in applicable penalties. The proposal was contained in S. 1630, the Criminal Code reform bill approved by the committee last Congress,[1] and derives from legislation introduced a decade ago.[2]

2. Present Federal law

As noted, the commercial bribery aspects of Federal regulation of the banking industry are currently covered in 18 U.S.C. 215 and 216.

Under 18 U.S.C. 215, the officers, employees, and agents of banks the deposits of which are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, as well as certain other specified financial institutions,[3] are prohibited from stipulating for, receiving, or agreeing to receive anything of value from any person, firm, or corporation "for procuring or endeavoring to procure," for the giver or for anyone else, "any loan or extension or renewal of loan or substitution of security, or the purchase or discount or acceptance of any paper, note, draft, check, or bill of exchange by" any such bank or financial institution. The penalty is imprisonment for up to one year.

Significantly, this statute does not reach the bribe offeror, but only the recipient of the bribe, although the offering party can be punished by means of the aiding and abetting or conspiracy statutes. This statute has been held to punish receipt of a gift for procuring a loan even though the loan was completed before the gift or fee was received.[4] Because of the inclusion of the term "stipulates for," it has also been construed to proscribe the action of a bank officer who stipulated that a commission for obtaining loan from the bank be paid to a third party. The court found that Congress' purpose under this statute was to protect the deposits of Federally insured banks by preventing unsound and improvident loans to be made from such banks and that it was thus immaterial who received the commission.[5]

18 U.S.C. 216 is a somewhat broader statute that reaches payments made to employees and officials of Federal land bank institutions and small business investment companies. It punishes by up to one year in prison whoever, being an employee or official of the type described above, "is a beneficiary of or receives any fee * * * or other consideration for or in connection with any transaction or business of such association or bank, other than the usual salary or director's fee paid to such officer—or employee for services rendered." This statute also penalizes whoever causes or procures a Federal land bank institution or small business investment company to charge or receive any consideration not specifically authorized.

Experience under this statutory scheme has led to the conclusion that the above laws are inadequate and obsolete because they neither cover all of the individuals or institutions that should be covered nor all of the activities that should be illegal. As a result the Committee has endorsed the instant legislation that would combine 18 U.S.C. 215 and 216 into a single statute, punishing both bribe offerors or givers and bribe recipients, and expanding the institutions covered to include every financial institution the transactions of which the Federal Government has a substantial interest in protecting against undue influence by bribery (e.g., in addition to those presently covered under 18 U.S.C. 215 and 216, any member of the Federal Home Loan Bank System and any Federal Home Loan Bank; any institution the deposits of which are insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation; any credit union the deposits of which are insured under the Federal Credit Union Act of 1934, as amended, etc.).

3. Provisions of the bill, as reported

Part F rewrites 18 U.S.C. 215 and repeals 18 U.S.C. 216. New section 215(a) is recast broadly to prohibit whoever, being an officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney of any financial institution, bank holding company, or savings and loan holding company, directly or indirectly asks, demands, exacts, solicits, seeks, accepts, receives, or agrees to receive anything of value, for himself or any other person other than such financial institution, from any person for or in connection with any transaction or business of such financial institution. The phrase "in connection with any transaction," etc. adopts the comprehensive style of current 18 U.S.C. 216 rather than the narrower method used in present 18 U.S.C. 215 to list the specific kinds of transactions reached. Also, the new section clearly proscribes the receipt of anything of value for a third person, thus carrying forward the interpretation in the Lane case, supra. Subsection (c) defines the terms "financial institution," "bank holding company" and "savings and loan holding company" to include all the types of federal financial institutions as to which there exists a strong federal interest to safeguard the transactions against undue influence by bribery. Subsection (b) proscribes activities of the same scope as subsection (a), but with respect to the bribe offeror or giver rather than the bribe taker or solicitor. Subsection (d), like present 18 U.S.C. 216, includes an explicit exemption for payments by the financial institution of the usual salary or director's fee paid to an officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney thereof, or for a reasonable fee paid by the financial institution to such persons for services rendered.

The penalty for a violation of subsection (a) or (b) is up to five years in prison and a fine of $5,000 or three times the value of the bribe offered, asked, given, received, or agreed to be given or received, whichever is greater, except that if such value is $100 or less the offense is punishable by up to one year in prison and a $1,000 fine. This grading has the effect generally of increasing the level of the kind of offenses now covered by 18 U.S.C. 215 and 216 from a misdemeanor to a felony. The Committee considers this increase justified in recognition of the strong Federal interest in deterring such crimes as they affect the banking industry and in view of the seriously culpable nature of the conduct involved. Notably, violations of other analogous statutes, such as 41 U.S.C. 54 proscribing commercial bribery with regard to government contractors, carry felony penalties. An exception from felony treatment is, however, provided for an offense where the bribe is relatively insignificant in amount and thus is less likely to have affected the recipient's conduct.

PART G—BANK FRAUD

1. In general and present Federal law

The offense of bank fraud in this part is designed to provide an effective vehicle for the prosecution of frauds in which the victims are financial institutions that are federally created, controlled or insured.

Recent Supreme Court decisions have underscored the fact that serious gaps now exist in Federal jurisdiction over frauds against banks and other credit institutions which are organized or operating under Federal law or whose deposits are federally insured. Clearly, there is a strong Federal interest in protecting the financial integrity of these institutions, and the legislation in this part would assure a basis for Federal prosecution of those who victimize these banks through fraudulent schemes.

The need for Federal jurisdiction over crimes committed against federally insured and controlled financial institutions has been recognized by the Congress in its passage of statutes specifically reaching crimes of embezzlement, robbery, larceny, burglary, and false statement directed at these banks. However, there is presently no similar statute generally proscribing bank fraud. As a result, Federal prosecutions of these frauds may now be pursued only if the circumstances of a particular fraud are such that the elements of some other Federal offense are met. Thus, whether Federal interests may be properly vindicated through prosecution turns on whether the fraudulent activity constitutes a crime under some other bank statutes, such as those governing larceny or false statement (18 U.S.C. 2113 and 1014), or whether the fradulent scheme involves a use of the mails or telecommunications that would permit prosecution under the mail or wire fraud statutes (18 U.S.C. 1341 and 1343).

This approach of prosecuting bank fraud under statutes not specifically designed to reach this criminal conduct is necessarily problematic. Nonetheless, for some time the Department of Justice had considerable success in using such statutes. The most useful of these was the mail fraud offense, for not only had the statute been held to reach a wide range of fraudulent activity, but also its jurisdictional element—use of the mails—could generally be satisfied in bank fraud cases because the collection procedures of victim banks ordinarily entailed use of the mails. In 1974, however, the utility of the mail fraud statute was notably diminished by the Supreme Court decisions in United States v. Maze.[1] In Maze, the Court held that proof that use of the mails occurred in or was caused by a fradulent scheme was insufficient for conviction under the mail fraud statute. Instead, proof that use of the mails played a significant part in bringing the scheme to fruition would be required. In addition to the problems of proof posed by the Maze decision, banks' increasing use of private courier services for collection purposes in lieu of the mails has further limited the instances in which the mail fraud statute may be used to prosecute bank fraud.

The use of other Federal statutes to attack bank fraud as an alternative to prosecution under the mail fraud offense has also been circumscribed by recent court decisions. By virtue of the Supreme Court's decision last year in Williams v. United States,[2] the bank false statement offense, 18 U.S.C. 1014, may no longer be applied to address one of the most pervasive forms of bank fraud, check-kiting. In Williams, the Court concluded this form of fraud did not fall within the scope of 18 U.S.C. 1014 because a check did not constitute a "statement" within the meaning of the statute. As a result of this decision, the Committee has been advised by the Justice Department that it has been necessary to cease prosecution of numerous pending check-kiting cases. Similarly, there appears to be an absence of coverage with respect to some types of fraud in the general bank theft statute, 18 U.S.C. 2113. Although the Supreme Court recently held that section 2113 is not limited to common law larceny and reaches also certain offenses involving the obtaining of property from banks by false pretenses,[3] the Court noted that, by its clear terms, section 2113 "does not apply to a case of false pretenses in which there is not a taking and carrying away" of the property. These various gaps in existing statutes, as well as the lack of a unitary provision aimed directly at the problem of bank fraud, in the Committee's view create a plain need for enactment of the general bank fraud statute set forth in this part of title XI.

2. Provisions of the bill, as reported

Part G would create a new section 1344 of title 18, United States Code. Subsection (a) prohibits whoever knowingly executes, or attempts to execute, a scheme or artifice (1) to defraud a federally chartered or insured financial institution, or (2) to obtain any of the moneys, funds, credits, assets, securities, or other property owned by or under the custody or control of a federally chartered or insured financial institution by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises. The penalty for a violation is imprisonment of up to five years and a fine of $10,000.

The proposed bank fraud statute is modeled on the present wire and mail fraud statutes which have been construed by the courts to reach a wide range of fraudulent activity. Like these existing fraud statutes, the proposed bank fraud offense proscribes the conduct of executing or attempting to execute "a scheme or artifice to defraud" or to take the property of another "by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises." While the basis for Federal jurisdiction in these existing general fraud statutes is the use of the mails or wire communications, in the proposed offense, jurisdiction is based on the fact that the victim of the offense is a federally controlled or insured institution defined as a "federally chartered or insured financial institution" in subsection (b) of the proposal. This term is defined to include all financial institutions whose deposits or accounts are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, or the Administrator of the National Credit Union Administration, Federal home loan banks or member banks of the Federal home loan bank system, and any banks or other financial institutions organized or operating under the laws of the United States.

Since the use of bogus or "shell" offshore banks has increasingly become a means of perpetrating major frauds on domestic banks and the considerable delay in collections between domestic and foreign banks makes manipulation of foreign financial transactions an attractive mode of defrauding banks within the United States, it is intended that there exist extraterritorial jurisdiction over the offense. This means that even if the conduct constituting the offense occurs outside the United States, once the offender is present within the country, he may nonetheless be subject to Federal prosecution.

In sum, the scope of present Federal statutes is not sufficient to assure effective prosecution of the range of fraudulent crimes commonly committed today against federally controlled or insured financial institutions. The legislative proposal contained in this part would meet the need for a statutory basis for asserting Federal jurisdiction over such offenses and would thereby better assure the integrity of the Federal banking system.

"(ii) section 1341 or 1343 affecting a financial institution.".

(d) CONFORMING TERMINOLOGY IN BANK ROBBERY SECTION.—Section 2113 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (f), by striking "any bank the deposits of which" and inserting "any institution the deposits of which";

(2) by adding before the period at the end of subsection (h) ", and any 'Federal credit union' as defined in section 2 of the Federal Credit Union Act"; and

(3) by striking subsection (g) and redesignating subsection (h) as subsection (g).

(e) CREATION OF GENERAL DEFINITION OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTION FOR TITLE 18.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (b) of section 215 of title 18, United States Code, is transferred to the end of chapter 1 of such title.

(2) UPDATING AND TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS.—Such subsection (b), as so transferred, is amended—

(A) by inserting at the beginning the following section heading:

"§ 20. Financial institution defined"

(B) by striking "(b)";

(C) by striking "this section" and inserting "this title";

(D) so that paragraph (1) reads as follows:

"(1) an insured depository institution (as defined in section 3(c)(2) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act);";

(E) by striking paragraphs (2) and (8);

(F) so that paragraph (5) reads as follows:

"(5) a System institution of the Farm Credit System, as defined in section 5.35(3) of the Farm Credit Act of 1971;";

(G) so that paragraph (7) reads as follows:

"(7) a depository institution holding company (as defined in section 3(w)(1) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act.";

and

(H) by redesignating paragraphs (3), (4), (5), (6), and (7) (as amended by this paragraph) as paragraphs (2), (3), (4), (5), and (6), respectively.

(3) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 1 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new item:

"20. Financial institution defined.".

SEC. 963. CIVIL AND CRIMINAL FORFEITURE.

(a) CIVIL FORFEITURE.—Section 981(a)(1) of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

Real property.

"(C) Any property, real or personal, which constitutes or is derived from proceeds traceable to a violation of section 215, 656, 657, 1005, 1006, 1007, 1014, or 1344 of this title.".

(b) TRANSFER OF PROPERTY UNDER CIVIL FORFEITURE.—Section 981(e) of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in the matter before paragraph (1), by striking out "determine to—" and inserting in lieu thereof "determine—";

(2) by striking out paragraphs (1) and (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) to any other Federal agency;

"(2) to any State or local law enforcement agency which participated directly in any of the acts which led to the seizure or forfeiture of the property;

"(3) in the case of property referred to in subsection (a)(1)(C) (if the affected financial institution is in receivership or liquidation), to any Federal financial institution regulatory agency—

"(A) to reimburse the agency for payments to claimants or creditors of the institution; and

"(B) to reimburse the insurance fund of the agency for losses suffered by the fund as a result of the receivership or liquidation;

"(4) in the case of property referred to in subsection (a)(1)(C) (if the affected financial institution is not in receivership or liquidation), upon the order of the appropriate Federal financial institution regulatory agency, to the financial institution as restitution, with the value of the property so transferred to be set off against any amount later recovered by the financial institution as compensatory damages in any State or Federal proceeding; or

"(5) in the case of property referred to in subsection (a)(1)(C), to any Federal financial institution regulatory agency, to the extent of the agency's contribution of resources to, or expenses involved in, the seizure and forfeiture, and the investigation leading directly to the seizure and forfeiture, of such property."; and

(3) by adding at the end the following new sentence: "The United States shall not be liable in any action arising out of a transfer under paragraph (3), (4), or (5) of this subsection.".

(c) CRIMINAL FORFEITURE.—Section 982 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)—

(A) by inserting "(1)" after "(a)"; and

(B) by adding at the end the following:

"(2) The court, in imposing sentence on a person convicted of a violation of, or a conspiracy to violate, section 215, 656, 657, 1005, 1006, 1007, 1014, 1341, 1343, or 1344 of this title, affecting a financial imprisonment for 5 years and a $10,000 fine, although 18 U.S.C. 3571 authorizes the court to impose a fine higher than $5,000.[11]

Section 961(k)(2) makes technical and conforming changes. Section 961(l)(1) adds a new section (3293) to chapter 213 of title 18 of the U.S. Code to provide a 10-year statute of limitations for banking offenses. The present statute of limitations period is five years.[12] New section 3293 applies the ten year statute of limitations to (1) a violation of 18 U.S.C. 215 (financial institution bribery), 656 and 657 (financial institution misapplication and embezzlement), 1005 and 1006 (false entries in reports on financial institutions), 1007 (fraud on deposit insurers), 1014 (false statement or overvaluation), and 1344 (financial institution fraud); (2) a violation of 18 U.S.C. 1341 or 1343 (mail and wire fraud) if the violation affects a financial institution; and (3) a conspiracy to violate any of these sections. Section 962(l)(2) makes necessary conforming changes. Section 961(l)(3) provides that the 10-year period applies to all offenses committed before the enactment of this legislation, as long as the five year statute has not already expired.

Section 961(m) amends 28 U.S.C. 994(p) and section 21 of the Sentencing Act of 1987, which authorize the United States Sentencing Commission to promulgate and amend sentencing guidelines. Section 961(m)(1) directs the Sentencing Commission to assign to a serious banking related offense an offense level of at least 24. Section 961(m)(2) provides that section 961 applies to violations or a conspiracy to violate 18 U.S.C. 215 (financial institution bribery), 656 and 657 (financial institution misapplication and embezzlement), 1005 and 1006 (false entries in reports on financial institutions), 1007 (fraud on deposit insurers), 1014 (false statement or overvaluation), 1341 or 1343 (mail and wire fraud if the violation affects a financial institution), and 1344 (financial institution fraud) where such offense substantially jeopardizes the safety and soundness of a financial institution. Section 961(m)(3) provides that the requirements of section 961 shall expire on December 31, 1993.

SEC. 962. MISCELLANEOUS REVISIONS TO TITLE 18.

Section 962 makes miscellaneous amendments to title 18 of the U. S. Code. Section 962(a) amends title 18 to replace the term "Federal Home Loan Bank Board" with the term "Office of Thrift Supervision".

Section 962(b)(1) broadens 18 U.S.C. 212, which deals with offers of loans or gratuities to bank examiners, to cover financial institutions and the Office of Thrift Supervision examiners, as well as "banks". Section 962(b)(2) expands 18 U.S.C. 213, which deals with acceptance of loans or gratuities by bank examiners, to include financial institutions other than banks. Section 962(b)(3) repeals 18 U.S.C. 1009. Section 962(b)(4), (5), and (6) and section 962(c) make technical and clerical amendments.

Section 962(d) amends 18 U.S.C. 1510, which deals with obstructing a criminal investigation. Section 962(d) expands 18 U.S.C. 1510, to make it an offense for an officer, director, partner, employee, or attorney of a financial institution knowingly to notify certain persons that a grand jury has subpoenaed the records of a customer, in connection with the investigation of the possible banking offenses listed in 951(c). The persons to whom disclosure is prohibited are (1) the customer whose records are sought, or (2) a target of the grand jury investigation. The maximum penalty is 5 years imprisonment and a fine under title 18 of the United States Code.[13]

Section 962(e) makes conforming amendments to 18 U.S.C. 2113. Section 962(f) makes technical amendments to 18 U.S.C. 215 and makes the definition of "financial institution" set forth in 18 U.S.C. 215(b) applicable to all of title 18, by moving the definition into a separate section (20) of title 18 of the United States Code.

SEC. 963. CIVIL AND CRIMINAL FORFEITURE.

Section 963 provides for civil and criminal forfeiture in connection with title 18 offenses affecting financial institutions. Section 963(a) amends 18 U.S.C. 981, which deals with civil forfeiture. Section 963(a)(1) provides for civil forfeiture for (1) a violation of 18 U.S.C. 215, 656, 657, 1005, 1006, 1007, 1014, or 1344; (2) a violation of 18 U.S.C. 1341 or 1343 affecting a financial institution; and (3) conspiracy to violate any of the above sections. Section 963(a)(2) makes necessary conforming changes and authorizes the Attorney General to sell any forfeited property which is not required to be destroyed or is not harmful. Section 963(a)(2) also adds a new provision establishing a priority for the disposition of proceeds that have been civilly forfeited. First, proceeds are used to reimburse out-of-pocket expenses incurred for seizure and forfeiture by the Federal banking agency regulating the financial institution. Second, proceeds go to the Department of Justice to reimburse its out-of-pocket expenses for seizure and forfeiture. Third, if the affected financial institution is in receivership or liquidation, proceeds go to a Federal banking agency regulating the institution, to reimburse the agency for (i) payments to claimants or creditors or (ii) losses suffered by that agency's insurance fund as a result of the receivership or liquidation. Fourth, if the affected financial institution is not in receivership or liquidation, the proceeds go to the General Fund of the Treasury or, upon the order of the appropriate Federal bank regulatory agency, to the affected financial institution as restitution. Amounts received by the financial institution shall be set off against amounts later recovered by the institution as compensatory damages in a State or Federal proceeding.

Section 963(b) amends 18 U.S.C. 982, which deals with criminal forfeiture. Section 963(b)(1) authorizes criminal forfeiture for (1) a violation of 18 U.S.C. 215, 656, 657, 1005, 1006, 1007, 1014, or 1344; (2) a violation of 18 U.S.C. 1341 or 1343 affecting a financial institution; and (3) a conspiracy to violate any of those sections. Section 963(b)(2) provides that property forfeited for these violations shall be disposed of in accordance with the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (12 U.S.C. 853).

[13] Under 18 U.S.C. 3571, the court can impose a fine (1) for an organization, of up to the greater of $500,000 or twice the amount gained or the loss inflicted by the offense for an organization; (2) for an individual, up to the greater of $250,000 or twice the amount gained or the loss inflicted by the offense.

An Act to amend title 18, United States Code, with respect to certain bribery and related offenses.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, Bank Bribery Amendments Act of 1985.

18 USC 201 note.

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Bank Bribery Amendments Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. CHAPTER 11 AMENDMENT.

Section 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 215. Receipt of commissions or gifts for procuring loans

Law enforcement and crime.

"(a) Whoever—

"(1) corruptly gives, offers, or promises anything of value to any person, with intent to influence or reward an officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney of a financial institution in connection with any business or transaction of such institution; or

"(2) as an officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney of a financial institution, corruptly solicits or demands for the benefit of any person, or corruptly accepts or agrees to accept, anything of value from any person, intending to be influenced or rewarded in connection with any business or transaction of such institution; shall be fined not more than $5,000 or three times the value of the thing given, offered, promised, solicited, demanded, accepted, or agreed to be accepted, whichever is greater, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, but if the value of the thing given, offered, promised, solicited, demanded, accepted, or agreed to be accepted does not exceed $100, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

"(b) As used in this section, the term 'financial institution' means—

"(1) a bank with deposits insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation;

"(2) an institution with accounts insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation;

"(3) a credit union with accounts insured by the National Credit Union Share Insurance Fund;

"(4) a Federal home loan bank or a member, as defined in section 2 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act (12 U.S.C. 1422), of the Federal home loan bank system;

"(5) a Federal land bank, Federal intermediate credit bank, bank for cooperatives, production credit association, and Federal land bank association;

"(6) a small business investment company, as defined in section 103 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 662);

"(7) a bank holding company as defined in section 2 of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 (12 U.S.C. 1841); or

"(8) a savings and loan holding company as defined in section 408 of the National Housing Act (12 U.S.C. 1730a).

"(c) This section shall not apply to bona fide salary, wages, fees, or other compensation paid, or expenses paid or reimbursed, in the usual course of business.

"(d) Federal agencies with responsibility for regulating a financial institution shall jointly establish such guidelines as are appropriate to assist an officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney of a financial institution to comply with this section. Such agencies shall make such guidelines available to the public.".

Joint Resolution making continuing appropriations for the fiscal year 1985, and for other purposes.

TITLE I

That the following sums are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and out of applicable corporate or other revenues, receipts, and funds, for the several departments, agencies, corporations, and other organizational units of the Government for the fiscal year 1985, and for other purposes, namely:

Agriculture, rural development appropriations.

SEC. 101. (a) Such sums as may be necessary for programs, projects, or activities provided for in the Agriculture, Rural Development and Related Agencies Appropriation Act, 1985 (H.R. 5743), to the extent and in the manner provided for in the conference report and joint explanatory statement of the Committee of Conference (House Report Numbered 98-1071), filed in the House of Representatives on September 25, 1984, as if such Act had been enacted into law.

D.C. appropriations.

(b) Such sums as may be necessary for programs, projects, or activities provided for in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act, 1985 (H.R. 5899), to the extent and in the manner provided for in the conference report and joint explanatory statement of the Committee of Conference (House Report Numbered 98-1088), filed in the House of Representatives on September 26, 1984, as if such Act had been enacted into law.

Post, p. 1838.

(c) Such amounts as may be necessary for programs, projects or activities provided for in the Department of the Interior and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1985, at a rate of operations and to the extent and in the manner provided as follows, to be effective as if it had been enacted into law as the regular appropriation Act:

"(1) the term 'counterfeited' means a document that purports to be genuine but is not, because it has been falsely made or manufactured in its entirety;

"(2) the term 'forged' means a document that purports to be genuine but is not because it has been falsely altered, completed, signed, or endorsed, or contains a false addition thereto or insertion therein, or is a combination of parts of two or more genuine documents;

"(3) the term 'security' means—

"(A) a note, stock certificate, treasury stock certificate, bond, treasury bond, debenture, certificate of deposit, interest coupon, bill, check, draft, warrant, debit instrument as defined in section 916(c) of the Electronic Fund Transfer Act (15 U.S.C. 1693(c)), money order, traveler's check, letter of credit, warehouse receipt, negotiable bill of lading, evidence of indebtedness, certificate of interest in or participation in any profit-sharing agreement collateral-trust certificate, pre-reorganization certificate of subscription, transferable share, investment contract, voting trust certificate, or certificate of interest in tangible or intangible property; 15 USC 1693n.

"(B) an instrument evidencing ownership of goods, wares, or merchandise;

"(C) any other written instrument commonly known as a security;

"(D) a certificate of interest in, certificate of participation in, certificate for, receipt for, or warrant or option or other right to subscribe to or purchase, any of the foregoing; or

"(E) a blank form of any of the foregoing;

"(4) the term 'organization' means a legal entity, other than a government, established or organized for any purpose, and includes a corporation, company, association, firm, partnership, joint stock company, foundation, institution, society, union, or any other association or persons which operates in or the activities of which affect interstate or foreign commerce; and

"(5) the term 'State' includes a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, and any other territory or possession of the United States.".

(b) The analysis at the beginning of chapter 25 of title 18 is amended by adding after the item relating to section 509 the following:

"510. Securities of the State and private entities.".

Part E—Receipt of Stolen Bank Property

Sec. 1106. Subsection (c) of section 2113 of title 18 is amended to read as follows:

"(c) Whoever receives, possesses, conceals, stores, barters, sells, or disposes of, any property or money or other thing of value which has been taken or stolen from a bank, credit union, or savings and loan association in violation of subsection (b), knowing the same to be property which has been stolen shall be subject to the punishment provided in subsection (b) for the taker.".

Part F—Bank Bribery

Sec. 1107. (a) Section 215 of title 18 is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Whoever, being an officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney of any financial institution, bank holding company, or savings and loan holding company, except as provided by law, directly or indirectly, asks, demands, exacts, solicits, seeks, accepts, receives or agrees to receive anything of value, for himself or for any other person or entity, other than such financial institution, from any person or entity for or in connection with any transaction or business of such financial institution; or

"(b) Whoever, except as provided by law, directly or indirectly, gives, offers, or promises anything of value to any officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney of any financial institution, bank holding company, or savings and loan holding company, or offers or promises any such officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney to give anything of value to any person or entity, other than such financial institution, for or in connection with any transaction or business of such financial institution, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or three times the value of anything offered, asked, given, received, or agreed to be given or received, whichever is greater, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both; but if the value of anything offered, asked, given, received, or agreed to be given or received does not exceed $100, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

"(c) As used in this section—

"(1) 'financial institution' means—

"(A) any bank the deposits of which are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation;

"(B) any member, as defined in section 2 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, of the Federal Home Loan Bank System and any Federal Home Loan Bank;

12 USC 1422.

"(C) any institution the accounts of which are insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation;

"(D) any credit union the accounts of which are insured by the Administrator of the National Credit Union Administration;

"(E) any Federal land bank, Federal land bank association, Federal intermediate credit bank, production credit association, bank for cooperatives; and

"(F) a small business investment company, as defined in section 103 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 662); and

"(2) 'bank holding company' or 'savings and loan holding company' means any person, corporation, partnership, business trust, association or similar organization which controls a financial institution in such a manner as to be a bank holding company or a savings and loan holding company under the Bank Holding Company Act Amendments of 1956 (12 U.S.C. 1841) or the Savings and Loan Holding Company Amendments of 1967 (12 U.S.C. 1730a).

12 USC 1841 note.
12 USC 1701 note.

"(d) This section shall not apply to the payment by a financial institution of the usual salary or director's fee paid to an officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney thereof, or to a reasonable fee paid by such financial institution to such officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney for services rendered to such financial institution.".

Repeal.
18 USC 216.

(b) Section 216 of title 18 is repealed, and the section analysis of chapter 11 for section 216 be amended to read:

"216. Repealed.".

PART G—BANK FRAUD

SEC. 1108. (a) Chapter 63 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding a new section as follows:

"§ 1344. Bank fraud 18 USC 1344.

"(a) Whoever knowingly executes, or attempts to execute, a scheme or artifice—

"(1) to defraud a federally chartered or insured financial institution; or

"(2) to obtain any of the moneys, funds, credits, assets, securities or other property owned by or under the custody or control of a federally chartered or insured financial institution by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(b) As used in this section, the term 'federally chartered or insured financial institution' means—

"(1) a bank with deposits insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation;

"(2) an institution with accounts insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation;

"(3) a credit union with accounts insured by the National Credit Union Administration Board;

"(4) a Federal home loan bank or a member, as defined in section 2 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act (12 U.S.C. 1422), of the Federal home loan bank system; or

"(5) a bank, banking association, land bank, intermediate credit bank, bank for cooperatives, production credit association, land bank association, mortgage association, trust company, savings bank, or other banking or financial institution organized or operating under the laws of the United States.".

8th Cir jury instr - embezzlement (18 USC §659 A) (?)

COURT'S INSTRUCTION NO. _____

The crime of embezzlement of bank funds, as charged in Count ^C of the indictment, has five essential elements, which are:

One, the defendant was ^C;

Two, the defendant embezzled the funds of the bank;

Three, the amount so embezzled was more than $100.00;

Four, the defendant did so with the intent to defraud the bank; and Five, the bank was insured by the FDIC.

"Embezzlement" means the voluntary and intentional taking, or conversion to one's own use, of the property of another, which property came into the defendant's possession lawfully, by virtue of some office, employment, or position of trust which the defendant held. "Misapplication" means the unauthorized, or unjustifiable or wrongful use of a bank's funds. Misapplication includes the wrongful taking or use of money of the bank by a bank officer or employee for his own benefit or for the use and benefit of some other person.

To act with "intent to injure" means to act with intent to cause pecuniary loss. To act with "intent to defraud" means to act with intent to deceive or cheat, for the purpose of causing a financial loss to someone else or bringing about a financial gain to defendant or another.

Daniel M. BURKE, Defendant-Appellant.

Nos. 89-8051, 89-8052, 90-8057, 90-8058.

United States Court of Appeals,
Tenth Circuit.

Jan. 22, 1992.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Wyoming, Alan B. Johnson, J., of various bank fraud offenses, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Baldock, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) one defendant's death pending appeal required dismissal of his appeal and remand to District Court with instructions to dismiss underlying indictment; (2) agency relationship existed between defendant and bank, as required to support conviction for misapplying federally insured funds and making false entries in bank books and records; (3) superseding indictment did not impermissibly amend charges in original indictment; (4) defendant could be convicted of misapplication of bank funds based on his alleged failure to disclose self-dealing in connection with bank's investment in various securities; (5) defendant could be convicted for misapplying bank funds used to purchase subordinated debentures in bank holding companies; and (6) federal agencies acted within their supervisory capacities in securing and exchanging information concerning defendant's activities.

Affirmed in part, dismissed in part, and remanded.

[24] BANKS AND BANKING ⇐ 509.20
52k509.20
Defendant could be convicted of overvaluing security by submitting false appraisal report to bank in connection with loan, although bank did not receive report until after one year after loan was made and note matured; bank sought appraisal as condition of initiation and continuation of loan, and Government was not required to prove that bank actually relied upon the appraisal. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1014.

52k509.10
Defendant could be convicted of making false entry in bank records based on his meeting with member of board of directors which allegedly caused member to make false entries in bank minutes at subsequent directors' meeting; it was sufficient that defendant knowingly "set into motion" or knowingly participated in events which would necessarily cause false entries to be made. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 1005, 1006.

1486 Before ANDERSON, BALDOCK and EBEL, Circuit Judges.

BALDOCK, Circuit Judge.

This case involves the theft of federally insured deposits through a series of complicated financial transactions involving collusion, deception, self-dealing and conflict of interest. Defendants Don C. Davis and Daniel M. Burke diverted or misapplied millions of dollars at the expense of several banks and savings and loan institutions, and ultimately the United States treasury. [FN1] The fraud required false representations to, and the concealing of important information from, bank examiners, bank directors and bank officers.

> FN1. Defendant John Edmiston was charged in a single count, pled guilty and testified against Davis and Burke. Edmiston was the president of First National Bank of Evanston (FNBE), owned an interest in the bank through the holding company, and served on the bank's board of directors.

By superseding indictment, both defendants were charged with one count of conspiracy to commit offenses against and to defraud the United States (count 1), 18 U.S.C. § 371; nine counts of wire fraud (counts 2-10), 18 U.S.C. § 1343; five counts of misapplying federally insured funds (counts 11-14, 16), 18 U.S.C. § 657; three counts of making false entries in bank books and records or unlawful receipt of benefits (counts 15, 20 & 21), 18 U.S.C. § 1006. Davis also was charged in two counts of overvaluing security and making false statements (counts 18 & 19), 18 U.S.C. § 1014. After a ten-week trial in which the trial judge displayed consummate patience, the jury convicted Davis on fourteen counts including the conspiracy count (count 1), five counts of wire fraud (counts 3-6, 9), four counts of misapplying federally insured funds (counts 11-13, 16), two counts of aiding and abetting false entries (counts 15 & 21), one count of aiding and abetting in the unlawful receipt of benefits (count 20), and one count of overvaluing security (count 18). The jury convicted Burke on eleven counts, including the conspiracy count (count

1), three counts of wire fraud (counts 4-6), four counts of misapplying federally insured funds (counts 11, 12, 14 & 16) two counts of making false entries (count 15 & 21) and one count of unlawfully receiving benefits (count 20). The district court, for these pre-Sentencing Guidelines offenses, sentenced Davis to six years imprisonment and Burke to four years. These appeals followed.

[1] After submission of these appeals, we affirmed the imposition of civil monetary penalties against defendants based on violations of cease and desist orders of the Federal Reserve Board. Burke v. Board of Governors, 940 F.2d 1360 (10th Cir.1991). Burke died on December 6, 1991. Thereafter, the government filed a suggestion of death. Burke's counsel, on behalf of the family, opposed dismissal, seeking an appellate decision on the merits. We respect the wishes of the family, but the law provides a more advantageous resolution: "death pending direct review of a criminal conviction abates not only the appeal but also all proceedings had in the prosecution from its inception." See Durham v. United States, 401 U.S. 481, 483, 91 S.Ct. 858, 860, 28 L.Ed.2d 200 (1971) (per curiam) (footnote omitted), overruled on other grounds, Dove v. United States, 423 U.S. 325, 96 S.Ct. 579, 46 L.Ed.2d 531 (1976) (per curiam) (eliminating Durham rule for petitions for certiorari, but not for appeals of right). See also United States v. Williams, 874 F.2d 968, 970 (5th Cir.1989); United States v. Schumann, 861 F.2d 1234, 1236 (11th Cir.1988); United States v. Mollica, 849 F.2d 723, 725-26 (2d Cir.1988); United States v. Littlefield, 594 F.2d 682, 683 (8th Cir.1979); United States v. Bechtel, 547 F.2d 1379, 1380 (9th Cir.1977). Accordingly, as to Burke, we shall dismiss his appeal and remand the criminal judgment against him to the district court with instructions to vacate the judgment and dismiss the underlying indictment. See Id.

I.

The government's case involved five transactions. We briefly outline these 1487 transactions before reaching the merits of Davis's appeal.

A. Acquisition of FNBE

The first transaction involved the acquisition of the First National Bank of Evanston, Wyoming (FNBE) by EVCO, Inc., a bank holding company, by a group of investors. Defendants Burke, Davis and Edmiston, see supra n. 1, first sought to acquire FNBE in 1982. All were well connected with other federally insured financial institutions. Davis was a major stockholder, board chairman and president of the Stockgrower's State Bank Company (SSBC), the bank holding company which owned Stockgrower's State Bank (SSB). Likewise, Edmiston was a stockholder and board member of SSBC. Burke was a board member of Guaranty Federal Bank (GFB).

Ultimately, the Federal Reserve Bank approved a $10 million acquisition of FNBE by a different investor group (the Burke group) with no more than a 3:1 debt-to-equity ratio ($7.5 million of debt) and no involvement of Davis and coinvestor Robert L. Anderson. Based on a series of false representations by Davis and Burke, however, the acquisition was financed for $12.5 million by Omaha National Bank, SSB, GFB and Provident Federal Bank. With the assistance of Burke, Davis directed the wire transfer of over $2 million for uses unrelated to the acquisition of FNBE. A total of $3.1 million of the acquisition funding was diverted to Davis and Anderson.

B. GFB Purchase of Bank Holding Company Securities

GFB, and its wholly owned subsidiary Powder River Service Corp. (PRSC), purchased $1.5 million in subordinated debentures and $1 million in preferred stock issued by EVCO and another bank holding company, SSBC. Burke and Davis exercised control of GFB as part of a group which had majority stock ownership. While Burke served as a director, Davis frequently gave financial advice to the board and attended several GFB board meetings. Burke and Davis were instrumental in persuading GFB's president, Tom Hogan, to purchase these securities. See X Tr. 60. The proceeds were to enable EVCO and SSBC to activate Wyoming Financial Services (WFS), a recently formed corporation. In reality, WFS served as a conduit to funnel approximately $701,000 to Davis and $54,000 to Burke. See XII Tr. 100-11.

C. Elkhorn Land Deal

[2] In May 1984, a limited partnership, in which PRSC had an 84% interest, purchased land owned by the Elkhorn Land and Livestock Company. Burke and Davis persuaded the GFB Board to fund PRSC's participation in the amount of $1.65 million, with the understanding that the proceeds would be used to pay existing indebtedness on the land. Only $1.15 million was used for that purpose; Davis received the remaining $500,000 as a secret commission. Several months later, Burke and Davis had GFB's attorney prepare a "clarifying" minute entry indicating that the commission had been authorized by the GFB board when, in fact, it had not. See Pl. ex. 914; VIII R.S. 19. Although Burke abstained from the vote on the amendment, he and Davis took steps leading to its preparation. GFB executive vice-president Mike Brown approved the amendment only because he did not want to be fired. XXXII Tr. 31. [FN2]

FN2. Our resolution of these appeals has been delayed substantially because the transcript consists of over one-hundred volumes in an order which does not allow for ready reference or chronological review. For example, the testimony of various witnesses is contained out of order in supplemental volumes. We note that the pages of a transcript should be numbered in a single series of consecutive page numbers for each proceeding, regardless of the number of days involved. Given the magnitude of this trial, all pages should have been numbered consecutively for the entire multiple-volume transcript and we so direct for the future. See VI Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, Guide to Judiciary Policies and Procedures-Court Reporters' Manual ch. XVIII, pt. k(2) (example set 2) (Oct. 91).

D. Dakota Minerals Deal

Burke and Davis agreed to purchase stock in Dakota Minerals, Inc. (Dakota) and initially secure a $1.75 million loan for Dakota. 1488 Dakota would pay a future fee of $4 million and grant stock options to Burke and Davis for their assistance in securing additional financing. At a GFB board meeting in June 1984, Burke and Davis advocated a $1.75 million loan to Dakota and Burke voted in favor of it, all without mention of their personal interest in the loan. The agreement between Davis, Burke and Dakota, though partially performed, was never executed. Davis and Burke expressed apprehension about signing the agreement when bank examiners were examining GFB.

E. GFB Loan to Tired Iron, Inc.

The final transaction concerned GFB's $650,000 loan to Tired Iron, a company owned by Davis. Davis agreed to provide an itemized list of collateral (aircraft parts, supplies and tools) with a value of $893,000 to secure the note. Pl. ex. 739, 747 & 751. Almost a year later, Davis provided the list which appraised the collateral at $1.45 million. Pl. ex. 752. The appraisal was done by Jay Johnson at the request and direction of Davis. Johnson had seen the parts one or two years previously, but did not inspect the inventory at the time he provided his estimate of a retail value of $1.45 million. The evidence tended to show that the parts were worth a maximum of $425,000 at retail and $170,000 at wholesale; a more realistic figure was $50,000 to $60,000, given a quick sale. Pl. ex. 754; XXXIII Tr. 42-110.

II.

[3] Defendant Davis first argues that his convictions under 18 U.S.C. § 657 and § 1006 are invalid because the trial evidence did not establish an essential element of those offenses, namely that Davis was an officer, agent or employee of a federally insured institution. "[T]he relevant question is whether, after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt." Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319, 99 S.Ct. 2781, 2789, 61 L.Ed.2d 560 (1979).

Under § 657, it is unlawful for a person who is "an officer, agent or employee of or connected in any capacity with" an insured institution to willfully misapply funds belonging to the institution. Likewise, under § 1006, it is unlawful for "an officer, agent or employee of or connected in any capacity with" an insured institution to make any false entry into its books, or, with intent to defraud the institution, to participate in or receive any money or other benefits through any transaction or act of the institution. [FN3]

FN3. We note that the parallel statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1005 (pertaining to national banks), does not contain the class limitation contained in §§ 656, 657 and 1006. See United States v. Edick, 432 F.2d 350, 352 (4th Cir.1970).

Davis was not an officer or employee of GFB, and he argues that no evidence indicates that he acted as an agent of GFB. He points to cross-examination of Tom Hogan, president of GFB, and Art Volk, board chairman of GFB, wherein these witnesses responded that Davis was not an agent of GFB. Merely because Davis had not been designated as an agent of GFB does not preclude a trier of fact from determining that an agency relationship existed based upon conduct. As important, the government was required to prove only that Davis was a person "connected in any capacity with" an insured financial institution for purposes of §§ 657 and 1006. [FN4]

FN4. Davis cites the district court's order granting bail pending appeal for the proposition that the district court "conceded that the factual predicate for liability under the statutes was lacking" when it indicated that Davis was neither an employee or officer or an agent of GFB. See Davis's Brief at 26 (citing VI R. doc. 431 at 18). Not so. The district court determined that Davis acquired GFB stock for himself and for nominees and served as a financial consultant to GFB. From these operative facts and its prescient view of the broad construction we would afford §§ 657 and 1006, the district court reasoned that Davis was indeed "connected in any capacity with" an insured financial institution.

[4] During the period alleged in the superseding indictment, Burke was a director of GFB and Davis often attended board meetings, providing financial advice to the 1489 GFB board and its president. See XXXII Tr. 37; III S.R. 11; VIII S.R. 119, 122. Burke and Davis were able to acquire control of a majority of GFB shares and, hence, controlled the GFB board. [FN5] See, e.g., XXIII Tr. 17. Although Davis argues that he was not a financial consultant to GFB, the testimony of Tom Hogan, the former president of GFB, certainly indicates otherwise. See, e.g., VII R.S. 34; VIII R.S. 21, 62-64, 83-84, 119; IX R.S. 10, 66. A consulting contract or agreement was not required. One cannot read this transcript in its entirety and fail to develop a definite and firm conviction that Burke and Davis were tireless in their self-dealing when it came to influencing bank transactions. [FN6]

FN5. Davis contends that he owned only 1.6% (4,600) of GFB shares. See Davis's Brief at 18 n. 15 & Reply Brief at 7. This conveniently ignores the GFB shares he purchased through nominees. Moreover, we look to Davis's effective control over the board given his alliance with Burke and other shareholders. When GFB was converted from a mutual company to a stock owned bank, Burke and Davis caused the number of directors on the GFB board to be reduced from twelve to five (one of whom was Burke), and made clear to remaining directors that it was their way or the highway.

FN6. Davis's implication that he was a mere customer of GFB (and therefore not liable under §§ 657 and 1007) is flatly contradicted by the record. Moreover, we note that a bank customer may be convicted as an aider and abetter under these statutes when the principal (an officer, agent, employee or other person connected in any capacity of trust with the institution) is found guilty of the offense. See United States v. Giordano, 489 F.2d 327, 330 (2d Cir.1973); United States v. Tornabene, 222 F.2d 875, 878 (3d Cir.1955). We note that the jury did indeed convict Davis of aiding and abetting Burke on some of the counts.

Davis contends, however, that only "officers, agents, or employees" who are "connected in any capacity with" an insured financial institution may be found liable under §§ 657 and 1006. According to Davis, "[t]he statutes apply only to officers, agents or employees, but allow those persons to be officers, agents or employees of [the institution] or, alternatively, officers, agents or employees connected in any capacity to [the institution]." Davis's Brief at 20. Davis further contends that § 657 requires the government to prove that a defendant had direct access to bank funds as an insider and used his position to victimize the bank.

Davis's construction of these statutes is too narrow. It would require us to strike out the following italicized words: "Whoever, being an officer, agent or employee of or connected in any capacity with...." 18 U.S.C. §§ 657, 1006. While the class of persons coming within the statutes is limited by a relationship of trust, and in the case of § 657, direct or indirect access to bank assets, these statutes are not limited solely to bank officers, agents or employees. Moreover, if the trier of fact determines that a principal within the class has committed bank fraud, a person outside the class such as a bank customer may be held liable as an aider and abetter. United States v. Cooper, 464

F.2d 648, 649-50 (10th Cir.1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1107, 93 S.Ct. 902, 34 L.Ed.2d 688 (1973); United States v. Tornabene, 222 F.2d 875, 877-78 (3rd Cir.1955).

We recently decided that the person "connected in any capacity with" language of § 657 should be given a "broad interpretation" in accordance with congressional intent of protection of federally insured institutions against fraud. In United States v. Ratchford, 942 F.2d 702 (10th Cir.1991), we held that a property manager who diverted funds from an apartment complex owned by two savings and loan associations was sufficiently connected to federally insured institutions to support conviction under § 657. Id. at 705.

> As president and owner of the managing company, defendant was aware of the savings and loans' ownership of the complex and that his ultimate responsibility was to these owners. It was in this position of trust that he diverted funds he knew belonged to these institutions to his own personal use.

Id. at 704. Although "each case is fact specific," id. at 705, several cases support the government's position that either (1) a stockholder who exerts control or (2) a financial adviser of a federally protected institution 1490 may be within reach of these statutes. Both persons occupy "position[s] of trust." See Id. at 704.

[5][6] In United States v. Prater, 805 F.2d 1441 (11th Cir.1986) (cited in Ratchford) the president of a real estate subsidiary wholly owned by an S & L was "connected with" the S & L under §§ 657 and 1006. Id. at 1446. The president of the real estate subsidiary had the power to initiate loans and the S & L board relied upon him for accurate recommendations concerning loans. Id. Those who serve a federally insured institution, whether in an employment context or in some other position of trust, are "connected with" that institution under §§ 657 and 1006. See id.; United States v. Rice, 645 F.2d 691, 693 (9th Cir.) (consultant retained by S & L to originate loans was "connected with" S & L under § 1006, notwithstanding he had no right to approve loans), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 862, 102 S.Ct. 318, 70 L.Ed.2d 160 (1981); United States v. Edick, 432 F.2d 350, 352 (4th Cir.1970) (employee of bank service corporation was connected with bank under § 656; "[i]t was because of his intimate relation to the bank's business and its records, in a position of trust, that he was able to divert its funds and make false entries in its records"). A connection with a federally protected institution may result from control through stock ownership, or control through the power to extend credit. Such direct control, however, is not essential to a finding that a defendant is connected with the institution. United States v. Payne, 750 F.2d 844, 855 (11th Cir.1985).

Garrett v. United States, 396 F.2d 489 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 952, 89 S.Ct. 374, 21 L.Ed.2d 364 (1968), presented circumstances analogous to the present case. In Garrett, controlling stockholders of a bank were charged with misapplication of national bank funds in connection with the purchase of mortgages by the bank. See 18 U.S.C. § 656 (proscribing willful misapplication of national bank funds by "[w]ho[m]ever, being an officer, director, agent or employee of, or connected in any capacity with ... [the financial institution]"). The bank paid face value for the mortgages; the seller then paid a large commission to a nonbank corporation owned by the defendants. The funds were deposited into a corporate bank account and immediately disbursed to the defendants by a series of checks. Defendants argued that because they were not officers, directors, agents or employees of the bank, they were not within the reach of the statute. The Fifth Circuit disagreed after examining the connection between the defendants and the bank. Defendants and their nominees obtained control of a majority of shares of the bank and arranged for the election of employees and associates to constitute a majority on the bank board. As controlling stockholders, defendants had a fiduciary duty not only to minority stockholders, but also to the bank. Id. at 491. Defendants participated in arranging the transactions resulting in their indictment. The court concluded that the "fact of ownership ... together with the activity ... in furtherance of control demonstrates a connection with the bank within the meaning of the statute." Id. at 491. The purpose of the statute is to protect and preserve bank assets. Id.

[7] On this point, no significant difference exists between the statutes in this case and the bank statute in Garrett. As noted, Burke and Davis exercised control of GFB and were active in the affairs of GFB. Davis's assertion to the contrary is not in accord with the evidence when viewed in the light most favorable to the government. See Davis's Reply Brief at 5. Davis further contends that he lacked direct access to funds, but § 657 does not require the government to prove that Davis performed the ministerial task of disbursement.

III.

[8] Davis next argues that wire fraud counts 2-10, occurring in March and April, 1983, were time-barred because the superseding indictment was not returned until August 18, 1988, outside the five year limitation period. See 18 U.S.C. § 3282. Although the original indictment in this case was returned within the limitation period 1491 (November 13, 1987), Davis contends that the superseding indictment impermissibly broadened or substantially amended these charges.

[9][10][11] The date of the original indictment tolls the limitations period as to charges alleged. See United States v. Jones, 816 F.2d 1483, 1487 (10th Cir.1987). A superseding indictment filed while the first indictment is validly pending is not barred by the statute of limitations unless it broadens or substantially amends the charges in the first indictment. United States v. Schmick, 904 F.2d 936, 940 (5th Cir.1990), cert. denied, ---U.S. ----, 111 S.Ct. 782, 112 L.Ed.2d 845 (1991); United States v. Grady, 544 F.2d 598, 602 (2d Cir.1976). "[N]otice is the touchstone in deciding whether a superseding indictment substantially changes the original charges." United States v. Gengo, 808 F.2d 1, 3 (2d Cir.1986). If the allegations and charges contained in the superseding indictment are "substantially the same" as those contained in the original indictment, sufficient notice is presumed. See Schmick, 904 F.2d at 940.

[12] The two indictments allege identical wire transfers as part of a scheme to defraud. Davis claims that the superseding indictment changed the entire theory of criminal liability from a scheme to transfer $20 million for the benefit of the defendants to a scheme to obtain control of three financial institutions, FNBE, SSB and GFB. See Davis's Brief at 23; Reply Brief at 10-12. The wire fraud counts incorporate the conspiracy count which was modified in the superseding indictment. Davis notes that the conspiracy count of the superseding indictment did not include a previously named defendant and omitted various objects of the conspiracy (offenses under 18 U.S.C. §§ 1001 and 1005). Davis's Brief at 23. Davis also points out that additional objects of the conspiracy were added, namely the commission of offenses under 18 U.S.C. §§ 1006 and 1014. An indictment is not amended impermissibly by a superseding indictment which names a greater or lesser number of defendants as coconspirators or contains a slightly different mix of closely related statutory violations as objects of the conspiracy, provided the essential nature of the conspiracy alleged in the first indictment remains the same. See United States v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 785 F.2d 777, 779 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 988, 107 S.Ct. 580, 93 L.Ed.2d 583 (1986); United States v. Panebianco, 543 F.2d 447, 454 (2d Cir.1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1103, 97 S.Ct. 1129, 51 L.Ed.2d 553 (1977).

For purposes of the scheme or artifice to defraud incorporated into the wire fraud counts, we are satisfied that the conspiracy count in the original indictment covered not only Davis's control activities, [FN7] but also transactions including (1) the acquisition of FNBE with $12.5 million of debt, $3.1 million of which was diverted to Davis and Anderson, [FN8] (2) GFB's purchase of subordinated debentures and preferred stock from EVCO and SSBC, with certain proceeds diverted to Burke and Davis, [FN9] (3) the Elkhorn land deal and Davis's $500,000 commission appearing in the false GFB minutes, [FN10] (4) the Dakota Minerals transactions in which Davis and Burke had a secret interest, [FN11] and (5) the loan to Tired Iron, Inc. based on misvalued security. [FN12] Thus, Davis had prior notice of the conspiracy charged in the superseding indictment. Indeed, after a practical reading of the counts in question in each indictment, we must conclude "that essentially the same facts were used to charge almost identical offenses." See United States v. Charnay, 537 F.2d 341, 355 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1000, 97 S.Ct. 528, 50 L.Ed.2d 610 (1976). The wire fraud counts remained the same, and the conspiracy charge (which 1492 contained a description of the fraudulent scheme alleged in the wire fraud counts) was not materially different. See Grady, 544 F.2d at 602. Therefore, we must reject Davis's contention that counts 2-10 were time-barred.

III.

[13][14][15][16] Defendant contends that the district court erred in not submitting his "theory of the defense" instructions and instructing the jury that if the money invested by GFB in the subordinated debentures and preferred stock was used by the recipient corporations in the way promised to GFB, there could be no misapplication. [FN13] A defendant is entitled to correct instructions on defenses supported by sufficient evidence for a jury to find in defendant's favor. Mathews v. United States, 485 U.S. 58, 63, 108 S.Ct. 883, 887, 99 L.Ed.2d 54 (1988); Ratchford, 942 F.2d at 707. Still, a district judge has substantial discretion in formulating the instructions; our review is confined to determining whether the instructions as a whole sufficiently cover the issues presented by the evidence and constitute correct statements of the law. United States v. Pena, 930 F.2d 1486, 1492 (10th Cir.1991). Instructions are considered as a whole; a particular jury instruction is not be read in isolation. See Cupy v. Naughten, 414 U.S. 141, 146-47, 94 S.Ct. 396, 400, 38 L.Ed.2d 368 (1973).

FN13. The proposed instruction stated: No misapplication of bank funds results where the recipient of bank funds uses them for the very purpose for which the funds were disbursed. IV R. doc. 314.

Davis's "theory of the case" instructions are essentially summaries of the evidence in the light most favorable to the defense, [FN14] summaries more appropriate for closing argument. The trial judge's decision not to give such instructions was proper in every respect. See United States v. Barham, 595 F.2d 231, 245 (5th Cir.1979) ("theory of the defense" instruction properly refused when it "was essentially a recounting of the facts as seen through the rose-colored glasses of the defense--glasses [defendant] hoped the jury would wear when they retired to the jury room"). These summaries marshal facts supporting Davis's version of the events, and would preclude the jury from finding the elements of various charged offenses. After review of the court's instructions to the jury, we note that they adequately (and with commendable clarity) cover the essential elements of every offense charged and encompass Davis's defenses supported by the evidence such as reliance on expert advice, good faith, and approval by bank officials after adequate disclosure. See, e.g., IV R. doc. 332, instr. 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, 31, 32, 34, 36, 52 & 53.

FN14. See, e.g., Defendant Davis's Instruction No. [unnumbered] .... COUNT 1: Mr. Davis did not enter into an agreement with Dan Burke, John Edmiston or anyone else to commit criminal acts. While the government claims that he conspired to control three banks, the evidence clearly showed that Mr. Davis was attempting to sell his interest as required by government regulators. Davis's attempts to comply are being unfairly and improperly used against him. .... IV R. doc. 314.

[17] The other challenge concerns the district court's rejection of Davis's instruction concerning misapplication. Davis relies upon United States v. Payne, 750 F.2d 844 (11th Cir.1985), in which the court of appeals set aside misapplication convictions because the government failed to prove that the borrowers for whom the defendants arranged loans were not creditworthy, nor did the government prove the loans undersecured. Id. at 750 F.2d at 856-57. Payne does not support Davis's argument.

[18][19] Misapplication of bank funds under § 657 involves: "(1) the willful (2) misapplication (3) of money, funds or credits (4) of a federally protected bank." United States v. Harenberg, 732 F.2d 1507, 1511 (10th Cir.1984) (construing 18 U.S.C. § 656); [FN15] United States v. Twiford, 1493 600 F.2d 1339, 1343 (10th Cir.1979) (same). Misapplication may occur when an officer, director, employee or other person subject to the statute knowingly lends money to a sham borrower or causes all or part of the loan to be made for his own benefit while concealing his interest from the bank. Twiford, 600 F.2d at 1341-42. Misapplication of funds " 'occurs when funds are distributed under a record which misrepresents the true state of the record with the intent that bank officials, bank examiners, or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation will be deceived.' " Id. at 1341 (quoting United States v. Kennedy, 564 F.2d 1329, 1339 (9th Cir.1977), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 944, 98 S.Ct. 1526, 55 L.Ed.2d 541 (1978)). Thus, when a person within the ambit of § 657 receives material benefits of loans without disclosing this fact, misapplication has occurred. See United States v. Cooper, 464 F.2d 648, 651-52 (10th Cir.1972) (construing 18 U.S.C. § 656).

FN15. Section 656 is a parallel statute to § 657, whereas § 656 protects institutions insured by FDIC, § 657 protects institutions insured by FSLIC. United States v. White, 882 F.2d 250, 253 (7th Cir.1989).

The proffered instruction would have narrowed the test, instructing the jury that if a recipient of bank funds uses them for the purpose intended, misapplication cannot occur. This is an incorrect statement of the law. A borrower of funds may use them for the purpose intended, yet the bank insider (who may or may not be aided and abetted by the borrower) may not disclose other material facts surrounding the extension of credit, such as adverse borrower characteristics, inadequate collateral or self-dealing, and, therefore, commit misapplication of funds. See Payne, 750 F.2d at 856; United States v. Riebold, 557 F.2d 697, 700-01 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 860, 98 S.Ct. 186, 54 L.Ed.2d 133 (1977). Indeed, we have recognized that misapplication may occur when the funds are applied by the borrower for the very purpose intended, yet the bank insider has failed to disclose his interest in the transaction. See Twiford, 600 F.2d at 1340-41.

In Twiford, a bank officer and director made a $20,000 loan to a construction company president for operating expenses. The bank officer also indicated to the borrower that the officer knew someone that would cosign a construction bond for a $6,500 fee. A loan for $26,500 loan was made, and the proceeds applied to the borrower's satisfaction. The cosigning fee was paid to a fictitious party and "the jury concluded that through a series of transactions the sum had been channeled to defendant [bank officer]." Id. at 1341. Such lack of disclosure constituted misapplication.

[20] The theory underlying defendant Davis's proffered instruction is "that the money invested by GFB in subordinated debentures and preferred stock was used by the recipient corporations [SSBC and EVCO] in exactly the fashion promised to GFB [to invest in WFS] and, thus, there could be no misapplication." Davis's Brief at 26. The proffered instruction would have made irrelevant Davis's undisclosed self-dealing when it came to GFB's investment in the securities in question and thus was improper. Moreover, the trier of fact is not restricted solely to the immediate transferee of bank funds when determining whether misapplication has occurred. See Harenberg, 732 F.2d at 1511.

IV.

Davis argues that the district court should have granted a new trial because various counts of the indictment were faulty. Presumably, Davis seeks a new trial absent the evidence used to prove the allegedly faulty counts.

A.

[21] Davis contends that counts 11, 12 and 13 of the superseding indictment should have been dismissed. These counts charged Davis with willful misapplication of bank funds with respect to GFB's purchase of subordinated debentures in EVCO and SSBC, and PRSC's (a wholly-owned subsidiary of GFB) purchase of preferred stock in SSBC. The substance of Davis's argument is that Davis could not misapply funds "belonging to or intrusted in the care of" GFB. He points out that GFB invested the funds in bank holding companies (SSBC 1494 and EVCO), and the bank holding companies then spent only a portion of the funds to acquire an option in WFS. WFS then paid substantial sums to Burke and Davis.

Davis contends that these counts must be dismissed for three reasons: (1) he was not within the class to which 18 U.S.C. § 657 applies, (2) the grand jury did not indict him for misapplication of funds belonging to WFS, but rather belonging to GFB, and (3) as a matter or law, funds belonging to WFS cannot belong to GFB and cannot be the subject of misapplication counts 11-13.

We have rejected the first reason as discussed above. The second reason concerning the sufficiency of the indictment is without merit. Counts 11-13 incorporate by reference allegations in the conspiracy count indicating that the money was diverted to personal use through WFS; thus, the grand jury indicted on this theory. See II R. doc. 146 at 8, ¶¶ 13 & 15.

[22][23] The third reason, that GFB funds were not involved, is foreclosed by any number of authorities, including United States v. Harenberg, in which Judge Barrett, writing for the court, eloquently and firmly rejected such a grudging interpretation of § 656. First, GFB's decision to purchase these securities in amounts which exceeded the legitimate uses of these funds constituted misapplication of GFB's bank funds. [FN16] Harenberg, 732 F.2d at 1511; United States v. Farrell, 609 F.2d 816, 819 (5th Cir.1980). "The statute does not require that cash actually leave the bank before a violation occurs." Farrell, 609 F.2d at 819. Davis's concealed interest in these funds "did not suddenly materialize after the bank funds were disbursed to the borrowers; rather it existed well before." See Harenberg, 732 F.2d at 1511. Second, recognizing the infinite imagination for evil, see Genesis 6:5, including methods for misapplication of bank funds by those familiar, see Payne, 750 F.2d at 856, we have declined to apply the statute solely on "the flow of funds and the consequent changes in the incidence of ownership." Harenberg, 732 F.2d at 1511. Rather, we look at the substance of the transactions, even if multiple entities are involved. Twiford, 600 F.2d at 1341. It seems to us that Davis's invitation to apply the statute based solely on the exchange of property rights (e.g. subordinated debentures and preferred shares exchanged for cash), without regard to the concealed information and the substance of the transactions, is exactly the approach rejected in Harenberg, one which would "miss the forest for the trees." See Harenberg, 732 F.2d at 1511. Davis's attempt to distinguish Harenberg and Twiford as involving kickbacks to bank officers and directors is unavailing in light of our previous rejection of such a limited approach.

FN16. See VIII R.S. 31 which illustrates the wisdom of this construction: Mr. Pico: Mr. Hogan, had you known that Mr. Davis was going to obtain a substantial portion of the monies from the subordinated debentures and preferred shares, would you have invested those in behalf of Guaranty Federal Bank? Mr. Hogan: No. It matters not that Mr. Hogan viewed the investments as prudent at the time made; such view was based in part on material misinformation. Davis further argues that to the extent that the allegedly misapplied funds came from PRSC, a wholly-owned subsidiary of GFB, such funds are beyond the reach of § 657 because PRSC was not a federally insured institution. Davis relies upon United States v. White, 882 F.2d 250 (7th Cir.1989), which involved allegedly false statements made to a wholly-owned equipment leasing subsidiary of a federally protected bank under 18 U.S.C. § 1014. We view White as turning on a failure of proof; the government did not prove that the defendant knew that the false statements made to the subsidiary would affect the parent bank. See Id. at 254. The evidence indicates that PRSC never received the funds provided by GFB, rather, those funds were disbursed from GFB to SSBC and EVCO. Moreover, even had the funds passed from GFB through PRSC, ample proof indicates that the funds belonged to GFB or that PRSC was merely a conduit through which Burke and Davis exploited GFB. See id. at 253; Prater, 805 F.2d at 1446; United States v. Fulton, 640 F.2d 1104, 1105-06 (9th Cir.1981); United States v. Cartwright, 632 F.2d 1290, 1292-93 (5th Cir.1980); Sell v. United States, 336 F.2d 467, 472 (10th Cir.1964).

B.

[24] Davis next argues that the district court should have dismissed count 18 which 1495 charged him with overvaluing security by submitting a false appraisal report. Davis argues that because the appraisal report was not received by GFB until almost one year after the loan was made and after the note matured, [FN17] the appraisal report as a matter of law could not be for the purpose of influencing GFB to approve a loan to Tired Iron, Inc., as alleged in the indictment. He also claims that the airplane parts appraised were not collateral for the loan and that he did not in any way submit the appraisal to GFB.

FN17. The note may have matured, but it was not paid. XIV R.S. 35.

Viewed in the light most favorable to the government, sufficient evidence supports the charge that Davis was responsible for submitting the appraisal report to GFB and that the report valued the collateral for the $650,000 loan in question. GFB sought the appraisal as a condition of the initiation and continuation of the loan. Pl. ex. 747, 1260. Johnson, who prepared the appraisal, did so at the behest of Davis. XXXIII Tr. 29. Mike Brown, the executive vice-president of GFB, testified that the appraisal was part of GFB's records pertaining to Tired Iron, Inc., as a borrower. XIV R.S. 45. The jury could logically infer that Davis provided the late appraisal report incident to GFB's extension of credit. Having so determined, it is of no moment that the inflated appraisal report was furnished subsequent to the loan advance. United States v. Kindig, 854 F.2d 703, 706 (5th Cir.1988); United States v. Gardner, 681 F.2d 733 (11th Cir.1982); United States v. Baity, 489 F.2d 256, 257 (5th Cir.1983). The government was not required to prove that GFB actually relied upon the appraisal. See United States v. Goberman, 458 F.2d 226, 229 (3rd Cir.1972).

C.

[25] Davis contends that count 21 should have been dismissed because it alleges that on or about September 28, 1984, Davis and Burke made and caused to be made false entries in GFB minutes of October 3, 1984. According to Davis, "[i]t is factually and legally impossible for defendant Davis or any person to cause the falsification of a future wholly independent event." Davis's Brief at 34.

Under 18 U.S.C. § 1006, the government was required to prove that "(1) defendant made a false entry in bank records, caused it to be made, or aided and abetted its entry; (2) defendant knew the entry was false when it was made; and (3) defendant intended that the entry injure or deceive a bank or public official." United States v. Wolf, 820 F.2d 1499, 1504 (9th Cir.1987), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 960, 108 S.Ct. 1222, 99 L.Ed.2d 423 (1988) (construing 18 U.S.C. § 1005); United States v. Jackson, 621 F.2d 216, 219 (5th Cir.1980) (same). Although Davis contends that the events of September 28 and October 3 are wholly independent, such is not the case. To the contrary, Burke and Davis met with Ron Brown, attorney for GFB, on September 28, 1984, after inquiries by federal regulators, including inquiries about the Elkhorn land deal. XXX Tr. 37-41, 69, 140, 145, 155-56; 184-88; Pl. ex. 1170. The meeting was designed to respond to those inquiries, and therefrom would come the false minutes of October 3, 1984. Burke sat on the board which approved the minutes, although he abstained on the vote concerning the fraudulent amendment. The false entry in the October 3 minutes had its genesis in the September 28 meeting; a reasonable jury could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that Davis knowingly aided and abetted Burke in creating a false bank record, all in an effort to satisfy federal regulators concerning the previously unmentioned $500,000 Elkhorn commission paid to Davis. It is sufficient that Davis knowingly "set into motion" or knowingly participated in events which would necessarily cause the false entries to be made. See Wolf, 820 F.2d at 1504; United States v. Krepps, 605 F.2d 101, 109 n. 28 (3rd Cir.1979).

V.

[26][27] Davis next argues that the indictment should be dismissed or evidence suppressed because of government agency deception. Specifically, Davis contends 1496 that the Federal Reserve Board (FRB), the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (FHLBB) and the Office of Comptroller of Currency (OCC) violated the Right to Financial Privacy Act (RFPA), 12 U.S.C. §§ 3401-3422, when, beginning in August 1984, these agencies (along with the Wyoming State Examiner's Office) exchanged information and transferred financial records pertaining to Davis's bank transactions. Davis's Brief at 35-36. In response to a similar argument by Davis in a civil enforcement proceeding, we held that RFPA was not violated by the FRB requested information from the above supervisory agencies in pursuit of its supervisory responsibilities. Burke, 940 F.2d at 1368. We are satisfied that the above agencies acted within their supervisory capacities [FN18] in securing and exchanging information concerning Davis's activities with respect to bank holding companies and individual banks. [FN19] See 12 U.S.C. §§ 3401(7), 3412(d), & 3413(b). Therefore, we must conclude that RFPA did not apply to the information disclosed by these agencies concerning Davis's bank transactions. See Burke, 940 F.2d at 1368; Adams v. Board of Governors, 855 F.2d 1336, 1345 (8th Cir.1988). Moreover, even had the RFPA been violated, we agree with the district court that suppression is not an available remedy, nor is dismissal of an indictment. See LVI Tr. 81; 12 U.S.C. § 3417(d); United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 442-43, 96 S.Ct. 1619, 1624, 48 L.Ed.2d 71 (1976); United States v. Kingston, 801 F.2d 733, 737 (5th Cir.1986), cert. denied, 481 U.S. 1014, 107 S.Ct. 1888, 95 L.Ed.2d 495 (1987); United States v. Frazin, 780 F.2d 1461, 1464-66 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 844, 107 S.Ct. 158, 93 L.Ed.2d 98 (1986).

FN18. SSBC and EVCO were regulated by the FRB; FNBE by the OCC; SSB by the FDIC and the Wyoming State Examiner's Office; and GFB by the FHLBB.

FN19. We note that an additional exception to RTPA now in effect, 12 U.S.C. § 3413(l), would encompass the disclosures in this case.

[28] Davis next contends that the FRB induced him participate in a meeting on June 7, 1985, to discuss financial problems of SSBC and EVCO, without revealing to him that, two days earlier, the FRB had sent a criminal referral to the United States Attorney. The criminal referral identified "eight or nine insiders" of SSBC and EVCO as the targets. The referral was drafted not later than May 2, 1985, but was not received by the U.S. Attorney until June 10, 1985. Def. ex. 2038, 2039. Davis seeks suppression of statements made during the meeting or dismissal of the indictment.

The district court denied a suppression motion concerning statements from an earlier FRB meeting in which Davis participated, along with other bank officers. XLI Tr. 93, 105-08. The district court determined that no custodial interrogation was involved. The June 7, 1985, meeting also involved the boards of directors from EVCO and SSBC and various Federal Reserve System personnel. Ron Brown was present and was representing Davis, as well as other directors. The purpose of the June 7, 1985, meeting was to present cease and desist orders to EVCO, SSBC and various individuals. XLI Tr. 133. The Federal Reserve System attorney, who had worked on the criminal referral, indicated that written plans submitted by the boards in response to the consent orders would be accepted if reasonable, and that "the Fed was trying to obtain remedial rather than punitive actions." Pl. ex. 809 at 1; XLI Tr. 159, 161-62.

Also discussed were various supervisory issues, raised at the earlier meeting, which are material to the criminal prosecution. For example, Davis was asked the whereabouts of $475,000 supplied by the holding companies to WFS. XLI Tr. 134. He referred his questioner to the books of WFS. Id. Likewise, in response to questions, Davis stated that he was not a shareholder, officer or director of WFS, but did receive consulting fees. Id. He also indicated that he had attended EVCO board meetings. Pl. ex. 809 at 3. Despite the potential overlap between the civil and criminal cases, Maryann Hunter of the Federal Reserve testified that "we were trying to correct the problems on the supervisory issues that we had through our civil type actions in a remedial type of way." XLI Tr. 161.

1497 There is no proof of custodial interrogation at the June 7, 1985, meeting. Accordingly, the safeguards of the Fifth Amendment, as interpreted in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S.Ct. 1602, 16 L.Ed.2d 694 (1966), were unnecessary. See Beckwith v. United States, 425 U.S. 341, 347-48, 96 S.Ct. 1612, 1617, 48 L.Ed.2d 1 (1976) (Miranda warnings not required during noncustodial interview pursuant to criminal tax investigation). Moreover, in denying the closely related suppression motion concerning statements made at the earlier meeting, the district court implicitly rejected the idea that the June 7, 1985, meeting was part of "a pattern of trickery on behalf of the government," XLI Tr. 103, in which the government was using the administrative process to obtain criminal information. See XLI Tr. 108. This implicit finding is not clearly erroneous.

[29] A government agency charged with bank oversight may well develop information in civil matters which may be relevant in a potential criminal prosecution. United States v. Copple, 827 F.2d 1182, 1189 (8th Cir.1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1073, 108 S.Ct. 1046, 98 L.Ed.2d 1009 (1988). Although the agency did not tell the parties concerning the referral, Davis has not come forward with evidence on his due process claim indicative of either (1) reasonable reliance on this deliberate omission, or (2) prejudice resulting from such reliance. See United States v. Caceres, 440 U.S. 741, 752-53, 99 S.Ct. 1465, 1472, 59 L.Ed.2d 733 (1979); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 573, 85 S.Ct. 476, 485, 13 L.Ed.2d 487 (1965). Accordingly, we reject it just as the district court apparently did.

VI.

[30][31] Davis next argues that he should have received a new trial based upon prosecutorial misconduct, specifically a sentencing memorandum filed by the government. See V R. Doc. 355. Although we see many a thin argument at the court of appeals, we are hard pressed to determine how the sentencing memorandum (postverdict) would require a new trial, even if it did net the government some press coverage. See V R. doc. 357, ex. A. In any event, we reject the notion that Fed.R.Crim.P. 32(a)(1), which provides that "[t]he attorney for the government shall have an equivalent opportunity to speak to the court," precludes the filing of a written sentencing memorandum. [FN20] For instances of such memoranda being filed by the government, see United States v. Ruminer, 786 F.2d 381, 385-86 (1986) and United States v. Salas, 824 F.2d 751, 752-53 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 969, 108 S.Ct. 465, 98 L.Ed.2d 404 (1987). Only if the government's sentencing memorandum is incorporated expressly into the presentence report and the defendant objects to material contained in the memorandum, would compliance with Fed.R.Crim.P. 32(c)(3)(D) (objections to the presentence report) be necessary. Salas, 824 F.2d at 753.

FN20. No common law right of allocution existed for the government. See 3 Charles A. Wright, Federal Practice & Procedure-Criminal § 525 at 87 (1982). The provision in Rule 32 was added in 1975 and requires that the government attorney be heard, if he so chooses. Id.

VII.

[32][33][34] Defense counsel requests a writ of mandamus requiring the district court to process his interim vouchers for payment of fees and expenses pursuant 18 U.S.C. § 3006A. [FN21] Counsel was appointed over his objection on March 23, 1988, and represents that he has yet to receive any interim payments, despite compliance with the district court's order on the subject, which was approved by the Chief Judge of the Tenth Circuit. See VII Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Guide to Judiciary Policies & Procedures app. E 1498 (interim payments to counsel). In seeking mandamus, however, we note that counsel has not complied with Fed.R.App. 21(a) concerning the requirement of filing a separate petition and proof of service on the respondent judge, as well as other parties below. We therefore deny the request, but without prejudice to a properly filed and served petition. [FN22]

FN21. Fee determinations by the district judge pursuant to the Criminal Justice Act are administrative in character and do not constitute final appealable orders within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1291. United States v. Rodriguez, 833 F.2d 1536, 1537-38 (11th Cir.1987); United States v. Walton (In re Baker), 693 F.2d 925, 926-27 (9th Cir.1982); United States v. Smith, 633 F.2d 739, 741-42 (7th Cir.1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 970, 101 S.Ct. 2047, 68 L.Ed.2d 349 (1981). 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(d)(4) requires that the district court "shall fix the compensation and reimbursement to be paid to the attorney" given a properly supported claim. The district court's order indicates that the district judge "will review the interim vouchers when submitted ... and will authorize compensation to be paid" and "payment [of] all reimbursable expenses." I R. doc. 101 at 2. The district judge will also review the final voucher and submit to the chief circuit judge for review and approval. Id. Here, counsel claims that the district court has not complied with its duty to review CJA vouchers and forward them for payment. We view this as fundamentally different from claims concerning the amount of payment and, therefore, conclude that the matter is cognizable under 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a).

FN22. Defense counsel also suggests that a new trial may be warranted if the failure to pay "resulted in an abrogation of Mr. Davis's rights." Davis's Brief at 45. After painstaking review of the proceedings below and in this court, we confidently state that no such abrogation has occurred. A new trial on this ground is not warranted.

Defendant Burke's appeal is DISMISSED. The criminal judgment against defendant Burke is REMANDED to the district court with instructions to VACATE it and DISMISS the underlying indictment against him. The criminal judgment against defendant Davis is AFFIRMED. The request of Davis's counsel for the writ of mandamus to issue is DENIED without prejudice to a proper application. All pending motions are DENIED.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Robert L. BAILEY, Kevin Kehoe, Robert M. Lang, and Harold J. Ticktin, Defendants-Appellants.

Nos. 86-2963 to 86-2965, 86-2982.

United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.

Argued June 3, 1988.

Decided Sept. 22, 1988.

Defendants were convicted of mail fraud for their roles in schemes to defraud the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and shareholders and depositors of particular savings and loan, and one of the defendants was also convicted of violating RICO statute, misapplying funds of federally insured savings and loan, and conspiring to misapply funds. On appeal by defendants after the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, 675 F.Supp. 1109, Nicholas J. Bua, J., denied defendants' motion to vacate their convictions and dismiss charges against them, the Court of Appeals, Manion, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence would not support finding two of the defendants intended to defraud FHLBB, FSLIC, or savings and loan's depositors and shareholders; (2) indictment charging mail fraud sufficiently alleged conduct that violated mail fraud statute, although charges were couched in intangible rights language, as trial evidence and arguments, along with jury instructions, established that jury necessarily found defendant's schemes were aimed at victims' property rights, so as to make mail fraud convictions proper; and (3) evidence regarding defendant savings and loan's president's acceptance of bonuses and making of loans supported convictions for misapplying savings and loan's funds based on his conduct.

Reversed in part; affirmed in part; and remanded with instructions.

Evidence would not support conviction for mail fraud in connection with condominium transaction, on indictment counts that alleged mailing of recorded mortgages from recorder of deeds to savings and loan institution as the mailing; similar mailings had previously been held insufficient to support defendant's conviction for mail fraud in connection with that part of condominium transaction financed by bank, and the mailings alleged in instant case were indistinguishable from those alleged in that other case.

MANION, Circuit Judge.

A jury convicted Harold Ticktin, Kevin Kehoe, Robert Bailey, and Robert Lang of mail fraud, 18 U.S.C. § 1341, for their roles in various schemes to defraud the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (FHLBB), the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation (FSLIC), and the shareholders and depositors of Manning Savings and Loan Corporation, a now-defunct savings and loan in Chicago. The jury also convicted Ticktin on one count of violating the RICO statute, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1962 and 1963, various counts of misapplying the funds of a federally insured savings and loan, 18 U.S.C. § 657, and one count of conspiracy to misapply funds, 18 U.S.C. § 371. We affirm in part and reverse in part.

I.
Facts

The evidence, taken in the light most favorable to the government, reveals that Ticktin was the President of Manning Savings and Loan Corporation, a state-chartered savings and loan insured by the FSLIC. Ticktin was also a member of Manning's Board of Directors and a shareholder in Manning, as well as President of Manning's wholly-owned subsidiaries, Manning Service Corporation and Manning Production Corporation.

During 1980 and 1981, Manning's net worth began to decline; by April, 1981, Manning's net worth was below the minimum level set by federal regulations, and still declining. Federal regulators met with Ticktin and the Manning Board of Directors several times during the Spring of 1981 to discuss the problem. During these meetings, the federal regulators advised Manning that the 1980 dividend the board had declared was inappropriate because of Manning's decreasing net worth. The regulators asked the board to refrain from declaring any further dividends and from increasing salaries for the time being. The regulators also discussed with the board the possibility of Manning merging with another financial institution or allowing the FHLBB or state authorities to take over should Manning become insolvent.

In November, 1981, the FHLBB entered a temporary cease and desist order against Manning, requiring Manning to reduce expenses, refrain from paying dividends, and recapitalize. At that time, Manning's net worth was almost $500,000 below the required level. A forced merger or takeover by state or federal regulators was becoming a distinct possibility.

Faced with the imminent prospect of a forced merger or takeover, Ticktin embarked upon the first of several maneuvers to manipulate Manning's net worth and keep the FSLIC and FHLBB at bay. In November, 1981, Ticktin, on behalf of Manning Production Company, agreed to purchase interests in five Texas oil wells from Dalco Petroleum Company for $1,500,000. Manning Production, that same day, sold the interests to ITEX for $4,000,000. Manning and Manning Production supplied all the financing for ITEX's purchase. ITEX gave Manning a $1,000,000 full-recourse note. ITEX also gave Manning Production a $3,000,000 note. The $3,000,000 note was a non-recourse note, so if the oil wells did not produce, ITEX would not have to pay Manning Production on the note. But the non-recourse language did not appear on the note's face, as is standard; instead, a separate side agreement provided that the note would be non-recourse.

Ticktin wanted to record a profit immediately from the Dalco/ITEX transaction so he could increase Manning's net worth immediately. Ticktin requested opinions from four certified public accountants regarding whether he could record a profit 1270 from the transaction; he wanted the answer in a hurry. The first two accountants told Ticktin that Manning could not record any profit from the transaction. The other two told Ticktin that Manning could record a profit. Ticktin accordingly recorded a $2,164,000 profit from the Dalco/ITEX deal, and reported that profit to the FHLBB. Ticktin, however, had not informed any of the accountants about the non-recourse side agreement; the belief that ITEX would be ultimately liable on the $3,000,000 note to Manning Production was a material factor in the opinions of the two accountants who advised Ticktin that he could record a profit.

James Scanlon was one of the accountants who approved the profit entry. Ticktin subsequently hired Scanlon's firm to conduct Manning's annual spring audit in 1982. While doing the audit, Scanlon attempted to certify that Manning had provided him with all documents concerning the Dalco/ITEX transaction. Ticktin assured Scanlon that Manning had provided the documents. However, Ticktin later misrepresented to Scanlon that Manning had released ITEX from personal liability on the $3,000,000 note in April, 1982.

Soon after the Dalco/ITEX transaction, Manning's net worth began to decline again. In March, 1982, the FHLBB challenged the Dalco/ITEX profit and drafted a proposed merger resolution for Manning. Sensing that Manning's net worth needed another boost, Ticktin returned to the oil business. In May, 1982, Ticktin instructed David Leibson, Manning's in-house counsel, to form a new corporation to buy oil and gas leases from Manning. Paul D. Olson was to be the corporation's sole shareholder. Manning and Olson were well-acquainted, and had a number of common economic interests. The corporation was named PDO Corporation (PDO).

On May 27, Ticktin, on behalf of Manning Production, purchased interests in three oil well leases from ITEX for $2,250,000. That same day, Manning Production sold the leases for $4,500,000 to PDO. PDO was eight days old at the time and had assets of $1,000, the amount of capital Olson paid in to start the corporation. To pay for the leases, PDO gave Manning Production a non-recourse note for $4,500,000. Ticktin recorded a $2,214,000 "profit" on the PDO transaction.

On July 14, 1982, an Administrative Law Judge found that Manning had improperly recorded a profit on the Dalco/ITEX transaction. The ALJ also found that Manning's net worth as of April 30, 1982 was negative $681,431. The ALJ entered a recommended order requiring Manning to meet its net worth requirements within twenty days or merge with another institution. The FHLBB adopted this order in October, 1982.

Against this background, Ticktin decided to take Manning into condominium financing. Jim Elliott and Kevin Kehoe, real estate brokers, were selling condominiums in a development in Orland Park, Illinois. First Security Bank of Glendale Heights, a bank in which Elliott had an interest, had been supplying the financing. After First Security ran out of money to finance the condominiums, Elliott turned to Ticktin. In late July, 1982 (shortly after the ALJ issued his recommended order), Ticktin agreed to have Manning finance 72 condominiums in Orland Park.

Kay Dwyer, Manning's vice-president, processed the loans. Manning's practice in the past had always been to verify borrowers' employment, deposits, and credit before making loans. Ticktin told Dwyer that she would not have to verify those items before making the Orland Park loans. Ticktin did tell Dwyer to obtain appraisals. Ticktin, however, told her what appraiser to use. The appraisals all came in together within two weeks and were merely photocopies, with only unit numbers changed. All two-bedroom units were appraised at the same price, regardless of location, as were all one-bedroom units.

Elliott and Kehoe sold the units at an inflated purchase price. Manning financed over 100 percent of the condominiums' true market value, and all but ten percent of the purchase price. The seller took second mortgages for the remainder of that price. Elliott and Kehoe received a commission of 1271 $15,000 on each condominium they sold. Elliott's commissions totalled $1,000,000 and Kehoe's $172,000. Ticktin knew about these commissions.

In September, 1982, the FHLBB was on the verge of closing Manning down. Ticktin told Elliott that he had to "book a profit to keep the regulators at bay." Ticktin felt that buying and selling condominiums would again be a good way to do this. On October 28, on behalf of Manning Service Corporation, he purchased 123 condominiums and nineteen mortgages in Forest Park, Illinois for $3,400,000. Ticktin simultaneously sold the condominiums, in blocks of multiple units, to ten purchasers that Elliott, Kehoe, and Lloyd Tuttle recruited. Ticktin agreed to pay Elliott a commission of $10,000 per unit.

Ticktin set the purchase price and the financing terms. Nine of the purchasers bought twelve condominiums for $804,000, and a tenth bought fifteen condominiums for $1,009,800. Manning financed 100 percent of the purchase price: Manning loaned 80 percent of the price to each purchaser, and each purchaser executed a second mortgage for the remaining 20 percent. Although Manning's loan files contained appraisals justifying the purchase price, those appraisals were rife with inaccuracies and misrepresentations. The condominiums were overpriced, and Manning actually lent more than 100 percent of the fair market value of each.

Ticktin engineered the Forest Park deal so he could book a profit, increase Manning's net worth, and stave off action by the FHLBB. He soon learned from his accountants that he could not record any profit unless he could show a 20 percent down payment from the purchasers. Ticktin therefore had to devise a plan to create the appearance of a down payment. Ticktin's first idea was to loan $1,649,160 (20 percent of the total price) to Olson, who would then return the money as a supposed down payment from the purchasers. This plan fell through when Olson refused to participate unless Ticktin paid him $50,000.

After Olson refused to participate, Ticktin told Elliott to find additional people to borrow money to use for the down payments. Elliott recruited his parents, and Tuttle recruited Robert Bailey and Robert Lang. All four executed documents borrowing $229,790 from Manning; at the same time, each received Manning's irrevocable commitment to buy back the loan at the borrower's option, and each signed a letter exercising that option.

The loans to Bailey, Lang, and Elliott's parents provided only $919,160 toward the appearance of a 20 percent down payment. Two sources provided the rest of the down payment. Manning "bought" (no money ever changed hands) second mortgage notes from Elliott on another set of condominiums in Worth, Illinois. Manning paid the face value of $363,020 for these notes, even though the first mortgages on the Worth condominiums were delinquent. Ticktin also coerced Elliott into returning $361,000 of his commission on the Forest Park condominiums. Ticktin told Elliott that unless Elliott rebated $361,000, the whole deal would be off because Manning needed that amount to record a profit.

On November 16, Manning wired $2,510,760 to Elliott's account at Sears Bank. That $2,510,760 represented the money from the notes to Bailey, Lang, and Elliott's parents, the money from the sale of the Worth second mortgages, and Elliott's total commission. That same day, Sears Bank wired $1,649,160 (20 percent of the total Forest Park purchase price) from Elliott's account to Manning. The money wired back from Sears Bank served as the down payment on the Forest Park transaction.

After completing the transaction, Ticktin asked an accountant whether he could record a profit. Ticktin wanted the answer "lickety-split." Because there appeared to be a sufficient down payment, the accountant told Ticktin that Manning could record a profit. Ticktin reported a $2,263,000 profit. Actually, no profit could be properly recorded because all the funds in the transaction originated from Manning.

All the time Ticktin was manipulating Manning's books, he was also drawing extraordinarily high salaries, bonuses, and 1272 other compensation. In 1981, Ticktin's salary was $85,000. By May, 1982, his salary was $100,000--despite Manning's precarious financial position and the FHLBB's express concern that Manning hold down expenses. Ticktin's 1982 compensation included much more than his salary. On January 5, 1982, Manning's five-member Board of Directors--which included Ticktin, Ticktin's father, Ticktin's wife, and Ticktin's father-in-law--voted Ticktin a $30,000 bonus. Ticktin himself voted to grant this bonus. Only four months later, on May 3, 1982, the Manning board (with Ticktin this time abstaining) voted Ticktin a $70,000 bonus for "the fantastic job that President Ticktin has done maintaining the net worth of the Association in these perilous times...." The times were indeed perilous but there was no net worth; Manning was insolvent. On December 16, 1982, two months after the FHLBB adopted the ALJ's recommended order that Manning increase its net worth or merge, the board (again, with Ticktin abstaining) voted Ticktin a $100,000 bonus "for the exemplary work that he has done turning the Association around and for the profits he has generated through Manning Service Corporation." The bonus was paid to Ticktin on January 26, 1983; one week later, the FSLIC closed Manning down.

Besides the salary and bonuses, Ticktin received substantial other consideration from Manning in 1982. In April, 1982, Ticktin received an assumable loan of $228,000 for 95 percent of the purchase price for a condominium in Scottsdale, Arizona. To help cover his Arizona living expenses, Manning gave Ticktin a $1,500 per month Arizona living allowance. Manning also bought two automobiles for Ticktin; a $12,000 automobile for his use in Arizona, and a $47,000 automobile for his use in Illinois. Finally, Manning paid Ticktin a $30,000 consulting fee. All told, Ticktin's compensation in 1982 from Manning--which was insolvent all or most of that year--totalled at least $289,000.

From February, 1982 onward, Ticktin had the sole authority to approve loans from Manning. During that time, while Manning was sinking, Ticktin made a number of substantial questionable loans. Many of these loans benefited Ticktin and his associates (primarily Olson and Elliott). On July 20, 1982, Ticktin made a $260,000 unsecured loan (the first Kay Dwyer had ever seen Manning make) to Olson. Two days later, Olson loaned Ticktin $287,650 from Olson's bank, the First Suburban Bank of Maywood.

A second loan from Manning to Olson on September 7, 1982, arose from prior dealings between Ticktin, Olson, and William Powers. Ticktin, Olson, and Powers had borrowed approximately $1,700,000 from American National Bank (ANB) in Chicago to purchase the Elgin National Bank. Elgin National Bancorp, Elgin National Bank's holding company, also owed ANB $3,000,000. As of August, 1982, both the individuals' and the Bancorp's obligations to ANB were in default. On September 2, Olson agreed to assume Ticktin's individual loan and guarantee of Powers' loan. ANB agreed to continue the $3,000,000 Elgin Bancorp loan if Olson paid the individual loans within one week. Five days later, Ticktin loaned Olson $1,593,000 from Manning Service Corporation, secured by 108,023 shares of Elgin Bancorp stock. There were two problems with this collateral: Elgin Bancorp was in default on its $3,000,000 loan, and Elgin Bancorp's loan from ANB was secured by stock in Elgin National Bank. ANB had first priority on the Elgin National Bank stock. If Elgin Bancorp could not meet its obligations to ANB (and its track record was not very good), ANB could take the Elgin National Bank stock, which was Elgin Bancorp's underlying asset. Thus, the Elgin Bancorp stock was worth little, if anything, as collateral, and the loan from Manning to Olson was undercollateralized. After Olson received the money from Manning Service Corporation, he used it to extinguish the outstanding individual obligations to ANB.

Six days after the $1,593,000 loan to Olson, Ticktin loaned $300,000 to Tuttle and $300,000 to Kehoe from Manning Service Corporation. Ticktin told Ted Guillem, a Manning vice-president, to use $350,000 of the loan proceeds to pay off part of the 1273 loan that Ticktin had made to Olson on September 7, and $150,000 to pay off part of a loan that Ticktin had made to Elliott. As part of this transaction, Olson gave Tuttle and Kehoe shares of Elgin National Bank stock; Tuttle and Kehoe pledged those shares as collateral for their loans. Inexplicably, though, Kehoe pledged twice as many shares as Tuttle for the same loan.

When Manning failed, the United States Attorney's office investigated the circumstances. That investigation resulted in a twenty-one count indictment naming Ticktin, Olson, Kehoe, Elliott, Lang, Bailey, and Michael Kelley, a purchaser in the Forest Park deal, as defendants. Elliott and Kelley pleaded guilty and testified for the government at the trial. Olson, who was tried along with the remaining defendants, was found guilty on six of seven charges. He has appealed, but his appeal is not part of this consolidated appeal. The jury found Ticktin, Kehoe, Bailey, and Lang guilty on all counts charged.

II.
Sufficiency of the Mailings in Counts Five, Six, and Seven

[1] The only counts in the indictment naming Kehoe were Counts Five, Six, and Seven. In those counts, the grand jury charged Ticktin, Elliott, and Kehoe with mail fraud in connection with the Orland Park condominium transaction. Each of those counts alleged the mailing of recorded mortgages from the Recorder of Deeds to Manning as the count mailing. In United States v. Kwiat, 817 F.2d 440 (7th Cir.1987), we held that similar mailings were insufficient to support Kehoe's conviction for mail fraud in connection with the part of the Orland Park condominium deal that First Security Bank of Glendale Heights financed. Kehoe contends that we must reverse his convictions here in light of Kwiat. The government has confessed error on Kehoe's convictions, and we agree with the parties that the mailings alleged in Counts Five, Six, and Seven are indistinguishable from those alleged in Kwiat. Therefore, we reverse Kehoe's conviction.

[2][3] Counts Five, Six, and Seven also charged Ticktin with mail fraud. Ticktin did not raise the sufficiency of the mailings in those counts in his opening brief. But it would be plain error to affirm Ticktin's conviction on those counts while holding that those counts fail against Kehoe. See Kwiat, 817 F.2d at 444; Fed.R.Crim.P. 52(b). Therefore, we also reverse Ticktin's convictions on Counts Five, Six, and Seven. [FN1]

> FN1. Reversing these three mail fraud convictions does not, as Ticktin argues, automatically require that we reverse his convictions on all the counts in the indictment. All of the indictment's counts were properly joined, Fed.R.Crim.P. 8(a), and there was no basis for a severance under Fed.R.Crim.P. 14. Also, all of the indictment's charges were similar in character and arose from the same overall scheme to loot Manning. Finally, most, if not all, of the evidence admitted on Counts Five, Six, and Seven would have been admitted even absent those counts. Therefore, our reversing Ticktin's convictions on Counts Five, Six, and Seven does not require us to reverse his convictions on the other counts. See generally United States v. Holzer, 840 F.2d 1343, 1349-50 (7th Cir.1988); United States v. Dicaro, 772 F.2d 1314, 1320-21 n. 4 (7th Cir.1985).

III.
Sufficiency of the Evidence to Convict Bailey and Lang

Bailey and Lang were each charged with and convicted of one count of mail fraud. They contend that there was insufficient evidence to prove that they intended to defraud the FSLIC, FHLBB, or Manning's depositors and shareholders. We agree.

[4] To convict Bailey and Lang, the government could not simply show that they participated in a transaction that turned out to be part of a fraudulent scheme. The government also had to show Bailey's and Lang's "willful participation in [the] scheme with knowledge of its fraudulent nature and with intent that these illicit objectives be achieved." United States v. Price, 623 F.2d 587, 591 (9th Cir.1980); see also United States v. Pearlstein, 576 F.2d 531, 537 (3d Cir.1978); United States v.

1274 Stull, 743 F.2d 439, 442 (6th Cir.1984). "[T]he requisite mental state in a prosecution for fraud is a specific intent to defraud and not merely knowledge of shadowy dealings." United States v. Piepgrass, 425 F.2d 194, 199 (9th Cir.1970).

[5] Tuttle recruited Bailey and Lang to borrow money to serve as a down payment for the Forest Park purchasers. Elliott and Tuttle met one day with Bailey at a restaurant and explained the transaction to him. Elliott would pay Bailey $5,000 in exchange for using Bailey's name and being able to make the loan. Bailey looked "a little bit funny" and "raised his eyebrows." He asked Elliott if the transaction was legitimate; Elliott responded that it was, explaining that his parents were entering into the same deal, and that a savings and loan president (Ticktin) would be standing behind the non-recourse aspect of the note. After also receiving assurances from Tuttle that the transaction was legitimate, Bailey agreed to participate.

Tuttle later contacted Lang and told him about the transaction. Tuttle explained the transaction to Lang as Elliott had explained it to Bailey, and assured Lang that it was legitimate. Lang also agreed to participate.

A few weeks passed. On November 17, 1982, Bailey and Lang received phone calls telling them to come to Elliott's office and sign the loan papers for the Forest Park deal. Bailey and Lang both signed documents borrowing $229,790 from Manning. The loans were secured by second mortgages from the Forest Park purchasers. Bailey and Lang also received letters from Ticktin on Manning stationery. The letters allowed Bailey and Lang to discharge their loans by tendering the collateral back to Manning within thirty days of the loan's maturity date; Manning was irrevocably committed to take back the collateral and discharge the debt. At the same time, Bailey and Lang signed letters exercising their options to tender the collateral back to Manning. Thus, Bailey and Lang got into and out of the transaction on the same day, and made $5,000 for their efforts.

The government offered no direct evidence that Bailey and Lang intended to defraud the FSLIC, FHLBB, or Manning's depositors and shareholders. The only direct evidence concerning Bailey's and Lang's participation was Elliott's and Tuttle's testimony--and both Elliott and Tuttle testified that they had assured Bailey and Lang that the transaction was legitimate.

Direct evidence, however, is not necessary to prove knowledge and intent to defraud. The government contends that the circumstances surrounding the loan transaction allowed the jury to properly infer Bailey's and Lang's guilty knowledge and intent. Alternatively, the government argues that the jury could properly infer that Bailey and Lang suspected that the transaction might be defrauding Manning but deliberately avoided further knowledge for fear of what they might learn. This combination of suspicion and deliberately avoiding further knowledge may support an inference of actual knowledge or criminal recklessness sufficient to convict. See United States v. Ramsey, 785 F.2d 184, 189 (7th Cir.1986). The district court gave an "ostrich" instruction, informing the jury that it could "infer knowledge from a combination of suspicion and indifference to the truth." See id. at 190.

The government characterizes its circumstantial case against Bailey and Lang as "powerful"; we characterize it as insufficient. The scheme was one to deceive the FSLIC, FHLBB, and Manning's depositors and shareholders. As we will discuss in more detail later, the government's theory was that Ticktin fraudulently inflated Manning's net worth to keep the federal regulators at bay so he could keep Manning open and plunder it. Nothing suggests that Bailey and Lang knew or had reason to know about Manning's precarious financial position, the FHLBB's scrutiny, or Ticktin's efforts to manipulate Manning's books. There is no evidence that Bailey or Lang had any expertise in banking or real estate financing. Cf. Pearlstein, 576 F.2d at 543-44. The government notes that both Bailey and Lang were small businessmen who were involved in local politics. 1275 But to infer any special knowledge from this requires too great a leap; the government offered very little detail about Bailey's and Lang's business and political experience, and not all small businessmen and politicians are familiar enough with real estate financing to suspect an illegal or fraudulent transaction. Bailey and Lang may have suspected (or even known) that the loan transactions they were entering were not "standard operating procedure." But Elliott and Tuttle, both highly regarded and respected real estate brokers at the time, assured Bailey and Lang that the deal was legitimate. Compare United States v. Browne, 225 F.2d 751, 758 (7th Cir.1955). The evidence reveals no reason why Bailey and Lang should have doubted Elliott and Tuttle. Bailey and Lang had been involved in other deals with Elliott and Tuttle (including Orland Park); the government does not suggest that Bailey or Lang had reason to doubt that those transactions were legitimate. Elliott even told Bailey that Elliott's parents were involved in the same transaction. Bailey and Lang also had Ticktin's assurance, implied through his participation, that the transaction was legitimate. There was no evidence that Bailey or Lang knew Ticktin personally. They knew only that he was President of Manning Savings and Loan. Ticktin's participation would tend to signal that the transaction was not one meant to harm Manning.

The "ostrich" instruction does not save this conviction. "[I]t takes a fairly large amount of knowledge" to permit a jury to infer guilty knowledge under an "ostrich" theory; "to permit an inference of knowledge from just a little suspicion is to relieve the prosecution of its burden of showing every element of the case beyond a reasonable doubt." Ramsey, 785 F.2d at 190. There was no evidence--except, perhaps, Bailey's "raised eyebrows" and "funny" look--that Bailey or Lang harbored any suspicion that would have required them to investigate Manning or Ticktin's relationship and dealings with Manning or that Bailey or Lang deliberately avoided seeking further knowledge for fear of what they might learn. In fact, as we have noted, Bailey did ask, and he was assured by two people with much greater expertise and experience than he that the deal was legitimate. Speculation, "funny" looks, and "raised eyebrows" are not sufficient to convict people for knowingly participating in a scheme to defraud. Therefore, we reverse Bailey's and Lang's convictions.

IV.
The Validity of Ticktin's Mail Fraud Convictions in Light of McNally v. United States

[6] In McNally v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 107 S.Ct. 2875, 97 L.Ed.2d 292 (1987), the Supreme Court rejected the so-called "intangible rights" theory of mail fraud, holding that the mail fraud statute makes criminal only schemes intended to deprive people of property rights. See id. 107 S.Ct. at 2879-80; see also Carpenter v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 108 S.Ct. 316, 320, 98 L.Ed.2d 275 (1987). Ticktin asserts that we must reverse his mail fraud convictions in light of McNally. [FN2]

> FN2. Bailey, Lang, and Kehoe also challenged their convictions as invalid under McNally. Because we have reversed their convictions for other reasons, see supra at 1274-77, we consider only Ticktin's McNally challenge.

Ticktin contends that the indictment's mail fraud counts do not state an offense under McNally. At first blush, Ticktin appears to be right. The specific charging language in each of the mail fraud counts alleges that Ticktin schemed to defraud Manning's depositors and shareholders, the FSLIC, and the FHLBB "out of their right to have the affairs of the Manning Savings and Loan Association conducted honestly, fairly, and free from craft, trickery, deceit, corruption, dishonesty and fraud." Standing alone, this language does not pass muster under McNally; the right to honest services is "too ethereal in itself to fall within the protection of the mail fraud statute...." Carpenter, 108 S.Ct. at 320.

Even though each specific charge is couched in "intangible rights" language, the substantive allegations in each mail 1276 fraud count charge a "scheme that had substantial potential to take other people's property by fraud," and therefore state offenses under McNally. United States v. Keane, 852 F.2d 199, 205 (7th Cir.1988). As we noted in United States v. Wellman, 830 F.2d 1453, 1462 (7th Cir.1987), the common thread running through "intangible rights" cases is that they involve rights whose violation would ordinarily result in no concrete economic harm; that is not the case here. All eleven mail fraud counts charged that Manning was in a precarious financial position, and that Ticktin artificially inflated Manning's net worth. The counts also charged that Manning was an insured institution, with the FSLIC insuring each depositor's account up to $100,000. The counts also state that Ticktin's family members controlled the Board of Directors and had the authority to grant Ticktin salary, loans, and bonuses. Each count thus alleged schemes with the potential to expose Manning's money and property to plunder by artificially keeping Manning in operation. This could affect the property interests of the depositors, shareholders, and FSLIC, which would be potentially on the hook for some or all of the depositors' losses.

The mail fraud counts also alleged other affected property interests. The Forest Park counts alleged that Ticktin loaned more than $6,500,000 with no down payments to the Forest Park purchasers, and $916,160 to Bailey, Lang, and Elliott's parents to create the appearance of a down payment. These counts also alleged that Ticktin paid commissions to Elliott as part of the deal. These counts thus alleged that Ticktin defrauded Manning's shareholders and depositors out of their property interests by committing Manning's funds to the loans, depriving Manning of down payments it would have otherwise received, and paying Manning's funds to Elliott for commissions.

The Dalco/ITEX count alleged that Ticktin paid $1,500,000 for the oil and gas leases, and financed the resale that same day for $4,000,000. Of that $4,000,000, $3,000,000 was both undersecured and without recourse, thus putting Manning's funds at greater than usual risk. The PDO counts alleged that Manning purchased leases from ITEX for $2,250,000, sold them to PDO for $4,500,000, and financed PDO's purchases. The PDO counts also alleged that on May 3, 1982, the directors voted a $70,000 bonus to Ticktin.

[7] Thus, although the government would no doubt draft the indictment differently today, the indictment sufficiently alleged mail fraud offenses even after McNally. But the indictment also alleged "intangible rights" mail fraud. We must examine the jury instructions, along with the evidence and arguments at trial to see if the jury necessarily convicted Ticktin of conduct that constituted an offense. See Wellman, 830 F.2d at 1462-63.

[8] The trial judge properly instructed the jury that to convict Ticktin it had to find beyond a reasonable doubt:

> 1) that the defendant knowingly participated in a scheme to defraud, as described in the indictment;
> 2) that, for the purpose of carrying out a scheme or attempting to do so, the defendant used the United States mails or caused the United States mails to be used in a manner charged in the particular count;
> 3) that the defendant did so knowingly and with the intent to defraud.

The instructions also defined a "scheme" and "intent to defraud":

> A "scheme" means some plan or course of action intended to deceive another and to deprive another of something of value by means of false pretenses, representations, or promises.
> It is not necessary that the government prove all of the false pretenses, representations, promises, and acts charged in the indictment. However, it is essential that the evidence establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants intended to deceive the shareholders, depositors, or the FSLIC to their detriment.
> ....
> To act with intent to defraud means to act willfully and with the specific intent 1277 to deceive or cheat; ordinarily for the purpose of either causing some financial loss to another, or bringing about some financial gain to oneself or another.

The judge further instructed the jury that:

> It is a theory of Harold J. Ticktin's defense in this case that he undertook all of his activities with respect to the ITEX, PDO, Orland Park, and Forest Park transactions in good faith for the purpose of benefiting rather than injuring the financial position of Manning Savings and Loan Association, and not for the purpose of his own improper financial gain. Since it is an element of all the crimes charged that Defendant Harold J. Ticktin had the intent to injure or defraud the association, you should acquit him if you find the government has not proved beyond a reasonable doubt that Defendant Ticktin had the requisite intent.

Ticktin argues that the court's instructions did not sufficiently ensure that the jury convicted him only for schemes that injured (or could have injured) the victims' property rights. When examining the sufficiency of jury instructions we must examine the jury charge as a whole, rather than focus on isolated passages. Moreover, because " 'a judgment of conviction is commonly the culmination of a trial which includes testimony of witnesses, argument of counsel, receipt of exhibits in evidence, and instruction of the jury by the judge,' " we review the instructions in the context of the overall trial and the arguments by counsel. See United States v. Piccolo, 835 F.2d 517, 519 (3d Cir.1987) (quoting Cupp v. Naughten, 414 U.S. 141, 147, 94 S.Ct.

Ticktin asserts that the definition of "scheme" does not limit "something of value" to money or property. In Wellman, we found the same language to be consistent with McNally. See 830 F.2d at 1463. Unlike United States v. Holzer, 840 F.2d 1343, 1346 (7th Cir.1988), nothing in the instructions specifically advised the jury that "intangible rights" could be "something of value" for purposes of finding a scheme.

The jury instruction defining "intent to defraud" equated that intent with an intent to cause financial loss to another or bring about financial gain to oneself. Ticktin complains that the word "ordinarily" made the instruction open-ended, and allowed the jury to find intent even absent an intent to bring about financial gain or loss. We think, however, that Ticktin parses this instruction much more closely than the average juror would; read naturally, the instruction defining intent focuses on financial gain or loss. Furthermore, Ticktin's "good faith" theory of defense instruction (which Ticktin has understandably ignored on appeal) clearly equates intent to defraud with an intent to injure Manning and bring about improper financial gain for Ticktin. Taken together, the intent instruction and Ticktin's good faith instruction adequately informed the jury that it had to find conduct aimed at injuring Manning's financial interests to convict Ticktin of mail fraud. A scheme to injure Manning financially is necessarily one to injure its shareholders and depositers financially.

Finally, the evidence and arguments in this case emphasized that the schemes were aimed at Manning's property. This case is unlike Holzer and Ward v. United States, 845 F.2d 1459 (7th Cir.1988), where the government's attorneys argued at trial that the jury should convict the defendants for depriving their victims of honest services but then adopted a different argument on appeal. From the beginning of the trial, the government's theory has been that Ticktin had "looted" Manning through a series of mail fraud schemes and misapplications. The jury heard testimony about how Ticktin's schemes depleted Manning's assets. And the closing arguments are replete with references to Ticktin using the transactions in the mail fraud schemes to artificially keep Manning open so he could divert more of its assets into his own pocket. Manning was, as the government puts it, "the goose that laid the golden eggs" and Ticktin had to keep that goose alive 1278 while there were still eggs to be gathered. [FN3]

> FN3. Ticktin argues that the jury instruction defining a "scheme" allowed the jury to convict Ticktin solely for conduct "intended to deceive ... the FSLIC." But the trial evidence and arguments made clear that deceiving the FSLIC was an integral part of defrauding Manning's shareholders and depositers of their property; the FSLIC and FHLBB had the power to shut Manning down and thus deny Ticktin access to Manning's funds. Moreover, as the indictment alleged, the FSLIC had a property interest at stake: the $100,000 per depositer it might have had to pay had Manning gone under. Thus, the reference to scheming to deceive the FSLIC does not require us to reverse Manning's conviction.

[9] In sum, the indictment adequately alleged conduct that violated the mail fraud statute, and the trial evidence and arguments, along with the jury instructions, convince us that the jury necessarily found that Ticktin's schemes were aimed at his victims' property rights. Therefore, Ticktin's mail fraud convictions (except, as we have already noted, the Orland Park convictions) were proper. [FN4]

> FN4. Since the RICO count alleged the substantive mail fraud counts as predicate offenses and we have upheld Ticktin's other mail fraud convictions, we also uphold his RICO conviction even though we have reversed Counts Five, Six, and Seven. The jury has "no discretion to pick and choose among predicate offenses." Holzer, 840 F.2d at 1351.

V.
Ticktin's Convictions for Misapplying Manning's Funds

Ticktin challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to convict him for misapplying Manning's funds and the district court's refusal to give certain jury instructions on misapplication that he tendered. The savings and loan misapplication statute, 18 U.S.C. § 657 states, in relevant part:

> Whoever, being an officer ... of ... any ... savings and loan association ... the accounts of which are insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation ... willfully misapplies any moneys, funds, credits, securities, or other things of value belonging to such institution or pledged or otherwise entrusted to its care, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both....

The district court instructed the jury that:

To sustain a charge of willful misapplication by Ticktin ... the government must prove the following propositions:

First, that at the time of the offense charged, the defendant was an officer, an agent, an employee of or connected in any capacity with Manning Savings and Loan Association;

Second, that the Manning Savings and Loan Association was an insured association;

Third, that the defendant used his position as an officer and agent to willfully misapply moneys, funds and credits belonging to the association, or entrusted to its care;

Fourth, that the defendant did so willfully and with the intent to injure or defraud the association.

A "willful misapplication" ... is an unauthorized, unjustifiable, or wrongful use of the association's funds with the intent to injure or defraud the association.

To show a willful misapplication, the government must prove a conversion of [the] association's funds to the use of a defendant or third party. However, ... actual loss need not be proved. It is sufficient that the defendant at least temporarily deprived the association of the possession, control or use of its funds.

The word "willfully" means that the person knowingly and intentionally committed the acts which constitute the offense charged.

The district court's instructions accurately stated the elements of a § 657 violation. See United States v. Marquardt, 786 F.2d 771, 785 (7th Cir.1986). The district court also accurately defined the term "willful misapplication." See United States v. Olson, 825 F.2d 121, 122-23 (7th Cir.1987). But Ticktin argues that the instructions were incomplete and did not adequately 1279 distinguish between criminal misapplication and mere maladministration. Ticktin appeals the district court's decision to refuse to give several of his tendered instructions that he claims would have cured this alleged defect.

A. The Bonus Counts.

[10] The jury convicted Ticktin on Counts 14, 15, and 20, for accepting bonuses from Manning. Since the Board of Directors voted him the bonuses, Ticktin tendered an instruction stating that the board's consent was a complete defense to the misapplication charges. Ticktin based this instruction onUnited States v. Britton, 108 U.S. 193, 2 S.Ct. 526, 27 L.Ed. 701 (1883) (Britton III). In Britton III, the indictment charged that Britton, who was president of the National Bank of the State of Missouri, had made a promissory note to his brother, who endorsed it back to Britton. Britton submitted the note to the bank's Board of Directors who discounted the note, and Britton took the proceeds for his own use. At the time, Britton knew that both he and his brother were insolvent. The Supreme Court held that the Board of Directors, "knowing all the facts," could discount the note, and that the indictment did not charge an offense against Britton. Id. at 197, 2 S.Ct. at 529.

Britton III does not stand for the broad principle that consent by the Board of Directors is an absolute defense to misapplication. Britton III turned on a technical defect in the pleadings: the indictment did not charge that Britton had fraudulently procured the discount. See id. In any event, the Court's subsequent decision in Evans v. United States, 153 U.S. 584, 14 S.Ct. 934, 38 L.Ed. 830 (1893) undercut the broad reading of Britton III that Ticktin proposes. In Evans, a bank director was charged with (among other things) aiding and abetting the bank's cashier's misapplication by presenting a note to the cashier to discount; both knew that the note was not adequately secured. Id. at 591-92, 14 S.Ct. at 937-38. One of Evans' arguments for dismissing the charge was that the indictment did not charge that the cashier was not authorized to discount the note. Id. at 592-93, 14 S.Ct. at 938. The Court held even if the board had authorized the cashier to discount the note, if he discounted it with the intent to defraud the bank he would be guilty of criminal misapplication. Id. at 593, 14 S.Ct. at 938. Thus, under Evans, the Board of Directors' consent is not an absolute defense to a misapplication charge.

[11] As more recent cases have held, the board's consent is an important factor to consider in determining whether a defendant attempted to defraud an institution. But if intent to defraud or injure exists, the Board of Directors' approval is irrelevant. See United States v. Cauble, 706 F.2d 1322, 1353-54 (5th Cir.1983); United States v. Beran, 546 F.2d 1316, 1321 (8th Cir.1976).

[12] Ticktin submitted a second instruction that the district court refused to give concerning the bonuses. This instruction would have told the jury that Ticktin's "acting in his official capacity in accepting the salary and bonuses" was a complete defense. Ticktin based this instruction on another in the line of Britton cases, United States v. Britton, 108 U.S. 199, 2 S.Ct. 531, 27 L.Ed. 698 (1883) (Britton IV). In Britton IV, Britton was charged with misapplying the bank's funds by conspiring with another director to persuade the bank's directors to declare a dividend even though he knew that the bank had no net profits with which to pay it. Id. at 206, 2 S.Ct. at 535. The Court held that "[t]he declaring of a dividend by the association when there were no net profits to pay it ... is an act done by an officer of the association in his official and not in his individual capacity" and was therefore not a misapplication. Read broadly, Britton IV seems to hold that any act performed by an officer in his official capacity is not a misapplication.

However, Evans undercuts this broad reading of Britton IV, just as it undercuts the broad reading of Britton III. Evans held that a bank officer or employee who fraudulently discounts a worthless note commits a criminal misapplication, even 1280 though discounting notes is part of his job (i.e., his "official capacity"). Evans, 153 U.S. at 593, 14 S.Ct. at 938. Similarly, as the Third Circuit stated almost forty years ago in construing Britton and Evans, "[i]f a dividend be illegally declared with the intent to defraud the bank the persons responsible for the declaration face criminal sanctions and have committed the crime defined by the statute." United States v. Matsinger, 191 F.2d 1014, 1017 (3d Cir.1951). Intent is the key element: "[T]he gravamen of the offense consists in the evil design with which the misapplication is made...." Evans, 153 U.S. at 594, 14 S.Ct. at 938.

[13] Neither of Ticktin's proposed instructions concerning the bonuses accurately stated the law. The district court did not err in refusing to give these instructions. In any event, the district court did instruct the jury on both board approval and official capacity as theories of Ticktin's defense. Ticktin was able to argue both these points to the jury. He was entitled to no more.

[14] The evidence was sufficient to convict Ticktin on all the misapplication counts concerning the bonuses. There was ample evidence for the jury to believe the government's theory that Ticktin embarked on a series of fraudulent schemes to keep Manning artificially alive and to believe that Ticktin was able to receive the bonuses because of his pattern of fraudulent conduct. This pattern supported an inference that Ticktin intended to defraud Manning when he accepted the bonuses. Moreover, each bonus was awarded to Ticktin at a time when he knew Manning had a negative net worth. The board was dominated by Ticktin's family, and Ticktin himself voted to grant the initial bonus. The board awarded the final two bonuses based on Ticktin's "fantastic" and "exemplary" work in turning Manning around and maintaining its profits, raising an inference that Ticktin deceived the board about Manning's true financial condition. In short, there was sufficient evidence for the jury to find that by accepting the bonuses Ticktin converted Manning's funds to himself with the intent to defraud or injure Manning.

B. The Loan Counts.

The jury convicted Ticktin on the other misapplication counts for five loans he made: a $260,000 loan to Olson, a $1,500,000 loan to Olson, $300,000 loans to Tuttle and Kehoe, and a $634,200 loan to Michael Kelley as part of the Forest Park transaction. The indictment alleged that the loans to Olson, Elliott, and Kehoe were unsecured or insufficiently secured. The indictment also alleged that Ticktin made the $1,500,000 loan to Olson for Ticktin's own benefit, and that Ticktin paid the proceeds of the loans to Tuttle and Kehoe over to Olson, and not the named borrowers. The indictment alleged that the loan to Kelley was secured by overvalued property, and that Kelley had not supplied a down payment for the loan.

[15][16] Ticktin submitted an instruction stating that it is not a misapplication for a bank officer to make a loan with little or no collateral. It is true that lack of collateral, by itself, does not make a loan a misapplication. Banks often make unsecured loans, based on the borrower's wealth, general creditworthiness, and other risk factors; increased interest compensates the lender for the increased risk involved. It would be an incredible and unjustified expansion of the misapplication statute to put bankers in jail simply for making unsecured loans.

But Ticktin's proposed instruction is incomplete and misleading. An unsecured or undersecured loan can be a misapplication, if made with the intent to defraud or injure the bank. United States v. Kahn, 381 F.2d 824, 832 (7th Cir.1967); cf. Evans, 153 U.S. at 592, 14 S.Ct. at 938 (discount of unsecured note is misapplication if made with intent to defraud). Ticktin's instruction would have focused the jury's attention solely on the lack of collateral and away from other facts from which the jury could have inferred an intent to defraud or injure Manning. Because Ticktin's proposed instruction did not accurately state 1281 the law, the district court did not err in refusing to give it.

[17] Ticktin also submitted an instruction that would have informed the jury that it is not a misapplication for a bank officer to make a loan knowing that the named borrower will turn the proceeds over to a third party, unless the officer knows that the named borrower will not or cannot repay the loan. Ticktin based this instruction on United States v. Gens, 493 F.2d 216, 222 (1st Cir.1974) and United States v. Gallagher, 576 F.2d 1028, 1045-46 (3d Cir.1978). Those cases held that, "absent other circumstances," Gens, 493 F.2d at 222, it was not a criminal misapplication for a bank officer to loan money to one person knowing that the named borrower will pass the proceeds to other persons, except in three situations: where the bank officer knows the named borrower is either fictitious or unaware that his name is being used; where the bank officer knows that the named debtor will be unable to repay the loan; and where the bank officer assures the named borrower that he will not have to repay the loan. Gens, 493 F.2d at 221-22; Gallagher, 576 F.2d at 1046. This circuit has cited Gens and Gallagher in holding that merely loaning money to a named borrower for somebody else's benefit is not, absent more, a criminal misapplication. United States v. Bruun, 809 F.2d 397, 411-12 (7th Cir.1987); see also United States v. Olson, 825 F.2d at 123 (dictum); United States v. Shivley, 715 F.2d 260, 265 (7th Cir.1983) (dictum).

[18] But Ticktin's proposed instruction concerning third-party loans was also incomplete and misleading. The instruction ignores the principle, clearly and repeatedly stated in this circuit, that when a bank officer makes a loan to a third party for the officer's own ultimate benefit he has made a criminal misapplication, regardless of the named borrower's intent or ability to repay the loan. See, e.g., Olson, 825 F.2d at 123; Bruun, 809 F.2d at 412; Shivley, 715 F.2d at 265. Ticktin claims that a third-party loan can never be a misapplication if the named borrower can and will repay it, but this circuit has never held that. See, e.g., Olson, 825 F.2d at 123 ("Without more," such third-party loans to financially capable borrowers are not misapplications). (Emphasis added.) And Gens and Gallagher did not set out an exhaustive list of situations in which third-party loans could or could not be misapplications; Gens itself acknowledged that other circumstances could make such loans criminal misapplications. 493 F.2d at 222; see also United States v. Kennedy, 564 F.2d 1329, 1339 (9th Cir.1977). If all the facts and circumstances surrounding a particular loan indicate that a bank officer intended to defraud or injure the bank, then the jury may properly find that the loan was a criminal misapplication despite the named borrower's willingness and ability to repay it. The intent to defraud or injure the bank is what separates criminal misapplication from mere maladministration.

[19] The evidence was sufficient to convict Ticktin for misapplication on all five loan counts. The first loan count involved a $260,000 loan to Olson. That loan was unsecured. The loan shortly followed the PDO transaction, and could be seen as a payoff for Olson's participation in that scheme. And two days later Olson loaned Ticktin $287,650 from Olson's First Suburban Bank of Maywood, secured by Manning shares (ten days after the ALJ had ordered Manning to increase its net worth or close down). It was a reasonable inference that the loan to Ticktin was in exchange for the loan to Olson. This inference is buttressed by the overall relationship between Ticktin and Olson, and by evidence of the fact that that relationship proceeded on an essentially quid pro quo basis--for example, Olson's demand that Ticktin pay him $50,000 to participate in the Forest Park scheme. Thus, the loan to Olson benefited Ticktin; it was a clever way for Ticktin to circumvent the regulations prohibiting him from loaning himself money from Manning.

The $1,500,000 loan to Olson was secured by Elgin Bancorp stock, stock that was worth little, if anything, as collateral. Olson used a substantial part of this loan to 1282 pay off Ticktin's personal obligation at American National Bank. Although Olson had agreed to assume this obligation five days before receiving the loan, Ticktin had agreed to loan him the money before Olson assumed the obligation. The loan could thus be seen as one that benefited Ticktin by allowing himself to pay off a personal obligation with Manning's money.

The $300,000 loans to Kehoe and Tuttle arose out of the $1,500,000 loan to Olson. All or part of each loan went to pay part of the $1,500,000 loan that Olson had used, in part, to pay off Ticktin's obligation at ANB. Thus, these loans could be seen as part of a "complicated morass of clandestine financial dealings ... [that] ultimately inured" to Ticktin's benefit. Olson, 825 F.2d at 123. These loans were also secured by Elgin Bancorp stock, so these loans were also undersecured.

The indictment's final misapplication count charged that Ticktin misapplied Manning's funds by loaning $643,200 to Michael Kelley, one of the purchasers in the Forest Park deal. Kelley never met with a loan officer, and was paid $6,000 to participate in the transaction. Kelley also made no down payment on the condominiums he purchased. That in itself may not indicate any intent to defraud because it is not uncommon for bankers to loan 100 percent of the purchase price of a piece of real estate, based on the borrower's creditworthiness and other risk factors. Here, however, there was evidence that Ticktin never evaluated any of these factors before making the loan to Kelley. Moreover, Ticktin went out of his way to create the appearance of a 20 percent down payment for the Kelley loan and the other Forest Park loans, even though Manning never actually received any down payments. There was also evidence that the condominiums Kelley purchased were valued well above their market price, and that Manning financed more than the market price for the purchase.

[20] We finally note that the government tried and argued the misapplications as part of its overall theory that Ticktin concocted several fraudulent schemes designed to bilk Manning of a substantial amount of its assets. We cannot view each misapplication count in isolation; instead, we must view the counts in light of Ticktin's overall course of conduct and in light of the fact that by convicting Ticktin on every count charged, the jury obviously believed the government's theory. Given this, it is difficult to believe that the jury would have convicted Ticktin on the misapplication counts unless it found that he intended to enrich himself at Manning's expense. Ticktin's convictions on the misapplication counts were proper. [FN5]

FN5. On both the loan and bonus counts, Ticktin rather obliquely seems to argue that the indictment did not state offenses. His opening brief mentions the allegations in the indictment but focuses its argument on the sufficiency of the evidence and the jury instructions. His reply brief is more forthright in arguing that the indictment did not state offenses but it does not discuss the applicable standards for determining an indictment's sufficiency. Assuming Ticktin has properly presented the issue, we hold that the misapplication counts sufficiently stated offenses. Each count alleged that Ticktin was an officer of Manning, that Manning was federally insured, that Ticktin willfully misapplied Manning's funds and how he misapplied those funds, and that Ticktin acted with the intent to injure or defraud Manning. See United States v. Broome, 628 F.2d 403, 405 (5th Cir.1980) (per curiam). Ticktin also argues that reversing any substantive misapplication count requires us to reverse the conspiracy counts as well. Because we affirm the substantive misapplication counts, we do not reach this argument.

VI.
Alleged Erroneous Evidentiary Ruling

Ticktin finally contends that we must reverse his conviction on all counts because an evidentiary ruling by the district court deprived him of a fair trial. While questioning David Liebson, Manning's in-house attorney, the government's attorney asked Liebson how Ticktin billed the legal services that Liebson performed for Olson at Ticktin's request. Liebson answered that Ticktin billed those services under the letterhead of Ticktin's private law firm. Ticktin's counsel immediately objected, but the 1283 district court refused to strike Liebson's answer.

On appeal, Ticktin argues that the district court abused its discretion by not striking Liebson's answer and allowing the government to ask further questions about the billing arrangement (eliciting the same information). According to Ticktin, Liebson's testimony was "other acts" evidence under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) that the district court should not have admitted because the government failed to disclose the evidence before trial. Ticktin also asserts that the evidence was irrelevant to any issue in the case, and unduly prejudicial to him.

[21][22] Rule 404(b) prohibits evidence of other acts "to prove the character of a person in order to show action conforming therewith." Assuming that Liebson's testimony about the billing was Rule 404(b) evidence, its admission was not reversible error. For one thing, the evidence was admissible. The testimony was relevant to the conspiracy count and other counts involving Ticktin and Olson because it showed the nature of the relationship between them. Any potential for unfair prejudice to Ticktin was minimal at best. Liebson's response was an isolated piece of testimony from a trial that lasted almost four weeks, and the government never argued or presented evidence to show that the billing arrangement was improper. And even if the admission of the evidence violated the district court's prior disclosure order, Ticktin has not mentioned how that violation affected his defense or prejudiced him in any way. See Fed.R.Evid. 103(a).

VII.
Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, we REVERSE Kehoe's, Bailey's, and Lang's convictions. We also REVERSE Ticktin's convictions on Counts Five, Six, and Seven (the Orland Park mail fraud counts). We AFFIRM Ticktin's convictions on all other counts. We REMAND to the district court with instructions to enter judgments of acquittal on all reversed convictions, and to resentence Ticktin on his remaining convictions.

sentencing under §657 - guidelines consider loss to be amt of $ actually at risk or actually taken.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellant,
v.
Janet Rebecca JOHNSON, Defendant-Appellee.

No. 92-3318.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted April 14, 1993.

Decided May 25, 1993.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa, Ronald E. Longstaff, J., of embezzlement and misapplication of credit union funds by credit union employee. United States appealed denial of sentencing enhancement under Sentencing Guidelines for defendant's misapplication of credit union funds. The Court of Appeals, Floyd R. Gibson, Senior Circuit Judge, held that credit union's "loss" did not include misapplied funds, as they were never removed from credit union.

Affirmed.

EMBEZZLEMENT ⇐ 52
146k52
Under Sentencing Guidelines, "loss," for purposes of calculating sentence of credit union employee convicted of embezzlement and misapplication of credit union funds, did not include funds that she misapplied by transfer from one account to another; that money was never actually removed from credit union accounts, and credit union was not "at risk" to lose it. U.S.S.G. §§ 2B1.1, 2B1.1, comment. (n.2), (backg'd.), 18 U.S.C.A.App.

The government appeals the district court's [FN1] denial of an additional three-level sentencing enhancement under United States Sentencing Guideline ("U.S.S.G.") § 2B1.1 due to Janet Johnson's misapplication of credit union funds. We affirm.

FN1. The Honorable Ronald E. Longstaff, United States District Judge for the Southern District of Iowa.

Johnson was an employee of the Lennox Credit Union of Marshalltown, Iowa from September 1977 until August, 1991. During an internal investigation in August 1991, Johnson called the credit union and admitted that she had embezzled funds from credit union accounts. Johnson then pled guilty to one count of embezzlement and misapplication of credit union funds by a credit union employee in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 657. In the stipulation of facts, Johnson admitted to embezzling $88,483.41 and misapplying $318,915. Johnson misapplied the funds by transferring money from one credit union account to another credit union account. The district court sentenced Johnson under § 2B1.1 of the Guidelines on September 11, 1992. The court computed Johnson's total offense level at 14, based upon a base offense level of four, an eight-level increase because the loss amounted to over $70,000, a two-level increase for more than minimal planning, a two-level increase for abuse of trust, and a two-level reduction based on acceptance of responsibility. Based on Johnson's adjusted base offense level of 14, the district court sentenced Johnson to 15 months imprisonment and three years of supervised release.

The government argues the court erred in not increasing Johnson's offense level by eleven levels based on the total amount of "loss" to the credit union. The government argues that the proper amount of loss was $407,398.41, which includes the $88,483 in embezzled funds and the $318,915 in misapplied funds. We disagree. "Loss" is defined 1359 as "the value of the property taken, damaged, or destroyed." U.S.S.G. § 2B1.1, comment. (n. 2). "The value of property taken plays an important role in determining sentences for theft offenses, because it is an indicator of both the harm to the victim and the gain to the defendant." U.S.S.G. § 2B1.1, comment. (backg'd). In this case, the amount of loss to the credit union was $88,483, which represents the amount of money actually removed from the credit union accounts. The misapplied funds were never removed from the credit union, but were transferred from one credit union account to another. [FN2] The credit union was never "at risk" to lose the misapplied funds, United States v. Brach, 942 F.2d 141, 143 (2d Cir.1991), and the district court properly excluded that figure from its calculation of loss under U.S.S.G. § 2B1.1.

FN2. See United States v. Shattuck, 961 F.2d 1012, 1017 (1st Cir.1992) (court indicated in dicta that amount of "victim loss" for sentencing purposes does not include the amount of misapplied funds that remained in bank accounts).

Elements of willful misapplication

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellant,
v.
Leonard W. EVANS, Defendant-Appellee.

No. 93-2051.

United States Court of Appeals,
Tenth Circuit.

Dec. 5, 1994.

Bank president was acquitted of misapplying bank funds and making false entry in bank records, by the United States District Court for the District of New Mexico, Santiago E. Campos, J. Government appealed. The Court of Appeals, Seymour, Chief Judge, held that: (1) government failed to prove bank president's intent to injure bank, in connection with misapplication of bank funds charge; (2) sufficient evidence existed for jury to find bank president guilty of making false entries; and (3) new trial should not have been granted on false entry counts.

Before SEYMOUR, Chief Judge, McKAY, and BALDOCK, Circuit Judges.

SEYMOUR, Chief Judge.

The government appeals the district court's judgment of acquittal and alternative grant of a new trial after a jury found Defendant Leonard W. Evans guilty on all fifteen counts before it. Eight of the counts charged Mr. Evans with making a false entry in bank records in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 1005 and 2, and seven counts charged him with misapplying bank funds in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 656 and 2. The government contends that the judgment of acquittal was erroneous because the evidence was sufficient to convict Mr. Evans on all counts and that the district court abused its discretion in granting a new trial. We affirm the judgment of acquittal on the misapplication counts and we reverse the judgment of acquittal and the grant of a new trial on the false entry counts.

I.

Mr. Evans was the president of American Bank, N.A. of Rio Rancho. The bank was having financial difficulties, so a group of investors formed to purchase it from its owner. Mr. Evans worked with this group and was to remain as the bank's president upon completion of the change of control. The group filed the necessary application with the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC) for a change of control of the bank. This application stated that the group would acquire all of the outstanding common stock for $200,000. Additionally, the group would inject $2.5 million dollars of capital into the bank. Because of the bank's critical financial condition, the OCC ordered an independent audit. This audit showed that the bank was insolvent at the date of the examination.

In its decision letter to Mr. Evans, the OCC stated that in order to consummate the 589 change of control, the group had to deposit $1.8 million of capital (first tier) in the bank within five days and the additional $700,000 (second tier) ten days later. After the infusion of the first tier capital, one of the second tier investors dropped out, leaving a deficiency of $450,000. This shortfall occurred around the time the money was to be deposited, and the investment group moved quickly to recruit new investors. Although the group found people who were interested in investing, the potential investors were unable to come up with the necessary cash on such short notice. Consequently, Mr. Evans and members of the investment group decided to arrange bank loans from American Bank to these investors to purchase American Bank stock. The charges against Mr. Evans are based on these loans and the use of their proceeds to purchase bank stock.

The pattern shown at trial, with slight variations, was that an investor would apply for a line of credit of about $75,000. Almost immediately after approval of the loan, the investor would draw out $50,000 and use the money to buy bank stock. In almost every case, the stock was held in trust for the investor under someone else's name. The loan approval and funding sheets for these loans reflected various purposes for the loans, none of which was to buy bank stock. The loan approval and funding sheets for four investors stated that the loan was for working capital for their businesses. Two investors' sheets stated that the loan was for debt consolidation and personal expenses. One investor's sheet claimed that the loan was for home improvement and bill consolidation, and the final investor's sheet stated that the loan was for purchasing a home. Richard Brown, an OCC examiner, testified that because the majority of the money was used to purchase bank stock, these purposes were false and would mislead a bank examiner. Rec., vol. IV, at 818-30.

The government does not argue that making loans to purchase bank stock is illegal, that any of the loans were deficient, or that the bank did not have the authority to make the loans. The government's theory is that Mr. Evans and members of the investment group schemed to deceive the OCC by hiding from regulators the fact that bank loan proceeds were being used to buy bank stock, and they thereby injured the bank by depriving it of much needed new capital.

Prior to submitting the case to the jury, the district court dismissed four counts against Mr. Evans. At the conclusion of the trial, the jury found Mr. Evans guilty on all remaining counts.

[1] The district court granted Mr. Evans a judgment of acquittal as to each count and, in the alternative, granted Mr. Evans a new trial on all counts. We review a district court's grant of a motion for acquittal under the same standard that the trial court applied when granting the motion. United States v. White, 673 F.2d 299, 301 (10th Cir.1982).

> We must view the evidence, both direct and circumstantial, in the light most favorable to the government, and without weighing conflicting evidence or considering the credibility of witnesses, determine whether that evidence, if believed, would establish each element of the crime. If the government has met that standard, we, as well as the trial court, must defer to the jury's verdict of guilty. This standard reflects a deep respect for the fact-finding function of the jury.

Id. at 301-02 (citations omitted).

II.

[2][3] The government appeals the judgment of acquittal as to the misapplication counts under 18 U.S.C. § 656. Section 656 makes it a crime for an officer or employee of any bank to "willfully misappl[y] any of the moneys, funds or credits of such bank." To prove a violation under this statute, the government must show that "(1) the defendant was an executive officer of the bank, (2) the bank was connected in some way to the Federal Reserve System, (3) the defendant willfully misapplied the funds of the bank, and (4) the defendant acted with the intent to injure or defraud that bank." United States v. Haddock, 961 F.2d 933, 934-35 (10th Cir.) [Haddock II], cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 88, 121 L.Ed.2d 50 (1992).

590 In its brief, the government states that " 'a willful misapplication' of bank funds 'occurs when funds are distributed under a record which misrepresents the true state of the record with the intent that bank officials, bank examiners, or the [Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation] will be deceived.' " Aplt.Br. at 28 (quoting United States v. Twiford, 600 F.2d 1339, 1341 (10th Cir.1979)); see also United States v. Davis, 953 F.2d 1482, 1493 (10th Cir.1992) (also quoting Twiford in context of 18 U.S.C. § 657, a parallel statute protecting institutions insured by FSLIC), cert. denied --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 2286, 119 L.Ed.2d 210 (1992). The government argues that "[t]here is no requirement that the 'misapplication' itself be unlawful; what makes it criminal is that the use of bank funds occurs with the specific intent to 'injure or defraud' the bank.' " [FN1] Aplt.Br. at 28-29 (quoting Hernandez v. United States, 608 F.2d 1361, 1364-65 (10th Cir.1979) (emphasis added)).

FN1. There is case law in this circuit stating that under some circumstances, "evidence of 'an intent to deceive' supplie[s] the necessary proof of criminal intent required by section 656." United States v. Harenberg, 732 F.2d 1507, 1511-12 (10th Cir.1984); see also, Davis, 953 F.2d 1482; Twiford, 600 F.2d 1339; Bruce A. Green, After the Fall: the Criminal Law Enforcement Response to the S & L Crisis, 59 Fordham L.Rev. S155, S159 (1991) (courts have interpreted section 656 broadly, reading the section to "simply require[ ] deceitful handling of bank funds"). We need not address the relationship between intent to deceive bank examiners and intent to injure the bank, however, because the government did not argue it. More significantly, the misapplication counts in the indictment specifically charge that Mr. Evans, with "intent to injure and defraud" the bank, made loans "knowing that the loan majority of the proceeds would not be used for the purpose stated on the loan approval and funding sheets and instead the majority of the proceeds would be used to finance the Bank Investment Group's efforts to recapitalize" the bank. Aplt.App., doc. 1 at 6.

The court instructed the jury that "intent to injure or defraud the bank may be shown by [a knowing], voluntary act by the defendant, the natural tendency of which may have been to injure the bank." Rec., vol. XI, at 2312; see also United States v. Tokoph, 514 F.2d 597, 603-04 (10th Cir.1975). Mr. Evans allegedly loaned money under a false record and then used that money to recapitalize the bank. The natural tendency of loaning the money could not have been to injure the bank because the government did not attempt to prove at trial that any of the loans were not adequately collateralized or that the borrowers were not creditworthy. [FN2] In addition, the loans were made at a time when the bank had lending authority. Rec., vol. V, at 938.

FN2. In fact, at oral argument, the government asserted that the condition of the loans was not relevant to its argument.

[4] The government also did not prove that using funds borrowed from the bank to buy stock in the bank tended to injure the bank. Buying bank stock with money loaned by that bank is not illegal. The only relevant statute states that a bank may not make loans on the security of its own shares. 12 U.S.C. § 83 (1988). The loans in this case were not secured by bank stock, but by other collateral.

The government argued at trial and also on appeal that Mr. Evans intended to injure the bank by depriving it of new capital. Aplt.Br. at 29. However, the government did not prove that using the loan proceeds as bank capital would tend to injure the bank, nor that Mr. Evans knew or should have known that using these loan proceeds for part of the capital infusion would tend to injure the bank. The only testimony tending to show that the bank officers believed the capital had to be "new money" came from Benjamin Lee Dante, an original member of the investment group. [FN3] He testified that he thought the capital needed to be "new money, not money loaned from the bank." Rec., vol. VIII, at 1496. He claims he made this assumption only on the basis of Mr. Evans' statement that they had to "watch what we are doing ... [w]e're all going to wind up going to jail." Id. 1496-97. In addition, Mr. Dante had previously testified that they hid the true purpose of the loans from the regulators because at the time they mistakenly thought that "it was illegal for loan proceeds 591 from the bank to be used to purchase stock." Rec., vol. VII, at 1289; see also rec., vol. VI, at 1229.

> FN3. Mr. Dante pled guilty to misapplication of bank funds before Mr. Evans' trial, but was allowed to withdraw his plea after the judgment of acquittal.

Richard Brown, the OCC examiner, testified about the consequences of not having "new money" make up all of the required capital. Rec., vol. V, at 1002-03. The first consequence, he said, was that if the OCC had known where the money came from, the OCC might not have approved the change of control application. Id. at 1002. However, this assertion only establishes that the false purpose deceived the OCC, not that the actual transaction adversely affected the bank itself. Mr. Brown also testified that under appropriate accounting, this money could not have been used to make loans. Id. at 1002-03.

In earlier testimony, Robert Norris, another OCC examiner, gave his opinion that if the $2.5 million of needed capital were not all "new money," the bank would probably fail. Rec., vol. IV, at 770-71. This statement was only presented as Mr. Norris' opinion, and the government offered no other evidence that this lack of new capital contributed or could have contributed to the bank's failure. In fact, Mr. Brown testified extensively on cross-examination that seventy-one days after the change of control took place, the examiners caused the bank to become insolvent in spite of the capital infusion by charging-off around $3.5 million dollars of loans. Rec., vol. V, at 908-28. Mr. Norris also testified that under generally accepted accounting principles, "money borrowed from the bank which is used to purchase stock in the bank would not qualify as capital. That's an accounting as well as a regulatory practice." Rec., vol. III at 604. He further stated that he would not have let the people invest their money. Id. at 605. However, he did not state how the bank itself would have been injured.

The district court asked the government whether a regulation existed that would prohibit making bank loans to investors to purchase stock in the same bank. Rec., vol. XI, at 2175. The government answered that an accounting regulation would have prohibited this money from being treated as capital. Id. at 2176. The court told the government to produce the regulation. Id. The government went on to state: "It could have been done if it was disclosed and the OCC says [sic] yes, but the regulation says they could not count this as part of the new paid[-in] capital." Id. It does not appear from the record that the government ever produced the regulation; nor has the government cited any such regulation to us on appeal.

In sum, the government had to prove, according to its own indictment, that Mr. Evans acted with intent to defraud the bank, i.e., that the natural tendency of his actions was likely to injure the bank. The government did not meet this burden. The government presented sufficient evidence that had the loan approval and funding sheets stated that the proceeds of the loans were used to buy bank stock, the OCC might not have approved change of control. This evidence, however, is not sufficient to prove that Mr. Evans intended to injure or defraud that bank. The bank was insolvent when the investment group submitted its change of control application. The OCC examiners approved the application contingent upon the infusion of $2.5 million of bank capital. According to the government, that infusion did not fully take place because the bank loans were not "new" capital, and had the OCC examiners known it in time, they might not have approved the change of control. The government does not address the fact that if the OCC had not approved the change of control, the bank would have remained in its original insolvent condition. In fact, seventy-one days after the $2.5 million was injected, OCC examiners charged-off bank loans totaling around $3.5 million. These charge-offs returned the bank to its insolvent position, despite the $2.5 million capital infusion, so the OCC closed the bank.

In sum, Mr. Evans and the investors tried to bring the bank out of insolvency but failed in their attempt, and the investors lost $2.5 million. The government's theory that Mr. Evans intended to injure the bank by arranging to supply $450,000 of capital that was not "new" is thus untenable. We therefore affirm the district court's judgment of acquittal on these counts.

592 III.

The false entry counts charge Mr. Evans with violating 18 U.S.C. § 1005. This section criminalizes a bank officer's "false entry in any book, report, or statement [of certain banks] with intent to ... deceive ... any agent or examiner." In granting the judgment of acquittal, the district court stated that "[t]he false entry must pertain to material information," Aplt.App., doc. 2 at 10, and then found that the entries, "if false, were not material," id. at 11.

[5][6][7] We need not decide whether Congress intended that a false entry under section 1005 be material because we hold that the false entries made in this case were material. In the context of other false statement statutes, we have defined materiality as "a natural tendency to influence, or the capability of influencing" a decision maker. United States v. Daily, 921 F.2d 994, 1003 n. 9 (10th Cir.1990) (construing 18 U.S.C. § 1001, which forbids the "mak[ing] of any false, fictitious or fraudulent statements or representations to government officials"), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 405, 116 L.Ed.2d 354 (1991); see also United States v. Haddock, 956 F.2d 1534, 1550 (10th Cir.1992) [Haddock I] (construing 18 U.S.C. § 1014, which criminalizes "knowingly mak[ing] any false statement or report on loan and credit applications"). Actual reliance on the false entry need not be shown, only that it "had the capacity to influence" the decision. Haddock I, 956 F.2d at 1550. The determination of materiality is a legal issue which we review de novo. See United States v. Brittain, 931 F.2d 1413, 1417 (10th Cir.1991) (construing 18 U.S.C. § 1001).

Courts have held in other contexts that stating a false loan purpose is material. The Eighth Circuit, which recognizes materiality as an essential element of a section 1001 violation, upheld a conviction under the statute in a situation very similar to the instant case. United States v. Whitaker, 848 F.2d 914, 916 (8th Cir.1988). In Whitaker, the court held that false statements made by a bank president to a Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation examiner concerning the use of loan proceeds were material. During a visit by the examiner, the defendant told him that the proceeds of certain loans were to be used for business purposes, with only some of the proceeds to be used to buy "penny" stock. Id. at 915. In actuality, all of the funds were used to purchase stock. At the time the defendant made these statements, the bank examiner already had information from a confidential source and from the bank's records which alerted him to the fact that the loans were suspicious. The defendant argued that because the examiner already knew the loans were suspect, his statements could not have influenced the examiner. Id. at 916. The examiner testified at trial that had he known the true purpose of the loans, he would have inquired into the matter further and recommended that practice of making these types of loans be stopped immediately. Id. The court held that the false statements about the purpose of the loans were thus material because they had the " 'capacity of influencing' the decisions of the FDIC." Id. [FN4]

> FN4. The facts in the present case suggest that the misrepresentation by Mr. Evans was more material than that made by Mr. Whitaker. Mr. Whitaker claimed that some of the loan proceeds would go to purchase bank stock but then used all of the money for that purpose. The loan approval and funding sheets in the present case, however, did not even mention the possibility that the money would be used to purchase stock.

Other courts have held that making false statements about the purpose of a loan is material under section 1014, which criminalizes making a false statement "for the purpose of influencing in any way the action of [certain banking entities]." Under this section, various circuits have held "that the stated purpose of a loan is a material fact." United States v. Van Dyke, 820 F.Supp. 1160, 1163 (N.D.Iowa 1993) (citing cases), rev'd on other grounds, 14 F.3d 415 (8th Cir.1994). The Seventh Circuit upheld a conviction under section 1014 when the defendant "falsely stated the purpose of the loan." United States v. Shively, 715 F.2d 260, 264 (7th Cir.1983), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1007, 104 S.Ct. 1001, 79 L.Ed.2d 233 (1984). The court stated:

> There is no question that by signing a promissory note which contained a statement 593 that he knew was false (that the purpose of the loan was "business expense and marketing operation") [the defendant] was making a false statement within the meaning of the statute.

Id.

[8] Cases construing section 1005, at issue here, also support the conclusion that false entries with regard to loan purposes are material. The Ninth Circuit upheld a conviction under the statute where the jury found that the "bank's records of the loans were false in that they did not reflect either the true borrower or the actual purpose of the loans." U.S. v. Wolf, 820 F.2d 1499 at 1504 (9th Cir.1987). The Third Circuit was faced with an analogous situation under the statute in United States v. Krepps, 605 F.2d 101 (3d Cir.1979). In that case, the bank's books showed loans to two separate parties, but did not show that the defendant, an officer of the bank, was the ultimate beneficiary of the loans. Krepps, 605 F.2d at 109. The court held it did not matter that the named debtors were capable of repaying the loan and recognized their legal obligation to do so.

> [T]he fact that there is no evidence demonstrating that the named debtors are incapable of repaying the loans, or that they deny their legal obligation to do so, does not shield the true nature of the transactions.... Because those who are charged by law with the examination of these records have a significant interest in obtaining a full picture of the bank's actual condition ... the true nature of the transaction should have been entered in the bank's records.

Id. The Third Circuit's reasoning applies to the instant case as well. Whether the loans were fully collateralized is irrelevant as long as the books did not reflect the actual state of affairs. The evidence is sufficient to support the conclusion that Mr. Evans actively concealed the nature of the loans so that the examiners would not realize the source of the second tier financing.

[9] The evidence presented at Mr. Evans' trial supports our conclusion that the entries were material. Richard Brown, an OCC national bank examiner, testified that if the true purposes of the loans had been listed on the funding sheets, he would have notified the OCC in Dallas. Rec., vol. V, at 846-47. He also testified that when he realized what the true purpose of the loans was, he did notify Bob Norris in the OCC office. Id. at 847. He said that the purpose of loans is important in general, id. at 856-57, and that the purpose of the loans was particularly important in this case because it had "a direct impact upon the balance sheet of the bank." Id. at 1000. In addition, he testified that had the loans been reflected accurately, the OCC might not have approved the application. Id. at 1002. Mr. Norris testified that the OCC might not have allowed the change in control if it had known that part of the second tier money was actually coming from loans made by the bank. Rec., vol. III, at 600. Sufficient evidence existed for the jury to find Mr. Evans guilty of the false entry violations. The judgment of acquittal therefore is reversed.

IV.

Because we have reversed the district court's judgment of acquittal on the false entry counts, we must address the district court's alternative grant of a new trial on those counts. "We review the trial court's grant or denial of a motion for new trial under the abuse of discretion standard." United States v. Muldrow, 19 F.3d 1332, 1339 (10th Cir.1994). The district court gave several reasons for granting a new trial. We address all but the one relating to improper jury instructions, which pertains only to the misapplication counts on which we have affirmed the judgment of acquittal.

[10][11] The district court held that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. As the court noted, "[i]n deciding a motion for new trial, the court may weigh the evidence and consider the credibility of witnesses in determining whether the verdict is contrary to the weight of the evidence such that a miscarriage of justice may have occurred." Aplt.App., doc. 2 at 13. The court went on to state that " 'the power to grant a new trial on this ground should be invoked only in exceptional cases in which the evidence preponderates heavily against the verdict.' " 594 Id. (quoting 3 C. Wright, Federal Practice & Procedure, § 553, at 248 (2d ed. 1982)). The district court stated the correct standard, but we disagree that the evidence in this case preponderates heavily against the verdict.

[12] The court determined that the verdict on the false entry charges was against the weight of the evidence because the loan applications established revolving lines of credit which "can be used for any legal purpose unless there is a specific restriction on it. None of these lines of credit had restrictions." Aplt.App., doc. 2 at 13-14. Although the promissory notes that were signed by the loan applicants described these loans as revolving lines of credit, the funding sheets and loan approval forms specifically stated false purposes for the loans. Mr. Evans argues that the promissory notes were the controlling documents because they were the only documents legally binding on the loan applicants. The loan funding and approval sheets, however, were part of the loan file which the OCC examiners reviewed. See rec., vol. XI, at 2188-91. These documents contained purposes which could not be read to authorize use of the proceeds to purchase bank stock. See rec., vol. IV, at 818-30. It is irrelevant for purposes of the false entry statute that the customers did not see these documents and were not bound by them, or that the purposes of the loans as stated in other documents in the file were broad enough to allow the money to be used to buy stock. It only matters that false entries which would deceive examiners were made in documents in the bank files.

The district court also said "there was strong evidence that the defendant acted in good faith in all respects.... The government did not negate the defendant's good faith and prove that he acted in bad faith." Aplt.App., doc. 2 at 14. We disagree. The evidence the government presented that Mr. Evans entered false purposes of the loans into the bank records with the intent to deceive the bank examiners was sufficient evidence for a jury to find that Mr. Evans acted in bad faith. Moreover, the government introduced other specific evidence that Mr. Evans did not act in good faith. Cindy Richards, vice-president of loan operations for the bank, produced the loan documents at the request of Mr. Evans. When she asked Anthony Aguilar, the bank's loan officer, what to put for the purpose of the loans, he said " 'I don't care, just put something.' " Rec., vol. VI, at 1118. See id. at 1125. She acknowledged that Mr. Evans' initials appeared on the loan approval and funding sheets. Id. at 1128-36. She also recalled Mr. Evans stating at a board meeting, "[w]hat we're doing here is not exactly kosher." Id. at 1144. Laura Shaefer, who worked as Mr. Evans' personal secretary, also testified that Mr. Evans stated that "what we had done quote, 'was not exactly kosher,' unquote." Id. at 1194. The district court abused its discretion in granting a new trial on this ground because the evidence does not weigh heavily against the jury's verdicts on the false entry counts.

[13] The district court further concluded that a new trial was warranted because "the government's closing argument was unduly prejudicial in that it referred to the multibillion dollar savings and loan bailout and its effect on taxpayers." Aplt.App., doc. 2 at 14. The court believed that this reference was inappropriate because the bank's insolvency had nothing to do with Mr. Evans' actions. Id. We have reviewed the closing argument, and the government's only reference to the savings and loan bailout or its effect on taxpayers was made in the context of "things that I submit really are not going to be relevant when you go in that jury room to make your determination as to that man's guilt or innocence." Rec., vol. XI, at 2320. The government made this reference during its reply to Mr. Evans' allegation of bad faith on the part of the OCC. Id. at 2322. The government explained that Congress had mandated that the OCC look at how a change of control will affect taxpayers and try to "avoid the same spectacle with commercial banks or nationally chartered banks as has happened with the S and L's and the $200 billion plus losses [that happened] there." Id. at 2323. A few sentences later the government said, "[i]f a bank fails that doesn't mean the banker committed a crime." Id.

595 [14] Given the context in which the statement about the savings and loan failure was made, the statement does not rise to the level of prosecutorial misconduct. Even if the statement were improper, a new trial is not warranted because the remark in context could not have had a " 'substantial influence' on the outcome" of the trial or leave us "in 'grave doubt' as to whether it had such effect." United States v. Rivera, 900 F.2d 1462, 1469 (10th Cir.1990) (en banc). Consequently, we hold that the district court's grant of a new trial on the false entry counts was an abuse of discretion.

We AFFIRM the judgment of acquittal on the misapplication counts. We REVERSE the judgment of acquittal and the grant of a new trial on the false entry counts, and we REMAND for sentencing in accordance with the jury verdict.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Frederick Charles BOLSTAD, Jr., Appellant.

No. 92-3725.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted May 10, 1993.

Decided July 12, 1993.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, Donald D. Alsop, J., of misapplication of savings and loan funds and fraudulent participation in loan, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals held that: (1) defendant was sufficiently related to savings and loan to fall under statutes prohibiting misapplication of funds and fraudulent participation in loan; (2) evidence was sufficient to show intent to defraud savings and loan; and (3) any error in instructing on willful blindness was harmless.

Affirmed.

Evidence in prosecution of president of subsidiary of savings and loan for misapplying savings and loan funds and fraudulent participation in loan was sufficient to show intent to defraud savings and loan; evidence included proof that defendant knew that loan proceeds could only be used for buying and developing real estate, that defendant structured two-part transaction to artificially increase real estate's purchase price, that defendant lied to savings and loan about actual price, and that he did not tell savings and loan that he was partner of subsequent transferee of real estate or that he received part of loan proceeds for personal use. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 657, 1006.

v.
Herman K. BEEBE, Sr. and Dale A. Anderson, Defendants-Appellants.

No. 85-4428.

United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit.

June 30, 1986.

Defendants were convicted on three counts of defrauding the Small Business Administration in the United States District Court for the Western District of Louisiana, Tom Stagg, Chief Judge. Defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals, W. Eugene Davis, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) count which informed defendants that illegal benefit they received was their participation in $100,000 loan was sufficient, and (2) evidence was sufficient to sustain convictions in that reasonable jurors could have concluded beyond a reasonable doubt that defendants, as officers of small business investment company, set up sham corporation with intent to defraud.

investment company (SBIC). SBIC's are private lending institutions which are licensed by the SBA. If the SBIC follows the regulations and restricts its loans to qualified business concerns--generally those with a relatively minimal net worth--the SBIC is eligible to receive "leveraged" financing through debt instruments purchased or guaranteed by the SBA. However, before it can apply for this financing, the SBIC must obtain private investment capital and loan these funds to qualified borrowers. Once the officer of the SBIC certifies that the privately generated funds have been loaned to qualified borrowers, the SBA will generally replenish the SBIC coffers with funds up to three times the amount of the SBIC's private capital. See 13 C.F.R. § 107 (1986).

The license application submitted by SVCC certified that it received $1,000,000 in private capital from Savings Life Insurance Company in return for 100% of its stock. Savings Life is a corporation wholly owned by AMI, Inc. After receiving the private capital, SVCC made numerous loans to small business concerns and qualified for and received SBA financing. At all relevant times, appellant Beebe was chairman of AMI's board and appellant Anderson was vice-chairman. Additionally, Beebe was a director of SVCC and Anderson was its president.

In November 1980, AMI contracted to buy from Christian Care, Inc., a leasehold interest in the San Jacinto Nursing Home located in Deer Park, Texas, for $100,000. Pursuant to the contract, AMI gave Christian Care a $25,000 deposit and was required to complete the purchase on December 29, 1980. However, AMI assigned the contract to American Medical Management Corporation (AMMC), an entity that was at least facially qualified to borrow from a SBIC. On December 29, 1980, SVCC loaned $100,000 to AMMC and AMMC used the proceeds of the loan to purchase the leasehold interest in the San Jacinto Nursing Home. After buying the leasehold interest, AMMC entered into an agreement with AMI whereby AMI agreed to manage the nursing home for a fee.

AMMC was initially incorporated in 1977 by George Owen, a business associate and personal friend of appellant Beebe, as a vehicle to acquire and operate hospitals. This venture, financed by Owen and Beebe, was shortlived and AMMC became inactive. On December 29, 1980--the same day AMMC acquired the interest in the San Jacinto Nursing Home--David Robinson, Owen's personal bookkeeper, was made president of AMMC. All of AMMC's stock was issued to Robinson without any investment or personal obligation on his part. Robinson had no experience operating nursing homes and knew nothing about the 1366 affairs of AMMC. Robinson's only duties, for which he received $500 a month, involved ministerial tasks assigned to him by AMI officers.

George Owen also knew nothing about AMMC's financial affairs, had no duties and held no stock in AMMC although he testified that he expected to profit if AMMC was successful. He did receive a $1,000 per month "consulting" fee to help defray expenses incurred in the use of his Dallas apartment by Beebe and other AMI officers. After suffering losses for two years, AMMC's stock was acquired by Louisiana Nursing Homes, Inc. (LNH), a corporation effectively owned by Beebe's children, in exchange for the cancellation of a debt owed to LNH. The government proceeded against appellants in Count 5 on the theory that AMMC was a sham corporation through which SVCC loaned $100,000 to AMI for appellants' benefit in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1006.

II. SUFFICIENCY OF THE INDICTMENT

[1][2][3] To be sufficient, an indictment must fairly inform the defendant of the charge against which he must defend and enable him to plead double jeopardy in future prosecutions of the same offense. Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 117, 94 S.Ct. 2887, 2907, 41 L.Ed.2d 590 (1974). The indictment's validity is determined by a practical, not technical, reading of the indictment as a whole. United States v. Webb, 747 F.2d 278, 284 (5th Cir.1984), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 105 S.Ct. 1222, 84 L.Ed.2d 362 (1985). Generally, an indictment is sufficient when the charge tracks the governing statute as long as the statutory language unambiguously sets forth all essential elements, United States v. Gordon, 780 F.2d 1165, 1169 (5th Cir.1986); otherwise, if the statute defines the offense in generic terms, the indictment "must descend to particulars." Russell v. United States, 369 U.S. 749, 765, 82 S.Ct. 1038, 1047, 8 L.Ed.2d 240 (1962).

[4] Appellants contend that Count 5 of the indictment is impermissibly vague because it fails to specify the illegal "benefit" which they allegedly received in connection with the $100,000 loan to AMMC. [FN3] However, Count 5 did inform appellants that the illegal benefit they received was their participation in the $100,000 loan from SVCC to AMMC. Under the established law of this circuit, the indictment is sufficient. [FN4]

FN3. Count 5 of the indictment alleges: On or about the 31st day of December 1980, in the Western District of Louisiana, [appellants], being officers, directors, employees, agents, or connected in a capacity with SVCC, a Small Business Investment Company, duly licensed by the SBA, with intent to defraud said SBA, did unlawfully and willfully participate, share in, and directly and indirectly receive monies and benefits by means of and through the disbursement by SVCC of a wire transfer in the amount of $100,000 drawn against the SVCC account at Bossier Bank and Trust Co. for benefit of American Medical Management Corporation, the same representing proceeds of a purported legitimate loan from SVCC to American Medical Management Corporation.

FN4. Appellants urge that we should find Count 5 insufficient because a similarly worded count in an indictment alleging a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1006 was found deficient in United States v. Quinn, 365 F.2d 256 (7th Cir.1966). Appellant's reliance on Quinn is misplaced. That court was not concerned with the adequacy of the description of benefit; the court there found that Count II of the indictment contained "no allegation as to the manner or means employed in receiving money, profits and benefits, or that the check described was issued without proper authority." Id. at 262. To the extent that Quinn can be read to support appellant's view that more detail is required in the indictment at issue, we decline to follow it.

[5][6] Appellants also complain that before the trial the district court denied their request for a bill of particulars requesting information regarding the illegal benefit they received and argue that this ruling constituted reversible error. Because the indictment was sufficient, the district court did not abuse its discretion when it denied appellants' request for a bill of particulars. 1367 [FN5] United States v. Chenaur, 552 F.2d 294, 302 (9th Cir.1977).

FN5. Appellants additionally complain that that ambiguity of the indictment and the jury instructions allowed the jury to conclude that the illegal "benefit" appellants received was the legitimate management fee paid to AMI pursuant to its contract with AMMC to operate the San Jacinto Nursing Home. They refer to three questions asked by the government on cross-examination of appellant Anderson which they argue introduced this new theory of "benefit" to the jury. Appellants in effect contend that the trial judge failed to instruct the jury that the management fee could not be considered an "illegal benefit" under section 1006. However, appellants failed to request such a jury instruction or seek an appropriate cautionary instruction during cross-examination. At the charge conference, defense counsel specifically declined to request any such instruction upon being informed that the government had no intention of asserting this theory of benefit. Throughout the trial and in its closing argument, the government argued that appellants benefitted from the $100,000 loan described in Count 5 because AMMC was a sham corporation set up for AMI's benefit. Therefore, we conclude that the trial court did not commit plain error in failing to warn the jury against the government's supposed new theory of benefit.

III. SUFFICIENCY OF THE EVIDENCE

Appellants argue that the evidence does not support their convictions on Count 5 because it fails to establish that AMMC was a sham corporation. Alternatively, Anderson contends that the evidence fails to prove that he had knowledge of this fact. On review, we consider whether the evidence viewed favorably toward the verdict could establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt in the mind of a reasonable trier of fact. United States v. Hernandez, 731 F.2d 1147, 1149 (5th Cir.1984).

[7] Appellants' first contention lacks merit. A review of the record persuades us that reasonable jurors could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that AMMC was set up as a sham corporation for AMI's benefit. AMMC was reactivated at appellant Beebe's request. David Robinson was made president of AMMC at Owen's suggestion and all of its stock was issued to Robinson at no cost. Robinson admitted that he knew nothing about the management or affairs of AMMC and performed only those ministerial duties assigned him by AMI personnel.

Appellants assert that Robinson held the AMMC stock for Owen's benefit and that Owen was the true owner of AMMC. Although Owen testified that he expected to profit if AMMC was profitable, he did not invest any funds in AMMC, did not perform any duties on behalf of AMMC, and knew nothing of AMMC's financial affairs. The only payment Owen received from AMMC was $1,000 a month which he testified Beebe obtained for him from AMMC to help pay for the use of his apartment by AMI officers. Ultimately, AMMC's stock was acquired by LNH, a corporation effectively owned by Beebe's children.

Appellants insist that the evidence is entirely consistent with their contention that AMI did not control AMMC at the time of the SVCC loan, and that Robinson and Owen were placed in the role of passive investors by AMMC's management agreement with AMI. This argument is misplaced. "It is not necessary that the evidence exclude every reasonable hypothesis of innocence or be wholly inconsistent with every conclusion except that of guilt, provided a reasonable trier of fact could find that the evidence establishes guilt beyond a reasonable doubt." United States v. Bell, 678 F.2d 547, 549 (5th Cir.1982), aff'd., 462 U.S. 356, 103 S.Ct. 2398, 76 L.Ed.2d 638 (1983). Here, the jury was "free to choose among reasonable constructions of the evidence" and properly did so. Id.

[8] Similarly, Anderson's argument that the evidence fails to prove his intent to defraud the SBA is meritless. At the time of the SVCC loan to AMMC, Anderson was a board member of AMI and president of SVCC. He signed a resolution authorizing AMI to assign the San Jacinto Nursing Home contract to AMMC and admitted 1368 knowing that AMI had contracted with AMMC to manage the nursing home. He approved the SVCC $100,000 loan to AMMC and was aware that the money would be used to purchase the nursing home leasehold interest. Although he testified that he believed George Owen owned AMMC and that the transaction was proper, the jury was entitled to infer from the evidence that Anderson was aware that AMMC was a sham corporation and approved the SVCC loan with intent to defraud the SBA.

IV. JURY INSTRUCTION

Appellants requested the trial judge to instruct the jury that good faith on their part is a complete defense to all counts of the indictment. The trial judge gave a good faith defense instruction but limited it to the charges of wire fraud and filing false statements contained in Counts 6-12.

[9] The parties agree that the applicable law in this circuit establishes that an accused is ordinarily entitled to a good faith defense instruction when intent to defraud is an element of the offense charged and the defense is fairly raised by the evidence. United States v. Goss, 650 F.2d 1336 (5th Cir.1981); United States v. Fowler, 735 F.2d 823 (5th Cir.1984). However, failure to give the instruction is not reversible error if intent is properly defined in the charge to exclude a good faith belief and defense counsel presents the substance of this defense to the jury in closing argument. United States v. Fooladi, 746 F.2d 1027, 1030 (5th Cir.1984), cert. denied, --- U.S. ---, 105 S.Ct. 1362, 84 L.Ed.2d 382 (1985); United States v. Gray, 751 F.2d 733, 735 (5th Cir.1985).

[10] In light of this authority, appellants do not argue that the trial judge's failure to give a good faith defense instruction for Counts 1 and 5 demands reversal. Rather, they contend that the court's instruction approving a good faith defense for Counts 6-12 allowed the jury to infer that good faith was not a defense to Counts 1 and 5. We are not persuaded by this ingenious argument. It is unrealistic to believe that the jury would place such emphasis on a single sentence in a lengthy charge. The government did not argue to the jury that good faith was not a defense to Counts 1 and 5; in closing argument both the prosecution and the defense focused on whether the defendants acted in good faith. This issue was squarely put to the jury which decided it against the defendants.

V. CONCLUSION

Having rejected appellants' points of error on Count 5 of the indictment, we need not consider their contingent arguments relating to their convictions on Counts 1 and 12. The judgment of the district court is

v.
Harold T. WOSEPKA, Defendant/Appellant.

No. 83-3117.

United States Court of Appeals,
Ninth Circuit.

Argued and Submitted March 5, 1985.

Decided April 9, 1985.
As Modified July 9, 1985. [FN*]

FN* The order modifying this opinion is published at 787 F.2d 1294.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington, Jack E. Tanner, J., of mail and wire fraud, false statements, and misapplying funds of small business investment company, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Ferguson, Circuit Judge, held that reasonable doubt instruction given by district court was inadequate.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington.

Before FARRIS, ALARCON and FERGUSON, Circuit Judges.

FERGUSON, Circuit Judge:

The defendant, Harold T. Wosepka, contends that his convictions for mail and wire fraud, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1341, 1343, false statements, 18 U.S.C. § 1001, and misapplying the funds of a small business investment company, 18 U.S.C. § 657, should be reversed because, inter alia, the reasonable doubt instruction given by the district court was inadequate. Given the circumstances of this case, we agree and reverse.

I.

The charges upon which Wosepka was convicted arose out of Wosepka's participation in a loan program operated by the Small Business Administration ("SBA") pursuant to the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (the "Act"). 15 U.S.C. §§ 681-687.

Under the Act, the SBA is authorized to license privately owned investment companies with sufficient capital from private funds as Small Business Investment Companies ("SBIC"s). The purpose of an SBIC is to provide equity capital, long-term loans and management assistance to small business concerns. When adequately capitalized by private funds, an SBIC may gain access to SBA funds in amounts equal to up to four times the private capital of the SBIC. These SBA funds, known as "leverage funds," are provided in the form of a loan, typically for a ten year period, at interest rates determined by the Treasury Department's cost of funds. Although it is independent and privately owned, an SBIC is subject to reporting requirements and annual examinations by the SBA. In short, an SBIC is a federally regulated investment company which lends the government's money as well as its own to small business concerns.

In 1978, Wosepka purchased all the stock of an SBIC named the Small Business Investment Company of America (the "Company"). After acquiring the Company, Wosepka sought the approval of the SBA for the transfer of ownership and control. Because the Company had been inactive for some time, the SBA required a fresh injection of private capital as a condition of any transfer of ownership.

In order to satisfy the SBA's requirement, Wosepka made a $268,719 deposit to the Company's account. This deposit was made possible by a complicated series of transactions which the government terms a "check kite"--a circular flow of nonsufficient funds checks culminating in an illusory deposit--and which Wosepka terms a valid series of close business transactions with real cash injected from a line of credit.

Wosepka then, on March 23, 1979, sent a letter to the SBA representing that a capital increase had been made and enclosing a balance sheet for the Company and a bank verification letter confirming that an unencumbered cash deposit of $268,719 had been made to the Company's account. Because of the private cash increase to the capital base of the Company, the SBA approved the license transfer to Wosepka and the Company also qualified for SBA leverage funding.

1008 The Company, with its name changed to Trans-Am Bancorp, Inc. ("Trans-Am"), applied for leverage funds on March 27, 1979 ($500,000), August 9, 1979 ($450,000), August 30, 1979 ($500,000), and October 31, 1979 ($500,000). All applications were approved and funds totalling $1.95 million were wired by the SBA in four increments to Trans-Am's bank account in Oregon. The government claims that Wosepka then set up various loans to small businesses which resulted in most of the monies being routed back to corporations controlled by Wosepka or to his own private use.

Based upon these alleged transactions, a federal grand jury returned a thirty-two count indictment against Wosepka. Counts I through V each charged Wosepka with a separate mailing in execution of a scheme and artifice to defraud the SBA in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1341 & § 2. (These included Wosepka's letter to the SBA of March 23, 1979 and its enclosed balance sheet and bank's verification letter (Count I) and the four form applications submitted to the SBA by Wosepka for leverage funds (Counts II through V)). Counts VI through IX charged Wosepka with causing four separate wirings of funds from the SBA totaling $1.95 million in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1343 & § 2. Count X charged Wosepka with making a material false statement to the SBA in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1001 when he represented that an increase in the private capital of the Company had been made by him. Counts XI through XXVIII charged Wosepka with misapplying the funds of Trans-Am in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 657 by making a series of sham loans which resulted in the return of a substantial portion of the funds to Wosepka and his designees. Counts XXIX through XXXII were dismissed by the district court on the government's motion after Wosepka's motion for their severance had been granted.

Wosepka pled not guilty to all counts of the indictment. During the course of a twelve-day trial, the government called thirty-eight witnesses and introduced approximately five hundred exhibits. Both Wosepka and the government submitted proposed "reasonable-doubt" instructions to the district court. The court declined to use either instruction and, over Wosepka's objection, gave no definition of reasonable doubt other than stating:

> Reasonable doubt, as the name implies, is a doubt based on reason and common sense.

The jury then returned guilty verdicts on all counts.

II.

Wosepka contends that, under the circumstances of this case, the district court's abbreviated reasonable-doubt instruction did not provide the jury with a sufficient basis to determine guilt or innocence and thus constitutes reversible error. Due to the complexity of the case and the conflicting evidence, we agree.

[1] "[A] society that values the good name and freedom of every individual should not condemn a man for commission of a crime when there is reasonable doubt about his guilt." In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 363-64, 90 S.Ct. 1068, 1072, 25 L.Ed.2d 368 (1970). The reasonable-doubt standard is thus indispensable in our American scheme of criminal procedure. Id. at 364, 90 S.Ct. at 1072. It reduces "the risk of convictions resting on factual error" and "provides concrete substance for the presumption of innocence" which " 'lies at the foundation of the administration of our criminal law.' " Id. at 363, 90 S.Ct. at 1072 (quoting Coffin v. United States, 156 U.S. 432, 453, 15 S.Ct. 394, 402, 39 L.Ed. 481 (1895)). Thus, if in reviewing the district court's reasonable-doubt charge we find that the charge taken as a whole does not fairly and accurately convey the meaning of a reasonable doubt, we must reverse. See Holland v. United States, 348 U.S. 121, 140, 75 S.Ct. 127, 137, 99 L.Ed. 150 (1954); United States v. Newport, 747 F.2d 1307, 1308 (9th Cir.1984).

The skeletal instruction on reasonable doubt given by the court in this case did not fairly or accurately convey the meaning of a reasonable doubt. Although the court 1009 noted the government's burden to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt several times during the instructions, it failed to provide any meaningful explanation of the reasonable-doubt concept. The instructions submitted by both the government and Wosepka gave fuller treatments to the concept of reasonable doubt than that given by the court. The government's requested instruction explained, among other matters, that reasonable doubt is such a doubt as "would cause a reasonable person to hesitate or pause in the graver or more important transactions of life" and "is such a doubt as would cause a juror, after careful and candid and impartial consideration of all the evidence, to be so undecided that he cannot say that he has an abiding conviction of the defendant's guilt." Wosepka's proposed instruction explained that reasonable doubt is "the kind of doubt that would make a reasonable person hesitate to act" and that proof beyond a reasonable doubt must "be proof of such a convincing character that a reasonable person would not hesitate to rely and act upon it in the most important of his own affairs."

[2] The court, however, rejected both these instructions and gave its own shortened version. The court merely stated that reasonable doubt "is a doubt based on reason and common sense." The court, for no apparent reason, deleted critical language defining reasonable doubt in terms of a "hesitation to act" and requiring the jurors to decide the question of guilt or innocence with the same degree of care and attention they would bring to bear "in the most important of their own personal affairs." Given the complexity of this case, the court's abbreviated instruction failed to provide the jury with any meaningful principles or standards to guide it in evaluating the sufficiency of the government's evidence.

We do not find United States v. Witt, 648 F.2d 608 (9th Cir. 1981), to the contrary. Witt found that the trial judge's failure to provide a definition of reasonable doubt was not reversible error. It also noted that " 'an omission or an incomplete instruction is less likely to be prejudicial than a misstatement of the law.' " Witt, 648 F.2d at 610 (quoting Henderson v. Kibbe, 431 U.S. 145, 155, 97 S.Ct. 1730, 1737, 52 L.Ed.2d 203 (1977)). Wosepka involves an instruction which did not fairly or accurately convey the meaning of a reasonable doubt--an instruction Witt recognized as a potential ground for reversal. Furthermore, Witt does not authorize the elimination of explanatory reasonable-doubt instructions in all cases. The issues to be resolved by the jury in that case were fairly straightforward and the evidence was not complex. See 648 F.2d at 611. The Witt court clearly recognized this and limited its holding to the unique circumstances in that case. See 648 F.2d at 610-11 ("We hold that in this case the district court was not required to define reasonable doubt" and that a complete instruction as to the presumption of innocence was not required "under the circumstances of this case.") (emphasis added).

In contrast, the issues raised and the evidence presented in the present case concern disputed transactions. Such transactions, compounded by the vast amount of evidence presented, made it difficult to determine whether the requisite elements could be found beyond a reasonable doubt with respect to each offense. Indeed, the government called thirty-eight witnesses and introduced approximately five hundred exhibits during the twelve-day trial. The testimony of the FBI agent called by the government as a summary witness at the conclusion of its case-in-chief alone fills one hundred and forty-seven pages of trial transcript.

[3] Furthermore, the inadequacy of the reasonable doubt instruction is clearly demonstrated by the jury's conviction of Wosepka on Counts II through V of the mail fraud counts. To establish an offense of mail fraud under 18 U.S.C. § 1341, in addition to a scheme to defraud, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Wosepka caused a use of the United States mails to execute the scheme. United States v. Beecroft, 608 F.2d 753, 757 (9th Cir.1979). With respect to the four applications for leverage funds submitted by Trans-Am to the SBA (which constitute the mailings charged in Counts II through V), the government presented no evidence of the use of the mails other than: (1) the conclusory "yes" of the SBA representative who processed the applications four years prior to trial in response to the prosecutor's questions of whether he had received the applications through the 1010 mail; and (2) certain exhibits (two of which are applications for leverage funds which are the subjects of Counts IV and V) bearing SBA date and mail room stamps. The defendant introduced into evidence the cover letter accompanying the application that constitutes the mailing charged in Count II expressly stating that such application was delivered "via Federal Express." No evidence was presented by the government to show that Federal Express deliveries were not received and stamped in the SBA mail room. Because a use of Federal Express would not constitute a use of the United States mails, under these circumstances, given a proper reasonable-doubt instruction, a reasonable juror could have had a reasonable doubt with respect to the use of the mails. United States v. Clevenger, 733 F.2d 1356, 1358 (9th Cir.1984) (quoting Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319, 99 S.Ct. 2781, 2789, 61 L.Ed.2d 560 (1979)). Cf. United States v. Stull, 521 F.2d 687, 690 (6th Cir.1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1059, 96 S.Ct. 794, 46 L.Ed.2d 649 (1976) (testimony of print shop owner that he received defendant's work orders through the mail four years prior to trial constituted "no more than a conclusion" and was insufficient to sustain conviction in light of other evidence presented). Considering Wosepka's evidence and the government's scarcity of proof, a fuller description of reasonable doubt was clearly necessary to guide the jury in its determination of whether the necessary elements for conviction were present.

III.

Given the circumstances of this case, the district court did not give a sufficient instruction on reasonable doubt. Even the government submitted a proposed reasonable doubt instruction much fuller and more detailed than that given by the court. The court's abbreviated instruction did not provide the guidance the jury needed in this complicated case.

"It was the duty of the court to safeguard the [defendant's] rights, a duty only it could have performed reliably." Taylor v. Kentucky, 436 U.S. 478, 489, 98 S.Ct. 1930, 1936, 56 L.Ed.2d 468 (1978). The skeletal reasonable-doubt instruction given by the district court was not sufficient to protect the defendant from erroneous conviction. See In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 363, 90 S.Ct. 1068, 1072, 25 L.Ed.2d 368 (1970).

We therefore REVERSE and REMAND for retrial.

Single v multiple conspiracy - false entries to defraud SBA. Temporary investments in SBIC to falsely boost capitalization.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Glenn W. McMURRAY and R. Glade Whiting, Defendants-Appellants.

Nos. 78-1928, 78-1929.

United States Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit.

Feb. 10, 1981.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Utah, Central Division, William G. Juergens, J., of substantive and conspiratorial offenses in violation of the Small Business Investment Act, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, William E. Doyle, Circuit Judge, 656 F.2d 540, affirmed, and rehearing en banc was sought. The Court of Appeals, Seth, Chief Judge, held, on rehearing, that where money was assembled in segments with different groups providing funds for sole purpose of supporting Small Business Administration applications for guaranty, there was but one conspiracy and thus Government was precluded from retrying defendants on conspiracy charges in view of previous conspiracy prosecutions and fact that members of two groups of "spoke" defendants were not found to have any connection did not mean that there were two separate conspiracies.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

William E. Doyle, Circuit Judge, dissented with opinion in which McWilliams and Barrett, Circuit Judges, concurred.

On Rehearing En Banc

SETH, Chief Judge.

These are appeals from the District of Utah in number CR-77-11 wherein the appellants were convicted in a jury trial. The appellants McMurray and Whiting urge that errors were committed by the trial court in its denial of their motions for acquittal, and as to certain instructions. They also urge that there was not sufficient evidence to support the verdicts.

Appellants McMurray and Whiting assert that the trial court was in error in its denial of their motions to dismiss on the ground of double jeopardy. The cases were based on several indictments all relating to a Small Business Investment Company.

The grand jury handed down several indictments based on applications made by the Utah Capital Corporation, which was a Small Business Investment Company, to the Small Business Administration. Each indictment in identical language alleges a conspiracy to make false entries in reports and statements in violation of 18 U.S.C. ss 1006 and 2 to defraud the United States by frustrating the operation of the Small Business Administration. Substantive counts were also included in each.

Utah Capital was under the supervision of the Small Business Administration and was in the business of lending funds to small concerns. Under the statute (15 U.S.C. s 683) it could apply to the SBA to issue government guaranteed debentures.

The amount of such debentures which could be issued by Utah Capital depended on the total of its paid-in capital and surplus. For authorization to issue debentures, Utah Capital had to apply and did apply to the SBA by an Application for Guaranty. In this application it was required to state the amount of its paid-in capital and surplus.

The Government in the indictments alleged that the defendants conspired to falsely and fictitiously misrepresent the amount of Utah Capital's capital and surplus. This was alleged to have been done by making deposits in the corporate bank account of funds which in fact were not unencumbered corporate funds but were provided by a number of persons for temporary use to increase the corporate bank deposits to support an application to issue guaranteed debentures. These advances were by prearrangement returned to the individuals within a very short time. The 697 application to the SBA was submitted at the time when the bank account of Utah Capital was so fictitiously increased.

The defendant McMurray was president and defendant Whiting was vice president of Utah Capital. Defendant Cassity was the attorney for the corporation. The record shows that the purpose of the conspiracy was to assemble funds in a certain agreed amount, deposit them in a bank, prepare and file the application with the SBA based on the then balance in the account, then return the funds to the individuals who had provided them for the described purpose.

The four indictments each named defendants McMurray, Whiting, and Cassity who came to be known as the "hub defendants." In each indictment there were named other defendants who it was asserted had conspired to provide one of the four segments of the total deposit. These "spoke" defendants were eight in number and were each named in but one indictment. For example, in the indictment which became case number CR-76-126, and was the first tried, defendants McMurray, Whiting, and Cassity were named with the "spoke" defendants Lindquist, Nemelka, and Solomon. It was there alleged that this group had provided $550,000.00 of the $2,185,000.00 deposit on May 21st for use in a SBA application. In CR-77-11 (the case before us) defendant Wilstead was named with McMurray, Whiting, and Cassity in providing $725,000.00, part of which was used in the same May 21st deposit of $2,185,000.00 and part used in a September deposit. The indictments in 76-126 and 77-11 both concern the same deposit to provide apparent support for the same SBA application.

In trial court case number CR-76-126 there were tried defendants McMurray, Whiting, and Cassity, the so-called "hub" defendants, as mentioned above, and others. In CR-76-126 Count I alleged a conspiracy and Counts II through V alleged false entries and aiding and abetting. After jeopardy had attached during the trial in 76-126 the court on the Government's motion dismissed all counts except the conspiracy count.

The jury in CR-76-126 acquitted defendant Cassity but convicted defendants McMurray, Whiting, and Nemelka. The convictions were appealed and became in this court 79-1655, 79-1654, and 79-1393. The cases were consolidated and the panel opinion was filed November 13, 1980.

The defendant Cassity who was acquitted in CR-76-126 was brought to trial under another of the four indictments in case CR-77-13. On motion of Cassity the trial court dismissed on the ground of double jeopardy arising from the trial in 76-126. We affirmed the dismissal on the Government's appeal in our 79-1077 with an opinion filed January 31, 1980.

The Government also sought to again try defendants McMurray and Whiting, who had been convicted in 76-126 on another of the four indictments as case number CR-77-11. Defendant Wilstead was tried in CR-77-11. He had not been tried before. The trial judge, who did not hear 77-13 (Cassity), denied the double jeopardy motions of defendants McMurray and Whiting and they went to trial. This denial, and the subsequent convictions, were appealed to this court and became numbers 78-1928, 78-1929, and 78-1930. The panel filed an opinion on March 5, 1980. 656 F.2d 540. Rehearing en banc was granted and this is the opinion on such rehearing.

We must hold that there was but one conspiracy and this was to amass the $2,185,000.00 for deposit to support the SBA application. It was assembled in segments with different groups providing funds for the purpose of supporting the Application for Guaranty. This was the objective of all the arrangements.

The Government asserts that there was no connection directly between the two "spoke" groups here concerned (CR-76-126 and CR-77-11), and thus each acted independently with the "hub" group. The Government thus takes the view that each arrangement with a "spoke" group for a segment of the total deposit was a separate conspiracy. It thus moves back one step from the assembly of, and the making of 698 the total deposit, and moves back from the submission of the application.

We are persuaded by the singleness of the ultimate objective of all the defendants. It was a narrow one and was to make the deposit to support the application to the SBA. It took a lot of arranging, some close timing, and a number of individuals to accomplish the objective, but again it was but one well defined objective. With each of the two "spoke" groups the subsidiary objective was to arrange for one segment or portion of the total deposit. The "spoke" group in CR-76-126 had no direct relationship with the group in CR-77-11; each was negotiated with separately by the "hub" group directly. All planning was directed by the "hub" defendants to the ultimate deposit and application.

In examining the scope of the conspiracy, we must look to the submission of the Application for Guaranty as the most important element. This submission was the basic aim of all the arrangements. The dollar total therein or in the supporting deposit is not significant for our purposes, but the submission was. It is apparent that all the convicted conspirators in CR-76-126 and CR- 77-11 entered into the sham investment plan to support an Application for Guaranty. The success of the application influenced the "spoke" defendants' compensation or that of most of them. The indictment alleged that the "spoke" defendants would receive loans for their participation. It is thus apparent that all the defendants in both cases were concerned with the success of the application, and the whole arrangement was dependent thereon.

The proof did not show that the "spoke" defendants had any contact or connection with other "spoke" defendants. Obviously the "hub" defendants were the same. Thus as the record before us stands, there is no showing of any connection or meetings between the two groups of "spoke" defendants.

Under the authorities it is not necessary that each conspirator agree with all others or even know of the others, or have contact with each of them. Blumenthal v. United States, 332 U.S. 539, 68 S.Ct. 248, 92 S.Ct. 154, presents fundamental issues as to the admission of evidence and its impact on the various defendants. However, on the broader questions the Court stated that participants could be convicted upon a showing of the nature of the plan and their connections with it, and "without requiring evidence of knowledge of all its details or of the participation of others." The Court continued to demonstrate several details in the conspiracy which might be unknown to some of the conspirators. This included knowledge of the participation by the unknown owner of the whiskey in the arrangement. The Court also there stated:

> "By their separate agreements, if such they were, they became parties to the larger common plan, joined together by their knowledge of its essential features and broad scope, though not of its exact limits, and by their common single goal."

And further:

> "All by reason of their knowledge of the plan's general scope, if not its exact limits, sought a common end, to aid in disposing of the whiskey. True, each salesman aided in selling only his part. But he knew the lot to be sold was larger and thus that he was aiding in a larger plan. He thus became a party to it and not merely to the integrating agreement with Weiss and Goldsmith."

In Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 90 L.Ed. 1557, each loan was a separate transaction complete in itself each with a separate illegal purpose and end. The only connection shown was that Brown handled all the loan applications. Each was a direct transaction, and was not part of a chain of events common in drug conspiracies.

We must again refer to the single purpose of the arrangement for the temporary use of the "spoke" defendants' funds. The defendants in both cases knew of this purpose; this was the plan and the agreement. Again, it was not necessary for all to know the ultimate dollar figure. It was not necessary that all know the others involved in the same purpose-those who provided other 699 dollars. The "hub" defendants dealt separately with the groups in the accumulation of the funds, but all was for the same purpose and the separate dealings did not thereby create separate conspiracies. Nor could the Government by separate indictments divide up a single conspiracy. Thus we must hold that but one conspiracy has been shown to exist, and the defense of double jeopardy was valid.

It is apparent that the issue as to whether one or more conspiracies existed in the cases before us is to be resolved by an examination of the facts. The problem is a factual one and each case is unique. There are no general legal propositions which will decide all the cases; instead, an examination must be made on a case by case basis starting with the purpose of the conspiracy and how it was carried out. The agreement obviously is the central element of any conspiracy. The agreement includes the objective of the combination. The objective here was to defraud the SBA by the Application for Guaranty based on fictitious bank deposits. All the convicted defendants knew the objective-the purpose of the accumulation of funds, and all participated in attaining the objective. In the cases before us there were two groups seeking to accomplish the same ends. The several participants had somewhat different roles as we have described. The success of the agreement was to be the approval of the application, and all worked to this end. The facts before us with the clear objective-a single business transaction-which all participants were seeking to bring about present a very much clearer picture than do the many drug conspiracies which find their way to the courts. See, for example, our United States v. Martinez, 562 F.2d 633 (10th Cir.). We have here a limited time span with the same cast of characters throughout. The comparison must again be made with the facts in Blumenthal v. United States, 332 U.S. 539, 68 S.Ct. 248, 92 S.Ct. 154, from which we have taken quotations in the preceding paragraphs. This was a conspiracy to sell whiskey provided by an unidentified owner which had come into the possession of Weiss and Goldsmith. The issue was whether there was one conspiracy to dispose of the whiskey or whether there were two conspiracies, one between Weiss-Goldsmith and the owner and another between Weiss-Goldsmith and the several salesmen. The Court decided there was one conspiracy and said:

> "All knew of and joined in the overriding scheme. All intended to aid the owner, whether Francisco or another, to sell the whiskey unlawfully, though the two groups of defendants differed on the proof in knowledge and belief concerning the owner's identity. All by reason of their knowledge of the plan's general scope, if not its exact limits, sought a common end, to aid in disposing of the whiskey. True, each salesman aided in selling only his part. But he knew the lot to be sold was larger and thus that he was aiding in a larger plan. He thus became a party to it and not merely to the integrating agreement with Weiss and Goldsmith."

The defendants here all knew of the general plan, purpose, and aim, as we have mentioned. All were aware of the accumulation of funds for the May deposit and the purpose of the deposit. Some participated by providing different amounts of money as compared to the sales in Blumenthal of different quantities of whiskey. The knowledge, the awareness of the purpose and objective are the same in this case as in Blumenthal.

The judgments of conviction of defendant Glenn W. McMurray in CR-77-11 Utah (our number 78-1928) and of R. Glade Whiting in CR-77-11 Utah (our number 78-1929) are reversed and the cases remanded with directions to dismiss the actions and the indictments.

DOYLE, Judge, dissenting.

I respectfully dissent.

The problem is whether a prior adjudication forms a basis for claiming former jeopardy. The ultimate question is whether the several indictments involved one conspiracy or four, and so the cause has to be determined 700 in relationship to the surrounding facts, with a view to deciding whether the indictments which are here being considered have an independent identity, or whether they are all part of a single conspiracy. The authorities, and particularly the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, must be examined and the standards and tests which are contained in those cases are to be applied to the solution.

I have no quarrel with the facts which are set forth in the majority opinion. I do feel, however, that some supplemental statement must be given for the purpose of showing the case in a light which shows my approach to the case.

On February 8, 1977, in the United States District Court for the District of Utah, an indictment was returned against Glenn W. McMurray, R. Glade Whiting, Donn E. Cassity and Robert H. Wilstead. This indictment alleged that the Small Business Administration, a United States agency charged with the administering of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, was defrauded by the defendants. Appellants McMurray and Wilstead were convicted following a trial to a jury. Cassity was dismissed out. They were found guilty on a conspiracy count and on additional substantive counts which charged false entries in books and accounts. Two of the several substantive counts were dismissed during the trial.

McMurray and Whiting are referred to throughout the case as "hub" defendants. Wilstead, on the other hand, for the purposes of the conspiracy, is referred to as a so-called "spoke" defendant. The appeal by McMurray and Whiting pertains to their contention that the conspiracy is barred by the Fifth Amendment doctrine of former jeopardy. Various other errors are set forth in the briefs, but there is no necessity for treating these contentions here.

The instrument for carrying out the fraud was Utah Capital Corporation, which was a small business investment company organized by the hub defendants, and licensed by the SBA pursuant to 15 U.S.C. Sec. 681. McMurray was the President and Chairman of the Board of Directors of UCC, and Cassity was Legal Counsel; R. Glade Whiting was the Vice-President and Director.

The Small Business Administration sought to make private funds available to small businesses. At the same time it sought to insure the private financial interests of the owners of small business investment companies such as UCC. To achieve these purposes it guaranteed payments on debentures issued by the Small Business Administration, subject to the restriction that the total amount of debentures guaranteed at any time from an SBIC was not to exceed 200% of the combined private paid-in capital and paid-in surplus of the company. This feature is the key to the fraud that was perpetrated. Because of it the defendants sought to build up their apparent paid-in capital and surplus in order to be able to issue a greater amount of securities debentures. Following the grand jury investigation four indictments were returned, charging a total of eleven defendants. Three of these, McMurray, Whiting and Cassity, were charged in each of the four indictments, although they have not been prosecuted on all indictments. Wilstead and the other defendants, all of whom have been referred to as spoke participants in the conspiracy cases, were charged in one indictment each.

The several indictments described distinct transactions, so I contend; conspiracies to defraud the government and substantive offenses involving independent false entries in the books and records of the Utah Capital Corporation. McMurray and Whiting were charged in each of the indictments. They were the operators of UCC, and were the ones who apparently conceived the scheme. Wilstead participated only in this one transaction and had nothing to do with the prior transaction which occurred four months or so before. In this case his role was loaning the added funds to swell the paid-in capital.

Although its mechanics were the same, the amounts of money utilized and the other cover-up facts were generally distinct. 701 The Small Business Administration was defrauded distinctly and independently in all four transactions; each group was charged with the making and receipt of a distinct sham investment in UCC. The investment was a substantial amount of money and was not retained by UCC. It was immediately returned to the contributing defendants by way of alleged sham loans to fictitious business entities. In truth these purported loans constituted the return of moneys that had been loaned for just long enough to mislead the Small Business Administration as to the amount of paid-in capital that the corporation had. There were false entries made in the books in order to support the fraud.

UCC qualified for matching funds guaranteed by the Small Business Administration, and upon its receipt of these guarantees each of the four capital providing groups was provided with accommodation loans as consideration for their previous participation. Wilstead was no exception.

The defendants McMurray and Whiting were charged with serving as a hub in arranging sham investments by various spoke defendants. There is no showing that one group of spoke defendants was familiar with the fact that there were other transactions and other spoke participants.

In CR-76-126, United States District Court for the District of Utah, which charge is held to bar the offense here, the hub defendants and principals of UCC were charged with conspiracy to fictitiously increase UCC's paid-in capital and surplus in the amount of $550,000. The funds were raised by other defendants who were in no way involved here. They were Lindquist, Nemelka and Solomon, and the funds were reflected on UCC's books as an investment by Robert Solomon. Shortly after its receipt, the $550,000 became part of a larger $2,185,000 bank deposit, on May 21, 1973, which deposit was shown in UCC's application for guarantee submitted to the SBA on May 21, 1973. The $550,000 was withdrawn from UCC's bank account within a very short time after it was deposited. Thereafter the funds were returned to Solomon and Lindquist, according to plan, through a series of bogus loans made to sham corporations controlled by Solomon, Lindquist and Nemelka. In return for this circular capitalization process, defendants Solomon, Lindquist and Nemelka received other loans from UCC. This was to compensate them for the momentary use of the $750,000.

The transaction that is here being considered, which is the subject of the indictment, occurred some months later, September, 1973. This was CR-77-11 in the United States District Court for the District of Utah, with the same hub defendants and principals, being McMurray, Whiting and Cassity, with Wilstead being the spoke defendant and financier. They were alleged to have entered into a separate agreement to fictitiously increase UCC's paid-in capital surplus by $725,000. As a result of this agreement, $200,000 became part of the May 21, 1973 bank deposit, and $525,000 became part of a second application, made in September of 1973. These funds were almost immediately withdrawn from UCC's control and returned to defendant Wilstead, the spoke defendant, through the use of sham loans to corporations controlled by him. Thereafter Wilstead received other pay-off loans from UCC to compensate him for the temporary use of the $725,000.

Similar schemes were alleged to have occurred in CR-77-13, with defendants West and Jolly participating, and CR-77-16, with defendants Rigby and Lord participating. Both of these indictments were dismissed as to McMurray and Whiting. There was a degree of co-mingling of other funds in the September transaction which is CR-77-11 in the district court. In CR-76-126 the amount co-mingled on May 21, 1973 constituted 100% of the sham capitalization employed in the alleged conspiracy. In CR-77-11, however, the amount co-mingled on May 21, 1973, constituted only 20%, $200,000, of the total $725,000. This is attributable to the fact that the sham capitalization in CR-77-11 agreement continued up to the September, 1973 UCC application, whereas CR-76-126 had nothing to do with this later period.

702 In June of 1978, CR-76-126, was tried to a jury before Chief Judge Fred M. Winner of the Colorado United States District Court. During the trial, on the government's motion, the court dismissed all counts of the indictment except the count of conspiracy. The jury returned verdicts of acquittal as to Cassity and guilt as to defendants McMurray and Whiting, and this is the basis for the present contention that former jeopardy precludes subsequent prosecution in the September transaction, which is the conviction which is being reviewed here.

The present case was tried to a jury in August of 1978, with the Honorable John Jurgens presiding. The jury returned verdicts of guilty as to conspiracy and as to Counts II, III, IV and VII, involving false entries and aiding and abetting, as to appellants McMurray, Whiting and Wilstead. Counts V and VI were dismissed on motion of the government. McMurray and Whiting, after entry of the judgments, moved the court for judgments of acquittal because of former jeopardy. These motions were denied, and they are now appealed.

The basic contention of the appellants is that the allegations of the various indictments are substantially identical and this called for treating the several incidents as a single conspiracy. Under their characterizations of the facts, there is only one agreement and objective, namely to obtain for UCC guaranteed debentures by allegedly increasing UCC's paid-in capital in connection with UCC's May, 1973, application for a guarantee. Since McMurray and Whiting were tried and convicted for this, they claim it is double jeopardy to convict them for the conspiracy which was established in the present case.

The government's position is, of course, that the four original indictments each charge a separate and independent agreement. Although each agreement contemplated violation of the same statute, they were separate transactions and not part of a single grand jury scheme. Therefore, the government contends that conviction for the conspiracy charged in the separate cases does not constitute double jeopardy, and that is what this dissent is all about.

We now address the question whether the several frauds are a part of one single conspiracy or are to be regarded as independent transactions, because the result reached depends upon this analysis.

The mere fact that the same hub defendants are charged with being members of the two conspiracies and that both concerned transactions with the same subject matter and overlapped in time does not establish that they are the same for double jeopardy purposes. See United States v. Martinez, 562 F.2d 633 (10th Cir. 1977). The Government's argument, which to this writer is valid, is that although various different parties conspire with one common hub group of conspirators, the evidence may nevertheless show that separate conspiracies were involved, and that no one combination embraced the objectives of the others. United States v. Martinez; United States v. Butler, 494 F.2d 1246, 1255 (10th Cir. 1974); Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 90 L.Ed. 1557 (1945).

The scope of the agreement to do unlawful acts and the scope of the conspiracy gives the answer to our question. If the evidence reveals a single over-all agreement to carry out an illegal plan or goal, then a single conspiracy may very well exist. A single plan, however, requires more dependence between the participants, and general knowledge of the spoke defendants as to the scope of the scheme or plan. Thus, this is not like a conspiracy to possess and distribute heroin and to sell it to various people. This may very likely be one conspiracy while it lasts, and in each instance the sellers that "retail" know full well of the general conspiracy and that their particular sales serve that conspiracy. If the numerous defendants participating in a conspiracy are to be brought into the fundamental scheme it is necessary that there be facts present to justify bringing all of the conspirators within the single agreement. And it would have to appear also that all of the objectives were contemplated in the one conspiracy.

703 The Supreme Court has spoken on this in positive terms in the case of Kotteakos v. United States, supra, which has facts which are similar to those before the court. The issue there was whether the petitioner suffered substantial prejudice from being convicted of a single general conspiracy by evidence which, as admitted by the government, proved to be not one conspiracy, but several of the same type and having the same subject matter, and did so through a common figure, as here. In Kotteakos the indictment alleged that one Brown was the central figure (the hub defendant) in a scheme to induce various financial institutions to grant credit with the intent that the loans or advancements would then be offered to the Federal Housing Administration for insurance upon applications containing false and fraudulent information. Brown pleaded guilty. He had acted as a broker for others in placing the loans, and charged five percent commission for his services. Brown obtained loans for several persons and groups of persons named in the original conspiracy indictment. The Supreme Court concluded:

> The evidence against the other defendants whose cases were submitted to the jury was similar in character. They too had transacted business with Brown relating to National Housing Act loans. But no connection was shown between them and petitioners, other than that Brown had been the instrument in each instance for obtaining the loans. In many cases the other defendants did not have any relationship with one another, other than Brown's connection with each transaction. As the Circuit Court of Appeals said, there were "at least eight, and perhaps more, separate and independent groups, none of which had any connection with any other, though all dealt independently with Brown as their agent." (United States v. Lekacos,) 151 F.2d (170) at 172 ((2nd Cir.)). As the Government puts it, the pattern was "that of separate spokes meeting in a common center," though, we may add, without the rim of the wheel to enclose the spokes.

The Supreme Court further said (328 U.S. at 768, 66 S.Ct. at 1249):

> The trial court was of the view that one conspiracy was made out by showing that each defendant was linked to Brown in one or more transactions, and that it was possible on the evidence for the jury to conclude that all were in a common adventure because of this fact and the similarity of the purpose presented in the various applications for the loans.

This view, specifically embodied throughout the instructions, obviously confuses the common purpose of a single enterprise with the several, though similar, purposes of numerous, separate adventures of like character.

The Supreme Court concluded that the petitioners before it had suffered substantial prejudice by being convicted of a single general conspiracy on evidence which the government admitted proved not one conspiracy, but some eight or more. The ruling was believed necessary in order to protect each defendant's right to have guilt determined on an individual basis, and thereby to avoid the dangers of transference of guilt from one defendant to another across lines separating conspiracies. We submit that if a single conspiracy for the four transactions had been here charged, and the trial had been on that theory, the defendants would be here protesting that they were being prejudiced by several conspiracies; that they were convicted of one conspiracy when, in truth, there were several, and they were thereby prejudiced. Therefore, the government is placed in a situation in which there will be protests regardless of how it proceeds.

Another Supreme Court decision which deals with this general problem is Blumenthal v. United States, 332 U.S. 539, 68 S.Ct. 248, 92 S.Ct. 154 (1947). There, four petitioners and another defendant were convicted of conspiring to sell whiskey at prices above the ceiling set by regulations of the Price Administration, in violation of the Emergency Price Control Act. The evidence showed that each of the defendants had a part in arranging sales and deliveries of portions of two larger shipments of liquor 704 to purchasers. The defendants were intermediaries between an unknown owner of the liquor and the tavernkeepers. The indictments alleged a single conspiracy. The issue considered by the Supreme Court was whether the evidence established that there was more than one conspiracy.

It is of interest to note that the defendants in the Blumenthal case who were intermediaries between an unknown owner of the liquor and the tavernkeepers were alleged to have acted pursuant to a single conspiracy. The issue addressed by the Supreme Court was whether the evidence established multiple conspiracies, and thus ran counter to Kotteakos.

The ruling of the court stemmed from the concept that the five defendants joined in a single conspiracy to sell whiskey at excessive prices and did so in the guise of legal sales, and the agreements involved were merely steps in the formation of the larger and ultimately general scheme. The court said the scheme was, in fact, the same one. The court added that the determining factor was that the salesmen knew, or must have known, that others unknown to them were sharing in so large a project. The court said further that by their separate agreements, if such they were, they became parties to the larger common plan, joined together by their knowledge of its essential features and broad scope, even though they did not know its exact limits. Blumenthal differed from the Kotteakos case in that in the latter each loan was an end in itself, separate from others, although were alike in having similar illegal objects. With the exception of Brown, the common figure, no conspirator was interested in whether any loan, except his own, went through, and no one aided in any way, by agreement or otherwise, in procuring another's loan. The court concluded:

The conspiracies, therefore, were distinct and disconnected, not part of the larger general scheme, both in the phase with Brown and in the absence of any aid given to any others, as well as in specific object and result.

The court also said there was no drawing of all (participants) together in a single, over-all comprehensive plan.

It is to be concluded from reading the above two decisions that the distinguishing feature in this type of case is some knowledge on the part of the spoke participants as to the general scope of the alleged goals of the general conspiracy. One cannot be said to agree to join a conspiracy to achieve illegal objectives without general knowledge of the scope of a larger plan and what is involved in the plan. Thus, there must be interdependence among the conspirators in reaching the ultimate objective of the conspiracy, and this serves as a basis for imputing knowledge of the larger plan to peripheral participants and ties all of them together in one scheme.

But in the case before us there is a complete lack of evidence as to the knowledge of the spoke defendants of the other transactions. None of the defendants charged with putting up the money, which was the main feature in the conspiracy in four separate indictments, had any knowledge that McMurray and Whiting were engaged in any similar transactions involving the money of other people, which transactions also misled the Small Business Administration. The separate transactions appear to have proceeded independently and to have had, as well, an independent character and identity. The success or failure of each transaction was not dependent upon the success or failure of the others.

The facts of the case here are very close to those in Kotteakos, where a core group of individuals was involved in distinct transactions with a variety of unrelated other persons.

This court in Bartlett v. United States, 166 F.2d 928 (10th Cir. 1948) considered a fact situation in which the appellants, along with another individual, were convicted under a charge of conspiracy to violate federal laws having to do with the rationing of sugar. They had previously been convicted on a conspiracy charge involving another scheme to manipulate entries of credit in the sugar account. They contended that double jeopardy precluded the second conviction. This court disagreed. It determined that the evidence justified the conclusion that separate agreements were entered into, rather than that there was a 705 single large conspiracy. The test for determining whether the offenses charged were identical was stated to be whether the facts alleged in one, if offered in support of the other, would sustain a conviction. When one indictment requires proof of a fact which the other indictment does not, the conclusion is that the several offenses charged are not identical for double jeopardy purposes.

The same evidence test is admittedly broader than the test that is discussed by the Supreme Court in Kotteakos and Blumenthal, but it nevertheless has been used to a great extent, even though recently there has been some criticism of it. See United States v. Papa, 533 F.2d 815 (2nd Cir. 1976); cert. denied 429 U.S. 961, 97 S.Ct. 387, 50 L.Ed.2d 329. The criticisms have been made in the course of considering narcotics conspiracies, and in those cases there is potential for prosecutorial splitting of conspiracies, due to the nature of the relationships involved. It would appear that in narcotics cases it has been regarded more logical to proceed on the theory of the conspiracy being one rather than several. In the Papa case the claim of double jeopardy was raised when the defendant was convicted of a charge of conspiring to traffic in narcotics. He claimed the conviction was barred because of a previous conviction on a guilty plea to another indictment which involved conspiracy to traffic in narcotics. The court found that the defendant was the director of two unrelated chains distributing narcotics, and the mere fact that he supervised each did not transform two separate conspiracies into one.

A more recent case in the Second Circuit is United States v. DeFillipo, 590 F.2d 1228 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied 442 U.S. 920, 99 S.Ct. 2844, 61 L.Ed.2d 288. The court there recognized that the government was not empowered to prosecute a defendant for conspiracy twice where there is a single agreement, but two crimes. The court rejected, however, the defendant's double jeopardy argument, because it determined that there were two separate distinct conspiracies to commit the same substantive offense, and although it acknowledged that the same evidence test was not necessarily applicable, it considered the relationship to be two transactions. It held that there had been independent agreements involved in each case, rather than one continuing conspiracy.

In summary, the evidence here discloses independent transactions, the use of independent funds in the fraud and the obtaining of an independent result. The spoke defendant Wilstead is not shown to have known of other transactions. The two transactions here being scrutinized occurred at different times with a different financier, and a distinct act of misleading the Small Business Administration.

After all, the ultimate question should be whether the transactions are identical whereby an adjudication of one bars the other. I maintain that the facts show that each of these has its own identity.

I am authorized to state that Circuit Judge McWILLIAMS and Circuit Judge BARRETT concur in the foregoing dissent.

§ 1341 –

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
J. Frank HANCOCK, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 28067.

United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit.

April 28, 1971, Rehearing Denied May 27, 1971.

Defendant was convicted before the United States District Court for the Middle District of Florida, Joseph P. Leib, Chief Judge, of embezzling, abstracting, and willfully misapplying small business investment company funds, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, John R. Brown, Chief Judge, held that evidence on issue whether funds were property of small business investment corporation at time funds were acquired by corporate organizer, who had engineered series of corporate loans entailing direct or circuitous repayments to himself, supported conviction.

Before JOHN R. BROWN, Chief Judge, and WISDOM and MORGAN, Circuit judges.

JOHN R. BROWN, Chief Judge:

J. Frank Hancock, former president and principal organizer of the Clearwater Capital Corporation, was charged in a nine count indictment with embezzling, abstracting, and willfully misapplying small business investment company funds in violation of 18 U.S.C.A. 657. Following a jury trial he was convicted and sentenced to concurrent five-year terms on all counts. We affirm.

Initially Hancock alleges error of constitutional dimensions by asserting that the Trial Court's denial of his motions for a list of government witnesses and a discovery order for the purpose of taking their depositions violated his rights under the Fifth and Sixth Amendments. We reject this contention. Apart from the Congressionally created exception in capital cases, /1/ the granting of a defense request for a list of adverse witnesses is a matter of judicial discretion, and a denial can be challenged only for abuse. O'Neal v. United States, 5 Cir., 1969, 411 F.2d 131, 138, cert. denied, 396 U.S. 827, 90 S.Ct. 72, 24 L.Ed.2d 77; Downing v. United States, 5 Cir., 1965, 348 F.2d 594, 599, cert. denied, 382 U.S. 901, 86 S.Ct. 235, 15 L.Ed.2d 155. All of the major witnesses were individuals with whom the defendant had had significant personal or financial relations, and it does not appear that the list would have 1287 materially aided him in the preparation of his defense.

Likewise, with the scope of discovery in criminal prosecutions narrower than it is in civil cases, Campbell v. Eastland, 5 Cir., 1962, 307 F.2d 478, 487, cert. denied, 371 U.S. 955, 83 S.Ct. 502, 9 L.Ed.2d 502, and in the absence of a rule which permits the taking of depositions of witnesses who will appear at the trial of a criminal case, we cannot say at this juncture that such a procedure has yet been elevated to a constitutional plane even though some states have been fit to adopt it.[FN2] It any event the defendant's relationship with the prospective witnesses preculdes a finding that he was prejudiced by the denial of his motion for discovery.

[4] Appellant also asserts that 657 is fatally defective-- presumably on grounds of vagueness-- because it does not explicitly define the phrase 'small business investment company,' and that this omission can be cured only by the indictment's unwarrnated addition of the words 'licensed under the Small Business Investment Act.' Since Title VII of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958[FN3] amended the related criminal provision, we think it clear that the reference in 657 is only to those businesses licensed under the Act, rather than to all small businesses generally. Clearwater Capital Corporation is thus a 'small business investment company' designated by 657.

[5] As for Appellant's argument that he could more appropriately have been charged under 18 U.S.C.A. 1006,[FN4] the obvious answer is that a criminal defendant has no choice in the matter. Prosecutorial decisions of this nature are wholly matters of Executive discretion. United States v. Cox, 5 Cir., 1965, 342 F.2d 167 (en banc), cert. denied sub nom. Cox v. Hauberg, 381 U.S. 935, 85 S.Ct. 1767, 14 L.Ed.2d 700.

[6] Finally Appellant mounts a frontal assault on the sufficiency of the evidence, contending that the funds were not the property of the corporation at the time he acquired them. We think it clear from a careful reading of the record that there was ample evidence from which the jury could have concluded that the defendant had engineered a series of corporate loans entailing direct or circuitous repayments to himself, in which the borrowers-- all personal or business acquaintances-- were mere conduits through which the funds were ultimately rechanneled for his use of benefit, not the least of the benefits being that the equity capital required by the organizers of a small business investment company came from loans made by the company after it was set up. The predictable result of these transactions was that Hancock benefited and Clearwater Capital Corporation went into receivership. The evidence amply supports a finding of misapplication of corporate funds with criminal implications.[FN5]

FN4. Fraudulent misapplication of funds is the essence of 657, while 1006 proscribes fraudulent receipt. United States v. Weaver, 7 Cir., 1966, 360 F.2d 903, 904.

FN5. We need not here belabor the technical and perhaps somewhat illusory distinctions between the terms 'embezzle,' 'abstract,' 'purloin,' and 'willfully misapply,' a problem we considered under the identical provisions of 656 in Williamson v. United States, 5 Cir., 1964, 332 F.2d 123, 133. The Trial Court's instructions incorporated adequate definitions, and we think the jury might properly have concluded that the acts charged fell within any or all of these prohibitions.

§ 19. Petty offense defined

As used in this title, the term "petty offense" means a Class B misdemeanor, a Class C misdemeanor, or an infraction, for which the maximum fine is no greater than the amount set forth for such an offense in section 3571(b)(6) or (7) in the case of an individual or section 3571(c)(6) or (7) in the case of an organization.

(Added Pub.L. 100–185, § 4(a), Dec. 11, 1987, 101 Stat. 1279, and amended Pub.L. 100–690, Title VII, § 7089(a), Nov. 18, 1988, 102 Stat. 4409.)

NOTES OF DECISIONS

Sentences 1
Trial by jury 2

1. Sentences

Petty offense constitutionally can include sentences of up to six months for criminal contempt. In re Betts, C.D.Ill.1990, 730 F.Supp. 942, reversed 927 F.2d 983, on remand 770 F.Supp 457.

2. Trial by jury

To same effect as U.S. v. Kovel, 908 F.2d 205, this note number, see Matter of Betts, C.A.7 (Ill.) 1991, 927 F.2d 983.

Statute defining the term "petty offense" did not create entitlement to jury trial, even in cases of criminal contempt where prison sentence might be imposed; purpose of statute was simply to limit prison time for crimes covered by section to six months, without forbidding it, and to put $5,000 cap on permissible fines. U.S. v. Kozel, C.A.7 (Ill.) 1990, 908 F.2d 205, certiorari denied 111 S.Ct. 969, 498 U.S. 1089, 112 L.Ed.2d 1055.

§ 20. Financial institution defined

As used in this title, the term "financial institution" means—

(1) an insured depository institution (as defined in section 3(c)(2) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act);

(2) a credit union with accounts insured by the National Credit Union Share Insurance Fund;

(3) a Federal home loan bank or a member, as defined in section 2 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act (12 U.S.C. 1422), of the Federal home loan bank system;

(4) a System institution of the Farm Credit System, as defined in section 5.35(3) of the Farm Credit Act of 1971;

(5) a small business investment company, as defined in section 103 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 662);

(6) a depository institution holding company (as defined in section 3(w)(1) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act;

(7) a Federal Reserve bank or a member bank of the Federal Reserve System;

(8) an organization operating under section 25 or section 25(a) of the Federal Reserve Act; or

(9) a branch or agency of a foreign bank (as such terms are defined in paragraphs (1) and (3) of section 1(b) of the International Banking Act of 1978).

"(D) a certificate of interest in, certificate of participation in, certificate for, receipt for, or warrant or option or other right to subscribe to or purchase, any of the foregoing; or

"(E) a blank form of any of the foregoing;

"(4) the term 'organization' means a legal entity, other than a government, established or organized for any purpose, and includes a corporation, company, association, firm, partnership, joint stock company, foundation, institution, society, union, or any other association or persons which operates in or the activities of which affect interstate or foreign commerce; and

"(5) the term 'State' includes a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, and any other territory or possession of the United States.".

(b) The analysis at the beginning of chapter 25 of title 18 is amended by adding after the item relating to section 509 the following:

"510. Securities of the State and private entities.".

Part E—Receipt of Stolen Bank Property

Sec. 1106. Subsection (c) of section 2113 of title 18 is amended to read as follows:

"(c) Whoever receives, possesses, conceals, stores, barters, sells, or disposes of, any property or money or other thing of value which has been taken or stolen from a bank, credit union, or savings and loan association in violation of subsection (b), knowing the same to be property which has been stolen shall be subject to the punishment provided in subsection (b) for the taker.".

Part F—Bank Bribery

Sec. 1107. (a) Section 215 of title 18 is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Whoever, being an officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney of any financial institution, bank holding company, or savings and loan holding company, except as provided by law, directly or indirectly, asks, demands, exacts, solicits, seeks, accepts, receives or agrees to receive anything of value, for himself or for any other person or entity, other than such financial institution, from any person or entity for or in connection with any transaction or business of such financial institution; or

"(b) Whoever, except as provided by law, directly or indirectly, gives, offers, or promises anything of value to any officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney of any financial institution, bank holding company, or savings and loan holding company, or offers or promises any such officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney to give anything of value to any person or entity, other than such financial institution, for or in connection with any transaction or business of such financial institution, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or three times the value of anything offered, asked, given, received, or agreed to be given or received, whichever is greater, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both; but if the value of anything offered, asked, given, received, or agreed to be given or received does not exceed $100, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

"(c) As used in this section—

"(1) 'financial institution' means—

"(A) any bank the deposits of which are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation;

"(B) any member, as defined in section 2 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, of the Federal Home Loan Bank System and any Federal Home Loan Bank;

12 USC 1422.

"(C) any institution the accounts of which are insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation;

"(D) any credit union the accounts of which are insured by the Administrator of the National Credit Union Administration;

"(E) any Federal land bank, Federal land bank association, Federal intermediate credit bank, production credit association, bank for cooperatives; and

"(F) a small business investment company, as defined in section 103 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 662); and

"(2) 'bank holding company' or 'savings and loan holding company' means any person, corporation, partnership, business trust, association or similar organization which controls a financial institution in such a manner as to be a bank holding company or a savings and loan holding company under the Bank Holding Company Act Amendments of 1956 (12 U.S.C. 1841) or the Savings and Loan Holding Company Amendments of 1967 (12 U.S.C. 1730a).

12 USC 1841 note.

"(d) This section shall not apply to the payment by a financial institution of the usual salary or director's fee paid to an officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney thereof, or to a reasonable fee paid by such financial institution to such officer, director, employee, agent, or attorney for services rendered to such financial institution.".

12 USC 1701 note.

Repeal.

(b) Section 216 of title 18 is repealed, and the section analysis of chapter 11 for section 216 be amended to read:

RE: Research Regarding 18 U.S.C. § 1001

Summary

You have requested preliminary research regarding the issue of whether or not an official of the Executive Branch who has made false statements and has concealed information in a Congressional oversight hearing is prosecutable under 18 U.S.C. § 1001. What follows are the preliminary results of that research. As you will see, substantial additional research will be required before charging decisions are made.

Discussion

Section 1001, the false statements statute, states:

> Whoever, in any matter within the jurisdiction of any department or agency of the United States knowingly and willfully falsifies, conceals or covers up by any trick, scheme, or device a material fact, or makes any false, fictitious or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious or fraudulent statement or entry, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

18 U.S.C. § 1001. There are three distinct offenses that fall within Section 1001: 1) concealing a material fact; 2) making a false statement; and 3) making or using a false writing or document. See id.; Edward J. Devitt et al., Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, Criminal § 37.00, at 411 (4th ed. 1990); Jennifer L. Kraft & David A. Sadoff, Ninth Survey of White Collar Crime, False Statements, 31 Am. Crim. L. Rev. 539, 540 (1994).

In order to convict a defendant under Section 1001 for making a false statement or writing or concealing a material fact, it must be proven that 1) the defendant knowingly and willfully; 2) made a false statement or writing or by trick, scheme, or device concealed a fact; 3) that was material; 4) in any matter within the jurisdiction of a department of the United States. United States v. Swaim, 757 F.2d 1530, 1533 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 825 (1985) (concealing fact case); Freidus v. United States, 223 F.2d 598, 601 (D.C. Cir. 1955) (false statement case); United States v. Weinberger, Crim. A. No. 92-235, 1992 WL 294877, at *4 (D.D.C. Sept. 29, 1992) (false statement case); United States v. Dale, 782 F. Supp. 615, 626 (D.D.C. 1991) (concealing fact case).

a. Knowing and Willful False Statement

In a false statement or writing case, it must be shown that the defendant "had the specific intent to make a false or fraudulent statement." United States v. Lange, 528 F.2d 1280, 1288 (5th Cir. 1976). This is established if the statement or writing is "untrue when made, and known at the time to be untrue by the person making it." United States v. Milton, 8 F.3d 39, 46 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (quoting jury instruction). The jury makes this determination of falsity by "considering the [statement] in context and taking into account the setting in which it appeared and the purpose for which it was used." Id. at 45. The jury must "determine how the defendant construed the question or answer and . . . decide, in that light, whether the defendant knowingly gave a false answer." Id. at 46.

b. Knowing and Willful Concealment of Fact

In a concealment case, it must be shown that the defendant 1) had a duty to disclose the fact and 2) used a "trick, scheme, or device" in concealing the fact.[1]
