Conditions on federal grants might be illegitimate if they are unrelated to the federal interest in particular national projects or programs.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation
Besides the limitations of Congress' spending power imposed by U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1, other constitutional provisions may provide an independent bar to the conditional grant of federal funds.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation
The constitutional limitations on Congress when exercising its spending power are less exacting than those on its authority to regulate directly.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation
Constitutional Law : Relations Among Governments
The "independent constitutional bar" limitation on the spending power is not a prohibition on the indirect achievement of objectives which Congress is not empowered to achieve directly. Instead, the power may not be used to induce the States to engage in activities that would themselves be unconstitutional.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation

Even if Congress might lack the power to impose a national minimum drinking age directly, that encouragement to state action found in 23 U.S.C.S. § 158 is a valid use of the Congress' spending power under U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

◆ Show Lawyers' Edition Display

SYLLABUS: Title 23 U. S. C. § 158 (1982 ed., Supp. III) directs the Secretary of Transportation to withhold a percentage of otherwise allocable federal highway funds from States "in which the purchase or public possession . . . of any alcoholic beverage by a person who is less than twenty-one years of age is lawful." South Dakota, which permits persons 19 years old or older to purchase beer containing up to 3.2% alcohol, sued in Federal District Court for a declaratory judgment that § 158 violates the constitutional limitations on congressional exercise of the spending power under Art. I, § 8, cl. 1, of the Constitution and violates the Twenty-first Amendment. The District Court rejected the State's claims, and the Court of Appeals affirmed.

Held: Even if Congress, in view of the Twenty-first Amendment, might lack the power to impose directly a national minimum drinking age (a question not decided here), § 158's indirect encouragement of state action to obtain uniformity in the States' drinking ages is a valid use of the spending power. Pp. 206-212.

(a) Incident to the spending [2] power, Congress may attach conditions on the receipt of federal funds. However, exercise of the power is subject to certain restrictions, including that it must be in pursuit of "the general welfare." Section 158 is consistent with such restriction, since the means chosen by Congress to address a dangerous situation -- the interstate problem resulting from the incentive, created by differing state drinking ages, for young persons to combine drinking and driving -- were reasonably calculated to advance the general welfare. Section 158 also is consistent with the spending power restrictions that, if Congress desires to condition the States' receipt of federal funds, it must do so unambiguously, enabling the States to exercise their choice knowingly, cognizant of the consequences of their participation; and that conditions on federal grants must be related to a national concern (safe interstate travel here). Pp. 206-209.

(b) Nor is § 158 invalidated by the spending power limitation that the conditional grant of federal funds must not be independently barred by other constitutional provisions (the Twenty-first Amendment here). Such limitation is not a prohibition on the indirect [3] achievement of objectives which Congress is not empowered to achieve directly, but, instead, means that the power may not be used to induce the States to engage in activities that would themselves be unconstitutional. Here, if South Dakota were to succumb to Congress' blandishments and raise its drinking age to 21, its action would not violate anyone's constitutional rights. Moreover, the relatively small financial inducement offered by Congress here -- resulting from the State's loss of only 5% of federal funds otherwise obtainable under certain highway grant programs -- is not so coercive as to pass the point at which pressure turns into compulsion. Pp. 209-212.

COUNSEL: Roger A. Tellinghuisen, Attorney General of South Dakota, argued the cause for petitioner. With him on the briefs was Craig M. Eichstadt, Assistant Attorney General.

Deputy Solicitor General Cohen argued the cause for respondent. With him on the brief were Solicitor General Fried, Assistant Attorney General Willard, Andrew J. Pincus, Leonard Schaitman, and Robert V. Zener. *

* Briefs of amici curiae urging reversal were filed for the State of Colorado et al. by Anthony J. Celebrezze, Jr., Attorney General of Ohio, William Damsel and Shawn H. Nau, Assistant

REV_00259109

Attorneys General, Joel S. Taylor, and Nancy J. Miller, joined by the Attorneys General for their respective States as follows: Duane Woodard of Colorado, Warren Price III of Hawaii, Robert T. Stephan of Kansas, William J. Guste, Jr., of Louisiana, Mike Greely of Montana, T. Travis Medlock of South Carolina, W. J. Michael Cody of Tennessee, Jeffrey L. Amestoy of Vermont, and Joseph B. Meyer of Wyoming; for the Mountain States Legal Foundation et al. by Hal Stratton, Attorney General of New Mexico, Constance E. Brooks, and Casey Shpall; for the National Conference of State Legislatures et al. by Benna Ruth Solomon, Beate Bloch, and Larry L. Simms; for the National Beer Wholesalers' Association et al. by E. Barrett Prettyman, Jr., John G. Roberts, Jr., and John F. Stasiowski; and for Phillip J. MacDonnell et al. by Morton Siegel, Michael A. Moses, Richard G. Schoenstadt, and James L. Webster.

Briefs of amici curiae urging affirmance were filed for the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety et al. by Andrew R. Hricko, Michele McDowell Fields, and Ronald G. Precup; for the National Council on Alcoholism et al. by Charles R. Walker III; for the National Safety Council by Harry N. Rosenfield; and for United States Senator Frank R. Lautenberg et al. by Thomas F. Campion and Michael J. Faigen. [4]

JUDGES: Rehnquist, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which White, Marshall, Blackmun, Powell, Stevens, and Scalia, JJ., joined. Brennan, J., post, p. 212, and O'Connor, J., post, p. 212, filed dissenting opinions.

OPINIONBY: REHNQUIST

OPINION: [*205] [2795] CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

[1A]
[2A]
Petitioner South Dakota permits persons 19 years of age or older to purchase beer containing up to 3.2% alcohol. S. D. Codified Laws § 35-6-27 (1986). In 1984 Congress enacted 23 U. S. C. § 158 (1982 ed., Supp. III), which directs the Secretary of Transportation to withhold a percentage of federal highway funds otherwise allocable from States "in which the purchase or public possession . . . of any alcoholic beverage by a person who is less than twenty-one years of age is lawful." The State sued in United States District Court seeking a declaratory judgment that § 158 violates the constitutional limitations on congressional exercise of the spending power and violates the Twenty-first Amendment to the United States Constitution. The District Court rejected the State's claims, and the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit affirmed. 791 F.2d 628 (1986). [5]

In this Court, the parties direct most of their efforts to defining the proper scope of the Twenty-first Amendment. Relying on our statement in California Retail Liquor Dealers Assn. v. Midcal Aluminum, Inc., 445 U.S. 97, 110 (1980), that the "Twenty-first Amendment grants the States virtually complete control over whether to permit importation or sale of liquor and how to structure the liquor distribution system," South Dakota asserts that the setting of minimum drinking ages is clearly within the "core powers" reserved to the States under § 2 of the Amendment. n1 Brief for Petitioner 43-44. Section 158, petitioner claims, usurps [*206] that core power. The Secretary in response asserts that the Twenty-first Amendment is simply not implicated by § 158; the plain language of § 2 confirms the States' broad power to impose restrictions on the sale and distribution of alcoholic beverages but does not confer on them any power to permit sales that Congress seeks to prohibit. Brief for Respondent 25-26. That Amendment, under this reasoning, would not prevent Congress from affirmatively enacting a national minimum drinking age more restrictive than [6] that provided by the various state laws; and it would follow a fortiori that the indirect inducement involved here is compatible with the Twenty-first Amendment.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 Section 2 of the Twenty-first Amendment provides: "The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[1B]
[3]
These arguments present questions of the meaning of the Twenty-first Amendment, the bounds of which have escaped precise definition. Bacchus Imports, Ltd. v. Dias, 468 U.S. 263, 274-276 (1984); Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190, 206 (1976). Despite the extended treatment of the question by the parties, however, we need not decide in this case whether that Amendment would prohibit an attempt by Congress to legislate directly a national minimum drinking age. Here, Congress has acted indirectly under its spending power to encourage uniformity in the States' [7] drinking ages. As we explain below, we find this legislative effort within constitutional bounds even if Congress may not regulate drinking ages directly.

[4]
The Constitution empowers Congress to "lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts, and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States." Art. I, § 8, cl. 1. Incident to this power, Congress may attach conditions on the receipt of [2796] federal funds, and has repeatedly employed the power "to further broad policy objectives by conditioning receipt of federal moneys upon compliance by the recipient with federal statutory and administrative directives." Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 474 (1980) (opinion of Burger, C. J.). See Lau v. Nichols, 414 U.S. 563, 569 (1974); Ivanhoe Irrigation Dist. v. McCracken, 357 U.S. 275, 295 (1958); Oklahoma [*207] v. Civil Service Comm'n, 330 U.S. 127, 143-144 (1947); Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548 (1937). The breadth of this power was made clear in United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 66 (1936), [8] where the Court, resolving a longstanding debate over the scope of the Spending Clause, determined that "the power of Congress to authorize expenditure of public moneys for public purposes is not limited by the direct grants of legislative power found in the Constitution." Thus, objectives not thought to be within Article I's "enumerated legislative fields," id., at 65, may nevertheless be attained through the use of the spending power and the conditional grant of federal funds.

[5]
[6]
The spending power is of course not unlimited, Pennhurst State School and Hospital v. Halderman, 451 U.S. 1, 17, and n. 13 (1981), but is instead subject to several general restrictions articulated in our cases. The first of these limitations is derived from the language of the Constitution itself: the exercise of the spending power must be in pursuit of "the general welfare." See Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 619, 640-641 (1937); United States v. Butler, supra, at 65. In considering whether a particular expenditure is intended to serve general public purposes, courts should defer substantially to the judgment of [9] Congress. Helvering v. Davis, supra, at 640, 645. n2 Second, we have required that if Congress desires to condition the States' receipt of federal funds, it "must do so unambiguously . . . , enabl[ing] the States to exercise their choice knowingly, cognizant of the consequences of their participation." Pennhurst State School and Hospital v. Halderman, supra, at 17. Third, our cases have suggested (without significant elaboration) that conditions on federal grants might be illegitimate if they are unrelated "to the federal interest in particular national projects or programs." Massachusetts v. United States, 435 U.S. 444, 461 [*208] (1978) (plurality opinion). See also Ivanhoe Irrigation Dist. v. McCracken, supra, at 295, ("The Federal Government may establish and impose reasonable conditions relevant to federal interest in the project and to the over-all objectives thereof"). Finally, we have noted that other constitutional provisions may provide an independent bar to the conditional grant of federal funds. Lawrence County v. Lead-Deadwood School Dist., 469 U.S. 256, 269-270 (1985); [10] Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 91 (1976) (per curiam); King v. Smith, 392 U.S. 309, 333, n. 34 (1968).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 The level of deference to the congressional decision is such that the Court has more recently questioned whether "general welfare" is a judicially enforceable restriction at all. See Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 90-91 (1976) (per curiam).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[1C]
[7A]
South Dakota does not seriously claim that § 158 is inconsistent with any of the first three restrictions mentioned above. We can readily conclude that the provision is designed to serve the general welfare, especially in light of the fact that "the concept of welfare or the opposite is shaped by Congress . . . ." Helvering v. Davis, supra, at 645. Congress found that the differing drinking [2797] ages in the States created particular incentives for young persons to combine their desire to drink with their ability to drive, and that this interstate problem required a national [11] solution. The means it chose to address this dangerous situation were reasonably calculated to advance the general welfare. The conditions upon which States receive the funds, moreover, could not be more clearly stated by Congress. See 23 U. S. C. § 158 (1982 ed., Supp. III). And the State itself, rather than challenging the germaneness of the condition to federal purposes, admits that it "has never contended that the congressional action was . . . unrelated to a national concern in the absence of the Twenty-first Amendment." Brief for Petitioner 52. Indeed, the condition imposed by Congress is directly related to one of the main purposes for which highway funds are expended -- safe interstate travel. See 23 U. S. C. § 101(b). n3 [*209] This goal of the interstate highway system had been frustrated by varying drinking ages among the States. A Presidential commission appointed to study alcohol-related accidents and fatalities on the Nation's highways concluded that the lack of uniformity in the States' drinking ages created "an incentive to drink and drive" because "young persons commut[e] to border States where the drinking age is lower." Presidential Commission on Drunk [12] Driving, Final Report 11 (1983). By enacting § 158, Congress conditioned the receipt of federal funds in a way reasonably calculated to address this particular impediment to a purpose for which the funds are expended.

[7B]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n3 Our cases have not required that we define the outer bounds of the "germaneness" or "relatedness" limitation on the imposition of conditions under the spending power. Amici urge that we take this occasion to establish that a condition on federal funds is legitimate only if it relates directly to the purpose of the expenditure to which it is attached. See Brief for National Conference of State Legislatures et al. as Amici Curiae 10. Because petitioner has not sought such a restriction, see Tr. of Oral Arg. 19-21, and because we find any such limitation on conditional federal grants satisfied in this case in any event, we do not address whether conditions less directly related to the particular purpose of the expenditure might be outside the bounds of the spending power.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[2B]
The remaining question [13] about the validity of § 158 -- and the basic point of disagreement between the parties -- is whether the Twenty-first Amendment constitutes an "independent constitutional bar" to the conditional grant of federal funds. Lawrence County v.

REV_00259112

Lead-Deadwood School Dist., supra, at 269-270. Petitioner, relying on its view that the Twenty-first Amendment prohibits direct regulation of drinking ages by Congress, asserts that "Congress may not use the spending power to regulate that which it is prohibited from regulating directly under the Twenty-first Amendment." Brief for Petitioner 52-53. But our cases show that this "independent constitutional bar" limitation on the spending power is not of the kind petitioner suggests. United States v. Butler, supra, at 66, for example, established that the constitutional limitations on Congress when exercising its spending power are less exacting than those on its authority to regulate directly.

[*210] We have also held that a perceived Tenth Amendment limitation on congressional regulation of state affairs did not comitantly limit the range of conditions legitimately placed on federal [14] grants. In Oklahoma v. Civil Service Comm'n, 330 U.S. 127 (1947), the Court considered the validity of the Hatch Act insofar as it was applied to political activities of state officials whose employment was financed in whole or in part with federal funds. The State contended that an order under this provision to withhold certain federal funds unless a state official was removed invaded its sovereignty in violation of the Tenth Amendment. Though finding that "the United States is not concerned with, and has no power to regulate, local political activities as such of state officials," the Court nevertheless held that the Federal Government "does have power to fix the terms upon [2798] which its money allotments to states shall be disbursed." Id., at 143. The Court found no violation of the State's sovereignty because the State could, and did, adopt "the 'simple expedient' of not yielding to what she urges is federal coercion. The offer of benefits to a state by the United States dependent upon cooperation by the state with federal plans, assumedly for the general welfare, is not unusual." Id., at 143-144 (citation [15] omitted). See also Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S., at 595 ("There is only a condition which the state is free at pleasure to disregard or to fulfill"); Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 482 (1923).

[2C]
[8]
These cases establish that the "independent constitutional bar" limitation on the spending power is not, as petitioner suggests, a prohibition on the indirect achievement of objectives which Congress is not empowered to achieve directly. Instead, we think that the language in our earlier opinions stands for the unexceptionable proposition that the power may not be used to induce the States to engage in activities that would themselves be unconstitutional. Thus, for example, a grant of federal funds conditioned on invidiously discriminatory state action or the infliction of cruel and unusual punishment would be an illegitimate exercise of the Congress' [*211] broad spending power. But no such claim can be or is made here. Were South Dakota to succumb to the blandishments offered by Congress and raise its drinking age to 21, the State's action in so doing would not violate the constitutional rights of anyone.

[*16]

[2D]
Our decisions have recognized that in some circumstances the financial inducement offered by Congress might be so coercive as to pass the point at which "pressure turns into compulsion." Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, supra, at 590. Here, however, Congress has directed only that a State desiring to establish a minimum drinking age lower than 21 lose a relatively small percentage of certain federal highway funds. Petitioner contends that the coercive nature of this program is evident from the degree of success it has achieved. We cannot conclude, however, that a conditional grant of federal money of this sort is unconstitutional simply by reason of its success in achieving the congressional objective.

When we consider, for a moment, that all South Dakota would lose if she adheres to her chosen course as to a suitable minimum drinking age is 5% of the funds otherwise obtainable under specified highway grant programs, the argument as to coercion is shown to be more rhetoric than fact. As we said a half century ago in Steward Machine Co. v. Davis:

REV_00259113

"Every rebate from a tax when conditioned upon conduct is in some measure a temptation. But to hold [17] that motive or temptation is equivalent to coercion is to plunge the law in endless difficulties. The outcome of such a doctrine is the acceptance of a philosophical determinism by which choice becomes impossible. Till now the law has been guided by a robust common sense which assumes the freedom of the will as a working hypothesis in the solution of its problems." 301 U.S., at 589-590.

[1D]
[2E]
Here Congress has offered relatively mild encouragement to the States to enact higher minimum drinking ages than they would otherwise choose. But the enactment of such laws remains the prerogative of the States not merely in theory [*212] but in fact. Even if Congress might lack the power to impose a national minimum drinking age directly, we conclude that encouragement to state action found in § 158 is a valid use of the spending power. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is Affirmed.

DISSENTBY: BRENNAN; O'CONNOR

DISSENT: JUSTICE BRENNAN, dissenting.

I agree with JUSTICE O'CONNOR that regulation of the minimum age of purchasers of liquor falls squarely within the ambit [2799] of those powers reserved to the States by the Twenty-first Amendment. See post, at 218. Since [18] States possess this constitutional power, Congress cannot condition a federal grant in a manner that abridges this right. The Amendment, itself, strikes the proper balance between federal and state authority. I therefore dissent.

JUSTICE O'CONNOR, dissenting.

The Court today upholds the National Minimum Drinking Age Amendment, 23 U. S. C. § 158 (1982 ed., Supp. III), as a valid exercise of the spending power conferred by Article I, § 8. But § 158 is not a condition on spending reasonably related to the expenditure of federal funds and cannot be justified on that ground. Rather, it is an attempt to regulate the sale of liquor, an attempt that lies outside Congress' power to regulate commerce because it falls within the ambit of § 2 of the Twenty-first Amendment.

My disagreement with the Court is relatively narrow on the spending power issue: it is a disagreement about the application of a principle rather than a disagreement on the principle itself. I agree with the Court that Congress may attach conditions on the receipt of federal funds to further "the federal interest in particular national projects or programs." Massachusetts v. United States, 435 U.S. 444, 461 (1978); [19] see Oklahoma v. Civil Service Comm'n, 330 U.S. 127, 143-144 (1947); Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U.S. 548 (1937). I also subscribe to the established proposition [*213] that the reach of the spending power "is not limited by the direct grants of legislative power found in the Constitution." United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 66 (1936). Finally, I agree that there are four separate types of limitations on the spending power: the expenditure must be for the general welfare, Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 619, 640-641 (1937), the conditions imposed must be unambiguous, Pennhurst State School and Hospital v. Halderman, 451 U.S. 1, 17 (1981), they must be reasonably related to the purpose of the expenditure, Massachusetts v. United States, supra, at 461, and the legislation may not violate any independent constitutional prohibition, Lawrence County v. Lead-Deadwood School Dist., 469 U.S. 256, 269-270 (1985). Ante, at 207-208. Insofar as two of those limitations are concerned, the Court is clearly correct [20] that § 158 is wholly unobjectionable. Establishment of a national minimum drinking age certainly fits within the broad concept of the general welfare and the statute is entirely unambiguous. I am also willing to assume, arguendo, that the Twenty-first Amendment does not constitute an "independent constitutional bar" to a spending condition. See ante, at 209-211.

But the Court's application of the requirement that the condition imposed be reasonably related to the purpose for which the funds are expended is cursory and unconvincing. We have repeatedly said that Congress may condition grants under the spending power only in ways reasonably related to the purpose of the federal program. Massachusetts v. United States, supra, at 461; Ivanhoe Irrigation Dist. v. McCracken, 357 U.S. 275, 295 (1958) (the United States may impose "reasonable conditions relevant to federal interest in the project and to the over-all objectives thereof"); Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, supra, at 590 ("We do not say that a tax is valid, when imposed by act of Congress, if it is laid upon the condition that a state may escape [21] its operation through the adoption of a statute unrelated in subject matter to activities fairly within the scope of national policy and power"). In my view, establishment of a minimum drinking [*214] age of 21 is not sufficiently related to interstate highway construction to justify [2800] so conditioning funds appropriated for that purpose.

In support of its contrary conclusion, the Court relies on a supposed concession by counsel for South Dakota that the State "has never contended that the congressional action was . . . unrelated to a national concern in the absence of the Twenty-first Amendment." Brief for Petitioner 52. In the absence of the Twenty-first Amendment, however, there is a strong argument that the Congress might regulate the conditions under which liquor is sold under the commerce power, just as it regulates the sale of many other commodities that are in or affect interstate commerce. The fact that the Twenty-first Amendment is crucial to the State's argument does not, therefore, amount to a concession that the condition imposed by § 158 is reasonably related to highway construction. The Court also relies on a portion of the argument transcript [22] in support of its claim that South Dakota conceded the reasonable relationship point. Ante, at 208-209, n. 3, citing Tr. of Oral Arg. 19-21. But counsel's statements there are at best ambiguous. Counsel essentially said no more than that he was not prepared to argue the reasonable relationship question discussed at length in the Brief for the National Conference of State Legislatures et al. as Amici Curiae.

Aside from these "concessions" by counsel, the Court asserts the reasonableness of the relationship between the supposed purpose of the expenditure -- "safe interstate travel" -- and the drinking age condition. Ante, at 208. The Court reasons that Congress wishes that the roads it builds may be used safely, that drunken drivers threaten highway safety, and that young people are more likely to drive while under the influence of alcohol under existing law than would be the case if there were a uniform national drinking age of 21. It hardly needs saying, however, that if the purpose of § 158 is to deter drunken driving, it is far too over- and under-inclusive. It is over-inclusive because it stops teenagers from drinking even when they are not about to drive on [23] interstate [*215] highways. It is under-inclusive because teenagers pose only a small part of the drunken driving problem in this Nation. See, e. g., 130 Cong. Rec. 18648 (1984) (remarks of Sen. Humphrey) ("Eighty-four percent of all highway fatalities involving alcohol occur among those whose ages exceed 21"); id., at 18651 (remarks of Sen. McClure) ("Certainly, statistically, if you use that one set of statistics, then the mandatory drinking age ought to be raised at least to 30"); ibid. (remarks of Sen. Symms) ("Most of the studies point out that the drivers of age 21-24 are the worst offenders").

When Congress appropriates money to build a highway, it is entitled to insist that the highway be a safe one. But it is not entitled to insist as a condition of the use of highway funds that the State impose or change regulations in other areas of the State's social and economic life because of an attenuated or tangential relationship to highway use or safety. Indeed, if the rule were otherwise, the Congress could effectively regulate almost any area of

REV_00259115

Spending general welfare

Service: LEXSEE®
Citation: 297 us 1

*297 U.S. 1, *; 56 S. Ct. 312, **;*
1936 U.S. LEXIS 946, ; 80 L. Ed. 477

UNITED STATES v. BUTLER ET AL., RECEIVERS OF HOOSAC MILLS CORP.

No. 401

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

297 U.S. 1; 56 S. Ct. 312; 1936 U.S. LEXIS 946; 80 L. Ed. 477; 36-1 U.S. Tax Cas. (CCH) P9039; 16 A.F.T.R. (P-H) 1289; 1936-1 C.B. 421; 4 Ohio Op. 401; 102 A.L.R. 914

Argued December 9, 10, 1935
January 6, 1936

PRIOR HISTORY: [*1]

CERTIORARI TO THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIRST CIRCUIT

CORE TERMS: farmer, expenditure, general welfare, commodity, regulation, agricultural, appropriation, exaction, Agricultural Adjustment Act, power to tax, cotton, spend, processing, federal government, processor, processing tax, acreage, duty, taxing power, agriculture, reserved, declare, levy, expended, spending, rental, excise, carrier, farm, delegated LEXIS HEADNOTES - Classified to U.S. Digest Lawyers' Edition:

STATUTES, §32
who may question validity -- right of taxpayer to question purpose to which proceeds of tax are appropriated. --

Headnote: [1]
One called upon to pay a tax levied, not to obtain revenue for the support of government generally, but for a specific purpose, may question the validity of the intended use and consequently of the exaction which is an incident of the scheme.

TAXES, §3
nature. --

Headnote: [2]
A tax, in the general understanding of the term and as used in the Federal Constitution, signifies an exaction for the support of the government; and the term cannot properly be applied to the expropriation of money from one group for the benefit of another.

TAXES, §12
purpose for which imposable -- incidental benefit to individuals. --

It is true that by the very Act which imposed the tax and provided for its collection, the proceeds were appropriated to other purposes. But § 12 shows that if not a dollar had been collected in the way of processing taxes, the Government, nevertheless, made provision for the payment of rental and benefit contracts out of the hundred million dollars which Congress directly appropriated and out of the authority which they gave to the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish funds for carrying on this activity of the Government. As a matter of fact, something less than a billion dollars has already been collected in these taxes.

The question of the validity of the Agricultural Adjustment Act as a tax or revenue statute alone is dependent upon a consideration of the cases which this Court has decided, namely, the Child Labor Tax case, 259 U.S. 20, and the case of Hill v. Wallace, 259 U.S. 44, upon the one side, and United States v. Doremus, 249 U.S. 86, Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, and Magnano Company [16] v. Hamilton, 292 U.S. 40, upon the other.

We distinguish the Child Labor Tax case. That case involved a tax of ten per cent. upon the profits which might be earned by a manufacturer who employed child labor, to be imposed immediately upon a violation of the law. It was not a tax in the sense that it was levied upon an operation by the manufacturer, but was held by this Court to be a penalty which affected the income from the operation of a manufacturer who employed children, and that penalty applied at the very instant when he employed the first child contrary to that Act, and employed that child knowingly. The doctrine of scienter entered into that case. In Hill v. Wallace the tax was upon the selling of futures upon the Grain Exchange, and was levied at a rate of 20 cents a bushel, when the commission of the broker was only a fraction of a cent a bushel, so that it was prohibitive.

This Court said in the case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno that "the judicial cannot prescribe to the legislative department of the government limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged powers. The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility [17] of the legislature is not to the courts but to the people, by whom its members are elected."

The case of Hampton & Company v. United States, 276 U.S. 394, involved an Act which declared in its very title that it was for the protection of inustries and for the raising of revenue.

In the present case there is a plain statement in the Act that the tax is to be used for something other than the general support of the Government. The contract which the Secretary of Agriculture makes with the individual producer is to be for the purpose of inducing the producer to reduce his production.

In United States v. Doremus, which involved licenses and taxes to control the dealing in drugs, there was a tax, in the earlier acts, of only one dollar a year, and a license for the purpose of handling; and upon that tax Congress built an entire system for information in regard to dealing in morphine and other narcotics. That was upheld. . . .

In the case of McCray v. United States, 195 U.S. 27, there was a clear intention on the part of Congress, which was not, however, expressed in the Act itself, to use the power of taxation for purposes other than the raising of revenue. [18]

I think it may be said that the Doremus case and the McCray case on one side, and the case of Hill v. Wallace and the Child Labor case on the other, lead to the conclusion that the motives of Congress in levying a tax are not to be considered by this Court. Even if the Act shows that the motive is ulterior to the tax in the mind of Congress, that is immaterial to the validity of the tax, so long as it is based upon an authority which occurs in the Constitution.

In both the Child Labor Tax case and in the case of Hill v. Wallace, you had clear evidence of prohibitions against constitutional rights which people had and exercised. In the Child Labor

REV_00259127

Tax case there had been, up to that time, and of course now is, the right to use child labor in manufacture if there was no State prohibition; and of course the brokers who deal upon the Exchange at Chicago, on the Grain Exchanges wherever they may be, have the right to deal upon those exchanges. So you had a tax which in effect prohibited the exercise of a right by the taxpayer. You had, in the Child Labor case, in addition to the excessive tax, an imposition of that tax for a violation of [19] a rule laid down. That, we think, distinguishes those cases from this one. Here is a tax which is to be used, let us say, in rental and benefit payments, together with other things, but there is nothing in the use for a rental or benefit payment which deprives the person who contracts with the Government of any constitutional right which he had at that time. He may be induced to give up a right which he had, which of course every employee of the Government gives up when he gives up his liberty to do other things and agrees to do certain things for the Government.

In so far as the excise is concerned, our briefs, I think, cover that thoroughly. We have the question of uniformity, we have the question of floor-stocks, and I pass to the problem of delegation.

[Here followed an interesting discussion (interrupted by many questions from the Bench) of the method of fixing the tax and of the question whether the functions sought to be delegated to the Secretary of Agriculture in that regard were constitutionally delegated, with proper legislative standards. The speaker also contended that, in any event, the acts of the Secretary in fixing the taxes were ratified by § 21 (b) of the [20] Amendatory Act of August 24, 1935.]

As to whether or not this is a violation of the Fifth Amendment, we contend that there is no power in the taxpayer to question the expenditures that are made. Citing Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447. . . .

If the Court should think it proper to go beyond the tax itself, and consider the purpose for which this money is expended, then we contend that the general welfare clause gave Congress power to expend it for rental and benefit payments.

We distinguish, of course, between the use of Federal money to coerce some action by an individual, and the inducement to the individual. We say that the general welfare clause is a clause that is construed not as a general power, but as a special power in Congress to expend this money, and we rely particularly upon the case of United States v. Realty Company, 163 U.S. 427, where it was held that Congress had authority to appropriate for the payment of a claim for sugar bounty which was a moral claim upon the Government, even if the earlier act granting the bounty were unconstitutional. . . .

We also take up a discussion of the purpose of this money -- as to whether this tax has been [21] levied for a public purpose. We do not think that that can be approached except from the standpoint of the general rules in regard to the use of tax money. We know how hesitant the Court is to interfere with the appropriation by Congress of money for purposes deemed by Congress to be within the public welfare.

We accept the decision in the case of Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, where this Court held that a State act was not for a public purpose, where it had authorized the payment to a local manufacturer of funds to operate his business. Upon the other side, the theory of public purpose upon which we rely is that enunciated in the case of Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U.S. 104. In that case money was taken from the various banks that were operating in the State of Oklahoma and paid into a fund which was to be used to make whole the depositors in banks that failed. That is an illustration of the use of public money for a public purpose. It seems to us similar to the use that is made here of a tax levied on processors in the form of an excise passed on to the general consuming public, the purpose of which is to raise money to be used by the Government [22] in contracts with farmers, for the reduction of surplus production that was pressing on the price and pressing on the supply in the hands of the American handlers of commodities. . . .

Extracts from the printed argument for the Government, signed by Attorney General Cummings, Solicitor General Reed, Assistant Attorney General Wideman, Assistant Attorney General Morris, and Messrs. Sewall Key, Andrew D. Sharpe, Robert N. Anderson, Alger Hiss, Mastin G. White, and Prew Savoy.

The sole purpose of the processing and floor-stock taxes is to raise revenue.

The processing and floor-stock taxes are excises; not direct taxes.

The floor-stocks adjustment may be separately justified as a necessary adjunct to the processing taxes.

Powers were not unlawfully delegated.

If in the original Act Congress exceeded its power to delegate, that is now immaterial because Congress has expressly ratified the assessment and collection of the taxes. Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended Aug. 24, 1935, § 30, subsec. 21 (b); Rafferty v. Smith, Bell & Co., 257 U.S. 226; The Peggy, 1 Cranch 103, 110; Dinsmore v. Southern Express Co., 183 U.S. 115; Dorchy v. [23] Kansas, 264 U.S. 286; Steamship Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450.

This Court has recognized that Congress may ratify taxes, illegal when assessed but assessed under claim and color of authority, if it could have imposed such taxes in the first instance and if its power to do so remained unimpaired to the date of ratification. United States v. Heinszen & Co., 206 U.S. 370; Rafferty v. Smith, Bell & Co., 257 U.S. 226. See also Mascot Oil Co. v. United States, 282 U.S. 434; Charlotte Harbor Ry. v. Welles, 260 U.S. 8, 10, 11; Seattle v. Kelleher, 195 U.S. 351, 359-360; Hamilton v. Dillin, 21 Wall. 73; Hodges v. Snyder, 261 U.S. 600, 602-603; Stockdale v. Insurance Companies, 20 Wall. 323, 332; Wagner v. Baltimore, 239 U.S. 207, 216, 217; Mattingly v. District of Columbia, 97 U.S. 687; Kansas City Ry. Co. v. Road District, 266 U.S. 379; Tiaco v. Forbes, 228 U.S. 549. Cf. Matter of People (Title & Mortgage Guaranty Co.), 264 N.Y. 69; Fisk v. Kenosha, 26 Wis. 23; Miller v. Dunn, 72 Cal. 462.

A tax is not necessarily invalid because retroactively [24] applied. Taxing acts having retroactive features have been upheld in view of the particular circumstances disclosed.

The processing and floor-stocks taxes do not contravene the Fifth Amendment. Helvering v. City Bank Farmers Trust Co., 296 U.S. 85; Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 525; Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton R. Co., 295 U.S. 330, 347 (footnote 5); Magnano Co. v. Hamilton, 292 U.S. 40, 44; McCray v. United States, 195 U.S. 27; Nicol v. Ames, 173 U.S. 509, 521; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U.S. 107.

The contention that these taxes are not for a public purpose is simply another way of challenging their character as revenue measures. The money collected goes into the Treasury of the United States. One must presume that it will be used for a purpose within the powers of Congress. If so used, no objection could be made on the ground that the taxes are not levied for a public purpose. Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U.S. 219; Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U.S. 104; Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533.

Respondents should not be allowed to question the appropriation as [25] a defense to the payment of their taxes. Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 487.Cf. Knights v. Jackson, 260 U.S. 12, 15; Patton v. Brady, 184 U.S. 608, 620; United States v. Realty Co., 163 U.S. 427.

Public policy requires that taxpayers shall not avoid payment of otherwise valid taxes by questioning the purpose of the levy or of an appropriation contained in the taxing statute. The appropriateness of such a rule is particularly apparent where, as here, it is not possible to ascertain the exact use to which the taxpayers' money will be put. It is true that the Act in its original form contained in itself an appropriation. § 12 (b). But this fact would not have made the money, if collected at that time, any the less a part of the public funds. See Knights v. Jackson, 260 U.S. 12. Furthermore, money collected under the Act could be used to defray any of the Government's expenses should Congress see fit to change the appropriation before the money was actually transferred from the general fund of the Treasury as a set-off against advances made out of that fund. Cf. Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580.

In the case of respondents' [26] taxes, the use is made even more uncertain by the terms of the appropriation provisions found in the Act.

Under the Act of August 24, 1935, the appropriation is out of the general funds of the Treasury in an amount equivalent to the taxes collected under the original Act. Also, under the appropriation the Secretary of Agriculture may now use any part of the money for additional kinds of payments and for the acquisition of agricultural commodities pledged as security for certain loans made by federal agencies. Thus, additional objects of expenditure and additional elements of uncertainty have been introduced.

The general welfare clause should be construed broadly to include anything conducive to the national welfare; it is not limited by the subsequently enumerated powers. Congress may tax (and appropriate) in order to promote the national welfare by means which may not be within the scope of the other Congressional powers. That this, commonly known as the Hamiltonian theory, is correct, is shown by the plain language of the clause; by the circumstances surrounding its adoption; by the opinion of most of those who participated in the early execution of the Constitution; by the opinion [27] of later authorities; and by long-continued practical construction.

The question was elaborately discussed in the briefs filed in Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649; United States v. Realty Co., 163 U.S. 427; Smith v. Kansas City Title Co., 255 U.S. 180; and Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447.

The Madisonian theory, rejecting the natural meaning, and treating the clause as an introduction to the subsequent enumeration of Congressional powers (1 Richardson's Messages, etc., 585), violates the basic principle of constitutional construction. Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet. 540, 570-571. See Story, Const., §§ 912-913. This would transform a great independent power into a mere incident of other powers.

The circumstances surrounding the adoption of the clause and the opinions of most of those who participated in the adoption and early execution of the Constitution support the Hamiltonian view. Arts. of Confed. § 8; 9 Writings of James Madison (Hunt ed.), pp. 411-424, 370-375; 4 Madison, Letters and Writings, 126; Elliott's Debates.

The clause was adopted along with that relating to payment of the debts, after a prolonged discussion, not [28] only of the Revolutionary debts, but also of the power of Congress, as against that of the States, in regard to matters of general interest. See Elliott's Debates, V, I; cf. 4 Madison, Letters and Writings, pp. 121 et seq.

Discussion in the ratifying conventions indicates clearly an almost unanimous view that the clause was not limited by the enumerated powers. Elliott's Debates; Hamilton's Rep. on Manufactures, 3 Hamilton's Works, pp. 192, 250; President Monroe, 2 Richardson's Messages, etc., pp. 165, 173.

There would seem no doubt that President Washington agreed with Hamilton and Monroe (Story, Const., § 978, note). And it is clear that John Quincy Adams was of the same opinion (Letter to Stevenson, July 11, 1832, reprinted in Cong. Rec., 49th Cong., 1st Sess., vol. 17, Part 8, Appendix, pp. 226 to 229). as was likewise Calhoun (30 Annals of Congress, 14th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 855). Henry St. George Tucker, of Virginia, representing a special committee of the House of Representatives in 1817, expressed the same opinion (II American State Papers (Misc.), 443, 446, 447), as did also Daniel Webster (Webster's Great Speeches, 243). Apparently, Jefferson likewise shared this [29] view, although his opinion on the Bank of the United States has been quoted both as supporting the Hamiltonian and the Madisonian view. IV Elliott's Debates, 2d ed., 610. See Story, Const., § 926 (note); 1 Hare, American Const. Law, 244; and see President Jackson's statements in his veto of the Maysville Road Bill. [An Appendix to the Government's brief in this case contains a valuable collection of the opinions on this question delivered before the ratifying conventions, and other examples of contemporaneous exposition. See also 36 Harv. L. Rev. 548; 23 Georgetown L.J. 155; 22 id. 207; 8 Va. L. Rev. 167-180; 42 Yale L.J. 878.] Madison himself in later years recognized that his view had not been followed in practice. 4 Madison's Letters and Writings, 146.

Not only was the Hamiltonian theory adopted by the "weight of contemporaneous exposition" (See Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304, 350); it has been accepted by most of the later great commentators on the Constitution. See Story, ubi supra; Pomeroy, the Const. (3d ed., 1883), pp. 174-175; Willoughby, Const., pp. 582-593; 1 Hare, Am. Const. L., pp. 241 et seq.; Mr. Justice Miller's "Lectures on the Constitution," [30] pp. 229-231, 235; Burdick, Const., § 77. Of even more importance is the practical construction by the earlier Congresses. 30 Annals of Congress, 14th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 855; II American State Papers (Misc.), 443, 446, 447; Story, op. cit., § 991.

The Hamiltonian view has been so continuously and so extensively followed by Congress that many of our most familiar and significant governmental policies and activities are dependent upon its validity. [Under this head the brief cites a large number of instances of appropriations for various objects, including: relief of distress due to catastrophes; health; education; science; social welfare; industry; agriculture.]

The relevant judicial authorities support the Hamiltonian theory. United States v. Realty Co., 163 U.S. 427; Missouri Utilities Co. v. California City, 8 F. Supp. 454, 462; United States v. Gettysburg Electric Ry., 160 U.S. 668, 681; Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580, 595; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 197; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U.S. 107, 153.

The literal reading of the general welfare clause has been adopted by most of the lower federal courts. Langer [31] v. United States, 76 F. (2d) 817; Kansas Gas & Electric Co. v. Independence, 79 F. (2d) 32, supplemental opinion on rehearing, 79 F. (2d) 638; Missouri Utilities Co. v. California City, 8 F. Supp. 454; Vogt & Sons v. Rothensies, 11 F. Supp. 225. Cf. Miles Planting Co. v. Carlisle, 5 App. D.C. 138; Washington Water Power Co. v. Coeur D'Alene, 9 F. Supp. 263.

It is not suggested that the public money may be expended by Congress for any other than national purposes, or for any other uses than those of the Nation. But the question of what is a national purpose, of what is a national use, is, in the first instance, purely a question of governmental policy, of which Congress is to judge.

The procedure provided by the Constitution for the consideration by Congress of fiscal measures, and the accountability to the electorate, were the only checks on congressional appropriations. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 428; Pacific Insurance Co. v. Soule, 7 Wall. 433, 443.

The entire range of discussion in the Convention was directed to locating the power and little or no attention was given its extent, which [32] everyone seemed to concede must, in the nature of things, be discretionary. The same is, in general, true of the ratifying conventions. In the early years following the adoption of the Constitution, the view was generally expressed that Congress' determination of what was for the general welfare was not subject to judicial review. Madison, Veto Message of March 4, 1817; Hamilton, Opinion on the National Bank, 3 Hamilton's Works (Lodge ed.), p. 485. See also Hamilton's Report on Manufactures, III Hamilton's Works (Hamilton ed.), p. 250; Monroe, Veto of the Road Bill, II Richardson, 142, 165, 166; Pomeroy, Const. L. (10the ed.), § 275; 1 Hare, American Const. L., 249; Cooley, Taxation (2d ed.), 109; Story, Const., §§ 924, 944, 991, 1348.

In United States v. Realty Co., 163 U.S. 427, it was said that the determination of what debts or claimed debts should be paid "depends solely upon Congress" (p. 441); and that the decision of Congress recognizing a claim founded upon principles of right and justice "can rarely, if ever, be the subject of review by the judicial branch of the government" (p. 444). If this be true of the word "debt" -- so familiar to our courts -- Congressional [33] application of the term "general welfare" cannot be more readily subject to judicial review.

The expenditures authorized by the Agricultural Adjustment Act were soundly designed to promote the general welfare. [Here followed an elaborate explanation of the agricultural situation and the application of the statute].

The tax was laid and the proceeds appropriated for a public purpose.

Rules applicable to municipal taxation are not relevant to the great power of Congress to raise revenues. 1 Cooley, Taxation, 4th ed., pp. 388-390.

While in local taxation the courts may, in extreme cases, review the legislative determination that a particular object is for a public purpose, in federal taxation Congress should be the final arbiter of what constitutes a federal public purpose. That which is for the "general welfare" as those words are used in the Constitution, must of necessity also be for a public purpose.

Yet even viewed by the more narrow and critical rules applicable to state taxation, the purpose here was clearly public. Citing and discussing many authorities, including Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 665; Green v. Frazier, 253 U.S. 233, 240-242; [34] Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U.S. 112; Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U.S. 487; Cole v. LaGrange, 113 U.S. 1.

It is no objection to the tariff acts that they benefit manufacturers as well as the country generally. Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 696; Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394, 411.

The appropriations contemplated by the Act are a valid exercise of the fiscal powers of Congress. To stabilize and preserve the credit structure of the Nation, to protect the banks and other credit agencies which it had already established or sponsored, and to protect the credit of the Government itself.

It was inevitable that the sudden and tremendous decrease in farm incomes should have caused a serious strain on the farm-credit agencies which had already been weakened by the long price decline and general liquidation which had characterized agriculture since 1920. Only by increasing the purchasing power of the farmer could the stability of the financial system be restored and the large investments which the Federal Government had made in this field ever be liquidated.

Power of control over or regulation of agriculture [35] has not been asserted, but, to the contrary, the steps authorized by this Act and taken under it do not go beyond the appropriation and spending of the money.

The contracts are a matter of negotiation and voluntary agreement and on the part of the United States amount to no more than a method by which the Secretary of Agriculture sees that the money appropriated goes to persons in the class specified by Congress. It is, indeed, probable that the Secretary would be held to have the right to enter into contracts of this sort even though he had not been specifically authorized by Congress to do so. See United States v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 80 F. (2d) 24. Similar contracts are entered into by administrative officials in almost every case where money is expended for such familiar matters as the construction of buildings and the delivery of supplies.

It would be most unusual to suppose that a contract of this nature, entered into freely by both parties, is an exercise of sovereign regulation and control over one of the parties or over the subject matter with which the contract deals. "The United States, when they contract with their citizens, are controlled by the same [36] laws that govern the citizen in that behalf." United States v. Bostwick, 94 U.S. 53, 66; See also Cooke v. United States, 91 U.S. 389, 398; Smoot's Case, 15 Wall. 36. No method of enforcement of these contracts has been provided by Congress. Under them the rights of the United States are no greater than would be the rights of a private citizen under similar contracts, and enforcement must be by ordinary judicial process according to the law of the forum. The contracts are not derogatory of any sovereign rights of the States; they are carried out pursuant to and under the protection of the laws of the States.

In this Act the Government goes no further than offering benefits to those who comply with certain conditions. If power over the matters to which those conditions relate is vested in the States, they remain free to pass laws rendering it impossible for any of their inhabitants to comply with such conditions. In so doing the States would not be clashing with any enactment of Congress, even though the result were to terminate completely the administration of the agricultural provisions of the Act in those States. There is no attempt to require the States [37] to take or refrain from action with respect to agricultural land within their borders, a power which this Court in Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U.S. 46, has declared does not reside in the Federal Government.

The distinction between an application of the lawmaking power to enforce compliance, and the use of the spending power to persuade, was pointed out in Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 529, and illustrated by the case of Federal Compress Co. v. McLean, 291 U.S. 17.

The effect which the Act of Congress will have in a State is dependent entirely upon the voluntary action of that State and its inhabitants. The situation is much like that in Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447.

Furthermore, if the expenditure results in regulation of matters normally within state control, that result cannot deprive Congress of the right of taxation for the general welfare given it by the Constitution. McCray v. United States, 195 U.S. 27.

Similarly, considering this Act as an exercise of the fiscal powers of Congress, it is not invalid even if it invades state fields. First National Bank v. Fellows, 244 U.S. 416; [38] Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 457, 539.

Oral argument of Mr. George Wharton Pepper, for respondents.

May it please your Honors, this record gives rise, as I see it, to two entirely distinct questions. One question is whether the portions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act which are under discussion would be constitutional in respect of the taxes levied under their authority, if Congress had itself levied them and settled every detail in connection with them. The second is the entirely distinct question (assuming that Congress might itself have done all that the Secretary of Agriculture has here done) whether the delegation to him of the authority in virtue of which he had undertaken to act was such a valid delegation that the acts done by him have the quality of taxation.

Mr. Hale, my colleague, who represents the receivers, respondents in this case, has invited me to address myself to the first of these questions, namely, whether or not this processing tax is a valid exaction, irrespective of the question of delegation; and he, with your Honors' permission, will address himself to the question of delegation, a great and important question in the case, but quite distinct, [39] as it seems to me, from the one which I am going to discuss.

REV_00259133

I have no disposition to raise an issue with the Solicitor General respecting the seriousness of the situation with which Congress undertook to deal; but when I come to consider whether or not the attempted remedy for the economic evils is or is not within the limits of the power of Congress, I cannot escape the conclusion that in his argument, able as it was, he has indulged somewhat in oversimplification. The case presents to him no difficulty. Congress, in the familiar course of legislation, has done two things, both of which, as he sees it, are well within its power. First it has laid a tax. Second it has made an appropriation. The tax feature is an ordinary exercise of the taxing power; and, as to the appropriation, even if it is for any reason questionable, nobody has a standing to question it. Apart from the question of delegation, he thus readily convicts the court below of error and asks confidently for a reversal.

I, on the other hand, find in this record some constitutional questions of great difficulty and of vast importance. It seems to me that a reversal of the judgment appealed from would justify [40] the conclusion that Congress, originating as a federal legislature with limited powers, has somehow been transformed into a national parliament subject to no restraint except self-restraint.

I venture to hope that the judicial power of the United States does not extend to working any such transformation and that, to bring it about, we the people of the United States must deliberately resort to the process of constitutional amendment.

One of the difficulties necessarily involved in the argument of this case is to identify the relevant portions of the statute and to isolate the essential facts, and then make a statement of them that is full enough to be fair but compact enough to be manageable. Although the Solicitor General has done this to the extent required by his argument, I hope the Court will be patient with me if I attempt a brief restatement.

In what I am about to say I am referring to the unamended act, inasmuch as the taxes sought to be recovered by the Government in the instant case had accrued before the amendment. The significance of the amendment will be discussed at the proper point in the argument in connection with what we hold to be an ineffective attempt [41] to ratify taxes theretofore invalid.

Any such statement must, as its first point, make a reference to the declared policy of the AAA, which is found in § 2 of Title I. That policy is by an elaborate mechanism to re-create for the farmer the favorable financial conditions which, under the operation of economic law, he for a short time enjoyed about a quarter of a century ago. More specifically, the policy is to raise the price which the farmer receives for a unit of what he produces until the sale of that unit shall enable him to buy as much and as many needed commodities as a unit sale would have enabled him to buy during the base period. The base period selected as the golden age of agriculture is, in the case of all commodities except tobacco and potatoes, the pre-war period from 1909 to 1914. In the case of tobacco and potatoes it is the post-war decade from 1919 to 1929. The golden age value to be secured for the unit is called its "fair exchange value." Obviously its determination requires first the ascertainment (at any given moment) of the actual current market price of the unit; second the actual current market price of commodities needed by the farmer; third the number [42] of dollars that a unit fetched in the base period; and, fourth, the quantity of needed commodities for which a unit was then exchangeable. When the Secretary of Agriculture has ascertained these factors he has the material for a formula which will determine the gap or "spread" between the actual price and the ideal, or parity, price. This gap it is the laudable purpose of the act to close.

REV_00259134

Accordingly, the Secretary undertook, in the early part of 1933, to determine what had been, in the base period, the farm price per pound of cotton, and he found that it was 12.40 cents. He then ascertained that the price index of the commodities which farmers buy pointed to a figure higher than their price in the base period by 3 per cent, so that the figure was 103 per cent as of the time of his determination compared with the situation in the base period.

Applying his 103 per cent to his 12.40, he got 12.77. He then ascertained that the farm price current for a pound of cotton was 8.7 cents. Subtracting the 8.7 cents from 12.77, he got 4.07. Then he made an adjustment, which is explained by the fact that the farm prices have to do with the lint cotton, in bales, and the price to the [43] farmer is based upon the unbaled weight, so he finally determined the gap to be 4.2 per pound.

It is perfectly true, as the Solicitor General has said, that we do not dispute that the Secretary of Agriculture did the best job he could do with the figures at his disposal. He gathered a lot of statistics from all over the country, and he weighted them and he did all the things which have been suggested from the bench as the common practice in the departments; and there did result this figure of 4.2, and there is no dispute between us respecting the fidelity with which the Secretary acted in an attempt to find the figures upon which to base the tax.

Adjustment of production to consumption by closing the gap in order to increase the purchasing power of agricultural commodities thus being the ultimate objective, the second important point is that the adjustment is to be accomplished by a reduction in acreage, or reduction in the production for market, or both, of any basic agricultural commodity. This reduction of production is relied upon to cause a corresponding diminution of marketable units and a consequent approximation of their actual market price to the golden age price. [44]

I pause to note that the phrase "adjustment of production to consumption" is really not an accurate statement of the objective. The natural meaning of that phrase is that you are merely reducing production to the extent of equalizing it to a consumption which is to remain undisturbed. It is evident, however, that what is really proposed is such a reduced production as will secure for the farmer his parity price, irrespective of the effect produced upon the consumer.

The third point is that the closing of the gap through reduction of production is to be accomplished principally through agreements with producers containing provisions for rental or benefit payments in such amounts as the Secretary of Agriculture deems fair and reasonable; the producer in consideration of the payment agreeing to act in conformity with the federal policy.

The fourth point is that, in order to raise the money with which to purchase the promise of the farmer to limit his production and otherwise submit to regulation, a processing tax is levied upon processors in respect of the first conversion of raw material into a manufactured product; and the proceeds of this tax, while paid into the Treasury, are [45] appropriated in advance to the Secretary of Agriculture for the specific purposes which I shall presently state. The rate of tax, per unit processed, is by the act declared to be the difference between the current average farm price for the commodity and the fair exchange value thereof. In other words, the rate of tax corresponds to the gap or spread between the actual and the ideal. Thus the rise and fall of the so-called tax is dependent upon factors wholly unrelated to the business of the processor. From his point of view the tax might as well have been levied at a figure per unit processed dependent upon the rise or fall of the mercury in the Fahrenheit thermometer.

The next point to be noted is that the proceeds of the tax when received by the Secretary of Agriculture are to be available for specific purposes, to wit, disbursements which include not merely rental and benefit payments to farmers but what is euphemistically described as "expansion of markets" and "removal of surplus agricultural products." "Expansion of markets" I understand to include those open market operations which, when conducted in financial centers, are described as "rigging the market." "The removal [46] of surplus agricultural products" means in the case of hogs (for example) the purchase of quantities of animals at high prices and their incineration with a view to limitation of supply. My friend the Solicitor General is quite right when he says that there was appropriated a hundred million dollars initially out of the Treasury, before the scheme got to work, which was available for the time being for rental and benefit payments; but I am sure that the provision of the Act has not escaped him which is to the effect that as the proceeds of the tax come in, the amounts advanced by the Treasury are to be repaid; so that the whole financing of the scheme which I am outlining is accomplished by a tax paid by the processors in accordance with a measure or yardstick which has no relation under heaven to their activity or the business they are to do.

Finally, it may be observed that the original list of agricultural commodities as contained in § 11 of the act, has been increased by the subsequent inclusion of many others, the most recent being potatoes. Naturally it is impossible to make a definate statement respecting the scope of that provision of the act which authorizes the imposition [47] of compensating taxes on articles found to be in competition with basic commodities. These competing commodities are to be identified only by the Secretary and might include a vast area of production in addition to the area specified in the act.

In making the foregoing statement I have carefully refrained from stating such features of the act as give rise to the question of delegated power. It seems to me to conduce to clearness to reserve a reference to those features until the argument on delegation is made. I merely remark in passing that the whole scheme of the act necessarily calls for so many determinations, adjustments and decisions on points of policy that it might fairly be described as a scheme for the government of agriculture with the Secretary of Agriculture as Governor General.

That is my basic statement of the significant parts of the Act and of the facts which it seems to me it is important to bear in mind in approaching the constitutional questions, which, as I have said, seem to me to be two. I affirm, first, that the processing exaction is not in its nature the exercise of the taxing power of the United States, but is wholly regulatory in character, and [48] is part of a nation-wide scheme for the Federal regulation of local agricultural production; and, second, that if that scheme as a whole is unconstitutional as an invasion of the reserved powers of the States, then the whole scheme falls and the processing tax falls with it. . . .

When the Court rose yesterday I had completed an introductory statement upon the basis of which I desire to present two propositions for the consideration of this Court.

First: That the exactions called processing taxes are not exercises of the taxing power as such but are integral parts of a regulatory scheme and are themselves regulatory in character.

Second: That this regulatory scheme is an invasion of the field reserved by the Tenth Amendment to the States and to the people and that therefore the scheme must fall and carry the processing taxes with it.

If I can sustain these propositions, then without regard to the question of delegation, the judgment appealed from must be affirmed. I confidently assert, without arguing the point, that if my propositions are sound, nothing in the amendment of August 24, 1935, in any way affects them. I do not understand it to be seriously contended that the [49] amendment has changed the nature of the regulatory scheme. If the original act was invalid for lack of power the amendment is in no better case.

The outline of the scheme which I have already made makes it clear that control of

REV_00259136

Headnote: [3]
An excise may constitutionally be levied on one group for the benefit of another when imposed to effectuate regulation of a matter in which both groups are interested and in respect of which there is a power of legislative regulation.

EVIDENCE, §2
judicial notice -- matters generally understood. --

Headnote: [4]
The court may not shut its eyes to what all others can see and understand.

STATUTES, §32
who may question validity of Agricultural Adjustment Act processing tax. --

Headnote: [5]
The processing tax authorized by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of May 12, 1933, is a mere incident of the regulation of agricultural production for which such act provides, the validity of which may accordingly be challenged by those against whom the tax is levied.

STATUTES, §12
validity -- conformity to Constitution as essential. --

Headnote: [6]
The Federal Constitution is the supreme law of the land, ordained and established by the people, and all legislation must conform to the principles it lays down.

COURTS, §96
extent of power to review legislation. --

Headnote: [7]
The function of the courts when an act of Congress is appropriately challenged as not conforming to the constitutional mandate is merely to ascertain and declare whether the legislation is in accordance with or in contravention of the provisions of the Constitution, and not to approve or condemn its policy.

UNITED STATES, §57
powers of Federal government -- extent. --

Headnote: [8]
The Federal government is one of delegated powers; and has only such as are expressly conferred upon it and such as are reasonably to be implied from those granted.

UNITED STATES, §14
powers of Congress -- scope of welfare clause. -- production is the objective of Congress. I now wish to show that the processing tax is merely a cog, though an essential cog, in the regulatory machine. That this is its true character appears from the following considerations:

There is no tax until the Secretary of Agriculture determines that rental or benefit payments are to be made. See § 9 (a). In other words, the making of rental or benefit payments is the sole occasion for the tax.

The declared objective being to close the gap between the farmer's financial condition today and his condition in a pre-war period, the rate of the tax is declared to be the extent of such gap. § 9 (b). In other words, (as already explained) there is no relation whatever between the rate of tax and the activity of the processor, except that the extent of the gap in the farmer's income is translated into such-and-such a sum per pound of raw material processed. Congress in so many words has said "We exact from the [50] processor a sum equal to our estimate of what the farmer should be receiving in addition to his present income."

The sum so exacted is to be paid into the treasury but is by the act itself so appropriated as to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for rental and benefit payments and other features of the reduction program. § 12 (b). In other words, the tax and its use are so related that, except for the specified use, there would be no tax, and except for the tax, the scheme could never go into effect.

The tax terminates at the end of the marketing year current at the time the Secretary determines to discontinue rental and benefit payments. § 9(a). In other words, just as the proposed exercise of control is the occasion of the tax so a determination to abandon control marks the end of the tax. The provision on that subject is the reciprocal of the first that I mentioned. The tax goes into effect when the Secretary declares that rental and benefit payments are to be made. The tax ceases to exist at the end of the market year when he declares that the rental and benefit payments are to terminate; and, as I have explained, in the interval the tax, in theory at least, [51] is modified upward or downward by fluctuations in the fortunes of the farmer. I say "in theory at least," because (referring to the brief filed on behalf of the processors of hogs) you will find that while in the case of cotton it so happens, as so clearly explained by the Solicitor-General yesterday, that the tax has been maintained and still exists at the same figure at which it was originally placed -- namely, 4.2 cents per pound, that being the precise mathematical outcome of the formula in the act, with some administrative adjustments -- in the case of hogs the authority given to the Secretary to approach compliance with the formula gradually has been exercised so liberally that while the tax which the formula would have yielded at the time the tax was imposed was something over four dollars and a half per hundred-weight of hogs, the Secretary imposed a tax first of fifty cents, then of a dollar, then of a dollar and a half, and subsequently, as of March, 1934, a tax of $ 2.25 the hundred-weight, which has continued in effect and is in effect at the present time, although at the outset that was only about half the figure yielded by the formula; and the gap has in fact so far [52] closed, owing to the successful operation of the scheme, that there was, I think, one time when the gap disappeared entirely; and there are judicial findings in a number of cases to the effect that the gap had shrunk to 81 cents at the time of the findings in question, although the tax was still maintained at $ 2.25.

I mention this to show that the tax is regulatory in character, and does not really follow even the fluctuations as required by the formula, but that resort must be had to that provision of the Act which authorizes the Secretary not merely to fix the rate at the outset in accordance with the formula or a gradual approach to it, but authorizes him to maintain the tax after it has been laid, so that if the tax equals the formula or is less than the formula at the time it is laid, and subsequently the gap closes, even approaching the vanishing point, the power to maintain is invoked for the purpose of keeping the tax at a figure in excess of the formula, provided in the opinion of the constituted authority it is necessary to do that thing in order to regulate local production.

Since the object of the scheme of federal control is to enable the farmers to get higher prices [53] for their products, and so close the gap, it must follow that if (for example) the processors of hogs had voluntarily paid to their several vendors such prices as would close the gap there never would have been any tax whatever.

While the formula for the tax rate is specified in the act, the Secretary of Agriculture is given discretion to lower it, § 9(b); he is, by § 15(a), given authority to exempt the processing of any commodity from all tax whatever, and even to refund what has been paid; and he is empowered by § 15(d) to impose compensating taxes of unspecified amounts upon commodities competing with basic commodities.

In view of the foregoing I submit that what Congress has done is not to exercise its taxing power except as part of and solely in aid of a regulatory scheme, the administration of which it has confided to an executive official.

If I am right in my analysis, it is about as clear a case of an exaction masquerading as a tax, but really regulatory in its character, as I think has ever come before this Court. . . .

Now, may it please your Honors, if I am right in my contention that this so-called processing tax is merely a regulatory exaction, and not an exercise [54] of the taxing power as such, it remains for me to satisfy your Honors that it is such an exaction as should fall if the scheme itself is beyond the power of Congress.

On this point I contend that this Court has decided that wherever it appears upon the face of the statute that levies are being imposed not to replenish the public treasury but to control the conduct of the private citizen, the validity of the levy depends upon whether the exercise of control is within the powers granted by the people to Congress.

At this point the Solicitor General advances the objection that there is a difference between this case and the decisions to which I refer. He is right: there is a difference but it is not a significant difference. It is true that in the Child Labor Case and others the tax was laid upon A in order to control A's conduct. In the instant case the money is exacted from A in order to be used for the control of the conduct of B. If, however, the fact be that control of conduct is the legislative objective and if such control cannot be accomplished without resort to a tax, then it must be immaterial whether the control, if achieved, results from A's desire to [55] escape the tax or from B's readiness to exchange his freedom for a share of A's money. . . .

But the objection is then advanced in another form. It is said that in the instant case it is optional with the farmer whether he will accept the benefit payment and that, if he subjects himself to control, he does so voluntarily. This, it seems to me, is a factual distinction without a legal difference. The employer of child labor was not coerced except by economic pressure. The farmer is not coerced except by economic pressure. Whether the pressure takes the form of threatened exaction or of promised bounty, the Court is faced by the same fundamental proposition, namely that Congress is using the device of a tax as a means to the exertion of effective pressure upon the citizen in order to make him conform to congressional policy. If the control thus sought is within some granted power, well and good. If not, the whole scheme fails.

The Court will note that I am not contending that a federal loan or a federal bounty to farmers is, per se, invalid. I recognize that for a hundred years there have been all sorts of unchallenged congressional appropriations to promote agriculture. [56] But these measures merely offered advice or instruction or extended financial aid to farmers. In no case, as far as I know, was there an attempt by Congress through the use of money to regulate local production. The type of regulation here attempted is the limitation of local agricultural production. Suppose it were the policy of a given State to stimulate such production through bounties or by more positive coercion. I find it hard to believe that the Constitution of the United States would sanction a public auction in which the farmer is placed on the auction block, the federal government bidding in order to purchase his promise to limit production and the State bidding in order to retain his loyalty to the local law. That is not at all an extravagant illustration, because, if, when your Honors come to look at Mr. Donald's able brief [referring to one of the briefs filed by amici curiae] you will glance at page 42, you will find the most interesting collection of constitutional and statutory declarations in the several States that seem to me to be at war with this Federal policy; and if it is going to be possible for the Federal Government to offer pecuniary reward to the [57] farmer under conditions such that he cannot very well afford to decline, you get a situation in which he sells his freedom for this mess of pottage, and disavows his allegiance to that State which, under the Tenth Amendment, is entitled to control his production, and subjects himself to what is, in that sense, an alien scheme. I always distrust my capacity to put a perfect dilemma; but I suggest that in this case one of two things is true -- either that control acquired by purchase is, if lawful, the supreme law of the land or that a scheme of local regulation which it is within the power of the State to nullify is a scheme which Congress lacks the power to set up.

REV_00259138

If you look at the case realistically, it is not a voluntary matter with the farmer whether he does or does not accept the regime. It is no more voluntary than it was in the case of the manufacturer of goods made with child labor to continue to pay the tax and still remain in the business of which Congress disapproved. It is not possible for the farmer in any neighborhood who refuses to accept the regime to compete successfully with his next door neighbor who has accepted it. If you think realistically, it is not [58] a voluntary scheme at all; and if you will glance at pages 32 to 36 in Mr. Donald's brief and note the intensive sales effort that was put out to capture the allegiance of the farmers, you will think that I am not extravagant in saying that that was a method of compulsion that is a good deal more effective than allotting quotas and threatening criminal penalties for their violation. It is a good deal more effective to purchase control with the use of liberal sums of money than it is to enforce obedience to a complicated scheme by means of criminal sanctions.

In connection with the emphasis laid by the Government upon the alleged voluntary character of the farmer's consent to be regulated, I think it significant to note that there is nothing voluntary in the consequences of his action as they affect the processor and the consumer. These people may well be neighbors of the farmer and citizens of the same State. The necessary result of the farmer's agreement with the federal government to limit production is threefold: first, it subjects the processor to a tax; second, it raises the price which the processor must pay to the farmer for his raw material; and, third, even if the processor [59] absorbs the tax, he must reflect the rise in raw material costs in his price to the retailer -- who, in turn, exacts an increased price from the ultimate consumer. There is, I repeat, nothing voluntary in this scheme as respects the effect upon processor and public. I mention this merely by the way; because I am contending that the criterion of validity or invalidity is the control sought by Congress and not the nature of the economic pressure exerted to secure it.

I have now attempted to establish that these processing exactions are an integral part of a scheme to regulate local production and to affect the price of agricultural commodities and so must be declared invalid if the scheme as a whole is invalid. Before passing to my second proposition -- namely, that the scheme is invalid -- I wish to notice a final objection made by the Government against treating the scheme of the act as a unity.

It is said that while A may resist payment of an exaction intended to control his own conduct, he has no standing to resist it if the proceeds are to go into the Treasury and there become subject to uncontrollable spending power. There is in this objection what seems to me an obvious [60] fallacy. The precedent relied upon by the Government -- Massachusetts v. Mellon -- is merely authority for the proposition that neither a State nor an individual taxpayer has a sufficiently direct pecuniary interest to give him a standing to question the validity of an appropriation of money which is lawfully in the Treasury and subject to appropriation. The question presented by this record is wholly different. Here the citizen is resisting an attempt of the Federal Government to take money out of his own pocket and is basing his resistance upon the invalidity of the scheme of which both the threatened collection and proposed disbursement are necessary parts.

I do not overlook the announcement recently carried by the press that if this act is declared unconstitutional the next move of Congress will be to levy an excise in one Act and then appropriate money for benefit payments by another. If such a course is followed it will be time enough to discuss the constitutional questions to which it may give rise. I venture the suggestion, however, that if the spending power is ever thus deliberately invoked to enlarge the area of Congressional control, it might not be impertinent [61] to ask this Court to consider whether, in a democracy, the individual citizen has not a standing to call the legislature to account, not because of his pecuniary stake but because of his responsible share in government.

I come now to my second proposition -- which is that a scheme to regulate farm production and fix farm prices is an invasion of the field reserved by the Tenth Amendment.

I do not see how there can be much controversy over the purpose of this Act. The draftsman with commendable frankness has, as we have seen, explicitly stated it. Whether you call it realistically the philosophy of scarcity or euphemistically the adjustment of production to consumption, the plain fact is that the reduction of local production of crops must at all hazards be achieved or else the desired increase in farm prices is unattainable. It seems to me, therefore, that we have, as to agriculture, the same type of regulation unsuccessfully attempted by NRA in the case of industry. If the Court will compare the declarations of emergency in the two Acts it will be seen that obstruction of the normal currents of commerce figures largely in what Congress evidently hoped would be accepted by [62] the Court as jurisdictional facts. In the case of both Acts the draftsman had a rosy vision of nationwide economic recovery achieved through increased commodity prices and he mistakenly assumed that this end could be lawfully accomplished through regimentation by a central authority -- in one case the President, in the other the Secretary of Agriculture.

When NRA was submitted for judicial examination an effort was made to salvage it by seeking authority for the codes in the power to regulate interstate commerce. Now, however, when AAA is before the Court, there is a significant silence on the part of the Government as to the commerce clause. It seems to be conceded, as indeed it would have to be in the light of the Schechter decision, that the federal regulation of production is wholly beyond the scope of the commerce clause. The whole reliance of the Government is accordingly placed upon the proposition that we have nothing to consider but an unimpeachable tax and an uncontrollable appropriation.

To support the tax argument, the Government invokes the general welfare clause. This seems to me to afford the coldest kind of cold comfort.

As I understand it, when Congress [63] merely imposes a tax (whether it be a uniform indirect tax or an apportioned direct tax) no question of purpose is involved. There are plenty of legitimate governmental needs for money, and Congress, presumably, is merely undertaking to meet them. Accordingly no problem arises unless and until, in the very act of imposing the tax, Congress (as here) specifies the purpose for which the money is sought to be raised. The purpose so specified might be one clearly within some recognized congressional power. In such case no difficulty would be presented. But suppose (as here) that the only specific power that might plausibly be invoked (to wit, the commerce power) falls far short of what is required. It is then, and then only, that recourse is had to the proposition that it is within the exclusive power of Congress to determine that a particular measure will promote the general welfare and that accordingly a tax to be applied for the purposes of that measure is a valid tax. This proposition, as far as I can see, means this: that Congress may determine that a certain nation-wide policy is necessary to the welfare of the nation; ergo that legislation to effectuate such policy must [64] be within the power of Congress, and that, if you cannot find an applicable specific power which covers the case, you invoke the general welfare clause. The practical result of this argument is the same as that which would flow from the doctrine of "inherent national power" upon which this Court put a quietus in Kansas v. Colorado . Whether Congress invokes "inherent power" or wallows in the welfare clause -- in either event the powers reserved by the Tenth Amendment disappear and that against which I solemnly protest ensues -- namely the conversion of a federal legislature into a national parliament -- with the consequent destruction of the right of local self-government.

As I understand it, there are three possible views of the general welfare clause. It seems to me to be patient of two interpretations and can be tortured into a third. It is patient of the Madisonian view; it is patient of the Hamiltonian view; and it can be tortured, possibly, although I hope not, to answer the needs of the Solicitor General in the present case.

I understand Madison's view to have been that the welfare for which Congress may appropriate is the welfare which may be achieved in the [65] exercise of the granted powers. I understand the Hamiltonian view to have been that, irrespective of the existence of power in virtue of specific grants or implications, the power to tax may be used to raise revenue for the general welfare, and that appropriations may be made out of that fund for such purposes as Congress may think fit. But I did not know, until this statute proposed it, of any interpretation which begins where Hamilton stops, and asserts that because you may appropriate for anything which congress thinks is consonant with the public welfare, you may, through that appropriation, control the local conduct of the producer in a particular reserved to the States under the Tenth Amendment. That, it seems to me, is the general welfare clause gone mad. It seems to me it is impossible to sustain any such view without throwing overboard once and for all the idea that Congress is a federal legislature with limited powers. It carries you all the way to the other extreme, which is that of the national parliament subject to no restraint but self-restraint. . . .

The commerce clause failing to serve his purpose -- and the general welfare clause being unsafe ground on which [66] to build, four subsidiary arguments are advanced by the Solicitor General to which I wish to refer briefly.

The first is based upon the historical fact that spending is an executive function. No student of English constitutional history will dispute the proposition and no contemporary observer can doubt that even in the United States the same function is effectively exercised by the Executive. But the conclusion sought to be drawn is a non-sequitur. Because the Executive may spend as he pleases, it is argued that when he pleases to make a certain expenditure his decision puts into operation a tax to raise the money for him to spend. Whether you call this a delegation to him of the taxing power or whether he is attempting to delegate to Cogress his executive discretion is largely a matter of words. The practical result would be to give to the President and to Congress an unlimited power to tax for any purpose which could be attained by inflating the general welfare clause to the utmost. . . .

Next it is said that Congress may organize banks and other agencies with power to lend money to farmers on mortgage. This may be conceded. But the conclusion is remarkable -- namely, [67] that therefore Congress may take over the control of production in order to increase the farmer's ability to repay the loan. If this argument had been advanced a year ago it might have saved the NRA; because, since Congress has authorized the formation of National Banks with power to lend money to industrialists, it would seem to follow that Congress may take control of any and all industries to make it more likely that the notes will be paid. Here again the trouble with the argument is that it proves too much. It frees the legislature from all constitutional restraint.

The third subsidiary argument is based upon the proposition that power to pay the debts of the United States includes power to discharge a moral obligation. This may be conceded. Thus, if a farmer had performed his part of a contract with the Secretary and the latter were to refuse to pay the consideration on the ground that the contract was void, and if Congress were then to appropriate for the relief of the farmer, nobody could enjoin the appropriation. But to argue that Congress may therefore authorize an unconstitutional scheme in order to create an honorary duty, and may then tax the processor to raise [68] the money to perform it, seems to me to be juggling with words. If the United States is unjustly enriched by accepting a farmer's performance, let Congress appropriate funds in the treasury not otherwise appropriated. If the honor of all the people is at stake, let all the people vindicate it. But for goodness sake do not permit the United States to purge itself of unjust enrichment by unjustly impoverishing the processor. The United States would not be entitled to a thrill of moral satisfaction merely because it had robbed Processor Peter in order to pay Producer Paul.

REV_00259141

A fourth subsidiary argument is built around the contention that the farmer needs a tariff -- and that therefore he should have it in the exercise of the same power that justifies the international tariff. The argument overlooks the fact that the international tariff is primarily an exercise of the express power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. It was so decided in Board of Trustees of State University v. United States in 289 U.S. Being free to forbid admission of goods from abroad, Congress may regulate their admission and use the taxing power in aid of regulation. There is no corresponding [69] power to regulate agricultural production -- and the argument loses its force. It has then no other basis than the exploded doctrine of "inherent national power" -- to which reference has already been made.

There is one aspect of this case which requires a reference to the Fifth Amendment.

The Solicitor General indeed stoutly maintains that the Amendment has nothing to do with this case. I agree that if this processing exaction is merely part of a regulatory scheme that is beyond the power of Congress, then the reason for the invalidity of the tax is, not the Fifth Amendment, but the lack of power to control local production.

On the other hand, if I am wrong in my main contention and if Congress may lawfully regulate such production -- on the general welfare theory or some other equally vague -- it by no means follows that the entire cost of the regulatory process may be taken out of the pockets of the processors. As the Fifth Amendment applies to the exercise of all the powers of government it must apply to the regulatory power of Congress no matter whence derived. I concede that an excise tax on all processors to help raise money for the federal treasury could not be resisted [70] merely because it was too heavy. If (contrary to my earnest contention) it were assumed that regulation of production by benefit payments and other uses of money is within some power of Congress, I should also have to concede that money in the treasury raised by general taxation is available for such use. I suggest, however, that there is something essentially unjust in compelling the first handler of an agricultural commodity to contribute whatever is necessary to make up deficiencies in the income of the man who produces that commodity. It is all very well to think of the promotion of the agricultural industry as a public purpose; but to integrate the industry for purposes of regulation by treating the handler and producer as having interlocking interests and then to compel the stronger group to extend financial aid to the weaker comes perilously close to taking A's property and giving it to B. Something like this was attempted by Congress in the Railroad Retirement Act, where strong roads were expected to make up the deficiencies of the weak. This exaction from the processor might be justified if there were any ascertainable relation between the rate of tax and the activity [71] in respect of which the excise is levied. But when it appears that the tax rate is determined by the width of the gap between what the farmer's income is and what Congress thinks it ought to be, it begins to look as if the processor were brought upon the scene merely in order to have his pocket picked for the benefit of the farmer. It would be hard enough on the processor to have to submit to assessment merely to increase the producer's income; but when we reflect that the increase is accomplished by using the proceeds of the tax to raise the price which the processor has to pay for his raw material, the question arises whether this is the due process which the Fifth Amendment guarantees. It seems clear to me that it is not due process to measure an excise on processing by a deficiency in producer's income.

It is not possible for me to extract from the due process decisions of this Court a formula for determining what does and what does not come within the condemnation of the Fifth Amendment. Probably the Court has deliberately avoided the formulation of a rule for the same reason that chancellors refuse to specify the limits of fraud. Each case must be determined in the light [72] of its own facts. I suggest, however, that the processing exaction is a far more marked departure from what is usually regarded as permissible in taxation than was the case in Nichols v. Coolidge, 274 U.S. 531 (1927), in Hoeper v. Tax Commission of Wisconsin, 284 U.S. 206 (1931) or in Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U.S. 312 (1932).

. . .

My time is fleeting and I must not pause to sum up the argument I have made. I have come to the point at which a consideration of delegation is the next logical step, and that is to be dealt with effectively by my colleague, Mr. Hale. But I do want to say just one final and somewhat personal word.

I have tried very hard to argue this case calmly and dispassionately, and without vehement attack upon things which I cannot approve, and I have done it thus because it seems to me that this is the best way in which an advocate can discharge his duty to this Court.

But I do not want your Honors to think that my feelings are not involved, and that my emotions are not deeply stirred. Indeed, may it please your Honors, I believe I am standing here today to plead the cause of the America I have loved; and I pray Almighty God that [73] not in my time may "the land of the regimented" be accepted as a worthy substitute for "the land of the free."

Messrs. Edward R. Hale and Bennett Sanderson closed the argument for respondents.

Following are excerpts from the respondents' brief, on which were the two gentlemen last named, together with Messrs. George Wharton Pepper, Humbert B. Powell, James A. Montgomery, Jr., J. Willison Smith, Jr., and Edmund M. Toland:

Notwithstanding the reservation of the Tenth Amendment, this Act, by purchased control, forces upon agricultural communities within state lines a reduction of production of agricultural commodities without regard to the needs, desires or policies of the State affected. It disregards even the policies against restraints on trade announced by many of the States in formal enactment.

Indeed, there is a substantial question of the power of the States themselves either to control agricultural activities and internal prices, or a fortiori, of their ability to grant any such power to the Federal Government. The ordinary legitimate pursuits and transactions of citizens are, except in extraordinary circumstances, traditionally free from control [74] even of the States. New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262; Tyson Bros. v. Banton, 273 U.S. 418; Fairmont Creamery v. Minnesota, 274 U.S. 1; Williams v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U.S. 235; Van Winkle v. Fred Meyer, Inc., 151 Ore. 455; 49 P. (2d) 1140. If power to regulate the operation of farms and prices of farm products is reserved to the people, as distinguished from the States, it follows that such power may not be delegated to the Federal Government except by an act of the people, expressed in a constitutional amendment. Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U.S. 46, 90.

REV_00259143

It is argued that there is something voluntary about the crop reduction program which removes it from the limitations upon the Federal Government. As a matter of law we are unable to see any valid distinction arising from the fact that in this Act the regulation of individual activities within the States is accomplished by purchase instead of penalty.

While economic compulsion is invoked in the original Act to secure compliance from the producer, Congress has not hesitated to employ legal compulsion where less drastic methods were too slow. Legal compulsion has [75] thus been resorted to in the case of cotton (the commodity involved in the instant case), tobacco and potatoes. The Bankhead Cotton Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 598; The Kerr Tobacco Act, 48 Stat. 1275; The Potato Act of 1935 (being Title II of "An Act to Amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other Purposes," approved August 24, 1935, Public No. 320, 74th Congress). Similar power to exert legal compulsion upon the processor or handler is granted in § 8 (3) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act as originally enacted. Such power has been extended by the amendments of August 24, 1935. These related Acts and provisions leave no doubt that the original and continuing Congressional intention in the Agricultural Adjustment Act is to impose the federal will upon production of agricultural commodities. In the light of such intentions and acts, the argument that control is voluntary becomes mere casuistry.

The regulatory measures of which the tax is an integral part cannot be justified as a regulation of interstate commerce.

Neither the production of commodities by farmers nor the manufacture of articles is subject to the control of Congress. Chassaniol v. Greenwood, 291 U.S. [76] 584; Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfost, 286 U.S. 165; Heisler v. Thomas Colliery Co., 260 U.S. 245; Oliver Iron Mining Co. v. Lord, 262 U.S. 172; Crescent Cotton Oil Co. v. Mississippi, 257 U.S. 129; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U.S. 1.

Interstate commerce begins only when articles are delvered to a carrier to be transported. It comes to an end when articles are delivered. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495; Federal Compress Co. v. McLean, 291 U.S. 17; United Leather Workers v. Herkert & Co, 265 U.S. 457.

Neither agriculture nor manufacturing "affects" or "burdens" interstate commerce. In order to come within the interstate commerce power, the effect or burden of activities not commerce must be direct and immediate. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, supra; Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton R. Co., 295 U.S. 330; Levering & Garrigues v. Morrin, 289 U.S. 103; United Leather Workers v. Herkert & Co., 265 U.S. 457; United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co., 259 U.S. 344; Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251.

The processing and floor stocks taxes [77] are levied in violation of the Fifth Amendment. The Act takes from one class without compensation, and gives to members of another. Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton R. Co., 295 U.S. 330; Louisville Joint Stock Land Bank v. Radford, 295 U.S. 555.

The taxing power is limited to taxes raised for public as distinguished from private purposes. Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655; Cole v. LaGrange, 113 U.S. 1; Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U.S. 487; Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454.

The taxes are arbitrary and unreasonable. The Fifth Amendment requires that a law (including a tax law) shall not be unreasonable, arbitrary or capricious. Of tax laws it requires a reasonable classification of objects of taxation, a rate determined upon a reasonable basis, not arbitrary or confiscatory, and reasonableness in the time when the tax becomes effective. The Fifth Amendment also requires that the means selected to carry out one of the granted powers shall have a real and substantial relation to the object sought to be attained. Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton R. Co., 295 U.S. 330, 347, note 5; Louisville Joint Stock [78] Land Bank v. Radford, 295 U.S. 555, 589, note 19. See also Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 525; Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U.S. 312; Nichols v. Coolidge, 274 U.S. 531; Hoeper v. Tax Commission, 284 U.S. 206.

REV_00259144

Congress may not, under the guise of the taxing power, assert a power not delegated to it by the Constitution. Ulterior purposes may be accomplished under this power only when they are truly incidental and necessary to a real revenue measure. Cf. Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton R. Co., supra; Hill v. Wallace, 259 U.S. 44; Child Labor Tax Case, 259 U.S. 20. United States v. Doremus, 249 U.S. 86 and McCray v. United States, 195 U.S. 27, distinguished.

The taxpayer may contest the tax and question the purpose thereof. Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, distinguished.

The floor stocks taxes are direct taxes and are void because not apportioned.

The Act is invalid in that it delegates legislative power to the Secretary of Agriculture. Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388; Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495; Field v. Clark, 143 [79] U.S. 649; United States v. Grimaud, 220 U.S. 506; Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394. Williamsport Wire Rope Co. v. United States, 277 U.S. 551; Blair v. Oesterlein Machine Co., 275 U.S. 220; Heiner v. Diamond Alkali Co., 288 U.S. 502, and United States v. Grimaud, 220 U.S. 506, distinguished.

Section 21 (b) of the amendments is ineffective to validate taxes assessed prior to its passage. United States v. Heinszen, 206 U.S. 370; Rafferty v. Smith, Bell & Co., 257 U.S. 226; Tiaco v. Forbes, 228 U.S. 549; Charlotte Harbor & N. Ry. Co. v. Welles, 260 U.S. 8; Graham & Foster v. Goodcell, 282 U.S. 409; Nichols v. Coolidge, 274 U.S. 531; Blodgett v. Holden, 275 U.S. 142; Untermyer v. Anderson, 276 U.S. 440.

Solicitor General Reed closed the argument:

May it please the Court, in the brief time remaining to me to close the argument for the Government I should like particularly to call to your Honors' attention the problem of the welfare clause, the Tenth Amendment, and whether or not this tax is for a public purpose.

I do not know whether counsel [80] for the respondents mean to take the position that the welfare clause does give a power of appropriation and a power to tax that can be utilized for the purposes of relief and that can be utilized for the purposes of making loans to agriculture through the Farm Loan Corporation, and making loans to homeowners through the Home Owners Loan Corporation, or can be used for making loans to agriculture, railroads, industry, and banks, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; or whether they take the position that the welfare clause as such does not give a right to the Government to make loans. If we can make a loan, can we also make a grant, or if we can make a grant, can we make a contract? The vital point of assault and defense upon the Agricultural Adjustment Act seems to me not to be in the Tenth Amendment, nor in whether this is for a public purpose, but as to whether the Government has the power to appropriate money which it raises by taxation for the benefit of individuals in the States, or to carry out contracts which the Government makes with those individuals.

The scope of the welfare clause has never been finally decided by this Court. The Government's position is [81] not that it may take any action it pleases under the welfare clause. Our contention is that the welfare clause gives the right to tax and the right to appropriate, so long as the appropriations are limited to the general welfare.

This interpretation of the welfare clause has met the approval of those who participated in the ratifying conventions. It met the approval of George Washington when he sent his message to Congress that agriculture should be supported and benefited by Congressional appropriations. It met the approval of the early Congresses when they used the power of giving bounties to the cod fisheries of Massachusetts. . . .

REV_00259145

That is the interpretation of the welfare clause which has met the approval of commentators from Story to Justice Miller. With but one exception that I recall, they have been fully settled in the view that the appropriating power of Congress gave it the right to give money for relief, to aid those who were in distress, to lend where money was needed. And surely if it can take those steps, it can also contract to help, where it is also for the public welfare.

Is this present Act for the public welfare? I heard the manifestation of deep emotion [82] with which counsel spoke of his interest in the preservation of the welfare of this Government, and I respect his motives and the earnestness with which he presents them to this Court. But there is another side to the argument, as to what is the duty of the Government of the United States. Over and over again counsel have used the words "control" and "regiment." There is no control or regimentation in this Act. An emergency existed, not of sudden creation, but grown up over the years; lack of balance between different sections of this country, not geographical sections, but different interests of the people of the United States.

This very corporation is an excellent example of benefits that have been secured from the taxing powers of this Government -- a textile mill which, with its competitors, for more than a hundred years has received the bounties which come and the benefits which flow from the protective tariff system. Surely they should be the last to object to a readjustment of the balance between agriculture and industry.

The farmers of the United States comprise 30 per cent of the population, men, women and children, bringing out of the ground the natural resources [83] which sustain the entire American commonwealth, and bringing from the ground the very resource which this corporation uses in its manufacture of textiles. There is no reason to begrudge it the bounties it has received from the Government, but on the other hand there is no reason why the Government of the United States, in the exercise of its power under the general welfare clause, should not seek to equalize the interests of agriculture and industry.

The Government sought to do that in the Act under consideration. The tax which is criticized has relation to the farmer and relation to the consumer. It was sought to equalize the benefits to the farmer, to give him better prices, and not impose a tax so high that the consumer would pay more than the normal amount the farmer was to receive. Therefore it is written that the tax shall not exceed the difference between the selling price of the commodity at the time the tax is placed upon it and the normal purchasing power of that commodity in what has been taken as a normal period.

Is there any reason why this country should be denied a right to help its citizens engaged in agriculture, which is open to every other country? Of course, [84] it is said that we must act within the Constitution. Certainly we must. But the interpretation that is to be given to the Constitution must be viewed in the light of what is reasonable in the exercise of the power of Congress under the general welfare clause. Every nation, from the British Isles to Bechuanaland -- we have cited the reports from them in the appendix to our brief -- has taken steps to protect its agriculture.

We do not mean to say that that gives us a right so to legislate in this country if it is contrary to the Constitution, but we do say that it is evidence of the reasonable exercise of the power, if we have the power to provide for the general welfare, and the power of appropriation under that provision of the Constitution.

No one could be more firmly convinced of the necessity of keeping inviolate the separation of powers between the National Government and the States than counsel for the Government

REV_00259146

Headnote: [9]
Power to provide for the general welfare independently of the taxing power is not conferred by the provision of Article 1, 8, clause 1, of the Federal Constitution empowering Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," but the only thing granted is the power to tax for the purpose of providing funds for payment of the nation's debts and making provision for the general welfare.

PUBLIC MONEY, §1
power to appropriate under welfare clause. --

Headnote: [10]
Power to appropriate public funds for the general welfare of the United States is as broad as the power to lay taxes for such purpose.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, §13 construction -- giving effect to every word. --

Headnote: [11]
Words employed in the Federal Constitution cannot be regarded as meaningless.

UNITED STATES, §17
powers of Congress -- scope of power to lay tax for general welfare. --

Headnote: [12]
The power conferred by Article 1, 8, clause 1, of the Federal Constitution to lay and spend taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States, is not restricted to the enumerated legislative fields committed to Congress by the other provisions of the article, but confers a substantive power to tax and appropriate, limited only by the requirement that it shall be exercised to provide for the general welfare of the United States.

EVIDENCE, §99
presumption of constitutionality of acts of Congress. --

Headnote: [13]
Every presumption is to be indulged in favor of faithful compliance by Congress with the mandates of the Constitution.

COURTS, §97
declaring unconstitutionality of statute -- effect of doubt as to invalidity. --

Headnote: [14]
To establish the unconstitutionality of an act of Congress requires a showing that by no reasonable possibility can the challenged legislation fall within the wide range of discretion permitted to the Congress.

who appear here before this Court. This Court, however, has laid down the rules by which we are to judge as to whether we are interfering with the rights of a State.

The case of Massachusetts v. Mellon has been repeatedly called to your Honors' attention. [85] We have used it as an argument that the respondent cannot object in this case to the way in which the money is spent. But that is not the most important part of the case of Massachusetts v. Mellon at this moment. In that case the Court said not only that the citizen of a State could not object, but it said that "Probably, it would be sufficient to point out that the powers of the State are not invaded, since the statute imposes no obligation but simply extends an option which the State is free to accept or reject."

It was also said, in the case of Ellis v. United States, 206 U.S. 246, that the United States had the right even to control, by criminal provision, the actions of employers who employed people contrary to the laws of the United States when there was a contract between the employer and the United States.

We do not need to go so far in this case but we do say that the right to contract is free from limitation, that we have no more interfered with the rights of the States in this case than we would have interfered with the rights of the State in the case of Massachusetts v. Mellon if that State had accepted the money which was offered.

With [86] those views, we submit that the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as it has been enacted and amended, is fully within the authority of the Constitution.

By leave of Court, briefs of amici curiae were filed as follows:

Mr. Vernon A. Vooman, on behalf of the League for Economic Equality; Messrs. Frederic P. Lee and Donald Kirkpatrick, on behalf of the American Farm Bureau Federation; Mr. Clay R. Apple, on behalf of the National Beet Growers Assn., and the Mountain States Beet Growers Marketing Assn.; Mr. O. O. Haga, on behalf of the Farmers National Grain Corp.; and Mr. Dan Moody, on behalf of the Texas Agricultural Assn.; -- supporting the validity of the Act.

Messrs. Nathan L. Miller, John W. Davis, and William R. Perkins, on behalf of Hygrade Food Products Corp., P. Lorillard Co., and National Biscuit Co.; Messrs. Malcolm Donald and Edward E. Elder, on behalf of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers; Messrs. Kingman Brewster, James S. Y. Ivins, Percy W. Phillips, O. R. Folsom-Jones, Richard B. Barker, and John W. Cutler; Mr. John E. Hughes, on behalf of American Nut Co., Inc., et al.; Messrs. Leo P. Harlow and Al. [87] Philip Kane, on behalf of Farmers' Independence Council of America; Mr. Wm. B. Bodine, on behalf of Berks Packing Co., Inc., et al.; and Messrs. Charles B. Rugg, Frank J. Morley, Thomas Nelson Perkins, and Warren F. Farr, on behalf of General Mills, Inc., et al.; -- challenging the validity of the Act.

JUDGES: Hughes, Van Devanter, McReynolds, Brandeis, Sutherland, Butler, Stone, Roberts, Cardozo

OPINIONBY: ROBERTS

OPINION: [*53] [314] MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

In this case we must determine whether certain provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, 1933, n1 conflict with the Federal Constitution.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n1 May 12, 1933, c. 25, 48 Stat. 31.

REV_00259147

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Title I of the statute is captioned "Agricultural Adjustment." Section 1 recites that an economic emergency has arisen, due to disparity between the prices of agricultural and other commodities, with consequent destruction of farmers' purchasing power and breakdown in orderly exchange, which, in turn, have affected transactions in agricultural commodities with a national [88] public interest and burdened and obstructed the normal currents of commerce, calling for the enactment of legislation.

[*54] Section 2 declares it to be the policy of Congress:

"To establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor, as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities n2 a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy, equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 Section 11 denominates wheat, cotton, field corn, hogs, rice, tobacco, and milk and its products, "basic agricultural commodities," to which the act is to apply. Others have been added by later legislation.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The base period, in the case of cotton, and all other commodities except tobacco, is designated as that between August, 1909, and July, 1914.

The further policies announced are an approach to the desired equality by gradual correction of present inequalities [89] "at as rapid a rate as is deemed feasible in view of the current consumptive demand in domestic and foreign markets," and the protection of consumers' interest by readjusting farm production at such level as will not increase the percentage of the consumers' retail expenditures for agricultural commodities or products derived therefrom, which is returned to the farmer, above the percentage returned to him in the base period.

Section 8 provides, amongst other things, that "In order to effectuate the declared policy," the Secretary of Agriculture shall have power

"(1) To provide for reduction in the acreage or reduction in the production for market, or both, of any basic agricultural commodity, through agreements with producers or by other voluntary methods, and to provide for rental or benefit payments in connection therewith or upon that part of the production of any basic agricultural commodity required for domestic consumption, in such amounts as the Secretary deems fair and reasonable, to [*55] be paid out of any moneys available for such payments. . . ."

"(2) To enter into marketing agreements with processors, associations of producers, and others engaged in the handling, [90] in the current of interstate or foreign commerce of any agricultural commodity or product thereof, after due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties. . . ."

"(3) To issue licenses permitting processors, associations of producers, and others to engage in the handling, in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, of any agricultural commodity or product thereof, or any competing commodity or product thereof."

It will be observed that the Secretary is not required, but is permitted, if, in his uncontrolled judgment, the policy of the act will so be promoted, to make agreements with individual farmers for a reduction of acreage or production upon such terms as he may think fair and reasonable.

REV_00259148

Section 9 (a) enacts:

"To obtain revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of the national economic emergency, there shall be levied processing taxes as hereinafter provided. When the Secretary of Agriculture determines that rental or benefit payments are to be made with respect to any basic agricultural commodity, he shall proclaim such determination, and a processing tax shall be in effect with respect to such commodity from the beginning of the marketing [91] year therefor next following the date of such [315] proclamation. The processing tax shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon the first domestic processing of the commodity, whether of domestic production or imported, and shall be paid by the processor. . .

The Secretary may from time to time, if he finds it necessary for the effectuation of the policy of the act, readjust the amount of the exaction to meet the requirements [*56] of subsection (b). The tax is to terminate at the end of any marketing year if the rental or benefit payments are discontinued by the Secretary with the expiration of that year.

Section 9 (b) fixes the tax "at such rate as equals the difference between the current average farm price for the commodity and the fair exchange value," with power in the Secretary, after investigation, notice, and hearing, to readjust the tax so as to prevent the accumulation of surplus stocks and depression of farm prices.

Section 9 (c) directs that the fair exchange value of a commodity shall be such a price as will give that commodity the same purchasing power with respect to articles farmers buy as it had during the base period and that the fair exchange value and [92] the current average farm price of a commodity shall be ascertained by the Secretary from available statistics in his department.

Section 12 (a) appropriates $ 100,000,000 "to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for administrative expenses under this title and for rental and benefit payments. . ."; and § 12 (b) appropriates the proceeds derived from all taxes imposed under the act "to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for expansion of markets and removal of surplus agricultural products. . . administrative expenses, rental and benefit payments, and refunds on taxes."

Section 15 (d) permits the Secretary, upon certain conditions, to impose compensating taxes on commodities in competition with those subject to the processing tax.

By § 16 a floor tax is imposed upon the sale or other disposition of any article processed wholly or in chief value from any commodity with respect to which a processing tax is to be levied in amount equivalent to that of the processing tax which would be payable with respect to the commodity from which the article is processed if the processing had occurred on the date when the processing tax becomes effective.

[*57] On July 14, [93] 1933, the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, proclaimed that he had determined rental and benefit payments should be made with respect to cotton; that the marketing year for that commodity was to begin August 1, 1933; and calculated and fixed the rates of processing and floor taxes on cotton in accordance with the terms of the act.

The United States presented a claim to the respondents as receivers of the Hoosac Mills Corporation for processing and floor taxes on cotton levied under §§ 9 and 16 of the act. The receivers recommended that the claim be disallowed. The District Court found the taxes valid and ordered them paid. n3 Upon appeal the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the order. n4

The judgment under review was entered prior to the adoption of the amending act of August 24, 1935, n5 and we are therefore concerned only with the original act.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n3 Franklin Process Co. v. Hoosac Mills Corp., 8 F. Supp. 552.

n4 Butler v. United States, 78 F. (2d) 1.

n5 49 Stat. 750, c. 641.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [94]

[1]
First. At the outset the United States contends that the respondents have no standing to question the validity of the tax. The position is that the act is merely a revenue measure levying an excise upon the activity of processing cotton, -- a proper subject for the imposition of such a tax, -- the proceeds of which go into the federal treasury and thus become available for appropriation for any purpose. It is said that what the respondents are endeavoring to do is to challenge the intended use of the money pursuant to Congressional appropriation when, by confession, that money will have become the property of the Government and the taxpayer will no longer have any interest in it. Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, is claimed to foreclose litigation by the respondents or other taxpayers, as such, looking to restraint of the expenditure of government funds. That case might be an authority [*58] in the petitioners' favor if we were here concerned merely with a suit by a taxpayer to restrain the [316] expenditure of the public moneys. It was there held that a taxpayer of the United States may not question expenditures from its treasury on the ground that the alleged [95] unlawful diversion will deplete the public funds and thus increase the burden of future taxation. Obviously the asserted interest of a taxpayer in the federal government's funds and the supposed increase of the future burden of taxation is minute and indeterminable. But here the respondents who are called upon to pay moneys as taxes, resist the exaction as a step in an unauthorized plan. This circumstance clearly distinguishes the case. The Government in substance and effect asks us to separate the Agricultural Adjustment Act into two statutes, the one levying an excise on processors of certain commodities, the other appropriating the public moneys independently of the first. Passing the novel suggestion that two statutes enacted as parts of a single scheme should be tested as if they were distinct and unrelated, we think the legislation now before us is not susceptible of such separation and treatment.

The tax can only be sustained by ignoring the avowed purpose and operation of the act, and holding it a measure merely laying an excise upon processors to raise revenue for the support of government. Beyond cavil the sole object of the legislation is to restore the purchasing [96] power of agricultural products to a parity with that prevailing in an earlier day; to take money from the processor and bestow it upon farmers n6 who will reduce their acreage for [*59] the accomplishment of the proposed end, and, meanwhile to aid these farmers during the period required to bring the prices of their crops to the desired level.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 U.S. Department of Agriculture, Achieving A Balanced Agriculture, p. 38: "Farmers should not forget that all the processing tax money ends up in their own pockets. Even in those cases where they pay part of the tax, they get it all back. Every dollar collected in processing taxes goes to the farmer in benefit payments."

U.S. Dept. of Agriculture, The Processing Tax, p. 1: "Proceeds of processing taxes are passed to farmers as benefit payments."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The tax plays an indispensable part in the plan of regulation. As stated by the Agricultural Adjustment Administrator, it is "the heart of the law"; a means of "accomplishing one or both of two things intended to help farmers [97] attain parity prices and purchasing power." n7 A tax automatically goes into effect for a commodity when the Secretary of Agriculture determines that rental or benefit payments are to be made for reduction of production of that commodity. The tax is to cease when rental or benefit payments cease. The rate is fixed with the purpose of bringing about crop-reduction and price-raising. It is to equal the difference between the "current average farm price" and "fair exchange value." It may be altered to such amount as will prevent accumulation of surplus stocks. If the Secretary finds the policy of the act will not be promoted by the levy of the tax for a given commodity, he may exempt it. (§ 11.) The whole revenue from the levy is appropriated in aid of crop control; none of it is made available for general governmental use. The entire agricultural adjustment program embodied in Title I of the act is to become inoperative when, in the judgment of the President, the national economic emergency ends; and as to any commodity he may terminate the provisions of the law, if he finds them no longer requisite to carrying out the declared policy with respect to such commodity. (§ 13.)

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n7 U.S. Department of Agriculture, Agricultural Adjustment, p. 9.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [98]

The statute not only avows an aim foreign to the procurement of revenue for the support of government, but by its operation shows the exaction laid upon processors to be the necessary means for the intended control of agricultural production.

[*60] In these aspects the tax, so-called, closely resembles that laid by the Act of August 3, 1882, entitled "An Act to Regulate Immigration," which came before this court in the Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580. The statute directed that there should be levied, collected and paid a duty of fifty cents for each alien passenger who should come by vessel from a foreign port to one in the United States. Payment was to be made to the collector of the port by the master, owner, consignee or agent of the ship; the money was to be paid into the Treasury, was to be called the immigrant fund, and to be used by the Secretary of the [317] Treasury to defray the expense of regulating immigration, for the care of immigrants and relieving those in distress, and for the expenses of effectuating the act.

Various objections to the act were presented. In answering them the court said (p. 595):

"But the true answer to all these objections is that the power [99] exercised in this instance is not the taxing power. The burden imposed on the ship owner by this statute is the mere incident of the regulation of commerce -- of that branch of foreign commerce which is involved in immigration. . . ."

"It is true not much is said about protecting the ship owner. But he is the man who reaps the profit from the transaction,. . . The sum demanded of him is not, therefore, strictly speaking, a tax or duty within the meaning of the Constitution. The money thus raised, though paid into the Treasury, is appropriated in advance to the uses of the statute, and does not go to the general support of the government."

While there the exaction was sustained as an appropriate element in a plan within the power of Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations," no question was made of the standing of the shipowner to raise the question [*61] of the validity of the scheme and consequently of the exaction which was an incident of it.

REV_00259151

[2]
[3]
[4]
It is inaccurate and misleading to speak of the exaction from processors prescribed by the challenged act as a tax, or to say that as a tax it is subject to no infirmity. A tax, in the general understanding of the term, [100] and as used in the Constitution, signifies an exaction for the support of the Government. The word has never been thought to connote the expropriation of money from one group for the benefit of another. We may concede that the latter sort of imposition is constitutional when imposed to effectuate regulation of a matter in which both groups are interested and in respect of which there is a power of legislative regulation. But manifestly no justification for it can be found unless as an integral part of such regulation. The exaction cannot be wrested out of its setting, denominated an excise for raising revenue and legalized by ignoring its purpose as a mere instrumentality for bringing about a desired end. To do this would be to shut our eyes to what all others than we can see and understand. Child Labor Tax Case, 259 U.S. 20, 37.

[5]
We conclude that the act is one regulating agricultural production; that the tax is a mere incident of such regulation and that the respondents have standing to challenge the legality of the exaction.

It does not follow that as the act is not an exertion of the taxing power and the exaction not a true tax, the statute is void or the exaction [101] uncollectible. For, to paraphrase what was said in the Head Money Cases (supra), p. 596, if this is an expedient regulation by Congress, of a subject within one of its granted powers, "and the end to be attained is one falling within that power, the act is not void, because, within a loose and more extended sense than was used in the Constitution," the exaction is called a tax.

[*62] Second. The Government asserts that even if the respondents may question the propriety of the appropriation embodied in the statute their attack must fail because Article I, § 8 of the Constitution authorizes the contemplated expenditure of the funds raised by the tax. This contention presents the great and the controlling question in the case. n8 We approach its decision with a sense of our grave responsibility [318] to render judgment in accordance with the principles established for the governance of all three branches of the Government.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 Other questions were presented and argued by counsel, but we do not consider or decide them. The respondents insist that the act in numerous respects delegates legislative power to the executive contrary to the principles announced in Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388, and Schechter Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495; that this unlawful delegation is not cured by the amending act of August 24, 1935; that the exaction is in violation of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment since the legislation takes their property for a private use; that the floor tax is a direct tax and therefore void for lack of apportionment amongst the states, as required by Article I, § 9; and that the processing tax is wanting in uniformity and so violates Article I, § 8, clause one, of the Constitution.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [102]

[6]
[7]
There should be no misunderstanding as to the function of this court in such a case. It is sometimes said that the court assumes a power to overrule or control the action of the people's representatives. This is a misconception. The Constitution is the supreme law of the land ordained and established by the people. All legislation must conform to the principles it lays down. When an act of Congress is appropriately challenged in the courts as not conforming to the constitutional mandate the judicial branch of the Government has only one duty, -- to lay the article of the Constitution which is invoked beside the statute which is challenged and to decide whether the latter squares with the former. All the court does, or can do, is to announce its considered judgment upon the question. [*63] The only power it has, if such it may be called, is the power of judgment. This court neither approves nor condemns any legislative policy. Its delicate and difficult office is to ascertain and declare whether the legislation is in accordance with, or in contravention of, the provisions of the Constitution; and, having done that, its duty ends. n9

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n9 Compare Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U.S. 52, 544; Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 488.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [103]

[8]
The question is not what power the Federal Government ought to have but what powers in fact have been given by the people. It hardly seems necessary to reiterate that ours is a dual form of government; that in every state there are two governments, -- the state and the United States. Each State has all governmental powers save such as the people, by their Constitution, have conferred upon the United States, denied to the States, or reserved to themselves. The federal union is a government of delegated powers. It has only such as are expressly conferred upon it and such as are reasonably to be implied from those granted. In this respect we differ radically from nations where all legislative power, without restriction or limitation, is vested in a parliament or other legislative body subject to no restrictions except the discretion of its members.

Article I, § 8, of the Constitution vests sundry powers in the Congress. But two of its clauses have any bearing upon the validity of the statute under review.

The third clause endows the Congress with power "to regulate Commerce. . . among the several States," Despite a reference in its first section to a burden upon, and an obstruction [104] of the normal currents of commerce, the act under review does not purport to regulate transactions in interstate or foreign n10 commerce. Its stated purpose [*64] is the control of agricultural production, a purely local activity, in an effort to raise the prices paid the farmer. Indeed, the Government does not attempt to uphold the validity of the act on the basis of the commerce clause, which, for the purpose of the present case, may be put aside as irrelevant.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 The enactment of protective tariff laws has its basis in the power to regulate foreign commerce. See Board of Trustees of the University of Illinois v. United States, 289 U.S. 48, 58.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[9]
The clause thought to authorize the legislation, -- the first, -- confers upon the Congress power "to lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States. . . ." It is not contended that this provision grants power to regulate agricultural production upon the theory [105] that such legislation would promote the general welfare. The Government concedes that the phrase "to provide for the general welfare" qualifies the power "to lay and collect taxes." The view that the clause grants power to provide for the general welfare, independently of the taxing power, has never been authoritatively accepted. Mr. Justice Story points out that if it were adopted "it is obvious that under color of the generality of the words, to 'provide for the common defence and general welfare,' the government of the United States is, in reality, a government of general and unlimited powers, notwithstanding the subsequent enumeration of specific powers." n11 The true construction undoubtedly is that the only thing granted [319] is the power to tax for the purpose of providing funds for payment of the nation's debts and making provision for the general welfare.

REV_00259153

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n11 Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, 5th ed., ol. I, § 907.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Nevertheless the Government asserts that warrant is found in this [106] clause for the adoption of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The argument is that Congress may appropriate and authorize the spending of moneys for the "general welfare"; that the phrase should be liberally [*65] construed to cover anything conducive to national welfare; that decision as to what will promote such welfare rests with Congress alone, and the courts may not review its determination; and finally that the appropriation under attack was in fact for the general welfare of the United States.

[10]
[11]
The Congress is expressly empowered to lay taxes to provide for the general welfare. Funds in the Treasury as a result of taxation may be expended only through appropriation. (Art. I, § 9, cl. 7.) They can never accomplish the objects for which they were collected unless the power to appropriate is as broad as the power to tax. The necessary implication from the terms of the grant is that the public funds may be appropriated "to provide for the general welfare of the United States." These words cannot be meaningless, else they would not have been used. The conclusion must be that they were intended to limit and define the granted power to raise and to expend money. How shall they [107] be construed to effectuate the intent of the instrument?

[12]
Since the foundation of the Nation sharp differences of opinion have persisted as to the true interpretation of the phrase. Madison asserted it amounted to no more than a reference to the other powers enumerated in the subsequent clauses of the same section; that, as the United States is a government of limited and enumerated powers, the grant of power to tax and spend for the general national welfare must be confined to the enumerated legislative fields committed to the Congress. In this view the phrase is mere tautology, for taxation and appropriation are or may be necessary incidents of the exercise of any of the enumerated legislative powers. Hamilton, on the other hand, maintained the clause confers a power separate and distinct from those later enumerated, is not restricted in meaning by the grant of them, and Congress consequently has a substantive power to tax and to appropriate, [*66] limited only by the requirement that it shall be exercised to provide for the general welfare of the United States. Each contention has had the support of those whose views are entitled to weight. This court has noticed the question, [108] but has never found it necessary to decide which is the true construction. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries, espouses the Hamiltonian position. n12 We shall not review the writings of public men and commentators or discuss the legislative practice. Study of all these leads us to conclude that the reading advocated by Mr. Justice Story is the correct one. While, therefore, the power to tax is not unlimited, its confines are set in the clause which confers it, and not in those of § 8 which bestow and define the legislative powers of the Congress. It results that the power of Congress to authorize expenditure of public moneys for public purposes is not limited by the direct grants of legislative power found in the Constitution.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n12 Loc. cit. Chapter XIV, passim.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

But the adoption of the broader construction leaves the power to spend subject to limitations.

As Story says:

"The Constitution was, from its very origin, contemplated to be the frame of a national government, of special and enumerated [109] powers, and not of general and unlimited powers." n13

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n13 Loc. cit. § 909.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Again he says:

"A power to lay taxes for the common defence and general welfare of the United States is not in common sense a general power. It is limited to those objects. It cannot constitutionally transcend them." n14

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n14 Loc. cit. § 922.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

That the qualifying phrase must be given effect all advocates of broad construction admit. Hamilton, in his [*67] well known Report on Manufactures, states that the purpose must be "general, and not local." n15 Monroe, an advocate of Hamilton's doctrine, wrote: "Have Congress a right to raise and appropriate the money to any and to every purpose according to their will and pleasure? They certainly [320] have not." n16 Story says that if the tax be not proposed for the common defence or general welfare, but for other objects wholly extraneous, it would be wholly indefensible upon constitutional principles. [110] n17 And he makes it clear that the powers of taxation and appropriation extend only to matters of national, as distinguished from local welfare.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n15 Works, Vol. III, p. 250.

n16 Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, Vol. II, p. 167.

n17 Loc. cit. p. 673.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[13]
[14]
[15]
As elsewhere throughout the Constitution the section in question lays down principles which control the use of the power, and does not attempt meticulous or detailed directions. Every presumption is to be indulged in favor of faithful compliance by Congress with the mandates of the fundamental law. Courts are reluctant to adjudge any statute in contravention of them. But, under our frame of government, no other place is provided where the citizen may be heard to urge that the law fails to conform to the limits set upon the use of a granted power. When such a contention comes here we naturally require a showing that by no reasonable possibility can the challenged legislation fall within the wide range of discretion permitted to the Congress. How great is the extent of that range, when the subject is the promotion [111] of the general welfare of the United States, we hardly need remark. But, despite the breadth of the legislative discretion, our duty to hear and to render judgment remains. If the statute plainly violates the stated principle of the Constitution we must so declare.

[*68]

[16]
We are not now required to ascertain the scope of the phrase "general welfare of the United States" or to determine whether an appropriation in aid of agriculture falls within it. Wholly apart from that question, another principle embedded in our Constitution prohibits the enforcement of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The act invades the reserved rights of the states. It is a statutory plan to regulate and control agricultural production, a matter beyond the powers delegated to the federal government. The tax, the appropriation of the funds raised, and the direction for their disbursement, are but parts of the plan. They are but means to an unconstitutional end.

From the accepted doctrine that the United States is a government of delegated powers, it follows that those not expressly granted, or reasonably to be implied from such as are conferred, are reserved to the states or to the people. To forestall [112] any suggestion to the contrary, the Tenth Amendment was adopted. n18 The same proposition, otherwise stated, is that powers not granted are prohibited. None to regulate agricultural production is given, and therefore legislation by Congress for that purpose is forbidden.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n18 The Tenth Amendment declares: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[17]
It is an established principle that the attainment of a prohibited end may not be accomplished under the pretext of the exertion of powers which are granted.

"Should Congress, in the execution of its powers, adopt measures which are prohibited by the constitution; or should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the government; it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision [*69] come before it, to say that such an act was not the [113] law of the land." McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 423.

"Congress cannot, under the pretext of executing delegated power, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not entrusted to the Federal Government. And we accept as established doctrine that any provision of an act of Congress ostensibly enacted under power granted by the Constitution, not naturally and reasonably adapted to the effective exercise of such power but solely to the achievement of something plainly within power reserved to the States, is invalid and cannot be enforced." Linder v. United States, 268 U.S. 5, 17.

These principles are as applicable to the power to lay taxes as to any other federal power.

REV_00259156

COURTS, §95
duty to declare unconstitutionality of statute. --

Headnote: [15]
If a statute plainly violates the Constitution, it is the duty of the court so to declare.

STATES, §31
reserved powers -- encroachment upon by Federal Agricultural Adjustment Act. --

Headnote: [16]
The Federal Agricultural Adjustment Act of May 12, 1933, in setting up a plan to regulate and control agricultural production, unconstitutionally invades the reserved rights of the states.

UNITED STATES, §14
powers of Congress -- attainment of prohibited end by indirection. --

Headnote: [17]
The attainment by Congress of a prohibited end may not be accomplished under the pretext of the assertion of powers which are granted.

TAXES, §5
validity of tax imposed for ulterior purpose. --

Headnote: [18]
While the power of taxation may be adopted as the means to carry into operation another power also expressly granted, resort to the taxing power to effectuate an end which is not within the scope of the Constitution is inadmissible.

INTERNAL REVENUE, §4 exercise of taxing power to purchase compliance with regulation beyond power of Congress. --

Headnote: [19]
The taxing power may not be employed to raise money to purchase or to enforce by economic pressure a compliance with a congressional regulation of a matter with respect to which Congress has no authority.

PUBLIC MONEY, §2 contract to compensate agriculturalists for reduction of acreage as justifying appropriation. --

Headnote: [20]
Contracts with agriculturalists for the reduction of acreage and the control of production, being outside the range of Federal power, cannot justify appropriations and expenditures for such purpose.

Said the court, in McCulloch v. Maryland, supra, 421:

"Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and [321] spirit of the constitution, are constitutional."

[18]
The power of taxation, which is expressly granted, may, of course, be adopted as a means to carry into operation another power also expressly granted. But resort to the taxing [114] power to effectuate an end which is not legitimate, not within the scope of the Constitution, is obviously inadmissible.

"Congress is not empowered to tax for those purposes which are within the exclusive province of the States." Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 199.

"There are, indeed, certain virtual limitations, arising from the principles of the Constitution itself. It would undoubtedly be an abuse of the [taxing] power if so exercised as to impair the separate existence and independent self-government of the States or if exercised for ends [*70] inconsistent with the limited grants of power in the Constitution." Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 541.

In the Child Labor Tax Case, 259 U.S. 20, and in Hill v. Wallace, 259 U.S. 44, this court had before it statutes which purported to be taxing measures. But their purpose was found to be to regulate the conduct of manufacturing and trading, not in interstate commerce, but in the states, -- matters not within any power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution -- and the levy of the tax a means to force compliance. The court held this was not a constitutional use, but an unconstitutional abuse [115] of the power to tax. In Linder v. United States, supra, we held that the power to tax could not justify the regulation of the practice of a profession, under the pretext of raising revenue. In United States v. Constantine, 296 U.S. 287, we declared that Congress could not, in the guise of a tax, impose sanctions for violation of state law respecting the local sale of liquor. These decisions demonstrate that Congress could not, under the pretext of raising revenue, lay a tax on processors who refuse to pay a certain price for cotton, and exempt those who agree so to do, with the purpose of benefiting producers.

[19]
Third. If the taxing power may not be used as the instrument to enforce a regulation of matters of state concern with respect to which the Congress has no authority to interfere, may it, as in the present case, be employed to raise the money necessary to purchase a compliance which the Congress is powerless to command? The Government asserts that whatever might be said against the validity of the plan if compulsory, it is constitutionally sound because the end is accomplished by voluntary co-operation. There are two sufficient answers to the contention. [116] The regulation is not in fact voluntary. The farmer, of course, may refuse to comply, but the price of such refusal is the loss of benefits. The amount offered is intended to be sufficient to exert pressure on him to [*71] agree to the proposed regulation. n19 The power to confer or withhold unlimited benefits is the power to coerce or destroy. If the cotton grower elects not to accept the benefits, he will receive less for his crops; hose who receive payments will be able to undersell him. The result may well be financial ruin. The coercive purpose and intent of the statute is not obscured by the fact that it has not been perfectly successful. It is pointed out that, because there still remained a minority whom the rental and benefit payments were insufficient to induce to surrender their independence of action, the Congress has gone further and, in the Bankhead Cotton Act, used the taxing power in a more directly minatory fashion to compel submission. This progression only serves more fully to expose the coercive purpose of the so-called tax imposed by the present act. It [322] is clear that the Department of Agriculture has properly described the plan as one to keep a non-cooperating [117] minority in line. This is coercion by economic pressure. The asserted power of choice is illusory.

REV_00259157

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n19 U.S. Dept. of Agriculture, Agricultural Adjustment, p. 9. "Experience of cooperative associations and other groups has shown that without such Government support, the efforts of the farmers to band together to control the amount of their product sent to market are nearly always brought to nothing. Almost always, under such circumstances, there has been a noncooperating minority, which, refusing to go along with the rest, has stayed on the outside and tried to benefit from the sacrifices the majority has made. . . . It is to keep this noncooperating minority in line, or at least prevent it from doing harm to the majority, that the power of the Government has been marshaled behind the adjustment programs."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In Frost Trucking Co. v. Railroad Comm'n, 271 U.S. 583, a state act was considered which provided for supervision and regulation of transportation for hire by automobile on the public highways. Certificates [118] of convenience and necessity were to be obtained by persons desiring to use the highways for this purpose. The regulatory [*72] commission required that a private contract carrier should secure such a certificate as a condition of its operation. The effect of the commission's action was to transmute the private carrier into a public carrier. In other words, the privilege of using the highways as a private carrier for compensation was conditioned upon his dedicating his property to the quasi-public use of public transportation. While holding that the private carrier was not obliged to submit himself to the condition, the commission denied him the privilege of using the highways if he did not do so. The argument was, as here, that the carrier had a free choice. This court said, in holding the act as construed unconstitutional:

"If so, constitutional guaranties, so carefully safeguarded against direct assault, are open to destruction by the indirect but no less effective process of requiring a surrender, which, though, in form voluntary, in fact lacks none of the elements of compulsion. Having regard to form alone, the act here is an offer to the private carrier of a privilege, [119] which the state may grant or deny, upon a condition, which the carrier is free to accept or reject. In reality, the carrier is given no choice, except a choice between the rock and the whirlpool, -- an option to forego a privilege which may be vital to his livelihood or submit to a requirement which may constitute an intolerable burden." (p. 593.)

But if the plan were one for purely voluntary co-operation it would stand no better so far as federal power is concerned. At best it is a scheme for purchasing with federal funds submission to federal regulation of a subject reserved to the states.

[20]
It is said that Congress has the undoubted right to appropriate money to executive officers for expenditure under contracts between the government and individuals; that much of the total expenditures is so made. But appropriations and expenditures under contracts for proper [*73] governmental purposes cannot justify contracts which are not within federal power. And contracts for the reduction of acreage and the control of production are outside the range of that power. An appropriation to be expended by the United States under contracts calling for violation of a state law clearly would [120] offend the Constitution. Is a statute less objectionable which authorizes expenditure of federal moneys to induce action in a field in which the United States has no power to intermeddle? The Congress cannot invade state jurisdiction to compel individual action; no more can it purchase such action.

We are referred to numerous types of federal appropriation which have been made in the past, and it is asserted no question has been raised as to their validity. We need not stop to examine or consider them. As was said in Massachusetts v. Mellon, supra (p. 487):

". . . as an examination of the acts of Congress will disclose, a large number of statutes appropriating or involving the expenditure of moneys for non-federal purposes have been enacted and carried into effect."

As the opinion points out, such expenditures have not been challenged because no remedy was open for testing their constitutionality in the courts.

We are not here concerned with a conditional appropriation of money, nor with a provision that if certain conditions are not complied with the appropriation shall no longer be available. By the Agricultural Adjustment Act the amount of the tax is appropriated [121] to be expended only in payment under contracts whereby the parties bind themselves to regulation by the Federal Government. There is an obvious difference between a statute stating the conditions upon which moneys shall be expended and one effective only upon assumption of a contractual obligation to submit to a regulation which otherwise could not be enforced. Many examples pointing the distinction might be cited. We are [323] referred to appropriations in aid [*74] of education, and it is said that no one has doubted the power of Congress to stipulate the sort of education for which money shall be expended. But an appropriation to an educational institution which by its terms is to become available only if the beneficiary enters into a contract to teach doctrines subversive of the Constitution is clearly bad. An affirmance of the authority of Congress so to condition the expenditure of an appropriation would tend to nullify all constitutional limitations upon legislative power.

But it is said that there is a wide difference in another respect, between compulsory regulation of the local affairs of a state's citizens and the mere making of a contract relating to their conduct; [122] that, if any state objects, it may declare the contract void and thus prevent those under the state's jurisdiction from complying with its terms. The argument is plainly fallacious. The United States can make the contract only if the federal power to tax and to appropriate reaches the subject matter of the contract. If this does reach the subject matter, its exertion cannot be displaced by state action. To say otherwise is to deny the supremacy of the laws of the United States; to make them subordinate to those of a State. This would reverse the cardinal principle embodied in the Constitution and substitute one which declares that Congress may only effectively legislate as to matters within federal competence when the States do not dissent.

[21]
Congress has no power to enforce its commands on the farmer to the ends sought by the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It must follow that it may not indirectly accomplish those ends by taxing and spending to purchase compliance. The Constitution and the entire plan of our government negative any such use of the power to tax and to spend as the act undertakes to authorize. It does not help to declare that local conditions throughout the nation [123] have created a situation of national concern; for this [*75] is but to say that whenever there is a widespread similarity of local conditions, Congress may ignore constitutional limitations upon its own powers and usurp those reserved to the states. If, in lieu of compulsory regulation of subjects within the states' reserved jurisdiction, which is prohibited, the Congress could invoke the taxing and spending power as a means to accomplish the same end, clause 1 of § 8 of Article I would become the instrument for total subversion of the governmental powers reserved to the individual states.

If the act before us is a proper exercise of the federal taxing power, evidently the regulation of all industry throughout the United States may be accomplished by similar exercises of the same power. It would be possible to exact money from one branch of an industry and pay it to another branch in every field of activity which lies within the province of the states. The mere threat of such a procedure might well induce the surrender of rights and the compliance with federal regulation as the price of continuance in business. A few instances will illustrate the thought.

Let us suppose [124] Congress should determine that the farmer, the miner or some other producer of raw materials is receiving too much for his products, with consequent depression of the processing industry and idleness of its employes. Though, by confession, there is no power vested in Congress to compel by statute a lowering of the prices of the raw material, the same result might be accomplished, if the questioned act be valid, by taxing the producer upon his output and appropriating the proceeds to the processors, either with or without conditions imposed as the consideration for payment of the subsidy.

We have held in Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, that Congress has no power to regulate wages and hours of labor in a local business. If the petitioner is right, this very end may be accomplished by [*76] appropriating money to be paid to employers from the federal treasury under contracts whereby they agree to comply with certain standards fixed by federal law or by contract.

Should Congress ascertain that sugar refiners are not receiving a fair profit, and that this is detrimental to the entire industry, and in turn has its repercussions in trade and commerce [125] generally, it might, in analogy to the present law, impose an excise of two cents a pound on every sale of the commodity and pass the funds collected to such refiners, and such only, as will agree to maintain a certain price.

[324] Assume that too many shoes are being manufactured throughout the nation; that the market is saturated, the price depressed, the factories running half-time, the employes suffering. Upon the principle of the statute in question Congress might authorize the Secretary of Commerce to enter into contracts with shoe manufacturers providing that each shall reduce his output and that the United States will pay him a fixed sum proportioned to such reduction, the money to make the payments to be raised by a tax on all retail shoe dealers or their customers.

Suppose that there are too many garment workers in the large cities; that this results in dislocation of the economic balance. Upon the principle contended for an excise might be laid on the manufacture of all garments manufactured and the proceeds paid to those manufacturers who agree to remove their plants to cities having not more than a hundred thousand population. Thus, through the asserted power of taxation, [126] the federal government, against the will of individual states, might completely redistribute the industrial population.

A possible result of sustaining the claimed federal power would be that every business group which thought itself under-privileged might demand that a tax be laid on its vendors or vendees, the proceeds to be appropriated to the redress of its deficiency of income.

[*77] These illustrations are given, not to suggest that any of the purposes mentioned are unworthy, but to demonstrate the scope of the principle for which the Government contends; to test the principle by its applications; to point out that, by the exercise of the asserted power, Congress would, in effect, under the pretext of exercising the taxing power, in reality accomplish prohibited ends. It cannot be said that they envisage improbable legislation. The supposed cases are no more improbable than would the present act have been deemed a few years ago.

Until recently no suggestion of the existence of any such power in the Federal Government has been advanced. The expressions of the framers of the Constitution, the decisions of this court interpreting that instrument, and the writings of [127] great commentators will be searched in vain for any suggestion that there exists in the clause under discussion or elsewhere in the Constitution, the authority whereby every provision and every fair implication from that instrument may be subverted, the independence of the individual states obliterated, and the United States converted into a central government exercising uncontrolled police power in every state of the Union, superseding all local control or regulation of the affairs or concerns of the states.

REV_00259160

Hamilton himself, the leading advocate of broad interpretation of the power to tax and to appropriate for the general welfare, never suggested that any power granted by the Constitution could be used for the destruction of local self-government in the states. Story countenances no such doctrine. It seems never to have occurred to them, or to those who have agreed with them, that the general welfare of the United States, (which has aptly been termed "an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States,") might be served by obliterating the constituent members of the Union. But to this fatal conclusion [*78] the doctrine contended for would inevitably lead. And its [128] sole premise is that, though the makers of the Constitution, in erecting the federal government, intended sedulously to limit and define its powers, so as to reserve to the states and the people sovereign power, to be wielded by the states and their citizens and not to be invaded by the United States, they nevertheless by a single clause gave power to the Congress to tear down the barriers, to invade the states' jurisdiction, and to become a parliament of the whole people, subject to no restrictions save such as are self-imposed. The argument when seen in its true character and in the light of its inevitable results must be rejected.

[22]
Since, as we have pointed out, there was no power in the Congress to impose the contested exaction, it could not lawfully ratify or confirm what an executive officer had done in that regard. Consequently the Act of 1935 does not affect the rights of the parties.

The judgment is Affirmed.

DISSENTBY: ~~STONE~~

DISSENT: MR. JUSTICE STONE, dissenting.

I think the ~~judgment should~~ be reversed.

[325] The present stress of widely held and strongly expressed differences of opinion of the wisdom of the Agricultural Adjustment Act makes it important, in the interest of clear thinking [129] and sound result, to emphasize at the outset certain propositions which should have controlling influence in determining the validity of the Act. They are:

1. The power of courts to declare a statute unconstitutional is subject to two guiding principles of decision which ought never to be absent from judicial consciousness. One is that courts are concerned only with the power to enact statutes, not with their wisdom. The other is that while unconstitutional exercise of power [*79] by the executive and legislative branches of the government is subject to judicial restraint, the only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint. For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government.

2. The constitutional power of Congress to levy an excise tax upon the processing of agricultural products is not questioned. The present levy is held invalid, not for any want of power in Congress to lay such a tax to defray public expenditures, including those for the general welfare, but because the use to which its proceeds are put is disapproved.

3. As the present [130] depressed state of agriculture is nation wide in its extent and effects, there is no basis for saying that the expenditure of public money in aid of farmers is not within the specifically granted power of Congress to levy taxes to "provide for the . . . general welfare." The opinion of the Court does not declare otherwise.

4. No question of a variable tax fixed from time to time by fiat of the Secretary of Agriculture, or of unauthorized delegation of legislative power, is now presented. The schedule of rates imposed by the Secretary in accordance with the original command of Congress has since been specifically adopted and confirmed by Act of Congress, which has declared that it shall be the lawful tax. Act of August 24, 1935, 49 Stat. 750. That is the tax which the government now seeks to collect. Any defects there may have been in the manner of laying the tax by the Secretary have now been removed by the exercise of the power of Congress to pass a curative statute validating an intended, though defective, tax. United States v. Heinszen & Co., 206 U.S. 370; Graham & Foster v. Goodcell, 282 U.S. 409; cf. Milliken v. United States, 283 U.S. 15. The [131] Agricultural Adjustment Act as thus amended declares [*80] that none of its provisions shall fail because others are pronounced invalid.

REV_00259161

It is with these preliminary and hardly controverted matters in mind that we should direct our attention to the pivot on which the decision of the Court is made to turn. It is that a levy unquestionably within the taxing power of Congress may be treated as invalid because it is a step in a plan to regulate agricultural production and is thus a forbidden infringement of state power. The levy is not any the less an exercise of taxing power because it is intended to defray an expenditure for the general welfare rather than for some other support of government. Nor is the levy and collection of the tax pointed to as effecting the regulation. While all federal taxes inevitably have some influence on the internal economy of the states, it is not contended that the levy of a processing tax upon manufacturers using agricultural products as raw material has any perceptible regulatory effect upon either their production or manufacture. The tax is unlike the penalties which were held invalid in the Child Labor Tax Case, 259 U.S. 20, in Hill [132] v. Wallace, 259 U.S. 44, in Linder v. United States, 268 U.S. 5, 17, and in United States v. Constantine, 296 U.S. 287, because they were themselves the instruments of regulation by virtue of their coercive effect on matters left to the control of the states. Here regulation, if any there be, is accomplished not by the tax but by the method by which its proceeds are expended, and would equally be accomplished by any like use of public funds, regardless of their source.

The method may be simply stated. Out of the available fund payments are made to such farmers as are willing to curtail their productive acreage, who in fact do so and who in advance have filed their written undertaking to do so with the Secretary of Agriculture. In saying that this [326] method of spending public moneys is an invasion of the reserved powers of the states, the Court does not assert [*81] that the expenditure of public funds to promote the general welfare is not a substantive power specifically delegated to the national government, as Hamilton and Story pronounced it to be. It does not deny that the expenditure of funds for the benefit of farmers and in aid of a program of curtailment [133] of production of agricultural products, and thus of a supposedly better ordered national economy, is within the specifically granted power. But it is declared that state power is nevertheless infringed by the expenditure of the proceeds of the tax to compensate farmers for the curtailment of their cotton acreage. Although the farmer is placed under no legal compulsion to reduce acreage, it is said that the mere offer of compensation for so doing is a species of economic coercion which operates with the same legal force and effect as though the curtailment were made mandatory by Act of Congress. In any event it is insisted that even though not coercive the expenditure of public funds to induce the recipients to curtail production is itself an infringement of state power, since the federal government cannot invade the domain of the states by the "purchase" of performance of acts which it has no power to compel.

Of the assertion that the payments to farmers are coercive, it is enough to say that no such contention is pressed by the taxpayer, and no such consequences were to be anticipated or appear to have resulted from the administration of the Act. The suggestion of coercion [134] finds no support in the record or in any data showing the actual operation of the Act. Threat of loss, not hope of gain, is the essence of economic coercion. Members of a long depressed industry have undoubtedly been tempted to curtail acreage by the hope of resulting better prices and by the proffered opportunity to obtain needed ready money. But there is nothing to indicate that those who accepted benefits were impelled by fear of lower prices if they did not accept, or that at any stage in the operation [*82] of the plan a farmer could say whether, apart from the certainty of cash payments at specified times, the advantage would lie with curtailment of production plus compensation, rather than with the same or increased acreage plus the expected rise in prices which actually occurred. Although the Agricultural Adjustment Act was put into operation in June, 1933, the official reports of the Department of Agriculture show that 6,343,000 acres of productive cotton land, 14% of the total, did not participate in the plan in 1934, and 2,790,000 acres, 6% of the total, did not participate in 1935. Of the total number of farms growing cotton, estimated at 1,500,000, 33% in 1934 [135] and 13% in 1935 did not participate.

REV_00259162

It is significant that in the congressional hearings on the bill that became the Bankhead Act, 48 Stat. 598, as amended by Act of June 20, 1934, 48 Stat. 1184, which imposes a tax of 50% on all cotton produced in excess of limits prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, there was abundant testimony that the restriction of cotton production attempted by the Agricultural Adjustment Act could not be secured without the coercive provisions of the Bankhead Act. See Hearing before Committee on Agriculture, U.S. Senate, on S. 1974, 73rd Cong., 2nd Sess:, Hearing before Committee on Agriculture, U.S. House of Representatives, on H.R. 8402, 73rd Cong., 2nd Sess. The Senate and House Committees so reported, Senate Report No. 283, 73rd Cong., 2nd Sess., p. 3; House Report No. 867, 73rd Cong., 2nd Sess., p. 3. The Report of the Department of Agriculture on the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act (February 15, 1934 to December 31, 1934), p. 50, points out that the Bankhead Act was passed in response to a strong sentiment in favor of mandatory production control "that would prevent noncooperating farmers from increasing their own plantings [136] in order to capitalize upon the price advances that had resulted from the reductions made by contract [*83] signers." n1 The presumption of constitutionality of a statute is not to be overturned by an assertion of its coercive effect which rests on nothing more substantial than groundless speculation.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 Whether coercion was the sole or the dominant purpose of the Bankhead Act, or whether the act was designed also for revenue or other legitimate ends, there is no occasion to consider now.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

It is upon the contention that state power [327] is infringed by purchased regulation of agricultural production that chief reliance is placed. It is insisted that, while the Constitution gives to Congress, in specific and unambiguous terms, the power to tax and spend, the power is subject to limitations which do not find their origin in any express provision of the Constitution and to which other expressly delegated powers are not subject.

The Constitution requires that public funds shall be spent for a defined purpose, the promotion [137] of the general welfare. Their expenditure usually involves payment on terms which will insure use by the selected recipients within the limits of the constitutional purpose. Expenditures would fail of their purpose and thus lose their constitutional sanction if the terms of payment were not such that by their influence on the action of the recipients the permitted end would be attained. The power of Congress to spend is inseparable from persuasion to action over which Congress has no legislative control. Congress may not command that the science of agriculture be taught in state universities. But if it would aid the teaching of that science by grants to state institutions, it is appropriate, if not necessary, that the grant be on the condition, incorporated in the Morrill Act, 12 Stat. 503, 26 Stat. 417, that it be used for the intended purpose. Similarly it would seem to be compliance with the Constitution, not violation of it, for the government to take and the university to give a contract that the grant would be so used. It makes no difference [*84] that there is a promise to do an act which the condition is calculated to induce. Condition and promise are alike valid [138] since both are in furtherance of the national purpose for which the money is appropriated.

These effects upon individual action, which are but incidents of the authorized expenditure of government money, are pronounced to be themselves a limitation upon the granted power, and so the time-honored principle of constitutional interpretation that the granted power includes all those which are incident to it is reversed. "Let the end be legitimate," said the great Chief Justice, "let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 421. This cardinal guide to constitutional exposition must now be re-phrased so far as the spending power of the federal government is concerned. Let the expenditure be to promote the general welfare, still, if it is needful in order to insure its use for the intended purpose to influence any action which Congress cannot command because within the sphere of state government, the expenditure is unconstitutional. And taxes otherwise lawfully [139] levied are likewise unconstitutional if they are appropriated to the expenditure whose incident is condemned.

Congress through the Interstate Commerce Commission has set aside intrastate railroad rates. It has made and destroyed intrastate industries by raising or lowering tariffs. These results are said to be permissible because they are incidents of the commerce power and the power to levy duties on imports. See Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U.S. 352; Shreveport Case, 234 U.S. 342; Board of Trustees of the University of Illinois v. United States, 289 U.S. 48. The only conclusion to be drawn is that results [*85] become lawful when they are incidents of those powers but unlawful when incident to the similarly granted power to tax and spend.

Such a limitation is contradictory and destructive of the power to appropriate for the public welfare, and is incapable of practical application. The spending power of Congress is in addition to the legislative power and not subordinate to it. This independent grant of the power of the purse, and its very nature, involving in its exercise the duty to insure expenditure within the granted power, presuppose freedom of selection [140] among divers ends and aims, and the capacity to impose such conditions as will render the choice effective. It is a contradiction in terms to say that there is power to spend for the national welfare, while rejecting any power to impose conditions reasonably adapted to the [328] attainment of the end which alone would justify the expenditure.

The limitation now sanctioned must lead to absurd consequences. The government may give seeds to farmers, but may not condition the gift upon their being planted in places where they are most needed or even planted at all. The government may give money to the unemployed, but may not ask that those who get it shall give labor in return, or even use it to support their families. It may give money to sufferers from earthquake, fire, tornado, pestilence or flood, but may not impose conditions -- health precautions designed to prevent the spread of disease, or induce the movement of population to safer or more sanitary areas. All that, because it is purchased regulation infringing state powers, must be left for the states, who are unable or unwilling to supply the necessary relief. The government may spend its money for vocational rehabilitation, [141] 48 Stat. 389, but it may not, with the consent of all concerned, supervise the process which it undertakes to aid. It may spend its money for the suppression of the boll weevil, but may [*86] not compensate the farmers for suspending the growth of cotton in the infected areas. It may aid state reforestation and forest fire prevention agencies, 43 Stat. 653, but may not be permitted to supervise their conduct. It may support rural schools, 39 Stat. 929, 45 Stat. 1151, 48 Stat. 792, but may not condition its grant by the requirement that certain standards be maintained. It may appropriate moneys to be expended by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation "to aid in financing agriculture, commerce and industry," and to facilitate "the exportation of agricultural and other products." Do all its activities collapse because, in order to effect the permissible purpose, in myriad ways the money is paid out upon terms and conditions which influence action of the recipients within the states, which Congress cannot command? The answer would seem plain. If the expenditure is for a national public purpose, that purpose will not be thwarted because payment is on condition which will advance [142] that purpose. The action which Congress induces by payments of money to promote the general welfare, but which it does not command or coerce, is but an incident to a specifically granted power, but a permissible means to a legitimate end. If appropriation in aid of a program of curtailment of agricultural production is constitutional, and it is not denied that it is, payment to farmers on condition that they reduce their crop acreage is constitutional. It is not any the less so because the farmer at his own option promises to fulfill the condition.

That the governmental power of the purse is a great one is not now for the first time announced. Every student of the history of government and economics is aware of its magnitude and of its existence in every civilized government. Both were well understood by the framers of the Constitution when they sanctioned the grant of the spending power to the federal government, and both were recognized by Hamilton and Story, whose views of the [*87] spending power as standing on a parity with the other powers specifically granted, have hitherto been generally accepted.

The suggestion that it must now be curtailed by judicial fiat because [143] it may be abused by unwise use hardly rises to the dignity of argument. So may judicial power be abused. "The power to tax is the power to destroy," but we do not, for that reason, doubt its existence, or hold that its efficacy is to be restricted by its incidental or collateral effects upon the states. See Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533; McCray v. United States, 195 U.S. 27; compare Magnano Co. v. Hamilton, 292 U.S. 40. The power to tax and spend is not without constitutional restraints. One restriction is that the purpose must be truly national. Another is that it may not be used to coerce action left to state control. Another is the conscience and patriotism of Congress and the Executive. "It must be remembered that legislators are the ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts." Justice Holmes, in Missouri, Kansas & Texas Ry. Co. v. May, 194 U.S. 267, 270.

A tortured construction of the Constitution is not to be justified by recourse to extreme examples of reckless congressional [329] spending which might occur if courts could not prevent -- expenditures which, even if they could [144] be thought to effect any national purpose, would be possible only by action of a legislature lost to all sense of public responsibility. Such suppositions are addressed to the mind accustomed to believe that it is the business of courts to sit in judgment on the wisdom of legislative action. Courts are not the only agency of government that must be assumed to have capacity to govern. Congress and the courts both unhappily may falter or be mistaken in the performance of their constitutional duty. But interpretation of our great charter of government which proceeds on any assumption that the responsibility for the preservation of our institutions is the exclusive [*88] concern of any one of the three branches of government, or that it alone can save them from destruction is far more likely, in the long run, "to obliterate the constituent members" of "an indestructible union of indestructible states" than the frank recognition that language, even of a constitution, may mean what it says: that the power to tax and spend includes the power to relieve a nationwide economic maladjustment by conditional gifts of money.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS and MR. JUSTICE CARDOZO join in [145] this opinion.

Service: LEXSEE®
Citation: 297 us 1
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, April 21, 2001 - 12:03 AM EDT

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

STATES, §16
reserved powers -- widespread similarity of conditions cannot justify Federal encroachment upon reserved powers of states. --

Headnote: [21]
A widespread similarity of local conditions cannot confer upon Congress powers reserved to the states by the Federal Constitution.

UNITED STATES, §14
powers of Congress -- ratification of acts of executive officer. --

Headnote: [22]
Where there is no power in Congress to impose an exaction, it cannot lawfully ratify or confirm the imposition of such exaction by an executive officer.

SYLLABUS: 1. Processors of farm products have a standing to question the constitutionality of the "processing and floor-stock taxes" sought to be laid upon them by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of May 12, 1933, 48 Stat. 31. Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, distinguished. P. 57.

2. A tax, in the general understanding and in the strict constitutional sense, is an exaction for the support of Government; the term does not connote the expropriation of money from one group to be expended for another, as a necessary means in a plan of regulation, such as the plan for regulating agricultural production set up in the Agricultural Adjustment Act. P. 61.

3. In testing the validity of the "processing tax," it is impossible to wrest it from its setting and treat it apart as a mere excise for raising revenue. P. 58.

4. From the conclusion that the exaction is not a true tax it does not necessarily follow that the statute is void and the exaction uncollectible, if the regulation, of which the exaction is a part, is within any of the powers granted to Congress. P. 61.

5. The Constitution is the supreme law of [2] the land, ordained and established by the people, and all legislation must conform to the principles it lays down. P. 62.

6. It is a misconception to say that, in declaring an Act of Congress unconstitutional, the Court assumes a power to overrule or control the action of the people's representatives. P. 62.

7. When an Act of Congress is appropriately challenged in a court, it is the duty of the court to compare it with the article of the Constitution which is invoked and decide whether it conforms to that article. P. 62.

8. All that the court does or can do in such cases is to announce its considered judgment upon the question; it can neither approve nor condemn any legislative policy; it can merely ascertain and declare whether the legislation is in accordance with, or in contravention of, the provisions of the Constitution. P. 62.

9. The question in such cases is not what powers the Federal Government ought to have, but what powers have in fact been given it by the people. P. 63.

10. Ours is a dual form of government; in every State there are two Governments -- the State and the United States; each State has all governmental powers, save such as the people, [3] by the Constitution, have conferred upon the United States, denied to the States, or reserved to themselves. P. 63.

11. The Government of the United States is a Government of delegated powers; it has only such powers as are expressly conferred upon it by the Constitution and such as are reasonably to be implied from those expressly granted. P. 63.

12. The Agricultural Adjustment Act does not purport to regulate transactions in interstate or foreign commerce; and the Government in this case does not attempt to sustain it under the commerce clause of the Constitution. P. 63.

13. In Article I, § 8, cl. 1 of the Constitution, which provides that Congress shall have power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States," the phrase "to provide for the general welfare" is not an independent provision empowering Congress generally to provide for the general welfare, but is a qualification defining and limiting the power "to lay and collect taxes," etc. P. 64.

14. The power to appropriate money from the Treasury (Constitution, Art. I, § 9, cl. 7) is as broad as the power to [4] tax; and the power to lay taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States implies the power to appropriate public funds for that purpose. P. 65.

15. The power to tax and spend is a separate and distinct power; its exercise is not confined to the fields committed to Congress by the other enumerated grants of power; but it is limited by the requirement that it shall be exercised to provide for the general welfare of the United States. P. 65.

16. The Court is not required in this case to ascertain the scope of the phrase "general welfare of the United States," or to determine whether an appropriation in aid of agriculture falls within it. P. 68.

17. The plan of the Agricultural Adjustment Act is to increase the prices of certain farm products for the farmer by decreasing the quantities produced; the decrease is to be attained by making payments of money to farmers who, under agreements with the Secretary of Agriculture, reduce their acreage and crops; and the money for this purpose is exacted, as a tax, from those who first process the commodities. Held:

(1) The Act invades the reserved powers of the States. P. 68.

(2) Regulation and control of agricultural [5] production are beyond the powers delegated to the Federal Government. P. 68.

(3) The tax, the appropriation of the funds raised, and the direction for their disbursement, are but parts of the plan -- the means to an unconstitutional end. P. 68.

(4) The power of taxation, which is expressly granted to Congress, may be adopted as a means to carry into operation another power also expressly granted; but not to effectuate an end which is not within the scope of the Constitution. P. 69.

(5) The regulation of the farmer's activities under the statute, though in form subject to his own will, is in fact coercion through economic pressure; his right of choice is illusory. P. 70.

(6) Even if the farmer's consent were purely voluntary, the Act would stand no better. At best it is a scheme for purchasing with federal funds submission to federal regulation of a subject reserved to the States. P. 72.

REV_00259123

(7) The right to appropriate and spend money under contracts for proper governmental purposes cannot justify contracts that are not within federal power. P. 72.

(8) Congress cannot invade state jurisdiction by purchasing the action of individuals any more than by compelling it. [6] P. 73.

(9) There is an obvious difference between a statute stating the conditions upon which moneys shall be expended and one effective only upon the assumption of a contractual obligation to submit to a regulation which otherwise could not be enforced. P. 73.

(10) Owing to the supremacy of the United States, if the contracts with farmers contemplated by the Agricultural Adjustment Act were within the federal power to make, the States could not declare them void or prevent compliance with their terms. P. 74.

(11) Existence of a situation of national concern resulting from similar and widespread local conditions cannot enable Congress to ignore the constitutional limitations upon its own powers and usurp those reserved to the States. P. 74.

(12) If the novel view of the General Welfare Clause now advanced in support of the tax were accepted, that clause would not only enable Congress to supplant the States in the regulation of agriculture and of all other industries as well, but would furnish the means whereby all of the other provisions of the Constitution, sedulously framed to define and limit the powers of the United States and preserve the powers of the States, could [7] be broken down, the independence of the individual States obliterated, and the United States converted into a central government exercising uncontrolled police power throughout the Union superseding all local control over local concerns. P. 75.

(13) Congress, being without power to impose the contested exaction, could not lawfully ratify the acts of an executive officer in assessing it. P. 78.

78 F. (2d) 1, affirmed.

CERTIORARI, 296 U.S. 561, to review a decree which reversed an order of the District Court (Franklin Process Co. v. Hoosac Mills Corp., 8 F. Supp. 552), directing the receivers of Hoosac Mills, a cotton milling corporation, to pay claims of the United States for processing and floor taxes on cotton, levied under §§ 9 and 16 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of May 12, 1933. The opinion of this Court begins on p. 53, post; the dissenting opinion on p. 78.

COUNSEL: Solicitor General Reed, orally, after stating the case:

The conditions to which power is addressed are always to be considered when the exercise of power is challenged, -- extraordinary conditions may call for extraordinary remedies; but, as the Court has said, "the argument necessarily stops [8] short of an attempt to justify action which lies outside the sphere of constitutional authority. Extraordinary conditions do not create or enlarge constitutional power." Home Building & Loan Assn. v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398; Schechter Case, 295 U.S. 495.

In the effort to meet the emergencies arising during this depression, we have proceeded under that view of the law; and we do not now contend that the extraordinary conditions give rise to anything more than an opportunity to use extraordinary remedies; but, of course, such remedies as flow from the language of the Constitution as it has been interpreted by this Court.

The Government, in legislating in regard to the depression, was quick to ratify actions that had been taken without clear, specific Congressional authority. The Court will recall that the first ratification by the Congress was as to the closing of the banks, which had been done under a statute conferring that authority, but in terms making ratification advisable. Further, there was an abrogation of the gold clause. There were Acts directed to the relief of distress. Others authorized lending to the home-owner, through the Home Owners Loan Corporation; [9] to the farmer, through the Farm Credit Corporation; and to banks and industry, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

REV_00259124

As a part of this concerted effort to bring about recovery, the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed. It should not, however, be approached as an emergency measure, nor as a measure that came into consideration because of the present emergency. Rather should we bear in mind that since the 68th Congress at least, the House and the Senate and the Executive have been giving careful attention to the problem of agricultural surpluses.

Eight times have acts been reported by the Agricultural Committee of the House, and ten times by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate. The House has rejected two and passed five. The Senate has rejected two and passed four. It is recalled, of course, that the McNary-Haugen Act was twice vetoed by President Coolidge, that the Federal Farm Board Act was approved by President Hoover, and the Agricultural Adjustment Act by President Roosevelt.

We have a long history of Legislative and Executive consideration of the problem of agricultural surplus. There were innumerable acts that dealt with other agricultural [10] difficulties, rather than the surplus as such. But it was the mounting supply of the great staple, nonperishable, agricultural commodities that demanded the attention of the Legislature and of the Executive, and that has received the attention of the courts throughout those years.

I need refer only to the Cooperative Marketing Acts passed by States, complemented by acts of Congress, which had for an end not only an orderly marketing of commodities but an endeavor to bring about an adjustment of supply and demand and a hoped-for diminution of a burdensome surplus. They did not achieve that result.

The Federal Farm Board Act, 46 Stat. 11, 12 U.S.C. § 1141, while providing for loans to cooperatives that complied with the Capper-Volstead Act, 42 Stat. 388, 7 U.S.C. §§ 291, 292, also contemplated a control of production of cotton and wheat through stabilization corporations. I mean the handling of the surplus, as distinct from a control of the actual growth of the commodity. . . .

The present Act is comprehensive. The title probably gives as accurate a reflection of its purposes as any statement of mine could do.

I might say parenthetically that this act in separate titles dealt [11] with the Farm Credit Administration and the establishment of the Farm Loan Bank Corporation, through which two billion dollars was loaned to agriculture.

The Act opens with a declaration of emergency, and passes on to a declaration of policy. A cursory reading will show that this declaration of policy, while it follows in form and in location in the Act declarations of policy that this Court considered in Panama Rfg. Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388, and in Schechter v. United States, is entirely distinct. It is a great deal more than a hope of what may happen, and will become important as an actual standard of what Congress sought from the passage of this legislation, and of what discretion it gave to its chosen instruments for carrying that out.

The essence of the declaration is that Congress hopes to re-establish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power, with respect to articles that farmers buy, equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period. For the purpose of this commodity and of all others, I believe, except tobacco, the base period was fixed as August, 1909, to July, 1914. [12] . . .

REV_00259125

After this declaration of policy, the Act points out what is to be done to effectuate it. Part 2 relates to the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to achieve this standard which Congress has laid down. Section 8 gives to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to provide for reduction in the acreage or reduction in the production for market, or both, of any basic agricultural commodity through agreements with producers or by other voluntary methods, and to provide for rental or benefit payments in connection therewith. . . .

This case involves the floor-stock tax, together with the processing tax. The processing tax is covered by § 9 of the Act. Section 9(a) provides the action that puts the tax into effect, and § 9(b) declares what that tax shall be:

"The processing tax shall be at such rate as equals the difference between the current average farm price for the commodity and the fair exchange value of the commodity,". . .

The current farm price for the commodity is a figure determined by the Department of Agriculture. The determination involves many different commodities, but includes all of those which are basic agricultural commodities under this Act. Prices [13] of farm commodities have been determined and published by the Secretary of Agriculture for at least twenty years.

The exchange value of the commodity is defined in § 9 (c) of the Act, and is -- "the price therefor that will give the commodity the same purchasing power, with respect to articles farmers buy, as such comodity had during the base period specified in § 2."

That means that the value or farm price would need to be increased according to the rising scale of prices for articles that farmers bought. Both of those factors had been used by the Department of Agriculture for many years. . . .

The collection of the tax is left to the Collector of Internal Revenue in the usual form, and an appropriation is made to carry out the purposes of the Act. The appropriation, I am sure, will be found important because it clearly answers the contention that this tax was wholly for the purpose of rental and benefit payments.

By § 12 one hundred million dollars are appropriated "For administrative expenses under this title and for rental and benefit payments made with respect to reduction in acreage." It also appropriated "The proceeds derived from all taxes imposed under this title. [14] . . to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for expansion of markets and removal of surplus agricultural products and the following purposes under Part 2 of this title: Administrative expenses, rental and benefit payments, and refunds on taxes."

There has been no adjustment of the tax rates in respect to cotton. No question is here as to refunds of the tax, nor of amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act. We do not conceive that the amendments (passed in August, 1935, 49 Stat. 750) have any effect upon the present case, unless the Court should determine that the old Act, the first Act, does not properly delegate to the officers of the Government discretion to handle the duties imposed upon them, and in that case there has been a ratification of the action of the officers, so that the tax is now authorized not only by the discretion of the administrative officers, but by the amendatory legislation.

The license taxes are in and of themselves a revenue measure; they are levied as an excise on the processing of the commodity, and for that reason are to be collected without regard to the purposes for which they are to be spent, inasmuch as they go into the Treasury of [15] the United States, together with other funds that were appropriated by the same section, and become there a part of the revenue of the Government.

n100 The Shreveport Rate Case, 234 U.S. at 351 (citation omitted).

n101 See infra notes 185-234 and accompanying text.

n102 188 U.S. 321 (1903). The appellants attempted as an initial maneuver to keep the case outside the commerce clause altogether, by arguing that lottery tickets were not articles of commerce at all, but were instead "mere evidences of contract made wholly within the boundaries of a State, which contracts are valid or invalid according to the municipal law of the State where made or attempted to be enforced." Id. at 327. This argument seems weak. If the writing has a tangible form, and if the ticket can be bought or sold, then something, rather than nothing, is working its way through the channels of interstate commerce.

n103 Id. at 327.

n104 See id. at 353-54.

n105 See supra note 14.

n106 See U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 1 ("The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person."). Clearly any regulation that made it impossible to import slaves (note the euphemism in the text) into the United States was prohibited as well. For the vexed relationship of this clause to the commerce power, see Berns, The Constitution and the Migration of Slaves, 78 Yale L.J. 198 (1968). Note, however, that although the commerce clause might have given Congress the power to regulate (or even prohibit) the slave trade, it did not give it the power to regulate the position of the slaves located within the state, much less to prohibit slavery.

n107 This argument was well made by the appellant's counsel in oral argument. Champion, 188 U.S. at 329-30 (argument of appellant). There the point was limited to the transfer of "promissory notes, of deed, of bonds, of contracts for personal services, etc." Id. In principle, however, it could extend to the underlying goods shipped in interstate commerce as well.

n108 The principle states that "a state is without power to impose an unconstitutional requirement as a condition for granting a privilege." Frost & Frost Trucking Co. v. Railroad Comm'n, 271 U.S. 583, 598 (1926). The most exhaustive treatment of the subject is found in Kreimer, Allocation Sanctions: The Problem of Negative Rights in a Positive State, 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1293 (1984). I have addressed the use of the doctrine of unconstitutional conditions in the context of eminent domain in Epstein, Takings: Descent and Resurrection, 1986 Sup. Ct. Rev. (forthcoming).

n109 This connection between the commerce clause and the fifth amendment was noted by counsel for appellees in Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 (1917), who insisted that there was a higher level of judicial review under the commerce clause. See id. at 267.

n110 Champion, 188 U.S. at 374 (Fuller, C.J., dissenting).

n111 See U.S. Const. art. VI.

n112 For a checkered history of lotteries passing in and out of favor in one state, see Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U.S. 814 (1881).

n113 See, e.g., Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905) (upholding compulsory vaccination); Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623, 674 (1887) (upholding prohibition of alcoholic beverages); Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 65 (1905) (Harlan, J., dissenting from holding that New York could not limit bakers' working hours).

n114 See Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U.S. 678, 683-87 (1888) (upholding prohibition of manufacture or sale of margarine).

n115 See, e.g., Adair v. United States, 208 U.S. 161 (1908) (upholding freedom of contract between employer and employee); Smyth v. Ames, 169 U.S. 466 (1898) (holding confiscatory state railroad rate regulations to be violations of the 14th amendment); Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U.S. 45, 58-70 (1908) (Harlan, J., dissenting) (criticizing racial segregation).

n116 Champion, 188 U.S. at 356.

n117 Id.

n118 See Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470 (1917); Hoke v. United States, 227 U.S. 308, 322 (1913) (noting the link between the police power and the commerce clause).

n119 See Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U.S. 45 (1911). Hipolite was confined to "illicit articles -- articles which the law seeks to keep out of commerce because, they are debased by adulteration," id. at 57, and which were "at their point of destination in the original, unbroken packages," id. at 58.

n120 247 U.S. 251 (1918).

n121 Act of Sept. 1, 1916, ch. 432, 39 Stat. 675. This act prohibited all labor by children under 14, and allowed children between the ages of 14 and 16 to work only eight-hour days, six days per week.

n122 Hammer, 247 U.S. at 272.

n123 156 U.S. 1 (1895); see infra notes 141-58 and accompanying text.

n124 Hammer, 247 U.S. at 271.

n125 Id.

n126 Id. at 273-74.

n127 Justice Day wrote:

There is no power vested in Congress to require the States to exercise their police power so as to prevent possible unfair competition. Many causes may cooperate to give one State, by reason of local laws or conditions, an economic advantage over others. The Commerce Clause was not intended to give to Congress a general authority to equalize such conditions.
Id. at 273.

n128 Id. at 281 (Holmes, J., dissenting).

n129 See Northern Secs. Co. v. United States, 193 U.S. 197, 402-03 (1904) (Holmes, J., dissenting).

n130 Hammer, 247 U.S. at 277.

n131 See id. at 276-77.

n132 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

REV_00259168

n133 Hammer, 247 U.S. at 256-57 (argument of appellant).

n134 Id. at 275 ("That such employment [e.g., child labor] is generally deemed to require regulation is shown by the fact that the brief of counsel states that every State in the Union has a law upon the subject, limiting the right to thus employ children.").

n135 Hammer, 247 U.S. at 268-69 n.1.

n136 "That there should be limitations upon the right to employ children in mines and factories in the interest of their own and the public welfare, all will admit." Id. at 275.

n137 See L. Wilder, Farmer Boy (1933).

n138 See I. Howe, The World of Our Fathers (1976). Howe's book is notable for its discussion of the unintended harmful consequences of turn-of-the-century social legislation on the very people it was supposed to protect. Howe himself is a social democrat who supports such legislation, but his accounts reveal his obvious sense of puzzlement about the issue, although he was not moved to change his substantive positions. See, e.g., id. at 150-53 (discussing the mixed results of housing legislation in New York, including the 1901 statute that forbade further construction of the so-called "dumbbell" tenements).

n139 See, e.g., the account of the police power given in New York Cent. R.R. v. White, 243 U.S. 188, 207 (1917).

n140 See supra notes 74-101 and accompanying text.

n141 156 U.S. 1 (1895).

n142 Ch. 647, 26 Stat. 209 (1980) (current version at 15 U.S.C. §§ 1-8 (1982)).

n143 E. C. Knight, 156 U.S. at 9.

n144 Id. at 16-17.

n145 Id. at 12-13.

n146 Id. at 18 (Harlan, J., dissenting).

n147 See id. at 12-13.

n148 Id. at 35-36 (Harlan, J., dissenting).

n149 See id. at 12, 36-37 (Harlan, J., dissenting).

n150 See supra note 87 and accompanying text.

n151 Justice Harlan wrote:

> If this combination, so far as its operations necessarily or directly affect interstate commerce, cannot be restrained or suppressed under some power granted to Congress, it will be cause for regret that the patriotic statesmen who framed the Constitution did not foresee the necessity of investing the national government with power to deal with gigantic monopolies holding in their grasp, and injuriously controlling in their own interest, the entire trade among the States in food products that are essential to the comfort of every household in the land.
> E. C. Knight, 156 U.S. at 19 (Harlan, J., dissenting).

REV_00259169

n152 Id. at 13.

n153 Id.

n154 Id. at 15-16.

n155 175 U.S. 211 (1899).

n156 198 U.S. 45 (1905). Yet Justice Peckham did not simply use "freedom of contract" as a phrase to conceal all understanding of regulatory issues. In Addyston Pipe, for example, he was explicit about the limits of freedom of contract in its constitutional guise:

It has been held that the word "liberty," as used in the Constitution, was not to be confined to the mere liberty of person, but included, among others, a right to enter into certain classes of contracts for the purpose of enabling the citizen to carry on his business. But it has never been, and in our opinion ought not to be, held that the word included the right of an individual to enter into private contracts upon all subjects, no matter what their nature and wholly irrespective (among other things) of the fact that they would, if performed, result in the regulation of interstate commerce and in the violation of an act of Congress upon that subject.
Addyston Pipe, 175 U.S. at 228-29 (citation omitted).

The passage is odd in the sense that it treats private contracts as the equivalent of public regulation, and because it inverts the relationship between constitutional principle and legislative action. But otherwise stated, the principle of freedom of contract does not protect contracts in restraint of trade. The explanation for the distinction lies in the external effects of two kinds of contracts. Contracts in restraint of trade may well have negative, systematic, economic effects; ordinary commercial contracts have positive systematic effects. The issue could be understood, although it was not by Justice Peckham, in terms of the just compensation requirements associated with limitation of both contract and property rights. See R. Epstein, Takings: Private Property and the Power of Eminent Domain 202-03 (1985).

n157 See Addyston Pipe, 175 U.S. at 248.

n158 Id. at 226-27.

n159 193 U.S. 197 (1904).

n160 See id. at 327-28.

n161 Id. at 402 (Holmes, J., dissenting).

n162 Id. at 402-03 (Holmes, J., dissenting) (citation omitted).

n163 196 U.S. 375 (1905).

n164 Id. at 388.

n165 Id. at 397.

n166 258 U.S. 495, 517 (1922) ("The judgment in [Swift] gives a clear and comprehensive exposition which leaves to us in this case little but the obvious application of the principles there declared.").

n167 262 U.S. 1, 35 (1923) ("[Swift] merely fitted the commerce clause to the real and practical essence of modern business growth. It applies to the case before us just as it did in [Stafford].").

n168 Ch. 64, 42 Stat. 159 (current version at 7 U.S.C. §§ 181-231 (1982)).

n169 Stafford, 258 U.S. at 514.

n170 Id. at 513-14.

n171 Id. at 515-16.

n172 Ch. 369, 42 Stat. 998 (1922) (current version codified as part of the Commodity Exchange Act, 7 U.S.C. §§ 1-24 (1982 & Supp. III 1985)).

n173 Olsen, 262 U.S. at 32.

n174 Chief Justice Taft wrote:

The railroads of the country accommodate themselves to the interstate function of the Chicago market by giving shippers from western States bills of lading through Chicago . . . for temporary purposes of storing, inspecting, weighing, grading, or mixing, and changing the ownership, consignee or destination and then to continue the shipment under the same contract and at a through rate. . . . The fact that the grain shipped from the west and taken from the cars may have been stored in warehouses and mixed with other grain, so that the owner receives other grain when presenting his receipt for continuing the shipment, does not take away from the interstate character of the through shipment . . . .
Id. at 33-34.

n175 295 U.S. 495 (1935).

n176 Id. at 521, 547, 551 (citing the National Industrial Recovery Act, ch. 90, 48 Stat. 195 (1933)).

n177 298 U.S. 238 (1936).

n178 Ch. 824, 49 Stat. 991 (1935).

n179 Carter, 298 U.S. at 239.

n180 Id. at 305.

n181 Id. at 308.

n182 See supra notes 60-61 and accompanying text.

n183 Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 25, 271 (1918); see supra notes 120-40.

n184 See G. Gunther, Constitutional Law 128-30 (11th ed. 1985).

n185 301 U.S. 1 (1937). Companion cases to Jones & Laughlin were NLRB v. Friedman-Harry Marks Clothing Co., 301 U.S. 58 (1937), and NLRB v. Fruehauf Trailer Co., 301 U.S. 49 (1937).

n186 Ch. 372, 49 Stat. 449 (1935) (current version at 29 U.S.C. §§ 151-169 (1982 & Supp. III 1985)).

n187 See id. § 8(a)(5), 29 U.S.C. § 158 (a)(5).

n188 See id. § 9(a), 29 U.S.C. § 159 (a).

REV_00259171

n189 See J.I. Case Co. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 332 (1944).

n190 Id. at 450.

n191 See supra notes 35-59 and accompanying text.

n192 See supra notes 141-83 and accompanying text.

n193 See supra notes 93-101 and accompanying text.

n194 "There would appear to be no difference in the constitutional power to protect interstate commerce against unduly high prices, as in the Sherman Act, and excessively low prices, as in the New Deal legislation." Stern, supra note 32, at 651. The economic error is to think that prices, rather than economic structure, are the source of any misallocation of resources.

n195 See Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 188 (1824).

n196 See Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238 (1936); E.C. Knight Co. v. United States, 156 U.S. 1 (1895).

n197 See NLRB v. Fruehauf Trailer Co., 85 F.2d 391 (6th Cir. 1936), rev'd, 301 U.S. 49 (1937); NLRB v. Friedman-Harry Marks Clothing Co., 85 F.2d 1 (2d Cir. 1936), rev'd, 301 U.S. 58 (1937); NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 83 F.2d 998 (5th Cir. 1936), rev'd, 301 U.S. 1 (1937). The circuit opinions were reprinted in full in Justice McReynolds' dissent to all three of these cases. See Labor Board Cases, 301 U.S. 76, 79-84 (1937) (McReynolds, J., dissenting).

n198 Carter, 298 U.S. at 308-09.

n199 Jones & Laughlin, 301 U.S. at 37; see Carter, 298 U.S. at 317 (Cardozo, J., dissenting).

n200 See Jones & Laughlin, 301 U.S. at 36-37 (quoting Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U.S. 1, 47 (1911); The Daniel Ball, 77 U.S. (10 Wall.) 557, 564 (1870)).

n201 Jones & Laughlin, 301 U.S. at 34-35 (quoting the government's argument).

n202 Chief Justice Hughes wrote:

The authority of the federal government may not be pushed to such an extreme as to destroy the distinction, which the commerce clause itself establishes, between commerce "among the several States" and the internal concerns of a State. That distinction between what is national and what is local in the activities of commerce is vital to the maintenance of our federal system.
Id. at 30.

n203 NLRB v. Fruehauf Co., 301 U.S. 49, 50 (1937).

n204 NLRB v. Friedman-Harry Marks Clothing Co., 301 U.S. 58, 73 (1937).

n205 The Court in Friedman-Harry Marks wrote:

With effective competition between the industry's enterprises an accepted fact regardless of location, and bearing in mind the purpose and effect of the migration of enterprises, it seems unavoidable that the members of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers should, as they do, regard the industry as one whose economic organization is not based on the interests of each individual enterprise, but is one in which union conditions, to be maintained at all, must prevail generally.

Id. at 59.

n206 312 U.S. 100 (1941).

n207 Ch. 676, 52 Stat. 1060 (1938) (current version at 29 U.S.C. §§ 201-209 (1982 & Supp. III 1985)).

n208 Darby, 312 U.S. at 102 (the government's argument).

n209 Id. at 115.

n210 Id.

n211 Id. at 121.

n212 Id. at 109 n.1. Justice Stone's version of The Shreveport Rate Case, 234 U.S. 342 (1914), was adopted by Justice Jackson in Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 123-34 (1942). See infra notes 221-26 and accompanying text.

n213 Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 281 (1918) (Holmes, J., dissenting).

n214 See Darby, 312 U.S. at 115.

n215 Id. at 124.

n216 See id. at 122.

n217 Id.

n218 315 U.S. 110 (1942).

n219 See id. at 116 (quoting the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, ch. 296, 50 Stat. 246 (current version at scattered sections of 7 U.S.C. (1982 & Supp. III 1985))).

n220 Id. at 120.

n221 317 U.S. 111 (1942).

n222 See id. at 120.

n223 See id.

n224 The Shreveport Rate Case, 234 U.S. 342 (1914).

n225 Wickard, 317 U.S. at 123 (quoting The Shreveport Rate Case, 234 U.S. at 351).

n226 The Shreveport Rate Case, 234 U.S. at 351. Professor Tribe's rendition of the The Shreveport Rate Case's sentence suppresses this first clause as well, with the exception of keeping the word "control" and dropping the words "their operations in." Tribe, supra note 28, § 5-4, at 235 (quoting The Shreveport Rate Case, 234 U.S. at 351).

n227 See supra notes 13-16 and accompanying text.

n228 Descriptively, one reason why there is little federal regulation of land use, for example, is that the markets for land tend to be more local than national. For these markets federal regulation is of little assistance, so regulation is apt to take place at the local level. But where the economics change, as with strip-mining, the regulation becomes federal. For my views on how the eminent domain clause of the fifth amendment, as applied to both federal and state governments, should function, see R. Epstein, supra note 156; Epstein, supra note 34.

n229 See, e.g., Wickard, 317 U.S. at 129-33; Darby, 312 U.S. at 125; Jones & Laughlin, 301 U.S. at 43-49. Wrightwood Dairy, 315 U.S. at 110, is an apparent exception, but only because the question whether the state could control the price of milk had already been resolved in favor of the state. See Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502 (1934).

n230 Professor Tribe has written that Hammer v. Dagenhart highlights the tension that existed between the Supreme Court's taxonomic approach to the commerce clause in the early 20th century -- an approach grounded in the theory of dual sovereignty and sustained by a faith in the market as the proper mechanism for distributing wealth -- and the increasingly undeniable consequences of economic interdependence.

Tribe, supra note 28, § 5-7, at 238 n.1. The word "creating" should be inserted in place of "distributing" to understand the economic case.

n231 Moreover, there is reason to fear local regulation that is designed to preclude external competition, as in Gibbons. Indeed, the great achievement of the commerce clause has been its negative side, which has precluded state regulation even when the federal government has not acted. Perhaps the ideal form of the commerce clause should have been negative:

"No state shall have any power to pass legislation that interferes with the freedom of commerce among the several states." There are of course difficulties to this proposal. For example, it makes any sensible response to the long-haul/short-haul problem difficult. The mischief of excessive federal action, however, is far greater.

n232 See Tullock, The Welfare Costs of Tariffs, Monopolies, and Theft, 5 W. Econ. J. 224, 232 (1967), for the first demonstration of the point. I have addressed some of these problems in Epstein, supra note 34.

n233 See supra note 62.

n234 For the modern analogue, see Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985), dealing with the ability of the federal government to regulate the states themselves under the commerce clause.

n235 See The Federalist No. 84 (A. Hamilton); supra notes 5-8 and accompanying text.

n236 See id.

n237 See R. Epstein, supra note 156, ch. 2.

Service: LEXSEE®
Citation: 73 Va. L. Rev. 1387
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, April 21, 2001 - 12:39 AM EDT

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Restatement of the Law, Second, Torts, section 908]

OA/NARA#: 1650/1518
9601

Box 51
Folder 3

REV_00259176

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Restatements > Torts > Restatement 2d, Torts - Rule Sections - Selected Documents ⓘ
TOC: Restatement 2d, Torts - Rule Sections > / . . . / > Topic 1- General Statements > § 908 Punitive Damages
Terms: No terms specified (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

Restatement of the Law, Second, Torts, § 908

Restatement of the Law, Second, Torts
Copyright (c) 1979, The American Law Institute

◆ Case Citations

Rules and Principles

Division 13 - Remedies

Chapter 47 - Damages

Topic 1 - General Statements

Restat 2d of Torts, § 908

§ 908 Punitive Damages

(1) Punitive damages are damages, other than compensatory or nominal damages, awarded against a person to punish him for his outrageous conduct and to deter him and others like him from similar conduct in the future.
(2) Punitive damages may be awarded for conduct that is outrageous, because of the defendant's evil motive or his reckless indifference to the rights of others. In assessing punitive damages, the trier of fact can properly consider the character of the defendant's act, the nature and extent of the harm to the plaintiff that the defendant caused or intended to cause and the wealth of the defendant.

COMMENTS & ILLUSTRATIONS: Comment:

a. Purpose. The purposes of awarding punitive damages, or "exemplary" damages as they are frequently called, are to punish the person doing the wrongful act and to discourage him and others from similar conduct in the future. Although the purposes are the same, the effect of a civil judgment for punitive damages is not the same at that of a fine imposed after a conviction of a crime, since the successful plaintiff and not the state is entitled to the money required to be paid by the defendant. The awarding of punitive damages is not prevented by a prior criminal conviction for the same act, which is relevant only to the amount of the award; nor does the granting of punitive damages prevent a subsequent criminal conviction.

Punitive damages are not awarded against the representatives of a deceased tortfeasor nor, ordinarily, in an action under a death statute. (See §§ 900 and 925).

In many states statutes have been enacted with reference to certain types of conduct, such as intentional trespass to land under the terms of which double or treble damages or designated amounts can be recovered. Punitive damages are to be distinguished from qui tam awards and civil penalties or forfeitures.

b. Character of defendant's conduct. Since the purpose of punitive damages is not compensation of the plaintiff but punishment of the defendant and deterrence, these damages can be awarded only for conduct for which this remedy is appropriate -- which is to say, conduct involving some element of outrage similar to that usually found in crime. The conduct must be outrageous, either because the defendant's acts are done with an evil motive or because they are done with reckless indifference to the rights of others. Although a defendant has inflicted no harm, punitive damages may be awarded because of, and measured by, his wrongful purpose or intent, as when he unsuccessfully makes a murderous assault upon the plaintiff, who suffers only a momentary apprehension. In all these cases, however, a cause of action for the particular tort must exist, at least for nominal damages. Reckless indifference to the rights of others and conscious action in deliberate disregard of them (see § 500) may provide the necessary state of mind to justify punitive damages.

REV_00259177

Punitive damages are not awarded for mere inadvertence, mistake, errors of judgment and the like, which constitute ordinary negligence. And they are not permitted merely for a breach of contract. When, however, the plaintiff has a right in the alternative to sue for a breach of contract or for a tort, the fact that his act or omission amounts to a breach of contract does not preclude the award of punitive damages if the action is brought for the tort and the tort is one for which punitive damages are proper.

c. Extent and nature of harm. In the earliest cases in which punitive damages were allowed, the plaintiffs suffered no substantial harm, or at least no physical or financial harm appeared. These were cases in which public officials were guilty of outrageously oppressive conduct. Punitive damages are today awarded when there is substantial harm and when there is none. Although as stated in Comment e, the extent of the harm may be considered in determining their amount, it is not essential to the recovery of punitive damages that the plaintiff should have suffered any harm, either pecuniary or physical.

Thus an award of nominal damages (see § 907) is enough to support a further award of punitive damages, when a tort, such as a trespass to land, is committed for an outrageous purpose, but no significant harm has resulted.

Compensatory damages in a trifling amount and substantial punitive damages in the same verdict are not necessarily inconsistent. It is essential, however, that facts be established that, apart from punitive damages, are sufficient to maintain a cause of action. Thus a nonharmful unauthorized dealing with another's chattel, if not amounting to a dispossession, does not give rise to a cause of action and the fact that it was done with a bad motive is immaterial. On the other hand, in torts like malicious prosecution that require a particular antisocial state of mind, the improper motive of the tortfeasor is both a necessary element in the cause of action and a reason for awarding punitive damages.

In many cases in which compensatory damages include an amount for emotional distress, such as humiliation or indignation aroused by the defendant's act, there is no clear line of demarcation between punishment and compensation and a verdict for a specified amount frequently includes elements of both.

d. Function of jury. Whether to award punitive damages and the determination of the amount are within the sound discretion of the trier of fact, whether judge or jury. It is error, however, for the trier of fact to award punitive damages if there has been no bad motive or wanton indifference. An instruction that the jury can award punitive damages in such a case followed by a verdict that indicates from its size that punitive damages have been awarded is ground for a new trial. On the other hand, the trier of fact is not required to award punitive damages in a case in which they are permissible, and it is error for a trial judge to instruct the jury that punitive damages must be given. The excessiveness of punitive damages in a case in which they are allowable may be ground for reversal, for a new trial, or for a remittitur under the usual rules by which the court controls the jury's award of compensatory damages.

REV_00259178

e. Amount of damages. In determining the amount of punitive damages, as well as in deciding whether they should be given at all, the trier of fact can properly consider not merely the act itself but all the circumstances including the motives of the wrongdoer, the relations between the parties and the provocation or want of provocation for the act. (See § 921). In addition, the extent of harm to the injured person can be considered by analogy to the doctrine of the criminal law by which the seriousness of a crime may depend upon the harm done, as when a battery with intent to kill results in mayhem or murder. Included in the harm to the plaintiff may be considered the fact that the plaintiff has been put to trouble and expense in the protection of his interests, as by legal proceedings in this or in other suits. (See § 914). The wealth of the defendant is also relevant, since the purposes of exemplary damages are to punish for a past event and to prevent future offenses, and the degree of punishment or deterrence resulting from a judgment is to some extent in proportion to the means of the guilty person.

Another factor that may affect the amount of punitive damages is the existence of multiple claims by numerous persons affected by the wrongdoer's conduct. It seems appropriate to take into consideration both thepunitive damages that have been awarded in prior suits and those that may be granted in the future, with greater weight being given to the prior awards. In a class action involving all claims, full assessment of the punitive damages can be made.

f. Criticisms and restrictions. The entire concept of punitive damages has been subjected to attack from some sources. Some states decline to award these damages in the absence of a statutory provision. Others insist that there must be significant compensatory damages in order to warrant their award and still others hold that they must be proportioned to compensatory damages in some appropriate ratio. In many states there has been a tightening of control by the appellate courts over discretion of the trier of fact.

Restrictive rules of substantive law have also developed in some states. Thus punitive damages are sometimes disallowed unless the defendant's conduct was "aimed at the public generally," and certain types of defendants, such as a governmental unit, may not be subject to them. Sometimes they are limited to the amount of counsel fees. Sometimes procedural techniques are utilized to prevent abuse of a claim for punitive damages when it becomes apparent that they are not warranted and the claim was made for the purpose of introducing prejudicial evidence that would otherwise not be admissible.

REPORTERS NOTES: This Section has been changed by adding the last clause in Subsection (1) and the first sentence in Subsection (2).

Comment a: Purpose. See generally, Johnson v. Husky Industries, 536 F.2d 645 (6th Cir. 1976); Ellis v. Zuck, 546 F.2d 643 (5th Cir. 1977); Knipper v. Ford Motor Co., 546 F.2d 993 (D.C.Cir. 1976); Northern v. McGraw-Edison Co., 542 F.2d 1336 (8th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1097, 97 S.Ct. 1115, 51 L.Ed.2d 544 (1977), reh'g denied, 430 U.S. 960, 97 S.Ct. 1612, 51 L.Ed.2d 812 (1977); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38 (Alaska 1979), mod'f, 615 P.2d 621 (1980); Anglo-American General Agents v. Jackson Nat'l Life Ins. Co., 83 F.R.D. 41 (N.D.Cal.1979); Hutchison v. Pyburn, 567 S.W.2d 762 (Tenn.App.1978).

Comment b: Character of defendant's conduct. See Johnson v. Husky Indus. Inc., 536 F.2d 645 (6th Cir. 1976); Birmingham Waterworks Co. v. Brooks, 16 Ala.App. 209, 76 So. 515 (1917), cert. denied, 200 Ala. 697, 76 So. 995 (1917); Eshelman v. Rawalt, 298 Ill. 192, 131 N.E. 675 (1921); Hintz v. Roberts, 98 N.J.L. 768, 121 A. 711 (1923); Cobb v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 175 N.C. 130, 95 S.E. 92 (1918); Gamble v. Keyes, 39 S.D. 592, 166 N.W. 134 (1917); Prince v. State Mut. Life Ins. Co., 77 S.C. 187, 57 S.E. 766 (1907) (fraudulent purpose).

On wilful or wanton conduct, see Dunn v. Koehring Co., 546 F.2d 1193 (5th Cir. 1977), mod'f on other grounds, 551 F.2d 73 (1977); Harris Lumber Co. v. Morris, 80 Ark. 260, 96 S.W.

REV_00259179

1067 (1906); Sistrunk & Co. v. Meisenheimer, 205 Ky. 254, 265 S.W. 467 (1924); Buford v. Hopewell, 140 Ky. 666, 131 S.W. 502 (1912); Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Owens, 95 So. 833 (Miss.1923); Reel v. Consolidated Inv. Co., 236 S.W. 43 (Mo.1921). A good opinion on this is Sebastian v. Wood, 246 Iowa 94, 66 N.W.2d 841 (1954); see also Allman v. Bird, 186 Kan. 802, 353 P.2d 216 (1960).

Gross negligence, in the sense merely of an extreme departure from ordinary care, is not enough. Moore v. Wilson, 180 Ark. 41, 20 S.W.2d 310 (1929). Cf. Rugg v. Tolman, 39 Utah 295, 117 P. 54 (1911).

Comment c: Extent and nature of harm. Many courts say that there must be compensatory damages to support an award of punitive damages. Aubertin v. Board of City Comm'rs, 588 F.2d 781 (10th Cir. 1978); Weider v. Hoffman, 238 F.Supp. 437 (M.D. Pa.1965); Stoner v. Houston, 265 Ark. 928, 582 S.W.2d 28 (1979); Brewer v. Second Baptist Church, 32 Cal.2d 791, 197 P.2d 713 (1948); Vice v. Automobile Club, 241 Cal.App.2d 759, 50 Cal.Rptr. 837 (1966); Miami Nat. Bank v. Sobel, 198 So.2d 841 (Fla.App. 1967); Syester v. Banta, 257 Iowa 613, 133 N.W.2d 666 (1965); Reeder v. Guaranteed Foods, Inc., 194 Kan. 386, 399 P. 2d 822 (1965); Stacy v. Portland Pub. Co., 68 Me. 279 (1878); Mississippi Power Co. v. Jones, 369 So.2d 1381 (Miss.1979); Scheid v. Pickham, 395 S.W.2d 166 (Mo.1965); Fort Worth Elevators Co. v. Russell, 123 Tex. 128, 70 S.W.2d 397 (1934); cf. Chuy v. Philadelphia Eagles Football Club, 595 F.2d 1265 (3rd Cir. 1979).

Some courts, insisting that there is a cause of action when there is actual injury but only nominal damages have been awarded, allow recovery of the punitive damages. Kelite Products, Inc. v. Binzel, 224 F.2d 131 (5th Cir. 1955); Wilson v. Vaughn, 23 F. 229 (10th Cir. 1885); Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Sellers, 93 Ala. 9, 9 So. 375 (1890); Muller v. Reagh, 150 Cal.App.2d 99, 309 P.2d 826 (1957); Sterling Drug Co. v. Benatar, 99 Cal.App.2d 393, 221 P.2d 965 (1950); Werschkull v. United California Bank, 85 Cal. App.3d 981, 149 Cal.Rptr. 829 (1978); Copeland v. Dunehoo, 36 Ga.App. 817, 138 S.E. 267 (1927); Crystal Dome Oil & Gas Co. v. Savic, 51 Idaho 409, 6 P.2d 155 (1931); Pringle Tax Service, Inc. v. Knoblauch, 282 N.W.2d 151 (Iowa 1979); State ex rel. St. Joseph Belt R. Co. v. Shain, 341 Mo. 733, 108 S.W.2d 351 (1937); Crawford v. Taylor, 58 N.M. 340, 270 P.2d 978 (1954); Underwriter's Laboratories, Inc. v. Smith, 41 Misc.2d 756, 246 N. Y.S.2d 436 (1964); Snyder v. Fatherly, 158 Va. 335, 163 S.E. 358 (1931).

Comment d: Function of jury. See Kelite Products, Inc. v. Binzel, 224 F.2d 131 (5 Cir. 1965); Collins v. Brown, 268 F.Supp. 198 (D.D.C.1967); Alabama Power Co. v. Rembert, 282 Ala. 5, 208 So.2d 205 (1968); Lindgren Plumbing Co. v. Doral Country Club, Inc., 196 So.2d 242 (Fla. App.1967); National Ass'n for A. C. P. v. Overstreet, 221 Ga. 16, 142 S.E.2d 816 (1965); Sebastian v. Wood, 246 Iowa 94, 66 N. W.2d 841 (1954); State ex rel. St. Joseph Belt R. Co. v. Shain, 341 Mo. 733, 108 S.W.2d 351 (1937).

On review of jury award, see Butcher v. Petranek, Mont. , 593 P.2d 743 (1979); Kraus v. Alamo Nat'l Bank of San Antonio, 586 S.W.2d 202 (Tex.Civ. App.1979); Malco v. Midwest Aluminum Sales, 14 Wis.2d 57, 109 N.W.2d 516 (1961).

On elements to be taken into consideration by the trier of fact in determining the measure of punitive damages, see Michael v. Cole, 122 Ariz. 450, 595 P.2d 995 (1979); Walker v. Signal Companies, Inc., 84 Cal.App.3d 982, 149 Cal.Rptr. 119 (1978); Arnold v. Sharpe, 37 N.C.App. 506, 246 S. E.2d 556 (1978) rev'd, 296 N.C. 533, 251 S.E.2d 452 (1979); Cooper v. Moscillo, 39 Or.App. 443, 592 P.2d 1034 (effect of previous criminal punishment); Kraus v. Alamo Nat'l Bank of San Antonio, 586 S.W.2d 202 (Tex.Civ.App.1979).

Comment e: Amount of damage. See Will v. Hughes, 172 Kan. 45, 238 P.2d 478 (1951); Edquest v. Tripp & Dragstedt Co., 93 Mont. 446, 19 P.2d 637 (1933); Beggs v. Universal C.I. T. Credit Corp., 409 S.W.2d 719 (Mo.1966); Gerharter v. Mitchellill, 157 S.W.2d 577

REV_00259180

(Mo.App. 1941); Hughes v. Babcock, 349 Pa. 475, 37 A.2d 551 (1944); Cain v. Fontana, 423 S.W.2d 134 (Tex.Civ.App.1967); Ostertag v. La Mont, 9 Utah 2d 130, 339 P.2d 1022 (1959); Wilson v. Oldroyd, 1 Utah 2d 362, 267 P.2d 759 (1954).

On punitive damages and multiple claims, see Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 838-40 (2 Cir.1967); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38 (Alaska 1979), mod'f, 615 P.2d 621 (1980); People v. Superior Court, 9 Cal.3d 283, 107 Cal.Rptr. 192, 507 P.2d 1400 (1973).

Comment f: Criticisms and restrictions. Punitive damages are not allowed in some states in the absence of statutory provision. See, e. g., Killebrew v. Abbott Labs., 359 So.2d 1275 (La.App. 1978); Boott Mills v. Boston & M.R.R. Co., 218 Mass. 582, 106 N. E. 680 (1914).

On appellate control of the amount, see Jones v. Fisher, 42 Wis.2d 209, 166 N.W.2d 175 (1969).

Punitive damages not allowed unless defendant's conduct aimed at the public generally. James v. Powell, 19 N.Y.2d 249, 279 N.Y. S.2d 10, 225 N.E.2d 714 (1967).

State not liable for punitive damages. McCandless v. State, 6 Misc.2d 391, 166 N.Y.S.2d 272 (1956), modified on other grounds, 3 A.D.2d 600, 162 N.Y. S.2d 570, aff'd, 4 N.Y.2d 797, 173 N.Y.S.2d 30, 149 N.E.2d 530 (1958). On liability of municipal corporation, see Eifert v. Bush, 27 A.D.2d 950, 279 N.Y.S.2d 368 (1967), aff'd, 22 N.Y.2d 681, 291 N.Y.S.2d 372, 238 N.E.2d 759 (1968).

Law reviews: See K. Redden, Punitive Damages (1980); Hodgin & Veitch, Punitive Damages Reassessed, 21 Int. & Comp.L.Q. 119 (1972); Mallor & Roberts, Punitive Damages: Toward a Principled Approach, 31 Hastings L.J. 639 (1980); Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 Harv.L.Rev. 1173 (1931); Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich.L. Rev. 1257 (1976); Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U.Chi.L. Rev. 1 (1982); Notes, 70 Harv. L.Rev. 517 (1957), 55 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 303 (1980).

CROSS REFERENCES: ALR Annotations:

Assault: Criminal liability as barring or mitigating recovery of punitive damages. 98 A.L.R.3d 870.
Defendant's state of mind necessary or sufficient to warrant award of punitive damages in action for malicious prosecution. 94 A.L.R.3d 791.
Defendant's state of mind necessary to warrant award of punitive damages in action for false arrest or imprisonment. 93 A.L.R.3d 1109.
Recovery of damages as remedy for wrongful discrimination under state or local civil rights provisions. 85 A.L.R.3d 351.
Admissibility on defendant's behalf, as matter in mitigation of punitive damages, or evidence as to his lack of financial resources. 79 A.L.R.3d 1138.
What constitutes malice sufficient to justify an award of punitive damages in action for wrongful attachment or garnishment. 61 A.L.R.3d 984.
Recovery of damages for emotional distress resulting from discrimination because of sex or marital status. 61 A.L.R.3d 944.
Requirement of full faith and credit to foreign judgment for punitive damages. 44 A.L.R.3d 960.
Punitive damages in actions based on nuisance. 31 A.L.R.3d 1346.
Spouse's or parent's right to recover punitive damages in connection with recovery of damages for medical expenses or loss of services or consortium arising from personal injury to other spouse or to child. 25 A.L.R.3d 1416.
Apportionment of punitive or exemplary damages as between joint tortfeasors. 20 A.L.R.3d

REV_00259181

666.
Financial worth of one or more of several joint defendants as proper matter for consideration in fixing punitive damages. 9 A.L.R.3d 692.
Action or claim for punitive damages as surviving death of person wronged. 63 A.L.R.2d 1327.
Punitive or exemplary damages for conversion of personalty by one other than chattel mortgagee or conditional seller. 54 A.L.R.2d 1361.
Punitive or exemplary damages in action by spouse for alienation of affections or criminal conversation. 31 A.L.R.2d 713.
Recovery of exemplary or punitive damages from municipal corporation. 19 A.L.R.2d 903.
Actual damages as a necessary predicate of punitive or exemplary damages. 17 A.L.R.2d 527.
Punitive damages for wrongful ejection or rejection of guest from hotel or restaurant. 14 A.L.R.2d 715.
Punitive damages in actions for violations of Title VII of Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq.). 43 A.L.R.Fed. 208.

Digest System Key Numbers:

C.J.S. Damages §§ 117-124.
West's Key No. Digests, Damages 87 et seq.

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh

Subject Files

[Review of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board Records]

OA/NARA#: 1824/1742
9632

Box 51
Folder 4

REV_00259183

[redacted]

NATIONAL RECONNAISSANCE OFFICE

18 December 2002

MEMORANDUM FOR EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR PRESIDENT'S FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE ADVISORY BOARD

SUBJECT: Review of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board Records in Accordance with Files Series Exemption (U)

REFERENCE: Memorandum of Understanding, Dated July 2000, Between the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board and the National Reconnaissance Office re Archived Records Declassification Review (U)

(U) This is to inform you that the declassification review of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board (PFIAB) Historical Files, as specified in the Statement of Work (SOW) attached to referenced Memorandum of Understanding (MOU), has been completed. This review was conducted in strict accordance with the directions set forth in your memoranda of 30 and 31 October 2001, same subject.

(U) The following is a summary of our activity:

a. (U) The actual review took place at the National Archives/Office of Presidential Libraries classified holdings area in the National Archives Building in Washington, D.C. Two National Reconnaissance Office contractor personnel conducted the review under the supervision of the Chief, Information Declassification Review Center. The project began on 16 April 2002 and ended on 8 August 2002.

b. (U) All PFIAB specified files in the 31 identified boxes were reviewed in accordance with the provisions of Executive Order (E.O.)12958. The reviewed files were categorized as follows: PFIAB Classified documents; PFIAB unclassified documents; Other Government Agency (OGA)-originated classified documents; and OGA-originated unclassified documents.

This memorandum is unclassified when separated from attachment.

CL BY: 538471
CL REASON: 1.5(C)
DECL ON: X1
DRV FROM: NCG 5.1
1 MAY 00

[redacted]

REV_00259184

[redacted]

SUBJECT: Review of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board Records in Accordance with Files Series Exemption (U)

c. (U) A total of 2,521 documents, 23,274 pages, are contained in the specified files. We identified 898 PFIAB classified documents; 580 PFIAB unclassified documents; 572 OGA classified documents; and 471 OGA unclassified documents.

d. (U) A loose-leaf binder listing all files reviewed, sorted as above, is attached with this memorandum.

(U) Since PFIAB classified documents are exempt from the provisions of E.O. 12958, no further action is required for those documents. PFIAB and OGA unclassified documents are not subject to provisions of E.O. 12958, therefore, no further action is required on that category of documents. However, OGA classified documents are subject to E.O. 12958 provisions. Further action regarding the referral process is pending the decision of PFIAB. Finally, an optional task identified in our SOW, preserving reviewed files, is also pending your decision whether to proceed.

(U) Three pieces of electronic equipment were purchased with PFIAB funds to aid in the performance of this task: a DELL laptop computer, a printer, and a ZIP drive. This equipment is being held in the Presidential Libraries classified holding area of the National Archives Building along with a ZIP disk which contains files formatted identically to those found in the attached notebook. This equipment is the property of PFIAB and can be picked up through arrangements with personnel from the Presidential Materials Staff of the National Archives and Records Administration.

Kenneth C. Piontek

Kenneth C. Piontek, Chief,
Information Declassification Review Center

Attachment:
Loose-leaf Binder Listing All Files Reviewed [redacted]

[redacted]

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Rewards - Authorities

OA/NARA#: 2184/2095
9804

Box 51
Folder 5

REV_00259186

"Philbin, Patrick" <Patrick.Philbin@usdoj.gov>
09/12/2001 11:53:22 AM

Record Type: Record

To: Brett M. Kavanaugh/WHO/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: more relevant reward provision

---

18 USC sect. 3071 authorizes the AG to reward any individual who furnishes information leading to arrest or conviction in any country of any individual for an act of terrorism against the U.S.

section 3072 provides that a reward under the section may not exceed $500,000 and a reward of $100,000 or more may not be made without approval of the AG or President personally. "A dtermination made by the AG or the President shall be final and conclusive and no court shall have power or jurisdiction to review it."

Section 3077 defines "act of terrrorism."

UNITED STATES CODE ANNOTATED
TITLE 18. CRIMES AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
PART II--CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
CHAPTER 204--REWARDS FOR INFORMATION CONCERNING TERRORIST ACTS AND ESPIONAGE

Copr. © West Group 2001. No claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Current through P.L. 107-11, approved 5-28-01

§ 3071. Information for which rewards authorized

(a) With respect to acts of terrorism primarily within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, the Attorney General may reward any individual who furnishes information--

(1) leading to the arrest or conviction, in any country, of any individual or individuals for the commission of an act of terrorism against a United States person or United States property; or

(2) leading to the arrest or conviction, in any country, of any individual or individuals for conspiring or attempting to commit an act of terrorism against a United States person or property; or

(3) leading to the prevention, frustration, or favorable resolution of an act of terrorism against a United States person or property.

(b) With respect to acts of espionage involving or directed at the United States, the Attorney General may reward any individual who furnishes information--

(1) leading to the arrest or conviction, in any country, of any individual or individuals for commission of an act of espionage against the United States;

(2) leading to the arrest or conviction, in any country, of any individual or individuals for conspiring or attempting to commit an act of espionage against the United States; or

(3) leading to the prevention or frustration of an act of espionage against the United States.

CREDIT(S)

2000 Main Volume

(Added Pub.L. 98-533, Title I, § 101(a), Oct. 19, 1984, 98 Stat. 2706, and amended Pub.L. 103-359, Title VIII, § 803(a), Oct. 14, 1994, 108 Stat. 3438.)

<General Materials (GM) - References, Annotations, or Tables>

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1994 Acts. House Report No. 103-541 and House Conference Report No. 103-753, see 1994 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 2703.

Amendments

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

1994 Amendments. Subsec. (a). Pub.L. 103-359, § 803(a)(1), designated existing provisions as subsec. (a).

Subsec. (b). Pub.L. 103-359, § 803(a)(2), added subsec. (b).

Short Title

Section 1 of Pub.L. 98-533 provided that: "This Act [enacting this chapter and section 2708 of Title 22, Foreign Relations and Intercourse, amending sections 2669, 2678 and 2704 of Title 22, Foreign Relations and Intercourse, enacting provisions set out as a note under section 5928 of Title 5, Government Organizations and Employees and amending provisions set out as a note preceding section 2651 of Title 22, Foreign Relations and Intercourse] may be cited as the '1984 Act to Combat International Terrorism'."

LIBRARY REFERENCES

American Digest System

Rewards ⚷4.

Key Number System Topic No. 340.

Encyclopedias

Rewards and Bounties, see C.J.S. §§ 9, 10.

18 U.S.C.A. § 3071

18 USCA § 3071

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

UNITED STATES CODE ANNOTATED
TITLE 18. CRIMES AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
PART II--CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
CHAPTER 204--REWARDS FOR INFORMATION CONCERNING TERRORIST ACTS AND ESPIONAGE

Copr. © West Group 2001. No claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Current through P.L. 107-11, approved 5-28-01

§ 3072. Determination of entitlement; maximum amount; Presidential approval; conclusiveness

The Attorney General shall determine whether an individual furnishing information described in section 3071 is entitled to a reward and the amount to be paid. A reward under this section may be in an amount not to exceed $500,000. A reward of $100,000 or more may not be made without the approval of the President or the Attorney General personally. A determination made by the Attorney General or the President under this chapter shall be final and conclusive, and no court shall have power or jurisdiction to review it.

CREDIT(S)

2000 Main Volume

(Added Pub.L. 98-533, Title I, § 101(a), Oct. 19, 1984, 98 Stat. 2707.)

<General Materials (GM) - References, Annotations, or Tables>

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Spending Limitations Lifted

Any funds made available to the Attorney General before or after July 27, 1995, as not subject to the spending limitations contained in this section and section 3059 of this title, but with a proviso that any reward of $100,000 or more, up to a maximum of $2,000,000, not to be made without the personal approval of the President or the Attorney General, with such approval not to be delegated, see section 3001 of Pub.L. 104-19, set out as a note under section 3059 of this title.

LIBRARY REFERENCES

American Digest System

Rewards ⚿4.

Key Number System Topic No. 340.

Encyclopedias

Rewards and Bounties, see C.J.S. §§ 9, 10.

18 U.S.C.A. § 3072

18 USCA § 3072

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

UNITED STATES CODE ANNOTATED
TITLE 18. CRIMES AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
PART II--CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
CHAPTER 204--REWARDS FOR INFORMATION CONCERNING TERRORIST ACTS AND ESPIONAGE

Copr. © West Group 2001. No claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Current through P.L. 107-11, approved 5-28-01

§ 3073. Protection of identity

Any reward granted under this chapter shall be certified for payment by the Attorney General. If it is determined that the identity of the recipient of a reward or of the members of the recipient's immediate family must be protected, the Attorney General may take such measures in connection with the payment of the reward as deemed necessary to effect such protection.

CREDIT(S)

2000 Main Volume

(Added Pub.L. 98-533, Title I, § 101(a), Oct. 19, 1984, 98 Stat. 2707.)

<General Materials (GM) - References, Annotations, or Tables>

LIBRARY REFERENCES

American Digest System

Rewards ⚿13.

Key Number System Topic No. 340.

Encyclopedias

Rewards and Bounties, see C.J.S. §§ 35-37.

18 U.S.C.A. § 3073

18 USCA § 3073

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

UNITED STATES CODE ANNOTATED
TITLE 18. CRIMES AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
PART II--CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
CHAPTER 204--REWARDS FOR INFORMATION CONCERNING TERRORIST ACTS AND ESPIONAGE

Copr. © West Group 2001. No claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Current through P.L. 107-11, approved 5-28-01

§ 3075. Authorization for appropriations

There are authorized to be appropriated, without fiscal year limitation, $5,000,000 for the purpose of this chapter.

CREDIT(S)

2000 Main Volume

(Added Pub.L. 98-533, Title I, § 101(a), Oct. 19, 1984, 98 Stat. 2707.)

<General Materials (GM) - References, Annotations, or Tables>

18 U.S.C.A. § 3075

18 USCA § 3075

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

UNITED STATES CODE ANNOTATED
TITLE 18. CRIMES AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
PART II--CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
CHAPTER 204--REWARDS FOR INFORMATION CONCERNING TERRORIST ACTS AND ESPIONAGE

Copr. © West Group 2001. No claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Current through P.L. 107-11, approved 5-28-01

§ 3076. Eligibility for witness security program

Any individual (and the immediate family of such individual) who furnishes information which would justify a reward by the Attorney General under this chapter or by the Secretary of State under section 36 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 may, in the discretion of the Attorney General, participate in the Attorney General's witness security program authorized under chapter 224 of this title.

CREDIT(S)

2000 Main Volume

(Added Pub.L. 98-533, Title I, § 101(a), Oct. 19, 1984, 98 Stat. 2707, and amended Pub.L. 99-646, § 45, Nov. 10, 1986, 100 Stat. 3601.)

<General Materials (GM) - References, Annotations, or Tables>

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1986 Acts. House Report No. 99-797, see 1986 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 6138.

References in Text

Section 36 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956, referred to in text, is classified to section 2708 of Title 22, Foreign Relations and Intercourse.

Amendments

1986 Amendments. Pub.L. 99-646 substituted "chapter 224 of this title" for "title V of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970".

LIBRARY REFERENCES

American Digest System

Criminal Law ⚷1222.1.

Key Number System Topic No. 110.

Encyclopedias

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Criminal Law, see C.J.S. §§ 1724, 1729-1731.

18 U.S.C.A. § 3076

18 USCA § 3076

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

UNITED STATES CODE ANNOTATED
TITLE 18. CRIMES AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
PART II--CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
CHAPTER 204--REWARDS FOR INFORMATION CONCERNING TERRORIST ACTS AND ESPIONAGE

Copr. © West Group 2001. No claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works.

Current through P.L. 107-11, approved 5-28-01

§ 3077. Definitions

As used in this chapter, the term--

(1) "act of terrorism" means an activity that--

(A) involves a violent act or an act dangerous to human life that is a violation of the criminal laws of the United States or of any State, or that would be a criminal violation if committed within the jurisdiction of the United States or of any State; and

(B) appears to be intended--

(i) to intimidate or coerce a civilian population;

(ii) to influence the policy of a government by intimidation or coercion; or

(iii) to affect the conduct of a government by assassination or kidnapping;

(2) "United States person" means--

(A) a national of the United States as defined in section 101(a)(22) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(22));

(B) an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States as defined in section 101(a)(20) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(20));

(C) any person within the United States;

(D) any employee or contractor of the United States Government, regardless of nationality, who is the victim or intended victim of an act of terrorism by virtue of that employment;

(E) a sole proprietorship, partnership, company, or association composed principally of nationals or permanent resident aliens of the United States; and

(F) a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, any State, the District of Columbia, or any territory or possession of the United States, and a foreign subsidiary of such corporation;

(3) "United States property" means any real or personal property which is within the United States or, if outside the United States, the actual or beneficial ownership of which rests in a United States person or any Federal or State governmental entity of the United States;

(4) "United States", when used in a geographical sense, includes Puerto Rico and all territories and possessions

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

of the United States;

(5) "State" includes any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and any other possession or territory of the United States;

(6) "government entity" includes the Government of the United States, any State or political subdivision thereof, any foreign country, and any state, provincial, municipal, or other political subdivision of a foreign country;

(7) "Attorney General" means the Attorney General of the United States or that official designated by the Attorney General to perform the Attorney General's responsibilities under this chapter; and

(8) "act of espionage" means an activity that is a violation of--

(A) section 793, 794, or 798 of this title; or

(B) section 4 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950.

CREDIT(S)

2000 Main Volume

(Added Pub.L. 98-533, Title I, § 101(a), Oct. 19, 1984, 98 Stat. 2707, and amended Pub.L. 100-690, Title VII, § 7051, Nov. 18, 1988, 102 Stat. 4401; Pub.L. 101-647, Title XXXV, § 3572, Nov. 29, 1990, 104 Stat. 4929; Pub.L. 103- 322, Title XXXIII, § 330021(1), Sept. 13, 1994, 108 Stat. 2150; Pub.L. 103- 359, Title VIII, § 803(b), Oct. 14, 1994, 108 Stat. 3439; Pub.L. 104-294, Title VI, § 605(g), Oct. 11, 1996, 110 Stat. 3510.)

<General Materials (GM) - References, Annotations, or Tables>

HISTORICAL AND STATUTORY NOTES

Revision Notes and Legislative Reports

1988 Acts. For Related Reports, see 1988 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 5937.

1990 Acts. House Report Nos. 101-681(Parts I and II) and 101-736, Senate Report No. 101-460, and Statement by President, see 1990 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 6472.

1994 Acts. House Report Nos. 103-324 and 103-489, and House Conference Report No. 103-711, see 1994 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 1801.

House Report No. 103-541 and House Conference Report No. 103-753, see 1994 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 2703.

1996 Acts. House Report No. 104-788, see 1996 U.S. Code Cong. and Adm. News, p. 4021.

References in Text

The Immigration and Nationality Act, referred to in pars. (2)(A) and (B) is Act June 27, 1952, c. 477, 66 Stat. 163, as amended, which is classified principally to chapter 12 (section 1101 et seq.) of Title 8, Aliens and Nationality. Section 101(a)(20) and (22) of the Immigration and Nationality Act is classified to section 1101(a)(20) and (22), respectively of Title 8. For complete classification of this Act to the Code, see Short Title note set out under section 1101 of Title 8 and Tables.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, referred to in par. (8)(B), is Act Sept. 23, 1950, c. 1024, Title I, 64 Stat. 987, as amended, which is classified principally to subchapter I (section 781 et seq.) of chapter 23 of Title 50, War and National Defense. Section 4 of such Act is classified to section 783 of Title 50. For complete classification of this Act to the Code, see Short Title note set out under section 781 of Title 50 and Tables.

Amendments

1996 Amendments. Par. (8)(A). Pub.L. 104-294, § 605(g), substituted "this title" for "title 18, United States Code".

1994 Amendments. Par. (1)(B)(iii). Pub.L. 103-322, § 330021(1), substituted "kidnapping" for "kidnaping".

Par. (8). Pub.L. 103-359, § 803(b), added par. (8).

1990 Amendments. Pub.L. 101-647, § 3572(1)-(3), substituted in par. (4) " 'United States'," for " 'United States,' "; substituted in pars. (1)-(3) and (5) at the end a semicolon for the period; and substituted in par. (6) "; and" for the period.

1988 Amendments. Par. (4). Pub.L. 100-690, § 7051, substituted "United " 'United States,' when" for " 'United States'--(A) when", and struck out subpar. (B) which provided that United States be defined in context of section 3073 with meaning given in Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101 et seq.).

LIBRARY REFERENCES

Law Review and Journal Commentaries

Money laundering and lawyers. Eugene R. Gaetke and Sarah N. Welling, 43 Syracuse L.Rev. 1165 (1992).

18 U.S.C.A. § 3077

18 USCA § 3077

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Rex R. Sprietsma v. Mercury Marine

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2163/2074
9693

Box 51
Folder 6

REV_00259199

Source: All Sources > Federal Legal - U.S. > Supreme Court Cases & Materials > US Supreme Court Briefs
Terms: brett /2 kavanaugh (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

1997 U.S. Briefs 288

◆ Go to Supreme Court Opinion ◆ Go to Oral Argument Transcript

VICKI LEWIS, ET VIR., ETC., Petitioners, v. BRUNSWICK CORPORATION, Respondent.

No. 97-288

1997 U.S. Briefs 288

October Term, 1997

January 28, 1998

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit.

BRIEF OF AMICUS CURIAE GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION IN SUPPORT OF RESPONDENT

David M. Heilbron, Leslie G. Landau, MCCUTCHEN, DOYLE, BROWN & ENERSEN, LLP, Three Embarcadero Center, San Francisco, California 94111, (415) 393-2000.

Thomas A. Ziolkowski, GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION, New Center One Building, 3031 West Grand Boulevard, Detroit, Michigan 48232.

Kenneth W. Starr, Counsel of Record, Paul T. Cappuccio, Richard A. Cordray, Brett M. Kavanaugh, KIRKLAND & ELLIS, 655 Fifteenth Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005, (202) 879-5000.

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae General Motors Corporation

QUESTION PRESENTED

Whether the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971 preempts a state common law requirement that recreational boats be equipped with propeller guards, where the United States Coast Guard, after extensive administrative proceedings, determined that such a requirement would be contrary to the interests of boat safety?

View Table of Contents

View Table of Authorities

INTEREST OF AMICUS CURIAE

General Motors Corporation ("General Motors") is the world's largest manufacturer of automobiles. n1 n1 Petitioners and respondent have consented to the filing of this brief, in letters on file in the Clerk's office. The undersigned counsel for General Motors Corporation alone have authored this brief, and no other person or entity has made a monetary contribution to its preparation or submission.

The National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, Pub. L. No. 89-563, 80 Stat. 718 that state juries, just like state administrative and legislative officials, set "standard[s]" and "requirement[s]" that may therefore be preempted by federal regulatory action. Cf. New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 265 (1964) (the "test is not the form in which state power has been applied but, whatever the form, whether such power has in fact been exercised").

Indeed, petitioners' argument on this point is so plainly wrong that, if accepted here, its logic would partially overrule Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938). The very same argument that petitioners and their amici put forward with respect to the text of section 4306 would apply equally well to the term "laws" in the Rules of Decision Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1652. The Rules of Decision Act requires a federal court to apply "the laws of the several states" as the rules of decisions in civil actions not arising under federal law. Applying the logic of petitioners' argument, because the Supremacy Clause refers also to "the Laws of the United States," U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2 (emphasis added), and because there is no general common law of the United States, then the phrase "the laws of the several states" should be limited to the positive law of the several states, thereby excluding state common law as the governing rules of decision in federal courts. Adoption of petitioners' argument thus would have the pernicious consequence of upsetting the entire interpretive basis for the longstanding and important Erie doctrine.

It is therefore not surprising that, in Cipollone, the Court rejected the parallel argument that the phrase "State law" included only state statutes and regulations, but not state common law. See 505 U.S. at 522-23; see also id. at 549 (Scalia, J., concurring and dissenting in part) (agreeing that the phrase "State law" used in the 1969 Act "embraces state common law"). The Court recognized that this argument was flatly irreconcilable with its longstanding construction of the same basic language in the Rules of Decision Act. See Erie, 304 U.S. at 77-78. Indeed, the Court indicated no desire to revisit the controversial battles fought over many decades that led up to the Court's historic decision in Erie to overrule the contrary interpretation of the Rules of Decision Act that had been adopted in Swift v. Tyson, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 1 (1842). Instead, the Court simply noted that "we have recognized the phrase 'state law' to include common law as well as statutes and regulations." Cipollone, 505 U.S. at 522. For all the same reasons, the efforts made by petitioners and the Solicitor General to limit the terms "requirement[s]" and "standard[s]" to state positive law must fail.

III. SECTION 4311(g) SIMPLY CONCERNS THE EFFECT OF COMPLIANCE WITH FEDERAL LAW, AND DOES NOT LIMIT THE SCOPE OF THE PREEMPTION CLAUSE.

The Boat Safety Act contains what some have called a "savings" clause, which states that "compliance with this chapter or standards, regulations, or orders prescribed under this chapter does not relieve a person from liability at common law or under State law." 46 U.S.C. § 4311(g). Petitioners and the Solicitor General contend that this provision establishes that the common law is beyond the reach of the preemption clause. See Petrs. Br. 28-31; U.S. Br. 21-24. But that does not square with the relation between the preemption clause and this provision, with the text of this provision, or with the clear purpose of this provision, as explained by Congress.

Section 4311(g) does not serve the purpose of "saving" state law or state common law from preemption at all. Indeed, the preemption clause contains its own savings provisions, which are explicitly designed to specify when state law is preserved in the face of the broader general language of the preemption clause. Those provisions operate to save state law from preemption in three distinct circumstances.

First, the States may apply their own law where it is "identical to a regulation prescribed" under federal law. 46 U.S.C. § 4306. This provision is similar to one at issue in Medtronic, where the Court unanimously held that the preemption clause permitted state laws and state requirements to be enforced where they are identical to federal law. See 116 S. Ct. at 2255; id. at 2264 (O'Connor, J., concurring and dissenting in part).

REV_00259209

Second, the States may apply to the Secretary for permission to apply their own law even where it differs from federal law. See 46 U.S.C. § 4306. This provision establishes an avenue for each State to seek approval, on a state-by-state basis, for exemption from the statutory prohibition on enforcing inconsistent state laws if a particular matter is thought to warrant an exemption.

Third, the States are explicitly permitted to apply their own law to "regulate the carrying or use of marine safety articles to meet uniquely hazardous conditions or circumstances within the State," unless the Secretary specifically disapproves of their doing so. 46 U.S.C. § 4306. This one narrow area of explicit state authority is clearly circumscribed, thus reinforcing the otherwise restrictive impact of the broad preemption clause.

Moreover, section 4311(g) says nothing about the kinds of state laws that are preempted or saved from preemption. Rather, it simply disclaims any possibility that a manufacturer will be able to assert a federal immunity from liability at state law based on its mere compliance with the requirements imposed by federal law. This provision thus works in tandem with the preemption clause by ensuring that the boundaries of federal preemption are not improperly expanded by a broad "government standards" defense, which might be asserted to impede the enforcement of otherwise valid state law. Thus, it would be much more appropriate to refer to this provision as an "anti-affirmative-defense" clause, which operates to preserve state authority on how to treat the issue of a manufacturer's compliance with pertinent federal standards and requirements. For example, where state common law addresses "uniquely hazardous" local conditions, as expressly permitted by the statute, this clause would ensure that federal law is understood to place no limits on how state courts treat the issue of compliance with any federal requirements.

Section 4311(g) thus should not be misread as an "anti-preemption" clause. To the contrary, Congress declared in this provision that where a state-law cause of action is not preempted by federal law, it is impermissible for a party or a court to accomplish the same end by citing the party's compliance with all pertinent federal requirements as the basis for an affirmative defense or immunity asserted to defeat the same state-law cause of action. In this manner, Congress specified that unless state common law is actually preempted, it cannot be circumscribed by legal inferences that might otherwise be drawn about a party's conduct in exercising due care by complying with the federal regulatory scheme. See, e.g., Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability § 4, cmt. e (proposed final draft Apr. 1, 1997) (explaining the "important distinction" between "the matter of federal preemption of state products liability law" and "the question of whether and to what extent, as a matter of state tort law, compliance with product safety statutes or administrative regulations affects liability for product defectiveness").

The Senate Report accompanying the Act confirms this interpretation. Congress intended, with respect to section 4311(g), that "mere compliance ... with the minimum standards promulgated under the Act will not be a complete defense to liability. Of course, depending on the rules of evidence of the particular judicial forum, such compliance may or may not be admissible for its evidentiary use." S. Rep. No. 92-248, at 32 (1971), reprinted in 1971 U.S.C.C.A.N. 1352. The references to "not ... a complete defense" and "evidentiary value" further establish that this provision simply ensures that the States will have the flexibility to determine whether a party's compliance with pertinent federal requirements can serve as the basis for an affirmative defense or immunity asserted to defeat an otherwise permissible state-law cause of action. In practice, the States differ in their views of such an affirmative defense, and on the admissibility of evidence of compliance with federal standards on the issues of defectiveness and due care. n9 n9 Each State thus remains free to determine for itself whether compliance with pertinent federal requirements (the "government standards" defense) is a relevant factor or an affirmative defense under state law in adjudicating an otherwise permissible state-law cause of action. There are diverse views on this issue under state law. Some States recognize a rebuttable presumption that a product which complies with federal standards is not defective. E.g., Mich. Comp. L. Ann. § 600.2946(4) (West 1997); Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-3304(a) (1996). Others hold compliance with federal standards is relevant to whether there is a defect, but not conclusive or presumptive evidence. E.g., Wagner v. Clark Equip. Co., 700 A.2d 38, 49-50 (Conn. 1997); Brooks v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 902 P.2d 54, 63 (N.M. 1995). A few States may hold that compliance conclusively negates any defect, see, e.g., Beatty v. Trailmaster Prods., 625 A.2d 1005, 1013-14 (Md. 1993), while others may treat compliance as irrelevant and inadmissible, see, e.g., Sheehan v. Cincinnati Shaper Co., 555 A.2d 1352, 1355 (Pa. Super. 1989).

REV_00259210

The contrary reading of this provision proposed by petitioners would, in addition, flout Congress' intention that "the need for uniformity in standards if interstate commerce is not to be unduly impeded supports the establishment of uniform construction and equipment standards at the Federal level" and that "manufacture for the domestic trade will not involve compliance with widely varying local requirements." S. Rep. No. 92-248, at 14, 20 (emphases added).

The erroneous construction of section 4311(g) urged upon the Court by petitioners and the Solicitor General is further underscored by their failure to come to grips with the actual language of the clause, which states that "compliance with ... this chapter does not relieve a person from liability at common law or under State law." 46 U.S.C. § 4311(g) (emphasis added). Although they make much of the fact that Congress used the term "common law" in this provision, they completely ignore the fact that Congress also referred to all of "state law" in the same passage. If petitioners' reading of this provision were to be adopted, then it would become a complete "anti-preemption" clause, and all state law -- whether statutory, administrative, or judge-made -- would remain in effect as a basis for imposing liability, thus completely nullifying the plain import of the preemption clause. Thus, petitioners' strained attempt to find deeper meaning in the omission of the term "common law" from the preemption clause and its inclusion in the so-called "savings" clause, see Petrs. Br. 30, rests on a clear distortion of the statutory text.

In addition, as Justice Breyer explained in Medtronic, the position urged by petitioners and their amici "would have anomalous consequences." 116 S. Ct. at 2259 (Breyer, J., concurring). It would permit "the liability-creating premises of the plaintiffs' state law tort suit" to operate in direct conflict with federal law, whereas state agency regulations could not. Id. at 2261. Yet the practical "effects of the state agency regulation and the state tort suit are identical." Id. at 2259; see also supra Section II.

Finally, the Court's prior cases have consistently held that the general language of a so-called "savings" clause cannot negate the terms of an explicit preemption clause. The Court has frequently been faced with potentially competing preemption and general savings clauses, and has given the latter provisions limited effect in the context of the statutory scheme as a whole. For example, in Morales v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 504 U.S. 374 (1992), the Court held that a "general 'remedies' saving clause cannot be allowed to supersede the specific substantive preemption provision." Id. at 385. Indeed, the Solicitor General had urged this reading upon the Court:

> [The savings clause] is properly construed only to preserve those remedies not inconsistent with other provisions of the statute, including [the] express preemption provision. That is the interpretation that this Court has long placed on a comparable savings clause in the Interstate Commerce Act. Pennsylvania R.R. v. Puritan Coal Mining Co., 237 U.S. 121, 129-30 (1915).

REV_00259211

Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Respondents, Morales (No. 90-1604), at 16.

More generally, the Court has routinely given so-called "savings" clauses a narrow reading in order to render them consistent with the preemptive thrust of the statute as a whole. See, e.g., American Airlines v. Wolens, 513 U.S. 219, 222 (1995) (state fraud suit expressly preempted notwithstanding savings clause providing that statute does not "abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute"); Pilot Life Ins. Co. v. Dedeaux, 481 U.S. 41, 51-52 (1987) (savings clause given narrow reading after the Court looked "to the provisions of the whole law, and to its object and policy"). Indeed, just two days ago, the Court held again "'it is a commonplace of statutory construction that the specific'" language concerning such matters as preemption "'governs the general' terms of the saving clause." South Dakota v. Yankton Sioux Tribe, No. 96-1581, slip op. at 17 (U.S. Jan. 26, 1998) (quoting Morales, 504 U.S. at 384)). n10 n10 The Solicitor General's suggestion that the federal safety standards should be understood as mere "minimum" standards, see U.S. Br. 20-21, proves too much, for it would exempt all state law from the reach of the preemption clause. Indeed, the only limit that the Solicitor General appears to place on this approach is supposedly premised on the language of section 4311(g), though once again he fails to recognize that the phrase "at common law" is followed by the phrase "or under State law." See id. at 21; see also Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151, 168 n.19 (1978) (rejecting argument that because statute referred to "minimum standards," it "requires recognition of state authority to impose higher standards").

Therefore, section 4311(g) of the Boat Safety Act cannot properly be read to nullify or abridge the explicit terms of the preemption clause.

IV. PETITIONERS' CLAIMS ALSO ARE SUBJECT TO IMPLIED-CONFLICT PREEMPTION ANALYSIS AND ARE IMPLIEDLY PREEMPTED.

Even if not expressly preempted, petitioners' claims would fail under an implied-conflict preemption analysis.

Petitioners briefly assert that the Court should not conduct any implied preemption analysis in this case because the Boat Safety Act contains a preemption clause. See Petrs. Br. 31-32. Notably, the Solicitor General appears to disagree with this assertion, for his brief devotes considerable space to the customary inquiry into implied-conflict preemption in an effort to explain its view that petitioners' claims are not impliedly preempted in this case. See U.S. Br. 25-30.

In fact, this Court's precedents have already established that the judicial inquiry into implied-conflict preemption, which is dictated by the Supremacy Clause, is proper when courts are applying the federal regulatory safety laws. At one time, a passage from the plurality opinion in Cipollone, see 505 U.S. at 517, had been misinterpreted so as to create confusion on this point. The Court seemed to settle the issue in CSX, when it conducted an implied-conflict preemption analysis even though the federal railway safety statutes included a preemption clause. See 507 U.S. at 673 n.12.

Nevertheless, some lower courts continued to dispute the issue. When the Court granted review in Myrick, therefore, the parties addressed it and the Court squarely resolved it:

> According to respondents and the Court of Appeals, Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504 (1992), held that implied pre-emption cannot exist when Congress has chosen to include an express preemption clause in a statute. This argument is without merit.

514 U.S. at 287 (emphasis added). The Court specifically noted that it had in fact "engaged in a conflict pre-emption analysis" in Cipollone itself, id. at 289, and had done so again in CSX, notwithstanding the existence of a preemption clause in the statutes at issue in both of those cases, see id. After thus conclusively deciding the issue, the Court went on to conduct an implied-conflict preemption inquiry under the motor vehicle safety statutes, which include both a preemption clause and a clause addressing the effect of compliance with federal standards and requirements. See id. at 287-88.

Finally, in Medtronic, the posture of the case decided by the Court was such that it concerned only an issue of express preemption, without any briefing on the issue of implied preemption. See, e.g., 116 S. Ct. at 2251 (plurality opinion). Nonetheless, even the four Justices who gave the preemption clause its narrowest reading pointed out that in considering further questions about express preemption under that statute in the future, "the issue may not need to be resolved if the claim would also be pre-empted under conflict pre-emption analysis." Id. at 2259 (citing Myrick, 514 U.S. at 289). The statute at issue in Medtronic, once again, contained both a preemption clause and a clause addressing the effect of federal compliance.

The Court's repeated endorsements of implied-conflict preemption analysis in the context of federal safety statutes that contain a preemption clause, and often a general savings clause, defeats the argument that such analysis is foreclosed in this case. This approach also accords with the natural effect of the Supremacy Clause. Federal law is unequivocally stated to be "the supreme Law of the Land," U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2, and thus any state law which conflicts with federal law is "pre-empted by direct operation of the Supremacy Clause." Brown v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees & Bartenders Int'l Union, 468 U.S. 491, 501 (1984). The mere inclusion of a preemption clause in a statute cannot uproot the necessary constitutional inquiry. n11 n11 Petitioners refer to a supposed "presumption against preemption." Petrs. Br. 24. Where state and federal law collide, the Supremacy Clause settles the matter and there is no place for presumptions, no matter how much the matter may traditionally be in the state domain: "The relative importance to the State of its own law is not material when there is a conflict with a valid federal law, for the Framers of our Constitution provided that the federal law must prevail." Free v. Bland, 369 U.S. 663, 666 (1962); see also Cipollone, 505 U.S. at 516 ("state law that conflicts with federal law is without effect"); id. at 544 (Scalia, J., concurring and dissenting in part) (same).

Moreover, the mere inclusion of a general savings clause in a federal statute cannot nullify the traditional judicial inquiry into implied-conflict preemption. n12 For almost a century, the Court has made clear that even when an Act has no preemption clause at all, a savings clause cannot be read to permit claims that actually conflict with the Act. The principle was first stated in Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co., 204 U.S. 426, 446 (1907). There, a federal act contained a broad savings clause that purported to save "the remedies now existing at common law or by statute." Id. at 446. In spite of that savings clause, the Court held that an existing but conflicting common law claim was preempted because a savings clause "cannot in reason be construed as continuing ... a common-law right, the continued existence of which would be absolutely inconsistent with the provisions of the act. In other words, the act cannot be held to destroy itself." Id.; see also International Paper Co. v. Ouellette, 479 U.S. 481, 485-505 (1987) (state common law claims were impliedly preempted because they conflicted with the method chosen by federal law to implement the statutory goals, despite broad savings clause); Chicago & Northwest Transp. Co. v. Kalo Brick & Tile Co., 450 U.S. 311, 328-31 (1981) (same). Whatever else may be the effect of section 4311(g), it most assuredly cannot, consistent with the Court's decisions, be interpreted to bar implied-conflict preemption.

REV_00259213

n12 The Solicitor General also appears to accept this proposition, for he states that "under our reading of the savings clause," a common law claim would be preempted by a pertinent federal regulation if it "propounded a standard of conduct directly contrary to the federal rule." U.S. Br. 28.

For purposes of the merits of the inquiry into implied-conflict preemption in this case, amicus curiae General Motors accepts the position taken by the Court of Appeals, see Pet. App. A15-A21, and presented in more detail by respondents here -- that in the circumstances of this case the Coast Guard made a considered decision not to mandate propeller guards on recreational vessels, because it determined that to do so would disserve the core safety objectives of the Boat Safety Act. n13 On this record, the agency's decision "takes on the character of a ruling that no such regulation is appropriate or approved pursuant to the policy of the statute." Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151, 178 (1978). n14 n13 The Solicitor General similarly frames the issue as whether the "Coast Guard's decision not to regulate propeller guards" results in implied preemption, U.S. Br. 25 (emphasis added), though his explanation of the underlying basis for the agency's decision is somewhat different.

n14 The Solicitor General's efforts to distinguish Ray, see U.S. Br. 28-29 & n.19, are unpersuasive. First,it cannot matter whether the federal agency is required to act or permitted to act; what matters is simply whether it is authorized to act. Second, the regulations imposed under the Boat Safety Act are quite comprehensive. See, e.g., 33 C.F.R. Pts. 175, 177, 181, 183.

As a practical matter, moreover, it would be unfair and unworkable to hold manufacturers liable for any penalties, fines, or compensatory or punitive damages imposed under state law for conforming the design of their vessels to the governing federal agency's explicit determination that requiring them to be equipped with propeller guards would undermine the public safety. The conflicting signals of state and federal policy pose an obvious potential to whipsaw citizens who wish only to abide by the law and policies of their respective governments. There can be little doubt that if any manufacturer had ignored these safety concerns and installed propeller guards, these considerations would have featured prominently in any lawsuit arising from a blunt trauma injury or fatality of the sort described by the agency as the basis for its determination not to mandate propeller guards on recreational vessels.

In sum, the Coast Guard's decision not to require propeller guards because to do so would disserve the core safety objectives of the Boat Safety Act necessarily leads to the conclusion that such a standard or requirement imposed by state positive law or common law is impliedly preempted. See, e.g., Ray, 435 U.S. at 178.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, as well as those set forth in respondent's brief, the decision below should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

DAVID M. HEILBRON, LESLIE G. LANDAU, MCCUTCHEN, DOYLE, BROWN & ENERSEN, LLP, Three Embarcadero Center, San Francisco, California 94111, (415) 393-2000

THOMAS A. ZIOLKOWSKI, GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION, New Center One Building, 3031 West Grand Boulevard, Detroit, Michigan 48232

KENNETH W. STARR, Counsel of Record, PAUL T. CAPPUCCIO, RICHARD A. CORDRAY, BRETT

M. KAVANAUGH, KIRKLAND & ELLIS, 655 Fifteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005, (202) 879-5000

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae General Motors Corporation

January 28, 1998

Source: All Sources > Federal Legal - U.S. > Supreme Court Cases & Materials > US Supreme Court Briefs
Terms: brett /2 kavanaugh (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, March 22, 2002 - 10:50 AM EST

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

(1966), 49 U.S.C. §§ 30101-30169 (1994) (the "Motor Vehicle Safety Act") is similar in certain respects to the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971 ("the Boat Safety Act"), under review here. The Motor Vehicle Safety Act contains a preemption clause, which states that when a federal standard is in effect, no State may "establish, or continue in effect, with respect to any motor vehicle or item of motor vehicle equipment any safety standard applicable to the same aspect of performance of such vehicle or item of equipment which is not identical to the Federal standard." 49 U.S.C. § 30103(b)(1). Moreover, like the Boat Safety Act, the Motor Vehicle Safety Act states: "Compliance with any [federal standard] does not exempt a person from liability under common law." 49 U.S.C. § 30103(e).

For that reason, the resolution of certain issues under the Boat Safety Act is potentially relevant to issues that arise under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act. General Motors thus has an interest in the Court's disposition of this case.

INTRODUCTION

The Boat Safety Act, 46 U.S.C. §§ 4301-4311 (1994), contains two provisions relevant to the preemption issues presented in this case.

Section 4306, entitled "Federal preemption," provides:

> Unless permitted by the Secretary under section 4305 of this title, a State or political subdivision of a State may not establish, continue in effect, or enforce a law or regulation establishing a recreational vessel or associated equipment performance or other safety standard or imposing a requirement for associated equipment (except insofar as the State or political subdivision may, in the absence of the Secretary's disapproval, regulate the carrying or use of marine safety articles to meet uniquely hazardous conditions or circumstances within the State) that is not identical to a regulation prescribed under section 4302 of this title.

Section 4311, entitled "Penalties and injunctions," provides in subsection (g):

> Compliance with this chapter or standards, regulations, or orders prescribed under this chapter does not relieve a person from liability at common law or under State law.

The preemption issues presented in this case require the Court to reach a sensible and harmonious construction of these two provisions. Amicus curiae General Motors respectfully submits that the positions taken by petitioners and the Solicitor General fail in this task. This brief is being submitted to respond to the points discussed not only in petitioners' brief, but also in the Solicitor General's brief.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. The Boat Safety Act delegates implementing authority to regulate the design and performance of boats and associated equipment, which the Coast Guard exercised by adopting extensive and detailed regulations. As the Solicitor General notes, section 4306 of the statute expressly preempts the field of state laws and regulations imposing standards or requirements with respect to the design and performance of boats and associated equipment, with only three exceptions: the States may enforce laws that are identical to federal regulations; they may apply for authorization to enforce differing laws; and they may regulate the carrying or use of marine safety articles to meet uniquely hazardous local conditions, unless this authority is specifically disapproved.

REV_00259201

If none of these exceptions applies, the Boat Safety Act explicitly preempts state law governing boat design and performance -- regardless of whether a federal regulation governs that same aspect of boat design or performance. Here, the Coast Guard has not required propeller guards on outboard motors. The State of Georgia has not obtained authorization to require propeller guards and does not claim that they would address any uniquely hazardous local conditions. Therefore, petitioners' tort claim based on respondent's failure to install propeller guards is expressly preempted.

2. Petitioners and the Solicitor General counter that state common law damages actions enjoy a blanket immunity from this straightforward preemption analysis because state common law is not a state "law or regulation" and does not impose any legal "standard" or "requirement" within the meaning of this clause. That is wrong. The Court has rejected their argument at least thrice, by holding that broad terms in a preemption clause such as "standard[s]" and "requirement[s]" encompass state common law. See, e.g., Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 116 S. Ct. 2240, 2259-60 (1996) (Breyer, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); id. at 2262 (O'Connor, J., concurring and dissenting in part); CSX Transp., Inc. v. Easterwood, 507 U.S. 658, 664 (1993); Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 520-24 (1992) (Stevens, J., plurality opinion); id. at 548-49 (Scalia, J., concurring and dissenting in part). Petitioners and the Solicitor General offer no justification for the Court to overrule this line of decisions, which forecloses their position.

Even putting aside this controlling precedent, the position taken by petitioners and the Solicitor General ignores the fact that state common law is an integral part of the corpus of state law, and it sets "standards" and "requirements" that govern private conduct quite as much as state positive law does. Their argument also rests on the bizarre assumption that Congress intended a single state jury -- an ad hoc collection of citizens assembled to hear one case -- to have more power to regulate private conduct in a manner different from the federal government than do their duly elected and appointed state officials. Finally, their suggested misreading of the statutory language, if accepted, would undermine the settled holding of cases as basic as Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938).

3. Petitioners and the Solicitor General further contend that the so-called "savings" clause in the Boat Safety Act negates its explicit preemption of common law tort suits. That, too, is incorrect. The preemption clause contains its own savings provisions, which operate to save state law from preemption where it is identical to federal law, where authority is granted to enforce differing state laws, and in limited circumstances to address uniquely hazardous local conditions. What petitioners and the Solicitor General call a "savings" clause -- section 4311 (g) -- is more appropriately viewed as an "anti-affirmative-defense" clause. It says nothing about the kinds of state laws that are preempted. Instead, it simply disclaims any federal immunity from liability at state law, which thus frees each State to determine for itself whether compliance with pertinent federal requirements (the "government standards" defense) will be recognized as an affirmative defense in an otherwise permissible state-law cause of action. The claim that this provision should be read instead as a broad "anti-preemption" clause is untenable and cannot be squared with the plain language of the statute.

In any event, the Court has repeatedly held that the general language of a so-called "savings" clause cannot negate the plain terms of an explicit preemption clause. See, e.g., Morales v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 504 U.S. 374, 385 (1992). More generally, the Court has routinely given these general clauses a narrow reading in order to render them consistent with the preemptive thrust of the statute as a whole. See, e.g., Pilot Life Ins. Co. v. Dedeaux, 481 U.S. 41, 51-52 (1987).

4. Moreover, petitioners' claims also fail under an implied-conflict preemption analysis. As the Court has consistently held in several recent decisions, the mere existence of a clause directed at preemption in the Boat Safety Act does not eliminate the need for such analysis. See Medtronic, 116 S. Ct. at 2259 (plurality opinion) (implied-conflict preemption inquiry is proper); Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280, 287-88 (1995) (conducting such an inquiry); CSX, 507 U.S. at 673 n.12 (same). In addition, the so-called "savings" clause does not preclude implied-conflict preemption analysis, as the Court has long held. See, e.g., International Paper Co. v. Ouellette, 479 U.S. 481, 493-94 (1987); Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co., 204 U.S. 426, 446 (1907). Unlike petitioners, the Solicitor General accepts this established approach, and there is no reason for the Court to strike out in a different direction in this case.

Here, accepting the Court of Appeals' view that the Coast Guard made a considered decision not to regulate propeller guards on recreational vessels, in furtherance of its mission to promote boat safety, the necessary result is that any such requirement imposed by state law is impliedly preempted. See Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151, 178 (1978). Indeed, as a practical matter it would be unfair and unworkable to hold manufacturers liable for any penalties, fines, or compensatory or punitive damages imposed under state law for conforming the design of their vessels to the federal agency's explicit determination that requiring them to be equipped with propeller guards would undermine the public safety.

ARGUMENT

I. THE BOAT SAFETY ACT PREEMPTS THE FIELD OF STATE LAW GOVERNING THE DESIGN AND PERFORMANCE OF RECREATIONAL VESSELS AND ASSOCIATED EQUIPMENT.

The Solicitor General points out that the plain language of the Boat Safety Act, its legislative history, and its subsequent administrative history all support the view that the statute is intended to preempt the field of state laws regulating the design and performance of recreational vessels and their associated equipment, subject only to certain exceptions that are specified in the statute itself. Strangely, however, the Solicitor General does not draw the conclusion that the Boat Safety Act actually has this effect, for reasons that will be discussed in more detail in Sections II and III, infra.

As the Solicitor General explains, the text of the Boat Safety Act appears expressly to preempt the field of state laws regulating the design and performance of recreational vessels and their associated equipment, subject only to three exceptions that are set forth in the preemption clause itself. See U.S. Br. 14; 46 U.S.C. § 4306. First, Congress has authorized the States to enforce laws that are "identical" to regulations adopted by the Secretary. Second, the States may apply to the Secretary for authorization to enforce differing laws. Third, the States may regulate the carrying or use of marine safety articles to meet uniquely hazardous conditions or circumstances within the State, unless the Secretary specifically disapproves. See id.

If none of these exceptions applies, the Boat Safety Act, by its terms, preempts state law governing the design and performance of recreational vessels and their associated equipment -- regardless of whether a federal regulation governs that same aspect of boat design or performance. It thus differs from the Motor Vehicle Safety Act at issue in Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280, 287-88 (1995), which preempts state law only where a federal regulation concerning the same aspect of performance is in effect. Myrick is thus irrelevant to the express preemption issue raised in this case.

As the Solicitor General further notes, this reading of the broad preemption clause contained in the Act is confirmed by its legislative history. See U.S. Br. 14. The Senate Report on the proposed legislation stated that it was intended to have broad preemptive effect, explaining the preemption clause as follows:

> This section provides for federal preemption in the issuance of boat and equipment safety standards. This conforms to the long history of preemption in maritime safety matters and is founded on the need for uniformity applicable to vessels moving in interstate commerce. In this case it also assures that manufacture for the domestic trade will not involve compliance with widely varying local requirements. . . . The section does not preempt state law or regulation directed at safe boat operation and use, which was felt to be appropriately within the purview of state or local concern.

S. Rep. No. 92-248, at 20 (1971), reprinted in 1971 U.S.C.C.A.N. 1341. The Report emphasized that the "need for uniformity in standards if interstate commerce is not to be unduly impeded supports the establishment of uniform construction and equipment standards at the Federal level." Id. at 14 (emphasis added). While the language of the Act phrased the Secretary's obligation to issue regulations in permissive rather than mandatory terms, "the Committee expected that initial standards will be promulgated as soon as practicable." Id. at 17. "It was precisely to take advantage of the expertise and flexibility available in the administrative process in these regards, and the possibility for continuous review and updating of the standards, that the Committee opted for a system of administrative rather than statutory standards." Id.

The Solicitor General also explains that this construction of the preemption clause accords with the administrative history implementing the Boat Safety Act. See U.S. Br. 14-15. The day after the Act was signed into law, the Secretary issued a statement exempting all existing state "laws and regulations" from preemption under the express language of the new statute. 36 Fed. Reg. 15,764-65 (Aug. 11, 1971). The Secretary noted that he was acting under the authority conferred by Congress, which provided that the Secretary "may, if he considers that boat safety will not be adversely affected, issue exemptions from any provision of this Act or regulations and standards established thereunder, on terms and conditions as he considers appropriate." Id. (quoting 46 U.S.C. § 4305). Because "boating safety will not be adversely affected by continuing in effect those existing laws and regulations," the Secretary exempted each State from the operation of the express preemption clause, which "prohibit[s] any of those jurisdictions from continuing in effect or enforcing any provision of law or regulation that is not identical to a Federal regulation." 36 Fed. Reg. at 15,765. The exemption was to remain in effect "until expressly superseded, revoked, or otherwise terminated." Id.

About a year later, the Coast Guard exercised the authority delegated by the Secretary to issue voluminous regulations governing boat safety pursuant to 46 U.S.C. § 4302. See 37 Fed. Reg. 15,777-85 (Aug. 4, 1972). These regulations cover a broad spectrum of safety matters, such as design standards for horsepower, electrical, fuel, ventilation, and start-in-gear systems, requirements for safety equipment to be carried on boats, and measures to correct especially hazardous conditions. See, e.g., 33 C.F.R. Pts. 175, 177, 181, 183 (1997). Thereafter, the Coast Guard proposed to replace the previous blanket exemption from preemption with a more limited provision, noting that "the issuance of these regulations removes the necessity for an exemption to the prohibitions of [the Act's preemption clause] concerning performance or other safety standards for boats." See 38 Fed. Reg. 71 (Dec. 27, 1972). The blanket exemption from preemption for state laws concerning boat performance or safety standards was eventually eliminated. See 38 Fed. Reg. 6914-15 (Mar. 8, 1973).

Both the legislative history and subsequent administrative history implementing the Boat Safety Act thus reinforce the plain language of the preemption clause. That provision operates to preempt all state laws that are not "identical" to federal regulations, unless they concern certain uniquely hazardous local conditions or unless the Secretary specifically confers additional authority to act. n2

REV_00259204

n2 Contrary to the assertions made by the Solicitor General, see U.S. Br. 14-15, nothing in the administrative history implementing the Act suggests that the exemptions to preemption granted first by the Secretary and later by the Coast Guard do not apply to state common law. Indeed, the Coast Guard explained its later, more limited, exemption by noting that it "will principally [but not solely] affect State statutes and regulations." 38 Fed. Reg. at 6914 (emphasis and bracketed material added). See also infra Sections II & III.

Here, the Court's application of the statute's preemption analysis is relatively uncomplicated. The Coast Guard has not required manufacturers to install propeller guards on outboard motors. The State of Georgia has not obtained authorization from the Secretary to require manufacturers to install propeller guards, and no claim has been made that they would address any uniquely hazardous local conditions. Petitioners' tort claim based on respondent's failure to install propeller guards thus is expressly preempted by the Boat Safety Act.

The Solicitor General tries to avoid this straightforward conclusion by arguing that: (1) the preemption clause contained in section 4306 of the Boat Safety Act does not encompass "standards" and "requirements" imposed by state common law; and (2) in any event, section 4311(g) of the Boat Safety Act should be read to override the preemption clause and to preserve all state common law. See U.S. Br. 13-25. These arguments are incorrect, as shown in Sections II and III, infra.

II. THE PREEMPTION CLAUSE APPLIES TO REQUIREMENTS IMPOSED BY STATE COMMON LAW AS WELL AS THOSE IMPOSED BY STATE STATUTE OR RULE.

The preemption clause in the Boat Safety Act states that no State may "establish, continue in effect, or enforce a law or regulation" establishing a "performance or other safety standard" or imposing such a "requirement" for recreational vessels and their associated equipment, which is "not identical to" a regulation prescribed by the Coast Guard under the Act. 46 U.S.C. § 4306. Petitioners and the Solicitor General contend that this provision encompasses only "state legislative and administrative enactments," but not common law. Petrs. Br. 13; U.S. Br. 11-12. They thus argue that all common law damages actions -- regardless of whether they set requirements or standards that differ from a federal requirement that is directly applicable -- are immune from a claim-by-claim determination of whether they are preempted under the Act. This extreme position is wrong, for a number of reasons.

First, the Court has rejected this very argument in three cases, holding that the use of terms such as "law," "standard," and "requirement" in a preemption provision plainly covers standards and requirements set by common law damages actions. See Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 116 S. Ct. 2240, 2259-60 (1996) (Breyer, J., concurring); id. at 2262 (O'Connor, J., concurring and dissenting in part); CSX Transp., Inc. v. Easterwood, 507 U.S. 658, 664 (1993); Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 520-24 (1992) (Stevens, J., plurality opinion); id. at 548-49 (Scalia, J., concurring and dissenting in part). The sound reasons for the Court's repeated holding on this interpretive point compel adherence to stare decisis as the Court addresses it once again in this case. n3 n3 The Solicitor General directly disagrees with the holdings of these cases, see U.S. Br. 17-18 & n.9, yet never offers any plausible basis for overruling them. For their part, petitioners essentially ignore the Court's holdings in Medtronic, CSX, and Cipollone when discussing this point. See Petrs. Br. 24-28.

In Cipollone, the Court was obliged to construe the express preemption provisions contained in two successive federal statutes -- the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act, 79 Stat. 282 (1965), and the Public Health Cigarette Smoking Act of 1969, 84 Stat. 87. The Court determined that in the preemption clause in the 1965 Act, "Congress spoke precisely and narrowly: 'No statement relating to smoking and health shall be required in the advertising of [properly labeled] cigarettes.'" Cipollone, 505 U.S. at 518 (quoting section 5(b) of the 1965 Act). The Court noted that this language was consistent with "the continued vitality of state common law damage actions," and was "best read as having superseded only positive enactments by legislatures or administrative agencies that mandate particular warning labels." Id. at 518-19.

REV_00259205

The Court held, however, that Congress changed the situation dramatically by enacting the "much broader" preemption clause contained in the 1969 Act. 505 U.S. at 520. That provision introduced new constraints upon all manner of requirements, duties, and standards imposed under state law by stating that "no requirement or prohibition based on smoking and health shall be imposed under State law with respect to the advertising or promotion of any cigarettes" that are labeled as required under federal law. 15 U.S.C. § 1334(b). Based on this language -- particularly the reference to "requirement[s] or prohibition[s] ... imposed under State law" -- the Court held that common law actions were within the coverage of the preemption clause in the 1969 Act. 505 U.S. at 520-24. n4 n4 The plurality opinion on this point actually speaks for the majority, for it is reinforced by the express agreement of Justices Scalia and Thomas. See 505 U.S. at 548-49 (Scalia, J., concurring and dissenting in part).

In Cipollone, therefore, the Court specifically rejected the linguistic argument urged by petitioners here in an attempt to limit the scope of terms such as "standard" and "requirement" to exclude the effects of damage actions brought under state common law. The Court explicitly found this argument to be "at odds both with the plain words of the 1969 Act and with the general understanding of common law damages actions." 505 U.S. at 521. In a key passage that squarely resolves this issue, the Court stated: "The phrase 'no requirement or prohibition' sweeps broadly and suggests no distinction between positive enactments and common law; to the contrary, those words easily encompass obligations that take the form of common law rules." Id. Even though there was some evidence in the legislative history suggesting that Congress "was primarily concerned with positive enactments by States and localities," the Court was emphatic that "the language of the Act plainly reaches beyond such enactments." Id. (emphasis added). n5 n5 Justice Scalia's separate opinion, joined by Justice Thomas, expressly agreed that the broader language of the 1969 Act "plainly reaches beyond [positive] enactments," and "general tort-law duties" can impose requirements or prohibitions within the meaning of the 1969 Act. See 505 U.S. at 548-49 (Scalia, J., concurring and dissenting in part) (brackets in original).

The Court dispatched the same argument more briefly in the CSX case, where it considered the preemptive effect of the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970, 84 Stat. 971. The preemption clause contained in that statute provided that applicable federal regulations would preempt any state "law, rule, regulation, order, or standard relating to railroad safety." 45 U.S.C. § 434. n6 In a single sentence, the Court treated the issue as settled, flatly stating that "legal duties imposed on railroads by the common law fall within the scope of these broad phrases." 507 U.S. at 664 (citing Cipollone plurality and concurrence). No member of the Court dissented from this proposition.

n6 The Railroad Safety Act's preemption clause provided that "[a] State may adopt or continue in force any law, rule, regulation, order, or standard relating to railroad safety until such time as the Secretary has adopted a rule, regulation, order, or standard covering the subject matter of such State requirement," but included an exception for "an additional or more stringent [state] law, rule, regulation, order, or standard relating to railroad safety when necessary to eliminate or reduce an essentially local safety hazard," when "not incompatible" with Federal law. 45 U.S.C. § 434; see 507 U.S. at 662 n.2.

In Medtronic, the Court addressed the Medical Device Amendments of 1976, 90 Stat. 539, which contained a preemption clause barring any State from " establishing or continuing in effect" any "requirement" relating to the safety or effectiveness of a medical device that differed from any applicable Federal requirement. 21 U.S.C. § 360k(a). Plaintiffs argued that "common-law duties are never 'requirements'" within the meaning of the statute, and that the statute "therefore never pre-empts common-law actions." 116 S. Ct. at 2258 (Stevens, J., plurality opinion).

REV_00259206

A majority of the Court directly rejected this argument. Justice Breyer, in a separate concurrence, stated that "one can reasonably read the word 'requirement' as including the legal requirements that grow out of the application, in particular circumstances, of a State's tort law." 116 S. Ct. at 2259 (Breyer, J., concurring). After setting forth the Court's holdings to the same effect in Cipollone and CSX, Justice Breyer observed that the same rationale "would seem applicable to the quite similar circumstances at issue here." Id. at 2259. He also agreed on this point with Justice O'Connor's separate opinion for four Justices, which held that state common law actions impose "requirements" because they "operate to require manufacturers to comply with common-law duties." Id. at 2262 (O'Connor, J., concurring and dissenting in part) (citing Cipollone). The other Justices found it unnecessary to address the issue,since none of plaintiffs' claims was preempted in any event. Id. at 2259 (Stevens, J., plurality opinion). The conclusion reached by the five Justices who addressed the question thus constitutes yet another holding that common law claims impose state law "requirements" within the meaning of such an explicit preemption clause. See generally Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 193-94 (1977) (majority of Justices reaching conclusion by way of "fragmented" opinions state "the holding of the Court"). n7 n7 In addition, the Court has frequently held that the term "standards" refers to state common law as well as state positive law. See, e.g., Asahi Metal Indus. Co. v. Superior Ct., 480 U.S. 102, 114-15 (1987) (referring to "safety standards" set by California products liability law); United Gas Improvement Co. v. Continental Oil Co., 381 U.S. 392, 400 (1965) (referring to "common law standards"); Kermarec v. Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, 358 U.S. 625, 630-31 (1959) (referring to "standard of care" imposed by common law).

It bears mention that the Government's position in this case is flatly inconsistent with the position in Medtronic, where the Solicitor General stated: "We do not agree with respondents' broad submission that the act's preemption provision does not speak at all to common law tort claims. In our view, the word 'requirement' in section 521(a) of the act encompasses duties imposed by State common law, as well as duties imposed by State statutory or regulatory law." Transcript of Oral Argument, Medtronic (No. 95-754), at 45. There the Solicitor General added that "Cipollone and the use of the requirement there, and just the nature of State law ... would also encompass duties imposed by the ... law from whatever source." Id. at 46. The Government offers no explanation for this abrupt about-face from its position in Medtronic.

Second, even if petitioners' argument were not squarely foreclosed by these prior decisions, it is still plainly wrong because it ignores the ordinary interrelations between the substantive principles of the common law and statutory law in regulating the health, safety, and welfare of citizens in each state. Again, the Court discussed this point in Cipollone, and pointed out that "common law damages actions of the sort raised by petitioner are premised on the existence of a legal duty and it is difficult to say that such actions do not impose 'requirements or prohibitions,'" for "it is the essence of the common law to enforce duties that are either affirmative requirements or negative prohibitions." 505 U.S. at 522; see also Medtronic, 116 S. Ct. at 2262 (O'Connor, J., concurring and dissenting in part) (state common law actions constitute "requirements" where they "operate to require manufacturers to comply with common-law duties").

In this regard, it simply does not matter whether the remedy used to enforce the substantive component of the state law is the payment of damages to private parties rather than the payment of fines to the government or some other enforcement mechanism. "Such regulation can be as effectively exerted through an award of damages as through some form of preventive relief. The obligation to pay compensation can be, indeed is designed to be, a potent method of governing conduct and controlling policy." San Diego Bldg. Trades Council, Millmen's Union, Local 2020 v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 247 (1959). The Court recently reaffirmed this position. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1598 n.17 (1996) ("State power may be exercised as much by a jury's application of a state rule of law in a civil lawsuit as by a statute.").

REV_00259207

The intricate relationship between state common law and state statutory and administrative law in regulating private conduct, and the extent to which they are inherently interwoven, is widely understood and readily demonstrated. Earlier in this century, the courts typically led the way on health and safety issues by applying and developing common law principles to regulate the private sector. The requirements, obligations, and standards imposed in accordance with these principles, in turn, were eventually codified and at times modified by state legislatures when they took the initiative to address particular concerns. On occasion, legislatures have enacted regulatory statutes conferring administrative authority on government agencies to regulate private conduct directly, while still retaining the common law to fill the remaining gaps between these positive enactments. The further interaction of state legislation and state common law adjudication often is even more complex, as legislative or regulatory enactments may be used to supply the duty of care underlying private damage actions. See generally Melvin Eisenberg, The Nature of the Common Law, (1988); Guido Calabresi, A Common Law for the Age of Statutes (1982). n8 n8 The Solicitor General offers a strained construction of the statutory phrase "State or political subdivision" that would appear to read the courts entirely out of the framework of state governments. See U.S. Br. 18-19. This approach overlooks the fact that the statute in Medtronic contained the same phrase ("State or a political subdivision"), and a majority of the Court held that its preemption clause reached common law claims. In the same passage, the Solicitor General suggests that if state courts wished to apply state common law standards or requirements to the design or manufacture of recreational vessels and associated equipment, it would be absurd to expect state judges to apply for federal authorization to do so. Id. We agree that the suggestion is absurd; it also is irrelevant. As with the state legislatures, the state courts have authority to act only where state law is not preempted; any application for an exemption from preemption to the governing federal agency -- here, the Coast Guard -- would be made by state executive officials. Neither state legislators nor state judges would be expected to make this application.

At the state level, therefore, it is undeniable that the common law forms an integral part of the law's comprehensive regulation of private conduct. Taken in combination with statutory and regulatory enactments, the common law imposes a continual procession of legal "requirements," obligations, prohibitions, and "standards" that are designed to influence and regulate the actions of businesses and individual citizens. See, e.g., Medtronic, 116 S. Ct. at 2262 (O'Connor, J., concurring and dissenting in part) ("state common-law damages actions operate to require manufacturers to comply with common-law duties"). Any reading of these terms that would pose a putative distinction between common law and positive law in this respect would be fundamentally misguided. See id. at 2259 (Breyer, J., concurring) ("The effects of the state agency regulation and the state tort suit are identical.").

Third, the argument presented by petitioners and their amici rests on the odd assumption that Congress intended an ad hoc collection of state citizens assembled to hear one civil case -- a jury -- to have greater power to set standards that differ from Federal law than do sovereign state officials acting through the careful, deliberative processes established in the legislative and administrative spheres. Such a result would be a perverse undermining of the democratic process, and the Court should not assume that Congress intended "this anomalous result" unless it clearly so provided. See Medtronic, 116 S. Ct. at 2260 (Breyer, J., concurring). Certainly nothing in the language of the Boat Safety Act requires this upside-down worldview. Indeed, for the reasons stated above, section 4306 plainly contemplates

REV_00259208

002
03/22/2002 12:27 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_0025916

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED

01-706 NOV 14 2001

No. _____

IN THE

Supreme Court Of The United States

Rex R. Sprietsma, Adm'r of the Estate of Jeanne Sprietsma, Deceased,

Petitioner,

v.

Mercury Marine, a Division of Brunswick Corporation,

Respondent.

On Petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Illinois

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI

Arthur H. Bryant
Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, P.C.
One Kaiser Plaza, Suite 275
Oakland, CA 94612-3684
(510) 622-8150

Joseph A. Power, Jr.
Todd A. Smith
Devon C. Bruce
Power, Rogers & Smith, P.C.
35 West Wacker Drive, Suite 3700
Chicago, IL 60601
(312) 236-9381

Leslie A. Brueckner
(Counsel of Record)
Michael J. Quirk
Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, P.C.
1717 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Suite 800
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 797-8600

011
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:29 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259225

B. The Proceedings Below

This case arose out of a boating accident in Tennessee state waters in which the petitioner's decedent, Jeanne Sprietsma, fell from a motor boat and was struck by the motor's propeller blades. App. 1. As a result, she suffered serious injuries and later died. App. 1. The boat was equipped with a 115-horsepower outboard motor that did not contain a propeller guard. The motor was designed, manufactured, and sold by respondent Mercury Marine, a division of Brunswick Corporation. App. 1, 23.

Petitioner Rex Sprietsma is the administrator of the estate of his deceased wife. App. 1. He filed a wrongful death action against Mercury Marine in the Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois seeking to recover damages for his wife's pain and suffering, along with the financial losses suffered by him and his son. App. 1. The complaint alleged that the boat engine was defectively designed because it was not equipped with a propeller guard. App. 24.

Respondent moved to dismiss on the ground that Mr. Sprietsma's claims are preempted by the Boat Safety Act and by the Coast Guard's decision not to regulate propeller guards. The trial court granted the motion to dismiss, finding the claims to be preempted. App. 39. The appellate court affirmed, holding that the claims are expressly preempted by the Boat Safety Act. App. 34.

On appeal, the Illinois Supreme Court rejected the appellate court's express preemption ruling, but nonetheless held that petitioner's claims are impliedly preempted by federal law. App. 16. At the outset, the court held that the case is not subject to the strong presumption against federal preemption that ordinarily applies to health and safety issues – "matters which have traditionally come within the jurisdiction of the state through its police powers." App. 5 (citing Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470, 474 (1996)). Relying on this Court's recent decision in United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89 (2000), which held that the presumption against preemption does not apply to cases involving international maritime commerce, the Illinois Supreme Court declined to apply any presumption against preemption in this recreational boating case on the theory that, "[a]lthough Sprietsma's claims bear upon state and federal concerns, we believe the federal concerns predominate in this case." App. 6.

The lower court then considered the questions of express and implied preemption under the Boat Safety Act. Regarding the former, the court concluded that the Act's broadly-worded savings clause, which provides that "compliance with this chapter . . . does not relieve a person from liability at common law or under state law," precludes any finding of express preemption of common law claims. App. 9-10. The Illinois Supreme Court went on to hold, however, that petitioner's claims are impliedly preempted by federal law because a jury verdict finding Mercury Marine liable for not installing a propeller guard would "frustrate" federal purposes. App. 16. Despite its acknowledgment that the Coast Guard has never issued any regulations governing propeller guards (yet retains the authority to do so if it so chooses), the court found that the agency's regulatory *in*action amounted to an affirmative decision to preclude any common law claims seeking to hold a manufacturer liable for failing to install propeller guards. In the court's view, "[a] damage award would, in effect, create a propeller guard requirement, thus frustrating the objectives of Congress in promulgating the [Boat Safety Act]." App. 16 (citations omitted).

012
03/22/2002 12:30 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259226

In so ruling, the lower court chose to disregard the United States' only articulated view on the matter: the anti-preemption position set forth in the Solicitor General's amicus curiae brief in Lewis, which argued that "[t]he Coast Guard's conclusion in 1990 that the available data did not justify the issuance of regulations concerning propeller guards is not a basis for implied conflict preemption of petitioners' common law tort claims." Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners at 26, Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 522 U.S. 978 (1997) (No. 97-288) (emphasis added). The Lewis brief emphasized that "[t]he Coast Guard has never formally determined that a requirement [of propeller guards] would be contrary to the interests of boat safety." Id. The United States further noted that,

> [i]f it had reached that conclusion, the Coast Guard may well have prohibited propeller guards. The Coast Guard stated only that the "available propeller guard accident data do not support imposition of a regulation requiring propeller guards."

Id. Given this fact, and the absence of any federal regulation governing propeller guards, the United States concluded that the petitioners' claims did not in any way conflict with the federal regulatory scheme. Id. at 25-30.

In the face of these arguments, the Illinois Supreme Court ultimately held that the United States' no-preemption position in Lewis was not persuasive because, among other things, "[t]he Solicitor General has not presented his argument concerning the Lewis case or the Sprietsma claim to this court." App. 18. This petition followed.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

I. This Case Presents the Same Federal Preemption Issue that this Court Considered in Lewis, But Could Not Resolve Because Lewis Settled After Oral Argument.

This case presents the same issue of federal preemption that was before the Court in Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 107 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir. 1997), cert. granted, 522 U.S. 978 (1997), cert. dismissed, 523 U.S. 1113 (1998): whether state common law tort claims that a boat was defectively designed because it lacked a propeller guard are preempted by federal law. In Lewis, the United States submitted an amicus curiae brief arguing that, because the Coast Guard never issued any regulations relating to propeller guards, common law no-propeller-guard claims do not conflict with or undermine any federal regulatory purpose. Lewis settled after oral argument, so no opinion was ever rendered in the case. The lower courts remain split on the issue, with one state supreme court (Texas) holding that no-propeller-guard claims are not preempted and a host of federal courts and the Illinois Supreme Court holding just the opposite (see infra at II).

The decision below is the first meaningful opportunity for this Court to review the propeller-guard issue in the wake of Lewis. The same question was presented in Lady v. Neal Glaser Marine, Inc., 228 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2000), cert. denied sub nom. Lady v. Outboard Marine Corp., 121 S. Ct. 1402 (2001), but the respondent declared bankruptcy shortly after the petition was filed and the writ was denied. The Illinois Supreme Court's ruling in this case is the first decision on the propeller-guard question rendered by a state high court or federal court of appeals since the denial of review in Lady.

013
03/22/2002 12:30 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259227

Thus, this case presents the first opportunity since Lewis for this Court to resolve this important issue of federal law.[2]

II. There is a Direct Split of Authority as to Whether No-Propeller-Guard Claims are Preempted by the Boat Safety Act.

Review is also warranted because there is a direct split between the Supreme Court of Texas and the Illinois Supreme Court (along with three federal circuit courts) as to whether a common law claim that a manufacturer is liable for failing to equip its boats with propeller guards is preempted by the Boat Safety Act.

In Moore v. Brunswick Bowling & Billiards Corp., 889 S.W.2d 246 (Tex.), cert. denied, 115 U.S. 664 (1994), the Texas Supreme Court held that the Boat Safety Act neither expressly nor impliedly preempts no-propeller-guard claims. The court emphasized the strong presumption against federal preemption of state common law claims – a presumption that "particularly obtains when, as in this case, state regulation of health and safety matters is involved." Id. at 249 (citing Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical Labs., Inc., 471 U.S. 707, 715 (1985)). In light of this strong presumption against preemption, Moore rejected the boat manufacturer's claim that the reference to "law or regulation" in the Boat Safety Act's preemption provision encompasses – and expressly preempts – common law claims. 889 S.W.2d at 250.

---

[2] In fact, in opposing review in Lady, the bankrupt defendant urged this Court to await review of the decision in this case, arguing that Mr. Sprietsma's claims against a non-bankrupt boat manufacturer would present a more suitable vehicle for review. See Respondent's Brief in Opposition at 24, Lady v. Outboard Marine Corp., No. 00-1031.

The Texas Supreme Court also rejected the boat manufacturers' argument that the plaintiff's no-propeller-guard claims were impliedly preempted under the Act. Id. at 251. On this point, the defendants argued that "a jury award in this case will conflict with and undermine the goals of the Act by creating a standard requiring propeller guards, in the face of the Coast Guard's determination that guards should not be mandated." Id. The Texas Supreme Court disagreed, stating, first, that the Coast Guard's decision not to commence rulemaking did not "reflect an intention to foreclose state tort liability." Id.

As to the boat manufacturers' claim that preemption must be implied because permitting no-propeller-guard claims would undermine Congress' goal of creating uniform safety regulations, the Texas Supreme Court stated: "the [Act's] savings clause reflects that Congress was willing to tolerate some tension between the concept that uniform safety regulations should be established at the federal level and the concept that a state may nevertheless award tort damages for unsafe products." Id. at 252. This approach makes sense, in the Texas Supreme Court's view, because "the regulatory effect of damage awards is not equivalent to that of positive enactments: a manufacturer who incurs tort liability for failing to install propeller guards has a choice not available to the regulated manufacturer – installing guards on future boats or taking no action and bearing the liability as a cost of doing business." Id. at 251 (citing Goodyear Atomic Corp. v. Miller, 486 U.S. 174, 185-86 (1988)). Moore concluded that, although "[w]e recognize the potential for conflict, [we] do not think it justifies a holding of preemption." Id. at 251-52.

The decision below is squarely in conflict with Moore. Although the two courts agree that there is no express preemption of common law claims under the Boat Safety Act (in light of the Act's savings clause), the Illinois Supreme Court split with Moore in holding that no-propeller-guard claims are impliedly preempted by the Coast Guard's regulatory inaction. To reach this conclusion, the lower court began by abandoning a core proposition of law embraced in Moore: that such claims are subject to a strong presumption against federal preemption. See App. 6. Having jettisoned the presumption against preemption, the lower court went on to conclude – again directly contrary to the holding in Moore – that "[a] damage award would, in effect, create a propeller guard requirement, thus frustrating the objectives of Congress in promulgating the [Boat Safety Act]." App. 16. Such an outcome, the court held, "would present an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the purposes and objectives Congress sought in enacting the [Boat Safety Act]." App. 16.

014
03/22/2002 12:30 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259228

Thus, the decision below is manifestly at odds with the Texas Supreme Court's decision in Moore. In addition, as the lower court recognized, this split is reflected in numerous other court decisions regarding the scope of preemption under the Boat Safety Act, including Carstensen v. Brunswick Corp., 49 F.3d 430 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 866 (1995), Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 107 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir. 1997), cert. dismissed, 523 U.S. 1113 (1998), and Lady v. Neal Glaser Marine, Inc., 228 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2000), cert. denied sub nom. Lady v. Outboard Marine Corp., 121 S. Ct. 1402 (2001). See App.16 (collecting cases). Review is warranted here to finish the job started in Lewis: to resolve this split, prevent further confusion among the lower courts, and ensure that state common law claims that Congress intended to preserve are not preempted.[3]

III. The Decision Below Conflicts with Relevant Decisions of this Court.

Review is also warranted because the lower court's ruling conflicts with decisions of this Court in at least three ways: first, it improperly affords preemptive effect to federal regulatory inaction; second, it improperly abandons the long-standing presumption against preemption; and, third, it fails to give any – let alone sufficient – weight to the federal government's own interpretation of the preemptive effect of the Coast Guard's decision not to regulate propeller guards.

A. The Lower Court Erroneously Afforded Preemptive Effect to the Federal Government's Regulatory Inaction.

To begin with, the Illinois Supreme Court's holding that the Coast Guard's decision not to commence rulemaking with respect to propeller guards has preemptive force directly conflicts with Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280 (1995), which made clear that the mere absence of federal regulation with respect to a particular product has no preemptive effect. In Myrick, this Court considered whether a claim that a manufacturer was negligent for failing to install antilock brakes in tractor-trailer trucks was preempted by the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1381 et seq. (1982), and by a federal motor vehicle

[3] Unless this split is resolved, the viability of no-propeller-guard claims in Texas will depend entirely on whether a case proceeds in state or federal court.

015
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:31 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259229

safety regulation governing airbrake systems in buses, trucks, and trailers. 49 C.F.R. § 571.121 (S3) (1993) ("Standard 121").

As originally promulgated in 1974, Standard 121 required that all truck manufacturers install antilock brakes. This requirement was invalidated by the Ninth Circuit's decision in Paccar, Inc. v. NHTSA, 573 F.2d 632, 640 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 862 (1978), which held that, although the braking performance of some trucks was improved by antilock brakes, "critical problems began with mass production of vehicles designed to meet the Standard." Id. at 641. Due to the unforeseen manufacturing difficulties encountered during mass production of antilock systems, the Ninth Circuit ordered the federal regulatory agency to suspend the antilock requirements of Standard 121. Id. at 643. In response, the agency added language to the regulation stating that the antilock brake provisions invalidated by the Paccar ruling "are not applicable to trucks and trailers." 49 C.F.R. § 571.121(S3).

In Myrick, the truck manufacturers argued that Standard 121 preempted common law claims that their trucks were defective because they lacked antilock brakes. This Court disagreed, holding that there could be no express preemption because there was no federal standard in place regarding antilock brakes in trucks. See 514 U.S. at 286. In so holding, Myrick explicitly rejected the truck manufacturers' claim "that the absence of regulation itself constitutes regulation," especially where "there is no evidence that [the federal agency] decided that [the product] should be free from all state regulation . . .." Id. Regarding implied preemption, the Court ruled, first, that "it is not impossible for petitioners to comply with both federal and state law because there is simply no federal standard for a private party to comply with." Id. at 289. Frustration of federal objectives was also not an issue, in the Court's view, because the federal regulation "currently has nothing to say concerning [antilock brake] devices one way or another, and [the federal agency] has not ordered truck manufacturers to refrain from using [such] devices. A finding of liability against petitioners would undermine no federal objectives or purposes with respect to [antilock brake] devices, since none exist." Id. at 289-90.

The decision below is squarely at odds with Myrick. In finding federal preemption of petitioner's no-propeller-guard claim, the Illinois Supreme Court embraced the very proposition that was rejected in Myrick: that an agency's decision not to regulate has the same preemptive force as a decision to regulate. This ruling has the perverse effect of transforming a federal decision not to commence rulemaking regarding propeller guards on motor boats into an affirmative decision to ban any common law claim seeking to require a manufacturer to pay damages for failing to include a specific propeller guard on a specific boat. Not only is this conclusion contrary to Myrick, but it flies in the face of numerous prior decisions of this Court holding that mere federal regulatory inaction, without more, does not imply an authoritative federal determination that the area is best left unregulated. See, e.g., Puerto Rico Dep't of Consumer Affairs v. Isla Petroleum Corp., 485 U.S. 496, 503-04 (1988) (federal inaction alone does not have preemptive effect); Arkansas Elec. Co-Op v. Arkansas Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 375, 384 (1983) (regulatory inaction only has preemptive force where Congress has made clear that its intention is "to fill a regulatory gap, not to perpetuate one.") (footnote omitted).

The lower court also ignored the fact that, as in Myrick, "there is no evidence that [the federal agency] decided that [the product at issue] should be free from all state regulation . . .." 514 U.S. at 286. As explained above, the Coast Guard's decision not to commence rulemaking regarding propeller guards stemmed from its "many questions about whether a universally acceptable propeller guard is available or technically feasible in all modes of boat operation." App. 40. Due to the lack of a "universally acceptable" solution, and the high statutory threshold of having to demonstrate that federal regulation would "avoid a substantial risk of personal injury to the public," 46 U.S.C. § 4302(c)(2), the Coast Guard declined to commence rulemaking to consider a nationwide standard for propeller guards. Id. The agency never stated, however, that there was no technology appropriate for use in any mode of boat operation; rather, the Coast Guard found that there was no technology appropriate for a national, across-the-board regulation applicable to all types of boats. App. 40. Contrary to the Illinois Supreme Court's apparent reasoning, this determination would be entirely consistent with a state's decision to allow some boat manufacturers to be held liable for failing to install a certain type of propeller guard on specific boats or on boats used for a particular purpose.

016
03/22/2002 12:31 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259230

There is also no evidence that the Coast Guard intended to restrict the ability of victims of propeller accidents to seek compensation through the common law tort system. To the contrary, as Moore recognized, the Propeller Subcommittee report that was the basis for the Coast Guard's decision not to regulate propeller guards "mentions that manufacturers have been sued for not installing propeller guards, and recognizes that a federal requirement of propeller guards would establish a prima facie case of manufacturer liability in some states." 889 S.W.2d at 252. Despite this recognition of on-going litigation regarding propeller guards, the agency never suggested that it intended to preempt such actions in the future. See App. 40-41. "Thus even if the Coast Guard made a policy determination, carrying preemptive weight, that propeller guards should not be regulated, its preemptive effect would not necessarily include common law." 889 S.W.2d at 252.

The absence of any preemptive intent on the part of the Coast Guard is dramatically underscored by the manner in which its decision was rendered. Under the Boat Safety Act, the Coast Guard is directed to "prescribe regulations . . . establishing minimum safety standards . . .." 46 U.S.C. § 4302(a)(1) (emphasis added). In keeping with this directive, Congress clearly intended that only properly promulgated regulations would exert preemptive force under the Act. In this case, however, there was no rulemaking proceeding of any sort, let alone a federal regulation proclaiming the Coast Guard's intention to ban state regulation of propeller guards. Instead, the agency's decision not to commence rulemaking was the product of internal deliberations by an advisory subcommitee (as opposed to the notice-and-comment rulemaking procedures mandated by the Administrative Procedure Act, see 5 U.S.C. § 553 (1994)), and was embodied in an informal letter to the Chairperson of the Advisory Council setting forth the agency's decision not to regulate propeller guards. App. 40-44. This is hardly the type of "clear and manifest" expression of preemptive purpose that must be evident before preemption may be found based on regulatory inaction. Isla Petroleum, 485 U.S. at 503.

At bottom, the Coast Guard's decision not to commence rulemaking with regard to propeller guards is markedly similar to the fate of antilock brake regulation described in Myrick. In both cases, the absence of regulation was due to a determination that the current state of technology did not warrant a universal regulatory solution to a safety problem. In Myrick, that decision was made by the Ninth Circuit and then memorialized in the amendment to Standard 121 eliminating the antilock brake

017
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:32 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259231

requirement for trucks and trailers; in this case, the decision not to commence rulemaking was made by the agency in the first instance. But the result in both instances was the same: an absence of any federal regulation mandating or prohibiting the use of the technology in question. Myrick makes clear that federal preemption does not exist under these circumstances.

The Illinois Supreme Court's decision, moreover, has implications far beyond the narrow issue of preemption under the Boat Safety Act. If the decision below is permitted to stand, it could massively broaden the scope of federal preemption far beyond what Congress ever intended. Under the lower court's reasoning, any federal decision not to regulate could be deemed to have preemptive force, regardless of the reason for federal inaction and regardless of the extent to which Congress made clear its intent not to intrude on States' regulatory power and/or strip individuals of their common law remedies. Not only would this constitute a grievous blow against the traditional rights of victims to seek redress for injuries caused by dangerous products, but it would strip the States of their historic power to protect the health and welfare of their citizens. Review is warranted to prevent this deep encroachment on the rights of the States to protect their citizens and of citizens to use the common law to protect themselves – rights that neither Congress nor the Coast Guard ever expressed any intention to restrict.

B. The Lower Court Erroneously Disregarded the Presumption Against Preemption.

Review is also warranted to correct the lower court's decision to abandon any presumption against preemption of common law claims in all cases in the "maritime" context – even those involving a small recreational boat in state waters.

See App. 6. This approach does violence to the rights of the States to provide compensation for their citizens and flies in the face of long-standing decisions of this Court recognizing a strong presumption against federal preemption in health and safety matters. See generally Medtronic, 518 U.S. at 485.

The lower court's error stemmed in part from a misreading of this Court's recent decision in Locke, 529 U.S. 89 (2000), which involved state regulations of the operation and design of ocean-going oil tankers used in international commerce. Locke merely held that, in a case where "[t]he state laws in question bear upon national and international maritime commerce, . . . there is no beginning assumption that concurrent regulation by the State is a valid exercise of its police powers." Id. at 108 (emphasis added). A presumption against preemption is inappropriate in such cases, this Court reasoned, given Congress' longstanding authority "to regulate interstate navigation, without embarrassment from intervention of the separate States and resulting difficulties with foreign nations." Id. at 98. The Court also expressed concern that regulations governing international ocean-going oil tankers implicated "the substantial foreign affairs interests of the Federal Government." Id. at 97.

These concerns have no bearing here. First, this case is entirely unrelated to "interstate navigation," as the accident that harmed petitioner occurred on Tennessee waters. Second, this case has nothing to do with "maritime commerce," international or otherwise, as the Boat Safety Act merely involves federal regulation of recreational vessels, such as the boat that struck petitioner's wife. See 46 U.S.C. § 4301. Finally, the United States' "foreign affairs interests" – so paramount in Locke that "the governments of 13 ocean-going nations expressed their concerns [about conflicting state regulations] through a diplomatic note" (429 U.S. at 97) – are clearly not implicated here. The United States has no greater interest in maintaining presumptively exclusive authority over safety features on small recreational boats than it has regulating medical devices, cigarettes, and myriad other products over which the federal government has authority and yet the presumption against preemption has been applied by this Court with full force. See, e.g., Medtronic, 518 U.S. at 485 (medical devices); Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 516 (1992) (cigarettes).

018
03/22/2002 12:32 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259232

At the same time, Locke reaffirmed that the "beginning assumption" against preemption continues to apply in cases involving the "historic police powers of the States." 429 U.S. at 107 (quoting Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230 (1947)). Numerous prior decisions of this Court have made clear that such powers may be exercised concurrently with the federal government's jurisdiction over maritime matters, see, e.g., Askew v. American Waterways Operators, 411 U.S. 325 (1973); Huron Portland Cement Co. v. City of Detroit, 362 U.S. 440 (1960); Kelly v. State of Washington, 302 U.S. 1 (1937), and that, absent express Congressional intent to preempt the entire field of state law, preemption only lies where the conflict between state and federal law is "so 'direct and positive' that the two acts cannot 'be reconciled or consistently stand together.'" Kelly, 302 U.S. at 10 (citations omitted). See also Askew, 411 U.S. at 341; Huron, 362 U.S. at 444. Nothing in Locke suggests that these cases are no longer good law, or that the presumption against preemption no longer applies in cases – such as this one – that involve the historic police powers of the states to compensate accident victims through the tort system. See, e.g., Medtronic, 518 U.S. at 488. Review is warranted to correct the Illinois Supreme Court's unwarranted holding to the contrary.

C. The Lower Court Erroneously Disregarded the United States' Own Interpretation of the Preemptive Effect of the Coast Guard's Regulatory Inaction.

Finally, review is warranted because the lower court improperly disregarded this Court's repeated teachings that the views of the federal government are entitled to deference when determining the preemptive effect of an agency's regulatory decisions. As this Court held in Medtronic, the United States' interpretation of the scope of preemption is entitled to "substantial weight." 518 U.S. at 496 (majority opinion); id. at 505-07 (Breyer, J., concurring). See also Geier v. Honda, 529 U.S. 861, 885 (1999) (federal government's interpretation of preemptive scope of agency regulations is entitled to "special weight"); Hillsborough County, 471 U.S. at 714-15 ("[t]he [federal government's] statement is dispositive on the question of implicit intent to pre-empt unless either the agency's position is inconsistent with clearly expressed congressional intent, . . . or subsequent developments reveal a change in that position") (citations omitted). Deference to the federal government's understanding of the Boat Safety Act is particularly appropriate where, as here, the United States is ceding authority to the states, not trying to claim power for itself. The concern behind the preemption doctrine – protection of federal interests from inconsistent state or local activity – is not implicated where the United States itself does not object to – and indeed welcomes – state participation. See Hillsborough County, 471 U.S. at 714-15.

The lower court paid lip service to these principles, but then substituted its judgment for that of the United States in holding that petitioner's common law claims are impliedly preempted by federal law. Such an approach was warranted, in the lower court's view, because the United States had not entered an appearance before it – even though the federal government's brief in Lewis was made part of the record in this proceeding. This reasoning simply makes no sense: an amicus curiae brief filed by the Solicitor General's office represents the United States' official position on an issue whether or not the United States has entered a formal appearance in a case.

019
03/22/2002 12:33 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259233

The lower court also held that the Lewis brief is not entitled to deference because "arguments made in the Lewis brief have been rejected by the Supreme Court in Geier." App. 18. This argument is simply wrong. With reference to implied conflict preemption (which is the issue before this Court), the United States in Lewis argued that the absence of any federal regulation of propeller guards, coupled with the absence of any federal determination that a requirement of propeller guards would be contrary to boat safety, meant that a common law damage claim such as petitioner's "would not in any way conflict with the federal regulatory scheme." Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners at 26, Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 522 U.S. 978 (1997) (No. 97-288).

This argument is entirely consistent with, and not in any way undercut by, this Court's recent decision in Geier. Regarding implied conflict preemption, Geier held that a common law claim that an automobile was defective because it lacked an airbag conflicted with a complex federal regulation that was carefully designed to "bring about a mix of different [passive restraint] devices introduced gradually over time." See 529 U.S. at 874. On this latter point, this Court's holding was narrowly confined to the particular regulation at issue, and has no bearing on whether a no-propeller-guard claim like petitioner's would conflict with the U.S. Coast Guard's regulatory *in*action regarding propeller guards.

At the same time, in one key respect that went unmentioned by the lower court, Geier confirms that the Texas Supreme Court got it exactly right. In Geier, the United States had filed an amicus curiae brief arguing that no-airbag claims would conflict with federal regulatory purposes. This Court ultimately deferred to that position, holding that the United States' interpretation of the preemptive effect of agency action is entitled to "special weight." Geier, 529 U.S. at 875. Thus, if anything, Geier provides further reason to grant review and accord the United States' authoritative position on the preemptive effect of the Coast Guard's regulatory inaction the deference it deserves.

CONCLUSION

This petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.

020

Respectfully submitted,

Arthur H. Bryant
Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, P.C.
One Kaiser Plaza, Suite 275
Oakland, CA 94612-3684
(510) 622-8150

Joseph A. Power, Jr.
Todd A. Smith
Devon C. Bruce
Power, Rogers & Smith, P.C.
35 West Wacker Drive
Suite 3700
Chicago, IL 60601
(312) 236-9381

Leslie A. Brueckner
(Counsel of Record)
Michael J. Quirk
Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, P.C.
1717 Massachusetts Avenue, NW, Suite 800
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 797-8600

Counsel for Petitioners

Date: November 14, 2001

03/22/2002 12:33 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ

REV_0025923

003
03/22/2002 12:27 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259217

QUESTION PRESENTED

This case involves the same issue raised by Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., No. 97-288 (October Term, 1997), cert. granted, 522 U.S. 978 (1997), cert. dismissed, 523 U.S. 1113 (1998): whether common law tort claims that a boat was defectively designed because it lacked a propeller guard are preempted by federal law. In Lewis, the United States submitted an amicus curiae brief stating the federal government's view that such claims are not preempted. Lewis, however, settled after oral argument, before any decision was rendered. This case presents the first meaningful opportunity for the Court to consider this preemption issue since Lewis. The question presented is:

Whether the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, 46 U.S.C. §§ 4301-4311 (1988 & Supp. 1993), preempts state common law claims that a recreational motor boat was defectively designed because it lacked a propeller guard when: (1) the Act expressly provides that "[c]ompliance with this chapter or standards, regulations, or orders prescribed under this chapter does not relieve a person from liability at common law or under State law" (46 U.S.C. § 4311(g)); (2) the U.S. Coast Guard has never adopted any standard or regulation with respect to propeller guards; and (3) the United States has taken the position that common law no-propeller-guard claims do not conflict with or otherwise frustrate any federal statutory or regulatory purpose?

004
03/22/2002 12:27 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259218

PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDING

The parties to the proceedings below were petitioner Rex R. Sprietsma, Administrator of the Estate of Jeanne Sprietsma (as appellant) and respondent Mercury Marine, a Division of Brunswick Corporation (as appellee).

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Page

QUESTIONS PRESENTED i

PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDING ii

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES ..... iv-vii

OPINIONS BELOW 1

JURISDICTION 1

STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED 1

STATEMENT OF THE CASE 2

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT 11

I. This Case Presents the Same Federal Preemption Issue that this Court Considered in Lewis, But Could Not Resolve Because Lewis Settled After Oral Argument 11

II. There is a Direct Split of Authority as to Whether No-Propeller-Guard Claims are Preempted by the Boat Safety Act 12

III. The Decision Below Conflicts with Relevant Decisions of this Court 15

CONCLUSION 25

005
03/22/2002 12:27 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259219

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases

Arkansas Elec. Co-Op v. Arkansas Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 375 (1983) 17

Askew v. American Waterways Operators, 411 U.S. 325 (1973) 22

Carstensen v. Brunswick Corp., 49 F.3d 430 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 866 (1995) 14

Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504 (1992) ... 22

Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280 (1995) 15-20

Geier v. Honda, 529 U.S. 861 (1999) 23-25

Goodyear Atomic Corp. v. Miller, 486 U.S. 174 (1988) .. 13

Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical Labs., Inc., 471 U.S. 707 (1985) 12, 23

Huron Portland Cement Co. v. City of Detroit, 362 U.S. 440 (1960) 22

Kelly v. State of Washington, 302 U.S. 1 (1937) 22

Lady v. Neal Glaser Marine, Inc., 228 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2000), cert. denied sub nom. Lady v. Outboard Marine Corp., 121 S. Ct. 1402 (2001) 11, 12, 14

Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 107 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir. 1997), cert. granted, 522 U.S. 978 (1997), cert. dismissed, 523 U.S. 1113 (1998) .. passim

Medtronic v. Lohr, Inc., 518 U.S. 470 (1996) ... 3, 9, 21-23

Moore v. Brunswick Bowling & Billiards Corp., 889 S.W.2d 246 (Tex.), cert. denied, 115 U.S. 664 (1994) ..... passim

Paccar, Inc. v. NHTSA, 573 F.2d 632 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 862 (1978) 16

Puerto Rico Dep't of Consumer Affairs v. Isla Petroleum Corp., 485 U.S. 496 (1988) 17, 19

Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218 (1947) 9

United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89 (2000) 9, 21-22

Statutes and Legislative Materials

Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 553 (1994) 7, 20

Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, 46 U.S.C. §§ 4301-4311 (1988 & Supp. 1993) ..... passim

National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1381 et seq. (1982) 16

S. Rep. No. 248, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971), reprinted in 1971 U.S.C.C.A.N. 1333 3

006
03/22/2002 12:28 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259220

28 U.S.C. § 1257 1

46 U.S.C. § 4302(a)(1) 19

46 U.S.C. § 4302(b) 4

46 U.S.C. § 4302(c)(2) 4

46 U.S.C. § 4302(c)(4) 3

46 U.S.C. § 4306 ..... 1, 5

46 U.S.C. § 4311(g) 1, 5

Regulations

49 C.F.R. § 571.121 (S3) (1993) 16

60 Fed. Reg. 25,191 (1995) 7

61 Fed. Reg. 12,123 (1996) 7

62 Fed. Reg. 22,991 (1997) 7

62 Fed. Reg. 44,507 (1997) 7

64 Fed. Reg. 21,566 (1999) 7

Miscellaneous

Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners, Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 522 U.S. 978 (1997) (No. 97-288) ..... passim

Report of the Propeller Guard Subcommittee of the National Boating Safety Advisory Council, November 7, 1989 6-7

Respondent's Brief in Opposition, Lady v. Outboard Marine Corp., No. 00-1031 12

007
03/22/2002 12:28 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259221

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the Illinois Supreme Court (App. 1-22) is reported at 197 Ill.2d 112 (2001). The opinion of the appellate court (App. 23-38) is reported at 729 N.E.2d 45 (2000). The unreported order of the trial court (App. 39) was entered on November 20, 1998.

JURISDICTION

The decision of the Illinois Supreme Court was filed on August 16, 2001. This Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1257.

STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

The express "preemption clause" of the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, 46 U.S.C. § 4306 (1988), reads as follows:

> Unless permitted by the Secretary under section 4305 of this title, a State or political subdivision of a State may not establish, continue in effect, or enforce a law or regulation establishing a recreational vessel or associated equipment performance or other safety standard or imposing a requirement for associated equipment (except insofar as the State or political subdivision may, in the absence of the Secretary's disapproval, regulate the carrying or use of marine safety articles to meet uniquely hazardous conditions or circumstances within the State) that is not identical to a regulation prescribed under section 4302 of this title.

The express "savings clause" of the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, 46 U.S.C. § 4311(g) (1988), reads as follows:

008
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:28 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259222

> Compliance with this chapter or standards, regulations, or orders prescribed under this chapter does not relieve a person from liability at common law or under State law.

The Coast Guard has not issued any regulations governing propeller guards on recreational vessels. The agency considered developing a regulation requiring propeller guards on all recreational boats, but it decided not to do so. The Coast Guard's decision not to take any regulatory action with respect to such devices was not the subject of any formal rulemaking.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This case presents the question of whether a state common law claim that a boat engine was defectively designed because it lacks a propeller guard is preempted by the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, 46 U.S.C. §§ 4301-4311 (1988 & Supp. 1993) ("Boat Safety Act" or "Act"), and by a decision of the United States Coast Guard not to begin developing a regulation that would have required the use of propeller guards on all recreational motor boats. The Illinois Supreme Court held that such claims are impliedly preempted by federal law, even though the Coast Guard has never regulated propeller guards and even though the United States, in an amicus curiae brief filed with this Court in a case that was settled after oral argument, took the position that no-propeller-guard claims like petitioner's are not preempted by federal law. See Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners, Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 522 U.S. 978 (1997) (No. 97-288). In so doing, the lower court disregarded repeated teachings of this Court that the federal government's own view of the preemptive effect of agency regulations is entitled to "susbstantial weight." E.g., Medtronic v. Lohr, Inc., 518 U.S. 470, 496 (1996) (majority opinion); id. at 505-07 (Breyer, J., concurring). The Illinois Supreme Court's decision, which is in direct conflict with the Texas Supreme Court's holding in Moore v. Brunswick Bowling & Billiards Corp., 889 S.W.2d 246 (Tex.), cert. denied, 115 U.S. 664 (1994), is the subject of this petition.

A. The Federal Statutory and Regulatory Framework.

1. The Boat Safety Act.

The Boat Safety Act was enacted to "improve boating safety by requiring manufacturers to provide safer boats and boating equipment to the public through compliance with safety standards to be promulgated by the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating – presently the Secretary of Transportation." S. Rep. No. 248, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971), reprinted in 1971 U.S.C.C.A.N. 1333, 1333. The Act provides that the Secretary of Transportation "may prescribe regulations establishing minimum safety standards for recreational vessels and associated equipment . . .." 46 U.S.C. § 4302(a)(1). This rulemaking authority has been transferred to the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard. See App. 2. The National Boating Safety Advisory Council (the "Advisory Council") is charged with assisting the Coast Guard in evaluating the need for safety regulations. 46 U.S.C. § 4302(c)(4).

Under the Act, the Coast Guard's authority to issue minimum safety standards is permissive, not mandatory. Id. See also S. Rep. No. 248, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971), reprinted in 1971 U.S.C.C.A.N. 1333, 1338. In addition, the Coast Guard is prohibited from establishing regulations that would compel substantial alterations of existing boats unless compliance with

009
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:28 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259223

those regulations would "avoid a substantial risk of personal injury to the public." 46 U.S.C. § 4302(c)(2). The Act sets forth the procedures that the Coast Guard must follow to prescribe such regulations, including the actual publishing of a proposed safety standard and the express provision of a future effective date after its initial publication. See 46 U.S.C. § 4302(b). Thus the Act > requires certain actions by the [Coast Guard] in the development of safety standards . . . In addition to the specific procedural requirements outlined in the [Act], the [Coast Guard], in promulgating standards, is required to comply with the formal rulemaking procedures in the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. 553).

S. Rep. No. 248, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971), reprinted in 1971 U.S.C.C.A.N. 1333, 1340. Under this scheme, any party adversely affected by a standard prescribed under the Act is entitled to seek judicial review of the standard in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act. Id.

The Boat Safety Act also contains two provisions addressing the effect of Coast Guard regulations on state law. First, Congress included in the legislation an express preemption clause providing, in pertinent part, that:

> Unless permitted by the Secretary under section 4305 of this title, a State or political subdivision of a State may not establish, continue in effect, or enforce a law or regulation establishing a recreational vessel or associated equipment performance or other safety standard or imposing a requirement for associated > equipment . . . that is not identical to a regulation prescribed under section 4302 of this title.

46 U.S.C. § 4306. Second, Congress included an anti-preemption provision, or savings clause, that expressly preserves all common law claims. It provides:

> [c]ompliance with this chapter or standards, regulations, or orders prescribed under this chapter does not relieve a person from liability at common law or under State law.

46 U.S.C. § 4311(g).

Together, the preemption provision and the savings clause govern the preemptive effect of federal regulations issued pursuant to the Boat Safety Act.

2. The Coast Guard's Decision Not to Regulate Propeller Guards.

In 1988, in response to increasing controversy over – and litigation with respect to – the dangers of unguarded boat propellers, the Coast Guard formed a subcommittee of the Advisory Council that included members of the boating industry and the general public (the "Subcommittee"). The Subcommittee was charged with investigating the feasibility of requiring guards to prevent underwater propeller accidents and opining whether "the Coast Guard should move toward a federal propeller guard requirement." App. 3. In November 1989, based in part on its conclusion that propeller guards "could create other safety concerns" (App. 3), the Subcommittee recommended that the Coast Guard should take no regulatory action to require propeller guards." App. 3. This recommendation was then adopted by the Advisory Council and forwarded to the Coast Guard for its consideration. App. 3.

010
03/22/2002 12:29 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259224

On February 1, 1990, the agency adopted the Advisory Council's recommendation that "the Coast Guard should take no regulatory action to require propeller guards." App. 3. In a letter setting forth the rationale underlying the agency's decision not to begin the formal regulatory process, Rear Admiral Robert T. Nelson explained the Coast Guard's position on propeller guards as follows:

> The regulatory process is very structured and stringent regarding justification. Available propeller guard accident data do not support imposition of a regulation requiring propeller guards on motorboats. Regulatory action is also limited by the many questions about whether a universally acceptable propeller guard is available or technically feasible in all modes of boat operation. Additionally, the question of retrofitting millions of boats would certainly be a major economic consideration.

App. 40. Rear Admiral Nelson added, however, that the agency would "continue to collect and analyze accident data for changes and trends . . . [and] review and retain any information made available regarding development and testing of new propeller guarding devices . . ." App. 40-41.

At no point did Rear Admiral Nelson's letter – or anything else issued by the Coast Guard – indicate that the agency had concluded that propeller guards are dangerous. In addition, although the agency was well aware of ongoing lawsuits filed by a number of propeller-strike victims, see Report of the Propeller Guard Subcommittee of the National Boating Safety Advisory Council, November 7, 1989, at 4, Rear Admiral Nelson's letter contains no indication that the agency ever intended to preempt common law claims relating to a manufacturer's failure to install propeller guards in its boats.

The Coast Guard's 1990 decision not to begin the process of developing a regulation to require propeller guards was not the product of any formal rulemaking proceeding and did not result in any regulatory action. Thus, there was no attempt to conform to the notice-and-comment rulemaking requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act. See 5 U.S.C. § 553 (1994). To date, there is still no federal regulation with respect to propeller guards, and their use is neither mandated nor prohibited by federal law.[1]

---

[1] The Coast Guard has, however, continued to study various policy proposals to prevent propeller-related injuries. In 1995, for example, the Coast Guard issued an Advance Notice of Proposed Rulemaking ("ANPRM") requesting comment on "the public's present feelings about the use of propeller guards on these vessels," a request occasioned by a serious accident involving a houseboat. See 60 Fed. Reg. 25,191 (1995). In 1996, the Coast Guard issued another ANPRM "to gather current, specific, and accurate information about the injuries involving propeller strikes and rented boats." 61 Fed. Reg. 12,123 (1996). And, in 1997, the Coast Guard sought "comments on the effectiveness and interventions which have been suggested for reducing the number of recreational boating accidents involving rented power boats in which individuals are injured by the propeller." 62 Fed. Reg. 22,991 (1997). Because it received few responses to that request, the Coast Guard extended the period for comments. See 62 Fed. Reg. 44,507 (1997). To date, the rulemaking is still open, and the Coast Guard is still considering what action, if any, to take with regard to propeller guards. See 64 Fed. Reg. 21,566 (1999).

"Schmitz, John P." <JSchmitz@mayerbrownrowe.com>
03/15/2002 03:01:15 PM

Record Type: Record

To: Lauren J. Vestewig/OPD/EOP@EOP

cc:
Subject: Important Preemption Information for Your Review

Hello Lauren,

Can you please pass this message on to Mr. Lefkowitz, from John? Have a great weekend. - Vanessa

Jay:

Please give me a call about this if you have a chance, it's quite important -- as you can see from the attachment. I've already spoken to Tim Flanigan about it. <<Boat Safety-Preemption.pdf>>

Tel: PRA 6
Cell:

JPS

 - att1.htm

 - Boat Safety-Preemption.pdf

021
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:33 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259237

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
DEC 20 2001
CLERK

No. 01-706

In the Supreme Court of the United States

REX R. SPRIETSMA, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE ESTATE OF JEANNE SPRIETSMA, DECEASED, PETITIONER

v.

MERCURY MARINE, A DIVISION OF BRUNSWICK CORPORATION, RESPONDENT.

On Petition For A Writ Of Certiorari To The Supreme Court Of Illinois

BRIEF FOR RESPONDENT IN OPPOSITION

DONALD F. IVANSEK
SANDRA E. KUPELIAN*
Cassiday, Shade & Gloor
20 North Wacker Drive
Suite 1040
Chicago, IL 60606
(312) 641-3100

Counsel of Record*

Counsel for Respondent Mercury Marine

030
03/22/2002 12:35 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259246

capability of boats equipped with such motors. Id. § 183.53 (boats must be "capable of completing a 90° turn without the driver losing control of the boat or reducing the throttle setting" at "maximum throttle"). The Coast Guard also has authority to notify manufacturers of product defects, and manufacturers must certify that their products comply with all federal design standards. Id. §§ 179.11, 181.7, 181.15.

1. The Coast Guard's study of propeller guards

In 1988, the Coast Guard considered whether to require manufacturers to install propeller guards on their boat motors. As required by 46 U.S.C. § 4302(c)(4), the Coast Guard consulted with the NBSAC and directed it to:

- "Review the available data on the prevention of propeller-strike accidents and the Coast Guard study of various methods of shrouding propellers to prevent contact with a person in the water."
- "Assess the arguments for and against some form of mechanical guard to protect against propeller strikes reflecting the positions of state boating law administrators, the recreational boating industry, and the boating public."

NBSAC, Report of the Propeller Guard Subcommittee (Nov. 7, 1989) ("Report"), Appendix A (Ill. App. A29). The NBSAC in turn appointed a subcommittee to "review and assess available data concerning the nature and incidence of recreational boating accidents in which persons in the water are struck by propellers" and the "[f]easibility of some form of mechanical guard or other action to prevent such contact." Id. at A2.

2. The Subcommittee's makeup and methodology

The Subcommittee comprised representatives of every interested constituency—state boat safety officials, industry representatives, members of recreational boating groups, and members of the general public. Ill. App. A55. Throughout its study, it invited oral and written participation from others by publishing notices of its proceedings in the Federal Register.[2]

Over an 18-month period, the Subcommittee heard from a wide range of interested parties—designers of propeller guards, accident victims and their attorneys, marine engineers, naval architects, academics, industry representatives, and medical doctors. It conducted a "comprehensive" review of the "documentation, materials and information" about propeller-related injuries, including videos, journal articles, patents, on-water test data, and statistics pertaining to the causes of boating accidents. It held public meetings across the country, and it conducted its own on-water tests, where members were given opportunity to drive boats both equipped and unequipped with propeller guards. Ill. App. A2-A5, A34-A39, A41-A43.

3. The Subcommittee's study of propeller guards

The Subcommittee carefully studied each of the "three basic configurations of 'propeller guards'": (1) ring-type guards, (2) screen- or cage-type guards, and (3) nozzle-type guards. Ill. App. A13-A14. Observing that a propeller guard requirement "would necessarily be predicated on the feasibility of guards and establish prima facie manufacturer liability in having failed to provide them," it stated that "[f]easibility" was an "important questio[n] before the Subcommittee." Id. at A6.

---

[2] See, e.g., 53 Fed. Reg. 33210 (Aug. 30, 1988) (public notice of Propeller Guard Subcommittee meeting on Sept. 22-23, 1988, stating that the meeting "is open to the public" and inviting "oral" or "written statement[s]"); id. at 43070 (Oct. 25, 1988) (same for Subcommittee meeting on Nov. 14, 1988); id. at 43069 (same for NBSAC meeting on Nov. 15-16, 1988); 54 Fed. Reg. 15068 (Apr. 14, 1989) (same for Subcommittee meeting on May 13, 1989 to "[d]iscuss the pros and cons of Propeller Guards"); id. at 15066 (same for NBSAC meeting on May 11-12, 1989); id. at 42138 (Oct. 13, 1989) (same for Subcommittee meeting on Nov. 4, 1989); ibid. (same for NBSAC meeting on Nov. 6-7, 1989).

031
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:36 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259247

Ring-type guards consist of a circular band surrounding the motor's propeller to prevent contact from the propeller's side. Ill. App. A15. However, the Subcommittee found that "the ring-type guard creates severe steering and trim effects which cause serious safety and control problems." Id. at A17. In on-water tests, for example, "the boat could not be brought out of a turn at high speed unless power was quickly reduced. In the hands of an inexperienced or negligent operator, a serious accident could result." Ibid. Moreover, ring-type guards create "a new hazard"—"an arm, leg, etc., may be caught by the bars or ring and held against the rotating propeller." Id. at A21-A22.

Cage- or mask-type guards consist of "a screen surrounding the propeller like a fan cage or catcher's mask, constructed of wire mesh, bars or wires." Ill. App. A14. The Subcommittee, however, found that such guards are only feasible for use on slow-moving "rescue boats" or "amusement park bumper boats, which operate at very slow speeds (approximately 2 miles an hour or less) where problems of drag, engine efficiency, structural integrity and boat handling are negligible," and where "a blow to a person in the water" has "minimal effects." "No evidence indicated that this solution had any validity for normal use of pleasure boats at normal planing speeds." Id. at A16.

Nozzle-type guards surround the propeller with "a tunnel or tube" and are designed "to increase its efficiency by producing greater power at low speeds, such as for tug boats and large ships." But "[n]o example of any nozzle device suitable for recreational boat use at normal operating speeds was brought to the attention of the Subcommittee." Ill. App. A14, A16.

4. The Subcommittee's conclusions

Based on the available data, the Subcommittee conducted a cost-benefit analysis of propeller guards, explaining that any "technologically feasible safety featur[e]" must "minimize the consequences of inexperienced or negligent operation, without at the same time (a) creating some other hazard, (b) materially interfering with normal operations, or (c) being at economic costs disproportionate to the particular risk." Ill. App. A21. The Subcommittee flatly rejected the "assert[ion] that propeller guard technology and/or availability meets the foregoing criteria." Ibid. Rather, it found "that propeller guards could create other safety concerns, including: (1) adversely affecting boat operations at speeds greater than 10 miles per hour; (2) increasing the chance of blunt force contact to a person in the water; and (3) creating a new hazard in that an arm or leg could be caught between the guard and the propeller blades." Pet. App. 3.

The Subcommittee thus concluded that "propeller guarding at best could have only a negligible impact on improving boating safety," and that "[o]perators of a 'guard-equipped' boat can be expected to have a false sense of security when approaching persons in the water at slow speeds, with a very real risk of impacting and/or entrapping a body appendage." Ill. App. A22, A24. As stated in the Report's conclusions:

> The development and use of devices such as "propeller guards" can * * * be counter-productive and can create new hazards of equal or greater consequence. * * * [T]here are no indications that there is a generic or universal solution currently available or foreseeable in the future. The boating public must not be misled into thinking there is a "safe" device which would eliminate or significantly reduce such injuries or fatalities.

Id. at A24-A25. The Subcommittee accordingly recommended that "[t]he U.S. Coast Guard should take no regulatory action to require propeller guards," but rather should focus on efforts such as "awareness campaigns" regarding "hazards associated with careless or negligent boat operation." Id. at A25. There were no "minority or dissenting statements." Id. at A2.

032
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:36 FAX 2025149769
REV_0025924

5. The Coast Guard's adoption of the Subcommittee's Report and Recommendations

The 21-member NBSAC and the Coast Guard unanimously adopted all of the Subcommittee's recommendations. Ill. App. A74; id. at A274 ("All of the report's recommendations are accepted" and "will be implemented"). In conformity with the Council's recommendation that the "U.S. Coast Guard should take no regulatory action to require propeller guards," the Coast Guard expressly determined that "[a]vailable propeller guard accident data do not support imposition of a regulation requiring propeller guards." Id. at A25, A274 (emphasis added). In addition to the accident data, the Coast Guard cited "economic" and "feasib[ility]" concerns as grounds for rejecting a propeller guard requirement. Ibid.

The Coast Guard noted that it would continue to "review and retain any information * * * regarding development and testing of new propeller guarding devices." Ill. App. A274. However, despite several instances in which the Coast Guard has invited the public to submit information regarding the feasibility of fitting other types of boats with propeller guards (e.g., houseboats), it has never altered its conclusions regarding high-speed recreational boats.[3] Nor has it issued any regulation requiring any boat to be equipped with such a guard or permitting the States to adopt such a requirement. To the contrary, in one recent notice of proposed rulemaking, it reiterated that "[u]nder current Federal statutes (46 U.S.C. 4306), the States do not have the authority to establish carriage requirements for associated equipment, such as a mechanical means for preventing propeller strikes, on vessels operated on waters where both the Coast Guard and the State have jurisdiction." 61 Fed. Reg. 13123, 13125 (Mar. 26, 1996) (emphasis added). The Coast Guard has held this view since the Act's adoption. See 36 id. 15764 (Aug. 18, 1971); 38 id. 6914 (Mar. 14, 1973).

[3] In 1995, the Coast Guard issued a Notice and Request for Comments on "the public's present feelings about the use of propeller guards" on "houseboats." 60 Fed. Reg. 25191 (May 11, 1995). In 1996, it issued an Advance Notice of Proposed Rulemaking "to gather current, specific, and accurate information about the injuries involving propeller strikes and rented boats." 61 Fed. Reg. 13123 (Mar. 26, 1996); see also 62 Fed. Reg. 22991 (Apr. 28, 1997) (soliciting comments on the effectiveness of specific devices that have been suggested for reducing the number of accidents involving propellers of rented boats). The Coast Guard has received "very general" comments in response to its 1995 notice. 65 Fed. Reg. 23144, 23148 (Apr. 24, 2000).

D. The Proceedings Below

The complaint alleges that on July 10, 1995, while boating in Tennessee, Jeanne Sprietsma "was caused to fall from the boat" in which she was riding as a passenger. Ill. App. A278. Ms. Sprietsma, a 41-year-old woman, allegedly was struck by the boat motor's propeller and sustained injuries resulting in death. The engine was a 115-horsepower outboard motor manufactured by Mercury Marine in 1988, equipped with a traditional propeller. Id. at A289-A290.

The accident occurred in the Mitchell Creek portion of Dale Hollow Lake, a major interstate body of water that spans the Kentucky-Tennessee border. Ill. App. A278. The lake was created by a federal dam built by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers pursuant to the Flood Control Act of 1938 and the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1946. It covers some 935 square miles and has more than 600 miles of shoreline, as well as seven federal recreation areas, 14 commercial marinas, and dozens of lodges, motels, and campgrounds. See generally http://www.lrn.usace.army.mil/op/DAL/rec/ (visited Dec. 4, 2001).

Rex Sprietsma later filed this suit against Mercury Marine and Ebbtide Corporation, the boat's manufacturer. Asserting theories of strict liability and negligence, he alleged that the boat's motor was defectively designed because it lacked a "propeller guard" that would have prevented Ms. Sprietsma's death. Ill. App. A277-A285. He also alleged that the boat, a 1988 Ebbtide ski boat, was defective because it "[a]llowed for

033
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:37 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259249

open bow seating to the very front edge of the bow," lacked "sufficient back support in the seating" or "any substantial form of rail or guard to obstruct a fall out of the boat," and failed to warn of these risks. Id. at A286.

Mercury Marine moved to dismiss the complaint, contending that the claims against it were preempted by the BSA. The Cook County Circuit Court granted the motion. Noting that the Coast Guard's "consideration of the propeller guard regulation or the lack thereof was substantial and within the guidelines set forth by [the BSA]," it held that the Coast Guard's decision not to require propeller guards impliedly preempted tort claims that would impose such a requirement. Ill. App. A292-A293, A295. The Appellate Court unanimously affirmed, observing that "every federal court to have considered the issue" has held that the BSA preempts propeller guard claims. Pet. App. 38.

In a detailed opinion that carefully canvassed governing Supreme Court precedents, the Illinois Supreme Court affirmed the lower courts' decisions. The court began by noting that the BSA, which applies to recreational boats operated "on waters subject to the jurisdiction of the United States" (46 U.S.C. § 4301(a)), is predicated on the "federal maritime jurisdiction." Pet. App. 5-6. Because propeller guard claims "bear upon an area historically regulated by the federal government," the court stated, "'an assumption of nonpre-emption is not triggered.'" Ibid. (quoting Locke, 529 U.S. at 108).

The court went on to hold that petitioner's claims were impliedly preempted under a long line of this Court's decisions, including Geier, Locke, and Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151 (1978). Pet. App. 12-17. Quoting this Court's holding in numerous cases that "'a federal decision to forgo regulation in a given area may imply an authoritative federal determination that the area is best left unregulated, and in that event would have as much pre-emptive force as a decision to regulate,'" the court concluded (Pet. App. 13, 15-16):

> [T]he Coast Guard's failure to promulgate a propeller guard requirement here equates to a ruling that no such regulation is appropriate pursuant to the policy of the FBSA. The Coast Guard made an informed decision that no regulatory action should be taken to require propeller guards after studying the findings and recommendations of the Advisory Council and the Propeller Guard Subcommittee. A damage award would, in effect, create a propeller guard requirement, thus frustrating the objectives of Congress in promulgating the FBSA.

The court was also persuaded by the reasoning of Lady v. Neal Glaser Marine, Inc., 228 F.3d 598, 615 (5th Cir. 2000), cert. denied, 121 S. Ct. 1402 (2001), which held that "'where the Coast Guard has been presented with an issue, studied it, and affirmatively decided as a substantive matter that it was not appropriate to impose a requirement, that decision takes on the character of a regulation and the FBSA's objective of national uniformity mandates that state law not provide a result different than the Coast Guard's.'" Pet. App. 18-19.[4]

REASONS FOR DENYING THE PETITION

The petition satisfies none of this Court's criteria for a grant of certiorari. Its central theme is that this Court should take its "first meaningful opportunity" (Pet. 11) to address the question presented in Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., No. 97-288, which settled before decision. But the issues raised in Lewis (and in this case) have been resolved by intervening decisions of this Court, including Geier and Locke. The court below carefully applied those precedents in concluding that the Coast Guard's considered decision regarding propeller guards has preemptive force, and nine other federal courts—including the only other post-Geier case—have unanimously reached the same result.

---

[4] The court further held that petitioner had waived his various arguments concerning the date of manufacture of the motor in question and accordingly did not address them. Pet. App. 19.

034
USG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:37 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259250

See Lady v. Neal Glaser Marine, Inc., 228 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2000), cert. denied, 121 S. Ct. 1402 (2001). Thus, the petition presents nothing more than a disagreement over the application of this Court's recent decisions to the facts of this particular case, which is not worthy of a grant of certiorari. See Rule 10. There will be other opportunities to review the issue should a conflict arise in the future.

Moreover, several other prudential considerations warrant a denial of certiorari. The decision below is of no practical importance because petitioner could not recover under Illinois law even if his tort claim were allowed to go forward. In addition, this case arose in state court and part of the proceeding—petitioner's claim against Ebbtide Corporation, the boat's manufacturer—is still pending. It thus appears that the decision below is not final as to all parties. Finally, the decision below is fully consistent with this Court's preemption rulings, with the federal interest in uniform design requirements for boats in interstate commerce, and with the public interest in boat safety. There is no ground for further review.

I. THE PETITION FAILS TO SATISFY ANY OF THE CRITERIA FOR A GRANT OF CERTIORARI.

A. This Court's Recent Decisions Have Resolved The Legal Issues Left Undecided In Lewis v. Brunswick Corporation.

Petitioner's principal argument for certiorari is the claim that "[t]his case involves the same issue raised by Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., No. 97-288," which settled before a decision on the merits. Pet. i. Because this Court granted review in Lewis, the argument goes, it should grant review here as well.

Lewis presented two related questions: first, whether "it is constitutionally permissible to imply the federal pre-emption of state common law claims" when a statute contains both express preemption and savings clauses; and second, whether "torts of omission [can be] impliedly preempted" under a statute that contains a savings clause. Pet. i in No. 97-288.

This Court answered both of these questions in Geier. As to whether implied preemption principles apply to laws containing both express preemption and savings clauses, Geier expressly held that such provisions "do[] not bar the ordinary working of conflict pre-emption principles." 529 U.S. at 869. And as to whether a "tort of omission" can be impliedly pre-empted in the face of a savings clause, Geier itself involved such a tort—a "failure to install" claim—yet the Court held that allowing a jury to require auto makers to install airbags would frustrate the purpose of a federal decision not to impose such a requirement. Id. at 881. That a case involves a "failure to install" claim does not alter this Court's analysis: the inquiry remains whether the claim "actually conflicts" with the federal regulatory scheme, either by making it "'impossible' for private parties to comply with both state and federal law," or by "frustrat[ing] the accomplishment of a federal objective." Id. at 873.

Petitioner attempts to discount Geier as "narrowly confined to the particular regulation at issue." Pet. 24. In the court below, however, he argued vehemently that the statutory provisions at issue in Geier and those at issue here were "nearly identical." Pet. 5 in Ill. No. 89492. Moreover, he sought review in the Illinois Supreme Court on the basis of this Court's pending decision in Geier (id. at 4-5, 17), and most of his merits brief below was devoted to arguments concerning Geier.

The court below faithfully applied Geier in holding that a jury verdict imposing a duty to install propeller guards would "present an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the purposes and objectives Congress sought in enacting the FBSA." Pet. App. 16. Petitioner's disagreement with the lower court's application of these "ordinary pre-emption principles, grounded in longstanding precedent" (Geier, 529 U.S. at 874), does not warrant a grant of certiorari.

035
USG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:38 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259251

Any remaining issue presented in Lewis was disposed of in Locke, which addressed the preemptive effect of Coast Guard decisions concerning the design and construction of maritime vessels. Specifically, petitioner complains that the court below entered uncharted waters in holding that a federal decision not to regulate can have preemptive effect in the "absence of any federal regulation." Pet. 20. But Locke unanimously reaffirmed that there are "instances in which state regulation of maritime commerce is inappropriate even absent the exercise of federal authority," citing this Court's repeated holdings that "'where failure of * * * federal officials affirmatively to exercise their full authority takes on the character of a ruling that no such regulation is appropriate or approved pursuant to the policy of the statute,' States are not permitted to use their police power to enact such a regulation." 529 U.S. at 99, 110 (citations omitted). As the Court in Locke stated in reference to the Coast Guard: "The Supremacy Clause dictates that the federal judgment that a vessel is safe to navigate United States waters prevail over the contrary state judgment." Id. at 111.

As with Geier, the court below carefully analyzed Locke in rendering its opinion. It explained that "'the relevant inquiry for * * * pre-emption'" is "'whether the Coast Guard has promulgated its own requirement on the subject or has decided that no such requirement should be imposed at all'" and concluded that the Coast Guard's "informed decision that no regulatory action should be taken to require propeller guards" "equates to a ruling that no such regulation is appropriate pursuant to the policy of the FBSA." Pet. App. 15-16 (quoting Locke, 529 U.S. at 110). Here again, petitioner dislikes this application of settled precedent, but there is no reason to review an application of principles that this Court laid down just two Terms ago—especially under a statutory scheme that petitioner concedes is "nearly identical" to that in Geier. If a conflict arises in the future, this Court can address the issue at that time.

B. The Lower Courts Are Not Divided Over The Issue Of BSA Preemption Of Propeller Guard Claims.

Petitioner next argues that review is necessary to resolve a "direct conflict" among the lower courts. Pet. 3. He concedes (at 11) that "a host" of courts have held that the BSA preempts propeller guard claims—indeed, the decision below accords with that of every federal court and several state courts to address the issue[5]—but asserts that the decision below conflicts with one 1994 state court decision, Moore v. Brunswick Bowling & Billiards Corp., 889 S.W.2d 246 (Tex. 1994).

Contrary to petitioner's claim, there is no genuine conflict. To begin with, the court in Moore, like the lower court here, rejected the contention that the BSA expressly preempts propeller guard claims, 889 S.W.2d at 249-251, and petitioner himself notes that the decisions are in agreement on that score. Pet. 13-14.

As for implied preemption, the reasoning of Moore has been overtaken by that of Geier and this Court's other recent preemption rulings. Moore held that the presence of an express preemption clause precluded a finding of implied preemption. 889 S.W.2d at 251 n.10. But that view was decisively rejected in Geier, which found conflict preemption in the face of a similar provision. 529 U.S. at 869 (an express preemption provision "does not bar the ordinary working of conflict preemption principles"); see also Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick,

---

[5] See Lady v. Neal Glaser Marine, Inc., 228 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2000); Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 107 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir. 1997); Carstensen v. Brunswick Corp., 49 F.3d 430 (8th Cir. 1995); Moss v. Outboard Marine Corp., 915 F. Supp. 183 (E.D. Cal. 1996); Davis v. Brunswick Corp., 854 F. Supp. 1574 (N.D. Ga. 1993); Shield v. Bayliner Marine Corp., 822 F. Supp. 81 (D. Conn. 1993); Shields v. Outboard Marine Corp., 776 F. Supp. 1579 (M.D. Ga. 1991); Parker v. Outboard Marine Corp., No. J90-0011(L) slip. op. at 2 (S.D. Miss. Feb. 28, 1991); Mowery v. Mercury Marine, 773 F. Supp. 1012 (N.D. Ohio 1991); Ryan v. Brunswick Corp., 557 N.W.2d 541 (Mich. 1997); Farner v. Brunswick Corp., 607 N.E.2d 562 (Ill. App. 1992).

036
03/22/2002 12:38 FAX 2025149789 OSG DOJ
REV_00259252

514 U.S. 280, 287 (1995) (rejecting the Eleventh Circuit's view "that implied pre-emption cannot exist when Congress has chosen to include an express pre-emption clause in a statute").[6]

Similarly, the Moore court was of the view that the BSA's savings clause indicated Congress's intent to preserve even common law claims that were in "tension" with federal policy. 889 S.W.2d at 252. But Geier rejected the view that a savings clause may be interpreted "to 'save' all state-law tort actions, regardless of their potential threat to the objectives of federal safety standards promulgated under that Act." 529 U.S. at 870.

Likewise, Moore reasoned that "damage awards" are "not equivalent to * * * positive enactments," since "a manufacturer who incurs tort liability for failing to install propeller guards has a choice not available to the regulated manufacturer—installing guards on future boats or taking no action and bearing the liability as a cost of doing business." 889 S.W.2d at 251. Geier, by contrast, held that "rules of law that judges and juries create or apply" in tort suits may remove a manufacturing choice that federal regulators intended to preserve. 529 U.S. at 871.

Finally, Moore applied a presumption against preemption, reasoning that the lawsuit implicated the safety of boats "on [Texas's] waterways." 889 S.W.2d at 251. Locke, however, made clear that no such presumption applies to the regulation of "maritime commerce" (529 U.S. at 108); the accident here occurred on an interstate body of navigable water (see supra p.11); and Congress relied upon its "historic maritime jurisdiction" in enacting the BSA. S. Rep. at 17; see id. at 20 (citing "the long history of preemption in maritime safety matters" and "the need for uniformity applicable to vessels moving in interstate commerce"); see also Geier, 529 U.S. at 873 (declining to apply an "unusual, 'special burden' against pre-emption").

[6] Indeed, the Moore court cited the Eleventh Circuit's decision in Myrick for the proposition that the presence of an express preemption clause foreclosed any implied preemption analysis. See 889 S.W.2d at 251 n.10. As shown in the text, however, this Court expressly repudiated that aspect of the Eleventh Circuit's reasoning when the case came before it on certiorari.

In sum, at every point in its reasoning, Moore adopted legal conclusions that have since been rejected by this Court's decisions. There is no reason to believe that the Texas Supreme Court would reach the same result today—especially when three justices dissented in Moore for reasons that this Court validated in Geier and Locke. See 889 S.W.2d at 252-257; Worthy v. Collagen Corp., 967 S.W.2d 360, 367 (Tex. 1998) ("We are also bound to follow the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, the final authority on federal preemption issues"). Thus, Moore does not give rise to any conflict with the decision below.

Apart from the decision below, the only other post-Geier case to address BSA preemption of propeller guard claims is Lady v. Neal Glaser Marine, Inc., 228 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2000). Applying Geier and Locke, the court there held that allowing such claims to proceed "would present an obstacle to and frustrate the flexible approach towards propeller guards adopted by the Coast Guard." Id. at 614.

Like the court below, the Fifth Circuit in Lady rejected the argument that claims implicating "maritime commerce" are entitled to a "presumption against preemption." 228 F.3d at 607. Like the court below, it rejected the view that the BSA "expressly preempts" propeller guard claims. Id at 611. Like the court below, it rejected the argument of the Solicitor General in Lewis. Id. at 615 n.23. And like the court below, it rejected the contention that propeller guard claims are not preempted "as long as the Coast Guard has not promulgated a regulation that conflicts with the common-law requirement." Id. at 611-612. "Rather," the court held, "where the Coast Guard has been presented with an issue, studied it, and affirmatively decided as a substantive matter that it was not appropriate to impose a requirement, that decision takes on the character of a regulation

037
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:38 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259253

and the FBSA's objective of national uniformity mandates that state law not provide a result different than the Coast Guard's." Id. at 615. Lady is thus on all fours with the decision below.

Without dissent, this Court denied the petition for certiorari in Lady—which was an almost verbatim copy of the petition filed here, raising identical arguments. 121 S. Ct. 1402 (2001). The petitioner's counsel there (also counsel here) argued that there was a conflict between the Fifth Circuit's decision and Moore, and that review was needed "to finish the job started in Lewis." Pet. 15 in No. 00-1031. OMC responded that Geier resolved the question presented in Lewis, and that the Solicitor General's arguments in Lewis and the reasoning of Moore have been rejected by recent decisions. The only development since Lady is the decision below. Thus, every post-Geier decision has held that the BSA impliedly preempts propeller guard claims.[7]

C. The Decision Below Is Fully Consistent With The Decisions Of This Court.

Faced with the absence of any genuine conflict among the lower courts, petitioner resorts to the assertion that the decision below conflicts with this Court's precedents. Pet. 15-25. He makes three such claims—that the decision is inconsistent with Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280 (1995); that it misapplied Locke in declining to apply a "presumption against preemption"; and that it failed to give sufficient weight to the Solicitor General's brief in Lewis. None of these arguments has merit.

[7] Petitioner tries to divert attention from the denial of certiorari in Lady by noting that OMC filed a Chapter 11 bankruptcy petition shortly after Lady sought certiorari. Pet. 11-12. In his reply brief in support of certiorari (at 7-9), however, Lady (represented by petitioner's counsel here) vigorously argued that "OMC's bankruptcy is not a reason to deny the writ," since he could obtain relief from the stay and potentially recover a substantial amount on remand if he prevailed. That assertion was plainly correct. The fact that OMC was in reorganization proceedings does not mean that Lady would have been unable to pursue his tort claim. Bankruptcy courts routinely lift the automatic stay to permit a determination of the validity of a claim in other litigation, particularly where necessary to avoid loss of the entire claim. See 3 COLLIER ON BANKRUPTCY ¶ 362.07[3][a] (15th ed. rev. 2001); Foust v. Munson S.S. Lines, 299 U.S. 77 (1936) (district court abused its discretion in staying wrongful death suit against company involved in reorganization proceeding). A bankruptcy court would undoubtedly lift the stay to permit briefing and argument of a case in which this Court granted certiorari.

Myrick involved a federal safety standard prescribing short stopping distances for semitrailers. The Ninth Circuit invalidated the standard on the ground that the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration ("NHTSA") had not considered the failure rate of anti-lock brake systems ("ABS"), which were needed to comply with the standard. 514 U.S. at 284-285. NHTSA thereafter amended the standard so that the distance and lock-up requirements no longer applied to semitrailers. Id. at 285.

The plaintiffs in Myrick, who were injured in accidents with trucks lacking ABS, claimed that "the absence of ABS was a negligent design that rendered the vehicles defective." 514 U.S. at 283. The defendants replied that the absence of any federal standard governing truck stopping distances evidenced an intent to leave the issue unregulated, thus impliedly preempting the plaintiffs' claims. This Court rejected that argument, however, explaining that "the lack of federal regulation did not result from an affirmative decision of agency officials to refrain from regulating air brakes." Id. at 286 (emphasis added).

In contrast to Myrick, this is a case where the absence of a federal regulation resulted from the agency's "affirmative decision to refrain" from regulating. As both the court below and the Fifth Circuit held: "'the lack of a regulation mandating propeller guards on recreational boats came after the Coast Guard studied the matter and affirmatively determined that requiring propeller guards was substantively inappropriate.'" Pet. App. 12 (quoting Lady, 228 F.3d at 612).

Moreover, the plaintiffs in Myrick merely sought to impose a state-law duty that was effectively identical to the short-lived

038
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:39 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259254

federal regulation. NHTSA wanted to regulate truck stopping distances; it had specifically endorsed ABS; and it had imposed a rule that would have required trucks to install ABS, only to have a court declare it invalid. Here, by contrast, the Coast Guard affirmatively determined that propeller guards should not be required, and petitioner advocates a duty directly contrary to this judgment. Thus, Myrick is wholly inapposite—as the lower courts have consistently recognized. Pet. App. 11-12; Lady, 228 F.3d at 612; Lewis, 107 F.3d at 1503-1504.

Petitioner next argues that the court below, in not applying a presumption against preemption, "misrea[d] this Court's recent decision in Locke." Pet. 21. He claims that Locke is irrelevant because this case involves "recreational vessels" and "has nothing to do with maritime commerce," because the accident here took place in "state waters," and because Locke involved "international" issues and "ocean-going oil tankers." Id. at 20-21. These arguments are without foundation.

First, the fact that this case involves recreational boats does not mean it does not implicate interstate commerce and federal waterways. Pleasure boating is a multi-billion-dollar industry, manufacturers make pleasure boats for national markets, and such boats routinely cross state lines (as petitioner's boat did here). As Congress explained in adopting the Act at issue: federal preemption in this context "conforms to the long history of preemption in maritime safety matters and is founded on the need for uniformity applicable to vessels moving in interstate commerce." S. Rep. at 20; accord id. at 14 (citing "[t]he need for uniformity in standards if interstate commerce is not to be unduly impeded"). Thus, Congress fully understood that manufacturing standards for recreational boats directly affect interstate commerce. See also Foremost Ins. Co. v. Richardson, 457 U.S. 668, 675 (1982) ("[a] collision between two pleasure boats on navigable waters has a significant relationship with maritime commerce").

Nor did this case arise in "state waters." As explained above (at 11), the accident here occurred in the Dale Hollow chain of lakes—a navigable and interstate body of water that crosses the Tennessee-Kentucky border and that was created by federal authorities acting under federal legislation. The "jurisdictional applicability" of the BSA extends to every recreational vessel "within the historic federal maritime jurisdiction—the navigable waters of the United States, [and] certain internal waters which are in the exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction of the United States." S. Rep. at 17. In sum, petitioner cannot plausibly claim that this accident occurred on state waters that are not "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States." 46 U.S.C. § 4301(a).

It makes no difference that Locke involved "international" concerns and "ocean-going oil tankers." Congress understood the BSA to be as closely related to maritime commerce as the Act at issue in Locke; the BSA applies as fully to boats on land-locked lakes as to those "on the high seas" (§ 4301(a)); and the federal government's paramount authority over maritime commerce does not depend on its being foreign or international in scope. Foremost, 457 U.S. at 674-677. As the Fifth Circuit explained in Lady: "any distinction between recreational vessels and tankers is of little significance, as the national interest in vessels operating on navigable waters of the United States encompasses both." 228 F.3d at 607.[8]

Moreover, even if petitioner's arguments regarding Myrick and Locke were correct (and they are not), they would represent nothing more than a quarrel over the Illinois Supreme Court's application of this Court's recent decisions to the particular [8] It is well settled that "'[t]he relative importance to the State of its own law is not material when there is a conflict with a valid federal law, for the Framers of our Constitution provided that the federal law must prevail.'" Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan v. de la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 153 (1982) (quoting Free v. Bland, 369 U.S. 663, 666 (1962)).

039
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:39 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259255

facts of this case. Petitioner does not deny that a federal decision not to regulate can have preemptive force when it is based on an affirmative determination that the area is best left unregulated; he simply disagrees that this is such a case. Nor does he dispute that a "presumption against preemption" does not apply to regulation of maritime commerce; he simply disagrees that this case involves such commerce. These disagreements do not justify this Court's review. See Rule 10 ("misapplication of a properly stated rule of law" is an insufficient basis for certiorari).

Finally, petitioner says that the decision below disregarded precedent in not deferring to the Solicitor General's brief in Lewis, which argued that the BSA does not preempt propeller guard claims. Pet. 23-25. But as the court below explained:

> [A]rguments made in the Lewis brief have been rejected by the Supreme Court in Geier. For example, the Solicitor General in the Lewis brief argued that the existence of the savings clause (section 4311(g)) "makes clear Congress's explicit intent to preserve tort liability." But the Geier Court found implied preemption in the presence of the savings clause and rejected the argument that this clause "bar[red] the ordinary working of conflict pre-emption principles."

Pet. App. 18; see Lady, 228 F.3d at 615 & n.23 (the Solicitor General's views in Lewis were not "sufficient to overcome the reasons supporting the application of implied preemption").

This is but one of the Solicitor General's arguments in Lewis that was rejected in Geier. For example, the Lewis brief states (at 27) that "a common law claim would be permitted even if a regulation were in existence unless that claim propounded a standard of conduct directly contrary to the federal rule." But Geier explained that the "full purposes" of federal law could be frustrated even absent such a direct conflict. 529 U.S. at 873.

Similarly, the brief (at 22) made much of the fact that the BSA's preemption provision did not reference common law claims, stating that "[t]he regulatory effect of a common law judgment is not as direct as that of positive enactments or prescriptions." But as Geier observed in analyzing a similar provision: "rules of law that judges and juries create or apply in [state tort] suits may themselves similarly create uncertainty and even conflict, say, when different juries in different States reach different decisions on similar facts." 529 U.S. at 871.

And the brief in Lewis argued (at 28) that "the absence of a federal regulation does not create a preemptive effect on state common law claims when the federal scheme is not intended to occupy the complete field of motorboat safety." But while the Court in Geier made no finding that the Act there "preempted the field," it readily concluded that the government's refusal to require airbags was a considered decision with preemptive force. See 529 U.S. at 874-883.

Furthermore, the Coast Guard did not sign the Solicitor General's brief in Lewis—in contrast to its practice in other preemption cases involving its jurisdiction. E.g., U.S. Br. in Locke (No. 98-1701). And that brief acknowledged the Coast Guard's "longstanding interpretation" that the Act preempts state safety requirements "regardless of whether a federal standard is in existence." Lewis Br. 15-17. See 61 Fed. Reg. 13123, 13125 (Mar. 26, 1996) ("the States do not have the authority to establish carriage requirements for associated equipment, such as a mechanical means for preventing propeller strikes, on vessels operated on waters where both the Coast Guard and the State have jurisdiction"); 36 id. 15764 (Aug. 18, 1971); 38 id. 6914 (Mar. 14, 1973). Thus, it is not the case that the views set forth in the Lewis brief are "the United States' only articulated view on the matter." Pet. 10. But in any event, those views have been rejected by subsequent decisions of this Court.

The holding below is consistent not only with Myrick, Locke, and Geier, but also with a long line of this Court's precedents.

QUESTION PRESENTED

Whether the Illinois Supreme Court correctly applied this Court's preemption precedents, including Geier v. American Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 861 (2000), and United States v. Locke, 11S. 89 (2000), in holding that the Federal Boat Safety Act preempts common law claims asserting that recreational boat motors must be equipped with "propeller guards," where the Coast Guard expressly rejected such a requirement after extensive administrative proceedings.

REV_00259238

040
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:40 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259256

As the court below recognized (Pet. App. 13-15), it is well settled that a federal decision not to regulate has preemptive force where based on a considered study of the regulatory question. See Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151, 178 (1978); Bethlehem Steel Co. v. New York State Labor Relations Bd., 330 U.S. 767, 774 (1947); Arkansas Elec. Coop. Corp. v. Arkansas Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 375, 384 (1983); Bonito Boats, Inc. v. Thunder Craft Boats, Inc., 489 U.S. 141, 151-152 (1989); Puerto Rico Dep't of Consumer Affairs v. Isla Petroleum Corp., 485 U.S. 495, 503 (1988). As the Court stated in the leading case in this area—involving the Coast Guard's authority—the "relevant inquiry" is "whether the Secretary has either promulgated his own [requirement] * * * or has decided that no such requirement should be imposed at all." Ray, 435 U.S. at 171-172. Accord Locke, 529 U.S. at 104, 107 (reaffirming Ray's "essential framework," "analytic structure," and "holding"). There is no reason to review the Illinois Supreme Court's ruling that this is such a case.

It is hard to imagine a more compelling case for application of the principle recognized in these decisions. Pursuant to statutorily prescribed procedures, the Coast Guard conducted a painstaking, 18-month study of propeller guards. Its decision not to require them reflected not indifference, but a thorough analysis of the regulatory issues and a conclusion that they were technologically infeasible, economically unjustified, and likely to increase safety hazards. Ill. App. A24. As in Geier, the Coast Guard focused on a single item of equipment and made a "policy judgment that safety would best be promoted" if that item is not required. 529 U.S. at 881. And as in Geier, to allow "different juries in different States [to] reach different decisions" "would take from those who would enforce a federal law the very ability to achieve the law's congressionally mandated objectives" and override federal safety policies that were "deliberately imposed." Id. at 869, 871, 872. See also id. at 884 (rejecting the argument that "a formal agency statement of pre-emptive intent [i]s a prerequisite to concluding that a conflict exists"); Ray, 435 U.S. at 178 (holding that the Coast Guard's "failure to promulgate a ban" on large oil tankers took on "the character of a ruling that no such regulation is appropriate or approved pursuant to the policy of the statute").

II. THIS CASE IS NOT A PROPER VEHICLE TO RESOLVE THE QUESTION PRESENTED.

Quite apart from the petition's failure to satisfy the criteria of Rule 10, review is also unwarranted for various prudential reasons. To begin with, a decision here would be of no practical importance because petitioner could not recover under Illinois tort law even if his claim were allowed to proceed. In Illinois, a party alleging a design defect must satisfy § 402A of the RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS (1965), which imposes strict liability on makers of "unreasonably dangerous" products. See Lamkin v. Towner, 563 N.E.2d 449 (Ill. 1990). Time and again, Illinois courts have held that a product is not "unreasonably dangerous" if its risks "derive merely from those inherent properties * * * which are obvious to all who come in contact with [it]." Hunt v. Blasius, 384 N.E.2d 368, 372 (Ill. 1978).[9] [9] See Miller v. Dvornik, 501 N.E.2d 160, 164 (Ill. App. 1986) (holding that a motorcycle is not defective for lack of crash bars and stating that "[i]t is well settled that injuries are not compensable if they are caused by inherent propensities of a product which are obvious to all who come into contact with them"); Scoby v. Vulcan-Hart Corp., 569 N.E.2d 1147, 1151 (Ill. App. 1991) (holding that a deep fat fryer is not defective for lack of a protective cover and stating that "[c]onsidering not only the obvious nature of any danger here but, also, the simple nature of the mechanism involved, * * * summary judgment for the defendant was clearly proper"); Jarke v. Jackson Products, 631 N.E.2d 233, 238 (Ill. App. 1994) (holding that a welding mask was not unreasonably dangerous for failure to include an ear guard and stating that "the only pertinent inquiry is whether the product is unreasonably dangerous in the state in which it is used"); Todd v. Societe BIC, S.A., 21 F.3d 1402, 1407 (7th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (holding that a cigarette lighter was not unreasonably dangerous for lack of a child-restraint device; stating that "[i]njuries are not compensable in products liability if they derive merely from those inherent properties of a product which are obvious to all who come in contact with the product").

---

041
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:40 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259257

These holdings fully apply to a boat motor's propeller, the dangers of which are readily apparent to the ordinary consumer. Much as a chef must appreciate the dangers of a sharp knife, or a lumberjack the dangers of a saw's spinning chain, members of the boating public must appreciate the danger of an outboard motor's high-speed propeller blades—as numerous courts have held. E.g., Elliott v. Brunswick Corp., 903 F.2d 1505, 1507 (11th Cir. 1990) (reversing a verdict finding that a propeller was defective for lack of a guard on the basis that "products whose inherent danger is patent and obvious, do not, as a matter of law, involve defects of a sort that a jury should resolve," and explaining that "the ordinary consumer clearly understands that a revolving propeller involves danger").[10]

[10] In addition to Elliott, see Fitzpatrick v. Madonna, 623 A.2d 322, 324-325 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1993) (reversing a jury verdict for the plaintiff because "[a] competent person knows that he or she must stay clear of the churning blades of an outboard motor in the same way as a person avoids airplane propellers, chain saw teeth, and lawn mower blades," and because "it cannot be said with any degree of certainty that the risk of injury will be reduced by a safety guard"); Pree v. Brunswick Corp., 983 F.2d 863, 867-868 (8th Cir. 1993) (unguarded propellers "[are] not dangerous beyond the expectations of the ordinary consumer" and "do not, as a matter of law, involve defects of a sort that a jury should resolve"); Allen v. Minnstar, Inc., 8 F.3d 1470, 1481 (10th Cir. 1993) (entering judgment for the manufacturer and citing the "absence of evidence that there was a feasible, safer alternative design for a propeller guard"); Shields v. Outboard Marine Corp., 776 F. Supp. 1579, 1583 (M.D. Ga. 1991) ("a pleasure boat's unguarded propellers are not dangerous beyond the expectations of the ordinary consumer"; "the consensus of experts that the industry's adaption of propeller guards at this point would not only be infeasible, but unwise, unsafe and unfortunate"); Beech v. Outboard Marine Corp., 584 So. 2d 447, 449-450 (Ala. 1991) (finding no "jury issue" because "a propeller guard that arguably creates other dangers is not a safer design"); Veal v. Teleflex, Inc., 586 So. 2d 188, 191 (Ala. 1991) (holding that "the trial court should not have submitted the [defective design] charge to the jury" and rejecting the claim "that because there were several patents available for propeller guards, Mercury Marine was negligent or wanton in failing to utilize them on its boats").

In light of this overwhelming body of authority, there is no substantial ground to doubt that Illinois courts would reject petitioner's claim as a matter of substantive tort law. It would thus be a waste of private and judicial resources to debate the preemption issue in this context.

Moreover, it is questionable whether this Court has jurisdiction in this matter. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1257(a), the Court may review federal issues arising from "[f]inal judgments or decrees rendered by the highest court of a State." In order to satisfy the finality requirement, the judgment from which review is sought must be final as to all parties and issues. See Flynt v. Ohio, 451 U.S. 619, 620 (1981) (per curiam) ("the final-judgment rule has been interpreted 'to preclude reviewability where anything further remains to be determined by a State court, no matter how dissociated from the only federal issue that has finally been adjudicated by the highest court of the State'"); Collins v. Miller, 252 U.S. 364, 370 (1920) (the judgment "should be final not only as to all the parties, but as to the whole subject-matter and as to all the causes of action"); Republic Natural Gas Co. v. Oklahoma, 334 U.S. 62, 68 (1948).

Petitioner, however, sued not only respondent, but Ebbtide Corporation, alleging that its boat was defectively designed because it lacked adequate handrails and failed to warn passengers of inadequate back support in the boat's seating. See supra p. 12. The Circuit Court granted respondent's motion to dismiss, and that decision was affirmed on appeal. Petitioner's claim against Ebbtide, however, is still pending.[11] A trial below may result in full relief (rendering the issue here moot), or it may raise other issues of federal law (e.g., relating to punitive damages or other federal regulatory standards). In any event, the decision below did not resolve petitioner's claims against all parties, and the federal question presented here is not conclusive of the remaining proceedings below.

[11] After the decision of the Illinois Supreme Court, the Circuit Court of Cook County reinstated petitioner's remaining claim against Ebbtide on its trial docket. See Order (Cook County Circuit Ct. No. 01L14400) (Dec. 4, 2001).

Finally, it merits emphasis that the decision below is fully consistent with the public interest in safe boating. After careful study, the Coast Guard determined not only that propeller guards were infeasible for any recreational speedboat, but also that they would give boaters a false sense of security and increase the occurrence of serious accidents. Numerous courts have held that speedboats are not defective for lack of propeller guards, citing "the consensus of experts that the industry's adaption of propeller guards at this point would not only be infeasible, but unwise, unsafe and unfortunate." E.g., Elliott, 903 F.2d at 1509. Thus, the decision below accords with the public interest in ensuring that boats be as safe as possible.[12]

CONCLUSION

The petition for a writ of certiorari should be denied.

Respectfully submitted.

[12] At the present time, boating accidents involving propellers are very rare. As the Subcommittee found, the "risk of fatality" from recreational power-boating is small in comparison to that of other activities, including other types of boating: estimated fatalities per each million activity hours were "1.26 for inflatables, 0.62 for canoes/kayaks, and 0.59 for rowboats, in each case with no engine being involved, compared to a risk of 0.14 from all causes for open motorboats (within which the risk of propeller strike itself is a very small fraction)." Ill. App. A11 (emphasis added).

DONALD F. IVANSEK
SANDRA E. KUPELIAN*
Cassiday, Shade & Gloor
20 North Wacker Drive
Suite 1040
Chicago, IL 60606
(312) 641-3100

Counsel of Record*

Counsel for Respondent Mercury Marine

DECEMBER 2001

042
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:41 FAX 2025149769
REV_0025925B

043
03/22/2002 12:41 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259259

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
JAN 2 2002

No. 01-706

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

Rex R. Sprietsma, Adm'r of the Estate of Jeanne Sprietsma, Deceased,

Petitioner,

v.

Mercury Marine, a Division
of Brunswick Corporation,

Respondent.

On Petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Illinois

PETITIONER'S REPLY TO BRIEF IN OPPOSITION

Arthur H. Bryant
Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, P.C.
One Kaiser Plaza, Suite 275
Oakland, CA 94612-3684
(510) 622-8150

Joseph A. Power, Jr.
Todd A. Smith
Devon C. Bruce
Power, Rogers & Smith, P.C.
35 West Wacker Drive, Suite 3700
Chicago, IL 60601
(312) 236-9381

Leslie A. Brueckner
(Counsel of Record)
Michael J. Quirk
Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, P.C.
1717 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Suite 800
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 797-8600

044
03/22/2002 12:41 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259260

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Page

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES ii

ARGUMENT 1

1. Neither Geier nor Locke Resolved the Federal Preemption Question Presented in Lewis and this Case 1

   A. Geier's Implied Preemption Holding Has No Bearing Here 1

   B. Locke's Preemption Holding is Equally Inapplicable to this Case 5

2. Moore is Still Good Law, and Directly Conflicts with the Decision Below 7

3. This Case is a Proper Vehicle for Review. 8

CONCLUSION 10

045
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:41 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259261

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases:

Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963) 9

Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504 (1992) ... 7

Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 (1975) ... 9

English v. General Electric Corp., 496 U.S. 72 (1990) 7

Geier v. Am. Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 861 (2000) ..... passim

Goodyear Atomic Corp. v. Miller, 486 U.S. 174 (1988) ... 7

Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 107 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir.), cert. granted, 522 U.S. 978 (1997), cert. dismissed, 523 U.S. 1113 (1998) 1

Medtronic v. Lohr, Inc., 518 U.S. 470 (1996) 4

Moore v. Brunswick Bowling & Billiards Corp., 889 S.W.2d 246 (Tex.), cert. denied, 115 U.S. 664 (1994) 1, 4, 7

Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151 (1978) 5, 6

Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 464 U.S. 238 (1984) ... 7, 8

United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89 (2000) 1, 5, 6, 8

Statutes:

Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, 46 U.S.C. §§ 4301-4311 ..... passim

28 U.S.C. § 1257 9

46 U.S.C. § 4311(g) 6

Miscellaneous:

Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners, Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 522 U.S. 978 (1997) (No. 97-288) 4, 5, 6

046 OSG DOJ 03/22/2002 12:41 FAX 2025149769 REV_00259262

ARGUMENT

As explained in our petition for certiorari, this case presents the identical question that was before this Court in Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 107 F.3d 1494 (11th Cir., cert. granted, 522 U.S. 978 (1997), cert. dismissed, 523 U.S. 1113 (1998): whether a state common-law claim that a boat engine was defectively designed because it lacks a propeller guard is preempted by a decision of the United States Coast Guard not to begin developing a regulation that would require the use of propeller guards on recreational motor boats. Lewis settled after oral argument, before any decision was rendered in the case. This is the first meaningful opportunity for this Court to revisit this important question of federal law in the wake of Lewis.

Mercury Marine's main theme in opposition is that review should not be granted because decisions of this Court since Lewis was argued – particularly Geier v. Am. Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 861 (2000), and United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89 (2000) – have "definitively resolved" the core questions presented in this case and discredited the conflicting decision of the Texas Supreme Court in Moore v. Brunswick Bowling & Billiards Corp., 889 S.W.2d 246 (Tex.), cert. denied, 115 U.S. 664 (1994). As we now explain, these arguments are meritless.

1. Neither Geier nor Locke Resolved the Federal Preemption Question Presented in Lewis and this Case.

A. Geier's Implied Preemption Holding Has No Bearing Here.

Mercury Marine's principal claim is that Geier repudiated the Texas Supreme Court's decision in Moore, thereby effectively eradicating the split of authority that gave rise to the grant of certiorari in Lewis. In so arguing, Mercury Marine mischaracterizes Geier as holding that "allowing a jury to require auto makers to install airbags would frustrate the purpose of a federal decision not to install an airbag requirement." Opp. at 15 (citing Geier, 529 U.S. at 881; emphasis in original). Based on this mischaracterization of Geier, Mercury Marine claims that the U.S. Coast Guard's decision "not to impose [a propeller guard] requirement" must be accorded similar preemptive effect. Id.

047
03/22/2002 12:42 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259263

The main flaw in this analogy is that, unlike the decision at issue here (a decision by the federal government to take no regulatory action at all), Geier involved a highly complex federal safety standard that did, in fact, regulate the use of airbags. In Geier, this Court confronted the 1984 version of a federal motor vehicle safety standard promulgated by the National Highway Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Administration ("NHTSA") – Standard 208 – that required auto manufacturers gradually to "phase-in" the use of passive restraint devices in passenger automobiles. Unlike the typical minimum safety standards promulgated by NHTSA, Standard 208 "deliberately sought variety . . . by setting a performance requirement for passive restraint devices and allowing manufacturers to choose among different passive restraint mechanisms, such as airbags, automatic belts, or other passive restraint technologies to satisfy that requirement." 529 U.S. at 878. The Court emphasized that NHTSA sought a "mix of devices" because of safety concerns associated with airbags. Id. at 878-79. Geier further stressed that, in NHTSA's view, a "mix of devices would help develop data on comparative effectiveness, would allow the industry time to overcome the safety problems and the high production costs associated with airbags, and could facilitate the development of alternative, cheaper, and safer passive restraint systems." Id. at 879.

Against this backdrop, Geier held that a common-law damages action holding a manufacturer liable for its failure to install an airbag would conflict with NHTSA's goal of encouraging a mixture of passive restraint devices. Id. at 880. The Court wrote that "a rule of state tort law imposing [liability for failure to install airbags] . . . would have presented an obstacle to the variety and mix of devices that the federal regulation sought." Id. In so ruling, Geier gave "special weight" to an amicus curiae brief filed by the United States, in which the agency strenuously argued that no-airbag claims would conflict with and substantially undermine NHTSA's regulatory goals. See id. at 886.

The facts here could not be farther from those in Geier. Unlike the complex set of regulatory obligations imposed by Standard 208, which affirmatively encouraged a mixture of passive restraint devices, there is no federal regulation whatsoever governing propeller guards. As previously explained, the only action taken by the Coast Guard with regard to these devices was to task a subcommittee of its Advisory Council (which included, among others, industry representatives and members of the public) with investigating whether the federal government should begin to develop a regulation requiring propeller guards on passenger boats. See Pet. at 5. The Coast Guard ultimately decided not to regulate these devices in any way, in part because there was no universally applicable technology appropriate for use on all boats. Id. at 6. To date, there is no federal safety standard governing (or even addressing) the use of propeller guards. Thus, unlike in Geier, there is no federal regulatory framework

048
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:42 FAX 2025149769
REV_0025926

with which petitioner's common-law claims could possibly conflict.

This conclusion is underscored by the fact that, in Lewis, the United States filed an amicus curiae brief confirming that no-propeller-guard claims exactly like petitioner's do not in any way conflict with federal regulatory purposes. See Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners, Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 522 U.S. 978 (1997) (No. 97-288) ("Lewis Brief"). This position stands in stark contrast to the United States' amicus curiae brief in Geier, which vigorously asserted that no-airbag claims would frustrate and undermine the goals of Standard 208. See 529 U.S. at 880. And Geier itself confirms that the Solicitor General's views on the preemptive effect of an agency's regulatory decisions are entitled to some deference. Id. at 882, 886. See also Medtronic v. Lohr, Inc., 518 U.S. 470, 496, 505-07 (1996) (majority and concurring opinions). Thus, if anything, Geier provides further reason to grant review and accord the United States' authoritative position the deference it deserves.[1]

[1] Mercury Marine attempts to avoid the United States' anti-preemption position in Lewis by arguing that the Solicitor General's reasoning, like that of the Texas Supreme Court in Moore, has been discredited by Geier. See Opp. at 24-25. This argument is meritless. First, the Lewis Brief's suggestion (at 21) that the Boat Safety Act's savings clause "makes clear Congress's explicit intent to preserve tort liability" is, contrary to respondent's claim, in no way contrary to Geier and ultimately irrelevant to the United States' rejection of preemption, which hinged on the fact that there is clearly no conflict between no-propeller-guard claims and the Coast Guard's regulatory purposes. Id. at 25-27. Second, the Lewis Brief's recognition (at 22) that the "regulatory effect of a common law judgment is not as direct as that of positive enactments or prescriptions" is, in fact, supported by ample authority and is wholly consistent with Geier. (As explained infra at 7-8, Geier explicitly acknowledged, and did not purport to overrule, numerous prior decisions of this Court making precisely this point.) Third, the Lewis Brief's argument (at 28) that, absent a statute that affirmatively preempts the entire field of state action, regulatory inaction lacks preemptive effect, is fully consistent with Geier, given that Geier did not involve a "field preemption" statute and did not involve regulatory inaction. In short, Geier did not undermine the validity of any of the arguments set forth in the Lewis Brief, and Mercury Marine's arguments to the contrary are simply wrong.

B. Locke's Preemption Holding is Equally Inapplicable to this Case.

Mercury Marine also argues that "any remaining issue presented in Lewis was disposed of in Locke," which stated that there are "instances in which state regulation of maritime commerce is inappropriate even absent the exercise of federal authority." Opp. at 16. Locke, however, did little more than reaffirm this Court's previous holding in Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151 (1978), that Title II of the Ports and Waterways Safety Act of 1972 ("PWSA") expressly preempts the entire field of state laws and regulations governing ocean-going oil tankers used in international commerce.[2] Within the context of a field preemption statute like the PWSA, it made sense for this Court to "reaffirm" that regulatory inaction may exert a preemptive effect on state law. This holding has virtually nothing to do with this case, however, given that the

[2] As the Supreme Court explained in Ray (and reiterated in Locke), Title II of the PWSA requires the Coast Guard to issue "such rules and regulations as may be necessary with respect to the design, construction, and operation of the covered vessels." Ray, 435 U.S. at 168; Locke, 529 U.S. at 110. Ray and Locke both reasoned that, given Title II's mandatory directive that the Coast Guard impose national regulations governing the general seaworthiness of tankers and their crews, "Congress has left no room for state regulation of these matters." Locke, 529 U.S. at 110.

049
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:42 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259265

Boat Safety Act, unlike the PWSA, does not preempt the field of boat safety.

As explained by the United States in Lewis, the Boat Safety Act "is quite distinctive from the [PWSA]" insofar as it "does not require the [Coast Guard] to issue regulations, but rather merely permits [the agency] to do so." Lewis Brief at 29. See also 46 U.S.C. § 4302(a). As the United States concluded, this grant of permissive regulatory authority reveals that Congress never intended the Act to preempt the entire field of boat safety regulation, given that the Coast Guard has the option of doing nothing under the Act (and, in fact, has not issued any regulations governing propeller guards). Because the Boat Safety Act does not preempt the regulated field, Locke's language regarding the preemptive effect of regulatory inaction has no bearing here: unlike the PWSA, the Boat Safety Act only preempts state positive law in areas where the Coast Guard has issued regulations governing the subject matter at issue – and it is undisputed that no such action has been taken with respect to propeller guards. Thus, Mercury Marine's suggestion that Locke resolves the preemption question presented here has no merit.[3]

[3] Assuming, however, that the Boat Safety Act (like Title II of the PWSA) preempts the field of state positive law even where the Coast Guard has taken no regulatory action, Locke's holding would still have no bearing here given that common-law claims are expressly preserved by the Act's broadly worded savings clause. See 46 U.S.C. § 4311(g). In this respect, this case is very different from both Ray and Locke, which involved state regulations rather than common-law claims. As the United States explained in Lewis, "[t]hat distinction is equally important here, because the [Act] contains a savings clause, but the PWSA, at issue in Ray, did not." Lewis Brief at 29.

2. Moore is Still Good Law, and Directly Conflicts with the Decision Below.

Equally without merit is Mercury Marine's claim that "there is no genuine conflict" between the decision below and the Texas Supreme Court's decision in Moore. See Opp. at 17. Mercury Marine argues, first, that Moore is no longer good law because its holding that "the presence of an express preemption clause precluded a finding of implied preemption" was rejected by Geier. Id. Moore's holding on this point is irrelevant, however, because the Texas Supreme Court went on to reach the same implied conflict preemption question presented here: whether "a jury award in this case will conflict with and undermine the goals of the Act by creating a standard requiring propeller guards, in the face of the Coast Guard's policy determination that guards should not be mandated." Id. at 251.

Mercury Marine is also wrong in claiming that Moore's holding that "damage awards" are "not equivalent to . . positive enactments" conflicts with this Court's prior teachings and was definitively rejected by Geier. Opp. at 18. In reality, Moore's holding on this point is squarely in accord with numerous prior decisions of this Court recognizing that "the effects of direct regulation . . . are significantly more intrusive than the incidental regulatory effects of [damage awards]." Goodyear Atomic Corp. v. Miller, 486 U.S. 174, 185-86 (1988). See also Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 518 (1992) ("there is no general, inherent conflict between [express] federal pre-emption of state [regulatory] warning requirements and the continued vitality of state common law [damages] actions") (plurality); id. at 533-34 (Blackmun, J., concurring); English v. General Electric Corp., 496 U.S. 72, 85 (1990) (common-law claims "neither direct nor substantial enough" to be within the preempted field"); Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 464 U.S.

023
03/22/2002 12:33 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259239

RULES 29.6 AND 14.1 STATEMENT

Respondent is Mercury Marine, an unincorporated division of Brunswick Corporation. Brunswick Corporation has no parent company, and no publicly held company owns 10% or more of Brunswick's stock.

Petitioner is Rex R. Sprietsma, administrator of the estate of Jeanne Sprietsma, deceased.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Page

QUESTION PRESENTED i

RULES 29.6 AND 14.1 STATEMENT ii

OPINIONS BELOW 1

JURISDICTION 1

STATEMENT OF THE CASE 1

A. The Federal Boat Safety Act 2

B. Preemption Under The Federal Boat Safety Act 3

C. The Federal Boat Safety Act's "Savings Provision" 5

D. The Coast Guard's Considered Determination That Propeller Guards Should Not Be Required 5

1. The Coast Guard's study of propeller guards 6

2. The Subcommittee's makeup and methodology 6

3. The Subcommittee's study of propeller guards 7

4. The Subcommittee's conclusions 8

5. The Coast Guard's adoption of the Subcommittee's Report and Recommendations 10

D. The Proceedings Below 11

050
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:43 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259266

238, 256 (1984) ("Congress intended . . . to tolerate whatever tension there was between [federal regulation and state common-law claims, and] [w]e can do no less.").

Notably, all of these cases were cited in Geier, which explicitly acknowledged this Court's oft-repeated teachings that the effects of "tort law may be somewhat different" than those of positive law for purposes of determining the extent of federal preemption. See 529 U.S. at 882. And Geier's particular holding that the "rules of law that judges or juries create or apply in [tort] suits" may remove a choice that federal regulators intended to preserve has no bearing here, given that the Coast Guard has made crystal clear that it never intended even to address any aspect of manufacturers' decision making with respect to propeller guards. In short, Moore remains good law after Geier, and is squarely in conflict with the decision below.[4]

[4] Mercury Marine also claims that Moore was wrong because it applied a presumption against preemption that was subsequently rejected in Locke. See Opp. at 18. As explained in our petition, however, there are myriad reasons why Locke's rejection of the presumption against preemption – a holding directed to state regulation of ocean-going oil tankers involved in international maritime commerce – should not apply to a case involving a small recreational vessel on local waters. See Pet. at 21-23. Even assuming that the Texas Supreme Court erred in this regard, however, its preemption ruling was still correct, given that the Coast Guard has never regulated propeller guards and the United States itself has taken the position that no-propeller-guard claims do not undermine or frustrate any federal policy.

3. This Case is a Proper Vehicle for Review.

Finally, there is no merit to Mercury Marine's argument that this case is not a proper vehicle for review on the grounds that (1) "petitioner could not recover under state tort law even if his claim were allowed to proceed"; and (2) this Court's jurisdiction is "questionable" due to the pendency of remaining claims against the boat's manufacturer. See Opp. at 29. Regarding the former, suffice it to say that the alleged weaknesses of petitioner's claims on the merits (which is a subject of hot dispute and belied by the fact that other injury victims in similar cases have obtained significant recoveries) is hardly a valid reason to decline review. Regarding the jurisdictional argument, the Illinois Supreme Court affirmed judgments dismissing petitioner's claims on the ground that they are preempted by federal law. Mercury Marine neither disputes that this is a final judgment between the parties to this appeal nor produces any authority for the argument that petitioner's claims against other defendants not party to this appeal render the Illinois Supreme Court's dismissal ruling unreviewable under 28 U.S.C. § 1257. In Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469, 480 (1975), this Court recognized its jurisdiction to review a state court decision where "the federal issue, finally decided by the highest court in the state, will survive and require decision regardless of the outcome of future state-court proceedings." See also Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963) (reviewing federal question arising out of criminal conviction before sentencing because sentence would not moot issue). This well-recognized exception to any requirement of technical finality that Section 1257 otherwise might impose plainly applies here, especially given that Mercury Marine will not even be a party to the only remaining state court proceedings it identifies. Respondent's preemption defense is thus guaranteed to survive these proceedings as a live issue in this case, and the case is properly presented for review.

051

CONCLUSION

This petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.

Respectfully submitted,

Arthur H. Bryant
Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, P.C.
One Kaiser Plaza, Suite 275
Oakland, CA 94612-3684
(510) 622-8150

Leslie A. Brueckner
(Counsel of Record)
Michael J. Quirk
Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, P.C.
1717 Massachusetts Avenue, NW, Suite 800
Washington, D.C. 20036
(202) 797-8600

Joseph A. Power, Jr.
Todd A. Smith
Devon C. Bruce
Powers, Rogers & Smith
35 West Wacker Drive
Chicago, IL 60601
(312) 236-9381

Counsel for Petitioner

Date: January 2, 2002

OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:43 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259267

024
03/22/2002 12:33 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_0025924

REASONS FOR DENYING THE PETITION 13

I. THE PETITION FAILS TO SATISFY ANY OF THE CRITERIA FOR A GRANT OF CERTIORARI 14

A. This Court's Recent Decisions Have Resolved The Legal Issues Left Undecided In Lewis v. Brunswick Corporation 14

B. The Lower Courts Are Not Divided Over The Issue Of BSA Preemption Of Propeller Guard Claims 17

C. The Decision Below Is Fully Consistent With The Decisions Of This Court. 20

II. THIS CASE IS NOT A PROPER VEHICLE TO RESOLVE THE QUESTION PRESENTED ... 27

CONCLUSION 30

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases: Page

Allen v. Minnstar, Inc., 8 F.3d 1470 (10th Cir. 1993) 28

Arkansas Elec. Coop. Corp. v. Arkansas Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 375 (1983) 26

Beech v. Outboard Marine Corp., 584 So. 2d 447 (Ala. 1991) 28

Bethlehem Steel Co. v. New York State Labor Relations Bd., 330 U.S. 767 (1947) 26

Bonito Boats, Inc. v. Thunder Craft Boats, Inc., 489 U.S. 141 (1989) 26

Carstensen v. Brunswick Corp., 49 F.3d 430 (8th Cir. 1995) 17

Collins v. Miller, 252 U.S. 364 (1920) 29

Davis v. Brunswick Corp., 854 F. Supp. 1574 (N.D. Ga. 1993) 17

Elliott v. Brunswick Corp., 903 F.2d 1505 (11th Cir. 1990) 28, 30

Farner v. Brunswick Corp., 607 N.E.2d 562 (Ill. App. 1992) 17

Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan v. de la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141 (1982) 23

Fitzpatrick v. Madonna, 623 A.2d 322 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1993) 28

Flynt v. Ohio, 451 U.S. 619 (1981) 29

Foremost Ins. Co. v. Richardson, 457 U.S. 668 (1982) 22, 23

025
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:34 FAX 202514976
REV_0025924

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES-Continued

Page

Foust v. Munson S.S. Lines, 299 U.S. 77 (1936) 20

Free v. Bland, 369 U.S. 663 (1962) 23

Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280 (1995) 17, 18, 21, 22, 23, 25

Geier v. American Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 861 (2000) ..... passim

Hunt v. Blasius, 384 N.E.2d 368 (Ill. 1978) 27

Jarke v. Jackson Products, 631 N.E.2d 233 (Ill. App. 1994) 27

Lady v. Neal Glaser Marine, Inc., 228 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2000), cert. denied, 121 S. Ct. 1402 (2001) .. passim

Lamkin v. Towner, 563 N.E.2d 449 (Ill. 1990) 27

Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., 523 U.S. 1113 (1998) ... passim

Miller v. Dvornik, 501 N.E.2d 160 (Ill. App. 1986) 27

Moore v. Brunswick Bowling & Billiards Corp., 889 S.W.2d 246 (Tex. 1994) 17, 18, 19, 20

Moss v. Outboard Marine Corp., 915 F. Supp. 183 (E.D. Cal. 1996) 17

Mowery v. Mercury Marine, 773 F. Supp. 1012 (N.D. Ohio 1991) 17

Parker v. Outboard Marine Corp., No. J90-0011(L) (S.D. Miss. Feb. 28, 1991) 17

Pree v. Brunswick Corp., 983 F.2d 863 (8th Cir. 1993) ... 28

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES-Continued

Page

Puerto Rico Dep't of Consumer Affairs v. Isla Petroleum Corp., 485 U.S. 495 (1988) 26

Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151 (1978) 12, 26

Republic Natural Gas Co. v. Oklahoma, 334 U.S. 62 (1948) 29

Ryan v. Brunswick Corp., 557 N.W.2d 541 (Mich. 1997) 17

Scoby v. Vulcan-Hart Corp., 569 N.E.2d 1147 (Ill. App. 1991) 27

Shield v. Bayliner Marine Corp., 822 F. Supp. 81 (D. Conn. 1993) 17

Shields v. Outboard Marine Corp., 776 F. Supp. 1579 (M.D. Ga. 1991) 17, 28

Todd v. Societe BIC, S.A., 21 F.3d 1402 (7th Cir. 1994) ... 27

United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89 (2000) ..... passim

Veal v. Teleflex, Inc., 586 So. 2d 188 (Ala. 1991) 28

Worthy v. Collagen Corp., 967 S.W.2d 360 (Tex. 1998) .. 19

026
03/22/2002 12:34 FAX 2025149769 OSG DOJ
REV_00259242

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES-Continued

Page

Statutes and Regulations:

Pub. L. No. 92-75, 85 Stat. 213:

§ 2 2
§ 17-24 2
§ 25-33 3

28 U.S.C. § 1257 1

28 U.S.C. § 1257(a) 29

46 U.S.C. §§ 4301-4311 2

46 U.S.C. § 4301(a) 12, 23

46 U.S.C. § 4302(a) 3

46 U.S.C. § 4302(c)(4) 3, 6

46 U.S.C. § 4306 ..... 5, 11

46 U.S.C. § 4311(g) 5, 24

46 U.S.C. § 13110 3

46 U.S.C. § 13110(a) 3

46 U.S.C. § 13110(b)(1) 3

33 C.F.R. Chap. I, Subchap. S 5

33 C.F.R. Part 175 5

33 C.F.R. § 179.11 6

33 C.F.R. § 181.7 6

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES-Continued

Page

33 C.F.R. § 181.15 6

33 C.F.R. Part 183 5

33 C.F.R. § 183.53 6

49 C.F.R. § 1.46(n)(1) 2

Miscellaneous:

3 COLLIER ON BANKRUPTCY ¶ 362.07[3][a] (15th ed. rev. 2001) 20

117 Cong. Rec. 28036 (1971) 5

36 Fed. Reg. 15764 (Aug. 18, 1971) 11, 25

38 Fed. Reg. 6914 (Mar. 14, 1973) 11, 25

53 Fed. Reg. 33210 (Aug. 30, 1988) 7

53 Fed. Reg. 43069 (Oct. 25, 1988) 7

53 Fed. Reg. 43070 (Oct. 25, 1988) 7

54 Fed. Reg. 15066 (Apr. 14, 1989) 7

54 Fed. Reg. 15068 (Apr. 14, 1989) 7

54 Fed. Reg. 42138 (Oct. 13, 1989) 7

60 Fed. Reg. 25191 (May 11, 1995) 10

61 Fed. Reg. 13123 (Mar. 26, 1996) 10, 11, 25

61 Fed. Reg. 13125 (Mar. 26, 1996) 11, 25

027
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:34 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259243

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES-Continued

Page

62 Fed. Reg. 22991 (Apr. 28, 1997) 10

65 Fed. Reg. 23144 (Apr. 24, 2000) 10

65 Fed. Reg. 23148 (Apr. 24, 2000) 10

H.R. Rep. No. 92-324 (1971) 2, 4, 5

National Boating Safety Program: Hearing on S. 696 Before the Merchant Marine Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on Commerce, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971) 4

Recreational Boat Safety: Hearings on H.R. 15041, 15140 Before a Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Merchant Marine & Fisheries, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970) 2, 4

National Boating Safety Advisory Council, Report of the Propeller Guard Subcommittee (Nov. 7, 1989) ..... passim

RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 402A (1965) 27

S. Rep. No. 92-248 (1971) ..... passim

BRIEF FOR RESPONDENT IN OPPOSITION

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the Illinois Supreme Court (Pet. App. 1-22) is reported at 757 N.E.2d 75 (Ill. 2001). The opinion of the Illinois Appellate Court (Pet. App. 23-38) is reported at 729 N.E.2d 45 (Ill. App. 2000). The order of the Circuit Court of Cook County (Nov. 20, 1998) (Pet. App. 39) is unreported.

JURISDICTION

Petitioner invokes this Court's jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1257. As explained below, however, there is a question about the Court's jurisdiction in this case. See infra pp. 29-30.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The petition rests almost entirely on the claim that this Court should resolve the question presented in Lewis v. Brunswick Corp., No. 97-288, which was dismissed before a decision on the merits. 523 U.S. 1113 (1998). But the principal legal issues raised here were definitively resolved two Terms ago in Geier v. American Honda Motor Co., 529 U.S. 861 (2000)—which involved a law that petitioner has acknowledged is "nearly identical" to the law at issue here, and which the court below carefully applied in reaching its decision.

No post-Geier decision conflicts with the ruling below. The nine federal courts to address the issue (both before and after Geier) have unanimously held that "propeller guard" claims are preempted by the Boat Safety Act. The only contrary decision —a 1994 state court ruling—rests on reasoning that has been repudiated by several recent decisions of this Court, including Geier and United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89 (2000). Thus, the petition is nothing more than a quarrel with the application of settled law to this particular case. There is no genuine conflict among the lower courts, and it will be time enough to address the issue if and when a conflict arises.

028
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:35 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259244

This Court's denial of certiorari only six months ago in Lady v. Neal Glaser Marine, Inc., 228 F.3d 598 (5th Cir. 2000), cert. denied, 121 S. Ct. 1402 (2001), a case presenting the same issue in a nearly identical petition submitted by the same counsel, confirms that this is not a certworthy case. There is no justification for a different disposition here.

A. The Federal Boat Safety Act

Congress enacted the Federal Boat Safety Act ("BSA"), 46 U.S.C. §§ 4301-4311, to "improve boating safety and to foster greater development, use, and enjoyment of all the waters of the United States." Pub. L. No. 92-75, § 2, 85 Stat. 213, 214 (1971). Congress sought to achieve those goals by "authorizing the establishment of national construction and performance standards for boats and associated equipment." Ibid.

Prior to the BSA, the federal laws governing boat safety did "not meet current requirements of safe boating." H.R. Rep. No. 92-324, at 9 (1971) ("H.R. Rep."). The Motorboat Act of 1940 imposed limited safety requirements "such as life preservers [and] fire extinguishers." S. Rep. No. 92-248, at 13 (1971) ("S. Rep."). The Boating Act of 1958 was narrower—"primarily a boat numbering statute." H.R. Rep. at 9. Congress thus established a more comprehensive and "coordinated national boating safety program"—the BSA. S. Rep. at 1, 13.

The BSA has three principal components. First, it establishes "a standard numbering system for vessels" that is administered by the Coast Guard. Pub. L. No. 92-75, §§ 17-24, 85 Stat. at 220-222; Recreational Boat Safety: Hearings on H.R. 15041, 15140 Before a Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Merchant Marine & Fisheries, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. 57 (1970) ("H. Hearings") (statement of Rear Admiral Joseph J. McClelland, U.S. Coast Guard).[1]

[1] The statute vests implementing authority in the Secretary of Transportation, who has delegated his functions to the Coast Guard. 49 C.F.R. § 1.46(n)(1).

Second, "to encourage greater State participation and consistency in boating safety efforts, and particularly greater safety patrol and enforcement activities," the BSA establishes "State boating safety programs" under the auspices of the Coast Guard. Pub. L. No. 92-75, §§ 25-33, 85 Stat. at 222-226.

Third, and most important, the Act mandates comprehensive federal design standards for boats and associated equipment (including motors). The Act directs the Coast Guard to prescribe regulations (46 U.S.C. § 4302(a)):

> (1) establishing minimum safety standards for recreational vessels and associated equipment, and establishing procedures and tests required to measure conformance with those standards, with each standard—
>
> (A) meeting the need for recreational vessel safety; and
>
> (B) being stated, insofar as practicable, in terms of performance * * *.

In considering whether to adopt a manufacturing standard, the Coast Guard must "consult with" the National Boating Safety Advisory Council ("NBSAC" or "Council"). 46 U.S.C. §§ 4302(c)(4), 13110. The Council's 21 members, all of whom are appointed by the Secretary of Transportation, must have expertise in recreational boating safety and must represent three different constituencies: (a) seven state officials responsible for state boat safety programs; (b) seven representatives of boat manufacturers; and (c) seven representatives of national boating organizations and the general public. Id. § 13110(a), (b)(1).

B. Preemption Under The Federal Boat Safety Act

The BSA grants the Coast Guard plenary authority to require that manufacturers comply with its "national construction and performance standards for boats and associated equipment." S. Rep. at 15. Because of their effect on interstate and maritime commerce, Congress was particularly concerned that any such manufacturing requirements be nationally uniform: "The need

029
OSG DOJ
03/22/2002 12:35 FAX 2025149769
REV_00259245

for uniformity in standards if interstate commerce is not to be unduly impeded supports the establishment of uniform construction and equipment standards at the Federal level." Id. at 14. Accord H.R. Rep. at 29; see H. Hearings at 61 ("several States are developing requirements of their own in law[s] which are varied and it is quite important both for the convenience of the boatmen and for the manufacturer, too, to insure that these standards are uniform throughout the country") (statement of Rear Admiral McClelland). As Representative Monagan explained: "A proliferation of dissimilar standards would give the manufacturer * * * an impossible task. Federal preemption over any law or regulation which establishes boat or associated equipment safety standards is imperative now." National Boating Safety Program: Hearing on S. 696 Before the Merchant Marine Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on Commerce, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. 101 (1971) ("S. Hearing").

Congress also recognized that maritime safety traditionally has been an area where federal regulation predominates. As the Senate Report states: "federal preemption in the issuance of boat and equipment safety standards * * * conforms to the long history of preemption in maritime safety matters and is founded on the need for uniformity applicable to vessels moving in interstate commerce." S. Rep. at 20.

These considerations led Congress to draft the BSA's preemption clause in broad and inclusive terms:

> Unless permitted by the [Coast Guard] under section 4305 of this title, a State or political subdivision of a State may not establish, continue in effect, or enforce a law or regulation establishing a recreational vessel or associated equipment performance or other safety standard or imposing a requirement for associated equipment (except insofar as the State or political subdivision may, in the absence of the [Coast Guard's] disapproval, regulate the carrying or use of marine safety articles to meet uniquely hazardous conditions > or circumstances within the State) that is not identical to a regulation prescribed under section 4302 of this title.

46 U.S.C. § 4306. The Act thus insures that boat manufacturers are not subject to "compliance with widely varying local requirements." S. Rep. at 20. By mandating that any state laws, regulations, or requirements be "identical" to some regulation issued by the Coast Guard, the preemption clause "preempts the field on boating standards or regulations." H.R. Rep. at 11.

C. The Federal Boat Safety Act's "Savings Provision"

Late in the course of Congress's consideration of the BSA, the Senate Commerce Committee added a "Savings Provision" to the bill. See S. Rep. at 31. "Compliance with this chapter or standards, regulations, or orders prescribed under this chapter," this provision states, "does not relieve a person from liability at common law or under State law." 46 U.S.C. § 4311(g).

The only recorded discussion of this provision in the House was a brief colloquy on the floor, in which Representative Grover described it as a "technical amendmen[t] put in on the Senate side in which we of the minority of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries have concurred." 117 Cong. Rec. 28036 (1971). The Senate's "technical" amendment "was concurred in" by the House, and the Act was adopted. Ibid.

D. The Coast Guard's Considered Determination That Propeller Guards Should Not Be Required

The Coast Guard has promulgated a host of federal boat and motor design standards. See 33 C.F.R. Chap. I, Subchap. S. In particular, it has adopted numerous "Equipment Requirements," including design standards for boat motors, flotation materials, electrical and fuel systems, personal flotation devices, distress signals, and ventilation systems. See id. Parts 175 (Subparts B-D), 183 (Subparts D-L). For example, the Coast Guard regulates the "safe powering" and "maximum horsepower capacity" of boats, the "placement" of outboard motors, and the "quick turn"

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 529 us 861

*529 U.S. 861, *; 120 S. Ct. 1913, **;*
146 L. Ed. 2d 914, ; 2000 U.S. LEXIS 3425

ALEXIS GEIER, ET AL. v. AMERICAN HONDA MOTOR COMPANY, INC., ET AL.

No. 98-1811

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

529 U.S. 861; 120 S. Ct. 1913; 146 L. Ed. 2d 914; 2000 U.S. LEXIS 3425; 68 U.S.L.W. 4425; CCH Prod. Liab. Rep. P15,795; 2000 Cal. Daily Op. Service 5277; 2000 Daily Journal DAR 5277; 2000 Colo. J. C.A.R. 2826; 13 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 344

December 7, 1999, Argued
May 22, 2000, Decided

NOTICE:

The LEXIS pagination of this document is subject to change pending release of the final published version.

PRIOR HISTORY: ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT.

DISPOSITION: 166 F.3d 1236, affirmed.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: On writ of certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, petitioners appealed from the judgment of the appellate court, affirming the dismissal of their "no airbag" tort suit, finding that those claims conflicted with Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard 208, and that the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, former 15 U.S.C.S. § 1381 et seq., consequently pre-empted the suit.

OVERVIEW: Petitioner driver collided with a tree and was seriously injured. Petitioners, the driver and her parents, sued respondent car manufacturer, claiming that respondent had designed its car negligently and defectively because it lacked a driver's side airbag. The district court dismissed the suit, and the court of appeals affirmed. The court granted certiorari and affirmed the dismissal. The court found that the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, former 15 U.S.C.S. § 1381 et seq., express preemption provision did not preempt the common-law "no airbag" action because the language permitted a narrow reading that excluded common-law actions. However, the court found that petitioners' suit conflicted with Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard (FMVSS) 208. FMVSS 208 sought a gradually developing mix of alternative passive restraint devices for safety-related reasons. The rule of state tort law for which petitioners argued would have stood as an obstacle to the accomplishment of that objective, and the statute foresaw the application of ordinary principles of preemption in cases of actual conflict. Hence, petitioners' action was pre-empted.

REV_00259268

suggests Congress wanted to complicate ordinary experience-proved principles of conflict pre-emption with an added, "special burden." Indeed, the dissent's willingness to impose a "special burden" here stems ultimately from its view that "frustration-of-purpose" conflict pre-emption is a freewheeling, "inadequately considered" doctrine that might well be "eliminated." Post, at 24, and n. 22. In a word, ordinary pre-emption principles, grounded in longstanding precedent, Hines, supra, at 67, apply. We would not further complicate the law with complex new doctrine.

IV

[*HR1D] [1D]
The basic question, then, is whether a common-law "no airbag" action like the one before us actually conflicts with FMVSS 208. We hold that it does.

In petitioners' and the dissent's view, FMVSS 208 sets a minimum airbag standard. As far as FMVSS 208 is concerned, the more airbags, and the sooner, the better. But that was not the Secretary's view. DOT's [*875] comments, which accompanied the promulgation of FMVSS 208, make clear that the standard deliberately provided the manufacturer with a range of choices among different passive restraint devices. Those choices [928] would bring about a mix of different devices introduced gradually over time; and FMVSS 208 would thereby lower costs, overcome technical safety problems, encourage technological development, and win widespread consumer acceptance -- all of which would promote FMVSS 208's safety objectives. See generally 49 Fed. Reg. 28962 (1984).

A

The history of FMVSS 208 helps explain why and how DOT sought these objectives. See generally Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Assn. of United States, Inc. v. State Farm Mut. Automobile Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 34-38, 77 L. Ed. 2d 443, 103 S. Ct. 2856 (1983). In 1967, DOT, understanding that seatbelts would save many lives, required manufacturers to install manual seat belts in all automobiles. 32 Fed. Reg. 2408, 2415. It became apparent, however, that most occupants simply would not buckle up their belts. See 34 Fed. Reg. 11148 (1969). DOT then began to investigate the feasibility of requiring "passive restraints," such as airbags and automatic seatbelts. Ibid. In 1970, it amended FMVSS 208 to include some passive protection requirements, 35 Fed. Reg. 16927, while making clear that airbags were one of several "equally acceptable" devices and that it neither "'favored' nor expected the introduction of airbag systems." Ibid. In 1971, it added an express provision permitting compliance through the use of nondetachable passive belts, 36 Fed. Reg. 12858, 12859, and in 1972, it mandated full passive protection for all front seat occupants for vehicles manufactured after August 15, 1975, 37 Fed. Reg. 3911. Although the agency's focus was originally on airbags, 34 Fed. Reg. 11148 (1969) (notice of proposed rulemaking); State Farm, 463 U.S. at 35, n. 4; see also id., at 46, n. 11 (noting view of commentators that, as of 1970, FMVSS [*876] 208 was "'a de facto airbag mandate'" because of the state of passive restraint technology), at no point did FMVSS 208 formally require the use of airbags. From the start, as in 1984, it permitted passive restraint options.

DOT gave manufacturers a further choice for new vehicles manufactured between 1972 and August 1975. Manufacturers could either install a passive restraint device such as automatic seatbelts or airbags or retain manual belts and add an "ignition interlock" device that in effect forced occupants to buckle up by preventing the ignition otherwise from turning on. 37 Fed. Reg. 3911 (1972). The interlock soon became popular with manufacturers. And in 1974, when the agency approved the use of detachable automatic seatbelts, it conditioned that approval by providing [1923] that such systems must include an interlock system and a continuous warning buzzer to encourage reattachment of the belt. 39 Fed. Reg. 14593. But the interlock and buzzer devices were most unpopular with the public. And Congress, responding to public pressure, passed a law that forbade DOT from requiring, or permitting compliance by means of, such devices. Motor Vehicle and Schoolbus Safety Amendments of 1974, § 109, 88 Stat. 1482 (previously codified at 15 U.S.C. § 1410b(b) (1988 ed.)).

REV_00259277

That experience influenced DOT's subsequent passive restraint initiatives. In 1976, DOT Secretary William [929] Coleman, fearing continued public resistance, suspended the passive restraint requirements. He sought to win public acceptance for a variety of passive restraint devices through a demonstration project that would involve about half a million new automobiles. State Farm, supra, at 37. But his successor, Brock Adams, canceled the project, instead amending FMVSS 208 to require passive restraints, principally either airbags or passive seat belts. 42 Fed. Reg. 34289 (1977).

Andrew Lewis, a new DOT Secretary in a new administration, rescinded the Adams requirements, primarily because DOT learned that the industry planned to satisfy those [*877] requirements almost exclusively through the installation of detachable automatic seatbelts. 46 Fed. Reg. 53419-53420 (1981). This Court held the rescission unlawful. State Farm, supra, at 34, 46. And the stage was set for then-DOT Secretary, Elizabeth Dole, to amend FMVSS 208 once again, promulgating the version that is now before us. 49 Fed. Reg. 28962 (1984).

B

Read in light of this history, DOT's own contemporaneous explanation of FMVSS 208 makes clear that the 1984 version of FMVSS 208 reflected the following significant considerations. First, buckled up seatbelts are a vital ingredient of automobile safety. Id., at 29003; State Farm, supra, at 52 ("We start with the accepted ground that if used, seatbelts unquestionably would save many thousands of lives and would prevent tens of thousands of crippling injuries"). Second, despite the enormous and unnecessary risks that a passenger runs by not buckling up manual lap and shoulder belts, more than 80% of front seat passengers would leave their manual seatbelts unbuckled. 49 Fed. Reg. 28983 (1984) (estimating that only 12.5% of front seat passengers buckled up manual belts). Third, airbags could make up for the dangers caused by unbuckled manual belts, but they could not make up for them entirely. Id., at 28986 (concluding that, although an airbag plus a lap and shoulder belt was the most "effective" system, airbags alone were less effective than buckled up manual lap and shoulder belts).

Fourth, passive restraint systems had their own disadvantages, for example, the dangers associated with, intrusiveness of, and corresponding public dislike for, nondetachable automatic belts. Id., at 28992-28993. Fifth, airbags brought with them their own special risks to safety, such as the risk of danger to out-of-position occupants (usually children) in small cars. Id., at 28992, 29001; see also 65 Fed. Reg. 30680, 30681-30682 (2000) (finding 158 confirmed airbag-induced fatalities as of April 2000, and amending rule [*878] to add new requirements, test procedures, and injury criteria to ensure that "future air bags be designed to create less risk of serious airbag-induced injuries than current air bags, particularly for small women and young children"); U.S. Dept. of Transportation, National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, National Accident Sampling System Crashworthiness Data System 1991-1993, p. viii (Aug. 1995) (finding that airbags caused approximately 54,000 injuries between 1991 and 1993). [1924] [930]

Sixth, airbags were expected to be significantly more expensive than other passive restraint devices, raising the average cost of a vehicle price $ 320 for full frontal airbags over the cost of a car with manual lap and shoulder seatbelts (and potentially much more if production volumes were low). 49 Fed. Reg. 28990 (1984). And the agency worried that the high replacement cost -- estimated to be $ 800 -- could lead car owners to refuse to replace them after deployment. Id., at 28990, 29000-29001; see also id., at 28990 (estimating total investment costs for mandatory airbag requirement at $ 1.3 billion compared to $ 500 million for automatic seatbelts). Seventh, the public, for reasons of cost, fear, or physical intrusiveness, might resist installation or use of any of the then-available passive restraint devices, id., at 28987-28989 -- a particular concern with respect to airbags, id., at 29001

REV_00259278

(noting that "airbags engendered the largest quantity of, and most vociferously worded, comments").

FMVSS 208 reflected these considerations in several ways. Most importantly, that standard deliberately sought variety -- a mix of several different passive restraint systems. It did so by setting a performance requirement for passive restraint devices and allowing manufacturers to choose among different passive restraint mechanisms, such as airbags, automatic belts, or other passive restraint technologies to satisfy that requirement. Id., at 28996. And DOT explained why FMVSS 208 sought the mix of devices that it expected its performance standard to produce. Id. at [*879] 28997. DOT wrote that it had rejected a proposed FMVSS 208 "all airbag" standard because of safety concerns (perceived or real) associated with airbags, which concerns threatened a "backlash" more easily overcome "if airbags" were "not the only way of complying." Id., at 29001. It added that a mix of devices would help develop data on comparative effectiveness, would allow the industry time to overcome the safety problems and the high production costs associated with airbags, and would facilitate the development of alternative, cheaper, and safer passive restraint systems. Id., at 29001-29002. And it would thereby build public confidence, id., at 29001-29002, necessary to avoid another interlock-type fiasco.

The 1984 FMVSS 208 standard also deliberately sought a gradual phase-in of passive restraints. Id., at 28999-29000. It required the manufacturers to equip only 10% of their car fleet manufactured after September 1, 1986, with passive restraints. Id., at 28999. It then increased the percentage in three annual stages, up to 100% of the new car fleet for cars manufactured after September 1, 1989. Ibid. And it explained that the phased-in requirement would allow more time for manufacturers to develop airbags or other, better, safer passive restraint systems. It would help develop information about the comparative effectiveness of different systems, would lead to a mix in which airbags and other nonseatbelt passive restraint systems played a more prominent role than would otherwise result, and would promote public acceptance. Id., at 29000-29001.

Of course, as the dissent points out, post, at 19-20, FMVSS 208 did not guarantee the mix by setting a ceiling for each different passive restraint [931] device. In fact, it provided a form of extra credit for airbag installation (and other nonbelt passive restraint devices) under which each airbag-installed vehicle counted as 1.5 vehicles for purposes of meeting FMVSS 208's passive restraint requirement. 49 CFR § 571.208, S4.1.3.4(a)(1) (1999); 49 Fed. Reg. 29000 (1984). [*880] But why should DOT have bothered to impose an airbag ceiling when the practical threat to the mix it desired arose from the likelihood that manufacturers would install, not too many airbags too quickly, but too few or none at all? After all, only a few years earlier, Secretary Dole's predecessor had discovered that manufacturers intended to meet [1925] the then-current passive restraint requirement almost entirely (more than 99%) through the installation of more affordable automatic belt systems. 46 Fed. Reg. 53421 (1981); State Farm, 463 U.S. at 38. The extra credit, as DOT explained, was designed to "encourage manufacturers to equip at least some of their cars with airbags." 49 Fed. Reg. 29001 (1984) (emphasis added) (responding to comment that failure to mandate airbags might mean the "end of . . . airbag technology"); see also id., at 29000 (explaining that the extra credit for airbags "should promote the development of what may be better alternatives to automatic belts than would otherwise be developed" (emphasis added)). The credit provision reinforces the point that FMVSS 208 sought a gradually developing mix of passive restraint devices; it does not show the contrary.

Finally FMVSS 208's passive restraint requirement was conditional. DOT believed that ordinary manual lap and shoulder belts would produce about the same amount of safety as passive restraints, and at significantly lower costs -- if only auto occupants would buckle up. See id., at 28997-28998. Thus, FMVSS 208 provided for rescission of its passive restraint requirement if, by September 1, 1989, two-thirds of the States had laws in place that, like those of many other nations, required auto occupants to buckle up (and which met other requirements specified in the standard). Id., at 28963, 28993-28994, 28997-28999. The Secretary wrote that "coverage of a large percentage of the American people by seatbelt laws that are enforced would largely negate the incremental increase in safety to be expected from an automatic protection requirement." Id., at 28997. [*881] In the end, two-thirds of the States did not enact mandatory buckle-up laws, and the passive restraint requirement remained in effect.

REV_00259279

In sum, as DOT now tells us through the Solicitor General, the 1984 version of FMVSS 208 "embodies the Secretary's policy judgment that safety would best be promoted if manufacturers installed alternative protection systems in their fleets rather than one particular system in every car." Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 25; see 49 Fed. Reg. 28997 (1984). Petitioners' tort suit claims that the manufacturers of the 1987 Honda Accord "had a duty to design, manufacture, distribute and sell a motor vehicle with an effective and safe passive restraint system, including, but not limited to, airbags." App. 3 (Complaint, P 11).

In effect, petitioners' tort action depends upon its claim that manufacturers had a duty to install an airbag when they manufactured the [932] 1987 Honda Accord. Such a state law -- i.e., a rule of state tort law imposing such a duty -- by its terms would have required manufacturers of all similar cars to install airbags rather than other passive restraint systems, such as automatic belts or passive interiors. It thereby would have presented an obstacle to the variety and mix of devices that the federal regulation sought. It would have required all manufacturers to have installed airbags in respect to the entire District-of-Columbia-related portion of their 1987 new car fleet, even though FMVSS 208 at that time required only that 10% of a manufacturer's nationwide fleet be equipped with any passive restraint device at all. It thereby also would have stood as an obstacle to the gradual passive restraint phase-in that the federal regulation deliberately imposed. In addition, it could have made less likely the adoption of a state mandatory buckle-up law. Because the rule of law for which petitioners contend would have stood "as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of " the important means-related federal objectives that we have just discussed, it is pre-empted. Hines, 312 U.S. at [*882] 67; see also Ouellette, 479 U.S. at 493; De la Cuesta, 458 U.S. at 156 (finding conflict and pre-emption where state law limited the availability of an option [1926] that the federal agency considered essential to ensure its ultimate objectives).

Petitioners ask this Court to calculate the precise size of the "obstacle," with the aim of minimizing it, by considering the risk of tort liability and a successful tort action's incentive-related or timing-related compliance effects. See Brief for Petitioners 45-50. The dissent agrees. Post, at 17-20. But this Court's pre-emption cases do not ordinarily turn on such compliance-related considerations as whether a private party in practice would ignore state legal obligations -- paying, say, a fine instead -- or how likely it is that state law actually would be enforced. Rather, this Court's pre-emption cases ordinarily assume compliance with the state law duty in question. The Court has on occasion suggested that tort law may be somewhat different, and that related considerations -- for example, the ability to pay damages instead of modifying one's behavior -- may be relevant for pre-emption purposes. See Goodyear Atomic Corp. v. Miller, 486 U.S. 174, 185, 100 L. Ed. 2d 158, 108 S. Ct. 1704 (1988); Cipollone, 505 U.S. at 536-539 (Blackmun, J., concurring in part, concurring in judgment in part, and dissenting in part); see also English, 496 U.S. at 86; Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 464 U.S. 238, 256, 78 L. Ed. 2d 443, 104 S. Ct. 615 (1984). In other cases, the Court has found tort law to conflict with federal law without engaging in that kind of an analysis. See, e.g., Ouellette, 479 U.S. at 494-497; Kalo Brick, 450 U.S. at 324-332. We need not try to resolve these differences here, however, for the incentive or compliance considerations upon which the dissent relies cannot, by themselves, change the legal result. Some of those considerations rest on speculation, see, e.g., post, at 17 (predicting risk of "no airbag" liability and manufacturers' [933] likely response to such liability); some rest in critical part upon the dissenters' own view of FMVSS 208's basic purposes -- a view [*883] which we reject, see, e.g., post, at 17-20 (suggesting that pre-existing risk of "no airbag" liability would have made FMVSS 208 unnecessary); and others, if we understand them correctly, seem less than persuasive, see, e.g., post, at 18 (suggesting that manufacturers could have complied with a mandatory state airbag duty by installing a different kind of passive restraint device). And in so concluding, we do not "put the burden" of proving pre-emption on petitioners. Post, at 23. We simply find unpersuasive their arguments attempting to undermine the Government's demonstration of actual conflict.

REV_00259280

One final point: We place some weight upon DOT's interpretation of FMVSS 208's objectives and its conclusion, as set forth in the Government's brief, that a tort suit such as this one would "'stand as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution'" of those objectives. Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 25-26 (quoting Hines, 312 U.S. at 67). Congress has delegated to DOT authority to implement the statute; the subject matter is technical; and the relevant history and background are complex and extensive. The agency is likely to have a thorough understanding of its own regulation and its objectives and is "uniquely qualified" to comprehend the likely impact of state requirements. Medtronic, 518 U.S. at 496; see id. at 506 (BREYER, J,. concurring in part and concurring in judgment). And DOT has explained FMVSS 208's objectives, and the interference that "no airbag" suits pose thereto, consistently over time. Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae in Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, O. T. 1994, No. 94-286, pp. 28-29; Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae in Wood v. General Motors Corp., O. T. 1989, No. 89-46, pp. 7, 11-16. In these circumstances, the agency's own views should make a difference. See City of New York v. FCC, 486 U.S. 57, 64, 100 L. Ed. 2d 48, 108 S. Ct. 1637 (1988); Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical Laboratories, Inc., 471 U.S. 707, 714, 721, 85 L. Ed. 2d 714, [1927] 105 S. Ct. 2371 (1985); De la Cuesta, supra, at 158; Blum v. Bacon, 457 U.S. 132, 141, 72 L. Ed. 2d 728, 102 S. Ct. 2355 (1982); Kalo Brick, supra, at 321. [*884]

We have no reason to suspect that the Solicitor General's representation of DOT's views reflects anything other than "the agency's fair and considered judgment on the matter." Auer v. Robbins, 519 U.S. 452, 461-462, 137 L. Ed. 2d 79, 117 S. Ct. 905 (1997); cf. Hillsborough County, supra, at 721 (expressing reluctance, in the absence of strong evidence, to find an actual conflict between state law and federal regulation where agency that promulgated the regulation had not, at the time the regulation was promulgated or subsequently, concluded that such a conflict existed). The failure of the Federal Register to address pre-emption explicitly is thus not determinative.

[*HR1E] [1E]
[*HR7B] [7B]
[*HR9] [9]
The dissent would require a formal agency statement of [934] pre-emptive intent as a prerequisite to concluding that a conflict exists. It relies on cases, or portions thereof, that did not involve conflict pre-emption. See post, at 25; California Coastal Comm'n v. Granite Rock Co., 480 U.S. 572, 583, 94 L. Ed. 2d 577, 107 S. Ct. 1419 (1987); Hillsborough, supra, at 718. And conflict pre-emption is different in that it turns on the identification of "actual conflict," and not on an express statement of pre-emptive intent. English, 496 U.S. at 78-79; see Hillsborough, 471 U.S. at 720-721; Jones, 430 U.S. at 540-543. While "pre-emption fundamentally is a question of congressional intent," English, supra, at 78, this Court traditionally distinguishes between "express" and "implied" pre-emptive intent, and treats "conflict" pre-emption as an instance of the latter. See, e.g., Freightliner, 514 U.S. at 287; English, 496 U.S. at 78-79; see also Cipollone, 505 U.S. at 545, 547-548 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). And though the Court has looked for a specific statement of pre-emptive intent where it is claimed that the mere "volume and complexity" of agency regulations demonstrate an implicit intent to displace all state law in a particular area, Hillsborough, supra, at 717; see post, at 25, n. 23 -- so-called "field pre-emption" -- the Court has never before required a specific, formal agency statement identifying conflict in order to conclude that such a conflict in fact exists. [*885] Indeed, one can assume that Congress or an agency ordinarily would not intend to permit a significant conflict. While we certainly accept the dissent's basic position that a court should not find pre-emption too readily in the absence of clear evidence of a conflict, English, supra, at 90, for the reasons set out above we find such evidence here. To insist on a specific expression of agency intent to pre-empt, made after notice-and-comment rulemaking, would be in certain cases to tolerate conflicts that an agency, and therefore Congress, is most unlikely to have intended. The dissent, as we have said, apparently welcomes that result, at least where "frustration-of-purpose" pre-emption by agency regulation is at issue. Post, at 24, and n. 22. We do not.

REV_00259281

Nor do we agree with the dissent that the agency's views, as presented here, lack coherence. Post, at 21-22. The dissent points, ibid., to language in the Government's brief stating that "a claim that a manufacturer should have chosen to install airbags rather than another type of passive restraint in a certain model of car because of other design features particular to that car . . . would not necessarily frustrate Standard 208's purposes." Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 26, n. 23 (emphasis added).

And the dissent says that these words amount to a concession that there is no conflict in this very case. Post, at 21. But that is not what the words say. Rather, [1928] as the italicized phrase emphasizes, [935] they simply leave open the question whether FMVSS 208 would pre-empt a different kind of tort case -- one not at issue here. It is possible that some special design-related circumstance concerning a particular kind of car might require airbags, rather than automatic belts, and that a suit seeking to impose that requirement could escape pre-emption -- say, because it would affect so few cars that its rule of law would not create a legal "obstacle" to 208's mixed-fleet, gradual objective. But that is not what petitioners [*886] claimed. They have argued generally that, to be safe, a car must have an airbag. See App. 4.

[*HR1F] [1F]
Regardless, the language of FMVSS 208 and the contemporaneous 1984 DOT explanation is clear enough -- even without giving DOT's own view special weight. FMVSS 208 sought a gradually developing mix of alternative passive restraint devices for safety-related reasons. The rule of state tort law for which petitioners argue would stand as an "obstacle" to the accomplishment of that objective. And the statute foresees the application of ordinary principles of pre-emption in cases of actual conflict. Hence, the tort action is pre-empted.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

It is so ordered.

DISSENTBY: STEVENS

DISSENT: JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE SOUTER, JUSTICE THOMAS, and JUSTICE GINSBURG join, dissenting.

Airbag technology has been available to automobile manufacturers for over 30 years. There is now general agreement on the proposition "that, to be safe, a car must have an airbag." Ante, at 23. Indeed, current federal law imposes that requirement on all automobile manufacturers. See 49 U.S.C. § 30127; 49 CFR § 571.208, S4.1.5.3 (1998). The question raised by petitioner's common-law tort action is whether that proposition was sufficiently obvious when Honda's 1987 Accord was manufactured to make the failure to install such a safety feature actionable under theories of negligence or defective design. The Court holds that an interim regulation motivated by the Secretary of Transportation's desire to foster gradual development of a variety of passive restraint devices deprives state courts of jurisdiction to answer that question. I respectfully dissent from that holding, and especially from the Court's unprecedented extension of the doctrine of pre-emption. As a preface to an explanation of my understanding of the statute and the regulation, these preliminary observations seem appropriate. [*887]

REV_00259282

"This is a case about federalism," Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 726, 115 L. Ed. 2d 640, 111 S. Ct. 2546 (1991), that is, about respect for "the constitutional role of the States as sovereign entities." Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706, 713, 144 L. Ed. 2d 636, 119 S. Ct. 2240 (1999). It raises important questions concerning the way in which the Federal Government may exercise its undoubted power to oust state courts of their traditional jurisdiction over common-law tort actions. The rule the Court enforces today was not enacted by Congress and is not to be found in the text of any Executive Order or regulation. It has a unique origin: it is the product [936] of the Court's interpretation of the final commentary accompanying an interim administrative regulation and the history of airbag regulation generally. Like many other judge-made rules, its contours are not precisely defined. I believe, however, that it is fair to state that if it had been expressly adopted by the Secretary of Transportation, it would have read as follows:

"No state court shall entertain a common-law tort action based on a claim that an automobile was negligently or defectively designed because it was not equipped with an airbag;

"Provided, however, that this rule shall not apply to cars manufactured before September 1, 1986, or after such time as [1929] the Secretary may require the installation of airbags in all new cars; and

"Provided further, that this rule shall not preclude a claim by a driver who was not wearing her seatbelt that an automobile was negligently or defectively designed because it was not equipped with any passive restraint whatsoever, or a claim that an automobile with particular design features was negligently or defectively designed because it was equipped with one type of passive restraint instead of another."

Perhaps such a rule would be a wise component of a legislative reform of our tort system. I express no opinion about [*888] that possibility. It is, however, quite clear to me that Congress neither enacted any such rule itself nor authorized the Secretary of Transportation to do so. It is equally clear to me that the objectives that the Secretary intended to achieve through the adoption of Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard 208 would not be frustrated one whit by allowing state courts to determine whether in 1987 the life-saving advantages of airbags had become sufficiently obvious that their omission might constitute a design defect in some new cars. Finally, I submit that the Court is quite wrong to characterize its rejection of the presumption against pre-emption, and its reliance on history and regulatory commentary rather than either statutory or regulatory text, as "ordinary experience-proved principles of conflict pre-emption." Ante, at 11.

I

The question presented is whether either the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 (Safety Act or Act), 80 Stat. 718, 15 U.S.C. § 1381 et seq. (1988 ed.), n1 or the version of Standard 208 promulgated by the Secretary of Transportation in 1984, 49 CFR §§ 571.208, S4.1.3-S4.1.4 (1998), pre-empts common-law tort claims that an automobile manufactured in 1987 was negligently and defectively designed because it lacked "an effective and safe passive restraint system, including, but not limited to, airbags." App. 3. In Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Assn. of United States, Inc. v. State Farm Mut. Automobile Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 34-38, 77 L. Ed. 2d 443, 103 S. Ct. 2856 (1983), we [937] reviewed the first chapters of the "complex and convoluted history" of Standard 208. It was the "unacceptably high" rate of deaths and injuries caused by automobile accidents that led to the enactment of the Safety Act in 1966. Id., at 33. The purpose of the Act, as stated by Congress, [*889] was "to reduce traffic accidents and deaths and injuries to persons resulting from traffic accidents." 15 U.S.C. § 1381. The Act directed the Secretary of Transportation or his delegate to issue motor vehicle safety standards that "shall be practicable, shall meet the need for motor vehicle safety, and shall be stated in objective terms." § 1392(a). The Act defines the term "safety standard" as a "minimum standard for motor vehicle performance, or motor vehicle equipment performance." § 1391(2).

REV_00259283

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 In 1994, the Safety Act was recodified at 49 U.S.C. § 30101 et seq. Because the changes made to the Act as part of the recodification process were not intended to be substantive, throughout this opinion I shall refer to the pre-1994 version of the statute, as did the Court of Appeals.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Standard 208 covers "occupant crash protection." Its purpose "is to reduce the number of deaths of vehicle occupants, and the severity of injuries, by specifying vehicle crashworthiness requirements . . . [and] equipment requirements for active and passive restraint systems." 49 CFR § 571.208, S2 (1998). The first version of that standard, issued in 1967, simply required the installation of manual seatbelts in all automobiles. Two years later the Secretary formally proposed a revision that would require the installation of "passive occupant restraint systems," that is to say, devices that do not depend for their effectiveness on any action by the vehicle [1930] occupant. The airbag is one such system. n2 The Secretary's proposal led to a series of amendments to Standard 208 that imposed various passive restraint requirements, culminating in a 1977 regulation that mandated such restraints in all cars by the model year 1984. The two commercially available restraints that could satisfy this mandate [*890] were airbags and automatic seatbelts; the regulation allowed each vehicle manufacturer to choose which restraint to install. In 1981, however, following a change of administration, the new Secretary first extended the deadline for compliance and then rescinded the passive restraint requirement altogether. In Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Assn., we affirmed a decision by the Court of Appeals holding that this rescission was arbitrary. On remand, Secretary Elizabeth Dole promulgated the version of Standard 208 that is at issue in this case.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 "The airbag is an inflatable device concealed in the dashboard and steering column. It automatically inflates when a sensor indicates that deceleration forces from an accident have exceeded a preset minimum, then rapidly deflates to dissipate those forces. The lifesaving potential of these devices was immediately recognized, and in 1977, after substantial on-the-road experience with both devices, it was estimated by [the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA)] that passive restraints could prevent approximately 12,000 deaths and over 100,000 serious injuries annually. 42 Fed. Reg. 34298." Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Assn. of United States, Inc. v. State Farm Mut. Automobile Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 35, 77 L. Ed. 2d 443, 103 S. Ct. 2856 (1983).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The 1984 standard provided for a phase-in of passive restraint requirements beginning with the 1987 model year. In that year, vehicle manufacturers were required to equip a minimum of 10% of their new passenger cars with such restraints. While the 1987 Honda Accord driven by Ms. Geier was not so equipped, it is undisputed that Honda complied with the 10% minimum by installing passive restraints [938] in certain other 1987 models. This minimum passive restraint requirement increased to 25% of 1988 models and 40% of 1989 models; the standard also mandated that "after September 1, 1989, all new cars must have automatic occupant crash protection." 49 Fed. Reg. 28999 (1984); see 49 CFR §§ 571.208, S4.1.3-S4.1.4 (1998). In response to a 1991 amendment to the Safety Act, the Secretary amended the standard to require that, beginning in the 1998 model year, all new cars have an airbag at both the driver's and right front passenger's positions. n3

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00259284

n3 See 49 U.S.C. § 30127; 49 CFR § 571.208, S4.1.5.3 (1998). Congress stated that it did not intend its amendment or the Secretary's consequent alteration of Standard 208 to affect the potential liability of vehicle manufacturers under applicable law related to vehicles with or without airbags. 49 U.S.C. § 30127(f)(2).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Given that Secretary Dole promulgated the 1984 standard in response to our opinion invalidating her predecessor's rescission of the 1977 passive restraint requirement, she provided a full explanation for her decision not to require airbags [*891] in all cars and to phase in the new requirements. The initial 3-year delay was designed to give vehicle manufacturers adequate time for compliance. The decision to give manufacturers a choice between airbags and a different form of passive restraint, such as an automatic seatbelt, was motivated in part by safety concerns and in part by a desire not to retard the development of more effective systems. 49 Fed. Reg. 29000-29001 (1984). An important safety concern was the fear of a "public backlash" to an airbag mandate that consumers might not fully understand. The Secretary believed, however, that the use of airbags would avoid possible public objections to automatic seatbelts and that many of the public concerns regarding airbags were unfounded. Id., at 28991.

Although the standard did not require airbags in all cars, it is clear that the Secretary did intend to encourage wider use of airbags. One of her basic conclusions was that "automatic occupant protection [1931] systems that do not totally rely upon belts, such as airbags . . . , offer significant additional potential for preventing fatalities and injuries, at least in part because the American public is likely to find them less intrusive; their development and availability should be encouraged through appropriate incentives." Id., at 28963; see also id., at 28966, 28986 (noting conclusion of both Secretary and manufacturers that airbags used in conjunction with manual lap and shoulder belts would be "the most effective system of all" for preventing fatalities and injuries). The Secretary therefore included a phase-in period in order to encourage manufacturers to comply with the standard by installing airbags and other (perhaps more effective) nonbelt technologies that they might develop, rather than by installing less expensive automatic seatbelts. n4 As a further incentive [*892] for the use of such technologies, the standard provided that a vehicle equipped with an airbag or other nonbelt system would count as 1.5 vehicles for the purpose [939] of determining compliance with the required 10, 25, or 40% minimum passive restraint requirement during the phase-in period. 49 CFR § 571.208, S4.1.3.4(a)(1) (1998). With one oblique exception, n5 there is no mention, either in the text of the final standard or in the accompanying comments, of the possibility that the risk of potential tort liability would provide an incentive for manufacturers to install airbags. Nor is there any other specific evidence of an intent to preclude common-law tort actions.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 "If the Department had required full compliance by September 1, 1987, it is very likely all of the manufacturers would have had to comply through the use of automatic belts. Thus, by phasing-in the requirement, the Department makes it easier for manufacturers to use other, perhaps better, systems such as airbags and passive interiors." 49 Fed. Reg. 29000 (1984).

n5 In response to a comment that the manufacturers were likely to use the cheapest system to comply with the new standard, the Secretary stated that she believed "that competition, potential liability for any deficient systems[,] and pride in one's product would prevent this." Ibid.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

II

REV_00259285

Before discussing the pre-emption issue, it is appropriate to note that there is a vast difference between a rejection of Honda's threshold arguments in favor of federal pre-emption and a conclusion that petitioners ultimately would prevail on their common-law tort claims. I express no opinion on the possible merit, or lack of merit, of those claims. I do observe, however, that even though good-faith compliance with the minimum requirements of Standard 208 would not provide Honda with a complete defense on the merits, n6 I assume [*893] that such compliance would be admissible evidence tending to negate charges of negligent and defective design. n7 In addition, [1932] if Honda were ultimately found liable, such compliance would presumably weigh against an award of punitive damages. Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 485 F. Supp. 566, 583-584 (WD Okla. 1979) (concluding that substantial compliance with regulatory scheme did not bar award of punitive damages, but noting that "good faith belief in, and efforts to comply with, all government regulations would be evidence of conduct inconsistent with the mental state requisite for punitive damages" under state law). n8

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 Wood v. General Motors Corp., 865 F.2d 395, 417 (CA1 1988) (collecting cases). The result would be different, of course, if petitioners had brought common-law tort claims challenging Honda's compliance with a mandatory minimum federal standard -- e.g., claims that a 1999 Honda was negligently and defectively designed because it was equipped with airbags as required by the current version of Standard 208. Restatement (Third) of Torts: General Principles § 14(b), and Comment g (Discussion Draft, Apr. 5, 1999) ("If the actor's adoption [or rejection] of a precaution would require the actor to violate a statute, the actor cannot be found negligent for failing to adopt [or reject] that precaution"); cf. ante, at 8-9 (discussing problem of basing state tort liability upon compliance with mandatory federal regulatory requirement as question of pre-emption rather than of liability on the merits); Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142-143, 10 L. Ed. 2d 248, 83 S. Ct. 1210 (1963) ("A holding of federal exclusion of state law is inescapable and requires no inquiry into congressional design where compliance with both federal [regulations and state tort law] is a physical impossibility . . . ").

n7 Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability § 4(b), and Comment e (1997); Contini v. Hyundai Motor Co., 840 F. Supp. 22, 23-24 (SDNY 1993). See also Restatement (Second) of Torts § 288C, and Comment a (1964) (negligence); McNeil Pharmaceutical v. Hawkins, 686 A.2d 567, 577-579 (D. C. 1996) (strict liability).

n8 The subsequent history of Silkwood does not cast doubt on this premise. See Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 667 F.2d 908, 921-923 (CA10 1981) (reversing on ground that federal law pre-empts award of punitive damages), rev'd and remanded, 464 U.S. 238 (1984), on remand, 769 F.2d 1451, 1457-1458 (CA10 1985).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The parties have not called our attention to any appellate court opinions [940] discussing the merits of similar no-airbag claims despite the fact that airbag technology was available for many years before the promulgation of the 1984 standard -- a standard that is not applicable to any automobiles manufactured before September 1, 1986. Given that an arguable basis for a pre-emption defense did not exist until that standard was promulgated, it is reasonable to infer that the manufacturers' assessment of their potential liability for compensatory and punitive damages on such claims -- even [*894] without any pre-emption defense -- did not provide them with a sufficient incentive to engage in widespread installation of airbags.

Turning to the subject of pre-emption, Honda contends that the Safety Act's pre-emption provision, 15 U.S.C. § 1392(d), expressly pre-empts petitioners' common-law no-airbag claims. It also argues that the claims are in any event impliedly pre-empted because the OUTCOME: Judgment affirmed; petitioners' action was preempted, since the rule of state tort law for which they argued would have stood as an obstacle to the accomplishment of a Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard, which sought a developing mix of alternative passive restraint devices.

CORE TERMS: pre-emption, airbag, passive restraint, manufacturer, common-law, regulation, pre-empt, state law, safety standard, saving clause, pre-emptive, passive, seatbelt, belt, automatic, federal law, install, obstacle, pre-empted, saving, manual, Safety Act, occupant, duty, mix, motor vehicle, state tort, installation, promulgated, lawsuit

CORE CONCEPTS - ◆ Hide Concepts

Torts : Procedure : Preemption

A "no airbag" tort suit conflicts with the objectives of Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard 208, a standard authorized by the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, former 15 U.S.C.S. § 1381 et seq., and is therefore pre-empted by the Act.

Constitutional Law : Supremacy Clause

Transportation Law : Private Motor Vehicles : Maintenance & Safety

See former 15 U.S.C.S. § 1392(d).

Torts : Procedure : Preemption

Compliance with a federal safety standard does not exempt any person from any liability under common law, former 15 U.S.C.S. § 1397(k).

Torts : Procedure : Preemption

The savings clause in the Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, former 15 U.S.C.S. § 1381 et seq., (like the express preemption provision) does not bar the ordinary working of conflict preemption principles.

Torts : Procedure : Preemption

The court has repeatedly declined to give broad effect to saving clauses where doing so would upset the careful regulatory scheme established by federal law.

Constitutional Law : Supremacy Clause

The saving clause in the Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, former 15 U.S.C.S. § 1381 et seq., foresees -- it does not foreclose -- the possibility that a federal safety standard will pre-empt a state common-law tort action with which it conflicts.

Constitutional Law : Supremacy Clause

The court has not previously driven a legal wedge, only a terminological one, between conflicts that prevent or frustrate the accomplishment of a federal objective and conflicts that make it impossible for private parties to comply with both state and federal law. Rather, it has said that both forms of conflicting state law are nullified by the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution.

Constitutional Law : Supremacy Clause

Torts : Procedure : Preemption

The court has refused to read general saving provisions to tolerate actual conflict both in cases involving impossibility, and in frustration-of-purpose cases.

Torts : Procedure : Preemption

REV_00259269

imposition of liability in cases such as this would frustrate the purposes of Standard 208. I discuss these alternative arguments in turn.

III

When a state statute, administrative rule, or common-law cause of action conflicts with a federal statute, it is axiomatic that the state law is without effect. U.S. Const., Art. VI, cl. 2; Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 516, 120 L. Ed. 2d 407, 112 S. Ct. 2608 (1992). On the other hand, it is equally clear that the Supremacy Clause does not give unelected federal judges carte blanche to use federal law as a means of imposing their own ideas of tort reform on the States. n9 Because of the role of States as separate sovereigns in our federal system, we have long presumed that state laws -- particularly those, such as the provision of tort remedies to compensate for personal injuries, that are within the scope of the States' historic police powers -- are not to be pre-empted by a federal statute unless it is the clear and manifest purpose of Congress to do so. Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470, 485, 135 L. Ed. 2d 700, 116 S. Ct. 2240 (1996); Gade v. National Solid Wastes Management Assn., 505 U.S. 88, 116-117, 120 L. Ed. 2d 73, 112 S. Ct. 2374 (1992) (SOUTER, J., dissenting) ("If the [federal] statute's terms can be read sensibly not to have a pre-emptive effect, the presumption controls and no pre-emption may be inferred").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n9 Regrettably, the Court has not always honored the latter proposition as scrupulously as the former. See, e.g., Boyle v. United Technologies Corp., 487 U.S. 500, 101 L. Ed. 2d 442, 108 S. Ct. 2510 (1988).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*895]

When a federal statute contains an express pre-emption provision, "the task of statutory construction must in the first instance focus on the plain wording of [that provision], which necessarily contains the best evidence of Congress' pre-emptive intent." CSX Transp., Inc. v. Easterwood, 507 U.S. 658, 664, 123 L. Ed. 2d 387, 113 S. Ct. 1732 (1993). The Safety Act contains both an express pre-emption provision, 15 U.S.C. § 1392(d), and a saving [1933] clause that expressly preserves common-law claims, § 1397(k). The relevant part of the former provides:

"Whenever a Federal motor vehicle safety standard established under this subchapter is in effect, [941] no State or political subdivision of a State shall have any authority either to establish, or to continue in effect, with respect to any motor vehicle or item of motor vehicle equipment[,] any safety standard applicable to the same aspect of performance of such vehicle or item of equipment which is not identical to the Federal standard." n10

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 This provision is now codified at 49 U.S.C. § 30103(b)(1). Because both federal and state opinions construing this provision have consistently referred to it as " § 1392(d)," I shall follow that practice. Section 1392(d) contains these additional sentences: "Nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing any State from enforcing any safety standard which is identical to a Federal safety standard. Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the Federal Government or the government of any State or political subdivision thereof from establishing a safety requirement applicable to motor vehicles or motor vehicle equipment procured for its own use if such requirement imposes a higher standard of performance than that required to comply with the otherwise applicable Federal standard."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The latter states:

REV_00259287

"Compliance with any Federal motor vehicle safety standard issued under this subchapter does not exempt any person from any liability under common law." n11

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n11 This provision is now codified at 49 U.S.C. § 30103(e). See nn. 1 and 10, supra.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*896]

Relying on § 1392(d) and legislative history discussing Congress' desire for uniform national safety standards, n12 Honda argues that petitioners' common-law no-airbag claims are expressly pre-empted because success on those claims would necessarily establish a state "safety standard" not identical to Standard 208. It is perfectly clear, however, that the term "safety standard" as used in these two sections refers to an objective rule prescribed by a legislature or an administrative agency and does not encompass case-specific decisions by judges and juries that resolve common-law claims. That term is used three times in these sections; presumably it is used consistently. Gustafson v. Alloyd Co., 513 U.S. 561, 570, 131 L. Ed. 2d 1, 115 S. Ct. 1061 (1995). The two references to a federal safety standard are necessarily describing an objective administrative rule. 15 U.S.C. § 1392(a). When the pre-emption provision refers to a safety standard established by a "State or political subdivision of a State," therefore, it is most naturally read to convey a similar meaning. In addition, when the two sections are read together, they provide compelling evidence of an intent to distinguish between legislative and administrative rulemaking, on the one hand, and common-law liability, on the other. This distinction was certainly a rational one for Congress to draw in the Safety Act given that common-law liability -- unlike most legislative or administrative rulemaking -- necessarily performs an important remedial role in compensating accident victims. Cf. Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 464 U.S. 238, 251, 256, 78 L. Ed. 2d 443, 104 S. Ct. 615 (1984).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n12 S. Rep. No. 1301, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., 2 (1966); H. R. Rep. No. 1776, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., 17 (1966).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

It is true that in three recent cases we concluded that broadly phrased pre-emptive commands encompassed common-law claims. In Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., while we thought it clear that the pre-emption provision [942] in the 1965 Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act applied only to "rulemaking bodies," 505 U.S. at 518, we concluded that the broad command in the subsequent 1969 [*897] amendment that "no requirement or prohibition . . . shall be imposed under State law" did include certain common-law claims. 505 U.S. at 548-549 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). n13 In CSX [1934] Transp., Inc. v. Easterwood, where the pre-emption clause of the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970 expressly provided that federal railroad safety regulations would pre-empt any incompatible state "'law, rule, regulation, order, or standard relating to railroad safety,'" n14 we held that a federal regulation governing maximum train speed pre-empted a negligence claim that a speed under the federal maximum was excessive. And in Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, we recognized that the statutory reference to "any requirement" imposed by a State or its political subdivisions may include common-law duties. 518 U.S. at 502-503 (plurality opinion); 518 U.S. at 503-505 (BREYER, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); 518 U.S. at 509-512 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n13 The full text of the 1969 provision read: "'No requirement or prohibition based on smoking and health shall be imposed under State law with respect to the advertising or promotion of any cigarettes the packages of which are labeled in conformity with the provisions of this Act.'" 505 U.S. at 515 (quoting Public Health Cigarette Smoking Act of 1969, 84 Stat. 88).

n14 507 U.S. at 664 (quoting § 205, 84 Stat. 972, as amended, 45 U.S.C. § 434 (1988 ed. and Supp. II)).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The statutes construed in those cases differed from the Safety Act in two significant respects. First, the language in each of those pre-emption provisions was significantly broader than the text of § 1392(d). Unlike the broader language of those provisions, the ordinary meaning of the term "safety standard" includes positive enactments, but does not include judicial decisions in common-law tort cases.

Second, the statutes at issue in Cipollone, CSX, and Medtronic did not contain a saving clause expressly preserving common-law remedies. The saving clause in the Safety Act [*898] unambiguously expresses a decision by Congress that compliance with a federal safety standard does not exempt a manufacturer from any common-law liability. In light of this reference to common-law liability in the saving clause, Congress surely would have included a similar reference in § 1392(d) if it had intended to pre-empt such liability. Chicago v. Environmental Defense Fund, 511 U.S. 328, 338, 114 S. Ct. 1588, 128 L. Ed. 2d 302 (1994) (noting presumption that Congress acts intentionally when it includes particular language in one section of a statute but omits it in another).

The Court does not disagree with this interpretation of the term "safety standard" in § 1392 (d). Because the meaning of that term as used by Congress in this statute is clear, the text of § 1392(d) is itself sufficient to establish that the Safety Act does not expressly pre-empt common-law claims. In order to avoid the conclusion that the saving clause is superfluous, [943] therefore, it must follow that it has a different purpose: to limit, or possibly to foreclose entirely, the possible pre-emptive effect of safety standards promulgated by the Secretary. The Court's approach to the case has the practical effect of reading the saving clause out of the statute altogether. n15 n15 The Court surely cannot believe that Congress included that clause in the statute just to avoid the danger that we would otherwise fail to give the term "safety standard" its ordinary meaning.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Given the cumulative force of the fact that § 1392(d) does not expressly pre-empt common-law claims and the fact that § 1397(k) was obviously intended to limit the pre-emptive effect of the Secretary's safety standards, it is quite wrong for the Court to assume that a possible implicit conflict with the purposes to be achieved by such a standard should have the same pre-emptive effect "'as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress.'" Ante, at 10. Properly construed, the Safety Act imposes a special burden on a party relying on an arguable implicit conflict [1935] with a temporary regulatory policy -- [*899] rather than a conflict with congressional policy or with the text of any regulation -- to demonstrate that a common-law claim has been pre-empted.

IV

Even though the Safety Act does not expressly pre-empt common-law claims, Honda contends that Standard 208 -- of its own force -- implicitly pre-empts the claims in this case.

"We have recognized that a federal statute implicitly overrides state law either when the scope of a statute indicates that Congress intended federal law to occupy a field exclusively, English v. General Elec. Co., 496 U.S. 72, 78-79, 110 L. Ed. 2d 65, 110 S. Ct. 2270 (1990), or when state law is in actual conflict with federal law. We have found implied conflict pre-emption where it is 'impossible for a private party to comply with both state and federal requirements,' id., at 79, or where state law 'stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress.' Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 67, 85 L. Ed. 581, 61 S. Ct. 399 (1941)." Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280, 287, 131 L. Ed. 2d 385, 115 S. Ct. 1483 (1995).

In addition, we have concluded that regulations "intended to pre-empt state law" that are promulgated by an agency acting non-arbitrarily and within its congressionally delegated authority may also have pre-emptive force. Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Assn. v. De la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 153-154, 73 L. Ed. 2d 664, 102 S. Ct. 3014 (1982). In this case, Honda relies on the last of the implied pre-emption principles stated in Freightliner, arguing that the imposition of common-law liability for failure to install an airbag would frustrate the purposes and objectives of Standard 208.

Both the text of the statute and the text of the standard provide persuasive reasons for rejecting this argument. The saving clause of the Safety Act arguably denies the Secretary the authority to promulgate standards that would [*900] pre-empt [944] common-law remedies. n16 Moreover, the text of Standard 208 says nothing about pre-emption, and I am not persuaded that Honda has overcome our traditional presumption that it lacks any implicit pre-emptive effect.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n16 The Court contends, in essence, that a saving clause cannot foreclose implied conflict pre-emption. Ante, at 11. The cases it cites to support that point, however, merely interpreted the language of the particular saving clauses at issue and concluded that those clauses did not foreclose implied pre-emption; they do not establish that a saving clause in a given statute cannot foreclose implied pre-emption based on frustration of that statute's purposes, or even (more importantly for our present purposes) that a saving clause in a given statute cannot deprive a regulation issued pursuant to that statute of any implicit pre-emptive effect. See United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. , (2000) (slip op., at 12-15); International Paper Co. v. Ouellette, 479 U.S. 481, 493, 93 L. Ed. 2d 883, 107 S. Ct. 805 (1987) ("Given that the Act itself does not speak directly to the issue, the Court must be guided by the goals and policies of the Act in determining whether it in fact pre-empts an action"); Chicago & North Western Transp. Co. v. Kalo Brick & Tile Co., 450 U.S. 311, 328, 331, 67 L. Ed. 2d 258, 101 S. Ct. 1124 (1981). As stated in the text, I believe the language of this particular saving clause unquestionably limits, and possibly forecloses entirely, the pre-emptive effect that safety standards promulgated by the Secretary have on common-law remedies. See Louisiana Pub. Serv. Comm'n v. FCC, 476 U.S. 355, 374, 90 L. Ed. 2d 369, 106 S. Ct. 1890 (1986). Under that interpretation, there is by definition no frustration of federal purposes -- that is, no "tolerat[ion of] actual conflict," ante, at 11 -- when tort suits are allowed to go forward. Thus, because there is a textual basis for concluding that Congress intended to preserve the state law at issue, I think it entirely appropriate for the party favoring pre-emption to bear a special burden in attempting to show that valid federal purposes would be frustrated if that state law were not pre-empted.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Honda argues, and the Court now agrees, that the risk of liability presented by common-law claims that vehicles without [1936] airbags are negligently and defectively designed would frustrate the policy decision that the Secretary made in promulgating Standard 208. This decision, in their view, was that safety -- including a desire to encourage "public acceptance of the airbag technology and experimentation with better passive restraint systems," n17 -- would best be promoted [*901] through gradual implementation of a passive restraint requirement making airbags only one of a variety of systems that a manufacturer could install in order to comply, rather than through a requirement mandating the use of one particular system in every vehicle. In its brief supporting Honda, the United States agreed with this submission. It argued that if the manufacturers had known in 1984 that they might later be held liable for failure to install airbags, that risk "would likely have led them to install airbags in all cars," thereby frustrating the Secretary's safety goals and interfering with the methods designed to achieve them. Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 25.

REV_00259290

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n17 166 F.3d 1236, 1243 (CADC 1999).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

There are at least three flaws in this argument that provide sufficient grounds for rejecting it. First, the entire argument is based on an unrealistic factual predicate. Whatever the risk of liability on a no-airbag claim may have been prior to the promulgation of the 1984 version of Standard 208, that risk did not lead any manufacturer to install airbags in even a substantial portion of its cars. If there had been a realistic likelihood that the risk of tort liability would have that consequence, there would have been no need for Standard 208. The promulgation of [945] that standard certainly did not increase the pre-existing risk of liability. Even if the standard did not create a previously unavailable pre-emption defense, it likely reduced the manufacturers' risk of liability by enabling them to point to the regulation and their compliance therewith as evidence tending to negate charges of negligent and defective design. See Part II, supra. Given that the pre-1984 risk of liability did not lead to widespread airbag installation, this reduced risk of liability was hardly likely to compel manufacturers to install airbags in all cars -- or even to compel them to comply with Standard 208 during the phase-in period by installing airbags exclusively.

Second, even if the manufacturers' assessment of their risk of liability ultimately proved to be wrong, the purposes of Standard 208 would not be frustrated. In light of the inevitable [*902] time interval between the eventual filing of a tort action alleging that the failure to install an airbag is a design defect and the possible resolution of such a claim against a manufacturer, as well as the additional interval between such a resolution (if any) and manufacturers' "compliance with the state law duty in question," ante, at 19, by modifying their designs to avoid such liability in the future, it is obvious that the phase-in period would have ended long before its purposes could have been frustrated by the specter of tort liability. Thus, even without pre-emption, the public would have been given the time that the Secretary deemed necessary to gradually adjust to the increasing use of airbag technology and allay their unfounded concerns about it. Moreover, even if any no-airbag suits were ultimately resolved against manufacturers, the resulting incentive to modify their designs would have been quite different from a decision by the Secretary to mandate the use of airbags in every vehicle. For example, if the extra credit provided for the use of nonbelt passive restraint technologies during the phase-in period had (as the Secretary hoped) ultimately encouraged manufacturers to develop a nonbelt system more effective than the airbag, manufacturers held liable for failing to install passive restraints would have been free to respond by modifying their designs to include [1937] such a system instead of an airbag. n18 It seems clear, therefore, that any [*903] [946] potential tort liability would not frustrate the Secretary's desire to encourage both experimentation with better passive restraint systems and public acceptance of airbags.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00259291

n18 The Court's failure to "understand [this point] correctly," ante, at 20, is directly attributable to its fundamental misconception of the nature of duties imposed by tort law. A general verdict of liability in a case seeking damages for negligent and defective design of a vehicle that (like Ms. Geier's) lacked any passive restraints does not amount to an immutable, mandatory "rule of state tort law imposing . . . a duty [to install an airbag]." Ante, at 18; see also ante, at 8 (referring to verdict in common-law tort suit as a "jury-imposed safety standard"). Rather, that verdict merely reflects the jury's judgment that the manufacturer of a vehicle without any passive restraint system breached its duty of due care by designing a product that was not reasonably safe because a reasonable alternative design -- "including, but not limited to, airbags," App. 3 -- could have reduced the foreseeable risks of harm posed by the product. See Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability § 2(b), and Comment d (1997); id., § 1, Comment a (noting that § 2(b) is rooted in concepts of both negligence and strict liability). Such a verdict obviously does not foreclose the possibility that more than one alternative design exists the use of which would render the vehicle reasonably safe and satisfy the manufacturer's duty of due care. Thus, the Court is quite wrong to suggest that, as a consequence of such a verdict, only the installation of airbags would enable manufacturers to avoid liability in the future.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Third, despite its acknowledgement that the saving clause "preserves those actions that seek to establish greater safety than the minimum safety achieved by a federal regulation intended to provide a floor," ante, at 7, the Court completely ignores the important fact that by definition all of the standards established under the Safety Act -- like the British regulations that governed the number and capacity of lifeboats aboard the Titanic n19 -- impose minimum, rather than fixed or maximum, requirements. 15 U.S.C. § 1391(2); see Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Shanklin, 529 U.S. , (2000) (BREYER, J., concurring) (slip op., at 1) ("federal minimum safety standards should not pre-empt a state tort action"); Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical Laboratories, Inc., 471 U.S. 707, 721, 85 L. Ed. 2d 714, 105 S. Ct. 2371 (1985). The phase-in program authorized by Standard 208 thus set minimum percentage requirements for the installation of passive restraints, increasing in annual stages of 10, 25, 40, and 100%. Those requirements were not ceilings, and it is obvious that the Secretary favored a more rapid increase. The possibility that exposure to potential tort liability [*904] might accelerate the rate of increase would actually further the only goal explicitly mentioned in the standard itself: reducing the number of deaths and severity of injuries of vehicle occupants. Had gradualism been independently important as a method of achieving the Secretary's safety goals, presumably the Secretary would have put a ceiling as well as a floor on each annual increase in the required percentage of new passive restraint installations. For similar reasons, it is evident that variety was not a matter of independent importance to the Secretary. Although the standard allowed manufacturers to comply with the minimum percentage requirements by installing passive restraint systems other than airbags (such as automatic seatbelts), it encouraged them to install airbags and other nonbelt systems that might be developed in the future. The Secretary did not act to ensure the use of a variety of passive restraints by placing ceilings on the number of airbags that could be used in complying [1938] with the minimum requirements. n20 Moreover, even if variety and gradualism had been independently important to the Secretary, there is nothing in the Standard, the accompanying commentary, or the history of airbag regulation to support the notion that the Secretary intended to advance those purposes at all costs, without regard to the detrimental consequences that pre-emption of tort liability could have for the achievement of her avowed purpose of reducing vehicular injuries. See Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 464 U.S. at 257.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n19 Statutory Rules and Orders 1018-1021, 1033 (1908). See Nader & Page, Automobile-Design Liability and Compliance with Federal Standards, 64 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 415, 459

REV_00259292

(1996) (noting that the Titanic "complied with British governmental regulations setting minimum requirements for lifeboats when it left port on its final, fateful voyage with boats capable of carrying only about [half] of the people on board"); W. Wade, The Titanic: End of a Dream 68 (1986).

n20 Of course, allowing a suit like petitioners' to proceed against a manufacturer that had installed no passive restraint system in a particular vehicle would not even arguably pose an "obstacle" to the auto manufacturers' freedom to choose among several different passive restraint device options. Cf. ante, at 16, 18-19.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

My disagreement with Honda and the Government runs deeper than these flaws, however. In its brief, the Government concedes that "[a] claim that a manufacturer should have chosen to install airbags rather than another type of [*905] passive restraint in a certain model of car because of other design features particular to that car . . . would not necessarily frustrate Standard 208's purposes." Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 26, n. 23. n21 Petitioners' claims here are quite similar to the claim described by the Government: their complaint [947] discusses other design features particular to the 1987 Accord (such as the driver's seat) that allegedly rendered it unreasonably dangerous to operate without an airbag. App. 4-5. The only distinction is that in this case, the particular 1987 Accord driven by Ms. Geier included no passive restraint of any kind because Honda chose to comply with Standard 208's 10% minimum requirement by installing passive restraints in other 1987 models. I fail to see how this distinction makes a difference to the purposes of Standard 208, however. If anything, the type of claim favored by the Government -- e.g., that a particular model of car should have contained an airbag instead of an automatic seatbelt -- would seem to trench even more severely upon the purposes that the Government and Honda contend were behind the promulgation of Standard 208: that having a variety of passive restraints, rather than only airbags, was necessary to promote safety. Thus, I conclude that the Government, on the Secretary's behalf, has failed to articulate a coherent view of the policies behind Standard 208 that would be frustrated by the petitioners' claims.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n21 Compare ante, at 18-19 (disagreeing with Government's view by concluding that tort-law duty "requiring manufacturers of all similar cars to install airbags rather than other passive restraint systems . . . would [present] an obstacle to the variety and mix of devices that the federal regulation sought"), with ante, at 21, 23 (noting that "the agency's own views should make a difference," but contending that the above-quoted Government view is "not at issue here").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

V

For these reasons, it is evident that Honda has not crossed the high threshold established by our decisions regarding [*906] pre-emption of state laws that allegedly frustrate federal purposes: it has not demonstrated that allowing a common-law no-airbag claim to go forward would impose an obligation on manufacturers that directly and irreconcilably contradicts any primary objective that the Secretary set forth with clarity in Standard 208. Gade v. National Solid Wastes Management Assn., 505 U.S. at 110 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); 505 U.S. at 111 ("A freewheeling judicial inquiry into whether [state law] is in tension with federal objectives would undercut the principle that it is Congress [and federal agencies,] rather than the courts[,] that pre-empt state law"). Furthermore, it is important to note that the text of Standard 208 (which the Court does not even bother [1939] to quote in its opinion), unlike the regulation we reviewed in Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Assn. v. De la Cuesta, 458 U.S. at 158, does not contain any expression of an intent to displace state law. Given our repeated emphasis on the importance of the presumption against pre-emption, see, e.g., CSX Transp., Inc. v. Easterwood, 507 U.S. at 663-664; Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230, 91 L. Ed. 1447, 67 S. Ct. 1146 (1947), this silence lends additional support to the conclusion that the continuation of whatever common-law liability may exist in a case like this poses no danger of frustrating any of the Secretary's primary purposes in promulgating Standard 208. See Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical Laboratories, Inc., 471 U.S. at 721; Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 464 U.S. at 251 ("It is difficult to believe that [the Secretary] would, without comment, [948] remove all means of judicial recourse for those injured by illegal conduct.").

REV_00259293

The Court apparently views the question of pre-emption in this case as a close one. Ante, at 20-21 (relying on Secretary's interpretation of Standard 208's objectives to bolster its finding of pre-emption). Under "ordinary experience-proved principles of conflict pre-emption," ante, at 11, therefore, the presumption against pre-emption should control. Instead, the Court simply ignores the presumption, [*907] preferring instead to put the burden on petitioners to show that their tort claim would not frustrate the Secretary's purposes. Ante, at 19-20 (noting that petitioners' arguments "cannot, by themselves, change the legal result"). In view of the important principles upon which the presumption is founded, however, rejecting it in this manner is profoundly unwise.

Our presumption against pre-emption is rooted in the concept of federalism. It recognizes that when Congress legislates "in a field which the States have traditionally occupied . . . [,] we start with the assumption that the historic police powers of the States were not to be superseded by the Federal Act unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress." Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. at 230; see Jones v. Rath Packing Co., 430 U.S. 519, 525, 51 L. Ed. 2d 604, 97 S. Ct. 1305 (1977). The signal virtues of this presumption are its placement of the power of pre-emption squarely in the hands of Congress, which is far more suited than the Judiciary to strike the appropriate state/federal balance (particularly in areas of traditional state regulation), and its requirement that Congress speak clearly when exercising that power. In this way, the structural safeguards inherent in the normal operation of the legislative process operate to defend state interests from undue infringement. Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528, 552, 83 L. Ed. 2d 1016, 105 S. Ct. 1005 (1985); see United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. , (2000) (BREYER, J., dissenting) (slip op., at 6-9); Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. , (2000) (STEVENS, J., dissenting) (slip op., at 2); Allied-Bruce Terminix Cos. v. Dobson, 513 U.S. 265, 292-293, 130 L. Ed. 2d 753, 115 S. Ct. 834 (1995) (THOMAS, J., dissenting); Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 460-464, 115 L. Ed. 2d 410, 111 S. Ct. 2395 (1991). In addition, the presumption serves as a limiting principle that prevents federal judges from running amok with our potentially boundless (and perhaps inadequately considered) doctrine of implied conflict pre-emption based on frustration of purposes -- i.e., that state law is pre-empted if it "stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution [*908] of the full purposes and objectives of Congress." Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. at 67. n22

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n22 Recently, one commentator has argued that our doctrine of frustration-of-purposes (or "obstacle") pre-emption is not supported by the text or history of the Supremacy Clause, and has suggested that we attempt to bring a measure of rationality to our pre-emption jurisprudence by eliminating it. Nelson, Preemption, 86 Va. L. Rev. 225, 231-232 (2000) ("Under the Supremacy Clause, preemption occurs if and only if state law contradicts a valid rule established by federal law, and the mere fact that the federal law serves certain purposes does not automatically mean that it contradicts everything that might get in the way of those purposes"). Obviously, if we were to do so, there would be much less need for the presumption against pre-emption (which the commentator also criticizes). As matters now stand, however, the presumption reduces the risk that federal judges will draw too deeply on malleable and politically unaccountable sources such as regulatory history in finding pre-emption based on frustration of purposes.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [1940] [949]

While the presumption is important in assessing the pre-emptive reach of federal statutes, it becomes crucial when the pre-emptive effect of an administrative regulation is at issue. Unlike Congress, administrative agencies are clearly not designed to represent the interests of States, yet with relative ease they can promulgate comprehensive and detailed regulations that have broad pre-emption ramifications for state law. We have addressed the heightened federalism and nondelegation concerns that agency pre-emption raises by using the presumption to build a procedural bridge across the political accountability gap between States and administrative agencies. Thus, even in cases where implied regulatory pre-emption is at issue, we generally "expect an administrative regulation to declare any intention to pre-empt state law with some specificity." n23 California Coastal [*909] Comm'n v. Granite Rock Co., 480 U.S. 572, 583, 94 L. Ed. 2d 577, 107 S. Ct. 1419 (1987); see Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical Laboratories, Inc., 471 U.S. at 717-718 (noting that too easily implying pre-emption "would be inconsistent with the federal-state balance embodied in our Supremacy Clause jurisprudence," and stating that "because agencies normally address problems in a detailed manner and can speak through a variety of means, including regulations, preambles, interpretive statements, and responses to comments, we can expect that they will make their intentions clear if they intend for their regulations to be exclusive"); Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Assn. v. De la Cuesta, 458 U.S. at 154 (noting that pre-emption inquiry is initiated "when the administrator promulgates regulations intended to pre-empt state law"). This expectation, which is shared by the Executive Branch, n24 serves to ensure [1941] that States will be able to have a dialog [*910] with agencies [950] regarding pre-emption decisions ex ante through the normal notice-and-comment procedures of the Administrative Procedure Act (APA), 5 U.S.C. § 553.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n23 The Court brushes aside our specificity requirement on the ground that the cases in which we relied upon it were not cases of implied conflict pre-emption. Ante, at 21-22. The Court is quite correct that Hillsborough and California Coastal are cases in which field pre-emption, rather than conflict pre-emption, was at issue. This distinction, however, does not take the Court as far as it would like. Our cases firmly establish that conflict and field pre-emption are alike in that both are instances of implied pre-emption that by definition do "not [turn] on an express statement of pre-emptive intent." Ibid.; see, e.g., Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, 514 U.S. at 287 (quoted on page 15, supra); English v. General Elec. Co., 496 U.S. 72, 79-80, 110 L. Ed. 2d 65, 110 S. Ct. 2270, and n. 5 (1990) (noting that field pre-emption rests on an inference of congressional intent to exclude state regulation and that it "may be understood as a species of conflict pre-emption"); Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Assn. v. De la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 153, 73 L. Ed. 2d 664, 102 S. Ct. 3014 (1982). Given that our specificity requirement was adopted in cases involving implied pre-emption, the Court cannot persuasively claim that the requirement is incompatible with our implied pre-emption jurisprudence in the federal regulatory context.

n24 See Exec. Order No. 12612, § 4(e), 3 CFR 252, 255 (1988) ("When an Executive department or agency proposes to act through adjudication or rule-making to preempt State law, the department or agency shall provide all affected States notice and an opportunity for appropriate participation in the proceedings."); Exec. Order No. 13132, § 4(e), 64 Fed. Reg. 43255, 43257 (1999) (same); cf. Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470, 496, 135 L. Ed. 2d 700, 116 S. Ct. 2240 (1996) (discussing 21 CFR § 808.5 (1995), an FDA regulation allowing a State to request an advisory opinion regarding whether a particular state-law requirement is pre-empted, or exempt from pre-emption, under the Medical Device Amendments of 1976).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00259295

When the presumption and its underpinnings are properly understood, it is plain that Honda has not overcome the presumption in this case. Neither Standard 208 nor its accompanying commentary includes the slightest specific indication of an intent to pre-empt common-law no-airbag suits. Indeed, the only mention of such suits in the commentary tends to suggest that they would not be pre-empted. See n. 5, supra. In the Court's view, however, "the failure of the Federal Register to address pre-emption explicitly is . . . not determinative," ante, at 21, because the Secretary's consistent litigating position since 1989, the history of airbag regulation, and the commentary accompanying the final version of Standard 208 reveal purposes and objectives of the Secretary that would be frustrated by no-airbag suits. Pre-empting on these three bases blatantly contradicts the presumption against pre-emption. When the 1984 version of Standard 208 was under consideration, the States obviously were not afforded any notice that purposes might someday be discerned in the history of airbag regulation that would support pre-emption. Nor does the Court claim that the notice of proposed rulemaking that led to Standard 208 provided the States with notice either that the final version of the standard might contain an express pre-emption provision or that the commentary accompanying it might contain a statement of purposes with arguable pre-emptive effect. Finally, the States plainly had no opportunity to comment upon either the commentary accompanying the final version of the standard or the Secretary's ex post litigating position that the standard had implicit pre-emptive effect.

Furthermore, the Court identifies no case in which we have upheld a regulatory claim of frustration-of-purposes implied conflict pre-emption based on nothing more than an ex post administrative litigating position and inferences from [*911] regulatory history and final commentary. The latter two sources are even more malleable than legislative history. Thus, when snippets from them are combined with the Court's broad conception of a doctrine of frustration-of-purposes pre-emption untempered by the presumption, a vast, undefined area of state law becomes vulnerable to pre-emption by any related federal law or regulation. In my view, however, "preemption analysis is, or at least should be, a matter of precise statutory [or regulatory] construction rather than an exercise in free-form judicial policymaking." 1 L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law § 6-28, p. 1177 (3d ed. 2000).

As to the Secretary's litigating position, it is clear that "an interpretation contained in a [legal brief], not one arrived at after, for example, a formal adjudication or notice-and-comment rulemaking[,] . . . does not warrant Chevron-style deference." Christensen v. Harris County, 529 U.S. , (2000) (slip op., at 10). Moreover, our [951] pre-emption precedents and the APA establish that even if the Secretary's litigating position were coherent, the lesser deference paid to it by the Court today would be inappropriate. Given the Secretary's contention that he has the authority to promulgate safety standards that pre-empt state law and the fact that he could promulgate a standard such as the one quoted supra, at 2, with relative ease, we should be quite reluctant to find pre-emption based only on the Secretary's informal effort to recast the 1984 version of Standard 208 into a pre-emptive mold. n25 See [1942] Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical [*912] Laboratories, Inc., 471 U.S. at 721; cf. Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. at 512 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("It is not certain that an agency regulation determining the pre-emptive effect of any federal statute is entitled to deference"); Smiley v. Citibank (South Dakota), N. A., 517 U.S. 735, 743-744, 135 L. Ed. 2d 25, 116 S. Ct. 1730 (1996). Requiring the Secretary to put his pre-emptive position through formal notice-and-comment rulemaking -- whether contemporaneously with the promulgation of the allegedly pre-emptive regulation or at any later time that the need for pre-emption becomes apparent n26 -- respects both the federalism and nondelegation principles that underlie the presumption against pre-emption in the regulatory context and the APA's requirement of new rulemaking when an agency substantially modifies its interpretation of a regulation. 5 U.S.C. § 551(5); Paralyzed Veterans of America v. D. C. Arena L. P., 326 U.S. App. D.C. 25, 117 F.3d 579, 586 (CADC 1997); National Family Planning & Reproductive Health Assn. v. Sullivan, 298 U.S. App. D.C. 288, 979 F.2d 227, 240 (CADC 1992).

- When the rule of law for which petitioners contend would stand as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the important means-related federal objectives, it is pre-empted.

Constitutional Law : Supremacy Clause

- Conflict pre-emption turns on the identification of "actual conflict," and not on an express statement of pre-emptive intent.

Constitutional Law : Supremacy Clause

- While pre-emption fundamentally is a question of congressional intent, the court traditionally distinguishes between express and implied pre-emptive intent, and treats conflict pre-emption as an instance of the latter. And though the court has looked for a specific statement of pre-emptive intent where it is claimed that the mere volume and complexity of agency regulations demonstrate an implicit intent to displace all state law in a particular area, so-called field pre-emption, the court has never before required a specific, formal agency statement identifying conflict in order to conclude that such a conflict in fact exists.

◆ Show Lawyers' Edition Display

SYLLABUS: Pursuant to its authority under the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, the Department of Transportation promulgated Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard (FMVSS) 208, which required auto manufacturers to equip some but not all of their 1987 vehicles with passive restraints. Petitioner Alexis Geier was injured in an accident while driving a 1987 Honda Accord that did not have such restraints. She and her parents, also petitioners, sought damages under District of Columbia tort law, claiming, inter alia, that respondents (hereinafter American Honda) were negligent in not equipping the Accord with a driver's side airbag. Ruling that their claims were expressly pre-empted by the Act, the District Court granted American Honda summary judgment. In affirming, the Court of Appeals concluded that, because petitioners' state tort claims posed an obstacle to the accomplishment of the objectives of FMVSS 208, those claims conflicted with that standard and that, under ordinary pre-emption principles, the Act consequently pre-empted the lawsuit.

Held: Petitioners'"no airbag" lawsuit conflicts with the objectives of FMVSS 208 and is therefore pre-empted by the Act. Pp. 3-23.

(a) The Act's pre-emption provision, 15 U.S.C. § 1392(d), does not expressly pre-empt this lawsuit. The presence of a saving clause, which says that "compliance with" a federal safety standard "does not exempt any person from any liability under common law," § 1397(k), requires that the pre-emption provision be read narrowly to pre-empt only state statutes and regulations. The saving clause assumes that there are a significant number of common-law liability cases to save. And reading the express pre-emption provision to exclude common-law tort actions gives actual meaning to the saving clause's literal language, while leaving adequate room for state tort law to operate where, for example, federal law creates only a minimum safety standard. Pp. 3-5.

(b) However, the saving clause does not bar the ordinary working of conflict pre-emption principles. Nothing in that clause suggests an intent to save state tort actions that conflict with federal regulations. The words "compliance" and "does not exempt" sound as if they simply bar a defense that compliance with a federal standard automatically exempts a defendant from state law, whether the Federal Government meant that standard to be an absolute, or a minimum, requirement. This interpretation does not conflict with the purpose of the saving provision, for it preserves actions that seek to establish greater safety than the minimum safety achieved by a federal regulation intended to provide a floor. Moreover, this n25 The cases cited by the Court, ante, at 21, are not to the contrary. In City of New York v. FCC, 486 U.S. 57, 100 L. Ed. 2d 48, 108 S. Ct. 1637 (1988), for example, we were faced with FCC regulations that explicitly "reaffirmed the Commission's established policy of pre-empting local regulation of technical signal quality standards for cable television." Id., at 62, 65. It was only in determining whether the issuance of such regulations was a proper exercise of the authority delegated to the agency by Congress that we afforded a measure of deference to the agency's interpretation of that authority, as formally expressed through its explicitly pre-emptive regulations. Id., at 64; see also Capital Cities Cable, Inc. v. Crisp, 467 U.S. 691, 700-705, 81 L. Ed. 2d 580, 104 S. Ct. 2694 (1984) (regulation); Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Assn. v. De la Cuesta, 458 U.S. at 158-159 (regulation); Blum v. Bacon, 457 U.S. 132, 141-142, 72 L. Ed. 2d 728, 102 S. Ct. 2355 (1982) (Action Transmittal by Social Security Administration); Chicago & North Western Transp. Co. v. Kalo Brick & Tile Co., 450 U.S. at 327 (order of Interstate Commerce Commission); United States v. Shimer, 367 U.S. 374, 377, 6 L. Ed. 2d 908, 81 S. Ct. 1554 (1961) (regulation). I express no opinion on whether any deference would be appropriate in any of these situations, but merely observe that such situations are not presented here.

REV_00259270

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n26 Hillsborough County v. Automated Medical Laboratories, Inc., 471 U.S. at 721 (noting that agency "can be expected to monitor, on a continuing basis, the effects on the federal program of local requirements" and to promulgate regulations pre-empting local law that imperils the goals of that program).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

* * *

Because neither the text of the statute nor the text of the regulation contains any indication of an intent to pre-empt [*913] petitioners' cause of action, and because I cannot agree [952] with the Court's unprecedented use of inferences from regulatory history and commentary as a basis for implied pre-emption, I am convinced that Honda has not overcome the presumption against pre-emption in this case. I therefore respectfully dissent.

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 529 us 861
View: Full
Date/Time: Monday, March 25, 2002 - 11:20 AM EST

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

Court has repeatedly declined to give broad effect to saving clauses where doing so would upset the careful regulatory scheme established by federal law, a concern applicable here. The pre-emption provision and the saving provision, read together, reflect a neutral policy, not a specially favorable or unfavorable one, towards the application of ordinary conflict pre-emption. The pre-emption provision itself favors pre-emption of state tort suits, while the saving clause disfavors pre-emption at least some of the time. However, there is nothing in any natural reading of the two provisions that would favor one policy over the other where a jury-imposed safety standard actually conflicts with a federal safety standard. Pp. 5-11.

(c) This lawsuit actually conflicts with FMVSS 208 and the Act itself. DOT saw FMVSS 208 not as a minimum standard, but as a way to provide a manufacturer with a range of choices among different passive restraint systems that would be gradually introduced, thereby lowering costs, overcoming technical safety problems, encouraging technological development, and winning widespread consumer acceptance -- all of which would promote FMVSS 208's safety objectives. The standard's history helps explain why and how DOT sought these objectives. DOT began instituting passive restraint requirements in 1970, but it always permitted passive restraint options. Public resistance to an ignition interlock device that in effect forced occupants to buckle up their manual belts influenced DOT's subsequent initiatives. The 1984 version of FMVSS 208 reflected several significant considerations regarding the effectiveness of manual seatbelts and the likelihood that passengers would leave their manual seatbelts unbuckled, the advantages and disadvantages of passive restraints, and the public's resistance to the installation or use of then-available passive restraint devices. Most importantly, it deliberately sought variety, rejecting an "all airbag" standard because perceived or real safety concerns threatened a backlash more easily overcome with a mix of several different devices. A mix would also help develop data on comparative effectiveness, allow the industry time to overcome safety problems and high production costs associated with airbags, and facilitate the development of alternative, cheaper, and safer passive restraint systems, thereby building public confidence necessary to avoid an interlock-type fiasco. The 1984 standard also deliberately sought to gradually phase-in passive restraints, starting with a 10% requirement in 1987 vehicles. The requirement was also conditional and would stay in effect only if two-thirds of the States did not adopt mandatory buckle-up laws. A rule of state tort law imposing a duty to install airbags in cars such as petitioners' would have presented an obstacle to the variety and mix of devices that the federal regulation sought and to the phase-in that the federal regulation deliberately imposed. It would also have made adoption of state mandatory seatbelt laws less likely. This Court's pre-emption cases assume compliance with the state law duty in question, and do not turn on such compliance-related considerations as whether a private party would ignore state legal obligations or how likely it is that state law actually would be enforced. Finally, some weight is placed upon DOT's interpretation of FMVSS 208's objectives and its conclusion that a tort suit such as this one would stand as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of those objectives. DOT is likely to have a thorough understanding of its own regulation and its objectives and is uniquely qualified to comprehend the likely impact of state requirements. Because there is no reason to suspect that the Solicitor General's representation of these views reflects anything other than the agency's fair and considered judgment on the matter, DOT's failure in promulgating FMVSS 208 to address pre-emption explicitly is not determinative. Nor do the agency's views, as presented here, lack coherence. Pp. 11-23.

166 F.3d 1236, affirmed.

COUNSEL: Arthur H. Bryant argued the cause for petitioners.

Lawrence G. Wallace argued the cause for the United States, as amicus curiae, by special leave of court.

Malcolm E. Wheeler argued the cause for respondents.

REV_00259271

JUDGES: BREYER, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which REHNQUIST, C. J., and O'CONNOR, SCALIA, and KENNEDY, JJ., joined. STEVENS, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which SOUTER, THOMAS, and GINSBURG, JJ., joined.

OPINIONBY: BREYER

OPINION: [*864] [*921] [1916]

JUSTICE BREYER delivered the opinion of the Court.

[*HR1A] [1A]
This case focuses on the 1984 version of a Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard promulgated by the Department of Transportation under the authority of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, 80 Stat. 718, 15 U.S.C. § 1381 et seq. (1988 ed.). The standard, FMVSS 208, required auto manufacturers to equip some but not all of their [*865] 1987 vehicles with passive restraints. We ask whether the Act pre-empts a state common-law tort action in which the plaintiff claims that the defendant auto manufacturer, who was in compliance with the standard, should nonetheless [1917] have equipped a 1987 automobile with airbags. We conclude that the Act, taken together with FMVSS 208, pre-empts the lawsuit.

I

In 1992, petitioner Alexis Geier, driving a 1987 Honda Accord, collided with a tree and was seriously injured. The car was equipped with manual shoulder and lap belts which Geier had buckled up at the time. The car was not equipped with airbags or other passive restraint devices.

Geier and her parents, also petitioners, sued the car's manufacturer, American Honda Motor Company, Inc., and its affiliates (hereinafter American Honda), under District of Columbia tort law. They claimed, among other things, that American Honda had designed its car negligently and defectively because it lacked a driver's side airbag. App. 3. The District Court dismissed the lawsuit. The court noted that FMVSS 208 gave car manufacturers a choice as to whether to install airbags. And the court concluded that petitioners' lawsuit, because it sought to establish a different safety standard -- i.e., an airbag requirement -- was expressly pre-empted by a provision of the Act which pre-empts "any safety standard" that is not identical to a federal safety standard applicable to the same aspect of performance, 15 U.S.C. § 1392(d) (1988 ed.); Civ. No. 95-CV-0064 (D. D.C., Dec. 9, 1997), App. 17. (We, like the courts below and the parties, refer to the pre-1994 version of the statute throughout the opinion; it has been recodified at 49 U.S.C. § 30101 et seq.). [922]

The Court of Appeals agreed with the District Court's conclusion but on somewhat different reasoning. It had doubts, given the existence of the Act's "saving" clause, 15 U.S.C. § 1397 (k) (1988 ed.), that petitioners' lawsuit involved the potential [*866] creation of the kind of "safety standard" to which the Safety Act's express pre-emption provision refers. But it declined to resolve that question because it found that petitioners' state-law tort claims posed an obstacle to the accomplishment of FMVSS 208's objectives. For that reason, it found that those claims conflicted with FMVSS 208, and that, under ordinary pre-emption principles, the Act consequently pre-empted the lawsuit. The Court of Appeals thus affirmed the District Court's dismissal. 166 F.3d 1236, 1238-1243 (CADC 1999).

[*HR1B] [1B]
Several state courts have held to the contrary, namely, that neither the Act's express pre-emption nor FMVSS 208 pre-empts a "no airbag" tort suit. See, e.g., Drattel v. Toyota Motor Corp., 92 N.Y.2d 35, 43-53, 699 N.E.2d 376, 379-386, 677 N.Y.S.2d 17 (1998); Minton v. Honda of America Mfg., Inc., 80 Ohio St. 3d 62, 70-79, 684 N.E.2d 648, 655-661 (1997); Munroe v. Galati, 189 Ariz. 113, 115-119, 938 P.2d 1114, 1116-1120 (1997); Wilson v.

Pleasant, 660 N.E.2d 327, 330-339 (Ind. 1995); Tebbetts v. Ford Motor Co., 140 N.H. 203, 206-207, 665 A.2d 345, 347-348 (1995). All of the Federal Circuit Courts that have considered the question, however, have found pre-emption. One rested its conclusion on the Act's express pre-emption provision. See, e.g., Harris v. Ford Motor Co., 110 F.3d 1410, 1413-1415 (CA9 1997). Others, such as the Court of Appeals below, have instead found pre-emption under ordinary pre-emption principles by virtue of the conflict such suits pose to FMVSS 208's objectives, and thus to the Act itself. See, e.g., Montag v. Honda Motor Co., 75 F.3d 1414, 1417 (CA10 1996); Pokorny v. Ford Motor Co., 902 F.2d 1116, 1121-1125 (CA3 1990); Taylor v. General Motors Corp., 875 F.2d 816, 825-827 (CA11 1989); Wood v. General Motors Corp., 865 F.2d 395, 412-414 (CA1 1988). We granted certiorari to resolve these differences. We now hold that this kind of "no airbag" lawsuit conflicts with the objectives of FMVSS 208, a standard authorized by the Act, and is therefore pre-empted by the Act. [*867]

[*HR1C] [1C]
[*HR2A] [2A]
[*HR3A] [3A]
In reaching our conclusion, we consider three subsidiary questions. First, does the Act's express pre-emption provision [1918] pre-empt this lawsuit? We think not. Second, do ordinary pre-emption principles nonetheless apply? We hold that they do. Third, does this lawsuit actually conflict with FMVSS 208, hence with the Act itself? We hold that it does.

II

We first ask whether the Safety Act's express pre-emption provision pre-empts this tort action. The provision reads as follows:

"Whenever a Federal motor vehicle safety standard established under this subchapter is in effect, no State or political subdivision of a State shall have any authority either to establish, or to continue in effect, with respect to any motor vehicle or item of motor vehicle equipment [,] any safety standard applicable to the same aspect of performance of such vehicle or item of equipment which is not identical to the Federal standard." [923] 15 U.S.C. § 1392 (d) (1988 ed.).

American Honda points out that a majority of this Court has said that a somewhat similar statutory provision in a different federal statute -- a provision that uses the word "requirements" -- may well expressly pre-empt similar tort actions. See, e.g., Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470, 502-504, 135 L. Ed. 2d 700, 116 S. Ct. 2240 (1996) (plurality opinion); 518 U.S. at 503-505 (BREYER, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); 518 U.S. at 509-512 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Petitioners reply that this statute speaks of pre-empting a state-law "safety standard," not a "requirement," and that a tort action does not involve a safety standard. Hence, they conclude, the express pre-emption provision does not apply.

[*HR2B] [2B]
We need not determine the precise significance of the use of the word "standard," rather than "requirement," however, for the Act contains another provision, which resolves the [*868] disagreement. That provision, a "saving" clause, says that "compliance with" a federal safety standard "does not exempt any person from any liability under common law." 15 U.S.C. § 1397(k) (1988 ed.). The saving clause assumes that there are some significant number of common-law liability cases to save. And a reading of the express pre-emption provision that excludes common-law tort actions gives actual meaning to the saving clause's literal language, while leaving adequate room for state tort law to operate -- for example, where federal law creates only a floor, i.e., a minimum safety standard. See, e.g., Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 21 (explaining that common-law claim that a vehicle is defectively designed because it lacks antilock brakes would not be pre-empted by 49 CFR § 571.105 (1999), a safety standard establishing minimum requirements for brake performance). Without the saving clause, a broad reading of the express pre-emption provision arguably might pre-empt those actions, for, as we have just mentioned, it is possible to read the pre-emption provision, standing alone, as applying to standards imposed in common-law tort actions, as well as standards contained in state legislation or regulations. And if so, it would pre-empt all nonidentical state standards established in tort actions covering the same aspect of performance as an applicable federal standard, even if the federal standard merely established a minimum standard. On that broad reading of the pre-emption clause little, if any, potential "liability at common law" would remain. And few, if any, state tort actions would remain for the saving clause to save. We have found no convincing indication that Congress wanted to pre-empt, not only state statutes and regulations, but also common-law tort actions, in such circumstances. Hence the broad reading cannot be correct. The language of the pre-emption provision permits a narrow reading that excludes common-law actions. Given the presence of the saving clause, we conclude that the pre-emption clause must be so read. [*869] [1919]

REV_00259273

III

We have just said that the saving clause at least removes tort actions from the scope of the express pre-emption clause. Does it do more? In [924] particular, does it foreclose or limit the operation of ordinary pre-emption principles insofar as those principles instruct us to read statutes as pre-empting state laws (including common-law rules) that "actually conflict" with the statute or federal standards promulgated thereunder? Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Assn. v. De la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 153, 73 L. Ed. 2d 664, 102 S. Ct. 3014 (1982). Petitioners concede, as they must in light of Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280, 131 L. Ed. 2d 385, 115 S. Ct. 1483 (1995), that the pre-emption provision, by itself, does not foreclose (through negative implication) "any possibility of implied [conflict] pre-emption," id., at 288 (discussing Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 517-518, 120 L. Ed. 2d 407, 112 S. Ct. 2608 (1992)). But they argue that the saving clause has that very effect.

[*HR3B] [3B]
We recognize that, when this Court previously considered the pre-emptive effect of the statute's language, it appeared to leave open the question of how, or the extent to which, the saving clause saves state-law tort actions that conflict with federal regulations promulgated under the Act. See Freightliner, supra, at 287, n. 3 (declining to address whether the saving clause prevents a manufacturer from "using a federal safety standard to immunize itself from state common-law liability"). We now conclude that the saving clause (like the express pre-emption provision) does not bar the ordinary working of conflict pre-emption principles.

[*HR2C] [2C]
[*HR3C] [3C]
Nothing in the language of the saving clause suggests an intent to save state-law tort actions that conflict with federal regulations. The words "compliance" and "does not exempt," 15 U.S.C. § 1397(k) (1988 ed.), sound as if they simply bar a special kind of defense, namely, a defense that compliance with a federal standard automatically exempts a defendant from state law, whether the Federal Government meant that standard to be an absolute requirement or only a minimum one. See Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products [*870] Liability § 4(b), Comment e (1997) (distinguishing between state-law compliance defense and a federal claim of pre-emption). It is difficult to understand why Congress would have insisted on a compliance-with-federal-regulation precondition to the provision's applicability had it wished the Act to "save" all state-law tort actions, regardless of their potential threat to the objectives of federal safety standards promulgated under that Act. Nor does our interpretation conflict with the purpose of the saving provision, say by rendering it ineffectual. As we have previously explained, the saving provision still makes clear that the express pre-emption provision does not of its own force pre-empt common-law tort actions. And it thereby preserves those actions that seek to establish greater safety than the minimum safety achieved by a federal regulation intended to provide a floor. See supra, at 4-5.

REV_00259274

[*HR4] [4]
Moreover, this Court has repeatedly "declined to give broad effect to saving clauses where doing so would upset the careful regulatory scheme established by federal law." United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. ,(2000) (slip op., at 14); see American Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Central Office Telephone, [925] Inc., 524 U.S. 214, 227-228, 141 L. Ed. 2d 222, 118 S. Ct. 1956 (1998) (AT&T); Texas & Pacific R. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co., 204 U.S. 426, 446, 51 L. Ed. 553, 27 S. Ct. 350 (1907). We find this concern applicable in the present case. And we conclude that the saving clause foresees -- it does not foreclose -- the possibility that a federal safety standard will pre-empt a state common-law tort action with which it conflicts. We do not understand the dissent to disagree, for it acknowledges [1920] that ordinary pre-emption principles apply, at least sometimes. Post, at 14-16 (opinion of STEVENS, J.).

[*HR5A] [5A]
Neither do we believe that the pre-emption provision, the saving provision, or both together, create some kind of "special burden" beyond that inherent in ordinary pre-emption principles -- which "special burden" would specially disfavor pre-emption here. Cf. post, at 14. The two provisions, read together, reflect a neutral policy, not a specially [*871] favorable or unfavorable policy, towards the application of ordinary conflict pre-emption principles. On the one hand, the pre-emption provision itself reflects a desire to subject the industry to a single, uniform set of federal safety standards. Its pre-emption of all state standards, even those that might stand in harmony with federal law, suggests an intent to avoid the conflict, uncertainty, cost, and occasional risk to safety itself that too many different safety-standard cooks might otherwise create. See H. R. Rep. No. 1776, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., 17 (1966) ("Basically, this preemption subsection is intended to result in uniformity of standards so that the public as well as industry will be guided by one set of criteria rather than by a multiplicity of diverse standards"); S. Rep. No. 1301, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., 12 (1966). This policy by itself favors pre-emption of state tort suits, for the rules of law that judges and juries create or apply in such suits may themselves similarly create uncertainty and even conflict, say, when different juries in different States reach different decisions on similar facts.

On the other hand, the saving clause reflects a congressional determination that occasional nonuniformity is a small price to pay for a system in which juries not only create, but also enforce, safety standards, while simultaneously providing necessary compensation to victims. That policy by itself disfavors pre-emption, at least some of the time. But we can find nothing in any natural reading of the two provisions that would favor one set of policies over the other where a jury-imposed safety standard actually conflicts with a federal safety standard.

[*HR6] [6]
Why, in any event, would Congress not have wanted ordinary pre-emption principles to apply where an actual conflict with a federal objective is at stake? Some such principle is needed. In its absence, state law could impose legal duties that would conflict directly with federal regulatory mandates, say, by premising liability upon the presence of the very windshield retention requirements that federal law requires. [*872] See, e.g., 49 CFR § 571.212 (1999). Insofar as petitioners' argument would permit common-law actions that "actually conflict" with federal regulations, it would take from those who would enforce a federal law the very ability to achieve the law's congressionally [926] mandated objectives that the Constitution, through the operation of ordinary pre-emption principles, seeks to protect. To the extent that such an interpretation of the saving provision reads into a particular federal law toleration of a conflict that those principles would otherwise forbid, it permits that law to defeat its own objectives, or potentially, as the Court has put it before, to "'destroy itself.'" AT&T, supra, at 228 (quoting Abilene Cotton, 524 U.S. at 446). We do not claim that Congress lacks the constitutional power to write a statute that mandates such a complex type of state/federal relationship. Cf. post, at 15, n. 16. But there is no reason to believe Congress has done so here.

REV_00259275

[*HR5B] [5B]
The dissent, as we have said, contends nonetheless that the express pre-emption and saving provisions here, taken together, create a "special burden," which a court must impose "on a party" who claims conflict pre-emption under those principles. Post, at 14. But nothing in the Safety Act's language refers to any "special burden." Nor can one find the basis for a "special burden" in this Court's precedents. [1921] It is true that, in Freightliner Corp. v. Myrick, 514 U.S. 280, 131 L. Ed. 2d 385, 115 S. Ct. 1483 (1995), the Court said, in the context of interpreting the Safety Act, that "[a]t best" there is an "inference that an express pre-emption clause forecloses implied pre-emption." Id., at 289 (emphasis added). But the Court made this statement in the course of rejecting the more absolute argument that the presence of the express pre-emption provision entirely foreclosed the possibility of conflict pre-emption. Id., at 288. The statement, headed with the qualifier "at best," and made in a case where, without any need for inferences or "special burdens," state law obviously would survive, see 514 U.S. at 289-290, simply preserves a legal possibility. This [*873] Court did not hold that the Safety Act does create a "special burden," or still less that such a burden necessarily arises from the limits of an express pre-emption provision. And considerations of language, purpose, and administrative workability, together with the principles underlying this Court's pre-emption doctrine discussed above, make clear that the express pre-emption provision imposes no unusual, "special burden" against pre-emption. For similar reasons, we do not see the basis for interpreting the saving clause to impose any such burden.

[*HR3D] [3D]
[*HR5C] [5C]
[*HR7A] [7A]
[*HR8] [8]
A "special burden" would also promise practical difficulty by further complicating well-established pre-emption principles that already are difficult to apply. The dissent does not contend that this "special burden" would apply in a case in which state law penalizes what federal law requires -- i.e., a case of impossibility. See post, at 8, n. 6, 15-16, n. 16. But if it would not apply in such a case, then how, or when, would it apply? This Court, when describing conflict pre-emption, has spoken of pre-empting state law that "under the circumstances of the particular case . . . stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress" -- whether that "obstacle" goes [927] by the name of "conflicting; contrary to; . . . repugnance; difference; irreconcilability; inconsistency; violation; curtailment; . . . interference," or the like. Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 67, 85 L. Ed. 581, 61 S. Ct. 399 (1941); see Jones v. Rath Packing Co., 430 U.S. 519, 526, 51 L. Ed. 2d 604, 97 S. Ct. 1305 (1977). The Court has not previously driven a legal wedge -- only a terminological one -- between "conflicts" that prevent or frustrate the accomplishment of a federal objective and "conflicts" that make it "impossible" for private parties to comply with both state and federal law. Rather, it has said that both forms of conflicting state law are "nullified" by the Supremacy Clause, De la Cuesta, 458 U.S. at 152-153; see Locke, 529 U.S., at (slip op., at 17); English v. General Elec. Co., 496 U.S. 72, 78-79, 110 L. Ed. 2d 65, 110 S. Ct. 2270 (1990), and it has assumed that Congress would not want either kind of conflict. The Court [*874] has thus refused to read general "saving" provisions to tolerate actual conflict both in cases involving impossibility, see, e.g., AT&T, 524 U.S. at 228, and in "frustration-of-purpose" cases, see, e.g., Locke, supra, at (slip op., at 11-20); International Paper Co. v. Ouellette, 479 U.S. 481, 493-494, 93 L. Ed. 2d 883, 107 S. Ct. 805 (1987); see also Chicago & North Western Transp. Co. v. Kalo Brick & Tile Co., 450 U.S. 311, 328-331, 67 L. Ed. 2d 258, 101 S. Ct. 1124 (1981). We see no grounds, then, for attempting to distinguish among types of federal-state conflict for purposes of analyzing whether such a conflict warrants pre-emption in a particular case. That kind of analysis, moreover, would engender legal uncertainty with its inevitable systemwide costs (e.g., conflicts, delay, and expense) as courts tried sensibly to distinguish among varieties of "conflict" (which often shade, one into the other) when applying this complicated rule to the many federal statutes that contain [1922] some form of an express pre-emption provision, a saving provision, or as here, both. Nothing in the statute

Source: All Sources > Federal Legal - U.S. > Supreme Court Cases & Materials > United States Supreme Court Transcripts
Terms: boat /2 safety and preemption and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)

*1998 U.S. TRANS LEXIS 21, **

◆ Go to Supreme Court Opinion ◆ Go to Supreme Court Brief(s)

VICKY LEWIS, ET UX., INDIVIDUALLY, AS PARENTS, AS NEXT FRIENDS AND AS ADMINISTRATORS OF THE ESTATE OF KATHRYN C. LEWIS, DECEASED Petitioners v. BRUNSWICK CORPORATION

No. 97-288

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

1998 U.S. TRANS LEXIS 21

March 2, 1998, Monday, Washington, D.C.

[*1] The above-entitled matter came on for oral argument before the Supreme Court of the United States at 11:35 a.m.

APPEARANCES:

DAVID E. HUDSON, ESQ., Augusta, Georgia; on behalf of the Petitioners.

DAVID C. FREDERICK, ESQ., Assistant to the Solicitor General, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.; on behalf of the United States, as amicus curiae, supporting the petitioners.

KENNETH S. GELLER, ESQ., Washington, D.C.; on behalf of the Respondent.

OPINION: PROCEEDINGS

11:35 a.m.

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST: We'll hear argument next in Number 97-288, Vicky Lewis v. Brunswick Corporation.

Mr. Hudson, you may proceed whenever you're ready.

ORAL ARGUMENT OF DAVID E. HUDSON ON BEHALF OF THE PETITIONERS

MR. HUDSON: Thank you, Mr. Chief Justice, may it please the Court:

Plaintiffs' claims that Brunswick negligently failed to protect against propeller guard injuries in the circumstances of this case should not be preempted for three reasons. First of all, the claims we are bringing in this case do not conflict with any Federal regulation. Under Freightliner, there's no preemption.

Secondly, the text of the preemption clause, section 4306 of the act, does not, much less clearly and unambiguously, reach [*2] the body of State law of general application, common law damage claims. Our position there is consistent, we think, with all of the preemption cases of this Court.

Thirdly, in this case the reading that we submit for the preemption clause is confirmed by a

REV_00259298

The first is that the savings clause was intended to make clear that there was to be no affirmative defense. In our view, that is incorrect, because it was black letter law in 1971. It was in the Second Restatement of Torts in section 288(c), which was published by the American Law Institute in 1965.

The compliance with a legislative enactment or a regulation would not relieve someone of liability if a reasonable person acting under the same or similar circumstances would do otherwise.

So that theory for the savings clause really doesn't make much sense. There would have been no need for Congress to have added a specific savings provision.

The second theory that they have is that the savings clause was intended to save against breach of warranty or manufacturing defect claims. Well, that theory in our view doesn't make any sense because you can't read 4306 to preempt those things, so--

QUESTION: Do you think the American Law Institute always represents what is the view in almost all of the States? That hasn't been [*22] my experience.

MR. FREDERICK: Well, I think--

QUESTION: I mean, I think there would be real reason to put that in just in case a number of States were following it.

MR. FREDERICK: Justice Scalia, even if you were to say that what Congress was intending to do was to put the ALI's view right into law, the words that Congress used made very clear that general provisions of common law liability are to be preserved, because it didn't say liability under common law, especially breach of warranty or product defect claims. It didn't create the kind of textual limitation that the respondents would read into the savings clause.

So I think that if you look at the way that respondent's theory spells, you know, out what the savings clause was intended to do, there really wouldn't be that much of a reason to do it, and--

QUESTION: What do you do--

QUESTION: What do you do with--oh.

MR. FREDERICK: Thank you.

QUESTION: Thank you, Mr. Frederick.

When we return at 1:00, Mr. Geller, we'll hear from you.

(Whereupon, at 12:01 p.m., the Court recessed.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

1:00 p.m.

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST: Mr. Geller, we'll hear from you.

ORAL ARGUMENT OF KENNETH S. GELLER ON BEHALF OF THE RESPONDENT

MR. [*23] GELLER: Thank you, Mr. Chief Justice, and may it please the Court:

REV_00259307

We heard 25 minutes of argument this morning from the plaintiffs and the Solicitor General explaining why it's perfectly permissible for the State of Georgia through its common law to impose a requirement that boats be equipped with propeller guards, but if Georgia can do this, then presumably South Carolina could through its common law impose a requirement that boats not be equipped with propeller guards for the reasons that, as the Coast Guard found, they make boats less safe.

Now--

QUESTION: Well, excuse me. I didn't know that the Coast Guard had found that at all. The Solicitor General's brief sets out a portion of the Coast Guard's letter stating the reason that it was going to take no actions. This is on page 7 of the SG's brief. At least in the excerpt there the Coast Guard didn't make any such finding. Is there more material?

MR. GELLER: No, there's no--I should say the Coast Guard was relying, I believe, on unanimous recommendations from the--from its Subcommittee on Propeller Guards and from the National Boating Safety Advisory Council, each of whom had found that the use of propeller guards would demonstrably [*24] make boating less safe, and the Coast Guard--

QUESTION: Well, that's right, but the Coast Guard--

MR. GELLER: The Coast Guard--

QUESTION: --gave its reasons. I mean, it said there was a deficiency of accident data, the difficulty of coming up with a single model, and so on. It didn't, as I understand it, adopt any finding that in fact it would be more dangerous in some cases--

MR. GELLER: That's--

QUESTION: --so I don't think we can attribute that to the Coast Guard.

MR. GELLER: That's true, Justice Souter, although it did find--it did agree with the recommendations of the underlying committees that it shouldn't impose a prop guard requirement.

But my point is simply that the accident in this case occurred on a body of water that forms part of the border between South Carolina and Georgia, and the plaintiffs and the Solicitor General don't bother to explain how a manufacturer could possibly build a boat that could operate on that body of water and still comply with these divergent State law.

QUESTION: What if there had been no Federal statute at all? A boat manufacturer would still have a difficult time complying with both--

MR. GELLER: Yes.

QUESTION: --South Carolina and Georgia [*25] law were they different.

MR. GELLER: But it was the very purpose of this statute, Mr. Chief Justice, the very purpose of this statute to avoid that sort of a problem. In fact, the Senate report specifically says in this case it assures that manufacturers for the domestic trade will not--will not involve--will not have to worry about compliance with widely varying local requirements. That's our precise point. It was the purpose of this statute to avoid a situation--

QUESTION: Well, yes, but the Coast Guard did not, in fact, adopt a regulation on this specific device, and I don't know that South Carolina have a different rule. Does South Carolina have common law principles that say you must have a propeller guard?

REV_00259308

MR. GELLER: No, it doesn't, and no, I think that would be preempted if it did as well. My point is simply to explain why there's a need for a national uniform rule here, which Congress recognized in passing this statute. It's so you have one single rule that manufacturers can follow throughout the United States.

QUESTION: Yes, but it clearly envisions that the Coast Guard might not take action with regard to the whole universe of possible actions it could take, and we have [*26] a situation here where it didn't take action.

MR. GELLER: But the language--

QUESTION: And that may leave open some room for application of State law.

MR. GELLER: I think that the language of the preemption provision, Justice O'Connor, specifically addresses the situation and provides, as the Solicitor General acknowledges, the Coast Guard has always interpreted the provision according to its plain--the Coast Guard has always interpreted the provision according to its plain language to preempt State law involving design and equipment requirements even in the absence of a Coast Guard regulation because of this congressional desire to have uniform national requirements.

In fact, this act was passed in 1971. The day after the act was passed--the day after--the Coast Guard issued a regulation under section 4305 exempting all existing State requirements from preemption, because--

QUESTION: Well, of course, that included, as I understand it, State regulatory requirements in the narrow sense, so that it did not necessarily imply that the Coast Guard thought that it was necessary to do that to preserve any State common law.

MR. GELLER: There was no--it simply exempted all existing State requirements. [*27] There was no specific discussion of statutes, regulations, common law. The point is-- QUESTION: Right, and that's--I mean, my only point is, I don't think you can infer from that that the Coast Guard ever took the position that a common law requirement was, in fact, preempted.

MR. GELLER: No. I'm taking from that the understanding, which has been in existence since the beginning of the statute, that even in the absence of a regulation section 4306 would provide for preemption from State law. That was the point that I think comes through clearly.

QUESTION: Mr. Geller, doesn't it--it's a little unrealistic to talk about a requirement imposed by State law anyway.

It's not as though--I mean, even within the State of South Carolina a manufacturer wouldn't know whether to put on or off the propeller guard, because one jury, the first jury may find it was negligent not to have it, and that--certainly that finding that it was negligent not to have a propeller guard does not prevent a subsequent South Carolina juror, jury from finding that it was negligent to have a propeller guard, isn't that right?

MR. GELLER: That's true. That's why it seems completely irrational for Congress to have prohibited [*28] State legislatures or State boating commissioners from entering this area, because it was concerned about the need for national uniform regulation, one rule that every manufacturer could follow throughout the United States, and to create an exception for common law rules, which is I think the point that Justice Breyer made last year in his separate opinion in Medtronic, but--

QUESTION: But isn't the argument for exception oddly enough supported by the advisory committee's report here, and that is that the designs of boats vary so enormously that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to have a uniform rule in the sense of saying, all boats should have propeller guards, or all boats should have this kind of propeller guard.

The kind of multifarious context here suggests exactly what common law adjudication is intended to serve, and that is quite fact-specific adjudications when no uniform rule really could sensibly be written to cover it.

MR. GELLER: Two requirements, Justice--two responses, Justice Souter. The first is I think that misstates what the advisory committee, commission did here. It tested every type of propeller guard in existence, and it concluded that there was no [*29] feasible workable propeller guard that could be used on any type of motor boat, so I don't think it's fair to say that it simply said there wasn't one that could be used on every boat. It tested every single-- QUESTION: Well, I thought they--and you know this better than I do. I thought they said that in some cases the guard would in fact make it much more dangerous than it was.

MR. GELLER: Exactly.

QUESTION: But not in all cases.

MR. GELLER: In every case in which a motor boat was going more than 10 miles an hour. In other words, they didn't find any application in which it would be safe to require that a motor boat be equipped with a propeller guard.

But the second answer to your question, Justice Souter, frankly is that this is an argument that I think--and Justice Scalia said this this morning--the Court has heard many previous times when faced with statutes of this type and has never drawn an exception between statutory requirements and common law requirements.

QUESTION: But we have emphasized the language in the particular statutes.

MR. GELLER: Yes, and the language in this statute I think is indistinguishable, Justice Stevens, from--

QUESTION: Does it have the word requirement [*30] in it?

MR. GELLER: Yes. The list--this statute does. In fact, it might be useful to focus on the specific language at issue here, because I think it answers a lot of questions. The section--

QUESTION: Mr. Geller, as you do that--

MR. GELLER: Yes.

QUESTION: --can you tell me if there's another statute that uses the word, minimum safety standards, because I thought that gave some kind of a tone to it.

MR. GELLER: Yes. The statute, for example, that was at issue in Ray v. Atlantic-Richfield, which this Court considered 20 years ago, had that very language in there, and the Court said that didn't mean there was no preemption. It simply meant the manufacturers--

QUESTION: No, everyone agrees that there's a preemption pro tanto. That is, to the extent the Coast Guard has a standard, the State can't have a different one.

MR. GELLER: Yes.

QUESTION: But the word minimum suggests to me that there could be other things, that every--

REV_00259310

MR. GELLER: What the Court--

QUESTION: That those standards must be followed, but there could be additional standards.

MR. GELLER: That's not the argument--the Court rejected that very argument in Ray v. Atlantic-Richfield, Your Honor. They're minimum in the sense [*31] that manufacturers could add to that. They're not minimum in the sense that States could add to that. That would make--there would be no reason for preemption if they were--if that reading of minimum standards were correct. There would be no reason to have a preemption clause in there.

QUESTION: The reason could be that these standards are in place, but we're not saying that that's the universe, that there can't be liability apart from these standards.

Let me ask you something just as a matter of updating. As I understood the propeller guard, it wasn't dead, that there's still current consideration in the Coast Guard?

MR. GELLER: Yes. Yes, absolutely.

QUESTION: Where--what is the status of that now?

MR. GELLER: As recently as last August, Justice Ginsburg, the Coast Guard again asked for comments from people as to whether there would be a workable type of propeller guard that the Coast Guard could consider.

QUESTION: And that's just--

MR. GELLER: They haven't yet issued any regulation presumably because they haven't yet been satisfied that they can meet the standards of 4302, which is to say that the requirement that the propeller guard would actually advance the interest of boat [*32] safety.

QUESTION: All we know is that they asked again.

MR. GELLER: Yes.

QUESTION: And we don't know anything about the answers.

MR. GELLER: No. I don't believe anything has happened since August of 1997.

Let me just focus if I could the Court on the language of 4306. It's reprinted in a number of different places, including page 6 of the red brief, and it's helpful to focus on the language. This language, Justice Stevens, is I think identical in respect to the language that the Court had before it in Medtronic and in Cipollone.

Section 4306 has a broad requirement that--broad preemptions that the State may not establish or enforce a law imposing a requirement for associated equipment, which is--no one disputes that a propeller guard here is associated equipment, and the Court has held in Cipollone, in Easterwood, in Norfolk and Western Railway, in Medtronic, that the word requirement in those very similar statutes includes common law claims.

In fact, I don't know of any case in this Court that has ever construed the word requirement to include only positive law, and the Court on a number of occasions has rejected that very argument. The Court--

QUESTION: Well, you take--

QUESTION: [*33] A law or regulation establishing--

MR. GELLER: Law or--

QUESTION: A law or regulation establishing--

MR. GELLER: Yes. I think the-- QUESTION: --the requirement?

MR. GELLER: I think the language in Medtronic was very, very similar. The law here is the common law, which establishes a requirement for associated equipment.

QUESTION: Well, you take the position, Mr. Geller, that regardless of whether--what we think of the action or inaction of the Coast Guard on this propeller guard business that any common law requirement for a propeller guard by a State is preempted, no matter what the Coast Guard has done--

MR. GELLER: That's right.

QUESTION: --or hasn't done.

MR. GELLER: Because I think that section 43--section 4306 enacts a general preemption rule that says no State can impose a requirement for associated equipment. Now, there are--

QUESTION: So if the Coast Guard had never even studied the problem, nothing had been done--

MR. GELLER: Absolutely. For the purposes of--

QUESTION: --you take the position it's still preempted.

MR. GELLER: Yes, for purposes of our express preemption.

Now, here we have a very powerful implied preemption argument as well, which I'll get to in a minute, Justice [*34] O'Connor, because the Coast Guard did do a thorough study, but that's right, and this is, of course, the way the Coast Guard has interpreted this statute over the years.

QUESTION: What sense would that make? I mean, you bring me along a lot when you say, unless we read the word requirement to include tort action--

MR. GELLER: Yes.

QUESTION: --then you would have a Coast Guard explicit rule and a State could have a tort case that would force the opposite. That would make no sense. I accept that--

MR. GELLER: That would make no sense.

QUESTION: --at least for argument. But doesn't it also make no sense to say, if the Coast Guard doesn't do anything, does nothing whatsoever, that then you couldn't have any State tort law in the area?

MR. GELLER: You couldn't have any--

QUESTION: I mean, I can understand why Congress might have said, if the Coast Guard does nothing at all, still the States aren't supposed to sit there and write rules out on a piece of paper, but I just can't understand why Congress would have said, if the Congress does nothing at all, all of State tort law goes up in smoke.

MR. GELLER: Not all of State tort--I think the breadth of this argument has been grossly overstated, [*35] Justice Breyer. The States have a large role to play under the Boat Safety Act, but in terms of boat safe use and operation, boater education, boat numbering, tort law can apply in case of manufacturing defects involving boats, and--

QUESTION: No, no, but why would Congress have wanted to--

MR. GELLER: Yes, and--

QUESTION: --say that no State tort law for the basic hornbook classic negligence--

MR. GELLER: Of design. Design.

QUESTION: --of design, any of that stuff when the Coast Guard does nothing.

MR. GELLER: Because, as Congress said--as Congress said, there has to be a uniform national rule for design requirements. You can't build a boat, one boat for South Carolina and another boat for Georgia, and that's precisely-- QUESTION: Well, I take it--I take it that an additional answer to Justice Breyer--maybe you don't want--is that this didn't prempt all State tort law automatically because the Coast Guard could and, in fact, did leave much of it in place, and in the States.

MR. GELLER: Absolutely. In fact, I want to turn--

QUESTION: Under 430--05.

MR. GELLER: 4305. 4305, Justice Kennedy. That's exactly right. I think if you look at section 4306, which I keep wanting to bring the [*36] Court back to because that's the issue in this case, is how to interpret that provision, there are a number of exceptions that Congress has written into the preemption provision.

There's a general preemption provision of State design requirements for the reasons I gave, that there has to be uniformity in design requirements. You can't have--you have to have a single national rule, which is precisely what the Senate report says. It assures that manufacturers will not have to worry about compliance with widely varying local requirements.

And then there are three exceptions to narrow it in section 4306. First of all, as Justice Kennedy said, the Coast Guard can draft an exemption to allow States to have a rule involving design of boats.

Second, even when the Coast Guard hasn't granted an exemption--

QUESTION: Are we talking about 4306 or 4305?

MR. GELLER: Yes, 4306. 4305 allows the Coast Guard to grant the exemption, but it's--4306 says that there's a general preemption of State requirements involving the design and equipment of boats, but the Coast Guard can grant an exemption to the States.

Secondly, the States can operate--their State law can operate to meet some uniquely hazardous [*37] local condition, and third, the States are allowed to enforce their law about the design of boats to the extent that it is identical to a regulation promulgated by the Coast Guard, and the scheme of this is obvious.

The Coast Guard is supposed to promulgate the rules that tell manufacturers what they have to do in order to build a boat, a recreational boat in interstate commerce, and the States can enforce--if the State law is identical to it, the States can participate in the enforcement. So if a boat is built out of compliance with Federal design requirements, there can be a State law remedy, but the States can't add to the requirement.

So that they--so that here, for example, you know, you could have a State requirement that has--that it requires that boats be built with propeller guards. That would be a requirement only for one State. It would dictate the national rule and, if a State had a contrary rule, you couldn't sell a boat in interstate commerce, because one State could say you had to have one type of requirement, another State could say you have to have another.

The idea of this was to have a uniform national rule, and as--the Court actually confronted a case almost precisely [*38] like this 20 years ago, Ray v. Atlantic Richfield. That was a case in which Congress passed a statute that promulgated--that authorized the Coast Guard to promulgate design requirements for tankers, and the Coast Guard in fact did.

It promulgated a long list of design requirements for tankers, and then the State of Washington came in and passed a statute that said, if you want to operate in Puget Sound, you also have to follow the following three additional design requirements. You have to have double hulls, you have to have two radar, working radar, and this Court held that that statute was preempted. It was preempted actually in the absence of an express preemption provision.

But the reason the Court gave is--applies here like a glove. The Court said, enforcement of these State requirements would frustrate what seems to us to be the evident congressional intent to establish a uniform Federal regime controlling the design of oil tankers. This is 435 U.S. at page 151.

It's precisely the same thing here. In fact, here there's even more evidence that that's what Congress wanted to do, because there's an express preemption provision that says that that's what [*39] they're trying to do.

QUESTION: Well, but you also have the savings clause, 4311, and--

MR. GELLER: Yes. Let's talk about the savings clause.

QUESTION: --its reference to common law and State law cuts the other way, I--

MR. GELLER: I don't think a fair reading of the savings clause cuts the other way, Justice O'Connor, but let's look at that as well. This is on page 2 of the red brief.

What it literally says--what it literally says is that compliance with a Federal regulation or order does not relieve a person from liability at common law or under State law, and the legislative history uses almost the exact same language to describe what Congress was trying to do here.

What Congress was trying to do here, quite specifically, and it says it literally, is that in those areas where State law still has a role to play, areas that are not preempted, it is not a defense to that State law claim that you've complied with the Federal regulation.

That's precisely what this says, and that's all that this says. It says nothing about preemption, and if it were truly a savings clause intended to create a gaping hole in section 4306, you'd think it would have been put in section 4306.

QUESTION: What [*40] does it apply to? Give me a few examples.

MR. GELLER: One example might be, Justice Scalia, if a State had a design requirement that was not preempted because it was intended to deal with uniquely hazardous local conditions. That's not preempted under section 4306. Or the State may have a design--

QUESTION: Yes, but by the same token you don't need a savings clause.

MR. GELLER: You need a savings clause, Justice Souter, for fear that the--that it might be perceived under State law that it's a complete defense that you've complied with the Federal regulation.

QUESTION: Yes, but that would be a bizarre reading of the preemption clause.

QUESTION: I don't think you really need it for that. Do you have any other examples?

MR. GELLER: Yes. Well, I think actually, Justice Scalia, that's precisely what the legislative history again says this was trying to do, because when it discusses the savings clause, which I should say was added at the last minute--

QUESTION: You're talking to me?

(Laughter.)

MR. GELLER: I'm talking to the Court.

But it does explain what this--what 4311(g) is intended to do. It says, of course, in describing 4311(g) and the reason they put it in, of course, depending [*41] on the rules of evidence of the particular judicial forum, such compliance--in other words, compliance with Federal regulations--may or may not be admissible for its evidentiary value.

In other words, they couldn't possibly have been talking about Federal preemption here. They were talking about State rules, and contrary--

QUESTION: What would happen in a case that--let's assume that there is fairly clear preemption. The Coast Guard says, no propeller guards, and this boat has no propeller guards, and the accident happened. Could the plaintiff sue for failure to warn?

MR. GELLER: I think that that claim would--the failure to warn about the absence of propeller guards?

QUESTION: About the absence, yes.

MR. GELLER: I think--I think that would probably be preempted as well because of the effect it would have on manufacturers to build their boats to--in other words, the failure to warn would have to warn about some dangerous, perhaps defective condition that--

QUESTION: I looked at the complaint briefly. I didn't see a failure to warn--

MR. GELLER: There isn't a failure to warn claim in this case--

QUESTION: --allegation here.

MR. GELLER: --and it's an interesting question. I'm not sure [*42] that I know the right answer, but I think the argument would be that if you allowed failure to warn claims in that situation it would impose pressure on manufacturers to put on the device that would eliminate the need to make the warning, and that would be a-- QUESTION: Oh, no. It would just--it would make them warn. It would make them put labels on.

MR. GELLER: There are warning requirements in the act as well, Federal warning requirements, and it may be that those would preempt a State warning requirement, but that's not what we have here. This is a pure design requirement.

They're saying this boat is defective because it didn't have a propeller guard, and what I'm saying is that section 4306 addresses that question precisely and says that the--what equipment a boat operating in interstate commerce should have is a question reserved to the Coast Guard.

QUESTION: Well, Mr. Geller, it's--you say that a propeller is regarded as associated equipment for the board--

MR. GELLER: Yes.

QUESTION: --for the boat?

MR. GELLER: Yes.

QUESTION: It's not a part of the boat itself.

MR. GELLER: It's defined in Coast Guard regulations as associated equipment.

QUESTION: So there's a little bit different [*43] language about associated equipment than there is for the vessel itself, isn't there? One says, imposing a requirement for associated equipment, and for the boat it says, enforce a law or regulation establishing performance or other safety standard.

MR. GELLER: Right, and we are relying--this case involves the section of 4306 that talks about imposing a equipment for associated--

QUESTION: A requirement.

MR. GELLER: A requirement for associated equipment, that's right.

QUESTION: Mr. Geller, can I come back and ask you for another example of how the savings clause would apply State law, other than a State law that had been exempted under 4305?

MR. GELLER: There are many types--first of all, I'm not sure that Congress necessarily had in mind a specific situation. They were told--

QUESTION: I don't need many. Just give me a couple.

MR. GELLER: Yes. Any case in which State law has a role to play. There could be a tort claim that the boat was defectively manufactured because something was done in a particular way and the--

QUESTION: But--

MR. GELLER: --suggestion is that you shouldn't allow the preemption provision to be broadened beyond Congress' intent by allowing the defense to argue [*44] that mere compliance--mere compliance with the Federal regulations is a defense under State law.

QUESTION: But unless the defective manufacture claim dealt with the manufacture of the particular savings clause, where Congress specifically and without qualification provided that compliance with the Boat Safety Act regulation is no defense to common law claims.

In this preemption case, as in every case of statutory interpretation, surely the starting point is the text of the act itself. We submit in this case it is also the ending point. Starting with a statement of purpose in the policy declaration--

QUESTION: Mr. Hudson, we have a good amplifying system. I think we could hear you even if you didn't speak quite as loud.

MR. HUDSON: I will tone it down--

QUESTION: Okay.

MR. HUDSON: --Chief Justice.

Starting with the policy declaration in section 2 of the act, Congress spoke of reciprocity and comity, signal words that State law has a role to play. It spoke of developing and enforcing Federal and State laws, again signalling that State laws would have a role to play.

And then throughout the act Congress over and [*3] over again speaks of the enactment of positive regulations both by the Federal Government and by the State, never any reference to common law claims.

QUESTION: Well, but we've certainly held in Medtronic and in that Cipollone case that State common law actions can constitute requirements subject to preemption.

MR. HUDSON: Yes, Your Honor, there has a been a holding that the common law can lead to a requirement. I don't think that-- QUESTION: Can lead to? It is. I mean, they are requirements, and I don't see why we should necessarily create--treat this statute differently in that regard.

MR. HUDSON: Well, for a couple of reasons. The language used in this statute is different than the language used in both Cipollone and in Medtronic. In this statute, Congress says that there may not be a State law or regulation. In both Cipollone and Medtronic it was a requirement which arose under State law and this Court has, in a number of cases, not only in Cipollone but following that in Medtronic, English v. GE, Goodyear v. Miller, Silkwood, has explained that common law is a traditional State area.

If we were to obtain a judgment in this case, Brunswick would not be required to put a propeller [*4] guard on any of its boats in any State, or in any jurisdiction. It would have the discretion as a manufact--

QUESTION: Well, I--isn't the whole purpose of your punitive damage claim to require the manufacturer to change his behavior?

MR. HUDSON: Even then--

QUESTION: Isn't that what you're going to argue to the jury?

MR. HUDSON: Even then, Your Honor, it may not be necessary that they actually install a propeller guard. It may be enough that a warning be issued putting consumers on notice that if you are thrown or fall out of this boat there's a danger of this type of injury.

We assert in our complaint that they had this knowledge, and they had-- propeller--

MR. GELLER: Yes. I mean, it could have. It could have. I mean, in other words--

QUESTION: It seems to me it would be preempted anyway. I just don't see any realistic situation in which the savings clause would apply, other than when there's been an exemption, which I don't find--

MR. GELLER: Well--

QUESTION: --terribly persuasive.

MR. GELLER: That's one example, but you have to remember, Justice Scalia, this was added at the last minute. This was not part of the original bill. It was stuck in at the Senate committee level at the last minute because someone suggested there might be a problem here, let's put this in, but--

QUESTION: Mr.--finish your answer. I'm sorry.

MR. GELLER: But the other key point--I mean, I think the Achille's heel of the plaintiffs' and any attempt to rely on section 4311(g) is that it doesn't distinguish at all between common law and State law.

I think the Court would have to commit an unnatural act with that language to draw a distinction between the common law and [*45] State law for purposes of preemption, and if--and if it saved all State law, which is the only logical reading of it, if it saves common law claims, if it saves State law claims there's no preemption at all. It eliminates completely section 4306.

QUESTION: I want to be sure--I thought you made an acknowledgement of a point I didn't think you would make. You suggested in answer to Justice Scalia that there could be a State law defective manufacture claim even if the Coast Guard had promulgated elaborate regulations about how boats had to be manufactured and the boat complied with every one of those regulations.

MR. GELLER: Yes. Yes.

QUESTION: There could still be a State law claim?

MR. GELLER: There could be a claim--there could well be a State law claim because we would not be within State 4306, that the boat was not manufactured according to its design requirements.

QUESTION: No, I'm assuming it complied with the--because it only talks about when they comply with all the Federal requirements. You think there still could be a--

MR. GELLER: Yes, but there aren't manufacturing requirements.

QUESTION: No, but I'm assuming they--of course, they could have a problem here, of course.

MR. [*46] GELLER: Yes. In other words, if, for example, the Coast Guard had a propeller--had a propeller guard requirement--

QUESTION: Right.

MR. GELLER: --and you complied fully with--you put the propeller guard on your boat, so you satisfied the design requirements, but you didn't fasten it properly. It should have been fastened with four bolts and you only put two on, and it fell off in the water, there would be, I think, a plausible--

REV_00259317

QUESTION: Even if--

MR. GELLER: --failure to manufacture--

QUESTION: Assuming that the Coast Guard regulation didn't tell you how many bolts to put on.

MR. GELLER: Right.

QUESTION: Is that right?

MR. GELLER: Right. But you see, the--Justice Stevens, the precise difference between that hypothetical-- QUESTION: It seems to me there's a bigger gap in this case than the one you--

MR. GELLER: A failure to manufacture claim only requires the manufacturer to comply with his own or the Coast Guard's design requirements. It doesn't add any design requirements.

The problem with allowing the States to impose design requirements--

QUESTION: But if that's true in regard to a minor matter like nuts and bolts, why isn't it true with regard to the total omission of any requirement [*47] for propeller guards?

MR. GELLER: Because how the boat is to be designed and what equipment the boat is to have on it is a question reserved to the Coast Guard or else you can't have a uniform national rule.

QUESTION: Well, but that's the same--true with the four bolts instead of two.

MR. GELLER: No. No, I don't think so, Your Honor, because there would be a uniform national rule. You have to build your boat consistent with the design requirements.

Now, if in a particular case you don't--

QUESTION: No, but the omission is, there's no requirement on the number of bolts. In this case, there's no requirement on propeller guards.

MR. GELLER: No, but in one case you're simply being asked to comply with your own design requirements. If your own design requirement says it should have four bolts, you have to have four bolts. If you only put two in, it's a manufacturing defect. That's a clear claim that can be brought under State law.

We have a completely different type of claim in this case. They're claiming it should have been designed differently.

QUESTION: The statute says performance standard. It doesn't talk about design.

MR. GELLER: Right.

QUESTION: So therefore, if the failure to have--it's [*48] the same question. If the failure to have a performance standard permits, in your view, a tort suit in respect to the defective manufacture, why doesn't the failure to have a propeller guard standard permit a tort suit in respect to the failure to have the propeller guard? I think that's what Justice Stevens'--

REV_00259318

MR. GELLER: I thought Justice Stevens was referring to a manufacturing defect, a failure to comply with your own design requirements or the Coast Guard's design requirements. There's a single set of design requirements. You have to comply with it, and if you don't, you're liable as a manufacturer for having a manufacturing defect.

That doesn't prevent you from manufacturing one type of boat throughout the United States. When you're dealing with a design requirement where each State can impose its own design requirement, it is impossible to build a single boat that operates throughout the United States, and that's precisely what the legislative history said Congress had in mind and wanted uniform national design and equipment requirements.

Manufacturing requirements are of a totally different order. You simply screwed up with one particular boat. It doesn't tell you anything [*49] at all about how you have to build the generality of your boats.

Now, I just want to turn for a minute to implied preemption, which provides a separate and totally independent basis for preemption here. The--even if the--even if 4306 didn't cover this situation, it's clear that it would--the State law claim here would be impliedly preempted, because it plainly frustrates what Congress and the Coast Guard were trying to do in this area.

I don't know of any piece of equipment that's been more thoroughly studied by the Coast Guard than prop guards, and the advisory committee and the Subcommittee on Prop Guards took 18 months, they looked at all the available data, they took a boat out onto Boston Harbor and operated it both with and without prop guards, they held hearings across the country--

QUESTION: Mr. Geller, do we give any credence to the fact that the Coast Guard itself doesn't think that this is contrary to what it's intending to do. In fact, it thinks it's consistent with the act.

MR. GELLER: Well, I don't know, Justice Ginsburg. That's the position of the Solicitor General. The Coast--I find it interesting, the Department of Transportation did not sign this brief, which is [*50] not typical of its practice. It's signed other briefs in this Court in cases like Myrick in recent years, so I don't know what the position of the Coast Guard is.

The Coast Guard has clearly held that even in the absence of a Federal regulation there is preemption of State law.

QUESTION: The Coast Guard isn't in charge of preemption anyway. The Coast Guard doesn't administer preemption. I mean, we give the Coast Guard deference on those matters that are within its bailiwick.

MR. GELLER: Yes. My point, Justice Scalia--

QUESTION: Whether the State is preempted or not is not within the Coast Guard's bailiwick.

MR. GELLER: All I'm saying, Justice Scalia, the answer to Justice Ginsburg's question is, I don't know of any pronouncement by the Coast Guard, ever, that has ever drawn a distinction between--

QUESTION: Well, maybe we should just leave the Coast Guard out of it.

MR. GELLER: Well, the fact of the matter is that the Coast Guard has never--

REV_00259319

(Laughter.)

MR. GELLER: And I think it's an important point. The Coast Guard has never, ever drawn a distinction between State, regulatory, statutory, or common law requirements, ever, and I think it would be inconsistent for the Coast Guard to [*51] do that, given the fact that common law requirements can frustrate what they're trying to do, as this case shows every bit as much as a State statutory or regulatory--

QUESTION: And I suppose some inquiry into that subject is within their purview, because they can pronounce regulations exempting--

MR. GELLER: Right.

QUESTION: --certain State laws.

MR. GELLER: Right, and I don't know of any instance in which they have ever said, contrary, for example, to in Medtronic, where the FDA had a regulation that-- QUESTION: Thank you, Mr. Geller.

Mr. Hudson, you have 4 minutes remaining.

REBUTTAL ARGUMENT OF DAVID E. HUDSON ON BEHALF OF THE PETITIONERS

MR. HUDSON: In regard to the position of the Coast Guard, I think in footnote 2 of the blue brief the statement of the Commandant at the time the legislation was enacted is pretty compelling.

Without any qualification, without any cramp reading, the Commandant understood that the usual tort law concerning negligence and warranties would survive the enactment of this law. It's consistent with the statement quoted on page 6 of the blue brief by the executive director of the Boatowners Association, who suggested a need for a provision in the law [*52] to make it clear that common law claims would survive.

QUESTION: This is the statement of the Commandant before this legislation was on the books?

MR. HUDSON: Yes, during the Senate committee hearings in response to a question from the committee.

QUESTION: You consider that to be a position of the agency as to the meaning of the law?

MR. HUDSON: Further evidence of the agency's position I think, Justice Scalia, is found in those 1971 and 1973 Federal Register provisions that are cited in all of the briefs where the Coast Guard specifically left in place all laws enacted by the States prior to 1971.

It was talking about statutory enactments, even felt no need to even speak to the common law. If they're going to allow the State law enactments to stay in place, surely the common law survives as well and, in fact, I don't know that there's any recision of those 1971 exemptions from preemption.

The claims we're making here, the Georgia wrongful death statute is over 100 years old, the negligence standard has existed for as long as the State of Georgia has existed, so the common law has never been a focus of the Coast Guard restriction, or any need to exempt from preemption common law claims. [*53]

In regard to the case of Ray v. Atlantic Richfield, it does not fit this case. That was a situation where the Coast Guard was directed--the statute said it shall issue the regulations governing the size of tankers and other activities on the coast. The Coast Guard in fact enacted regulations.

REV_00259320

And if the State of Washington was able to put a limit on tanker sizes, contrary to what the Coast Guard had done, it would be the hypothetical Justice Breyer presented this morning. You would have a conflict, and under the Supremacy Clause, the State may not act contrary to any established regulation of the Coast Guard and in this case we don't have an established regulation.

Finally, I would submit--

QUESTION: You wouldn't necessarily have a conflict if they added something that the regulations didn't have, like a propeller guard. It wouldn't necessarily conflict any more than it does.

MR. HUDSON: I agree there would be no conflict, Justice Scalia. If we are able to prevail on a damage claim there would be no conflict.

It seems to me, Your Honors, that for Brunswick to prevail and for preemption to exist in this case five very high hurdles have to be overcome. They must overcome the presumption [*54] against the displacement of State law. They must overcome the requirement that preemption be manifest and clear purpose of Congress. They must overcome the lack of any statutory or legislative history showing an intent to restrict the common law. They must overcome the common understanding of the words used in section 4306.

Justice Stevens, in Cipollone you made a distinction between a preemption of requirements and in the Senate draft in the tobacco legislation they talked about a statute or regulation. That was changed to a requirement, and you pointed out one would be preempted and the other would not.

And finally, they would have to overcome the express mention of the common law in the savings provision in this case.

On the other hand, this is a preemption case, after all. The Federal agency with the authority to regulate agrees that common law claims should not be barred, or, indeed, there is no conflict between anything claimed in our lawsuit and any existing regulation of the Coast Guard and, if our claims are successful, we will only enhance the ultimate goal of the Boat Safety Act, which was to improve safety for people using boats.

Thank you, Your Honors.

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST: [*55] Thank you, Mr. Hudson.

The case is submitted.

(Whereupon, at 1:34 p.m., the case in the above-entitled matter was submitted.)

Source: All Sources > Federal Legal - U.S. > Supreme Court Cases & Materials > United States Supreme Court Transcripts
Terms: boat /2 safety and preemption and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Monday, March 25, 2002 - 11:35 AM EST

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

QUESTION: Well, I take it that the main thrust of your argument below is that the propeller guard should have been installed. You're going to change the behavior of the manufacturer. That's the whole justification, at least for your punitive damage award, punitive damage claim.

MR. HUDSON: To award compensation to the injured victim is the first purpose. The punitive damage claim is a heightened incentive to do the steps that are necessary to protect persons who use the boats. It would have that impact.

But as this Court acknowledged in Silkwood, [*5] punitive damage is a customary part of the State common law damage scheme and just because it's a punitive damage claim married with a claim for general damages does not create any heightened point of reference to preempt a State law claim.

QUESTION: On that very point, if--imagine that the Coast Guard here had said what it didn't say, but suppose it said we think that the guards on these propellers are actually a greater danger than an unguarded propeller because somebody can get hit on the head, and that's a bigger chance of harm than the other, so suppose because of that they'd said very clearly, we don't want guards.

Now, on your view of the statute a jury would be perfectly free to award punitive damages against the manufacturer because he did the very thing that the Coast Guard told him to do. Now, what sense would that make of the statute?

MR. HUDSON: Under that reading it wouldn't make sense, Justice Breyer, and I'd like to-- QUESTION: So how do you prevent--how do you read it your way, which is to say, it preserves common law claims, and yet avoid what you've just said is a ridiculous result?

MR. HUDSON: May I assume in your question that you are referring to the Coast Guard [*6] adopting a regulation saying thou shalt not have propeller guards, and then not as a matter of preemption, but I think as a matter of the Supremacy Clause and cases like American Airlines v. Wollands and the case that was cited from 1907. If the State attempts to do something it is in conflict with the regulation by Supremacy Clause analysis--

QUESTION: What happens to your savings clause here? You said that the savings clause preserves all common law remedies and so why hasn't Congress, on your view of it--I mean, what then does the savings clause mean? You started off pointing to that savings clause which refers to common law and State law--

MR. HUDSON: Well--

QUESTION: --and--yes. So you see my question.

MR. HUDSON: It's--I think you have to go one word further. Back in the savings clause it refers to liability under common law or State law, is what is preserved, and--

QUESTION: Well--

QUESTION: You mean, it reads punitive damages out?

MR. HUDSON: No. I think it is--that is a liability claim under State law, but you asked what is the purpose of the savings clause if you cannot bring a claim that is diametrically opposed to a Federal regulation, which is not our case.

I concede [*7] that if--

REV_00259300

QUESTION: I'm trying to get your view on it. I thought your view was that the common law was simply preserved. Now I take it your view is that the common law is simply preserved in the absence of a specific determination by the Coast Guard. Is that your view? That's a different view.

MR. HUDSON: No, sir, I think that is our view, Your Honor.

QUESTION: So in other words your view is that the savings clause does nothing if the Coast Guard--it--the savings clause is necessary, I guess, in your view. It's just that this prempt--a straight rule of the Coast Guard preempts the tort remedy, but other than a straight rule it doesn't, is that the view?

MR. HUDSON: Well, it depends on whether or not there's a conflict, because if they say thou shalt not have a propeller guard, then our claim would be barred.

QUESTION: Suppose it simply--

QUESTION: Well, but you told me that State common law couldn't be a requirement and could never have any preemptive effect, so you can't have it both ways.

MR. HUDSON: Well--

QUESTION: Now, I take it you're backing off that position and you're saying, well, if it really is in direct conflict, then maybe common law rules can in fact be requirements [*8] or regulations under--

MR. HUDSON: Fortunately, that's not our case, but I do--

QUESTION: No, but even if--

MR. HUDSON: I do concede--

QUESTION: Even if we think that, that doesn't end the case for you because you have another theory here, right?

MR. HUDSON: Well, our theory is that there is no conflict.

QUESTION: No, but before you get to--I thought that your position was that the savings clause requires us to read the statute in such a way that the reference to regulations or standards does not necessarily encompass every common law rule. Do you go any further than that?

MR. HUDSON: No, we don't, Justice Souter.

QUESTION: Okay. Okay.

MR. HUDSON: That is statutory evidence, along with some pretty extensive legislative history, that all concerned thought that common law claims would survive even after the adoption of this act. It is additional authority for the proposition that what was preempted in section 4306 were positive enactments under a State legislative law on affirmative regulation.

QUESTION: And what do you do with the phrase, or under State law? I didn't understand your--

MR. HUDSON: Justice Scalia, you backed up in that statute.

REV_00259301

QUESTION: You just say you have to read [*9] it with the word--

MR. HUDSON: Liability.

QUESTION: --liability. I don't--that doesn't make any sense to me. I don't--

MR. HUDSON: For example, Justice Scalia, in our case we are bringing a negligence--we have a negligence count. We have a wrongful death count. The wrongful death count is a statutory claim in Georgia. It's been in existence for over 100 years, so that is a liability claim--that's certainly not common law. I don't think wrongful death was recognized at the common law.

QUESTION: Well, you could call it a State law--it's positive State enactment rather than common law--couldn't you?

MR. HUDSON: The difference, I think, Chief Justice, is it is not a law aimed specifically at boating requirements. What Congress was addressing in 4306 was acts and regulations enacted by a State and particularly applied to boat safety. These are laws of general application, much as has been said you might have a zoning law or a general safety law. These are different from what Congress preempted in the section under question.

QUESTION: Of course, that reference to State law might be an indication that the only--that the general preemption clause should be read to mean that there is no preemption [*10] unless there is a positive enactment of Federal law. That might be one indication of--and that's not the way the Coast Guard read it right after the act, after the passage of act, but it could mean that too, couldn't it?

MR. HUDSON: I think that is the most logical reading, because when you read 4306 in conjunction with 4305, what you are permitted to obtain exemption from if you apply to the Coast Guard is from existing rules and regulations of the Coast Guard.

Furthermore, if you read the statute where it says at the conclusion, unless identical to a regulation comprised under section 4302, that's surplus. If what Congress intended to do was to say the only regulation we're going to have are positive enactments of the Coast Guard, then you don't need that language in the statue that says, unless identical to the regulations prescribed under this section.

QUESTION: Well, you could read it either way. I mean, there's an ambiguity there.

I suppose you could read it as saying, all State law goes unless the Coast Guard has adopted a regulation and State law is identical to that regulation, or you could read it as saying, all State law stays unless there is a Coast Guard regulation and [*11] in that case the only State law that stays is that which is identical. You could read it either way, I suppose, textually.

The reference to State law in the savings clause as distinct from common law might be an indication of which of those two possible readings you should take, i.e. that the State law is preserved in the absence of a positive enactment with conflict.

MR. HUDSON: To that I would respond, Justice Souter, that the former reading, why do you need State laws that simply parrot an existing Federal regulation that has been enacted by the Coast Guard.

QUESTION: Mm-hmm.

MR. HUDSON: The conduct is being regulated.

I would further say, if you have a statue that can be read both ways under the clear and unambiguous standard that this Court cites in every one of its preemption cases, that in itself proves that at the very least this would be an ambiguous statute.

QUESTION: If that's what we mean.

QUESTION: You don't--we don't have to resolve that question, I take it, to decide in your favor, because the Government is taking the position, I assume, that the Coast Guard is right when the Coast Guard says, we're the only ones in the standard-setting business, so to reach your common [*12] law claim we don't have to decide--

MR. HUDSON: That is correct, because from the time of the enactment of the act and through the present time the Coast Guard has never taken the position that common law claims of general application of State laws are preempted.

QUESTION: May I ask you about the--whether the Georgia--the question of Georgia law of--to introduce to this jury the fact that the Coast Guard did not make a regulation requiring propeller guards would be relevant, wouldn't it?

MR. HUDSON: At least the underlying facts that caused the Coast Guard not to do anything, and the Coast Guard decided not to do anything because they couldn't come up with a common solution and it might expensive and the data was incomplete.

Now, the study committee said some other things, but the Coast Guard letter was general in that nature.

Yes, I think the underlying facts about whether propeller guards are safe or not safe do come into evidence.

QUESTION: And the fact that the Coast Guard that has set other standards didn't set this one.

MR. HUDSON: Yes, I think that could, because it will be a very limited application, even when it comes in, because the Coast Guard's action was very narrow in [*13] scope, the letter that adopted the position of the subcommittee that studied propeller guards.

QUESTION: Mr. Hudson--

QUESTION: Are you responding to Justice Ginsburg's question by saying what you think is desirable, or what you feel you know about the Georgia law of evidence?

MR. HUDSON: Well, I think I do know that much, Your Honor. In product liability cases in Georgia there's a recent supreme court decision we cite in our brief, and it allows all of these factors to come into evidence, whether they are other designs, whether they are Federal regulations, or Federal authorities. The whole mix goes into the jury's determination of whether or not this was too dangerous for use under this application.

QUESTION: Mr. Hudson, 4305 is discussed in all the briefs. I can't find it set forth anywhere. Is it set forth in any of your submissions?

It's very annoying to have a lot of discussion going on about a particular statutory provision and you look in the materials in front of you and it's just not there.

Is it in the red brief?

MR. HUDSON: Your Honor, I can't--we'll look in the blue brief. I think 4305 is the statute that allows the regulations to be established. Other than the fact that-- [*14]

REV_00259303

QUESTION: It's the one that permits the State to apply--

MR. HUDSON: For an exemption.

QUESTION: For an exemption.

MR. HUDSON: Okay. That's right.

QUESTION: Right.

MR. HUDSON: It's--if we haven't set it forth, Your Honor, that's an oversight, but it simply says the Coast Guard can grant an exemption from an existing act or a regulation that the Coast Guard has adopted, not an exemption from the wiping-of-the-slate clean notion that Brunswick submits in this case.

QUESTION: Well, I'm still looking for it.

MR. HUDSON: I'd like to reserve the balance of my time.

QUESTION: Very well, Mr. Hudson.

Mr. Frederick, we'll hear from you.

ORAL ARGUMENT OF DAVID C. FREDERICK ON BEHALF OF THE UNITED STATES, AS AMICUS CURIAE, SUPPORTING THE PETITIONERS

MR. FREDERICK: Thank you, Mr. Chief Justice, and may it please the Court:

Justice Scalia, it's at page 2 of the red brief. Actually, sorry, page 1 of the red brief, 4305.

We agree with petitioners that common law claims are not expressly preempted or impliedly preempted by Coast Guard regulations that don't exist in this case. Congress had two very good reasons to differentiate between positive law enactments and common law remedies that might be [*15] available.

The first is that common law remedies give manufacturers a choice as to whether or not they would change their product design or to install some particular equipment. They could make a cost-benefit analysis of whether assuming the risk that their product might cause a danger and thereby incur liability is worth the cost of redesigning the equipment or putting on some type of propeller guard, and that--

QUESTION: What about punitives?

QUESTION: We've heard that argument before. We heard it in Cipollone. We hear it in every case where the issue is whether common law remedies are precluded, and we have not found it persuasive.

MR. FREDERICK: Well, Justice Scalia--

QUESTION: I mean, it's true, you can roll the dice if you like. I suppose you can say the same thing about an explicit regulatory prohibition and there's especially very little difference when you have punitive damages.

I mean, I could ignore a regulation, too, can't I, and say it's a cost of business. A cost of doing business is now and then I'll get picked up for violating the regulation. It's worth it. I can say that about a regulation just as well as about a common law liability.

MR. FREDERICK: Justice Scalia, [*16] I'm trying to set forth the reasons why in 1971, when Congress enacted this statute, it may have differentiated it. The second is that it legislated against a backdrop, the historical traditions of the country that if people were injured they would have the ability to bring a tort claim, and so the words that it used in setting out in sections 4302, 4306, and 4311(g) used words that suggest positive law enactments would be preempted in 4306 and that common law liability would be saved--

QUESTION: Is that true even if the Coast Guard has a particular rule? I mean, suppose the Coast Guard said, look, this is obviously a tough question whether you should have propeller guards or not. People are killed both ways, and if the--you don't want to make a mistake. So the Coast Guard says, we don't want it. We think more people are killed with the propeller guards than without.

Are you saying under those circumstances in your view a State is perfectly free to award $ 50, $ 60, $ 100 million in punitive damages for doing the very thing the Coast Guard said not to do?

MR. FREDERICK: No. We think implied conflict preemption--

QUESTION: Ah.

MR. FREDERICK: --principles would be applicable.

QUESTION: [*17] So in other words it's just the fact they don't have a particular reg here that this turns on, in your opinion.

MR. FREDERICK: Well, the savings clause should not be read to eviscerate the power that Congress gave the Coast Guard to promulgate affirmative regulations, so that if in exercising that power that Congress gave the Coast Guard the Coast Guard promulgates a regulation that prohibits propeller guards, it would be anomalous to read the savings clause to bring it into conflict with that.

QUESTION: So if they have a reg--suppose they do have a reg.

MR. FREDERICK: Yes.

QUESTION: In your view, should we look to see whether that reg, there's a direct conflict with the State law or common law State--you know, the tort judgment, whether it--the State tort judgment would defeat an object of the reg, or whether the state judgment would be in an area that the reg clearly intends to reserve to the Coast Guard--that's your view of it?

MR. FREDERICK: That's correct. All of the-- QUESTION: Okay. If that's your view of it, why doesn't that apply--and I think maybe that is a perfectly good view. Why doesn't that just as much apply to a State positive regulation as it would to a tort action? [*18]

MR. FREDERICK: Because in 4306 the words that Congress used, it started out by saying, unless permitted by the Secretary, and everything else follows. It uses terms that parallel the terms that were used in 4302 which allow the Secretary to prom--to establish a safety standard.

If you then look at 4306 you see the parallel reference to, a State shall not be allowed to do a law or regulation that establishes a standard or in 4302(a)(2) it says, or impose a requirement or require a--an associated equipment device.

You then look at 4306. After the or, it says, or impose a requirement for associated equipment.

REV_00259305

In our view, the language the Congress used in 4302 was to say, these are the things that the Secretary is authorized to issue regulations about, and then in 4306 it says, unless the Secretary permits, a State can't do those things which the Secretary is empowered to do in 4302, and--

QUESTION: The trouble I find with this analysis, that you rely just on implied preemption for common law, is that would be very peculiar in a statute which in 4306 insists that the State law be identical, that the State regulation, at least, be identical to the Federal law.

I mean, it's really saying, [*19] we don't want any State regulation unless it's the very same one.

MR. FREDERICK: Well, to the contrary, Justice Scalia.

If a regulation that a State promulgates is written in words that are going to be easily compared with a Federal standard it would be very easy to determine whether it was identical or not identical.

And the fact that Congress used the phrase, liability under common law in the savings provisions 4311(g), but did not use the phrase, common law to show that which was to be preempted in 4306 is further textual support for our view that those things which were to be preempted in 4306 were positive enactments of State law that would be done by State executive officers because, in fact, they will have to apply to the Secretary for the exemption from a preemption, and they are the ones who have to seek that authority in order to keep that in place, so it is true that--

QUESTION: Why would a State want to have a regulation that was identical with the Federal regulation?

MR. FREDERICK: Mr. Chief Justice, the history of it is that the Coast Guard recognized that it lacked the resources in order to enforce all of these provisions with the tens of millions of boats that were [*20] out there, so in fact when the Commandant of the Coast Guard testified he urged Congress to provide a scheme that would allow States to promulgate parallel--an identical regulation so that State enforcement officers could go and help with the enforcement of the safety standards.

QUESTION: The States couldn't help enforce the Coast Guard regulation?

MR. FREDERICK: It wasn't clear at the time whether in the absence of that explicit authority and provision that State officers would have the incentive or necessarily the power to do that, so when the Commandant of the Coast Guard testified before the Senate committee he made very clear that what the concern that the Coast Guard had was the positive enactments that would be conflicting with State law.

And he also made clear in response to a written question that was given to him in advance of his testimony so he had additional time to think about it that private remedies would be available to people if they were injured as a result of an unsafe device that was put on a boat.

So we think the legislative history, the structure and the text make very clear that what Congress was intending to do in 4306 was to deal with State positive law enactments.
[*21]

I would like to address, briefly address the respondent's theory of the savings clause, because in our view it doesn't really make that much sense. They have two theories.

REV_00259306

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Rich, Marc Pardon

OA/NARA#: 341/237
9122

Box 51
Folder 7

REV_00259323

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legislative Affairs

Washington, D.C. 20530

Draft March 27, 2001

The Honorable Dan Burton
Chairman
Committee on Government Reform
U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, DC 20515

Department of Justice

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This responds to your letter, dated March 14, 2001, which requested documents relating to certain recent presidential pardons. Your letter requested four categories of documents.

The first category consists of records relating to the consideration of clemency for 18 named individuals. Consistent with the approach that the ~~executive branch~~ took in response to similar document requests made by congressional committees in 1999 with regard to grants of clemency for certain Puerto Rican Nationalists, we are prepared to provide the Committee with documents submitted to the Department from outside the executive branch and certain law enforcement records, such as pre-sentencing reports, but ~~we are~~ not ~~prepared to provide~~ internal executive branch documents concerning the deliberations regarding possible grants of clemency. Documents concerning the grant to Carlos Vignali fall within an exception to this limitation, because the privilege protections have previously been lifted with respect to that matter (as was the case with respect to the pardons of Marc Rich and Pincus Green). We are searching for documents within this category that we are prepared to provide, and will inform you when they are assembled.

The second and third categories consist of records relating to any criminal investigations concerning individuals and matters identified in your letter. Our longstanding policy regarding the confidentiality of ongoing criminal investigations precludes us from providing records in response to this request. Although we can neither confirm nor deny that we are investigating any of the specific matters referred to in your letter, the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York has informed us that your request does have some relationship to its ongoing investigations.

Finally, your fourth category consists of records relating to clemency requests for which the White House requested priority review. White House requests to the Department concerning clemency deliberations, such as requests that we prioritize certain matters, fall within the category of deliberative information that we are protecting, consistent with the ~~executive branch~~ position on the Puerto Rican Nationalist matter. Accordingly, we are not prepared to identify which matters the White House asked us to prioritize and therefore are not providing documents in response to this request.

Please do not hesitate to contact me if you would like additional assistance regarding this or any other matter.

Sincerely,

Sheryl L. Walter
Acting Assistant Attorney General

cc: The Honorable Henry Waxman
Ranking Minority Member

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legislative Affairs

Washington, D.C. 20530

Draft March 27, 2001

The Honorable Richard C. Shelby
Chairman
Select Committee on Intelligence
United States Senate
Washington, DC 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This responds to your letter of March 12, 2001, which requested "an outline of the role, formal or informal, of officials of the Department of Justice in the consideration and granting" of pardons to John Deutch and Samuel Morison. We are sending an identical letter to Vice Chairman Graham.

Under the Constitution, the pardon power is exercised by the President alone, although the Department has traditionally played an extensive advisory role with respect to most pardons and commutations. Mr. Deutch's pardon was an exception to that general rule. The President made his decision in this matter without consultation with or advice from the Department of Justice. To our knowledge, the Pardon Attorney is the only Department official who was advised that Mr. Deutch was going to receive a pardon. At about 9:30 or 9:45 A.M. on the morning of January 20, 2001, the Pardon Attorney was informed in a telephone call from an Associate White House Counsel that President Clinton had decided to grant a pardon to Mr. Deutch. The Associate Counsel requested technical advice in drafting the language of the pardon warrant and the Pardon Attorney attempted to provide such advice, although his only knowledge of the Deutch matter was the information provided by the Associate Counsel. Prior to this occurrence, neither he nor anyone on his staff was aware that Mr. Deutch was being considered for a pardon, and the pardon warrant was drafted by members of the White House Counsel's Office, rather than by attorneys at the Department of Justice.

By contrast, Mr. Morison submitted a petition for pardon to the Office of the Pardon Attorney, and it was processed routinely. The process typically includes obtaining the presentence report, requesting an FBI background investigation, and seeking recommendations from the United States Attorney whose office prosecuted the case and from the sentencing judge. After completing its investigation of Mr. Morison's case, the Pardon Attorney's Office prepared a report and recommendation for the Deputy Attorney General's signature. The report was signed by the Deputy Attorney General and sent to the White House Counsel. Subsequently, President Clinton made the decision to grant Mr. Morison a pardon. I would emphasize that the role of the Department of Justice in this case, as in all clemency cases in which the applicant applies through the Pardon Attorney, was to conduct an appropriate investigation and provide advice and a recommendation to the President. The President, however, is always free to accept or ignore the Department's recommendation in a particular case.

I hope that this information is helpful. Please do not hesitate to contact me if you would like assistance regarding any other matter.

Sincerely,

Sheryl L. Walter
Acting Assistant Attorney General

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legislative Affairs

Office of the Assistant Attorney General Washington, D.C. 20530

Draft March 20, 2001

The Honorable Orrin G. Hatch
Chairman
Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
Washington, DC 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This is to provide information responsive to Senator Feinstein's questions at the Committee's hearing on February 14, 2001 regarding clemency granted by President Clinton on January 20, 2001. We request that this information, which pertains to the role of victims in the clemency review process, be included in the hearing record.

The impact on victims of the crime for which the applicant seeks executive clemency has long been a significant factor for the Office of the Pardon Attorney in its investigation of clemency petitions and in its preparation of the Department's advice to the President concerning whether a pardon or commutation should be granted. Since 1997, the portion of the United States Attorneys Manual that deals with the role of the United States Attorney in clemency matters (Section 1-2.111, USAM) has expressly noted the importance of providing information to the Pardon Attorney regarding victim impact in clemency cases. The practice of victim consultation in clemency cases has now been standardized by a regulation (28 CFR § 1.6(b)) which applies to clemency petitions filed on or after September 28, 2000, but this reflects more of a continuation of past practice than the commencement of a new procedure.

In response to Senator Feinstein's request, we examined pardons and commutations granted between December 1, 1999, and December 31, 2000. Of the ten commutations granted in this period, none involved an individual victim who suffered either physical or financial harm.
Of the 147 pardons granted during this period, only two involved physical harm to persons or property. The victims were not consulted in these two cases. In both instances, the defendant/pardon applicant had been charged with a regulatory type offense, not an assault or property destruction offense. In one case, restitution had been fully paid many years ago, and the defendant had taken great pains not to hurt any persons and to do only damage to the personal property of an individual with whom he was having a personal feud. The other case involved merely bad judgment that resulted in an accident, and neither drugs nor alcohol were involved.

I hope that this information is helpful. Please do not hesitate to contact me if you would like additional assistance regarding this matter.

Sincerely,

Sheryl L. Walter
Acting Assistant Attorney General

cc: The Honorable Patrick J. Leahy
Ranking Minority Member

REV_00259329

To: Stuart B.
6-1647

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

OFFICE OF THE COUNSEL TO THE PRESIDENT

FACSIMILE COVER SHEET

Date: 3/28 Time: _____

To: Brad (6-2146) + Brett (6-1647)

Fax: _____

From: Judge

Phone: (202) 456-2632 Fax: (202) 456-6279

Number of Pages (including cover sheet): 3 4

Message:

The Judge wants to visit with you both about This.
He meets w/ Cauthell + Murray on Th. @ 10:45 am (w/ Stuart).

Confidentiality Notice

The document accompanying this telecopy transmission contain confidential information belonging to the sender which is legally privileged. The information is intended only for the use of the individual or entity named above. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, or distribution or the taking of any action in reliance on the contents of this telecopied information is strictly prohibited. If you have received this telecopy in error, please immediately notify us by telephone to arrange for return of the original documents to us.

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

Facsimile
Cover Sheet

Date: _____
Time: _____

To: Paul Colburn

Fax: 305-8524

From: _____

Number of Pages: _____

Message:

_____

_____

_____

_____

_____

_____

Confidentiality Notice

The document accompanying this telecopy transmission contain confidential information belonging to the sender which is legally privileged. The information is intended only for the use of the individual or entity named above. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, or distribution or the taking of any action in reliance on the contents of this telecopied information is strictly prohibited. If you have received this telecopy in error, please immediately notify us by telephone to arrange for return of the original documents to us.

REV_00259331

DAN BURTON, INDIANA,
CHAIRMAN
BENJAMIN A. GILMAN, NEW YORK
CONSTANCE A. MORELLA, MARYLAND
CHRISTOPHER SHAYS, CONNECTICUT
ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN, FLORIDA
JOHN M. MCHUGH, NEW YORK
STEPHEN HORN, CALIFORNIA
JOHN L. MICA, FLORIDA
THOMAS M. DAVIS, VIRGINIA
MARK E. SOUDER, INDIANA
JOE SCARBOROUGH, FLORIDA
STEVEN C. LATOURETTE, OHIO
BOB BARR, GEORGIA
DAN MILLER, FLORIDA
DOUG OSE, CALIFORNIA
RON LEWIS, KENTUCKY
JO ANN DAVIS, VIRGINIA
TODD RUSSELL PLATTS, PENNSYLVANIA
DAVE WELDON, FLORIDA
CHRIS CANNON, UTAH
ADAM H. PUTNAM, FLORIDA
C.L. "BUTCH" OTTER, IDAHO
EDWARD L. SCHROCK, VA

ONE HUNDRED SEVENTH CONGRESS

Congress of the United States

House of Representatives

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT REFORM

2157 RAYBURN HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING

WASHINGTON, DC 20515-6143

MAJORITY (202) 225-5074
MINORITY (202) 225-5051
TTY (202) 225-6852

www.house.gov/reform

HENRY A. WAXMAN, CALIFORNIA,
RANKING MINORITY MEMBER
TOM LANTOS, CALIFORNIA
MAJOR R. OWENS, NEW YORK
EDOLPHUS TOWNS, NEW YORK
PAUL E. KANJORSKI, PENNSYLVANIA
PATSY T. MINK, HAWAII
CAROLYN B. MALONEY, NEW YORK
ELEANOR HOLMES NORTON,
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA
ELIJAH E. CUMMINGS, MARYLAND
DENNIS J. KUCINICH, OHIO
ROD R. BLAGOJEVICH, ILLINOIS
DANNY K. DAVIS, ILLINOIS
JOHN F. TIERNEY, MASSACHUSETTS
JIM TURNER, TEXAS
THOMAS H. ALLEN, MAINE
JANICE D. SCHAKOWSKY, ILLINOIS
W. LACY CLAY, MISSOURI

BERNARD SANDERS, VERMONT,
INDEPENDENT

March 14, 2001

The Honorable John Ashcroft
Attorney General
United States Department of Justice
Tenth Street & Constitution Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20530

Re: Request for Documents

Dear General Ashcroft:

Pursuant to its authority under Rules X and XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Government Reform is conducting an investigation of certain pardons and commutations granted by President Clinton. The Committee hereby requests certain records.

Please provide the Committee with the following records:

1. All records relating to the consideration of Executive Grants of Clemency for the following individuals:

(1) deliberative
(2) FALN line →

a. Benjamin Berger;
b. Almon Glenn Braswell;
c. Jacob Elbaum;
d. Robert Clinton Fain;
e. David Goldstein;
f. Edgar Allen Gregory;
g. Vonna Jo Gregory;
h. Garland Lincecum;
i. Eugene Lum;
j. Nora Lum;
k. James Lowell Manning;
l. Joe McKernan;
m. Kalmen Stem;
n. Carlos Vignali;
o. Thomas Waddell III;

REV_00259332

p. Harvey Weinig;
q. Mitchell Couey Wood;
r. Phillip Young;

2. All records relating to any criminal investigation of Roger Clinton's involvement in the pardon request of Phillip Young;

3. All records relating to any criminal investigation relating to the relationship between Roger Clinton, Arkansas lawyer Larry Wallace, and Birmingham, Alabama, businessman John Katopodis; and

4. All records from October 2000 through January 20, 2001, relating to any requests for grants of clemency for which the White House requested priority review by the Justice Department.

Please provide the requested records by March 21, 2001. If you have any questions about this matter, please have your staff contact the Committee's Chief Counsel, James C. Wilson, at (202) 225-5074. Thank you for your cooperation with this request.

Sincerely,

Dan Burton
Chairman

cc: The Honorable Henry A. Waxman, Ranking Minority Member

REV_00259333

DAN BURTON, INDIANA,
CHAIRMAN
BENJAMIN A. GILMAN, NEW YORK
CONSTANCE A. MORELLA, MARYLAND
CHRISTOPHER SHAYS, CONNECTICUT
ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN, FLORIDA
JOHN M. MCHUGH, NEW YORK
STEPHEN HORN, CALIFORNIA
JOHN L. MICA, FLORIDA
THOMAS M. DAVIS, VIRGINIA
MARK E. SOUDER, INDIANA
JOE SCARBOROUGH, FLORIDA
STEVEN C. LATOURETTE, OHIO
BOB BARR, GEORGIA
DAN MILLER, FLORIDA
DOUG OSE, CALIFORNIA
RON LEWIS, KENTUCKY
JO ANN DAVIS, VIRGINIA
TODD RUSSELL PLATTS, PENNSYLVANIA
DAVE WELDON, FLORIDA
CHRIS CANNON, UTAH
ADAM H. PUTNAM, FLORIDA
C.L. "BUTCH" OTTER, IDAHO
EDWARD L. SCHROCK, VA

ONE HUNDRED SEVENTH CONGRESS

Congress of the United States

House of Representatives

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT REFORM

2157 RAYBURN HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING

WASHINGTON, DC 20515-6143

MAJORITY (202) 225-5074
MINORITY (202) 225-5051
TTY (202) 225-6852

www.house.gov/reform

HENRY A. WAXMAN, CALIFORNIA
RANKING MINORITY MEMBER
TOM LANTOS, CALIFORNIA
MAJOR R. OWENS, NEW YORK
EDOLPHUS TOWNS, NEW YORK
PAUL E. KANJORSKI, PENNSYLVANIA
PATSY T. MINK, HAWAII
CAROLYN B. MALONEY, NEW YORK
ELEANOR HOLMES NORTON,
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA
ELIJAH E. CUMMINGS, MARYLAND
DENNIS J. KUCINICH, OHIO
ROD R. BLAGOJEVICH, ILLINOIS
DANNY K. DAVIS, ILLINOIS
JOHN F. TIERNEY, MASSACHUSETTS
JIM TURNER, TEXAS
THOMAS H. ALLEN, MAINE
JANICE D. SCHAKOWSKY, ILLINOIS
WM. LACY CLAY, MISSOURI

BERNARD SANDERS, VERMONT,
INDEPENDENT

March 14, 2001

The Honorable John Ashcroft
Attorney General
United States Department of Justice
Tenth Street & Constitution Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20530

Re: Request for Documents

Dear General Ashcroft:

Pursuant to its authority under Rules X and XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Government Reform is conducting an investigation of certain pardons and commutations granted by President Clinton. The Committee hereby requests certain records.

Please provide the Committee with the following records:

1. All records relating to the consideration of Executive Grants of Clemency for the following individuals:

   a. Benjamin Berger;
   b. Almon Glenn Braswell;
   c. Jacob Elbaum;
   d. Robert Clinton Fain;
   e. David Goldstein;
   f. Edgar Allen Gregory;
   g. Vonna Jo Gregory;
   h. Garland Lincecum;
   i. Eugene Lum;
   j. Nora Lum;
   k. James Lowell Manning;
   l. Joe McKernan;
   m. Kalmen Stern;
   n. Carlos Vignali;
   o. Thomas Waddell III;

REV_00259334

p. Harvey Weinig;
q. Mitchell Couey Wood;
r. Phillip Young;

2. All records relating to any criminal investigation of Roger Clinton's involvement in the pardon request of Phillip Young;

3. All records relating to any criminal investigation relating to the relationship between Roger Clinton, Arkansas lawyer Larry Wallace, and Birmingham, Alabama, businessman John Katopodis; and

4. All records from October 2000 through January 20, 2001, relating to any requests for grants of clemency for which the White House requested priority review by the Justice Department.

Please provide the requested records by March 21, 2001. If you have any questions about this matter, please have your staff contact the Committee's Chief Counsel, James C. Wilson, at (202) 225-5074. Thank you for your cooperation with this request.

Sincerely,

Dan Burton
Chairman

cc: The Honorable Henry A. Waxman, Ranking Minority Member

REV_00259335

THE WHITE HOUSE ID#

CORRESPONDENCE TRACKING WORKSHEET PAGE 1

DATE RECEIVED: 3/15/01

NAME OF CORRESPONDENT: Paul Colborn

SUBJECT: Request for Documents from the House Cmte. on Govt. Reform

ROUTE TO: OFFICE/AGENCY	(STAFF NAME)	ACTION CODE	ACTION DATE YY/MM/DD	DISPOSITION TYPE RESP	DISPOSITION CD	DISPOSITION COMPLETED YY/MM/DD
CUGONZ		A	3/15/01		A	3/15/01
	ACTION COMMENTS:
CUATOS		A	3/15/01			/ /
	ACTION COMMENTS:
			/ /			/ /
	ACTION COMMENTS:
			/ /			/ /
	ACTION COMMENTS:

COMMENTS

ADDITIONAL CORRESPONDENTS: MEDIA:

ACTION CODES:
A - APPROPRIATE ACTION
C - COMMENT/RECOMMENDATION
D - DRAFT RESPONSE
F - FURNISH FACT SHEET
I - INFO COPY/NO ACT NECESSARY
R - DIRECT REPLY W/ COPY
S - FOR SIGNATURE

DISPOSITION CODES:
A - ANSWERED
B - NON-SEPC-REFERRAL
C - COMPLETED
S - SUSPENDED

OUTGOING CORRESPONDENCE:
TYPE RESP = INITIALS OF SIGNER
CODE = A COMPLETED = DATE OF OUTGOING

REFER QUESTIONS AND ROUTING UPDATES TO RECORDS MANAGEMENT (ROOM 72, OEOB) EXT 6-2590.
KEEP THIS WORKSHEET ATTACHED TO THE ORIGINAL INCOMING LETTER AT ALL TIMES AND SEND COMPLETED RECORD TO RECORDS MANAGEMENT.

Fax Transmission

Faxed Over

Paul P. Colborn
Special Counsel
United States Department of Justice
Office of Legal Counsel
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20530
Phone: 202-514-2048
Fax: 202-305-8524

To: Brett Kavanaugh Date: 3-15-01

Office # ( ) Pages: 3 (including cover sheet)

Fax#: ( ) 456-6279

Subject: Oversight on Pardons

Comments: Please call me to discuss the DOJ response to the attached

Good morning, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee:

I am here today at the Committee's request to provide information about how my office, the Office of the Pardon Attorney, normally handles clemency petitions, and to describe the procedures we followed with regard to President Clinton's grants of pardon to individuals, including Marc Rich and Pincus Green, on January 20, 2001.

Executive clemency petitions most commonly request relief in the form of pardon or commutation of sentence. The Department of Justice processes requests for executive clemency in accordance with regulations promulgated by the President and set forth at 28 C.F.R. §§ 1.1 to 1.11. These regulations provide internal guidance for Department of Justice personnel who advise and assist the President in carrying out the pardon function, but they create no enforceable rights in persons applying for executive clemency and do not restrict in any way the plenary clemency authority granted to the President under Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution. While the regulations thus govern the process for clemency requests submitted to the Department, they do not govern requests submitted directly to the President.

A presidential pardon serves as an official statement of forgiveness for the commission of a federal crime and restores basic civil rights. It does not connote innocence. Under the provisions of 28 C.F.R. § 1.2, a person does not become eligible to file a pardon request with the Department until the expiration of a five-year waiting period that commences upon the date of the individual's release from confinement (including home or community confinement) for his most recent conviction or, if no condition of confinement was imposed as part of that sentence, the date of conviction. Typically, the waiting period is triggered by the sentence imposed for the offense for which the pardon is sought, but any subsequent conviction begins the waiting period anew. Moreover, the same regulation stipulates that no petition for pardon should be filed by an individual who is then on probation, parole, or supervised release. As the foregoing indicates, a person who has not yet been convicted or has not fully served the sentence for the federal crime for which pardon is sought is ineligible for pardon under the regulations that guide the President Clinton intended to pardon, and drafted the individual warrant accordingly. We obtained information as to dates of conviction and exact offenses for which these persons were convicted from the Internet web sites of several Independent Counsels, and in some cases obtained court documents such as the judgment orders, which give the date of conviction and the United States Code citation for the offense of conviction.

In non-Independent Counsel cases in which we have received either no documents at all or very sketchy information from the White House Counsel in the last hours before the pardons were granted, we have determined in all but one case that the person has only one federal conviction. We are therefore confident that it was this single conviction that President Clinton intended to pardon, and so drafted the individual warrants accordingly. We obtained information as to the date of conviction and the exact charges by contacting United States Attorney's Offices and United States Probation Offices and requesting the judgment orders in each case. We intend to prepare in this fashion the remaining nine individual warrants that have not been completed as of today. The delay in the processing of these warrants is occasioned by the need of the U.S. Attorneys and Probation Officers to request the official records from archived files stored at distant locations, and is not due to any doubt as to the scope of the pardon intended by President Clinton. We expect to complete this task shortly. In one case (that of Adolph Schwimmer), the conviction of which we have knowledge is more than 50 years old. The age of that conviction and Mr. Schwimmer's own advanced age may prolong for awhile the process of confirming that this is only conviction. In any event, we have no knowledge or belief that President Clinton intended to pardon anyone for conduct for which he or she was not at least charged and, in most cases, convicted. Moreover, my office has had no contact of any sort with President Clinton or any of his assistants since the master pardon warrant was signed on January 20th.

REV_00259347

Department of Justice's processing of pardon requests. However, these rules do not bind the President. The President retains the authority under the Constitution to consider a pardon request from an individual who is ineligible to apply under the regulations or who has not applied at all, and to grant clemency to such a person if he believes such action to be appropriate.

A pardon request is typically processed in the following manner. The pardon applicant files his clemency petition, addressed to the President, with the Office of the Pardon Attorney. He is free to utilize the services of an attorney or to act on his own behalf in seeking pardon. The standard form utilized for this process requests information about the offense, the petitioner's other criminal record, his employment and residence history since the conviction and other biographical information, and his reasons for seeking pardon. The application must be signed and notarized, and the applicant must also submit three notarized affidavits from character references who are unrelated to him, know of his conviction, and support his pardon request. When my office receives a pardon petition, it is screened to ensure that the applicant is in fact eligible to seek a pardon (i.e., that the crime for which pardon is sought is a federal offense and that the waiting period has been satisfied), to determine whether any necessary information has been omitted from the application or whether the applicant's responses to the questions require further elaboration, and to ascertain whether the petitioner has described his efforts at rehabilitation. If the petitioner is ineligible to apply for pardon under the regulations, he is so informed. If the application is incomplete, further information is sought from the petitioner.

As an initial investigative step in a pardon case, the Office of the Pardon Attorney contacts the United States Probation Office for the federal district in which the petitioner was prosecuted to obtain copies of the presentence report and the judgment of conviction, as well as information regarding the petitioner's compliance with court supervision, and to ascertain the Probation Office's views regarding the merits of the pardon request. If review of the pardon petition and the data obtained from the Probation Office reveals information that clearly excludes the case from further favorable consideration, my office prepares a report to the President for the signature of the Deputy Attorney General recommending that pardon be denied. Alternatively, if the initial review indicates that the case may have some merit, it is referred to the FBI so that a background investigation can be conducted.

The FBI does not make a recommendation to support or deny a pardon request. Rather, the Bureau provides the Office of the Pardon Attorney with factual information about the petitioner including such matters as his criminal history, records concerning the offense for which pardon is sought, his employment and residence history, and his reputation in the community. The FBI report is reviewed by my staff to ascertain whether favorable consideration of the case may be warranted. If the investigation reveals derogatory information of a type that would render pardon inappropriate and warrant denial of the request, my office prepares a report to the President through the Deputy Attorney General recommending such a result.

If the FBI report suggests that favorable treatment may be warranted, or in cases which are of particular importance or in which significant factual questions exist, the Office of the Pardon Attorney requests input from the prosecuting authority (e.g., a United States Attorney, a Division of the Department of Justice, or in some cases, an Independent Counsel) and the sentencing judge concerning the merits of the pardon request. If the individual case warrants, other government agencies, such as the Internal Revenue Service or the Immigration and Naturalization Service, may be contacted as well. In appropriate cases in which the offense involved a victim, the prosecuting authority is asked to notify the victim of the pendency of the clemency petition and advise him that he may submit comments concerning the pardon request. Upon receipt of the responses to these inquiries, my office prepares a report and a proposed recommendation for action upon the case. The report is drafted for the signature of the Deputy Attorney General and is submitted for his review. If the Deputy Attorney General concurs with my office's assessment, he signs the recommendation and returns the report to my office for transmittal to the Counsel to the President. If the Deputy Attorney General disagrees with the disposition proposed by the Office of the Pardon Attorney, he may direct the Pardon Attorney to modify the Department's recommendation. After the recommendation is signed by the Deputy Attorney General, the report is transmitted to the Counsel to the President for the President's action on the pardon request whenever he deems it appropriate.

Similarly, a federal inmate seeking a presidential commutation (reduction) of his sentence files a petition for such relief with the Office of the Pardon Attorney. In contrast to a pardon, a commutation is not an act of forgiveness, but rather simply remits some portion of the punishment being served. An inmate is eligible to apply for commutation so long as he has reported to prison to begin serving his sentence and is not concurrently challenging his conviction through an appeal or other court proceeding. The petitioner is free to append to the commutation application - or to submit separately at a later date - any additional documentation he believes will provide support for his request. In completing the petition, the inmate - or his attorney, if he is represented by counsel - explains the circumstances underlying his conviction; provides information regarding his sentence, his criminal record, and any appeals or other court challenges he has filed regarding the conviction for which he seeks commutation; and states the grounds upon which he bases his request for relief.

When my office receives a commutation petition, we review it to ensure that the applicant is eligible to apply for clemency, and we commence an investigation of the merits of the request. The initial investigative step involves contacting the warden of the petitioner's correctional institution to obtain copies of the presentence report and judgment of conviction for the petitioner's offense, as well as the most recent prison progress report that has been prepared detailing his adjustment to incarceration, including his participation in work, educational, vocational, counseling, and financial responsibility programs; his medical status; and his disciplinary history. We also check automated legal databases for any court opinions relating to the petitioner's conviction. In most cases, this information is sufficient to enable my office to prepare a report to the President through the Deputy Attorney General recommending that commutation be denied.

In a minority of cases, however, if our review of this information raises questions of material fact or suggests that the commutation application may have some merit, or because the case presents significant issues, my office contacts the United States Attorney for the federal district of conviction or the prosecuting section of the Department of Justice for comments and recommendations regarding the commutation request. We also contact the sentencing judge, either through the United States Attorney or directly, to solicit the judge's views and recommendation on the clemency application. As with pardon requests, if the individual case warrants, other government agencies may be contacted as well. In appropriate cases in which the offense involved a victim, the prosecuting authority is asked to notify the victim of the pendency of the commutation petition and advise him that he may submit comments concerning the clemency request.

Following an evaluation of all of the material gathered in the course of the investigation, the Pardon Attorney's Office drafts a report and recommendation for action on the merits of the commutation request which is transmitted to the Deputy Attorney General. Following his review, the Deputy Attorney General may either sign the report and recommendation or return it to my office for revision. Once the Deputy Attorney General determines that the report and recommendation satisfactorily reflects his views on the merits of the clemency request, he signs the document, which is then forwarded to the Counsel to the President for consideration by the President. Thereafter, when he deems it appropriate, the President acts on the commutation petition and grants or denies clemency, as he sees fit.

When the President decides to grant clemency, whether in the form of pardon or commutation of sentence, the Counsel to the President informs the Office of the Pardon Attorney to prepare the appropriate clemency warrant. Typically, if the President intends to pardon a number of applicants, a master warrant of pardon will be prepared for his signature. The signed warrant bears the seal of the Department of Justice, lists the names of all of the individuals to whom the President grants pardon, and directs the Pardon Attorney to prepare and sign individual warrants of pardon reflecting President's action to be delivered to each pardon recipient. The individual warrant signed by the Pardon Attorney likewise bears the seal of the Department of Justice and reflects that it has been prepared at the direction of the President. When the individual pardon warrant has been prepared, it is sent to the applicant, or his attorney if he is represented by counsel, along with an acknowledgment form that the pardon recipient completes and returns to the Pardon Attorney's Office to reflect receipt of the warrant.

If the President decides to commute a prisoner's sentence, the Pardon Attorney's Office likewise prepares the warrant of commutation for the President's signature. Depending upon how many sentences are to be commuted, either a master warrant detailing all of the commuted sentences or individual commutation warrants may be prepared. After the President has signed the commutation warrant, which bears the seal of the Department of Justice, the Pardon Attorney's Office transmits a certified copy of the document to the Bureau of Prisons to effect the inmate's release. A copy of the warrant is also sent to the petitioner's attorney if he is represented by counsel. Whenever the President grants a pardon or commutation, the Pardon Attorney's Office notifies the prosecuting authority (United States Attorney or Division of the Justice Department), the sentencing judge, the relevant United States Probation Office, the FBI, and any other government agencies whose views were solicited, of the final decision in the matter.

When the President denies clemency, the Counsel to the President typically notifies the Deputy Attorney General and the Pardon Attorney's Office by memorandum that the affected cases have been decided adversely. The Pardon Attorney's office then notifies the pardon or commutation applicant, or his attorney, of the decision. In addition, the Pardon Attorney's Office notifies the prosecuting authority, the sentencing judge, other government agencies whose views were solicited, and, in the case of a commutation, the Federal Bureau of Prisons, of the outcome of the request. No reasons for the President's action are given in the notice of denial.

With respect to the pardon of Marc Rich and Pincus Green, none of the regular procedures were followed. The first time I learned that the White House was considering these two persons for pardon was shortly after midnight on the morning of Saturday, January 20, 2001. At that time, I received a telephone call from the Office of the White House Counsel advising me that they were faxing me a list of additional persons to whom the President was considering granting pardons. When the facsimile arrived, among the several names listed were Pincus Green and Marc Rich. Since the fax included no other information about these persons, I telephoned the White House Counsel's Office to advise that I would need additional identifying data in order to request that the FBI conduct criminal records checks on the named individuals. (I had been contacting the FBI for the past several days with names of persons for whom the White House wanted checks of criminal records and outstanding warrants.)

I was told by White House Counsel staff that the only two people on the list for whom I needed to obtain records checks were Marc Rich and Pincus Green, and that it was expected there would be little information about the two men because they had been "living abroad" for several years. I obtained the dates of birth and Social Security numbers for Rich and Green from Counsel's Office and then passed this information along to the FBI by telephone so that the records checks could be completed. Shortly thereafter, White House Counsel's Office personnel faxed to my office a few pages that appeared to have come from a clemency petition that had been submitted to the White House on behalf of Rich and Green by Jack Quinn, Esq. and other attorneys. The information contained in these documents revealed that the pardon request sought clemency for pending charges that had been brought by indictment in the Southern District of New York some 17 years earlier, and that Rich and Green had resided outside the United States ever since and were considered to be fugitives. At that point, a member of my staff began to conduct a quick Internet search for information about the two men.

While that search was ongoing, I received a facsimile transmission from the FBI of records which confirmed that Rich and Green were wanted fugitives whom law enforcement authorities were willing to extradite for a variety of felony charges, including mail and wire fraud, arms trading, and tax evasion. Because I was concerned that the FBI transmission would not be readable if it were itself faxed to the White House Counsel's Office, I wrote a quick summary of the information regarding the outstanding charges against Rich and Green and their fugitive status and faxed that to Counsel's Office shortly before 1:00 a.m. on January 20th. Because of what we had learned about Rich and Green, I also immediately contacted Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder at home through the Justice Department Command Center to alert him that the President was considering granting pardons to the two men. Mr. Holder indicated to me at that time that he was aware of the pending clemency requests by Rich and Green. After receiving my short summary of the FBI's information about Rich and Green, personnel from the White House Counsel's Office called to ask that I fax them a copy of the FBI record itself. I did so shortly after 1:00 a.m., and also included the limited information about Rich's fugitive status and the charges against him that my staff had been able to obtain from the Internet.

The only other time the names of Marc Rich and Pincus Green had come to my attention was on the morning of January 19, 2001, when I first saw a copy of a letter dated January 10, 2001, that their attorney, Jack Quinn, had sent to Deputy Attorney General Holder seeking his support for pardons for the two men. The Justice Department transmittal sheet attached to the letter indicated that on January 17th, the Department's Executive Secretariat had assigned the Quinn letter to my office for response and had sent a copy to the Deputy Attorney General's Office for information. My office received its copy on the afternoon of January 18th, and on the morning of the 19th, I saw it in our mail. The due date for response indicated by the Executive Secretariat was January 31st. Because neither Rich nor Green had filed a clemency application with my office and because the White House Counsel's Office had never indicated to me that pardons for these two persons were under consideration, I simply drafted a short response on the morning of the 19th, to be held until the following Monday, advising Mr. Quinn that neither man had submitted a pardon petition to my office and that if they wished to request pardons, the application forms were available upon request.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Committee is also interested in hearing how the Department of Justice determined the scope of the individual pardon grants made on January 20, 2001. A majority of the persons named on the master pardon warrant had submitted petitions for pardon to the Department of Justice. Their applications specified the offenses for which they had been convicted and for which they sought pardon. In many cases, we had sufficient time to fully process their cases and submit reports and recommendations to the White House in which we discussed those offenses. In these cases, it is clear that President Clinton intended to grant pardons for the offenses so noted and discussed.

Other persons named on the master warrant also submitted petitions to the Department, but they arrived too late for us to submit a report and recommendation. Many of these persons had also submitted their petitions directly to the White House, and in some cases the White House asked the Office of the Pardon Attorney for copies of their petitions. In these cases as well, we are confident that President Clinton intended to grant pardons for the offenses cited in their petitions.

Some of the persons whose names were on the master pardon warrant never submitted petitions to the Department. We have determined the scope of the pardons for these persons in a variety of ways. In some cases, including those of Marc Rich and Pincus Green, the White House Counsel's office sent us, just prior to the granting of the pardons, copies of or excerpts from the pardon requests that these persons or their counsels had submitted to the White House. We therefore drafted the individual pardon warrants to reflect the offenses for which the pardon recipients were convicted (or, in the case of Rich and Green, indicted) as described in these submissions made directly to the White House.

In several other cases in which the Department received nothing from the pardoned person, we were able to determine that the person had been prosecuted by an Independent Counsel. In these instances, we determined that the Independent Counsel conviction is the person's only federal conviction. We therefore are confident that it was this conviction that litigation files

Robert Wollner
5540 W. Glendale Ave., Suite 204
Glendale, Arizona 85301
Telephone 623 939-7745

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

DISTRICT OF ARIZONA

Robert Wollner,

Plaintiff,

- VS. -

Defendants,

George H. Bush
Jeb Bush
George W. Bush
Dick Cheney
Colin Powel
Donald Rumsfelt

SUMMONS IN A CIVIL CASE

Case Number

CIV '01 0602 PHX EHC

TO:

George H. Bush
10000 Memorial Dr.
Houston, TX 77024-3422

Jeb Bush
State of Florida, The Capitol
Tallahassee, Florida 32399-0001

George W. Bush
1600 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dick Cheney
1600 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20500

Colin Powel
2201 C Street N.W.
Washington D.C. 20520

Donald Rumsfeld
The Pentagon
Washington D.C. 20301-1155

YOU ARE HEREBY SUMMONED and required to serve upon THE PLAINTIFF

Robert Wollner, 5540 W. Glendale Ave., Suite 204, Glendale, Arizona 85301

An answer to the complaint which is herewith served upon you, within 20 days after service of this summons upon you, exclusive of the day of service. If you fail to do so, judgment by default will be taken against you for the relief demanded in the complaint. You must also file your answer with the Clerk of this Court within a reasonable period of time after service.

REV_00259362

United States Courthouse
230 North First Avenue, Room 1400
Phoenix, AZ 85025

RICHARD H. WEARE
CLERK

(BY) DEPUTY CLERK

APR 04 2001
DATE

Robert Wollner
5540 W. Glendale Ave., Suite 204
Glendale, Arizona 85301
Telephone 623 939-7745

FILED ✓ LODGED
RECEIVED ✓ COPY
APR 04 2001
CLERK U S DISTRICT COURT
DISTRICT OF ARIZONA
BY DEPUTY

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

DISTRICT OF ARIZONA

Robert Wollner,

Plaintiff,

- VS. -

Defendants,

George H. Bush
Jeb Bush
George W. Bush
Dick Cheney
Colin Powel
Donald Rumsfelt

George H. Bush
10000 Memorial Dr.
Houston, TX 77024-3422

Jeb Bush
State of Florida, The Capitol
Tallahassee, Florida 32399-0001

George W. Bush
1600 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dick Cheney
1600 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20500

Colin Powel
2201 C Street N.W.
Washington D.C. 20520

Donald Rumsfeld
The Pentagon
Washington D.C. 20301-1155

COMPLAINT

Case Number

CIV '01 0602 PHX EHC

REV_00259364

JURISDICTION

The United States District Court, District Of Arizona, is the proper jurisdiction for litigating this matter. The court has jurisdiction and the claim needs no new grounds of jurisdiction to support it.

Being Sued As Individuals

The Defendants, each singular litigant, are being sued as individuals, and any past or present public service office which they may have held, or may now hold, is not relevant to this litigation.

COMPLAINT

The Plaintiff in this action, Mr. Robert Wollner, will NOW introduce the pertinent facts and issues that have risen in order to provoke this lawsuit. The Plaintiff comes forth with dispatch, to present the relevant circumstances pertaining to his complaint.

The Plaintiff, Robert Wollner, is the author\inventor of a new concept in economics named Negative Economics. The new concept has been designated as "Negative" Economics, because of the consequences that such a concept would produce on the human race. The destructive capabilities of Negative Economics to damage the human race is profound. The evolution forecast of mankind would be altered, because the incentive to implement Negative Economics is rooted in the basic evil characteristics of man. The human desire that produces the hunger for greed and wickedness is the motivation that justifies the logic to employ Negative Economics pursuits. If the concept of Negative Economics were to reach the sovereign nations of the world, the planet Earth would be transformed into a different world. A world of warring nations would emerge. Aggressive nations would wage war for the ownership of other nations, with the intent being, to impose Negative Economics upon them in order to steal their national income and their nation's wealth. Negative Economics is a concept that has been designed to enrich governments. Governments acquire wealth by imposing Negative Economics upon their own citizens. And by overthrowing other nations and imposing Negative Economics upon them. The more nations they overthrow, and impose Negative Economics upon, the wealthier they become. Stealing the wealth and financial assets of nations is the undertaking of Negative Economics. The primary objective of the concept of Negative Economics is to establish Negative Economics "Empires", that consist of large numbers of nations that produce income and wealth, on a ongoing basis, for the nation, or group of nations, that implement Negative Economics as a means of acquiring wealth. It is even conceivable that the holders of larger Negative Economics "Empires" would overthrow the holder, or holders, of smaller Negative Economics "Empires" and, in doing so, benefit from the wealth that can be acquired. The appetite for wealth and the yearning for power makes Negative Economics an irresistible compulsion to nations who are willing to consider beginning and controlling a Negative Economics empire.

REV_00259365

The inability of the Defendants to recognize the threat that Negative Economics imposes upon the world of sovereign nations, and the freedom that can be lost, should the practice of implementing Negative Economics become a reality, is an issue for this court to judge. Their unconcern is undermining the safety and well-being of the human race. The Defendants have made no effort to prevent Negative Economics from reaching the sovereign nations of the world. Their attitude is one of complete disregard. They send no messages or signals that indicate their concern for the captured nations of the world who would become economic slaves to the more powerful nations, who would force Negative Economics upon them. The Defendants possess the experience and the knowledge for evaluating the detrimental consequences that a Negative Economics world would produce, yet their belief and conviction that sovereign nations would not be corrupted by the powerful influence that Negative Economics represents, is without foundation. Greed and the appetite for wealth are the characteristics that fuel Negative Economics. Such greed is demonstrated in the United States. In our economic system, only one percent of the population owns all the wealth of the system. Greed and the desire for wealth has flourished in capitalism. Negative Economics offers a larger path for greed to spread and expand its evil wrongdoing. The wealth of a legion of nations, and the potential for "world domination", now lies at the feet of those bold nations who would extract wealth on a gigantic scale, from captured nations who must submit to Negative Economics. Since the Defendants are unwilling to chose a destiny for Negative Economics to take, this court will decide the outcome. The significance and purpose of this litigation is to prevent our planet from becoming a doomed world that consists of Negative Economics empires.

REV_00259366

The Plaintiff had requested that the Defendants provide him with a small government grant for developing his inventions. The Defendants, most of whom, hold positions that grant them the authority to provide government grants. The Defendants have ignored the Plaintiff's request. In exchange for the government grant, the Plaintiff expressed his willingness to forgo his anticipated project of mailing Negative Economics to all the nations of the world. And in doing so, suffer the loss of billions of dollars paid by rouge nations and impoverished nations who would welcome the opportunity to acquire great wealth and power from the implementation of Negative Economics. Negative Economics has a value in excess of ten billion dollars. The Plaintiff feels that his request was not unreasonable. The willingness of the Defendants to prevent Negative Economics from reaching the sovereign nations of the world has not been demonstrated. Thus, the Plaintiff is demanding compensation and relief from the Defendants for his loss for not providing Negative Economics to the nations of the world.

REV_00259367

Attached to this lawsuit is a complete and concise description of Negative Economics. It describes in detail, the methods, the procedures, and the system of Negative Economics, that bold nations could use for stealing the wealth of other nations. The description also explains the precise methods for establishing Negative Economics Empires. The material is marked ("Exhibit A" Negative Economics).

THE VALUE OF NEGATIVE ECONOMICS

In order to determine the approximate loss of the Plaintiff for not providing Negative Economics to the sovereign nations of the world, the following is given.
Negative Economics is compared in monetary value to some of the major corporations in America. For example. If Time\Warner Corporation has a monetary value of 110 billion dollars, as was stated on the television news, then Negative Economics must have a far greater monetary value. Negative Economics has the capability of abstracting the wealth of entire nations, and moving that wealth into the government revenues bank accounts of the nation who controls Negative Economics. Negative Economics is very efficient at abstracting the wealth of a nation. Undeniably, such a concept has a far greater monetary value then any one corporation. Thus, 10 billion dollars is a very small amount in compensation, for the Plaintiff's loss for not marketing Negative Economics to the world. One rouge nation would gladly pay that amount to purchase such a concept.

REV_00259368

THE MONETARY VALUE OF SOME OF AMERICA'S CORPORATIONS, COMPARED TO THE VALUE OF COMPENSATION BEING ASKED FOR NEGATIVE ECONOMICS

NAME OF COMPANY	MARKET VALUE
Negative Economics	- 10 billion dollars
Merrill Lynch	- 37 billion dollars
Dimler\Chrysler	- 54 billion dollars
General Motors	- 57 billion dollars
Ford Motor Co.	- 59 billion dollars
Philip Morris Cos.	- 60 billion dollars
Chase Manhattan Bank	- 61 billion dollars
Wells Fargo	- 73 billion dollars
Nestle	- 73 billion dollars
Dean Witter & Cos.	- 81 billion dollars
Bell Atlantic	- 81 billion dollars
Procter & Gamble	- 88 billion dollars
Bank of America	- 91 billion dollars
Howlett-Packard	- 119 billion dollars
AT & T	- 130 billion dollars
Toyota Motor	- 170 billion dollars
IBM	- 190 billion dollars
Wal-Mart Stores	- 258 billion dollars
Exxon\Mobil	- 290 billion dollars
Microsoft	- 329 billion dollars
General Electric	- 405 billion dollars
Citigroup	- 716 billion dollars

REV_00259369

SUMMATION

The Plaintiff, Mr. Robert Wollner, is the author\inventor of a new concept in economics called, Negative Economics. This new economic concept can produce a world where nations prey upon other nations for the purpose of abstracting their wealth. Negative Economics can withdraw a nation's riches and transfer them to the government revenues bank accounts of the nation who controls Negative Economics. Imagine a world where prosperity is a disadvantage. A world where prosperous nations fall victim to other nations who desire to harvest their wealth. Military power becomes the implement for robbing affluent nations of their riches. The objective of Negative Economics is to establish Negative Economics "empires". Negative Economics "empires" begin and expand. Consuming more and more nations. Bigger, more powerful nations take and control the Negative Economics empires of smaller nations. The world becomes a planet of Negative Economics empires.

The Plaintiff mailed descriptions of Negative Economics to all of the Defendants, and informed the Defendants about the harmful effects that Negative Economics can produce in the world of sovereign nations. The Plaintiff was willing to accept a small government grant for abandoning his project of selling and marketing Negative Economics to all the countries of the world. Once mailed, Negative Economics cannot be retrieved. The nations of the world would not return it. They would use it. A state of panic would arise amongst the peaceful nations of the world, who would fear that they could become the victims of Negative Economics. Their concern that other nations would be expecting to overthrow them, and to steal their wealth, could be realized. The world would be change indefinitely. The system of Negative Economics would continue on into the future, constantly making the world an unsafe place for prosperous nations. Negative Economics is a threat to prosperous nations. Poor nations have no value in the Negative Economics formula. They have no wealth to steal.

REV_00259370

The Defendants were unwilling to recognize the threat that Negative Economics imposed upon a peaceful world. They ignored the Plaintiff's pleas to compensate him with a small sum for not corrupting the world with Negative Economics. Weary of pleading with the Defendants, the Plaintiff has initiated this litigation in order to be compensated. The Plaintiff is asking for compensation from the Defendants who have disregarded the safety and well-being of humanity. This lawsuit is well-founded.

DEMAND

Plaintiff is praying for a judgment, for the following compensation and relief:

$10,000,000,000.00 (Ten Billion Dollars)

Compensation is being sought for the plaintiff's loss for not selling and marketing Negative Economics to the sovereign nations of the world. This is satisfactory compensation for denying an economic concept to rouge nations and impoverished countries who would implement such a concept to enrich themselves.

The judgment prayed for is to be divided up as follows:

George H. Bush	- 4 billion dollars.	($4,000,000,000.00)
Jeb Bush	- 1 billion dollars.	($1,000,000,000.00)
George W. Bush	- 2 billion dollars.	($2,000,000,000.00)
Dick Cheney	- 1 billion dollars.	($1,000,000,000.00)
Colin Powel	- 1 billion dollars.	($1,000,000,000.00)
Donald Rumsfelt	- 1 billion dollars.	($1,000,000,000.00)

Plaintiff has indicated that George H. Bush should bear the biggest obligation should judgment be granted. George H. Bush is the most qualified of the Defendants and has the most experience in foreign affairs. His qualifications include: Director of the CIA, 8 years as Vice President of the United States, and 4 years as President of the United States. The Plaintiff first began his ordeal with Negative Economics by contacting George H. Bush. The Defendant, George H. Bush, has continually ignored the threat that Negative Economics represents to the world. He made no effort to stop Negative Economics from reaching sovereign nations who would implement it with malicious intent.

REV_00259371

Dated this 4th day of April, 2001.

Robert Wollner, Plaintiff

Robert Wollner
5540 W. Glendale Ave., Suite 204
Glendale, Arizona 85301
Telephone 623 939-7745

REV_00259372

EXHIBIT A

Negative Economics

REV_00259373

government could impose a tax on business incomes as high as 50% or 65% of each business's income. This would boost government revenues.

Other Resources That Can Be Utilized To Increase Spending In Spending Programs

Negative Economics is a system that was designed for government revenues production. The greater the amount of Dated Money that can be pumped through the economy, the more profoundly the government benefits. By adding more methods to increase Dated Money spending during spending programs, adds to government revenues intake. Some methods for consideration could be:

Match The Dated Money, Program

Profitable businesses, factories and corporations could be required to "Match" the amount of Dated Money that employees receive in their pay envelope. Or even "Double" the amount. This would increase the amount of Dated Money being spent in the spending program.

Example. Mr. Smith, a production supervisor, normally earns $630.00 a week after tax deductions. This week's pay envelope contained a pay check for $210.00 (1\3rd of his normal pay check) and $420.00 in Dated Money. (2\3rds of his pay check mandated by the government for the spending program). A second envelope contained another $420.00 in Dated Money, with a statement from his employer showing that they had met their obligation under the government mandate to match the Dated Money amount employees receive for the spending program. Mr. Smith now has a total of $840.00 in Dated Money to spend before the spending program expires. The Dated Money may be spent at any business in the country, unless certain types of businesses have been excluded from the spending program. $294.00 will end up in government revenues accounts (35%). $546.00 (65%), the country's businesses will benefit from.

Money Stored In Bank Accounts

Depending on the government. And the country. Banks would provide lists of bank balances over the "Target Balance" amounts. Businesses and individuals who have bigger bank account balances might be relied upon for boosting Dated Money spending in spending programs. They may be required to contribute to the spending program by spending more Dated Money. The strategy is to free up money stored in bank accounts and pump it into the economy so that the economy and the government revenues bank accounts will benefit.

REV_00259382

Example. Mr. Smith, the production supervisor, has $840.00 in Dated Money to spend in the spending program. $420.00 came from his own pay check. An additional $420.00 came from his employer. Because his bank account balance is over the government targeted amount, he will receive from his bank a government mandated, "Dated Money Voucher" that will be good for $150.00 in Dated Money. The $150.00 has already been withdrawn from his bank account and was used to purchase the voucher from the government. The Voucher can be cashed in for Dated Money at any location that has Dated Money available. He now has $990.00 in Dated Money available that him and his family will spend in the spending program. $346.50 will end up in government revenues bank accounts (35%). $643.50 (65%), the country's businesses will benefit from.

Credit Card Indebtedness Program

Other targeted moneys for spending programs could be reviewed as well. Depending on which government is implementing the programs. Credit Cards are another source for generating Dated Money spending in spending programs. Citizens would be required to spend money during spending programs that is taxed onto their credit card and is designated as Dated Money. An amount would be determined for each credit card account. That amount of money would be defined as Dated Money to be used for that spending program. The amount determined would have to be spent with that credit card during the spending program. If not spent by the time the spending program ended, the money is forfeited. The date printed on Dated Money being used for each spending program, is the date the program expires. Any part of the money that remains on the credit card when the spending program expires is credited to the government revenue accounts. The credit card holder is notified that on the date the spending program begins $200 (for example) will be credited to their credit card. When the spending program begins they have until the end of the program to spend the $200. This may be in addition to any other Dated Money they may have received through their employer, or bank if they are self-employed. The $200 will appear on their credit card statement when they receive it. They can make monthly payments on the $200 as they normally do other charges on their credit card.
Example. Mr. Smith, the production supervisor, now has $990.00 in Dated Money to spend in the spending program. $420.00 came from his own pay check. An additional $420.00 came from his employer. $150.00 was mandated by the government from his savings account. Mr. Smith's credit card account has been selected by the government for increasing Dated Money spending in the spending program. He has received notification by Certified Mail that $350.00 in Dated Money credits are available on his credit card for spending during the spending program. That the $350.00 must be spent in its entirety before the spending program expires. Any portion that is remaining on the credit card will be forfeited. Mr. Smith now has $1,340.00 in Dated Money for him and his family to spend during the spending program. $469.00 will end up in government revenues accounts (35%). $871.00 (65%) the country's businesses will benefit from. The Certified Mail letter that Mr. Smith received, also informed him that certain items will not be available for Dated Money spending in this spending program. Food items at the supermarkets and other stores, new or used cars, professional services such as Dentists, Doctors, Hospitals and other medical services, new or used home purchases, and other items are listed that are excluded from the spending program.

REV_00259383

Consumers Assistance Program

The government prints extra Dated Money and sells it to consumers during spending programs. The incentive to purchase the Dated Money is to increase their spending power which helps consumers with inflation.
See chart below.

PURCHASE DATED MONEY FROM THE GOVERNMENT AND INCREASE YOUR SPENDING POWER

AMOUNT PAID IN CASH	DATED MONEY AMOUNT YOU RECEIVE
$10.00	$12.00
$15.00	$18.00
$20.00	$25.00
$40.00	$54.00
$60.00	$78.00
$100.00	$135.00

Example. Mr. Smith, the production supervisor, and his family, decide to purchase $300.00 in Dated Money from the government. This gives them $405.00 additional in Dated Money to spend. They now have $1,745.00 in Dated Money to spend in the spending program. Mr. Smith supports a wife and three children who are overjoyed about the spending they will do during the spending program. The $420.00 in Dated Money that Mr. Smith received from his employer, through the government mandated program will help them out considerably.

REV_00259384

Who Benefits From All The Spending

The government benefits with increased revenues. The nation's businesses benefit from increased sales and income. The economy benefits from increased employment and business activity.

MAKING CHANGE

Making change for purchases made with Dated Money at businesses during the Spending Programs. When consumers receive their Dated Money, businesses would not have change to give for purchases made with Dated Money. The government does not provide businesses with Dated Money for the purpose of making change. That would require to much Dated Money to be printed for the Spending Program. As cash registers in businesses fill up with Dated Money from purchases, that money would be used for giving change.
Example. SHOWN IN U.S. DOLLARS

No Dated Money In Cash Register Yet
A $3.00 purchase is made. $5.00 is given to the cashier in Dated Money. Change given back is $2.00 in cash.

With Dated Money In Cash Register
A $3.00 purchase is made. $5.00 is given to the cashier in Dated Money. Change given back is $2.00 in Dated Money.

No coins such as nickels, dimes, quarters, are made for Consumer Spending Programs. If the change is $3.75, the customer gets $3.00 in Dated Money and 75¢ in normal change.

REV_00259385

A MARRIED COUPLE GET A SURPRISE

It's Friday night and workers everywhere are opening their pay envelops. OH, NO. Say the married couple. It's mostly all Dated Money. We didn't plan on going out this weekend, they say. The couple now has to decide if they want to forfeit their Dated Money. Or head out to the businesses and shopping areas and spend. Spend it or lose it, is their motto. Might as well spend, they say. 35% of what is being spent goes into the government's revenues bank accounts. Besides spending Dated Money during the program, many people will run out of Dated Money and keep on spending when they find things they need. This helps to increase economic productivity.

Negative Economics Can Be Expanded To Other Countries (optional) (May be used by some countries)

One of the benefits that Negative Economics offers is that it can be expanded to other countries.
The first consideration is to decide which nations are the best candidates for expanding Negative Economics to.

Evaluating A Country's Potential For Negative Economics

In considering which countries are good candidates for expanding Negative Economics to, the economic productivity of nations is appraised. The chart on the next page gives information for Gross Domestic Product and Income Per Capita figures for ten simulated countries. They are being used for an example and are not the figures of any country.

REV_00259386

Country	Gross Domestic Product	Income Per Capita
Country A	$4.15 Trillion	$3,260 a year
Country B	$674 Billion	$5,700 a year
Country C	$4.08 Trillion	$22,000 a year
Country D	$302 Billion	$5,200 a year
Country E	$690.2 Billion	$16,700 a year
Country F	$20.4 Billion	$900 a year
Country G	$6.031 Trillion	$32,600 a year
Country H	$264 Billion	$2,200 a year
Country I	$4.6 Billion	$3,200 a year
Country J	$50 Billion	$3,000 a year

On the chart shown above, the Gross Domestic Product figures can be used for determining a nation's economic productivity. The Gross Domestic Product figures can be used to help estimate the income that Negative Economics might provide if expanded to that nation.

Gross Domestic Product Figures

Country A $4.15 Trillion
Country B $674 Billion
Country C $4.08 Trillion
Country D $302 Billion
Country E $690.2 Billion
Country F $20.4 Billion
Country G $6.031 Trillion
Country H $264 Billion
Country I $4.6 Billion
Country J $50 Billion

In reviewing the Gross Domestic Product figures above we can make some comparisons.

Country C has a large Gross Domestic Product. $4.08 trillion a year. This indicates that it is a good candidate for expanding Negative Economics to.
Country C $4.08 Trillion

REV_00259387

Country E generates twice as much wealth as Country D. Country E is the better choice for expanding Negative Economics to.

Country D $302 Billion

Country E $631.2 Billion

Between Countries H, I and J. Country H is the best choice for expanding Negative Economics to. It has a Gross Domestic Product of $264 billion. Country I is hardly worth bothering with. It only has a Gross Domestic Product figure of $4.6 billion.

Country H $264 Billion

Country I $4.6 Billion

Country J $50 Billion

In comparing Country E and Country F. Country F has such a small Gross Domestic Product that it is a poor choice for expanding Negative Economics to.

Country E $631.2 Billion

Country F $20.4 Billion

Another comparison is that of Country B and Country E. Both countries have about the same Gross Domestic Product figures. Country B is a country with only 45 million people. Country E has 200 million people. The country with the smaller population is the better choice for Negative Economics. It generates more wealth with fewer people.

Country B $674 Billion 45 million people

Country E $690.2 Billion 200 million people

Country G has by far the highest Gross Domestic Product figure.
It is the best choice for expanding Negatives Economics to.

Country G $6.031 Trillion

The Gross Domestic Product a nation produces tells how much wealth it generates. For example, compare Example A, with a Gross Domestic Product of 7.9 billion, to Example B, with a Gross Domestic Product of 4.03 Trillion. If your income from Negative Economics consists of 25% of each business's income, (or whatever percentage amount is decided), in an entire country, which country will have businesses that earn higher incomes, Example A or Example B. Example

REV_00259388

B's Gross Domestic Product is so small that it hardly pays to bother with it. By selecting countries with higher Gross Domestic Product amounts means more wealth can be obtained.

The next consideration is Income Per Capita. This discloses the average income that people earn in a country. These figures are important because Consumer Spending Programs pump money into an economy that ends up in government revenues bank accounts. The higher the incomes that people earn in a country, the more money that can be pumped into the economy on a regular basis.

Income Per Capita Figures (The amount of money people earn per year on a national average)

Country A	$3,260 a year	– Low
Country B	$5,700 a year	– Low
Country C	$22,000 a year	– Very High
Country D	$5,200 a year	– Low
Country E	$16,700 a year	– High
Country F	$900 a year	– Lowest
Country G	$32,600 a year	– Very High
Country H	$2,200 a year	– Low
Country I	$3,200 a year	– Low
Country J	$3,000 a year	– Low

The Income Per Capita figures shown above designate which countries are the more promising choices for expanding Negative Economics to. The more money people earn in a country, the greater the amount that can be pumped into the economy during Dated Money spending programs. A percentage of the money is channeled to government revenues bank accounts. Example: People in Country F earn only $900 a year. People in Country C earn $22,000 a year.

Income from Negative Economics is generated by implementing Consumer Spending Programs in countries that Negative Economics has been expanded to. Dated Money is used as a tool for creating intense consumer spending. Intense consumer spending results in increased business incomes. The Negative Economics income during Dated Money spending programs is a 35% tax (or whatever amount is decided upon) of each business's income. Each business will deposit 35% of their income earned from the spending program into their government Treasure Chest account at their bank. The money goes directly into government revenues bank accounts. The higher the incomes that people earn in a country, the more money that can be pumped into the economy. Much of which will end up in government revenues accounts. The money is collected by banks in each country. Banks receive deposits from local businesses which is deposited into their government Treasure Chest account. The money is then transferred by "electronic bank money transfers" to banks in the country that controls Negative Economics. The Internet can be used to keep track of business incomes in countries where Negative Economics is present. Accounting technicians would sit in front of computers and analyze business incomes from Negative Economics governed nations. The Government Treasure Chest checking account that each business entity maintains is the tool for collecting money from businesses. Banks make regular electronic money transfers so that the cash keeps flowing out of the country and into the governing country's bank accounts. When the Income Per Capita figures are low for a country, less Negative Economics income is possible from Consumer Spending Programs. How much money can be pumped into an economy when people only earn $2000 or $3000 a year. Very little.

REV_00259389

How To Begin And Expand A Negative Economics Empire

The first requirement is to purchase the rights to use Negative Economics from the owner, Robert Wollner. The second step is to decide which countries are worth expanding Negative Economics to. Perhaps neighboring countries are more convenient because they are closer and easier to access.

In order to impose Negative Economics upon a country, it is necessary to capture the country through military engagement. Military conflicts are common in the world today. Selecting weaker, yet economically healthy nations is beneficial. Once captured, the nation will continue to produce income for your government indefinitely. While capturing a nation is not such a pleasant act, the wealth that can be obtained makes it a potential consideration. The more nations that are captured, the greater the wealth that is obtained. After a nation has been captured, then Negative Economics begins. All the businesses, factories, corporations and so forth, in the captured country are informed that they are now required to open, and make regular bank deposits into, a second checking account at the bank where they do business. This is the ruling government's Treasure Chest account. The Treasure Chest, as it is called, is the channel through which revenues pass to reach the ruling government's bank accounts. At first the amounts businesses must deposit into their Treasure Chest account is small. So small that few businesses complain. This gets them acquainted with the process of depositing moneys into the Treasure Chest account. As the amounts increase, businesses are informed that, while their business income is shared with the Treasure Chest bank account, the ruling government will be implementing consumer spending programs on a regular basis that will generate increased spending in the economy. The result will be increased business activity. Business incomes will rise nationally. As the spending programs are implemented, the tax mandated for the government Treasure Chest program increases to reach 50% of the income of each business, factory, corporation and so forth in the entire country. This money passes through the Treasure Chest bank accounts and is transferred via bank money transfers into the government bank accounts in the ruling country. This money keeps piling up. The ruling country's government then informs the businesses in the captured nation that there are costs involved in running the spending programs. And that each business, factory, corporation etc. will help to shoulder the cost by paying their fair share. Before long the ruling government is getting 60% of the spending during spending programs, as well as 50% of business incomes during normal times. Other programs are implemented, such as targeting larger bank accounts of individuals and businesses, mandating employers to double and triple the Dated Money amounts that employees receive, charging up people's credit card accounts, and so forth. Before long the national income and the wealth of the captured nation is moved over to the ruling government's bank accounts. Such wealth supports an ever increasing military force that captures more nations to impose Negative Economics upon them, and for military forces that are maintained in captured nations. As the empire grows larger, the inventor of the concept, Robert Wollner, claims more riches for himself. Everyone benefits except the captured nations who work and toil with few rewards because the wealth of their nation keeps disappearing.

REV_00259390

REV_00259391

NEGATIVE ECONOMICS

A New System of Economics Designed for Government Revenues Enrichment.

COPYRIGHT © 2000 by Robert Wollner

Robert Wollner
5540 W. Glendale Ave, Suite 204
Glendale, Arizona 85301
Telephone 623 939-7745
United States of America

REV_00259374

Negative Economics Coalitions And Alliances

By combining forces with other nations, Negative Economics coalitions can achieve greater wealth. Many nations working together can establish large empires by working together as partners in Negative Economics.

Expanding The Vast Network Of Wealth

New nations can be added to the Negative Economics empire regularly when coalitions and alliances combine their military forces. Vast wealth can be achieved rapidly and easily.

The Basic Rules Of Negative Economics

Negative Economics is a concept that was designed for channeling money into government revenues bank accounts. A nation's businesses are essential for abstracting money that a nation possess. Business incomes are easy to tax and funnel into government revenues bank accounts. A checking account concept referred to as the Treasure Chest account is used to collect the money. If businesses had to be relied upon to mail the money, the system would be less reliable. During normal times each business is required to deposit a percentage of their weekly income into their government Treasure Chest account. This provides the government with constant revenues. When the government needs to acquire additional revenues consumer spending programs are implemented. Dated Money is used to generate consumer spending. Consumer spending programs boost business incomes. Money flows into government revenues bank accounts when consumer spending programs are implemented. A percentage of the income businesses earn during spending programs is deposited into their government Treasure Chest bank account. This goes directly to the government. Other resources a nation has can be utilized for boosting Dated Money spending during spending programs. Employee wages, business monetary assets, funds in bank accounts, and credit card accounts are some examples. The more Dated Money that is spent in spending programs, the greater the government benefits. By consuming other nations and forcing Negative Economics upon them, adds to the wealth that a nation can achieve. As more and more nations are consumed, through military superiority, those nations become contributors to the abundant riches that a nation who controls Negative Economics can attain. Imposing Negative Economics on other nations, affords the dominating nation the opportunity to abstract the wealth of their nation on an ongoing basis. The businesses in those countries are required to deposit a percentage of their weekly income into the Treasure Chest checking account at their bank. Implementing consumer spending programs boosts business incomes which channels greater amounts of money through the Treasure Chest accounts to the ruling nation's banks. Such vast wealth acquired continuously and relentlessly, contributes to an ever increasing military force that dominates nations for the productive endeavor of utilizing Negative Economics as a tool for achieving great and abounding wealth. Negative Economics does not impose enslavement or tyranny upon a nation, it simply abstracts its wealth. While it is difficult to capture a nation, once captured it continues to provide revenues. Looking for weaknesses in leadership, a reduction in military capabilities, economic distress, loss of friendship with other nations, etc. pays off in acquiring nations for Negative Economics.

REV_00259392

Dated Money Programs In Captured Countries.

Low Incomes In A Country Reduces Dated Money Spending During Spending Programs.

When the Income Per Capita of a country is low, additional methods are needed in order to increase the amount of money that will be pumped into the economy. If the bulk of the money being spent in the consumer spending program consists of employee's wages, and the weekly income of employees in a country is small, the government revenues yield from the spending program will be reduced. In order to increase the Dated Money amounts that will be spent in the spending program, additional sources can be utilized to boost spending during the program. Other financial resources a nation owns can be pumped into the economy so that increased revenues are gained for government revenues accounts. No assets are exempt in the Negative Economics formula. Worker's wages, business and personal checking and savings accounts, business financial assets, credit card accounts, are just some of the many sources the government can regard as obtainable resources in Negative Economics. Some examples are given:

REV_00259393

Match The Dated Money Program

Businesses, factories, corporations, etc., will match the amount of Dated Money that employees receive in their pay envelope. Or even "Double" the amount. This will increase the amount of money being spent in the program.

Money Stored In Bank Accounts

Business bank accounts and personal bank accounts are considered for examination. Banks will provide lists of bank balances over the "Target Balance" amounts. Businesses and individuals who have bigger bank account balances may be relied upon for boosting Dated Money amounts in spending programs. The objective is to move the wealth of the nation into government revenues accounts. This is the purpose of Negative Economics. The wealth of the government is more significant then the wealth of its citizens. The idea is to free up money stored in bank accounts and pump it through the economy so that government revenues accounts will benefit.

Credit Card Indebtedness Program

Credit Cards are another source for boosting Dated Money spending. Citizens would be required to spend money during spending programs that is charged on their credit card and designated as Dated Money. This has already been explained on page 8.

Dated Money Giveaway Program

The government intentionally executes an overprinting of Dated Money with the intention of giving it to special government employees and government officials and their families as a reward for their faithful service to the government. The overprint of Dated Money is spent during the spending program and much of it ends up in government revenues accounts.

Government Credits Program

The program is designed to extend loans to people who need to buy things they can't afford. The loan is given to them in Dated Money when consumer spending programs occur. The money is paid back to the government by low weekly payments removed from their pay check by their employer and mailed to the government.

REV_00259394

Employee Bonus Program

The program encourages businesses to give bonuses to their employees in Dated Money. The Dated Money is spent in the economy and is good for the nation's businesses. And adds to the government revenues stockpile of wealth.

Bank Loans Program

This program encourages banks to loan money to people that is paid to them in Dated Money that can be spent in consumer spending programs.

Printing Billions In Dated Money And Sell It To The Public

This program is a method for turning printed money into cash. The public is encouraged to increase their spending power by purchasing Dated Money. In ruled countries this is effective for turning printed paper into cash. The ruling government prints the Dated Money themselves. This gives them control over its use.

PURCHASE DATED MONEY FROM THE GOVERNMENT AND INCREASE YOUR SPENDING POWER

AMOUNT PAID IN CASH	DATED MONEY AMOUNT YOU RECEIVE
$10.00	$12.00
$15.00	$18.00
$20.00	$25.00
$40.00	$54.00
$60.00	$78.00
$100.00	$135.00

Buying Merchandise With Dated Money, Program

Dated Money that the ruling government prints is used by their "Team Buyers" to purchase tons of merchandise in the captive country. The merchandise is warehoused, and then sold back to the merchants for the next spending program, at a 100% profit.

These and other ideas, no matter how trivial they might sound, could boost government revenues accounts. All the ideas that can be invented add up to more Dated Money being spent in spending programs.

REV_00259395

How Negative Economics Develops From Peaceful Beginnings

The country of Russia is being used for this example model. The Russian government and its embassies around the world receive a description of Negative Economics. In the earliest review of Negative Economics the Russian government rejects the concept. More copies of Negative Economics reach the Russian government and its embassies as the months go by. As winter approaches the Kremlin decides that the concept of Negative Economics contains definite parts of the plan that could contribute to an improved Russian economy. Russia's winters are long, and extremely cold climate is the explanation for a slowed down economy. Russian consumers are not active during the colder months and business activity is reduced. Reduced business activity during the long Russian winters is devastating to the economy. Government revenues are reduced and national business profits suffer. The concept of Negative Economics offers a consumer spending plan that utilizes Dated Money to generate consumer spending. Consumers are compelled to shop and spend money because of Dated Money that expires. If not spent, the Dated Money expires and becomes worthless. The Russian government decides that Dated Money spending programs could increase consumer spending during the long winter season. Another part of the Negative Economics plan the Russian government finds desirable is the "Match the Dated Money" program. In this concept Russian businesses would be required to match the Dated Money that workers receive in their pay envelope. This would force businesses in Russia to put back into the economy some of the money they withdraw from the economy and store in their bank accounts. For the free enterprise system to work, money must constantly flow through the system. Worker's wages are often not sufficient to produce an ample flow of money through the system. The Match the Dated Money program in Russia would provide enhanced spending capabilities for consumers who contribute to the economic well-being of the system. Economists worldwide have concluded that consumer spending is 70% of the free market system.

The Russian Foreign Minister makes arrangements with the inventor of Negative Economics to meet at the Russian Embassy in Washington D.C.. The deal is consummated and Russia begins their new winter economic improvement program. Russian businesses are overjoyed about the increased consumer spending in the Russian economy. The economy benefits from the spending and the economy grows. Economic expansion, increased employment, and the beginning of new industries in Russia is the result of the increase in consumer spending. The Kremlin decides that the Dated Money spending programs are costly to the government and are becoming a burden on the government. Dated Money has to be constantly printed and the programs have to be administered. They decide to charge a tax to businesses in Russia who benefit from the spending programs. They mandate that all businesses in Russia will open a second checking account at their bank for depositing taxes into that are related to the Dated Money spending programs. Money deposited into these accounts will go directly into Russian government revenues bank accounts. At first the amounts businesses are required to deposit are low. As the tax is increased each business in Russia is required to deposit 25% of their business income into the government's bank account. The second bank account businesses maintain might be called the "Dated Money Spending Program" tax account. Even thought businesses are required to make deposits on a weekly bases weather spending programs are implemented that week, or not. The government then increases the tax that businesses must pay to 45% of their business income during the Dated Money spending programs. The Kremlin discovers that new wealth is reaching their revenues bank accounts. Instead of burdening the Russian businesses with additional increased taxes, the Kremlin decides to add more businesses to the formula that will contribute to the Russian government revenues accounts. In order to increase the number of businesses that contribute to the Russian government's wealth, other countries are considered for the Dated Money spending programs agenda. The Kremlin informs the countries of Ukraine, Kazakhstan, Belarus, Estonia, Lithuania, Moluova, Romania and Bulgaria about the remarkable Dated Money spending programs that have produced such incredible results in Russia's economy. That Russia wants to assist them with their economy so that they also will benefit from this remarkable new economic wonder. Eager to improve their economy, they agree to a trial period. The Kremlin's plan works. The businesses in these countries are soon paying 25% of their business income during normal times, and 45% of their business income during Dated Money spending programs. This money is deposited into the second bank account that businesses must maintain at their bank. The money is transferred to Russian government revenues bank accounts in Russia, via electronic money transfers by the many banks in those countries that collect the money. Russia's greed is now beyond hope. More nations must be added the Kremlin says. The Russian president, Mr. Putin, meets with the president of China and North Korea and informs them that easy money is to be made with Negative Economics. And that prosperous nations have wealth to plunder. Japan, Great Britain, France, Germany, the United States, Canada and others are looked upon as potential revenue providers for the Russia\China\North Korea Coalition.

REV_00259396

REV_00259397

But then, the Federal Judge who is adjudicating this case is to responsible to permit Negative Economics to reach these countries. He points his finger at the Defendants and says: Judgment For Plaintiff, for the amount stated in the complaint. END OF STORY

Contact the inventor of Negative Economics to purchase exclusive rights to use Negative Economics in your country. Or begin Negative Economics empires. International copyright laws protect this material from unauthorized use.

COPYRIGHT © 2000 by Robert Wollner

THE END

To purchase the rights to use Negative Economics in your country, or to begin Negative Economics empires that generate enormous wealth, contact the owner\inventor of Negative Economics below.

COPYRIGHT © 2000 by Robert Wollner

Robert Wollner
5540 W. Glendale Ave, Suite 204
Glendale, Arizona 85301
Telephone 623 939-7745
United States of America

REV_00259398

WHAT IS NEGATIVE ECONOMICS

Negative Economics is a new system that has been designed for government revenues enrichment. Negative Economics is designed to produce income at the government level. A prosperous government is the goal of Negative Economics. Because Negative Economics can be extended to other countries, additional revenues can be acquired by countries that implement Negative Economics. Negative Economics is a comprehensive blueprint for systematic approaches to broadening government wealth by utilizing techniques that are at the forefront of economic ingenuity. New principles in economics elevate government wealth by manipulating economic factors in an economy that control economic functions. Wealth and revenues are produced at the government level.

THE SYSTEM OF NEGATIVE ECONOMICS

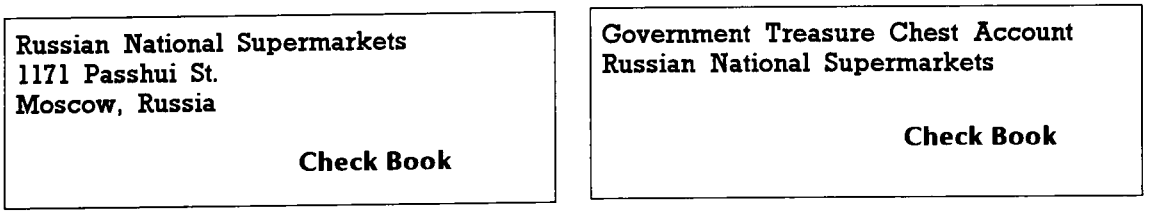
COPYRIGHT © 2000 by Robert Wollner

The Needed Elements That Are Essential For Negative Economics To Work Are As Follows:

1. Businesses That Earn A Profit.

2. Consumers That Spend Money.

3. An Economic Pump That Pumps Money Through An Economy.



Businesses That Earn A Profit

A country's businesses are an essential element in the Negative Economics system. For Negative Economics to function, a system is needed for withdrawing from an economy, money that will contribute to government revenues enrichment. A country's businesses are the instrument that serve the purpose of withdrawing revenues from an economy. Each business in a country that utilizes Negative Economics, supports a "Government Treasure Chest". The enrichment of government revenues is the goal that Negative Economics was designed to achieve.

REV_00259376

The Government Treasure Chest Program

In countries that utilize Negative Economics for the purpose of government revenues enrichment, all the businesses are required by law to participate in the Government Treasure Chest program. The program requires that every business enterprise well have two checking accounts for their business. One checking account is for their regular business checking. The other checking account is for the Government Treasure Chest program. Example below.

The business checking account is for regular business deposits. The Government Treasure Chest account is for deposits mandated by the government for the Treasure Chest program. The monies deposited into the Government Treasure Chest account goes directly into the government revenues accounts. The checking account concept is used because the money goes immediately into government bank accounts. If businesses have to be relied upon to mail the money, the system becomes less reliable.

An Economic Pump

An economic pump has been designed for pumping money through a country's economy. A portion of the money will be channeled into government revenues bank accounts.

The Economic Pump In Action --- It Works Good

This "Consumer Spending Program" model is being used to demonstrate how money can be pumped through a country's economy and can be channeled into government revenues bank accounts.

REV_00259377

How The Program Works

The government has decided that the economic pump will be utilized to pump money into the economy.

The money will come from various sources. The objective of the program is to create increased consumer spending and heightened business activity. Increased economic activity will boost business incomes. As previously stated, a country's businesses are the instrument that serve the purpose of withdrawing revenues from an economy. The Government Treasure Chest program is utilized for channeling revenues into government revenues bank accounts. It will now be demonstrated how this works.

EMPLOYEE WAGES

One of the sources for pumping money into an economy is employee wages. In this consumer spending program model the government has mandated that 2\3rds of each employee's pay check that they receive for one week will be pumped into the economy. All employees in the country will participate in the program.

On Friday night when working people get their pay checks there will be two (2) different items in their pay check envelope. One item will be their pay check for 1\3 of the normal amount they receive. The other 2\3rds of their pay check will consist of Dated Money. Example. An employee earns $300.00 a week. $200.00 will be Dated Money. $100.00 will be a company pay check. Dated Money is currency that has been printed by the government for the spending program. The Dated Money looks like regular currency printed in a different color. A large DATE is printed on the money in a large colorful box that is quite visible. The color of the Dated Money can be changed each time there is a Spending Program. The workers\employees inspect their Dated Money to see when the date expires. The date printed on the Dated Money is the following Monday. This indicates that the Dated Money will expire on Sunday at midnight. The country's citizens will have Friday night, Saturday and Sunday until midnight to spend the Dated Money. Monday morning the Dated Money is worthless. Might as well throw it in the trash. Any Dated Money that is not spent is lost. The government could determine any period of time to spend the Dated Money. A weekend, a week, 2 weeks, or whatever is decided.

REV_00259378

People who are self-employed, own a business, are retired, and so forth, will pick up their Dated Money at their bank. Or arrangements can be made for their bank to mail it to them. Everyone in the country, if it is a national spending program, will have Dated Money to spend. The government will decide how far-reaching the program will be. The program could embody the entire country, a section of the country, a city or cities, or whatever they decide. The government will decide how much Dated Money people will be required to spend. The amount could be based on their income, their total wealth, their job, occupation or profession, or whatever method they decide. The government might charge a fee for the Dated Money which would be paid either by the employee or by the employer. This is to cover the cost of printing and distributing the Dated Money. If the employee pays the fee, there would be less Dated Money in the pay envelope. Example. Instead of receiving $200.00 in Dated Money, the Dated Money amount would be $192.00.

The Program Starts

Some citizens will begin spending their Dated Money as quickly as possible because they know that those who shop later will find that store merchandise stocks can become depleted from massive consumer spending. The early shoppers will have the better choices before stocks begin to deplete. The country's manufactures, distributors and retailers have prepared for the program by overstocking stores with merchandise for the crowds of shoppers who will be looking for things to buy with their Dated Money. The police, fire department and volunteers will be available to assist with the traffic problem that will exist when consumers take to the streets in pursuit of their spending spree.

The Government Treasure Chest Program

Negative Economics is a system that has been designed to promote government revenues enrichment. A nation's businesses are an essential part of the system because they deposit money into government revenues accounts, designated as the Government Treasure Chest bank account.

REV_00259379

In the consumer spending program model example that is being demonstrated here, the government mandated tax that businesses will pay for the Government Treasure Chest program is: 25% of their business income during normal times. 35% of their business income during Date Money spending programs. During normal times each business, factory, corporation, etc. in the country will deposit 25% of their income on a weekly basis, into their Government Treasure Chest account at their bank. When spending programs occur, because there are costs related to the programs, such as the printing of Dated Money, administering the program, etc., each business will deposit 35% of their business income into their Government Treasure Chest account at their bank. At the conclusion of each spending program these deposits are made. Money will be pumped into the economy, and will be spent at the nation's businesses. 35% of the money will reach the government's revenues accounts. Since the government decides how much Dated Money people will be required to spend, and what percentage of their income businesses will be required to deposit into their Government Treasure Chest account at their bank, the government can regulate its revenues growth.

Inflation During The Spending Programs

The 35% Government Treasure Chest tax mandated to businesses during spending programs could be reflected in an increase in prices that consumers pay. Because of inflation during spending programs (businesses increasing prices to cover the 35% tax) the buying power of consumers could be reduced. Dated Money doesn't buy much in these spending programs", consumers might complain. Prices are just to high, they might say. Inflated prices on consumer goods and services during the spending programs drives up business incomes, which means more money for the government. These spending programs generate consumer spending in an economy. Increased spending in the economy is good for businesses who profit from such spending programs. While 25% or 35% of a business's income, (the Government Treasure Chest program) is a lot of taxation, usually such taxes are passed on to consumers who pay higher prices. Higher prices (inflation) can result in reduced consumer spending in an economy. Economies that operate with inflation are flawed and can result in a slowed down economy. Factories produce less, retailers sell less, consumers buy less, because of inflation. Consumer spending can be increased in an economy by utilizing these spending programs which will defeat inflation by creating volume sales. The programs result in consumers who must go out to spend, because of Dated Money that will expire. The money is forfeited if not spent.

REV_00259380

How effective was the Consumer Spending Program.

It is Monday morning and the spending program has ended. The country's banks are getting all the expired Dated Money ready to be returned to the government. The country's businesses are making their bank deposits. The banks are ensuring that bank deposits are being made in both of the checking accounts that businesses must maintain. The business's regular checking account and the Government Treasure Chest account. Both deposits are made at the same time. 65% of the total deposit is deposited into the business account. 35% is deposited into the Government's Treasure Chest account. All of the country's businesses will make these 65% - 35% bank deposits at the conclusion of each spending program. Banks and government employees may be verifying each business's cash register receipts which show a record of business sales and income during the spending program. The effect of the program is being analyzed by the program administrators. They are deciding if the consumer spending program had the effect on the government revenues accounts that they had hoped for. And that the government received ample financial resources from the spending program that contributed to the government's stockpile of wealth. The government can regulate their revenues income, by governing the amounts that employees spend in Dated Money, and by controlling the tax that businesses pay into their Treasure Chest checking account. The purpose of the spending programs is to pump money through the economy that ends up in government revenues accounts. Normally 25% of each business's income is deposited into the Government Treasure Chest account at their bank on a weekly basis. (used as an example for this spending program model). During spending programs the amount is increased to 35% of a business's income. Because the government decides how much Dated Money citizens must spend, and the amount of tax businesses will pay during the spending program, the government can pump as much money into the economy as they desire, and regulate how much of the money will end up in their revenues bank accounts. During certain selected Dated Money spending programs, the

REV_00259381

THE WHITE HOUSE
CORRESPONDENCE TRACKING WORKSHEET

DATE RECEIVED: 5/14/01

NAME OF CORRESPONDENT: Robert Wollner

SUBJECT: vs. POTUS

ROUTE TO: OFFICE/AGENCY	(STAFF NAME)	ACTION CODE	ACTION DATE M/D/YR	DISPOSITION TYPE RESP	DISPOSITION C D	DISPOSITION COMPLETED M/D/YR
	CUGONZ	A	5/14/01		C
	Brett	A

ACTION COMMENTS:

ACTION COMMENTS:

ACTION COMMENTS:

ACTION COMMENTS:

COMMENTS:

ADDITIONAL CORRESPONDENTS: MEDIA:

14 Counsel

Defendant,

George W. Bush

Robert Wollner
5540 W. Glendale Ave., Suite 204
Glendale, Arizona 85301
Telephone 623 939-7745

FILED LODGED
RECEIVED COPY
APR 3 0 2001
CLERK U S DISTRICT COURT
DISTRICT OF ARIZONA
BY DEPUTY

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

DISTRICT OF ARIZONA

Robert Wollner,

Plaintiff,

- VS. -

Defendants,

George H. Bush
Jeb Bush
George W. Bush
Dick Cheney
Colin Powel
Donald Rumsfeld

George H. Bush
10000 Memorial Dr., Suite 900
Houston, TX 77024-3422

Jeb Bush
State of Florida, The Capitol
Tallahassee, Florida 32399-0001

George W. Bush
1600 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dick Cheney
1600 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20500

Colin Powel
2201 C Street N.W.
Washington D.C. 20520

Donald Rumsfeld
The Pentagon
Washington D.C. 20301-1155

Case Number

CIV '01 0602PHX EHC

MOTION

REQUEST FOR DEFAULT JUDGMENT

FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE
RULE 55. DEFAULT

REV_00259401

REQUEST FOR DEFAULT JUDGMENT

The Plaintiff in this action does herewith inform the court that the defendants have willfully and deliberately defaulted. The Defendants have failed to plead, answer or otherwise defend the claim against them. Proof of service has been effected in accordance with F.R.C.P. Rule 4. No answer or effort to respond to the Complaint is evident. The Defendants have declined to acknowledge the Plaintiff's declaration in asserting his claim for relief. And in doing so, Defendants have compromised the invitation to defend this action. Plaintiff believes that Defendants have no intention of acknowledging this civil action. Their defiance to this lawsuit is basis for a default judgment. The Plaintiff believes that the Defendants deem themselves exempt from such a proceeding. That they will pursue no Defense other then to insist that they be excused because of their standing in public office. That they be granted the privilege to adjourn this case and suspend court procedures predicated upon their conviction that public office affords one the right to exemption from public regulations and that government administrations are not subject to judicial civil processes. The foundation for this lawsuit is seated in the premise that public officials have ignored a concept that is detrimental to the prosperous nations of the world. That their inappropriate behavior has endangered the continued freedom of the United States, and other countries could undergo a loss of freedom because of their actions. Exhibit A, Negative Economics has recently been rewritten and upgraded and is now more potent and more deadly then before. Negative Economics is a threat to the world. This can be proven in court through testimony from competent professionals who possess knowledge of the ruthlessness of sovereign nations who would stop at no end to implement Negative Economics in order to acquire great wealth. The Defendants have sanctioned such a ruthless course of action by disregarding all possibilities that any nation would undertake a concept such as Negative Economics. This is an issue that is of importance to the courts, the American people and the Congress. While this lawsuit is an annoyance to the Defendants it is in the public's interest.

The Plaintiff appeals to the court to enter judgment against Defendants who are in default under federal statutes. The Defendants will not defend this lawsuit and legal remedy should be undertaken.

All of the Defendants received a Summons which states that an answer to the Complaint must be served upon the Plaintiff and the court within the stated time period or judgment by default will be taken against Defendants for the relief demanded in the Complaint. The time has expired and no answer has been dispatched. Plaintiff believes that Defendants have contempt for this lawsuit and deem themselves exempt from this proceeding. Plaintiff has mailed a copy of this Motion and Request for Default Judgment to all of the Defendants. At the court's discretion please enter Default Judgment when appropriate.

Dated this 30th day of April, 2001.

Robert Wollner, Plaintiff

Robert Wollner
5540 W. Glendale Ave., Suite 204
Glendale, Arizona 85301
Telephone 623 939-7745

THE WHITE HOUSE
CORRESPONDENCE TRACKING WORKSHEET

DATE RECEIVED: 7/25/01

NAME OF CORRESPONDENT: Roger L. Shoffstall

SUBJECT: Shoffstall v. POTUS

ROUTE TO: OFFICE/AGENCY	(STAFF NAME)	ACTION CODE	ACTION DATE M/D/YR	DISPOSITION TYPE RESP	DISPOSITION C D	DISPOSITION COMPLETED M/D/YR
	CUGONZ	A	7/25/01		C
	ACTION COMMENTS:
	Brett	A				__/__/__
	ACTION COMMENTS:
			__/__/__			__/__/__
	ACTION COMMENTS:
			__/__/__			__/__/__
	ACTION COMMENTS:

COMMENTS: file in litigation file
Brett Kavanaugh

ADDITIONAL CORRESPONDENTS: MEDIA:

REV_00259404

12-R Counsel's Office

JUN 20 2001

134620

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,

Petitioner / Plaintiff,

vs.

The presiding PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, George Bush,

Respondent / Defendant.

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

MOTION FOR EX PARTE ORDER GRANTING

"EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT"

COMES NOW the Petitioner / Plaintiff, ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL, by and through himself, appearing In propria persona, and hereby moves, COMMANDS and ORDERS this Court to issue Ex Parte Order that grants Ex Parte Summary Judgment to the Petitioner / Plaintiff, Roger L. Shoffstall, in this matter.

WHEREFOR, the PREPONDERANCE of the EVIDENCE which is substantial proves BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT that Petitioner / Plaintiff is entitled to enjoy the issuance of this Motion.

RESPECTFULLY Submitted at Fairbanks, Alaska this 14th day of June, 2001.

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL

Roger L. Shoffstall
P.O. Box 70689
Fairbanks, Alaska 99707
In propria persona

REV_00259405

I certify that on 6/14/2001
the original copy of this Motion was sent to:

Presiding Judge of the Superior Court of Alaska
Fourth Judicial District
604 Barnette Street
Fairbanks, Alaska 99701;

And that true and full copies of the above Motion were sent
to:

William Rehnquist
Chief Justice
U.S. Supreme Court
One First Street, NE
Washington, D.C. 20543;

George Bush
The presiding President of the United States
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, D.C. 20500;

as shown by affidavit;

By: _____
ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL.

REV_00259406

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,

Petitioner / Plaintiff,

vs.

The presiding PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, George Bush,

Respondent / Defendant.

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

EX PARTE ORDER GRANTING

EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT

GOOD CAUSE APPEARING and the Petitioner / Plaintiff having made proper Motion and the Court being advised in the Premises:

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED, AND DECREED that the U.S. Supreme Court shall immediately issue and execute "EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT" under this matter - in favor of and on behalf of Petitioner / Plaintiff, Roger L. Shoffstall.

IT IS HEREBY FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED, AND DECREED that the U.S. Supreme Court shall immediately issue and execute "EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT (Supplement 1)" under this matter - in favor of and on behalf of Petitioner / Plaintiff, Roger L. Shoffstall.

IT IS HEREBY FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED, AND DECREED that the U.S. Supreme shall immediately issue DECLARATORY JUDGMENT and its FINDINGS under this matter.

IT IS HEREBY FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED, AND DECREED that the U.S. Supreme Court shall immediately convey to Petitioner / Plaintiff ANY AND ALL REDRESS AND RESTORATION that is legitimately due Petitioner / Plaintiff under this matter.

REV_00259407

IT IS HEREBY FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED, AND DECREED that the U.S. Supreme Court shall proceed forthwith to grant Petitioner / Plaintiff, Roger L. Shoffstall, Relief and Redress via EXPEDITED CONSIDERATION under this matter in a Summary Manner.

DONE IN OPEN COURT this _____ day of _____, 2001.

_____
JUDGE OF THE SUPERIOR COURT

RLS 6/14/2001

REV_00259408

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,

Petitioner / Plaintiff,

vs.

The presiding PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, George Bush,

Respondent / Defendant.

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

"MOTION FOR EX PARTE ORDER GRANTING LEAVE TO EXECUTE EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT"

COMES NOW The Petitioner / Plaintiff, Roger L. Shoffstall, by and through himself, and hereby moves and COMMANDS this Court to issue EX PARTE ORDER that invokes an immediate and indefinite STAY of these proceedings when and where this Court shall fully and fairly Execute Ex Parte Summary Judgment for the Petitioner / Plaintiff, Roger L. Shoffstall, and against the Respondent / Defendant, the presiding President of the United States, George Bush.

WHEREFOR, the PREPONDERANCE of the EVIDENCE which is substantial shows BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT that Petitioner / Plaintiff is entitled to the issuance of this Motion.

RESPECTFULLY Submitted at Fairbanks, Alaska this 14th day of June, 2001.

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL

Roger L. Shoffstall
P.O. Box 70689
Fairbanks, Alaska 99707
In propria persona

REV_00259409

I certify that on 6/14/2001
the original copy of this Motion was sent to:

Presiding Judge of the Superior Court of Alaska
Fourth Judicial District
604 Barnette Street
Fairbanks, Alaska 99701;

And that true and full copies of the above Motion were sent
to:

William Rehnquist
Chief Justice
U.S. Supreme Court
One First Street, NE
Washington, D.C. 20543;

George Bush
The presiding President of the United States
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, D.C. 20500;

as shown by affidavit;

By: _____
ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL.

REV_00259410

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,)
)
Petitioner / Plaintiff,) vs.)
)
The presiding PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES,) George Bush,)
)
Respondent / Defendant.)
)

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

EX PARTE ORDER GRANTING LEAVE

TO EXECUTE EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT

GOOD CAUSE APPEARING and Petitioner / Plaintiff having made proper Motion and the Court being advised in the premises:

IT IS ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that an immediate Stay is hereby invoked on these proceedings when and where this Court shall fully and fairly Execute Summary Judgment in favor of and on behalf of the Petitioner / Plaintiff, ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that from this day forward this Court shall not hear and/or consider any communications inclusive of ex parte communications from the Respondent / Defendant, the presiding President of the United States, George Bush, or from any party on his behalf.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that this Court shall immediately suspend above said Stay of Proceedings when service of Motion to Suspend Stay of Proceedings is made by Petitioner / Plaintiff, Roger L. Shoffstall.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that this Court and all other courts shall immediately proceed with execution of above said Ex Parte Summary Judgment until Motion is made by Petitioner / Plaintiff, Roger L. Shoffstall, to Stay said execution.

REV_00259411

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that this Court shall CONVENE a Fair and Impartial EX PARTE HEARING to Hear Petitioner's / Plaintiff's "MOTION FOR EX PARTE ORDER GRANTING LEAVE TO EXECUTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT" in a speedy manner giving expedited consideration to the Execution of all aspects of this matter.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that this Court shall RENDER Fair and Impartial ADJUDICATION on Petitioner's "Motion For Ex Parte Order Granting Leave To Execute Summary Judgment" in a speedy manner.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that that the United States inclusive of this Court shall give sufficient and adequate NOTICE to Petitioner / Plaintiff regarding all aspects of this proceeding.

DONE IN OPEN COURT this _____ day of _____, 2001.

_____
JUDGE OF THE SUPERIOR COURT

RLS 6/14/2001

REV_00259412

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,)
)
Petitioner / Plaintiff,)
)
vs.)
)
The presiding PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES,) George Bush,)
)
Respondent / Defendant.)
)

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

"MOTION FOR EX PARTE ORDER ISSUING WRIT OF EXECUTION"

COMES NOW The Petitioner, Roger L. Shoffstall, by and through himself, and hereby moves and COMMANDS this Court to issue EX PARTE ORDER where this Court immediately renders, RELINQUISHES and RELEASES WRIT OF EXECUTION in this matter.

WHEREFOR, the PREPONDERANCE of the EVIDENCE which is substantial shows BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT that Petitioner / Plaintiff is entitled to the issuance of this Motion.

RESPECTFULLY Submitted at Fairbanks, Alaska this 14th day of June, 2001.

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL

Roger L. Shoffstall
P.O. Box 70689
Fairbanks, Alaska 99707
In propria persona

REV_00259413

I certify that on 6/14/2001
the original copy of this Motion was sent to:

Presiding Judge of the Superior Court of Alaska
Fourth Judicial District
604 Barnette Street
Fairbanks, Alaska 99701;

And that true and full copies of the above Motion were sent
to:

William Rehnquist
Chief Justice
U.S. Supreme Court
One First Street, NE
Washington, D.C. 20543;

George Bush
presiding President of the United States
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, D.C. 20500;

as shown by affidavit;

By: _____
ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL.

REV_00259414

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,

Petitioner / Plaintiff,

vs.

The presiding PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, George Bush,

Respondent / Defendant.

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

EX PARTE ORDER ISSUING WRIT OF EXECUTION

GOOD CAUSE APPEARING and Petitioner having made proper Motion and the Court being advised in the premises:

IT IS ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that this Court shall immediately render, RELINGUISH, RELEASE AND execute Writ of Execution served by the Petitioner / Plaintiff, ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that the United States Government inclusive of this Court shall give sufficient and adequate NOTICE to Petitioner / Plaintiff regarding all aspects of this proceeding.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that this Court shall immediately CONVENE a Fair and Impartial EX PARTE HEARING to Hear Petitioner's / Plaintiff's "MOTION FOR EX PARTE ORDER ISSUING WRIT OF EXECUTION".

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that this Court shall immediately RENDER ADJUDICATION on Petitioner's / Plaintiff's "Motion For Ex Parte Order Issuing Writ Of Execution".

DONE IN OPEN COURT this _____ day of _____, 2001.

JUDGE OF THE SUPERIOR COURT

RLS 6/14/2001

REV_00259415

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,

Petitioner / Plaintiff,

vs.

The presiding PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, George Bush,

Respondent / Defendant.

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

WRIT OF EXECUTION

To: U.S. Marshal or Any Other Officer Serving Process:

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL [judgement creditor] recovered a judgement against the presiding PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, George Bush, the Government of the United States [judgement debtor] in this court on or about the 24th day of May, 2001, consisting of immediate relief in the form of Declaratory Judgement via Ex Parte Summary Judgment.

A certified true and full copy of said Ex Parte Summary Judgment is enclosed with this Writ.

You are hereby ordered and commanded to fully execute said Ex Parte Summary Judgment against the Respondent / Defendant, and for the Petitioner / Plaintiff continuing through to a point when and where all of Petitioner's / Plaintiff's Due Process Rights have been fully and fairly restored and redressed, and all due relief has been fully and fairly conveyed and delivered to Petitioner / Plaintiff directly and/or to his children [Jamie Lynne Shoffstall D.O.B. 2/17/79, Sean Gilbert Shoffstall D.O.B. 10/1/75, and William Charles Shoffstall D.O.B. 9/26/93].

REV_00259416

CLERK OF COURT

Date:_____

By Deputy Clerk: _____

Return to: 604 Barnette Street
Fairbanks, Alaska
99701

6/14/2001 RLS

REV_00259417

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,)
)
Petitioner / Plaintiff,) vs.)
)
The PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES,) George Bush,)
)
Respondent / Defendant.)
)

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

STATE OF ALASKA)
)ss
FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT)

AFFIDAVIT OF SERVICE OF PROCESS

I, ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL, The undersigned, appearing in propria persona, being first duly sworn upon oath, depose and state as follows:

1. I am over 18 years of age, I am a Citizen of the United States and resident of the State of Alaska.

I am the Petitioner / Plaintiff in this Writ of Habeas Corpus action.

I am entitled to have Ex Parte Summary Judgment adjudicated on my behalf.

I have personal knowledge of the facts contained herein.

To the best of my knowledge and belief the legality of my restraint has not been adjudicated on a prior Writ of Habeas Corpus.

The preponderance of the evidence which is substantial clearly shows that Petitioner/Plaintiff is entitled to immediate conveyance of the relief via Ex Parte Summary Judgment.

2. On or about June 14, 2001, I served the original copy of this "Affidavit Of Service Of Process" along with the original copy of the following listed documents:

REV_00259418

A. MOTION FOR EX PARTE ORDER GRANTING "EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT";

B. EX PARTE ORDER GRANTING EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT;

C. "MOTION FOR EX PARTE ORDER GRANTING LEAVE TO EXECUTE EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT";

D. EX PARTE ORDER GRANTING LEAVE TO EXECUTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT;

E. "MOTION FOR EX PARTE ORDER ISSUING WRIT OF EXECUTION";

F. EX PARTE ORDER ISSUING WRIT OF EXECUTION;

G. WRIT OF EXECUTION;

to the following address:

Presiding Judge
Superior Court of Alaska
4th Judicial District
604 Barnette Street
Fairbanks, Alaska 99701
via US Certified Mail
7000 1530 0005 2219 8751,
return receipt requested.

3. On or about June 14, 2001, I served true and full copies of this Affidavit and the above listed documents to the following addresses:

William Rehnquist
Chief Justice
U.S. Supreme Court
One First Street, NE
Washington, D.C. 20543
via U.S. Certified Mail
7000 1670 0011 1576 6231,
return receipt requested;

George Bush
U.S. President
White House Office
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, D.C. 20500
via U.S. Certified Mail

REV_00259419

7000 1530 0005 2219 8768,
return receipt requested.

4. I personally placed the above listed documents in the U.S. Mail at Fairbanks, Alaska on or about the above shown dates.

DATED AT Fairbanks, Alaska this 14th day of June in the year 2001.

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL

Roger L. Shoffstall
P.O. Box 70689
Fairbanks, Alaska 99707
In propria persona

CERTIFICATE OF COUNSEL/Return of Service

I, Roger L. Shoffstall, the undersigned hereby certify that the originals and true & full copy(ies) of the foregoing "AFFIDAVIT OF FACT AND OF SERVICE OF PROCESS", and the above listed documents were sent via U.S. Certified Mail to the addresses shown herein this 14th day of June, 2001, as is shown by the above Affidavit of Service of Process.

6/14/2001
RETURN DATE

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL
In propria persona
P.O. Box 70689
Fairbanks, Alaska 99707
In Propria Persona

SUBSCRIBED AND SWORN to before me this 14 day of June, 2001.

Rebecah McBr
Notary Public in and for Alaska

My commission expires: 8-17-04

REV_00259420

THE WHITE HOUSE
CORRESPONDENCE TRACKING WORKSHEET

DATE RECEIVED: 6/5/01

NAME OF CORRESPONDENT: Roger L. Shoffstall

SUBJECT: Roger L. Shoffstall v. POTUS

ROUTE TO: OFFICE/AGENCY	(STAFF NAME)	ACTION CODE	ACTION DATE M/D/YR	DISPOSITION TYPE RESP	DISPOSITION C D	DISPOSITION COMPLETED M/D/YR
	CUGONZ	A	6/5/01		C
	Brett	A

ACTION COMMENTS:

ACTION COMMENTS:

ACTION COMMENTS:

ACTION COMMENTS:

COMMENTS:

ADDITIONAL CORRESPONDENTS: MEDIA:

REV_00259421

2102392

12 - R
Counsel's Office JUN 1

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,)
)
Petitioner / Plaintiff,) vs.)
)
The PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES,) George Bush,)
)
Respondent / Defendant.)
)

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

STATE OF ALASKA)
)ss
FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT)

AFFIDAVIT OF FACT AND OF SERVICE OF PROCESS

I, ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL, The undersigned, appearing in propria persona, being first duly sworn upon oath, depose and state as follows:

1. I am over 18 years of age, I am a Citizen of the United States and resident of the State of Alaska.

I am the Petitioner / Plaintiff in this Writ of Habeas Corpus action.

I am entitled to have Ex Parte Summary Judgment adjudicated on my behalf.

I have personal knowledge of the facts contained herein.

To the best of my knowledge and belief the legality of my restraint has not been adjudicated on a prior Writ of Habeas Corpus.

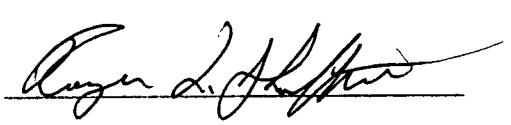
The preponderance of the evidence which is substantial clearly shows that Petitioner/Plaintiff is entitled to immediate conveyance of the relief contained within below listed Ex Parte Summary Judgment.

REV_00259422

2. On or about May 25, 2001, I served the original copy of this "Affidavit Of Fact And Of Service Of Process" along with the original copy of "EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT" (initialed and dated 5/24/2001, by myself) - to the following address:

Presiding Judge
Superior Court of Alaska
4th Judicial District
604 Barnette Street
Fairbanks, Alaska 99701
via US Certified Mail
7000 1530 0005 2219 8706,
return receipt requested.

3. On or about May 25, 2001, I served true and full copies of this Affidavit and the above listed "Ex Parte Summary Judgment" to the following addresses:



William Rehnquist
Chief Justice
U.S. Supreme Court
One First Street, NE
Washington, D.C. 20543
via U.S. Certified Mail
7000 1530 0005 2219 8713,
return receipt requested;

George Bush
U.S. President
White House Office
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, D.C. 20500
via U.S. Certified Mail
7000 1530 0005 2219 8720,
return receipt requested.

4. I personally placed the above listed documents in the U.S. Mail at Fairbanks, Alaska on or about the above shown dates.

DATED AT Fairbanks, Alaska this 24th day of May in the year 2001.

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL

REV_00259423

Roger L. Shoffstall
P.O. Box 70689
Fairbanks, Alaska 99707
In propria persona

CERTIFICATE OF COUNSEL/Return of Service

I, Roger L. Shoffstall, the undersigned hereby certify that the originals and true & full copy(ies) of the foregoing "AFFIDAVIT OF FACT AND OF SERVICE OF PROCESS", and the above listed "EX PARTE SUMMARY JUDGMENT" were sent via U.S. Certified Mail to the addresses shown herein this 25th day of May, 2001, as is shown by the above Affidavit of Service of Process.

5/25/2001
RETURN DATE

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL
In propria persona
P.O. Box 70689
Fairbanks, Alaska 99707
In Propria Persona

SUBSCRIBED AND SWORN to before me this 25th day of MAY, 2001.

Notary Public in and for Alaska

My commission expires: 01-16-02

JEAN TORKEL NOTARY PUBLIC STATE OF ALASKA

REV_00259424

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,

Petitioner / Plaintiff,

vs.

5/24/01 The ~~Ex~~PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, ~~William Jefferson Clinton~~ George Bush, Respondent / Defendant.

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

Ex Parte SUMMARY JUDGMENT

GOOD CAUSE APPEARING and the Petitioner / Plaintiff having made proper Motion and the Court being advised in the Premises:

IT IS ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that an immediate and perpetual moratorium is hereby placed on any and all action under the United States Government ~~Title three~~ made under the Department of the Treasury / Internal Revenue Service ~~Case Exhibit #1~~ and/or the State of Alaska Department of Revenue ~~Case Exhibit #2~~ where said agencies have levied Direct tax against Petitioner / Plaintiff, Roger L. Shoffstall. ~~when it is not laid in Proportion to the Census or Enumeration as is established by and through the principles of taxation under the ratified body of the United States Constitution.~~

5/24/01

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that the Supreme Court of the United States shall fully and fairly render Declaratory Judgment in this matter, ~~for the purpose of~~ therein, making a full and fair determination of damages and other relief that are Due Petitioner / Plaintiff.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that prior to issuing above said Declaratory Judgment said Court shall visit the record of this matter and all associated cases ~~and to consider the~~ then make a full and fair consideration of that of this matter.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED, AND DECREED that ~~the Ex~~President of the United States, ~~William Jefferson Clinton~~ George Bush, is hereby ~~CONVICTED of Treason, Bribery, and other high Crimes and Misdemeanors~~ removed from the Office of the President.

REV_00259425

It Is Further Ordered, Commanded, Adjudicated, AND DECREED that Petitioner / Plaintiff, Roger L. Shoffstall, is hereby installed in the Office of the U.S. President. 5/24/01 5/24/01

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED, AND DECREED that this Court and the administration of United States shall act immediately and perpetually to REDRESS and FULLY RESTORE any and all violations of Petitioner's / Plaintiff's substantive DUE PROCESS RIGHTS, and all other Things, rights, privileges, principles etc. that Petitioner / Plaintiff is due and entitled to enjoy under the U.S. Const. and other places.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that the UNITED STATES Government shall fully and fairly execute, convey and deliver all Relief and damages that is due Petitioner / Plaintiff throughout this matter.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, COMMANDED, ADJUDICATED AND DECREED that this Court shall fully and fairly EXECUTE Summary Judgment in a summary manner in this matter.

DONE IN OPEN COURT this _____ day of _____, 2001.

_____
JUDGE OF THE SUPERIOR COURT

~~RLS 4 / 19 / 2001~~
RLS 5 24 2001

REV_00259426

THE WHITE HOUSE
CORRESPONDENCE TRACKING WORKSHEET

DATE RECEIVED: 7/16/01

NAME OF CORRESPONDENT: Roger L. Shoffstall

SUBJECT: Shoffstall v. POTUS

ROUTE TO: OFFICE/AGENCY	(STAFF NAME)	ACTION CODE	ACTION DATE M/D/YR	DISPOSITION TYPE RESP	C D	COMPLETED M/D/YR
	CUGONZ	A	7/16/01		C
ACTION COMMENTS:
	Brett	A
ACTION COMMENTS:
ACTION COMMENTS:
ACTION COMMENTS:

COMMENTS: file in litigation file - give to Brent

Brett Kavanaugh
7/17/01

ADDITIONAL CORRESPONDENTS: MEDIA:

145008

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,

Petitioner/Plaintiff,

vs.

PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES,

George Bush,

Respondent/Defendant.

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

CLOSING AURGUMENT

The Haves take from the Have-nots!!!!!!! The Haves do so in an illicit manner under the guise of legitimacy!!!!!! The Haves have always taken from the Have-nots throughout recorded history!!! After thousands of years of this the Have-nots established the Supreme Law of the Land under the United States Constitution!!!

Now as is normal – the Haves are illicitly usurping the Rights and other Things belonging to the Have-nots!!!

It is this Court's manifest duty and obligation to prohibit the Haves from usurping the Rights and other Things belonging to the Have-nots!!!

President Bush is a Have!!!

To President Bush the Constitution is nothing more than window dressing!!! Good cover for his "Big Oil" to work under!!!

His solemn oath is just another lie told for his personal gain and that of his supporters!!!

His intent is to enrich himself at my expense!

In the world I grew up in - a man's word was his solemn oath that you could rely on him to satisfy his obligation to you!!! I can't rely on President George W. Bush to satisfy his sworn oath any more than I could rely on his Daddy to or President Clinton to!!!

In February of 1988, the then President Bush (the current President's father) kept and concealed my children from me by and through the State of Arizona, at Maricopa County, in substantial violation of my Due Process Rights!!! He filed a malicious prosecution (Dependency Petition) that directed the State kidnapping of my then minor children!!! He failed to give Full Faith And Credit to a standing Alaska Decree of Divorce And Child Custody that had previously granted me permanent Shared Custody of my then minor children!!! He arbitrarily and capriciously suspended my Petition For Order To Show Cause without consideration for or in disregard of my rights and other Things established by and through the U.S. Constitution.

His intent was to enrich himself at my expense too!!!

President Clinton took over from there and continued the substantial violations of my Due Process Rights!!! Substantial evidence shows that he to used the powers of the Office of the President to arbitrarily and capriciously inflicted irreparable harm on my children and me!!!

His intent was to enrich himself at my expense too!!!

And here we are today with the presiding President Bush conducting the State of Alaska, IRS, NASA, AT&T, GCI and others under his continuing illicit cause to inflict further irreparable injury on me, the Petitioner / Plaintiff!!! President Bush uses them and others to harass me from day to day with intent to make my life difficult if not unbearable!!! President Bush uses NASA and AT&T to routinely cause problems on FTS 2000 circuits carried by my company and then frames me to make it appear like the problem was in my company!!! The State of Alaska continues to takes my income while they build their own private telecommunications network that they use to bypass mine!!!!! Of course the rules of competition that they apply to me don't apply to them!!!!!!!

The 1st time the President began to operate outside of our Constitution we were doomed!

I cannot stand by and permit my rights to be taken by ~~while~~ the President while he lords over me and enslaves me!!!

Rather than administer the Constitution the President has built a massive wall of illicit bureaucracy between the Constitution and myself, thereby, insuring that I will not enjoy its protection!!! He has made them elite and treats them better than Citizens like myself!!! With his jack booted IRS Agents, those of the Department of Revenue for Alaska and other like officials he steals my life, liberty, income, and other Things!!!

Substantial evidence shows that he has intentionally obstructed my attempts to enjoy my Due Process Rights and other Things that I am entitled to enjoy!!!

I have as much right to be here as he does!!!

Just because he is willing to do anything in order to conceal and continue his substantial violation of my Due Process Rights - doesn't mean it is right!!!!!

What it does mean is that he is a criminal!!! I'm a law-abiding citizen entrapped in his snare because – to my detriment I relied and depended on him to do what he swore to do when he took the Office of the President!!!

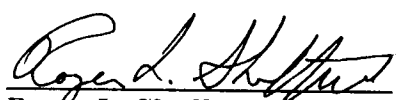
There is no place in the Constitution that says it is okay to administer our Republic as a Democracy but he is doing it!!!

I have tried to correct these Things by and through every means that is available to me as a common citizen of this country – to no avail!!!

The U.S. Supreme Court should compel the President to administer Equal Protection of the Laws to me and all Citizens, not to just the select super minority that controls this country where I and others have been arbitrarily and capriciously excluded.

It appears that in order to change Things from what they are – I will have to occupy the Office of the President!!!!!!

This Court should have installed me in the Office of the President before the current Bush administration's entry but it omitted doing so then!!!



There is and has been a standing order before this Court to install Petitioner / Plaintiff into the Office of the President since before President Clinton was removed from the Office!!!

Now, therefor - it is time to summarily remove presiding President George Bush from the Office of the President and install Petitioner / Plaintiff!!!!!!!

WHEREFOR, – IT IS TIME TO AMEND this Court's above act of omission - thereby installing the Petitioner / Plaintiff in the Office of the President!!!

RESPECTFULLY SUBMITTED At or near Fairbanks, Alaska this the 17th day of June in the year of 2001.

Roger L. Shoffstall

Roger L. Shoffstall
In propria persona
P.O. Box 70689
Fairbanks, Alaska 99707

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE STATE OF ALASKA

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL,)
)
Petitioner / Plaintiff,) vs.)
)
The PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES,) George Bush,)
)
Respondent / Defendant.)
)

CASE NO. 4FA-91-378 CI

STATE OF ALASKA)
)ss
FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT)

AFFIDAVIT OF SERVICE OF PROCESS

I, ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL, The undersigned, appearing in propria persona, being first duly sworn upon oath, depose and state as follows:

1. I am over 18 years of age, I am a Citizen of the United States and resident of the State of Alaska.

I am the Petitioner / Plaintiff in this Writ of Habeas Corpus action.

I am entitled to have Ex Parte Summary Judgment adjudicated on my behalf.

I have personal knowledge of the facts contained herein.

To the best of my knowledge and belief the legality of my restraint has not been adjudicated on a prior Writ of Habeas Corpus.

The Preponderance of Evidence clearly shows that Petitioner / Plaintiff is entitled to immediate conveyance of the relief via Ex Parte Summary Judgment.

The preponderance of evidence shows that Respondant / Defendant is NOT entitled to legitimate relief in this matter under the "Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act".

REV_00259431

The Preponderance of Evidence shows that Public Safety does not require the suspension of Petitoner's / Plaintiff's privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus. This country is not under invasion and we are not suffering under rebellion.

The preponderance of evidence shows that NO TRIABLE ISSUE OF FACTS exist in this matter.

The preponderance of evidence shows that NO GENUINE ISSUE OF MATERIAL FACT exist in this matter.

There is only a question of law left for determination in this matter.

Questions of law can be determined by the Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, William Rehnquist.

Wherefor, Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, William Rehnquist, should proceed in a summary manner to convey all legitimate due relief to Petitioner / Plaintiff.

2. On or about June 18, 2001, I served the original copy of this "Affidavit Of Service Of Process" along with the original copy of the enclosed "CLOSING ARGUMENT".

to the following address:

Presiding Judge
Superior Court of Alaska
4th Judicial District
604 Barnette Street
Fairbanks, Alaska 99701
via US Certified Mail
7000 1670 0011 1576 6224,
return receipt requested.

3. On or about June 18, 2001, I served true and full copies of this Affidavit and the above listed "CLOSING ARGUMENT" to the following addresses:

REV_00259432

William Rehnquist
Chief Justice
U.S. Supreme Court
One First Street, NE
Washington, D.C. 20543
via U.S. Certified Mail
7000 1670 0011 1576 6217,
return receipt requested;

George Bush
U.S. President
White House Office
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, D.C. 20500
via U.S. Certified Mail
7000 1670 0011 1576 6200,
return receipt requested.

4. I personally placed the above listed documents in the U.S. Mail at Fairbanks, Alaska on or about the above shown dates.

DATED AT Fairbanks, Alaska this 18th day of June in the year 2001.

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL

Roger L. Shoffstall
P.O. Box 70689
Fairbanks, Alaska 99707
In propria persona

REV_00259433

CERTIFICATE OF COUNSEL/Return of Service

I, Roger L. Shoffstall, the undersigned hereby certify that the originals and true & full copy(ies) of the foregoing "AFFIDAVIT OF FACT AND OF SERVICE OF PROCESS", and the above listed document(s) were sent via U.S. Certified Mail to the addresses shown herein this 18th day of June, 2001, as is shown by the above Affidavit of Service of Process.

6/18/2001
RETURN DATE

ROGER L. SHOFFSTALL
In propria persona
P.O. Box 70689
Fairbanks, Alaska 99707
In Propria Persona

SUBSCRIBED AND SWORN to before me this 18 day of June, 2001.

Notary Public in and for Alaska

My commission expires: 8.17.04

REV_00259434

HSBA
Hawaii State Bar Association

February 27, 2002

Honorable Patrick J. Leahy
Chair, Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
224 Dirkson Senate Office Building
Washington, D.C. 20510- 6275

OFFICERS
Michael W. Gibson, President
Douglas A. Crosier, President-Elect
Lionel T. Nishioka, Secretary
Jeffrey H.K. Sia, Treasurer

DIRECTORS
Steven J.T. Chow
John P. Gillmor
Paul K. Hamano (East Hawaii)
Hugh R. Jones
David M. Jorgensen (Maui)
Ronette M. Kawakami
Faye M. Koyanagi
Carol Mon Lee
Carol K. Muranaka
Christiane L. Nakea (Kauai)
Wayne D. Parsons
Trudy Burns Stone
Elizabeth A. Strance (West Hawaii)
Suzanne T. Tarada
Andrew S. Winer

YLD PRESIDENT
Jodi L. Kimura

HSBA/ABA DELEGATE
James A. Kawachika

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR
Coralie Chun Matayoshi

Re: Nomination of Frederick W. Rohlfing III to U.S. District Court in Hawaii

Dear Senator Leahy:

The Board of Directors of the Hawaii State Bar Association (HSBA) has found Frederick W. Rohlfing III to be highly qualified for the position of U.S. District Court Judge in Hawaii, and he therefore meets our very highest level of standards for recommendation to the Bench.

As part of the HSBA Board's procedures for taking a position on judicial appointments, the candidate is requested to submit a resume and/or respond to a questionnaire and to appear before the Board, which Mr. Rohlfing has done. The HSBA Board utilizes a modified version of the American Bar Association Guidelines for Reviewing Qualifications of Candidates for State Judicial Office. These Guidelines include the following criteria for judicial positions: integrity, legal knowledge and ability, professional experience, judicial temperament, diligence, financial responsibility, public service, collegiality, and writing ability.

The HSBA Board's rating system includes the categories of "highly qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified."

The qualifications of Mr. Rohlfing for the position of U.S. District Court Judge in Hawaii were reviewed in this manner and the HSBA Board determined that he is highly qualified.

Please contact me if you have any questions about our position on this matter.

Sincerely,

Michael W. Gibson, President
Hawaii State Bar Association

cc: HSBA Board of Directors
Coralie Chun Matayoshi, HSBA Executive Director

1132 Bishop Street, Suite 906 • Honolulu, HI 96813 • Phone: (808) 537-1868 • Fax: (808) 521-7936 • Http://HSBA.org

c

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legal Policy

Frederick W. Rohlfing

Biography

Frederick W. Rohlfing III is a founding partner in the Honolulu law firm of Rohlfing & Stone. Born in what was then the Territory of Hawaii, he graduated from Punahou School in 1974, received his B.A. magna cum laude, with high honors in economics, from Dartmouth College in 1978, and his J.D. from the University of Chicago in 1983. In Chicago, Mr. Rohlfing was active in the Mandel Legal Aid Clinic, representing Social Security Disability claimants.

Since returning to Honolulu in 1983, Mr. Rohlfing has concentrated his practice primarily in business, real estate, and personal injury civil litigation. He has vigorously advocated on behalf of injured traffic accident victims, including before the Hawaii Supreme Court. Mr. Rohlfing is a member of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America.

An opening brief co-authored by Mr. Rohlfing in the case of Swire Properties (Hawaii), Ltd. v. Zoning Board of Appeals was selected by the Hawaii Supreme Court as the best example of appellate writing from the State of Hawaii for submission to the first annual Scribe's Brief Writing Competition sponsored by the American Society of Writers on Legal Subjects.

In federal court, Mr. Rohlfing has participated in a variety of cases involving First Amendment constitutional law, the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Clean Water Act, the Lanham Act, the Petroleum Marketing Practices Act, the Securities Act, and the Sherman Antitrust Act. Mr. Rohlfing has also been a faculty speaker in several continuing legal education seminars in Hawaii.

In addition to his legal practice, Mr. Rohlfing is active in the community. He served from 1991-1993 as an elected member of the Manoa Neighborhood Board of the City and County of Honolulu. He was the president of Manoa Paniolo (Youth) Football from 1999-2001, and presently serves as a member of the Mission Houses Museum board.

REV_00259436

FOIA | Privacy and Security Notice

REV_00259437

c

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legal Policy

Frederick W. Rohlfing III

Resumé

Birth:	July 21, 1956	Honolulu, Hawaii
Legal Residence:	Hawaii
Education:	1974 - 1978	Dartmouth College B.A. degree, magna cum laude
	1980 - 1983	University of Chicago Law School J.D. degree
Bar Admittance:	1983	Hawaii
Experience:	1983 - 1984	Torkildson Katz Jossem & Loden Associate
	1985	House of Representatives, State of Hawaii Chief Minority Attorney
	1985 - 1990	Law Offices of James M. Sattler Associate
	1990 - 1995	Stubenberg & Durrett Associate 1990 - 1993 Partner 1993 - 1995
	1995	Senate, State of Hawaii Chief Minority Attorney
	1995 - 1996	Law Office of Frederick

	W. Rohlfing, III Sole Proprietor
1997 - present	Rohlfing & Stone Partner

FOIA | Privacy and Security Notice

REV_00259439

c

U.S. Department of Justice
Office of Legal Policy

Frederick W. ("Fritz") Rohlfing III
Support

Lowell K.Y. Chun-Hoon, Esq. of King, Nakamura & Chun-Hoon, Honolulu, Hawaii:

- "I have worked together with him extensively representing a mutual client in an unusually complicated personal injury-legal malpractice-workers' compensation claim... I was impressed by his rapid assimilation of this arcane body of law, his graceful and lucid prose, and his tenacious representation of the injured worker. . . . I hope the fact that he is endorsed by a lifelong union lawyer like myself suggests something of his ability to transcend traditional labels and affiliations through the force of his character and intellect." Excerpt from February 20, 2002 letter to Michael Gibson, President, Hawaii State Bar Association.

Cynthia A. Farias, Esq., Honolulu, Hawaii:

- "In my opinion, Mr. Rohlfing is highly intelligent, completely honest and extremely hard-working. He is reasonable and even-tempered, and has been a pleasure to work with. Mr. Rohlfing is also a problem-solver who will work diligently towards resolution of an issue. He has the legal skills, experience and work ethic to be an excellent judge." Excerpt from February 20, 2002 letter to Michael Gibson, President, Hawaii State Bar Association.

Thomas E. Crowley, Esq., of the Law Offices of Thomas E. Crowley, Honolulu, Hawaii:

- "Mr. Rohlfing is an excellent lawyer and litigator. He brings two critical skills to each case which are fundamental to a district court judgeship: the ability to correctly analyze complicated issues, and the ability to communicate that analysis in a clear and concise way. He is extremely well-organized, prompt, careful, and efficient. Of special note is the superior quality of Mr. Rohlfing's legal writing."

REV_00259440

- "Mr. Rohlfing is more than an excellent litigator. He has private as well as public integrity, which means he is honest in both his personal and professional dealings. As a judge, Mr. Rohlfing would have the courage to displease, which means he will rule the right way, even in the face of public and private pressure." Excerpt from March 12, 2002 letter to Senator Patrick Leahy.

The Honorable Boyd P. Mossman, State of Hawaii Circuit Court Judge for the Second Circuit, Retired

- "Fritz's legal education and his experience with business as well as the law provide him with an intellectual capacity and confidence; however, his sense of community and sense of humor generating from his local roots are an even better gauge of his genuinenesss and dedication to Hawaii and the United States." Excerpt from February 5, 2002 letter to Michael Gibson, President, Hawaii State Bar Association.

Sharon R. Himeno, Esq. of Price Okamoto Himeno & Lum, Honolulu, Hawaii:

- "I am pleased to endorse Fritz Rohlfing's nomination to the U.S. District Court. I have known Fritz for over 25 years, and he has always been a person of the highest integrity and intellect. His credentials are outstanding, he has extensive experience as a litigator in both federal and state court, and he would be a great addition to our federal bench." Excerpt from February 20, 2002 letter to the Michael Gibson, President, Hawaii State Bar Association.

Charles Robert Ching, Esq. of Honolulu, Hawaii:

- "In working with Fritz, I found both his legal analysis and his written work product to be consistently excellent. In discussing legal issues and theories, Fritz demonstrates a keen legal mind and an abiding respect for the law. I am particularly impressed by Fritz's ability to recall and explore alternate legal theories and his willingness to entertain and analyze such theories on their own merits. In this regard, Fritz has always displayed an intellectual curiosity, integrity, and judgement that would be especially well suited to the bench. Fritz is also a tireless legal researcher with a thirst for substantive legal knowledge and a seemingly infinite capacity to digest case law." Excerpt from February 11, 2002 letter to the Michael Gibson, President, Hawaii State Bar Association.

Russell Blair, former Democratic state senator and District Judge:

REV_00259441

- "We've had discussions over the years about matters political and legal and he's always struck me as being intelligent and forthright. He's coming from the right place: good heart and good head." The Honolulu Advertiser, Thursday, January 24, 2002.

For further information please contact Barbara Comstock in the Office of Public Affairs at (202) 514-2007.

FOIA | Privacy and Security Notice

REV_00259442

HSBA
Hawaii State Bar Association

February 27, 2002

Honorable Patrick J. Leahy
Chair, Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
224 Dirkson Senate Office Building
Washington, D.C. 20510- 6275

OFFICERS
Michael W. Gibson, President
Douglas A. Cresler, President-Elect
Lurnel T. Nishioka, Secretary
Jeffrey H.K. Sia, Treasurer

DIRECTORS
Steven J.T. Chow
John P. Gillmor
Paul K. Hamano (East Hawaii)
Hugh R. Jones
David M. Jorgensen (Maui)
Ronette M. Kawakami
Faye M. Koyanagi
Carol Mon Lee
Carol K. Muranaka
Christiane L. Nakea (Kauai)
Wayne D. Parsons
Trudy Burns Stone
Elizabeth A. Strance (West Hawaii)
Suzanne T. Tarada
Andrew S. Winer

YLD PRESIDENT
Jodi L. Kimura

HSBA/ABA DELEGATE
James A. Kawachika

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR
Coralie Chun Matayoshi

Re: Nomination of Frederick W. Rohlfing III to U.S. District Court in Hawaii

Dear Senator Leahy:

The Board of Directors of the Hawaii State Bar Association (HSBA) has found Frederick W. Rohlfing III to be highly qualified for the position of U.S. District Court Judge in Hawaii, and he therefore meets our very highest level of standards for recommendation to the Bench.

As part of the HSBA Board's procedures for taking a position on judicial appointments, the candidate is requested to submit a resume and/or respond to a questionnaire and to appear before the Board, which Mr. Rohlfing has done. The HSBA Board utilizes a modified version of the American Bar Association Guidelines for Reviewing Qualifications of Candidates for State Judicial Office. These Guidelines include the following criteria for judicial positions: integrity, legal knowledge and ability, professional experience, judicial temperament, diligence, financial responsibility, public service, collegiality, and writing ability.

The HSBA Board's rating system includes the categories of "highly qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified."

The qualifications of Mr. Rohlfing for the position of U.S. District Court Judge in Hawaii were reviewed in this manner and the HSBA Board determined that he is highly qualified.

Please contact me if you have any questions about our position on this matter.

Sincerely,

Michael W. Gibson, President
Hawaii State Bar Association

cc: HSBA Board of Directors
Coralie Chun Matayoshi, HSBA Executive Director

1132 Bishop Street, Suite 906 • Honolulu, HI 96813 • Phone: (808) 537-1868 • Fax: (808) 521-7936 • Http://HSBA.org

c

U.S. Department of Justice
Office of Legal Policy

About Us

Home | Judicial Nominations | Contact Us | DOJ

- History
- Functions
- Staff Bios

Resources

- Judicial Nominations
- Employment/ Internships
- DOJ Homepage

Last Updated: 3/25/02

Frederick W. Rohlfing
Biography

Frederick W. Rohlfing III is a founding partner in the Honolulu law firm of Rohlfing & Stone. Born in what was then the Territory of Hawaii, he graduated from Punahou School in 1974, received his B.A. magna cum laude, with high honors in economics, from Dartmouth College in 1978, and his J.D. from the University of Chicago in 1983. In Chicago, Mr. Rohlfing was active in the Mandel Legal Aid Clinic, representing Social Security Disability claimants.

Since returning to Honolulu in 1983, Mr. Rohlfing has concentrated his practice primarily in business, real estate, and personal injury civil litigation. He has vigorously advocated on behalf of injured traffic accident victims, including before the Hawaii Supreme Court. Mr. Rohlfing is a member of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America.

An opening brief co-authored by Mr. Rohlfing in the case of Swire Properties (Hawaii), Ltd. v. Zoning Board of Appeals was selected by the Hawaii Supreme Court as the best example of appellate writing from the State of Hawaii for submission to the first annual Scribe's Brief Writing Competition sponsored by the American Society of Writers on Legal Subjects.

In federal court, Mr. Rohlfing has participated in a variety of cases involving First Amendment constitutional law, the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Clean Water Act, the Lanham Act, the Petroleum Marketing Practices Act, the Securities Act, and the Sherman Antitrust Act. Mr. Rohlfing has also been a faculty speaker in several continuing legal education seminars in Hawaii.

In addition to his legal practice, Mr. Rohlfing is active in the community. He served from 1991-1993 as an elected member of the Manoa Neighborhood Board of the City and County of Honolulu. He was the president of Manoa Paniolo (Youth) Football from 1999-2001, and presently serves as a member of the Mission Houses Museum board.

REV_00259444

FOIA | Privacy and Security Notice

REV_00259445

c

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legal Policy

Frederick W. Rohlfing III

Resumé

Birth:	July 21, 1956	Honolulu, Hawaii
Legal Residence:	Hawaii
Education:	1974 - 1978	Dartmouth College B.A. degree, magna cum laude
	1980 - 1983	University of Chicago Law School J.D. degree
Bar Admittance:	1983	Hawaii
Experience:	1983 - 1984	Torkildson Katz Jossem & Loden Associate
	1985	House of Representatives, State of Hawaii Chief Minority Attorney
	1985 - 1990	Law Offices of James M. Sattler Associate
	1990 - 1995	Stubenberg & Durrett Associate 1990 - 1993 Partner 1993 - 1995
	1995	Senate, State of Hawaii Chief Minority Attorney
	1995 - 1996	Law Office of Frederick

REV_00259446

	W. Rohlfing, III Sole Proprietor
1997 - present	Rohlfing & Stone Partner

FOIA | Privacy and Security Notice

REV_00259447

c

U.S. Department of Justice
Office of Legal Policy

Frederick W. ("Fritz") Rohlfing III
Support

Lowell K.Y. Chun-Hoon, Esq. of King, Nakamura & Chun-Hoon, Honolulu, Hawaii:

- "I have worked together with him extensively representing a mutual client in an unusually complicated personal injury-legal malpractice-workers' compensation claim... I was impressed by his rapid assimilation of this arcane body of law, his graceful and lucid prose, and his tenacious representation of the injured worker. . . . I hope the fact that he is endorsed by a lifelong union lawyer like myself suggests something of his ability to transcend traditional labels and affiliations through the force of his character and intellect." Excerpt from February 20, 2002 letter to Michael Gibson, President, Hawaii State Bar Association.

Cynthia A. Farias, Esq., Honolulu, Hawaii:

- "In my opinion, Mr. Rohlfing is highly intelligent, completely honest and extremely hard-working. He is reasonable and even-tempered, and has been a pleasure to work with. Mr. Rohlfing is also a problem-solver who will work diligently towards resolution of an issue. He has the legal skills, experience and work ethic to be an excellent judge." Excerpt from February 20, 2002 letter to Michael Gibson, President, Hawaii State Bar Association.

Thomas E. Crowley, Esq., of the Law Offices of Thomas E. Crowley, Honolulu, Hawaii:

- "Mr. Rohlfing is an excellent lawyer and litigator. He brings two critical skills to each case which are fundamental to a district court judgeship: the ability to correctly analyze complicated issues, and the ability to communicate that analysis in a clear and concise way. He is extremely well-organized, prompt, careful, and efficient. Of special note is the superior quality of Mr. Rohlfing's legal writing."

REV_00259448

- "Mr. Rohlfing is more than an excellent litigator. He has private as well as public integrity, which means he is honest in both his personal and professional dealings. As a judge, Mr. Rohlfing would have the courage to displease, which means he will rule the right way, even in the face of public and private pressure." Excerpt from March 12, 2002 letter to Senator Patrick Leahy.

The Honorable Boyd P. Mossman, State of Hawaii Circuit Court Judge for the Second Circuit, Retired

- "Fritz's legal education and his experience with business as well as the law provide him with an intellectual capacity and confidence; however, his sense of community and sense of humor generating from his local roots are an even better gauge of his genuinenesss and dedication to Hawaii and the United States." Excerpt from February 5, 2002 letter to Michael Gibson, President, Hawaii State Bar Association.

Sharon R. Himeno, Esq. of Price Okamoto Himeno & Lum, Honolulu, Hawaii:

- "I am pleased to endorse Fritz Rohlfing's nomination to the U.S. District Court. I have known Fritz for over 25 years, and he has always been a person of the highest integrity and intellect. His credentials are outstanding, he has extensive experience as a litigator in both federal and state court, and he would be a great addition to our federal bench." Excerpt from February 20, 2002 letter to the Michael Gibson, President, Hawaii State Bar Association.

Charles Robert Ching, Esq. of Honolulu, Hawaii:

- "In working with Fritz, I found both his legal analysis and his written work product to be consistently excellent. In discussing legal issues and theories, Fritz demonstrates a keen legal mind and an abiding respect for the law. I am particularly impressed by Fritz's ability to recall and explore alternate legal theories and his willingness to entertain and analyze such theories on their own merits. In this regard, Fritz has always displayed an intellectual curiosity, integrity, and judgement that would be especially well suited to the bench. Fritz is also a tireless legal researcher with a thirst for substantive legal knowledge and a seemingly infinite capacity to digest case law." Excerpt from February 11, 2002 letter to the Michael Gibson, President, Hawaii State Bar Association.

Russell Blair, former Democratic state senator and District Judge:

REV_00259449

- "We've had discussions over the years about matters political and legal and he's always struck me as being intelligent and forthright. He's coming from the right place: good heart and good head." The Honolulu Advertiser, Thursday, January 24, 2002.

For further information please contact Barbara Comstock in the Office of Public Affairs at (202) 514-2007.

FOIA | Privacy and Security Notice

REV_00259450

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

OFFICE of ETHICS

1400 Independence Ave. SW
STOP 0122
Rm. 347-W J.L.W Bldg.
Washington, D.C. 20250-1220

Office# (202) 720-2251
Fax# (202) 690-2642

www.usda.gov/ethics

FAX TRANSMITTAL SHEET

NO. OF PAGES (INCLUDING COVER SHEET) 2

TODAY'S DATE 06/18/03

TO: Brett Kavanaugh AGENCY: WH Counsel's Office

OFFICE# ( ) 456-7984 FAX# ( ) 456 1647

FROM:

[~~4~~] Raymond Sheehan
Director

[ ] Dave Spradlin
Sr. Ethics Specialist

[ ] Pat Tippett
Sr. Ethics Specialist

[ ] Mike Edwards
Sr. Ethics Specialist

[ ] Lolita Roberson
Ethics Specialist

[ ] Dwaine Grove
Intern

~ COMMENTS ~

Brett: How's it going?
Dale Moore wants to send out the May 30 memos from Andy Card and Judge Gonzales under this cover letter and wants your 'OK' on whether it's sufficient. Thanks
Ray

MEMORANDUM TO THE SUBCABINET

FROM: Dale Moore, Chief of Staff

SUBJECT: Rules Governing Partisan Political Activity

Please find attached a memorandum from the Chief of Staff to the President and an accompanying memorandum from the Counsel to the President reiterating the restrictions and ground rules that must be followed by all officers and employees in regards to political campaigns at any level of government. While the general election isn't until November 3, 2004, both major political parties have commenced fundraising and organizational activities. The President is adamant that no member of his Administration breach or even appear to push the envelope of the Hatch Act restrictions or such other procedures as the White House and employing agencies may establish for their officers and employees.

There are different restrictions and allowances regarding political activity depending upon where one falls within three classes of officer or employee: 1) Senate Confirmed Appointees, 2) Career Senior Executives, and 3) all others – including non-career Senior Executives, Schedule C appointees, and career staff below the Senior Executive level. We need to make sure that everyone at USDA knows and abides by the rules.

Classroom instruction will soon be afforded at the Subcabinet Meeting and the Schedule C meetings conducted by the White House Liaison. In addition, Office of Ethics and the Chief Financial Officer have developed the following training tools and procedures specific to political activity:

- Financial Procedures under which the costs of mixed travel (political and official) by Senate Confirmed Appointees are to be allocated and the political portion billed to the benefited political committee(s). These procedures are attached and must be provided to your travel coordinators.
- Laminated vest-pocket / purse-sized cards that summarize the basic "dos and don'ts" of political activity according to the type of officer or employee. Samples of all three cards are attached and sufficient quantities are available to distribute to your staffs. Every person engaged in partisan political activity should carry the card pertinent to him or her at all times.
- The ethics website (www.usda.gov/ethics) has a thorough online training module on political activity as well as the full text of the pertinent Federal Regulations (5 CFR 734 Subparts A through F). Field staff unable to attend classroom instruction should be directed to this site and complete the automated certification upon completion of the training module.

I ask each of you to take all steps necessary to make sure that your employees are well versed in, and fully compliant with, these rules and procedures.

Attachments / as stated

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: (engagement) and necessity and war and self-defense and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)

*42 A.F. L. Rev. 245, **

Copyright (c) 1997 Air Force Judge Advocate General School
The Air Force Law Review

1997

42 A.F. L. Rev. 245

LENGTH: 6553 words

ARTICLE: The JCS Standing Rules of Engagement: A Judge Advocate's Primer

Professor Richard J. Grunawalt *

* Professor Grunawalt (B.A., J.D., University of Michigan) is Director, Oceans Law and Policy Department, United States Naval War College.

SUMMARY:
... The Standing Rules of Engagement (SROE) promulgated by Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Instruction 3121.01 provides policy guidance and procedures governing self-defense and mission accomplishment for US commanders during all military operations and contingencies. ... The SROE consist of the basic Chairman's Instruction and four enclosures which set forth "Standing Rules of Engagement for U.S. Forces" (Enclosure A), "Supplemental Measures" (Enclosure B), "Compendium and Combatant Commander's Special ROE" (Enclosure C), and "References" (Enclosure D). ... The commander and the mission will not be well served, however, if unwarranted deference is made to the special ROE expertise that we expect of the operational lawyer. ... Enclosure C contains a "Compendium" of other ROE-related guidance as well as the "Combatant Commander's Special ROE." ... Determining the existence of a hostile act or demonstration of hostile intent is a function of the professional military judgment of the on-scene commander. ... Clearly, an F-16 pilot engaged in that mission will comply with that supplemental measure, e.g., he or she will not engage intruding aircraft absent specific authority from the designated air defense commander to do so. ...

TEXT:
[*245] I. INTRODUCTION

The Standing Rules of Engagement (SROE) [1] promulgated by Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Instruction 3121.01 provides policy guidance and procedures governing self-defense and mission accomplishment for US commanders during all military operations and contingencies. Judge advocates contemplating assignment to operational law billets must be fully conversant with these SROE. This article is designed to assist in that process.

The Armed Forces of the United States constitute without question the most powerful, technologically sophisticated and professionally respected military organization in the world. Some 1.5 million strong, the men and women of the United States Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps and Coast Guard are either "on-station" around the globe or are prepared to deploy whenever and wherever they are directed to do so by the National Command Authorities (NCA). [2] Rules of engagement delineate the circumstance when those forces are authorized to initiate or continue armed engagement with foreign forces or terrorist units wherever they may be encountered. [3] were always more versatile than the word "Peacetime" in the title might suggest. Replacement of "Peacetime" with the term "Standing", results in a far more descriptive title to the current rules. Memorandum from Secretary of the Joint Staff for Unified and Specified Combatant Commanders and Commander U.S. Element, NORAD, Peacetime Rules of Engagement for U.S. Forces (Oct. 28 1988) (on file with author).

REV_00259453

n9 See CJCSI 3121.02, supra note 1.

n10 CJCSI 3121.02, supra note 1, at 2.

n11 The term "Military Operations Other Than War," "encompasses the use of military capabilities across the range of military operations short of war. These military actions can be applied to complement any combination of the other instruments of national power and occur before, during, and after war. Also called MOOTW." Joint Pub. 3-07, Joint Doctrine for Military Operations Other Than War p. GL-3 (1995).

n12 CJCSI 3121.02, supra note 1, at app. A.

n13 Id. at app. B.

n14 Id. at app. C.

n15 Id. at app. D.

n16 The five geographic CINCs are Commander in Chief U.S. Atlantic Command (USCINCACOM), Commander in Chief U.S. European Command (USCINCEUR), Commander in Chief U.S. Pacific Command (USCINCPAC), Commander in Chief U.S. Central Command (USCINCCENT), and Commander in Chief U.S. Southern Command, (USCINCSOUTH). The four functional CINCs are Commander in Chief U.S. Strategic Command, (USCINCSTRAT), Commander in Chief U.S. Transportation Command (USCINCTRANS), Commander in Chief U.S. Special Operations Command (USCINCSOC), and Commander in Chief U.S. Space Command (USCINCSPACE). CJCSI 3121.02, supra note 1, at B-1, C-1.

n17 To date, only USCINCENT, USCINCPAC and USCINCSOUTH have promulgated NCA-approved Combatant Commander's Special ROE. (Annexes B, D and F, respectively).

n18 Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations provides, in pertinent part, that. "nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. . . ." U.N. Charter art. 51. For a discussion of the inherent right of self-defense generally, see James Brierly, The Law of Nations: An Introduction to the International Law of Peace 416-21 (6th ed., 1963): Stone, Legal Controls of International Conflict 244 (1954); von Glahn, Law Among Nations 129-33 (6th ed., 1992); Bruce Harlow, *The Legal Use of Force . . . Short of War, U.S. Naval Inst. Proc., Nov. 1966, at 89; and Yoram Dinstein, War, Aggression and Self-Defense 187-191 (2d ed., 1994).

n19 See L.C. GREEN, THE CONTEMPORARY LAW OF ARMED CONFLICT 122 (1993).

n20 Id. at 330-332.

n21 CJCSI 3121.02, supra note 1, at A-3.

n22 The glossary of the SROE provides the following amplifying guidance on the concept of individual self-defense:

> . . . It is critical that individuals are aware of and train to the principle that they have the authority to use all available means and to take all appropriate action to defend themselves and other U.S. personnel in their vicinity. In the implementation of these SROE and other ROE, commanders have the obligation to ensure that the individuals within that commander's unit understand when and how they may use force in self-defense. While individuals assigned to a unit respond to a hostile act or hostile intent in the exercise of their inherent right of self-defense, their use of force must remain consistent with lawful orders of superiors, the rules contained in this document, and other applicable rules of engagement promulgated for the mission or AOR.

Id. at GL-10.

n23 Admiral Frank Kelso, Commander in Chief, U.S. Atlantic Command, Address at the Norfolk Naval Base Rules of Engagement Symposium (Nov. 18 1987).

n24 CJCSI 3121.02, supra note 1, at A-4.

n25 Id. at A-6.

n26 Id. at B-1.

n27 Id.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: (engagement) and necessity and war and self-defense and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, September 12, 2001 - 9:35 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

Carl von Clausewitz, the renowned military strategist of the last century, wrote that:

> War is not merely an act of policy but a true political instrument, a continuation of political inter-course, carried on with other means . . . the political object is the goal, war is the means of reaching it, and means can never be considered in isolation from the purpose. [4]

[*246] Von Clausewitz' premise reminds us that application of the military instrument, at whatever level of intensity, is always pursuant to an overarching national political purpose. Article II of the Constitution vests the executive power of the United States, and responsibility for the development and execution of the foreign policy of our nation, in the President. [5] Article II further provides that the President is the Commander in Chief of the armed forces. [6] Under this fundamental constitutional construct, the military forces of the United States are at all times and for all purposes under the control of, and responsive to, civilian leadership. In a Clausewitzian sense, rules of engagement serve the most fundamental of political purposes -- they ensure that the military instrument of the United States is indeed employed pursuant to the overarching national political purposes of our nation.

Rules of engagement shape the application of military force to national political objectives by:

(a) providing standing guidance on the use of force during time of peace;
(b) controlling the application of force during transition from peace to war;
(c) controlling combat operations during time of war; and
(d) controlling the application of force during transition from war back to peace. [7]

At all times, our rules of engagement are designed to provide for the safety and survival of U.S. military forces that come into harm's way and to ensure successful accomplishment of any mission that those forces may be tasked to undertake. Our rules of engagement are also the principal mechanism of [*247] ensuring that U.S. military forces are at all times in full compliance with our obligations under domestic as well as international law.

U.S. rules of engagement are, therefore, based upon three pillars - national policy, operational requirements and law. To be truly effective, the rules of engagement that govern the military forces of the United States must be fully consistent with the political objectives of our national policy, the dictates of the law, and the safety and survival of our forces during the prompt and effective accomplishment of their mission.

In October 1994, the NCA approved the Standing Rules of Engagement for US Forces. Issued by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the form of a Chairman's Instruction (CJCSI 3121.01), they replace the JCS Peacetime Rules of Engagement which had been last promulgated in 1988. [8] The SROE consist of the basic Chairman's Instruction and four enclosures which set forth "Standing Rules of Engagement for U.S. Forces" (Enclosure A), "Supplemental Measures" (Enclosure B), "Compendium and Combatant Commander's Special ROE" (Enclosure C), and "References" (Enclosure D). A Glossary of abbreviations, acronyms, terms and definitions is also included. [9]

A. The Chairman's Instruction

REV_00259454

The basic Chairman Instruction (CJCSI 3121.01) is just two pages in length. The purpose paragraph of the instruction establishes that the SROE serve two distinct purposes: implementing the inherent right of self-defense and providing guidance for the application of force for mission accomplishment. At the outset of this discussion of the SROE, it is imperative to keep in mind these two purposes, self-defense and mission accomplishment, as a clear understanding of the differences between the two is critical to the proper understanding and implementation of the SROE.

The Chairman's Instruction provides that the SROE apply to U.S. forces during all military operations and contingencies and the policies and procedures established by the SROE remain in effect until rescinded. [*248] Moreover, they may be augmented by supplemental ROE for specific operations or mission.

As a general rule, the SROE apply to all U.S. forces at all places at all times. As the title to the document underscores, these are standing ROE. They are not limited to peacetime application, but are designed to remain effective in prolonged conflict as well. There are no "wartime" ROE awaiting implementation at the first outbreak of hostilities. The SROE, augmented as necessary by supplemental rules, are the bedrock of U.S. military engagement throughout the spectrum of conflict.

The basic Chairman's Instruction notes that the NCA approves ROE for U.S. forces and that the Joint Operations Division (J-3) of the Joint Staff is responsible for their maintenance. This later observation is worthy of elaboration. The development, maintenance and implementation of ROE are the province of the operational directorate -- not the staff judge advocate, not the intelligence officer, not the planner, and not the logistician. All of the latter have important roles to play in this process, but it is imperative that both the operational commander and the judge advocate (or other staff specialists) understand that ROE are properly within the responsibility of the operations directorate. Judge advocates in operational law positions must be well versed in ROE and must be prepared to support the commander and the operations directorate as fully and effectively as possible in their development and interpretation. The commander and the mission will not be well served, however, if unwarranted deference is made to the special ROE expertise that we expect of the operational lawyer.

The Chairman's Instruction notes that "Enclosure A [the first 8 pages of Enclosure A] is unclassified and intended to be used as a coordination tool with U.S. allies for the development of combined or multinational ROE that are consistent with these SROE." [10] Promulgation of the underlying principles and policies of the SROE in an unclassified format is a major improvement over past practice. Heretofore, our ROE were classified SECRET-NOFORN (no foreign nationals) in their entirety. Given the reality of coalition warfare and the day-to-day occurrence of combined operations in the MOOTW [11] arena, the utility of fostering commonality in basic ROE precepts with allied forces is obvious. Moreover, the promulgation of basic ROE principles in an unclassified format facilitates a broader understanding of the policies and procedures of the SROE among U.S. forces.

[*249] B. Structure of the SROE

Any meaningful effort to become conversant with the SROE should begin with an examination of the Table of Contents of that document. Consisting of four Enclosures and the Glossary, the SROE must be seen as an integral whole; a sophisticated system rather than a litany of disparate rules. Proper implementation of the SROE, whether in regard to self-defense or mission accomplishment, requires that commanders -- at whatever echelon of command -- and the operational lawyers providing guidance and assistance to them, comprehend the SROE as a system. That comprehension begins with a familiarity of the Table of Contents.

Enclosure A, entitled "Standing Rules" sets forth the purpose, scope and policy of the SROE. As noted above, the first eight pages of Enclosure A are unclassified. It is here that one finds the fundamental expression of U.S. policy regarding rules of engagement. The unclassified provisions are supported by four classified Appendices which, in turn, contain a number of Annexes, which are also classified. Appendix A -- General Standing Rules -- builds upon the general provisions of the unclassified text by, inter alia, delineating where the authority to declare forces hostile is fixed, and by providing guidance on operational security (OPSEC), tactical military deception, and security operations at U.S. diplomatic and consular facilities abroad. The three Annexes thereunder address "Command and Control and Information Warfare" (Annex A), "Counterdrug Support Operations" (Annex B) and "Noncombatant Evacuation Operations" (Annex C). [12]

REV_00259455

Appendix B of Enclosure A is entitled "US Seaborne Forces" and provides more definitive guidance for U.S. forces engaged in or supporting seaborne operations. Note that the guidance applies to all seaborne operations and is not limited to Navy, Marine Corps or Coast Guard activities. Air Force units providing Civil Air Patrol (CAP), refueling, reconnaissance, strike, etc., support for seaborne operations are embraced by this Appendix, as are Army units operating from or in support of seaborne platforms. Two annexes support Appendix B - "Defense of US Citizens and Their Property at Sea" (Annex A) and "Recovery of US Government Property at Sea" (Annex B). [13]

Appendix C, entitled "Air Operations" provides guidance for all air operations other than those in support of seaborne operations. Naval aviation, when "feet-dry" or otherwise in support of other than seaborne operations, falls under Appendix C. These are not "U.S. Air Force" rules, they are U.S. air forces rules. [14]

[*250] Appendix D, "Land Operations," similarly embraces all U.S. ground forces irrespective of Service affiliation. Thus, they govern, e.g., the use of force by U.S. Air Force security police engaged in air base defense. [15]

Enclosure B, "Supplemental Measures," provides the means to tailor mission accomplishment rules to the particular circumstances at hand. Supplemental measures provide tactically realistic guidance to operational commanders regarding the employment of force in mission accomplishment. Consisting of a numbered series of authorizations and restrictions, supplemental measures, applied through a formatted message system, are designed to ensure that mission accomplishment rules reflect the dynamic realities of the mission setting. To make them more "user friendly" the supplemental measures are set out in four Annexes - "General Supplemental Measures List" (Annex A), "Supplemental Measures List for Maritime Operations" (Annex B), "Supplemental Measures List for Air Operations" (Annex C), and "Supplemental Measures List for Land Operations" (Annex D). A fifth Annex describes the formatted message system (Annex E).

Enclosure C contains a "Compendium" of other ROE-related guidance as well as the "Combatant Commander's Special ROE." Each of the Unified Combatant Commanders (CINC's) (currently 9 in number - 5 geographic and 4 functional [16]) as well as the Commander, U.S. Element, North American Defense Command (NORAD) is provided an opportunity to include theater-specific or function-specific ROE in the SROE. Those CINC specific rules, which of course require prior approval by the NCA, are set forth in Annexes A through J. [17]

Enclosure D, entitled References, lists a series of DOD Directives, Joint publications and other doctrinal authority pertaining to military operations and capabilities.

Lastly, is the Glossary of abbreviations, acronyms, terms and definitions. It is important to note here that the Glossary, like each of the Enclosures, is an [*251] integral and essential part of the SROE structure. Amplifying policy guidance, in the form of definitional expressions, is often found in the Glossary.

II. SELF-DEFENSE

REV_00259456

The inherent right of self-defense, as articulated in customary international law and reflected in the Charter of the United Nations, [18] is the basis of the self-defense provisions of the SROE. Under international law, the predicate for actions taken in self-defense consists of two elements -- necessity and proportionality. Necessity is defined in the law as the presence of an imminent danger of an armed attack. [19] In military parlance, and in the SROE, necessity is expressed as the occurrence of a hostile act or demonstration of hostile intent, e.g., someone is shooting at you or is about to do so.

The proportionality element of the self-defense equation establishes the nature and magnitude of the response that is permitted when the necessity element is present. Proportionality, an often misunderstood concept, is not a body-count equation. Proportionality does not mean that if they killed six of our people, we kill six of theirs. Nor does it mean if they fired at us with a 166 millimeter howitzer, we are allowed to respond in kind. As defined in international law -- and in the SROE -- proportionality is the degree of force, that is reasonable in terms of intensity, duration and magnitude, required to decisively counter the hostile act or demonstration of hostile intent that constitutes the necessity part of the equation - but no more than that. [20]

Under the SROE, self-defense is addressed at two levels, the unit level (or unit self-defense) and the national level (or national self-defense.) To fully comprehend the concept of self-defense in the SROE, it is important to understand the nature of these two levels.

[*252] A. Unit Self-defense

Unit self-defense is the authority and obligation of commanders to defend their units from hostile acts and demonstrations of hostile intent. Determining the existence of a hostile act or demonstration of hostile intent is a function of the professional military judgment of the on-scene commander. The fundamental policy within the SROE pertaining to unit self-defense is expressed as follows: "These rules do not limit a commander's inherent authority and obligation to use all necessary means available and to take all appropriate action in self-defense of the commander's unit and other U.S. forces in the vicinity. [21]

This policy pronouncement is the only guidance in the SROE that is presented in all capital letters and all bold print. Its importance is also reflected in the fact that it is repeated, verbatim, ten times throughout the document. A close analysis of this policy statement is therefore in order.

The words "These rules do not limit" highlight that notwithstanding other guidance contained in the SROE, this expression of policy is paramount and immutable. "A Commander's inherent authority and obligation" establishes the fundamental premise that all commanders at every echelon of command are both authorized and obligated to defend the forces entrusted to their command. It is not a matter of discretion. The commander will defend his forces as an inherent function of command. "To use all necessary means available" instructs that in exercising this authority and obligation, the commander may employ the military capability, e.g., forces, weapons, tactics at hand (other than those weapons that are specifically controlled at all times by the NCA), as the commander determines is necessary. "*And to take all appropriate action in self-defense" refers to the proportionality part of the self-defense equation. The responsive action must be reasonable in intensity, duration and magnitude based upon all of the facts known to that commander at that time. "Of the commander's unit" refers to the aircraft, squadron, ship, tank, squad, platoon, division, etc. that constitutes the "unit" of that particular "commander." "And other U.S. forces in the vicinity" imposes on the commander the authority and obligation of self-defense of any other US forces entity that may be present. Consequently, an Air Force or Navy aircraft commander has the obligation to come to the defense of an Army or Marine unit on the ground that is confronted with a hostile act or demonstration of hostile intent. This authority and obligation of unit self-defense does not extend to the defense of other U.S. citizens and property or to foreign forces. The

REV_00259457

SROE provide separate guidance for such contingencies. Individual self-defense, that is, the authority and obligation of self-defense of individual military members within a unit, is a [*253] subset of unit self-defense. That means that the individual soldier or marine on patrol in the streets of Mogadishu has the authority and obligation to defend himself and other U.S. force members. [22]

As noted previously, determination by an on-scene commander that the "unit" is being subjected to a hostile act or a demonstration of hostile intent is necessarily a matter of professional military judgment. While a hostile act is ordinarily self-evident - you generally know when you are being shot at - the existence of a demonstration of hostile intent is necessarily a most difficult determination to make. Admiral Frank Kelso, USN, while addressing commanders participating in a ROE symposium some years ago, remarked, "The determination of hostile intent is the single most difficult decision that a commander has to make during peacetime." [23]

The rationale behind this observation is compelling. It is difficult to define the intention of another party under the best of circumstances. When that judgment must be made in a dynamic operational context on the basis of incomplete and often conflicting information, and when the on-scene commander may not have the luxury of 90 seconds to make a decision, the complexity of the equation is several orders of magnitude greater. Moreover, the commander must always bear in mind the terrible consequences of being wrong. To be overly cautious may result in the destruction of the unit. Conversely, to be too fast to respond may risk death or injury to persons innocent of hostile intention. Therefore, the guidance in the SROE recognizes that the determination of hostile intent is necessarily a matter of sound military judgment; judgment that must take into consideration the military evidence of the situation, i.e., the capabilities and physical actions of the person or platform presenting a threat. The on-scene commander must also consider the intelligence information that has been provided, e.g., indications and warnings, as well as the political backdrop against which these events are unfolding.

[*254] B. National Self-defense

National self-defense involves actions to defend "the United States, US forces, and in certain circumstances, US citizens and their property, US command assets, and other designated non-US forces, foreign nationals and their property" from hostile acts and demonstrations of hostile intent. [24] The exercise of national self-defense ordinarily involves the act of declaring a foreign force or terrorist unit hostile. Once such an entity has been declared hostile by appropriate authority, the on-scene commander no longer need observe a hostile act or demonstration of hostile intent before engaging that force or unit. For obvious reasons, the authority to declare a force hostile is very carefully circumscribed.

The SROE provide that the authority to defend non-U.S. forces, "collective self-defense," is a subset of national self-defense that only the NCA may authorize.

C. Action in Self-defense

Amplifying "all necessary means available" and "all appropriate action", the SROE establish the following guidelines for use of force in self-defense:

a. Use of force is ordinarily a measure of last resort. When the situation permits, a potentially hostile force should be warned and given an opportunity to withdraw.

b. When force is in fact required, it must be proportional. This means that the amount of force to use must not exceed that which is required to decisively counter the hostile act or demonstration of hostile intent.

REV_00259458

c. Once the hostile act or demonstration of hostile intent has been successfully countered, or the threat is otherwise no longer imminent, the authority to continue the engagement ceases. [25]

The SROE generally contemplate that the on-scene commander will make every effort to contact superiors in the chain of command, report the circumstances as they unfold, and obtain any additional guidance that may pertain. However, the SROE also recognize that there may very well be no opportunity to do so. In any case, the authority and obligation of the on-scene commander to defend his or her unit remains undiminished.

[*255] III. MISSION ACCOMPLISHMENT

The second basic purpose of the SROE is to provide guidance for mission accomplishment. This purpose is distinct from that of self-defense. Mission accomplishment is a function of how U.S. forces are to be employed in the execution of their assigned tasks. This includes the what, the when, the where, and the how of the mission. Mission accomplishment guidance under the SROE will take the form of supplemental measures promulgated by appropriate authority. Enclosure B to the SROE sets forth this system of supplemental measures. At the outset, Enclosure B states that such measures define limits or grant authority for mission accomplishment, not self-defense. To emphasize this point, the following policy pronouncement is set out in that Enclosure: "Supplemental measures do not limit a commander's inherent authority and obligation to use all necessary means available and to take all appropriate action in self-defense of the commander's unit and other U.S. forces in the vicinity." [26]

A hypothetical example may be useful to illustrate this precept - that supplemental measures do not bear on self-defense. Assume that an operational commander has been tasked to enforce a "no-fly zone" to prevent intrusion into a defined airspace by military aircraft of a particular nation. Assume further that supplementary measures under the SROE have been promulgated providing guidance for the accomplishment of that mission. One such measure provides that intruding aircraft are not to be so engaged without the express authority of the designated area air defense commander. Clearly, an F-16 pilot engaged in that mission will comply with that supplemental measure, e.g., he or she will not engage intruding aircraft absent specific authority from the designated air defense commander to do so. However, let us now assume that our F-16 pilot, while on patrol of the "no-fly zone", encounters an aircraft that he or she determines is demonstrating hostile intent and time does not permit contacting the air defense commander. Is that pilot authorized to engage the threatening aircraft notwithstanding the supplemental measure necessitating authorization from the air defense commander? Of course. The supplemental measure here under consideration, like any and all supplemental measures, has nothing whatsoever to do with self-defense. In this instance, the F-16 pilot is authorized (and obliged!) ". . . to use all necessary means available and to take all appropriate action in self-defense . . ." [27] If that pilot determines that engagement of the intruding aircraft is necessary and appropriate in order to decisively counter the imminent threat that it poses, he or she would be fully justified in doing so.

[*256] It is also important to bear in mind that supplemental measures are designed to facilitate command and control of the force. Any measure listed in Enclosure B of the SROE may be requested by any echelon of command. The level of authority necessary to approve a particular measure depends upon the nature of the measure under consideration. This approval authority is set out in the SROE. It is also important to understand that if there is no listed supplemental measure that "fits" the contemplated need, the requesting or approving commander is free to draft a measure that does "fit". Indeed, the listings of supplemental measures in Enclosure B contain numerous "spare" numbers just for that purpose.

REV_00259459

IV. LESSONS LEARNED

A primer on rules of engagement would not be complete without a brief discussion of the principal "lessons learned" that caused the SROE to evolve as it has. Lessons learned are more often than not the product of something that has gone wrong -- often tragically wrong. A comprehensive assessment of ROE lessons learned over the past two decades is obviously beyond the scope of this paper. However, the following examples should prove insightful;

A. ROE are Dynamic

To be effective, ROE must reflect operational reality. As the mission evolves, as it inevitably will, so too must the ROE. This is particularly true with respect to the threat, which is a function of both capabilities and intentions - ours as well as that of potential adversaries. ROE that are adequately "robust" in one setting may be decidedly less so in another.

B. ROE Are Not Written in Stone

It is important to appreciate the difference between the Ten Commandments, which are depicted as chiseled in stone for all eternity, and ROE. By their very nature, ROE are designed to be questioned, and when necessary, changed. Indeed, commanders at every echelon of command have the obligation to always question the ROE provided to them. If the authority provided is considered to be inadequate, excessive or unclear, that concern must be voiced. The system of the SROE is designed with that purpose in mind.

C. Mind-set

How ROE are actually implemented by the operational commander on the scene may very well be a function of the "mind-set" of that particular individual. In the compressed time equation of a hostile act or demonstration [*257] of hostile intent encounter, when a potentially fateful decision may have to be taken on literally a moment's notice, the mind-set that the commander awoke with that morning may be decisive. If that mind-set is one of safety over security, of "try not to hurt anyone", that commander's response may be quite different than that of the commander with a mind-set of "don't take the first hit." The point here is that there is more to this business of ROE than promulgating written guidance. It is also important to understand how that guidance is being inculcated in the thought processes of the commander - the mind-set.

D. Common Understanding

All too often ROE take on one meaning at one echelon of command and quite another at a higher or lower echelon. It was with this problem in mind during the Iran-Iraq "Tanker War" in the Persian Gulf (1987-88) that the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff met privately with the Commander, Middle East Command to discuss application of the applicable ROE in a variety of possible settings. Their purpose of course, was to ensure that the Chairman and the onscene commander had a common understanding of the ROE.

E. Tailored to the User

The document described in this article, the SROE provides the policies and procedures that govern all U.S. forces commanders - from CINC's to sergeants. Necessarily, the SROE are broad based, detailed and, in a word, complex. Consequently, the guidance of the SROE must be tailored to the circumstance of its application. This may take the form of supplemental ROE for specific operations or missions. It may also take the form of basic rules reproduced on plasticised cards pinned to the flak-jacket of individual troopers or inserted into the combat mission folder (CMF) of aircrew members. Whatever the mechanism, the need to tailor the SROE to the user's requirements cannot be overstated.

REV_00259460

V. CONCLUSION

This "primer" on the SROE is just that -- a primer. It is a place to begin what, for the operational lawyer, must become a career-long pursuit. There are no "ultimate experts" in the business of rules of engagement. The subject is far too important to be taken lightly and far too complex to be studied cavalierly. Premised upon national policy, international and domestic law, and operational necessity, the SROE ensure that U.S. military forces are at all times responsive to the direction of the constitutionally established civilian leadership of our [*258] nation. The SROE implement the inherent right of self-defense for those forces and provide to them guidance for the application of force for mission accomplishment across the spectrum of military operations and contingencies. No small accomplishment.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 Chairman Joint Chiefs of Staff Instruction 3121.02, Standing Rules of Engagement for United States Forces (1994) [hereinafter CJCSI 3121.02].

n2 The "National Command Authorities", a plural term, is defined as "The President and the Secretary of Defense or their duly deputized alternates or successors. Commonly referred to as NCA." Joint Pub. 1-02, Dictionary of Military and Associated Terms (1994) at 253.

n3 The SROE defines rules of engagement as "Directives issued by competent military authority which delineate the circumstances and limitations under which U.S. forces will initiate and/or continue combat engagement with other forces encountered." CJCSI 3121.02, supra note 1, at A-5. This definition has been specifically held to include terrorist units. Id.

n4 CARL VON CLAUSEWITZ, ON WAR 87 (Michael Howard & Peter Paret eds., 1984).

n5 U.S. CONST. art. II. Article II, § 1 provides, "The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America . . . ." Id.

n6 Id. Article II, § 2, also provides that "the President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States." Id. Of course, the Congress also has a role under the Constitution in the governance of the armed forces. Article I, § 8 provides, inter alia, that:

> The Congress shall have Power to lay and collect Taxes . . . and provide for the common Defense and general Welfare of the United States;
>
> . . . .
> To raise and support Armies . . .;
> To provide and maintain a Navy;
> To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval forces . . . .

U.S. Const. art I, § 8.

n7 United States Naval War College, Rules of Engagement Lecture Materials, Oceans Law and Policy Department (on file with author).

n8 The 1988 Peacetime Rules of Engagement for U.S. Forces were promulgated to the Unified and Specified Combatant Commanders and Commander U.S. Element, NORAD, by Memorandum of the Secretary of the Joint Staff, Oct. 28, 1988. Paragraph 1 of the memorandum stated: "The Secretary of Defense has approved the attached 'Peacetime Rules of Engagement for U.S. Forces,' which is forwarded for your compliance." The 1988 rules

REV_00259461

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: (engagement) and necessity and war and self-defense and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)

*152 Mil. L. Rev. 33, **

Military Law Review

Spring, 1996

152 Mil. L. Rev. 33

LENGTH: 24444 words

ARTICLE: OPERATIONAL LAW -- A CONCEPT MATURES

LIEUTENANT COLONEL MARC L. WARREN *

* Judge Advocate General's Corps, United States Army. B.A., University of Florida, 1978; J.D. (with honors), University of Florida, 1981; LL.M. (Commandant's List), The Judge Advocate General's School (TJAGSA), 1993. Formerly assigned as Legal Assistance Officer, XVIII Airborne Corps, 1981-1982; Administrative Law Officer, XVIII Airborne Corps, 1982-1983; Operational Law Officer and Claims Judge Advocate, U.S. Forces Grenada, 1983; Chief, Operational Law/Administrative Law Officer, 199th Judge Advocate Detachment, 1984-1988; Chief, International Affairs, V Corps, 1988-1989; Special Assistant to the SJA/Trial Counsel, V Corps, 1989; Chief, International and Operational Law, V Corps, 1989-1990; Officer in Charge, Fulda Branch Office, V Corps SJA, 1990-1992; Regimental Judge Advocate, 11th Armored Cavalry Regiment/Legal Advisor, Task Force Victory (Kuwait), 1991; Instructor, International and Operational Law Department, TJAGSA, 1993-1995. Editor, Operational Law Handbook, 1994-1995. Member of the Bars of Florida, U.S. Supreme Court, U.S. Tax Court, 11th Circuit Court of Appeals, Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, and U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Florida.

SUMMARY:
... This article describes the context of contemporary military operations and suggests an operational focus for the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps. ... From running the "weapons for cash" turn-in program in Grenada to investigating war crimes in Kuwait, from trying courts-martial in Saudi Arabia to advising detainee interrogators in Haiti, from participating in targeting cells in Somalia to sitting on joint military commissions in Bosnia, judge advocates constantly expand the scope of the practice of operational law. ... Beyond the content of the mission statement, ascertaining the proper scope of a mission is at times complicated by the inherent vagaries of the term "MOOTW." ... In Haiti, in a heavily publicized incident occurring two days into the operation, the United States military was criticized for not intervening to prevent the beating death of a civilian coconut vendor. ... Law of armed conflict training at the soldier-level should center on performanceoriented training on the "Soldier's Rules," nine minimum principles which every soldier must know and obey. ... Perhaps the most accurate forecast of the future of operational law -- and thus of the Corps -- was provided not by a judge advocate, but by a commander:

...

Commanders should be counseled chiefly by persons of known talent; by those who have legal, document.

A recommended approach to the ROE staff process is to form a ROE working group. (The group could be termed an "ROE Board" or exist as part of, or adjunct to, an extant targeting board.) The G3, G2 (Intelligence), and SJA (or their representatives) constitute the group. The G3 brings knowledge of the mission, operations details, and Commander's Intent; the G2 contributes information concerning the threat (intent, capabilities, and systems); and the SJA adds insight concerning language and meaning, enforceability, and the law of armed conflict. Collectively, the group considers the ROE in the context of the mission statement and the Commander's Intent, both from their own and higher headquarters. The working group is not a committee. Their conclusions and proposals are briefed to, and approved by, the commander (ROE are the commander's rules for the use of force).

If time permits, proposed ROE are distributed for comment to subordinate commanders (brigade and battalion, for example) and senior noncommissioned officers. Recognition of reality is as significant in drafting ROE as situation awareness is in implementing them. A 10th Mountain Division soldier's comment suggests the complex dynamic associated with ROE: "The ROE vignettes are a lot like football plays. We practice the vignettes, but in the real game, they let the fans on the field." [90]

Just as the JCS SROE is guidance from the NCA to the CINCs, ROE in contingency operations are primarily guidance from the CINCs to subordinate commanders. These ROE are typically tailored to the particular mission and scenario and may reflect control measures (for example, no incendiaries, no riot control agents [*55] (RCA), [91] nor unobserved fires) which result from political or practical considerations. These control measures seldom impact on the firing of small arms by individual soldiers. For most individual soldiers, the term "ROE" is a misnomer. Particularly in MOOTW, and in any scenario without a declared "hostile force," [92] ROE for the individual soldier might be more appropriately termed "RUF" ("rules for the use of force") or "OFOF" ("orders for opening fire"). [93] In such circumstances, the trigger for the use of force is the conduct, not the status, of the threat.

More fundamentally, with the JCS SROE establishing standing policies and rules concerning the right and obligation of unit self-defense, commanders and judge advocates should consider what standing principles they have given their soldiers which enable them to exercise the right and obligation of self-defense. Simple, memorable "default rules" can serve as the basis both for repetitive generalized training and for additional rules in a specific operation. [94] The standing, or "default," principles can be stated as [*56] acronyms for ease of recollection in training and implementation. [95]

Standing rules, by whatever name, may be supplemented or modified in -- and often during -- an actual operation. Soldiers must be alert and responsive to, and trained to anticipate, changes in ROE. Changes in the application of the ROE may occur because of changes in mission or threat. In Somalia, for example, the overall ROE remained fairly constant throughout the operation. What changed, predominately due to changes in the threat to United States forces, was the way in which the ROE were applied to, for example, Somali Technicals, light trucks carrying crew-served weapons. In the early stages of the operation, Technicals were permissible targets only if they posed a threat to United States forces by demonstrating hostile intent or committing a hostile act. As the operation progressed, and Technicals repeatedly fired on United States forces, they were simply deemed a threat to United States forces and could be targeted at any time. [96]

Operations in Macedonia [97] and Haiti illustrate the effect of context, threat, and mission on ROE. These operations also high-light the disciplined flexibility required of United States military personnel who must implement ROE in subtle operations. In Macedonia, United States forces operate under Chapter VI of the UN Charter as part of a UN "peacekeeping force" [98] tasked to observe and report Serbian military movements near the Serbian-Macedonian border. In Haiti, United States forces operated under Chapter VII of the UN Charter as part of a multinational force tasked to restore the Aristide government to power. In Macedonia, the threat to UN forces is low, but fairly certain; in Haiti, the threat was low, but, at least in the early stages of the operation, the threat was uncertain.

[*57] As of the writing of this article, in Macedonia, Serbian soldiers have pointed small arms at United States patrols and, on at least two occasions, detained United States soldiers for a period of hours. [99] United States soldiers have neither fired at Serb forces nor physically resisted detention. By contrast, in Haiti, a United States Marine platoon preemptively fired on a group of Haitian policemen, killing ten of them, after the Haitian officer in charge of the group raised the muzzle of his submachine gun. [100] The acts of both the soldiers in Macedonia and the Marines in Haiti were appropriate based on their respective missions, threats, and contexts.

Rules of engagement in MOOTW typically stress two concepts: self-defense and restraint, but neither principle is within the exclusive domain of MOOTW. United States forces may use force in self-defense in any context; United States forces frequently practice restraint in war. What makes the principles so significant in MOOTW is the means by which they are regulated. For example, the use of warning shots, a practice conceived with good intentions and fraught with practical difficulties, has crept into ROE as a means of tempering self-defense with restraint. The proper use of warning shots requires rigorous training; in most cases, warning shots may create, not prevent, incidents suggesting lack of discipline. [101]

Conversely, ROE in MOOTW should address the use of force to defend military property, and the circumstances under which force may be used to defend civilians. In addressing these and other appropriate issues, judge advocates and commanders must guard against the temptation to cram ROE with guidance, procedures, or admonitions unrelated to the use of force. Rules of engagement and ROE extracts are diluted when they contain restatements of the law of armed conflict, reporting requirements, or weapons safety instructions.

D. Prisoners and Detainees

Operation Desert Storm presented a relatively uncomplicated context within which to address prisoner of war issues. [102] The war was unquestionably an international armed conflict, and southern [*58] Iraq was a territory under partial occupation, within the meaning of Article 2 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War of 12 August 1949 [103] (GPW). Persons who met the criteria of Article 4 of the GPW (members of the Iraqi Army, for example) were accordingly "the right kind of people in the right kind of place" and entitled to the status of prisoners of war as a matter of law.

Military operations other than war frequently present scenarios in which United States forces encounter persons who do not qualify for legal status as prisoners of war. In Panama, Somalia, and Haiti, for example, persons captured after having committed hostile acts against United States forces were not entitled to legal status as prisoners of war. None of the persons were in an international armed conflict or in occupied territory. [104] In Somalia, for example, United States forces were confronted by armed civilians who fought with impunity as unlawful combatants. The challenge in such operations is to ensure that soldiers act with discipline and humanity and that they act in accordance with the rules on which they have been trained.

In this regard, the humanitarian provisions of the GPW are of particular value in nuanced operations. They establish a baseline or foundation of understood rules of humanity. They provide a common point of reference and minimum standards of humanitarian treatment from which particular problems may be resolved either by application or analogy.

In Panama, Somalia, and Haiti, captured persons -- termed "detainees" -- were treated as prisoners of war during their capture and initial period of detention. [105] Although not qualifying for prisoner of war status, detainees were treated with dignity and humanity.

REV_00259474

Detainees in Panama, most of whom met the criteria for members of the regular armed force under Article 4 of the GPW, were treated as prisoners of war throughout their brief period of captivity. [106] [*59] In Somalia and Haiti, detainees were treated in accordance with the humanitarian, but not administrative or technical, standards of the GPW.

In both Somalia and Haiti, United States forces detained persons who fell within two deliberately narrow categories: those who posed a threat to the force and those who had committed a serious criminal act. Judge advocates prepared the list of humanitarian standards for detainees by using the humanitarian provisions of the GPW, among other authorities, [107] as a general foundation. They then tailored additional standards to the nuances of each operation.

In Somalia, for example, detainees were originally held in anticipation of release to the custody of an emerging Somali government. As the political situation in Somalia failed to improve, detainees were held not only for a longer time than anticipated, but toward an uncertain disposition. The United States refrained from trying any of the detainees (many of whom were unlawful combatants or common criminals) by military commission or general court-martial as it could have under Articles 18 and 21 of the UCMJ and under the law of armed conflict. [108] Some of the detainees, held for less serious infractions, were simply released over time. More serious offenders were transferred to the custody of the UN. [109]

Although human rights groups generally found the conditions of detention to be acceptable, the uncertain circumstances and duration of the detention provoked some criticism. Some detainees objected to being held without arraignment or trial. Some claimed that they did not know why they were being held or that they were mistreated in the course of interrogation. Several detainees expressed concern that they were afforded no forum in which to communicate with military authorities and "tell their side of the story" concerning the incident occasioning their detention. [110]

[*60] In Haiti, judge advocates helped develop an innovative approach to address the criticisms and concerns which had arisen in Somalia. [111] A judge advocate was assigned to the Joint Interrogation Center and to the Joint Detention Center. Military Intelligence interrogators questioning the detainees were instructed to use the same rules, and restrict themselves to the same interrogation techniques, as would apply to prisoners of war. Detainees were allowed visitation hours four days per week. Visitors could include family members, physicians, or attorneys. The Detention Center Commander provided a daily list of detainees to the ICRC. [112]

Each detainee was visited by a "detainee judge advocate" within seventy-two hours of his detention. [113] Through an interpreter, the detainee judge advocate explained to the detainee the basis for his detention and afforded the detainee the opportunity to communicate, through the detainee judge advocate, to the general officer commanding the multinational force. The communication of the detainee, which generally requested immediate release, was reduced to writing, then forwarded through the SJA to the commanding general. The SJA, and the force's J-2 (intelligence section) and provost marshal, would collectively review detainees' requests for release.

Almost all of the detainees in Haiti requested release through this procedure; about one-fourth of them were released by order of the commanding general. Most were released within two weeks of their detention after investigation established that they were not a threat to the multinational force. The remaining detainees, most of whom had been detained for commission of serious criminal acts, were transferred to the custody of the Haitian government. [114]

The utility of the GPW in establishing minimum treatment standards for detainees is exemplified by the provisions of the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel. [115] Applying by its terms only in those operations which [*61] the

REV_00259475

GPW does not apply as a matter of law, the Convention requires that captors treat captured or detained UN and associated personnel in accordance with "the principles and spirit of the Geneva Conventions of 1949." This approach -- demanding treatment, but not status, in accordance with the GPW -- was used by the United States in its communications with Mohammed Aideed concerning Chief Warrant Officer Two Michael Durant, the Army helicopter pilot detained in Somalia in October 1993. [116]

E. Indigenous Civilians

Humanitarian protections afforded to civilians cannot only affect, but define, the conduct of military operations. In both Grenada and Panama, the safety of United States civilians present in those nations was an articulated basis for United States intervention under Article 51 of the UN Charter. The suffering of indigenous civilians was at the very heart of military operations in Somalia and Rwanda. In Haiti, the poor human rights record of the de facto government of General Cedras was cited as moral, if not legal, persuasion for United States intervention.

The problem for commanders and judge advocates in such operations is how to translate lofty humanitarian goals into practical action. When given mission statements which include such general directives as "restore order" or "create a stable environment," how should judge advocates assist commanders discharge their humanitarian obligations toward civilians? What minimum humanitarian rules apply to civilians? [117]

In occupied territory, the entire range of protections, responsibilities, and rights enumerated in the Geneva Convention for the Protection of Civilians in Time of War [118] (GC) apply to civilians who are "protected persons" within the scope of the Convention. "Occupation," a term of legal precision and significance, is a question of fact. [119] Occupation may be partial or total and follows hostile [*62] invasion, whether resisted or unresisted. An example of partial occupation was the United States occupation of southern Iraq after the Gulf War; an example of total occupation was Iraq's occupation of Kuwait after the 1990 invasion.

Most recent military operations were not conducted in occupied territory. The United States was not an occupier in Grenada, Panama, or Rwanda because it was present at the invitation or acquiescence of the governments of those countries. The United States was not an occupier in Somalia because there was no hostile invasion nor was there a supplantation of governmental authority within former enemy territory. Similarly, in Haiti, the United States was not an occupier because there was no hostile invasion; however, this point is much less clear in Haiti than in Somalia. United States forces were present in Haiti at the invitation of the de jure Aristide government, at the acquiescence of the de facto Cedras government, and at the behest of the UN (through Security Council Resolution 940).

Nevertheless, the duress attendant to the acquiescence of the Cedras government -- and the substitution of United States military authority for the authority of the Cedras government -- allow a reasoned argument that United States forces occupied Haiti subsequent to an unresisted invasion. Much like the initial debate over whether the United States was an occupier in southern Iraq, the debate over the legal context of United States forces' presence in Haiti is practically superfluous. The United States routinely assumes the minimum humanitarian responsibilities of an occupier as a matter of policy in the areas under the control of United States Armed Forces. Since World War II, however, the United States has not issued an occupation proclamation or otherwise exercised the rights of an occupier.

In territory which is not occupied, but in which United States forces are present as participants in an international armed conflict, the general human rights protections of the GC apply to civilians. In combat, the goal of United States forces is to minimize civilian casualties and minimize civilian interference with military operations. Insofar as practicable, United States forces should observe the humanitarian principles of the law of occupation on the battlefield and in the areas transited by United States troops.

REV_00259476

In unoccupied territory where United States forces are not present as participants in an international armed conflict, the GC applies only as a matter of policy. It serves mainly as a point of reference and a basis for analogy. For example, in Somalia, United States forces protected civilians from serious criminal acts of other civilians only to the extent that they were in areas under United [*63] States forces' control. A similar approach was utilized in Haiti with the ROE allowing United States forces to detain and using deadly force, if necessary, "persons observed committing serious criminal acts." [120]

The locational limitations present in both Somalia (areas under United States control) and Haiti (criminal acts under observation) were deliberate and designed to restrict the law enforcement activities of United States forces to those mandated by the limited mission statement in each operation. On at least one occasion in Somalia, United States forces properly refused to send soldiers to detain a Somali civilian alleged to have murdered a relief worker. The murder occurred, and the accused Somali civilian resided, outside the area of United States forces' control. [121] The United States military was not the national police force for Somalia.

In Haiti, in a heavily publicized incident occurring two days into the operation, the United States military was criticized for not intervening to prevent the beating death of a civilian coconut vendor. The civilian was beaten with clubs wielded by Haitian police in view of United States soldiers. [122] Despite initial press reports to the contrary, the extant ROE would have allowed the soldiers to stop the beating and detain the attackers. [123] However, United States forces were not legally obligated to act. At the time of the incident, United States forces were consolidating their positions and testing the terms of the Carter-Cedras "power sharing" agreement. They were rightfully concerned about their primary mission at the time: protecting the force. The United States military was not a guarantor for the safety of all civilians in Haiti.

F. Discipline

Discipline is a fundamental aspect of Army operations. [124] In contemporary military operations, where restraint and legitimacy are often important to mission success, and where misconduct can have immediate world-wide impact, disciplined conduct is essential. Discipline is a central component of military effectiveness: [*64] "Untrained and undisciplined troops take heavy casualties; trained and disciplined ones inflict them." [125]

Disciplined operations are not premised on fear of prosecution under the UCMJ. Adherence to the rule of law is instilled by training and based on our national and military values:

> A nation state that disregards the human rights of individuals makes warfare unnecessarily harsh, increases the resolve of its enemy, and changes the nature of the conflict. How the Army fights is a mark of what it is and what it stands for. Laws of war are only effective in reducing casualties and enhancing fair treatment of combatants and noncombatants alike so long as trained leaders ensure that those laws are obeyed. The commander ensures the proper treatment of prisoners, noncombatants, and civilians by building good training programs that reinforce the practice of respecting those laws. [126]

Former Chief of Staff of the Army, General Gordon Sullivan, once told the following story: On the first day of the Haiti operation, a young soldier from the Army's 10th Mountain Division disembarked from a Blackhawk helicopter and took up a prone firing position -- right in front of a network camera crew. A reporter walked over to the soldier, and asked him why he had taken up a defensive firing position when the only apparent threat was from the horde of overzealous reporters. The young soldier responded quickly and surely, "Because that is what I was trained to do." [127]

REV_00259477

Judge advocates can assist in the development of good training programs. [128] They can help make units more capable and versatile. Wherever possible, trainers should combine tactical, law of armed conflict, and ROE training. Training should be realistic, evaluated, and tied to the unit's mission-essential task list. [129] Law of armed conflict training at the soldier-level should center on performanceoriented training on the "Soldier's Rules," nine minimum principles [*65] which every soldier must know and obey. [130] Leader-level training may be more advanced, involving discussions and problem-solving exercises. Particularly when preparing for actual operational application, classes on ROE and on the law of armed conflict should be standardized throughout the unit. [131]

When breaches of discipline occur, commanders and judge advocates must process military justice actions fairly and efficiently in accordance with law and regulation. Military justice is the codal mission of the JAGC [132] and it must be accomplished flawlessly. In operations, this includes making arrangements for defense counsel and military judge support and correctly establishing courts-martial convening authorities in the field and at the home station. The Army must retain its capability to enforce discipline in the field, whether in a combat or noncombat environment. The enforcement of discipline includes trying courts-martial in combat zones. [133] All judge advocates must know how to try courts-martial; as the number of cases diminishes, the importance of correctly handling cases, both from the prosecutorial and defense perspective, increases.

[*66] Judge advocates must have a clear understanding of how to create provisional units and transfer jurisdiction; how to establish courts-martial convening authorities; [134] and how to administer "joint justice" in a Joint Task Force (JTF). [135] Although the legal authority already exists, [136] and joint doctrine and implementing regulations are maturing, [137] practical experience in "joint justice" is limited. The growing role of the joint force commander [138] will reduce the role of the component commander. As a result, the impact of component regulations and policies will diminish, and divergence among the regulations and policies will become increasingly vestigial. Absent compelling reason to the contrary, joint force commanders should have clear disciplinary authority over their subordinates. Their judge advocates must push to make it happen.

As the military draws down and increasingly relies on civilian employees and contractors to perform operational and tactical logistical functions, judge advocates will face questions concerning discipline of, and jurisdiction over, civilians accompanying the force in the field. [139] While sporadic effort has been made to expand courtsmartial jurisdiction to include civilians accompanying the force in [*67] circumstances short of war, [140] no civilian is subject to the UCMJ unless either serving with or accompanying the force in a declared war or accused of a war crime. [141]

Nevertheless, current United States policy allows the arming of civilians for personal defense; authorizes the training of civilians in the law of armed conflict, UCMJ, and use of weapons and equipment; permits the provision of weapons, protective equipment, and uniforms; and requires the issuance of Geneva Convention identification cards. [142] If captured by the enemy in a conflict to which the GPW applies, civilians accompanying the force in the field shall be accorded status as prisoners of war. [143] Arming civilians raises three of the many potential questions associated with the current law and policy pertaining to civilians accompanying the force. One is whether civilian employees and contractors are sufficiently trained to safely and effectively handle weapons. The second is whether persons over whom there is no real disciplinary authority should be armed. Finally, while there is little doubt that civilians accompanying the force are lawful targets for the enemy, [144] what precisely are the limitations on their use of force and how does this affect their status under the law of armed conflict? [145]

REV_00259478

[*68] Since Operation Desert Storm, a punitive order regulating conduct, often referred to as "General Order Number 1," has become common in operations. [146] Very much like ROE, a General Order Number 1 addresses the commander's concerns and lays out the commander's rules. Like ROE, the order should be tailored to each operation. Absolute prohibitions on war trophies [147] and alcohol, while appropriate in most operations, may be unduly restrictive in other scenarios. [148] As always, the commander must strike the balance among morale and discipline and reality and risk. [149]

In combat, a similar balance must be struck between control and latitude, and safety and audacity. Accidents, including fratricide, within the force are unfortunate consequences of operations. While they are not individually inevitable, they are collectively [*69] foreseeable. [150] Mishaps will occur. While accidents should not compromise a mission or halt an operation, they require investigation for myriad reasons, the most important is to ascertain facts to prevent their recurrence. [151] Judge advocates must stand ready to participate in administrative investigations, commander's inquiries, and related activities, including summary courts, line of duty investigations, and casualty notification and survivor assistance duty. Judge advocates must anticipate untoward events and subsequent scrutiny. In more serious cases, or to ease the burden on other officers, judge advocates will serve as investigating officers. In most cases, judge advocates will advise investigating officers and the command. In either event, the command legal section, including its legal noncommissioned officers, has a vital role in completing an accurate, thorough, and legally sufficient report of investigation.

VI. The Future

The challenges of the future are many -- the world is becoming a more dangerous place. [152] Despite good intentions, [153] war will not disappear; it will just become more confusing. The nature of future conflicts will involve competitions of diverse technologies as well as clashes of diverse interests: unregulated weapons of mass destruction versus strictly controlled precision munitions, sticks and clubs versus directed energy weapons, and blunt force versus information warfare.

Not all challenges are external. Changes in force size, structure, and systems afford both opportunity and risk. [154] Nevertheless, change, like the Army's journey into the Twenty-First Century, is inevitable. [155]

[*70] As the Army marches toward Force XXI, the operational law role of the judge advocate becomes even more critical. Smaller, more lethal forces require capable staff officers who are able to process and exploit information. [156] Judge advocates can serve as multifunctional staff officers. They possess the education and experience, judgment and maturity, and mental acuity and flexibility to cope with the complexities and pace of tomorrow's operations. Their greatest asset is the mind, [157] and they require extraordinarily little equipment or support to be fully operational. [158] Judge advocates are force multipliers, particularly within smaller deployed headquarters elements.

The Judge Advocate General's Corps of the future will be:

* joint and interagency compatible;

* multifunctional;

* integrated in doctrine;

* a success multiplier; and

REV_00259479

* a nonlethal element of military power.

The Corps will be joint and interagency compatible, with judge advocates and legal noncommissioned officers trained and ready to deploy in any command or operational environment. Deployed legal elements will likely be joint, built on or with existing headquarters, [*71] and staffed with modules of judge advocates and legal noncommissioned officers. [159] Joint commands in general, and the unified commands in particular, will continue to gain in importance -- and so will their legal advisors. [160] The Corps must develop judge advocates for increasingly key joint assignments. [161] Reserve Component judge advocates and the Corps' civilian attorneys, with their critical legal skills and interagency experience, are an integral part of the Corps of the future.

Judge advocates will increasingly serve as multifunctional staff officers, particularly in civil-military and postconflict operations. Judge advocates have a traditional role in civil affairs. [162] Tomorrow's Army should strongly consider giving the Judge Advocate General's Corps staff responsibility for the civil affairs/civil-military operations mission. [163]

The role of the judge advocate will be increasingly integrated into Army and joint doctrine. The revitalization of the Center for [*72] Law and Military Operations, [164] which has involved judge advocates more fully in the Army's Combat Training Centers, [165] is a major investment by the Corps in the Army of the future. Not only must the Corps continue to refine its doctrine, it must ensure that developing Army and joint doctrine reflects the role of the judge advocate. [166] Judge advocates are key players in operations; their continued presence in deployed units must be enshrined in doctrine, not dependent on the force of personality.

Judge advocates will continue to act as success multipliers. Proactive operational law advice and legal support and services in the field will facilitate mission accomplishment by unburdening commanders, reducing distractions, enforcing discipline, and promoting effectiveness. Prompt and astute advice, and effective training contributions, can set the conditions for future success. Planning and executing the conflict termination [167] and postconflict phases of future operations will increasingly involve judge advocates; they will become key advisors in mission analyses, particularly in helping define success criteria and end states. Judge advocates will assist commanders in executing disciplined operations in compliance with an evolving law of armed conflict, and provide more sophisticated advice in the areas of intelligence law, special operations, and information warfare. They will continue to assist all soldiers and families through legal assistance and family support activities.

The Corps of the future, even more than today, will be a nonlethal element of military power. Its judge advocates are instruments of both engagement and disengagement [168] and merit an expanding [*73] role in international military education and training. They will have a central role in stability and support operations and in building or rehabilitating systems of governance. [169] They will likely become increasingly involved in international criminal tribunals such as those established by the UN for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, and in international conferences and conventions on the evolving law of armed conflict in a changing world. By their very existence, judge advocates represent the rule of law, and their continued presence in the field demonstrates the commitment of the nation -- and the Army -- to discipline and humanity in battle.

VII. Conclusion

The great challenges of the future are important opportunities for the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps. Its officers are members of two great professions and, as soldier-lawyers, they have unbridled potential for future service to the nation. They are, like the commanders and soldiers they serve, the best in the business. As operational law matures, it will increasingly define and expand the role of the Corps. Perhaps the most accurate forecast of the future of operational law -- and thus of the Corps -- was provided not by a judge advocate, but by a commander:

REV_00259480

> Operational law is going to become as significant to the commander as maneuver, as fire support, and as logistics. It will be a principal battlefield activity. The senior SJAs may be as close to the commander as his operations officer or his chief of staff . . . . Operational law and international law are the future. We need an SJA who is a man or a woman for all seasons. SJAs will find themselves more and more part of the operational aspects of the business. They will be the right hand of the commander, and he will come to them for advice. [170] n1 Whether this is really a new phenomenon is debatable. The United States military has long conducted wide-ranging operations at home and abroad. Consider, for example, Operation Bluebat, the 1958 United States intervention in Lebanon (see ROGER J. SPILLER, COMBAT STUDIES INSTITUTE, LEAVENWORTH PAPER NO. 3, NOT WAR BUT LIKE WAR: THE AMERICAN INTERVENTION IN LEBANON (1981)) or Operation Power Pack, the 1965 intervention in the Dominican Republic (see LAWRENCE A. YATES, COMBAT STUDIES INSTITUTE, LEAVENWORTH PAPER NO. 15, POWER PACK: UNITED STATES INTERVENTION IN THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC, 1965-1966 (1988)). What is novel, and the result of the end of the Cold War, is the recent United States participation in repetitive overseas operations authorized or directed by the United Nations (UN).

FOOTNOTES:

n2 10 U.S.C. § 3062 (1988). See DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 100-5, OPERATIONS iv (14 June 1993) [hereinafter FM 100-5, OPERATIONS]; DEP'T OF ARMY WHITE PAPER, DECISIVE VICTORY -- AMERICA'S POWER PROJECTION ARMY 2 (Oct. 1994).

n3 General Maxwell R. Thurman frequently said, "All military operations are political-military operations."

n4 See, e.g., General Gordon R. Sullivan & Lieutenant Colonel Andrew B. Twomey, The Challenges of Peace, PARAMETERS, Autumn 1994, at 4 (discussing "nuanced operations").

n5 "MOOTW encompass the use of military capabilities across the range of military operations short of war." See JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF PUBLICATION 3-07, JOINT DOCTRINE FOR MILITARY OPERATIONS OTHER THAN WAR (16 June 1995) [hereinafter JOINT PUB 3-07, MOOTW]; JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF PUBLICATION 3-0, DOCTRINE FOR JOINT OPERATIONS (9 Sept. 1993); FM 100-5, OPERATIONS, supra note 2, ch. 13.

n6 The operational diversity within MOOTW has caused the Army to revisit the issue of whether there should be any overarching reference to operations other than war (OOTW). See Message, Headquarters, US Army Training and Doctrine Command, DTG 272016Z Oct 95, subject: Commander TRADOC's Philosophy on the Term "Operations Other Than War" (OOTW). What to call OOTW is a tempest in a teapot -- the military has always been involved in operations other than war. Suggestions on the successor to the term "OOTW" range from "small wars" to "operations short of war," and from "low intensity conflict" to, facetiously, "operations formerly known as operations other than war" to "stability and support operations." See, e.g., Dep't of Army, Field Manual 100-20, Stability and Support Operations (1996) (Final Draft). A new FM 100-5, Operations, which must confront the issue, will likely not be published until 1997 or 1998. For analyses of the doctrinal and practical issues associated with overarching terminology, see Colonel Ann E. Story & Major Aryea Gottlieb, Beyond the Range of Military Operations, JOINT TASK FORCE QUARTERLY, Autumn 1995, at 99; Robert J. Bunker, Rethinking OOTW, MIL. REV., Nov.-Dec. 1995, at 34.

REV_00259481

n7 However, JOINT PUB 3-07, MOOTW, identifies "areas requiring legal expertise." These include refugees, displaced and detained civilians, fiscal law, rules of engagement (ROE), psychological operations, civil affairs, medical support, local culture and government, international law and agreements, military and political liaison, claims, and contingency contracting. JOINT PUB 3-07, MOOTW, supra note 5, fig. IV-2.

n8 Lawyers advise and commanders command. Nevertheless, as Sir Francis Bacon wrote: "The greatest trust between man and man is the trust of giving counsel" (quoted in GREGG HERKEN, COUNSELS OF WAR (1985)).

n9 Lieutenant Colonel David E. Graham, Operational Law (OPLAW) -- A Concept Comes of Age, ARMY LAW., Jul. 1987, at 9.

n10 Id.

n11 DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 27-100, LEGAL OPERATIONS 5, 6 (Sept. 1991) [hereinafter FM 27-100, LEGAL OPERATIONS]. The term "legal operations" is a confusing misnomer. A more accurate title for the manual is "Operational Law."

n12 THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S SCHOOL, UNITED STATES ARMY, JA 422, OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK 1-1 (1996) [hereinafter OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK]. The Operational Law Handbook is published each June and is available on the JAGC Electronic Bulletin Board Service and on the Joint Electronics Library (JEL) CDROM on Peace Operations (Joint Warfighting Center, Fort Monroe, Virginia, Dec. 1995).

n13 Judge advocates were involved in military operations long before Grenada. See, e.g., DEP'T OF ARMY, THE ARMY LAWYER: A HISTORY OF THE JAGC, 1775-1975 (1975); MAJOR GENERAL GEORGE S. PRUGH, DEP'T OF ARMY, VIETNAM STUDIES, LAW AT WAR: VIETNAM 1964-1973 (1975) [hereinafter PRUGH, LAW AT WAR]; Colonel Ted B. Borek, *Legal Services During War, 120 MIL. L. REV. 19 (1988).

n14 Major Peter Zolper & Captain Mike Isaaco, The Joint Military Commission -- A Potential Decisive Point, CENTER FOR ARMY LESSONS LEARNED (CALL) NEWSLETTER, Jan.-Feb. 1996, at 8. Joint military commissions are specified under Article VIII of Annex 1A, Military Aspects of the Peace Settlement, of the Agreement on General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Implementing the Dayton Peace Accords), 15 December 1995, Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Republic of Croatia, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia [hereinafter the Dayton Agreement], printed in THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S SCHOOL, MATERIALS ON OPERATIONAL LAW 107, 116 (1996) [hereinafter MATERIALS ON OPERATIONAL LAW].

n15 Cf. Major Richard W. Thelin, Specialization: The Time is Now for Judge Advocates, MARINE CORPS GAZETTE, Feb. 1996, at 29.

n16 If every judge advocate is an operational lawyer, what is the role of the Chief, Operational Law, at corps and divisions? The chief, operational law, is the link between the Staff Judge Advocate (SJA) and other staff elements, primarily operations and intelligence, involved in the planning and execution of operations. The SJA is always the chief operational lawyer. The chief, operational law, is the SJA's representative. In the field, the chief, operational law, is collocated with the G3 operations section, typically in the plans element. In garrison, the chief, operational law, frequently works in the G3 section several days per week. Properly discharged, the duties of the chief, operational law, constitute more than a full-time job.

n17 Military schooling, staff rides, officer professional development sessions, and professional reading programs are key components of training. For military reading program made the art of war their particular study, and whose knowledge is derived from experience; from those who are present at the scene of action, who see the country, who see the enemy; who see the advantages that occasions offer, and who, like people embarked on the same ship, are sharers of the danger. If, therefore, anyone thinks himself qualified to give advice respecting the war which I am to conduct, which may prove advantageous to the public, let him not refuse his assistance to the state, but let him come with me into Macedonia. He shall be furnished with a ship, a horse, a tent; even his traveling charge shall be defrayed. But if he thinks this is too much trouble, and prefers the repose of the city life to the toils of war, let him not, on land, assume the office of a pilot. The city, in itself, furnishes abundance of topics for conversation; let it confine its passion for talking within its own precincts, and rest assured that we shall pay no attention to any councils but such as shall be framed within our camp.

REV_00259482

-- Lucius Paulus

Roman Consul

We are soldiers who happen to be lawyers.

-- Major General Michael J. Nardotti

The Judge Advocate General, U.S. Army

TEXT:

[*34] I. Introduction

This article describes the context of contemporary military operations and suggests an operational focus for the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps. It endorses a broad definition of the maturing concept of operational law and examines selected legal issues in recent operations. Finally, it posits a vision for the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps of the future -- a Corps based on operational law.

II. The Operational Context

The United States military routinely conducts extraordinary missions. [1] While existing fundamentally to fight and win the nation's wars, [2] the United States military's recent utility has been in diverse political-military operations, [3] which blur the distinction between combat and noncombat and between war and peace. [4] From Somalia to Macedonia, Northern Iraq to Haiti, and Bosnia to Liberia, these operations present issues of enormous political, military, and legal complexity. For better or for worse, the United States military is inexorably involved in what the United States military community jointly calls "military operations other than war," or MOOTW, a term first coined by the Army that made its official Department of Defense appearance in 1993 in Joint Chiefs of Staff [*35] Publication 3-0, Doctrine for Joint Operations. [5] While doctrine and doctrinal terms for joint operations are in flux, changing in response to threats, technology, and objectives, throughout this article I use the current official Department of Defense term MOOTW to collectively describe the many and complex United States joint military efforts short of war.

Military operations other than war present numerous and diverse legal issues. Just as types of missions vary widely within MOOTW, so do the legal issues which pertain to them. [6] There is no "law of MOOTW." [7] There are, however, numerous laws and policies that impact -- and frequently define -- MOOTW.

As the Army faces new and sophisticated challenges, its leadership requires advisors who focus on concomitant political, military, and legal issues. To face these challenges, the Army suggestions, see COMBAT STUDIES INSTITUTE, BOOKS FOR THE MILITARY PROFESSIONAL (1995).

REV_00259465

n18 See Colonel James W. Swanson & Colonel Charles J. Dunlap, Jr., Staff Judge Advocate for the Joint Task Force: Are You Ready?, 22:1 REPORTER 1. At a minimum, officers and noncommissioned officers should be aware of the concept of joint staffs and have access to the publications on the Joint Electronic Library (JEL) CD ROMs available from the Joint Warfighting Center, Fort Monroe, Virginia. A good primer on joint staffs is the Department of Defense's 1993 Armed Forces Staff College Publication 1, The Joint Staff Officer's Guide.

n19 Judge advocate sections also must establish internal standard operating procedures. Deployment checklists, smart books, job books, continuity books, and published reporting requirements are important; once deployed, a log or other record is essential. Deployment preparation and execution is addressed in the OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch. 14.

n20 This attribute suggests flexibility, initiative, agility, and versatility, and is incorporated in Army doctrine. See FM 100-5, OPERATIONS, supra note 2, at 2-9.

n21 Recognition of contracting and fiscal law issues and solutions is an attribute of the operational lawyer. Recent experience in limited war and MOOTW suggests that such issues will arise almost contemporaneously with the commencement of an operation. See, e.g., CENTER FOR LAW AND MILITARY OPERATIONS, LAW AND MILITARY OPERATIONS IN HAITI, 1994-1995, LESSONS LEARNED FOR JUDGE ADVOCATES 118 (11 Dec. 1995) [hereinafter HAITI LESSONS]. For a primer on contingency contracting, see Major Rafael Lara, Jr., A Practical Guide to Contingency Contracting, ARMY LAW., Aug. 1995, at 16; on fiscal law, see Contract Law Note, Funding Issues in Operational Settings, ARMY LAW., Oct. 1993, at 38.

n22 FM 27-100, LEGAL OPERATIONS, supra note 11, at 1; the reference in the manual to "battlefield" can be read as "area of operations." The manual, premised on the Airland Battle Doctrine, predates the doctrinal concept of MOOTW.

n23 Advice on the law of armed conflict is a solemn responsibility of judge advocates, involving issues of law, regulation, policy, discipline, humanity, politics, and treaty obligations on the part of the United States. In no small measure, judge advocates in the field are an affirmation of the nation's intent to follow and enforce the law of armed conflict. Although the United States is not yet a party to Protocol I Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, judge advocates provide a more comprehensive -- and immediate -- resource than contemplated by Article 82 of the Protocol (mandating legal advisors for commanders). See The 1977 Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol I), opened for signature Dec. 12, 1977, U.N. Doc. A/32/144, Annex 16 I.L.M. 1391, 1125 U.N.T.S. 3 [hereinafter Protocol I]. For an examination of the role of the legal advisor in this context, see William H. Parks, The Law of War Adviser, 31 JAG. J. 1 (1980); Matthew E. Winter, "Finding the Law" -- The Values, Identity, and Function of the International Law Adviser, 128 MIL. L. REV. 1 (1990); Lieutenant Colonel Walter G. Sharp, Jr., The Warfighting Role of the Marine Judge Advocate, MARINE CORPS GAZETTE, Feb. 1996, at 18.

n24 DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 71-100, DIVISION OPERATIONS 3-2 to 3-8 (16 JUNE 1993); DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 71-100, DIVISION OPERATIONS 3-30 (approved final draft, 27 Oct. 1995) [hereinafter FM 71-100, DIVISION OPERATIONS]; DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 71-100-2, INFANTRY DIVISION OPERATIONS TACTICS, TECHNIQUES, AND PROCEDURES 2-42, 2-61 to 2-84 (31 Aug. 1993) [hereinafter INFANTRY DIVISION TTP]. "Included in the personnel requirements for the G3 operations element is an SJA officer to inform the commander on legal ramifications of operations and COAs [courses of actions]. . . . The SJA element is a critical element in the assault CP [command post] in the early stages of the deployment." Id. at 2-83. See also OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch.

REV_00259483

1.

n25 INFANTRY DIVISION TTP, supra note 24, at 6-7.

n26 See, e.g., DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 100-16, SUPPORT OPERATIONS: ECHELONS ABOVE CORPS 7-11, 7-12 (16 Apr. 1985). "[Judge Advocate General's Corps] officers, legal clerks, and court reporters will be attached to each of the brigade-sized units . . . . All legal services, except legal assistance, are required by statute notwithstanding the type of combat, the intensity of the combat environment, and the time phase of combat. Legal assistance is required by regulation. . . . Legal support, however, must remain organic and dedicated to the command at all times." Id.

n27 The presence of judge advocates near the actual fighting provoked comment dating back to the First World War:

> It would be well to disabuse the public mind of any superstition to the effect that the applicants under the legal branch of the army are looking for a 'snap' or for a 'silk stocking' position far in the rear of the actual fighting. The officers acting on the staff of The Judge Advocate General will be members of the actual fighting force, and, in the pursuit of duty, will be brought into the danger zone just as often as other specialized commissioned men, medical officers, for instance.

11 AM. J. INT'L L. 651 (1917).

n28 DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 101-5, STAFF ORGANIZATION AND OPERATIONS 2-3 to 2-9, 3-31, 3-32 (25 May 1984). Judge advocates often perform nonlegal duties during operations; Army Regulation 27-1 cautions only that they should "as much as possible . . . perform only professional legal duties" and should not "perform any nonlegal duties . . . that would interfere with their primary assigned legal duties." DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 27-1, JUDGE ADVOCATE LEGAL SERVICE, para. 3-2c (3 Feb. 1995).

n29 The Combined Joint Task Force 180/XVIII Airborne Corps Staff Judge Advocate was Colonel, now Brigadier General, John D. Altenburg. The commander was Lieutenant General, now General, Henry H. Shelton.

n30 The acts of the judge advocate must always remain within the bounds of the law and conform to standards of professional ethics and responsibility. There is no combat or operational exclusion to professional responsibility; unless expressly authorized, the judge advocate's client remains the Army or, in the case of a joint or other executive agency assignment, the organization of assignment, not the commander or the unit. See DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 27-26, RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT FOR LAWYERS (1 May 1992) (Rules 1.13 and 1.7, and comments thereto); OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, app. G, "Professional Responsibility."

n31 General Matthew B. Ridgway, Leadership, reprinted in MILITARY LEADERSHIP: IN PURSUIT OF EXCELLENCE 43, 51 (Robert L. Taylor & William E. Rosenbach, eds., 2d ed. 1992).

n32 Contemporary operations present numerous legal issues which could be grouped in many ways. One means of grouping legal issues is "FAST J," found in the Operational Law Handbook, see OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch. 6. Designed as a shorthand method of operation plan and order review addressing major operations legal issues, the acronym stands for "Force" (ROE), "Authority" (to perform missions and tasks), "Status" (of the force and other persons encountered by the force), "Things" (buying, breaking, and blowing up), and "Justice."

REV_00259484

n33 Interview with General Maxwell R. Thurman at National Defense University Joint Operations Symposium, Washington, D.C. (12 July 1994).

n34 The mission is "the primary task assigned to an individual, unit, or force. It usually contains the elements of who, what, when, where, and the reason therefor, but seldom specifies how." DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 101-5-1, OPERATIONAL TERMS AND SYMBOLS 1-47 (21 Oct. 1985). See also FM 100-5, OPERATIONS, supra note 2, at 6-6: "The mission is the commander's expression of what the unit must accomplish and for what purpose."

n35 UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS, SMALL WARS MANUAL 9 (1940). The Small Wars Manual, now out of official print but available from Sunflower University Press, Manhattan, Kansas, is a must-read for operational lawyers. It is proof of Hamilton's assertion that, "All who have gone before us are not fools." In addition to traditional military topics like tactics and logistics, it discusses psychological warfare, the relationship with the State Department, methods of pacification, recruiting and training native troops and police, detaining and disarming civilians, establishing military government, supervising elections, applying legal principles to situations short of war, and withdrawal.

n36 It may be possible to refine a proposed mission statement to give the command the clear capability to accomplish the intended mission. A task specified or implied from a mission statement is both proper for the force to accomplish and a proper, easily justified expenditure of Operation and Maintenance (O&M) Appropriations. Conversely, some latitude in the mission statement is essential to afford the commander operational flexibility. There is no cookie cutter solution; the SJA must participate in the mission analysis, conduct a legal estimate of the situation, and assist the commander as part of a synchronized staff. See generally DEP'T OF ARMY, COMMAND AND GENERAL STAFF COLLEGE, STUDENT TEXT 101-5, COMMAND AND STAFF DECISION PROCESSES (20 Feb. 1995).

n37 This is an area in which judge advocates must step forward to protect their command and the Army. "Force protection" is not a subterfuge for actions that should be funded by other means, such as the Economic Support Fund (Foreign Assistance Act §§ 531-535d, 22 U.S.C. §§ 2346-2346d), specifically, or the Foreign Assistance Act programs, generally. A key indicator that O&M funds may be improper for a contemplated project is that the idea for the project arose not in command or operations channels but with the Ambassador or United States Agency for International Development (USAID) director or in the civil-military operations element. Judge advocates also should consider whether the contemplated expenditure is long term or if the result is permanent. If in doubt about the contemplated project, the judge advocate should raise the issue, forward an inquiry, and document the response.

n38 "Mission creep" is a phenomenon where parties, in furtherance of their political agendas, attempt to expand the limits of a commander's mission without approval of the National Command Authority (NCA). See DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 100-23-1, MULTISERVICE PROCEDURES FOR HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE OPERATIONS 3-1, 3-2 (31 Oct. 1994) [hereinafter FM 100-23-1, HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE].

n39 See generally John T. Fishel, The Murky World of Conflict Termination: Planning and Executing the 1989-90 Restoration of Panama and The Middle East, War's End: A Strategic Concept for Post-Conflict Operations, reprinted in DEP'T OF ARMY, COMMAND AND GENERAL STAFF COLLEGE, THEATER OPERATIONS (Jan. 1996), suggesting that postconflict operations, including the discharge of legal obligations toward indigenous civilians and rehabilitation of legal and governmental structures, were not integrated into the respective campaign plans for Panama and the Gulf War.

REV_00259485

n40 See supra notes 6, 7, and related text.

n41 In 1994, Operation Support Hope in Rwanda, for example, was crafted with specific success criteria and measures of effectiveness, a clear end state, purely defensive ROE, and a limited, explicitly stated mission. It was a pristine "humanitarian assistance operation."

n42 The word "dominated" is used deliberately. Operations may involve combat and noncombat activity. Under this model, Somalia was a noncombat operation in that it was "dominated" by noncombat activity and "dominated" by nonlethal elements of power. Nevertheless, combat was certainly an integral part of the United States military experience in Somalia. Similarly, UN and NATO missions in Bosnia are noncombat operations, but combat activity (NATO airstrikes) set the conditions for the Dayton Agreement and subsequent NATO IFOR mission.

n43 These areas include, for example, the law of armed conflict and the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), various implementing directives and regulations, and FM 27-100, LEGAL OPERATIONS, supra note 11.

n44 Weapons confiscation, control, and buyback policies can be extremely complicated. In Grenada, judge advocates actually ran the weapons and explosives turn in and buyback operation. Weapons buyback in Panama led to an investigation concerning funding for, and disposition of, weapons. Judge advocates must distinguish weapons "buyback" or "incentive" programs from confiscation. In contemplating any such policies, judge advocates should consider the realistic threat to the force, the threat to law-abiding citizens if they are disarmed, the law and culture of the society regarding weapons, the possibility of creating a weapons black market, and the likelihood of success. See, e.g., Colonel F.M. Lorenz, Law and Anarchy in Somalia, PARAMETERS, Winter 1993-94, at 27, 30.

n45 The means to accomplish a mission range from the inherent authority of United States forces to more specific action such as that taken in Operation Urgent Fury in Grenada. After the combat phase of that operation, the emerging Grenadian government was faced with limited police capability and rampant lawlessness. Among other problems, with the breakdown of authority during and after the combat phase, inmates escaped from the island's prison and helped themselves to the ample supply of weapons strewn about the island. The Governor-General declared a state of emergency and, pursuant to his emergency powers, issued a "Preventative Detention Ordinance" which authorized "United States Forces officers and Military Police" to enforce Grenadian law.

n46 Police training is an issue associated with virtually every operation. From 1981 to 1996, the United States military was prohibited by law from expending Foreign Assistance Act (FAA) funds to train or advise nonexempted foreign police in law enforcement functions (Foreign Assistance Act § 660(a), 22 U.S.C. § 2420(a)), but a broader prohibition existed by policy and tradition. In Somalia, United States forces assisted the UN in training local police only after a presidential authorization effectively exempted the training from the FAA. Absent such authority, only limited inter-operability and compatibility training and liaison and joint patrol activity could be appropriately accomplished for force protection and mission objective reasons in stability-type operations. However, in 1996 the National Defense Authorization Act amended FAA § 660 to, among other things, expressly permit the United States military to provide assistance to reconstitute civilian police authority and capability in the postconflict restoration of host nation infrastructure and to provide professional public safety training, including training in human rights, the rule of law, anticorruption, and the promotion of civilian police roles that support democracy. More detailed training on law enforcement and criminal investigation subjects are within the purview of the Department of Justice's International Criminal Investigation and Training Assistance Program (ICITAP). Judge advocates have long had a role in assisting governments reestablish or improve judicial, penal, justice, and police institutions.

REV_00259486

n47 As a general starting point, judge advocates should be familiar with the content of the current National Security Strategy and the National Military Strategy, salient extracts of which are located in the OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch. 2.

n48 For general information on the bases of intervention, see RICHARD HAASS, INTERVENTION: THE USE OF AMERICAN MILITARY FORCE IN THE POST-COLD WAR WORLD (1994).

n49 50 U.S.C. §§ 1541-48 (1988 & Supp.).

n50 The White House and the National Security Council, Presidential Decision Directive/NSC 25, subject: Reforming Multilateral Peace Operations (May 1994).

n51 The country team is the means by which the Chief of Mission (Ambassador) ensures interdepartmental coordination among key members of the United States diplomatic mission. Its membership varies but frequently includes the Political Counselor (often third in command of the mission after the Deputy Chief of Mission and Ambassador); the Defense, Commercial, Agricultural, and Treasury Attaches; Directors of the USAID, USIS, and Peace Corps; and the chief of the Security Assistance Office. The United States forces commander is not a member of the diplomatic mission or country team but is typically welcome at country team meetings. See 22 U.S.C. § 3927; see DEP'T OF DEFENSE, JOINT PUBLICATION 3-07.1, JOINT TACTICS, TECHNIQUES, AND PROCEDURES FOR FOREIGN INTERNAL DEFENSE, ch. 2 (20 Dec. 1993); DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 41-10, CIVIL AFFAIRS OPERATIONS, ch. 14 (11 Jan. 1993); United States Foreign Service Institute, The Team: The Ambassador Sets the Pace 1 (undated 3 page information paper widely distributed to individuals receiving foreign service training).

n52

> Political objectives drive military decisions at every level from the strategic to the tactical. All commanders and staff officers must understand these political objectives and the impact of military operations on them. They must adopt courses of action which legally support those objectives even if the courses of action appear to be unorthodox or outside what traditional doctrine had contemplated.

DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 100-20, MILITARY OPERATIONS IN LOW-INTENSITY CONFLICT 1-5 (5 Dec. 1990).

n53 See generally DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 100-23, PEACE OPERATIONS (30 Dec. 1994) [hereinafter FM 100-23, PEACE OPERATIONS]. The manual is a "big picture, broad brush" reference which contains a chapter on legal considerations discussing ROE, terms of reference, and status of forces issues.

n54 Judge advocates deploying on a peacekeeping mission should review the materials on the JEL Peace Operations CD-ROM, supra note 12, paying particular heed to the Joint Task Force Commander's Handbook for Peace Operations and Joint Publication 3-07.3, Joint Tactics, Techniques, and Procedures for Peacekeeping Operations. If embarking on a mission as or with UN peacekeepers, see also INTERNATIONAL PEACE ACADEMY, PEACEKEEPER'S HANDBOOK (1984) [hereinafter PEACEKEEPER'S HANDBOOK].

n55 See FM 100-23, PEACE OPERATIONS, supra note 53, at 6.

n56 The United States Agency for International Development (USAID) Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance (OFDA) Disaster Assessment and Response Team (DART) is a United States GO likely to be present in an operation. The DART Field Operations Guide is a superb pocket-size reference for judge advocates deploying on a humanitarian assistance (or any other) operation. See FIELD OPERATIONS GUIDE (OFDA, 1994) The UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) are examples of IOs.

REV_00259487

n57 Nongovernmental organizations are "predominantly European national or international, nonprofit citizen's voluntary organizations." Private volunteer organizations are "private US based, nonprofit organizations involved in humanitarian efforts." FM 100-23-1, HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE, supra note 38, at 1-1, 1-2. Lists of the most active NGOs and PVOs are published in FM 100-23-1, Humanitarian Assistance, and FM 100-23, Peace Operations. Supra note 53; and the OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12. Many of the organizations register with the USAID, which publishes a yearly report and list entitled "Volunteer Foreign Aid Programs."

n58 For guidance, look to the mission statement and list of specified tasks and implied tasks. See generally DEP'T OF ARMY, PAMPHLET 700-15, LOGISTICAL SUPPORT OF UN PEACEKEEPING FORCES (1 May 1986); DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 700-131, LOAN AND LEASE OF ARMY MATERIEL (15 Feb. 1985) (C1, 4 Sept. 1987); DEP'T OF ARMY, UNIT SUPPLY UPDATE, 2-14 (23 Feb. 1994).

n59 For information on the CMOC (now often termed the Civil-Military Cooperation Center), and on the closely related Humanitarian Operations Center (HOC), see FM 100-23-1, HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE, supra note 38, chs. 3, 4.

n60 Of course, UN operations present a host of legal issues. See generally LIEUTENANT COLONEL WALTER G. SHARP, JR., UNITED NATIONS PEACE OPERATIONS (1996).

n61 A sample mandate is in FM 100-23, PEACE OPERATIONS, supra note 53, annex B.

n62 A sample TOR document is located in FM 100-23, Peace Operations. Supra note 53, annex A.

n63 The CAO is the principal administrative and budget advisor to the UN Head of Mission.

n64 See DEP'T OF ARMY, PAMPHLET 700-31, HANDBOOK FOR PEACE OPERATIONS (A LOGISTICS PERSPECTIVE) (1 July 1994), which discusses logistics organization, structure, and procedures. Chapter VI, UN Cost Reimbursements and associated annexes are of particular importance to judge advocates as they cover in and out surveys, write off of equipment, and funds calculations.

n65 Although Treaties in Force (T.I.F.), United States Treaties (U.S.T.), and Treaties and Other International Acts Series (T.I.A.S.) are excellent academic references; the best source of information is the unified command having geographic responsibility for the country at issue and, if United States forces are already in country, the legal advisor for that force. Reference texts are often outdated, do not contain classified agreements, and cannot relate the ground truth concerning the actual implementation of an agreement by a country or its political subdivisions.

n66 In Somalia, for example, there was no legitimate national government with which to conclude any agreement concerning the status of the force; there was instead only a political vacuum.

n67 The "Law of the Flag," which traces its lineage in American jurisprudence back to The Schooner Exchange v. McFadden, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 116 (1812), and Coleman v. Tennessee, 97 U.S. 509 (1878), has two components of relevance to judge advocates. The first is that a force can bring its own law into foreign territory (the concept of extraterritoriality, which is inherent in the UCMJ); the second is that the force and its personnel are, in certain circumstances, immune from the exercise of jurisdiction by the foreign sovereign. The thrust of case law and commentators since the 1950s has been to limit the circumstances of immunity. See generally DEP'T OF ARMY, PAMPHLET 27-161-1, LAW OF PEACE 11-1 (1 Sept. 1979).

REV_00259488

n68 While academics conclude that the Law of the Flag is a discredited or obsolete concept in international law, it is alive and well in fact and practice. Although it is true in modern law that consensual entry does not guarantee legal immunity, there are plainly situations in which the United States will not allow its forces to be amenable to local law but subject only to the extraterritorial application of the UCMJ and international law. In addition to combat and occupation, and operations conducted in a political vacuum, the Law of the Flag also may apply as a "default" in MOOTW which are "near-combat" or "near-occupation" operations. Two examples are Operations Provide Comfort (northern Iraq) and Uphold Democracy (Haiti). In both operations, the United States obtained a "waiver of jurisdiction" from the "receiving state;" however, the waivers were superfluous concessions to a foregone conclusion.

n69 See DEP'T OF DEFENSE, DIRECTIVE 5530.3, INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS (11 June 1987) (C1, 18 Feb. 1991); DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 550-51, AUTHORITY AND RESPONSIBILITY FOR NEGOTIATING, CONCLUDING, FORWARDING, AND DEPOSITING OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS (1 May 1995); see generally OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch. 3.

n70 "Extrapolated," as used in this context, is a term coined in the Operational and International Law Department of The Judge Advocate General's School, United States Army, Charlottesville, Virginia, which has found its way into scholarly literature. See, e.g., Major Brian H. Brady, The Agreement Relating to a United States Military Training Mission in Saudi Arabia: Extrapolated to Deployed Forces?, ARMY LAW., Jan. 1995, at 14.

n71 Administrative and Technical Staff Privileges and Immunities flow from Article 37 of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, Apr. 18, 1961, 22 U.S.T. 3227, T.I.A.S. 7502, 500 U.N.T.S. 95. Often termed "Admin. & Tech. P. & I.," the status affords immunity from receiving state criminal jurisdiction and civil immunity for acts performed within the scope of duty. Typically, members of the Force do not enjoy "Admin. & Tech. P. & I." because they are not on the mission staff; rather, they enjoy an analogous status under a specific agreement.

n72 See OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch. 3.

n73 The "UN Model SOFA" is reprinted in id., ch. 3. It is useful in two respects. It is an accepted model for concluding a SOFA in a particular operation, and it may be used as the basis for the behavior of the parties in the absence of an express agreement.

n74 Feb. 13, 1946, 21 U.S.T. 1419, T.I.A.S. 6900. The status granted by the Convention is often termed "Expert on Mission" status. See also PEACEKEEPER'S HANDBOOK, supra note 54, at 361.

n75 Such was the case during UN Protection Force (UNPROFOR) operations in Bosnia, where political subdivisions routinely ignored express or implied agreements.

n76 In Haiti, the Aristide government not only insisted on a tailored SOFA (not being content with simple SOFAs utilized in similar prior operations), but on three specific and diverse SOFAs with the various visiting forces in the country. Accordingly, the first SOFA, applicable to the Multinational Force (MNF), was not concluded until 10 December 1995, and two separate status agreements were required to respectively govern the UN Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) and United States forces not part of the MNF or UNMIH. See HAITI LESSONS, supra note 21, appendices O, P, Q.

REV_00259489

n77 In Bosnia, United States Brigadier General Patrick O'Neal pragmatically demonstrated his understanding of the freedom of ingress and movement granted to IFOR under the Dayton Agreement when he was confronted at the border by a Bosnian militiaman demanding his passport. As he walked past the militiaman and into Bosnia, he pointed at his soldiers' rifles and said, "That's our passport." Thomas K. Ricks, U.S. Brings to Bosnia Tactics That Tamed Wild West, WALL STREET J., Dec. 27, 1995, at 7.

n78 Requisition, seizure, and confiscation are terms of legal significance and acts typically reserved for the battlefield or "enemy or former territory." See DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 27-10, THE LAW OF LAND WARFARE 148-56 (18 July 1956) (C1, 15 July 1976) [hereinafter FM 27-10, THE LAW OF LAND WARFARE]. Nevertheless, even in MOOTW dominated by noncombat activities (particularly where authorized under Chapter VII of the UN Charter), reason and practice suggest that weapons may be confiscated or seized for force protection purposes, and public property may be seized at least at the beginning of an operation in order to receive and consolidate, and establish lodgements for the force. Concerning practical and legal aspects of seizure (and other "combat acquisition practices") see OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch. 9.

n79 10 U.S.C. § 2734 (1988 & Supp.); DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 27-20, CLAIMS, ch. 10 (15 Feb. 1989).

n80 In Grenada, claims for combat damage were not paid under the initial Army claims program. A later and separate program, funded by USAID and executed by Army judge advocates pursuant to a Participating Agency Servicing Agreement (PASA), paid certain combat damage claims which had been originally denied by Army Foreign Claims Commissions.

n81 Discipline is a characteristic of Army operations. FM 100-5, OPERATIONS, supra note 2, at 2-3.

n82 Restraint and legitimacy are tenets of operations other than war (FM 100-5, OPERATIONS, supra note 2, at 13-4) but are not restricted to OOTW. The United States showed great restraint in furtherance of political objectives in Operation Desert Storm, despite being operationally unimpeded by the enemy. For an example of an ill-conceived and needless use of restraint in the Vietnam War, see William H. Parks, *Rolling Thunder and the Law of War, AIR U. REV., Jan.-Feb. 1982, at 4.

n83 JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF PUBLICATION 1-02, DOD DICTIONARY OF MILITARY AND ASSOCIATED TERMS (23 Mar. 1994) defines ROE as: "Directives issued by competent military authority which delineate the circumstances and limitations under which United States Forces will initiate and/or continue combat engagement with other forces encountered." Interestingly, the definitions of ROE contained in other doctrinal publications (many Army field manuals, for example) do not track the Department of Defense definition.

n84 CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF INSTRUCTION 3121.01, STANDING RULES OF ENGAGEMENT FOR US FORCES (1 Oct. 1994).

n85 For an excellent, succinct primer on the JCS SROE, see Colonel F.M. Lorenz, Standing Rules of Engagement: Rules to Live By, MARINE CORPS GAZETTE, Feb. 1996, at 20.

n86 For insight into multinational ROE, see Colonel F.M. Lorenz, Forging Rules of Engagement: Lessons Learned in Operation United Shield, MIL. REV., Nov.-Dec. 1995, at 17. The Lorenz article raises an important issue: even with almost identical ROE, units from different countries may lack the common training and will to identically apply the ROE. See also Lieutenant Colonel Stephen M. Womack, Rules of Engagement in Multinational Operations, MARINE CORPS GAZETTE, Feb. 1996, at 22.

REV_00259490

n87 See International Law Note, *"Land Forces" Rules of Engagement Symposium: The CLAMO Revises the Peacetime Rules of Engagement, ARMY LAW., Dec. 1993, at 14.

n88 Pocket cards are no panacea. They are predominately training tools for MOOTW. While they tend to make everyone feel better, they are not a necessity for every unit in every operation. Special mission units do not require ROE pocket cards. Combat operations against a declared hostile force only require pocket cards to the extent that they may reflect either the imposition or removal of control measures or constraints.

n89 "JAGC personnel . . . review ROE" and "provide required training on the law of war and ROEs." FM 27-100, LEGAL OPERATIONS, supra note 11, at 17. Judge advocates "assist in the preparation of and review ROE." Id. at 13. "The SJA receives the JTF or Corps ROE from the G3. He recommends changes to the division commander and G3. The SJA works with the division staff and subordinate commanders to ensure that ROE support the operation." FM 71-100, DIVISION OPERATIONS, supra note 24, at 8-14.

n90 JOINT WARFIGHTING CENTER, JOINT TASK FORCE COMMANDER'S HANDBOOK FOR PEACE OPERATIONS 76 (28 Feb. 1995). This superb handbook, contained in the JEL Peace Operations CD-ROM, supra note 12, should be in every deployment library.

n91 Riot control agents (RCAs) are now a matter of particular concern in ROE. Ironically, the United States has recently imposed restrictions on the use of RCA in operations just as it has become involved in operations in which they are useful. In 1993, the United States signed the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on Their Destruction, Jan. 13, 1993, 32 I.L.M. 800 [hereinafter the CWC]. Although the Senate still has not given its advice and consent to the CWC, the President has taken the position that the CWC prohibits the use of RCA as a "method of warfare," and the formerly permissible use of RCA in the rescue of downed aircrews and dispersal of civilians being used as human shields is now prohibited. This position conflicts with Exec. Order No. 11,850 (3 C.F.R. 980 (1971-1975)), reprinted in FM 27-10, THE LAW OF LAND WARFARE, supra note 78, at 18, C1, 2), which has not been superseded. (See CHAIRMAN, JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF INSTRUCTION 3110.07, NUCLEAR, BIOLOGICAL, AND CHEMICAL DEFENSE; RIOT CONTROL AGENTS; AND NON-LETHAL WEAPONS (3 July 1995).) Accordingly, judge advocates should anticipate confusion concerning RCA, ensure that any use of RCA is coordinated with the responsible unified command, and plan on the likelihood that NCA approval will be required to employ RCA in virtually any non-law enforcement circumstance.

n92 Distinguish conduct (committing a hostile act or exhibiting hostile intent) from status (membership in a hostile force). In most MOOTW, ROE are based on conduct, not status -- typically, there is no declared "hostile force."

n93 For example, the NATO IFOR "ROE Card," dated 10 January 1996, is styled "Commander's Guidance on Use of Force."

n94 The rules are typically a starting, not ending, point. As stated in FIELD MANUAL 100-5, OPERATIONS, supra note 2, at 2-4, and numerous other references, ROE are tailored, dynamic, and change over time. Nevertheless, most aspects of default rules will not change at the soldiers' level and serve as a valid training base. Further, there are standing unit ROE which, given their proponent, content and audience, are likely consistent with future operational ROE (or extracts thereof) and require no modification for actual combat operations. For an example, see "Ranger Regiment Combat ROE" pocket card (Headquarters, 75th Ranger Regiment) reprinted in OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch. 8.

n95 See Major Mark S. Martins, Rules of Engagement for Land Forces: A Matter of Training, Not Lawyering, 143 MIL. L. REV. 1 (1994); HAITI LESSONS, supra note 21, at 40-42; CENTER FOR ARMY LESSONS LEARNED, ROE TRAINING: AN ALTERNATIVE APPROACH

REV_00259491

(May 1996). Like pocket cards, mnemonics are not a panacea; they are training tools that can help soldiers develop judgment, not a substitute for judgment itself. See Martins, supra, at 86-89, 105.

n96 Compare pertinent extracts of Unified Task Force (UNITAF) ROE ("You have the right to use force to defend yourself against attack or threat of attack") and the subsequent UN Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM) II ROE ("Crew-served weapons are considered a threat to UNOSOM Forces and the relief effort whether or not the crew demonstrates hostile intent").

n97 Macedonia is often termed the "Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia" or "FYROM." For purposes of this article, it is referred to as Macedonia.

n98 Under the United States doctrinal definition, the force is engaged in a "preventive diplomacy" deployment, not peacekeeping, because it is present to deter violence at a zone of potential conflict where tension exists among several parties. FM 100-23, PEACE OPERATIONS, supra note 53, at 2.

n99 Interview with Task Force Legal Advisors, Garmisch, Germany (December 1994). See also Captain David G. Bolgiano, Firearms Training System: A Proposal for Future Rules of Engagement Training, ARMY LAW., Dec. 1995, at 79.

n100 See Tom Rhodes & Ian Brodie, Americans Admit They Fired First, THE TIMES, Sept. 26, 1994, at 1.

n101 See, e.g., the discussion and analysis of United States v. Mowris, a case arising from the use of warning shots in Somalia, in MARTINS, supra note 95, at 3, 17.

n102 See, e.g., Captain Vaughn A. Ary, Accounting for Prisoners of War: A Legal Review of the United States Armed Forces Identification and Reporting Procedures, ARMY LAW., Aug. 1994, at 16.

n103 Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, opened for signature Aug. 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3316, 75 U.N.T.S. 135 (entered into force Oct. 21, 1950) [hereinafter GPW].

n104 Some scholars would disagree and assert that Operation Just Cause was an international armed conflict thus triggering prisoner of war status for the Panamanian Defense Forces. See, e.g., Major John Embry Parkerson, Jr., United States Compliance with Humanitarian Law Respecting Civilians During Operation Just Cause, 133 MIL. L. REV. 31 (1991).

n105 This broad practical application of the humanitarian provisions of the GPW was used by the United States with regard to the Viet Cong (PRUGH, LAW AT WAR, supra note 13, at 61-78) and makes good sense today. United States forces train on how to handle prisoners of war, and field soldiers should not be burdened with legalistic distinctions between "prisoner of war" and "detainee." Judge advocates and senior commanders, however, should know that the difference between the two terms is not merely semantic; similarly, the distinction between "treatment" and "status" as a prisoner of war can be legally, practically, and politically profound.

n106 Panamanian soldiers were not prisoners of war as a matter of law because the intervention was not an international armed conflict. United States forces were present at the invitation of the lawfully elected government of President Endara. Cf. United States v. Noriega, 808 F. Supp. 791 (S.D. Fla. 1992) (the court, finding the GPW to be self-executing, held that Manuel Noriega was a "prisoner of war"). The ruling was irrelevant to the defense, however, since Noriega was charged with precapture criminal offenses unrelated to any claim of privileged warlike act.

REV_00259492

merits a cadre of advisors who are competent in military and legal skills, participants in operations, and mindful of the depth -- and limitation -- of their roles. [8] The focus of the advisors is to lawfully facilitate mission accomplishment, thereby enhancing the versatility of already capable units to meet diverse mission requirements. That cadre is the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps. Their focus is operational law.

[*36] III. Operational Law

In his seminal article on operational law, Colonel David Graham identified the discipline as "that body of law, both domestic and international, impacting upon legal issues associated with the planning for and deployment of US Forces overseas in both peace-time and combat environments." [9] Colonel Graham noted that operational law "transcends normally defined legal disciplines" and constitutes a "comprehensive, yet structured approach toward resolving legal issues evolving from the overseas deployment of US military forces." [10] Colonel Graham's definition, with slight modification, is repeated in the field manual on legal operations: "Operational law is the application of domestic, international, and foreign law to the planning for, training for, deployment of, and employment of United States military forces." [11]

The Operational Law Handbook, published by The Judge Advocate General's School, offers a more contemporary and comprehensive working definition of the discipline: "Operational law is that body of foreign, domestic, and international law which impacts specifically upon the activities of US Forces in war and operations other than war." [12] The School's definition of operational law is remarkably broad -- and deliberately so. The role of the judge advocate in military operations since Operation Urgent Fury in 1983 (the crucible for the definition and practice of operational law) establishes the interdisciplinary and interprofessional depth and breadth of operational law. [13] From running the "weapons for cash" turn-in program in Grenada to investigating war crimes in Kuwait, from trying courts-martial in Saudi Arabia to advising detainee interrogators in Haiti, from participating in targeting cells in Somalia to sitting on [*37] joint military commissions in Bosnia, [14] judge advocates constantly expand the scope of the practice of operational law.

If the essence of the Army is its operations in the field, then operational law is the essence of the military legal practice. Operational law exists to provide legal support and services to commanders and soldiers in the field. It is not a specialty, [15] nor is it a discrete area of substantive law. It is a discipline, a collection of all of the traditional areas of the military legal practice focused on military operations. Practicing operational law involves military justice, administrative law, claims, contract law, fiscal law, legal assistance, international law, and the law of armed conflict. Operational law also includes proficiency in military skills. It is the raison d'etre of the uniformed judge advocate. Every judge advocate must be an operational lawyer. [16]

This broad view of operational law is inclusionary, not exclusionary, and evolutionary, not revolutionary. It requires more of a thematic than a structural revision of the Corps. Our central focus must be to facilitate operations. Staff judge advocates, regional defense counsel, and other leaders must stress the legal and military roles of their judge advocates [17] and train their subordinates as soldier-lawyers in a joint, combined, and interagency environment. [18] [*38] Operations training should include legal noncommissioned officers and stress joint headquarters tactics, techniques, and procedures. [19]

Operational lawyers must be decathletes, not boxers. [20] They must be consummate generalists, well schooled in all aspects of this discipline. Substantive specialization, although necessary in some areas (for example, acquisition law), should continue to be the exception rather than the rule in the Corps. [21]

Versatility of the Corps' personnel enhances the versatility afforded by the Corps to the Army. As operations are increasingly executed by joint and interagency task forces and, in n107 Preeminent among the other authorities was the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 217 A(III), Dec. 10, 1948, U.N. Doc. A/810 (1948).

REV_00259466

n108 See generally Robinson O. Everett & Scott L. Silliman, Forums for Punishing Offenses Against the Law of Nations, 29 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 509 (1994).

n109 This transfer would have been prohibited by law had the detainees been prisoners of law. The UN is neither a signatory nor a party to the GPW.

n110 See, e.g., JOINT COMMITTEE PRINT, COUNTRY REPORTS ON HUMAN RIGHTS PRACTICES FOR 1993, at 258-60 (Feb. 1994).

n111 The approach developed by judge advocates in Haiti made good political, practical, and legal sense in that particular operation. The approach incorporated aspects of the Haitian Constitution and international law, but was not required by either law. Although praised by humanitarian organizations and commentators, the approach does not establish a new standard or requirement of detainee law or policy.

n112 The SJA served as the command's liaison to the ICRC, a role of the judge advocate in all United States combat operations since at least the Vietnam War. The judge advocate's ICRC liaison role is doctrinal (see FM 71-100-2, INFANTRY DIVISION TTP, supra note 24, at 6-28).

n113 The "detainee judge advocate" did not establish an attorney-client relationship with the detainee. Another judge advocate reviewed the written basis of the detention within 72 hours of the detention.

n114 The number of detainees reached a high of about 200 during the first month of the intervention, but was down to 24 by January 1995. HAITI LESSONS, supra note 21, at 60.

n115 G.A. Res. 49/59, Feb. 17, 1995, U.N. DOC. A/Res./49/59 (1995), 34 I.L.M. 482 (1995).

n116 In contrast, Chief Warrant Officer Two (CW2) Bobby Hall, captured in December 1994 when his helicopter crashed in North Korea, was a prisoner of war. The Korean War was not terminated by peace treaty; military operations have merely been suspended by armistice. Accordingly, CW2 Hall was "captured" in an international armed conflict, but released under GPW Article 118.

n117 In an effort to answer this question in today's complex political-military environment, the International and Operational Law Department of The Army Judge Advocate General's School, United States Army, developed a new category of law: "Civilian Protection Law" (CPL). Civilian Protection Law is a logical and dynamic extension of the law of occupation. An entire chapter is devoted to CPL in the OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12.

n118 Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, opened for signature Aug. 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3516, 75 U.N.T.S. 287 (entered into force Oct. 21, 1950).

n119 FM 27-10, THE LAW OF LAND WARFARE, supra note 78, at 139.

n120 Headquarters, CJTF 180 PROE, "Civil-Military Operations in Haiti," para. 7 (23 Sept. 1994).

n121 See Law and Anarchy, supra note 44, at 27, 35.

REV_00259493

n122 See Kenneth Freed, Haitian Police Attack Crowds as American Troops Look On, L.A. TIMES, Sept. 21, 1994, at A1.

n123 In response to concerns raised by judge advocates, the ROE already had been changed to expressly allow action by United States forces in cases of Haitian civilian violence, but new ROE cards reflecting the change had not been issued to soldiers. Soldiers were still operating under a generic permissive-entry ROE card dated 6 September 1994. See HAITI LESSONS, supra note 21, at 32-34.

n124 FM 100-5, OPERATIONS, supra note 2, at 2-3.

n125 Brigadier General Jack Rogers, quoted in DEP'T OF DEFENSE, UNITED STATES SPECIAL OPERATIONS COMMAND PUBLICATION 1, SPECIAL OPERATIONS IN PEACE AND WAR C-1 (25 Jan. 1996).

n126 FM 100-5, OPERATIONS, supra note 2, at 2-3, 2-4.

n127 General Gordon R. Sullivan, speech at the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps Worldwide Continuing Legal Education Conference, The Judge Advocate General's School, Charlottesville, Virginia (Oct. 1994).

n128 See, e.g., William H. Parks, *Teaching the Law of War, ARMY LAW., June 1987, at 3; H. Wayne Elliott, Theory and Practice: Some Suggestions for the Law of War Trainer, ARMY LAW., July 1983, at 1.

n129 Judge advocates should have some familiarity with the Army's training doctrine -- it works. See DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 25-100, TRAINING THE FORCE (15 Nov. 1988); DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 25-101, BATTLE FOCUSED TRAINING (30 Sept. 1990).

n130 The nine rules, listed in DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 350-41, TRAINING IN UNITS, ch. 14 (19 Mar. 1993), are as follows:

> (1) Soldiers fight only enemy combatants.
> (2) Soldiers do not harm enemies who surrender. Disarm them and turn them over to your superiors.
> (3) Soldiers do not kill or torture enemy prisoners of war.
> (4) Soldiers collect and care for the wounded, whether friend or foe.
> (5) Soldiers do not attack medical personnel, facilities, or equipment.
> (6) Soldiers destroy no more than the mission requires.
> (7) Soldiers treat all civilians humanely.
> (8) Soldiers do not steal. Soldiers respect private property and possessions.
> (9) Soldiers should do their best to prevent violations of the law of war. Soldiers report all violations of the law of war to their superiors.

n131 A superb example of standardized training is the package developed by the SJA section, 1st Armored Division/Task Force Eagle in preparation for the NATO IFOR mission. The package, styled "Pre-Deployment Legal Briefing," covers ROE, law of armed conflict, Code of Conduct, and Treaty issues. MATERIALS ON OPERATIONAL LAW, supra note 14, at 50, contains the briefing slides.

n132 10 U.S.C. § 801 (1988 & Supp.) (UCMJ art. 1); 10 U.S.C. § 806 (1988) (UCMJ art. 6); 10 U.S.C. § 3064 (1988 & Supp.); 10 U.S.C. § 3072 (1988) (creating the Corps and authorizing The Judge Advocate General).

REV_00259494

n133 Matters likely considered for resolution by courts-martial in a combat zone include "wartime offenses," offenses inimical to the maintenance of good order and discipline in the field, and offenses violating the law of armed conflict (although not charged as such as a matter of policy). For a discussion of "wartime" and "combat offenses," see OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch. 17. Whether to try cases in a combat zone also depends on a number of factors other than the offense, including the intensity and duration of the conflict and the availability of panel members and witnesses. The decision should never hinge on the availability of counsel, military judges, or court reporters.

n134 Notwithstanding the statement of command relationships found in plans and orders, judge advocates must look to law and regulation to determine whether commanders are in fact courts-martial convening authorities. Judge advocates should read UCMJ Articles 22 through 24, and study MANUAL FOR COURTS-MARTIAL, UNITED STATES (1995 ed.), R.C.M. 201(e), "Reciprocal Jurisdiction," and the analysis thereto [hereinafter MCM]. While it is widely known that the commander of a "unified and specified combatant command" may convene courts-martial (id. R.C.M. 201(e)(2)(A)), it is less known that the Secretary of Defense may empower "any commanding officer of a joint command or joint task force [to] convene general courts-martial for the trial of members of any of the armed forces" (id. R.C.M. (e)(2)(B)).

n135 DEP'T OF DEFENSE, JOINT PUBLICATION 0-2, UNIFIED ACTION ARMED FORCES ch. IV (10 Jan. 1995) [hereinafter UNIFIED ACTION] discusses the exercise of disciplinary authority in unified command, subordinate unified command, and JTF organizations. The publication, either in hard copy or on the JEL CD-ROM, supra note 18, is a must for a deployment library in that it addresses the law, policy, and practice of jurisdiction, nonjudicial punishment, courts-martial trial and punishment, and rules and regulations in a joint environment.

n136 See UCMJ art. 22 and MCM, supra note 134, R.C.M. 201(e); R.C.M. 503 (authorizing the detailing of military judges and counsel from one armed force to serve in courts-martial in a different armed force).

n137 See, e.g., DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 27-10, MILITARY JUSTICE, para. 8-6e (8 Aug. 1994) (C1, 16 Dec. 1994), which addresses judicial cross-servicing, and, in change 1, addresses imposition of, and procedures concerning, nonjudicial punishment by multiservice commanders and officers in charge. See also DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 600-20, ARMY COMMAND POLICY, para. 2-12b (24 Apr. 1988).

n138 The joint force commander can be a geographic commander in chief (CINC) or a JTF commander.

n139 See, e.g., Major Susan S. Gibson, Lack of Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Over Civilians: A New Look at an Old Problem, 148 MIL. L. REV. 114 (1995); Major Brian H. Brady, Notice Provisions for United States Citizen Contractor Employees Serving with the Armed Forces of the United States in the Field: Time to Reflect Their Assimilated Status in Government Contracts?, 147 MIL. L. REV. 1 (1995).

n140 A proposed amendment to the UCMJ, now under study, would give courtsmartial jurisdiction over civilians accompanying the force in "time of armed conflict," a broader period than "time of war," but still limited in that many contemporary operations are conducted in neither war nor armed conflict. The amendment was introduced in the House as H.R. 1530, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995) and in the Senate as S. 1026, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995).

n141 In United States v. Averette, 41 C.M.R. 363 (C.M.A. 1970), the United States Court of Military Appeals (now the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces) held that UCMJ Article 2(a)(10) jurisdiction over civilians serving with or accompanying an armed force in the field "in time of war" applied only in a declared war. Notwithstanding the holding in Averette, UCMJ Article 18 grants to general courts-martial the jurisdiction to try "any person who by the law of war is subject to trial by a military tribunal" (emphasis added).

n142 See DEP'T OF DEFENSE, DIRECTIVE 1404.10, EMERGENCY-ESSENTIAL (E-E) DOD US CITIZEN CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES (10 Apr. 1992); UNITED STATES ARMY MATERIEL COMMAND, AMC CIVILIAN DEPLOYMENT GUIDE (Mar. 1994).

n143 GPW, supra note 103, art. 4(A)(4).

n144 See, e.g., THE DESERT STORM ASSESSMENT TEAM, REPORT TO THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL OF THE ARMY, III.F., Labor and Employment Law (22 Apr. 1992). "Civilian employee[s] accompanying the force are, of course, legitimate targets of enemy attack." Id. See also William H. Parks, *Air War and the Law of War, 32 A.F. L. REV. 1, 131 (1990).

n145 While the thrust of developing international law suggests that civilians accompanying the force in the field are combatants (see INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE RED CROSS, COMMENTARY ON THE ADDITIONAL PROTOCOLS OF 8 JUNE 1977 TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS OF 12 AUGUST 1949 515 (Sandoz et al. eds., 1987) [hereinafter PROTOCOL COMMENTARY]), United States policy reflects the position that at least contractors are noncombatants. See DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 700-137, LOGISTICS CIVIL AUGMENTATION PROGRAM, para. 3-2d (16 Dec. 1985) ("[Contractors] may not be used in any role that would jeopardize their role as noncombatants."). Although the distinction between combatant and noncombatant within the armed forces may no longer be critical under international law (PROTOCOL COMMENTARY, supra, at 506), it is significant in determining numerous disciplinary, employment, and veterans' status issues under United States domestic law. A cogent examination of these issues is found in Brady, supra note 139.

n146 Sample General Orders, including the JTF 190 Order used in Haiti, are in the OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch. 17.

n147 Regarding war trophies, see 10 U.S.C. § 2579 (1996), a product of the 1994 National Defense Authorization Act. The legislation mandates standards not yet published in implementing directives and regulations. The Department of Defense should publish a governing directive; the Army regulation on war trophies is decades old. See DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 608-4, CONTROL AND REQUISITION OF WAR TROPHIES AND WAR TROPHY FIREARMS (28 Aug. 1969) (C1, 27 Aug. 1975). One of the purposes of a war trophy or minimum vehicle number convoy policy is to reduce needless risk to soldiers. In Panama, the Gulf, and Bosnia, soldiers were killed or maimed by exploding ordnance or mines when they acted in contravention of orders and policy. Consider prohibitions on unauthorized bunkering, souvenir hunting, and "climbing on or in enemy vehicles and equipment." (A good maxim in areas where unexploded ordnance and booby traps are a problem: "If you didn't drop it, don't pick it up.") n148 In a multinational operation, for example, commanders contemplating a complete ban on alcohol should consider that other national contingents may have liberal alcohol policies. While considering the adverse impact that this may have on morale, commanders also should consider the undeniable positive impact of an alcohol ban on discipline and efficiency in the field.

n149 When drafting the order, consider the "6 C Principle:"

1. COMMON SENSE: Does the order make sense?
2. CLARITY: Is the order understandable at the lowest level?
3. COMMAND INFORMATION (CI): Is the order publicized through all CI means available?

4. CONSISTENCY: Is the order applicable, enforceable, and enforced throughout all levels and layers of command? (An order promulgated for an entire corps is better than diverse orders within its subordinate divisions; a policy promulgated by a unified command and applicable to all of its component commands is better still.)
5. CUSTOMS: Are amnesty and leaders' inspection procedures in place prior to redeployment customs inspections?
6. CAUTION: Does the order reflect the commander's risk assessment?

n150 See generally Lieutenant Colonel Charles R. Shrader, Friendly Fire: The Inevitable Price, PARAMETERS, Autumn 1992, at 29.

n151 See, e.g., DEP'T OF ARMY, REG. 15-6, PROCEDURE FOR INVESTIGATING OFFICERS AND BOARDS OF OFFICERS, para. 1-5 (11 May 1988) ("The primary function of any investigation . . . is to gather facts and report them to the appointing authority.").

n152 See, e.g., Major Ralph Peters, After the Revolution, PARAMETERS, Summer 1995, at 7; Robert D. Kaplan, The Coming Anarchy, ATLANTIC MONTHLY, Feb. 1994, at 44; ALVIN & HEIDI TOFFLER, WAR AND ANTI-WAR: SURVIVAL AT THE DAWN OF THE 21ST CENTURY (1993); Samuel P. Huntington, The Clash of Civilizations?, FOREIGN AFF., Summer 1993, at 22.

n153 See MICHAEL HOWARD, WAR AND THE LIBERAL CONSCIENCE (1978).

n154 See, e.g., Steven Metz & Lieutenant Colonel James Kievit, *The Siren Song of Technology and Conflict Short of War, SPECIAL WARFARE, Jan. 1996, at 2.

n155 All who will lead the Army into the next century should consider Brigadier R. G. S. Bidwell's "five fallacies: "the fallacy of miniaturism (a small good army cannot defeat a big good army); the fallacy of the magic weapon (there is no such thing); the fallacy of war as chess (wars are not won by maneuver alone); the fallacy of the bloodless operation (such is self-deception); and the fallacy of the passive enemy (possible, but neither likely nor completely predictable). Brigadier R. G. S. Bidwell, The Five Fallacies: Some Thoughts on British Military Thinking, THE ROYAL UNITED SERVICE INSTITUTION JOURNAL, Feb. 1967, at 53.

n156 A Force XXI objective is to "win the information war." See, e.g., DEP'T OF ARMY, OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF, FORCE XXI AMERICA'S ARMY OF THE 21ST CENTURY, 15 Jan. 1995, at 22.

n157 "The military staff must be adequately composed: it must contain the best brains in the fields of land, air, and sea warfare, propaganda war, technology, economics, politics, and also those who know the peoples' life." GENERAL ERICH VON LUDENDORFF, TOTAL WAR (1935), quoted in UNIFIED ACTION, supra note 135, at IV-11.

n158 Many judge advocates have remarked that they are ready to practice with "a pen, a green memo pad, the Operational Law Handbook, and the MCM." CD-ROM technology, a 486 or Pentium computer with preloaded form sets, software compatible with the deployed headquarters, the LAAWS program, and a communications link greatly enhance the capability of the deployed judge advocate (deploying judge advocates should have not only the JEL CD-ROMs, supra notes 12 and 18, but other available CD-ROMs such as the ICRC's CD-ROM on "International Humanitarian Law"). United States Army Special Forces command judge advocates have fielded the "Deployable Law Office," which includes, within a briefcase, a notebook computer with CD-ROM, printer, telephone, optical scanner, and camera; the system is powered by batteries and a solar panel. More recently, the Developments, Doctrine, and Literature Department at The Judge Advocate General's School and the Office of the Staff Judge Advocate, United States Army Forces Command, have developed a "Rucksack Deployable Law Office and Library (RDL)," a set of similar capabilities that can serve as the basis for training, equipping, and task organizing legal support elements. The latter organization has purchased more than 80 RDLs for Division and Corps staff judge advocate sections, and the RDL has become for judge advocates the TRADOC-approved "workaround" to the Army Battle Command System (ABCS). See generally DEP'T OF ARMY, FIELD MANUAL 24-7, ARMY BATTLE COMMAND SYSTEM (ABCS): SYSTEMS MANAGEMENT TECHNIQUES (1996). Legal support tactics, techniques, and procedures are fast incorporating these promising new information and digital technologies.

REV_00259497

n159 The concept of "modularity," much discussed in the context of division redesign, is nothing new for the Corps. With the exception of some divisions in Operations Desert Shield and Storm, units or unit composites typically choose to deploy tailored legal cells or elements, not the entire SJA section. Requirements for legal support and services continue at home station. Furthermore, United States Army Reserve judge advocate offices already are modular.

n160 "Jointness" is a profound phenomenon which has only marginally impacted the military legal community. The day likely will come when unified command legal offices are large organizations and the CINCs' legal advisors are brigadier generals. The relative rank and significance of the services' Judge Advocates General and the Chairman's legal advisor will, along with pressure for civilianization and service consolidation, be a major organizational issue facing the Corps of the early Twenty-First Century.

n161 Aside from joint duty assignments, a means for judge advocates to become more proficient is to allow them to complete Phase II of their Professional Joint Education (PJE) at the Armed Forces Staff College. Graduation from the Command and General Staff Officer Course constitutes completion of Phase I of the PJE. Whether judge advocates should become joint specialty officers (JSOs) is a question worthy of careful study. On the developing process of joint education, see JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF PUBLICATION, A STRATEGIC VISION FOR THE PROFESSIONAL MILITARY EDUCATION OF OFFICERS IN THE TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY (1995).

n162 Judge advocates were involved in the emerging stages of Army civil affairs. In 1941, The Judge Advocate General (and later Provost Marshall General), Major General Allen W. Gullion, suggested the need for advanced military government training. General Gullion supervised the production of Field Manual 27-5, Military Government. The Corps was offered the military government mission but demurred. HARRY L. COLES & ALBERT K. WEINBERG, US ARMY IN WORLD WAR II SPECIAL STUDIES, CIVIL AFFAIRS: SOLDIERS BECOME GOVERNORS 8-29 (1964). Ironically, the Army's School of Military Government opened at the University of Virginia, later "the home of the Army lawyer," while The Judge Advocate General's School held classes at the University of Michigan.

n163 In Exercise Prairie Warrior 1996, the capstone exercise for the Army Command and General Staff College and part of the Army Advanced Warfighting Experiment, judge advocates served as the G5 of the Corps and as the G5 of one of two divisions participating in the exercise.

n164 See Major Mark S. Martins, Responding to the Challenge of an Enhanced OPLAW Mission: CLAMO Moves Forward with a Full-Time Staff, ARMY LAW., Aug. 1995, at 3.

n165 A judge advocate has served as an observer-controller (OC) at the Combat Maneuver Training Center (CMTC), Hohenfels, Germany since 1993. A judge advocate OC was assigned to the Joint Readiness Training Center (JRTC), Fort Polk, Louisiana, in 1995, see id., and two more judge advocates and a legal NCO will be assigned to the JRTC in 1996. A judge advocate was assigned to the Battle Command Training Program (BCTP), Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, in June of 1996.

REV_00259498

n166 This process is already underway. Several joint and service publications contain chapters or appendices on "legal responsibilities" or "legal considerations." See OPERATIONAL LAW HANDBOOK, supra note 12, ch. 1, for a list of selected doctrinal publications. The JEL Peace Operations CD-ROM, supra note 12, includes the 1995 edition of the Operational Law Handbook. The process must be continuous and monitored with vigilance, particularly as the Army downsizes and increasingly relies on technology. Simulations are not conducive to the presentment of legal issues, and the contributions of the SJA are often not quantified. Accordingly, the Corps must continue to aggressively state its case about the role, location, and organization of judge advocates in the Force XXI Army.

n167 See, e.g., Major Vaughn A. Ary, Concluding Hostilities: Humanitarian Provisions in Cease-Fire Agreements, 148 MIL. L. REV. 186 (1995).

n168 With regard to engagement (and enlargement), judge advocates are involved in Expanded International Military Education and Training (see Martins, supra note 164) and "Human Rights" Training (see Major Jeffrey F. Addicott & Major Andrew M. Warner, JAG Corps Poised for New Defense Missions: Human Rights Training in Peru, ARMY LAW., Feb. 1991, at 78), and have the potential for increased participation in programs as diverse as the Marshall Center in Garmisch, Germany, and the ICRC's International Institute for Humanitarian Law in San Remo, Italy. As instruments of disengagement, judge advocates are significant members of training teams preparing UN, multinational, or other national headquarters to successfully accept responsibility from the United States for an ongoing mission (for example, judge advocates participated in BCTP training of the UN mission in Haiti military staff). Judge advocates also can help ensure the success of follow-on headquarters: two judge advocates have served as legal advisors to the Commander, UNMIH.

n169 "Governance," or "relative good government," is a more realistic aspiration than "democracy." See generally Kishore Mahbubani, The West and the Rest, NATIONAL INTEREST, Summer 1993.

n170 Lieutenant General Anthony C. Zinni, Commanding General, I MEF, The SJA in Future Operations, MARINE CORPS GAZETTE, Feb. 1996, at 15, 17.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: (engagement) and necessity and war and self-defense and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, September 12, 2001 - 10:00 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

combined environments, judge advocates are likely to deploy as part of a composite legal support section. Because of the composite, complex nature of modern operations, judge advocates supporting combat support or combat service support units may be as likely to deploy as those assigned to combat units. Such was the case in Haiti, Somalia, and Rwanda. Soldier-lawyers must be physically fit and mentally prepared to deploy whether they are assigned to the Pentagon or to a division.

Army doctrine mandates the assignment of judge advocates to combat units and provides some constants concerning their location and mission. First, judge advocates will deploy as far forward as possible. The mission of the Judge Advocate General's Corps is "to support the commander on the battlefield by providing professional legal services as far forward as possible at all echelons of command throughout the operational continuum." [22] Within the discipline of operational law, judge advocates advise commanders on the law of armed conflict, and on other international and domestic law and [*39] policy which impact upon the activities of United States forces in war and MOOTW. [23]

Second, judge advocates will deploy with the lead elements of combat units. The field manuals governing the operations of the infantry division in the field provide a description of the SJA section in the rear, main, and assault command posts of the division. [24] The SJA of the 82d Airborne Division airlanded in Grenada with the division's assault command post in Operation Urgent Fury in 1983. The SJA parachuted into Panama with the division's assault command post in Operation Just Cause in 1989. Judge advocates are a key component of the advance party and main body in MOOTW. [25] A judge advocate deployed with the first rotation of soldiers in Operation Able Sentry in Macedonia in 1993. Presently, many judge advocates serve with the NATO Implementation Force (IFOR) in Bosnia.

Third, judge advocates will deploy with maneuver brigades and larger units. [26] Judge advocates participated in combat with brigades, regiments, and divisions in Operation Desert Storm and in [*40] Panama and Grenada. [27] Judge advocates were on the ground and offshore in Somalia and Haiti. In what may have been a first, at least for an Army judge advocate, an attorney was aloft in the airborne command post for the Haiti operation.

The role of the deployed judge advocate has changed. No longer solely an advisor on discrete areas of law, the SJA increasingly serves in a broader capacity analogous to that of corporate general counsel. Subordinate judge advocates serve as operational law advisors to their commanders. All judge advocates provide legal and policy advice and serve as multifunctional personal and special staff officers. [28] In Haiti, for example, on the first morning of the operation, the SJA advising the United States forces commander participated in the first meeting between the United States commander and General Cedras. [29]

Within the command, judge advocates frequently serve as the "honest broker" or "sounding board" in matters other than those involving law and regulations. Particularly in deployed headquarters, judge advocates cannot wait for others to identify and staff legal issues; they must anticipate, identify, and resolve issues which arise in the course of operations outside the normal staffing process. Judge advocates should be as comfortable in the tactical operations center as they are in a courtroom and as versed in operational legal issues as they are in case law. A deployed, effective judge advocate both unburdens and empowers the commander, relieving the commander from unnecessary tasks and providing advice which enhances the capability of the unit. [30] Today's judge advocate is not [*41] "just the lawyer" but a key leader within the unit. In this regard:

> The qualities of a leader are not limited to commanders. The requirements for leadership are just as essential in the staff officer, and in some respects more exacting, since he does not have that ultimate authority which can be used when necessary and must rely even more than his commander on his own strength of character, his tact, and persuasion in carrying out his duties. [31]

REV_00259467

IV. Selected Legal Issues

Recent experience suggests that legal issues concerning the mission and status of the force, rules of engagement (ROE), prisoners and detainees, indigenous civilians, and military discipline are particularly critical in MOOTW outside the continental United States involving United States forces equipped for combat. [32] Identification and orderly resolution of these and other legal issues can help enhance effectiveness, focus effort, and accomplish the mission. Judge advocates assist commanders by providing legally and militarily sound analysis: "The SJA must be on the commander's squad from the very beginning of any operation." [33]

Solving the legal issues in operations requires analytical versatility and flexible thinking. Seldom are the issues rote or the solutions readily apparent. The "practice of law by analogy" is common-place in operations outside the traditional ambits -- and resultant legal structure -- of "war," "international armed conflict," "internal armed conflict," or "occupation." Nontraditional operational and [*42] legal parameters create issues arising from the most basic of military concepts: the mission. [34]

A. The Mission

To paraphrase the Marine Corps Small Wars Manual, military operations other than war "are conceived in uncertainty, are conducted often with precarious responsibility and doubtful authority, under indeterminate orders lacking specific instructions." [35] Commanders often require assistance in defining the permissible scope of their mission. Coordinated and approved restated mission statements provide the most direct guidance to commanders. Similarly, approved and nested intent statements help ensure that all levels of command "stay within their lane" legally, fiscally, and tactically.

When concerned about whether contemplated tasks or actions are within the scope of the unit's mission, commanders and judge advocates should collectively review their mission statement. [36] If the action is not expressly authorized by the statement, they must consider whether it is inherently authorized. Reasonable action to protect the force is always authorized. In Somalia, United States forces permissibly improved roads under the inherent authority to protect the force -- convoys and patrols that would have been placed at greater risk on dangerous, worn roads. More problematic are actions undertaken by implication. In Haiti, for example, United States forces were directed to "enhance security and restore civil order." This mission statement served as the implied basis for [*43] Operation Light Switch, wherein operational and maintenance funds were used to make minor, short-term repairs to the Port-au-Prince municipal power plant. [37] The restoration of electricity in a city clearly enhances security and promotes order. Similarly, the authority to detain civilians for security and order is fairly implied from mission statements which contain commands such as "restore order" or "create a secure environment."

Missions can change. Although judge advocates should assist their commanders in avoiding "mission creep," [38] whether a mission "crept" or changed may be a matter of intent, result, and perspective. Changes in mission can be deliberate, as in phases, or contingent, as in branches and sequels. Missions and orders are dynamic; they will likely be modified by fragmentary orders (FRAGOs). Judge advocates can make a valuable contribution in their commands by assisting in the planning for sequels involving postcombat stability and support and civil-military operations. [39]

Beyond the content of the mission statement, ascertaining the proper scope of a mission is at times complicated by the inherent vagaries of the term "MOOTW." What constitutes a

REV_00259468

"MOOTW mission?" What is a "MOOTW environment?" What is a "MOOTW trained and ready force?" Judge advocates may be tempted to look for "the law of MOOTW." [40] They must ignore that temptation. While there may be some constants, tenets, or principles associated with MOOTW, they are, like the principles of war or tenets of Army operations, only generalities. Conversely, the "laundry list" of MOOTW [*44] can present a trap for the unwary, suggesting that missions can be readily categorized; while this is possible, it is unusual. [41] More likely, operations will be a combination of MOOTW, occurring either concurrently or consecutively. Operations may even be a combination of MOOTW and war. When faced with a particular mission, however characterized, judge advocates should instead ask, "Is the mission primarily dominated by combat or noncombat operations?" Put another way, the question could be phrased, "Is the operation dominated by lethal or nonlethal elements of combat power?" [42]

In operations primarily dominated by combat operations, the role of the judge advocate is significant, but traditional, and involves support in the areas governed by existing law, regulation, and doctrine. [43] In operations either dominated by, or evolving into, noncombat operations, the role of the judge advocate expands. Conflict termination activity, stability and support operations, and postconflict missions in general are expanding areas for judge advocates. Repetitive issues in these contexts are indigenous weapons control and confiscation policies, [44] methods by which United States forces restore order, [45] the status of United States forces, and the reemergence [*45] and training of local police and governmental structures. [46]

Judge advocates must appreciate the political-legal context of operations. [47] At a minimum, they must understand the articulated legal basis for an operation. [48] Questions concerning the applicability and effect of the War Powers Resolution [49] are rote, but inevitable. The content and meaning of applicable UN Security Council resolutions and the impact of Presidential Decision Directive 25 [50] are key issues in establishing the context of peace operations authorized or directed by the UN. On the ground, political-legal factors are no less important. Judge advocates must understand the role of the country team. [51] The senior judge advocate on a contingency operation should [*46] attend country team meetings with, or for, the commander whenever practicable. All judge advocates should appreciate that the Departments of State and Defense do not necessarily have identical (or even parallel) agendas in a particular operation, and that domestic, international, and "host nation" politics are important considerations, particularly in MOOTW. [52]

Much has been written about peace operations [53] and the distinctions between "peacekeeping" [54] and "peace enforcement." [55] While the distinctions are critical to the international lawyer or politician, the terminology differences among missions are not as important to the soldier on the ground. The soldier -- and his commander -- are more properly concerned about the following questions:

. Who is in charge?

. What is the mission?

. Where is my sector, position, or zone?

. When do we use force (what are the ROE)?

. Why are we here? How do we know when we are done (what is the objective and end state)?

REV_00259469

Peace and humanitarian assistance operations present particular challenges to commanders and judge advocates. In addition to the issues associated with all military operations, peace operations often produce complex questions concerning mission and legal context; ROE; status, authority, and protection of the force; and logistics. In both peace and humanitarian assistance operations, the presence of international organizations (IOs) and governmental [*47] organizations (GOs), [56] and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and private volunteer organizations (PVOs), [57] can establish, complicate, or hinder the mission of the deployed force. In any event, the judge advocate will provide advice concerning the command's support to, and authority over, IOs, GOs, NGOs, and PVOs. [58] The judge advocate, possessing legal, cultural, and negotiating skills, has a key role in supporting the civil-military operations center (CMOC). [59]

In UN operations, regardless of their mission characterization, judge advocates must understand the international and domestic governing authority, the mandate, and the terms of reference (TOR). [60] Simply stated, governing authority is granted by applicable UN Security Council Resolutions (UNSCRs) and the domestic law of the nations contributing forces to the operation. The mandate is expressed by UNSCR and states the broad mission, political objective, and desired end state. [61] The TOR is effectively the contract between the UN and countries contributing forces to an operation. [62] The TOR are extremely important; the document states the mission, structure, organization, command and logistical relationships, support requirements, and funding of the force. Judge advocates must appreciate the roles of UN civilians, particularly the Special Representative to the Secretary General (SRSG), who is to UN [*48] forces what the United States Ambassador is to United States forces overseas and to the Chief Administrative Officer (CAO). [63] Attention to logistical support, resource management, and property account-ability details are important in a UN operation. [64]

B. Status of the Force

Any overseas mission requires determining the legal status, rights, and privileges of the force and its members. In some instances, this determination is simple and certain; in others, it is difficult and ambiguous. Judge advocates addressing the issue should first ascertain whether any existing agreement applies to the operation. [65] If no agreement applies, then judge advocates should consider whether one is necessary. No agreement is necessary if United States forces are engaging in combat against, or occupying, what would otherwise be the "receiving state;" similarly, no agreement is necessary without a "receiving state." [66] In these instances, "the Law of the Flag" [67] applies, and the United States retains exclusive jurisdiction over its forces. [68]

[*49] Two situations are more problematic. The first occurs when United States forces are present with the consent or acquiescence of the receiving state, without benefit of any status of forces agreement. The second occurs in postconflict situations when the United States is not an occupier and local governmental structures, particularly police and judicial institutions, are beginning to function. Both situations require some determination of the status of the force. Both require coordination with the geographically-responsible unified command and the United States Chief of Mission (Ambassador). Those negotiating status (and other international) agreements must act with requisite legal, procedural, and substantive authority. [69]

Judge advocates have been deeply involved in determining the status of United States forces in recent operations. Typically, United States forces are granted the status "extrapolated" [70] from an already existing agreement (which, by its terms, does not apply to the size, composition, or size of the force at issue), or the United States forces are granted privileges and immunities analogous to those conferred on the administrative and technical staff of missions (embassies). [71] The result under either approach is to give United States forces full immunity from receiving state criminal laws and limited immunity from civil jurisdiction. In Grenada, as combat ended and government functions reemerged, United States forces were granted such immunity through an exchange of notes. [72] In Kuwait, United States forces were initially and unilaterally granted complete immunity. During Operation Desert Storm, Saudi Arabia extrapolated an earlier limited agreement to apply to arriving United States forces. In the NATO IFOR mission, the Dayton Agreement addresses the status of the force in Bosnia. The new Partnership for Peace (PFP) status of forces agreement governs the status of the force in Hungary, which is the site of the intermediate staging base.

REV_00259470

[*50] Status of forces issues can be complicated in UN operations. On the one hand, forces committed to a traditional peacekeeping mission directed by the UN generally can rely on the consent of the receiving state as well as express or implied agreement about the privileges and immunities of the peacekeeping force. An express agreement may be concluded between the UN mission and the receiving state, often following the terms of "the UN Model Status of Mission/Status of Forces Agreement." [73] An implied understanding can flow from the terms of Articles 104 and 105 of the UN Charter and, by analogy, from the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the UN. [74] In any event, the nature of a true peace-keeping mission portends little real difficulty concerning the status of the peacekeeping force.

On the other hand, in a mission which does not fit within traditional peacekeeping, or where the receiving state is not fully committed to the success of the mission, reliance on agreements by implication is folly. Not only must judge advocates strive to obtain explicit agreements which address both legal and military issues, they must anticipate variance between "legal truth and ground truth." They must recognize the reality that a receiving state may be unable or unwilling to enforce compliance with agreements among its political subdivisions; [75] conversely, the receiving state may insist on strict interpretation of the parties and content of an agreement. [76] The negotiation and application of status of forces, and other international agreements, in modern operations requires sagacity born of political, military, and legal experience. [77]

[*51] Claims play a significant role in operational law. Prompt and efficient processing of deployed soldiers' claims can have a positive impact on morale. Payment of indigenous citizens' claims enhances civilian support of the force. Military operations other than war can present an unusual context for claims because of the blurred distinction between combat and noncombat operations, with resultant uncertainty over compensation for the use, taking, or damage of civilian property. [78] Further, claims processing in MOOTW may be complicated by other UN, multilateral, and host nation claims authorities.

Judge advocates should be mindful that, despite frequent political and economic arguments to the contrary, the United States does not pay claims for combat damage under the Foreign Claims Act. [79] Absent express authority and funding, the United States Armed Forces claims program is not an instrument of economic recovery. [80] Similarly, the program is not a contracting substitute. It is, however, a powerful tool to maintain the goodwill of the civilian populace; accordingly, United States forces should be cautious about relying on the often ponderous and cumbersome claims programs of the UN or other authorities. Notwithstanding assertions that other programs are in place, United States forces should always maintain the capability to adjudicate claims in the field.

*C. Rules of Engagement

Rules of engagement are a critical component of disciplined operations, [81] particularly in MOOTW where political considerations [*52] require the restrained and judicious use of force. [82] For the judge advocate, ROE may be the most important information pertaining to an operation. Judge advocates are increasingly involved in the drafting, distillation, and dissemination of ROE.

While much has been written on ROE at the theoretical and strategic levels, little doctrinal literature for land forces exists at the practical, operational, and tactical levels. Even the doctrinal definition of ROE, published by the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS), has little specific meaning to the soldier on the ground. [83] A better definition for the soldier is that ROE are the commander's standards for the use of force.

REV_00259471

The JCS Standing ROE (SROE), which replaced the JCS Peacetime ROE (PROE) in 1994, provide standing rules and policy guidance from the National Command Authority to the unified command commanders-in-chief (CINCs). [84] The JCS SROE base document is unclassified, but the SROE include classified supplemental measures. Unclassified definitions of critical terms, such as "national self-defense," "unit self-defense," "collective self-defense," "hostile act," and "hostile intent," also are contained in the SROE.

The JCS SROE contain numerous improvements over the JCS PROE. [85] First, the SROE provide standing rules and policy that apply, unless superseded, in peacetime, transition to war, and wartime. Second, the SROE are permissive and realistic, not restrictive or prophylactic. Third, they govern the use of force not only in self-defense, but in mission accomplishment. Fourth, the SROE include, as additional standing ROE for specific areas of operational responsibility (AORs), ROE proposed by CINCs and approved by the JCS. Fifth, the SROE contain more robust supplemental measures, particularly for the ground forces, which may be activated either by [*53] order of the JCS or on the request of any level of command and approval by the JCS. Significantly, commanders need not limit their requests to listed supplemental measures but may draft their own proposed ROE for approval by higher headquarters. Supplemental measures, whether or not invoked, never limit a commander's right and obligation to use force for unit self-defense. Sixth, the SROE provide guidance concerning ROE in combined (multinational) operations: ROE should be "common" but need not be identical among multinational partners. [86]

Judge advocates participated in the drafting and staffing process leading to the new SROE, [87] and play a continuing role in the implementation of ROE at the operational and tactical levels. Judge advocates assist commanders in several major respects relative to ROE:

> (1) They provide advice to commanders concerning the effect and propriety of applicable or putative Supplemental Measures, frequently drafting proposed Supplemental Measures.
>
> (2) They "distill" complex ROE provided by higher head-quarters into simplified ROE, and into ROE extracts on pocket cards, for their units. [88] The "distillation" must be consistent with the ROE provided by the higher headquarters.
>
> (3) They draft, in concert with the operations and intelligence staffs, complete ROE for a contingency operation. The ROE is then sent to higher headquarters for approval.
>
> (4) They provide advice to commanders concerning the meaning, effect, implementation, and enforceability of ROE.
>
> (5) They provide training assistance in preparing realistic scenarios and vignettes for commanders and soldiers to learn the ROE, and enhance the ability of commanders and soldiers to apply the ROE under stress.

[*54] Doctrine does not define a standard staff approach and procedure for ROE development. The role of judge advocates in the ROE process is mentioned only generally or obliquely in military publications. [89] In some commands, staff primacy in ROE matters resides with the SJA; in others, with the G3 (Operations). Primary staff responsibility for ROE should lie with the G3. The SJA may "draft" the ROE (or ROE supplemental measure, distillation, or extract), but the ROE at the operational and tactical level should remain an operational, not a

REV_00259472

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: (engagement) and necessity and war and self-defense and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)

*50 Cath. U.L. Rev. 501, **

Copyright (c) 2001 The Catholic University Law Review
Catholic University Law Review

Winter, 2001

50 Cath. U.L. Rev. 501

LENGTH: 14420 words

COMMENT: PROTECTING CIVILIANS DURING OPERATION ALLIED FORCE: THE ENDURING IMPORTANCE OF THE PROPORTIONAL RESPONSE AND NATO'S USE OF ARMED FORCE IN KOSOVO

Randy W. Stone+

* J.D. Candidate, May 2001, The Catholic University of America, Columbus School of Law.

SUMMARY:
... An example of an internationally recognized limitation governing the use of force is the doctrine of proportionality. ... This doctrine accepts wartime civilian casualties as inevitable, but the doctrine of proportionality requires that civilian casualties inflicted by military strikes not be excessive in relation to the anticipated military advantage gained by the strike. ... Although the U.N. Charter does not expressly discuss a proportional limitation on the use of force, it is widely accepted that the doctrine of proportionality governs any use of force, including the use of force in self-defense. ... When balanced against the anticipated military advantage of a strike, such caution is indicative of the doctrine of proportionality. ... Kosovo: The Continuing Crisis in the Balkans ... A. Kosovo: The Anatomy of a Conflict ... In Kosovo, ninety percent of the civilian population is Albanian and the remaining ten percent is Serbian. ... As applied in Kosovo, this strategy combined the case-by-case analysis with the cumulative analysis and, at times, sacrificed the protective umbrella created by the doctrine of proportionality. ... As evidenced by the conflict in Kosovo, one of the most important continues to be the doctrine of proportionality. ...

"[The l]aws are silent in time of war."

- Cicero [1]

"To introduce into the philosophy of War ... a principle of moderation would be an absurdity ... . Let us not hear of Generals who conquer without bloodshed. If a bloody slaughter is a horrible sight, then that is a ground for paying more respect to War."

- Carl von Clausewitz [2]

"There has always been a sentiment among mankind to mitigate the horrors of war, as far as the nature of the thing permits."

- William C. Sherman [3]

Operation Allied Force demonstrated the modern application of the doctrine of proportionality. Examples of NATO attacks, namely those against the Socialist Party Headquarters building in Belgrade and Serbian infrastructure targets, show that NATO planners had intended to avoid excessive civilian casualties. [199]

[*531] In addition, political leaders of NATO member nations took active roles in target selection. [200] Current information does not indicate any intentional or indiscriminate bombings of civilian populations, which the doctrine of proportionality strictly prohibits. [201] NATO planners reviewed the range of possible civilian collateral damage for each target, gathered intelligence, and used weapons that would minimize civilian casualties. [202] Finally, NATO postponed a ground invasion of Kosovo and an attack upon Serbian computer systems, both of which would have negatively impacted Serbian civilian life. [203]

B. Operation Allied Force: NATO's Proportional Failures

An analysis of Operation Allied Force's individual attacks, particularly [*532] the attacks that disrupted the water supply, reveals NATO's failure to protect civilians. [204] Attacks on electrical power grids and bridges also raise questions as to whether the anticipated military advantage truly outweighed civilian concerns. [205] Further, accidental strikes occurred and led to civilian casualties. [206]

Operation Allied Force shows that nations use a combination of the cumulative and case-by-case approaches when determining anticipated military advantage. [207] When the case-by-case analysis does not justify a particular attack, nations may apply the cumulative analysis of the anticipated military advantage, which provides a lower standard of protection for civilians during wartime. [208] The strategic goals of Operation Allied Force included expelling Serbian forces from Kosovo, ending the humanitarian disaster, and preventing further instability in the Balkan region. [209] NATO's use of force was not intended to punish Serbian civilians, but rather to apply only that amount of force necessary to achieve these strategic goals. [210]

NATO planners frequently balanced civilian concerns when they [*533] planned individual attacks, as evidenced in the attack upon the Socialist Headquarters building and the refusal to bomb the "Rock-n-Roll" bridge. [211] They planned for a minimum amount of potential civilian casualties, acted upon intelligence to minimize such casualties, and discussed possible strategies that would decrease unwanted casualties. [212]

At times, however, NATO planners measured the anticipated military advantage through a cumulative analysis, determining whether a specific attack would help achieve the overall strategic goals. [213] NATO understood that attacking Serbian military targets in Kosovo and Serbia would not be enough to make the Serbian government capitulate. [214] The Serbian government would have acquiesced only after NATO targeted more sensitive and civilian-related objects, including electricity grids, ministry buildings, and bridges. [215] NATO, therefore, attacked targets that affected Serbia's military capability, as well as its ability to gain Serbian-civilian support for its military action in Kosovo. [216]

[*534] As applied in Kosovo, this strategy combined the case-by-case analysis with the cumulative analysis and, at times, sacrificed the protective umbrella created by the doctrine of proportionality. [217] Continuing this predominant aspect of warfare, which focuses military force on an enemy's civilian population and government in order to compel an enemy to accept certain terms, fails to provide the full protection found in the express language of the Protocol. [218]

Operation Allied Force illustrates the continuing influence of the jus ad bellum of a military operation upon the jus in bello. [219] Theoretically, the two maxims are distinct, but frequently, the means of an operation are considered just if the cause is considered just. [220] Increased acceptance of proportionality, a development marked most notably by its codification in the

REV_00259509

Protocol, may be expected to dull the jus ad bellum influence; however, the tactics of the Gulf War and Operation Allied Force show the strong belief that achieving an end, when deemed just, permits a wide range of means. [221]

[*535]

C. Operation Allied Force: A Criminal Law Application?

As required by the Protocol, an operation is not analyzed as a whole to determine whether it constituted a proportional response, but the proportionality of each attack within an operation is assessed individually. [222] Proportionality, within the context of the Protocol, stresses the jus in bello of warfare, speaking to the anticipated military advantage of a specific attack rather than the overall political or humanitarian advantages of an operation. [223]

Proportionality in the criminal law context, which mandates that the punishment fit the crime, provides another analytical tool for the jus ad bellum of a military operation. [224] Considering whether NATO's operation, taken as a whole, was a proportional response to the humanitarian crisis created in Kosovo, the appropriate question asks whether the operation, inclusive of both civilian and combatant injuries, properly fits the crimes committed by Serbia against the citizens of Kosovo. [225] The answer to this question will differ according to individual moral, political, legal, and ethical views. [226]

D. The Direction of the Doctrine of Proportionality in the 21st Century

As the hearts and minds of the world soar and embrace the new opportunities of the 21st century, they sink when remembering the carnage of wars fought in the 20th century, including the current trend of violence in the Balkans. [227] Is it possible to regulate war and maintain rules intended [*536] to protect civilians? [228] Although nations once chose to settle conflicts by engaging large armies on battlefields, airstrikes are now popular military tools. [229] Governments prefer surgical airstrikes, which maintain the false promises of decreasing combatant and civilian casualties. [230] Despite the best efforts and intentions of any military planner to apply the doctrine of proportionality, civilian casualties in wartime are inevitable. [231] Because [*537] of this truth of war, some suggest that General Robert E. Lee surmised correctly that "it is well that war is so terrible[; otherwise] we would grow too fond of it." [232]

V. Conclusion

The doctrine of proportionality, most recently codified in the Protocol, continues to be a workable tool and the best solution in the effort to prevent excessive civilian casualties. Its purpose and importance find support in international charters and treaties, ICJ decisions, and in state practice. Proportionality now claims further support from NATO's Operation Allied Force against Serbia. For proportionality to be most effective, however, nations must focus on a case-by-case analysis of military advantage. The current trend of accepting a cumulative analysis of military advantage, within a broader combination of both cumulative and case-by-case analyses, fails to meet the standards set forth by the Protocol. This combination deprives civilians of the most protection during wartime. As modern warfare continues to exact tolls on civilians, it is imperative that nations continue to look to the doctrine for guidance and explore ways for which it can be improved. Contrary to Cicero's belief, there are laws in time of war. As evidenced by the conflict in Kosovo, one of the most important continues to be the doctrine of proportionality.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. The Oxford Dictionary of Quotations 204 (Angela Partington ed., 4th ed. 1992).

REV_00259510

n2. Gerald J. Adler, Targets in War: Legal Considerations, 8 Hous. L. Rev. 1, 7 & n.28 (1970) (quoting Carl von Clausewitz, On War 3, 288 (Graham trans., 1966)).

n3. The Laws of War: Constraints on Warfare in the Western World 159 (Michael Howard et al., eds., 1994).

n4. See John Prevas, Hannibal Crosses the Alps at xv (1998) (providing a time line of the major events in Hannibal's life including the Battle of Zama); see also Donald Kagan, On the Origins of War and the Preservation of Peace 232-80 (1995) (detailing the causes and battles of the Second Punic War); Serge Lancel, Hannibal 172-85 (1998) (restating the facts of the Battle of Zama); B.H. Liddell Hart, Scipio Africanus: Greater Than Napoleon 164-90 (1926) (assessing the Battle of Zama).

n5. See Prevas, supra note 4, at 7 (intimating that Scipio also spared Carthage due to his respect for Hannibal).

n6. See id. (clarifying how Carthage quickly prospered due to international trade and repaid its debt to Rome after the Second Punic War ahead of schedule).

n7. See id. (noting Carthage's eventual demise due to Rome's three-year siege of the city). The story states that:

Legend has it that the Roman fear and hatred of Carthage had become so great ... that a curse was placed over the ruins and salt plowed into the ground so nothing could ever live there again. So complete was the Roman destruction that little trace of the Carthaginian culture remains today.

Id.

n8. See id. at 1. The story continues:

The city burned for seventeen days, and even after it no longer contained life the Romans weren't finished. Once the fires had cooled, soldiers worked amidst the rubble and the thousands of incinerated human remains to obliterate any physical trace of what had once been known as "the jewel of the Mediterranean."

Id.

n9. See id.

n10. See id.

n11. Id.; cf. Kagan, supra note 4, at 289-90 (providing a comparison of the peace treaty that concluded the First World War to a "Carthaginian Peace"). John Maynard Keyes, the noted economist, called the Treaty of Versailles "immoral and unworkable." Id. at 290. Referring to both the reparations and economic aspects imposed by the treaty and the total destruction of Carthage by Rome after the Third Punic War, Keyes argued that the proposed peace treaty "would bring economic ruin and war to Europe unless it was repudiated." Id.

n12. See John Temple Swing, Foreword to Louis Henkin et al., Right v. Might: International Law and the Use of Force at vii (1989) (admitting that humankind has a long history of attempts to limit the "scourge of war"). Swing describes this process as a "struggle to impose "rationality on reality.'" Id. Swing postulates that this "central contest between reason and force" continues today. Id.; see generally John Keegan, A History of Warfare 3-60 (1993) (summarizing the role war has played in the development of humankind).

n13. See Swing, supra note 12, at vii (postulating that limitations on the use of force, culminating with the U.N. Charter, are as old as warfare itself); see also Lieutenant Colonel William J. Fenrick, The Rule of Proportionality and Protocol I in Conventional Warfare, 98 Mil. L. Rev. 91, 92 (1982) ("The law of war or of armed conflict is concerned in part with the protection of basic human rights, particularly the elemental right to life."); Guy B. Roberts, The New Rules for Waging War: The Case Against Ratification of Additional Protocol I, 26 Va. J. Int'l L. 109, 110-11 (1985) (providing a brief description of the history of warfare regulation); Stefaan Smis & Kim Van der Borght, The Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, 27 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 345, 376-77 (1999) (stating that the customary rules that limit the use of force in the conduct of war existed in India, China, Ancient Rome, and the European Middle Ages).

n14. See Commander Charles A. Allen, Implementing Limitations on the Use of Force: The Doctrine of Proportionality and Necessity, 86 Am. Soc'y Int'l Proc. 39, 46 (1992) (defining proportionality as a concept of distinction, requiring that parties to a conflict "distinguish between civilian populations and combatants and between civilian objects and military objectives"); Fenrick, supra note 13, at 92; Judith Gail Gardam, Proportionality and Force in International Law, 87 Am. J. Int'l L. 391, 391 (1993) (introducing the doctrine of proportionality as it applied in the Gulf War); Bernard L. Brown, Note, The Proportionality Principle in the Humanitarian Law of Warfare: Recent Efforts at Codification, 10 Cornell Int'l L.J. 134, 134 (1976) (providing examples of attempts to codify and strengthen the international recognition of limitations on warfare); see also Crimes of War: What the Public Should Know 294 (Roy Guthman & David Rieff, eds., 1999) [hereinafter Crimes of War] (stating that the principle of proportionality is "embedded in almost every national legal system and underlies the international legal order"). Proportionality is used to determine "the lawfulness in jus ad bellum of the strategic goals ... [and] the lawfulness in jus in bello of any armed attack that causes civilian casualties." Id. Proportionality is involved in any situation where military action causes collateral civilian damage. See id.

REV_00259512

n15. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 391 & n.3 (expressing the importance of a proportional military response); Michael N. Schmitt, Clipped Wings: Effective and Legal No-fly Zone Rules of Engagement, 20 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L.J. 727, 765 (1998) (defining proportionality, within the context of legal rules of engagement for no-fly zones, as allowing "no more force than necessary to counter the hostile act or demonstration of hostile intent"). The fundamental principle of proportionality states that belligerents are not entitled to utilize unlimited means to achieve particular military objectives at the expense of civilian casualties. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 391; see also Brown, supra note 14, at 134 & n.2 (noting the failure of recent codifications such as the Geneva Convention to address proportionality and to provide adequate civilian protection).

n16. See Brown, supra note 14, at 134.

n17. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 395-96; see also Crimes of War, supra note 14, at 223 ("Jus ad bellum is the title given to the branch of law that defines the legitimate reasons a state may engage in war and focuses on certain criteria that render a war just."). The modern principle of jus ad bellum derives from the U.N. Charter, which sets forth the only acceptable instances that permit the use force. See id.

n18. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 391, 395; see also Crimes of War, supra note 14, at 223 (providing that the jus in bello is the "set of laws that come into effect once a war has begun" and noting that these rules depend upon international customary law); Fenrick, supra note 13, at 94 (setting forth the concepts underlying the rule of proportionality). The traditional approach toward armed conflict involves three concepts. See id. at 93. First, military necessity mandates that force can only be used to achieve a particular military objective, which is usually the "partial or complete submission of the enemy at the earliest possible moment with the least possible expenditure of lives, resources, and money." Id. Second, humanity prohibits the infliction of unnecessary suffering upon combatants or noncombatants. See id. Third, chivalry recognizes the deference to certain formalities and courtesies in warfare. See id. at 94. The doctrine of proportionality balances these three concepts. See id.

n19. See North Atlantic Treaty, Apr. 4, 1949, 63 Stat. 2241, 34 U.N.T.S. 243. NATO was established as a U.S.-European alliance, "reaffirming their faith in the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and their desire to live in peace with all peoples and all governments." Id. at 2242. Frequently viewed solely as a defensive alliance against the Soviet Union, the Treaty granted NATO nations the ability to settle international disputes, including the use of force, under the auspices and direction of the U.N. See id.

n20. See generally NATO's Role in Relation to the Conflict in Kosovo (visited June 17, 2000) <http://www.nato.int/kosovo/history.htm> [hereinafter NATO's Role] (providing background information on the Kosovo conflict and an overview of NATO's goals and methods).

REV_00259513

n21. See Michael J. Kelly, Traveling the Road to Rambouillet: Is the Imposition of Federalism in Kosovo Pragmatic Foreign Policy or Unwise Meddling?, 40 S. Tex. L. Rev. 789, 798-99 (1999) (considering various questions raised by NATO's action in Kosovo, such as whether mass genocide justifies the use of armed force by a nation-state); Aaron Schwabach, The Legality of the NATO Bombing Operation in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, 11 Pace Int'l L. Rev. 405, 407-08, 418 (1999) (suggesting sources of international law that would provide a legal basis for NATO's bombing of Kosovo and Serbia); Kofi Annan, Two Concepts of Sovereignty, The Economist, Sept. 18, 1999, at 49-50 (advancing both the importance of national sovereignty and the risks presented to international peace and stability by the use of force by regional arrangements without the previous and explicit approval of the U.N. Security Council); Other People's Wars, The Economist, July 31, 1999, at 13-14 (evaluating the opinions of legal scholars who argue that force for humanitarian intervention is wrong because it prolongs violence and unrest by prohibiting the same from running their natural courses to cessation and postulating that intervention does not produce lasting peace).

n22. Black's Law Dictionary 1219 (6th ed. 1990); see also Webster's New World Dictionary 1139-40 (2d ed. 1980) (defining proportionate as "in proper proportion" or "to make proportionate" and defining proportion as "the comparative relation between parts, things or elements with respect to size, amount or degree").

n23. See, e.g., Lewis v. Vogelstein, 699 A.2d 327, 336-38 (1997) (introducing the concept of proportionality into Delaware corporate law).

n24. See, e.g., Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 303 (1983) (reaffirming proportionality in criminal sentencing); Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 367 (1910) ("It is a precept of justice that punishment for [a] crime should be graduated and proportioned to [the] offense.").

n25. See Barry E. Carter & Phillip R. Trimble, International Law 1287-88, 1293 (2d ed. 1995) (discussing the concept of proportionality as it relates to the state of war among nations).

n26. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 394-95 (contending that proportionality "required an assessment as to whether the overall evil a war would cause was balanced by the good that would be achieved"). But see M. Shaw, International Law 539-41 (1986), reprinted in Carter & Trimble, supra note 25, at 1282-83 (insisting that later legal theorists began to include with the requirements of just war the "immunity of innocent persons from direct attack and the proportionate use of force to overcome the opposition").

n27. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 395 (conceding that no independent jus in bello doctrine existed during the early stages of the proportionality doctrine); see also Crimes of War, supra note 14, at 224 (reporting that the theory of just war originated from Roman Law). In the seventeenth century, the Dutch philosopher Hugo Grotius first espoused the seven criteria that formed the foundation for a just war:

The criteria for engaging in a just war ... consists of seven elements: (1) that there be a just cause; (2) that there is a right authority (legitimate sovereign) to initiate the war; (3) a right intention on the part of the parties using force; (4) that the resort to force be proportional; (5) that force be a last resort; (6) that war is undertaken with peace as its goal (not for its own sake); (7) and that there be a reasonable hope of success.

Id. at 224.

n28. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 397 (illuminating the early developmental stage of proportionality). The modern law of armed conflict developed during:

The period from the emergence of the modern nation state until the adoption of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 saw the development of the modern law of armed conflict; much of the law of the means and methods of warfare was codified between the middle of the nineteenth century and the Hague Conferences of 1899 and 1907. The foundation of the modern doctrine of proportionality in the law of armed conflict, that belligerents do not have an unlimited choice of means to inflict damage on the enemy, emerged during this period.

Id.

n29. See id.

n30. See id. at 397, 399-401; see also David G. Burwell, Note, Civilian Protection in Modern Warfare: A Critical Analysis of the Geneva Civilian Convention of 1949, 14 Va. J. Int'l L. 123, 126 (1973) (elaborating that "the atrocities of the Second World War ... pointed out the need to extend protection to civilians, not only as against the acts of opposing belligerent powers, but also as against persecution by their own incumbent governments"); David MacIsaac, Voices from the Central Blue: The Air Power Theorists, in Makers of Modern Strategy from Machiavelli to the Nuclear Age 624, 630 (Peter Paret et al. eds., 1986) (detailing the argument that air warfare should avoid making distinctions between combatants and noncombatants because massive aerial bombing raids should be conducted against enemy centers of population, government, and industry).

n31. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 400. But see id. (arguing that governments expressed concern regarding a strict adherence to proportionality because the doctrine may nullify the effectiveness of military strikes). In addition to the desire to maximize military effectiveness, a pessimism continued from the First World War into the Second over the ability to maintain proportional armed force. See id. As methods of warfare became more sophisticated and the practice of aerial bombardment became more accepted, distinguishing between military and nonmilitary targets and combatants and civilians became increasingly difficult. See id.

n32. See id. at 402.

REV_00259515

n33. See Allen, supra note 14, at 39 (concluding that a determination of whether force is necessary and proportional "arouses strong emotions and affects political attitudes" and citing as examples the Second World War, the Panamanian Invasion by the United States, and the Korean, Vietnam, and Gulf Wars); see also Roberts, supra note 13, at 118 (noting the difficulty of applying proportionality). Roberts argues that:

Balancing the potential loss of innocent civilian lives against the attainment of an important military objective requires a commander to undertake an impossible ethical calculus. Nevertheless, the principle remains an integral part of the law of war, serving as a method whereby judgments can be made as to the appropriateness of the use of force in a given situation.

Id.

n34. U.N. Charter art. 2, para. 4. The Charter states that: "All members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations." Id.

n35. U.N. Charter art. 39 ("The Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken ... to maintain or restore international peace and security."); U.N. Charter art. 42 ("Should the Security Council consider that measures ... [are] inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security.").

n36. U.N. Charter art. 51 ("Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations ... . "); see also Major Dawn R. Eflein, A Case Study of Rules of Engagement in Joint Operations: The Air Force Shootdown of Army Helicopters in Operation Provide Comfort, 44 A.F. L. Rev. 33, 40 (1998) (reiterating that necessity and proportionality are prerequisites for the legitimate use of force in self-defense).

n37. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 403; Louis Henkin, Use of Force: Law and U.S. Policy, in Right v. Might: International Law and the Use of Force 37, 45 (1989) (discussing proportionality as a limitation on the use of force for self-defense under the U.N. Charter); see also Mark B. Baker, Terrorism and the Inherent Right of Self-Defense (A Call to Amend Article 51 of the United Nations Charter), 10 Hous. J. Int'l L. 25, 46-47 (1987) (citing the importance of proportionality when responding in self-defense to a terrorist attack). The methods used must be limited to removing the danger; once the danger is removed under Article 51 of the U.N. Charter, all force must cease pending Security Council action. See id.

n38. See Fenrick, supra note 13, at 95 (detailing attempts at codifying proportionality prior to Protocol I); see also id. at 96 (adding that the 1938 Resolution of the League of Nations Assembly Concerning Protection of Civilian Population Against Bombing From the Air in Case of War was another milestone in the development of proportionality). The Resolution made the intentional bombing of civilian populations illegal, mandated that targets of aerial attacks must be legitimate, identifiable military targets, and insisted that caution be used in the execution of attacks in order to prevent the negligent bombing of civilian areas. See id.

n39. See N.J. Rengger, Treaties and Alliances of the World 163-64 (1990) (providing pertinent aspects of the 1899 Hague Convention including the prohibitions on the use of asphyxiating gases and expanding bullets).

n40. See Brown, supra note 14, at 136; Burwell, supra note 30, at 125-26 (stressing how the parties to the 1907 Hague Convention "remained under the protection and the rule of the principles of the law of nations, as they result from the usages established among civilized peoples, from the laws of humanity, and from the dictates of the public conscience"). But see Rengger, supra note 39, at 164 (finding that the previous prohibitions on the use of asphyxiating gases and expanding bullets were not renewed in 1907).

n41. See Hague Convention, July 29, 1899, 32 Stat. 1803, 1 Bevans 247 [hereinafter 1899 Hague Convention]; Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, Oct. 18, 1907, 36 Stat. 2277, 1 Bevans 631 [hereinafter 1907 Hague Convention]; Brown, supra note 14, at 136; see also Allen, supra note 14, at 41-42 (detailing provisions of the Hague Conventions that limited the means of combat, such as Article 23(g) that protected enemy property and Article 27 that protected certain buildings from attack). This protection required combatants to limit the use of force only as much as practically possible, accepting the possibility of civilian casualties. See id. Identifying a limitation of the Hague Convention, the author recognized the difficulty in determining whether a target is a military necessity. See id. This determination is an important aspect of justifying a military strike against a target. See id.

n42. See Rengger, supra note 39, at 162-63.

n43. See Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in the Time of War, Aug. 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3516, 3528, 3530, 3552, 4 Bevans 853 [hereinafter the Geneva Convention]. The Geneva Convention also extends protection to expectant mothers, provides strict rules governing the application of the death penalty to protected persons, guarantees the right of protected persons to appeal convictions, and mandates that internees are provided with adequate food and clothing. See id. at 3528, 3560, 3564, 3574.

n44. See Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts, June 8, 1977, 16 I.L.M. 1391 [hereinafter Protocol I]; Fenrick, supra note 13, at 95. Article 15 of the Lieber Instructions, which was distributed to the Union forces engaged in the U.S. Civil War in 1863, stated that military necessity required the destruction of enemy forces. See id. The Rules of Air Warfare, drafted by Hague jurists in 1922-1923, prohibited indiscriminate aerial bombings of civilian populations. See id. Compare George H. Aldrich, Prospects for United States Ratification of Additional Protocol I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions, 85 Am. J. Int'l L. 1, 20 (1991) (arguing that ratification of Protocol I is in the best interests of the United States as it would improve protections for civilians caught in armed conflicts), with Roberts, supra note 13, at 170 (arguing against the ratification of Protocol I calling it "neither a codification of the laws of war nor a reliable coherent expression of humanitarian principles").

REV_00259517

n45. See generally Protocol I, supra note 44; see also Rengger, supra note 39, at 163 (describing the contents of Protocols I and II). Protocol I includes, in its definition of war crimes, "attacks on the civilian population by target area (or "carpet") bombing, the destruction of nuclear power stations, dams, food supplies and water installations indispensable to the survival of civilians." Id. at 163. In pertinent part, Protocol I includes struggles against colonial domination or racist regimes and an occupation by a foreign power in the definition of "armed international conflict" under Article 42 of the U.N. Charter. Id. In addition, Protocol II seeks to safeguard civilian populations during an internal conflict providing protections for the sick, wounded, medical personnel, and children, as well as providing a general prohibition on the intentional starvation of a civilian population as a tool of war. See id.; Fenrick, supra note 13, at 92 (introducing the two Protocols adopted in 1977 including Protocol I and Protocol II). International armed conflicts involve "regular armed forces engaging the regular armed forces of a foreign state or entering the territory of a foreign state without permission" and those conflicts against a racist regime in the name of self-determination. Id. at 98.

n46. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 406; see also Allen, supra note 14, at 47 (stating that the conventional rule of proportionality as codified in Protocol I requires more than simple intent not to harm civilians, but an active consideration of the likelihood of civilian casualties). Sixteen of the nineteen NATO member nations including: Belgium, Canada, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Germany, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Great Britain, and the United States, signed the Protocol. See Protocol Original Agreement (visited Nov. 20, 1999) <http://www.un.org/depts/ treaty>. France, Greece, and Turkey did not sign the Protocol. See id. In addition to these NATO member nations, China recently acceded to the terms and conditions of the Protocol. See China's National Defense in 2000 (visited Oct. 18, 2000) <http://www.chinadaily.com.cn/cndydb/2000/10/d1-6re1.a17.html>. The terms of the Protocol bind NATO members because Article 18 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties requires a nation not to do anything to defeat the purpose of the treaty once the nation has signed it or once it has "expressed its consent to be bound by the treaty." Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, May 23, 1969, 8 I.L.M. 679.

n47. See Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 48 (requiring that all parties to a conflict shall attack only military objectives after distinguishing between military and civilian objectives and civilian populations and combatants); see also Allen, supra note 14, at 50 (citing sources of international customary law that accept Article 52(2) including the United States Army's Field Manual and the Annotated Supplement to the Commander's Handbook on the Law of Naval Operations).

n48. See Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 51; see also Fenrick, supra note 13, at 99-100.

REV_00259518

TEXT:
[*501] In 202 B.C., the Roman general Scipio Africanus achieved a decisive victory over Hannibal, the great Carthaginian general, at the Battle of Zama, thus ending the Second Punic War. [4] Scipio, moved by the splendor and beauty of Carthage, decided to spare the city from total destruction. [5] Carthage again prospered in the years following Rome's victory. [6]
[*502] Fearing Carthage's new-found prosperity, Rome launched the Third Punic War, this time showing Carthage no mercy. [7] The Romans set Carthage ablaze, took the city apart stone by stone, and either killed or enslaved its citizens. [8] The Romans destroyed official Carthaginian records and threw salt over the area where Carthage once stood in order to prevent life from ever growing there again. [9] In time, Rome destroyed all traces of Carthage and its great civilization. [10] Rome devised the "Carthaginian solution," which refers to the total destruction and annihilation of one's enemy with equal disregard for combatants and civilians. [11]

Throughout history, humankind has continually resorted to the use of force to resolve conflicts. [12] Because international law developed limitations on the use of force in an attempt to minimize the horror of war, acts such as the "Carthaginian solution" became the exception rather than the norm. [13] An example of an internationally recognized limitation governing [*503] the use of force is the doctrine of proportionality. [14]

The doctrine of proportionality requires a response of force to be proportional to the aggression that precipitated such force. [15] This doctrine accepts wartime civilian casualties as inevitable, but the doctrine of proportionality requires that civilian casualties inflicted by military strikes not be excessive in relation to the anticipated military advantage gained by the strike. [16] The doctrine initially applied to the jus ad bellum of warfare, the branch of law that defines the legitimate reasons a nation may conduct a military operation. [17] The modern application of proportionality, [*504] however, also covers the jus in bello, the actual means used in the conduct of the military operation, balancing the anticipated military advantage gained against expected civilian casualties. [18]

On March 23, 1999, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) [19] commenced Operation Allied Force against targets in Kosovo and Serbia. [20] Despite the Operation's short duration, ability to keep NATO casualties low, and use of high-tech weapons, Operation Allied Force sparked debate over the international use of force. [21]

This Comment explores both the legal foundation for the doctrine of proportionality and NATO's application of the doctrine during Operation [*505] Allied Force. This Comment examines Operation Allied Force's impact on the acceptance of proportionality as a workable tool in the endeavor to protect civilians during wartime. First, this Comment explores the foundation of the legal doctrine by considering the general principle of proportionality, existing international treaties and charters, International Court of Justice (ICJ) decisions that speak to proportionality, and examples of the use of force in state practice. Second, this Comment details the history of the conflict in Kosovo and provides a summary of Operation Allied Force. Third, this Comment considers specific Operation Allied Force attacks and analyzes them under the requirements of proportionality. Finally, this Comment argues that proportionality continues to be a workable tool in the effort to protect civilians during wartime. This Comment further argues that NATO intended to respond proportionally to the Serbian offensive within Kosovo's borders. To this end, NATO succeeded in many of its attempts to protect civilians. Operation Allied Force shows, however, that in order to provide civilians with maximum protection, nations must apply proportionality consistantly when using armed force.

I. The Doctrine of Proportionality: A Historical and Legal Foundation

A. Proportionality and the Use of Force: The Historical Development

n49. See Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 57; see also Fenrick, supra note 13, at 100-01 (detailing Article 57); Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 58 (mandating that nations remove civilians from the vicinity of military objectives and take other precautions required to protect the civilian population).

n50. See Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 85 (calling the deliberate planning and execution of indiscriminate attacks as grave breaches of the Protocol). In sum, Article 85 states that when conducted willfully, grave breaches of Protocol I include: (1) making civilian populations or individual civilians the object of attacks; (2) launching indiscriminate attacks with the knowledge that such an attack will cause excessive injuries or death to civilians; (3) and knowingly launching attacks on works or installations that contain dangerous forces that might result in excessive injury or death to civilians. See id.; see also Fenrick, supra note 13, at 110. The violator of this provision may be subject to "universal jurisdiction" if the breach causes death or injury. See id. Further, it is the commander who orders, and not the subordinate who executes the attack, who will be punished for the grave breach. Id.

n51. Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons, opened for signature Apr. 10, 1980, 19 I.L.M. 1523 (1980). This Convention prohibits the indiscriminate use of such weapons when not directed toward a military object or when excessive injury or loss of civilian life could occur in relation to the military gain. Id. art. 3, para. 3. Finally, this Convention requires parties to record the locations of any pre-planned mine fields or areas with large numbers of booby-traps or mines. Id. art. 7, paras. 1 & 2.

n52. Protocols to the 1980 Conventional Weapons Convention, amended May 3, 1996, 35 I.L.M. 1207 (1996). The 1980 Conventional Weapons Convention proposed three protocols: (1) an Amended Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby-traps, and Other Devices, which expanded the protections of civilians during internal conflicts; (2) the Protocol or Restrictions on the Use of Incendiary Weapons, which prohibits the use of incendiary weapons against targets in cities, towns, or villages; and (3) the Protocol on Blinding Laser Weapons, which prohibits the use of such weapons against opposing soldiers and civilians. Id.

n53. United States Convention on the Law of the Sea, Nov. 1, 1982, 21 I.L.M. 1261, 1274-75 (stating that nations are entitled to take "necessary steps" to prevent prejudicial passage of a foreign ship); see also Dale G. Stephens, The Impact of the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention on the Conduct of Peacetime Naval/Military Operations, 29 Cal. W. Int'l L.J. 283, 311 (1999) (concluding that taking such "necessary steps" in response to prejudicial passage must be necessary and proportionate though the Convention fails to expressly address the use of force in this context).

n54. But see Carter & Trimble, supra note 25, at 14 (concluding that only a "few issues of substantial significance to international order" get to the ICJ because nations prefer the "flexibility of diplomacy" to the slow and expensive methods of the international court).

REV_00259519

n55. The Corfu Channel (U.K.-N. Ir. v. Alb.), 1949 I.C.J. 4 (Apr. 9).

n56. Id. at 36 (articulating the findings of the ICJ including the rejection of the Albanian claim that Operation Retail violated its sovereignty).

n57. See id. at 35. After previously sweeping the Corfu Channel for mines in 1945 and declaring it a safe passageway, two British warships hit mines on October 22, 1946 and suffered severe damage. See id. at 12-13. Despite Albania's sovereignty protests, the British Navy swept the Corfu Channel again for mines under Operation Retail on November 13, 1946. See id. at 13. As part of that operation, and in preparation for any offensive Albanian action, the British Navy sent a covering force of warships to accompany the minesweepers, including an aircraft carrier, cruisers, and other war vessels. See id. at 14. The ICJ deemed this covering force to be proportional to the perceived threat of Albanian offensive action and possible existing mines in the area. See id. at 35. The court further held Albania responsible for deaths and injuries caused by the detonations. See id. at 36.

n58. Military and Paramilitary Activities (Nicar. v. U.S.), 1986 I.C.J. 4 (June 27).

n59. Id. at 146 (providing the court's conclusions).

n60. Id. at 103.

n61. See id. at 176 (separate opinion of Judge Ruda).

n62. See id. at 367-68 (dissenting opinion of Judge Schwebel) (asserting the importance of a flexible application of proportionality). But see id. (dissenting opinion of Judge Schwebel) (noting that self-defense must be proportional to the precipitating use of force, but asserting that the use of force in self-defense will sometimes fail to be "commensurate with the attack"). The dissent considered Judge Ago's opinion, which stated that the defensive act may sometimes be disproportionate to the initial act of aggression. See id. (dissenting opinion of Judge Schwebel). According to Judge Ago, the important point to consider was the result to be achieved by the defensive act, not the forms, substance, and strength of the defensive act. See id.

n63. Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, 1996 I.C.J. 226 (Jul. 8).

n64. Id. at 259-63, 266 (exposing the court's inability to decide the legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons under international law even if a nation uses nuclear weapons within the guidelines of humanitarian law).

REV_00259520

n65. See id.; see also Smis & Van der Borght, supra note 13, at 386 (summarizing the ICJ's conclusion that it had "established customary rules of humanitarian law applicable to any present and future weapon").

n66. See Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, 1996 I.C.J. at 257.

n67. See, e.g., Fenrick, supra note 13, at 117-19 (citing the 1856 bombardment of Canton by Royal Navy ships, pre-D-Day bombing of French territory in 1944, and the battle to recapture Manila in 1945 as examples of proportionality in state practice).

n68. See id. at 122-23 (introducing two studies of proportionality's impact on the effectiveness of the 1965 to 1968 and 1972 to 1973 bombing campaigns).

n69. See id. (citing studies attributing the failure of Operation Rolling Thunder and other bombing campaigns in North Vietnam to the Johnson Administration's over-extensive demand that the bombing campaign minimize civilian casualties rather than merely lessen collateral civilian casualties). The 1972 to 1973 campaign, however, was effective despite proportionality's rigorous application. See id. at 123.

n70. See id.

n71. See id.

n72. See Tom J. Farer, Panama: Beyond the Charter Paradigm, 84 Am. J. Int'l L. 503, 513 (1990) (questioning the proportionality of Operation Just Cause); Ved P. Nanda, The Validity of United States Intervention in Panama Under International Law, 84 Am. J. Int'l L. 494, 497 (1990) (criticizing "Operation Just Cause" because no imminent threat to U.S. interests or U.S. citizens existed). But see Anthony D'Amato, The Invasion of Panama Was a Lawful Response to Tyranny, 84 Am. J. Int'l L. 516, 524 (1990) (arguing that the U.S. invasion of Panama appropriately and legally protected civil liberties and fundamental freedoms).

n73. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 404-05. The massive bombardment of the Iraqi infrastructure was troubling; moreover, it "appeared that more was done than was proportionate to [expel] Iraq from Kuwait." Id. at 405.

REV_00259521

n74. See Michael P. Roch, Military Intervention in Bosnia-Hercegovina: Will World Politics Prevail Over the Rule of International Law?, 24 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 461, 468-72 (1996) (describing the events leading to NATO's airstrikes). Fighting erupted when various ethnic factions of the country, including the Bosnian Croats, Muslims, and Serbs, declared independence. See id. at 468-69. After these declarations, a civil war erupted, which resulted in NATO's use of armed force for the first time in its history. See id. at 487.

n75. See Sean D. Murphy, Contemporary Practice of the United States Relating to International Law, 93 Am. J. Int'l L. 161, 161-64 (1999). The United States attacked targets in response to the bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. See id. at 161. The United States believed that the first set of targets, paramilitary camps in Afghanistan, were training grounds for the terrorist organization that perpetrated the embassy bombings. See id. The U.S. identified the second target, a Sudanese pharmaceutical plant, as a chemical weapons facility, the products of which were to be used in future attacks against U.S. targets. See id.

n76. See id. at 163 & n.6 (quoting a letter dated August 20, 1998 from the Permanent Representative of the United States to the United Nations, which was addressed to the President of the Security Council). But see Jules Lobel, The Use of Force to Respond to Terrorist Attacks: The Bombing of Sudan and Afghanistan, 24 Yale J. Int'l L. 537, 539-40, 557 (1999) (postulating that the airstrikes against Sudan and Afghanistan failed to meet the requirements of proportionality because of factual insufficiencies and a disregard for the U.N. Charter and international law); Leah M. Campbell, Comment, Defending Against Terrorism: A Legal Analysis of the Decision To Strike Sudan and Afghanistan, 74 Tul. L. Rev. 1067, 1096 (2000) (arguing that the U.S. missile strikes failed to meet the requirements of necessity and proportionality because international law did not condone the use of force to retaliate against terrorists).

n77. See Richard C. Paddock, Russia Takes Page from NATO Playbook, L.A. Times, Sept. 29, 1999, at A1 (describing the Russian air offensive in Chechnya as identical to NATO's air operation in Kosovo). Russian airstrikes targeted the Chechen economy in an attempt to devastate it just as NATO attacked Serbia's infrastructure and industry to bring Milosevic's government to the negotiating table. See id. Russian warplanes attacked bridges, oil and communications facilities, and economic and military installations. See id.; Daniel Williams, Russian Aircraft Batter Chechnya, Wash. Post, Sept. 28, 1999, at A1 [hereinafter Williams, Better Chechnya] (assessing the initial phases of the Russian air campaign over Chechnya and adding Russian views that the Russian bombings of Chechnya are identical to NATO's bombings of Serbia).

n78. See David Hoffman, Yeltsin Aides Guiding War in Chechnya, Wash. Post, Oct. 7, 1999, at A1 (stating that thousands of Chechen civilians fled from the war zone to northern Chechnya). Admitting that civilians were among the victims of the Russian air campaign, Russian generals justified strikes against civilian targets by accusing Chechen civilians of being a vital part of both the guerrillas' efforts to wage war in Dagestan and to conduct bombing campaigns in Russian cities. See Williams, Better Chechnya, supra note 77, at A1; Daniel Williams, Rockets Hit Chechen Capital, Wash. Post, Oct. 22, 1999, at A1 (describing a Russian attack on an alleged arms bazaar, which was really a Chechen marketplace, that resulted in civilian casualties). Russia's then-President Boris Yeltsin defended the military campaign against allegations that it was creating a humanitarian disaster. Yeltsin: West Has "No Right' To Criticize Chechen Campaign (visited Aug. 3, 2000) <http://www.cnn.com/WORLD/europe/9911/18/osce.summit>. Yeltsin declared that Russian forces would follow all U.N. conventions, but urged OSCE members not to interfere ""in the internal affairs of sovereign states.'" Id. Yeltsin claimed to have learned from NATO's use of force in Kosovo and stated that the world already knew ""what disproportionate consequences such interference can cause'" in nations. Id. But See Human Rights Watch, Russia/Chechnya: Civilian Killings in Staropromyslovski District of Grozny (visited Sept. 2, 2000) <http://www.hrw.org/reports/2000/russia<uscore>chechnya/> (detailing abuses by Russian soldiers in Chechnya, including the execution of 38 Chechen civilians and the looting and destruction of Chechen personal property).

REV_00259522

n79. See Barak, 2 Ministers Empowered To Strike Lebanese Civilian Targets (visited June 11, 2000) <http://www.cnn.com/2000/WORLD/meast/02/16/lebanon.israel.02>.

n80. Id.

n81. See Barton Gellman, U.S., Allies Order Attack on Serbia, Wash. Post, Mar. 24, 1999, at A1; see also NATO's Role, supra note 20, at 1; Bruce W. Nelan, Into the Fire (visited June 11, 2000) <http://www.time.com/timemagazine/articles/0,3266,22211,00.html> [hereinafter Into the Fire] (describing the initial phases of Operation Allied Force).

n82. See Text: NATO Sec-Gen Solana Statement on NATO Airstrikes (visited Aug. 24, 1999) <http://www.usia.gov/kosovo/texts/99032504.htm>. Regarding this matter, President Clinton stated that:

We act to protect thousands of innocent people in Kosovo from a mounting military offensive. We act to prevent a wider war; to diffuse a powder keg at the heart of Europe that has exploded twice before in this century with catastrophic results ... ending this tragedy is a moral imperative.

United States Information Agency (visited Aug. 24, 1999) <http://www.usia.gov/kosovo/texts/990324wh.htm> (statement by President Clinton, Mar. 24, 1999); see also Guardian Unlimited (visited Feb. 28, 2001) <http://www.guardian.co.uk/Archive/Article/0,4273,3854203,00.html> (statement by British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Apr. 13, 1999). Additional goals included ending Serbian violence, establishing the withdrawal of all Serbian forces, providing a safe return of all refugees, and guaranteeing access to humanitarian aid organizations. See id. Further objectives included an end to all military action and the immediate suspension of violence and suppression, the withdrawal of military forces from Kosovo, the stationing of U.N. peacekeepers in Kosovo, the safe and unconditional return of all refugees, and the establishment of a more secure political framework for Kosovo. See NATO's Role, supra note 20, at 1; see generally U.S. and NATO Objectives and Interests in Kosovo (visited Aug. 24, 1999) <http://www.state.gov/www/regions/eur> [hereinafter U.S. and NATO Objectives] (detailing three strong interests for the mission in Kosovo: stopping the humanitarian crisis caused by the Serbian military, preventing a wider Balkan war, and securing NATO's credibility).

REV_00259523

n83. See Dana Priest, A Decisive Battle That Never Was, Wash. Post, Sept. 19, 1999, at A1 (addressing the use of air power as the main vehicle of Operation Allied Force and describing the initial planning for a ground invasion of Kosovo and Serbia by NATO troops if the airstrike phase of Operation Allied Force failed to achieve its objectives).

n84. See id.; Gen. Wesley K. Clark, Supreme Allied Commander, Europe, & Brig. Gen. John Corley, Press Conference on the Kosovo Strike Assessment (visited June 11, 2000) <http://www.nato.int/kosovo/press/p990916a.htm> [hereinafter Kosovo Strike Assessment].

n85. Military Technical Agreement Between the International Security Force ("KFOR") and the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Republic of Serbia, June 9, 1999, KFOR-Yugo.-Serb. (visited June 11, 2000) <http://www.nato.int/kosovo/docu/a990609a.htm>; see also U.N. SCOR Res. No. 1244, 4011 mtg. at 1 (1999) (visited Aug. 24, 1999) <http://www.nato.int/kosovo/docu/u99061a.htm> (authorizing the creation and implementation of a peacekeeping force in Kosovo). The main effect of Resolution 1244 was to approve the creation of an international peacekeeping force within Kosovo to monitor the status of the peace agreement established under the Military Technical Agreement. See id.

n86. Noel Malcolm, Kosovo: A Short History xxvii (1999).

n87. Id. at 1; see also David Fromkin, Kosovo Crossing: American Ideals Meet Reality on the Balkan Battlefields 158 (1999) (describing the geography of the Kosovo region).

n88. See Fromkin, supra note 87, at 84 (addressing the effects of the mountainous terrain on the development of the Balkan people); see also Malcolm, supra note 86, at 1-2 (attributing the name of the "Accursed Mountains" to "their fierce impenetrability: rivers have sliced through their dry limestone like wires through cheese, creating a network of vertiginous gorges"). The mountains have internally divided the Balkan region, thereby decreasing unity among the people. See Fromkin, supra note 87, at 84. For example, the "inhabitants ... have retained their own religions, ... languages, ... style of dress, ... architecture, ... and their own calendars." Id.

n89. See Malcolm, supra note 86, at 2.

n90. Why Kosovo? Why NATO? Why Now? (visited June 10, 2000) <http://www.policy.com/issuewk/1999/0420<uscore>69/detail428.html> [hereinafter Why Kosovo?].

n91. See id. The origin of this conflict is commonly attributed to the Ottoman Turks' defeat of Serbia during the Battle of Kosovo Polje in 1389. See id. Since then, relations between the Serbs, who are predominantly Eastern Orthodox Christian, and Kosovo Albanians, who are predominantly Islamic due to Ottoman rule, have suffered. See id.

REV_00259524

n92. See Malcolm, supra note 86, at 264-65 (noting that the Yugoslav state came into existence on December 1, 1918, after the First World War ended). The state officially took the name Yugoslavia in 1929. See id.; Fromkin, supra note 87, at 135 (contending that the victors of the First World War divided the Austrian-Hungarian Empire into three states: Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the Kingdom of the Serbs, which included the Croats and Slovenes and would later be called Yugoslavia). Following the Second World War, Yugoslavia was divided into the six republics of Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Serbia, Montenegro, and Macedonia. See id. at 146. Belgrade, the capital of Serbia, became the capital of this new federal system and retained the bulk of federal power. See id.; see also Why Kosovo?, supra note 90 (describing the modern history of Kosovo, including the effect of Yugoslavia's internal ethnic conflict on the region).

n93. See Why Kosovo?, supra note 90, at 1; see also Michael P. Roch, supra note 74, at 468-72 (explaining the conditions in the Balkans that led to the conflict in Bosnia and Kosovo's declaration of independence); Kelly A. Childers, United Nations Peacekeeping Forces in the Balkan Wars and the Changing Role of Peacekeeping Forces in the Post-Cold War World, Comment, 8 Temp. Int'l & Comp. L.J. 117, 123-24 (1994) (detailing Bosnia's application for recognition as an independent state); Yoshiko Inoue, United Nations' Peace-Keeping Role in the Post-Cold War Era: The Conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Comment, 16 Loy. L.A. Int'l & Comp. L.J. 245, 250-53 (1993) (describing the Bosnian conflict as a classic example of a fight for self-determination).

n94. See Why Kosovo?, supra note 90; see generally Ved P. Nanda et al., Tragedies in Somalia, Yugoslavia, Haiti, Rwanda and Liberia - Revisiting the Validity of Humanitarian Intervention Under International Law - Part II, 26 Denv. J. Int'l L. & Pol'y 827, 837-42 (1998). In June 1991, two Yugoslav republics, Slovenia and Croatia, declared independence. See id. A Croatian civil war erupted as Croat Serbs, with military support from Serbia, resisted the independence movement. See id. Although the Croatia situation seemed relatively secure by July 1992, a civil war had erupted in Bosnia-Herzegovina between the Bosnian Serbs, Croats, and Muslims. See id.

n95. See Why Kosovo?, supra note 90 (describing the escalation of violence between KLA and Serbian forces during the mid-1990s). The KLA consequently took control of almost a third of Kosovo before Serbian forces became more involved in the fighting. See id.

n96. See NATO's Role, supra note 20, at 6.

n97. See U.S. and NATO Objectives, supra note 82.

REV_00259525

n98. See SCOR Res. No. 1160, 3868th mtg., at 1 (1998) (visited Aug. 24, 1999) <http://www.nato.int/kosovo/docu/u980331a.htm>. The resolution "call[ed] upon the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia immediately to take the further necessary steps to achieve a political solution to the issue of Kosovo through dialogue ... . " Id. The resolution demanded that both sides cease hostilities and prohibited the sale of military equipment to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. See id.

n99. See Why Kosovo?, supra note 90, at 1; NATO's Role, supra note 20, at 3. The Contact Group met on January 29, 1992 to convene "urgent negotiations between the parties to the conflict, under international mediation." Id. at 2.

n100. See NATO's Role, supra note 20, at 2.

n101. See id. During a subsequent meeting held on June 12, 1998, the North Atlantic Council considered further measures, including various military measures. See id.

n102. SCOR Res. No. 1199, 3930th mtg. at 1 (1998) (visited Aug. 24, 1999) <http://nato.int.kosovo/docu/u980923a.htm>.

n103. See NATO's Role, supra note 20, at 2 (describing NATO's authorization of airstrikes as "designed to support diplomatic efforts to make the Milosevic regime withdraw forces from Kosovo, bring an end to the violence, and facilitate the return of refugees to their homes").

n104. See id. Milosevic agreed only after intense negotiations and diplomatic initiatives, including visits from NATO Secretary General Solana, United States Envoys Holbrooke and Hill, and General Clark, the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe. See id.

n105. See What Is the OSCE? (visited Aug. 7, 2000) <http://www.osce.org/publications/factsheets/osce<uscore>e.pdf7>. OSCE is a "pan-European security organization [with fifty-five] participating States [that] span the geographic area from Vancouver to Vladivostok." Id. OSCE deals with different security issues including arms control, diplomacy, human rights, and the environment. See id.

n106. SCOR Res. No. 1203, 3937th mtg. at 1 (1998) (visited Aug. 24, 1999) <http://www.nato.int/kosovo/docu/u981024a.htm> (authorizing the OSCE to establish a ground-based verification mission and NATO to create an air verification mission over Kosovo for surveillance purposes).

n107. See NATO's Role, supra note 20, at 3 (describing the resumption of attacks between the KLA and Serbian military and police forces). Despite international mediation efforts, both the KLA and the Serbian government initiated attacks in early 1999. See id. By mid-January 1999, Serbia initiated an offensive against Kosovar Albanians. See id.; see also Report to Congress: Kosovo/Operation Allied Force After-Action Report (Jan. 31, 2000) (visited Feb. 5, 2000) <http//www.defenselink.mil/pubs/index.html#Reports> (statement of Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Henry H. Shelton) [hereinafter Report to Congress] (offering that initial agreements allowed unarmed international observations from the OSCE and a NATO air verification mission into Kosovo).

REV_00259526

n108. See NATO's Role, supra note 20, at 3.

n109. See id. The first round took place February 6-23, 1999, and the second round took place March 15-18, 1999. See id.

n110. See id.

n111. See id.; Gellman, supra note 81, at A1 (reporting that during last-minute meetings, Milosevic was "adamant in rejecting any deployment of NATO peacekeepers").

n112. See NATO's Role, supra note 20, at 3.

n113. See id.

n114. See id. (stating that airstrikes began only after Ambassador Holbrooke failed in his last attempt at mediation after flying to Belgrade and meeting with President Milosevic).

n115. See id.; Kosovo Strike Assessment, supra note 84.

n116. See Kosovo Strike Assessment, supra note 84.

n117. See id. (stating that at the beginning of the campaign, the second line of strikes against Serbian military targets within Kosovo would be the critical focus of NATO's efforts because these were the Serbian elements conducting the attacks against Kosovar civilians and KLA units).

REV_00259527

n118. See Report to Congress, supra note 107, at 7.

n119. See id.

n120. See id.

n121. See id.

n122. Id. at 8.

n123. See id.

n124. See Kosovo Strike Assessment, supra note 84, at 3, 7.

n125. See id.

n126. Operation Allied Force Update (visited June 10, 2000) <http://www.nato.int/kosovo/all-frce.htm> (providing a daily update of the missions flown and the targets attacked during Operation Allied Force). Additional targets included: military barracks, petroleum storage sites, military radio relay sites, communications centers, border posts, and a Serbian presidential retreat and leadership command center. See id.

n127. See Mark Thompson, Warfighting 101, Time, June 14, 1999 (visited Jan. 19, 2001) <http://www.time.com/time/magazine/printout/0,8816,26475,00. html> (adding that NATO claimed a 99.6% success rate in hitting its intended targets).

n128. See Dana Priest, Bombing by Committee: France Balked at NATO Targets, Wash. Post, Sept. 20, 1999, at A10 [hereinafter Priest, Bombing by Committee] (providing lower estimates of 500 to 1,000 for the number of civilian casualties caused by Operation Allied Force).

n129. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 391 & n.1 (discussing the difference between the jus ad bellum and the jus in bello); see also supra notes 15-18 and accompanying text (discussing both doctrines).

REV_00259528

"Proportionate" means to be "adjusted to something else according to [a] certain rate of comparative relation." [22] The concept of proportionality is used in various legal fields such as corporate, [23] criminal, [24] and international law. [25] Within the international legal arena, proportionality developed as a response to the Christian theory of just war, which permitted any means of fighting a war if the cause of the war proved [*506] just. [26] In order to achieve a just end, any means used were considered just even if those means adversely impacted civilians. [27]

The proportionality doctrine experienced growing acceptance during the Nineteenth century. [28] The doctrine initially centered on combatants, as warfare mainly involved armies of professional soldiers fighting far from civilian populations. [29] The doctrine of proportionality in armed conflict became more applicable to civilians with the development of modern weapons, such as fighterplanes and bombers, which increasingly victimized civilian populations. [30] This use of modern weapons prompted [*507] nations to find a method that would limit excessive civilian casualties; the doctrine of proportionality accordingly evolved. [31]

Legal limitations on armed force seemed obsolete with the creation of the United Nations (U.N.) and the prohibition against the use of international force under the U.N. Charter. [32] Despite the U.N. founders' good intentions, nations continued to use force and the doctrine of proportionality maintained a vital role in international law. [33]

B. Proportionality and the Use of Force: International Treaties and Charters

Article 2(4) of the U.N. Charter forbids one nation from using force against another. [34] The U.N. Charter, however, provides exceptions and permits armed force in two situations: maintaining international peace and security as authorized by the U.N. Security Council, [35] and acting in self-defense. [36] Although the U.N. Charter does not expressly discuss a [*508] proportional limitation on the use of force, it is widely accepted that the doctrine of proportionality governs any use of force, including the use of force in self-defense. [37]

Prior to the U.N. Charter, nations entrusted the 1899 and 1907 Hague Conventions, which were important stages in the development of proportionality, to limit the means and methods of international warfare. [38] Because governments sought to limit the way soldiers fought wars, the Hague Convention of 1899 prohibited the use of balloon-released projectiles, asphyxiating gases, and expanding bullets. [39] The 1907 Hague Convention provided broader rules for the conduct of warfare by requiring all signatory nations to follow the principles of warfare observed by civilized nations. [40] Both Hague Conventions protected enemy property from unneeded seizure and prohibited the destruction of buildings dedicated to nonmilitary purposes including religious, artistic, scientific, charitable, historic, and health purposes. [41]

[*509] Following the Second World War, nations adopted the Geneva Convention on the Protection of Civilians in Wartime, which not only limited the methods of armed force, but also sought protection for civilian populations. [42] The Geneva Convention created safe neutral zones where belligerents could station injured and sick combatants and noncombatants, protected civilian hospitals organized to give care to the sick and wounded, and directed an occupying power to provide food and medical supplies to civilian populations under its control. [43]

In 1977, Protocol I to the 1949 Geneva Convention (the Protocol) provided the first real attempt to codify the doctrine of proportionality. [44] The Protocol drafters included new protections for civilians caught in the middle of armed conflict. [45] The adoption of the Protocol allowed proportionality [*510] to develop into an international conventional rule. [46] Among other requirements, the Protocol limits military attacks to military objectives, [47] prohibits indiscriminate attacks upon civilians, [48] requires military planners to use caution in an order to avoid excessive civilian casualties, [49] and outlaws indiscriminate attacks of civilian populations. [50] n130. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 411 (rationalizing the theoretical independence of the jus ad bellum from the jus in bello); cf. Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 49, para. 1 (defining both offensive and defensive military attacks as "acts of violence against the adversary").

REV_00259502

n131. See Brown, supra note 14, at 140; Gardam, supra note 14, at 407.

n132. See Brown, supra note 14, at 140. If the decision is made in "hindsight," the effectiveness of proportionality is nullified. Id.

n133. See id. at 140-47; Gardam, supra note 14, at 407. In addition to these factors, the party planning the military attack must determine whether the object identified for attack is a civilian or a legitimate military object. See Brown, supra note 14, at 139.

n134. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 407; see also Brown, supra note 14, at 145-46. Although the importance of military intelligence and increased technology is recognized, this analysis greatly enhances the ability to plan and to execute a proportional military attack. See Brown, supra note 14, at 145-46. The failure to plan may lead to indiscriminate attacks on insignificant military targets in large civilian population centers. See id. at 147. This is not to suggest, however, that the doctrine of proportionality is free from error. See id. at 146.

n135. See Brown, supra note 14, at 146.

n136. See id. Nuclear reactors, which could cause additional civilian casualties if struck, are examples of potentially dangerous forces. See id.

n137. See id.

n138. See id.

n139. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 407; Brown, supra note 14, at 146-47.

n140. See Brown, supra note 14, at 142; Gardam, supra note 14, at 407 (noting that the use of aerial bombardment may be indiscriminate and therefore disproportional).

REV_00259529

n141. See Brown, supra note 14, at 142.

n142. See id. at 143.

n143. See id. (noting that nuclear weapons cause crop destruction and defoliation and citing A. Thomas & A.J. Thomas, Jr., Legal Limits on the Use of Chemical and Biological Weapons, 210 (1970)).

n144. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 407.

n145. See Allen, supra note 14, at 48.

n146. See id. (discussing variables beyond the control of military planners). No "rational planner assumes either human or mechanical infallibility." Id. But see NATO Bombed Chinese Deliberately (visited Jul. 31, 2000) <http://www.guardianunlimited.co.uk/Archive/Article/0,24273,39,3246,00.html> (stating that NATO intentionally bombed the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade because the embassy transmitted Serbian military communications for the Serbian government and monitored U.S. cruise missile strikes in order to develop effective countermeasures against the United States).

n147. See Allen, supra note 14, at 48. One example includes a British bomber attack on a bridge located in the Iraqi town of Falluja during the Persian Gulf War that missed its target, hit a marketplace, and caused many civilian casualties. See id.; see also Priest, Bombing by Committee, supra note 128, at A10 (listing mistakes during NATO bombing missions). This list of mistakes includes the killing of 17 civilians in the mining town of Aleksinac, the accidental bombing of a passenger train, the killing of dozens of refugees in a convoy heading for the Macedonian border, the deaths of more than 20 civilians due to a laser-guided bomb in Surdulica, and the killing of 47 civilians when a bus was attacked on a bridge. See id. Most notably, 15 people were killed when bombs accidentally struck a marketplace and a hospital in Nis on May 7, 1999. See id. In addition, three Chinese citizens were killed when NATO forces accidentally attacked the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade. See id.

n148. See supra notes 44-52 and accompanying text.

n149. See supra notes 44-55 and accompanying text (articulating specific articles of Protocol I that apply to proportionality).

n150. Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 57, para. 3.

REV_00259530

n151. Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 53. Protocol I states that:

It is prohibited (a) to commit any acts of hostility directed against the historic monuments, works of art or places of worship which constitute the cultural or spiritual heritage of peoples; (b) to use such objects in support of the military effort; [and] (c) to make such objects the object of reprisals.

Id.

n152. Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 54, para. 2 ("Objects indispensable to the survival to the civilian population [include] foodstuffs, agricultural areas for the production of foodstuffs, crops, livestock, drinking water installations and supplies and irrigation works, for the specific purpose of denying them for their sustenance value to the civilian population ... .").

n153. Brown, supra note 14, at 141-42 (introducing the "cumulative" and "case-by-case" analyses).

n154. Id.

n155. See id. at 141.

n156. Cf. id. (providing a discussion of a cumulative analysis and justification for military strikes in Japan, the Second World War, and Vietnam). One example is the use of nuclear weapons in Hiroshima and Nagasaki in 1945 to cripple and destroy the Japanese war industry. See id. The United States justified the use of atomic weapons by arguing that they brought a quick Japanese surrender, which saved countless lives on both sides, including those that may have been lost in a ground invasion. See id. In Shimoda v. State, however, a Japanese court deemed the use of nuclear weapons illegal because they could not discriminate between military and non-military objects. Shimoda v. State, 32 I.L.R. 626, 627 (Dist. Ct. of Tokyo, Japan 1963); see also Brown, supra note 14, at 141-42. The Vietnam Conflict provides another example of the cumulative approach, as the United States destroyed large areas of the Vietnamese countryside in which enemy guerillas reportedly operated. See Brown, supra note 14, at 141-42. The United States justified this tactic "on the grounds that their cumulative effect was to keep the enemy forces constantly on the move and to separate the guerillas from their base of support." Id. at 142. These attacks received wide criticism because of the belief that Vietnamese civilian casualties outnumbered Vietcong guerilla casualties. See id.

n157. See Brown, supra note 14, at 142.

REV_00259531

n158. See id. (identifying this weakness of the cumulative approach and stating that the language of the Articles support the "case-by-case" approach); see also Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 51, para. 5(b); Gardam, supra note 14, at 407 (interpreting the Protocol's "concrete and direct" language to mean that military advantage is assessed "in relation to each individual attack, rather than on a cumulative basis"). The individual assessment of the "case-by-case" approach provides more protection for civilians. Gardam, supra note 14, at 407. Consequently, this approach is preferred over the cumulative approach.

n159. Brown, supra note 14, at 141.

n160. Id. at 140-41 (stressing that a case-by-case analysis refers to the specific tactical objective of a military strike); cf. Gardam, supra note 14, at 407 (postulating that the case-by-case language creates a subjective test that is often difficult to satisfy consistently). This "lack of precision" benefits military operations rather than civilian protection. Id.

n161. See Priest, Bombing by Committee, supra note 128, at A10 (discussing briefly the initial intended targets of Operation Allied Force); see also Dana Priest, Tension Grew with Divide Over Strategy, Wash. Post, Sept. 21, 1999, at A1 [hereinafter Priest, Divide Over Strategy] (stating that Allied warplanes destroyed or damaged 93 tanks, 153 armored personnel carriers, 339 military vehicles, and 389 artillery pieces and mortars).

n162. See Priest, A Decisive Battle, supra note 83, at A30 (detailing a bombing raid upon two battalions of Serbian troops stationed on Mount Pastrik).

n163. See U.S. and NATO Objectives, supra note 82, at 1 (stating that one of NATO's objectives included stopping the humanitarian disaster in Kosovo and in the surrounding areas). The KLA began an offensive against Serbian positions, but the tide soon turned as the KLA forces were pinned down on Mount Pastrik. See Priest, A Decisive Battle, supra note 83, at A30. On June 7, 1999, two B-52 bombers bombed the Serbian positions to relieve the KLA forces. See id. At the time, it was believed the Serbian forces sustained heavy casualties, but this has yet to be confirmed. See id.

n164. See Priest, Divide Over Strategy, supra note 161, at A16; cf. Adler, supra note 2, at 24-25 (discussing some of the difficulties that arise when a target has probable military value as opposed to possible military value).

n165. See Thompson, supra note 127, at 1 (estimating that NATO dropped 20,000 bombs).

n166. See Priest, Bombing by Committee, supra note 128, at A10 (discussing briefly the repair and salvage efforts after the Socialist Headquarters building was destroyed).

REV_00259532

n167. See id. Unconfirmed Serbian reports estimated that ten civilians perished because of this attack. See id. No official casualty figure exists, but reports indicate that these ten casualties resulted from two attacks: the attack on the Socialist Party Headquarters on April 21, 1999, and an attack on the Yugoslav state television and radio building on April 23, 1999. See id.

n168. See id. at A1 (providing a copy of the intelligence report used in planning the attack on the Headquarters building). The intelligence report stated that NATO planners were highly confident that the strike would cause no more than 350 casualties. See id. Planners based this estimate upon the expectation that there would be casualties of 50-100 government employees in the building at the time of the attack and 250 civilians who lived in nearby apartment buildings. See id.

n169. See Priest, Divide Over Strategy, supra note 161, at A16 (reiterating NATO's ability to use weapons that would make a building fall in on itself, thereby reducing the amount of expelled fragments that would cause civilian casualties).

n170. See id. (exploring how technology aided target selection). The article continues:

The general gave ... a detailed lesson in targeting. He explained the blast radius of various weapons. He talked about picking "aim points" - crossbeams, keystones or baseboards that could be struck to make a building collapse inward, upon itself. NATO planners ... could calculate how far shattered glass would fly and whether it would simply graze or penetrate a person's skin. If they changed the warhead or angle of impact, they could determine whether concrete would be blown one block away or three.

Id.

n171. Cf. generally Lessons Learned from Military Operations and Relief Efforts in Kosovo: Hearing of the Senate Committee on Armed Services, Oct. 21, 1999 (statements of General Wesley Clark, USA, Admiral James O. Ellis, Jr., USN, and Lieutenant General Michael C. Short, USAF) available at <http://www.fednews.com.> (insisting that precision guided munitions were effective because they provided highly accurate strikes while "minimizing collateral damage and civilian casualties").

n172. Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 57 (demanding verification that targets are military in nature rather than civilian in nature).

n173. See id. (characterizing advanced cruise missiles as one of NATO's specific means and methods).

n174. Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 51(b).

n175. See Gardam, supra note 14, at 412.

n176. Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 48.

n177. Id. art. 52(2).

n178. See id. (requiring a military strike to be conducted only against a military target).

n179. See Priest, Bombing by Committee, supra note 128, at A10.

n180. See Adler, supra note 2, at 39-42 (arguing that attacks against governmental buildings are permissible). Destruction of government buildings produce strong emotional and psychological effects upon the enemy; as such, an attack against these buildings affects the morale of the enemy, which may benefit the attacker. See id. at 40. Compare Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 52, para. 2 (clarifying that military attacks are permitted against military objectives), with id. art. 51, para. 7 (commanding belligerents not to use civilians as shields for military targets in order to render military targets immune from attack).

n181. See Priest, Bombing by Committee, supra note 128, at A10 (detailing Allied efforts to strike Serbia's electrical system); cf. Allen, supra note 14, at 50-51 (describing Allied attacks during the Gulf War against electrical power generating stations). Because attacks on power stations normally do not incur high civilian casualties, they do not raise a proportionality concern, except for the issue of whether electrical grids are military objects. See id. But see Protocol I, supra note 44, art. 54 (protecting objects that are indispensable to the survival of the civilian population).

n182. See Priest, Bombing by Committee, supra note 128, at A1.

n183. See id. (describing the CBU-94 as a then top-secret United States weapon invented to disable electrical grids). To further alleviate French concerns, General Henry Shelton, Chairman of the United States' Joint Chiefs of Staff, provided information about backup electricity that hospitals could use. See id.

REV_00259534

n184. See id. The article continues:

And in the post-midnight darkness ... dispensers the size of a can of tennis balls dropped from the sky, each with its own parachute. As they reached ... power grids and transformer yards, spools of specially treated carbon-graphite thread unraveled into a web causing instant short circuits. The rubber duckies, as the military dubbed the weapon, knocked out power to 70 percent of Yugoslavia. Most of it was back on within a day.

Id.

n185. See id.

n186. See id.; Michael Mandelb

REV_00259535

Since the creation of the Protocol, subsequent international treaties [*511] have provided support for the doctrine of proportionality. The 1980 Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons limited the use of mines, booby-traps, and other related devices aimed at civilian populations. [51] The Protocols to the 1980 Convention [52] and the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention on the Conduct of Peacetime Naval/Military Operations also consider proportionality a method of limiting the use of force in armed conflict. [53]

C. Proportionality and the Use of Force: The ICJ's Recognition of Proportionality's Role in International Law

In addition to treaties and charters, International Court of Justice (ICJ) decisions refer to the doctrine of proportionality. [54] In Corfu Channel, [55] the ICJ held that Great Britain's Operation Retail, a minesweeping operation of the Corfu Channel that began after two British warships suffered damage from striking mines, did not violate Albania's sovereignty. [56] The ICJ held that the number of ships used in the operation was a proportional response to the existing threat of both possible Albanian [*512] offensive action and mines in the area. [57]

In Nicaragua v. United States, [58] the ICJ rejected the claim of the United States that its actions in Nicaragua constituted collective self-defense under the U.N. Charter. [59] While discussing the various factors that justify self-defense, the court recognized proportionality as "well-established in customary international law." [60] The court further suggested that acts of national self-defense must be proportional to the initial armed attack. [61] The dissent noted that state practice supports the application of proportionality to acts of self-defense; in addition, proportionality must have a flexible application to meet the specific circumstances of a certain situation. [62]

In Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, [63] the ICJ recognized the limitations placed on a military planner's ability to meet the requirements of proportionality and other laws of war if nuclear weapons were used in battle. [64] The court declared that the use of nuclear weapons would violate the principles of humanitarian law because such weapons could not be used in a manner that would discriminate between combatants and civlians. [65] Even though the court failed to conclude whether the [*513] use of nuclear weapons would be unlawful, it stressed that nations can not deliberately target civilians during military operations and should not use weapons that would help in such an effort. [66]

D. Proportionality in State Practice

A full review of the application of the doctrine of proportionality in state practice, which defines the manner in which a nation conducts itself, is extensive and beyond the scope of this Comment. [67] A few examples, however, are illustrative.

The United States strictly adhered to the principle of minimizing civilian casualties during its bombing campaigns over North Vietnam from 1965 to 1968 and 1972 to 1973. [68] Even though the effectiveness of the 1965 to 1968 campaigns was limited due to targeting constraints, the bombing campaigns of 1972 to 1973 were deemed militarily effective and in compliance with the laws of war. [69] These later bombing campaigns avoided intentional attacks on civilian populations and the subsequent collateral casualties that would have resulted. [70] When balanced against the anticipated military advantage of a strike, such caution is indicative of the doctrine of proportionality. [71]

After conducting Operation Just Cause, the 1989 full-scale invasion of Panama, the United States was criticized for responding disproportionately to the threats of Panamanian dictator Manuel Noreiga. [72] It also has [*514] been argued that the United States' response to Iraq's armed invasion of Kuwait during the 1991 Persian Gulf War failed to meet the requirements of proportionality. [73] In 1995, NATO ordered airstrikes of select targets in

REV_00259503

Bosnia-Herzegovina to end a humanitarian crisis caused by conflict in that country. [74] In 1998, the United States claimed self-defense after conducting missile strikes against targets in Sudan and Afghanistan in order to prevent future attacks by a terrorist group led by Osama bin Laden. [75] The United States chose these targets in an effort to limit possible collateral damage to civilians and to comply with the rules of necessity and proportionality. [76]

Two more recent examples of the use of armed force in self-defense present questions of whether nations strictly adhere to proportionality. Russia invaded neighboring Chechnya in 1999 because it allegedly housed terrorists who had attacked Russian cities. [77] In launching these [*515] cross-border attacks, the Russian government was accused of failing to take necessary precautions to promote the safety of Chechen civilians. [78] In early 2000, Israeli military forces conducted retaliatory airstrikes against Hezbollah guerrilla targets in southern Lebanon. [79] The Israeli Government permitted military strikes against targets even if located in predominately civilian areas. [80]

II. Kosovo: The Continuing Crisis in the Balkans

On March 23, 1999, NATO ordered its warships and aircraft to initiate Operation Allied Force and to begin bombing selected targets in Kosovo and Serbia. [81] NATO's main objectives included halting further humanitarian catastrophe caused by a Serbian military offensive against Kosovar civilians and preventing further destabilization of the Balkan region, produced by the thousands of refugees fleeing into neighboring countries such as Macedonia and Albania. [82] NATO's operation, which only consisted [*516] of airstrikes [83] and lasted seventy-eight days, [84] ended with the signing of the mutual Military Technical Agreement. [85]

A. Kosovo: The Anatomy of a Conflict

""The Yugoslav crisis began in Kosovo, and it will end in Kosovo.'" [86]

Kosovo, a small region located in the southwest corner of Serbia, has been called the "lost heart of the Balkans." [87] Geographically, the region [*517] is isolated because its southern border is formed by the Sar Mountain Range extending eastward from northern Albania, its western border is formed by the "Accursed Mountains," [88] its northern border consists of the Kopaonik Range, and its southeastern border is formed by a range of hills known as the Skopska Crna Gora. [89] In Kosovo, ninety percent of the civilian population is Albanian and the remaining ten percent is Serbian. [90] This region has been the site of constant ethnic, religious, and political conflicts for over 600 years. [91]

The cycle of violence that led to NATO's military operation can be traced to the fall of the Soviet-dominated communist system and the eventual dissolution of Yugoslavia. [92] In September 1991, Kosovar Albanian separatists declared Kosovo an independent republic. [93] Serbia, the [*518] largest Yugoslavian state, paid little attention to this declaration because it was embroiled in conflict, first with Croatia, and then with Bosnia. [94] By 1996, Kosovar separatists, who would later become the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA), had increased their attacks on Serbia's military forces and its Interior Ministry. [95] Due largely to Serbian military attacks against KLA forces, NATO asserts that approximately 1.5 million Kosovars had been displaced from their homes by March 1999, [96] while more than 250,000 Kosovars had fled to neighboring countries such as Macedonia and Montenegro, over 225,000 Kosovar men were missing, and 5,000 Kosovars had been executed. [97]

B. The International Community's Response

Spurred by the escalation of fighting in Kosovo, the U.N. Security Council adopted Resolution 1160 on March 31, 1998, which called upon all parties involved to enter into meaningful dialogue in order to reach a political solution. [98] In April 1998, the members of "the Contact Group" for Yugoslavia, which consisted of the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy, sanctioned Serbia for its role in worsening the situation in Kosovo. [99]

REV_00259504

On May 28, 1998, the North Atlantic Council of NATO issued two major objectives regarding the conflict in Kosovo. [100] The first objective [*519] attempted to help achieve a peaceful solution to the conflict, while the second promoted stability and security in the Balkan region. [101] On September 23, 1998, the U.N. Security Council adopted Resolution 1199, which renewed its demand for all parties to cease hostilities, evaluated measures that may have been helpful in achieving international peace and security, and expressed concern over the excessive and indiscriminate force used by both Serbian government and KLA forces. [102]

On October 13, 1998, the North Atlantic Council acted again by authorizing activation orders for airstrikes against Serbian targets. [103] In response to these threatened airstrikes and growing international pressure, Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic agreed to a cease-fire. [104] To assist in maintaining the cease-fire, the U.N. Security Council authorized NATO and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) [105] to establish surveillance missions in Kosovo. [106]

Despite the cease-fire and the verification missions, violence among the Serbian military, police forces, and the KLA reignited in Kosovo. [107] This resumption of violence prompted the Contact Group to convene in [*520] January 1999 and to engage in negotiations in Rambouillet, France. [108] The Rambouillet talks involved two rounds of negotiations. [109] By the end of the second round, the KLA representatives agreed to the proposed peace agreement. [110] The Serbian government, on the other hand, did not agree, in part because of its refusal to permit U.N. peacekeeping troops in Kosovo. [111] Serbian forces then increased their attacks upon Kosovar civilians and the KLA. [112]

On March 20, 1999, the OSCE withdrew the Verification Mission from Kosovo because of the looming prospect of NATO military intervention. [113] Because Serbia refused to stop attacking Kosovar civilians and KLA units, NATO authorized Operation Allied Force on March 23, 1999, and commenced airstrikes against Serbian targets. [114]

C. NATO's Response to Serbian Aggression: Operation Allied Force

Operation Allied Force, NATO's response to Serbia's refusal to sign the Rambouillet Accords and maintain peace in the Kosovo region, proceeded along two lines of attack. [115] The first line included a strategic attack against Serbian targets such as its integrated air defense, command and control centers, military supply routes, and infrastructure. [116] The second line identified, isolated, and interdicted Serbian targets strictly in the Kosovo region, including troops, weapons, and other military supplies. [117]

These two lines of attack proceeded in five phases. [118] First, NATO deployed air assets to the European theater to prepare for the operation. [119] [*521] Second, NATO established air superiority over Kosovo and degraded Yugoslavia's command and control and integrated air-defense system. [120] Third, NATO attacked Serbian targets in Kosovo and Yugoslavia, south of its capital Belgrade, which provided support for Serbia's war effort. [121] Fourth, NATO expanded its air operations to include "high-value military and security force targets" throughout the Kosovo region and Serbia. [122] Fifth, NATO redeployed forces as required. [123]

NATO selected a variety of targets throughout Serbia during its operation. [124] Examples of such targets included: tanks, armored fighting vehicles, artillery, mortars, aircraft, airfields, ordinance repair facilities, and ammunition storage sites. [125] Further, NATO targeted the Serbian Ministry of Defense and Army General Staff buildings in Belgrade, electrical power transformer yards and power generation facilities, television and radio transmitters, and highway and railroad bridges. [126] Subsequent estimates concluded that NATO pilots flew 35,000 sorties and dropped over 20,000 bombs on targets. [127] Despite some estimates of high accuracy in NATO bombing, approximately five thousand Yugoslavian citizens were killed during Operation Allied Force. [128]

REV_00259505

III. Proportionality and Operation Allied Force

A. The Importance of Assessing the Individual Attack

The modern doctrine of proportionality addresses the jus ad bellum, the reasons given for the military operation, as well as the jus in bello, the [*522] means used to conduct the operation. [129] Historically, the means of an attack were justified if the cause was just, but proportionality now requires that the means of an attack be assessed by balancing the anticipated military advantage against expected civilian casualties. [130] This reasoning requires an assessment of proportionality for each individual attack of a military operation at its planning stage, [131] which must be completed prior to approving a military strike. [132]

B. Making the Assessment: The Important Factors of Proportionality

The factors used to assess the proportionality of a military attack include: target selection, the means and methods chosen for the military strike, the lack of negligence in the execution of the military strike, and the determination of what constitutes the military advantage of a particular military strike. [133]

1. Target Selection

Selecting a target is extremely important, especially when targets are near civilian populations. [134] Proper assessment of a target requires knowledge of the precise location of the target, [135] a determination of whether the target contains any potentially dangerous forces, [136] an estimate of the importance of the military objective to an opponent's military [*523] capabilities, [137] and an assessment of the vulnerability of the target to destruction by the military attack. [138]

2. Means and Methods and Lack of Negligence

The means and methods of a military strike, as well as negligent execution of the strike, are critical when determining the proportionality of a particular strike. [139] Controllability is a particularly important factor to consider when choosing which weapon or technique to use in a military strike. [140] Controllability connotes the ability to limit the strike's damage to the military objective while avoiding civilian casualties and damage to civilian areas. [141] A military planner must ascertain a weapon or technique's controllability by considering the immediate damage and the long-term effects that may result from the use of the weapon or technique. [142] Such effects will include not only physical damage to the intended target, but also a long-term impact on the environment surrounding it. [143]

In addition to controllability, military planners must strive to avoid negligence in the execution of the military strike that may result in unnecessary civilian casualties. [144] A cunning strategy and good intentions do not guarantee an error-free and perfect execution of a military operation. [145] Accidents occur and result in the loss of human life despite a military planner's preparation and best efforts. [146] Planners must account for variables over which they have little control, including pilot error, weapon malfunction, enemy defenses, and sudden changes in weather. [147]

[*524]

3. The Guidance of Protocol I

Protocol I provides guidance regarding what constitutes a proportional response. [148] In addition to the relevant articles of Protocol I discussed above, [149] Article 57 requires a military planner, when presented with several military targets of equal military advantage, to select the target expected to cause the fewest civilian casualties. [150] In particular, Article 53

REV_00259506

prohibits attacks against cultural objects or places of worship. [151] Similarly, Article 54 prohibits attacks against objects that are indispensable for the survival of the civilian population. [152]

4. The Interpretation of Military Advantage

The final factor in analyzing the proportionality of a military strike involves deciding which of two "military advantage" approaches to use. [153] The first approach, the "cumulative" approach, balances expected civilian casualties against the contribution of an anticipated military advantage to a party's overall strategic goals. [154] In the Operation Allied Force context, this approach would have required NATO to determine the [*525] overall strategic goals of its operation in Kosovo. [155] The anticipated military advantage of any specific attack would have been measured by determining whether that advantage would help achieve those strategic goals. [156] Cumulative analysis has been interpreted to condone civilian casualties that result from military strikes because these casualties will prevent future civilian casualties. [157] This interpretation, however, deprives civilians of meaningful protection and creates a vague standard of review because it is difficult to predict accurately the consequences of military strikes. [158]

The second approach, the "case-by-case" approach, requires the anticipated military advantage of any strike to be measured by the specific tactical advantage gained. [159] This approach defines the term "military advantage" as the "specific tactical objective of a particular action." [160]

[*526]

C. Final Assessment and Execution: What did the Planners of Operation Allied Force Decide?

The initial phase of Operation Allied Force concentrated firepower upon Serbian military targets including tanks, artillery, bunkers, barracks, ammunition depots, [161] and enemy troops. [162] It is difficult to question the proportionality of these strikes because they were carried out in areas far from civilian population; moreover, the anticipated military advantage outweighed civilian concerns because the Serbian military forces were judged to be responsible for most of the humanitarian disaster. [163] As the operation entered the later phases, however, NATO increasingly began to focus on targets that were not only closer to civilian areas, but those that arguably had military and civilian purposes. [164]

Operation Allied Force involved thousands of individual attacks, many of which affected civilians. [165] Specific attacks, such as the bombing of Serbian infrastructure targets and the Socialist Party Headquarters in Belgrade, illustrate the use of the doctrine of proportionality in the planning and execution of NATO's operation. [166]

1. The Socialist Party Headquarters in Belgrade

In the early morning hours of April 21, 1999, four cruise missiles struck the Socialist Party Headquarters in downtown Belgrade. [167] Before [*527] launching this attack, operation planners used a picture of the building and an intelligence report to determine the possible consequences, including the number of civilians (e.g., employees) that might be killed. [168] The availability of modern weapons, which could implode a building, provided military planners with some confidence that civilian casualties would be minimized. [169] For example, modern weapons allowed NATO military planners to predict the path and distance of propelled concrete and shattered glass, which provided an additional method of protecting civilians. [170]

NATO appears to have applied the doctrine of proportionality properly during the planning and execution stages of its bombing of the Socialist Party Headquarters. [171] Accordingly, NATO satisfied Article 57 of the Protocol, which requires planners to do everything within their ability to verify that an object is truly military in nature. [172] NATO chose means and methods to ensure maximum damage with minimum collateral damage and does not appear to have acted negligently. [173]

REV_00259507

Article 51(5)(b) of the Protocol requires a balancing of the anticipated [*528] military advantage gained and the expected civilian casualties caused by a specific military strike. [174] This balancing is important because proportionality will only achieve its goal of lessening civilian casualties if those expected casualties do not exceed the anticipated military advantage. [175] Article 48 of the Protocol mandates that the target is a true military objective, [176] and Article 52(2) specifically limits all attacks to military objectives. [177] Therefore, NATO could only justify the attack on the Socialist Party Headquarters building by establishing, during the planning stage, that the building served military purposes. [178] NATO planners described the Socialist Party Headquarters as an alternative headquarters for the Milosevic government. [179] By establishing that the Serbian government converted an otherwise civilian-oriented building into a government building, NATO acquired and attacked a target of true military advantage. [180]

2. The Serbian Infrastructure: Electricity, Water, and Bridges

Some operation planners, particularly the members of the United States' Armed Forces wanted to strike Serbia's power grid. [181] The French Government, however, opposed this plan. [182] In order to allay French concerns, the Allies turned to a top-secret weapon that would disrupt the electricity for only a few hours. [183] Once France agreed to this [*529] plan, NATO commenced the attack. [184] In subsequent weeks, the Allies conducted additional attacks on Yugoslavia's electrical system that disabled power for days. [185] These tactics not only disabled electrical power, but disrupted the Serbian water supply. [186]

In addition to the disruption of Serbia's electrical power and water supplies, airstrikes destroyed twenty-four bridges. [187] NATO planners spared one bridge, known as the "Rock-n-Roll" bridge, from Allied attack. [188] The Allies refrained from bombing this bridge because they wanted to avoid excessive civilian casualties. [189] That Serbian volunteers stood on the bridge to prevent its destruction also contributed to the decision not to bomb the "Rock-n-Roll" bridge. [190] In sum, NATO planners refused to attack the "Rock-n-Roll" bridge because the anticipated civilian casualties outweighed any expected military advantage. [191]

The bombings of the electrical system and bridges, and the disruption of the water supply, raise questions under Article 54 of the Protocol, which prohibits attacks against targets that are indispensable to the survival of the civilian population. [192] The fundamental question asks whether these objects are strictly civilian in nature. Article 54(2) expressly [*530] protects water supplies, which are solely for civilian use. [193] This language does not, however, define electrical grids or bridges as indispensable for civilian survival. [194] When considering the evidence beyond the language of the Protocol, however, facts suggest that the directors of Operation Allied Force wanted to control the amount of damage these attacks caused, as evidenced by the choice of weapons. [195]

The question was whether any anticipated military advantage could be gained by attacking elements of the Serbian infrastructure when balanced against expected civilian casualties. [196] Military advantage may be gained only through the attack of military objects because Protocol I prohibits attacks against civilian targets. [197] It is arguable that electrical grids and bridges satisfy the Article 52(2) definition of military objects because they may be used for military and domestic purposes; the water supply, on the other hand, is expressly protected by the Protocol because the supply supported the civilian population and not the military. [198]

IV. Operation Allied Force: A Proportional Response?

A. NATO's Intention: A Proportional Effort To Maintain Balkan Stability

REV_00259508

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: (engagement) and necessity and war and self-defense and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)

*93 A.J.I.L. 879, **

Copyright (c) 1999 The American Society of International Law
The American Journal International Law

October, 1999

93 A.J.I.L. 879

LENGTH: 27504 words

ARTICLE: Contemporary Practice of the United States Relating to International Law

Edited by Sean D. Murphy *

* George Washington University Law School. Professor Murphy wishes to acknowledge the superb research assistance provided by Cameron Alford, Perri Al-Raheim, and Uta Melzer in preparing the four submissions of this section for volume 93.

SUMMARY:
... Kosovo: Deployment of Peacekeeping Force ... The international security presence with substantial North Atlantic Treaty Organization participation must be deployed under unified command and control and authorized to establish a safe environment for all people in Kosovo and to facilitate the safe return to their homes of all displaced persons and refugees. ... The Court entered final judgment in the Prudential worldwide settlement class action on July 17, 1992. ... Swiss banks will pay the valid claims and will deduct those amounts from the amount that they will pay in settlement of the New York class action. ... U.S.-Taiwan-China Relations ... The European Union failed to lift the import restrictions by that date, so Canada and the United States requested the WTO Dispute Settlement Body to authorize suspension of the application to the European Union and its member states of Canadian and U.S. tariff concessions and related obligations, in an amount of $ 202 million for the United States and $ 51 million for Canada. ... *Status of the U.S.-USSR Anti-Ballistic Missile System Treaty*One of the most important nuclear arms control agreements concluded during the Cold War was the 1972 anti-ballistic missile treaty (ABM Treaty). ...

TEXT:
[*879] LEGAL REGULATION OF THE USE OF FORCE

Kosovo: Deployment of Peacekeeping Force

After seventy-two days of NATO's air campaign against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia-Montenegro) (FRY), [1] FRY President Slobodan Milosevic on June 3, 1999 accepted an international peace proposal to end the conflict concerning Kosovo. [2] The proposal was developed in Bonn after lengthy discussions between U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbott, EU envoy (and Finnish President) Martti Ahtisaari, and Russian envoy Viktor Chernomyrdin, and then presented to President Milosevic by President Ahtisaari and Mr. Chernomyrdin. Although it contained several elements previously unacceptable to the FRY, Mr. Milosevic accepted the proposal due to a relentless bombing campaign against FRY tanks, artillery, and ground forces in Kosovo, as well as the destruction of oil refineries, bridges, and power stations elsewhere in Serbia; a resurgence of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) as a ground force; and the decision of Russia to find common ground with NATO prior to a regular meeting in early June of the seven leading industrial countries (Group of Seven or "G-7") and

REV_00259536

702, 99 S. Ct. 2545, 61 L. Ed. 2d 176 (1979) ("Nothing in Rule 23 . . . limits the geographical scope of a class action that is brought in conformity with that Rule."). Accordingly, United States courts have not hesitated to certify international classes, and to enter judgments with effects resounding worldwide. For example, in In re "Agent Orange" Product Liability Litigation, 506 F. Supp. 762 (E.D.N.Y. 1980), the court certified an international class of soldiers who were exposed to Agent Orange in Vietnam. Despite defendants' arguments that the laws of the 50 states and foreign nations diverged and clashed, making class certification inappropriate, the court found that defendants' course of conduct in the devastating overseas deployment of Agent Orange gave rise to common issues amenable to class treatment.

Similarly, by order dated July 17, 1992, the Honorable Milton Pollack approved the inclusion of Prudential Life Insurance Co. v. Milken, 92 Civ. 1151 (S.D.N.Y.), a world-wide securities class action, in the "Milken Global Settlement" relating to over 180 federal and state court actions against Michael Milken and numerous former associates of The Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc. See In re Michael Milken & Assocs. Sec. Litig. (In re First Capital Holdings Corp. Fin. Prods. Sec. Litig.), 150 F.R.D. 57, 59 & n.1 (S.D.N.Y. 1993). The Court entered final judgment in the Prudential worldwide settlement class action on July 17, 1992. See Presidential Life Ins. Co. v. Milken, 946 F. Supp. 267, 269 (S.D.N.Y. 1996) (denying motions to intervene and for relief from judgment). When Judge Pollack signed the final closing papers in Prudential in September of 1993, thereby releasing settlement funds to the class, see In re Michael R. Milken & Assocs. Sec. Litig. (Presidential Life Ins. Co. v. Milken), 1993 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14242 (S.D.N.Y. 1993), he was lauded for his "imagination to come up with creative methods of handling this huge mass of litigation across the country, including a worldwide class . . . it was a phenomenal step in the advancement of creative class litigation, and that itself will be a landmark in jurisprudence." Id. at * 16.

Likewise, the consequences of international distribution and use of the Dalkon Shield intrauterine device required certification of a class comprised of Dalkon Shield [*890] users in the United States and approximately 100 foreign countries. In re A.H. Robins Co. (Breland v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co.), 85 B.R. 373, 376-78 (E.D. Va. 1988) (certifying plaintiff class in part because the Dalkon Shield had been distributed not only in the United States, but in approximately 100 foreign countries, making joinder impracticable); 88 B.R. 755 (E.D. Va. 1988) (approving class settlement), aff'd 880 F.2d 709 (4th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom, Anderson v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 493 U.S. 959 (1989). In connection with its approval of a global settlement, the court ordered implementation of a sophisticated world-wide notice program, including press releases, press conferences, public service announcements, and letters to foreign health and medical associates. The district court's notice implementation order was upheld, and the adequacy of the foreign notice program was described in detail and expressly approved, in Vancouver Women's Health Collective Soc. v. A.H. Robins Co., 820 F.2d 1359 (4th Cir. 1987).

In In re Silicone Gel Breast Implant Products Liability Litigation (MDL 926), Master File No CV 92-P 10000-S (Lindsey v. Dow Corning Corp., Civil Action No. CV 94-P-11558-S), the court approved a $ 4.2-plus billion worldwide class action settlement on behalf of an international settlement class.

Finally, in In re Estate of Marcos Human Rights Litig., 910 F. Supp. 1460 (D. Haw. 1995), aff'd sub nom., Hilao v. Estate of Ferdinand Marcos, 103 F.3d 767 (9th Cir. 1996), as discussed above, the court certified a class of approximately 10,000 victims of torture, summary execution and disappearance during the roughly 14-year period (1972-86) when President Marcos had declared martial law. The > Ninth Circuit affirmed the 3-phase class-wide trial of liability, punitive damages, and compensatory damages, conducted under international law. [27]

The District Court preliminarily approved the settlement agreement on April 2, 1999. [28] As a means of alerting potential claimants to the settlement, an extensive, worldwide advertising campaign commenced in June 1999.

Although a lawsuit had been filed against the Swiss National Bank, that bank refused to contribute to the settlement, arguing that, as a government bank, doing so "would lend this an official character, which is not in the interests of the country as a whole." [29] The settlement expressly provides that the lawsuit against the Swiss National Bank will be dismissed.

As part of their efforts to demonstrate good faith in dealing with dormant bank accounts, Swiss banks in 1996 entered into an agreement with the World Jewish Restitution Organization and the World Jewish Congress, which set up an "Independent Committee of Eminent Persons" (ICEP) headed by Paul A. Volcker, former Chairman of the U.S. Federal Reserve Bank. ICEP searched the banks' archives and assessed the number and value of bank accounts opened before the Second World War and since then dormant. In 1997, lists of the names of account holders were published worldwide, with an invitation to persons believing that they have a claim on an account to file the claim with an international accounting firm. A group of arbitrators comprising the Claims Resolution Tribunal, financed by the Swiss Federal Banking Commission and acting under the auspices of an Independent Claims Resolution Foundation, was established under Swiss law to decide the [*891] validity of the claims. [30] Swiss banks will pay the valid claims and will deduct those amounts from the amount that they will pay in settlement of the New York class action.

When the New York class action settlement was announced in August 1998, the Swiss Government stated that it provided a closure of all the financial claims raised against Switzerland. Both President Clinton and Under Secretary of State Eizenstat issued statements lauding the agreement and complimenting the parties' "understanding, flexibility, and determination." [31] On January 30, 1999, Vice President Al Gore declared that the disputes over Nazi gold, as well as the treatment of Holocaust survivors by Swiss banks, were finally settled, but he sought assurances from the Swiss Government that it remained committed to the creation of a $ 4.7 billion humanitarian fund, to be financed by selling some of the nation's gold reserves. The creation of such a fund most likely would require a Swiss national referendum, and has been criticized heavily in Switzerland. [32]

A similar class action suit filed on behalf of Holocaust victims and their families in New York against Bank Austria led to a $ 40 million settlement on May 19, 1999. [33]

Confiscated Art. On August 30, 1998, Under Secretary of State Eizenstat commended the New York class action settlement agreement, as well as the evolving cooperation in the area of insurance disputes, but looked to expand the "search for truth" to other areas, especially works of art stolen during the war. [34]

To deal with issues of stolen art (as well as insurance, education, communal property, and archives), the U.S. Department of State and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum cohosted a Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets in late 1998. [35] Forty-four countries and thirteen nongovernmental organizations participated and reached consensus on certain principles, which, according to Under Secretary of State Eizenstat, "while not legally binding represent a moral commitment among nations which all in the art world will have to take into account." [36] The Washington Conference Principles on Nazi Confiscated Art provide:

> In developing a consensus on non-binding principles to assist in resolving issues relating to Nazi-confiscated art, the Conference recognizes that among participating nations there are differing legal systems and that countries act within the context of their own laws.

I. Art that had been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted should be identified.

II. Relevant records and archives should be open and accessible to researchers, in accordance with the guidelines of the International Council on Archives.

III. Resources and personnel should be made available to facilitate the identification of all art that had been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted.

IV. In establishing that a work of art had been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted, consideration should be given to unavoidable gaps or ambiguities in the provenance in light of the passage of time and the circumstances of the Holocaust era.

[*892] V. Every effort should be made to publicize art that is found to have been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted in order to locate its pre-War owners or their heirs.

VI. Efforts should be made to establish a central registry of such information.

VII. Pre-War owners and their heirs should be encouraged to come forward and make known their claims to art that was confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted.

VIII. If the pre-War owners of art that is found to have been confiscated by the Nazis and not subsequently restituted, or their heirs, can be identified, steps should be taken expeditiously to achieve a just and fair solution, recognizing this may vary according to the facts and circumstances surrounding a specific case.

IX. If the pre-War owners of art that is found to have been confiscated by the Nazis, or their heirs, can not be identified, steps should be taken expeditiously to achieve a just and fair solution.

X. Commissions or other bodies established to identify art that was confiscated by the Nazis and to assist in addressing ownership issues should have a balanced membership.

XI. Nations are encouraged to develop national processes to implement these principles, particularly as they relate to alternative dispute resolution mechanisms for resolving ownership issues. [37]

In his concluding statement at the Conference, Under Secretary of State Eizenstat acknowledged ongoing efforts to address the issue of stolen art by various countries and expressed hope that others would join in these efforts:

I am pleased to note that several countries have already taken courageous steps to address these issues. For example, Austria, Switzerland, and the Netherlands are researching the provenance of works in their national collections; the French Government has established a web site to display a portion of the some 2,000 > pieces of art restituted after the war still unclaimed; and Austria has passed a law to allow restitution notwithstanding such legal obstacles as the statute of limitations. In addition, we are particularly pleased by the announcement of the Russian delegation that they will actively cooperate in resolving outstanding issues related to Holocaust-era art. The actions of these nations could provide useful models for other countries. [38]

REV_00259547

U.S. Abduction of Mexican National As Violation of International Law

In 1990, individuals, acting on behalf of the U.S. Government, abducted Dr. Humberto Alvarez-Machain in Mexico, detained him for twenty-four hours, and brought him to the United States to face trial on various counts of conspiracy, kidnapping and murder of a U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) agent, Enrique Camarena, in Mexico in 1985. [1] As a result of the abduction, Mexico lodged several diplomatic protests against the United States.

U.S. law does not impair the power of a court to try a person for a crime merely on the basis that that person was brought within the court's jurisdiction by reason of a "forcible abduction." [2] However, courts have denied such jurisdiction when the abduction was undertaken in violation of an extradition treaty. [3] Dr. Alvarez-Machain moved to dismiss his indictment, in part on grounds that his apprehension violated the U.S.-Mexico extradition [*893] treaty. [4] In 1992, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the motion, finding that the treaty, by its terms, did not preclude the United States from obtaining custody over persons in Mexico through resort to means other than as provided by the extradition treaty. [5] The Court did not determine whether the abduction violated international law generally but stated that "it may be in violation of general international law principles." [6]

On remand, the case proceeded to trial, but the U.S. District Court granted Dr. Alvarez-Machain's motion for an acquittal based on a lack of evidence. On July 9, 1993, Dr. Alvarez-Machain brought a civil suit against the U.S. Government and numerous individual defendants charging, among other things, kidnapping, assault and battery, false imprisonment, negligent and intentional infliction of emotional distress, and cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment. On March 18, 1999, in the course of deciding several motions by the parties, the U.S. District Court made certain important findings.

First, the Court rejected most of Dr. Alvarez-Machain's claims against the U.S. Government under the Federal Tort Claims Act [7] for acts occurring in California and Texas. The Court found that the applicable state laws did not regard most of the alleged acts as torts or as otherwise actionable in a civil action. Particularly with respect to California, the Court asserted:

> While Plaintiff correctly observes that California courts have applied international law to certain discrete situations, such as determining California's territorial jurisdiction, Plaintiff does not cite a single instance in the history of California case law, nor did the court find an example, in which a California court has incorporated a violation of international law into its domestic law as a tort. In fact, the cases which Plaintiff cites as examples of situations in which American courts have recognized a prohibition on kidnapping or cruel treatment rely on the Alien Tort Claims Act, . . . which explicitly contemplates the use of such law. [8]

Despite these findings regarding California law, the Court refused to dismiss Dr. Alvarez-Machain's charges against the U.S. Government for the alleged actions that occurred once Dr. Alvarez-Machain arrived in El Paso because Texas law allows a civil action for intentional

REV_00259548

infliction of emotional distress. [9]

Second, the Court considered the application of the Alien Tort Claims Act (ATCA), [10] a statute increasingly used as a tool for judicial redress of human rights violations [11] but that generally has been limited to suits against individuals acting under color of state authority, [12] since it generally is assumed that only states can violate international law. [13] In this case, Dr. Alvarez-Machain used the ATCA to sue an individual, Francisco Sosa, who the United States had hired as an independent contractor, not an employee, to arrange the abduction. The Court reasoned that, if the U.S. Government had employed Mr. Sosa, in the sense that it directly controlled and supervised his performance or provided the tools or instrumentalities [*894] for the abduction, then Dr. Alvarez-Machain would not be able to sue Mr. Sosa in his personal capacity, pursuant to the Federal Employees Liability Reform and Tort Compensation Act of 1988. [14] However, for this abduction, the U.S. Government only instructed Mr. Sosa on who should be abducted and how he should be treated once in custody, leaving to Mr. Sosa's discretion the time and manner for conducting the abduction. As such, the Court found that Mr. Sosa was an independent contractor who could be sued in his individual capacity under the ATCA. [15]

Third, for an ATCA claim, three elements must exist: the claim must be filed by an alien (i.e., a non-citizen and non-national of the United States); the claim must be for a tort; and the action in controversy must have violated international law. With respect to the third element, the Court affirmed certain positions taken by earlier courts, noting that the violated international norm must be "specific, universal, and obligatory," that it need not rise to the level of jus cogens, and that it be assessed as it exists today rather than as it existed in 1789, when the ATCA was enacted as part of the First Judiciary Act of 1789. [16] With respect to this case, the Court held that state-sponsored transnational border abductions violate international law, [17] a conclusion never before reached by a U.S. court, but one that accords with the practice of states, the courts of other countries, resolutions of international organizations and the views of many commentators. [18] Likewise, the Court found that arbitrary arrest and detention violated international law. [19] However, the Court also found that while international law prohibited cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment, as of 1990 -- when the events in this case took place -- there was no "universal" consensus as to the content of such a tort. [20] Moreover, violation of any such norm related to whether the plaintiff had been deprived of his constitutional due process rights, which the Ninth Circuit, on a previous appeal, found had not occurred.

U.S.-Taiwan-China Relations

Although in 1979 the United States ended normal diplomatic relations with Taiwan (which officially refers to itself as The Republic of China), the United States nevertheless unofficially has maintained extensive political, economic, cultural and military relations with Taiwan. Rather than promote Taiwan as an independent state, the United States has sought to maintain relations with both Taiwan and the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.) through a "one-China" policy, which -- in declaring that there was only one state of "China" -- allowed both governments to maintain the fiction that each was the legitimate ruler of the other and that reunification might someday occur.

U.S.-P.R.C. relations since 1979 have been normal diplomatic relations. U.S.-Taiwan relations are grounded in the Taiwan Relations Act (TRA) [1] which, among other things, provides that the absence of diplomatic relations after 1979 does not affect the application of U.S. laws to Taiwan, that the United States will support Taiwan's self-defense capability, [*895] that all treaties and international agreements entered into prior to 1979 between the United States and Taiwan continue in force, [2] and that relations of the U.S. Government with Taiwan after 1979 shall be conducted through the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT), a nonprofit corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia. AIT conducts relations with a nongovernmental counterpart organized under Taiwanese law, the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office (TECRO), formerly known as the Coordination Council for North American Affairs (CCNAA).

REV_00259549

On April 14, 1999, Susan L. Shirk, U.S. Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, testified before the House International Relations Committee's Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific regarding the twentieth anniversary of the TRA. She stated:

> One measure of the TRA's success is the remarkable democratic transformation and economic prosperity achieved by Taiwan. Twenty years ago, Taiwan was under martial law, and human rights violations occurred with regularity. Today, Taiwan has a vibrant democracy characterized by free elections, a free press, and dynamic political campaigns. Taiwan's economic development on free market principles has been no less impressive, as seen in its ranking as the 14th largest trading economy in the world and in its success in weathering the Asian Financial Crisis. Taiwan's experience is a powerful example in the region and beyond.
>
> Of course, Taiwan's people deserve the full credit for their achievements. But the TRA helped both to ensure that the unofficial status of our relations did not harm Taiwan's interests and to create a stable environment favorable to Taiwan's transformation.
>
> Consistency of U.S. Commitment
>
> One way the U.S. Government has fostered this stable environment is by upholding the security provisions of the TRA. In close consultation with Congress, successive administrations have implemented our obligation under the TRA to provide articles and services necessary to Taiwan to maintain a sufficient self-defense capability. We have provided Taiwan with F-16s, Knox class frigates, helicopters, and tanks as well as a variety of air-to-air, surface-to-air, and anti-ship defensive missiles. We continually reevaluate Taiwan's posture to ensure we provide Taiwan with sufficient self-defense capability while complying with the terms of the 1982 U.S.-P.R.C. Communique.
>
> The Department of Defense's recent assessment of the security situation in the Taiwan Strait concludes that, except in a few areas, despite improvements in the military forces of both sides, the dynamic equilibrium of those forces in the Taiwan Strait has not changed dramatically over the last two decades. This assessment reflects the effectiveness of the TRA.

Ms. Shirk noted the growth of the U.S.-Taiwan relationship in trade, aviation, science and technology, public health and other fields. She characterized U.S. policy toward Taiwan and the P.R.C. as not being a "zero sum game":

> The U.S. policy framework, of which the TRA is part, allows us to retain substantive, but unofficial relations with Taiwan, while pursuing improved ties with the P.R.C. Six U.S. administrations of both parties have engaged Beijing in order to promote U.S. interests and to encourage a responsible P.R.C. role in the world. The U.S.-P.R.C. relationship that followed the normalization decision -- for all of its ups and downs -- has contributed enormously to stability and peace in Asia -- an environment which is very much in Taiwan's interest.
>
> . . . .
>
> [*896] U.S. relations with the P.R.C. and the people on Taiwan are likely to be one of our most complex and important foreign policy challenges for many years to come. This Administration, like the five Republican and Democratic Administrations before it, firmly believes that the future of cross-Strait relations is a matter for Beijing and Taipei to resolve peacefully.

REV_00259550

. . . .

Our role should not be as a mediator but instead as a contributor to an environment in which the two sides can take good ideas and build on them. This role has three elements: having sound relationships with Taiwan and the P.R.C.; maintaining stable, consistent, and predictable policies in the region so that both Taiwan and the P.R.C. focus energies on engaging one another directly rather [than] trying to pull us over to their side; and adhering to the overall China policy framework that has served our interests well. [3]

In an interview on German radio on July 10, 1999 (subsequently clarified by Taiwanese officials), Taiwan President Lee Teng-hui announced that Taiwan was ending its "one China" policy and would henceforth treat contacts between Taiwan and the P.R.C. as "state-to-state relations." [4] The P.R.C. reacted by threatening Taiwan that it might use force if Taiwan sought independence or to interfere otherwise with reunification. [5] Asked the view of the U.S. Government, the Department of State spokesman said: "We do not support Taiwan independence; we do not support Taiwanese membership in organizations where statehood is required; we do not support a two-China policy or a one-China/one-Taiwan policy." [6]

International Convention to Eliminate the "Worst Forms of Child Labor"

On June 17, 1999, the International Labor Organization (ILO) unanimously adopted a Convention to eliminate the "worst forms of child labor." The Convention states in part:

Article 1. Each member which ratifies this Convention shall take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency.

Article 2. For the purposes of this Convention, the term "child" shall apply to all persons under the age of 18.

Article 3. For the purposes of this Convention, the term "the worst forms of child labour" comprises:

(a) all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, such as the sale and trafficking of children, debt bondage and serfdom and forced or compulsory labour, including forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict;

[*897] (b) the use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances;

(c) the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs as defined in the relevant international treaties;

(d) work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children.

. . . .

REV_00259551

Article 7. 1. Each Member shall take all necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to this Convention including the provision and application of penal sanctions or, as appropriate, other sanctions.

2. Each Member shall, taking into account the importance of education in eliminating child labour, take effective and time-bound measures to:

(a) prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of labour;

(b) provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration;

(c) ensure access to free basic education, and, wherever possible and appropriate, vocational training, for all children removed from the worst forms of child labour;

(d) identify and reach out to children at special risk; and

(e) take account of the special situation of girls. [1]

The Convention will enter into force twelve months after ratification by two states and, thereafter, shall come into force for any state that ratifies it twelve months after that state's ratification.

The language in Article 1(a) of the treaty regarding the use of children in armed conflict permits the voluntary enlistment of children under age 18 to serve in a state's armed services. Since both the United Kingdom and the United States permit enlistment of volunteers under the age of 18, they insisted that the Convention permit such practice. [2]

In the first speech of a U.S. President before the ILO in Geneva, President Clinton addressed the conference on June 16, 1999. He stated that the United States endorsed the Convention and that he would seek advice and consent from the Senate for its ratification. Among other things, he said that the United States would not tolerate children being used in pornography, prostitution, slavery or bondage, being forcibly recruited to serve in armed conflicts, or risking their health in hazardous and dangerous working conditions. President Clinton noted, however, that adopting the Convention alone would not solve the problem. Rather, states must work aggressively both to enforce the Convention and to address the root causes of the problem ("the tangled pathology of poverty and hopelessness that leads to abusive child labor") by providing access to education for students and to jobs for their parents. [3]

Separately, President Clinton signed an executive order on June 12, 1999, setting forth the policy of U.S. executive branch agencies to take appropriate actions to enforce U.S. laws prohibiting the manufacture or importation of goods produced by forced child labor. To [*898] that end, the Department of Labor will publish a list of products, identified by their country of origin, which are believed to have been produced by forced child labor. Whenever U.S. executive branch agencies at home or abroad contract to procure products which appear on the list, they must obtain a certification from the supplying contractor that forced child labor was not used. The executive order contains further provisions for investigation of such certifications and sanctions if they are provided falsely. [4]

Unconstitutionality of Massachusetts Law Targeting Business with Myanmar

In 1996, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts enacted "An Act Regulating State Contracts with Companies Doing Business with or in Burma (Myanmar)". [1] The law prohibited the Commonwealth, its government agencies and authorities, from purchasing goods or services from individuals or companies that engage in business with or in Myanmar, except in certain limited situations. The purpose of the law was both to express disapproval of the human rights abuses of the non-democratic, military Government of Myanmar, and to inhibit companies wishing to do business with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts from also doing business with or in Myanmar, thereby placing economic pressure on the Government of Myanmar to reform. Massachusetts purchases approximately $ 2 billion in goods and services annually. [2]

After hundreds of U.S. and non-U.S. companies were placed by Massachusetts on a "restricted purchase list," the National Foreign Trade Council (NFTC) [3] on April 30, 1998, filed a suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Massachusetts charging that the law was unconstitutional. The NFTC contended that the law interfered with the federal foreign relations power, violated the foreign commerce clause, [4] and violated the supremacy clause, [5] given the existence of federal laws that impose sanctions on Myanmar. [6]

Because of the scope of the Massachusetts law, the existence of similar laws in other U.S. states and localities (i.e., laws that target foreign states, such as China, Cuba and Nigeria, for social and political injustices), and concerns about the role of U.S. states in foreign affairs, [7] the Massachusetts case attracted considerable interest in the United States and abroad, within both the business and academic communities. [8] Several entities, including representatives from other states, the U.S. Congress, and the European Union, (but not the U.S. executive branch) appeared as amici curiae.

[*899] On November 4, 1998, the District Court found that the U.S. Constitution grants the federal government exclusive authority over foreign affairs and that the Massachusetts law impermissibly burdened U.S. foreign relations. As such, the law was unconstitutional. The Court found that NFTC had not shown that federal law preempted the Massachusetts law; it did not reach the issue relating to the foreign commerce clause. [9]

On June 22, 1999, the First Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the District Court's finding that the Massachusetts law unconstitutionally infringed on the foreign affairs power of the federal government. After noting that the "Constitution's foreign affairs provisions have been long understood to stand for the principle that power over foreign affairs is vested exclusively in the federal government," [10] the Court carefully analyzed the Supreme Court's holding in Zschernig v. Miller [11] to assess the boundaries for permissible state activity in the foreign affairs context. The Court found that the Massachusetts law had more than an "incidental or indirect effect in foreign countries" (evidenced by the intent of the law, by Massachusetts' purchasing power, by protests from foreign countries, and by the law's divergence from federal law which creates the potential for federal embarrassment) and therefore is impermissible even if it advances a strong state interest. [12]

Further, the Court found the Massachusetts law unconstitutional as a violation of the foreign commerce clause. The Court doubted that the "market participant exception," which is part of the U.S. constitutional doctrine concerning the "dormant" domestic commerce clause, [13] extended as well to the foreign commerce clause. Even if this exception did extend to foreign commerce, the Court found that, in passing its law, Massachusetts did not act as a market participant but, rather, as a market regulator. The Massachusetts law violated the foreign commerce clause because it facially discriminated against foreign commerce without a legitimate local justification and because it attempted to regulate conduct beyond its borders. [14]

Unlike the District Court, the Court of Appeals also found the Massachusetts law unconstitutional under the supremacy clause, given the federal sanctions against Myanmar. The Court found that Congress had not implicitly approved of or permitted the Massachusetts law and that the law tried to regulate conduct (trade with Myanmar) already addressed by federal law, yet through different means in scope and kind. [15] The Court concluded:

> The passage of the Massachusetts Burma Law has resulted in significant attention being brought to the Burmese government's human rights record. Indeed, it may be that the Massachusetts law was a catalyst for federal sanctions. Massachusetts also played a role, through its representatives in the House and the Senate, in Congress's decision to impose sanctions on Burma. Nonetheless, the conduct of this nation's foreign affairs cannot be effectively managed on behalf of all of the nation's citizens if each of the many state and local governments pursues its own foreign policy. Absent express congressional authorization, Massachusetts cannot set the nation's foreign policy. [16]

[*900] INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC LAW

Unilateral U.S. Actions Against Steel Imports

In part because of the sharp reduction in demand for steel in Asia brought about by the Asian financial crisis, steel imports to the United States surged in 1998, leading U.S. steel producers and some in Congress to charge that foreign producers were selling steel products at prices below production costs or below their home-market prices (an illegal practice referred to as "dumping"). On September 30, 1998, U.S. steel producers and workers filed petitions with the International Trade Administration (ITA) of the U.S. Department of Commerce and with the International Trade Commission (ITC) alleging that Brazil, Japan, and Russia were dumping "hot-rolled" carbon steel flat products on the U.S. market. [1]

In response to a request from Congress, the Clinton Administration prepared a report in January 1999 setting forth an array of diplomatic and unilateral steps to deal with the increase in steel imports. Those steps included (1) bilateral efforts -- primarily with Japan, Korea and Russia -- to counter unfair trade practices and subsidization; (2) the enforcement of U.S. trade laws against unfair trade practices, effectuated in part through new regulations, [2] expedited investigations, and preliminary rulings by the U.S. Department of Commerce of "critical circumstances," which allow for the retroactive assessment of dumping duties; (3) "safeguards" actions, [3] which provide an important and WTO-consistent mechanism for addressing import surges; (4) the development of an early warning system to monitor import trends and guidelines for the release of preliminary import statistics to the U.S. steel industry; (5) the restoration of growth and demand in emerging markets, generating the conditions necessary for stronger, more stable currencies in our trading partners, and strengthening market-based reform in economies affected by the financial crisis so as to reduce the steel import pressure on the U.S. market; (6) tax relief for the steel industry; and (7) adjustment assistance for steelworkers and their communities. [4]

Dissatisfied with the Administration's approach, the U.S. House of Representatives on March 17, 1999 passed by a vote of 289 to 141 (one vote shy of a veto-proof majority) a bill directing the Administration to limit steel imports to the monthly average of the amount of steel imported during the 36-month period preceding July 1997. [5] The Clinton Administration urged the Senate not to pass the bill and, if passed, threatened to veto it, arguing that it would require broad restrictions on steel imports and therefore contravene U.S. obligations under WTO agreements. [6] The Senate killed the bill 57 to 42. [7]

In response to U.S. concerns over steel imports, both Brazil and Russia entered into agreements that suspended U.S. investigations concerning the dumping of hot-rolled steel

REV_00259554

Russia. [3]

The peace proposal provided as follows:

> Agreement should be reached on the following principles to move towards a resolution of the Kosovo crisis:
>
> 1. An immediate and verifiable end of violence and repression in Kosovo.
>
> 2. Verifiable withdrawal from Kosovo of all military police and paramilitary forces according to a rapid timetable.
>
> 3. Deployment in Kosovo under United Nations auspices of effective international civil and security presences, acting as may be decided under Chapter VII of the Charter, capable of guaranteeing the achievement of common objectives.
>
> 4. The international security presence with substantial North Atlantic Treaty Organization participation must be deployed under unified command and control and authorized to establish a safe environment for all people in Kosovo and to facilitate the safe return to their homes of all displaced persons and refugees.
>
> [*880] 5. Establishment of an interim administration for Kosovo as a part of the international civil presence under which the people of Kosovo can enjoy substantial autonomy within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, to be decided by the Security Council of the United Nations. The interim administration to provide transitional administration while establishing and overseeing the development of provisional democratic self-governing institutions to ensure conditions for a peaceful and normal life for all inhabitants in Kosovo.
>
> 6. After withdrawal, an agreed number of Yugoslav and Serbian personnel will be permitted to return to perform the following functions:
>
> -- Liaison with the international civil mission and the international security presence;
>
> -- Marking/clearing minefields;
>
> -- Maintaining a presence at Serb patrimonial sites;
>
> -- Maintaining a presence at key border crossings.
>
> 7. Safe and free return of all refugees and displaced persons under the supervision of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and unimpeded access to Kosovo by humanitarian aid organizations.
>
> 8. A political process towards the establishment of an interim political framework agreement providing for substantial self-government for Kosovo, taking full account of the Rambouillet accords and the principles of sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the other countries of the region, and the demilitarization of the [KLA]. Negotiations between the parties for a settlement should not delay or disrupt the establishment of democratic self-governing institutions.
>
> 9. A comprehensive approach to the economic development and stabilization of the crisis region. This will include the implementation of a stability pact for

REV_00259537

[*901] products. The suspension agreement with Brazil, concluded on July 7, 1999, precludes Brazil from selling hot-rolled steel at a price below $ 327 per metric ton. A separate agreement, designed to address Brazil's subsidization of its steel exporters, cut Brazil's exports to the United States of hot-rolled steel by approximately 28 percent, and limited exports to 295,000 metric tons per twelve-month period, beginning in October 1999. [8]

The United States and Russia concluded a suspension agreement regarding hot-rolled steel products on July 12, 1999. The agreement prohibits the shipment of certain types of Russian steel to the United States during most of 1999 and establishes quotas for the subsequent four years. The agreement also sets minimum prices, which range from $ 255 to $ 280 per metric ton of steel. Moreover, the United States and Russia reached a separate agreement, which restricted exports to the United States of Russian steel products not covered by the suspension agreement, including cold-rolled steel, semi-finished steel, wire rod, and galvanized sheet, pipe, and tube. This separate agreement was intended not only to provide further relief for U.S. industry, but also to help prevent circumvention of the suspension agreement. [9]

The United States did not, however, reach a suspension agreement concerning steel imports from Japan. On April 29, 1999, the ITA determined that illegal dumping was occurring for hot-rolled carbon steel imports from Japan. [10] In June 1999, the ITC determined that the dumping of such products had materially injured U.S. industry, [11] which led the U.S. Customs Service to impose duties on Japanese steel. [12] Japan protested the ITC's findings and announced that it would challenge these actions at, among other places, the WTO. [13]

U.S. Reaction to EU Failure to Abide by WTO Decision on Banana Imports

As part of its preferential trade scheme for former European colonies in Africa, the Caribbean, and the Pacific (ACP), [1] the European Union since 1993 has provided ACP countries with preferential treatment for the imports of ACP bananas. Further, the European Union concluded in 1994 a Banana Framework Agreement with Colombia, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, and Venezuela to provide special quota allocations for banana imports from those countries. Both schemes operate at the expense of banana producers in other Latin American states, including producers owned by U.S. corporations. [2]

In 1996, the United States, along with Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Mexico (later joined by Panama), filed a complaint with the World Trade Organization charging that these schemes violated various provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and the General Agreement on Trade in Services (GATS). On May 22, 1997, a [*902] WTO dispute panel agreed, finding that the European Union's allocation of tariff quota shares was inconsistent with the requirements of GATT article XIII, and that the European Union's import licensing procedures were inconsistent with several provisions of GATT and GATS. [3] On September 9, 1997, the Appellate Body upheld the panel's decision with minor changes; [4] the Appellate Body's decision, in turn, was adopted by the WTO Dispute Settlement Body on September 25, 1997. [5]

Subsequent consultations between the complaining parties and the European Union failed to reach agreement on the deadline for EU compliance with its WTO obligations. Consequently, the parties submitted the matter to binding arbitration, in accordance with Article 21.3(c) of the WTO Dispute Settlement Understanding (DSU). [6] When the parties could not agree on an arbitrator, the WTO Director-General appointed one for them. The arbitrator, Said El-Nagger, found on January 7, 1998, that the European Union must comply by January 1, 1999. [7] As of that date, the European Union had proposed a modified preference scheme that would retain separate tariff rate quotas for the ACP and non-ACP countries, which the United States found unacceptable. Consequently, on January 14, 1999, the United States requested, pursuant to DSU article 22.6, that the WTO Dispute Settlement Body authorize suspension of the application to the European Union and its member states of U.S. tariff concessions and related obligations in an amount of $ 520 million. The European Union objected to the requested amount and the matter was referred to arbitration by the members of the original panel.

REV_00259555

On April, 9, 1999, the WTO arbitrators determined that the level of impairment suffered by the United States was $ 191.4 million per year and, therefore, permitted the United States to suspend the application to the European Union and its member states of tariff concessions and related obligations in that amount. In determining a value lower than that requested by the United States, the arbitrators did not include in their assessment of harm to the United States losses incurred in trade between the United States and non-EU countries. The arbitrators stated in part:

> 6.12. We are of the view that the benchmark for the calculation of nullification or impairment of US trade flows should be losses in US exports of goods to the European Communities and losses by US service suppliers in services supply in or to the European Communities. However, we are of the opinion that losses of US exports in goods or services between the US and third countries do not constitute nullification or impairment of even indirect benefits accruing to the United States under the GATT or the GATS for which the European Communities could face suspension of concessions. To the extent the US assessment of nullification or impairment includes lost US exports defined as US content incorporated in Latin American bananas (e.g. US fertilizer, pesticides and machinery shipped to Latin America and US capital or management services used in banana cultivation), we do not consider such lost US exports for calculating nullification or impairment in the present arbitration proceeding between the European Communities and the United States.
>
> . . . .
>
> [*903] 6.14. It would be wrong to assume that there is no further recourse within the framework of the WTO dispute settlement system to claim compensation or to request authorization to suspend concessions equivalent to the level of the nullification or impairment caused with respect to bananas of Latin American origin, including incorporated inputs of whatever kind or origin. A right to seek redress for that amount of nullification or impairment does exist under the DSU for the WTO Members which are the countries of origin for these bananas, but not for the United States. In fact, a number of these WTO Members have been in the recent past, or are currently, in the process of exercising their rights under the DSU. Moreover, our concern with the protection of rights of other WTO Members is in conformity with public international law principles of sovereign equality of states and the non-interference with the rights of other states . . . .
>
> 6.15. Moreover, if overlapping claims by different WTO Members as to nullification or impairment suffered because of the same lost trade in goods (and goods and service inputs used in their production or incorporated therein) or the same lost trade in services were permissible under the DSU, the problem of "double-counting" of nullification or impairment would arise. Due to the difference in origin of goods or services used as inputs in the banana production, on the one hand, and the origin of the bananas as end-products, on the other, cumulative requests for compensation or suspension of concessions could be made for the same amount of nullification or impairment caused by a Member. [8]

In light of this decision, the United States applied one hundred percent duties on various European products (that are unrelated to bananas) retroactively effective until March 3,

1999, [9] the deadline for the arbitral panel decision under WTO dispute settlement rules. This case represents the first time that the WTO has authorized retaliatory measures for failure of a member state to comply with a WTO ruling within the required time. [10]

The European Union did not appeal the arbitrators' April 1999 ruling. While the European Commission outlined new options for modifying its regime, the Commission expressed uncertainty as to whether those options would meet the European Union's obligations under the WTO agreements. [11] In a message to the European Council of Ministers on June 1, 1999, the Commission stated:

> It is clear that there is no solution which is guaranteed to solve the dispute which does not involve major difficulties in relation to the Community's own interests, budget resources and obligations. It is also clear that the Community will have to put forward its solution if it wants to avoid an indefinite continuation of the US sanctions, possibly followed by more retaliation by Ecuador. The Commission would find a continuation of the sanctions inappropriate in view of the damage they do to European industry but also because of the wider implications this would have on our WTO obligations. [12]

U.S. Reaction to EU Failure to Abide by WTO Decision on Hormone Treated Beef Imports

On April 29, 1996, the European Union decided to maintain a ban first enacted in the 1980s on the import of meat derived from cattle treated with certain growth-promoting [*904] hormones. [1] Canada and the United States challenged the import ban as a violation of the European Union's obligations as a member of the WTO. [2] On August 18, 1997, a WTO dispute panel found that the ban violated provisions of the WTO Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures ("SPS Agreement") and therefore should be lifted. [3] On January 16, 1998, the WTO Appellate Body affirmed these findings, concluding that the risk assessments that had been performed did not support the ban on imports. [4]

The parties entered into consultations regarding the deadline for EU compliance, but they failed to reach an agreement. An EU proposal to compensate the United States by doubling the European Union's import quota for hormone free beef was considered inadequate, since U.S. exports only fulfill about half of the existing hormone free beef quota. [5] A second proposal, which would allow imports of hormone-treated beef but make them subject to labeling, foundered due to disagreements over the label's language. In any event, the European Union indicated that it would not lift its import ban until risk studies were completed sometime in 2000. [6] On April 28, 1999, the European Union released preliminary results from one of the seventeen studies it had underway, which demonstrated that residues from one hormone fed to cattle may cause cancer. [7] The United States challenged the validity of those findings.

Since the parties could not agree on a deadline for EU compliance, the appointed arbitrator decided that the European Union must comply by May 13, 1999. [8] The European Union failed to lift the import restrictions by that date, so Canada and the United States requested the WTO Dispute Settlement Body to authorize suspension of the application to the European Union and its member states of Canadian and U.S. tariff concessions and related obligations, in an amount of $ 202 million for the United States and $ 51 million for Canada. [9] The European Union contested the amount of the U.S. request, forcing the matter into another arbitration by the original dispute resolution panel, which issued a decision on July 12, 1999. The panel found that the EU's beef hormone ban resulted in annual U.S. beef export losses of $ 116.8 million, and that the United States and Canada were entitled to $ 125 million in sanctions against the European Union. [10] Therefore, [*905] effective July 29, 1999, the United States imposed one hundred percent tariffs on a range of foodstuffs from the

REV_00259557

European Union. [11]

U.S. Reaction to Canadian Failure to Abide by WTO Decision on "Split-Run" Magazines

Up until 1965, several U.S. magazine publishers had "split-runs" for the U.S. and Canadian markets, meaning that they published in Canada a Canadian version of the U.S. magazine. The Canadian version of the split-run typically contained advertisements purchased by Canadian advertisers at what Canada alleged to be significantly reduced rates, since most of the production costs of the magazine were already covered through sales of the U.S. magazine in the U.S. market. Canada claimed that selling such advertising at low rates began drawing advertisers away from Canadian-produced magazines, which the Government of Canada feared would drive Canadian magazines out of business and diminish Canadian culture. Consequently, in 1965, Canada enacted a ban on imports of any periodical that either (a) contains an advertisement that primarily targets the Canadian market and that does not appear identically in all editions of that issue of the periodical that were distributed in the periodical's country of origin, or (b) has more than five percent of its advertising content directed to the Canadian market. Further, in 1994, Canada imposed an 80 percent excise tax on split-runs, as well as postal rate measures designed to protect Canadian periodicals from split-run competition.

On May 24, 1996, the United States requested the formation of a WTO dispute panel to review these measures for compliance with WTO agreements. On March 14, 1997, the dispute panel found that most of the measures were inconsistent with Canada's obligations under the GATT, a decision that the WTO Appellate Body largely upheld. [1] Effective October 30, 1998, Canada responded to the WTO ruling by terminating its import ban and eliminating or modifying its other measures. At the same time, however, the Canadian Heritage Minister introduced legislation before the Canadian Parliament -- the Foreign Publishers Advertising Services Act -- that would have prohibited foreign magazines from selling advertising aimed at Canadians, thus accomplishing the same effect as the earlier measures. [2] In response, the United States threatened in early 1999 to take action under NAFTA to impose retaliatory tariffs of $ 650 million against Canadian steel, clothing, wood and plastics. The threat prompted Canada to enter into meaningful negotiations, [3] which lead in May 1999 to a bilateral resolution of the matter.

Canada agreed to amend its proposed legislation to exempt foreign-owned magazines either produced in or imported to Canada so long as no more than twelve percent of their advertisements primarily target the Canadian market (with the percentage increasing to eighteen percent after three years). Furthermore, Canada agreed to certain tax and investment measures favorable to foreign publishers of periodicals selling in the Canadian market. [4]

[*906] ENVIRONMENTAL, SCIENCE, AND HEALTH AFFAIRS

Amendment of U.S.-Canada 1985 Pacific Salmon Treaty

The United States and Canada have attempted for decades to reach a sensible arrangement for the harvesting of salmon that migrate from one State's waters to the other's in the North Pacific Ocean. In 1985, after fifteen years of negotiations, the two States concluded a Pacific Salmon Treaty [1] designed to establish a framework for long-term bilateral cooperation in salmon management, research, and "enhancement," meaning efforts to increase salmon stocks. Unfortunately, the regime established under the 1985 treaty, based on a fixed quota system, proved inadequate for resolving disputes between the two States and began to break down in 1992. [2]

Consequently, the two States sought to amend the 1985 treaty through further negotiations, which successfully concluded on June 30, 1999. [3] According to the U.S. State Department, the key features of the amendments are:

REV_00259558

The agreement establishes abundance-based regimes for the major salmon intercepting fisheries in the US and Canada. These regimes, which allow catches in fisheries to vary from year-to-year, are designed to implement the conservation and harvest sharing principles of the Pacific Salmon Treaty. Larger catches will be allowed when abundance is higher, and importantly, catches will be significantly constrained in years when abundance is down. This type of regime will be more responsive to the conservation requirements of salmon than the fixed ceilings that existed under the original Treaty arrangements.

Two bilaterally-managed regional funds would be established. The funds would be used to improve fisheries management and aid the country's efforts to recover weakened salmon stocks. Subject to the availability of appropriated funds, the US will contribute $ 75 million and $ 65 million dollars [sic] ($ US) to a northern and a southern fund, respectively, over a four-year period.

The agreement includes provisions to enhance bilateral cooperation, improve the scientific basis for salmon management, and apply institutional changes to the Pacific Salmon Commission. [4]

Most of the elements of the amendments are contained in new chapters to Annex IV of the 1985 treaty, which address management of salmon in several transboundary rivers (chapter 1), management of sockeye and pink salmon fisheries in southeastern Alaska and northern British Columbia (chapter 2), management of chinook salmon in marine and certain freshwater fisheries in Alaska, Canada, and the States of Washington and Oregon (chapter 3), management of sockeye and pink salmon in the Fraser River (chapter 4), and management [*907] of coho salmon and chum salmon in southern British Columbia and the State of Washington (chapters 5 and 6). All of these chapters will remain in force for at least ten years.

Retention of the Smallpox Virus

In 1980, after years of an intense, global vaccination program, the World Health Organization (WHO) declared that smallpox -- a virus with a thirty percent mortality rate believed to have killed 500 million people in this century alone -- had been eradicated as a disease. [1] Beginning in 1990, the WHO's Ad Hoc Committee on Orthopoxvirus Infections recommended destroying the remaining known stocks of smallpox virus, held in laboratories in Russia and the United States. That recommendation was endorsed by the WHO's governing body, the World Health Assembly (WHA), in 1996, subject to further confirmation by the WHA in 1999. [2] The three-year delay was intended to provide an opportunity to achieve a broad consensus in favor of destruction and permitted time for the WHO to conduct an inquiry into the attitudes of states. As of 1998, 74 of the 191 WHO members responded to the WHO's inquiry that they favored destruction of the virus, while four (including the United States) said they were undecided, and one (Russia) said it was opposed. In January, 1999, the WHO's Ad Hoc Committee again recommended destruction by June 30, 1999. [3]

On March 15, 1999, the U.S. Institute Of Medicine (IOM) issued a report stating that important scientific and medical opportunities would be lost if the smallpox virus were destroyed. In particular, the IOM report noted the value of having the live virus so as to develop antiviral agents to protect persons against a future outbreak of smallpox, which might occur as part of a terrorist attack against the United States using biological weapons. [4]

On April 22, 1999, President Clinton decided that the United States would not destroy its smallpox virus stock. [5] The President reportedly based his decision on the March 1999 IOM report and on intelligence reports that some states may secretly hold stocks of the smallpox virus for military use. [6]

REV_00259559

Although the WHA can adopt regulations concerning prevention of the international spread of disease, such regulations do not enter into force with respect to any member state that notifies the WHO of its rejection. [7] Consequently, the WHA operates largely by consensus. In the face of Russian and U.S. resistence to complete destruction of known smallpox virus stocks, on May 24, 1999, the WHA adopted by consensus a resolution authorizing "temporary retention" by Russia and the United States of the known smallpox stocks "up to not later than 2002 and subject to annual review" by the WHA "for the purpose of further international research into antiviral agents and improved vaccines, and to permit high-priority investigations of the genetic structure and pathogenesis of smallpox." [8]

[*908] PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES

Surrender of Libyan Nationals for Lockerbie Bombing Trial in the Netherlands

On April 5, 1999, Libya surrendered two Libyan nationals accused of committing the 1988 bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland for trial by a Scottish court in the Netherlands. [1] Libya surrendered the two nationals after receiving private clarifications from the UN Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, [2] concerning a U.S.-UK proposal for the trial. [3] President Clinton expressed his gratitude for the surrender, noting that the "road to justice has begun." [4] As anticipated by Security Council Resolution 1192, [5] the Secretary-General reported to the Security Council that the surrender had occurred, and the economic sanctions previously imposed on Libya in 1992 immediately were suspended. [6]

The two men were handed over in Tripoli to the UN Legal Counsel, Hans Corell, and then flown on an Italian air force plane to the Netherlands, where the Dutch took them into custody. After the two suspects informed Dutch authorities that they consented to their immediate extradition to UK custody, Dutch authorities took them to a Dutch military base outside Utrecht and handed them over to Scottish authorities. Pursuant to an agreement between the United Kingdom and the Netherlands, Scottish authorities had established a Scottish detention center at the base, where the two men will be tried before a Scottish court. On April 6, the two men were formally charged by Scottish police with conspiracy, murder, and contravention of the UK Aviation Security Act of 1982. [7]

A request by defense lawyers for additional time to prepare their case has delayed commencement of the trial until February 2000. In the meantime, in a meeting with the Secretary-General, U.S. and Libyan Government representatives discussed the United States' position on a final lifting of UN economic sanctions. The United States informed Libya that it would not support a final lifting of sanctions until Libya satisfied the requirements of the relevant Security Council resolutions, namely that it stop support for international terrorism, cooperate fully in the trial, acknowledge its responsibility for the acts of its officials, and pay compensation to the families of the victims of Pan Am Flight 103. [8]

ARMS CONTROL

North Korean Nuclear Proliferation

Throughout the 1990s, the United States has sought to reduce the threat of nuclear and missile proliferation, as well as the prospect of war, on the Korean Peninsula. On October 21, 1994, representatives of the United States and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK or North Korea), signed an unusual Agreed Framework, in which the DPRK, [*909] among other things, agreed to freeze its existing nuclear reactor and related facilities program and to refrain from further development of a nuclear program; in exchange, the United States would provide a light-water reactor power plant. [1] To that end, in March 1995, the United States, the Democratic Republic of Korea (ROK or South Korea), and Japan founded the Korean Peninsula Energy Development Organization (KEDO), based in New York, as an international consortium to finance and supply to the DPRK two proliferation-resistant light water reactors, as well as shipments of heavy fuel oil as an interim energy source.

REV_00259560

As of 1997, KEDO had grown to include eleven member states, had received monetary contributions from twenty-one nations, and included the European Union as the fourth member of the executive board, alongside the three founding members. [2] By 1998, KEDO had negotiated a supply agreement with the ROK for the light water reactor and a number of other side protocols and agreements. The ROK pledged to pay for seventy percent of the $ 4.6 billion light water reactor project, Japan pledged $ 1 billion to the project, and the United States undertook to provide 500,000 metric tons per year of heavy fuel oil. [3]

Due to various delays, including those related to obtaining sufficient financing, construction of the reactors moved slowly and generated concern in the U.S. Congress regarding the commitment of sufficient resources by other states. [4] Furthermore, in 1998 the United States began to suspect that the DPRK was not abiding by its obligation to refrain from developing a nuclear program, and to consider with particular concern the construction at an underground site at Kumchang-ni. In May 1999, after months of bilateral negotiations, a team of U.S. inspectors toured the site at Kumchang-ni only to find a reportedly empty tunnel. [5]

At a hearing of the House International Relations Committee on March 24, 1999, Chairman Benjamin A. Gilman outlined steps for a new U.S. policy for North Korea. He asserted that the United States needed: (1) to more aptly be able to verify North Korea's compliance with the Agreed Framework; (2) to address the North Korean missile program; (3) to monitor food aid to North Korea -- possibly by means of unscheduled, unsupervised visits by U.S. Korean-speaking monitors -- in order to prevent diversion to the military and to the ruling party cadre; (4) to pay greater attention to North Korea's involvement in international narcotics trafficking and other criminal activity; (5) to pursue full implementation of the 1991 Joint Declaration on the Denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula; and (6) to develop a theater missile defense that will serve to insulate the United States and its allies from nuclear and missile "blackmail" by North Korea. [6] Representative Gilman threatened to introduce legislation that would restrict the ability of the President to lift sanctions against North Korea, or provide aid to it, unless such concessions were made.

In an effort to place the process back on track, President Clinton named Dr. William Perry, a former U.S. Secretary of Defense, as the Administration's North Korea Policy [*910] Coordinator. [7] In May 1999, Dr. Perry headed the highest-ranking U.S. delegation to visit North Korea since the 1950-53 Korean war, with a proposal for lifting U.S. economic sanctions on North Korea, as well as expanding economic and diplomatic ties, in exchange for North Korean commitments to abide by the Framework Agreement and to stop testing missiles and selling missile technology. While the DPRK pledged its commitment to the Agreed Framework, it did not otherwise immediately respond to the U.S. initiative. [8]

Status of the U.S.-USSR Anti-Ballistic Missile System Treaty

One of the most important nuclear arms control agreements concluded during the Cold War was the 1972 anti-ballistic missile treaty (ABM Treaty). [1] The parties to the ABM Treaty envisioned a blanket prohibition on the development of anti-ballistic missile systems, except for very limited land-based systems, on a theory that neither the United States nor the Soviet Union would initiate a nuclear attack if it were unable to defend itself against the retaliation that almost certainly would ensue. A 1985 Reagan Administration interpretation of the Treaty as permitting the development and testing of a space-based system, known as the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), sparked controversy both within the United States and with the Soviet Union. [2] While funding of SDI went forward, the United States could not sufficiently perfect its technology in order to deploy such a system.

On September 26, 1997, the U.S. Department of State issued the following statement addressing the effect of the Soviet Union's dissolution upon the ABM Treaty and certain memoranda [3] negotiated with the newly formed states of the former Soviet Union.

> The Treaty between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems of May 26, 1972, commonly known as the ABM Treaty, was a bilateral agreement between the two states. When the USSR dissolved at the end of 1991, and its constituent republics became independent States, the only operationally-deployed ABM system was at Moscow, while a number of its early warning radars and an ABM test range were located outside of the Russian Federation. Although the ABM Treaty continues in force, it nevertheless has become necessary to reach agreement as to which New Independent States (NIS) would collectively assume the rights and obligations of the USSR under the Treaty.
>
> The Memorandum of Understanding on Succession (MOUS) establishes that the Parties to the ABM Treaty shall be the United States, Belarus, Kazakhstan, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine. For the purposes of the MOUS and the ABM Treaty, the latter four states are considered to be the USSR Successor States. Pursuant to the MOUS provisions, the USSR Successor States collectively assume the rights and obligations of the USSR. This means that only a single ABM deployment area is permitted among the four Successor States; in addition, only 15 ABM launchers at ABM test ranges are collectively permitted. Russia will be able to continue to operate any existing early [*911] warning radars, as well as the ABM test range, located within other states with the permission of those governments.
>
> States that become bound by the MOUS also are bound to observe the provisions of both the First and Second Agreed Statements, which deal with lower-velocity and higher-velocity theater ballistic missile defense systems, respectively. These agreements will now be subject to ratification or approval by the signatory states in accordance with the appropriate constitutional procedures of each state, and will enter into force on the date when the governments of all five signatory states have deposited instruments of ratification or approval of the Memorandum of Understanding on Succession. The MOUS will remain in force as long as the ABM Treaty remains in force. The ABM Treaty is of unlimited duration. [4]

In the aftermath of the Cold War, concerns about the ballistic missile threat of Russia and other former Soviet states have diminished. However, due to concern about the ballistic missile capabilities of "rogue" states, such as North Korea and Iran, U.S. Secretary of Defense William S. Cohen announced on January 20, 1999, a six-year, $ 6.6 billion plan for the development of a land-based National Missile Defense (NMD) system, which he stated would be deployed if technologically feasible. Since deployment of such a system might be construed as a violation of the ABM Treaty, Secretary Cohen noted:

> While our NMD program is being conducted consistent with the terms of the ABM Treaty to date, our deployment might require modifications to the treaty and the Administration is working to determine the nature and scope of these modifications.
>
> We will seek to amend the treaty if necessary, and we will work in good faith to do so. We have amended the treaty before and see no reason why it cannot be amended again.

REV_00259562

> The ABM Treaty also provides, of course, for right of withdrawal with six months notice if a party concludes it's in its supreme national interests.
>
> The limited NMD capability we're developing is focused primarily on countering rogue nation threats and will not be capable of countering Russia's nuclear deterrent. We've already begun environmental site surveys for potential basing sites in both Alaska and North Dakota, and we have briefed Russian officials on these activities and on our NMD program in general, and on today's announcement. [5]

After Secretary Cohen's announcement, the United States proposed to Russia that the ABM Treaty be amended; Russia initially refused and threatened not to ratify the START II (strategic arms limitation treaty) if Washington went forward with its NMD. [6] Conservatives within the United States began urging the Administration to abandon the ABM Treaty as inhibiting the United States' ability to protect itself against growing missile threats.

On May 25, 1999, David B. Rivkin, Jr. and Lee A. Casey, summarized for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee an analysis of this issue undertaken by their law firm, Hunton & Williams, at the request of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research organization based in Washington, D.C. They argued that the ABM Treaty was a bilateral agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union whose key terms could be performed only by those two states. When the Soviet Union disappeared, so did the ability to execute the Treaty in accordance with its original terms, and thus the Treaty expired. Further, in [*912] considering whether any of the new states of the former Soviet Union could be viewed as parties to the Treaty, Messrs. Rivkin and Carey argued that, either under a continuity rule or under a "clean slate" analysis, the ABM Treaty did not survive the Soviet Union. Finally, they argued that the President must obtain the advice and consent of the Senate before reviving the ABM Treaty and adding new parties. [7]

In May 1999, Congress voted overwhelmingly in favor of proceeding with an anti-missile defense system, which was then signed into law by President Clinton on July 22. The National Missile Defense Act of 1999 provides:

> It is the policy of the United States to deploy as soon as is technologically possible an effective National Missile Defense system capable of defending the territory of the United States against limited ballistic missile attack (whether accidental, unauthorized, or deliberate) with funding subject to the annual authorization of appropriations and the annual appropriation of funds for National Missile Defense. [8]

After meetings between U.S. and Russian officials in Cologne, Germany, in June 1999, the two governments issued a joint statement providing, in part:

> Proceeding from the fundamental significance of the ABM Treaty for further reductions in strategic offensive arms, and from the need to maintain the strategic balance between the United States of America and the Russian Federation, the Parties reaffirm their commitment to that Treaty, which is a cornerstone of strategic stability, and to continuing efforts to strengthen the Treaty, to enhance its viability and effectiveness in the future. [9]

REV_00259563

Further, the two governments affirmed their existing obligations under the ABM Treaty to consider "possible changes in the strategic situation that have a bearing on the ABM Treaty and, as appropriate, possible proposals for further increasing the viability of this Treaty." The two governments also called for early entry into force of the 1997 memoranda of understanding and the implementation of measures previously agreed upon for the exchange of data on missile launches and on early warning. [10]

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See Sean D. Murphy, Contemporary Practice, 93 AJIL 167 & 627 (1999).

n2 Steven Erlanger, Milosevic Yields on NATO's Key Terms; 50,000 Allied Troops to Police Kosovo, N.Y. TIMES, June 4, 1999, at A1.

n3 William Drozdiak & Anne Swardson, Diplomatic, Military Offenses Forced Belgrade's Hand, WASH. POST, June 4, 1999, at A1; William Drozdiak, The Kosovo Peace Deal: How It Happened, WASH. POST, June 6, 1999, at A1.

n4 Letter Dated 7 June 1999 from the Permanent Representative of Germany to the United Nations Addressed to the President of the Security Council, UN Doc. S/1999/649, annex (1999). For the FRY's acceptance as communicated to the United Nations, see Letter Dated 7 June 1999 from the Charge D'Affaires A.I. of the Permanent Mission of Yugoslavia to the United Nations Addressed to the Security Council, UN Doc. S/1999/655 (1999).

n5 R. W. Apple Jr., Moscow and West Agree on Kosovo; Plan Given to U.N., N.Y. TIMES, June 9, 1999, at A1.

n6 Military Technical Agreement between the International Security Force (KFOR) and the Governments of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Republic of Serbia (June 9, 1999), reprinted in Letter Dated 15 June 1999 from the Secretary-General Addressed to the President of the Security Council, UN Doc. S/1999/682, annex (1999), available in <http://www.nato.int/kosovo/docu/a990609a.htm>; see Steven Lee Myers, Serb Military Accepts Accord, Clearing Way to Halt Bombing, N.Y. TIMES, June 10, 1999, at A1.

n7 SC Res. 1244 (June 10, 1999). For the Security Council's debate, see UN SCOR, 54th Sess., 4011th mtg., UN Doc. S/PV.4011 (1999).

n8 For NATO's communication to the United Nations that the air campaign was suspended, see Letter Dated 10 June 1999 from the Secretary-General Addressed to the President of the Security Council, UN Doc. S/1999/663, annex (1999); see also Letter Dated 21 June 1999 from the Secretary-General Addressed to the President of the Security Council, UN Doc. S/1999/702, annex (1999) (transmitting NATO's communication to the Secretary-General that the air campaign was terminated); Craig R. Whitney, Bombing Ends as Serbs Begin Pullout, N.Y. TIMES, June 11, 1999, at A1.

n9 The Secretary-General's plan for the UN Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) was approved by the Security Council. Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 10 of Security Council Resolution 1244 (1999), UN Doc. S/1999/672 (1999); Letter Dated 17 June 1999 from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General, UN Doc. S/1999/689 (1999). The Secretary-General then issued a report setting forth the framework for the operation of UNMIK. Report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo, UN Doc. S/1999/779 (1999). For the FRY's reaction to that report, see Letter Dated 19 July 1999 from the Charge d'Affaires A.I. of the Permanent Mission of Yugoslavia to the United Nations Addressed to the Secretary-General, UN Doc. S/1999/800 (1999).

n10 For the initial report of NATO to the United Nations on the KFOR deployment, see Letter Dated 17 June 1999 from the Secretary-General Addressed to the President of the Security

REV_00259564

South-Eastern Europe with broad international participation in order to further promotion of democracy, economic prosperity, stability and regional cooperation.

10. Suspension of military activity will require acceptance of the principles set forth above in addition to agreement to other, previously identified, required elements . . . . A military-technical agreement will then be rapidly concluded that would, among other things, specify additional modalities, including the roles and functions of Yugoslav/Serb personnel in Kosovo . . . . [4]

Within days of President Milosevic's acceptance of this peace proposal, G-7 leaders and Russia meeting in Cologne reached agreement on the draft of a UN Security Council resolution to authorize deployment of peacekeeping forces to Kosovo, [5] as well as on funding for the "stability pact" for aid to rebuild Kosovo. FRY military authorities and NATO authorities, meeting just across the border from Kosovo in Macedonia, then concluded the military-technical agreement covering, among other things, the timetable and movement for the withdrawal of FRY forces from Kosovo. [6] On June 10, the Security Council adopted [*881] Resolution 1244 by a vote of 14-0 (with China abstaining), [7] FRY military and police forces began withdrawing from Kosovo, and NATO suspended its bombing campaign. [8]

Resolution 1244 authorized the Secretary-General to establish an "interim administration" for Kosovo, guaranteeing "substantial autonomy" and providing for free elections. [9] The resolution also authorized the deployment of a NATO-led international peacekeeping force for an initial period of 12 months, although the force -- known as KFOR (Kosovo Force) -- can continue to operate thereafter "unless the Security Council decides otherwise." Charged by the Resolution with "deterring renewed hostilities," "demilitarizing the Kosovo Liberation Army," and establishing a "secure environment" for the return of refugees, KFOR troops entered Kosovo on June 12, and established themselves in five sectors run by French, German, Italian, U.K. and U.S. forces, [10] all under the command of U.K. Lieutenant General Michael Jackson.

Prior to the entry of NATO forces, a small contingent of Russian peacekeeping troops, which already was deployed in Bosnia, crossed into Serbia and traveled to Kosovo's captial, Pristina, where they took up position at Pristina's airport. This unexpected move unnerved Western leaders and led to extensive negotiations between U.S. and Russian diplomats concerning Russia's role in Kosovo. [11] Ultimately, on June 18, the two countries signed a military agreement that integrated Russian forces into KFOR, dividing most of the expected 3,600 Russian troops among three of the sectors. While it was agreed that the Russian troops would be under the political control of Russia and under the tactical command of KFOR, disputes nevertheless arose, both over the Russian troops' exact relationship to NATO and over the appropriate posts at which to station them. [12]

UN administrators and NATO peacekeepers also had to provide for the thousands of Kosovar Albanian refugees eager to return home. As of July 8, more than 650,000 refugees [*882] had returned to Kosovo. [13] Their return coincided with the departure of an estimated 50,000 Serbs from Kosovo to elsewhere in Serbia, fearful for their safety now that FRY forces had departed. [14] Low-level violence broke out by Kosvar Albanians against Serbs and gypsies, [15] and between Serbs and NATO peacekeepers. Concern over KLA hostilities toward the Serbs prompted NATO peacekeepers to move quickly to disarm the KLA. At the same time, NATO pledged in a formal agreement in June on "demilitarization and transformation" of the KLA to consider the formation from the KLA of an "Army in Kosovo on the lines of the US National Guard in due course as part of a political process designed to determine Kosovo's future status, taking into account the Rambouillet Accord." [16] In September, agreement was reached on the formation of such a force. [17]

REV_00259538

Council, UN Doc. S/1999/692 (1999); see also Letter Dated 8 July 1999 from the Secretary-General Addressed to the President of the Security Council, UN Doc. S/1999/767 (1999) (Secretary-General's initial report on KFOR operations); John Kifner & Steven Lee Myers, Russians Enter Kosovo Early But Moscow Calls It a Mistake; British Lead NATO's Vanguard: A Short Pause, Then the Allies Start Moving In, N.Y. TIMES, June 12, 1999, at A1.

n11 Western intelligence analysts later concluded that the Russian deployment was part of a scheme to stake out a Russian zone in the northwest sector of Kosovo. The United States thwarted the Russian scheme by prevailing on Bulgaria, Hungary, and Romania to deny Russian requests to use the airspace of those states to fly more Russians into Kosovo. Robert G. Kaiser & David Hoffman, Russia Had Bigger Plan in Kosovo, WASH. POST, June 25, 1999, at A1.

n12 Agreed Points on Russian Participation in KFOR (June 18, 1999), available in <http://www.nato.int/kosovo/docu/a990618a.htm>; see Celestine Bohlen, Accord is Reached on Integrating Russian Troops in Kosovo Force, N.Y. TIMES, June 19, 1999, at A1; Craig R. Whitney, NATO and Moscow Still Differ Over Where Russian Forces Will Be Stationed, N.Y. TIMES, July 1, 1999, at A10; Eric Schmitt, NATO Bars Russia From Reinforcing Troops in Kosovo, N.Y. TIMES, July 3, 1999, at A1; Carlotta Gall, Russians Fly Into Kosovo After Impasse Is Resolved, N.Y. TIMES, July 7, 1999, at A8. For the "G-8" statement on Kosovo of June 20, see Note Verbale Dated 24 June 1999 from the Permanent Mission of Germany to the United Nations Addressed to the Secretary-General, UN Doc. S/1999/711, annex (1999).

n13 Report of the Secretary-General, UN Doc. S/1999/779, supra note 9, at para. 9.

n14 See, e.g., John Ward Anderson & Molly Moore, Kosovo's Albanians Returning in Droves, WASH. POST, June 18, 1999, at A1.

n15 See, e.g., Letter Dated 24 July 1999 from the Charge d'Affaires A.I. of the Permanent Mission of Yugoslavia to the United Nations Addressed to the Secretary-General, UN Doc. S/1999/818 (1999); Chris Hedges, Slaying of Serbs Sets Back Efforts for Kosovo Peace, N.Y. TIMES, July 25, 1999, at 1; John Kifner, Kosovo Rebels Move Into Towns; Violence is Reported, N.Y. TIMES, June 19, 1999, at A1.

n16 Undertaking of Demilitarization and Transformation by the UCK, para. 25 (June 20, 1999), available in <http://www.nato.int/kosovo/docu/a990620a.htm>; see Steven Lee Myers, NATO To Consider Letting Kosovars Set Up New Army, N.Y. TIMES, June 22, 1999, at A1; Molly Moore, NATO Hastens Disarming of KLA as Serb Fears Rise, WASH. POST, June 20, 1999, at A19. For the FRY's attitude regarding UN and NATO implementation of Security Council Resolution 1244, see Letter Dated 28 July 1999 from the Charge d'Affaires A.I. of the Permanent Mission of Yugoslavia to the United Nations Addressed to the Secretary-General, UN Doc. S/1999/828 (1999).

n17 See R. Jeffrey Smith, NATO, Kosovo Rebel Group Agree on Civil Corps, WASH. POST, Sept. 21, 1999, at A1.

n18 Steven Lee Myers, Last Serbian Troops Pull Out of Kosovo, N.Y. TIMES, June 21, 1999, at A1.

n19 John Kifner with Ian Fisher, Kosovo Landscape Lays Bare Serbs' Brutal Campaign, N.Y. TIMES, June 16, 1999, at A1.

n20 See, e.g., John Kifner, Bodies Torn From a Grave Leave a Trail of Evidence, N.Y. TIMES, June 29, 1999, at A8; John Kifner, F.B.I. Team Looks for Evidence of Massacres, N.Y. TIMES, June 25, 1999, at A13.

n21 John Kifner, Inquiry Estimates Serb Drive Killed 10,000 in Kosovo, N.Y. TIMES, July 18, n22 Excerpts From the President's Remarks on Kosovo and National Issues, N.Y. TIMES, June 26, 1999, at A11; see also Address to the Nation on the Military Technical Agreement on Kosovo, 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1074 (June 14, 1999).

REV_00259565

1999, at 1.

n1 In addition, in 1952, Germany concluded an agreement at Luxembourg whereby it agreed to pay 3.5 billion Deutschmarks to Israel and 500 million Deutschmarks to the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, a federation of 52 Jewish organizations in Western countries formed in 1951 to act as the overall representative of Jews living outside of Israel and having reparation claims against Germany. For a brief description of the compensation programs established through the Conference, see Wolf v. Federal Republic of Germany, 95 F.3d 536, 539-40 (7th Cir. 1996). For an overall discussion of post-war efforts to obtain compensation for Holocaust claims, see CHRISTIAN PROSS, PAYING FOR THE PAST: THE STRUGGLE OVER REPARATIONS FOR SURVIVING VICTIMS OF THE NAZI TERROR (Belinda Cooper trans., 1998).

The U.S. Government's release of two reports coordinated by Under Secretary of State Stuart E. Eizenstat have aided recent efforts to recover assets lost during the Holocaust. U.S. Dep't of State, Preliminary Study on U.S. and Allied Efforts to Recover and Restore Gold and Other Assets Stolen or Hidden by Germany During World War II (May 1997); U.S. Dep't of State, U.S. and Allied Wartime and Postwar Relations and Negotiations with Argentina, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and Turkey on Looted Gold and German External Assets and U.S. Concerns About the Fate of Wartime Ustasha Treasury (June 1998). The reports, and other information on State Department activities relating to Holocaust claims, may be found at <http://www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/holocausthp.html>.

n2 For instance, claims for forced or slave labor were ultimately rejected by German courts on the grounds that the 1952 London Debt Conference (at which the amount and method of payment of the total debt of the former Third Reich to the allied powers was negotiated) had decided that such claims should be deferred until "final settlement of the problem of reparation," which never occurred due to the partition of Germany. See Agreement on German External Debts, Feb. 27, 1953, Art. 5(2), 4 UST 443, 333 UNTS 3; see also BENJAMIN B. FERENCZ, LESS THAN SLAVES: JEWISH FORCED LABOR AND THE QUEST FOR COMPENSATION (1979).

Efforts during the era of the Cold War to bring suits in U.S. courts to advance wide-ranging Holocaust claims were unsuccessful. See, e.g., Kelberine v. Societe Internationale, Etc., 363 F.2d 989 (D.C. Cir. 1966) (unsuccessful effort to enjoin the U.S. Government from paying $ 120 million to a Swiss corporation which allegedly conspired with a German corporation in Nazi actions against some 200,000 persons between 1933 and 1945); Handel v. Artukovic, 601 F. Supp. 1421 (C.D. Cal. 1985) (class action against defendant for alleged involvement in deprivations of life and property suffered by Jews in Yugoslavia during Second World War dismissed on various grounds, including the age of the claim).

n3 Princz v. Federal Republic of Germany, 813 F.Supp. 22, 29 (D.D.C. 1992); see also Princz v. Federal Republic of Germany, Civ. A. No. 92-0644, 1993 WL 121501 (D.D.C. Apr. 7, 1993) (denying German Government's motion for a stay pending appeal).

n4 Princz v. Federal Republic of Germany, 26 F.3d 1166, 1168 (D.C. Cir. 1994). Thereafter, the U.S. District Court dismissed the German Government from the lawsuit. Princz v. Federal Republic of Germany, 871 F.Supp. 18 (D.D.C. 1994).

n5 141 CONG. REC. E681-02, available in 1995 WL 128869.

n6 35 ILM 193 (1996).

REV_00259566

n7 For a discussion of the related case of Miller v. Albright, see Sean D. Murphy, Contemporary Practice, 93 AJIL 663 (1999).

n8 22 U.S.C.A. § 1644 note (West Supp. 1999).

n9 Exchange of Letters between Hans-Friedrich von Ploetz, German Foreign Office State Secretary, and John C. Kornblum, U.S. Ambassador to Germany (Jan. 25, 1999) (on file at GWU). The agreement reportedly covers some 230-40 further U.S. nationals. Philip Shenon, Germany to Pay Compensation To U.S. Survivors of Nazi Camps, N.Y. TIMES, Jan. 16, 1999, at A6; Germany to Pay Reparations for Americans, WASH. POST, Jan. 16, 1999, at A18. The United States and Germany, however, agreed that the numbers of claimants and the bases for determining the amount would remain confidential.

n10 See, e.g., Iwanova v. Ford Motor Co., 57 F.Supp. 2d 41 (D.N.J. 1999); Burger-Fisher v. Siemens AG, 1999 WL 717260 (D.N.J. 1999); Fishel v. BASF Group, 175 F.R.D. 525 (S.D. Iowa 1997); Edmund L. Andrews, 53 Years Later, Lawsuit Is Filed on Behalf of Hitler's Slave Labor, N.Y. TIMES, Sept. 1, 1998, at A9.

n11 See Joint Statement on the Establishment of a "Foundation Initiative of German Enterprises: Remembrance, Responsibility and Future" (Feb. 16, 1999), available in <http://www.germany-info.org/govern/ state_02_16_99.htm>; Roger Cohen, German Companies Adopt Fund For Slave Laborers Under Nazis, N.Y. TIMES, Feb. 17, 1999, at A1; William Drozdiak, German Banks Make Redress, WASH. POST, Feb. 17, 1999, at A11.

n12 Stuart E. Eizenstat, Under Secretary of State, U.S. Dep't of State Press Release on Third Plenary Meeting of the Steering Group to Prepare the Foundation Initiative of German Enterprises (July 15, 1999), available in <http://secretary.state.gov/www/briefings/statements/1999/ps990715e.html>.

n13 In California, the state court has held that it has the authority to hear the case, which was brought by a family of five Holocaust survivors. Stern v. Assicurazioni Generali, No. BC 185376, 1999 WL 167546 (Cal. Super. Jan. 25, 1999); see Henry Weinstein, Holocaust Survivors' Claims Get Boost, L.A. TIMES, Jan. 26, 1999, at A3, available in 1999 WL 2124106. The family alleges that Generali wrongfully withheld life insurance benefits from the family of Moshe Stern, who was killed at Auschwitz. See Alan Abrahamson, Heirs of Holocaust Victims Sue Insurer, L.A. TIMES, Feb. 5, 1998, at B3, available in 1998 WL 2395560. See generally <http://www.insurance.ca.gov/holocaust/department/legalactions.htm>. For class action litigation in New York, see Leslie Scism, State Insurance Regulators Join Holocaust-Survivor Claims Probe, WALL ST. J., Dec. 12, 1997, at B2.

n14 Abrahamson, supra note 13.

n15 John M. Goshko, Italian Insurer Reaches Pact on Holocaust Claims; Tentative Settlement Includes $ 100 Million Payment, WASH. POST, Aug. 20, 1998, at A3.

n16 Stuart E. Eizenstat, Under Secretary of State, U.S. Dep't of State Press Release on Announcement of Agreement Between Generali, Holocaust Survivor Organizations and U.S. Insurance Commissioners (Aug. 19, 1998), available in <http://secretary.state.gov/www/briefings/statements/1998/ps980819b.html>.

n17 For information on the Commission and the text of the Memorandum of Understanding, see <http://www.icheic.org>; see also Stuart E. Eizenstat, Under Secretary of State, Statement to the U.S. Executive Monitoring Committee at 5-6 (Apr. 15, 1999) (on file at GWU).

n18 Italy's Generali Says Settlement of Claims On Holocaust Fails, WALL ST. J., Sept. 21,

REV_00259567

1998, at A14, available in 1998 WL-WSJ 18984933.

n19 International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims Press Release on Statement of Lawrence S. Eagleburger Following the Meeting of the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (May 6, 1999), available in <http://www.icheic.org/press_releases/May1999.html>; see Alan Cowell, Insurers Agree to Pay on Victims' Pre-Holocaust Policies, N.Y. TIMES, May 7, 1999, at A3.

n20 The banks initially were Credit Suisse, Swiss Bank Corporation, and the Union Bank of Switzerland, but the latter two merged during the course of the lawsuit to form UBS AG.

n21 In re Holocaust Victims Assets Litigation, No. CV 96-4849, CV 96-5161, CV 97-0461 (E.D.N.Y. filed Oct. 3, 1996). The additional, related cases were filed in California state courts, but were then stayed pending resolution of the New York cases.

n22 The actions were consolidated under In re Holocaust Victims Assets Litigation, No. CV 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y.).

n23 John M. Goshko, Sanctions on Swiss Banks to Proceed, WASH. POST, July 2, 1998, at A3.

n24 Devon Spurgeon, New York Threatens Swiss Bank Sanctions; State Department Criticizes Move, WASH. POST, July 3, 1998, at A3.

n25 James P. Rubin, Assistant Secretary of State and Spokesman, U.S. Dep't of State Daily Press Briefing, at 8 (July 6, 1998), available in <http://secretary.state.gov/www/briefings/9807/980706db.html>.

n26 John M. Goshko, Swiss Banks Agree to Holocaust Pact; $ 1.25 Billion Settlement for Victims, Heirs, WASH. POST, Aug. 13, 1998, at A1. For the text of the settlement, see <http://www.giussani.com/holocaust-assets/documents/settlement.html>.

n27 Plaintiffs' Memorandum of Points and Authorities in Support of Motion for Preliminary Approval of Proposed Class Action Settlement and Provisional Certification of Settlement Classes at 46-48, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, No. CV 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 22, 1999) (footnote omitted).

n28 Order Preliminarily Approving Material Terms of the Proposed Class Settlement Agreement and Provisionally Certifying the Proposed Settlement Classes, In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, No. CV 96-4849 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 30, 1999). At the same time, the District Court issued an order referring the settlement to a special master for development of a plan to allocate and distribute the settlement proceeds.

n29 Swiss Bank Won't Pay Holocaust Victim Fund, WASH. POST, Aug. 22, 1998, at A12. The Swiss National Bank, however, has made a $ 75 million contribution to a charitable fund for Holocaust survivors. David E. Sanger, Gold Dispute With the Swiss Declared to Be At an End, N.Y. TIMES, Jan. 31, 1999, at 9.

n30 Hans Michael Riemer et al., The Claims Resolution Tribunal For Dormant Accounts In Switzerland: An Overview, 14 MEALEY'S INT'L ARB. REP., Feb. 1999, at 19, 20.

n31 Statement on the Settlement of Holocaust Assets Lawsuits, 34 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1624 (Aug. 17, 1998); Stuart E. Eizenstat, Under Secretary of State, U.S. Dep't of State Press Release on Settlement of Class Action Suits (Aug. 12, 1998), available in <http://secretary.state.gov/www/briefings/statements/1998/ps980812c.html>.

n32 Sanger, supra note 29.

REV_00259568

n33 John M. Goshko, $ 40 Million Holocaust Settlement From Bank, WASH. POST, May 20, 1999, at A2.

n34 Stuart E. Eizenstat, Justice After The Holocaust, WASH. POST, Aug. 30, 1998, at C7.

n35 Thomas W. Lippman, 44 Nations Pledge to Act On Art Looted by Nazis, WASH. POST, Dec. 4, 1998, at A2.

n36 Stuart E. Eizenstat, Under Secretary of State, Concluding Statement at Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets (Dec. 3, 1998), available in <http://www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1998/981203_eizenstat_heac_conc.html>.

n37 Washington Conference Principles on Nazi-Confiscated Art (Dec. 3, 1998), available in <http://www.state.gov/www/regions/eur/981203_heac_art_princ.html>.

n38 Eizenstat, supra note 36.

n1 Jacques Semmelman, International Decisions, 86 AJIL 811 (1992); Abraham Abramovsky, Extraterritorial Abductions: America's "Catch and Snatch" Policy Run Amok, 31 VA. J. INT'L L. 151, 167-70 (1991).

n2 Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436, 444 (1886); Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519, 522 (1952).

n3 See, e.g., United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341, 1343 (9th Cir. 1991), vacated, 505 U.S. 1201 (1992).

n4 Extradition Treaty, May 4, 1978, U.S.-Mex., 31 UST 5059, TIAS No. 9656.

n5 United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 504 U.S. 655, 668-69 (1992).

n6 Id. at 669.

n7 28 U.S.C. §§ 1346(b), 2401(b), 2671-2680 (1994). The Court also rejected certain constitutional claims against named U.S. Government employees involved in arranging for the abduction.

n8 Alvarez-Machain v. United States, No. CV 93-4072, mem. op. at 18 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 18, 1999). Similarly, the Court found that Texas law does not contain a cause of action for negligent infliction of emotional distress.

n9 Id. at 36-37.

n10 The ATCA states that "district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States." 28 U.S.C. § 1350 (1994).

n11 For a discussion of prominent cases since 1980, see Donald J. Kochan, Note, Constitutional Structure as a Limitation on the Scope of the "Law of Nations" in the Alien Tort Claims Act, 31 CORNELL INT'L L.J. 153, 162-68 (1998).

n12 Suits against governments present difficulties under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1330, 1441(d), 1602-11 (1994). See generally Justin Lu, Note, Jurisdiction over Non-State Activity under the Alien Tort Claims Act, 35 COLUM. J. TRANSNAT'L L. 531 (1997).

n13 Sung Teak Kim, Note, Adjudicating Violations of International Law: Defining the Scope of Jurisdiction Under the Alien Tort Statute -- Trajano v. Marcos, 27 CORNELL INT'L L.J. 387, 411 (1994).

REV_00259569

n14 28 U.S.C. § 2679 (1994).

n15 Alvarez-Machain, supra note 8, at 11.

n16 Id. at 38-39, 44.

n17 Id. at 44.

n18 See, e.g., Michael J. Glennon, Agora: International Kidnapping: State Sponsored Abduction: A Comment On United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 86 AJIL 746 (1992); Malvina Halberstam, Agora: International Kidnapping: In Defense Of The Supreme Court Decision In Alvarez-Machain, 86 AJIL 736 (1992).

n19 Alvarez-Machain, supra note 8, at 47-49.

n20 Id. at 46-47.

n1 22 U.S.C. §§ 3301-3316 (1994); see also Exec. Order No. 12,143, 44 Fed. Reg. 37,191 (1979), superceded by Exec. Order No. 13,014, 61 Fed. Reg. 42,963 (1996). On the status of Taiwan generally, see JOHN F. COPPER, TAIWAN: NATION-STATE OR PROVINCE? (2d ed. 1996); THE INTERNATIONAL STATUS OF TAIWAN IN THE NEW WORLD ORDER: LEGAL AND POLITICAL CONSIDERATIONS (Jean-Marie Henchaerts ed., 1996); PENG MING-MIN & NG YUZIN CHIAUTONG, TAIWAN NO HOTEKI CHII [THE LEGAL STATUS OF TAIWAN] (1983).

n2 Pre-1979 agreements remaining in force between the United States and Taiwan appear in the U.S. Department of State's annual publication TREATIES IN FORCE at the end of the bilateral treaties section, under "China (Taiwan)." Agreements between the United States and Taiwan concluded between 1979 and 1993 may be found at Agreements Between the American Institute in Taiwan and the Coordination Council for North American Affairs, 58 Fed. Reg. 32,355 (1993).

n3 The Taiwan Relations Act at Twenty, Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Asia and the Pacific of the House Int'l Relations Comm., 96th Cong. (Apr. 14, 1999) (testimony of Susan L. Shirk, U.S. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs), available in <http://www.state.gov/www/policy_remarks/1999/990414_shirk_taiwan 2. html>.

n4 Michael Laris, Taiwan Jettisons 'One China' Formula, WASH. POST, July 13, 1999, at A14; Seth Faison, Taiwan President Implies His Island Is Sovereign State, N.Y. TIMES, July 13, 1999, at A1.

n5 Michael Laris, Sparks Fly Across Taiwan Strait, WASH. POST, July 14, 1999, at A17; John Pomfret, Beijing Warns Taiwan Again, WASH. POST, July 19, 1999, at A13.

n6 James P. Rubin, Assistant Secretary of State and Spokesman, U.S. Dep't of State Daily Press Briefing at 4 (July 13, 1999), available in <http://secretary.state.gov/www/briefings /9907/990713db.html>; see also Jane Perlez, China and U.S. Are Reported to Trade Threats on Taiwan, N.Y. TIMES, Aug. 13, 1999, at A1; China Says It Will Not Use Nuclear Weapons Against Taiwan, N.Y. TIMES, Sept. 3, 1999, at A3. Similar support for maintenance of the "one China" policy was expressed in a communique of the foreign ministers of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations on July 24. Asian Group Lends Support to Beijing Over Taiwan, N.Y. TIMES, July 25, 1999, at 8.

n1 Convention Concerning the Prohibition and Immediate Action for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour, adopted June 17, 1999, ILO No. C182. Documents of the ILO may be found at <http://www.ilo.org/public/ english>. See 93 AJIL 943 (1999); Elizabeth Olsen, World Panel Adopts Treaty to Restrict Child Labor, N.Y. TIMES, June 18, 1999, at A12.

REV_00259570

n2 Jane Perlez, Clinton Pushes for Treaty to Ban The Worst Child Labor Practices, N.Y. TIMES, June 17, 1999, at A17.

n3 Remarks to the International Labor Organization Conference in Geneva, Switzerland, 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1117, 1120-21 (June 21, 1999).

n4 Exec. Order No. 13,126, 64 Fed. Reg. 32,383 (1999) n1 MASS. ANN. LAWS ch. 7, §§ 22G-22M, 40F 1/2 (Law. Co-op. 1998).

n2 Voiding Of Burma Boycott Upheld: Mass. Overstepped Authority, Court Says, WASH. POST, June 24, 1999, at A16.

n3 The NFTC is a nonprofit corporation founded in 1914 that advocates, on behalf of its member companies, in favor of open international trade and investment.

n4 U.S. CONST. Art. I, § 8, cl.3.

n5 U.S. CONST. Art. VI, cl. 2.

n6 The federal government imposed certain foreign assistance sanctions and other measures on Myanmar three months after the Massachusetts law was enacted. Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act of 1997, § 570, 110 Stat. 3009-166 to 3009-167, as contained in the Omnibus Consolidated Appropriations Act of 1997, Pub. L. No. 104-208, § 101(c), 110 Stat. 3009-121 to 3009-181 (1996). In addition, in May 1997, President Clinton imposed certain trade sanctions on Myanmar. Exec. Order No. 13,047, 62 Fed. Reg. 28,301 (1997); for implementing regulations, see 31 C.F.R. pt. 537 (1998).

n7 Compare Jack L. Goldsmith, Federal Courts, Foreign Affairs, and Federalism, 83 VA. L. REV. 1617 (1997) (favoring involvement of U.S. states in foreign affairs) with Harold Hongju Koh, Is International Law Really State Law?, 111 HARV. L. REV. 1824 (1998) (taking the opposite view).

n8 Compare Daniel M. Price & John P. Hannah, The Constitutionality of United States State and Local Sanctions, 39 HARV. INT'L L.J. 443 (1998) and David Schmahmann & James Finch, The Unconstitutionality of State and Local Enactments in the United States Restricting Business Ties with Burma (Myanmar), 30 VAND. J. TRANSNAT'L L. 175 (1997) (finding such laws unconstitutional) with Lynn Loschin & Jennifer Anderson, Massachusetts Challenges the Burmese Dictators: The Constitutionality of Selective Purchasing Laws, 39 SANTA CLARA L. REV. 373 (1999) and Jay A. Christofferson, Comment, The Constitutionality of State Laws Prohibiting Contractual Relations with Burma: Upholding Federalism's Purpose, 29 McGEORGE L. REV. 351 (1998) (finding such laws constitutional).

n9 National Foreign Trade Council v. Baker, 26 F.Supp. 2d 287, 293 (D. Mass. 1998), aff'd sub nom. National Foreign Trade Council v. Natsios, No. 98-2304, 1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 13735 (1st Cir. June 22, 1999). For an analysis of the decision, see Recent Case, 112 HARV. L. REV. 2013 (1999).

n10 National Foreign Trade Council v. Natsios, No. 98-2304, 1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 13735 at * 20 (1st Cir. June 22, 1999).

n11 389 U.S. 429 (1968).

n12 Natsios, 1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 13735 at * 31-33 (quoting Clark v. Allen, 331 U.S. 503, 517 (1947)). Further, the court rejected Massachusetts' effort to extend to the foreign affairs power the "market participant" exception to the dormant domestic commerce clause and found that neither the first nor tenth amendments protected the Massachusetts law.

n13 See, e.g., White v. Massachusetts Council of Construction Employers, 460 U.S. 204 (1983) (when the state is acting as a market participant, rather than as a market regulator, the dormant domestic commerce clause places no limitation on its activities).

n14 Natsios, 1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 13735 at *57-87.

n15 Id. at * 88-107.

n16 Id. at * 107-08.

n1 The petitions were filed as confidential, although basic information is recorded as part of the ITC's public docket. See <http://info.usitc.gov/sec/dockets.nsf>; see also Three Nations Are Accused of Dumping Steel, N.Y. TIMES, Oct. 1, 1998, at C4. To obtain relief from dumping or unfairly subsidized imports, the Commerce Department must issue a finding of dumping or subsidization and the ITC must find that the dumped or subsidized imports are injuring a U.S. industry. See 19 U.S.C. §§ 1671-77n (1994). All told, imports of hot-rolled steel products surged seventy-four percent in 1998 over 1997 imports. Remarks of William M. Daley, U.S. Secretary of Commerce, on Steel Quota Legislation and the Administration's Response to the 1998 Surge of Steel Imports (June 21, 1999), available in <http://www.ita.doc.gov/media/0621STEELWMD.htm>.

n2 19 C.F.R. pt. 351 (1999).

n3 Trade Act of 1974, Title II, § 201, 19 U.S.C. § 2251 (1994).

n4 White House, Report to Congress on a Comprehensive Plan for Responding to the Increase in Steel Imports (Jan. 7, 1999), available in <http://www.pub.whitehouse.gov/uri-res/I2R?urn:pdi//oma.eop.gov.us/1999/1/8/4.text.1>.

n5 H.R. 975, 96th Cong. (1999); Alison Mitchell, By A Wide Margin, The House Votes Steel Import Curb, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 18, 1999, at A1.

n6 David E. Sanger, White House Tries To Fend Off Push For Steel Quotas, N.Y. TIMES, June 22, 1999, at A1.

n7 Paul Blustein, Bill to Restrict Steel Imports Fails to Clear Hurdle in Senate, WASH. POST, June 23, 1999, at A6; David E. Sanger, Senate Kills Effort to Impose Tight Limits on Steel Imports, N.Y. TIMES, June 23, 1999, at A1.

n8 Dep't of Commerce Press Release, Commerce Secretary William M. Daley Announces Agreements Substantially Reducing Imports of Brazilian Steel (July 7, 1999). Press releases and fact sheets of the Department of Commerce may be found at <http://www.doc.gov>.

n9 Dep't of Commerce Press Release, Commerce Secretary William M. Daley Announces Agreements Sharply Reducing Imports of Russian Steel (July 13, 1999).

n10 U.S. Dep't of Commerce Fact Sheet on Anti-dumping Investigation: Hot-Rolled Steel Products from Japan (Apr. 29, 1999); see Rossella Brevetti, Commerce Finds Japan Is Dumping Hot-Rolled Steel, 16 Int'l Trade Rep. (BNA) 779 (May 5, 1999).

n11 Certain Hot-Rolled Steel Products from Japan, 64 Fed. Reg. 33,514 (1999); see Punitive Tariffs Are Approved On Imports of Japanese Steel, N.Y. TIMES, June 12, 1999, at n12 Antidumping Duty Order: Certain Hot-Rolled Flat-Rolled Carbon-Quality Steel Products from Japan, 64 Fed. Reg. 34,778 (1999).

C3.

n13 Toshio Aritake, Japanese Steel Mills Preparing Complaints to WTO over ITC Decisions, 16 Int'l Trade Rep. (BNA) 1017 (June 16, 1999).

n1 This trade scheme operates under the Fourth ACP-EEC Convention of Lome, Dec. 15, 1989, 29 ILM 783 (1990).

n2 For background to the U.S.-EU dispute over EU banana imports, see Raj Bhala, *The Bananas War, 31 McGEORGE L. REV. (forthcoming 2000).

n3 European Communities -- Regime for the Importation, Sale and Distribution of Bananas, WTO Doc. WT/DS27/R/USA (May 22, 1997), available in 1997 GATTPD LEXIS 34. WTO Reports are generally available at <http://www.wto.org/wto/dispute/distab.htm>.

n4 European Communities -- Regime for the Importation, Sale and Distribution of Bananas, WTO Doc. WT/DS27/AB/R (Sept. 9, 1997), available in 1997 GATTPD LEXIS 25.

n5 European Communities -- Regime for the Importation, Sale and Distribution of Bananas, WTO Doc. WT/DS27/15 (Jan. 7, 1998), para. 1.

n6 Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes, Apr. 15, 1994, Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization, Annex 2, 33 ILM 1144, 1226 (1994).

n7 European Communities -- Regime for the Importation, Sale and Distribution of Bananas, WTO Doc. WT/DS27/15 (Jan. 7, 1998), paras. 3, 20.

n8 European Communities -- Regime for the Importation, Sale and Distribution of Bananas -- Recourse to Arbitration by the European Communities under Article 22.6 of the DSU, WTO Doc. WT/DS27/ARB (Apr. 9, 1999) (emphasis in original).

n9 David E. Sanger, Ruling Allows Tariffs by U.S. Over Bananas, N.Y. TIMES, Apr. 7, 1999, at C1.

n10 Daniel Pruzin, WTO Backs U.S. Banana Sanction Request; Wrangling Continues Over Retroactive Duties, 16 Int'l Trade Rep. (BNA) 660 (Apr. 21, 1999).

n11 European Commission Outlines Options For Resolving Banana Dispute With U.S., 16 Int'l Trade Rep. (BNA) 944 (June 2, 1999).

n12 European Commission, Communication From the Commission to the Council on Bananas, EC Doc. SEC/99/0799 at 8 (June 1, 1999), available in <http://europa.eu.int/comm/dg01/2605bana.pdf>.

n1 Council Directive 96/22/EC of 29 April 1996 Concerning the Prohibition on the Use in Stockfarming of Certain Substances Having a Hormonal or Thyrostatic Action and of Beta-Antagoists, and Repealing Directives 81/602/EEC, 88/146/EEC and 88/299EEC, 1996 O.J. (L 125) 3. For background on this dispute, see Implementation of WTO Recommendations Concerning EC -- Measures Concerning Meat and Meat Products (Hormones), 64 Fed. Reg. 14,486 (1999).

n2 Sixty-three percent of all cattle and ninety percent of feed cattle in the United States are treated with growth hormones. Elizabeth Olsen, $ 253 Million Sanctions Sought in Beef Fight

With Europe, N.Y. TIMES, June 4, 1999, at C4.

n3 EC Measures Concerning Meat and Meat Products (Hormones), WTO Docs. WT/DS26/R/USA & WT/DS/48/R/CAN (Aug. 18, 1997) at para. 9.1

n4 EC Measures Concerning Meat and Meat Products (Hormones) (AB-1997-4), WTO Docs. WT/DS26/AB/R & WT/DS48/AB/R (Jan. 16, 1998); see David A. Wirth, International Decisions, 92 AJIL 755 (1998); Dale E. McNiel, The First Case Under the WTO's Sanitary and Phytosanitary Agreement: The European Union's Hormone Ban, 39 VA. J. INT'L L. 89 (1998).

n5 Gary G. Yerkey, U.S., Europe Make Little Progress In New Discussions on Beef, Aides Say, 16 Int'l Trade Rep. (BNA) 710 (Apr. 28, 1999).

n6 Daniel Pruzin, U.S., Canada Request WTO Approval To Retaliate Against EU Hormone Ban, 16 Int'l Trade Rep. (BNA) 974 (June 9, 1999).

n7 Daniel Pruzin & Joe Kirwin, U.S., EU Fail to Resolve Hormone Dispute, But U.S. Will Study Recent Scientific Data, 16 Int'l Trade Rep. (BNA) 888 (May 26, 1999).

n8 EC Measures Concerning Meat and Meat Products (Hormones) -- Arbitration Under 21.3 (c) of the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes, WTO Docs. WT/DS26/15 & WT/DS48/13 (May 29, 1998) at para. 48.

n9 Olsen, supra note 2.

n10 European Communities -- Measures Concerning Meat and Meat Products (Hormones)-Recourse to Arbitration by the European Communities Under Article 22.6 of the DSU, WTO Docs. WT/DS26/ARB & WT/DS48/ARB (July 12, 1999); see Elizabeth Olsen, U.S. and Canada Get $ 125 Million Ruling on Europe Beef Ban, N.Y. TIMES, July 13, 1999, at C4.

n11 Paul Blustein, Europe Hit By Tariffs In Battle Over Beef, WASH. POST, July 20, 1999, at E1.

n1 Canada -- Certain Measures Concerning Periodicals, WTO Doc. WT/DS31/R (Mar. 14, 1997), available in 1997 GATTPD LEXIS 20; Canada-Certain Measures Concerning Periodicals, WTO Doc. WT/DS31/AB/R (June 30, 1997), available in 1997 GATTPD LEXIS 18. For background, see USTR Press Release on United States and Canada Resolve "Periodical" Differences, No. 99-46 (May 26, 1999), available in <http://www.ustr.gov/releases/1999/05/99-46.html>.

n2 Canadian Magazine Law Opponents Ask Senate to Delay Passage of Bill, 16 Int'l Trade Rep. (BNA) 822 (May 12, 1999).

n3 Chad Bowman & Peter Menyasz, Canada Magazine Dispute Cools Off After 'Amicable, Cooperative' Talks, 16 Int'l Trade Rep. (BNA) 449 (Mar. 17, 1999); Canada, U.S. Exchange Proposals in Start Of Talks Over Magazine Advertising Dispute, 16 Int'l Trade Rep. (BNA) 208 (Feb. 3, 1999).

n4 The agreement consists of an exchange of letters between Raymond Chretien, Ambassador of Canada to the United States, and Charlene Barshefsky, United States Trade Representative (June 3, 1999), available in <http://www.usembassycanada.gov/mags.htm>.

n1 Treaty Concerning Pacific Salmon, Jan. 28, 1985, U.S.-Can., TIAS 11091, 1469 UNTS 357. For background, see Marian Nash Leich, Contemporary Practice, 79 AJIL 432 (1985); Joy A. Yanagida, The Pacific Salmon Treaty, 81 AJIL 577 (1987).

Serbian forces completed their withdrawal on June 20, prompting NATO formally to end its air campaign. [18] The Serb forces left in their wake "a landscape of grave sites, burned homes, toppled mosque minarets and smashed shops." [19] Investigators from the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) entered Kosovo to gather evidence of atrocities, and were supported by investigators from the United States. [20] Information uncovered by the ICTY, as well as by NATO peacekeepers and aid agencies, suggested that at least 10,000 Albanian Kosovars were killed during the three-month FRY Government campaign. [21]

Asked at a news conference on June 25 to reflect on Kosovo, President Clinton replied in part:

> I think that when you look at this conflict and you seek to understand, "Well, why did President Clinton do this, why did Tony Blair do this, why did Jacques Chirac go along, why did the Germans get in there with both feet so early, given their history and all this?" I think you have to see this through the lens of Bosnia.
>
> . . . In Bosnia we had the U.N. in there first in a peacekeeping mission, and we tried for four years, you know, 50 different diplomatic solutions, all those different maps, all that different argument, and in the end of it all, from 1991 to 1995, we still had Srebrenica.
>
> . . . When it was all said and done, we had a quarter of a million people dead and two and a half million refugees. And I think what you have to understand is that we saw this through the lens of Bosnia. And we said we are not going to wait a day, not a day if we can stop it . . . . Once we knew there was a military plan, they had all those soldiers [*883] deployed, they had all those tanks deployed, you know, we knew what was coming and we decided to move. [22]

NON-STATE ENTITIES IN INTERNATIONAL LAW

U.S. Involvement in Claims by Victims of the German Holocaust or Their Heirs

In the aftermath of the Second World War, the major powers that occupied Germany enacted laws in their respective zones to restore property confiscated by the Nazis to the original owners. These laws did not address non-property loss, such as physical suffering or unjust deprivation of freedom, since the Allies contemplated that a new German Government would assume such responsibility. In the 1950s, and through various amendments thereafter, the Federal Republic of Germany enacted legislation to provide restitution for persons persecuted by the Nazi regime because of political opposition or for racial, religious or ideological reasons. [1] While these complex restitution laws permitted recovery by many persons who were German nationals or stateless persons during the war, or who were refugees within the meaning of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, the laws excluded many others. [2] In the years thereafter, Germany concluded bilateral agreements with several countries to compensate persons not eligible under the German restitution laws. After German reunification in 1989, Germany expanded its program to include persons to whom the German Democratic Republic had denied relief.

Since German reunification, U.S. victims of the German Holocaust or their heirs have pursued various avenues to obtain compensation for both personal and property losses against the German and Swiss Governments, and against private entities in those and other states, often with the support of the U.S. Government. These initiatives may be grouped into the following categories: (1) claims against the Government of Germany for persecution; (2) claims against German industry and German banks; (3) claims against insurance [*884] n2 For background on the breakdown of the 1985 treaty, see Thomas Healy, Comment, Where Artificial Constraints Kill: The Dispute Between Canada and the United States Over Pacific Salmon, 12 ARIZ. J. INT'L & COMP. L. 303 (1995); Michael F. Keiver, The Pacific Salmon War: The Defense of Necessity Revisited, 21 DALHOUSIE L.J. 408 (1998); Ted L. McDorman, The West Coast Salmon Dispute: A Canadian View of the Breakdown of the 1985 Treaty and the Transit License Measure, 17 LOY. L.A. INT'L & COMP. L.J. 477, 491-497 (1995); Robert J. Schmidt, Jr., International Negotiations Paralyzed by Domestic Politics: Two-Level Game Theory and the Problem of the Pacific Salmon Commission, 26 ENVT'L L. 95 (1996).

REV_00259539

n3 The agreement consists of an exchange of diplomatic notes between Thomas Pickering, U.S. Acting Secretary of State, and Raymond Chretien, Ambassador of Canada to the United States (June 30, 1999), available in <http://www.state.gov/www/global/oes/oceans/990630_salmon_index.html>. See Tom Kenworthy & Steven Pearlstein, U.S., Canada Reach Landmark Pact on Pacific Salmon Fishing, WASH. POST, June 4, 1999, at A17; Sam Howe Verhovek, U.S. and Canada Agree on a Plan to Restrict Catches of Endangered Salmon, N.Y. TIMES, June 4, 1999, at A19.

n4 U.S. Dep't of State Fact Sheet on the Pacific Salmon Agreement (June 3, 1999), available in <http://www.state.gov/www/global/oes/oceans/fs_990603_salmon.html>.

n1 Lawrence K. Altman et al., Smallpox: The Once and Future Scourge?, N.Y. TIMES, June 15, 1999, at D1.

n2 WHA Res. 49.10 (1996). For background, see Report by the WHO Secretariat, Smallpox Eradication: Destruction of Variola Virus Stocks, WHO Doc. A52/5 (Apr. 15, 1999). WHO documents generally are available at <http://www.who.int>.

n3 Department of Communicable Disease Surveillance and Response, World Health Organization, Report of the Meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee on Orthopoxvirus Infections. Geneva, Switzerland, WHO Doc. WHO/CDS/CSR/99.1 at 2, 4 (Jan. 14-15, 1999).

n4 Institute Of Medicine, Assessment of Future Scientific Needs for Live Variola Virus (1999), available in <http://books.nap.edu/books/0309064414/html/7-14.html>.

n5 Statement by the White House Press Secretary (Apr. 22, 1999), available in <http://www.pub.whitehouse.gov/uri-res/I2R?urn:pdi//oma.eop.gov.us/1999/4/23/5.text.1>; see Susan Okie, U.S. to Oppose Destroying Smallpox Stocks, WASH. POST, Apr. 23, 1999, at A2.

n6 Judith Miller & William J. Broad, Clinton to Announce That U.S. Will Keep Sample of Lethal Smallpox Virus, Aides Say, N.Y. TIMES, Apr. 22, 1999, at A12; Judith Miller, U.S. Foresees Smallpox Research With Russia, N.Y. TIMES, Apr. 23, 1999, at A3.

n7 Constitution of the World Health Organization, opened for signature July 22, 1946, Arts. 21-22, 62 Stat. 2679, 14 UNTS 185.

n8 WHA Res. 52.10 (1999); see Susan Okie, Countries Hold Off on Destroying Smallpox Stocks: WHO Members Vote to Retain Virus for Research Until 2002, WASH. POST, May 25, 1999, at A2.

n1 Marlise Simons, 2 Libyan Suspects Handed To Court In Pan Am Bombing, N.Y. TIMES, Apr. 6, 1999, at A1.

n2 John M. Gosko, Assurance for Libya Proposed in Bid to Try Suspects in Bombing, WASH. POST, Feb. 17, 1999, at A10; John M. Goshko, U.N. Chief Gives Libya Assurances Over Trial of 2 Lockerbie Suspects, WASH. POST, Feb. 18, 1999, at A14; Judith Miller, Libya Asks Annan

About Pan Am Trial Rules, N.Y. TIMES, Feb. 20, 1999, at A5.

n3 Sean D. Murphy, Contemporary Practice, 93 AJIL 174 (1999).

n4 Statement on the Delivery of the Suspects Accused of the 1988 Bombing of Pan Am Flight 103, 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 587 (Apr. 12, 1999).

n5 SC Res. 1192, para. 8 (1998).

n6 Report of the Secretary-General Submitted Pursuant to Paragraph 8 of Resolution 1192 (1998), UN Doc. S/1999/378 (1999).

n7 Marlise Simons, 2 Libyans Formally Charged In 1988 Pan Am Bombing, N.Y. TIMES, Apr. 7, 1999, at A6.

n8 Judith Miller, In Rare Talks With Libyans, U.S. Airs View On Sanctions, N.Y. TIMES, June 12, 1999, at A4; see also Colum Lynch, U.S. Threatens to Veto Lifting Libyan Sanctions, WASH. POST, July 8, 1999, at A18. For the Secretary-General's report on a final lifting of sanctions and Libya's reaction, see Report of the Secretary-General Submitted Pursuant to Paragraph 16 of Security Council Resolution 883 (1993) and Paragraph 8 of Resolution 1192 (1998), UN Doc. S/1999/726 (1999); Letter Dated 6 July 1999 from the Permanent Representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the United Nations Addressed to the President of the Security Council, UN Doc. S/1999/752 (1999).

n1 See Marian Nash (Leich), Contemporary Practice, 89 AJIL 119 & 372 (1995). When fully implemented, the Agreed Framework will terminate the DPRK's nuclear program.

n2 Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Asian and Pacific Affairs of the House Int'l Relations Comm., 105th Cong. (Feb. 26, 1997) (testimony of Charles Kartman, Acting Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, U.S. Dep't of State).

n3 Hearings Before the Subcomm. on E. Asian and Pacific Affairs of the Senate Foreign Relations Comm., 105th Cong. (July 14, 1998) (testimony of Rust Demig, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, U.S. Dep't of State.)

n4 See generally Thomas W. Lippman, Perry May Be Named to Try to Salvage Pact With N. Korea, WASH. POST, Oct. 4, 1998, at A27; David E. Sanger, U.S. Aide Due in North Korea With Deal to Lift Sanctions, N.Y. TIMES, May 21, 1999, at A6; Philip Shenon, North Korean Nuclear Arms Pact Reported Near Breakdown, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 6, 1998, at 16; Hearings Before the House Int'l Relations Comm., 105th Cong. (Sept. 24, 1998) (testimony of Charles Kartman, U.S. Representative to KEDO).

n5 Philip Shenon, Suspected North Korean Atom Site Is Empty, U.S. Finds, N.Y. TIMES, May 28, 1999, at A3.

n6 Hearings Before the House Int'l Relations Comm., 106th Cong. (Mar. 24, 1999) (opening statement of Chairman Benjamin A. Gilman).

n7 James P. Rubin, Assistant Secretary of State and Spokesman, U.S. Dep't of State Press Release on Dr. William Perry Named North Korean Policy Coordinator (Nov. 12, 1998), available in <http://secretary.state.gov/www/briefings/statements/1998/ps981112.html>.

n8 Hearings Before the Subcomm. on E. Asian and Pacific Affairs of the Senate Foreign Relations Comm., 105th Cong. (Oct. 12, 1999) (testimony of William Perry, U.S. North Korea Policy Coordinator); Nicholas D. Kristof, North Korea Unresponsive In U.S. Talks, Envoy Reports, N.Y. TIMES, May 30, 1999, at 4; Kevin Sullivan, N. Korea Promises No Nuclear Weapons, WASH. POST, May 30, 1999, at A19. For the unclassified version of Dr. Perry's review of U.S. policy toward North Korea, see <http://www.state.gov/www/regions/eap/991012_northkorea_rpt.html>.

REV_00259576

n1 Treaty on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems, May 26, 1972, U.S.-USSR, 23 UST 3435.

n2 Compare Abram Chayes & Antonia Handler Chayes, Testing and Development of "Exotic" Systems Under the ABM Treaty: The Great Reinterpretation Caper, 99 HARV. L. REV. 1956 (1986), with Abraham Sofaer, The ABM Treaty and the Strategic Defense Initiative, 99 HARV. L. REV. 1972 (1986).

n3 These memoranda have not yet been submitted to the Senate for advice and consent. See Thomas W. Lippman, Helms Faces Off With White House on Missed ABM Treaty Deadline, WASH. POST, June 21, 1999, at A5. The amendments would also define the difference between strategic or intercontinental missiles (prohibited under the treaty) and "theater" missiles (not prohibited).

n4 U.S. Dep't of State Fact Sheet on Memorandum of Understanding on Succession (Sept. 26, 1997), available in <http://www.state.gov/www/global/arms/fs-abm_succ__mou_970926.html>.

n5 William S. Cohen, Secretary of Defense, U.S. Dep't of Defense Press Briefing at 2-3 (Jan. 20, 1999), available in <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jan 1999/t01201999_t0120md.html>.

n6 See David Hoffman, Russia Says START II Is Imperiled, WASH. POST, Jan. 22, 1999, at A16; Walter Pincus, Pentagon Debates Arms Treaty Changes, WASH. POST, Jan. 22, 1999, at A16; Daniel Williams, Russia Rejects Changes to ABM Treaty, WASH. POST, Jan. 23, 1999, at A18. In June 1999, Russia agreed to meet to hear the U.S. proposals, but continued to assert that it opposed amending the ABM Treaty. David Hoffman, Clinton, Yeltsin Plan New Talks on Nuclear Arms, WASH. POST, June 22, 1999, at A10.

n7 The Legal Status of the ABM Treaty: Hearings Before the Senate Foreign Relations Comm., 106th Cong. (May 25, 1999) (prepared statement of David B. Rivkin and Lee A. Casey), available in <http://www.senate.gov/[approximately]foreign/riv.htm>.

n8 Pub. L. No. 106-38, 113 Stat. 205 (1999); see also Statement on Signing the National Missile Defense Act of 1999, 35 WEEKLY COMP. PRES. DOC. 1471 (Aug. 2, 1999) (the statement was made July 22, but released on July 23).

n9 White House Press Office, Joint Statement Between the United States and the Russian Federation Concerning the Strategic Offensive and Defensive Arms and Further Strengthening of Stability (June 20, 1999).

n10 See Sean D. Murphy, Contemporary Practice, 93 AJIL 192 (1999).

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: (engagement) and necessity and war and self-defense and date(aft 1995) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, September 12, 2001 - 9:36 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

companies; (4) claims against Swiss banks; and (5) claims for confiscated art. Each is discussed in turn.

Persecution Claims. Hugo Princz, a U.S. national of Jewish faith, was living with his family in what is now Slovakia at the outbreak of the Second World War. The Slovak police arrested Mr. Princz and his family as enemy aliens; normal international practice would dictate that they intern in civilian camps or be exchanged for U.S.-held German nationals. Since the Princz family was Jewish, however, it was handed over to the German SS, which sent it to concentration and slave labor camps. Mr. Princz survived; his parents and three siblings did not. Although Mr. Princz filed a claim under Germany's post-war restitution program, the claim was denied because Mr. Princz was neither a German national nor a refugee. Mr. Princz may have been eligible when Germany expanded its program in 1965, but he did not reapply until after the period for filing claims had expired in 1969.

In November of 1992, Mr. Princz sued the Federal Republic of Germany in a U.S. federal court for false imprisonment, assault and battery, emotional distress, and recovery quantum meruit for the value of his labor under the Nazi regime. The District Court denied Germany's motion to dismiss the case for lack of jurisdiction under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. [3] That decision, however, was reversed in July 1994 by the Court of Appeals, which stated:

> Assuming that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act [FSIA] of 1976 . . . applies retroactively to events occurring in 1942-1945, no exception to the general grant of sovereign immunity in that statute applies in this case. If the FSIA does not apply retroactively, then there is no federal subject matter jurisdiction over Mr. Princz's claims, which sound in tort and quasi contract. [4]

The U.S. Congress reacted strongly to the decision. In March of 1995, Representative Charles E. Schumer of New York summarized its efforts as follows:

> During the 103d Congress, the House and Senate [passed] unanimous resolutions supporting Mr. Princz and took numerous other steps on his behalf, including unanimous passage last October in the House, and near passage in the Senate, of legislation I authored which would have permitted the lawsuit he filed against Germany in 1992 to proceed . . . . My colleagues and I are prepared to reintroduce that bill in this Congress should the latest diplomatic efforts to resolve the case founder. [5]

On September 19, 1995, Germany and the United States signed an Agreement Concerning Final Benefits to Certain United States Nationals Who Were Victims of National Socialist Measures of Persecution. [6] The Agreement was designed to compensate persons who were U.S. nationals persecuted by the Nazi regime, but who had not previously been compensated. The Agreement provided for a lump-sum transfer of three million Deutschmarks (about U.S.$ 2.1 million) to the U.S. Government; the U.S. Department of State then distributed the sum to Mr. Princz and several other known victims. Individuals subjected to forced labor in prison camps other than concentration camps were excluded from the agreement. [7]

Since Germany and the United States anticipated that there could be other victims with claims comparable to those of Mr. Princz who had not come to the attention of the U.S. [*885] Government as of September 1995, Article 2(2) of the Agreement provided for the possibility of future payments to other victims. It states:

REV_00259540

> For any possible further cases not known at the present moment, both Governments intend to negotiate two years after the entry into force of this Agreement, an additional lump sum payment based on the same criteria as set forth in Article 1 and derived on the same basis as the amount under paragraph 1.

The United States enacted legislation enabling the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission (FCSC) of the U.S. Department of Justice to receive and determine the validity and amount of claims by U.S. nationals against Germany for persecution within the scope of the 1995 Agreement. [8] The FCSC conducted its Holocaust Survivors Claims Program to locate eligible individuals and to assess their claims. The FCSC extended its initial filing deadline of September 1996 numerous times, setting the final deadline at September 1997, two years after the 1995 Agreement entered into force. In March 1998, the FCSC completed its adjudications under the Program and certified to the Secretary of State the validity and amounts of the awards.

On January 25, 1999, the United States and Germany reached agreement on a lump sum payment by the German Government of 34.5 million Deutschmarks for those claimants. [9] In June 1999, Germany transferred the funds to the United States, totaling U.S.$ 18,183,559.24.

Claims against German industry and German banks. In 1998, lawsuits were filed in U.S. courts against certain German companies and banks. [10] On February 16, 1999, in part as a response to such suits, the German Government announced the creation of a "Foundation Initiative of German Enterprises: Remembrance, Responsibility, and Future" ("Stiftungsinitiative deutscher Unternehmen: Erinnerung, Verantwortung und Zukunft"), a fund to which initially twelve of Germany's largest banks and companies accused of benefitting from slave labor during the Second World War will contribute. The Foundation is expected to address claims of former forced and slave laborers, as well as claims against German banks stemming from "aryanization activities," dormant accounts, and looted gold.

The joint statement of Germany's Government and private companies issued by the German Government reads:

> The companies Allianz AG, BASF AG, Bayer AG, BMW AG, DaimlerChrysler AG, Deutsche Bank AG, Degussa-Huls AG, Dresdner Bank AG, Friedr. Krupp AG Hoesch-Krupp, Hoechst AG, Siemens AG and Volkswagen AG today proposed to the Federal Chancellor the establishment of a "Foundation Initiative of German Enterprises: Remembrance, Responsibility and Future". The Federal Chancellor welcomes and commends this Initiative and pledges the Federal Government's support.
>
> The companies wish, from a sense of solidarity, justice and self-respect, to send a conclusive material signal as the century draws to a close. This Initiative is a direct way for civil society to contribute to and complement the efforts of the state in the field of restitution policy. Since restitution payments by the state have been funded from public tax revenues, German business has also hitherto consistently contributed indirectly to these payments. In addition, German companies have over the past decades made direct payments of their own to Nazi victims.
>
> [*886] The fact that the German Bundestag intends to speedily establish a Federal foundation for humanitarian payments, especially to victims of Nazi forced labor, is welcomed. It is important to find an appropriate way of linking this legislative initiative with the Foundation Initiative of German Enterprises.

REV_00259541

This Foundation Initiative has three goals:

> -- To meet the moral responsibilities of German companies arising from the use of forced labor, aryanization and other grave injustices committed under the Nazi dictatorship,
>
> -- Based on this understanding of the Nazi past, to support humanitarian and forward-looking projects, and
>
> -- Thereby to lay the groundwork for countering lawsuits, particularly class actions in the USA, and remove the rationale for any campaigns against the reputation of our country and its business community.

The Foundation Initiative is to comprise two parts of equal importance:

> -- A humanitarian fund for the benefit of victims of forced labor and other groups who suffered at the hands of the Nazis, and
>
> -- A future foundation to support appropriate projects linked in some way to the reasons for which the fund is to be set up.

The Governments of the USA and Israel welcome this Initiative as a positive and courageous response by the German companies to meet their moral responsibilities. The Initiative is contingent on the participating German companies receiving a satisfactory degree of legal certainty on the basis of appropriate intergovernmental agreements.

The paramount goal of the fund is to provide cooperative, fair, unbureaucratic and above all prompt assistance to Nazi victims. Given the advanced age of those concerned, the prime humanitarian objective must be to put the Initiative in place quickly, and if possible by September 1, 1999.

The participating German companies thank the Federal Government for the progress made in the discussions to date toward the creation of the fund and toward achieving legal certainty . . . . It is the express goal of the participating German companies that humanitarian payments to those concerned be made without regard to their religion or nationality. Other German companies that are involved but have not yet participated in this Initiative are called upon to join in the efforts now under way. [11]

The statement did not specify the amount of money provided for the fund as that amount ultimately will depend on the number of German companies that join in the initiative. As of July 1999, a steering group of governmental and nongovernmental representatives formed to develop the initiative focused on a plan to create two categories of former forced laborers, distinguished on the basis of whether they were imprisoned in a concentration camp (category A claimants) or detained for other forms of forced labor (category B claimants, who would receive a lesser amount). The steering group also anticipated payments to the claimants at a fixed amount (not based on need or living standards), which would be offset by any amount that private enterprises previously have paid to the individuals. [12] However, the steering group proved unable to reach agreement by the [*887] September 1, 1999, deadline on exactly who would qualify as "forced laborers" and how much compensation they should receive. On October 7, the German companies and German Government offered $ 3.3 billion in compensation, but it was immediately rejected by lawyers of the claimants as insufficient.

Claims Against Insurance Companies. Various European insurance companies accused of denying life insurance payments to heirs of insurance holders who died in the Holocaust have faced criticism and lawsuits, and many have attempted to resolve the issue. For instance, in 1997-98, suits were filed in California state and New York federal courts by Holocaust survivors and their heirs against the Italian insurance company Assicurazioni Generali. [13] Assicurazioni Generali announced that it would establish a $ 12 million philanthropic fund in honor of policyholders who died in the Holocaust. [14] This initiative, however, did not resolve the lawsuits, forcing Assicurazioni Generali to settle the New York class action lawsuit for $ 100 million, to be paid both to individual claimants and to a humanitarian fund established to benefit Holocaust survivors more generally. [15]

State insurance regulators also pursued this issue, although not in the form of class action suits. In April 1998, the U.S. National Association of Insurance Commissioners (NAIC) formed a task force to investigate the issue of Holocaust-era insurance policies. NAIC held extensive hearings on this subject and threatened sanctions against European insurers that did not cooperate in addressing the matter. In August 1998, Under Secretary of State Eizenstat urged the targeted insurance companies to create an international commission to deal with this matter. He stated:

> Earlier this summer, I met with Generali executives and representatives and encouraged their cooperation in resolving Holocaust insurance issues. I have convened similar meetings with other European insurers, and I have also personally raised Holocaust insurance issues with governments in Central and Eastern Europe.
>
> We support the establishment of an international process to deal with all Holocaust insurance issues and claims. We believe such issues and claims are best handled through international cooperation among insurance regulators, insurance companies, and organizations representing Holocaust survivors. We support in this regard the efforts led by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, Holocaust survivor organizations, and major insurance companies. These entities are working on a Memorandum of Understanding calling for the formation of an international commission to address Holocaust-era insurance issues. [16]

On September 9, 1998, NAIC and the major European insurance companies (including Assicurazioni Generali) concluded a Memorandum of Understanding establishing the International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims. The Commission includes representatives from Holocaust survivor organizations, U.S. and European insurance regulators, major European insurance companies, the State of Israel and (in an observer status) the U.S. Department of State. The purpose of the Commission, which is chaired by [*888] former Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger and funded by the insurance companies, is to foster a fact-based, equitable effort to resolve Holocaust insurance claims within two years, without resorting to lengthy litigation. The program entails a claims process whereby, after advertisement, persons will file claims that then will be adjudicated through relaxed standards of proof. [17]

Assicurazioni Generali backed out of the previously agreed settlement of the class action lawsuit, since the Commission process did not cap at $ 100 million the amount that Assicurazioni Generali would be expected to contribute to the process. [18] On May 6, 1999, the

REV_00259543

Commission reached agreement for payment by the European insurance companies on prewar policies of Holocaust victims under a formula that reflects present day values (thus taking into account inflation, interest payments, and currency depreciation). The total amount ultimately paid is expected to be in the billions of dollars. [19]

Swiss Bank Claims. In late 1996 and early 1997, class action lawsuits on behalf of an estimated 18,000 Holocaust survivors and their heirs (both U.S. nationals and non-U.S. nationals) were filed against major Swiss banks [20] in U.S. federal court. [21] The complaints were eventually consolidated into a single case, in which the plaintiffs alleged that the Swiss banks collaborated with the Nazis in violation of international humanitarian law by knowingly retaining and concealing the assets of Holocaust victims, accepting and laundering illegally obtained Nazi loot, and transacting in the profits of slave labor. The plaintiffs also claimed that the banks breached fiduciary and other duties, breached contracts, converted the plaintiffs' property, enriched themselves unjustly, acted negligently, violated Swiss banking law and the Swiss commercial code of obligations, engaged in fraud and conspiracy, and concealed relevant facts from the plaintiffs in an effort to frustrate their claims. The plaintiffs sought compensatory and punitive damages, as well as declaratory and other relief. [22]

Although the banks offered to settle the case for $ 600 million, many Jewish groups regarded the amount offered as "insulting." [23] New York state and city financial officers announced that they planned to impose sanctions against the banks, and several other U.S. states announced that they were considering similar action. The Swiss Government strongly protested the threatened sanctions, deeming them "unjustified and illegal." [24] Although the U.S. Government favored resolving this matter, it did not favor imposition of economic sanctions by state and local authorities. On July 6, 1998, U.S. State Department spokesman James P. Rubin commented as follows:

> Our position on sanctions against Switzerland remains firm. We continue to believe that sanctions are unwarranted and counterproductive. They may lead to less rather than more flexibility on the part of Swiss institutions. They will prevent our nation from [*889] speaking with one voice on matters of foreign policy. They may call into question the openness of American financial markets, and we're calling on state and local governments considering punitive measures to refrain from taking actions which can further heighten tensions and delay further progress on a settlement that can do justice to the victims of the Holocaust. In the light of recent findings, we encourage the Swiss government to reflect on what [it] can do, what ways [it] can develop to accelerate the movement towards closure on these issues. [25]

The defendant banks moved to dismiss the New York class action, but before the court ruled on the motion Credit Suisse and UBS agreed in principle, on August 12, 1998, to settle the lawsuit for $ 1.25 billion. [26] After months of further negotiations, the parties signed a final settlement agreement on February 10, 1999. The key terms of the settlement provide that: (1) the defendants will pay a total of $ 1.25 billion in four installments over the course of three years; (2) the court will appoint a special master who will develop a plan for allocation and distribution of the funds to the class members; (3) the plaintiffs relinquish their claims against all Swiss companies and institutions; (4) the plaintiffs will develop a plan for notifying all class members; and (5) all class members have a right not to participate in the settlement, but any class member that affirmatively fails to opt out remains within the class and is bound by the settlement. In arguing to the court the appropriateness of accepting a settlement agreement covering a world-wide class, the plaintiffs argued:

> Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 imposes no geographic limitations on the size or scope of a certifiable classes. See, e.g., Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682,

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Rules on Summons/Service

OA/NARA#: 2163/2074
9693

Box 51
Folder 13

REV_00259579

USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 4

UNITED STATES CODE SERVICE
Copyright 2001, LEXIS Law Publishing, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc.
All rights reserved.

 CURRENT THROUGH CHANGES RECEIVED APRIL, 2001 ***

FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE
II. COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION; SERVICE OF PROCESS, PLEADINGS, MOTIONS, AND ORDERS

USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 4 (2001)

- Review expert commentary from The National Institute for Trial Advocacy
- Review Court Orders which may amend this Rule.

Rule 4. Summons

(a) Form.The summons shall be signed by the clerk, bear the seal of the court, identify the court and the parties, be directed to the defendant, and state the name and address of the plaintiff's attorney or, if unrepresented, of the plaintiff. It shall also state the time within which the defendant must appear and defend, and notify the defendant that failure to do so will result in a judgment by default against the defendant for the relief demanded in the complaint. The court may allow a summons to be amended.

(b) Issuance.Upon or after filing the complaint, the plaintiff may present a summons to the clerk for signature and seal. If the summons is in proper form, the clerk shall sign, seal, and issue it to the plaintiff for service on the defendant. A summons, or a copy of the summons if addressed to multiple defendants, shall be issued for each defendant to be served.

(c) Service with Complaint; by Whom Made.
(1) A summons shall be served together with a copy of the complaint. The plaintiff is responsible for service of a summons and complaint within the time allowed under subdivision (m) and shall furnish the person effecting service with the necessary copies of the summons and complaint.
(2) Service may be effected by any person who is not a party and who is at least 18 years of age. At the request of the plaintiff, however, the court may direct that service be effected by a United States marshal, deputy United States marshal, or other person or officer specially appointed by the court for the purpose. Such an appointment must be made when the plaintiff is authorized to proceed in forma pauperis pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915 or is authorized to proceed as a seaman under 28 U.S.C. § 1916.

(d) Waiver of Service; Duty to Save Costs of Service; Request to Waive.
(1) A defendant who waives service of a summons does not thereby waive any objection to the venue or to the jurisdiction of the court over the person of the defendant.
(2) An individual, corporation, or association that is subject to service under subdivision (e), (f), or (h) and that receives notice of an action in the manner provided in this paragraph has a duty to avoid unnecessary costs of serving the summons. To avoid costs, the plaintiff may notify such a defendant of the commencement of the action and request that the defendant waive service of a summons. The notice and request.
(A) shall be in writing and shall be addressed directly to the defendant, if an individual, or else to an officer or managing or general agent (or other agent authorized by appointment or law to receive service of process) of a defendant subject to service under subdivision (h);

(B) shall be dispatched through first-class mail or other reliable means;

(C) shall be accompanied by a copy of the complaint and shall identify the court in which it has been filed;

(D) shall inform the defendant, by means of a text prescribed in an official form promulgated pursuant to Rule 84, of the consequences of compliance and of a failure to comply with the request;

(E) shall set forth the date on which request is sent;

(F) shall allow the defendant a reasonable time to return the waiver, which shall be at least 30 days from the date on which the request is sent, or 60 days from that date if the defendant is addressed outside any judicial district of the United States; and

(G) shall provide the defendant with an extra copy of the notice and request, as well as a prepaid means of compliance in writing.

If a defendant located within the United States fails to comply with a request for waiver made by a plaintiff located within the United States, the court shall impose the costs subsequently incurred in effecting service on the defendant unless good cause for the failure be shown.

(3) A defendant that, before being served with process, timely returns a waiver so requested is not required to serve an answer to the complaint until 60 days after the date on which the request for waiver of service was sent, or 90 days after that date if the defendant was addressed outside any judicial district of the United States.

(4) When the plaintiff files a waiver of service with the court, the action shall proceed, except as provided in paragraph (3), as if a summons and complaint had been served at the time of filing the waiver, and no proofs of service shall be required.

(5) The costs to be imposed on a defendant under paragraph (2) for failure to comply with a request to waive service of a summons shall include the costs subsequently incurred in effecting service under subdivision (e), (f), or (h), together with the costs, including a reasonable attorney's fee, of any motion required to collect the costs of service.

(e) Service Upon Individuals Within a Judicial District of the United States.Unless otherwise provided by federal law, service upon an individual from whom a waiver has not been obtained and filed, other than an infant or an incompetent person, may be effected in any judicial district of the United States:

(1) pursuant to the law of the state in which the district court is located, or in which service is effected, for the service of a summons upon the defendant in an action brought in the courts of general jurisdiction of the State; or

(2) by delivering a copy of the summons and of the complaint to the individual personally or by leaving copies thereof at the individual's dwelling house or usual place of abode with some person of suitable age and discretion then residing therein or by delivering a copy of the summons and of the complaint to an agent authorized by appointment or by law to receive service of process.

(f) Service Upon Individuals in a Foreign Country.Unless otherwise provided by federal law, service upon an individual from whom a waiver has not been obtained and filed, other than an infant or an incompetent person, may be effected in a place not within any judicial district of the United States:

(1) by any internationally agreed means reasonably calculated to give notice, such as those means authorized by the Hague Convention on the Service Abroad of Judicial and Extrajudicial Documents; or

(2) if there is no internationally agreed means of service or the applicable international agreement allows other means of service, provided that service is reasonably calculated to give notice:

(A) in the manner prescribed by the law of the foreign country for service in that country in an action in any of its courts of general jurisdiction; or

(B) as directed by the foreign authority in response to a letter rogatory or letter of request; or

(C) unless prohibited by the law of the foreign country, by

REV_00259581

(i) delivery to the individual personally of a copy of the summons and the complaint; or

(ii) any form of mail requiring a signed receipt, to be addressed and dispatched by the clerk of the court to the party to be served; or

(3) by other means not prohibited by international agreement as may be directed by the court.

(g) Service Upon Infants and Incompetent Person.Service upon an infant or an incompetent person in a judicial district of the United States shall be effected in the manner prescribed by the law of the state in which the service is made for the service of summons or like process upon any such defendant in an action brought in the courts of general jurisdiction of that state. Service upon an infant or an incompetent person in a place not within any judicial district of the United States shall be effected in the manner prescribed by paragraph (2)(A) or (2)(B) of subdivision (f) or by such means as the court may direct.

(h) Service Upon Corporations and Associations.Unless otherwise provided by federal law, service upon a domestic or foreign corporation or upon a partnership or other unincorporated association that is subject to suit under a common name, and from which a waiver of service has not been obtained and filed, shall be effected:

(1) in a judicial district of the United States in the manner prescribed for individuals by subdivision (e)(1), or by delivering a copy of the summons and of the complaint to an officer, a managing or general agent, or to any other agent authorized by appointment or by law to receive service of process and, if the agent is one authorized by statute to receive service and the statute so requires, by also mailing a copy to the defendant, or

(2) in a place not within any judicial district of the United States in any manner prescribed for individuals by subdivision (f) except personal delivery as provided in paragraph (2)(C)(i) thereof.

(i) Serving the United States, Its Agencies, Corporations, Officers, or Employees.

(1) Service upon the United States shall be effected

(A) by delivering a copy of the summons and of the complaint to the United States attorney for the district in which the action is brought or to an assistant United States attorney or clerical employee designated by the United States attorney in a writing filed with the clerk of the court or by sending a copy of the summons and of the complaint by registered or certified mail addressed to the civil process clerk at the office of the United States attorney and

(B) by also sending a copy of the summons and of the complaint by registered or certified mail to the Attorney General of the United States at Washington, District of Columbia, and

(C) in any action attacking the validity of an order of an officer or agency of the United States not made a party, by also sending a copy of the summons and of the complaint by registered or certified mail to the officer or agency.

(2) (A) Service on an agency or corporation of the United States, or an officer or employee of the United States sued only in an official capacity, is effected by serving the United States in the manner prescribed by Rule 4(i)(1) and by also sending a copy of the summons and complaint by registered or certified mail to the officer, employee, agency, or corporation.

(B) Service on an officer or employee of the United States sued in an individual capacity for acts or omissions occurring in connection with the performance of duties on behalf of the United States--whether or not the officer or employee is sued also in an official capacity--is effected by serving the United States in the manner prescribed by Rule 4(i)(1) and by serving the officer or employee in the manner prescribed by Rule 4 (e), (f), or (g).

(3) The court shall allow a reasonable time to serve process under Rule 4(i) for the purpose of curing the failure to serve:

(A) all persons required to be served in an action governed by Rule 4(i)(2)(A), if the plaintiff has served either the United States attorney or the Attorney General of the United States, or

(B) the United States in an action governed by Rule 4(i)(2)(B), if the plaintiff has served an officer or employee of the United States sued in an individual capacity.

(j) Service Upon Foreign, State, or Local Governments.
(1) Service upon a foreign state or a political subdivision, agency, or instrumentality thereof shall be effected pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1608.
(2) Service upon a state, municipal corporation, or other governmental organization subject to suit, shall be effected by delivering a copy of the summons and of the complaint to its chief executive officer or by serving the summons and complaint in the manner prescribed by the law of that state for the service of summons or other like process upon any such defendant.

(k) Territorial Limits of Effective Service.
(1) Service of a summons or filing a waiver of service is effective to establish jurisdiction over the person of a defendant
(A) who could be subjected to the jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction in the state in which the district court is located, or
(B) who is a party joined under Rule 14 or Rule 19 and is served at a place within a judicial district of the United States and not more than 100 miles from the place from which the summons issues, or
(C) who is subject to the federal interpleader jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1335, or
(D) when authorized by a statute of the United States.
(2) If the exercise of jurisdiction is consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, serving a summons or filing a waiver of service is also effective, with respect to claims arising under federal law, to establish personal jurisdiction over the person of any defendant who is not subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of general jurisdiction of any state.

(l) Proof of Service.If service is not waived, the person effecting service shall make proof thereof to the court. If service is made by a person other than a United States marshal or deputy United States marshal, the person shall make affidavit thereof. Proof of service in a place not within any judicial district of the United States shall, if effected under paragraph (1) of subdivision (f), be made pursuant to the applicable treaty or convention, and shall, if effected under paragraph (2) or (3) thereof, include a receipt signed by the addressee or other evidence of delivery to the addressee satisfactory to the court. Failure to make proof of service does not affect the validity of the service. The court may allow proof of service to be amended.

(m) Time Limit for Service.If service of the summons and complaint is not made upon a defendant within 120 days after the filing of the complaint, the court, upon motion or on its own initiative after notice to the plaintiff, shall dismiss the action without prejudice as to that defendant or direct that service be effected within a specified time; provided that if the plaintiff shows good cause for the failure, the court shall extend the time for service for an appropriate period. This subdivision does not apply to service in a foreign country pursuant to subdivision (f) or (j)(1).

(n) Seizure of Property; Service of Summons Not Feasible.
(1) If a statute of the United States so provides, the court may assert jurisdiction over property. Notice to claimants of the property shall than be sent in the manner provided by the statute or by service of a summons under this rule.
(2) Upon a showing that personal jurisdiction over a defendant cannot, in the district where the action is brought, be obtained with reasonable efforts by service of summons in any manner authorized by this rule, the court may assert jurisdiction over any of the defendant's assets found within the district by seizing the assets under the circumstances and in the manner provided by the law of the state in which the district court is located.

HISTORY:
(Amended July 1, 1963; July 1, 1966; Aug. 1, 1980; Jan. 12, 1983, P.L. 97-462, § 2, 96 Stat. 2527; Aug. 1, 1987; Dec. 1, 1993.)

(As amended Dec. 1, 2000.)

HISTORY; ANCILLARY LAWS AND DIRECTIVES

Other provisions:

Notes of Advisory Committee. Note to Subdivision (a). With the provision permitting additional summons upon request of the plaintiff compare former Equity Rule 14 (Alias Subpoena) and the last sentence of former Equity Rule 12 (Issue of Subpoena--Time for Answer).

Note to Subdivision (b). This rule prescribes a form of summons which follows substantially the requirements stated in former Equity Rules 12 (Issue of Subpoena--Time for Answer) and 7 (Process, Mense and Final).

U.S.C., Title 28, former § 721 (now § 1691) (Sealing and testing of writs) is substantially continued insofar as it applies to a summons, but its requirements as to teste of process are superseded. U.S.C., Title 28, former § 722 (Teste of process, day of), is superseded.

See Rule 12(a) for a statement of the time within which the defendant is required to appear and defend.

Note to Subdivision (c). This rule does not affect U.S.C., Title 28, former § 503 (now § 547), as amended June 15, 1935 (Marshals; duties) and such statutes as the following insofar as they provide for service of process by a marshal, but modifies them insofar as they may imply service by a marshal only:

U.S.C., Title 15:

§ 5 (Bringing in additional parties) (Sherman Act)

§ 10 (Bringing in additional parties)

§ 25(Restraining violations; procedure)

U.S.C., Title 28, former:

§ 45 (Practice and procedure in certain cases under the interstate commerce laws)

Compare former Equity Rule 15 (Process, by Whom Served).

Note to Subdivision (d). Under this rule the complaint must always be served with the summons.

Paragraph (1). For an example of a statute providing for service upon an agent of an individual see U.S.C., Title 28, former § 109 (now §§ 1400, 1694) (Patent cases).

Paragraph (3). This enumerates the officers and agents of a corporation or of a partnership or other unincorporated association upon whom service of process may be made, and permits service of process only upon the officers, managing or general agents, or agents authorized by appointment or by law, of the corporation, partnership or unincorporated association against which the action is brought. See Christian v. International Ass'n of Machinists, 7 F.2d 481 (D.C. Ky. 1925) and Singleton v. Order of Railway Conductors of America, 9 F. Supp. 417 (D.C. Ill. 1935). Compare Operative Plasterers' and Cement Finishers' International Ass'n of the United States and Canada v. Case, 93 F.2d 56 (D.C. Cir. 1937).

For a statute authorizing service upon a specified agent and requiring mailing to the defendant, see U.S.C., Title 6, § 7 (Surety companies as sureties; appointment of agents; service of process).

Paragraphs (4) and (5) provide a uniform and comprehensive method of service for all actions against the United States or an officer or agency thereof. For statutes providing for such service, see U.S.C., Title 7, §§ 217 (Proceedings for suspension of orders), 499k (Injunctions; application of injunction laws governing orders of Interstate Commerce Commission), 608c(15)(B) (Court review of ruling of Secretary of Agriculture), and 855 (making § 608c(15)(B) applicable to orders of the Secretary of Agriculture as to handlers of anti-hog-cholera serum and hog-cholera virus); U.S.C., Title 26, § 3679 (Bill in chancery to clear title to realty on which the United States has a lien for taxes); U.S.C., Title 28, former § 45 (District courts; practice and procedure in certain cases under the interstate commerce laws), former § 763 (Petition in suit against the United States; service; appearance by district attorney), former § 766 (now § 2409) (Partition suits where United States is tenant in common or joint tenant), former § 902 (now § 2410) (Foreclosure of mortgages or other liens on property in which the United States has an interest). These and similar statutes are modified insofar as they prescribe a different method of service or dispense with the service

REV_00259584

THIS SEARCH	THIS DOCUMENT	GO TO
Next Hit	Forward	New Bills Search
Prev Hit	Back	HomePage
Hit List	Best Sections	Help
	Contents Display

Bill 4 of 4
There are 3 other versions of this bill.

GPO's PDF version of this bill	References to this bill in the Congressional Record	Link to the Bill Summary & Status file.	Printer Friendly Display - 15,520 bytes.[Help]

To authorize an additional permanent judgeship in the district of Idaho, and for other purposes. (Referred to House Committee after being Received from Senate)

S 878 RFH

108th CONGRESS

1st Session

S. 878

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

June 2, 2003

Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

AN ACT

To authorize an additional permanent judgeship in the district of Idaho, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, SECTION 1. DISTRICT JUDGESHIP FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA.

(a) ADDITIONAL PERMANENT DISTRICT JUDGESHIP- The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, 1 additional district judge for the northern district of Alabama.

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENT- The table under section 133(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking the item relating to Alabama and inserting the

REV_00259585

following:

8

3

3.'.

SEC. 2. DISTRICT JUDGESHIPS FOR THE DISTRICT OF ARIZONA.

(a) ADDITIONAL PERMANENT DISTRICT JUDGESHIPS- The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, 2 additional district judges for the district of Arizona.

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENT- The table under section 133(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking the item relating to Arizona and inserting the following:

14.'.

SEC. 3. DISTRICT JUDGESHIPS FOR THE EASTERN AND SOUTHERN DISTRICTS OF CALIFORNIA.

(a) ADDITIONAL PERMANENT DISTRICT JUDGESHIPS- The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate--

(1) 3 additional district judges for the eastern district of California; and

(2) 1 additional district judge for the southern district of California.

(b) CONVERSION OF TEMPORARY JUDGESHIP TO PERMANENT JUDGESHIP- The existing judgeship for the eastern district of California authorized by section 203(c) of the Judicial Improvements Act of 1990 (28 U.S.C. 133 note; Public Law 101-650) shall, as of the date of enactment of this Act, be authorized under section 133 of title 28, United States Code, and the incumbent in that office shall hold the office under section 133 of title 28, United States Code (as amended by this Act).

(c) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENT-

(1) IN GENERAL- The table under section 133(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking the item relating to California and inserting the following:

14

10

27

14.'.

REV_00259586

(2) EFFECTIVE DATE- This subsection shall take effect on the later of--

(A) the date of enactment of this Act; or

(B) July 16, 2003.

SEC. 4. DISTRICT JUDGESHIP FOR THE DISTRICT OF IDAHO.

(a) ADDITIONAL PERMANENT DISTRICT JUDGESHIP- The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, 1 additional district judge for the district of Idaho.

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENT- The table under section 133(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking the item relating to Idaho and inserting the following:

'Idaho

3.'.

SEC. 5. TEMPORARY JUDGESHIP FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF IOWA.

(a) IN GENERAL- The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, 1 additional judge for the northern district of Iowa.

(b) VACANCY NOT FILLED- The first vacancy in the office of district judge in the northern district of Iowa occurring 10 years or more after the confirmation date of the judge named to fill the temporary district judgeship created by this subsection, shall not be filled.

SEC. 6. CONVERSION OF TEMPORARY JUDGESHIP TO PERMANENT JUDGESHIP FOR THE DISTRICT OF NEBRASKA.

(a) IN GENERAL- The existing judgeship for the district of Nebraska authorized by section 203 (c) of the Judicial Improvements Act of 1990 (28 U.S.C. 133 note; Public Law 101-650) shall, as of the date of enactment of this Act, be authorized under section 133 of title 28, United States Code, and the incumbent in that office shall hold the office under section 133 of title 28, United States Code (as amended by this Act).

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS- The table under section 133(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking the item relating to Nebraska and inserting the following:

4.'.

SEC. 7. DISTRICT JUDGESHIPS FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

(a) ADDITIONAL PERMANENT DISTRICT JUDGESHIPS- The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, 2 additional district judges for the eastern district of New York.

REV_00259587

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENT-

(1) IN GENERAL- The table under section 133(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking the item relating to New York and inserting the following:

5

28

17

4.'.

(2) EFFECTIVE DATE- This subsection shall take effect on the later of--

(A) the date of enactment of this Act; or

(B) July 16, 2003.

SEC. 8. TEMPORARY JUDGESHIP FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

(a) IN GENERAL- The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate 1 additional judge for the eastern district of New York.

(b) VACANCY NOT FILLED- The first vacancy in the office of district judge in the eastern district of New York occurring 10 years or more after the confirmation date of the judge named to fill the temporary district judgeship created by this subsection, shall not be filled.

SEC. 9. DISTRICT JUDGESHIP FOR THE DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

(a) ADDITIONAL PERMANENT DISTRICT JUDGESHIP- The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, 1 additional district judge for the district of South Carolina.

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENT- The table under section 133(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking the item relating to South Carolina and inserting the following:

11.'.

SEC. 10. DISTRICT JUDGESHIP FOR THE DISTRICT OF UTAH.

(a) ADDITIONAL PERMANENT DISTRICT JUDGESHIP FOR THE DISTRICT OF UTAH- The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, 1 additional district judge for the district of Utah.

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS- The table under section 133(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking the item relating to Utah and inserting the

REV_00259588

following:

6.'.

SEC. 11. BANKRUPTCY JUDGESHIPS.

(a) SHORT TITLE- This section may be cited as the `Bankruptcy Judgeship Act of 2003'.

(b) AUTHORIZATION FOR ADDITIONAL BANKRUPTCY JUDGESHIPS- The following judgeship positions shall be filled in the manner prescribed in section 152(a)(1) of title 28, United States Code, for the appointment of bankruptcy judges provided for in section 152(a)(2) of such title:

(1) Two additional bankruptcy judgeships for the southern district of New York.

(2) Four additional bankruptcy judgeships for the district of Delaware.

(3) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the district of New Jersey.

(4) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

(5) Three additional bankruptcy judgeships for the district of Maryland.

(6) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the eastern district of North Carolina.

(7) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the district of South Carolina.

(8) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the eastern district of Virginia.

(9) Two additional bankruptcy judgeships for the eastern district of Michigan.

(10) Two additional bankruptcy judgeships for the western district of Tennessee.

(11) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the eastern and western districts of Arkansas.

(12) Two additional bankruptcy judgeships for the district of Nevada.

(13) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the district of Utah.

(14) Two additional bankruptcy judgeships for the middle district of Florida.

(15) Two additional bankruptcy judgeships for the southern district of Florida.

(16) Two additional bankruptcy judgeships for the northern district of Georgia.

(17) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the southern district of Georgia.

(c) TEMPORARY BANKRUPTCY JUDGESHIPS-

REV_00259589

(1) AUTHORIZATION FOR ADDITIONAL TEMPORARY BANKRUPTCY JUDGESHIPS- The following judgeship positions shall be filled in the manner prescribed in section 152(a)(1) of title 28, United States Code, for the appointment of bankruptcy judges provided for in section 152(a)(2) of such title:

(A) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the district of Puerto Rico.

(B) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the northern district of New York.

(C) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the middle district of Pennsylvania.

(D) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the district of Maryland.

(E) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the northern district of Mississippi.

(F) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the southern district of Mississippi.

(G) One additional bankruptcy judgeship for the southern district of Georgia.

(2) VACANCIES-

(A) IN GENERAL- The first vacancy occurring in the office of bankruptcy judge in each of the judicial districts set forth in paragraph (1)--

(i) occurring 5 years or more after the appointment date of the bankruptcy judge appointed under paragraph (1) to such office; and

(ii) resulting from the death, retirement, resignation, or removal of a bankruptcy judge; shall not be filled.

(B) TERM EXPIRATION- In the case of a vacancy resulting from the expiration of the term of a bankruptcy judge not described in subparagraph (A), that judge shall be eligible for reappointment as a bankruptcy judge in that district.

(3) EXTENSION OF EXISTING TEMPORARY BANKRUPTCY JUDGESHIPS-

(A) IN GENERAL- The temporary bankruptcy judgeships authorized for the northern district of Alabama and the eastern district of Tennessee under paragraphs (1) and (9) of section 3(a) of the Bankruptcy Judgeship Act of 1992 (28 U.S.C. 152 note) are extended until the first vacancy occurring in the office of a bankruptcy judge in the applicable district resulting from the death, retirement, resignation, or removal of a bankruptcy judge and occurring 5 years or more after the date of enactment of this Act.

(B) APPLICABILITY OF OTHER PROVISIONS- All other provisions of section 3 of the Bankruptcy Judgeship Act of 1992 (28 U.S.C. 152 note) remain applicable to the temporary bankruptcy judgeships referred to in this subsection.

REV_00259590

(d) TRANSFER OF BANKRUPTCY JUDGESHIP SHARED BY THE MIDDLE DISTRICT OF GEORGIA AND THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA- The bankruptcy judgeship presently shared by the southern district of Georgia and the middle district of Georgia shall be converted to a bankruptcy judgeship for the middle district of Georgia.

(e) CONVERSION OF EXISTING TEMPORARY BANKRUPTCY JUDGESHIPS-

(1) DISTRICT OF DELAWARE- The temporary bankruptcy judgeship authorized for the district of Delaware pursuant to section 3 of the Bankruptcy Judgeship Act of 1992 (28 U.S.C. 152 note), shall be converted to a permanent bankruptcy judgeship.

(2) DISTRICT OF PUERTO RICO- The temporary bankruptcy judgeship authorized for the district of Puerto Rico pursuant to section 3 of the Bankruptcy Judgeship Act of 1992 (28 U.S.C. 152 note), shall be converted to a permanent bankruptcy judgeship.

(f) TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS- Section 152(a)(2) of title 28, United States Code, is amended--

(1) in the item relating to the eastern and western districts of Arkansas, by striking `3' and inserting `4';

(2) in the item relating to the district of Delaware, by striking `1' and inserting `6';

(3) in the item relating to the middle district of Florida, by striking `8' and inserting `10';

(4) in the item relating to the southern district of Florida, by striking `5' and inserting `7';

(5) in the item relating to the northern district of Georgia, by striking `8' and inserting `10';

(6) in the item relating to the middle district of Georgia, by striking `2' and inserting `3';

(7) in the item relating to the southern district of Georgia, by striking `2' and inserting `3';

(8) in the collective item relating to the middle and southern districts of Georgia, by striking `Middle and Southern . . . . . 1';

(9) in the item relating to the district of Maryland, by striking `4' and inserting `7';

(10) in the item relating to the eastern district of Michigan, by striking `4' and inserting `6';

(11) in the item relating to the district of Nevada, by striking `3' and inserting `5';

(12) in the item relating to the district of New Jersey, by striking `8' and inserting `9';

(13) in the item relating to the southern district of New York, by striking `9' and inserting `11';

(14) in the item relating to the eastern district of North Carolina, by striking `2' and inserting `3';

REV_00259591

(15) in the item relating to the eastern district of Pennsylvania, by striking `5' and inserting `6';

(16) in the item relating to the district of Puerto Rico, by striking `2 and inserting `3';

(17) in the item relating to the district of South Carolina, by striking `2' and inserting `3';

(18) in the item relating to the western district of Tennessee, by striking `4' and inserting `6';

(19) in the item relating to the district of Utah, by striking `3' and inserting `4'; and

(20) in the item relating to the eastern district of Virginia, by striking `5' and inserting `6'.

Passed the Senate May 22, 2003.

Attest:

EMILY J. REYNOLDS,

Secretary.

THIS SEARCH	THIS DOCUMENT	GO TO
Next Hit	Forward	New Bills Search
Prev Hit	Back	HomePage
Hit List	Best Sections	Help
	Contents Display

REV_00259592

A PRAYER FOR CALIFORNIA
36th Annual California Prayer Breakfast Thunderbird Ballroom, Red Lion Hotel
Thursday, March 6, 1997

By: Justice Janice R. Brown

Please join me in a prayer for California.

Dear God,

We join in prayer to celebrate this great State and surrender its destiny to you. When we find you in the sacred silence of the redwoods; when we contemplate the perfect beauty of Shasta's peak; when you lay fields of golden poppies and purple irises like a gift at our feet; when sunset spreads its colors over the Pacific like a benediction; when we see all the wondrous things your hands have made, we stand in awe of you. And we know you love us. And we thank you.

[We thank you for the cleansing breath of the Santa Ana's and the howling winds of winter's storms. For the night sky teeming with stars and for the burning sun that warms our fertile valleys. We thank you for giving us minds to seek distant universes and hearts filled with the longing to know. We thank you for making us weak enough to love beauty and strong enough to endure whatever comes. When the earth moves beneath our feet and the waters overwhelm our efforts to control the flood, you are yet with us. Do not let us forget that it is the earth and the water that sustain our lives. And it is through the work of rebuilding that we glimpse immortality.]*

We give thanks today for everything that makes California a place of exhilaration and enchantment. We thank you for the good and the bad. We accept the good with gratitude and the bad knowing we can make it better. What needs to be changed will be changed when we are changed. Help us to change. Heal our cynicism, Father. Cure us of the disease of indifference. Take this plague of violence from our midst.

REV_00259609

Forgive us for our many failures, our lapses, our lack of faith. We know you keep all your promises and love everything that you have made. We pray today for a new spirit. Grant us, dear God, a total transformation. Send us a miracle. Send us two or three. Whatever it takes to convince us that we can make a world defined by our highest aspirations and not our lowest appetites.

Break our chains so the truth can set us free. Remove the walls that separate us. Remove the anger and the rage. Remove from our hearts the illusion that we are separate. Let us all, people of every color and every language and every religion, understand that we are members of a single tribe and through you, our common Father, redeemer of broken dreams, we share one heart and one destiny. Remove from our minds the tendency to blame. Instill in each of us a personal and powerful passion for justice.

We ask your blessings for those who lead us. Make them great enough to be the conduits of your power; humble enough to serve faithfully, diligently seeking the common good; wise enough to see the innocence and the brotherhood of those who oppose them; and brave enough to speak the truth and thus lead us into a new freedom, a new politics, a new hope.

Reanimate in us the spirit of integrity so that the beauty and greatness of this state will flower once again in the hearts of its people. Help us not to be afraid of malice and not to be dismayed by fools. Remind us of the eternal truths and the permanent things so that we will not confuse self-indulgence with self-discipline so that we will know the difference between hype and hope, so that we will stop

---

* This language was omitted from the prayer presentation on March 6 due to time constraints.

REV_00259610

pretending that license and liberty are the same. Help us to realize the dreams of those who came before us, that we might live in honesty and charity and excellence with our neighbors and so that we might pass on a legacy to our children and their children worthy of free people.

Dear God,

Fill our hearts with love.

Our minds with humility.

Our spirits with soaring light.

Reignite the flame in us so we, as living fire, may yet become a beacon of hope and goodness and peace and freedom.

Renew us.

Repair us.

Revive us again.

Dear God, please, bless California.

Amen.

REV_00259611

How Open Do We Have To Be?
San Diego Chamber of Commerce
National Business Women's Forum
Thursday, March 27, 1997
7:30 A.M.
Emerald Wyndham Hotel
San Diego, CA

By Justice Janice R. Brown

Thank you. I want to thank Midge Costanza for extending the invitation to join you and all of the people who have gone to so much trouble to make my stay so enjoyable. It is always a pleasure to come to San Diego. I keep trying to convince my colleagues to agree that -- since we are violating our authorizing statute by having the court headquartered in San Francisco, we might as well go all the way and move the court to San Diego. The weather is better; the people are nicer; and you don't have nearly as many bridges. So far I've only gotten one vote for that proposition -- my own.

Recently I had the good fortune to stumble upon a book by Rabbi Harold Kushner called "How Good Do We Have to Be?" It is one of those small delightful books filled with practical wisdom and good sense. Rabbi Kushner points out how much grief and anguish is added to individual human lives by our determination to be perfectly good and by our self-disgust -- the coals of fire we heap upon our own heads when we fail to achieve this mythical perfection. And, of course, we fail over and over again because we are only human. The rabbi's point is not that we should not strive. Striving is what makes us human. But he suggests we should accept the fact that failure is part of the process. That what is required is not perfection, but rather integrity. What he calls wholeness. [Expand this definition]

He illustrates his point with an adult fable by Shel Silverstein. It is the story of a circle that has a piece missing. He goes on a journey rolling through the world recognizing, as in the parable with which I began this discussion, that we will always be flawed. That's okay. Imperfection is part of the human condition. In fact, Revel says it "is a mistake to fault liberal society for lacking an ideal." On the contrary, "this is what renders it noble." The whole evolution of the West, in his view, has been "to make an individual who is free and even obliged to be the author of his own destiny and capable of doing this."

REV_00259612

> "The tragedy is that until our own times, so many individuals have shirked before this prospect, fearing mediocrity, anguish, loneliness. So they invented collective madness to avoid their own responsibilities, on the threshold of free and liberal civilization. Totalitarianism is a deadly substitute for man's self-improvement."

Second, I recommend to you a document drafted as part of the bicentennial celebration called the Williamsburg Charter. It offers four guidelines for conducting civil public debate.

"First, those who claim the right to dissent should assume the responsibility to debate. This combination implies that 'the characteristic American formula of individual liberty complemented by respect for the opinions of others [will] permit differences to be asserted, yet a broad, active community of understanding to be sustained.'

"Second, those who claim the right to criticize should assume the responsibility to comprehend. This suggests a critical difference between a 'genuine tolerance' and a 'debased tolerance.' As the charter puts its, 'Genuine tolerance considers contrary views fairly and judges them on merit. Debased tolerance so refrains from making any judgment that it refuses to listen at all. Genuine tolerance honestly weighs honest differences and promotes both impartiality and pluralism. Debased tolerance results in indifference to the differences that vitalize a pluralistic democracy.'

REV_00259621

"Third, those who claim the right to influence should accept the responsibility not to inflame. When ultimate principles are at stake in public life, it is both natural and very easy for each side to incite the other to defensiveness and hostility. After all, what one side of the cultural divide views as a desacralization, the other views as a constitutional right, and vice versa. A commitment to both the social and moral bonds of democratic civility would seem to require a caution and respect (based in common citizenship) in the manner in which ideas and agendas are put forward.

"Fourth, those who claim the right to participate should accept the responsibility to persuade. Among other things, this means that arguments for public policy 'should be more than private convictions shouted out loud. For persuasion to be principled, private convictions would be translated into publicly accessible claims. Such claims should be made publicly accessible for two reasons: first, because they must engage those who do not share the same private convictions; and second, because they should be directed toward the common good.' "

Third, we should redefine the public debate to give it a more human scale. As De Tocqueville noted in his travels through America, democracy flourishes in small scale (decentralized or local) settings. This may be as good a reason as any to argue in favor of smaller government and stronger communities.

Finally, I will close with the final thoughts from Revel's book:

REV_00259622

"Democracy depends, to function well, on citizens being autonomous individuals. This means that culture is understood to provide a capacity to sustain oneself, escaping from the emptiness and the loneliness by the resources of one's own mind. Education is ever more important as societies grow more democratic. The purpose of education is not to prepare for a job; it is, far more, a preparation for understanding and giving meaning to civilization in which one lives. Only the cultural maturity of the majority will allow democracy to last. Otherwise fanaticism and violence will motivate people. They will be their only way of filling the spiritual void of their existence, by replacing individual liberty with collective exultation.

"Democracy allows free men to be born, but free men enable democracy to last."

REV_00259623

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Books

Allan Bloom, The Closing of the American Mind (Simon & Schuster, 1987)

Zbigneiw Brzezinski, Out of Control (Collier Books, 1993)

Francis Fukuyama, The End of History and the Last Man (Avon Books, 1992)

James Davison Hunter, Before the Shooting Begins, Searching for Democracy in America's Culture War (The Free Press, 1994)

Articles

William Rasberry, Discovered: A New Definition of Ethics (March 17, 1997) San Diego Union Tribune, p. G-3

Jane Kennedy, Ebonics Furor Articulates a Real Problem (March 17, 1997) San Diego Union Tribune, p. G-1

George F. Will, Kerrey is Painfully Candid . . . (March 16, 1997) San Diego Union Tribune, p. G-2

Carol Whiteside, Smaller Government: Stronger Communities Opportunities in Downsizing Government (May 1995)

REV_00259624

looking for his missing piece. He finds lots of pieces along the way: some are too big; some are too small; some too narrow. None of them fit just right. But because he has a piece missing, he is not able to roll smoothly. He rolls very slowly. And because of his missing piece he has time to notice the colors and the light. He has a chance to appreciate the flowers beside the path. And then one day, he finds his missing piece. It fits perfectly. And once he has it in place, he rolls along at an incredible speed. But he realizes that he is no longer seeing the colors and the seasons and the flowers. So he takes out the missing piece and leaves it by the side of the road and then goes on his way, looking for his missing piece. I think this may be more of a fable for our times than may at first appear. The rabbi's point, of course, is that a person may have integrity (be whole) without being perfect.

It occurred to me that it might be profitable to apply this idea to our consideration of government. In fact, De Tocqueville, who seems to have thought of everything sooner and more clearly than everybody else, says something similar in his book, Democracy in America. He says candidly, that compared to the French government of that era, American government is woefully inefficient. But he argues that is one of its strengths. Every project is so thoroughly discussed and debated that everyone feels they have a hand in its solution. Of course, that emphasis on local government and community life has almost disappeared in the modern political realm, but the positive qualities of imperfection might be something we should consider reviving.

This morning, I will attempt to explore (very briefly) the logical limits of a commitment to openness. "How Open Do We Have to Be?" A number of different words could be substituted here. We might ask how pure or how perfect does democratic capitalism have to be? Like Rabbi Kushner, my thesis is a simple one. I believe we can be seduced by this dream of perfection in a way that will ultimately kill the very thing we seek to perfect. My grandmother might approach this with an affirmation rather than a question. She would say: "It's a fine thing to have an open mind. But your mind shouldn't be so open everything in it falls out."

REV_00259613

I realize that even to question openness as the primary virtue of American democracy is to be guilty of heresy. But as Alan Bloom points out openness may be in the eye of the beholder.

> "Openness used to be the virtue that permitted us to seek the good by using reason. It now means accepting everything and denying reason's power."

In his book, The Closing of the American Mind, Bloom theorizes that our perspective on rational thought and knowledge itself has changed. We have accepted doctrines of openness and relativism to such an extent that we have abandoned reason for fear it may lead to intolerance. The true effect of such blind allegiance to openness is that we now refuse to seek any truth at all. In a word, our minds have become closed to the reality of truth. "The unrestrained and thoughtless pursuit of openness, without recognizing the inherent political, social, or cultural problems of openness as the goal of nature, has rendered openness meaningless." He concludes:

> "The United States is one of the highest and most extreme achievements of the rational quest for the good life according to nature. What makes its political structure possible is the use of the rational principles of natural right to found a people . . . . Or, to put it otherwise, the regime established here promised untrammelled freedom to reason--not to everything indiscriminately, but to reason, the essential freedom that justifies other freedoms. . . . An openness that denies the special claim of reason bursts the mainspring keeping this regime in motion."

Bloom says in fact that the goals of education have changed from the education of the democratic person to the education of the democratic personality. The old view was that by accepting a notion of universal rights, people found a basis of unity and sameness in the light of which differences in class, race, religion, and national origin tended to recede. The recent education in openness abandons all that. The only virtue is openness. But, he asks, "when there is no shared goals or vision of the public good, is the social contract any longer possible?"

REV_00259614

Francis Fukuyama, in his book, The End of History and the Last Man, puts this even more bluntly.

> "Democratic societies tend to promote a belief in the equality of all lifestyles and values. They do not tell their citizens how they should live, or what will make them happy, virtuous, or great. Instead, they cultivate the virtue of toleration, which becomes the chief virtue in democratic societies."

Of course, no one is in favor of intolerance. Openness seems to be one of those things like truth, justice, and the American way (motherhood and apple pie); who can be against it. Nevertheless, as in other aspects of our lives, too much of a good thing can have its dark side.

As Fukuyama notes: "It becomes particularly difficult for people in democratic societies to take questions with real moral content seriously in public life. Morality involves a distinction between better and worse, good and bad, which seems to violate the democratic principle of tolerance." It is for this reason, he says, that the last man becomes obsessed with his own personal health and safety. "In America today, we feel entitled to criticize another person's smoking habits but not his or her religious beliefs or moral behavior."

Query whether we could have fought a civil war on the question of slavery in an era of openness in which all views are equally valid? In a society so transformed that we now believe there is no right or wrong, we are left with a single gauge by which to judge all actions and all outcomes: Our feelings. We need no greater justification for any position we care to take. We can say: "This is how I feel. My feelings are valid." End of conversation. On this scale, there is no difference between the feelings of Mother Teresa and the militiaman who feels he is justified in blowing up a preschool full of toddlers.

REV_00259615

It may seem that relying on feeling doesn't matter very much. What's the big deal? There are two ways in which it matters very much. First, we greatly increase the chances of being led into error in our political decisions. In his book, Democracy Against Itself, Jean Francois Revel says unself-consciously that the "whole world needs democracy in order to survive or to be reborn." But he notes: "the more democratic societies become, the more complex become the issues and the more difficult the choices among desired but incompatible solutions." In this confusion, conducive to demagoguery, "tricks must not become the ultimate element in the arsenal of campaigns -- a grotesque dance of mutual alienation between the voter and the candidate, wherein the latter grow more manipulative and at the same time enslaved by public opinion, which they themselves deform." It is not enough to say democracy is a good regime because the people cannot be wrong. The people are often wrong and are even more often led into error. It is, Revel says, "despite this sorry reality," that democracy is the least bad regime.

Noting that politicians no longer win elections by telling the truth (indeed they scarcely try to find out what it is), Revel suggests the successful campaign nowadays is "one that severs the link between the voters' common sense and reality."

He concludes that an additional cause of the disappearance of democracy where it should be strongest is "the improvement of the means of persuasion, obsession with public relations, the appeal to feelings instead of critical reflection, the supremacy of affirmative rather than demonstrative statements, all of the tricks of communication which is the art whereby a leader gets himself judged on the basis of the impression he puts across rather than his record or his proposed programs -- lead voters to forget the facts, to lose sight of the real issues and their contexts. Voters have a growing difficulty in expressing through their ballots a choice based on real results or real reflection on the future.

REV_00259616

Secondly, sentiment is simply not a basis for substantive democracy. As James Hunter says: "When the truth claims at the heart of culture are hollowed out, when their substance cannot be defended or criticized, there is little left besides feelings." But sentiment constitutes very shaky ground for sustaining democratic ideals. Shallow democracy is only capable of producing a shallow self-defense.

Thus, a handful of advocates and activists are able to wield enormous power. We literally cede the power of government to the Sony soundbite. Hamlet said, "To be or not to be was the question." He was wrong. "How do you feel?" is the question. A handful of people with picket signs become more powerful than thousands of people peacefully participating. There is little entertainment value in constructive dialogue. The media wants conflict, pathos, ethos, and if possible bathos. The more maudlin the better.

A recent example. A report on NPR about the threatened federal crackdown on Indian gaming. The report began by saying the United States Attorney had asked tribes operating slot machines to sign a voluntary agreement to cease using the machines which violate California law. Although most tribes had agreed, several in Southern California vowed to resist the order. The rest of the report had interviews with tribal leaders talking about what an economic boom the casinos had been to tribes formerly dependent on welfare; the report noted the casinos were major employers in the area and featured an interview with one of the casino workers who was asked -- you guessed it -- "How do you feel." Her response. "Just devastated. It's terrible. I don't feel the casino is doing anything wrong." The segment ended with Steven Seagal, apparently as a spokesman for the Indians, reciting the many broken promises between the Indians and the federal government.

REV_00259617

Without expressing any view about the merits of this, I can tell you exactly who won the Sony soundbite contest.

In this, I suppose we must accept being both sinned against and sinning. Our democratic education has taught us to remain in the shallow end of the pool. Even so, we are remarkably ill informed. Legal illiteracy and misinformation are the rule, not the exception. As Hunter describes it: "Americans have strong opinions, but they seem to venture on the seas of various controversies without much ballast of knowledge." They are incapable of articulating much beyond their feelings. They have remarkably few resources on which to draw.

The key institutions which should mediate these controversies are often engaged in the dispute as superficially and tendentiously as the partisans. Professional associations, political parties and religious institutions often become de facto special interest groups themselves and end up carrying out the political agendas of one side or the other. What we end up with is power politics with a vengeance. Brute force. Not only power politics but negative politics in which the object is to delegitimize and discredit the opposition. What one author characterizes as "a soft imperialism" where words are weapons and debates are occasions to intimidate if not verbally bludgeon one's opponent. In the world of power politics there is no percentage in trying to be reasonable.

What information citizens can obtain comes from the media and will be superficial by design. Newspapers, radio, and television are dramatic media. They need the interplay of antagonists and protagonists, heroes and villains, victims and victimizers. The voices that do not fit neatly into the grid of inflamed rhetoric -- the thoughtfully ambivalent and scholarly -- are simply ignored. Public discourse thus becomes much more polarized than the nation is. The other aspect of this -- and perhaps the most significant is the tendency to reduce every controversy to the struggle for power. Every issue is framed in terms of who has power and who does not.

REV_00259618

To quote from Barbara Brotman of the Chicago Tribune: "We've gotten bogged down in reporting the political ups and downs of the sides, like we're covering sports and we've gotten away from reporting the issues." To put it another way, "when the cultural, moral, and aesthetic dimensions of a controversy are ignored, public expectations cannot help but be framed by the zero-sum logic of winners and losers."

A recent column by William Raspberry, entitled "Discovered: A New Definition of Ethics," brought this to light for me. Raspberry begins by lamenting that his small class at Duke seemed incapable of working up any more outrage about the latest campaign fundraising scandal. Thinking they simply did not understand what was normal in the buying and selling of political access, Raspberry offered several hypothetical examples of selling his column in the newspaper. To his dismay, the vast majority of his students saw nothing wrong with taking money to advocate some organization's side of a controversy even if he did not believe in the righteousness of their cause. He muses that maybe we are not seeing cynicism or indifference to unethical behavior, but a new definition of "ethics that allows for the buying and selling of virtually anything." He says:

> "Maybe they have come to see the media's hot-breadth pursuit of political scandal the way they view professional boxing -- as a game that is sometimes boring, sometimes entertaining but irrelevant to their lives. What are the Lincoln Bedroom story, the Newt Gingrich affair or Whitewater about? One may as well ask what the fight between Evander Holyfield and Mike Tyson was about."

He ends by saying: "It has been remarked of late that the media, driven by their own economic survival, are becoming more tabloid every day." Wouldn't it be something if they also became the last surviving arbiter of public virtue? Now there's a scary thought.

REV_00259619

The question, of course, is what then shall we do. We have shifted the paradigm. From our vantage point at the end of history, we exude a world weary cynicism. It is hard for us to believe in anything. The irony is we must believe in something or be destroyed. Democratic capitalism may be the last regime left standing. But its triumph at this stage owes more to the weakness and wickedness of totalitarian regimes than to its own agility.

Fukuyama offers this chilling assessment.

> "Relativism--the doctrine that maintains that all values are merely relative and which attacks 'privileged perspectives--must ultimately end up undermining democratic and tolerant values as well.' Relativism is not a weapon that can be aimed selectively at the enemies one chooses. It fires indiscriminately shooting out the legs of not only the 'absolutisms,' dogmas, and certainties of western tradition, but the tradition's emphasis on tolerance, diversity, and freedom of thought as well. If nothing can be true absolutely, if all values are culturally determined, then cherished principles like human equality have to go by the wayside as well."

This is true even though liberal democracy may constitute the best solution to the human problem. As Revel puts it: "Men are able to conceive and build political institutions that are more rational than they are, and to freely place themselves under their rule. However, it is unlikely that we will ever be capable of building a world that is qualitatively better than we ourselves are. There is within us an unchanged impulse which prefers failure to success, misfortune to happiness, might over right, violence over justice."

There are many ways in which we might begin to recapture the ideal we hold in our minds. There are a few things we could try. First, I think we must give up this idea of the silver bullet, the dream of perfection, the universal solution. Our hopes ought to be altogether more modest. Part of this modesty is

REV_00259620

It's Not That Easy Being Green
(A Philosophical Perspective From Kermit the Frog)
UCLA Law School Alumni Association Luncheon
The City Club
April 30, 1997

By Justice Janice R. Brown

Good afternoon. Thank you. I want to thank Dean Prager for extending the invitation and all of you for such a warm welcome. I am truly happy to be here. This has been the most difficult month I have spent on the court. When Ron George, the new Chief, was appointed, he changed the schedule for the compilation of court statistics from the calendar year to a true court-term calendar which runs from September to September. He did this to avoid what had come to be known as "December Dementia" — three weeks in December when a large portion of the court's yearly workload would have to be completed. The change to a true term means the June calendar represents the last opportunity to get cases completed before September. Thus, December Dementia has now been replaced with "April Angst."

Since I had never experienced this phenomenon, and foolishly thought this would be a slow time for the court, I followed up a packed two-day calendar in Los Angeles with participation in a moot court program at the Southwestern University School of Law; the annual judges dinner in Hanford the following week; a panel discussion at the Appellate Court Institute in Palm Springs the week after that; and finally this luncheon. Those were my spare-time activities. During regular working hours, I had to review, comment upon, or take exception to, no less than 25 circulating calendars and half a dozen opinions being prepared for release. We did not rid ourselves of the bulge in the court's workload, we just shifted it to another season. And tax season at that. Looking on the bright side, I suppose it's better to be feeling evil in April than December.

REV_00259625

When I say I am delighted to be here, I am completely sincere. I am thrilled to be still standing. If I can last another two days, I will celebrate (May 2) my first full year as a member of the California Supreme Court. It seems longer doesn't it? June 19 is the 20-year anniversary of my graduation from the UCLA School of Law. And that seems much shorter. Okay, I'm going to talk a little bit about the adventure I am having because this is a family discussion and UCLA played a critical role (even if largely off-screen). I suppose this segment could be called First Impressions.

What is it like being the junior member of a state supreme court in a state so large and populous it seems to be another country? Is it different? Well, I have to tell you the truth. In the words of a froggy philosopher of my acquaintance, "It's not that easy being green." I have always liked Kermit's whimsical signature song because it suggests not only the ordinary ways in which we use the idea of greenness — to be new, fresh, untested — but also acknowledges the special and positive dimensions of being different.

So I will limit myself to sharing a few of the things I think I have learned — some more startling than others. First, I have been forcibly reminded of the wisdom of the ages: There really is no free lunch. In the old days, when someone said they wanted to "honor" me they just meant I should stop by, enjoy a complimentary lunch or dinner, be introduced, and have a good time. These days I'm expected to make a few remarks. The bad news is that this is a speech. The good news is it's a teeny one.

> Sudden Revelation No. 1. Supreme Court justices are expected to earn their calories. And this is a good thing. It is how we maintain that lean and hungry look that keeps appellate lawyers awake at night.

REV_00259626

Second, one of the things I loved about the Court of Appeal was its air of anonymity. Most people did not know what it was and certainly not where it was or who was part of it. And, except for a handful of appellate specialists, nobody cared. I remember thinking I had finally found my niche and launched myself into complete obscurity.

The Supreme Court has a much higher profile. Many more people know my face. I don't have fans or groupies, but I am recognized — often in unlikely places, like dripping with sweat on the stairmaster at the athletic club or buying shoes in Macy's. Meeting the public has not been so bad. Most of them have actually been quite nice and have offered words of encouragement. What is even more disconcerting, every word written or spoken is likely to be minutely scrutinized. Of course, this has always been true and the dissemination of opinions is a large part of the reason for the court's existence. But information has now become an industry — perhaps the premier industry in America — and the competition for the new angle, the odd spin, the hint of controversy has altered the nature of our interest.

Writing 20 years ago, Bayless Manning diagnosed the United States as having hyperlexis — a malady he described as a pathological condition caused by an overactive lawmaking gland. He paints a graphic word picture of this activity:

> "Law has always been one of the garrulous professions, and modern communications gadgetry makes it all too easy to record, reproduce, and distribute legal words. As in the wake of a great ship, mewing seagulls follow so legal commentators pursue the societies law making machines, squabbling over the newly emitted material."

Whether one agrees with Manning's rather uncharitable characterization or not, the sheer volume of commentary is daunting and the immediacy with which legal pronouncements are turned into political issues seems likely to alter forever the stately, evolutionary progress of the common law tradition. In the past 20 years, the trends Manning chronicled have only intensified. As more and more new organizations come into being, the news cycles faster and faster. A story that used to last two or three days now lasts two or three hours. Consequently, the media no longer wait for news, they create it.

REV_00259627

Newspapers often report what the court will do before it does it. And judges get credit or blame for things they did not do and could not have done. So far, I have seen at least four reports in which I am identified as one of the judges responsible for the Romero decision. This kind of haphazard reporting could have a positive side. I have been compiling a list of other things I would like to get credit for which I did not do. Maybe I could take credit for Marbury v. Madison or the dissent in Plessy v. Ferguson which celebrated its 100th anniversary last year. I certainly would have dissented if I had been there.

> Revelation No. 2. In a world dominated by soundbites, perception becomes reality. There is a great irony. Those who are in the business of producing opinions are discouraged from having any of their own.

Third, the differences between this court and the Court of Appeal are obvious, but profound. I did not think so when I was on the Court of Appeal. The work of the Court of Appeal is to write opinions. The task on the Supreme Court is the same. But there the similarity ends. On the Court of Appeal, you spend almost all of your time writing opinions. On this court, you spend a lot of time deciding to decide. This seems like the simplest thing in the world, but it is actually quite complex. H. W. Perry in his book Deciding to Decide — a discussion of United States Supreme Court certiorari procedures — begins his discussion of jurisdiction with this gem:

REV_00259628

> "The State Supreme Court refused to deny a lower court ruling to quash an appeal to rehear an appeal by the Circuit Court to regain jurisdiction in a previous case. In the majority opinion, Justice Memphis Cumbrun wrote, 'In the opinion of this court . . . we don't know what the heck is going on here.' "

The complaint is often made that the court does not take enough of particular kinds of cases. From the court's point of view, the perspective is different. We are often desperately looking for the right vehicle. Many cases are rejected simply because they are so procedurally intricate or so factually convoluted we fear we can never fight our way through the thicket to decide the merits. The right case, at the right time, with the right facts, in just the right procedural posture, is a thing of beauty and it is extremely rare.

Moreover, because the court is trying to carefully select cases which present new, novel issues or questions on which reasonable minds and reasonable courts of appeal can differ, a large percentage of the cases selected are quite difficult. In contrast, since litigants have virtually free access to the courts of appeal, a large percentage of the cases are, once examined, easily resolved. Perhaps 80 percent of court of appeal cases fall into this category. So judges can spend a lot of time on the 20 percent of cases that present tough issues. On the supreme court, 70 percent of the cases are difficult. Moreover, the authoring judge needs three votes instead of one. As might be expected, consensus is much harder to achieve. Every judge on the court must consider every case in light of the court's precedents and their own inclinations.

> Revelation No. 3. To achieve unanimity, the authoring judge must overcome the objections of every other judge or get them to come over, AND IT AIN'T EASY.

Which brings me to my final comment and back to Kermit. About the positive dimensions of being different. In 1977, the year I graduated from law school, the first African American, Wiley Manuel, was appointed to the California Supreme Court. The first woman, Rose Bird, was confirmed a few days later. We have come to accept (and indeed to expect) that the high court will reflect differences of gender, ethnicity, culture, and religious conviction. We did not achieve this easily, but we did achieve it. I think we have come to understand that our similarities as human beings are more important than our differences of gender or skin color or language. And as wide as the divide has been between us on these issues, it has always been easier for us to accommodate our cultural diversity than our differences of opinion.

REV_00259629

De Tocqueville, writing in 1835 said: "I know of no country in which there is so little independence of mind and real freedom of discussion as in America." Contrasting the tyranny of the majority with the authority of the king, he noted: "The authority of a king is physical, and controls the actions of men without subduing their will. But the majority possesses a power which is physical and moral at the same time, which acts upon the will as much as upon the actions, and represses not only all contest, but all controversy." As a result, he concluded, "freedom of opinion does not exist in America."

Judge Learned Hand recognized this tendency was amplified by the increasingly homogenized mass society that characterized American society in the Twentieth Century. In many of his speeches, he questioned how democracy might survive amid the pressure toward conformity. Writing in 1920 to his friend Walter Lippmann, he lamented that never before had there been so many people "who felt alike, thought alike, ate alike, slept alike, hated alike . . . loved alike, wore the same clothes, used the same furniture in the same houses, went to the same games, saw the same plays, approved the same sentiments . . . ."

If you've been reading the legal newspapers or the advance sheets, the members of this court, however, are in no danger of suffering a crushing conformity. The court represents, as it should, a broad range of life experiences, perspectives, and philosophies. And though it is our task to produce symphonies and not solos, that does not mean the separate instruments are not heard. But, it is in melding our voices that the work is done. The beauty and utility of the work of a collegial court is this accommodation of differences to create a stronger, richer context for understanding.

REV_00259630

I do not mean to suggest that accommodation is easy, painless, or graceful. Usually, it is not. The paradigm of collegiality to which we aspire — fully informed and intelligent participation of every judge in every case — is not for wimps. Disagreements may be sharp; criticisms breathtakingly frank. Revising, restructuring, rethinking is a time-consuming process. In fact, as Chief Justice Traynor once noted, trying to craft a judicial opinion, to see if an analysis "will write" is the hardest kind of thinking. The result, though, is an improved judicial product no single judge could have created.

That is the final insight which has been evolving over the last two years and which comes into clear focus in the work of this court. The tough discipline of the appellate court is not only to capture thoughts and give them structure and coherence within the pattern of the law but to be able to defend both articulation and result.

Like Kermit said, "It's not that easy being green." It is difficult to be different. But it has its rewards. It occurs to me that if we imposed the same discipline on politicians, public officials, and bureaucrats, it might have some interesting results. Suppose that before you could run for office, or emcee a talk show, or be an advocate for some interest group, you had to put your opinions in written form, write them persuasively enough to convince three other thoughtful, conscientious people who have different views before you could make any public statement. Undoubtedly, the airwaves would be quieter. Civic discourse would be immeasurably improved. And we might all be the better for it.

Kermit ends his song this way:

REV_00259631

BUT IF BEING GREEN IS ALL THERE IS TO BE
IT CAN MAKE YOU WONDER
BUT WHY WONDER WHY WONDER WHY
I'M GREEN. AND IT'S BEAUTIFUL AND IT'S WHAT I WANT TO BE.

I could end here too because — somewhat to my surprise — I am where I want to be. The California Supreme Court was never my ambition. It was not in my plans. As a youngster and even into my college years, I was a semi-serious poet. In my senior year, I was asked to participate in a poetry reading and told to write my own introduction — what I thought would be important to tell the audience. I said: "The critical question at this time in my life is whether the heart of a Black woman, the mind of an economist, and the soul of a poet can continue to peacefully coexist or will they have to go their separate ways."

After I was appointed to the Third District Court of Appeal, I remember walking into the Library and Courts Building and seeing the words carved into the pediment: "Into the highlands of the mind." I realized UCLA was the first giant step on this journey.

The judge exists because of the UCLA School of Law. I know some of my professors are cringing, thinking, "I hope people don't hold me responsible for this." I hasten to absolve the faculty of any personal responsibility. But, UCLA, a state institution, was the only sort of professional school I could afford. I was a parent, I could work only part-time, and I had no family resources to finance my education. Moreover, because I was able to manage with a modest amount of loans, after law school I could afford to forego the search for a huge salary and was able to follow my inclination to work in the public sector. And that has a lot to do with my becoming a judge.

REV_00259632

I know concern is often expressed about the level of the subsidy provided to students in state-sponsored professional schools. But I hope some consideration will be given in the equation to unexpected returns. The rule of reciprocity. When you put more in; you get more out.

When I arrived at the Third District Court of Appeal, my chambers contained a bare desk, a chair, a telephone. But the work was waiting, briefs and records lined up on my book bench like little soldiers. I picked up the first set of briefs and a pad. I was immediately absorbed. The world went away. I finished my first opinion before I paused to add any personal touches to the office. When I finished it, I had the most poignant, most powerful sense of homecoming I have ever experienced. I knew the answer to that old question, knew the answer was yes. All those different parts of myself survive, indeed they thrive, in the judge.

Thank you.

REV_00259633

CJER RESEARCH ATTORNEYS INSTITUTE
September 26, 1997, Noon
Hyatt Alicante Hotel, Anaheim

RESISTANCE IS FUTILE

When I received this invitation, I was faced with the most difficult problem givers of speeches have to confront. I thought it was very nice of you to extend the invitation. I was flattered. I was honored. But I asked myself what can I possibly say. I could talk about the transition from the Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court, but I would have to label that speech "Paradise Lost" and that says about all there is to say on that subject. I could tell you about the glamorous life of an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, but most of you would know that's a lie. The most exciting thing that has happened to me at Marathon Plaza was a particularly nasty encounter with our state-of-the-art security system which left me (at 9:00 p.m.) locked in an elevator that would not move, would not open, and which after about 90 seconds went completely dark. But, I probably found that a great deal more exciting than you would.

Finally, I hit upon the perfect topic. I could talk about you. Or rather about what you do. Actually, the relationship of judges and research attorneys is a rather mysterious subject — though not as mysterious as it used to be before Professor Barnett started accusing us of selling our judicial soul for the comforts of bureaucracy, the California Lawyer started publishing articles called "The Shadow Court," and newspaper reporters started asking impertinent questions like: "How much of this stuff do you actually write?" Barnett's article is simply taking a page from a much more thoughtful discussion of this subject by Judge Richard Posner. (Judge Posner is focusing on the federal courts.)

REV_00259634

discussion, the attorney admitted the decision to leave the court was hastened by continued exposure to a PR process that seemed to thrive on destruction for the sheer joy of destruction. I have no doubt the PR process was intended to be wholly positive, to enhance the quality of the court's work. Sometimes it works that way. But all too often, a process designed to be constructive, to point out mistakes, flaws in reasoning, and inaccuracies degenerates into some sort of demolition derby. My own staff expressed this sentiment a bit more humorously. They awarded me the Chambers Medal of Valor (designed especially for the occasion) for, in the words of the citation, "conspicuous bravery in submitting unflinchingly to the calendar memorandum vetting process." I treasure the medal. I plan to have it framed.

We often make light of the savaging to which majority calendars are subjected and shrug it off as part of the process; and while I am less and less certain such rigorous thought control is necessary, I am more and more convinced that it is inevitable. Indeed, Posner may be right but for the wrong reason. He criticizes current judicial opinions for exhibiting a "standard style" which "draws a veil over reality, making it harder to see exactly what the judge is doing." These opinions, he notes, "do everything they can to conceal novelty and to disguise imagination as deduction." Professor Vining criticizes the bureaucratic writing style for producing opinions which seem "written by no one at all."

> "They are too much things of patchwork, things which seem, on their face, to express more the institutional process of their making than the . . . reasoning of the author and those persuaded with him."

In his view, judicial opinions "exert their authority over us and command our respect and serious attention because and to the extent that we hear a person speaking through them. Their authority rests upon the sense of mind behind them."

REV_00259643

If these perceptions are correct, the problem goes beyond the simple complaint of over-delegation. Posner, and others, think the bureaucratic style reflects timidity on the part of staff. It may be instead that the institutional dynamic is more akin to mob rule. Thus, the pressure on judges as well as staff is in the direction of relentless conformity. The desire is to make the target small; to write opinions that are innocuous, uncontroversial, in every way unobjectionable. In other words, the bureaucratic style is not an unintended consequence of the process; it is the purpose for the process.

The sense of style Posner praises, the sense of mind Vining seeks becomes not just unusual, it is deemed inappropriate. Nevertheless, I believe the decline in the quality of judicial writing — if it has declined — cannot be blamed solely on different institutional arrangements.

It is true the tug of institutional arrangements works on us at some subterranean level and it is precisely at that level that the judges best work is done or undone. As Llewellyn says, it is the conscious struggle to take a new look which "may bring something better into focus."

> "The queer subconscious may this time be ready to give up an out which has been cooking down in there since the last time the court walked through these legal sandbars. In this effort to take a [fresh] look each time, the appellate court's job, their duty [is to] freshen up consciously . . . . It must not be what all habit, all routine, all weariness cry out that it is and has to be: just another of the shopworn same."

Of course, not every opinion requires a divine spark. There are subjects which will maintain their pedestrian character even in the hands of the master jurist. Judges have more to do than ever before. This year our court filed 99 majority opinions, authored 104 separate opinions, reviewed more than 7,000 petitions for review (that works out to about 135 per week); participated in oral arguments and performed countless other tasks, both administrative and judicial. The judicial system ain't what it used to be. I can only look with admiration and envy upon Hand's famous admonition to his law clerks: "I write, you listen." I would like to emulate his singular devotion to his judicial duty. I wonder, though, if we would produce as many "great" judges even if the judges sitting today wrote every word of every opinion. Were those flashes of inspiration and insight so prized by Posner glimpsed in majority opinions or only in separate opinions later adopted by the majority of the court. It occurs to me that greatness is not a goal of the appellate project. The need to woo three other judges to your point of view is a strong incentive to remove all flair, to erase marks of individuality. People often criticize the majority opinions of the Supreme Court as sounding like something written by a committee. But that, of course, is exactly what it is.

REV_00259644

It is also true that the weight of institutional arrangements tends to flatten us out, to create a sort of mass culture in which our differences are homogenized. But, again, I suspect that judges come to the bench flatter than they once were. In her book, Rights Talk, Mary Ann Glendon theorizes that American political discourse has become thinner and thinner because its leaders have become ever narrower. She notes "[f]ew American statesmen today are — as Abraham Lincoln was — equally at home with the Bible and Blackstone." Our language which has become increasingly legalistic draws on fewer cultural, intellectual, or philosophical resources. Judges are probably no different in this respect. We may find ourselves at century's end much like the last men Nietzche's Zarathrusta speaks of with such contempt — "without belief or superstition. . . [we stick] out our chests — but alas they are hollow."

REV_00259645

I agree that writing an opinion and editing one can never be the same thing. An act of creation is transforming in a way an act of adoption can never be. You give some part of yourself to that which you create; and you are always changed by the act of creation.

Workload pressures have altered forever the way we work. Must it inevitably cast its shadow over the work itself and cripple the imagination of those whose work it purports to be. The debate may be most notable for what it overlooks. In a scene from Young Frankenstein, Gene Wilder who plays the young doctor, says to a horribly and obviously deformed Igor: "Perhaps I could do something about your hump." Marty Feldman, as Igor, replies, "What hump?"

The current debate focuses on how others will perceive judges and their work product. Maybe we would do better to focus on the mirror we hold up to them. What is it that we prize in judges? Intellect? Experience? Genius? Humanity? Character? Or only the illusion of the emotionless and neutral arbiter. What is it that society thinks it wants judges to be? Is that different from what it will allow them to be. Our fate may be decided by the terms of the debate. Is resistance futile and assimilation inevitable?

Letting The Music Come

My husband is a musician — a bass player. When he and I were still courting (that's an old fashioned term — you will have to ask your grandparents what it means!) he did something I found rather curious. He would get a far-away, abstracted look on his face and usually the fingers of one hand would be moving, tapping out a rhythm. I would ask: "What are you doing?" His usual answer was "nothing." But when I persisted, he finally told me "I am letting the music come." Well, I am tone deaf and have no musical talent whatsoever, but I do have great curiosity. So I asked: "When you hear this music, is it the sound of a musical instrument — a piano, a saxophone, a flute." He said, "No, no, it's nothing like that. It isn't the sound of any instrument. Sometimes it is the way a flag moves in the breeze, the quality of the light, the way a sign flashes on and off. It has music." And then, having explained it beautifully, he would look at me helplessly and say: "I can't explain." Another time he told me, "There is no music without silence." For a bass player, it's the beat between beats, the beat of silence, that makes the music.

REV_00259646

Musically challenged as I am, I did understand in my own way. Sometimes he wakes up in the morning and finds me, propped on my elbow, staring out the window. He says: "What are you doing?" I say: "I am writing." He says, "Oh, sure!" But the answer is accurate. In those quiet moments, the words pour in a torrent through my head — sometimes hot and liquid like molten steel, sometimes cool and supple as clay on a potter's wheel. In these moments I feel free to let the music come.

When I finally write it down, it will never be as clear or pure as that chorus in my head. The melody will never be as right; the bass line never quite as compelling. But, in those quiet, staring-out-the-window and into-my-head moments, I can glimpse what it should be. Words are the way the music comes for me. It is language that I love; writing that is my passion.

CONCLUSION

Lest anyone should misunderstand, I hasten to say that I am devoted to my research attorneys. They are smart, funny, hardworking, intensely loyal. The task of modern day appellate judges would be impossible without them. I am not suggesting that we turn back the clock. Caseloads are not likely to decrease substantially in the foreseeable future. Courts and judges will have to continue to press for productivity gains. My point is a modest one. It is the hope that judges and staff and institutional demands can be tuned to accommodate the broader reaches of the judicial process so that we can continue to do the work efficiently and well, to be even-handed and to think straight, and still . . . let the music come.

REV_00259647

Thank you.

REV_00259648

I know the mere mention of Barnett gives some folks hives. But, as my grandmother is fond of saying, even the devil tells the truth sometimes. It seems to me that the role of research attorneys and the interaction of judges with them is a largely unexamined aspect of our work. And while I was musing on this subject, I was fortuitously reminded of the perfect analogy for exploring this relationship. I have to confess, I am a science fiction fan. In fact, I am a Trekkie. And, thus, I am well acquainted with all the generations of those who have explored the final frontier and pretty familiar with the etiology of most alien species they have encountered. As luck would have it, while I was struggling with the ideas for this speech, I heard a preview for Star Trek Voyager. The voiceover caught my attention with this phrase. "We are Borg. Resistance is Futile."

For those of you not conversant with the Star Trek cosmology, the Borg is a technological race, half humanoid, half robot, which conquers by assimilating its victims into the collective. In other words, the Borg emulates the organization of the hive: a single consciousness, focused on relentless assimilation of all other life forms. The monolithic consciousness knows all the conquered species knew. The conquered forget all that they were. They are assimilated. They become Borg. Resistance is futile. In applying this analogy to the interaction between research attorneys and judges, the most interesting question, of course, is who is assimilating whom and for what purpose?

I think the assumption would be that attorneys are submerged into the consciousness of judges. In fact, when I have participated in interviews with lawyers seeking work with the court, one of the routine questions is: "How will you feel about having to defer to the judge's wishes even (especially) when you disagree?" What Posner highlights and it may be worth considering is the impact of the attorney presence on the decisionmaking process itself. In other words, maybe the question is not whether attorneys ultimately defer to the judge's decision, the question may be whether the result is already being shaped in subtle and intangible ways before the judge reaches any decision. Are we talking about judicial alter egos or para-judges?

REV_00259635

And Then There Were Law Clerks

The exploration of that question requires us to return to the beginning. Judges have not always had law clerks or attorneys to assist them. I was surprised to find that — in America — a particular judge is credited with creating the judicial clerkship. Judge Horace Gray became Chief Justice of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court of Errors in 1873. In the summer of 1875, the increased workload led Gray to employ a law assistant — a recently graduated and highly ranked law school student. Gray was fortunate to be able to get referrals from half-brother, John Chipman Gray, a Harvard professor. When Chief Justice Gray was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1882, he brought his personal assistant to Washington with him. And the rest is history. Judge Gray apparently paid for his assistants out of his own resources, as there was no budget for them.

By 1886 the Attorney General was recommending that each justice be provided "with a secretary or law clerk, to be a stenographer, to be paid an annual salary to assist in such clerical work as might be assigned to him." On August 4, 1886, Congress provided for a stenographic clerk for each justice of the Supreme Court at the munificent salary of $1,600 a year. By 1888, all nine justices were using the allotted stenographic clerks. They were never used purely as scribes, however. The law clerk, as invented by Judge Gray, reviewed newly filed cases and the opinions proposed by the judge's colleagues. They were sometimes asked to draft opinions, but the opinions served we are told only as a source of discussion. The real work of the law clerk was to engage in vigorous colloquy with the judge.

REV_00259636

That paradigm of the law clerk function has persisted. By the 1930s the institution of law clerking was firmly entrenched and clerks were introduced to the lower federal courts. As caseloads continued to rise so did the number of clerks, reaching a peak with the caseload explosion of the 1960s. Supreme Court justices have four authorized clerks, district courts have two. Circuit court judges also have four if the court's central staff attorneys are included.

The California Supreme Court, as usual a little ahead of the curve, hired its first research attorney in 1925. William I. Sullivan, who graduated from law school in 1924, served the court as a research attorney for 21 years, the last seven as chief research attorney until he was appointed Clerk of the Supreme Court and ex officio Secretary of the Judicial Council in 1946.[1]

California created a somewhat unique hybrid, utilizing both a central staff, to handle the courtwide work, like petitions, and permanent attorney staff, instead of temporary law clerks, to assist judges in chambers. The justification for all of these changes was the same: burgeoning caseloads. Courts needed to be more efficient while at the same time keeping the complement of judicial officers relatively small.

---

[1] Sullivan was joined by a second law clerk (research attorney) in 1930 and the two men had facing desks in a little office of the fourth floor of the old State Building. This second clerk returned to the court in 1959 as an associate justice. In the interim, he served as Presiding Justice of the First District Court of Appeal. His name was Raymond E. Peters. (Not a bad career path.) The two research attorneys performed the functions similar to our current central staff.

REV_00259637

Too Much Of A Good Thing?

As the use of law clerks and attorneys has expanded, it has spawned a surprisingly contentious — even if relatively low-key debate. While the complaints vary with the age, experience, and permanency of the staff, the underlying concern is for the quality and legitimacy of the judicial product. Everyone acknowledges that courts may have no alternative, but some question whether there is a darker side to our quest for greater efficiency. Kester, in his article, "The Law Clerk Explosion," laments that these "disquieting changes" are being accepted with "virtually no analysis and no protest."

One concern is consistently voiced. Critics of the over-reliance on staff complain that legal assistants have "become an uncontrollable force that has transformed the judicial process into an essentially bureaucratic arm of government, with judges functioning as staff managers and opinion editors rather than in the traditional judicial role." Whether the courts have increased their reliance on young, inexperienced law school graduates or career attorneys, the complaints are remarkably similar. The critics claim the delegation of judicial tasks has gone too far. As one commentator sees it: "law clerks have usurped the decision-making function in toto from the judges. . . . Once an institution that supplied mentors to instruct bright graduates, the clerkship has grown into a corps of post-adolescent mandarins, Judges for a Year after the fashion of 'Queen for a Day.' " But where a court relies on career attorneys, the attorneys are criticized because their longevity gives them excessive clout. Professor Barnett points to a forum of ex-justices held in 1994, which he claims became "a chorus bemoaning of staff presumption," with Justices Panelli and Kaufman commiserating that "[s]ome people who have been there a long time feel they are the judge" or "tend to lose sight of their role."

REV_00259638

Even more surprising was Barnett's repetition of some advice former members of the court had offered after my nomination to "dispel" any doubts about my competence. They, according to a newspaper article, advised me to "first of all hire a good staff . . . and be prepared to delegate work to them and, most important of all, to avoid the mistake of trying to do things my own way." Barnett ends this section with his own editorial comment: "If the power of staff is such that a new justice to survive had better hire some of them, it may follow that the justice had better not offend the ones hired — as by editing their drafts too aggressively."

The Chief Justice has authored a rebuttal to Professor Barnett's specific criticisms of the Supreme Court and we need not rework that ground. What is more interesting is the subtle and coded subtext of these exchanges. Whether people feel alarm or complacency about institutional changes in the courts depends on how they define the essential judicial function. And this definition has proved very elusive.

Critics of the new order, like Judge Posner and Professor Joseph Vining, believe that if there is any essential quality to justice, it is the engaged, personal creative effort of the judge as author. As Posner explains: "The structure, the ideas, even the style of the opinion may be the judge's even though much of the actual drafting is the law clerk's. But it is generally true that whoever does the basic drafting of a document — a judicial opinion or anything else — will have a big impact on the final product." Posner argues that opinions drafted by law clerks will differ in substantial ways from opinions written by judges and these differences include style, length, candor, credibility, and what Posner characterizes as greatness:

> "It is a curious feature of the American legal system that a handful of famous judges should have made a contribution to the law so greatly disproportionate to their number. But it is true; and it would be sad to think that there will never be another great American judge . . . . The sense of style that is inseparable from the idea of a great judge in our tradition is unlikely to develop in a judge who does not do his own writing. People are not born great writers; they become great writers by hard work — as writers not editors. And the struggle to compose a coherent opinion provides a more searching test of the soundness of one's ideas than performing an editorial function does. It is all too easy to glide over the smoothly written product of an able assistant without searching out the stresses and weak joints."

REV_00259639

To others, the essential judicial function is merely the judge's involvement in the ultimate outcome of the system or process. Thus, Judge Harry Edwards, a spirited defender of the "new" judicial institution, argues vehemently that drafting opinions is not the same thing as deciding appeals.

"[A]ll careful judges will confer at length with their clerks and give them fairly specific instructions concerning the content of opinions. And, more important, careful judges will not allow an opinion to issue in their name until the words constituting the opinion precisely reflect their views on the proper disposition of the case. . . . [¶] [¶] . . . In the opinions of a careful judge, as in other fields, '[s]entences, forms of expression, even ideas that are not originally the author's own become his by adoption because he actually, and I emphasize actually, considers them, sentence by sentence, phrase by phrase, thought by thought, comma by comma, and makes them his own after deliberation.' "

REV_00259640

Judge Mahoney of the Second Circuit strongly seconds this view:

> "Personally, I feel that so long as the judge reads all the briefs (and key portions of the record), listens to oral argument and engages in face-to-face dialogue with counsel, participates in the conferences with her colleagues, and controls the formation and expression of ideas . . . that go into her opinion, she has done the job."

Of course, Posner's response is that "adoption is not creation." But, these are issues on which reasonable minds can differ. Indeed, it is not clear that the combatants are fighting about the same thing. Nostalgia tends to add a rosy glow to things when we look back. It is true that opinions were shorter. However, as I have had occasion to note recently, those one-page opinions were often lacking in analysis and some of them were patently wrong.

Moreover, we live in a much more complicated world. The complications are real even if courts themselves have been responsible for their great increase in business and for the difficulties in resolving the ever-expanding universe of questions on which courts now have the final word.

My experience suggests there is some validity to both viewpoints, but this discussion includes elements claimed by neither camp. In one of the first discussions I had with my research attorneys, I explained that I wanted to be able to write. For me, the writing is the most attractive part of the job. I must say my staff has done everything possible to accommodate my idiosyncrasy. In the writing of separate opinions, I have had the opportunity to shape the opinion very precisely.

Crafting majority opinions is a different matter. As you probably know, the Supreme Court's opinion process is somewhat different from the Courts of Appeal. We begin with a calendar memo (what in other courts is called a proposed opinion). The authoring judge sends out the calendar and all the other chambers prepare formal written comments — a Preliminary Response (PR in the court's shorthand). Usually, the initials of the staff attorney responsible for the calendar appear at the bottom of the calendar. On the summary document which tallies the votes, the initials of the staff attorney who is "tracking the calendar" appears next to the name of each judge. This way, the staff can have detailed discussions about the calendar before the judge even weighs in. Thus, the staff discussion can (and usually does) bypass the judge. The schedule includes time for the circulation of separate opinions. It is up to the individual judges to determine how they will participate in the review process.

REV_00259641

When I sent out the first majority calendar drafted entirely by my own hand, there was a great deal of discussion concerning the advisability of circulating the opinion with my own initials or hiding behind the initials of one of my attorneys and letting them take the heat. My staff encouraged me — perhaps in their own self-interest — to circulate the opinion under my own initials. The next morning I encountered a senior attorney from another chambers in the elevator. He asked if those were actually my initials on a calendar he had just seen. When I confirmed it, he asked: "Are you really going to submit yourself to this nest of vipers?" That is a fascinating comment on the way some members of the staff view the process in which they participate. My own experience is consistent.

I have talked to attorneys who have made the transition from the Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court, and they tell me they feel so intimidated by the virulence of the Supreme Court PR process that they are reluctant to send out any work at all. A similar observation was voiced by a former court staffer I encountered at a conference recently. In the course of a casual

REV_00259642

Los Angeles Federalist Society
California Lincoln Club
Libertarian Law Council
California Club — Justice of the Year Award
December 11, 1997, 11:30 a.m.

Thank you. I am honored to accept this award and gratified to know you are cautious enough only to honor one judge this year and discerning enough not to give out an award every year. I am touched and frankly . . . surprised. Since I have been making a career out of being the lone dissenter, I really didn't think anyone reads this stuff. It's nice to know a few people occasionally do. The Reporter of Decisions has a nice tradition. When an appellate judge leaves the bench, the Reporter collects all of the judge's opinions and places them in a bound volume (or volumes) and presents it to the judge as a keepsake. I console myself that these exercises in futility (a.k.a. my dissents) are essays for my bound volume. For reasons which I will explain, however, I think it is probably too soon for me to receive any recognition as a judge. I still don't know what I will be when I grow up.

America is, and always has been, an impatient country. I suppose nothing else could be expected in a place that invented minute rice, instant oatmeal, and quick grits. We delight in jumping to the wrong conclusion and do not hesitate to express our opinions on issues about which we know nothing. As P.J. O'Rourke[1] puts it: "The American electorate isn't willing to learn facts, let alone face them." I recognize that it goes against the grain to say that judges have to be aged to perfection.

Last year when I had been on the Supreme Court a mere five months, I wrote a speech entitled "It's Not Easy Being Green" and talked about my first impressions of the court — about the qualities associated with being green: newness, freshness, being untried and untested. I confessed that I have always liked Kermit's whimsical signature song because it suggests not only these ordinary themes, but also acknowledges the positive dimensions of being different.

REV_00259649

process and simultaneously frustrate the society's capacity to make policy decisions."[23] However unpopular it may be to say so, America's lawmaking machinery is overheated. We must continue to protect the rights of the individual, but must also consider law's impact on the community and our communal lives. As Keyes puts it: "No matter how much good we may wish to achieve, we do not have the right to achieve that good at the expense of others' freedom."[24] Or, to quote Manning: "In a legal system that tries to offer everybody a remedy for everything, no one will have a remedy for anything."[25]

I started out by saying that you would have to wait to see who I was when I grew up. I know who I would like to be. In 1930, Learned Hand spoke at the presentation to Harvard Law School of a portrait of Holmes. He explained what he and Holmes called "Jobbism." According to Holmes, one of the best ways to find purpose in life "is just to do one's task with one's might." In his speech in 1930, Hand explained what it meant to be a "Jobbist": He asked: "Are you a member of the Society of Jobbist, or do you know the guild? If not let me tell you of it. All may join, though few can qualify. . . . It is an honest craft, which gives good measure for its wages and undertakes only those jobs which the members can do in proper workman-like fashion. Which of course means that they must like them . . . It demands right quality, better than the market will pass, and perhaps it is not quite as insistent as it should be on standards of living, but the working hours are strictly controlled."[26] Like Holmes, I believe "every detail has the mystery of the universe behind it" and that the only pride appropriate to a judge is the pride one takes in mastery of one's craft and in the tradition of which one feels a part.

I had the privilege this summer of meeting Raoul Berger in his 96th year. He is a remarkable man and I think he gave me some very good advice. He said he has great sympathy for judges because the task they have to do is so difficult, but he told me to remember that a judge builds her house one brick at a time and I should just concentrate on making good bricks. That is what I will try to do and maybe when I grow up I will be accepted as a member in good standing of that Society of Jobbist to which I aspire.

REV_00259658

Thank you.

---

1 O'Rourke, Parliament of Whores (1991).

2 DeTocqueville, Democracy in America (1835) Part I, The Unlimited Power of the Majority, p. 263.

3 Ibid.

4 Id. at p. 265

5 Scalia, A Matter of Interpretation (1997) pp. 95, 114.

6 The Philosophy of Edmund Burke (Bredvod & Ross edit. 1970) pp. 73-74.

7 Golembiewski & Wildavsky, Bare Bones: Putting Flesh on the Skeleton of American Federalism (1984) The Cost of Federalism, p. 70.

8 Howard,

9 Hamilton, Madison, Jay (Rossider ed. 1961) No. 51: Madison, p. 322.

10 Op. cit. supra, No. 51: Madison, p. 324.

11 Keyes, The Preservation of Liberty (1992) Cornell L.Rev. 969 (hereafter Keyes)

12 Berger, A Lawyer Lectures A Judge (1995) 18 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y, p. 864, quoting H. Jefferson Powell, The Original Understanding of Original Intent (1985) 98 Harv. L.Rev. (1985) p. 892

13 Hamilton, Madison, Jay, op. cit. supra, No. 78: Hamilton, p. 465

14 Hamilton, Madison, Jay, op. cit. supra, No. 78: Hamilton, p. 466

15 Glendon, A Nation Under Lawyers (1994) (hereafter Glendon)

16 Glendon, supra, at p. 118.

17 Glendon, supra, at p. 152.

18 Glendon, supra, at pp. 124-126

19 The Spirit of Liberty: Papers and Addresses of Learned Hand (Dilliard ed. 1959) p. xx.

20 Ibid.

21 Stewart, A Life on the Court, A.B.A. Journal (Feb. 1993) p. 62

22 Manning, Hyperlexis: Our National Disease (1977) Northwestern U.L.Rev. 767, 772 (hereafter Manning).

23 Manning, op. cit. supra, at p. 780.

24 Keyes, op. cit. supra, at p. 970.

25 Manning, op. cit. supra, at p. 781.

26 Glendon, op. cit. supra, at p. 93

REV_00259659

I pointed out that the year I graduated from law school, the First African American, Wiley Manuel, was appointed to the California Supreme Court. The first woman, Rose Bird, was confirmed a few days later. We have come to accept (and indeed to expect) that the high court will reflect differences of gender, ethnicity, culture, and religion. We did not achieve this easily, but we did achieve it. I think we have come to understand that our similarities as human beings are more important than our differences of gender or skin color or language. But as wide as the divide has been between us on these issues, it has always been easier to accommodate our cultural diversity than our differences of opinion.

DeTocqueville, writing in 1835, said: "I know of no country in which there is so little independence of mind and real freedom on discussion as in America."[2] Contrasting the tyranny of majority with the authority of the king, he noted: "The authority of a king is physical, and controls the actions of men without subduing their will. But the majority possesses a power which is physical and moral at the same time, which acts upon the will as much as upon the actions, and represses not only all contest, but all controversy."[3] As a result, he concluded, "freedom of opinion does not exist in America."[4]

Judge Learned Hand recognized this tendency was amplified by the increasingly homogenized mass society that characterizes America in the Twentieth Century. In many of his speeches, he questioned how democracy might survive amid the relentless pressure to conformity. (Of course, our court does not suffer this crushing conformity!) Judge Hand believed it was important to the kind of democracy we want to have and the kind of people we want to be to preserve a spirited public dialogue — to make sure the marketplace of ideas remains open.

Today, having passed my third anniversary as a member of the bench and a year and a half on the Supreme Court, I thought I might preview the sequel. I could call it: "It's Not Easy Being Green, but It's Really Tough Being Gray." One of the corollaries to our hostility to different points of view may be the way in which the familiar becomes more and more invisible.

I am reminded of a conversation I had with my son many years ago. He was 10 or 12 years old. I was cleaning house one Saturday afternoon. He was watching one of those mindless, low-budget movies that provided staple early afternoon fare. Usually they featured pretty young girls on the beach. This particular one featured pretty girls in ski sweaters – very original. Anyway, I heard some familiar music and said to him as I was passing by: "That sounds like James Brown." He looked at me in great surprise and said, "That's who it is. James Brown and the Famous Flames. How did you know?" "Oh," I replied airily, "James Brown was the man when I was in my teen's. He had the most popular group around." My son looked at me wide-eyed. "Really," he said. "They were around when you were a kid. Are they dead?"

I remembered that story when I began thinking about this topic because it reminds me how difficult it is to have a true sense of perspective about things — like parents — with which we feel a sense of utter familiarity. I suppose that is why we can all use the same words, we can talk about freedom, justice, and equality, and yet mean something so different we could be speaking a foreign language. Courts have certainly not escaped the contagion. And the whole field of constitutional interpretation is a subject of lively debate with a cast of thousands – originalists, strict constructionists, intentionalists, evolutionists, and even a deconstructive group of neo-intentionalists. In the whorl of abstract and theoretical discussions, the familiar becomes invisible to us and words, chameleon-like, change their meaning with the environment.

In her comment to Justice Scalia's essay on interpretation, Mary Ann Glendon recalls the scene from Young Frankenstein in which Gene Wilder as the doctor looks at the visibly and hideously deformed Igor, played by Marty Feldman, and says, "Perhaps I could do something about your hump" – and Igor replies "What hump?" She ends her comment with this statement:

> "Tyranny, as Tocqueville warned, need not announce itself with guns and trumpets. It may come softly — so softly that we will barely notice when we become one of those countries where there are no citizens but only subjects. So softly that if a well-meaning foreigner should suggest, 'Perhaps you could do something about your oppression,' we might look up, puzzled, and ask, 'What oppression?' "[5]

REV_00259651

The genius of the American Constitution was in its attempt to combine stable government with liberty. Liberty was what the American experiment was all about, but liberty to the founders was not a synonym for license. The political philosophers in Publius's reading list were always careful to modify that word liberty. They talked of ordered liberty, rational liberty, or moral liberty. But, they always made a connection between civic freedom and civic responsibility.

There is a wonderful quote from Edmund Burke which beautifully articulates the task confronting the founders:

> "To make a government requires no great prudence. Settle the seat of power, teach obedience, and the work is done. To give freedom is still more easy. It is not necessary to guide; it only requires to let go the rein. But to form a free government, that is, to temper together these opposite elements of liberty and restraint in one consistent work, requires much thought, deep reflection, a sagacious, powerful, and combining mind."[6]

For a long period of our history, it seemed the founders had succeeded. As late as 1944, Judge Learned Hand could talk of the spirit of liberty in a way that suggested the opposite elements of liberty and restraint had been able to peacefully coexist.

The United States Constitution inspired reverence not just because it was a clever experiment in political science, but because it was an attempt to construct a polity consistent with both the baser passions and the higher aspirations of its citizens. But there is now a sense that things are more than slightly askew. Despite the founder's notion that liberty requires law-free spaces, Americans are probably the most law-ridden people on the face of the earth. Every aspect, every corner, every moment of our lives is subject to government regulation and control. And while everybody demands the right to everything without restraint, there is a gnawing sense of impotence. As Aaron Wildavsky has noted:

REV_00259652

". . . [P]rocedures for making public policy — from nominating Presidential candidates to holding open meetings — appear to be more and more democratic. Equality, majority rule, due process, representation of practically everyone, all appear to have increased."[7]

Why then, he asks, are outcomes increasingly unsatisfactory? Despite a constitutional blueprint designed to emphasize deliberation rather than allowing the passion or power of a particular cause to take hold, we have become in recent years what Philip K. Howard[8] calls "A Nation of Enemies." We seem every day less like a nation and more like a collection of warring tribes.

In short, we have more freedom than the founders would ever have imagined possible and less liberty than they would ever have tolerated. We have been described, accurately I think, as the most law-ridden society on the face of the earth. We are heirs to a mind-numbing bureaucracy; subject to a level of legalization that cannot avoid being arbitrary, capricious, and discriminatory. What other outcome is possible in a society in which no adult can wake up, go about their business, and return to their homes without breaking several laws? There are of course many reasons for our present difficulties, but some of our troubles can be laid at the feet of that most innocuous branch – the judiciary.

In Federalist No. 51, Madison tried to explain how we might preserve liberty by constraining government. He said the great security against a gradual concentration of power in one department was to give each the constitutional means and personal motives to resist encroachments of the others:

"Ambition must be made to counteract ambition. The interest of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place. It may be a reflection on human nature, that such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government. But what is government itself, but the greatest of all reflections on human nature? If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself."[9]

Madison says something else in that passage that is very rarely quoted and that seems to me equally significant. He says:

> "Justice is the end of government. It is the end of civil society. It ever has been and ever will be pursued until it be obtained, or until liberty be lost in the pursuit." [10]

In the modern era, we have come to see justice in terms that undermine the notion of liberty. We see justice not as the personal responsibility of each individual, but as an institutional obligation. We talk of social justice and propose redistributive means to achieve those ends. As our view of justice has changed so has the way we view the judiciary and, more fundamentally, the way in which judges view themselves.

Alan Keyes makes a cogent observation about the relationship between justice and liberty. He says this passage summarizes the "challenge our society faces when confronted with questions involving principles of right and justice." Justice has "substantive relevance to any regime," but the real goal of this society's existence is "the preservation of liberty." [11]

Concern about the untrammeled power of judges was an issue during the drafting and ratification of the Constitution. As summarized in an article by Raoul Berger, the colonists expressed the fear that judges would " 'undermine the legislative prerogatives of the people's representatives by engaging in the corruptive process of interpreting legislative texts;' " they feared the advantages of " 'a known and written [constitution] would be lost if the law's meaning could be twisted by judicial construction,' " [12] and they opposed the judges' imposition of their personal views.

Hamilton sought to allay the concerns of the ratifiers of the Constitution about possible usurpation by the judicial branch by assuring them that "the judiciary, from the nature of its functions, will always be the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution, because it will be least in a capacity to annoy or injure them." [13] As we know, of course, the courts overcame these alleged limitations on their powers with ridiculous ease. How?

REV_00259654

By constitutionalizing everything possible, finding constitutional rights which are nowhere mentioned in the Constitution. By taking a few words which are in the Constitution like "due process" and "equal protection" and imbuing them with elaborate and highly implausible etymologies; and by enunciating standards of constitutional review which are not standards at all but rather policy vetoes, i.e., strict scrutiny and the compelling state interest standard. As one commentator candidly admits: The "compelling interest" test imposes such a severe burden of justification on the state as to be "a statement of conclusion rather than a measure of constitutionality."

Hamilton acknowledges that "individual oppression may now and then proceed from the courts of justice," but he says "the general liberty of the people can never be endangered from that quarter." [14] I think Hamilton's faith that the judiciary could never endanger liberty was based on an assumption — not about the nature of the judiciary — but about the nature of judges. And for a long time that classical ideal of how judges behaved was powerfully predictive and accurate. But things have changed.

Most court observers see Brown v. The Board of Education as the pivotal decision which ushered in the new era. According to one commentator: What has been changing in the years since Brown is the way judges and the legal community in general think about judicial excellence and about the role of the judiciary in American society. Two sets of ideals are vying for the soul of the American judiciary. For most of our history, we admired and venerated what Glendon calls the classical virtues: impartiality, prudence, practical reason, mastery of craft, persuasiveness, a sense of the legal system as a whole, the ability to preserve principled continuity while adopting the law to changed social and economic conditions — and above all self-restraint. She discerns three distinct concepts of self-control. [15]

> "[S]tructural restraint (respecting the limits on judicial power imposed by federalism, the separation of powers and a court's position in the judicial hierarchy); interpretive restraint (observing the bounds imposed on judicial discretion by precedent, statute, or constitutional text, design, and tradition); and personal restraint (avoiding distortion of the decision making process by one's own opinion of the parties or the issues)."[16]

In marked contrast, the new paradigm celebrates adventurousness and hubris. From the 1960's onward, we have witnessed the rise of the judge militant. The classical conception of the judicial role was viewed as too confining, boring, and above all insufficiently responsive to social problems. The classical ideal is being rapidly supplanted by the "image of the good judge as bold, creative, compassionate, result-oriented, and liberated from legal technicalities."[17]

For judges like John Marshall, Holmes, Hand and Frankfurter, the most important quality was humility. Frankfurter described it this way:

> "What is essential. . . is that you get [judges] who bring to their task first and foremost, humility and an understanding of the range of the problems and of their own inadequacy in dealing with them, disinterestedness, and allegiance to nothing except the effort, amid tangled words and limited insights to find the path through precedent, through policy, through history, to the best judgment that fallible creatures can reach in that most difficult of all tasks: the achievement of justice . . . through reason called law." [18]

As is probably apparent these are the judges to whom I can relate. I freely confess that this is the most difficult job I have ever tried to do; the most daunting. There are moments of exhilaration and satisfaction. But, there are also moments (lots of them) of terror and black despair.

And that is why I find it so hard to understand the chronic conceit of judges who claim infallibility, shrug off the Constitution like a shopworn suit, and never let text or tradition stand in the way of a desired result.

Apparently when Learned Hand was asked about his judicial philosophy, he liked to say that it was summed up in Oliver Cromwell's admonition to the Kirk of Scotland: " 'I beseech ye in the bowles of Christ, think that ye may be mistaken.' " [19] Those words, said Hand, "should be inscribed on the portals of every courthouse in the nation . . . ."[20]

Justice Brennan, on the other hand, was not given to such doubt and self-questioning. Shortly after his retirement, the justice reminisced with journalist David O. Stewart about his long judicial career. Stewart reminded Brennan of retired Justice Lewis Powell's admission that with hindsight he regretted voting to uphold Georgia's sodomy law. Had Justice Powell's second thoughts prompted Justice Brennan to think of any cases over his 33 years on the Supreme Court where he wished now that he had voted differently?, Stewart asked. "Hell no," Brennan replied, "I never thought I was wrong."[21]

We cannot lay all the blame on the courts. Americans have always turned to the courts for the resolution of difficult problems. As Manning notes, "The special role of the Supreme Court as ultimate arbiter of constitutionality enhances that impulse, but the people's faith and reliance in its judges runs both wider and deeper than that. Whether in matters of civil rights, town planning, the economics of the market place, or labor-management relations, . . . the judiciary will play, a key and often determining, role. . . . The inevitable result is that we are the most litigious people in the world. We go to great lengths to find ways to cast any and every problem into the familiar pattern of a two-party adversary trial and take it to court."[22]

If we really want to understand what has gone wrong with the political process, we should look in the mirror. In the immortal words of Pogo, "We have met the enemy and he is us." We the People are We the Government. If we believe nothing really matters, nothing will. If we refuse to look beyond the immediacy of our own desires, politics will never be more than the arithmetical and (paralytic) sum of appetites. And it should be more. Much more.

As Manning recognized way back in 1977, "Our legislatures, courts and agencies must eventually recognize, and the public must come to see, that the legal system simply cannot operate if it tries to provide for every citizen and institution a lawsuit against every other citizen and institution to resolve every difference of view or interest, to redress every perceived invasion of privilege, and to recompense every risk of living. The ultimate result of that approach will be to halt the legal

Hearts Touched With Fire
Upon Receiving Honorary Doctor of Law Degree
Pepperdine University Commencement
May 22, 1998, 2:00 p.m.

I thank the Chief Justice for his kind introduction. To the President, the Dean, Members of the Faculty, Baron Six, Graduates and all our Honored Guests. I greatly value the distinction you confer upon me by awarding me the honorary degree and allowing me to share, if only by reflection, this university's great record of excellence and achievement. I take special pride in receiving a mark of recognition from the Pepperdine University School of Law because of this university's strong affirmation that faith and moral principle are a necessary part of a personal commitment to justice.

A commencement is a ceremony which celebrates both endings and beginnings and invites us to reflect. About the past and about the future. Last summer, my law school class celebrated its 20-year reunion and a classmate reminded me of something I had forgotten. He said that he looked up my picture in the year book and under the heading "future plans" it said: "looking for work as a gardener." He said he was relieved to know at least one other person in the class had not yet achieved their aspiration. I doubt that any of you aspire to be gardeners — but I can now give you some advice from the perspective of a grizzled old veteran. It is more important to think about the kind of person you want to become than to worry about what you will do.

Grant Gilmore ends his book, The Ages of American Law, with a passage he identifies as a paraphrase of Holmes. "Law reflects but in no sense determines the moral worth of a society. The values of a reasonably just society will reflect themselves in a reasonably just law. The better the society, the less law there will be. In Heaven there will be no law, and the lion will lie down with the lamb. The values of an unjust society will reflect themselves in an unjust law. The worse the society, the more law there will be. In Hell, there will be nothing but law, and due process will be meticulously observed."[1]

REV_00259660

I believe this catechism is correct. But that does not mean law and lawyers are insignificant. In America, there has always been a potent reciprocity between the attitudes of lawyers and the expectations of popular culture. In a country like our own, a society so culturally diverse in which we share neither language nor culture nor history, law has become the carrier of our few common understandings. As Maryann Glendon notes: [It is now] the terrain on which Americans are struggling to define what kind of people they are, and what kind of society they wish to bring into being."[2]

That will be the challenge for the next generation of lawyers. My generation viewed the task as largely external, and in our arrogance, we believed pure intellect would provide the universal key. We were going to change the world. Through law, our society would be reformed, purified, saved. Our hubris was understandable if not wholly justified. After all, this country was founded by men who believed they were to political science what Sir Isaac Newton was to physics.

We did change the world, but not always for the better. We have overcome cold-eye sheriffs, fire hoses, and cattle prods. We have faced up to discrimination, racism, and bigotry, and struggled to make our dreams and our principles one. We have come close to the mountain top, but we have also descended to the rubble of Oklahoma City. We earnestly celebrate diversity, but we also mourn the loss of common ground. Freedom is the word on all our lips, but every day we drive the stake deeper into the heart of the spirit of liberty. In many ways, civil society now seems shattered. Every attempt to move forward founders on new and greater obstacles. Our hyphens overtake us. The rights we sow so abundantly spring up overnight, like dragon's teeth, and destroy the bridges to tomorrow. Further investigation revealed that Newton did not get the physics exactly right and neither did we.

The legal profession's task is no longer changing the world. It is the more difficult, useful, and ultimately more rewarding job of changing ourselves.

We must once again seek and respect the "ideal of character." We must restore reverence for the lawyer as peacemaker and healer, the advocate Dean Kronman describes as "devoted to the public good but keenly aware of the limitations of human beings and their political arrangements."[3] The desirable traits – integrity, exceptional wisdom, good judgment, extraordinary deliberative power, prudence, sympathy for opposing views, and a keen sense of honor – are a catalogue of virtues. And the pursuit of virtue, like hope, is an activity of the spirit.

De Chardin has said that one day after mastering the physical universe, "We shall finally harness for God the energies of love. And on that day, for the second time in the history of the world, we will have discovered fire." We must restore that spirit of virtue and one more thing: We must once again come to an understanding of what it means to have, in Holmes's words, "hearts touched with fire."

I like that phrase because it distinguishes the "heart" of which I speak from the maudlin sentimentality which pervades the national consciousness, from the flood of easy talk show tears, available on cue.

When I speak of heart, I mean to use the term in what I think is a truer sense. I mean great-hearted. The heart of the warrior, filled with courage and purpose, but not cruelty. The heart that glories in the richness of the human connection. The heart that feels shame. The heart that recognizes and is humbled by the nuanced, complex, many-patterned reality of the human condition. The heart that perseveres, accepting adversity as the other face of triumph.

Between 1899 and 1902 – just at the turn of the last century – Rene Rilke, a young German poet, composed one of his best-known works, "The Book of Hours." In this book, subtitled "Love Poems to God," Rilke pens not only a ravishingly poetic vision but a prophetic one. In one poem, written after a visit to Italy, Rilke admits his envy of his southern brethren whose religious Renaissance art portrayed God as "an ardent flame" and laments: "When I lean over the chasm of myself – it seems my God is dark and like a web: a hundred roots silently drinking."[4]

Like all good poetry, Rilke's vision works on many levels. He seems to see or foresee exactly what is taking place in his world. He is writing at a time which marks the end of the Age of Enlightenment and the inauguration of this present darkness – a nonjudgmental, indifferent age, the era of moral relativity. On another level, though, when Rilke talks about leaning over the chasm of himself he also suggests that what we see, all we can see, is what we have made of ourselves. What we have become. If our God is dark, we alone are responsible for reigniting that ardent flame.

So I will close, as I began, with the words of Holmes:

> "Through our great good fortune, in our youth our hearts were touched with fire. It was given to us to learn at the outset that life is a profound and passionate thing. While we are permitted to scorn nothing but indifference, and do not pretend to undervalue the worldly rewards of ambition, we have seen with our own eyes, beyond and above the gold fields, the snowy heights of honor, and it is for us to bear the report to those who come after us. But, above all, we have learned that whether [we] accept from Fortune her spade, and will look downward and dig, or from Aspiration her axe and cord, and will scale the ice, the one and only success which it is [ours] to command is to bring to [our] work a mighty heart."[5]

This school has taken seriously its responsibility to engender mighty hearts. The university can only give us the spark. We, ourselves, must nurture the flame. I will work on mine if you will work on yours, and, together, we can bring honor to our calling.

---

1 Gilmore, The Ages of American Law (1977) pp. 110-111.
2 Glendon, Rights Talk (1991) p. 3
3 Kronman, The Lost Lawyer (1993) p. __
4 Rilke's Book of Hours, Love Poems to God (Barrows et al. ed. 1996) p. 49.
5 The Mind and Faith of Justice Holmes (Max Lerner ed. 1943) p. 33.

REV_00259664

Remarks
Retirement Dinner of Justice Robert K. Puglia
February 18, 1999

Close Encounters Of The First Kind

Good evening. I suppose I am on the program because I have a slightly different perspective. I came to know Justice Puglia later in his illustrious career and so represent that generation of lawyers who got to know him from the other side of the bench when he was (in my mind at least) already a great gray eminence and I also had the privilege of serving as a member of the Third District Court of Appeal and working with him.

In 1979 when I joined the Attorney General's office, he was the Presiding Justice of the Third and people were already beginning to speak of him in reverent tones. The first thing I did that caused much wincing and frowning among the assignment assistants at the AG's office was to ask: "Who is this guy . . . PUG-lia? It's Pul-ya, Pul-ya, they chanted in unison. The 'G' is silent!"

I vividly remember my first encounter with Justice Puglia. I had never been in the Third DCA's courtroom before. They sent along another deputy attorney general to make sure I could actually find the courtroom and would know which chair to sit in. It was my companion's job to show me the ropes. And he dutifully pointed out the beautiful features of the courtroom — the marvelously luminous gumwood, the specially designed light fixtures, the frosted glass lightwells, and the magnificent coffered ceiling. He told me how the artisan who created that ceiling had left out one of the gold medallions because he thought only God should create perfection. I peered at the ceiling trying to find that empty space. And the whole time I could hear this annoying tap, tappity, tap, tap. I thought what a shame that this beautiful old courtroom had problems with the sound system. I wondered if this noise would continue during the argument. And I worried about being totally distracted. I kept leaning this way and that trying to detect the source of that dry, rhythmic clicking.

REV_00259678

This was a simple case. What would later be known as a routine disposition appeal. So I had brought along a notebook of carefully outlined arguments, the briefs, and parts of the record just in case. All of this material was resting on my lap. And I happened to notice the movement of the pile of papers resting on my lap was precisely synchronized to that annoying noise — and realized — to my complete horror — that clicking sound was from my knees knocking together. Just at that moment, the gavel banged; the panel of judges strode into the courtroom. I rose shakily to my feet as they marched past those gold-topped Corinthian columns and royal purple draperies. They sat in chairs covered in the same material. But Justice Puglia sat in a chair a foot taller than all the rest with a carved diadem above his head. It looked like a throne.

I represented the respondent. When appellant finished I rose and neatly arranged my pages of prepared argument and launched into it. About 90 seconds into my oration, however, Justice Puglia's chair tilted back almost to the wall, he cast his eyes upward to that magnificent ceiling and kept them there. Somehow, I did not think Justice Puglia was looking for that missing medallion. I stammered: "Uh, unless the court has questions . . . ." Before I finished the thought, Puglia's chair came upright with a thump. He nodded regally. I had been dismissed. Lesson No. 1. If you have nothing to say that will enlighten, enliven, or enlarge the dialogue, shut up. I subsided feeling a bit downcast. But, just for a moment, I had the most disconcerting feeling his eyes were twinkling — like a relieved parent with a slow child.

Nah. I thought as I trudged back to the office: " I might be new at this, but one thing I knew for certain: great gray eminencies do not twinkle."

Gamesmanship And All That Jazz

By December 1982, I was an old hand. Puglia, P.J., published Cronk v. Municipal Court. The case involved a defendant's attempt to hurriedly enter a plea before the information could be amended to allege more serious charges. The opinion said a magistrate has "the inherent power to prevent injustice." It was short, it was clear, it was correct. And it contained this footnote: "The dubious tactic referred to in the concluding sentence of the trial court's opinion is more colorfully characterized in the Attorney General's brief as "Gamesmanship and All that Jazz." I was that lowly AG. And I was thrilled that something I had written would actually be quoted in the official reports. Great gray eminencies might twinkle . . . occasionally.

Somewhere during this time, the thought may first have come to me that if ever I were a judge — a possibility I deemed extremely remote — I would be a judge like Puglia. I liked his opinions — and not just because he quoted me. They were intelligent, wise, and witty, but most important, they were clear, assessable, understandable. I began to discern that the opinions which resonated, the ones I remembered long after I read them, had at their heart a passionate kernel of truth. They were not the product of "a judicial process"; and even though they sometimes reflected the opinion of a court, the best of them exuded that "sense of style" that Richard Posner tells us is "inseparable from the idea of a great judge in our tradition."

Rules To Live By

Because truth really is stranger than fiction, in time I was actually appointed to the Third and became a colleague of Justice Puglia.

There are many benefits to being a judge on the Third District Court of Appeal. For one thing, you are automatically on the distribution list for Puglia's Rules to Live By. Unfortunately, I was on the court such a short time, I only received Rules No. 11 and 12. No. 11 warned us not to be guilty of turgid writing lest our readers conclude "we do not know precisely what we are talking about." No. 12 admonished us to be "all [we] could be" but at least be better than the Iowa or Texas appellate courts, and use "pleaded," the correct past tense, and not "pled" — a weak form of the verb when we discussed pleas. I got that part, but since my subscription to the rules was abruptly terminated at that point, I was left in a quandary about other crucial questions. Should I say the victim bled or that he bleeded. Or should led be leaded.

I learned other important stuff too. Justice Puglia is a walking musical encyclopedia. I am one of the very few appellate judges in the country who knows all the words to the Chiquita Banana Song.

Warrior Virtues

Several years ago, Justice Puglia returned to Korea. He had fought in Korea as a member of the Third Infantry Division — part of the group that finally broke the stranglehold of the North Korean Army in the winter of 1952-53. On his return trip — 40 years later, he had an opportunity to visit a monument commemorating the landing at Inchon. The memorial is set in the midst of a broad, grassy area. Nearby a group of neatly dressed, elderly men sat in the sunshine, laughing and talking. But when the guide explained to them that his guest (Justice Puglia) was one of the soldiers who had fought during the last phase of the Korean War, the men approached him and each in turn bowed and kissed his hand. It was their way of showing respect to someone they regarded as a liberator of their country.

We all thought that was a very touching story until we realized Bob intended to implement a similar ritual in the Third District to show respect for the P.J.

Winning Is The Only Thing

If you know Justice Puglia at all, you know he is a fierce competitor. So it is not surprising that he joined with two of his colleagues — Fred Morrison and Arthur Scotland — to form a triathlon team to compete in the appellate division of regional events. Bob was the biker. The group, aptly named Team Jurisimprudence, first took to the field in the Monterey Bay Triathlon, held in Aptos on July 14 (Bastille Day), 1996, and took first place in the Appellate Judiciary Division. Next was the Sentinel Triathlon in Santa Cruz on October 6, 1996, and another first place! In 1997, the TEAM rested on its laurels. I tried to tell them that if they were resting on their laurels they were probably wearing them in the wrong place. But you know when three appellate judges agree on something, you can't tell them anything.

In 1998 the TEAM was resurrected to defend its honor at the Donner Lake Triathlon, the national championship. Once again, they were victorious, now becoming — unknown to the race directors — national champions in their division. Bob had, by far, the most difficult task in this struggle: he rode up and down the Donner Summit Road. And I certainly don't think the significance of this string of victories should be one whit diminished by the trifling circumstance that they were in each case the only team in their division.

With A Song In His Heart

Bob has another little known distinction. You know when entertainers are starting out, they often get their first break as an opening act. That means they go on first, warm up the audience and get them in the mood for the main attraction. When an entertainer has made it to the top in the profession, he or she is the headliner. The part of the show everyone pays to see. But when you get beyond headliner status, you can be the closing act. That's the act that takes over when you want everybody to leave.

REV_00259682

Here again, Bob is a standout. At the ABOTA dinner in January 1999, Justice Puglia distinguished himself by taking over the mike from the band's singer and treating the audience to songs from his favorite era — the late 20's — and sure enough, everybody went home. When the last guest left, even Ingrid, Bob was still singing. This is a man who loves his work. Even when its only his avocation.

Not PC

Justice Puglia comes from a time when men could be gentlemen, scholars, and warriors. And these are the virtues he brought to the work at the Third District. Bob Puglia has never been politically correct. He is something much better than that. A decent, honorable man, who never sees people as abstractions or symbols. He takes them as he finds them; expects the best of them; and demands no more from them than he demands of himself. I think it was precisely this leadership by example that over the past quarter century has made the Third such an extraordinary court. With Justice Puglia expressing his absolute faith that we would be all we could be and that we could be much more than we imagined, it would have been downright churlish to let him down.

The Third is a productive, collegial, remarkably lighthearted place where everyone — at every level — works with a will. It reminds me of that mythical Guild of Judges which Learned Hand called the Society of Jobbists — judges for whom exquisite craftsmanship, attention to detail, and principled continuity — is both motivation and reward. If the society existed, Robert K. Puglia would be its California Chairman.

My personal pantheon of admirable judges does not contain a cast of thousands. It is a select company, but I certainly include Justice Puglia among them.

REV_00259683

To me he exemplifies the classical judicial virtues: impartiality, prudence, mastery of a craft, persuasiveness, and candor. He has a sense of the legal system as a whole, an awareness of the ebb and flow of history, and of the need for consistent jurisprudence, and above all self-restraint.

I have this framed quotation on my desk. "Angels can fly because they take themselves lightly. I think it was Justice Puglia's seemingly contradictory qualities that gained him the respect and affection of so many people. He was serious about the work of the court; and he took seriously his role as the keeper of its history and traditions — even going so far as to undertake a lightning commando raid on a museum in South Carolina to retrieve some of our lost artwork. He took the job seriously, but he took himself lightly.

His approach to decisionmaking was painfully democratic. I had a great deal of sympathy for lawyers who sought to work at the Third and bopped into the job interview only to be confronted with all 10 judges. Even arguing before the U. S. Supreme Court you only have to deal with nine! It takes 15 minutes just to shake hands with everybody.

Since he retired, Bob and I have shared adjacent workspaces on the fifth floor. He began with his small space crammed with boxes — the accumulation of more than a quarter century at the court. Recently, I stopped to see how the work was progressing. He had only a few boxes left. He said he had calculated that in his time on the court he had authored more than 3,000 opinions. "Are they going to provide you with bound volumes of all your published opinions?," I asked. His response: "Heck, No." I'm pretty sure he said "heck." "I can always find them on the library shelf if I want to read them." And after a little pause, he said: "Any way, all my best stuff is in California Reporter." For the non-lawyers among us, California Reporter is where good opinions go to die when the California Supreme Court depublishes them.

We talked a few minutes more. Reflecting on all the differences the last few years have wrought. We complained about the general fecklessness of American society in its current manifestation and were, frankly, nostalgic for the days when more people had "feck." Finally, he said with a rueful laugh, "I guess I am a dinosaur." I don't think so. Not a dinosaur. More of an ancient artifact. Like the Rosetta Stone. A text from which we can decipher the best of our past and — if we are lucky — find our way back to the future.

I am sure the Third will continue to be a good court. But, a part of it will always belong to Puglia, P.J. The court will go on, but it will never be quite the same without him. And those of us who in our misspent youth wanted to be Puglia when we grew up now know in our heart of hearts that there will only ever be one. That is as it should be.

Justice Puglia, we will miss you. It will be strange to see future pictures of the court without you in that middle chair. We are, all of us, glad to have been part of the California court system on your watch. Thank you for teaching us what it means to be a good judge. For demonstrating that character counts and integrity is personal. For showing us what dreams may come when we believe in ourselves. Thank you.

Vaya con Dios.

Frederick Douglass Moot Court Competition
Introductory Remarks by Justice Janice R. Brown
Hyatt Hotel, Fisherman's Wharf
San Francisco, California
February 25, 1999
6:15 P.M.

Thank you. I would like to thank the Mayor for his gracious introduction. I am especially grateful because I understand the Mayor had an adventure on his way to the hotel this evening that might have unsettled a less self-possessed individual. He was running late when his limousine unaccountably screeched to a halt in the middle of the block. When he asked the driver what was happening, the driver explained that a frog was hopping across the street and the driver, being a compassionate soul, did not want to squash him. Unfortunately, the frog had stopped and showed no signs of moving on. Well, the Mayor had had enough of this nonsense. He got out of the limo, walked up to the front of the car and sure enough a rather large frog was sitting there. He was startled when the frog thanked him for being so courteous and asked for a ride. Mayor Brown obliged. He put the frog on the seat beside him and the limo continued on its way. Before they had traveled two blocks, the frog said: "Kiss me, I will become a beautiful princess and reward you for your kindness." The Mayor said nothing. The entreaty was repeated several times and got no response. Finally, the frog asked plaintively, "Why won't you kiss me?" And the Mayor replied: "I would rather have a talking frog." You see like most lawyers, he loves words. The law is a wordy profession.

Frederick Douglass was also someone who loved words; who believed in the power of words and the ideas they can convey to enlighten, inspire and persuade, as well as chastise and degrade. He made a career of talking.

REV_00259686

that they would take care of the philosophy and that his role should be limited to telling facts.

His determination to go his way and think his own thoughts, eventually becoming publisher and editor of his own newspaper, led to a rift between Douglass and his benefactors that was not healed for decades. Nevertheless, he chose to be free. Even when that was painful. He understood that there were choices to be made and that those choices would have consequences. At the end of his biography he says:

> "[I] have written in part for the encouragement of a class whose aspirations need the stimulus of success. I have aimed to assure them that knowledge can be obtained under difficulties; that poverty may give place to competency; that obscurity is not an absolute bar to distinction, and that a way is open to welfare and happiness to all who will resolutely and wisely pursue that way; that neither slavery, stripes, imprisonment or proscription need extinguish self-respect, crush manly ambition, or paralyze effort; that no power outside of himself can prevent a man from sustaining an honorable character and a useful relation to his day and generation."

After the war, on August 1, 1880, speaking at a rally celebrating the abolition of slavery in the West Indies, he gave an update of conditions in America.

> "Taking all the circumstances into consideration, the colored people have no reason to despair. We still live, and while there is life there is hope. The fact that we have endured wrongs and hardships, which would have destroyed any other race, and have increased in numbers and public consideration, ought to strengthen our faith in ourselves and the future. . . . I will not listen, myself, and I would not have you listen to the nonsense, that no people can succeed in a life among people by whom they have been despised and oppressed. [¶] The statement is erroneous and contradicted by the whole history of human progress. A few centuries ago, all Europe was cursed with serfdom or slavery. . . . [¶] Greatness does not come to any people on flowery beds of ease. We must fight to win the prize . . . . The hardships and dangers involved in the struggle give strength and toughness to the character, and enable it to stand firm in storm as well as in sunshine. [¶] One thought more before I leave this subject, and it is a thought I wish you all to lay to heart. Practice it yourselves and teach it to your children. It is this. Neither we nor any other people, will ever be respected until we respect ourselves, and we will never respect ourselves till we have the means to live respectably. An exceptionally poor and dependent people will be despised by the opulent and despise themselves."

REV_00259695

Like Douglass I do not think freedom is an entitlement. Freedom is a responsibility. Nor do I believe it is the job of government to take care of us. That idea is the antithesis of freedom. Burke got it right 300 years ago and it is still true. "The people maintain the government, and not the government the people." If the government takes care of the people, they will be subjects not citizens, a passive and dependent population, ~~suffering~~ a different, perhaps more comfortable slavery. To quote Alan Keyes: "Empowerment does not mean just the capacity to do for oneself; rather it means the motive and the will to take the responsibility for one's own destiny. This is the essence of self-government."

REV_00259696

Frederick Douglass understood something I hope we may soon come to realize. Chains on your body are easier to endure than chains on your mind. When your body is imprisoned, your mind can set you free. But when your mind is imprisoned, there can be no hope. These ideas are not new. They have been echoed by sources as diverse as Frederick Douglas, Booker T. Washington, W.E.B. Du Bois, Marcus Garvey and Malcolm X. Without claiming to be heir apparent to any, we might profitably consider the remarkable convergence of their views on the need for intellectual achievement, economic self-sufficiency, and good character.

There is a song from the soundtrack of Space Jam that I used to hear constantly last year. R. Kelly. I Believe I Can Fly. "I believe I can fly. I believe I can touch the sky. I believe I can soar. See me running through that open door." I hope you believe you can fly. I know you can. But our job on the eve of the new millennium is to create an America in which every child will have that same confidence. For black children, this means retrieving the positive portion of our legacy; creating an ethic of pride, progress, and achievement. A legacy of resilience, courage, morality, responsibility, and collective commitment.

Well, I started with a talking frog. I will end with wild geese. When I was a little girl, living in the country, one of the things that fascinated me was the seasonal migration of flocks of geese. I would see them flying overhead. Always in formation. Sometimes a V; sometimes a W. And I learned there is a reason for this characteristic shape. It is aerodynamic. The biggest and strongest birds are always at the front or nearest to the point of the V. They take the brunt of the headwinds and the shape of the formation forces the winds outward and away from the rest of the flock. The young, the old, the sick and weak fly near the tail end of the formation. That way they are not only protected from the fiercest winds, the updraft of the leaders' wings lifts them aloft and pulls them along.

REV_00259697

You have an obligation to go as far and as high as you can. You cannot change the past, but you have it in your power to invent the future. Have a care for the rest of us who will be swept along and held aloft by the updraft of your wings.

Please. Please. Please. Choose to be free.

REV_00259698

He was a natural orator. The editor and publisher of a newspaper. And a nonfiction writer of some renown.

It was his role in history to be a beacon and a symbol for black Americans in a time of change and great peril. And it occurs to me that here — on the eve of the millennium — his words may once again help us to see the future more clearly. I apologize for what I am going to say next, but it has become somewhat of a cliché to say black folks in America are imperiled. But sometimes even a cliché may be true.

In the words of Pastor Leonidas Young, former Mayor of Richmond, Virginia: "The crisis now facing Black America is more devastating than the combined impact of slavery, racial discrimination, and drugs. For now, the enemy is within." We are suffering death by a thousand cuts, and many of the wounds are self-inflicted. It is a crisis of the spirit. Robert Woodson laments that "the lifeline has been severed between today's generation and the rich heritage of self-determination and the will to achieve that once provided a foundation for black progress, even against the greatest odds."

I experienced this firsthand when I was still in law school. The Black Law Student's Association at UCLA started a community outreach program. Each law student adopted a neighborhood school and taught a series of classes about issues we thought would be of interest: legal history, famous black jurists, the legal basis of the civil rights struggle, and questions related to juvenile law.

I was assigned to teach at Inglewood High School. Twenty-five years ago, I would not have described Inglewood as a ghetto school. It was located in a neighborhood of single family homes with well-kept lawns. The school itself was the typical, sprawling California construction, with buildings grouped around a landscaped quad. There was a student parking lot filled with decent looking cars.

REV_00259687

I thought these discussions were going pretty well. The students were attentive though not talkative. On the last day, a young man raised his hand. He said: "Why are you coming here? Why are you talking about this stuff? Everybody knows if you're black and you're poor, you don't have a chance." I was astonished. In all my life I had never heard this defeatist manifesto. Quite the opposite. I started out poor; I will die black, and all my life I had been offered a world of limitless possibilities. I am a great fan of Condoleza Rice, a black woman, a world-class scholar and now Provost at Stanford University. She is from Birmingham, Alabama; I grew up in the tiny town of Luverne. During one speech I attended, she said her parents had her absolutely convinced that she could grow up to be president — even if she couldn't eat a sandwich at Woolworth's. My experience was much the same. I imagine Mayor Brown could recite much the same story.

I was baffled. A law student in my 20s, I was less than 10 years older than this high school student — much less than a generation — and yet it was as if we stood on opposite sides of a great divide. I could not conceive of anyone having the opportunities this young man had who did not think he could conquer the world.

At that moment, I knew I felt something terribly wrong. My certainty has deepened in every decade since. Simple and silly as it sounds, I began to have an inkling even then that words might be the root of the problem. And when it happened — quite by accident — that I became reacquainted with the writings of Frederick Douglass, I was sure of it.

Like you, I heard part of Frederick Douglass's story when I was in grade school. There are several copies of biographies — by and about him — on my bookshelves. But I feel I really made his acquaintance in November 1994. November 4th to be exact.

REV_00259688

[I had been appointed to the Third District Court of Appeal and November 4 was the date set for my confirmation hearing. Ordinarily, the hearing would have been scheduled close to my home, but in order to accommodate the schedule of the members of the Commission on Judicial Appointments, the hearing was scheduled in Los Angeles. I traveled to Los Angeles with my husband and a couple of friends. Not knowing how long the process would take, we scheduled our return flight for late afternoon. As it turned out, the hearing was a breeze and we found ourselves with a whole afternoon of leisure. So, of course, we sent shopping. At least, we went looking. On Rodeo Drive. And we happened upon a shop called Profiles in History. They had fascinating memorabilia. Letters and speeches and photographs from past presidents, supreme court justices, movie stars. Autographed pictures and fragments of letters. We had a wonderful time browsing and reading. Finally, the men growing impatient, we headed for the door. As I walked out, I had the sudden sensation of someone looking at me. Turning my head, I encountered a pair of intent eyes. A fierce gaze. From eyes that could stare an eagle blind.

Stopped in my tracks, I did an about face, walked back into the store and into the corner where I could get a better look. It was a photograph of Frederick Douglass — the young Frederick — mounted above his signature, taken from a letter written in his own hand. I was astonished. I had been in the shop more than an hour and had not seen this photo. It was tucked away in the darkest corner behind the door. But, the fact that I did see it; could not leave the shop without my attention being drawn to it; and that I found it (or it found me) on this day — the day I was first sworn in as a judge — must have some special meaning.

They removed Frederick from the wall, wrapped him carefully, and he went with me on the plane back to Sacramento.] His autographed picture was the first thing I placed on the walls of my chambers at the Third District Court of Appeal. And it went with me when I was appointed to the Supreme Court. If you come into my office right now, you will see Frederick still watching from the wall right in front of my desk. Whenever I look up from my work, he is looking back at me. And that is why when I received your invitation, I knew it was an offer I could not refuse.

REV_00259689

Of course, I had heard stories of Frederick Douglas since childhood. The saga of a man born into slavery who managed to win his freedom; to overcome illiteracy and become one of the most powerful advocates of the abolitionist cause. His life has been an inspiration to generations of black people. And Frederick Douglass reentered my life as a story and a symbol at about the time the sense of unease and bafflement I felt that morning in Inglewood blossomed into full-fledged dismay and a sense of impending doom.

It was not that black Americans made no progress in that quarter century. Those decades saw explosive growth in the numbers of black households moving firmly into the middle class. There were more black high school graduates; more college diplomas; and more advanced degrees than ever before. A corps of dedicated black professionals won praise and recognition for their accomplishments in science, medicine, and law. And there are thousands of black-elected officials throughout the country.

REV_00259690

It is important to say that this history is part of an unbroken march of progress by black Americans that begins before the Civil War. We have a proud heritage left to us by people who did more than sing "We Shall Overcome." They founded businesses and banks, established flourishing centers of trade and commerce, and supported a host of mutual aid societies. But it is becoming increasingly difficult to feel that legacy is authentic. It seems sometimes like a dream only half remembered.

Day after day, week after week, month after month. We hear, like the incessant thrum of talking drums, this roll call of failure. Drugs, poverty, violence. An illegitimacy rate above 80 percent for black children; a third of young black males enmeshed in the criminal justice system; the highest murder rate in the civilized world. More than 350 young black men are killed each year in our nation's capital. A few years ago the Los Angeles Times ran a week long series on all the child victims of gang warfare in Watts and East Los Angeles. Pages and pages of photographs and tiny biographies. Infants. Toddlers. Ten- and twelve-year-olds. And these scenes are being repeated in cities across America. I sit in my office every day reading of senseless slaughter and young men sentenced to two and three consecutive life terms.

I believe that what is happening on these streets would have been unthinkable 45 years ago when Rosa Parks refused to give up her seat on that Montgomery bus; inconceivable in 1963 when thousands stood before the Washington Monument and heard Martin Luther King speak the truth to power, extolling the dream of freedom.

But sometime between then and now, the dream came undone.

There was a day when we were a community and the things that are now happening to our children would not have been permitted. Now, we are only a hapless aggregation and we feel powerless to prevent it. The difference is just a word, but the difference is profound.

REV_00259691

In the words of Robert Woodson, "[a]ccepting an identity as 'victims' has done more damage than years of outright discrimination could accomplish, because it has caused destruction from within. We have fallen prey to an epidemic of an entitlement mentality." We are not alone. As Tony Brown notes in his book, Black Lies, White Lies, "we have become a nation on the dole, a people constantly foraging for government handouts. Americans, rich, poor, and in the middle, have come to feel they are entitled to tap into the public till."

Nor did black people invent the game of grievance-based political action, but — as with everything we put our hearts into — we raised it to a high art form. We did it so well, in fact, that everyone else has learned to play. Julian Bond offers this wry observation: "Today the protected classes extend to a majority of all Americans, including white men over 40, short people, the chemically addicted, the left-handed, the obese, members of all religions. Surely there is a scholar somewhere who can tell us how we came to this state of affairs and how the road to civil rights became so crowded . . . ."

By relying on grievance as the basis of political power and our claims to entitlement, we have been twice victimized: first by the oppression which gave rise to our claim, but finally by the unintended consequences of that agenda.

The unintended consequences have been devastating. The sociological equivalent of a reversal of polarity. "[T]he champions of the black community are those who whine the loudest, whose complaints are the most persistent, and whose claims are the most outrageous — those who 'rattle their [beggar's] cups the loudest.' " In order to support this culture of victimization we have excised from the portrait of black America "the remarkable models of self-help — accomplishments of black entrepreneurs and mutual aid societies" that succeeded even during the eras of the most brutal racial repression and slavery.

REV_00259692

> "The selective history that is transmitted to our young people is, simply put, that blacks came into this country on slave ships; from there they went to the plantations and slavery, from the plantations to the ghetto, and finally, to welfare.
>
> "A complete black history would reveal that, even in the face of the most bitter oppression and bondage, many courageous blacks persevered and accomplished, undaunted by the obstacles they faced."

I grew up surrounded by these stories, these images, words of encouragement and support. It was in the air. Like the scent of flowers on the breeze. We breathed it in, absorbed it, internalized, and lived by it. Words like Challenge. Struggle. Self-reliance. Responsibility. Self-improvement. Achievement. Success. Self-respect. They came not just from my parents and grandparents. From in-laws, cousins, teachers, preachers, and passersby on the street. Any adult could and would reprimand me if I behaved badly; but they were just as likely to pat me on the shoulder and say "we're all so proud of you; keep up the good work!"

These days, it seems just the opposite. Parents struggle in vain to inoculate their children against a culture that celebrates mediocrity and worse; that sees incompetence and academic failure as signs of "true" blackness; that says, without apology, that SAT testing is unfair to black students because they do not have the "genetic hereditary background" to achieve high scores; a culture that proclaims in every way that being black is a handicap, a cross to bear, and a deficit we cannot be expected to overcome. These words like poison in the air. Defeat. Despair. Failure. How high I wonder do the bodies of our children have to be piled before we acknowledge the need for a new vision. Or an old one, retooled for the next millennium.

REV_00259693

The current civil rights agenda apparently assumes history began in the 1960's and ended there too. It is past time to hit the eject button and get out of this time warp.

It's always a revelation to go back to the stories you loved as a child and read them with the eyes of an adult. When I read about Frederick Douglass as a little girl, it was his bondage and his suffering that stayed in my mind. He complained of being hungry, ill-clothed and often cold. I could feel his terrible desolation at being a "slave, a slave for life." His vivid descriptions of the horror and oppression of slavery sparked my compassion.

When I returned to his story as an adult, I still had sympathy for his suffering, but what kindled my admiration was his determination — man and boy — to be free, free on every level. And his willingness to accept the burdens as well as the benefits of his freedom. The Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society launched Douglass's career by signing him on as a paid lecturer. In later years, when asked where he got his education, Douglass replied: "From Massachusetts Abolition University, Mr. Garrison, president." But as much as he admired the abolitionists and credited them with his success, Douglass chafed at the limits they tried to impose on him. White abolitionists welcomed blacks to recount their suffering, to become prize exhibits of the evils of slavery. They did not invite their input on policy or their vision for the future. When Douglas said he wanted to go beyond a recitation of the wrongs he endured to discuss his hopes for the future, Garrison advised that he just stick to his storytelling. Others told Douglass

REV_00259694

California Supreme Court
Sesquicentennial Celebration
B.F. Hastings Building
Old Sacramento
February 8, 2000
9:00 a.m.

By: Justice Janice R. Brown

Thank you Chief.

I am honored to be able to speak on behalf of the court at its 150th birthday party and delighted that all of you are here to share the occasion with us. This has been an extraordinary program.

Shakespeare said, "[The] past is prologue." H.J. Mueller muses that history is poetry and the poetry of history consists in its truth. "It is the fact about the past that is poetic." The playwright and the historian are both right.

I want to thank the participants in this morning's program who have evoked this court's rich history with passion, poetry, and truth. We have certainly had our share of colorful characters and moments of high drama, and our speakers today have made our story live. And those stories about perseverance, independence and courage — and even eccentricity — are the touchstones from which we shape our visions of the future. Holmes said that knowing our history is not a duty; it is only a necessity.

Sometimes, though, history seems oddly familiar. Or, as the French say, the more things change, the more they remain the same. Consider this brief survey of the press coverage of the court's first hundred years.

On April 6, 1855, the same year the court moved into the B.F. Hastings Building, the daily Alta California published an editorial entitled "Contempt of Court." The paper gleefully congratulated the Legislature for passing a law overturning the court's recent decision in Johnson v. Gordon (1854) 4 Cal. 368, in which the court held the United States Constitution gave no authority to the Supreme Court of the United States to exercise appellate jurisdiction over the state courts. According to the Alta's editorial page: "The doctrines laid down in this opinion were so novel and so startling, that in some they caused surprise, in others alarm, in all contempt." The newspaper applauded the Legislature for pulling off "the coolest contempt of court ever committed." Of course, given the way things have turned out, the Legislature might want to reconsider.

REV_00259699

Curiously, eight years later the same paper lamented that the $8,000 annual salary proposed for justices of the Supreme Court was inadequate. Said the paper's editorial writer on March 8, 1863: "This upon reflection must be regarded as very poor economy. First class talent cannot be procured for this stipend. The office of a judge in this state is no sinecure. . . . One of the greatest elements of prosperity is an able, upright, and brilliant judiciary. We can have such only by paying for it." But here we are. Able, upright and brilliant jurists, and still underpaid.

And in a surprisingly sympathetic tone, the Sacramento Union reported, on December 4, 1869, on the first case to be heard in the Supreme Court courtroom at the capitol. The day before, Judge Sanderson had heard the habeas corpus case of Nellie Smith and Anna Keating — a case brought to test the validity of the city ordinance providing that women shall not exhibit themselves in a drinking saloon after midnight. The women argued the ordinance conflicted with the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution. But the city attorney argued that the ordinance, "like all other laws, merely placed restrictions on one for the benefit of many." That was not so uplifting a cause as the one led by Clara Shortridge Foltz, but still a claim for the rights of women.

In 1886, when an unpopular decision concerning riparian rights (Lux v. Haggin (1886) 69 Cal. 255) led to vociferous calls for the resignation of the justices, the San Francisco Call came stoutly to the court's defense in an editorial published on June 18 of that year. Chastising the "infamous plan of dragging the Supreme Court into politics," which the Call said was being advocated by papers like the Chronicle, Examiner, and Alta, the Call ridiculed "these journalistic wiseacres" who with "their usual pretensions to a universality of knowledge, sum up the law of the case in a line and abuse the majority of the Supreme Court in a paragraph" and "stigmatize as ignorant and stupid" the judges who had devoted months "of weary labor to a patient study of the law."

REV_00259700

And then there is the long-running and apparently endless debate about where the Supreme Court should have its headquarters. One editorial, appearing in the Alta California on January 20, 1865, takes a somewhat jaundiced view of the reason for the opposition of the City of Sacramento to the court's removal to San Francisco. According to the Alta California, the Sacramento Union opposed the removal of the Supreme Court because it feared "there may be less demand for drinks, and fewer boots to black." (Parenthetically, I should say I do not think the writer was accusing the justices of being heavy drinkers. He seems to have been referring to the lawyers who would come to town to appear before the court.) On the other hand, the Marysville Express had complained that "the removal of the court would necessitate the removal of the State Library," which the Express said was needed as much for the benefit of the Legislature as the court. The Alta conceded that point was "good in theory," but noted: "The Library would be a great assistance to our legislators, provided these gentlemen made a practice of seeking wisdom among its shelves. But when have they done so? [¶] Books in certain cases, it cannot be denied would be of great service in framing of enactments, but the trouble about them is, they can neither buzz nor buttonhole. The 'lobby' has an advantage over them which cannot be overcome. Champagne can make more converts to a given opinion, any day, than Blackstone."

The court did move to San Francisco, but the controversy was still very much alive in 1957 when the Sacramento Bee reported Governor Goodwin J. Knight's favorable reaction to "the growing movement to return the state supreme court from San Francisco to Sacramento." The article noted that no new law would be needed since the Constitution specifies the court shall be located in Sacramento, and cited in support reports in recent weeks that Chief Justice Phil

REV_00259701

Gibson favored returning the court to Sacramento to "do away with the expensive and exhausting practice of holding court periodically in Los Angeles and Sacramento as well as in San Francisco." (Sacramento Bee (Feb. 22, 1957) p. 1, col. 4.) Apparently, that was only a rumor. Almost 50 years later, the court remains in San Francisco.

After 150 years, we may perhaps be entitled to feel some confidence that — despite our ups and downs — the court's existence is secure. In 2050, we hope the court will be able to return to the B.F. Hastings Building to celebrate its 200th anniversary. You are all invited. I am reminding you now to save the date. Mark your calendars because Justice Mosk will be very disappointed if you are not here.

Finally, on behalf of all the members of the court and the court's staff, I want to thank the people of Sacramento for being generous and gracious to the Supreme Court of California during the whole of its 150-year history. And I do not think it was only because you thought we would give a boost to the local economy.

~~I promise.~~ If I ever get three more votes, we'll be back!

Thank you.

REV_00259702

"Holding Everything Up"
Address to the Black Women Lawyers
Claremont Resort
Berkeley, California
Sunday, May 21, 2000
11:00 A.M.

Thank you. And Good Morning. I want to thank your President, Jill Jasper, for inviting me to join you today at this lovely hotel and for going out of her way to accommodate my schedule. My task this morning is to deliver an address. What that means is that Congresswoman Lee has to do the real work, and I still get to have lunch. That's important because the first thing you learn as a member of the Supreme Court is that there is no free lunch. You are always expected to earn it. But, the more generous groups, like the Black Women Lawyers, sometimes give you a discount: you do an address instead of a speech.

So I thought I would just share with you some personal reflections about life, law and music. I know this may seem to be an oddly disjointed collection of topics, but as I grow older I see fiercer connections between seemingly unrelated ideas and events. This may be the beginning of wisdom. On the other hand, it may signal the onslaught of Alzheimer's. Only time will tell!

In his book, The Mind of God, physicist Paul Davies recounts an anecdote about a student who interrupts a lecture on the origins of the universe to proclaim that she knows better. The world she declares is really a flat plate resting on the back of a giant turtle. When asked by the lecturer what the turtle rests on, she replies: "It's turtles all the way down."[1] This story, Davies says, symbolizes the essential problem of those who search for ultimate answers to the mystery of existence. Where he asks can such a chain of reasoning end? We are either faced with an infinite regress or a superturtle that stands at the base of the tower unsupported. Davies goes on to speculate that the symmetry and precision and intelligibility of the universe weighs strongly in favor of a creative intelligence. That being the case, I propose to offer a new theory about what holds everything up. I am casting a vote for the Left Hand of God. I realize this is an idea which may require a bit more explanation. So, by way of explanation, I offer a biography and some reflections about thinking differently and how a structural conception (or the absence of it) changes everything.

REV_00259703

The Biography

You see it occurs to me that the world may not have started with a bang. Maybe it was a jazz riff. An unmistakable boogie-woogie bass line. This is how my theory evolved. Not long ago I heard a program on NPR called Jazz Profiles. They devoted the entire segment to Mary Lou Williams, a jazz pianist and composer, described as the first internationally famous jazz artist who was not a vocalist. I had never heard her name. I doubt if you have either — unless you are a true jazz aficionado. She has become more famous in the 20 years since her death than she was during her lifetime. Yet, Mary Lou Williams began her performing career in 1916 at the age of six, began gigging with early Swing groups as a teenager, and is credited by many with being the bridge from boogie-woogie to be-bop. Her playing influenced performers as diverse as Art Tatum, Count Basie, and Nat "King" Cole. "Indeed, critics have called her the history of Jazz".[2] She was "the only major Jazz artist who lived and played through all the eras in the history and development of Jazz: The Spirituals, the Blues, . . . Kansas City Swing, Boogie-Woogie, Bop or Modern, [sacred music], and . . . even . . . Avante Garde."[3]

REV_00259704

Between 1929 and 1942, she was the musical director and piano player for Andy Kirk and the Clouds of Joy, one of the premier Kansas City bands of Kansas City's golden era. She got her start as an arranger and composer during the great days of the so-called "stride" piano players -- people like James P. Johnson, Fats Waller, and Jelly Roll Morton. In fact, the boogie-woogie player, Jack Howard, was one of her earliest influences. While she was still in kindergarten, Howard taught her the importance of a strong and loud left hand. This was the main characteristic of the stride piano. In those days when many bands did not have a drummer and the bass was unamplified, it was the piano that provided both tempo and bass. Thus, it was said that the piano was "holding everything up." Jazz musicians sometimes refer to this as bottom. It is their way of describing the foundation, the structure or framework on which everything else rests. Without that driving relentless beat, without the fullness supplied by those crashing lefthanded chords, the rest of the band lacks both tempo and contrast.

The front men had fame; the soloist got the glory, but it was the powerful left hand of the stride pianist that made the music happen. And as I was listening to some of the early compositions of Mary Lou Williams, I could feel the strength of her hand. Relentless as a locomotive. Steady as a heartbeat. Providing that steadiness required discipline, self-restraint, self-control and humility.

Listening to the powerful, beautiful, mysterious chords of Mary Lou Williams on a Sunday afternoon, I had this sudden insight: That the structure of music is the structure of everything. It is not, as the modern world seems to think, chaos that is creative. Bringing order out of chaos is the creative act. But only, and this is important, if the order does no more than anchor the soaring solos and make the song intelligible.

REV_00259705

Life, Law & The Universe

Does this lesson in musicology have anything to do with life and law? I think it does. The profile of Williams included excerpts of interviews of Williams, commentaries from other musicians about her accomplishments, and many examples of Williams's compositions being played by the lady herself. Thinking about, and hearing and feeling, this music, an odd but satisfying analogy came to mind. Perhaps because we think of new things in terms that are familiar, I found myself thinking this is exactly what good judges do. And, in a sense, it's exactly how they do it.

For much of our history we admired and venerated judges who exhibited what Mary Ann Glendon calls the classical virtues: impartiality, prudence, practical reason, mastery of a craft, and a sense of the legal system as a whole. The ability to preserve principled continuity while adopting the law to changed social and economic conditions was greatly prized; and the highest virtue was self-restraint. These judges of the old school were kindred spirits to the old stride piano players. They could lay down the beat and hold it steady. They could improvise and innovate without ever disconnecting from the solid foundation. Ms. Williams said she "changed her style with each period."[4] She was "always experimenting."[5] She changed her emphasis, but she never abandoned her roots. "The left hand gave you strength and a great beat in your head. You didn't have to stride after the [mid-thirties]. You could play rhythmic things on top because the beat was embedded in your head."[6]

For judges of the old school, like John Marshall, Holmes, Hand, and Frankfurter, the most important quality was humility. Frankfurter described it this way:

REV_00259706

> "What is essential . . . is that you get [judges] who bring to their task first and foremost, humility and an understanding of the range of the problems and of their own inadequacy in dealing with them, disinterestedness, and allegiance to nothing except the effort, amid tangled words and limited insights to find the path through precedent, through policy, through history, to the best judgment that fallible creatures can reach in that most difficult of all tasks: the achievement of justice . . . through reason called law."[7]

It was all about knowing the limits of the role, the limits of the law, and the limits of human beings. In marked contrast, the new paradigm celebrates adventuresomeness and hubris. The classical conception of the judicial role is viewed as too confining, boring, and above all insufficiently responsive to social problems. The classical ideal is being rapidly supplanted by the "image of the good judge as bold, creative, compassionate, result-oriented, and liberated from legal technicalities."[8]

The ideal of the good judge succumbs more and more to the cult of celebrity. Judges are no longer content with providing the steady and stable foundation. They want acclaim, adulation, stardom. And these may seem innocuous ambitions in a culture where every opportunity for notoriety is eagerly grasped and no indignity is too great if it will guarantee 15 minutes of fame and the paycheck that comes with it. Who wouldn't want to be Learned Hand; but more famous, Harlan Stone, winning every instant poll even if his colleagues won't sign his opinion; Justice Jackson as the guest host on Larry King Live. But judges cast in the role of entertainers or court jesters may not be the best thing for a democratic regime such as ours.

Morton Horwitz[9] says the early evolution of American law can be explained as a continuing struggle to provide assurance that law transcends politics. To separate law and politics has been a central theme of much of our legal and political thought. In the old world, American jurists sought to enshrine the rule of law — the conviction that a structure of impartial and self-executing norms existed, untainted by politics. "Law carried an unusual burden in this conception. It was hoped that it could provide a non-political cushion or buffer between state and society. Unless law could be rendered non-political, how could it avoid becoming simply an instrument of democratic politics?"[10]

REV_00259707

In the new world, the judicial allegiance to principle, prudence, and moderation became the first casualty in the war waged by the theorists and the ideologues. "Safeguards against arbitrary power, resistance to total power, assurance of stable government which is responsive and capable of generating long term consent"[11] — these were all anathema to the architects of perfection. Law became not only an instrument of politics, it became the instrument of politically imposed perfection.

America's Constitution provided an 18th Century answer to the question of what to do about the status of the individual and the mode of government. Though the founders set out to establish good government "from reflection and choice,"[12] they also acknowledged the "limits of reason as applied to constitutional design,"[13] and wisely did not seek to invent the world anew on the basis of abstract principle; instead, they chose to rely on habits, customs, and principles derived from human experience and authenticated by tradition. They sought to limit government and thus to limit the villainous potential of self-interest amplified by the public sphere.

In the 1930's things began to change. Traditional morality lost ground to moral relativism. And the ideal of limited government gave way to the ideology of collectivism. Collectivism sought to answer a different question: how to achieve cosmic justice – sometimes referred to as social justice – a world of social and economic equality. Such an ambitious proposal sees no limit to man's capacity to reason. It presupposes a community can consciously design not only improved political, economic, and social systems but new and improved human beings as well. The pursuit of these goals required a new view of government and a new sort of judge — a decisionmaker convinced of the infallibility of human reason and the absolute sovereignty not of the rule of law but of the rule of judges. These judges viewed their paramount obligation as "doing the right thing." It is difficult to think that "doing the right thing" could ever be wrong. But the choice is not between doing right and doing wrong. The choice is between judges imposing their own view of what is right (and waiting for the applause) or judges committed resolutely to the much less glamorous task of holding everything up. What holds everything up can be invisible; unnoticed by the uninitiated; but deeply necessary.

REV_00259708

As we cease to remember the music of our youth, the rhythm of our past becomes little more than a fading and erratic echo. If that indeed was what was holding everything up, we are in danger of losing more than the same old song.

I know this sounds impossibly far-fetched. But why should the conception of God as a jazz musician be less compelling than God as a mathematician or God as a computer programmer. Maybe his strong left hand has been sending a rollicking rhythm through the cosmos for eons, and when he lifts his fingers from the keys the song of the universe will collapse. You ought not to reject the idea out of hand. There could be a lot worse things than a God who likes to jam!

Thank you.

REV_00259709

[1] Davies, The Mind of God (1992) p. 223.

[2] http://www.New Jazz Archives (1997-1999) Eyeneer Music Archives.

[3] Ibid.

[4] O'Neil, Swinger With A Mission, Books & Arts (Dec. 7, 1979) pp. 30-31.

[5] Maroon, Mary Lou Williams Biography (1931-1942).

[6] Ibid.

[7] Id. at pp. 124-126.

[8] Glendon, A Nation Under Lawyers (1994) p. 152

[9] Horwitz, The Transformation of American Law 1870-1960 (1992).

[10] Ibid.

[11] Bickel, The Morality of Consent (1975) p.18.

[12] Hamilton, The Federalist Papers No. 1 (Rossiter ed. 1961) p. 33.

[13] Michael W. Spicer, Public Administration and the Constitution: A Conflict in World Views (Mar. 1, 1994) 24 American R. of Public Admin. 85 [1994 WL 2806423 at *10].

REV_00259710

Fifty Ways to Lose Your Freedom*
The Institute for Justice
Washington, D.C.
August 12, 2000
6:30 P.M.

Thank you. This has been a wonderful evening and I congratulate all of the participants. I would like to thank William ("Chip") Mellor and Clint Bolick for inviting me to join you — even though it is August. Just knowing that such a conference exists is a refreshment to my spirit. It is not often that I am in the company of so many people who speak my language. I appreciate Mr. Bolick's kind introduction and I applaud the Institute for laboring to keep alive an authentic conversation about the core principles of our regime. It is not an easy task in a world where all the words have lost their meaning.

A few preliminaries. First, I should warn you that today's discussion will be a mile wide, but only an inch deep. That's about all you can do in a speech. Second, the title of this meditation is Fifty Ways to Lose Your Freedom, which is a paraphrase of a Paul Simon tune. If you don't know who Paul Simon is, ask an old person. It will be a good way to get acquainted. The song tells the tale of a young man trying — though not too hard — to resist temptation and remain true to his first love while being advised by the source of temptation that . . . there must be 50 ways to leave your lover. When I began writing this speech, that phrase kept revolving in my mind.

In the last 100 years – and particularly in the last 30 – the Constitution, once the fixed chart of our aspirations, has been demoted to the status of a bad chain novel. Government has been transformed from a necessary evil to a nanny – benign, compassionate, and wise. Sometimes transformation is a good thing. Sometimes, though, it heralds not higher ground but rather, to all foundations for prudence and practical reason."[xvi] Thus, "the fatal error" of the Enlightenment is "the emancipation of the will from reason."[xvii] Similarly, the fatal error of those who repudiated the idea of natural law is the attempt to separate law from morality. "Law is rooted in a series of objective value judgments about morality or 'justice' or it is about nothing."[xviii]

REV_00259711

Lord Hailsham adds: "Law is concerned with the compulsion of human beings by other human beings. To try and divorce such compulsion from conceptions of what is right and wrong is ultimately to justify tyranny in its most naked form."[xix]

While politics is the art of the possible and law must often be expedient, "the attempt to divorce law or legislation from an objective set of moral or spiritual values connected with right and wrong, just and unjust, good and bad, virtue and vice, however starry-eyed the proponents or advocates of such an attempt may be, is the precise heresy which has led to the major cruelties and disasters of the twentieth century."[xx]

All political ideologies involve the assertion of values and all values are derived from what we call the Natural Law, Traditional Morality, or the First Principles of Practical Reasoning. "There never has been and never will be, a radically new judgment of value in the history of the world. What purport to be new systems or [as they now call them] new 'ideologies,' all consist of fragments from [the natural law] arbitrarily wrenched from their context in the whole and then swollen to madness in their isolation, yet still owing to [natural law] alone such validity as they possess."[xxi] To put it another way, these so-called new values resemble natural law "as Satan resembles God. These bloodthirsty idols are proving to be far more exacting than the old gods of truth and justice."[xxii] The result, I believe, is an America the Constitution never contemplated.

REV_00259720

Aaron Wildavsky notes that the Madisonian world has now gone "topsy turvy" as factions, defined as groups "activated by some common interest adverse to the rights of other citizens or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community,"[xxiii] have been transformed into sectors of public policy. "Indeed," says Wildavsky, "government now pays citizens to organize, lawyers to sue, and politicians to run for office. Soon enough, if current trends continue, government will become self-contained, generating (apparently spontaneously) the forces to which it responds."[xxiv]

Is this the fulfillment of the Founders' plan? Not exactly. Clearly, the American Revolution, like the French Revolution, is part of a rationalist tradition. But rationalism is an ambiguous term, subtle in its infinite manifestations. For present purposes it is sufficient to identify the critical differences. The American tradition accepted the limits of reason; the European tradition did not.

America's Constitution provided an 18th Century answer to the question of what to do about the status of the individual and the mode of government. Though the Founders set out to establish good government "from reflection and choice,"[xxv] they also acknowledged the "limits of reason as applied to constitutional design,"[xxvi] and wisely did not seek to invent the world anew on the basis of abstract principle; instead, they chose to rely on habits, customs, and principles derived from human experience and authenticated by tradition.

> "The Framers understood that the self-interest which in the private sphere contributes to the welfare of society — both in the sense of material well-being and in the social unity engendered by commerce — makes man a knave in the public sphere, the sphere of politics and group action. It is self-interest that leads individuals to form factions to try to expropriate the wealth of others through government and that constantly threatens social harmony."[xxvii]

REV_00259721

There is nothing new, of course, in the idea that the Framers did not buy into the notion of human perfectibility. The political theory upon which our Constitution was organized reflected not an antirationalist conception of human capacity — but a narrower and, in my view, more realistic one. It could be characterized as a conception of man after the fall.

It was a quite opposite notion of humanity, of its fundamental nature and capacities, that animated the great concurrent event in the West in 1789 – the revolution in France. Out of that revolutionary holocaust – intellectually an improbable melding of Rousseau with Descartes – the powerful notion of abstract human rights was born. At the risk of being skewered by historians of ideas, I want to suggest that the belief in and the impulse toward human perfection, at least in the political life of a nation, is an idea whose arc can be traced from the Enlightenment, through the Terror, to Marx and Engels, to the Revolutions of 1917 and 1937. The latter date marks the triumph of our own socialist revolution.

Collectivism provided the 20th century answer to a question very different from the one our Constitution resolved. The new question was how to achieve cosmic justice – sometimes referred to as social justice – a world of perfect social and economic equality. Such an ambitious proposal sees no limit to man's capacity to reason. It presupposes a community can consciously design not only improved political, economic, and social systems, but new and improved human beings as well.

The great innovation of this millennium was equality before the law. The greatest fiasco — the attempt to guarantee equal outcomes for all people. Tom Bethell notes that the security of property — a security our Constitution sought to ensure — had to be devalued in order for collectivism to come of age. The ambitious project of socialism was nothing less than the "reformation of human nature. Intellectuals visualized a planned life without private property, mediated by the New Man."[xxviii] He never arrived. As John McGinnis persuasively argues: "There is simply a mismatch between collectivism on any large and enduring scale and our evolved nature. As Edward O. Wilson, the world's foremost expert on ants, remarked about Marxism, 'Wonderful theory. Wrong species.' "[xxix]

REV_00259722

We continue to chip away at the foundations of our success. We dismissed natural law and morality because its unverifiable judgments were deemed inferior to reason. But, then, we drove reason itself from the camp because the most significant of life's questions defy empiricism. Kant compared a "purely empirical theory of law" to "the wooden head in Phaedrus' fable, which may be beautiful, but alas! has no brain."[xxx] Now we have nothing left but our passion.

This is a dilemma for any judge, but one especially acute for a supreme court judge. A court of last resort is supposed to do more than resolve individual disputes. Such courts ought to be building for the future, providing guidance, structure, stability — instilling confidence in the primacy of the rule of law. But, alas, the decisions of such courts, including my own, seem ever more ad hoc and expedient, perilously adrift on the roiling seas of feckless photo-op compassion and political correctness. And we are, by and large, captives of an intellectual world view that is completely antithetical to the kind of substantive limits an authentic historical interpretation of our constitutional traditions would impose. We are committed to doing the right thing. But with only our feelings to guide us, most of the time we cannot figure out what the right thing is.[xxxi]

REV_00259723

I know the idea that there is an extra constitutional dimension to constitutional law is heresy. And given our recent history, it is a very scary thought. But I am slowly coming to agree with Charles Fried's assessment: it is the hubris, carelessness, and lack of candor of judges that should concern us — not the label active or passive. If judges tell us honestly what they are doing, we do know something about the world view that animated the American Revolution and formed the basis of our constitutional documents. The Founders were committed to individual liberty. Liberty not license. And not openness. Certainly not an openness so extreme it bursts the mainspring of the regime. That mainspring is reason. An idea of reason that is both modest and practical. The Founders did not demand perfection of human beings or civil society. They seemed to understand the essentially totalitarian heart of all dreams of utopia. One man's perfection is another's holocaust. Their ideas — expressed with precision and detail — will allow us to gauge the bona fides of judges audacious enough to invoke higher law.

On those rare occasions, we will have to face the countermajoritarian difficulty squarely. It must be part of the design. Individual liberty cannot be preserved if the majority's will must always triumph.

My view is admittedly a bit skewed. My heritage includes not only the middle passage but the trail of tears; not only the rhythms of midnight trains but the terrors of midnight riders; Jim Crow and Jim Dandy; whited sepulchres and colored fountains.

Anyone with that kind of history will tell you quite emphatically that the positive law is not enough. Never enough. When I was growing up the positive law declared that some people were more equal than others. But that law, judged by a higher law, was wrong.

REV_00259724

And the civil rights movement that firmly established that proposition was deeply rooted in the natural law, natural rights tradition. By demanding the natural and political rights which belonged to them as human beings, Black Americans in the early civil rights movement firmly allied themselves with the natural law foundations of the Constitution. Only natural law offers an alternative to might makes right and accounts for man's "unrelenting quest to rise above the 'letter of the law' to the realm of the spirit."[xxxii]

I know it is fashionable these days to dismiss the Founders as stale, pale, and male; to speak harshly and cynically of America's corrupt constitutional tradition. But, this is a cheap shot. One which does not do justice to the principles embodied in our founding documents. These men deserve our admiration and respect. They were human. They were flawed. Gertrude Himmelfarb says hypocrisy is the homage vice pays to virtue. But, whether the result of glorious accident, inspired mistake, Machiavellian machination or well-considered master plan, the Founders built better than perhaps they knew. They built on the right foundation and founded a regime which created the potential for moral freedom, material prosperity, and social generosity. "[W]hat the American revolution instituted was a rule of law, a preference for restraint, a refuge from the rampaging presumptions" of those Sowell refers to derisively as the "morally anointed."[xxxiii]

Lincoln long ago foresaw that America's achievement might be jeopardized from within by those anxious to "strike a blow" against free government. Men of ambition would continue to seek to gratify their "ruling passion." Such ambition, Lincoln warned, "thirsts and burns for distinction; and, if possible, it will have it, whether at the expense of emancipating slaves, or enslaving free men."[xxxiv] Both Lincoln and Tocqueville apparently did anticipate that we might cheerfully place the shackles around our own necks.

REV_00259725

As Lincoln noted: "If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen, we must live through all time, or die by suicide."[xxxv]

We have had to decide before: whether to be slaves or free.

Freedom never has been easy. Not to obtain. Not to sustain. In the last 100 years we have let the government buy our birthright with our own tax money. Freedom requires us to have courage; to live with our own convictions; to question and struggle and strive. And to fail. And Fail. Recently, I saw a quote attributed to Samuel Beckett. He asks: "Ever tried? Ever failed?" Well, no matter. He says, "Try again. Fail better." Trying to live as free people is always going to be a struggle. But we should commit ourselves to trying and failing, and trying again. To failing better until we really do become like that city on the hill, which offered the world salvation.

---

* I am, of course, indebted to an old Paul Simon song for this felicitous phrase.

i Woodrow Wilson, Democracy and Efficiency, Atlantic Monthly (1901).

ii F. A. Hayek, The Road to Serfdom (U. of Chicago Press 1994).

iii Tom Bethell, Property Rights, Prosperity and 1,000 Years of Lessons, Wall Street J. (Dec. 27, 1999) p. A19 (Bethell); and see James W. Ely, The Guardian of Every Other Right (Oxford U. Press 1992) p. 26.

iv Ibid.

v Ibid.

vi Ayn Rand, Capitalism the Unkown Ideal (New Am. Lib. 1966) pp. 4-5.

vii Harold McKinnon, The Higher Law, address to Ninth Circuit judges (1946) p. 1 (McKinnon).

viii Id. at p. 16.

ix Clint Bolick, Unfinished Business (Pacific Research Inst. 1990) p. 2.

x Lord Hailsham, Modern Reflections on the Natural Law, address to the Canon Law Trust Society (1978) (Hailsham).

xi d'Entreves, Natural Law: An Introduction to Legal Philosophy (Hutchinson U. Lib. 1951) p. 7 (d'Entreves).

xii Id. at p. 86, quoting Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica

xiii Id. at p. 95.

xiv Id. at p. 105.

xv Id. at p. 75.

REV_00259726

[xvi] Stanley Rosen, Rethinking the Enlightenment, 7 Common Knowledge (Winter 1998) 104, 106.

[xvii] Id. at p. 114.

[xviii] Hailsham, op cit. supra, at p. 3.

[xix] Ibid.

[xx] Ibid.

[xxi] C.S. Lewis, The Abolition of Man (First Touchstone ed. 1996) pp. 55-56.

[xxii] d'Entreves, op cit. supra, at p. 17.

[xxiii] Golembiewski & Wildavsky, The Cost of Federalism, Bare Bones: Putting Flesh on the Skeleton of American Federalism (1984) 67, 73.

[xxiv] Ibid.

[xxv] Hamilton, The Federalist Papers No. 1 (Rossiter ed. 1961) p. 33.

[xxvi] Michael W. Spicer, Public Administration and the Constitution: A Conflict in World Views (Mar. 1, 1994) 24 American R. of Public Admin. 85 [1994 WL 2806423 at *10].

[xxvii] John O. McGinnis, The Original Constitution and Our Origins (1996) 19 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Policy 251, 253, fn. omitted (McGinnis).

[xxviii] Bethell, supra, at p. A19.

[xxix] McGinnis, op. cit. supra, at p. 258, quoting Josh Getlin, Natural Wonder: At Heart, Edward Wilson's an Ant Man, L.A. Times (Oct. 21, 1994) p. E1.

[xxx] d'Entreves, Natural Law, supra, at p. 115.

[xxxi] See Jean Francois Revel, The Flight From Truth (Random House N.Y. 1991) p. xvi.

[xxxii] d'Entreves, Natural Law, supra, at p. 121.

[xxxiii] Tom Sowell, The Quest for Cosmic Justice (The Free Press 1999) p. 146.

[xxxiv] Abraham Lincoln, address to the Young Men's Lyceum of Springfield, Illinois, January 27, 1838.

[xxxv] Ibid.

REV_00259727

put a different gloss on Pat Moynihan's memorable phrase, defining democracy down.

My grandparents' generation thought being on the government dole was disgraceful, a blight on the family's honor. Today's senior citizens blithely cannibalize their grandchildren because they have a right to get as much "free" stuff as the political system will permit them to extract. What happened to the old time glory of constitutional democracy, which Woodrow Wilson praised for "the emphasis it puts on character; for its tendency to exalt the purposes of the average man to some high level of endeavor; for its just principles of common assent in matters in which all are concerned; for its ideals of duty and its sense of brotherhood"?[i]

I have bad news. Not only was the revolution not televised; most of us did not hear the radio broadcast; we missed it entirely.

Writing 50 years ago, F.A. Hayek warned us that a centrally planned economy is "The Road to Serfdom."[ii] He was right, of course; but the intervening years have shown us that there are many roads to serfdom. In fact, it now appears that human nature is so constituted that, as in the days of empire all roads led to Rome; in the heyday of liberal democracy, all roads lead to slavery. If Hayek was writing today he would have to call his book "50 Ways to Lose Your Freedom." Consider these lyrics: "Climb on somebody's back, Jack; just believe every lie, Sly; plan the perfect man, Stan; If you crave slavery, go to the back of the bus, Gus. You don't have to discuss much; tell the powers that be, Lee; they can throw away the key, you don't want to be free!" Well . . . Paul Simon probably has nothing to worry about. I'm just trying to make a point. Most of us no longer find slavery abhorrent. We embrace it. We demand more. Big government is not just the opiate of the masses. It is the opiate. The drug of choice for multinational corporations and single moms, for regulated industries and rugged Midwestern farmers, and militant senior citizens.

REV_00259712

The prevalence and permanence of this newly fledged feudal consciousness is a puzzle that led me — by a very circuitous path — to a new understanding of (or at least a new way of thinking about) the judicial role. As a conservative judge, I initially accepted the conventional wisdom that substantive due process was a myth invented by judicial activists who were up to no good. You all know the drill. Substantive due process is an oxymoron and Lochnerism is the strongest pejorative known to American law.

There are at least two problems with dismissing the idea of substance in the due process clause. First, substantive due process is still around, cleverly disguised as fundamental rights jurisprudence. Second, even conservative judges who take the rule of law seriously are appalled by legislative actions which violate the whole spirit, if not quite the letter, of provisions clearly designed to limit government. And most significantly, if we can invoke no ultimate limits on the power of government, a democracy is inevitably transformed into a Kleptocracy — a license to steal, a warrant for oppression.

Much to my surprise, when I actually began to investigate the question, I found a small but credible body of scholarship suggesting that, in our early history, the due process clause was viewed as a restraint on government, fashioned, in part, to protect the rights of property owners. Apparently, the colonists saw in the due process clause a guarantee which had a wide, varied, and indefinite content. The concept of due process like the words "the law of the land" in the Magna Carta put some liberties and some property interests beyond the power of government. Moreover, the language of the Constitution suggests the drafters clearly distinguished between the limited framework of that document and the whole law.

REV_00259713

This revelation was what's known in the precise, technical language of the judge's trade as an "uh-oh."

It slowly dawned on me that the problem may not be judicial activism. The problem may be the world view — amounting to an altered political and cultural consciousness — out of which judges now fashion their decisions.

At its founding and throughout its early history, this regime revered private property. The American philosophy of the Rights of Man relied heavily on the indissoluble connection between rationality, property, freedom, and justice. The Founders viewed the right of property as "the guardian of every other right" and reasoned that "to deprive a people of this right is in fact to deprive them of their liberty."[iii] The idea of constitutional government is deceptively simple: the government cannot legitimately infringe upon our rights even if the majority votes to do so.

But, by 1890, attitudes had changed radically enough for Alfred Marshall, the teacher of John Maynard Keynes, to make "the astounding claim that the need for private property 'reaches no deeper than the qualities of human nature.' "[iv] A hundred years later came Milton Friedman's laconic reply: " 'I would say that goes pretty deep.' "[v] Marshall's statement, however, signaled a seachange: a political and cultural shift from the American vision of humans as free and creative beings entitled to enjoy the fruits of individual effort back to the tribal view of man which continues to dominate European political philosophy. "Europe's predominant idea of emancipation consisted of changing the concept of man as a slave to the absolute state embodied by the king, to the concept of man as a slave to the absolute state as embodied by 'the people' — i.e., switching from slavery to a tribal chieftain into slavery to the tribe."[vi] America sought to make government subservient to the people; the collectivist impulse which gained preeminence in Europe sought to keep people subservient to the government.

REV_00259714

It is, I believe, this shift in world view which causes conservatives to dread judicial activism. In short, we have been fixated on the structure's gingerbread trim when we should have been focusing on its foundations.

Speaking to a conference of Ninth Circuit judges in San Francisco in 1946, Harold McKinnon identified a central problem with the socialist mystique. He understood the threat of the essentially antidemocratic and totalitarian political and legal philosophies gaining ground in American universities. Such teachings, McKinnon believed, denied the essential elements of a regime devoted to the preservation of natural rights.

> "[This teaching] denies that there is a moral law which is inherent in human nature and which is therefore immutable and to which all man-made laws to be valid must conform. It denies that by virtue of this law man possesses certain rights which are inherent and inalienable and therefore superior to the authority of the state. It denies that the purpose of government is to secure these inherent inalienable rights."[vii]

I take issue with one part of McKinnon's catechism. He says the teachings are undemocratic. While it is true that natural law was a necessary precursor to the good constitutional republic; democracy need not be a good regime — as we are proving every day. Freedom and democracy are not synonymous. Indeed, one of the grave errors of American foreign policy is the assumption that merely installing the forms of a regime like ours — without its foundation — will automatically lead to freedom, stability, and prosperity.

REV_00259715

McKinnon correctly concluded that adherence to natural law is the essential element of the American birthright.

> "For if there is no higher law, there is no basis for saying that any man-made law is unjust . . . and, in such case, the ultimate reason for things, as Justice Holmes himself conceded, is force. If there is no natural law, there are no natural rights; and if there are no natural rights, the Bill of Rights is a delusion, and everything which a man possesses — his life, his liberty and his property — are held by sufferance of government, and in that case it is inevitable that government will some day find it expedient to take away what is held by such a title as that. And if there are no eternal truths, if everything changes, everything, then we may not complain when the standard of citizenship changes from freedom to servility and when democracy relapses into tyranny."[viii]

Today these words sound strange to our ears. McKinnon could make such a forceful statement because he and his audience shared a common understanding. They accepted the necessary connection between natural law and natural rights and the centrality of natural law to any effective scheme of limited government. In short, McKinnon and his audience of judges shared a common devotion to a set of first principles — what Clint Bolick describes as that immutable body of law derived from the nature of people as rational human beings — "the law of nature that has from the beginning of human beings nurtured their progress and development."[ix]

In the context of law or morality, "natural" means "something which can be apprehended by natural man, by the use of faculties with which he is naturally endowed, including reason and the moral sense, and which does not require for its authentication more than reflection, thought, and the diligent pursuit of truth by practice, self-discipline, and attention to detail."[x]

REV_00259716

Let me give you an example from an unlikely source: a comedy routine of Chris Rock's. He is talking about taxes and government services. He says: "The messed up thing about taxes is you don't 'pay' taxes. The government TAKES them. You get your check and money is GONE! It was not an option! That ain't a payment, that's a JACK! I been TAX JACKED! . . . [The] worst part about it, we pay taxes for [stuff] we don't even use . . . . Why are black people paying Social Security? I won't get the money till I'm 65 . . . . Meanwhile, the average black man dies at 54. Hypertension, high blood pressure, police. . . . I used to work at McDonald's making minimum wage. . . . I would get $200 a week and they would take out $50 in taxes. That's a lot of money if you only making $200. . . . What do you get with that $50? All the free street light in the world. As far as I am concerned, give everybody a candle. Just give me back my $50."

As far as I know, Chris Rock is not a lawyer; he is not a legal philosopher; and I doubt that he is a conservative. But he is using his experience, his observations, and his rational faculties to make a judgment about fairness and justice.

Natural law seems to come naturally to human beings. We almost invariably describe events as fair or unfair, sporting or not sporting, just or unjust. If memory serves, "it's not fair" is the first phrase our children learn after they master the word "no." If anything, we may make such value judgments too casually and with too little appreciation of the deep metaphysical implications of our language.

Nevertheless, for thousands of years, the idea of natural law played a dominant role in both philosophy and history. "It was conceived as the ultimate measure of right and wrong, as the pattern of the good life. . . . It provided a potent incentive to reflection, the touchstone of existing institutions, the justification of conservatism as well as revolution."[xi]

REV_00259717

Cicero's eloquent expression of this idea should be committed to memory by every law student:

> "True law is Reason, right and natural, commanding people to fulfill their obligations and prohibiting and deterring them from doing wrong. Its validity is universal; it is immutable and eternal. Its commands and prohibitions apply effectively to good men, and those uninfluenced by them are bad. Any attempt to supersede this law, to repeal any part of it, is sinful; to cancel it entirely is impossible. Neither the Senate nor the Assembly can exempt us from its demands; we need no interpreter or expounder of it but ourselves. There will not be one law at Rome, one at Athens, or one now and one later, but all nations will be subject all the time to this one changeless and everlasting law." (De Re Publica, III, 33.)

I suspect it is the use of words, like unchanging, everlasting, immutable, that was (and is) also natural law's greatest vulnerability. The claim to fame of modern jurisprudence is precisely that it does not purport to have a monopoly on truth. Medieval scholars devoted much energy to demonstrating the demarcation between law and morals because they did not want morals reduced to narrow legal categories. They did not deny the close connection between law and morals (they would have argued that life in society is a moral duty and that there is no aspect of life to which we can be morally indifferent), but argued morality is (and should remain) broader than legal duty. "[T]he laws of men do not primarily aim at promoting virtue, but only at securing peaceful living together; they do not forbid all that is evil, but only that which imperils society; they do not command all that is good, but only that which pertains to the general welfare."[xii]

REV_00259718

"Natural law is the outcome of man's quest for an absolute standard of justice."[xiii] The breach between law and morals, the assertion that one has nothing to do with the other, is the essential feature of modern jurisprudence. Positivism is perhaps the inevitable result of the rationalist view that exalts the lawgiver. For the positivists, law is defined by the will of the lawmakers and the truth of legal propositions is proven by the fact the provision has been duly enacted by the appropriate authority. Positivism, in turn, paved the way for a slew of other adventures in legal criticism: legal realism, historical, feminist, critical legal studies, and even law and economics.

To the extent the Enlightenment sought to substitute the paradigm of reason for faith, custom or tradition, it failed to provide a rational explanation of the significance of human life. It thus led, in a sort of ultimate irony, to the repudiation of reason.[xiv] Rationalism pushed to its limits consigns all that is not objectively verifiable, i.e., all that is not mathematical or scientific, to the realm of rhetoric. Thus, it reduces truth to a matter of perspective; and makes all perspectives equal. And since our choices can only be justified rhetorically — that is by reference to compassion or philanthropy or utility — even equality is debased, reduced to the equal right of all desires to be satisfied. In this brave new world, the assertion of a perspective becomes its justification. The claim is that a particular perspective serves the general welfare. What is really served is the will to power. "There can be little room left for old-fashioned discussions about the nature of justice and the essence of law when human will is made the supreme arbiter of all human values."[xv]

I am glossing over a complicated evolution, but the important point here is that positivism exalts the lawgiver because from the positivist's point of view it is the only rational thing to do. However, "[t]he repudiation of metaphysics, religion, and tradition . . . leads inevitably to the destruction of

REV_00259719

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Sample Speeches] [Folder 2]

OA/NARA#: 337/233
9118

Box 52
Folder 1

REV_00259728

Brett

Fifty Ways to Lose Your Freedom*
The Institute for Justice
Washington, D.C.
August 12, 2000
6:30 P.M.

Thank you. This has been a wonderful evening and I congratulate all of the participants. I would like to thank William ("Chip") Mellor and Clint Bolick for inviting me to join you — even though it is August. Just knowing that such a conference exists is a refreshment to my spirit. It is not often that I am in the company of so many people who speak my language. I appreciate Mr. Bolick's kind introduction and I applaud the Institute for laboring to keep alive an authentic conversation about the core principles of our regime. It is not an easy task in a world where all the words have lost their meaning.

A few preliminaries. First, I should warn you that today's discussion will be a mile wide, but only an inch deep. That's about all you can do in a speech. Second, the title of this meditation is Fifty Ways to Lose Your Freedom, which is a paraphrase of a Paul Simon tune. If you don't know who Paul Simon is, ask an old person. It will be a good way to get acquainted. The song tells the tale of a young man trying — though not too hard — to resist temptation and remain true to his first love while being advised by the source of temptation that . . . there must be 50 ways to leave your lover. When I began writing this speech, that phrase kept revolving in my mind.

In the last 100 years – and particularly in the last 30 – the Constitution, once the fixed chart of our aspirations, has been demoted to the status of a bad chain novel. Government has been transformed from a necessary evil to a nanny – benign, compassionate, and wise. Sometimes transformation is a good thing. Sometimes, though, it heralds not higher ground but rather, to all foundations for prudence and practical reason."[xvi] Thus, "the fatal error" of the Enlightenment is "the emancipation of the will from reason."[xvii] Similarly, the fatal error of those who repudiated the idea of natural law is the attempt to separate law from morality. "Law is rooted in a series of objective value judgments about morality or 'justice' or it is about nothing."[xviii]

REV_00259861

Lord Hailsham adds: "Law is concerned with the compulsion of human beings by other human beings. To try and divorce such compulsion from conceptions of what is right and wrong is ultimately to justify tyranny in its most naked form."[xix]

While politics is the art of the possible and law must often be expedient, "the attempt to divorce law or legislation from an objective set of moral or spiritual values connected with right and wrong, just and unjust, good and bad, virtue and vice, however starry-eyed the proponents or advocates of such an attempt may be, is the precise heresy which has led to the major cruelties and disasters of the twentieth century."[xx]

All political ideologies involve the assertion of values and all values are derived from what we call the Natural Law, Traditional Morality, or the First Principles of Practical Reasoning. "There never has been and never will be, a radically new judgment of value in the history of the world. What purport to be new systems or [as they now call them] new 'ideologies,' all consist of fragments from [the natural law] arbitrarily wrenched from their context in the whole and then swollen to madness in their isolation, yet still owing to [natural law] alone such validity as they possess."[xxi] To put it another way, these so-called new values resemble natural law "as Satan resembles God. These bloodthirsty idols are proving to be far more exacting than the old gods of truth and justice."[xxii] The result, I believe, is an America the Constitution never contemplated.

REV_00259870

Aaron Wildavsky notes that the Madisonian world has now gone "topsy turvy" as factions, defined as groups "activated by some common interest adverse to the rights of other citizens or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community,"[xxiii] have been transformed into sectors of public policy. "Indeed," says Wildavsky, "government now pays citizens to organize, lawyers to sue, and politicians to run for office. Soon enough, if current trends continue, government will become self-contained, generating (apparently spontaneously) the forces to which it responds."[xxiv]

Is this the fulfillment of the Founders' plan? Not exactly. Clearly, the American Revolution, like the French Revolution, is part of a rationalist tradition. But rationalism is an ambiguous term, subtle in its infinite manifestations. For present purposes it is sufficient to identify the critical differences. The American tradition accepted the limits of reason; the European tradition did not.

America's Constitution provided an 18th Century answer to the question of what to do about the status of the individual and the mode of government. Though the Founders set out to establish good government "from reflection and choice,"[xxv] they also acknowledged the "limits of reason as applied to constitutional design,"[xxvi] and wisely did not seek to invent the world anew on the basis of abstract principle; instead, they chose to rely on habits, customs, and principles derived from human experience and authenticated by tradition.

> "The Framers understood that the self-interest which in the private sphere contributes to the welfare of society — both in the sense of material well-being and in the social unity engendered by commerce — makes man a knave in the public sphere, the sphere of politics and group action. It is self-interest that leads individuals to form factions to try to expropriate the wealth of others through government and that constantly threatens social harmony."[xxvii]

REV_00259871

There is nothing new, of course, in the idea that the Framers did not buy into the notion of human perfectibility. The political theory upon which our Constitution was organized reflected not an antirationalist conception of human capacity — but a narrower and, in my view, more realistic one. It could be characterized as a conception of man after the fall.

It was a quite opposite notion of humanity, of its fundamental nature and capacities, that animated the great concurrent event in the West in 1789 – the revolution in France. Out of that revolutionary holocaust – intellectually an improbable melding of Rousseau with Descartes – the powerful notion of abstract human rights was born. At the risk of being skewered by historians of ideas, I want to suggest that the belief in and the impulse toward human perfection, at least in the political life of a nation, is an idea whose arc can be traced from the Enlightenment, through the Terror, to Marx and Engels, to the Revolutions of 1917 and 1937. The latter date marks the triumph of our own socialist revolution.

Collectivism provided the 20th century answer to a question very different from the one our Constitution resolved. The new question was how to achieve cosmic justice – sometimes referred to as social justice – a world of perfect social and economic equality. Such an ambitious proposal sees no limit to man's capacity to reason. It presupposes a community can consciously design not only improved political, economic, and social systems, but new and improved human beings as well.

The great innovation of this millennium was equality before the law. The greatest fiasco — the attempt to guarantee equal outcomes for all people. Tom Bethell notes that the security of property — a security our Constitution sought to ensure — had to be devalued in order for collectivism to come of age. The ambitious project of socialism was nothing less than the "reformation of human nature. Intellectuals visualized a planned life without private property, mediated by the New Man."[xxviii] He never arrived. As John McGinnis persuasively argues: "There is simply a mismatch between collectivism on any large and enduring scale and our evolved nature. As Edward O. Wilson, the world's foremost expert on ants, remarked about Marxism, 'Wonderful theory. Wrong species.' "[xxix]

REV_00259872

We continue to chip away at the foundations of our success. We dismissed natural law and morality because its unverifiable judgments were deemed inferior to reason. But, then, we drove reason itself from the camp because the most significant of life's questions defy empiricism. Kant compared a "purely empirical theory of law" to "the wooden head in Phaedrus' fable, which may be beautiful, but alas! has no brain."[xxx] Now we have nothing left but our passion.

This is a dilemma for any judge, but one especially acute for a supreme court judge. A court of last resort is supposed to do more than resolve individual disputes. Such courts ought to be building for the future, providing guidance, structure, stability — instilling confidence in the primacy of the rule of law. But, alas, the decisions of such courts, including my own, seem ever more ad hoc and expedient, perilously adrift on the roiling seas of feckless photo-op compassion and political correctness. And we are, by and large, captives of an intellectual world view that is completely antithetical to the kind of substantive limits an authentic historical interpretation of our constitutional traditions would impose. We are committed to doing the right thing. But with only our feelings to guide us, most of the time we cannot figure out what the right thing is.[xxxi]

REV_00259873

I know the idea that there is an extra constitutional dimension to constitutional law is heresy. And given our recent history, it is a very scary thought. But I am slowly coming to agree with Charles Fried's assessment: it is the hubris, carelessness, and lack of candor of judges that should concern us — not the label active or passive. If judges tell us honestly what they are doing, we do know something about the world view that animated the American Revolution and formed the basis of our constitutional documents. The Founders were committed to individual liberty. Liberty not license. And not openness. Certainly not an openness so extreme it bursts the mainspring of the regime. That mainspring is reason. An idea of reason that is both modest and practical. The Founders did not demand perfection of human beings or civil society. They seemed to understand the essentially totalitarian heart of all dreams of utopia. One man's perfection is another's holocaust. Their ideas — expressed with precision and detail — will allow us to gauge the bona fides of judges audacious enough to invoke higher law.

On those rare occasions, we will have to face the countermajoritarian difficulty squarely. It must be part of the design. Individual liberty cannot be preserved if the majority's will must always triumph.

My view is admittedly a bit skewed. My heritage includes not only the middle passage but the trail of tears; not only the rhythms of midnight trains but the terrors of midnight riders; Jim Crow and Jim Dandy; whited sepulchres and colored fountains.

Anyone with that kind of history will tell you quite emphatically that the positive law is not enough. Never enough. When I was growing up the positive law declared that some people were more equal than others. But that law, judged by a higher law, was wrong.

REV_00259874

And the civil rights movement that firmly established that proposition was deeply rooted in the natural law, natural rights tradition. By demanding the natural and political rights which belonged to them as human beings, Black Americans in the early civil rights movement firmly allied themselves with the natural law foundations of the Constitution. Only natural law offers an alternative to might makes right and accounts for man's "unrelenting quest to rise above the 'letter of the law' to the realm of the spirit."[xxxii]

I know it is fashionable these days to dismiss the Founders as stale, pale, and male; to speak harshly and cynically of America's corrupt constitutional tradition. But, this is a cheap shot. One which does not do justice to the principles embodied in our founding documents. These men deserve our admiration and respect. They were human. They were flawed. Gertrude Himmelfarb says hypocrisy is the homage vice pays to virtue. But, whether the result of glorious accident, inspired mistake, Machiavellian machination or well-considered master plan, the Founders built better than perhaps they knew. They built on the right foundation and founded a regime which created the potential for moral freedom, material prosperity, and social generosity. "[W]hat the American revolution instituted was a rule of law, a preference for restraint, a refuge from the rampaging presumptions" of those Sowell refers to derisively as the "morally anointed."[xxxiii]

Lincoln long ago foresaw that America's achievement might be jeopardized from within by those anxious to "strike a blow" against free government. Men of ambition would continue to seek to gratify their "ruling passion." Such ambition, Lincoln warned, "thirsts and burns for distinction; and, if possible, it will have it, whether at the expense of emancipating slaves, or enslaving free men."[xxxiv] Both Lincoln and Tocqueville apparently did anticipate that we might cheerfully place the shackles around our own necks.

REV_00259875

As Lincoln noted: "If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen, we must live through all time, or die by suicide."[xxxv]

We have had to decide before: whether to be slaves or free.

Freedom never has been easy. Not to obtain. Not to sustain. In the last 100 years we have let the government buy our birthright with our own tax money. Freedom requires us to have courage; to live with our own convictions; to question and struggle and strive. And to fail. And Fail. Recently, I saw a quote attributed to Samuel Beckett. He asks: "Ever tried? Ever failed?" Well, no matter. He says, "Try again. Fail better." Trying to live as free people is always going to be a struggle. But we should commit ourselves to trying and failing, and trying again. To failing better until we really do become like that city on the hill, which offered the world salvation.

---

* I am, of course, indebted to an old Paul Simon song for this felicitous phrase.

i Woodrow Wilson, Democracy and Efficiency, Atlantic Monthly (1901).

ii F. A. Hayek, The Road to Serfdom (U. of Chicago Press 1994).

iii Tom Bethell, Property Rights, Prosperity and 1,000 Years of Lessons, Wall Street J. (Dec. 27, 1999) p. A19 (Bethell); and see James W. Ely, The Guardian of Every Other Right (Oxford U. Press 1992) p. 26.

iv Ibid.

v Ibid.

vi Ayn Rand, Capitalism the Unkown Ideal (New Am. Lib. 1966) pp. 4-5.

vii Harold McKinnon, The Higher Law, address to Ninth Circuit judges (1946) p. 1 (McKinnon).

viii Id. at p. 16.

ix Clint Bolick, Unfinished Business (Pacific Research Inst. 1990) p. 2.

x Lord Hailsham, Modern Reflections on the Natural Law, address to the Canon Law Trust Society (1978) (Hailsham).

xi d'Entreves, Natural Law: An Introduction to Legal Philosophy (Hutchinson U. Lib. 1951) p. 7 (d'Entreves).

xii Id. at p. 86, quoting Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica

xiii Id. at p. 95.

xiv Id. at p. 105.

xv Id. at p. 75.

REV_00259876

[xvi] Stanley Rosen, Rethinking the Enlightenment, 7 Common Knowledge (Winter 1998) 104, 106.

[xvii] Id. at p. 114.

[xviii] Hailsham, op cit. supra, at p. 3.

[xix] Ibid.

[xx] Ibid.

[xxi] C.S. Lewis, The Abolition of Man (First Touchstone ed. 1996) pp. 55-56.

[xxii] d'Entreves, op cit. supra, at p. 17.

[xxiii] Golembiewski & Wildavsky, The Cost of Federalism, Bare Bones: Putting Flesh on the Skeleton of American Federalism (1984) 67, 73.

[xxiv] Ibid.

[xxv] Hamilton, The Federalist Papers No. 1 (Rossiter ed. 1961) p. 33.

[xxvi] Michael W. Spicer, Public Administration and the Constitution: A Conflict in World Views (Mar. 1, 1994) 24 American R. of Public Admin. 85 [1994 WL 2806423 at *10].

[xxvii] John O. McGinnis, The Original Constitution and Our Origins (1996) 19 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Policy 251, 253, fn. omitted (McGinnis).

[xxviii] Bethell, supra, at p. A19.

[xxix] McGinnis, op. cit. supra, at p. 258, quoting Josh Getlin, Natural Wonder: At Heart, Edward Wilson's an Ant Man, L.A. Times (Oct. 21, 1994) p. E1.

[xxx] d'Entreves, Natural Law, supra, at p. 115.

[xxxi] See Jean Francois Revel, The Flight From Truth (Random House N.Y. 1991) p. xvi.

[xxxii] d'Entreves, Natural Law, supra, at p. 121.

[xxxiii] Tom Sowell, The Quest for Cosmic Justice (The Free Press 1999) p. 146.

[xxxiv] Abraham Lincoln, address to the Young Men's Lyceum of Springfield, Illinois, January 27, 1838.

[xxxv] Ibid.

REV_00259877

put a different gloss on Pat Moynihan's memorable phrase, defining democracy down.

My grandparents' generation thought being on the government dole was disgraceful, a blight on the family's honor. Today's senior citizens blithely cannibalize their grandchildren because they have a right to get as much "free" stuff as the political system will permit them to extract. What happened to the old time glory of constitutional democracy, which Woodrow Wilson praised for "the emphasis it puts on character; for its tendency to exalt the purposes of the average man to some high level of endeavor; for its just principles of common assent in matters in which all are concerned; for its ideals of duty and its sense of brotherhood"?[i]

I have bad news. Not only was the revolution not televised; most of us did not hear the radio broadcast; we missed it entirely.

Writing 50 years ago, F.A. Hayek warned us that a centrally planned economy is "The Road to Serfdom."[ii] He was right, of course; but the intervening years have shown us that there are many roads to serfdom. In fact, it now appears that human nature is so constituted that, as in the days of empire all roads led to Rome; in the heyday of liberal democracy, all roads lead to slavery. If Hayek was writing today he would have to call his book "50 Ways to Lose Your Freedom." Consider these lyrics: "Climb on somebody's back, Jack; just believe every lie, Sly; plan the perfect man, Stan; If you crave slavery, go to the back of the bus, Gus. You don't have to discuss much; tell the powers that be, Lee; they can throw away the key, you don't want to be free!" Well . . . Paul Simon probably has nothing to worry about. I'm just trying to make a point. Most of us no longer find slavery abhorrent. We embrace it. We demand more. Big government is not just the opiate of the masses. It is the opiate. The drug of choice for multinational corporations and single moms, for regulated industries and rugged Midwestern farmers, and militant senior citizens.

REV_00259862

The prevalence and permanence of this newly fledged feudal consciousness is a puzzle that led me — by a very circuitous path — to a new understanding of (or at least a new way of thinking about) the judicial role. As a conservative judge, I initially accepted the conventional wisdom that substantive due process was a myth invented by judicial activists who were up to no good. You all know the drill. Substantive due process is an oxymoron and Lochnerism is the strongest pejorative known to American law.

There are at least two problems with dismissing the idea of substance in the due process clause. First, substantive due process is still around, cleverly disguised as fundamental rights jurisprudence. Second, even conservative judges who take the rule of law seriously are appalled by legislative actions which violate the whole spirit, if not quite the letter, of provisions clearly designed to limit government. And most significantly, if we can invoke no ultimate limits on the power of government, a democracy is inevitably transformed into a Kleptocracy — a license to steal, a warrant for oppression.

Much to my surprise, when I actually began to investigate the question, I found a small but credible body of scholarship suggesting that, in our early history, the due process clause was viewed as a restraint on government, fashioned, in part, to protect the rights of property owners. Apparently, the colonists saw in the due process clause a guarantee which had a wide, varied, and indefinite content. The concept of due process like the words "the law of the land" in the Magna Carta put some liberties and some property interests beyond the power of government. Moreover, the language of the Constitution suggests the drafters clearly distinguished between the limited framework of that document and the whole law.

REV_00259863

This revelation was what's known in the precise, technical language of the judge's trade as an "uh-oh."

It slowly dawned on me that the problem may not be judicial activism. The problem may be the world view — amounting to an altered political and cultural consciousness — out of which judges now fashion their decisions.

At its founding and throughout its early history, this regime revered private property. The American philosophy of the Rights of Man relied heavily on the indissoluble connection between rationality, property, freedom, and justice. The Founders viewed the right of property as "the guardian of every other right" and reasoned that "to deprive a people of this right is in fact to deprive them of their liberty."[iii] The idea of constitutional government is deceptively simple: the government cannot legitimately infringe upon our rights even if the majority votes to do so.

But, by 1890, attitudes had changed radically enough for Alfred Marshall, the teacher of John Maynard Keynes, to make "the astounding claim that the need for private property 'reaches no deeper than the qualities of human nature.' "[iv] A hundred years later came Milton Friedman's laconic reply: " 'I would say that goes pretty deep.' "[v] Marshall's statement, however, signaled a seachange: a political and cultural shift from the American vision of humans as free and creative beings entitled to enjoy the fruits of individual effort back to the tribal view of man which continues to dominate European political philosophy. "Europe's predominant idea of emancipation consisted of changing the concept of man as a slave to the absolute state embodied by the king, to the concept of man as a slave to the absolute state as embodied by 'the people' — i.e., switching from slavery to a tribal chieftain into slavery to the tribe."[vi] America sought to make government subservient to the people; the collectivist impulse which gained preeminence in Europe sought to keep people subservient to the government.

REV_00259864

It is, I believe, this shift in world view which causes conservatives to dread judicial activism. In short, we have been fixated on the structure's gingerbread trim when we should have been focusing on its foundations.

Speaking to a conference of Ninth Circuit judges in San Francisco in 1946, Harold McKinnon identified a central problem with the socialist mystique. He understood the threat of the essentially antidemocratic and totalitarian political and legal philosophies gaining ground in American universities. Such teachings, McKinnon believed, denied the essential elements of a regime devoted to the preservation of natural rights.

> "[This teaching] denies that there is a moral law which is inherent in human nature and which is therefore immutable and to which all man-made laws to be valid must conform. It denies that by virtue of this law man possesses certain rights which are inherent and inalienable and therefore superior to the authority of the state. It denies that the purpose of government is to secure these inherent inalienable rights."[vii]

I take issue with one part of McKinnon's catechism. He says the teachings are undemocratic. While it is true that natural law was a necessary precursor to the good constitutional republic; democracy need not be a good regime — as we are proving every day. Freedom and democracy are not synonymous. Indeed, one of the grave errors of American foreign policy is the assumption that merely installing the forms of a regime like ours — without its foundation — will automatically lead to freedom, stability, and prosperity.

REV_00259865

McKinnon correctly concluded that adherence to natural law is the essential element of the American birthright.

> "For if there is no higher law, there is no basis for saying that any man-made law is unjust . . . and, in such case, the ultimate reason for things, as Justice Holmes himself conceded, is force. If there is no natural law, there are no natural rights; and if there are no natural rights, the Bill of Rights is a delusion, and everything which a man possesses — his life, his liberty and his property — are held by sufferance of government, and in that case it is inevitable that government will some day find it expedient to take away what is held by such a title as that. And if there are no eternal truths, if everything changes, everything, then we may not complain when the standard of citizenship changes from freedom to servility and when democracy relapses into tyranny."[viii]

Today these words sound strange to our ears. McKinnon could make such a forceful statement because he and his audience shared a common understanding. They accepted the necessary connection between natural law and natural rights and the centrality of natural law to any effective scheme of limited government. In short, McKinnon and his audience of judges shared a common devotion to a set of first principles — what Clint Bolick describes as that immutable body of law derived from the nature of people as rational human beings — "the law of nature that has from the beginning of human beings nurtured their progress and development."[ix]

In the context of law or morality, "natural" means "something which can be apprehended by natural man, by the use of faculties with which he is naturally endowed, including reason and the moral sense, and which does not require for its authentication more than reflection, thought, and the diligent pursuit of truth by practice, self-discipline, and attention to detail."[x]

REV_00259866

Let me give you an example from an unlikely source: a comedy routine of Chris Rock's. He is talking about taxes and government services. He says: "The messed up thing about taxes is you don't 'pay' taxes. The government TAKES them. You get your check and money is GONE! It was not an option! That ain't a payment, that's a JACK! I been TAX JACKED! . . . [The] worst part about it, we pay taxes for [stuff] we don't even use . . . . Why are black people paying Social Security? I won't get the money till I'm 65 . . . . Meanwhile, the average black man dies at 54. Hypertension, high blood pressure, police. . . . I used to work at McDonald's making minimum wage. . . . I would get $200 a week and they would take out $50 in taxes. That's a lot of money if you only making $200. . . . What do you get with that $50? All the free street light in the world. As far as I am concerned, give everybody a candle. Just give me back my $50."

As far as I know, Chris Rock is not a lawyer; he is not a legal philosopher; and I doubt that he is a conservative. But he is using his experience, his observations, and his rational faculties to make a judgment about fairness and justice.

Natural law seems to come naturally to human beings. We almost invariably describe events as fair or unfair, sporting or not sporting, just or unjust. If memory serves, "it's not fair" is the first phrase our children learn after they master the word "no." If anything, we may make such value judgments too casually and with too little appreciation of the deep metaphysical implications of our language.

Nevertheless, for thousands of years, the idea of natural law played a dominant role in both philosophy and history. "It was conceived as the ultimate measure of right and wrong, as the pattern of the good life. . . . It provided a potent incentive to reflection, the touchstone of existing institutions, the justification of conservatism as well as revolution."[xi]

REV_00259867

Cicero's eloquent expression of this idea should be committed to memory by every law student:

> "True law is Reason, right and natural, commanding people to fulfill their obligations and prohibiting and deterring them from doing wrong. Its validity is universal; it is immutable and eternal. Its commands and prohibitions apply effectively to good men, and those uninfluenced by them are bad. Any attempt to supersede this law, to repeal any part of it, is sinful; to cancel it entirely is impossible. Neither the Senate nor the Assembly can exempt us from its demands; we need no interpreter or expounder of it but ourselves. There will not be one law at Rome, one at Athens, or one now and one later, but all nations will be subject all the time to this one changeless and everlasting law." (De Re Publica, III, 33.)

I suspect it is the use of words, like unchanging, everlasting, immutable, that was (and is) also natural law's greatest vulnerability. The claim to fame of modern jurisprudence is precisely that it does not purport to have a monopoly on truth. Medieval scholars devoted much energy to demonstrating the demarcation between law and morals because they did not want morals reduced to narrow legal categories. They did not deny the close connection between law and morals (they would have argued that life in society is a moral duty and that there is no aspect of life to which we can be morally indifferent), but argued morality is (and should remain) broader than legal duty. "[T]he laws of men do not primarily aim at promoting virtue, but only at securing peaceful living together; they do not forbid all that is evil, but only that which imperils society; they do not command all that is good, but only that which pertains to the general welfare."[xii]

REV_00259868

"Natural law is the outcome of man's quest for an absolute standard of justice."[xiii] The breach between law and morals, the assertion that one has nothing to do with the other, is the essential feature of modern jurisprudence. Positivism is perhaps the inevitable result of the rationalist view that exalts the lawgiver. For the positivists, law is defined by the will of the lawmakers and the truth of legal propositions is proven by the fact the provision has been duly enacted by the appropriate authority. Positivism, in turn, paved the way for a slew of other adventures in legal criticism: legal realism, historical, feminist, critical legal studies, and even law and economics.

To the extent the Enlightenment sought to substitute the paradigm of reason for faith, custom or tradition, it failed to provide a rational explanation of the significance of human life. It thus led, in a sort of ultimate irony, to the repudiation of reason.[xiv] Rationalism pushed to its limits consigns all that is not objectively verifiable, i.e., all that is not mathematical or scientific, to the realm of rhetoric. Thus, it reduces truth to a matter of perspective; and makes all perspectives equal. And since our choices can only be justified rhetorically — that is by reference to compassion or philanthropy or utility — even equality is debased, reduced to the equal right of all desires to be satisfied. In this brave new world, the assertion of a perspective becomes its justification. The claim is that a particular perspective serves the general welfare. What is really served is the will to power. "There can be little room left for old-fashioned discussions about the nature of justice and the essence of law when human will is made the supreme arbiter of all human values."[xv]

I am glossing over a complicated evolution, but the important point here is that positivism exalts the lawgiver because from the positivist's point of view it is the only rational thing to do. However, "[t]he repudiation of metaphysics, religion, and tradition . . . leads inevitably to the destruction of

REV_00259869

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Saudi Arabia 09/11/2001 Suit

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2175/2026
9795

Box 52
Folder 2

REV_00259878

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE
Office of the Assistant Legal Adviser for Diplomatic Law and Litigation
2201 C Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20520-6310

FAX COVER SHEET

DATE:	June 18, 2003
TO:	CHAD BOUDREAUX	PHONE:
		FAX:	(202) 514-8071
FROM:	Andrew Keller L/DL, Room 5420	PHONE: FAX:	202-647-1074 202-736-7541

Subject: Saudi letter to Sec. Powell

Cover plus 3 page(s)

→ send to State
David Stewart
Will Taft

Withdrawal Marker
The George W. Bush Library

FORM	SUBJECT/TITLE	PAGES	DATE	RESTRICTION(S)
Email	Powell Letter - To: Brett M. Kavanaugh - From: Chad Boudreaux	1	06/18/2003	P1/b1;

This marker identifies the original location of the withdrawn item listed above. For a complete list of items withdrawn from this folder, see the Withdrawal/Redaction Sheet at the front of the folder.

COLLECTION:
Counsel's Office, White House

SERIES:
Kavanaugh, Brett - Subject Files

FOLDER TITLE:
Saudi Arabia 09/11/2001 Suit

FRC ID:
9795

OA Num.:
2175

NARA Num.:
2086

FOIA IDs and Segments:
2017-0345-F

RESTRICTION CODES

Presidential Records Act - [44 U.S.C. 2204(a)]

P1 National Security Classified Information [(a)(1) of the PRA]
P2 Relating to the appointment to Federal office [(a)(2) of the PRA]
P3 Release would violate a Federal statute [(a)(3) of the PRA]
P4 Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential commercial or financial information [(a)(4) of the PRA]
P5 Release would disclose confidential advice between the President and his advisors, or between such advisors [a)(5) of the PRA]
P6 Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(a)(6) of the PRA]

PRM. Personal record misfile defined in accordance with 44 U.S.C. 2201(3).

Deed of Gift Restrictions

A. Closed by Executive Order 13526 governing access to national security information.
B. Closed by statute or by the agency which originated the document.
C. Closed in accordance with restrictions contained in donor's deed of gift.

Freedom of Information Act - [5 U.S.C. 552(b)]

b(1) National security classified information [(b)(1) of the FOIA]
b(2) Release would disclose internal personnel rules and practices of an agency [(b)(2) of the FOIA]
b(3) Release would violate a Federal statute [(b)(3) of the FOIA]
b(4) Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential or financial information [(b)(4) of the FOIA]
b(6) Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(b)(6) of the FOIA]
b(7) Release would disclose information compiled for law enforcement purposes [(b)(7) of the FOIA]
b(8) Release would disclose information concerning the regulation of financial institutions [(b)(8) of the FOIA]
b(9) Release would disclose geological or geophysical information concerning wells [(b)(9) of the FOIA]

Records Not Subject to FOIA

Court Sealed - The document is withheld under a court seal and is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act.

This Document was withdrawn on 7/17/2018 by RAF

Withdrawal Marker
The George W. Bush Library

FORM	SUBJECT/TITLE	PAGES	DATE	RESTRICTION(S)
Letter	[Letter] - To: Your Highness - From: Colin Powell	1	06/18/2003	P1/b1;

This marker identifies the original location of the withdrawn item listed above. For a complete list of items withdrawn from this folder, see the Withdrawal/Redaction Sheet at the front of the folder.

COLLECTION:
Counsel's Office, White House
SERIES:
Kavanaugh, Brett - Subject Files
FOLDER TITLE:
Saudi Arabia 09/11/2001 Suit
FRC ID:
9795
OA Num.:
2175
NARA Num.: 2086

FOIA IDs and Segments:
2017-0345-F

RESTRICTION CODES

Presidential Records Act - [44 U.S.C. 2204(a)]

P1 National Security Classified Information [(a)(1) of the PRA]
P2 Relating to the appointment to Federal office [(a)(2) of the PRA]
P3 Release would violate a Federal statute [(a)(3) of the PRA]
P4 Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential commercial or financial information [(a)(4) of the PRA]
P5 Release would disclose confidential advice between the President and his advisors, or between such advisors [a)(5) of the PRA]
P6 Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(a)(6) of the PRA]
PRM. Personal record misfile defined in accordance with 44 U.S.C. 2201(3).

Deed of Gift Restrictions

A. Closed by Executive Order 13526 governing access to national security information.
B. Closed by statute or by the agency which originated the document.
C. Closed in accordance with restrictions contained in donor's deed of gift.

Freedom of Information Act - [5 U.S.C. 552(b)]

b(1) National security classified information [(b)(1) of the FOIA]
b(2) Release would disclose internal personnel rules and practices of an agency [(b)(2) of the FOIA]
b(3) Release would violate a Federal statute [(b)(3) of the FOIA]
b(4) Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential or financial information [(b)(4) of the FOIA]
b(6) Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(b)(6) of the FOIA]
b(7) Release would disclose information compiled for law enforcement purposes [(b)(7) of the FOIA]
b(8) Release would disclose information concerning the regulation of financial institutions [(b)(8) of the FOIA]
b(9) Release would disclose geological or geophysical information concerning wells [(b)(9) of the FOIA]

Records Not Subject to FOIA

Court Sealed - The document is withheld under a court seal and is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act.

This Document was withdrawn on 7/17/2018 by RAF

REV_00259881

Withdrawal Marker
The George W. Bush Library

FORM	SUBJECT/TITLE	PAGES	DATE	RESTRICTION(S)
Letter	[Letter] - To: Colin Powell - From: Saud Al-Faisal	3	06/18/2003	P1/b1;

This marker identifies the original location of the withdrawn item listed above. For a complete list of items withdrawn from this folder, see the Withdrawal/Redaction Sheet at the front of the folder.

COLLECTION:
Counsel's Office, White House

SERIES:
Kavanaugh, Brett - Subject Files

FOLDER TITLE:
Saudi Arabia 09/11/2001 Suit

FRC ID:
9795

OA Num.:
2175

NARA Num.: 2086

FOIA IDs and Segments:
2017-0345-F

RESTRICTION CODES

Presidential Records Act - [44 U.S.C. 2204(a)]

P1 National Security Classified Information [(a)(1) of the PRA]
P2 Relating to the appointment to Federal office [(a)(2) of the PRA]
P3 Release would violate a Federal statute [(a)(3) of the PRA]
P4 Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential commercial or financial information [(a)(4) of the PRA]
P5 Release would disclose confidential advice between the President and his advisors, or between such advisors [a)(5) of the PRA]
P6 Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(a)(6) of the PRA]

PRM. Personal record misfile defined in accordance with 44 U.S.C. 2201(3).

Deed of Gift Restrictions

A. Closed by Executive Order 13526 governing access to national security information.
B. Closed by statute or by the agency which originated the document.
C. Closed in accordance with restrictions contained in donor's deed of gift.

Freedom of Information Act - [5 U.S.C. 552(b)]

b(1) National security classified information [(b)(1) of the FOIA]
b(2) Release would disclose internal personnel rules and practices of an agency [(b)(2) of the FOIA]
b(3) Release would violate a Federal statute [(b)(3) of the FOIA]
b(4) Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential or financial information [(b)(4) of the FOIA]
b(6) Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(b)(6) of the FOIA]
b(7) Release would disclose information compiled for law enforcement purposes [(b)(7) of the FOIA]
b(8) Release would disclose information concerning the regulation of financial institutions [(b)(8) of the FOIA]
b(9) Release would disclose geological or geophysical information concerning wells [(b)(9) of the FOIA]

Records Not Subject to FOIA

Court Sealed - The document is withheld under a court seal and is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act.

This Document was withdrawn on 7/17/2018 by RAF

REV_00259882

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

EP2, P6/b6] - DOL (Department of Labor) Nomination

OA/NARA#: 1824/1742
9632

Box 52
Folder 3

REV_00259883

U.S. Department of Labor
Office of the Chief of Staff

Fax

To: Brett Kavanaugh From: Gene Scalia

Fax: Date:

Phone : Page: (Total) 2

Re: CC:

☐ Urgent ☐ For Review ☐ Please Comment ☐ Please Reply ☐ Please Recycle

•Subject:

•Comments:

If you have questions or problems regarding this fax, please call (202) 693-6007.

12/18/01 TUE 15:52 FAX

Two Scalias in our government are two too many

MARIANNE MEANS
Hearst News Service

WASHINGTON — When President Bush nominated the son of conservative Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia to the third-highest post in the Labor Department, the terrorist attacks had not occurred and Bush was not yet in a political unity mode.

This week, however, Eugene Scalia's nomination to be the department's solicitor — its top lawyer — was before the Senate Judiciary Committee threatening to blow up the fragile aura of bipartisanship the president is currently trying to foster. During his hearing, Scalia was sternly grilled by Democratic members and lavishly praised by the Republicans.

Giving Scalia power to interpret the administration's policies toward organized labor, which worked hard to defeat Bush in the 2000 election, was a deliberately vengeful move. Looming over the selection is the dark shadow of his cranky father, the architect of the court's rightward drift on civil rights and the mastermind of the court's convoluted ruling that handed the presidency to Bush. Eugene Scalia's nomination inescapably looks like a gigantic political payback, meant to reaffirm Bush's authority by slapping the Democrats in the face.

In April when he picked Scalia, Bush had embarked on a crusade to drive the country to the right, rolling over the Democratic congressional minority and his own party's moderates. In those days, he had no interest in bipartisanship.

His first choice as Labor Secretary, the conservative anti-labor commentator Linda Chavez, proved to be too controversial and was forced to withdraw her name. She was replaced by Elaine Chao, whose attitude is less ideological than Chavez's and is therefore less objectionable to the major unions. Scalia, 37, seems to have been selected to give Chao the backbone to be tough on the labor movement whenever possible.

During his career as a labor lawyer, Scalia campaigned vigorously to repeal Clinton-era federal ergonomics rules designed to reduce repetitive-motion injuries and lower back problems. He said he doubted the "very existence" of the problem, which union officials take very seriously, and mocked ergonomics as "junk science." The Clinton rule was killed by the Republican-controlled Congress earlier this year, and Chao is currently reviewing proposals for revised ergonomics rules.

Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee ChairmanEdward Kennedy, D-Mass., is unequivocal in his opposition to Scalia. The senator says his writings and his record "clearly suggest that his views are outside the mainstream on many issues of vital importance to the nation's workers and their families."

The committee is divided along party lines, with all 10 Democrats opposed to Scalia and all 10 Republicans supporting him. When the committee votes next week, the tie will be broken by former Republican-turned-independent James Jeffords of Vermont. Recently Jeffords said awkwardly, "I think I'll probably support him ... reluctantly."

That means the nomination will go to the Senate floor, where Kennedy vowed "there will be a battle." Business groups have lined up behind Scalia, and the AFL-CIO is campaigning against him, making the outcome uncertain.

The floor vote is likely to break down along party lines, marking the first serious tear in the bipartisan fabric Bush is trying to weave.

He visited the Labor Department Thursday and warned, "This is not a time to worry about partisan politics."

He should have thought of that before he picked such a partisan nominee. Scalia, a choice left over from the pre-unity era, is a flagrant example of the partisan excesses of that period before the terrorist attacks. It is impossible for the Democrats to embrace Scalia, and Bush knew it when he chose him. It would be disingenuous of the president to claim now to be shocked that the nomination has provoked a partisan confrontation.

If Bush is really serious about working in a bipartisan fashion, he should withdraw the nomination. There are other qualified Republican labor lawyers who would not raise so many hackles and cost the president so much in good will.

Marianne Means can be reached at the e-mail address means@hearstdc.com.

002

REV_00259885

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject File

[P2, P6/b6] Recommendation Letters

OA/NARA #: 2174/2085
9794

Box 52
Folder 4

REV_00259886

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2179/2090
9799

Schumer, Charles / Patrick Leahy Letters

Box 52
Folder 5

REV_00259891

United States Senate

WASHINGTON, DC 20510

March 16, 2001

President George W. Bush
The White House
Washington, DC 20500

Dear President Bush:

We are writing to you as Ranking Member of the Senate Judiciary Committee and Ranking Member of the Courts Subcommittee to express our serious concern that your Administration is considering terminating the policy of soliciting comment from the American Bar Association on prospective nominees for the federal courts. The policy of obtaining ABA review – half a century old and uniformly followed by Republican and Democratic Presidents alike – has served our nation well, and ending it would imperil the process of selecting and confirming federal judges.

Since 1952, the ABA has reviewed the professional qualifications of potential nominees to the federal bench before the person under consideration is formally nominated and submitted to the Senate. The ABA considers only the integrity, professional competence and temperament of persons identified as potential nominees – not their philosophy or ideology.

To ensure complete insulation from politics, members of the ABA committee that evaluates potential nominees refrain from participating in or contributing to political campaigns, or taking part in political activity of any kind. The ABA's views remain confidential until after a judicial candidate is formally nominated.

We firmly believe that ending the long established practice of ABA review would dilute the quality of the federal bench. The process of judicial selection needs more information about the competence and integrity of potential nominees, not less. If ABA evaluation did not provide unique, unbiased and essential information, presidents of both parties would not have so heavily relied on it for almost 50 years.

ABA evaluation has been the gold standard by which judicial candidates are judged, which is why presidents have rarely elected to proceed with a nomination after the ABA found the candidate unqualified in the confidential pre-nomination stage. Indeed, for every candidate the ABA finds unqualified, there are undoubtedly scores of others never submitted for ABA review because it is known they cannot meet that body's rightfully exacting scrutiny. Without having to clear the bar of ABA review, nominees will inevitably be of lower quality.

Eliminating ABA review will also further polarize a process that, by now, all Senators agree cries out for less partisanship. The void of information about a candidate's merits that will result from elimination of ABA review will inevitably be filled with politics. And if the Administration chooses not to consult the ABA, we and others of our committee will. Far from saving time, that will delay Senate consideration of nominees, end the Administration's ability to withdraw a nomination in a confidential manner because of a poor ABA rating (which will also publicly embarrass nominees), and drive Senators apart over ideology rather than bring them together.

In sum, we urge you to continue the nearly 50 year old tradition of independent, apolitical ABA evaluation of potential nominees for federal judgeships. Our system of justice can only benefit as a result.

Sincerely,

Charles E. Schumer
UNITED STATES SENATOR

Patrick J. Leahy
UNITED STATES SENATOR

PATRICK J. LEAHY, VERMONT, CHAIRMAN
EDWARD M. KENNEDY, MASSACHUSETTS
JOSEPH R. BIDEN, JR., DELAWARE
HERBERT KOHL, WISCONSIN
DIANNE FEINSTEIN, CALIFORNIA
RUSSELL D. FEINGOLD, WISCONSIN
CHARLES E. SCHUMER, NEW YORK
RICHARD J. DURBIN, ILLINOIS
MARIA CANTWELL, WASHINGTON
JOHN EDWARDS, NORTH CAROLINA
ORRIN G. HATCH, UTAH
STROM THURMOND, SOUTH CAROLINA
CHARLES E. GRASSLEY, IOWA
ARLEN SPECTER, PENNSYLVANIA
JON KYL, ARIZONA
MIKE DEWINE, OHIO
JEFF SESSIONS, ALABAMA
SAM BROWNBACK, KANSAS
MITCH McCONNELL, KENTUCKY

United States Senate
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY
WASHINGTON, DC 20510-6275

EXEC. OFC. PRESIDENT
COUNSEL TO THE PRESIDENT
2002 JUN 25 AM 5:42

June 24, 2002

The Honorable George W. Bush
President of the United States
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20501

Dear Mr. President:

The Senate Judiciary Committee has been working diligently and consistently to consider your judicial nominations during the past 11 months. During that time, the Senate Judiciary Committee has held 20 hearings for 75 of your nominees for lifetime appointment to the federal bench and we are planning another hearing for this week. We have given hearings to more of your judicial nominees in less than one year than were granted to the judicial nominees of other presidents in 20 of the last 22 years.

It was unfortunate to see the Senate's bipartisan cooperation on judicial confirmations distorted in the weeks leading up to May 9th of this year. It was disappointing to see White House officials asserting that the Senate's pace of confirmation of judges was the "worst pace set in recent history" when, in fact, in less than one year since the reorganization of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the Democratic-led Senate had already confirmed 57 judges as of May 9, 2002. This constitutes more judicial nominees confirmed under Democratic leadership than were confirmed in four of the last six full years of Republican control.

Rather than acknowledge the better pace at which your nominees have been considered than those of the last President, members of your staff and political party have chosen to make fund-raising speeches to conservative activists focusing on the few nominees who have not yet had a hearing. The Committee is working hard to evaluate all of your judicial nominees, as part of the Senate's role under the Constitution of preserving the independence of the federal courts. A number of your nominations have not been without controversy, and the difficult ones have taken more time.

Senator Hatch himself acknowledged, when he was Chair, that the Committee can set its own pace depending on the difficulty of the nominees, stating: "If nominees were only considered in the order there were nominated, the process would grind to a halt as more qualified nominees would back up behind questionable nominees." In attempting to address responsibly the 110 vacancies we inherited last summer, the Committee has endeavored to move as quickly as possible on the less controversial of the nominees, in order to provide some much needed relief to the federal courts. Confirming 57 judicial nominees in fewer than 11 months demonstrates our willingness to act fairly, expeditiously and in a bipartisan way.

With all of those appointments, the current number of vacancies in the 862-member federal judiciary is 89. The additional 42 judicial vacancies which have arisen since last summer contribute to that number. Of course, had Senate Republicans not blocked more than 50 of your predecessor's judicial nominees, the current vacancy level would be closer to a total of 40.

At the beginning of this year I offered some suggestions on how we could proceed more cooperatively. Unfortunately, the White House has uniformly rejected them. Most importantly, there has been no significant improvement in the consultation with home-state Senators of which I am aware. Fully a dozen of your current judicial nominees do not have the required support of home-state Senators to be considered by the Committee. As you know, the Committee's long-standing policy in this regard remains unchanged. At the risk of another wasted effort, I again urge increased and improved consultation.

I reiterate my request that you allow the American Bar Association (ABA) peer review process to occur simultaneously with the FBI investigation of judicial nominees. That would allow more nominees to be ready for hearings more quickly. I think that your staff would have to concede that the ABA process has been quite fair to your nominees and that it has not posed the kinds of difficulties that perhaps you had anticipated. I can recall only one of your nominees who received a not qualified rating, and the Committee and Senate nonetheless proceeded to confirm even that nominee.

I again urge your staff to abandon their practice of hoarding nominations and grouping them for simultaneous transmission to the Senate. Larger groupings of nominees may make for a fine press release but create bottlenecks in the review process for the Committee.

Today almost half of the open seats on the federal courts, 44 of 89, are without nominees. While we are moving to consider your judicial nominees, we obviously cannot confirm those who have not yet been nominated. The lack of nominations is particularly acute in the district courts. In fact, we are almost out of district court nominees whose paperwork is complete and are ready to be given hearings. As it is now late June -- and because you have declined to allow the ABA to conduct its independent evaluation concurrent with the FBI investigation prior to nomination, as was the practice of Republican and Democratic presidents dating back to President Eisenhower -- anyone that you nominate in the next month will likely not have an opportunity to receive an ABA rating and be eligible for a hearing prior to the August recess. Accordingly, we likely will have only September and a very few days in October to hold additional hearings.

It was also disheartening to hear members of your Administration admit that they are making no efforts to work out differences on judicial nominations and that your Administration has made the political decision to wait to see what happens in the upcoming elections. This kind of approach is counter-productive.

The Constitution contemplates both the Executive and Legislative Branches working together with respect to lifetime appointments to the Judicial Branch. The nomination and confirmation process can be improved through more cooperation, not less. We could accomplish more and help fill more vacancies more quickly with greater consultation and cooperation. I look forward to working with you more closely on the important work of identifying judicial nominees who will follow precedent, be fair and impartial to all people, respect the independence of the federal judiciary, and protect the rights of all Americans.

Sincerely,

PATRICK LEAHY
Chairman

CHARLES E. SCHUMER
NEW YORK

516476

COMMITTEES:
BANKING JUDICIARY RULES

United States Senate

WASHINGTON, DC 20510

May 14, 2002 5/14/02

The Honorable George W. Bush
The White House
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Mr. President:

I am writing today about the nation's federal appellate courts in the hope we can create a more constructive, fair, and balanced approach to filling the vacancies on the federal bench.

As you know, the judges sitting on the circuit courts of appeals have tremendous power. In an era when the Supreme Court hears fewer than 100 cases a year, the federal appellate courts have nearly unchecked authority. Their rulings have a massive impact on national policy, especially when it comes to areas I care most about such as the environment, workers' rights, women's rights, and the right to vote.

We agree on at least one thing when it comes to judicial nominations: ideology matters. You have made no bones about your desire to nominate conservatives. I respect and appreciate your candor. It creates an atmosphere in which we can engage in honest dialogue about what is happening to the courts instead of being forced to play "gotcha" politics, searching for minor personal peccadillos when ideology is really what the dispute is all about.

That said, I must tell you that with all due respect that your strategy is troubling in the opinion of many members of the Senate. Trying to tilt the bench too far to either side is dangerous for the courts, the country, and the average, everyday Americans for whom these judges have the last word on some of the most important issues in their lives.

Your mission to stock the courts with judges in the mold of Justices Scalia and Thomas, without offering balance on the other side, endangers the legitimacy of our vaunted independent judiciary. Personally, I have no objection to one or two Scalias or Thomases when there is balance on the other side. But a bench full of them will throw the courts out of the mainstream for decades to come.

The Constitution gives the Senate the power of both advice and consent when it comes to federal judicial nominations. Therefore, I am writing to offer some suggestions to improve the process and to expedite the confirmation of judges.

Last week, I chaired a hearing at which four of President Clinton's nominees to the federal bench testified. Judge Jorge Rangel and Enrique Moreno from Texas, former Iowa Attorney General Bonnie Campbell, and Professor Kent Markus from Ohio, have a lot in common. All four are eminently qualified to be federal judges. They are an impressive, accomplished, moderate, and diverse group of men and women. And they share one other thing in common. Not one of them received a vote in the Senate Judiciary Committee under Republican control.

1072407

REV_00259897

Vacancies exist on all three circuits from which they hail: the 5th, 6th, and 8th. Were you to renominate these four compelling and ideological moderates, it would go a long way toward convincing us that you share our goal of maintaining balance on our nation's courts. While these four compelling people would be extraordinary jurists, they are by no means the only candidates for renomination. I would be pleased to provide you with a more thorough list candidates who are legally excellent, ideological moderate, and diverse.

At a minimum, I encourage you to consider seeking advice from the Senate, especially when it comes to these circuit court nominations that have such far-reaching impact. We would much rather work together to ensure the federal judiciary remains the thoughtful, balanced system envied by the world, instead of becoming so politically charged that it loses the respect and reverence it has enjoyed since the founding of our country.

You and I have worked together successfully in a bipartisan manner on any number of matters. For one reason or another, we have been unable to reach agreement with the Administration on how to fill open judgeships. It is precisely because I have so much respect for you and because I have such a strong desire to end the partisan wrangling over who will serve in our third branch of government that I write to propose this first step toward a solution.

I look forward to discussing this matter with you in the near future.

Sincerely,

Charles E. Schumer
United States Senator

REV_00259898

May 19, 2002

Dear Chuck:

This is to acknowledge the receipt of your letter to the President regarding the Nation's federal appellate courts and offering some suggestions on how to improve the process and expedite the confirmation of judges.

I have shared your letter with the President's advisors and the appropriate agencies who have been formulating policy recommendations in this area. Your letter is receiving their close and careful attention. You will be receiving a more detailed response in the near future.

Thank you for your comments.

Sincerely,

Nicholas E. Calio
Assistant to the President and Director of Legislative Affairs

The Honorable Charles Schumer
United States Senate
Washington, DC 20510

Bcc w/ copy for appropriate action: Counsel
For Information:

020531

REV_00259899

Seattle Hebrew Academy

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 1652/1520
9603

Box 52
Folder 6

REV_00259900

BOSTON CHICAGO
FRANKFURT HAMBURG
HONG KONG
LONDON
LOS ANGELES
MOSCOW
NEW JERSEY

Latham & Watkins
ATTORNEYS AT LAW
www.lw.com

NEW YORK
NORTHERN VIRGINIA
ORANGE COUNTY
PARIS
SAN DIEGO
SAN FRANCISCO
SILICON VALLEY
SINGAPORE
TOKYO
WASHINGTON, D.C.

December 21, 2001

VIA FACSIMILE AND U.S. MAIL

Ms. Donna Voss
Washington State Public Assistance Officer
Washington State Disaster Field Office
625 Black Lake Blvd., Suite 3200
Olympia, WA 98502

Re: Seattle Hebrew Academy

Dear Ms. Voss:

This is an appeal from the decision of Region X of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (Bothell, Washington office) ("Region X"), which your office forwarded to Ms. Rebecca Almo, President of Seattle Hebrew Academy ("SHA") on October 27, 2001 that SHA is not an eligible PNP under 44 C.F.R. 206.221(e)(1).

Pursuant to 44 C.F.R. 206.206, SHA has sixty (60) days from receipt of the determination to appeal Region X's decision. This letter appeals Region X's decision that SHA does not meet the eligibility requirements of 44 C.F.R. 206.221(e)(1). SHA requests that this determination be reversed, and that SHA be classified eligible for FEMA assistance under the aforementioned Regulation.

I Summary

This is SHA's second appeal under 44 C.F.R. § 206.206. Region X denied SHA's application for disaster relief, determining that SHA is not "open to the general public" (44 C.F.R. 206.221(e)(1)) and therefore not eligible to receive disaster relief. SHA submits that this determination is both legally nonapplicable and factually inappropriate. From a legal perspective, the requirement of "open to the general public" does not apply to a nonprofit educational facility; 42 U.S.C.A. §5122(9), 44 C.F.R. §206.221(e)(1) so that, even if SHA were deemed not "open to the general public" it would be eligible for public assistance. Moreover, reliance by Region X exclusively on SHA's old bylaws and articles of incorporation gives an incomplete factual picture of the nature of SHA's student body.

In addition, the Stafford act's nondiscrimination provisions mandate that FEMA provide SHA with public assistance. Finally, Region X has conceded that SHA's building is not "used primarily for religious purposes," 44 C.F.R. § 206.221(e)(1), and is therefore not ineligible on these grounds. Regardless, granting relief to SHA neither constitutes the promotion of religion, nor excessive government entanglement with a religious institution.

statutory provisions are intended as binding directives with regard to the government agencies applying them; any form of discrimination constitutes a violation.

Furthermore, FEMA's Director's Policy No. 1-97 of May 12, 1997 (as updated on December 4, 1998) and Director's Policy No. 2-01 of July 17, 2001 (as updated on August 1, 2001) provide the following:

> 1. It is the policy of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) to ensure that the Civil Rights of all persons receiving services or benefits from agency programs and activities are protected. No person shall, on the grounds of race, color, national origin, sex, religion, age, disability, or economic status, be denied the benefits of, be deprived of participation in, or be discriminated against in any program or activity receiving financial assistance from FEMA. In particular, all personnel carrying out Federal major disaster or emergency assistance functions, including the distribution of supplies, the processing of the applications, and other relief and assistance activities, shall perform their work in an equitable and impartial manner without discrimination. It is Agency policy to prohibit such discrimination in any programmatic guidelines, procedures, or other directives. (...)
>
> 5. As an Agency, our goals are to protect lives and prevent the loss of property; to reduce human suffering and enhance the recovery of communities after disaster strikes; and to ensure that FEMA is a high-performance organization serving the public in a timely and cost-efficient manner. We will not truly fulfill these goals unless we also protect precious rights and prevent discrimination. I expect support from every employee of FEMA in carrying out our Civil Rights mandates.
>
> (See Exhibits 6-A and 6-B) (Emphasis supplied.)

Discrimination, however, does not only occur when a statute itself (on its face) provides for disparate treatment on the basis of religion. As such, the language of 44 C.F.R. 206.221(e)(1), which excludes facilities "primarily used for religious instruction" from eligibility, is inherently suspect; see McDaniel v. Paty (1978) 435 U.S. 618 and Larson v. Valente (1982) 456 U.S. 228, 244-246. Discrimination can also occur if such disparate treatment takes place in the application of an otherwise neutral statute to a given case. Further, discrimination does not only involve giving preference to one religion over another (McDaniel, 435 U.S. 618 and Larson, 456 U.S. at 244-246); it also involves the unequal treatment of religious groups and organizations on the one hand and secular groups and organizations on the other hand. The Stafford Act, FEMA Regulation 206.11(b) (mandating non-discrimination) and FEMA's written policies prohibit any and all such practices. It is a well-established principle that the government must not impose any special disabilities on the basis of religious views or status (McDaniel, 435 U.S. 618, and Larson, 456 U.S. at 245).

Even indirect coercion is subject to constitutional scrutiny. In particular, governmental benefits may not be withheld based on an individual's choice to follow the laws of his religion. See Everson v. Board of Education (1947) 330 U.S. 1, 16 and Sherbert v. Verner (1963) 374 U.S. 398, 404 (analogizing the denial of benefits to the imposition of a fine); accord, Thomas v. Review Board (1981) 450 U.S. 707, 716-718. Similarly, the religion-based exclusion from a public forum is subject to strict constitutional scrutiny and requires the government to advance a compelling interest and show that its course of action is narrowly tailored to realize that interest. Widmar v. Vincent (1981) 454 U.S. 263, 270. Only where the incidental effect of a governmental program is to make it more difficult to practice certain religions, without any tendency to coerce members of that religion to act contrary to their beliefs, does government not have to provide a compelling justification for its course of action. Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Ass'n (1988) 485 U.S. 439, 450. Here, however, the denial of FEMA aid on the basis of SHA's old bylaws is of such a coercive nature, because it penalizes SHA based on the strict interpretation of Judaic principles embedded in the school's old bylaws.

REV_00259910

As stated above, both the Stafford Act in section 5151(a) and 44 C.F.R. 206.11(b) unequivocally prohibit discrimination, in whichever form it may occur; and so do FEMA's written policies. Significantly, by including the word "accomplished," the Act and the Regulations emphasize that discrimination is also prohibited in their application. This, too, is underscored in FEMA's written policies. Yet, in arguing – erroneously, see part III.B and C of this appeal – that SHA is not eligible for public assistance because under SHA's old bylaws admission to the school could be restricted on religious grounds, Region X draws a distinction which not only misinterprets the applicable statutes but moreover, runs afoul of the prohibition of discrimination codified in 42 U.S.C.A. 5151(a), 44 C.F.R and FEMA's written policies. Further, in not expressly relying on First Amendment grounds, Region X does not even undertake to set forth a compelling governmental interest that would justify its denial of aid to SHA (nor does it advance a legitimate governmental interest forming a rational basis for the denial, which would be required even if strict scrutiny did not apply here). Region X merely purports to interpret the applicable statutes, and it does so in an erroneous manner.

E. Region X Does Not Argue that the SHA Building is Not "Used Primarily for Religious Purposes."

Because Region X has conceded this argument, we do not need to point out that, under the definition given in the Public Assistance Guide, FEMA Publication Manual 322 p. 15, SHA's building is not "used primarily for religious purposes."[5]

F. Granting Relief To SHA Neither Constitutes The Promotion Of Religion Nor Excessive Government Entanglement With A Religious Institution.

While FEMA has not expressly denied assistance to SHA based on First Amendment grounds, the language of 44 C.F.R. 206.221(e)(1) ("primarily used for religious instruction"), and the definition of eligible facilities under this section in the Public Assistance Guide, FEMA Publication Manual 322 p. 15 ("used over 50 percent of the time for eligible activities, or 50 percent of its space is used for eligible activities") suggests that FEMA is concerned that assistance given to institutions inter alia engaged in religious instruction might constitute excessive government entanglement with a religious institution or the promotion of [5] Rather, the facility is used, in accordance with the Public Assistance Guide, "over 50 percent of the time for eligible activities, or 50 percent of its space is used for eligible activities;". see Exhibit 2-B.

---

religion, as defined in the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and the U.S. Supreme Court's case law. In the present case, however, this is not true.

The criteria traditionally considered to govern the permissibility of government aid to educational institutions were first articulated in the Supreme Court's decision in Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971) 403 U.S. 602. The tripartite so-called "Lemon test" requires an analysis (1) whether the government program serves a purely secular purpose, (2) whether it has the effect of advancing religion, and (3) whether it creates excessive government entanglement with religion. Lemon, 403 U.S. at 612-613. In a number of cases, however, the Supreme Court has reevaluated and elaborated on these criteria, and SHA submits that granting FEMA assistance to SHA would not run afoul of the standards established in the Supreme Court's case law.

1. SHA Is Eligible To Receive FEMA Aid Because Such Assistance Neither Has The Purpose Nor The Effect Of Promoting Religion.

Even if government aid is given directly to religious institutions, it is not necessarily invalid. The mere identity of the recipient of the aid is not dispositive. Pursuant to Agostini v. Felton (1997) 521 U.S. 203, 225-228, Witters v. Washington Dept. of Services for the Blind (1986) 474 U.S. 481, 486-489 and Mueller v. Allen (1983) 463 U.S. 388, 396-399 government grants that are made available "generally without regard to the sectarian-nonsectarian, or public-nonpublic nature of the institution benefited" are permissible even if they are given to recipients who ultimately use them to engage in or obtain religious education, and even if the government agency administering the grants is aware of this use. Agostini, 521 U.S. at 225, quoting Witters, 474 U.S. at 488; see also Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District (1993) 509 U.S. 1, 10 and Walker v. San Francisco Unified School District (9th Cir. 1995) 46 F.3d 1449, 1458, 1462 and 1464-1467. The key element, according to these cases, is not what kind of institution is the ultimate recipient of the funds but rather, whether the funds are made available pursuant to neutral criteria, and to religious and non-religious beneficiaries alike. Where aid is provided on such neutral, secular criteria, and made available to various kinds of beneficiaries regardless of their religious or other orientation, it neither creates an incentive to undertake religious indoctrination, nor can any religious indoctrination occurring in an educational institution reasonably be attributed to the government aid granted. This type of aid, therefore, is permissible, regardless whether granted in the context of a religious institution or otherwise. Agostini, 521 U.S. at 226 and 230-231, Witters, 474 U.S. at 488 and Mueller, 463 U.S. at 398-399; accord, Mitchell v. Helms (2000) 530 U.S. 793, 809-814 and 822 ["Where the aid would be suitable for use in a public school, it is also suitable for use in any private school."]

FEMA aid fits these neutral criteria: Its purpose is to provide disaster relief, not to advance or promote religion (42 U.S.C.A. § 5121 and 44 C.F.R. § 206.3). Further, while 44 C.F.R. 206.221(e)(1) places certain restrictions on assistance to "primarily" religious institutions, the Regulations do not, in any event, provide for preferential treatment of religious institutions.[6]

---

[6] Under the Supreme Court case law requirement that public assistance must neither further nor hinder religion, and that the religious character of an institution may not be inquired into (infra), it is debatable whether 44 C.F.R. 206.221(e)(1), insofar as it expressly excludes aid to primarily religious institutions, is in compliance with the Supreme Court's interpretation of the First

REV_00259912

In fact, pursuant to 42 U.S.C.A. 5151(a), the Regulations "shall include provisions for insuring that the distribution of supplies, the processing of applications, and other relief and assistance activities shall be accomplished in an equitable and impartial manner, without discrimination on the grounds of ... religion ..." (emphasis supplied). 44 C.F.R. § 206.11(b)-(d) implement this requirement with regard to disaster relief, providing (again) that all personnel carrying out disaster relief or assistance functions shall perform their work "in an equitable and impartial]manner, without discrimination on the basis of [inter alia] religion," that as a condition of participation in Stafford Act programs, government bodies and other organizations shall provide written assurances of their intent to comply with regulations relating to nondiscrimination, and that information regarding these provisions shall be made available to applicants and other interested parties. Neither the Act nor the Regulations therefore foster religion; to the contrary, 42 U.S.C.A. § 5151(a) and 44 C.F.R. § 206.11(b)-(d) expressly mandate neutral and non-discriminatory disbursement criteria and procedures.

The Regulations further set forth an elaborate scheme defining the procedures according to which FEMA disaster relief is granted, and detailing a review process designed to make sure aid is only granted and used in accordance with the purpose stated in 42 U.S.C.A. § 5121 and 44 C.F.R. § 206.3. An analysis of these criteria shows that FEMA aid is not only secular in its purpose but, likewise, in its effect.

Pursuant to 44 C.F.R. § 206.48(a), the factors considered by FEMA in reviewing a Governor's request for a major disaster declaration (44 C.F.R. § 206.36) with regard to FEMA's public assistance program – which is applicable to grants to private nonprofit educational institutions such as SHA (44 C.F.R. §§ 206.200 et seq. and 206.220 et seq.) – are the estimated costs of the assistance, the localized impacts of the disaster, any insurance coverage in force, hazard mitigation measures in place in the state, the state's recent disaster history and the applicability of other federal aid programs. Upon issuing of the Presidential declaration of a major disaster or emergency and notification of the Governor (44 C.F.R. §§ 206.38 and 206.39), the Associate Director determines and designates the areas eligible to receive assistance, as well as the types of assistance to be made available, based on findings as to the magnitude and effects of the disaster, the response capabilities of the State, local governments and other potential recipients of FEMA assistance (44 C.F.R. § 206.40). More detailed determinations as to the types of relief to be granted, and as to the coordination between federal and state governments are made by the Federal and State Coordinating officers (44 C.F.R. §§ 206.41, 206.42). The mutual understandings, commitments and conditions under which FEMA assistance is provided, as well as the period for which aid is made available and the type and extent of aid, are laid down, in a form binding and legally enforceable upon all parties, governments and private nonprofit organizations, in a FEMA-state agreement, the so-called Memorandum of Understanding (44 C.F.R. § 206.44). None of the factors and criteria considered in any of the aforementioned determinations and agreements is applicable to religious institutions in a way different from the treatment of secular institutions.

Likewise, the types of assistance granted in the context of FEMA's public assistance program are the same with regard to all classes of beneficiaries, namely, cost-sharing (subject to the limitations set by the FEMA-State Agreement and the Stafford Act), and project-funding, in degrees varying with the size of the project (44 C.F.R. § 206.203) and according to specific deadlines and payment procedures (44 C.F.R. §§ 206.204 and 206.205), but not in any particular consideration of the religious or non-religious affiliation of the ultimate recipient of the funds.

---

Amendment Establishment Clause, and whether it is likewise in compliance with the Stafford Act's non-discrimination provision (42 U.S.C.A. 5151(a)). Infra.

Detailed program standards, reporting systems, and procedures for further review and studies are established by the Associate Director and the Regional Director pursuant to § 206.13; in addition, the Associate Director and the Regional Director conduct audits and investigations to assure compliance with the Stafford Act (44 C.F.R. § 206.16; see also 42 U.S.C.A. § 5161). The State, likewise, develops an administrative plan setting forth procedures for the notice, hearing, and processing of the applications of potential beneficiaries, cooperation with FEMA, and auditing and review requirements (44 C.F.R. § 206.207). Again, none of these procedures and standards affect religious institutions in a way different from their effect on non-religious institutions.

Lastly, an analysis of the types of applicants eligible under 44 C.F.R. §§ 206.221 and 206.222 shows that the Regulations' only focus is on the support and maintenance of essential services to the public in the wake of a disaster. In addition to educational institutions, pursuant to 44 C.F.R. § 206.221(e),[7] eligible applicants include facilities such as water, sewer, irrigation, energy, communication and similar utilities, ambulance, rescue, fire and other emergency service providers, medical, rehabilitation and custodial care facilities, homeless shelters, and cultural institutions such as museums, libraries and zoos. A number of the aforementioned types of facilities, particularly those maintained by ambulance, rescue and other emergency service providers, medical, rehabilitation and custodial care facilities and homeless shelters, but also certain cultural institutions such as museums, are often operated by religious organizations and, in varying degrees depending on the "mission" of the organization in question, utilized for the purpose of religious indoctrination. Yet, their eligibility is neither curtailed nor enhanced by their potential religious affiliation. This shows that regardless of any non-secular side effect which the assistance may have in the context of these institutions, religion is not a consideration in granting or denying assistance. The only effect of FEMA aid given importance by the creators of the Regulations is the maintenance of the essential public services provided by these and all other eligible institutions in the wake of a disaster. This effect is purely secular and does not change with the kind of institution providing the services.

In this context, the exclusion of facilities "primarily used" for religious education from the catalog of eligible institutions in 44 C.F.R. § 206.221(e)(1) can only be understood as a reflection of earlier Supreme Court decisions, now expressly abandoned in Mitchell v. Helms (2000) 530 U.S. 793, 827-828, which considered aid to "pervasively sectarian" organizations and institutions a potential violation of the First Amendment. In the context of 44 C.F.R. 206.221 and the Stafford Act and Regulations as a whole, it is an anomaly as it is the only instance where religion is declared a determinative factor. Even this, however, shows the concern of the creators of the Regulations with the non-religious effect of FEMA aid. See section C.2 of this appeal, infra.

---

[7] As amended by Interim Final Rule RIN3067-AD20, 66 Fed. Reg. 87, pp. 22443-22445.

The focus on the use of FEMA aid for disaster relief only is further reinforced by provisions according to which the knowing misapplication of funds or other benefits granted pursuant to the Stafford Act and Regulations is fined at a rate of 1 ½ times the misappropriated funds, and the Attorney General may initiate both criminal prosecutions and civil actions against suspected violators (42 U.S.C.A. § 5157; 44 C.F.R. § 206.14).

Lastly, it must not be forgotten that FEMA aid is not provided directly to any particular beneficiary but rather distributed to the respective State's disaster relief agencies (here: the Washington State Disaster Field Offices) which then in turn dispense the funds pursuant to the Memorandum of Understanding reached with FEMA and pursuant to the Regulations. This, too, can be a factor indicating that the funds are not used to foster or otherwise establish a religion. Agostini, 521 U.S. at 228-229.

2. Neither The Divertibility Of Funds Nor The Allegedly "Pervasively Sectarian" Character Of The Beneficiary Nor The Size Of A Particular Class Of Recipients Are Legitimate Considerations.

So long as government aid is available pursuant to neutral criteria and therefore does not create an incentive for religious indoctrination, it is irrelevant whether it is divertible in the sense that it frees the institution to spend its own resources on religious ends. Mitchell, 530 U.S. at 824-825 [rejecting "divertibility" as an unworkable and overbroad criterion]; see also Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan (1980) 444 U.S. 646, 658. If SHA receives FEMA assistance, it is irrelevant to what extent the school is consequently able to use funds for educational purposes which, to the extent that it would not have received financial support, it would have had to spend on the restoration of its facility. Every type of public funding incidentally has this effect, and none of the agencies involved in the instant proceedings have even suggested that SHA is applying for disaster relief with the intention to divert these funds to religious indoctrination (which, indeed, it of course does not intend. See declaration of Marc Maislen, attached hereto as Exhibit 1). In addition, such intentional diversion is penalized in 42 U.S.C.A. § 5157 and 44 C.F.R. § 206.14.

Moreover, the Supreme Court has expressly given up reliance on the "pervasively sectarian" character of a recipient as a factor that must be considered: regardless whether the institution in question provides primary or secondary school education, its potentially pervasive sectarian character is irrelevant. Mitchell, 530 U.S. at 827-828 [pointing out that to receive aid granted pursuant to otherwise neutral criteria does not constitute a "special favor," and that a court's focus on the pervasively sectarian nature of a school is "not only unnecessary but also offensive," because "[i]t is well established ... that courts should refrain from trolling through a person's or institution's religious beliefs," and because the application of this factor "collides with our decisions that have prohibited governments from discriminating in the distribution of public benefits based upon religious status or sincerity."] Under Mitchell, FEMA aid would have to be granted to SHA even if it were to devote more than 50% of its time and other resources to Judaic instruction (which it does not; supra), because FEMA aid has a religiously neutral purpose and effect and is appropriately granted to public and non-religious private schools, and because in consideration of these factors, the government is not allowed to pry into SHA's (or its students') religious beliefs.

Similarly, the constitutionality of a particular type of otherwise neutrally granted assistance does not depend on the number of sectarian or religiously oriented recipients who are among its beneficiaries. Agostini, 521 U.S. at 229; Mueller, 463 U.S. at 401 [stating that the Court would be "loath to adopt a rule grounding the constitutionality of a facially neutral law" on reports on such facts]. Even if only schools operated by religious organizations would apply for FEMA aid in the State of Washington with regard to this particular earthquake, those schools would still be entitled to assistance as long as the aid is granted pursuant to facially neutral criteria and would also be available to secular schools if they applied.

REV_00259915

3. FEMA Aid Does Not Create An "Excessive Entanglement" Between SHA And The Government.

Insofar as "excessive entanglement" of government and religion is still a factor to be considered separately, it is likewise analyzed in the context of a statute's effect. Not all entanglements have the effect of advancing religion, and some level of involvement between church and state has always been tolerated. Agostini, 521 U.S. at 233. Aid that is granted to religious and secular institutions alike, pursuant to the same neutral criteria, does not embody excessive entanglement; at least not if, like here, no permanent relationship or "symbolic link" between SHA and the government is created by granting government assistance. Regan, 444 U.S. at 659-661 and Walker, 46 F.3d at 1458-1459; see also Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Secretary, U.S. Dept. of Education (E.D.N.Y. 1996) 942 F. Supp. 842, 866 ["In order for such a [symbolic link] to be found, the activity must give the appearance of public endorsement or support for a religion or a religious tenet"] and id. at 868-869 [neither administrative contacts nor political divisiveness created by a government program alone have the effect of unconstitutional entanglement]; see also, Nat'l Coalition for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Harris (S.D.N.Y. 1980) 489 F.Supp. 1248, 1268-1270 [same]. SHA neither receives special benefits if it is granted FEMA aid nor does this create the need for onerous, intrusive, day-to-day oversight. Any furtherance of SHA's religious orientation would be merely incidental and thus, permissible. Zobrest, 509 U.S. at 8; Walker, 46 F.3d at 1461 and 1469.

4. The Government Is Prohibited From Taking An Adversary Position Towards Religion.

Lastly, it must not be overlooked that the First Amendment requires the state to be neutral in its relations with religious believers and nonbelievers, not adversarial. Benefits may not be denied to a particular recipient based on his/her or its religion alone. Everson, 330 U.S. at 16-17 [pointing out that "state power is no more to be used so as to handicap religions than it is to favor them;" id. at 17]; accord, Mitchell, 530 U.S. at 827-828 ["[i]t is most bizarre" if, in the case of a facially neutral program, "the Court would ... reserve special hostility for those who take their religion seriously," and "profoundly troubling" if the Court were "discriminating in the distribution of public benefits based upon religious status or sincerity"]; see also 42 U.S.C.A. 5151(a) [the Regulations "shall include provisions for insuring that the distribution of supplies, the processing of applications, and other relief and assistance activities shall be accomplished in an equitable and impartial manner, without discrimination on the grounds of ...religion ..."](emphasis supplied)].

Yet, the government has taken an adversarial position to religion in general, and to SHA in particular (based on its religious orientation) in two instances here: first, generally, in singling out all "primarily religious institutions" as the only institutions otherwise defined as providing essential government services excluded from access to FEMA disaster relief in 44 C.F.R. 206.221(e)(1); and second, specifically, in denying SHA's application based on their old bylaws alone without performing a complete analysis of the underlying facts of SHA's application. This position is irreconcilable with the First Amendment's requirement that the government take a neutral stance towards religion.

IV Conclusion

For all the aforementioned reasons, this appeal should be granted and SHA should be awarded the assistance it has applied for.

Truly yours,

Ulrike I. Boehm of LATHAM & WATKINS

II Statement of Facts

SHA is a private nonprofit organization devoted to educational purposes (see Bylaws of the Seattle Hebrew Academy as amended and adopted on May 1, 2001, attached hereto as Exhibit 1-A; hereinafter: "Bylaws").[1] It is incorporated as a Washington nonprofit corporation pursuant to the state's March 31, 1895 Act regarding the incorporation of educational, charitable and religious associations (see Articles of Incorporation of June 10, 1920, Certificate of Reinstatement of July 16, 1993, and Certificate of Amendment of November 15, 1996 reflecting the school's name change to Seattle Hebrew Academy, all attached hereto as Exhibits 1B through 1-D). The facility enjoys tax-exempt status under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code (see June 1, 1971 confirmation letter from the District Director of the Internal Revenue Service, attached hereto as Exhibit 1-E), is a candidate for membership with the Pacific Northwest Association of Independent Schools ("PNAIS"), which only accepts schools that adhere to a non-discrimination policy as members (see May 23, 2001 letter from PNAIS and attachments, attached hereto as Exhibit 1-F), and is a recipient of various forms of state and federal funding. SHA offers a full range of academic courses of study to students in grades Kindergarten through eight. Its graduates have been successful in high schools throughout the Seattle area, and in many colleges and universities around the country (see declaration of Marc Maislen, attached hereto as Exhibit 1).

SHA's site consists of a four-story building and over 15 classrooms, offices, a library, a full sized school kitchen which serves a hot lunch, a large auditorium, a large gym, a three-room preschool facility, and a small outdoor field and play area. The main building dates from 1909 and qualifies as historic building (see Seattle City Ordinance No. 102229, attached hereto as Exhibit 1-G).

SHA's facility sustained severe damage as a result of the magnitude 6.8 Nisqually Earthquake on February 28, 2001, which was centered near Olympia, WA, and caused destruction throughout the Puget Sound area. The President immediately declared the quake zone a National Disaster Area. Because of the damages the facility sustained, it is currently unoccupied, in accordance with recommendations by SHA's architects. In addition to widespread damage to the interior architectural finish work, such as cracked and fallen plaster, the facility also sustained extensive structural damage, and according to the architects' professional estimate, areas showing certain forms of non-structural damage are likely to have underlying structural damage as well.

In the basement/foundation of the building, the exterior concrete walls at the basement floor contain several diagonal and vertical cracks, spreading from the corners, sills, or headers of window and door openings (in some cases, these cracks are extensions of pre-existing cracks, widened due to the building motion). Cracks in several locations begin in the concrete

---

[1] At the time of the earthquake, SHA had initiated procedures to amend its Bylaws to more accurately reflect the educational practices and the policies which at that time had already been followed for a considerable amount of time. The earthquake interrupted this process to amend the bylaws; it was, however, promptly resumed after the school had taken the steps necessary to deal with the immediate effects of the disaster. See declaration of Marc Maislen and copy of the revised Bylaws, attached hereto as Exhibits 1 and 1-A.

wall and extend upward into the brick walls above. There is also a large vertical crack at the interior wall of the boiler room in the building's central wing.

Further, the exterior balcony on the third floor at the east end of the central wing, which is located directly above the building's east entrance, has pulled away from the building. There is a visible separation at the railing between the building and the balcony, which continues down to the columns below. Also on the third floor, the east exterior wall of the north wing has pulled away from the floor and ceiling, the north-south corridor at the intersection of the north wing has a large crack a the walls and ceiling, and the north and east exterior walls in the vicinity of the north stair have pulled away slightly from the stair framing, with cracks at the intersection of the floor and walls. Similar structural damage as on the third floor also exists on the fourth floor, and even appears to be slightly worse.

On the roof, the east exterior wall of the north wing has separated from the roof framing, tearing the roofing material above in the process. The north exterior wall at the dormer roof at the top of the stairwell has separated slightly from the roof framing. The east exterior wall of the central wing has pulled away from the roof framing. All of the parapets, which exist at all three wings and at the dormer roofs of the building, were damaged, in degrees ranging from cracking and misalignment to fallen brick. While none of the parapets failed completely, several bricks were dislodged and fell on the roofs and surrounding area below.

Based on the existing structural damage, SHA's architects also expect certain areas of apparent non-structural damage to have similar underlying structural damage. At locations where the perpendicular floor framing is parallel to the walls, inadequate connection between the floor and the walls allowed for separation; and damage requiring repair also exists at the stairwell, where the floor framing changes and inadequate connection of the floor and roof's diaphragm exists. For example, plaster cracking exists at the wall corners and floor of the north and south wing at the east walls and the stairwells of the second floor, and structural damage in the form of mild separation of the walls from the floor are expected by SHA's architects at the east and west walls of the north and south wing, as well as the exterior walls of the stairwells of both wings. On the third and fourth floor, there is plaster cracking at the east wall and stairwell of the south wing, and structural damage in the form of a slight separation of the walls from the floor is expected at the east and west walls of the south wing and at the south wall of the stairwell. On the roof, where the framing of the pitched roof areas of the dormer roof system and the end walls of the north, central and south wings runs parallel to the exterior wall and forms a ridge member at the roof peak, there is no adequate connection between the roof diaphragm and the walls. Similar conditions exist at the east and west ends of the north and south wings, and the east end of the central wing.

Even the initial repairs, which would not yet bring the building into compliance with current building codes or seismic safety provisions but will enable it to retain the level of seismic safety present prior to the earthquake and allow it to be re-occupied, are quite extensive. Repair work will have to include the mending of the cracks in the facility's foundation/basement; either by injection with a structural epoxy (in the case of large cracks), or by sealing with elastomeric paint. The second, third and fourth floor diaphragms will need to have ties installed to connect the floor to the masonry walls at locations where the framing runs perpendicular to the wall. Likewise, the roof diaphragm will have to have ties with the top of the masonry walls at all dormer roofs and peak configurations installed. Finally, the parapets at all sides of the building will need to be repaired or reconstructed, and external bracing will have to be installed from the parapets to the roof framing. The review of the damage and the design of a cost-effective repair scheme has not yet been completed by SHA's architects. Current estimates for the damage and necessary repair work described herein are between two and four million dollars (with regard to the extent of the damage and necessary minimal repairs, see declaration of Marc Maislen, attached hereto as Exhibit 1, and Report of Coughlin Porter Lundeen, SHA's architects, attached hereto as Exhibit 1-H).

REV_00259903

SHA applied for disaster assistance with the U.S. Small Business Administration ("SBA") and with FEMA, in accordance with the Stafford Act, as amended on October 30, 2000, and in accordance with the Regulations and Interim Final Rule RIN3067-AD20. However, both SHA's application with the SBA and with FEMA were denied; its application with the SBA by letter dated April 4, 2001 and its application with FEMA by fax dated March 29, 2001 (see April 4, 2001 letter and March 29, 2001 fax, attached hereto as Exhibits 1-K and 1-L). In addition, SHA's first appeal of the denial of its application for FEMA assistance was also denied (see October 27, 2001 letter from Donna J. Voss, attached hereto as Exhibit 1-M).

This is SHA's second appeal of the denial of its application for FEMA assistance, filed in accordance with 44 C.F.R. § 206.206. SHA submits that the denial of its application with FEMA is unjustified. Contrary to the conclusion reached by Region X, the requirement of being "open to the general public" is not applicable to a private nonprofit educational facility, either by statute or regulation. Furthermore, reliance by Region X exclusively on SHA's old bylaws and articles of incorporation gives an incomplete factual picture of the nature of SHA's student body. Finally, as Region X has conceded, SHA is not an institution "primarily used" for religious instruction. Further, granting assistance to SHA is not contrary to the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

III Analysis

A. The Regulatory Framework Of The Stafford Act And Regulations

Pursuant to 42 U.S.C.A. § 5121 and 44 C.F.R. § 206.3, the purpose of FEMA assistance is to provide disaster relief in cases of major disasters, which surpass an individual state's or local government's financial ability to cope with the effects of the disaster. 42 U.S.C.A. 5151(a) and 44 C.F.R. § 206.11(b) mandate that FEMA's distribution of supplies, the processing of applications, and other relief and assistance activities "shall be accomplished in an equitable and impartial manner, without discrimination on the grounds of ...religion ..." (emphasis supplied).

The eligibility requirements for FEMA disaster assistance are set forth in 44 C.F.R. § 206.221(e) and (f). Pursuant to 44 C.F.R. § 206.221(f), a private nonprofit organization is eligible if it has been declared tax-exempt under § 501(c)-(e) of the Internal Revenue Code or if it is organized or doing business as a nonprofit entity under state law. Pursuant to in 44 C.F.R. § 206.221(e), private nonprofit institutions providing educational services are eligible for FEMA disaster assistance, except if they are "primarily used" for religious instruction. According to the definition given in the Public Assistance Guide, FEMA Publication Manual 322 p. 15, a facility is "not primarily used" for religious instruction if it is used "over 50 percent of the time for eligible activities, or 50 percent of its space is used for eligible activities." Lastly, according to 44 C.F.R. 206.206, a party whose application has been denied has sixty (60) days from receipt of the determination to appeal FEMA's decision.

REV_00259904

B. SHA is not Required by Statute or Regulation to be "Open to the General Public" in order to be Eligible for Public Assistance.

As already explained, SHA is a private nonprofit organization devoted to educational purposes, incorporated as a Washington nonprofit corporation pursuant to the state's March 31, 1895 Act regarding the incorporation of educational, charitable and religious associations. The facility enjoys tax-exempt status under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code, is a candidate member of PNAIS, and is a recipient of state and federal funding.

Region X posits that, because SHA is not "open to the general public," it is ineligible for public assistance under the Stafford Act and regulations promulgated thereunder. This is a fundamental misreading of the Stafford Act. 42 USC §5122(9) defines "private nonprofit facility" as any one of the following:

> private nonprofit educational, utility, emergency medical, rehabilitation, and temporary or permanent custodial care facilities (including those for the aged and disabled), other private nonprofit facilities which provide essential services of a governmental nature to the general public, and facilities on Indian reservations as defined by the President.

The key phrase within this definition is "which provide essential services of a governmental nature to the general public." Region X maintains that this phrase modifies not only "other private nonprofit facilities," but also the first list of facilities, namely "educational, utility, emergency medical . . . facilities." Region X also points to the regulations set forth at 42 CFR §206.221(e), which contain language almost identical to the statute.

A proper understanding of the definition of "private nonprofit facility" (above) begins with the recognition that it includes three separate categories; two of these were included as eligible facilities in disaster relief law prior to adoption of the Stafford Act: (1) "private nonprofit educational, utility, emergency medical, rehabilitation, and temporary or permanent custodial care facilities (including those for the aged and disabled)," and (2) "facilities on Indian reservations as defined by the President." The third category, which the Stafford Act placed in between these two, is other private nonprofit facilities which provide essential services of a governmental nature to the general public."

The Disaster Mitigation Act of 1974, P.L. 93-288 (the "1974 Act") was the first statute to provide for public assistance to private nonprofit facilities (an earlier law had provided this only in the case of one specific hurricane, not as a general rule). Section 402(b) of the 1974 Act provides as follows:

> The President is also authorized to make grants to help repair, restore, reconstruct or replace private nonprofit educational, utility, emergency, medical and custodial care facilities, including those for the aged or disabled, and facilities on Indian reservations as defined by the President, which were damaged or destroyed by a major disaster.

REV_00259905

The Legislative History calls this section a "significant amendment" to the law and describes it as "authorizing 100% grants for repairing or reconstructing . . . private, nonprofit medical and educational facilities and utilities damaged by major disasters." 1994 USCCAN 3071. The Legislative History also provides: "This bill . . . includes private non-profit educational, emergency, medical, custodial care and utility facilities. . ." 1994 USCCAN 3074. You will note that the words "provide essential services of a governmental nature to the general public" do not appear in the 1974 Act, and are not mentioned in the legislative history. The category of private, nonprofit educational facility is not qualified.

In 1988, the Stafford Act, P.L. 100-707, amended the Disaster Mitigation Act of 1974 to include the current language of 42 U.S.C. §5122(9) as set forth above. Prior to adoption of the Stafford Act, there was not a separate definition of "private nonprofit facility" in the statute; rather, the list of these types of facilities was included within Section 402(b) of the 1974 Act, as set forth above. The Legislative History accompanying the Stafford Act explains how the definition of "private nonprofit facility" (42 U.S.C. §5122(9)) entered the definitions section of the statute:

> Subsection (e) [of Section 104 of the Stafford Act] places the definition of public facility and private non-profit facility as those terms are used throughout the Act into the definition section. The definition of public facility is amended to include those facilities used for cultural purposes, such as museums. The definition of private non-profit facility is also broadened [i.e., the middle category was inserted] to include facilities which provide to the general public services of a governmental nature. Examples of eligible facilities include museums, zoos, community centers, libraries, homeless shelters, senior citizen centers, rehabilitation facilities, and shelter workshops (emphasis supplied).

1988 USCCAN 6088. Thus, this new section of the Stafford Act is the first time that these words, "provide essential services of a governmental nature to the general public," appear in disaster relief law. It is clear from both the Stafford Act's amendment to the language of the Disaster Mitigation Act of 1974 and from the accompanying Legislative History that the entire phrase, "other private nonprofit facilities which provide essential services of a governmental nature to the general public," was inserted right into the middle of the prior language, not intending to change the meaning of either the category before it or after it, but only intending to broaden the definition of "private nonprofit facility." There is no reference in either the Stafford Act or the accompanying Legislative History to any attempt to narrow the definition of "educational facility," or to modify it in any way. Region X's reading of the Stafford Act, on the other hand, would have its amendments narrowing the category of eligible educational facilities, a reading clearly rebutted by the legislative history, and one which should be reversed.[2]

This understanding of the Stafford Act definition of "private nonprofit facility" is further buttressed by FEMA's own regulations. In 42 CFR §206.221(e), after repeating the statutory definition of "private nonprofit facility," the regulation states:

> Further definition is as follows:
>
> (1) Educational facilities means classrooms plus related supplies, equipment, machinery, and utilities of an educational institution necessary or appropriate for instructional, administrative, and support purposes, but does not include buildings, structures and related items used primarily for religious purposes or instruction[3].
> (2) Utility means buildings, structures, or systems of energy, communication, water supply, sewage collection and treatment, or other similar public service facilities.
> (3) Emergency facility means those buildings, structures, equipment, or systems used to provide emergency services, such as fire protection, ambulance, or rescue, to the general public, including the administrative and support facilities essential to the operation of such emergency facilities even if not contiguous.
> (4) Medical facility means and hospital, outpatient facility, rehabilitation facility, or facility for long term care as such terms are defined in section 645 of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 2910) and any similar facility offering diagnosis or treatment of mental or physical injury or disease, including the administrative and support facilities essential to the operation of such medical facilities even if not contiguous.
> (5) Custodial care facility means those buildings, structures, or systems including those for essential administration and support, which are used to provide institutional care for persons who require close supervision and some physical constrains on their daily activities for their self-protection, but do not require day-to-day medical care.

---

[2] Region X asserts that the requirement that any PNP be "open to the general public" is included in the statute in order to implement the statute's nondiscrimination provisions, 42 U.S.C. §5151(a). There is not statutory basis, or basis in the Stafford Act's legislative history, to support this assertion in any way.

[3] Region X has conceded that, because the SHA building is used a majority of the time for secular instruction, it is not a "structure . . . used primarily for religious purposes or instruction." See Section III.E.

> (6) Other essential governmental service facility means museums, zoos, community centers, libraries, homeless shelters, senior citizen centers, rehabilitation facilities, shelter workshops and facilities which provide health and safety services of a governmental nature. All such facilities must be open to the general public.

Most important about this list is that Paragraph (1) contains no reference to "the general public." Other paragraphs include this reference, and Paragraph (6), which incorporates the language of the Legislative History quoted above to further define the new language placed within the definition by the Stafford Act, states explicitly that, as to those facilities, "[a]ll such facilities must be open to the general public." Region X is reading the introductory paragraph of 44 C.F.R. §206.221(e) in a way which is inconsistent with the further definitions which follow.

C. Even if Region X's Understanding of the Stafford Act Definition of "Private Nonprofit Facility" is Correct, SHA Should be Eligible for Public Assistance.

Even if the requirement of being "open to the general public" is applicable to a private nonprofit educational facility, SHA should be eligible for public assistance. Region X's exclusive reliance on the wording of old bylaws (which were in the process of being rewritten, see Exhibit 4), to the exclusion of SHA's actual admissions policy which was in effect at the time, is misplaced. Under the guidelines of FEMA's Public Assistance Guide, SHA is a qualified PNP and is eligible for public assistance.

SHA is in compliance with the requirements of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, section 2000d, which states:

> No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.

SHA is also a candidate member of Pacific Northwest Association of Independent Schools ("PNAIS") (see Exhibit 1-F). One of the key philosophies of PNAIS is:

> Member schools do not discriminate on the basis of race, color, religion, gender, disability , national or ethnic origin, or other legally protected status in admission of otherwise qualified students or in providing access t o the rights, privileges, programs, or activities generally available to all students or their families, including educational polices, scholarship and other financial aid programs, or athletic, extra-curricular, and other school-administered programs and activities.

In addition, SHA has consistently participated in PNAIS advertisement of non-discriminatory practices; see Exhibits 1-F, 2-A and 3. For the 2000-2001 school year, SHA's student body included two African Americans, three Asian Americans, and four Hispanic students. Student nationalities included Russian, Bulgarian, Australian, and French.

REV_00259908

SHA's bylaws in effect on February 28, 2001 were old, and were not being followed at the time of the earthquake; see Exhibit 4. In fact, the bylaws were being rewritten as mentioned in the February 6, 2001 SHA board minutes (Exhibit 5). The bylaws have been revised to state in Article I: "The purpose of this corporation shall be to own, maintain and operate a school or schools for the education of children." See Exhibit 1-A.

SHA had disregarded the old bylaws, in that students who, under the old bylaws definition, were not eligible for admission, were admitted. See Exhibit 4. Such students have been those whose non-Jewish families are seriously studying and practicing Jewish law and culture in their home, under the supervision and instruction of a rabbi. Under Paragraph 7.E.2 of RR Policy Number 9521.3 (April 25, 2000)[4], if such a qualification is deemed a restriction, then SHA is nonetheless eligible for public assistance because it meets the Public Assistance Guide requirement that its restriction to users has at least one open ended parameter. Specifically, attendance is open to children of any race, color, or national original. Since SHA is a Jewish school, and a significant portion of the curriculum taught to students is Jewish, SHA's selection criteria (set forth above) should be considered a use restriction, clearly related to the nature of the facility and allowable under Paragraph 7.E.2.

Region X's exclusive reliance on the language of the old bylaws and articles of incorporation is misplaced. These bylaws were in the process of being rewritten prior to the earthquake. Moreover, SHA's admissions practices prior to the earthquake did not adhere to the requirements of the bylaws. Even if "open to the general public" is a requirement applicable to SHA, SHA is eligible for public assistance from FEMA.

D. It Constitutes a Violation of the Stafford Act's, the FEMA Regulations' and FEMA's Written Policies' Nondiscrimination Mandate not to Provide Public Assistance Relying on SHA's Religious Orientation.

42 U.S.C.A. 5151(a) and 44 C.F.R. § 206.11(b) mandate that FEMA's distribution of supplies, the processing of applications, and other relief and assistance activities "shall be accomplished in an equitable and impartial manner, without discrimination on the grounds of ...religion ..." (emphasis supplied). The use of the word "shall" indicates that these

---

[4] This paragraph provides:

. . . an organization likely meets the "open to the general public" requirement if:

a. It is open to the general public,

b. Membership fees, if any, are nominal,

c. Membership fees, if any, can be waived in instances I which someone can show inability to pay the fee, and

d. Use restrictions, if any are clearly related to the nature of the facility. (Facilities for senior citizens, child day-care, children with cancer and other disabilities, or abused spouses could be restricted to that group and might still be eligible.

Secret Service Personnel Matters

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 341/237
9122

Box 52
Folder 7

REV_00259918

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

May 14, 2001

Elroy Sailor
House Republican Conference
U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Mr. Sailor:

I write in response to your letter to Judge Gonzales regarding the Department of Treasury and a Secret Service personnel complaint. As this matter is currently in litigation, we will not comment further about it at this time, but we thank you for your letter and the information you have provided.

Sincerely yours,

Brett M. Kavanaugh

Brett M. Kavanaugh
Associate Counsel

Brett is Treasury

GOP.gov
HOUSE REPUBLICAN CONFERENCE

J.C. WATTS, JR.
CHAIRMAN
4th District, Oklahoma

Reforming Washington Securing America's Future

Fax Cover Sheet

To: Alberto Gonzales
Office: White House Legal Counsel
Phone: 202-456-2632
Fax: 202-456-6279
Date: 4/5/01
No. of pages (including cover sheet) 19

From:
- ☐ Downey, Kyle
- ☐ Dhar, Shawn
- ☐ Henderson, Shelley
- ☐ Hofer, Tom
- ☐ Horner, Jack
- ☐ Iverson, Christine
- ☐ Jones, Jocelyn
- ☐ LaMora, Leigh
- ☐ Leahy, Pat
- ☐ Manning, Tom
- ☐ Mascott, Jeff
- ☐ Perrin, Chris
- ☐ Pryor, Pam
- ☐ Radewagen, Amata
- ☒ Sailor, Elroy
- ☐ Schweers, Kevin
- ☐ Smith, James
- ☐ VandenHeuvel, Jon
- ☐ Wolfe, Kenneth
- ☐ Other _____

Phone: 202 225-5107 Fax: 202 225-0809

Note:
The originals of this fax are being mailed to you today, along with an executive summary booklet. I just wanted you to get this as soon as possible. Thank you.

REV_00259920

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

REGINALD G. MOORE, et al. Plaintiffs, vs. LAWRENCE H. SUMMERS, Secretary, U.S. Department Of The Treasury Defendant.	Civil Action No. 00-00953 (RWR) CLASS ACTION

DECLARATION OF JAMES C. SHARF, PH.D.

1. I am over eighteen years of age, and have personal knowledge of and am competent to testify as to the matters stated herein.

2. From 1974 until 1978, I was the Chief Psychologist at the United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission ("EEOC"). In that position, I assisted the EEOC's

REV_00259929

General Counsel in drafting the 1978 Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures ("Uniform Guidelines"). I was responsible for critiquing validation studies and served as the EEOC's testing expert on "job-relatedness" matters. I also assisted EEOC attorneys in making prima facie case determinations of adverse impact by reviewing statistical evidence related to employment practices.

3. From 1991 to 1993, I served as the Special Assistant to the Chairman of the EEOC. In that capacity, I advised the Chairman on the Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures and on generally accepted principles and practices involving employee selection and job performance appraisal systems. During my service with the Chairman, I assisted him in drafting the language for the "race norming" prohibition section (codified as Section 106) of the 1991 Civil Rights Act.

4. From 1978 to 1984, I was Vice President of Richardson, Bellows, Henry & Co., Inc. where I designed and conducted multi-employer validation studies. I also provided expert testimony in Title VII litigation for private-sector employers and for the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Department of Justice.

5. From 1985 to 1991, I was a Personnel Research Psychologist in the United States Office of Personnel Management ("OPM"). In this position, I developed job-related selection procedures that are currently used by the Federal civil service Agencies to select professional and career employees nationwide. I also represented OPM on the National Academy of Science study of validity generalization for the U.S. Employment Service's General Aptitude Test Battery.

6. From 1994 to 1998, I was employed as Vice President, Human Resources Consulting Group for Aon Consulting, in Washington, D.C. In this position I was in charge of

REV_00259930

EEO compliance, risk management, and litigation support services within the Human Resources Consulting Group.

7. I have also worked as an Assistant and Adjunct Professor at The American University and as a Professorial Lecturer in two graduate departments at The George Washington University. In 1978, I served as Team Leader in the President's Reorganization Project in the Executive Office of President Carter.

8. I obtained my B.S. in Chemistry from Dickinson College in 1965 and my Ph.D. in Organizational Psychology from the University of Tennessee in 1970. I have authored over 50 professional articles and have served on the editorial boards of Personnel Psychology and The Industrial/Organizational Psychologist. I am a Fellow of the Society for Industrial and Organizational Psychology and a Fellow of the American Psychological Association.

9. I am currently employed as President of SHARF & Associates, Employment Risk Advisors in Alexandria, Virginia. SHARF & Associates is a consulting firm that specializes in employment risk management by advising Human Resources professionals, employment attorneys and industrial psychologists on developing, implementing, and defending selection and job performance appraisal systems. I also serve as an expert witness on these issues where appropriate to do so. I have been President of SHARF & Associates since its inception in 1999.

10. In July 2000, I was retained by Plaintiffs in this matter to give my opinion on whether the Secret Service's Merit Promotion Plan for GS/GM 1811s ("MPP") performance appraisals and promotion selections were consistent with the EEOC's 1978 Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures and/or the generally accepted principles and practices of industrial psychology described in the Society for Industrial and Organizational Psychology,

REV_00259931

Inc.'s 1987 Principles for the Validation and Use of Personnel Selection Procedures (3rd ed.). I reviewed the following documents and materials in arriving at my opinion:

1. United States Secret Service, Merit Promotion Plan for GS/GM-1811 Positions, 7/8/97, 52p. (Saliunas Deposition, Exhibit 4).

2. United States Secret Service, Amendment to PER-08 (02), 12/23/98, 3p. (Saliunas Deposition, Exhibit 4).

3. United States Secret Service, Amendment to GS/GM-1811 Promotion Process, 5/14/98, 2p. (Saliunas Deposition, Exhibit 4).

4. United States Secret Service, Language Prerequisite and Supervisory Experience for Overseas Assignments, 8/4/95, 2p. (Saliunas Deposition, Exhibit 4).

5. United States Secret Service, Special Agent Career Track Program. 09/06/94, 10 p. (Saliunas Deposition, Exhibit 16).

6. United States Secret Service, GS-1811 Job Opportunities, 05/12/00, 3p. (Saliunas Deposition, Exhibit 8).

7. United States Secret Service, Amendment to GS-1811 Job Opportunities, 05/19/00, 2p. (Saliunas Deposition, Exhibit 8).

8. Declaration of Special Agent Reginald G. Moore, May 30, 2000, 10p. (Saliunas Deposition, Exhibit 9).

9. Declaration of Donna Burgess, Supervisory Personnel Management Specialist, United States Secret Service, June 8, 2000, 8p. (Saliunas Deposition, Exhibit 7).

10. Notice of Filing of Corrected Copy of Memorandum of Points and Authorities in Support of Plaintiffs' Application for Preliminary Injunction, June 1, 2000, 45p.

11. Defendant's Opposition to Plaintiffs' Application for a Preliminary Injunction, June 14, 2000, 32p.

12. Plaintiffs' Reply to Defendant's Opposition to Plaintiffs' Application for a Preliminary Injunction, June 30, 2000, 34p.

13. Deposition transcript of Secret Service Designee Deputy Chief of Personnel Barbara Saliunas, July 27, 28 and 31, August 1, 7 and 8, 2000., 987p.

REV_00259932

11. It is my opinion that appraisal decisions and promotion selections made under the Secret Service's MPP are not "job-related" as that term is understood either under the EEOC's 1978 Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures and/or the generally accepted principles and practices of industrial psychology. My reasoning is based on the following facts as described in the MPP, (PER-08(02) and its subsequent amendments) and the deposition testimony of Secret Service Designee Barbara Saliunas.

12. The MPP for GS/GM-1811 Position in the United States Secret Service described in Directive System, PER-08 (02), Amendment to PER-08 (02) states that the Promotion Evaluation process is comprised of three components: the First-level supervisors evaluation which counts 50%, a Peer Panel evaluation counting 20% and a Second Level Panel evaluation counting 30% (p.2).

13. MPP scores are used to rank candidates to develop a best qualified group. The best qualified group is the top 30 candidates who apply for the position or the top 25%, which ever is greater (Saliunas Deposition Transcript, 137:4-19, 137:20-138:3). The Assistant Director with authority over the position in question makes a recommendation to the Advisory Board from the best qualified group. The Advisory Board is comprised of the Assistant Directors, the Chief Counsel, and the Deputy Director. The Chief Personnel Division serves as a recording secretary (144:2-7). The Advisory Board discusses it and after coming to a consensus, makes a recommendation to the Director (144:3-20). The Director has ultimate authority to select all GS-14s and above (201:17-19).

14. There is no mandated uniform method on how the Assistant Directors arrive at their recommendations to the Advisory Board (145:20-146:11). Each Assistant Director is free to develop his or her own procedures and can make recommendations from the best qualified list without specific criteria. (145:20-146:11) (151:17-22). One Assistant Director's practice is to ask the Special Agent in Charge ("SAIC") where the position is located for three recommendations (650:5-17). This process is not in the MPP and other Assistant Directors could have different practices (650:18-651:3) (651:4-7). The Secret Service does not know if there are any guidelines in place as to how each Assistant Director should decide who to recommend to the Advisory Board for promotion (146:16-20).

REV_00259933

15. The Secret Service claims it follows the Uniform Guidelines for Employee Selection Procedures in validating its selection procedures (165:13-16) (169:12-16). Yet, the Secret Service does not know if the MPP was validated pursuant to the Uniform Guidelines (169:8-11). The Secret Service does not know if the MPP score is used for any other purpose than as a cutoff score for the best qualified list (140:18-22). The Secret Service does not know if MPP cutoff score procedures have been validated pursuant to the Uniform Guidelines (189:2-7). The Secret Service does not know if the Advisory Board considers relative differences in scores in promotion considerations (184:14-17).

16. The Secret Service alleges that it promotes people in accordance with the MPP (589:1-2). The MPP indicates that race and gender are two factors that should not be considered in making promotion decisions (939:12-940:4) (MPP, p. 4). Nonetheless, there were two promotion selections discussed during the Saliunas deposition in which contrary to the MPP, race and gender were a consideration (638:2-12) (633:2-634:3).

17. Under the MPP, management will take into account the Career Track Program when making selections (MPP, p. 4). The Secret Service does not know if the Special Agent Career Track Program is taken into account in making promotion recommendations (775:11-19). None of the Assistant Directors indicated that the Special Agent Career Track Program was a factor in any of the promotion recommendations discussed during the Saliunas deposition (775:1-7) (657:6-11)

REV_00259934

18. The Advisory Board is not routinely provided with the candidate's Special Agent Qualification Statements which describes their experience and ratings (206:12-207:4). Some Assistant Directors indicated that they make promotion recommendations without considering the candidate's Special Agent Qualification Statements (230:8-12).

19. Other than the two promotion selections discussed during the Saliunas deposition in which race and gender were a consideration in determining promotion recommendations, the various different practices used by different AD's did not violate Secret Service policy (939:12-940:12).

20. There is a discretionary policy, for example, that allows for a Special Agent to get promoted outside the MPP (668:15-22). The exception is "an action taken for failure to receive proper consideration in a competitive action" (MPP, p5.). The Secret Service does not know under what circumstances that exception would apply (672:17-673:2). The Secret Service does not know if this exception is initiated by the Director or Assistant Directors (673:3-5).

21. The Secret Service does not have a policy called "informal disciplinary action" (246:20-247:1). There is nothing in the MPP that indicates that such a factor is to be used in the promotion process. (MPP). The Secret Service does not know if it has a policy to consider incidents that occur off-duty for which no discipline was incurred in connection with promotion selections (248:5-9). One Assistant Director indicated that in deciding not to recommend a candidate, he considered the fact that the candidate had been involved in a domestic incident and had not received discipline (248:21-249:2).

REV_00259935

22. The Director has established an unwritten "practice" of preferring GS-14 lateral candidates for open GS-14 positions over GS-13s (131:2-8) (951:12-22). This preference is not in writing and is not in the MPP (154:20-22) (131:9-11). The Secret Service does not know if the Director has articulated a business justification for establishing that preference or what weight it should be given (132:16-20) (132:3-15). The Secret Services does not know if the SAICs have been informed of this "practice" (948:4-6). The Secret Service does not know if all of the Assistant Directors have been informed of this "practice" (948:4-6). However, Assistant Director Bauer, Assistant Director Spriggs and Assistant Director Riggs follow this "practice" (952:18-22) (953:1-4) (955:8-11). The Secret Service does not know if Assistant Director Cockell follows this "practice" (955:4-7).

23. The Director has asked all Assistant Directors and the Deputy Director to consider the cost of a government move in making promotion recommendations to the Advisory Board (155:13-156:3). This "practice" is not in writing and no specific weight is attached to this consideration (156:17-21) (156:7-12). The Secret Service does not know if this factor has been part of a job posting (156:17-21). The cost of a government move is not in the MPP (157:11-16) (946:20-947:8). The Secret Service does not know whether the SAICs are aware of the "practice" of considering government moves, in promotion decisions (945:14-19). The Secret Service does not know whether it has been communicated to Agents in the field that the cost of a government sponsored move may be a factor in determining whether or not they may be promoted to a specific position. (157:2-10).

24. In my opinion, two of the three components of the MPP performance appraisals are subjectively flawed for the following reasons. Raters serving on Peer Panels are selected by lottery (PER-08 (02), 12/23/98, p.15) without regard as to whether each panel member, or any panel member, has first-hand knowledge of the candidate for promotion's job performance. Raters serving on the Second Level Panel are tasked to assess "an employee's ability to perform successfully at the next higher grade" and "rate(s) each candidate on managerial competencies based on the information provided on the candidate's qualification statement" again without regard as to whether each panel member, or any panel member, has first-hand knowledge of the candidate for promotion's job performance. Rather panel members will "consist of a representative from each Assistant Director's office" (p.17). Additionally, the Second Level Panel is encouraged to compound their subjectivity by basing their deliberations on "Peer Panel results...(which) may be considered..."(p.16).

REV_00259936

25. In contrast, the MPP's first-level evaluation explicitly requires that the person preparing the evaluation "to consult with lower-level supervisors whenever he/she is not the immediate supervisor of the employee being evaluated" and the lower-level supervisor is required to sign the completed form to attest to his/her participation. Also, the rating official is to consider the comments of others who have supervised the employee for significant periods of time during the rating official (MPP, p.12)

26. The generally accepted principles and practices of industrial psychology recognize that people other than an employee's immediate first-level supervisor may have relevant information about an employee's job performance. In addition to self-assessments, appraisals may be solicited from co-workers, from subordinates and even from customers. The use of multiple sources of appraisal ratings enhances the opportunity for observing an employee's job-relevant behaviors. What makes these appraisal practices generally accepted professionally is that each source of job-relevant information depends on the rater having directly observed the employee's job performance. As attested in sections of the Secret

REV_00259937

Service's Merit Promotion Plan (see ¶ 24 above), the MPP falls short of generally accepted professional practices by asking randomly selected and/or administratively appointed raters without regard to whether there is first-hand information based on having observed the specific candidate's job performance.

27. One generally accepted professional performance appraisal practice frequently includes a higher-level review of the immediate supervisor's rating of a subordinate's job performance. What distinguishes such professionally acceptable practices from the instant case is that the higher-level reviewer does not make the appraisal decision. Rather the second-level reviewer is responsible for assuring that the immediate supervisor's appraisal decision has been sufficiently documented with examples of either effective or ineffective job performance. The Secret Service's MPP falls short in this regard because Peer Panel and Second Level panel members are making appraisal decisions without the benefit of first-hand observation of job performance.

28. It is my professional opinion that the appraisal decisions made by Secret Service Peer Panels and by Second Level Panels are not "job related" as understood either under generally accepted principles and practices of industrial psychology and/or the EEOC's 1978 Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures because decisions are made without first-hand observation of actual on-the-job performance.

29. It is also my professional opinion that the promotion recommendations made by Assistant Director or Deputy Director to the Advisory Board are not "job-related" as that term is understood under the Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures and/or generally accepted principles and practices of industrial psychology because different decision-makers invoke different considerations in making promotion recommendations that are nowhere defined

REV_00259938

CHAIRMAN
J.C. WATTS, JR.
4TH DISTRICT, OKLAHOMA

VICE CHAIRMAN
DEBORAH PRYCE
15TH DISTRICT, OHIO

SECRETARY
BARBARA CUBIN
WYOMING—AT LARGE

ROOM 1010
LONGWORTH HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING
202-225-5107

House Republican Conference
U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, DC 20515

April 2, 2001

Alberto R. Gonzales
Counsel to the President
Office of the Counsel to the President
White House
Washington, DC 20502

Dear Mr. Gonzales,

Per my meeting with Ronald A. Schmidt, an attorney with the law office of Thelen Reid & Priest LLP, I would like to bring to your attention an issue regarding the Department of Treasury and a Secret Service personnel complaint. Our office would appreciate your review of this matter. While I am aware that a myriad of issues are on your desk, we would appreciate your assistance.

For additional information regarding this issue, please see the attached correspondence.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Sincerely,

Elroy Sailor
Director of Policy

cc: Angela Sailor
White House Public Affair's Office

PRINTED ON RECYCLED PAPER

in official Secret Service policy directives. The various decision-making considerations fall short because there is no consistent, reliable application of valid job-related criteria. For example, many of the promoting officials make their recommendation without having reviewed the candidate's Special Agent Qualification Statements.

30. From my review of the evidence, it is clear that the Secret Service's MPP promotion system lacks job-related standards and the various practices that are followed are inherently subjective. Even where policies do exist, such as the MPP requirement that managers consider the Career Track Program in their selection decision-making , they are not consistently followed. In addition, it is troubling that many of the Secret Service's employment practices have not been directed to the SAICs or the Agents in the field as official policy.

31. In sum, the Secret Service's MPP promotion appraisal and selection system falls far short of meeting either generally accepted principles and practices of industrial psychology or the EEOC's 1978 Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures.

I declare under the penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct to the best of my knowledge, information and belief. Executed this 9th day of August, 2000.

James C. Sharf, Ph.D.

REV_00259939

THELEN REID & PRIEST LLP

NEW YORK
SAN FRANCISCO
WASHINGTON, D.C.
LOS ANGELES
SILICON VALLEY
MORRISTOWN, N.J.

ATTORNEYS AT LAW
MARKET SQUARE, SUITE 800
701 PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE, N.W.
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20004-2608
TEL (202) 508-4000 FAX (202) 508-4321 www.thelenreid.com

February 26, 2001

Elroy P. Sailor
Director of Policy
House Republican Conference
U.S. House of Representatives
1010 Longworth Building
Washington, DC 20515

Re: Flawed Secret Service Personnel System

Dear Mr. Sailor:

In our meeting last Thursday, you mentioned that it would be helpful if we could present you with evidence that non-African-American Special Agents shared our view that there are serious problems with the Secret Service personnel system.

Enclosed is a message sent recently over the Hispanic Agents e-mail router at the Secret Service. Special Agent PRA 6 calls the Secret Service promotion system "a sham." He suggests that promotion ranking results are manipulated by management to promote unqualified people. Diaz also raises serious questions about the equal employment opportunity atmosphere at the Secret Service. For example, non-Hispanic Agents refer to Hispanic Agents as "laca laca" Agents. PRA 6 and the other Hispanic Agents are considering their own suit against the Department of Treasury. Many of the issues they raise are the same ones that we identified in Moore v. Summers, Civ. Action No. 00-00953 (RWR).

In addition, there are white Special Agents who will confirm the problems with the Secret Service promotion system. PRA 6 is contacting them to see if they would be willing to speak to you and/or Chairman Watts. I am told these Agents are very concerned about retaliation by the Secret Service and may not be willing to speak if their identities would have to be revealed.

As a final matter, I am enclosing to you a copy of our expert's evaluation of the Secret Service promotion system. Dr. Sharf was the Chief Industrial/Organizational Psychologist at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission ("EEOC") from 1974 through 1978 and helped draft the EEOC's 1978 Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures. Based upon his review of the relevant materials, Dr. Sharf determined that the Secret Service's MPP promotion system lacked job-related standards and that the various practices were inherently subjective.

REV_00259922

Even where policies do exist, Dr. Sharf found that the Secret Service does not follow them consistently.

For example, the MPP requirement that managers consider the Career Track Program in promotion selections is frequently ignored. Still more troubling is that many of the Secret Service's employment practices have not been directed to the Special Agent in Charge ("SAICs") or the Agents in the field as official policy. In sum, Dr. Sharf found that the Secret Service's MPP promotion appraisal and selection system is a ready vehicle for discrimination that falls short of generally accepted principles and practices of industrial psychology or the EEOC's 1978 Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures.

Thank you for your assistance in this matter. If you require any additional information, please do not hesitate to call me at the above number.

Yours truly,

Ronald A. Schmidt

RAS/dam
Enclosures

REV_00259923

To: Elroy Sailor

From: Daniel Beck

Date: 3-6-01

RE: Possible Policies for Secret Service

When I spoke with Secret Service agen PRA 6 and his lawyer both of them would like to see a policy that more objective, less subjective and arbitrary implemented. They want agents to be promoted based on merit not on their race or whom they know. PRA 6 and his lawyer are advocating that agents be promoted based upon their test scores and their performance field. When discrimination does occur both agent PRA 6 and his lawyer would like to see punishment administered to agents who discriminate against African American agents. The policy that they would they would like to see implemented would be similar to that of the A.T.F.'s, that is objective.

The A.T.F.'s policies for combating discrimination are very logical and straightforward. In the Diversity and Career Impact Program Coordinators section page 19, the policy states that every field division office will have one special agent designated as the diversity and career impact program coordinator, which would be a part time position while hiring is going on. One of their main jobs is to collect data on the racial diversity of the applicants. Another policy under in this section is that the associate director can hire no special agents unless they have prior approval of head quarters.

Pg 20 states that a qualified individual, though it does not state the qualifications of a qualified person, will write a work statement for promotions so there will be minimal negative impacts on African American agents. The qualified individual shall outline the promotion assessment system and selection process. Page 22. A technical evaluation panel would be set up to evaluate all promotional proposals. The designated qualified individual as well as representatives of the plaintiffs would represent the panel.

Pg 25 b. If an African American is selected for promotion, the process shall be complete and the agent should be promoted.

Pg 26 c. If a non-African American is chosen for promotion, the Secret Service will at minimum designate an Associate assistant director to review the promotion. The director will be known as the Competitive Promotion Consultant (CPC).

Pg 26 d. If the African American candidate is not recommended than the non-African American shall receive the promotion.

Pg 26 f. If an African American is recommended by the CPC but officials reject it, the case shall be reviewed by the director and his designee.

Pg 26 g. If the director rejects the promotion of the African American, the director must submit an explanation in writing with in 45 days of why the promotion is rejected.

Performance Appraisals

Pg 27 a. Performance appraisal will be evaluated with uniformed guidelines and other professional standards enforced by the proper individuals to help minimize discrimination.

Pg 28 d. Agents will have two options for performance appraisals. Either taking the most recent test or the three most recent test's which will be averaged together.

Transfers

Pg 30. Transfers will be governed by the new promotion assessment system by Career Development.

Discipline

Pg32 c. In cases of discrimination in the Secret Service, the Secret Service shall determine whether discriminatory actions have taken place against African American agents. Upon the agencies review they determine whether a change of procedure is necessary to reduce disparity.

Pg 32 d. If discrimination is found, the agency should conduct an investigation against the alleged agent. If discipline is not needed a letter is to be written and submitted to the deputy associate director on why discipline is not needed.

Assignment To Special Teams

Pg 32 a. The agency will develop objective criteria for assignments to special teams.

To: Elroy Sailor

From: Daniel Beck

Re: Secret Service Article

Date: 2-22-01

The Washington Post Magazine article titled, The Secret Service, In Black and White, concerns racism and the lack of promotion of African Americans in the Secret Service. PRA 6 PRA 6 who had served in the Secret Service for 16 years, guarded nearly five Presidents and was highly respected by others, was passed over for promotions numerous times for under qualified agents who were white. He was passed over for about 70 promotions in 1999 alone.

After much thought about what he should do about the unfair situation he decided to hire PRA 6 to place a class-action race discrimination suit against the Secret Service that will go as far back as1974. The lawsuits is seeking $300,000 in damages and back pay for each of the eligible and current black agents. Once PRA 6 had filed the suit he began to hold meetings to rally support for his case and at the first meeting he and PRA 6 were surprised that 50 agents showed up to discuss the matter. They were only expecting 15. Each agent felt as though they were being passed over for white and under qualified agents as well. Going public with their grievances went against Secret Service tradition of keeping everything private because they always thought of themselves as family.

As the investigation continued agent after agent told their stories of how they had received verbal insults and were passed over for job hiring, job placement and promotion because of race and/gender. Former agent PRA 6 tell of being verbally assaulted for his race and treated as a second class agents from his fellow colleagues. Fellow agents PRA 6 PRA 6 and many other agents all confirmed that they received the same unfair treatment.

During the investigation the Secret Service denied that they show preferential treatment to white agents. They claimed that the agents needed a few more months in training then about 30 or more agents would be promoted. They went on to state that two of the seven assistant directors are African-American.

Section 2954 - Henry Waxman

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 21616/2077
96,96

Box 52
Folder 8

REV_00259960

D R A F T

Honorable Henry S. Reuss
House of Representatives
Washington, D. C. 20515

Dear Mr. Reuss:

This is in response to the letter of May 25, 1970, signed by you and six other members of the House Committee on Government Operations which, making reference to section 2954, title 5, United States Code, requests a copy of a report on the SST prepared in 1969 by a committee headed by Dr. Richard L. Garwin. I understand that Presidential Assistant Ehrlichman advised you on May 20, 1970, that the report constitutes an internal governmental memorandum of a confidential nature which cannot be released.

The language of the statutory provision on which your request is based unquestionably is rather broad. The legislative history of section 2 of the act of May 29, 1928, 45 Stat. 996, from which that provision is derived, however, indicates that its legislative purpose is narrow and that it does not support your request. See in this connection Kramer & Marcuse, Executive Privilege--A Study of the Period 1953-1960, Part II, 29 George Washington Law Review 827, 881-983.

REV_00259961

The purpose of the 1928 act was to discontinue the submission to Congress of a large number of obsolete and useless reports, and to enable Congress to obtain the information contained in the discontinued reports if this should become necessary. See S. Rept. 1320, 70th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 4, and H. Rept. 1757, 70th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 6. 5 U.S.C. 2954 is thus designed to serve as a means for obtaining information theretofore embodied in annual routine reports to Congress submitted by the several agencies, rather than to compel the release of internal executive branch information such as the Corwin report.

I therefore regret that I cannot comply with your request.

Sincerely,

REV_00259962

ROBERT D. McCALLUM, JR.
Assistant Attorney General

JOHN S. GORDON
United States Attorney

ROGER WEST
First Assistant United States Attorney
Federal Building, Suite 7516
300 North Los Angeles Street
Los Angeles, California 90012
Telephone: (213) 894-2461

DAVID J. ANDERSON
D.C. Bar No. 36988
ANNE L. WEISMANN
D.C. Bar No. 298190
TIMOTHY ZICK
D.C. Bar No. 446063
GAIL WALKER
Va. Bar No. 23590
United States Department of Justice
Civil Division
Federal Programs Branch
901 E Street, N.W.
P.O. Box 883
Washington, D.C. 20044
Telephone: (202) 616-0673

Attorneys for Defendants

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

CENTRAL DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

HENRY A. WAXMAN, et al.,

Plaintiffs,

v.

DONALD L. EVANS, Secretary of Commerce,

Defendant.

No. 01-04530-LGB (AJWx)

SECRETARY'S MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION

Date: March 4, 2002
Time: 10:00 a.m.
Courtroom: No. 780
Location: Los Angeles-Roybal

REV_00259963

violated? If they do not, their claim must be dismissed under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b).[5] immunity for suits seeking nonmonetary relief. See Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) v. United States, 870 F.2d 518, 524-26 (9th Cir. 1989) (construing second sentence 5 U.S.C. § 702 as waiving sovereign immunity for all claims for nonmonetary relief against the United States, its agencies or officials). The question for the Court is whether plaintiffs can point to any federal statute that creates an express or implied cause of action in their favor, an "analytically distinct" inquiry than that posed by sovereign immunity which goes to "whether the source of substantive law upon which the claimant relies provides an avenue of relief." FDIC v. Meyer, 510 U.S. 471, 484 (1994) (reversing decision of the Ninth Circuit because it "conflate[d] the two analytically distinct inquiries of sovereign immunity and cause of action), citing United States v. Mitchell, 463 U.S. 206, 218 (1983). See, e.g., Dewakuku v. Martinez, 271 F.3d 1031, 1037 (Fed. Cir. 2001) (waiver of sovereign immunity in Housing Act of 1937 did not obviate the need for plaintiff suing the Department of Housing and Urban Development to establish an express or implied cause of action under that Act); United States of Shawnee Indians v. United States, 253 F.3d 543, 550 (10th Cir. 2001) (waiver of sovereign immunity in 5 U.S.C. § 702 does not obviate the need for plaintiff suing the United States to establish an express or implied cause of action).

---

That the Court has subject matter jurisdiction over plaintiffs' claim under 28 U.S.C. § 1361 – which states that district courts have original jurisdiction of any action "in the nature of mandamus" – does not eliminate the need for plaintiffs to establish an express or implied cause of action under either § 2954 or the APA. While the Ninth Circuit has recently declined to take a position on the question, see Barron v. Reich, 13 F.3d 1370, 1375 (9th Cir. 1994), the weight of authority holds that a plaintiff who lacks a private right of action, under the statute alleged to give rise to a duty, is not entitled to mandamus relief under 28 U.S.C. § 1361. Id. at 1374-75, citing District Lodge No. 166, Int'l Ass'n of Machinists v. TWA Servs., Inc., 731 F.2d 711, 717 (11th Cir. 1984); Aguirre v. Meese, 930 F.2d 1292, 1293 (7th Cir. 1991); Gonzalez v. INS, 867 F.2d 1108, 1110 (8th Cir. 1989). See also Mead Corp. v. United States, 490 F. Supp. 405, 407 (D.D.C. 1980) (28 U.S.C. § 1361 does not in itself create substantive rights or causes of action but only confers jurisdiction on district court to hear certain kinds of cases); International Fed'n of Prof'l & Technical Engineers v. Williams, 389 F. Supp. 287, 290 (E.D. Va. 1974), aff'd without opinion, 510 F.2d 966 (4th Cir. 1974) (28 U.S.C. § 1361 "broadened the venue" where mandamus-type actions could be brought and did not create any new causes of action). But see Hernandez-Avalos, 50 F.3d 842, 845 (10th Cir. 1995) (holding that a plaintiff who has alleged a cause of action under the Mandamus Act "need not rely upon an implied right of action under any other statute"). In short, if a failure to comply with § 2954 is not otherwise subject to judicial review under another statute, the jurisdictional grant set forth in 28 U.S.C. § 1361 does not create an independent right to a judicial relief. (If the Court disagrees and concludes that 28 U.S.C. § 1361 does give rise to an independent cause of action for individual members of Congress to sue the Executive Branch to enforce a statutory duty, that provision is unconstitutional for the reasons stated in Section II supra.)

In issuing its ruling of January 22, the Court apparently assumed that 5 U.S.C. § 2954 or the APA created such a right and, indeed, indicated its belief that judicial enforcement of that provision was necessary to give effect to "congressional intent to empower Plaintiffs here to obtain the census data sought without having to invoke the authority of the full committee through a subpoena or convincing a chamber majority of the need for the information." Order at 14.

This assumption, however, is directly at odds with the Supreme Court's admonition that a court should not infer an intent by Congress to create a judicially enforceable right of action absent a clear indication from the statutory text or legislative history that Congress intended to create not just a right but also a judicial remedy. Alexander v. Sandoval, 532 U.S. 275, ___ (2001) (emphasis added).[6] As the Court recently explained in Sandoval, "like substantive federal law itself, private rights of action to enforce federal law, must be created by Congress." Sandoval, 532 U.S. at ___ , 121 S.Ct. at 1519. See also Touche Ross & Co. v. Redington, 442 U.S. 560, 578 (1979) (remedies available are those "that Congress enacted into law"). Thus, the role of the judiciary is to interpret the statute Congress has passed to determine whether it "displays an intent to create not just a private right but also a private remedy." Sandoval, 532 U.S. at ___, 121 S.Ct. at 1519 (emphasis added), citing Transamerica Mortgage Advisors, 444 U.S. 11, 15 (1979). See also Walls v. Wells Fargo Bank, 276 F.3d 502, ___, 2002 WL 15687, * 4 (quoting Sandoval and adhering to this principle).

"Statutory intent on this latter point is determinative." Sandoval, 532 U.S. at ___, 121 S.Ct. at 1519, citing Virginia Bankshares, Inc. v. Sandberg, 501 U.S. 1083,1102 (1991); Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U.S. 804, 812, n. 9 (1986) (and cases cited therein). See also Davis v. Passman, 442 U.S. 228, 241 (1979) ("Statutory rights and obligations are established by Congress, and it is entirely appropriate for Congress, in creating these rights and obligations, to determine, in addition, who may enforce them and in what manner . . . In each case, . . . the question is the nature of the legislative intent informing a specific statute . . . ."). See also Walls v. Wells Fargo Bank, 276 F.3d at ___, 2002 WL 15687, * 4 ("the critical inquiry is whether Congress intended to create a private right of action").

---

[6] See also Lampf, Pleva, Lipkind, Prupis & Petigrow v. Gilbertson, 501 U.S. 350, 365 (1991) ("Raising up causes of action where a statute has not created them may be a proper function for common-law courts, but not for federal tribunals.") (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment), quoted in Sandoval, 532 U.S. at ___, 121 S.Ct. at 1520).

Without the requisite legislative intent, "a cause of action does not exist and courts may not create one, no matter how desirable that might be as a policy matter, or how compatible with the statute." Alexander, 532 U.S. at ___, 121 S.Ct. at 1520, citing Massachusetts Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Russell, 473 U.S. 134, 145, 148 (1985); Transamerica Mortgage Advisors, 444 U.S. at 23; Touche Ross, 442 U.S. at 575-576. See also Northwest Airlines, Inc. v. Transport Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, 451 U.S. 77, 94 (1981) ("[U]nless this congressional intent can be inferred from the language of the statute, the statutory structure, or some other source, the essential predication for implication of a private remedy does not exist.") [7]

Under the rule of Sandoval, plaintiffs' claim for judicial relief fails here. An examination of both statutes which plaintiffs claim have been violated – 5 U.S.C. § 2954 and the APA – demonstrates that Congress did not intend to create judicially enforceable rights to the information requested by plaintiffs.

5 U.S.C. § 2954

Plaintiffs' claim for direct judicial relief under 5 U.S.C. § 2954 fails as a result of the utter lack of any indication that Congress intended to create a private remedy to enforce this provision.

---

[7] The Supreme Court stressed in its recent decision in Sandoval, supra, that it long ago abandoned the understanding of private causes of action that held sway 40 years ago, as captured by the Court's statement in J.I. Case Co. v. Borak, 377 U.S. 426, 433 (1964), that "it is the duty of the courts to be alert to provide such remedies as are necessary to make effective the congressional purpose" expressed by a statute. See Sandoval, 532 U.S. at ___, 121 S.Ct. at 1520. Thus, in addressing the issue at hand, the Court can disregard similar statements made in the past to the effect that courts will "ordinarily presume that Congress intends the executive to obey its statutory commands and, accordingly, expects the courts to grant relief when an executive agency violates such a command." Bowen v. Michigan Academy of Family Physicians, 476 U.S. 667, 681 (1986).

Section 2954 was enacted in 1928, nearly two decades before passage of the APA. Even at that time, congressional practice with regard to compelling disclosure of information by the Executive Branch was well-established. Then, as now, resort to the courts to compel disclosure was only done with the assent of at least a majority of a House of Congress, generally through an action to enforce a subpoena.

The process for gaining judicial enforcement of subpoenas exists today as it existed at the time § 2954 was enacted in 1928. See 2 U.S.C. § 194 (enacted in 1857). It requires that, following non-compliance with a subpoena, a contempt citation must be approved by the subcommittee, the full committee, and the full House or Senate, or by the presiding officer if Congress is not in session, before certification to the appropriate United States Attorney for prosecution. Id. That process accords with the relevant interest, which is not the interest of individual members, but the interest of Congress as an institution. And it ensures that the courts' powers are only invoked when a majority believes that disclosure of information is in the public interest and when there is political accountability for its determination. Indeed, no House or committee rules have ever authorized ranking minority members or individual members on their own, without an authorizing Resolution, to seek judicial enforcement of a subpoena.

Nothing in the language of the statute or its history remotely suggests that Congress believed it was, for the first time, creating in individual members a judicially enforceable right to compel disclosure of a virtually unlimited category of information from the Executive Branch. Indeed, at the time of enactment, the Supreme Court had ruled that, for purposes of 5 U.S.C. § 1345,[8] individual legislators had no right to invoke the power of the courts to compel the production of requested documents absent a specific and express grant of that power by their respective Chamber. See Reed v. County Commissioners of Delaware County, Pa., 277 U.S. 376 (1928) (upholding dismissal of suit brought by a number of Senators to compel the production of ballots and other evidence where suit was not expressly authorized by the full Senate). Given that this was the state of the law at the time § 2954 was enacted, there is no basis for inferring that Congress intended to create a right for individual legislators to invoke the power of the courts to enforce its provisions.

---

[8] 5 U.S.C. § 1345 gives district courts original jurisdiction over "all civil actions, suits, or proceedings commenced by the United States, or by any agency or officer thereof expressly authorized to sue by Act of Congress."

What the legislative history cited by this Court suggests is that Congress was creating a means of allowing more specific requests for information to the Executive Branch to overcome the deficiencies in reports that were not directed to members' concerns. In providing a mechanism for streamlining information requests, Congress gave no sign that it was shifting judicially enforceable rights to small minorities so that they would be capable of overriding the collective judgment of both Houses and the Executive Branch.

If Congress had intended to create such rights, it would have done so explicitly, just as it has in other contexts in which it intended for compliance with requests for Executive Branch documents to be judicially enforced. For example, in the Freedom of Information Act, Congress expressly created a judicially enforceable right to government information, establishing a carefully calibrated scheme that balances a variety of common law and statutory privileges against a requester's right to information. While Congress might have adopted a different set of protections in a statute dealing only with requests by legislators, it surely would not have created an unfettered right in individual legislators to invoke the powers of the courts to gain access to a broad spectrum of Executive Branch information subject only to such privileges as a court might choose to recognize.

Given that Congress has expressly authorized suit to compel disclosure of Executive Branch information in other instances, the lack of express authorization for individual members of Congress to file suit to enforce 5 U.S.C. § 2954, in itself, is a strong indication that Congress did not intend for disputes between Congress and the Executive Branch arising under this provision to be resolved in court.[9] See Walls v. Wells Fargo Bank, 276 F.3d at ___, 2002 WL 15687, * 5 ("Had Congress meant to create a remedy for violations of [a provision of the Bankruptcy Code], it could easily have done so; that it did not is a strong indication that it did not intend any such remedy.").

---

[9] [Discuss resolutions authorizing suits here]

The need for a clear statement of congressional intent is particularly important where, as here, the legislator plaintiffs are suing in their official capacities as individual legislators and not on behalf of Congress or a congressional committee. Such a dispute is inherently political and raises fundamental questions as to the power of an individual legislator to inquire into the conduct of the Executive. A court thus should be wary of assuming that, in directing the Executive Branch to comply with requests for information by individual members, Congress intends to confer on those members the right to take the Executive Branch to court.[10]

Finally, any suggestion that a private right of action in plaintiffs' favor should be inferred because they are members of "the class for whose especial benefit the statute was enacted," Cort v. Ash, 422 U.S. 66, 78 (1975) (emphasis in original), would be meritless. First, as the Secretary stated earlier, § 2954 was clearly enacted for the purpose of seeking information for the benefit of Congress as whole, not for congressmen as private individuals.[11] Second, even assuming for the sake of argument that § 2954 was enacted to benefit individual members, that alone would not justify the inference that Congress intended to create right for individual members to invoke the powers of the courts to compel compliance with their requests. "[T]he mere fact that [a] statute was designed to protect [certain individuals] does not require the implication of a private cause of action . . . on their behalf . . . . The dispositive question remains whether Congress

---

[9] [Discuss resolutions authorizing suits here]

[10] When a House of Congress determines to seek judicial enforcement of a subpoena – the traditional means of compelling the Executive Branch to comply with a demand for information – it makes a collective, considered determination for which that House is politically accountable. A suit by individual members, in contrast, does not carry the same degree of political accountability and may seek to compel disclosure of information that the vast majority of Congress believes should not be disclosed.

[11] It is for this reason that plaintiffs lack standing. See discussion supra.

intended to create any such remedy." Transamerica Mortgage Advisors, 444 U.S. at 24. See also Walls v. Wells Fargo Bank, 276 F.3d at ___, 2002 WL 15687, * 4. In this instance, taking into account all the circumstances surrounding enactment of § 2954, it is clear that Congress did not so intend and that is where the inquiry must end.[12]

"Final Agency Action"

Plaintiffs erroneously assert that the APA gives them a right to seek judicial enforcement of 5 U.S.C. § 2954. See Pls Mem. (filed Aug. __, 2001), at 18. In determining whether review is available under the APA, as in determining the existence of an implied cause of action, it is necessary to examine the language and nature of that Act. By its express terms, the APA provides for judicial review only of "[a]gency action made reviewable by statute" and "final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court." 5 U.S.C. § 704.[13] See, generally, Western Radio Services Co., Inc. v. Glickman, 123 F.3d 1189, 1196 (9th Cir. 1997). Because there is no express or implied right of action under 5 U.S.C. § 2954 itself, as explained above, the failure to comply with that provision is not "made reviewable" by that statute. Thus, plaintiffs' claim is viable under the APA only if a failure to submit information pursuant to a statutory mandate constitutes "final agency action" within the meaning of the APA.

---

[12] Supreme Court decisions since Cort v. Ash, 422 U.S. 66 (1975), make clear that the so-called Cort factors are merely guides in the central task of ascertaining legislative intent, see Transamerica Mortgage Advisors, 444 U.S. at 15; Touche Ross, 442 U.S. at 575-76 (1979), that they are not of equal weight, Transamerica Mortgage Advisors , 444 U.S. at 15, and that in deciding an implied-right-of-action case, courts need not "mechanically trudge through all four of the factors when the disposition question of legislative intent has been resolved." California v. Sierra Club, 451 U.S. 287, 301 1981) (Rehnquist, concurring), citing Transamerica Mortgage Advisors, 444 U.S. at 24; Touche Ross, 442 U.S. at 24; Kissinger v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136, 148-49 (1980).

[13] 5 U.S.C. § 704 specifies the types of actions that are judicially reviewable under the APA, thereby clarifying the scope of the judicial review to which a person is entitled under that statute. See 5 U.S.C. § 702 ("A person suffering legal wrong because of agency action, or adversely affected or aggrieved by agency action within the meaning of a relevant statute, is entitled to judicial review thereof.").

"Agency action" is defined in the APA to mean "the whole or a part of an agency rule, order, license, sanction, relief, or the equivalent or denial thereof, or failure to act." 5 U.S.C. 551(13). "Final agency action" has been construed by the courts to mean agency action "by which 'rights or obligations have been determined,' or from which 'legal consequences will flow.'" Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 177 (1997). See also Western Radio Services Co., Inc. v. Glickman, 123 F.3d at 1196-97.

The courts have consistently held that the submission of information to Congress does not constitute "agency action" within the meaning of the APA. See, e.g., Guerrero v. Clinton,157 F.3d 1190, 1195-96 (9th Cir. 1998) (a report to Congress "not agency action of the sort that is typically subject to judicial review" because "it triggers no legal consequences and determines no rights or obligations"); Chemical Weapons Group, Inc. v. United States Dep't of the Army, 111 F.3d 1485, 1495 (10th Cir. 1997) (a certification to Congress not reviewable agency action). Cf. American Trucking Assoc. v. United States, 755 F.2d 1292, 1297 (7th Cir. 1985) (report that is "educational undertaking" and does not "impose an obligation, determine a right or liability or fix a legal relationship" is not reviewable agency action).

The reasons for this are best explained by the D.C. Circuit's opinion in Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc. v. Hodel, 865 F.2d 288 (D.C. Cir. 1988), which bears quoting at length here:

> We think the presumption [of reviewability for agency action] is inapplicable here. First, and most importantly, the nature of the "agency action" at issue is quite distinct from the prototypical exercise of agency power. In the run-of-the-mill case, the agency whose action is challenged has exercised authority delegated (at least arguably) to it by Congress. The agency in such circumstances is exercising legislative functions (via formal or informal rulemaking) or adjudicatory functins that have been specifically ordained by Congress. As a basic element of our system of checks and balances, Congress has seen fit to provide broadly for judicial review of those actions, affecting as they do the lives and liberties of the American people. This is fully in keeping with > fundamental notions in our policy that the exercise of governmental power, as a general matter, should not go unchecked. . . Executive responses to congressional reporting requirements [requiring that certain reports be made to Congress] represent, we believe, an entirely different sort of action. Under the reporting requirement before us, the designated Executive Branch officer is simply reporting back to the source of its delegated power in accordance with the Article I branch's instructions. Lacking a provision for judicial review, the measure before us embodies a requirement that by its nature seems singularly committed to congressional discretion in measuring the fidelity of the Executive Branch actor to legislatively mandated requirements . . . It scarcely bears more than a passing mention that the most representative branch is not powerless to vindicate its interests or ensure Executive fidelity to Legislative directives. In short, in the absence of a congressional directive for judicial review . . ., this issue seems to us quintessentially within the province of the political branches to resolve as part of their ongoing relationships.

Id. at 318-19, quoted favorably in Guerrero v. Clinton,157 F.3d at 1195-96.[14]

If the submission of information to Congress is not "agency action," it follows that the failure to submit information ~~also~~ does not fall within the definition of "agency action" either. Like a submission of information, a failure to submit information to Congress cannot be said to be agency action "by which 'rights or obligations have been determined,' or from which 'legal consequences will flow.'" Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. at 177. To the contrary, a failure to comply with a congressional reporting requirement is "an entirely different sort of action" that is "quintessentially within the province of the political branches to resolve as part of their ongoing

---

[14] While the plaintiffs in Hodel were private parties rather than legislators, and the case turned in part on a lack of meaningful standards to judge compliance with the reporting requirement in question, the D.C. Circuit's observations are equally applicable here.

[15] Even if a failure to comply with a reporting requirement might qualify as "final agency action" in some instances, the Court should be wary of concluding that a failure to comply with 5 relationships," Hodel, 865 F.2d at 318-19, and outside the scope of the APA.[15]

* * *

In sum, the historical means by which Congress has compelled the disclosure of information from the Executive Branch reflect the interests and accountability of Congress as a whole, and there is simply no indication whatsoever that Congress intended to deviate from those means when it enacted either § 2954 or the APA.

Should the Court have any doubt in this regard, it should resolve those doubts in favor of finding no right of action for plaintiffs in order to avoid reaching the serious constitutional question that would arise if § 2954 or the APA (or any other statute) were construed to allow suits by individual members of Congress to compel Executive Branch compliance with a congressional request for information. See Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22, 62 (1932) (in choosing between competing versions of statutory construction, a court must choose that which avoids a constitutional question); Public Citizen v. United States Department of Justice, 491 U.S. 440, 466 (1989) (reluctance to confront or decide constitutional issues "is especially great where . . . they concern the relative powers of coordinate branches of government"). As the Secretary demonstrates next, any attempt by Congress to create such a right would exceed its powers under Article I of the Constitution.

III. CONGRESS MAY NOT CONSTITUTIONALLY DELEGATE ITS INVESTIGATORY POWERS TO A FEW MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TO THE EXTENT OF ALLOWING THEM TO SUE THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH TO COMPEL COMPLIANCE WITH A REQUEST FOR INFORMATION.

If the Court construes a statute enacted by Congress – be it 5 U.S.C. § 2954 or the APA – to encompass a right of individual members of Congress to sue the Executive Branch for failure to comply with an investigatory request, without the express consent of their respective Chamber, that statute would be unconstitutional. Congress simply may not constitutionally delegate its investigatory powers to a few individual members in a manner that has coercive effects outside of Congress.

Article I of the Constitution provides that "All legislative Powers herein granted shall be

---

U.S.C. § 2954 falls within the compass of the APA given the nature and purpose of that provision and the context in which it was enacted, discussed supra.

GROUNDS FOR RECONSIDERATION

The Secretary seeks reconsideration of the Court's January 22 ruling in order to address a crucial but unexamined premise that lies at the heart of that ruling – namely, that plaintiffs were entitled to invoke the powers of the Court under the statutes on which they rely. This motion, then, does not seek to reargue points already considered by the Court, but addresses additional ~~case~~ authority that compels dismissal of plaintiffs' claim. As this memorandum goes to the very authority of this Court to resolve a dispute between the two political branches of government, the Secretary respectfully urges the Court to reconsider its ruling in light of it.

As the Secretary demonstrates below, plaintiffs' requested relief suffers from two principal flaws not fully considered in this Court's January 22 ruling. First, plaintiffs lack Article III standing to sue for the release of the documents subject to their request. Under the Supreme Court rule of Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811 (1997), legislators lack standing where, as here, they sue to remedy an institutional injury suffered by them in their official capacity as legislators. Here, despite asserting that they are seeking information in their personal capacities, plaintiffs would have no claim whatsoever to the information if they were not members of Congress. See id at 821. Plaintiffs do not cure the standing deficiency by arguing 5 U.S.C. § 2954 provides the basis for standing because, as the Court made clear in Raines, "Congress cannot erase Article III's standing requirements by statutorily granting the right to sue to a plaintiff who would not otherwise have standing." Id. at 820 n.3 (citations omitted).

Second, even if the Court's interpretation of the scope of 5 U.S.C. § 2954 is correct, plaintiffs do not have a judicially enforceable right of action, express or implied, under either 5 U.S.C. § 2954 or the Administrative Procedure Act. Absent a clear statutory right on plaintiffs' part to invoke the power of the courts to enforce 5 U.S.C. § 2954, it is axiomatic – and not a matter of judicial discretion – that their claim must be dismissed under Fed.R.Civ.P 12(b)(6). To the extent the Court construes either the APA or § 2954, or any other statutory provision, to create a right of action for individual Members of Congress to sue the Executive Branch over document disputes without the express consent of a majority of either the House of Representatives or the Senate, the Secretary explains why the creation of such a right would be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." U.S. Const., Art. I, § 1. Included in Congress' "legislative Powers," of course, is the power to conduct investigations "in the aid of a legislative function." Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 204 (1880).[16] But that power is constitutionally assigned to Congress, as a whole, and not to any individual Member of Congress. Given that fundamental fact, it would be unconstitutional for Congress to allow a few members of a Senate or House committee to exercise Congress's investigatory powers to the extent of suing the Executive Branch without the express authorization or approval of a majority in either the Senate or the House. Giving due respect to the separation of powers fundamental to our Constitution, the power to create a dispute of such moment, involving all three branches of the government and invoking the coercive powers of a court to compel Executive Branch action, can be exercised only upon the deliberate decision of a House as a whole.

The Secretary has no quarrel with the Senate or House, as a matter of their internal rules, delegating to committees or individual members the power to make a request for documents or testimony, or to issue subpoenas to demand compliance with such a request. See McGrain v. Daugherty, 272 U.S. 135, 158 (1927) ("The committee was acting for the Senate and under its authorization and therefore the subpoenas which the committee issued . . . are to be treated as if issued by the Senate"). The power to invoke the powers of the courts to compel compliance with such a demand or to enforce a subpoena, however, is an altogether different matter, and can only be exercised pursuant to a collective determination by the respective Chamber that such a step is truly "in the aid of a legislative function," Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. at 204, and necessary to achieve its investigatory goals. Whatever Congress may choose to administratively delegate within its four walls, when it acts externally – whether by legislation or through its

---

[16] See also McGrain v. Daugherty, 272 U.S. 135 (1927); Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178 (1957); Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1950); Eastland v. United States Servicemen's Fund, 421 US. 491 (1975); Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425 (1977).

coercive investigatory powers – Article I requires that this be done only at the will of the majority.[17]

IV. SECTION 2954 HAS BEEN SUPERSEDED BY HOUSE RULES.

[this argument up for discussion]

Insofar as § 2954 purports to delegate the power of the House of Representatives to "any seven members" of the House "Committee on Government Operations," § 2954 had, by the time of the request at issue, been superseded by subsequent House rules and was therefore no longer effective.

Article I , § 5, cl. 2 authorizes "[e]ach House [to] determine the Rules of its Proceedings." This rule-making power has been construed broadly by the courts. The Supreme Court long ago described its breadth in this way:

> All matters of method are open to the determination of the house. . . The power to make rules is not one which once exercised is exhausted. It is a continuous power, always subject to be exercised by the house, and [unless exercised so as to ignore constitutional restraints or irrationally], absolute and beyond the challenge of any other body or tribunal.

United States v. Ballin, 144 U.S. 1, 5 (1892). See also INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 956 n.20 (1983) ("Each House has the power to act alone in determining specified internal matters.").

Each House has the constitutional power to establish, and to revise, its own rules. This power is by its very nature non-delegable: the House of Representatives cannot delegate to the Senate, to the President, or to any private individual the ability to establish its rules. Nor may either House bind its successors. Indeed, the House of Representatives is not a continuous body -- it is reconstituted each Congress -- and it adopts its own rules of proceedings at the outset of each Congress.

---

[17] While this issue appears to be one of first impression, the judicial precedent that does exist indicates that the courts have been reluctant to use their coercive power at the behest of less than a majority of a House. For example, in Wilson v. United States, 369 F.2d 198 (D.C. Cir. 1966), the D.C. Circuit read the contempt-of-Congress statute, contrary to its literal terms, to require a vote of the full House before a witness could be found in contempt by a court. Although the court stressed Congress's apparent desire that committees be subject to external checks, the court also appeared concerned that committees might manipulate their processes in order to "insulate their actions on contempt matters from any further consideration within the legislative branch."

The question who may exercise each House's authority to request information on its behalf is a "matter[ ] of method" related directly to the investigatory powers of the Senate and House and thus must be "open to the determination of each House." Ballin, 144 U.S. at 5. Section 2954 therefore addresses a matter within the rule-making power of the Senate and the House under Article I, § 5, cl. 2.

Plaintiffs' reading of § 2954 would effect an unconstitutional delegation of the House's power to make its own rules. Under plaintiffs' reading, the House of Representatives is forever barred from repealing the seven-member rule contained in § 2954 unless it obtains the consent of the Senate and of the President. In short, under this view, the House has delegated to the Senate and the President the power to block the House from revising its own rules.

We do not dispute the ability of each House, if it so chooses, to embody rules in statute if it thereafter incorporates that statute by reference into its internal rules. The House of Representatives has not done this. Specifically, the House rules in effect at the time of plaintiffs' request do not incorporate § 2954 (nor do they even establish a "Committee on Government Operations"). Therefore, the House rules have, as a constitutional matter, superseded § 2954.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court should reconsider its Order granting Plaintiffs' Motion for Summary Judgment, vacate that order, and then dismiss plaintiffs' claim for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

Respectfully submitted,

ROBERT D. McCALLUM, JR.
Assistant Attorney General

JOHN S. GORDON
United States Attorney

ROGER WEST
First Assistant United States Attorney
Federal Building, Suite 7516
300 North Los Angeles Street
Los Angeles, California 90012
Telephone: (213) 894-2461

DAVID J. ANDERSON, D.C. Bar No. 36988
ANNE L. WEISMANN, D.C. Bar No. 298190
TIMOTHY ZICK, D.C. Bar No. 446063
GÁIL WALKER, Va. Bar No. 23590

United States Department of Justice
Civil Division, Federal Programs Branch
901 E Street, N.W., P.O. Box 883
Washington, D.C. 20044
Telephone: (202) 616-0673
Facsimile: (202) 616-8470

Attorneys for Defendant

Dated: February 5, 2002

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I hereby certify that on February 5, 2002, I caused a true copy of the Secretary's Memorandum in Support of Motion for Reconsideration to be served by first class mail, postage prepaid, upon:

Marvin E. Krakow
Krakow & Kaplan, LLP
1801 Century Park East
Suite 1520
Los Angeles, CA 90067-2302

David C. Vladeck
Public Citizen Litigation Group
1600 20th Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20009-1001

Gail Walker

an unconstitutional exercise of Congress's Article I powers.

While recognizing that motions for reconsideration are disfavored by the Court, the Secretary urges the Court to exercise its considerable discretion in light of the extraordinary nature of the remedy afforded by the Court in its January 22 Order. The Court's ruling is likely to have a dramatic impact on relations between the Congress and the Executive Branch and on the courts. Much more is at stake here than access to the specific data sought by plaintiffs. The Court has, in effect, given a small number of members of the two investigative committees of Congress the ability to circumvent the congressional subpoena process and the will of the majority and bring routine political disputes over document production directly to the courts for resolution – disputes that have been resolved through non-judicial means, with few exceptions, since the ratification of our Constitution.

Moreover, the implications of the Court's ruling extend well beyond requests for information pursuant to § 2954. If every statute providing that the Executive Branch "shall" produce information to Congress (or one of its components or members) is enforceable in the courts, as the Court appears to suggest, the "veritable cornucopia of federal reporting requirements, involving basic interrelationships between the Article I and Article II branches" would be "appropriate grist for the judicial rule." Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc. v. Hodel, 865 F.2d 288, 317 & n.3 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (counting over 150 provisions in the U.S. Code imposing congressional reporting requirements). The Court's ruling is thus "rife with danger of flooding the courts with failure-to-file cases," id. at 319, and inserting the judiciary into everyday disputes between the Executive Branch and Congress over access to Executive Branch information to a far greater extent than has ever been allowed before.

Before the Court allows a ruling with such profound and far-reaching implications to take effect, it should be absolutely certain that plaintiffs have constitutionally valid statutory authority to invoke the powers of the judiciary to resolve this dispute. The authority discussed infra establishes that such authority is lacking and that plaintiffs' claim is therefore not legally viable, no matter how "plain" the statutory duty in question may appear to the Court.[1]

ARGUMENT

I. PLAINTIFFS LACK STANDING TO MAINTAIN THIS ACTION.

"No principle is more fundamental to the judiciary's proper role in our system of government than the constitutional limitation of federal-court jurisdiction to actual cases or controversies." Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 818, quoting Simon v. Eastern Ky. Welfare Rights Organization, 426 U.S. 26, 37 (1976). See also Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 471 (1982) (case-or-controversy requirement is a "bedrock requirement.").

One element of the case-or-controversy requirement is that a plaintiff must establish that he has standing to sue. Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 561 (1992) (plaintiff bears burden of establishing standing). To meet the standing requirements of Article III, "[a] plaintiff must allege personal injury fairly traceable to the defendant's allegedly unlawful conduct and likely to be redressed by the requested relief." Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751 (1984) (emphasis added). Thus, a plaintiff's complaint must establish that he has a "personal stake" in the alleged dispute, and that the alleged injury suffered is particularized as to him. See, e.g., Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560-561 & n. 1 (to have standing, the plaintiff must have suffered a "particularized" injury, which means that "the injury must affect the plaintiff in a personal and individual way"); Bender v. Williamsport Area School Dist., 475 U.S. 534, 543-544 (1986) (school board member who "has no personal stake in the outcome of the litigation" has no standing); Simon, 426 U.S. at 39 ("The necessity that the plaintiff who seeks to invoke judicial

---

[1] The Secretary has also discovered additional evidence of legislative intent that supports his position as to the proper scope of § 2954 that he wishes to add to the record. This new evidence – the Senate floor debate– is along the same lines of the legislative statements the Secretary relied on before. See ___ Cong. Rec. S10613-14 (daily ed. May 29, 1928) (copy attached hereto) (statement of Sen. Sackett, characterizing the provision later codified as § 2954 as a provision "under which the committee could reinstate any report [previously required] that was found to be needed."). [need full cite] power stand to profit in some personal interest remains an Art. III requirement").

The Supreme Court has also stressed that the alleged injury must be "legally and judicially cognizable." Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. at 819. This requires, among other things, that the plaintiff have suffered "an invasion of a legally protected interest which is ... concrete and particularized," Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560, and that the dispute is "traditionally thought to be capable of resolution through the judicial process." Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 97 (1968). See also Allen, 468 U.S. at 752 ("Is the injury too abstract, or otherwise not appropriate, to be considered judicially cognizable?").

The Supreme Court has always insisted on "strict compliance" with this jurisdictional standing requirement. See Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. at 819, citing Allen, 468 U.S. at 752 (under Article III, "federal courts may exercise power only 'in the last resort, and as a necessity' ") (quoting Chicago & Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U.S. 339, 345, 12 S.Ct. 400, 402, 36 L.Ed. 176 (1892)); Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 356, 31 S.Ct. 250, 253, 55 L.Ed. 246 (1911) ("[F]rom its earliest history this [C]ourt has consistently declined to exercise any powers other than those which are strictly judicial in their nature"). And the standing inquiry is to be "especially rigorous" when reaching the merits of the dispute would force the court to decide whether an action taken by one of the other two branches of the Federal Government was unconstitutional. See Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. at 819, citing Bender, 475 U.S. at 542; Valley Forge, 454 U.S. at 473-474. As the Supreme Court said in Allen, 468 U.S. at 752, "the law of Art. III standing is built on a single basic idea--the idea of separation of powers."

In the light of this "overriding and time-honored concern about keeping the Judiciary's power within its proper constitutional sphere," this court must "put aside the natural urge to proceed directly to the merits of [an] important dispute and to 'settle' it for the sake of convenience and efficiency." Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. at 820. Instead, it must carefully inquire as to whether plaintiffs have met their burden of establishing that their claimed injury is "personal, particularized, concrete, and otherwise judicially cognizable." Id.

* * *

In a recent decision, the Supreme Court has revisited the application of these fundamental principles to the question of legislative standing. Its decision in Raines v. Byrd, supra, leaves no doubt that the legislator-plaintiffs in the instant suit have no standing to bring suit.

In Raines v. Byrd, the Supreme Court addressed the standing of a small number of legislators to challenge the constitutionality of the Line Item Veto Act. In finding standing lacking, the Court disagreed with a line of cases from the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which applied special standing rules to permit "legislative standing" for Members of Congress asserting injury to their institutional interests as legislators. The Supreme Court made clear that congressional plaintiffs hold no privileged status for purposes of the standing inquiry and that "strict compliance" with the fundamental principles of standing discussed above is required.

Applying these principles, the Raines Court held that congressional plaintiffs alleging a "diminution of [their] legislative power" lacked a "personal stake" in the outcome of the case and failed to allege a sufficiently concrete injury to establish Article III standing. Id. at___. In making this determination, the Court first noted that plaintiffs claimed only a type of "institutional injury," which was based on a loss of political power and which would affect all members of Congress equally, rather than an injury to a " private" right to which they were personally entitled.[2] Id. at 829. Next, the Court considered the nature of the institutional injury, and held that the claimed loss of legislative power was itself "wholly abstract and widely dispersed." Id. at 2322.

Only once in its history has the Supreme Court upheld standing for legislators claiming an institutional — as opposed to a personal — injury. Id. at ___. In that case,

---

[2] The Raines court distinguished Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969), a case in which a Member of Congress was found to have standing to challenge his exclusion from the House of Representatives. In Powell, plaintiff alleged both that he was "singled out for specially unfavorable treatment" compared to other Members, and he alleged a loss of something to which he was personally entitled, i.e., his salary and his seat as a Member of Congress after his constituents had elected him. Raines, 117 S. Ct. at 2318. The Court explained that Powell's loss of a private right, rather than an institutional one, made his injury "more concrete," id., and conferred standing.

Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939), the Court affirmed a Kansas Supreme Court decision to grant standing to 20 state legislators challenging Kansas' ratification of a constitutional amendment. The plaintiffs had voted against ratification, deadlocking the legislature in a 20-20 tie and, plaintiffs claimed, properly dooming the amendment to defeat. However, after the State's Lieutenant Governor cast a deciding vote in favor of the amendment, it was deemed ratified. The 20 legislators had standing to sue, the Supreme Court held, because their "votes against ratification [were] overridden and virtually held for naught although if they are right in their contentions their votes would have been sufficient to defeat ratification." Id. at 438.

The Raines Court refused to extend the holding in Coleman to support standing for a minority of legislators alleging that the Line Item Veto Act reduced their political power. Raines, 117 S. Ct. at 2320. "[O]ur holding in Coleman stands (at most) for the proposition that legislators whose votes would have been sufficient to defeat (or enact) a specific legislative act have standing to sue if that legislative action goes into effect (or does not go into effect), on the ground that their votes have been completely nullified." Id. at ____.[3] The Raines plaintiffs, in contrast, did not allege "that they voted for a specific bill, that there were sufficient votes to pass the bill, and that the bill was nonetheless deemed defeated," id., nor that the Line Item Veto Act nullified their votes in such a way that there was no alternative political remedy. Id. at ___. Because the Raines Court found that "there is a vast difference between the level of vote nullification at issue in Coleman and the abstract dilution of institutional legislative power" alleged in Raines, the Court dismissed plaintiffs' claims for lack of standing. Id.

The rationale of the Raines decision is fatal to plaintiffs' standing claims in this case. First, this is plainly not a case where the private or personal rights of the legislators are at issue. Rather, plaintiffs have claimed "serious, irreparable" harm from being deprived of "important information to which they are entitled by law" and which is needed in order to "engage in meaningful oversight . . . [and] develop legislation." Complaint at ¶ 19. Like the injuries alleged in Raines, there can be no doubt that these are quintessential "institutional injuries" that "damage[ ] all members of Congress and both Houses of Congress equally," and that are claimed only on the basis of plaintiffs' official capacities as legislators. Raines, 521 U.S. at ___.

---

[3] Further, the Court noted that Coleman may not even stand for that narrow proposition, as it declined to decide whether the fact that Coleman was brought by state legislators — and therefore did not raise separation of powers concerns — made it entirely distinguishable from any case in which plaintiffs are federal legislators. Id. at 824 n.8.

Second, these plaintiffs share none of the exceptional characteristics that may be sufficient to confer standing on legislators seeking redress for institutional injuries.[4] Unlike the plaintiffs in Coleman, these plaintiffs represent a minority of the House Committee on Government Reform. As a small minority of one House committee, they do not themselves maintain the right to enact legislation pertaining to redistricting or to amend the Census Act. Nor do they have standing to allege institutional injuries on behalf of a majority of their colleagues whose votes would be sufficient to enact legislation on such matters – colleagues who have not joined plaintiffs in this suit or authorized them to bring it on their behalf. See Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. at ___ (holding that Coleman exception to general rule against legislative standing is limited to cases where plaintiffs include legislators whose votes would have been sufficient to defeat (or enact) a specific legislative act, and further attaching "some importance to the fact that appellees have not been authorized to represent their respective Houses of Congress").]

* * *

Plaintiffs' suggestion (see Pls. Mem. at 19-20) that they have standing,"[b]ecause at its [4] In fact, it is not clear after the Court's decision in Raines whether any institutional injury alleged by congressional plaintiffs will be sufficient to confer standing, unless the injury exactly mimics the injury claimed in Coleman. See generally Separation of Powers — Congressional Standing, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 217 (1997).

---

core this is a case to enforce a statutory right," is unavailing. In the next section, the Secretary shows that plaintiffs do not have a statutory right to go to court to enforce 28 U.S.C. § 2954. But even if the Court concludes otherwise, this would not give plaintiffs Article III. standing. As the Supreme Court reaffirmed in Raines, "Congress cannot erase Article III's standing requirements by statutorily granting the right to sue to a plaintiff who would not otherwise have standing." Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. at 820 n.3, citing Gladstone, Realtors v. Village of Bellwood, 441 U.S. 91, 100 (1979). See also Lujan, 504 U.S. at 578 ("in suits against the government, at least, the concrete injury requirement must remain" and is not subject to congressional override). [confirm quote]

Plaintiffs' assertion that they have suffered a "particularized harm" from the Secretary's failure to comply with 5 U.S.C. § 2954 is also without merit. Although there is no question that § 2954 was enacted to make it clear that the Executive Branch was expected to comply with requests for information by a certain number of individual members acting without the assent of their committee, that provision was clearly enacted for the purpose of seeking information for the benefit of Congress as whole, not for congressmen as private individuals. Plaintiffs' injury, then, is properly deemed an "institutional injury" that "damages all members of Congress and both Houses of Congress equally," Raines, 521 U.S. at 829, and thus insufficient to confer Article III standing.

II. PLAINTIFFS LACK A STATUTORY RIGHT OF ACTION, EXPRESS OR IMPLIED, TO ENFORCE SECTION 2954.

This Court's January 22 opinion overlooks a fundamental issue underlying this dispute: do plaintiffs have a right of action, either express or implied, under the statute they are seeking to enforce or the Administrative Procedure Act, the only other statute they allege to have been

---

[5] It is fundamental that a plaintiff suing the United States or one of its officials must demonstrate subject-matter jurisdiction of the court where suit is brought, a waiver of sovereign immunity, and an express or implied cause of action in its favor. In this action, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331 and 1361 provide the basis for the Court's exercise of subject matter jurisdiction and 5 U.S.C. § 702, as construed by the Ninth Circuit, provides a general waiver of sovereign

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Section 535 of Title 28, Referrals to DOJ (Department of Justice)

OA/NARA#: 2163/2074
9693

Box 52
Folder 9

REV_00259987

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Book - Senate Hearing - The Role of the American Bar Association in the Judicial Evaluation Process

OA/NARA#: 2177/2088
9797

Box 52
Folder 10

REV_00260002

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Senators' Proposals to Change Rules

OA/NARA#: 2179/2090
9779

Box 52
Folder 11

REV_00260003

United States Senate

WASHINGTON, DC 20510

April 30, 2003

Dear Senators Frist and Daschle,

As the ten newest members of the United States Senate, we write to express our concerns about the state of the federal judicial nomination and confirmation process. The apparent breakdown in this process reflects poorly on the ability of the Senate and the Administration to work together in the best interests of our country. The breakdown also disserves the qualified nominees to the federal bench whose confirmations have been delayed or blocked, and the American people who rely on our federal courts for justice.

We, the ten freshmen of the United States Senate for the 108th Congress, are a diverse group. Among our ranks are former federal executive branch officials, members of the U.S. House of Representatives, and state attorneys general. We include state and local officials, and a former trial and appellate judge. We have different viewpoints on a variety of important issues currently facing our country. But we are united in our commitment to maintaining and preserving a fair and effective justice system for all Americans. And we are united in our concern that the judicial confirmation process is broken and needs to be fixed.

In some instances, when a well qualified nominee for the federal bench is denied a vote, the obstruction is justified on the ground of how prior nominees – typically, the nominees of a previous President – were treated. All of these recriminations, made by members on both sides of the aisle, relate to circumstances which occurred before any of us arrived in the United States Senate. None of us were parties to any of the reported past offenses, whether real or perceived. None of us believe that the ill will of the past should dictate the terms and direction of the future.

Each of us firmly believes that the United States Senate needs a fresh start. And each of us believes strongly that we were elected to this body in order to do a job for the citizens of our respective states – to enact legislation to stimulate our economy, protect national security, and promote the national welfare, and to provide advice and consent, and to vote on the President's nominations to important positions in the executive branch and on our nation's courts.

Accordingly, the ten freshmen of the United States Senate for the 108th Congress urge you to work toward improving the Senate's use of the current process or establishing a better process for the Senate's consideration of judicial nominations. We acknowledge that the White House should be included in repairing this process.

All of us were elected to do a job. Unfortunately, the current state of our judicial confirmation process prevents us from doing an important part of that job. We seek a bipartisan solution that will protect the integrity and independence of our nation's courts, ensure fairness for judicial nominees, and leave the bitterness of the past behind us.

Yours truly,

John Cornyn

Mark Pryor

Lisa Murkowski

Elizabeth Dole

Norm Coleman

Lamar Alexander

[Separation of Powers] [1]

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 21641/2075
9694

Box 52

Folder 12

REV_00260006

Brett
from Gary

Citation Search Result Rank 1 of 13 Database Slip Copy USAG
1996 WL 876050 (O.L.C.)
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

(Preliminary Print)

Office of Legal Counsel
U.S. Department of Justice

I. THE CONSTITUTIONAL SEPARATION OF POWERS BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS

May 7, 1996

This memorandum provides an overview of the constitutional issues that periodically arise concerning the relationship between the executive and legislative branches of the federal government. Although that relationship is shaped in part by the policy and political concerns of the President and Congress of the day, the political interaction between the President and Congress takes place within an enduring constitutional framework that confers powers and responsibilities on both elected branches. In this memorandum we discuss the general principles underlying separation of powers analysis, and we address certain specific questions that have arisen in the past. Any set of examples is necessarily illustrative rather than exhaustive, however, and the Office of Legal Counsel is always available to assist in reviewing legislation or other congressional action for potential separation of powers issues. [FN1]

MEMORANDUM FOR THE GENERAL COUNSELS OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Table of Contents

I. General Principles 1
A. Express Procedures: The Bicameralism and Presentment Requirements and the Appointments Clause 5
B. The Anti-Aggrandizement Principle 7
C. The General Separation of Powers Principle 10
II. Common Separation of Powers Issues 13
A. Bicameralism/Presentment Questions 13
B. Appointments Clause and Related Questions 17
1. Who is Required to Be an Officer of the United States? 18
a. Employment by the Government: The Distinction between Appointees and Independent Contractors 19
b. The Exercise of Significant Authority 22
c. Appointment to a Position of Employment within the Federal Government 25
d. Summary 29
2. Who May Be an Inferior Officer? 30

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

I was unconstitutional. "[O]nce a function has been delegated to the executive branch, it must be performed there, and cannot be subjected to continuing congressional control except through the constitutional process of enacting new legislation." Constitutionality of Congress' Disapproval of Agency Regulations by Resolutions Not Presented to the President, 4A Op. O.L.C. 21, 27 (1980) (opinion of the Attorney General).

Similarly, while Congress has near-plenary authority in deciding to grant, limit or withhold appropriations, the Department of Justice has long contended that the appropriations power may not be used to circumvent the restrictions the Constitution places on the modes of legislative action. See, e.g., Authority of Congressional Committees to Disapprove Action of Executive Branch, 41 Op. Att'y Gen. 230 (1955) (opining that legislation authorizing congressional committees to disapprove Defense Department contracts is unconstitutional). Several years before Chadha, for example, this Office advised that Congress could not validly provide for the indirect implementation of a legislative "veto" by an appropriations rider that would prospectively deny funding for the implementation of any regulation disapproved in the future by such a "veto." See Appropriations Limitation for Rules Vetoed by Congress, 4B Op. O.L.C. 731 (1980). Our reasoning in that opinion is equally applicable to appropriations provisions that attempt to cut off funding that would otherwise be available on the basis of any future expression of disapproval by Congress that does not take the form of new legislation. The same analysis would apply, as well, to a provision prohibiting the expenditure of funds for some purpose, but allowing a future expression of approval by committee action to remove the prohibition.

In carrying out its legitimate legislative functions, Congress "enjoys ample channels to advise, coordinate, and even directly influence an executive agency [including by] direct communication with the [agency]." FEC v. NRA Political Victory Fund, 6 F.3d 821, 827 (D.C. Cir. 1993), cert. dismissed, 115 S. Ct. 537 (1994). As a practical matter, therefore, congressional committees and individual members of Congress often are able to sway the decisions of the executive officials with whom they deal. In addition, congressional committees can exercise limited but legally coercive authority over persons outside the legislative branch through the power to issue subpoenas to compel testimony. [FN44] In light of the capacity of Congress to extend its influence beyond the legislative sphere by informal means that are sometimes troubling although not unlawful, it is imperative that the executive branch consistently assert the rule of constitutional law that formal control of executive decision making and administration is subject to the requirements of Article I, and especially to the constitutional authority of the President to participate in the legislative process through the presentment mechanism. The executive branch has a constitutional obligation not to accede to legislative action that does not conform to Article I. Advising the Secretary of Education that she could validly implement departmental regulations despite a legislative "veto," Attorney General Civiletti wrote that "recognition of these concurrent resolutions as legally binding would constitute an abdication of the responsibility of the executive branch, as an equal and coordinate branch of government with the legislative branch, to preserve the integrity of its functions against constitutional encroachment." Congress' Disapproval of Agency Regulations, 4A

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

Op. O.L.C. at 29.

B. Appointment Clause and Related Questions

The Appointments Clause provides that

[The President,] shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2. [FN45] In Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976) (per curiam), the Supreme Court held that the terms of the Appointments Clause set out the only means by which Congress may provide for the appointment of "Officers of the United States." [FN46] Id. at 124-37. Principal officers must be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate; inferior officers will be appointed in the same manner unless Congress by statute provides for their appointment by the President, the "Head[] of [a] Department[]," or the courts. Id. at 132; [FN47] see also Freytag v. Commissioner, 501 U.S. 868, 878 (1991) ("the Constitution limits congressional discretion to vest power to appoint 'inferior Officers' to three sources"). Despite the apparent clarity of its language, however, the Appointments Clause has provided the occasion for many opinions of the Attorneys General and of this Office. [FN48]

1. Who is Required to Be an "Officer of the United States"? Not everyone who performs duties for the federal government is an "officer" within the meaning of the Appointments Clause. From the early days of the Republic, this term has been understood to embrace the ideas of "tenure, duration, emolument, and duties." United States v. Hartwell, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 385, 393 (1868). Because Hartwell has long been taken as the leading statement of the constitutional meaning of "officer," [FN49] that statement is worth repeating in full:

An office is a public station, or employment, conferred by the appointment of government. The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties.

The employment of the defendant was in the public service of the United States. He was appointed pursuant to law, and his compensation was fixed by law. Vacating the office of his superior would not have affected the tenure of his place. His duties were continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary. They were to be such as his superior in office should prescribe. A government office is different from a government contract. The latter from its nature is necessarily limited in its duration and specific in its objects. The terms agreed upon define the rights and obligations of both parties, and neither may depart from them without the assent of the other.

Id. at 393.

Hartwell and the cases following it specify a number of criteria for identifying constitutional officers, and in some cases it is not entirely clear which criteria the court considered essential to its decision. Nevertheless, we believe that from the earliest reported decisions onward, the constitutional definition of officer has involved at least three necessary conditions.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

a. Employment by the Government: The Distinction between Appointees and Independent Contractors. An officer's duties are permanent, continuing, and based upon responsibilities created through a chain of command rather than by contract. Underlying an officer is an "office," to which the officer must be appointed. As Chief Justice Marshall, sitting as circuit justice, wrote: "Although an office is 'an employment,' it does not follow that every employment is an office. A man may certainly be employed under a contract, express or implied, to do an act, or perform a service, without becoming an officer." United States v. Maurice, 26 F. Cas. 1211, 1214 (C.C.D. Va. 1823) (No. 15,747). Chief Justice Marshall speaks here of being "employed under a contract"; in modern terminology the type of non-officer status he is describing is usually referred to as that of independent contractor. In Hartwell, this distinction shows up in the opinion's attention to the characteristics of the defendant's employment being "continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary," as well as to the suggestion that with respect to an officer, a superior can fix and then change the specific set of duties, rather than having those duties fixed by a contract. 73 U.S. at 393.

The distinction between employees and persons whose relationship to the government takes some other form also appears in later decisions. [FN50] The question in United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508 (1879), concerned whether a surgeon appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions "to examine applicants for pension, where [the Commissioner] shall deem an examination . . . necessary," id. at 508 (quoting Rev. Stat. § 4777), was an officer within the meaning of the Appointments Clause. The surgeon in question was "only to act when called on by the Commissioner of Pensions in some special case"; furthermore, his only compensation from the government was a fee for each examination that he did in fact perform. Id. at 512. The Court stated that the Appointments Clause applies to "all persons who can be said to hold an office under the government" and, applying Hartwell, concluded that "the [surgeon's] duties are not continuing and permanent and they are occasional and intermittent." Id. (emphasis in original). The surgeon, therefore, was not an officer of the United States. Id. [FN51]

The Court employed the same reasoning in Auffmordt v. Hedden, 137 U.S. 310 (1890). Pursuant to statute, an importer dissatisfied with the government's valuation of dutiable goods was entitled to demand a reappraisement jointly conducted by a general appraiser (a government employee) and a "merchant appraiser" appointed by the collector of customs for the specific case. Despite the fact that the reappraisement decision was final and binding on both the government and the importer, id. at 329, the Court rejected the argument that the merchant appraiser was an "inferior Officer" whose appointment did not accord with the requirements of the Appointments Clause.

> He is an expert, selected as such. . . . He is selected for the special case. He has no general functions, nor any employment which has any duration as to time, or which extends over any case further than as he is selected to act in that particular case. . . . He has no claim or right to be designated, or to act except as he may be designated. . . . His position is without tenure, duration, continuing emolument, or continuous duties . . . . Therefore, he is not an

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

'officer,' within the meaning of the clause.
Id. at 326-27.
We believe that under its best reading, Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976) (per curiam), reflects and endorses this distinction, and that suggestions to the contrary misread the opinion. First, Buckley cites both Germaine and Auffmordt approvingly. See id. at 125-26 & n.162. Second, in several of its statements of the definition of "officers," Buckley, sometimes citing Germaine explicitly, says that the term applies to appointees or appointed officials who exercise significant authority under federal law, thus recognizing the possibility that non-appointees might sometimes exercise authority under federal law. See, e.g., 424 U.S. at 131 ("Officers" are "all appointed officials exercising responsibility under the public laws"). It is true that at other points in its opinion, the Buckley Court used language that, taken in isolation, might suggest that the Appointments Clause applies to persons who, although they do not hold positions in the public service of the United States, exercise significant authority pursuant to federal law. See id. at 141. However, we think such a reading of Buckley is unwarranted. So understood, Buckley must be taken to have overruled, sub silentio, Germaine and Auffmordt -- cases upon which it expressly relies in its analysis, see id. at 125-26 & n.162 -- and its repeated quotation of the Germaine definition of "officer" as "all persons who can be said to hold an office under the government" would make no sense. The apparently unlimited language of some passages has a simpler explanation: there was no question that the officials at issue in Buckley held "employment[s]," Maurice, 26 F. Cas. at 1214, under the federal government, and thus the question of the inapplicability of the Appointments Clause to persons not employed by the federal government was not before the Court. [FN52] The Supreme Court's decision in Buckley, we conclude, did not modify the long-settled principle that a person who is not an officer under Hartwell need not be appointed pursuant to the Appointments Clause. [FN53]
b. The Exercise of Significant Authority. Chief Justice Marshall's observation that "[a]lthough an office is 'an employment,' it does not follow that every employment is an office," United States v. Maurice, 26 F. Cas. 1211, 1214 (C.C.D. Va. 1823) (No. 15,747) (Marshall, Circuit Justice), points to a second distinction as well -- although not one that was at issue in Maurice itself. An officer is distinguished from other full-time employees of the federal government by the extent of authority he or she can properly exercise. As the Court expressed this in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976) (per curiam):

> We think that the term "Officers of the United States" as used in Art. II, defined to include "all persons who can be said to hold an office under the government" in United States v. Germaine, [means] that any appointee exercising significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States . . . must . . . be appointed in the manner prescribed by [the Appointments Clause].

Id. at 125-26 (emphasis added). [FN54] In contrast, "[e]mployees are lesser functionaries subordinate to officers of the United States." Id. at 126 n.162.
The distinction between constitutional officers and other employees is a long-standing one. See, e.g., Burnap v. United States, 252 U.S. 512, 516-19 (1920) (landscape architect in the Office of Public Buildings and Grounds was an employee, not an officer); Second Deputy Comptroller of the Currency --

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Appointment, 26 Op. Att'y Gen. 627, 628 (1908) (Deputy Comptroller of the Currency was "manifestly an officer of the United States" rather than an employee). At an early point, the Court noted the importance of this distinction for Appointments Clause analysis. See Germaine, 99 U.S. at 509. [FN55]

The Supreme Court relied on the officer/employee distinction in its recent decision in Freytag v. Commissioner, 501 U.S. 868 (1991). In Freytag, the Court rejected the argument that special trial judges of the Tax Court are employees rather than officers because "they lack authority to enter a final decision" and thus arguably are mere subordinates of the regular Tax Court judges. [FN56] Id. at 881. The Court put some weight on the fact that the position of special trial judge, as well as its duties, salary, and mode of appointment, are specifically established by statute; [FN57] the Court also emphasized that special trial judges "exercise significant discretion" in carrying out various important functions relating to litigation in the Tax Court. Id. at 881-82.

Applying the same understanding of the distinction between officers and employees, this Office has concluded that the members of a commission that has purely advisory functions "need not be officers of the United States" because they "possess no enforcement authority or power to bind the Government." Proposed Commission on Deregulation of International Ocean Shipping, 7 Op. O.L.C. 202, 202-03 (1983). For that reason, the creation by Congress of presidential advisory committees composed, in whole or in part, of congressional nominees or even of members of Congress does not raise Appointments Clause concerns.

Since employees do not wield independent discretion and act only at the direction of officers, they do not in their own right "exercis[e] responsibility under the public laws of the Nation," Buckley, 424 U.S. at 131. [FN58] As a constitutional matter, therefore, an employee may be selected in whatever manner Congress directs. Conversely, "any appointee" in federal service who "exercis[es] significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States" must be an officer in the constitutional sense and must be appointed in a manner consistent with the Appointments Clause. [FN59] 424 U.S. at 126. Congress and the President may not avoid the strictures of the Clause by vesting federal employees with the independent or discretionary responsibility to perform any "significant governmental duty." Id. at 141. [FN60]

c. Appointment to a Position of Employment within the Federal Government.

Finally, United States v. Hartwell, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 385 (1868), and the other major decisions defining "Officers of the United States" all reflect the historical understanding that a constitutional officer is an individual who is appointed to his or her office by the federal government. The Appointments Clause simply is not implicated when significant authority is devolved upon non-federal actors. [FN61] In Hartwell the Court stated, "[a]n office is a public station, or employment, conferred by the appointment of government. . . . The employment of the defendant was in the public service of the United States." Id. at 393; see also United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508, 510 (1879) (founders intended appointment pursuant to the Appointments Clause only for "persons who can be said to hold an office under the government about to be established under the Constitution"). It is a conceptual confusion to argue that federal laws delegating authority to state officials create federal "offices," which are then

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

filled by (improperly appointed) state officials. Rather, the "public station, or employment" has been created by state law; the federal statute simply adds federal authority to a pre-existing state office. Accordingly, the substantiality of the delegated authority is immaterial to the Appointments Clause conclusion. [FN62] An analogous point applies to delegations made to private individuals: the simple assignment of some duties under federal law, even significant ones, does not by itself pose an Appointments Clause problem. [FN63]

In our view, therefore, the lower federal courts have been correct in rejecting Appointments Clause challenges to the exercise of federally derived authority by state officials, [FN64] the District of Columbia City Council, [FN65] qui tam relators under the False Claims Act, [FN66] and plaintiffs under the citizen suit provisions of the Clean Water Act. [FN67] The same conclusion should apply to the members of multinational or international entities who are not appointed to represent the United States. [FN68] We believe that the Appointments Clause doubts sometimes voiced about legislation requiring the concurrence of state or local officials, Indian tribes, or private persons as a condition precedent to federal action are equally without merit. [FN69]

Determining whether an individual occupies a position of private employment or federal employment can pose difficult questions. The Supreme Court recently set forth rules for making this determination in Lebron v. National Railroad Passenger Corp., 115 S. Ct. 961 (1995). There, the Court found itself faced with the question of whether Amtrak is a private corporation or an agency of the government. Amtrak is chartered by Congress and incorporated under the District of Columbia Business Corporation Act. Id. at 967. The organic statute expressly provides that Amtrak "shall be operated and managed as a for-profit corporation, and is not a department, agency, or instrumentality of the United States Government." 49 U.S.C. § 24301(a)(2)-(3). The Court ruled that this provision "is assuredly dispositive of Amtrak's status as a Government entity for purposes of matters that are within Congress' control . . . . But it is not for Congress to make the final determination of Amtrak's status as a government entity for purposes of determining the constitutional rights of citizens affected by its actions." 115 S. Ct. at 971.

However, the Court held that an entity is "what the Constitution regards as the Government," if the entity is government-created and government- controlled. Id. at 971. Because Amtrak was created "by special law for the furtherance of governmental objectives," it is government-created. [FN70] Id. at 974. Because federally appointed members of Amtrak's governing board hold "voting control" and there is no provision for this government control to sunset, Amtrak is government-controlled. The Court contrasted Conrail, which it determined is not what the Constitution regards as the government. By statute the federal government appoints a voting majority of Conrail's board of directors. Nevertheless, the Court held that Conrail is not part of the government, because the government's voting control will shift to the private shareholders if Conrail's debt to the federal government falls below half of its total indebtedness and because "'[t]he responsibilities of the federal directors are not different from those of the other directors -- to operate Conrail at a profit for the benefit of its shareholders' -- which contrasts with the public-interest 'goals' set forth in Amtrak's charter." Id. (quoting Regional Rail Reorganization Act Cases, 419 U.S. 102, 152 (1974)). [FN71]

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

d. Summary. An appointee (1) to a position of employment (2) within the federal government (3) that carries significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States is required to be an "Officer of the United States." Each of these three conditions is independent, and all three must be met in order for the position to be subject to the requirements of the Appointments Clause.

We recently applied this principle in determining whether the Appointments Clause represents a blanket proscription against participation by the federal government in binding arbitration. Typically, arbitrators are private individuals chosen by the parties to the dispute. In a binding arbitration, the decision of the arbitrators is mandatory upon the parties, subject only to limited judicial review. The view that the Appointments Clause prohibits federal government participation in binding arbitration proceeds from the misinterpretation of Buckley discussed above. We reasoned that although it is "beyond dispute that arbitrators exercise significant authority, at least in the context of binding arbitration involving the federal government," [FN72] the standard binding arbitration mechanism does not implicate the Appointments Clause. Arbitrators > are manifestly private actors who are, at most, independent contractors to, rather than employees of, the federal government. Arbitrators are retained for a single matter, their service expires at the resolution of that matter, and they fix their own compensation. Hence, their service does not bear the hallmarks of a constitutional office -- tenure, duration, emoluments, and continuing duties. Consequently, arbitrators do not occupy a position of employment within the federal government, and it cannot be said that they are officers of the United States. Because arbitrators are not officers, the Appointments Clause does not place any requirements or restrictions on the manner in which they are chosen.

Memorandum for John Schmidt, Associate Attorney General, from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, re: Constitutional Limitations on Federal Government Participation in Binding Arbitration, at 10 (Sept. 7, 1995). [FN73] The only case that to our knowledge addresses this question agreed with our analysis and conclusion, and held that the Appointments Clause does not prohibit the federal government from entering into binding arbitration. See Tenaska Washington Partners v. United States, 34 F. Cl. 434, 440 (1995) ("the OLC Memorandum is a thorough and persuasive analysis").

2. Who May Be an Inferior Officer? Since all officers of the United States may be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, the only Appointments Clause significance to the distinction between principal and inferior officers lies in Congress's ability to provide for the appointment of inferior officers by one of the alternative means listed in the Clause. The Supreme Court has observed that "[t]he line between 'inferior' and 'principal' officers is one that is far from clear, and the Framers provided little guidance into where it should be drawn." Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 671 (1988). Unfortunately, the Court's own decisions provide only modest additional guidance. In Morrison, the Court declined to "attempt . . . to decide exactly where the line falls" because it found that the independent counsel "clearly falls on the 'inferior officer' side of that line." Id. at 671. The Court advanced several factors that pointed to that conclusion: (1) The counsel was removable by the Attorney General, thus making her "to some degree 'inferior' in rank and authority." Id. (2) The counsel's duties were limited, particularly with respect to policy making and administration. (3) The counsel's tenure was limited to the particular "mission that she was appointed for." Id. at 672. [FN74] The Court's other recent Appointments Clause decisions shed little additional light on the subject. [FN75]

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

We agree with the court of appeals in Silver v. United States Postal Service, 951 F.2d 1033 (9th Cir. 1991), that the particular factors Morrison discussed do not constitute an exhaustive or exclusive list. See id. at 1040 ("The nature of each government position must be assessed on its own merits."). The Silver court noted that the official at issue in that case, the Postmaster General, "performs many tasks and has many responsibilities," but determined the office to be an inferior one because the Postmaster General "does not have 'control"' and "serv[es] at the pleasure of the" Board of Governors of the Postal Service. Id. This approach is consistent with the one we have taken in the past. For example, in concluding that United States Attorneys are inferior officers whose appointment could be vested in the Attorney General, we rejected the argument that the constitutional term "inferior" means "'petty or unimportant"'; instead, we concluded that the term connotes amenability to supervision by the superior "in whom the power of appointment is vested." United States Attorneys -- Suggested Appointment Power of the Attorney General -- Constitutional Law (Article 2, § 2, cl. 2), 2 Op. O.L.C. 58, 58-59 (1978) (quoting Collins v. United States, 14 Ct. Cl. 568, 574 (1878)); see also Department of Housing and Urban Development -- Delegations of Authority -- 42 U.S.C. § 3533, 3535, 2 Op. O.L.C. 87, 89 (1978) (deputy assistant secretary, who is subject to direction by an assistant secretary, is "unquestionably" an inferior officer). In determining whether an officer may properly be characterized as inferior, we believe that the most important issues are the extent of the officer's discretion to make autonomous policy choices and the location of the powers to supervise and to remove the officer. While an officer responsible only to the President for the exercise of significant discretion in decision making is probably a principal officer, an officer who is subject to control and removal by an officer other than the President should be deemed presumptively inferior.

3. Who May Appoint Inferior Officers? The Appointments Clause does not define "Heads of Departments" or "Courts of Law," and questions have arisen about which entities are included by these terms within the "possible repositories for the appointment power." Freytag v. Commissioner, 501 U.S. 868, 884 (1991). Earlier Attorneys General have accorded these terms a broad construction. See, e.g., Authority of Civil Service Commission to Appoint a Chief Examiner, 37 Op. Att'y Gen. 227 (1933). The same is true of the courts, [FN76] which have held that the Tax Court, [FN77] a special division of a court of appeals created primarily for the purpose of appointing independent counsels, [FN78] and the Governors of the Postal Service (as a collective head of department), [FN79] can be vested with appointments power. The interpretive difficulties lie in determining exactly how broadly the term "Department" should be read.

We think that the "Departments" to which the Appointments Clause refers are not limited to those major divisions of the executive branch that are headed by members of the President's cabinet. [FN80] In 1933, Acting Attorney General Biggs opined that Congress could authorize the Civil Service Commission to appoint an inferior officer. Authority of Civil Service Commission to Appoint a Chief Examiner, 37 Op. Att'y Gen. 227 (1933). His opinion noted that the Commission "ha[d] certain independent executive duties to perform," was "responsible only to the Chief Executive," id. at 229, and was "not a subordinate Commission attached to one of the so-called executive departments," id. at 231. As "an independent division of the Executive Branch," he concluded, the Commission was a "Department" for Appointments Clause purposes and its three commissioners, collectively, "the 'head of a Department' in the constitutional sense." Id. The fact that the commissioners were not members of the Cabinet was not controlling, the Acting Attorney General concluded, because the Cabinet itself is not a creation of the Constitution. Id. [FN81] We find this opinion persuasive and note that the Court's opinion in Freytag ultimately reserved the question of whether the heads of entities other than cabinet-level departments can be vested with the power to appoint inferior officers. See Freytag, 501 U.S. at 887 n.4. [FN82] Cf. United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508 (1879) (Commissioner of Pensions, as head of a bureau within the Interior Department, was not a "Head of Department"). [FN83]

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

We would apply the reasoning of the 1933 opinion in concluding that it is constitutional for Congress to vest the power to appoint inferior officers in the heads of the so-called independent agencies -- those agencies whose heads are not subject to removal at will by the President and that conventionally are understood to be substantially free of policy direction by the President. Except for the attenuated nature of the President's supervisory authority, most of the independent agencies are clearly analogous to major executive agencies. They exercise governmental authority without being subordinated to any broader unit within the executive branch, and Congress has implicitly characterized them as "Departments" for Appointments Clause purposes by permitting their heads to appoint officials who plainly are inferior officers. [FN84] Nothing in the original history of the Clause suggests any intention to exclude from the scope of the Clause separate establishments that are not subject to plenary presidential control. [FN85] Finally, in reserving the question of appointments by "the head of one of the principal agencies," the Freytag Court itself included as examples of those agencies the "independent" FTC and the SEC as well as the clearly executive CIA, which suggests that the Court did not perceive a difference between the two types of agencies, at least in the Appointments Clause context. 501 U.S. at 887 n.4. We see no reason to exclude the independent regulatory agencies from the class of entities that are "Departments" for Appointments Clause purposes.

We note that, even accepting the reasoning of the 1933 Justice Department opinion, some entities may exercise governmental authority in so limited a manner that they need not be viewed as "Departments" even though their heads are responsible only to the President. For example, the Committee for Purchase from People Who Are Blind or Severely Disabled, the members of which are appointed by the President alone, 41 U.S.C. § 46(a), appears to exercise significant authority but is subordinate to no larger executive agency. Id. §§ 46-48c. Given the narrow scope of the Committee's powers, however, we do not think that the Committee necessarily should be analyzed as a collective head of a department for Appointments Clause purposes.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

4. Legislation Lengthening the Tenure of an Officer. As the Court held in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 126 (1976) (per curiam), the Appointments Clause by its terms and its structure prohibits Congress from itself exercising the power to appoint "Officers of the United States." The text and structure of the Clause reflect a deliberate constitutional choice to deny to the legislature the power to select the individuals who exercise significant governing authority as non-legislative officers of the federal government. See id. at 129-31 (reviewing the debates in the Philadelphia convention). [FN86] This choice to exclude Congress as such from the appointments process can be set at naught by means other than legislation overtly vesting in Congress the power of appointment. Accordingly, the executive branch has traditionally viewed statutes that constitute an effective exercise by Congress of the power to appoint as violations of the Appointments Clause.

This issue sometimes arises in connection with statutes that attempt to extend the tenure of an officer with a set term, thus potentially denying the President the power he or she would otherwise have to reappoint the officer or select someone else. In 1951, for example, the President requested the Justice Department's views on the validity of a statute extending the terms of the members of a commission. See Displaced Persons Commission -- Terms of Members, 41 Op. Att'y Gen. 88 (1951). According to the original legislation creating the commission, the terms were to expire in June 1951, but prior to that date Congress amended the legislation to extend the commissioners' tenure to August 1952. Acting Attorney General Perlman advised the President that, while he did not think "there can be any question as to the power of the Congress to extend the terms of offices which it has created," this legislative power is subject "to the President's constitutional power of appointment and removal." Id. at 90. However, because the legislation did not attempt to restrict the President's authority to remove the commissioners at will, it was constitutionally harmless: the President remained free to exercise his appointment power simply by removing the incumbents from office at any time. See id. ("As so construed, the [extension legislation] presents no constitutional difficulties."); see also Pension Agents and Agencies, 14 Op. Att'y Gen. 147, 148-49 (1872) (discussing President's power to remove officer serving a term extended by statute). [FN87]

We think that the Department's 1951 opinion adopted the correct approach to this issue: while the power to lengthen the tenure of an incumbent officer is incident to Congress's general power to create, determine the duties of, and abolish offices, [FN88] that power cannot legitimately be employed to produce a result that is, practically speaking, a congressional reappointment to office. On this reasoning, the extension of tenure of officers serving at will raises no Appointments Clause problem, but lengthening the term of an officer who may be removed only for cause would be constitutionally questionable. [FN89] However, this conclusion, which we think sound in principle, has been rejected by the courts in at least one context. The Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984 extended the tenure of bankruptcy judges, who can be removed only for cause, and that provision has been sustained repeatedly against constitutional challenge. The leading case, In re Benny, 812 F.2d 1133 (9th Cir.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

3. Who May Appoint Inferior Officers? 32
4. Legislation Lengthening the Tenure of an Officer 35
5. Legislation Imposing Additional Duties on an Officer 39
6. The Ineligibility and Incompatibility Clauses 42
7. The Recess Appointments Clause 43
8. Acting and Interim Appointments 44
9. Other Issues of Combined, Collective, and Interbranch Authority and the Appointments Clause 48
C. Removal Power Issues 49
1. The Executive's Removal Power 49
2. Congressional Removal Power 54
D. Issues Involving the Boundaries of the Legislative Sphere 56
1. The Paradox of Congressional Agencies 56
2. Reporting Requirements 58
3. Congressional Agents in Non-Legislative Contexts 60
E. The General Separation of Powers Principle 62
F. Statutory Construction 63
III. Constitutional Requirements and Policy Concerns 66 I. General Principles

The Constitution reflects a fundamental conviction that governmental "power is of an encroaching nature, and that it ought to be effectually restrained from passing the limits assigned to it." The Federalist No. 48, at 332 (James Madison) (Jacob E. Cooke ed., 1961), quoted in Metropolitan Washington Airports Auth. ("MWAA") v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc., 501 U.S. 252, 273 (1991). The founders, not content to rely on paper definitions of the rights secured to the people, "viewed the principle of separation of powers as a vital check against tyranny." Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 121 (1976) (per curiam). In order to safeguard liberty, therefore, the Constitution creates three distinct branches of government -- Congress, the President, and the federal judiciary -- and assigns to them differing roles in the exercise of the government's powers. The resulting division of governmental authority is not a mere set of housekeeping rules indicating which branch presumptively performs which functions; it is, rather, a fundamental means by which the Constitution attempts to ensure free, responsible, and democratic government. See MWAA, 501 U.S. at 272 ("The ultimate purpose of this separation of powers is to protect the liberty and security of the governed."). The constitutional separation of powers advances this central purpose by "assur[ing] full, vigorous, and open debate on the great issues affecting the people"; [FN2] by "placing both substantive and procedural limitations on each [branch]"; [FN3] and by maintaining a "system of . . . checks and balances" among the three branches. [FN4]

Although the structure of the Constitution is designed to obviate the danger to liberty posed by each of the branches, [FN5] the founders were particularly concerned with the Congress's potential for improvident or overreaching action: "the tendency of republican governments is to an aggrandizement of the legislat[ure] at the expense of the other departments." The Federalist No. 49, at 315-16 (James Madison) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961), cited in United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437, 444 n.17 (1965). Many specific aspects of the Constitution's separation of governmental powers embody the founders' "profound 1987), held that a statutory extension of tenure "becomes similar to an appointment" only "when it extends the office for a very long time." Id. at 1141; see also In re Investment Bankers, Inc., 4 F.3d 1556, 1562 (10th Cir. 1993) (agreeing with Benny and noting that the contrary Appointment Clause argument "has been rejected by every court that has considered it"), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1061 (1994). We do not find especially persuasive the reasoning of Benny, [FN90] and it is possible that the doctrine of Benny is limited to its factual context. [FN91] However, the reasoning set forth in Benny and the cases that follow it is susceptible to general application, and it is unclear that the courts could repudiate Benny's conclusion with respect to other officers without undercutting the legitimacy of those cases.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The relevant precedents contemplate a continuum. At the one end is constitutionally harmless legislation that extends the term of an officer who is subject to removal at will. At the other end is legislation, constitutionally objectionable even under Benny, that enacts a lengthy extension to a term of office from which the incumbent may be removed only for cause. Legislation along this continuum must be addressed with a functional analysis. Such legislation does not represent a formal appointment by Congress and, absent a usurpation of the President's appointing authority, such legislation falls within Congress's acknowledged authority -- incidental to its power to create, define, and abolish offices -- to extend the term of an office. As indicated, constitutional harm follows only from legislation that has the practical effect of frustrating the President's appointing authority or amounts to a congressional appointment.

Our recent opinion on legislation extending the terms of members of the United States Sentencing Commission is illustrative of this functional approach. After the Sentencing Commission had been appointed, Congress enacted legislation "to provide [that] a member of the United States Sentencing Commission may continue to serve until a successor is appointed or until the expiration of the next session of Congress." Pub. L. No. 102-349, 106 Stat. 933 (1992). Commissioners may be removed only for cause. 28 U.S.C. § 991(a). We concluded that the statute did not function to violate the President's appointment power. See Whether Members of the Sentencing Commission Who Were Appointed Prior to the Enactment of a Holdover Statute May Exercise Holdover Rights Pursuant to the Statute (Apr. 5, 1994) (publication forthcoming in 18 Op. O.L.C. (1994)). The statute left the President free to "nominate whomever he want[ed] at precisely the same time as he could before [the statute was enacted]." Id. at 10. We noted that the effect of the legislation could actually be to augment the President's power by giving him "the option of retaining the holdover officer until he chooses to nominate a successor." Id.

We acknowledged the argument that the statute might give Congress the opportunity to appoint, in effect, an incumbent to a new term because the President's removal authority is statutorily restricted and the Senate might refuse to confirm any presidential nominee in order to retain a congressionally favored incumbent. Id. But this argument was unavailing for two reasons. First, the argument is unduly speculative insofar as it hypothesizes contumacious conduct on the part of the Congress, and whatever danger such a possibility might entail was mitigated by the limitation on the period for which a holdover may continue to serve. Second, we noted that the holdover provision is unarguably valid as applied to Sentencing Commissioners who took office after the statute's enactment. We concluded that "[i]t is simply not persuasive to argue that the President's appointment power is effectively frustrated when incumbent commissioners hold over but not when subsequent commissioners hold over." Id.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

We also found it significant that the holdover statute was neutral in its application. We reserved the question of whether a holdover statute "might amount to a prohibited congressional designation, even if the holdover period is for a short time," if the statute "would create or repeal holdover provisions for selective members of the same commission or for classes of members on the same commission, e.g., those appointed on a certain date or those from a particular political party." Id. at 14 n.8.

5. Legislation Imposing Additional Duties on an Officer. The executive branch has consistently maintained that a statute creating a new office and conferring it and its duties on the incumbent of an existing office would be unconstitutional under the Appointments Clause. [FN92] Congress's recognized authority to alter the duties and powers of existing offices could be employed to achieve substantially the same result if the legislature were unconstrained in the duties it could add to an office. [FN93] The Supreme Court accordingly has interpreted the Constitution to limit the legislature's discretion. The leading case, Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U.S. 282 (1893), concerned a statute that created a commission to select the land for Rock Creek Park in the District of Columbia. Three of the five members were to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate; the persons holding two existing federal offices, the chief of engineers of the Army and the engineer commissioner of the District, were declared members ex officio. The Court rejected an Appointments Clause challenge to the assignment of the two engineers to the new commission:

> [W]e do not think that, because additional duties, germane to the offices already held by them, were devolved upon them by the act, it was necessary that they should be again appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It cannot be doubted, and it has frequently been the case, that Congress may increase the power and duties of an existing office without thereby rendering it necessary that the incumbent should be again nominated and appointed.

Id. at 301. The legislation at issue was valid, the Court concluded, because the new duties assigned to the engineers "cannot fairly be said to have been dissimilar to, or outside of the sphere of," the engineers' existing responsibilities. Id.

The Shoemaker rule ensures "that Congress [is] not circumventing the Appointments Clause by unilaterally appointing an incumbent to a new and distinct office." Weiss v. United States, 114 S. Ct. 752, 759 (1994). For the imposition of new duties on an officer to be valid under Shoemaker, two requirements must be met. First, as in Shoemaker itself, the legislation must confer new duties on "offices, . . . [not] on any particular officer." Olympic Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Director, Office of Thrift Supervision, 732 F. Supp. 1183, 1192 (D.D.C.) (emphasis in original), appeal dismissed as moot, 903 F.2d 837 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "Had the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army or the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia resigned from office after the commission was established, he would no longer have served on the commission

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

-- the new Chief of Engineers or Engineer Commissioner would have taken over those duties." Id. at 1192-93 (discussing facts in Shoemaker). The statute at issue in Olympic Federal, in contrast, abolished certain offices (the three-person Federal Home Loan Bank Board) while simultaneously defining the duties of a new office (the Director of OTS) and designating as the first Director the holder of one of the abolished offices (the chair of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board). See id. at 1186. The Olympic Federal court correctly determined that by doing so the statute in effect appointed the particular individual who was chair of the old board to a new position. Id. at 1193. [FN94]

The second facet of the Shoemaker rule is the requirement that the new duties be "germane to the offices already held by" the affected officers. 147 U.S. at 301. This inquiry is necessarily case-specific. In Weiss, the Court examined closely the specific duties of military judges and the general responsibilities of military and naval officers and concluded that they are so intertwined that the selection by the Judges Advocate General of certain military and naval officers to serve for a time as military judges is consistent with the germaneness requirement. 114 S. Ct. at 759-60. In giving advice on this issue, we also have looked at the reasonableness of assigning the new duties "in terms of efficiency and institutional continuity," and we have asked whether "it could be said that [the officers'] functions . . . [with the additional duties] were within the contemplation of those who were in the first place responsible for their appointment and confirmation." Legislation Authorizing the Transfer of Federal Judges from One District to Another, 4B Op. O.L.C. 538, 541 (1980).

The Weiss decision may have weakened judicial enforcement of Shoemaker's germaneness requirement by suggesting that some legislation that adds new duties is valid regardless of whether it satisfies the requirement. The opinion of the Court stressed the fact that "[i]n Shoemaker, Congress assigned new duties to two existing offices, each of which was held by a single officer. This no doubt prompted the [Shoemaker] Court's description of the argument as being that 'while Congress may create an office, it cannot appoint the officer.' . . . But here the statute authorized an indefinite number of military judges, who could be designated from among hundreds or perhaps thousands of qualified commissioned officers." 114 S. Ct. at 759. For that reason, the Court concluded, there was "no ground for suspicion here that Congress was trying to both create an office and also select a particular individual to fill the office." Id. The Court nevertheless went on to consider the germaneness issue and concluded that the duties of military judges are adequately related to the duties of the commissioned officers from whom the judges are selected. Id. at 760.

In a separate opinion, Justice Scalia argued that "'germaneness' is relevant whenever Congress gives power to confer new duties to anyone other than the few potential recipients of the appointment power specified in the Appointments Clause," because "taking on . . . nongermane duties . . . would amount to assuming a new 'Offic[e]' within the meaning of Article II, and the appointment to that office would have to comply with the strictures of Article II." Id. at 770 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment). We find Justice Scalia's reasoning persuasive and believe that in an appropriate setting the executive branch should urge the Court expressly to accept it. In light of the Weiss Court's detailed examination of the germaneness issue, this may not require the Court in fact to modify the doctrine of that case because it is unclear to us that the Court actually intended to hold germaneness constitutionally irrelevant in Weiss-type circumstances. The Court may instead simply have been emphasizing the fact that assignment of new and nongermane duties to a few specific officers not only violates the Appointments Clause per se, but also fails under the more general anti-aggrandizement principle of its decisions. We believe that it is appropriate, therefore, to review proposed new-duties legislation for germaneness even where the new duties are assigned to large or indefinite groups.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

6. The Ineligibility and Incompatibility Clauses. The Constitution places two important restrictions on the universe of persons who may be appointed to serve as officers of the United States. U.S. Const. art. I, § 6, cl. 2. [FN95] The Ineligibility Clause states that "[n]o Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time." Id. The Clause "restricts the President's power to appoint Members of Congress," and "[i]t has long been settled within the executive branch that the President, in exercising his powers of appointment under Article II, § 2, cl. 2, will not make an appointment in violation of the . . . clause." Members of Congress Holding Reserve Commissions, 1 Op. O.L.C. 242, 244 (1977). The most common problem under the Ineligibility Clause arises from legislation that creates a commission or other entity and simultaneously requires that certain of its members be Representatives or Senators, either ex officio or by selection or nomination by the congressional leadership. Unless the congressional members participate only in advisory or ceremonial roles, or the commission itself is advisory or ceremonial, the appointment of members of Congress to the commission would violate the Ineligibility Clause. [FN96]

The Incompatibility Clause provides that "no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in Office." U.S. Const. art. I, § 6, cl. 2. The Clause is primarily a restriction on Congress and its members: the Incompatibility Clause "disqualifies individuals who have already been appointed from assuming or retaining seats in Congress." Reserve Commissions, 1 Op. O.L.C. at 244; cf. Members of Congress Serving in the Armed Forces, 40 Op. Att'y Gen. 301 (1943). [FN97] However, the President's duty to take care that the law of the Incompatibility Clause is observed requires him or her to ensure that appointments [FN98] and legislation creating governmental positions are consistent with the Clause. See, e.g., Case of the Collectorship of New Orleans, 12 Op. Att'y Gen. 449, 451 (1868) ("in view of the" Incompatibility Clause, an executive officer's acceptance of a seat in Congress "must be considered as having the legal character of a resignation of the office"); Appointments to the Commission on the Bicentennial of the Constitution, 8 Op. O.L.C. 200, 207-08 (1984) (providing advice about "various structural arrangements within the Commission that might be designed to respect the Incompatibility Clause"). [FN99]

7. The Recess Appointments Clause. With respect to officers of the United States, the Constitution vests the President with the "Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session." U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 3. "A long line of opinions of the Attorneys General, going back to 1823 . . . and which have been judicially approved . . . has firmly established that . . . [t]he President's power to make recess appointments . . . extends to all vacancies existing during the recess regardless of the time when they arose." Recess Appointments -- Compensation, 3 Op. O.L.C. 314, 314 (1979) (citations omitted); accord Executive Authority to Fill Vacancies, 1 Op. Att'y Gen. 631 (1823). [FN100] Although there was some early uncertainty about the President's power to make appointments under the Recess Appointments Clause during intrasession recesses, that question was settled within the executive branch by an often-cited opinion of Attorney General Daugherty concluding that the President is so authorized. Executive Power -- Recess Appointments, 33 Op. Att'y Gen. 20 (1921). The most difficult problem of interpretation under the Clause today is determining how substantial an intrasession recess must be to give rise to the President's power. [FN101] Attorney General Daugherty concluded that a twenty-eight-day recess was sufficient, but cautioned that "the term 'recess' must be given a practical construction." Id. at 24-25. We agree with his view that the President has discretion to make a good-faith determination of whether a given recess is adequate to bring the Clause into play. [FN102] Giving advice on how the President may properly exercise that discretion has proven a difficult task. See Recess Appointments During the Recess of the Senate Beginning January 3, 1992, 16 Op. O.L.C. 15 (1992) (preliminary print) (eighteen-day recess a sufficient period, particularly in light of fact that except for a brief formal session on January 3 the Senate would actually be absent for fifty-four days); Recess Appointments, 3 Op. O.L.C. at 316 (President may make recess appointments "during a summer recess of the Senate of a month's duration").

8. Acting and Interim Appointments. Early Attorneys General repeatedly opined that the President enjoyed a constitutional power of appointment empowering the President to make temporary or ad interim appointments to offices in cases of need without conforming to the requirements of the Appointments or Recess Appointments Clause. [FN103] Their initial reaction to congressional legislation on the subject of vacancies was therefore to view it as having neither the purpose nor the effect of supplanting the President's preexisting constitutional authority. See Office and Duties of Attorney General, 6 Op. Att'y Gen. 326, 352 (1854) ("Perhaps the truer view of the question is to consider the . . . statutes as declaratory only, and to assume that the power to make such temporary appointment is a constitutional one."). After the enactment of the Vacancies Act of 1868, 15 Stat. 168, however, the Attorneys General treated the Act as providing the exclusive means of making temporary appointments to those offices covered by the statute. See, e.g., Appointments Ad Interim, 17 Op. Att'y Gen. 530 (1883); Appointments Ad Interim, 16 Op. Att'y Gen. 596, 596-97 (1880) (authority to fill vacancy in the office of Navy Secretary is "a statutory power," and when the power is exhausted, "the President is remitted to his constitutional power of appointment"). A 1904 opinion attempted to synthesize the older and the more recent views, treating as reasonable and legitimate Congress's wish to cabin presidential discretion to make interim appointments while the Senate is in session, but describing as a "fundamental right as Chief Executive" the President's authority "to make such a temporary appointment, designation, or assignment of one officer to perform the duties of another whenever the administration of the Government requires it." Temporary Recess Appointments, 25 Op. Att'y Gen. 258, 261 (1904); see also Promotion of Marine Officer, 41 Op. Att'y Gen. 291, 294 (1956) (President has constitutional authority to appoint "key military personnel to positions of high responsibility" without following statutory procedures).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

There is little modern caselaw on the President's power to make temporary appointments to offices requiring Senate confirmation. [FN104] The "leading" judicial decision is a brief per curiam court of appeals opinion denying a motion for a stay of the district court's mandate pending appeal, Williams v. Phillips, 482 F.2d 669 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (per curiam). [FN105] Because of its procedural posture, Williams did not actually resolve the constitutional issue, but it suggested somewhat obliquely that what non- statutory power the President possesses to make interim appointments to offices requiring Senate confirmation can be employed only for a "reasonable time required by the President to select persons for nomination." Id. at 671. Looking to the thirty-day period that was, at the time, permitted temporary appointments under the Vacancies Act for an indication of what a reasonable period would be, Williams concluded that even if the implied power existed, a four-and-a-half-month period without any nomination was unreasonable. Id. at 670-71. [FN106] Since Williams was decided, the Vacancies Act has been amended to provide for an initial appointment period of 120 days. Up to two extensions, each lasting 120 days, may be made depending on the specific circumstances of the vacancy. Moreover, the Vacancies Act also tolls the running of these periods when particular conditions obtain. See 5 U.S.C. § 3348. Thus, the Vacancies Act allows temporary appointments, in appropriate circumstances, of durations well in excess of even one year. Accordingly, we would not currently view a four-and-a-half-month temporary appointment as necessarily exceeding a reasonable duration, provided that a nomination is submitted to the Senate.

On the assumption that Williams can be read to indicate that "[t]o keep the Government running calls for the designation of acting officials to fill vacancies in the absence of express statutory authority," Department of Energy -- Vacancies, 2 Op. O.L.C. 113, 117 (1978) (citing Williams), we have argued that the reasonableness of a given interim appointment should be measured not by a per se rule but by a variety of pragmatic factors. Those factors include "the difficulty of finding suitable candidates," id. at 118, "the specific functions being performed by the [interim officer]; the manner in which the vacancy was created (death, long-planned resignation) . . . and particular factors affecting the President's choice [such as] a desire to appraise the work of [the interim officer] or the President's ability to devote attention to the matter." Status of the Acting Director, Office of Management and Budget, 1 Op. O.L.C. 287, 290 (1977). However, given the ambiguity of the Williams opinion, we have urged caution, even when the relevant department head has statutory authority to designate another official to serve in an acting capacity. See Acting Officers, 6 Op. O.L.C. 119, 121-22 (1982).

We recently revisited the vacancies question in relation to the United States Commission on Civil Rights. The Commission is headed by an eight-member committee that works on a part-time basis, while its day-to-day functioning is administered by a staff director. The statute creating the position of staff director vests the authority to appoint the staff director in the President, subject to the concurrence of a majority of the members of the Commission. In keeping with the Department of Justice's long-standing position, we concluded that, when confronted with a vacancy in the position of staff director, the President has constitutional authority to appoint an acting staff director, unless Congress had statutorily limited this authority. We stated:

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The President's take care authority to make temporary appointments rests in the twilight area where the President may act so long as Congress is silent, but may not act in the face of congressional prohibition. See Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 637 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring). Thus, the Vacancies Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 3345-3348, constitutes a restriction on the President's authority, as opposed to a source of power. If it applies to a given position, the Vacancies Act constitutes the sole means by which a temporary appointment to that position may be made.

Appointment of an Acting Staff Director of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, at 3 (Jan. 13, 1994) (publication forthcoming in 18 Op. O.L.C. (1994)).

We concluded that Congress had not limited the President's constitutional authority with respect to the appointment of an acting staff director of the Civil Rights Commission. The Vacancies Act does not apply to the position of staff director. [FN107] In addition, the statute creating the position is silent on the subject of temporarily filling a vacancy in that position. Consequently, we concluded that the President was free to exercise his constitutional authority to appoint an acting staff director. [FN108]

9. Other Issues of Combined, Collective, and Interbranch Authority and the Appointments Clause. The Appointments Clause prohibits Congress or the President from obscuring the lines of authority and responsibility within the federal government: the political branches cannot vest the power to perform "a significant governmental duty" of an executive, administrative, or adjudicative nature in any federal official who is not appointed in a manner consistent with the Clause. Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 141 (1976) (per curiam). The Clause, however, does not prohibit creative combinations of officers and authorities as long as a person or body with legitimate appointing authority under the Clause has appointed -- and therefore is accountable for -- all federal officials with such power. Cf. Weiss v. United States, 114 S. Ct. 752, 768 (1994) (Souter, J., concurring); Silver v. United States Postal Serv., 951 F.2d 1033, 1040-41 (9th Cir. 1991).

The Appointments Clause therefore does not forbid the exercise of authority by a decision-making body with a collective head that consists of principal officers and an inferior officer removable by them. See Silver, 951 F.2d at 1040-41. Nor is the Clause offended by the delegation of concurrent authority to a Senate-confirmed officer and her deputy when the latter is appointed by a head of department. See Department of Housing and Urban Development -- Delegations of Authority, 2 Op. O.L.C. 87, 89-91 (1978). In both cases all of the officials performing significant governmental duties are validly appointed officers.

The exercise of authority by a group of principal officers, some of whom serve at the President's pleasure while others are removable by the President only for cause, presents no Appointments Clause issue: once again, the Clause's procedures for appointing federal officials so that they may wield "significant authority" have been met. The Clause's strictures are likewise satisfied by arrangements in which a head of department, pursuant to a statute, designates a subordinate to sit in his or her stead on a commission or board: if the designation by the head were authorized by statute, then it would itself be an appointment in conformity with the Clause, and even if it were not, the designee would be acting for or on behalf of the head of department, whose actions, for constitutional purposes, are the head's.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Finally, the Appointments Clause does not invalidate commissions composed of members or appointees from more than one branch of the government. Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 412 (1989), upheld the constitutionality of the Sentencing Commission, which includes at least three federal judges and the Attorney General as an ex officio non-voting member, while Buckley concluded that a commission consisting of a mixture of presidential appointees and members of Congress selected by the Speaker and President pro tempore can validly exercise "powers . . . essentially of an investigative and informative nature," 424 U.S. at 137. Interbranch entities are subject to constitutional review on other grounds, including the anti- aggrandizement and general separation of powers principles, but their interbranch nature does not in itself raise any Appointments Clause question.

C. Removal Power Issues

1. The Executive's Removal Power. The first great constitutional debate in the First Congress concerned the power to remove officers of the United States. A wide range of views was expressed over the respective roles -- or lack thereof -- of the President and Congress in removal matters, [FN109] but ultimately, as the Supreme Court has interpreted the "Decision of 1789," Congress rejected a legislative role in removal in favor of recognizing plenary presidential power over officers appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. See Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 723-24 (1986); see also Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 111-44 (1926) (discussing debates and subsequent acquiescence in the legislative decision).

The nineteenth-century Justices interpreted the First Congress's actions as illustrative of a more general principle that "the power of removal [is] incident to the power of appointment." Ex parte Hennen, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 230, 259 (1839). Thus, it was determined that inferior officers appointed by a department head were not removable by the President (absent statutory authorization to do so) but by the secretary who appointed them and that a new appointment by the proper officer amounted to a removal of the previous incumbent by operation of law. Id. at 260-61; accord The President and Accounting Offices, 1 Op. Att'y Gen. 624 (1823). In United States v. Perkins, 116 U.S. 483 (1886), the Court held that, "when Congress, by law, vests the appointment of inferior officers in the heads of departments, it may limit and restrict the power of removal as it deems best for the public interest." Id. at 485. Although the Court did not address any questions about presidential removal powers, its reasoning about Congress's authority to limit department heads' removal power could logically be applied to the President with respect to inferior officers whose appointment is vested by statute in the President alone. [FN110] The power to suspend an officer, finally, was held to be "an incident of the power of removal." Burnap v. United States, 252 U.S. 512, 515 (1920) (relying primarily on nineteenth-century precedents). The Court's conclusions in Hennen, Perkins, and Burnap remain good law. [FN111]

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The seminal twentieth-century cases on removal, Myers and Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602 (1935), both addressed the power to remove officers appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Myers held unconstitutional a statute requiring Senate approval of the President's decision to remove certain postmasters. The Court based its holding in part on its interpretation of the "Decision of 1789" and on its understanding of the President's constitutional role. "Made responsible under the Constitution for the effective enforcement of the law, the President needs as an indispensable aid to meet it the disciplinary influence upon those who act under him of a reserve power of removal. . . . Each head of a department is and must be the President's alter ego in the matters of that department where the President is required by law to exercise authority." 272 U.S. at 132-33. An illimitable removal power, Myers concluded, is a necessary incident to the President's power and responsibility to take care that the laws are faithfully executed. Id. at 163-64. [FN112]

Any suggestion in Myers that the Supreme Court would invalidate all limitations on the President's power to remove officers appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate was firmly repudiated less than a decade later by Humphrey's Executor. The case concerned the President's power to remove a member of the Federal Trade Commission on the grounds of policy differences, despite the existence of a for-cause removal provision in the statute establishing the Commission. [FN113] The Court dismissed Myers as inapposite because a postmaster is "an executive officer restricted to the performance of executive functions," and "the necessary reach of the decision" only "goes far enough to include all purely executive officers [and] no farther." 295 U.S. at 627-28. [FN114] By contrast, the Court examined the functions of the FTC and concluded that it was "an administrative body" exercising "quasi-legislative or quasi-judicial powers," rather than an agency of the executive branch. Id. at 628. The Court reasoned that Congress possesses the authority in creating such a body "to require [it] to act in discharge of [its] duties independently of executive control." Id. at 629. [FN115] In Wiener v. United States, 357 U.S. 349 (1958), the Court extended the scope of Humphrey's Executor by inferring the existence of a for-cause limitation on the President's power to remove an officer with quasi-adjudicatory functions, even in the absence of an express statutory removal restriction. [FN116]

The rationale in Humphrey's Executor for upholding Congress's power "to forbid [the commissioners'] removal except for cause" was in fact identical to that for recognizing the President's plenary removal power over "purely executive officers." "[I]t is quite evident that one who holds his office only during the pleasure of another, cannot be depended upon to maintain an attitude of independence against the latter's will." 295 U.S. at 629. The constitutionality of congressional limitations on presidential removal authority thus depended under Humphrey's Executor on the legitimacy of a legislative decision to reduce or eliminate the President's control over a particular agency or officer, and that in turn depended on the nature of the functions performed by the agency or officer. [FN117]

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

In Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654 (1988), the Supreme Court upheld a provision of the Ethics in Government Act that forbids the removal of an independent counsel appointed under the Act except for cause. The Court explained that under "[t]he analysis contained in our removal cases," the constitutional question is whether Congress has "interfere[d] with the President's exercise of the 'executive power' and his constitutionally appointed duty to 'take care that the laws be faithfully executed."' Id. at 689-90. Morrison reasoned that the Attorney General retained adequate control over the independent counsel to safeguard "the President's ability to perform his constitutional duty." Id. at 691.

Morrison's broader significance is defined by the office in question. The removal restriction upheld in Morrison concerned an inferior officer with a sharply limited and highly unusual function, the investigation of particular allegations about the conduct of high-ranking executive branch officials. In that context, although it declined to decide "exactly what is encompassed within the term 'good cause,"' the Court held that "because the independent counsel may be terminated for 'good cause,' the Executive . . . retains ample authority to assure that the counsel is competently performing his or her statutory responsibilities in a manner that comports with the provisions of the Act." 487 U.S. at 692. The Morrison Court thus had no occasion to consider the validity of removal restrictions affecting principal officers, officers with broad statutory responsibilities, or officers involved in executive branch policy formulation. [FN118]

The Supreme Court's removal cases establish a spectrum of potential conclusions about specific removal limitations. At one end of the spectrum, restrictions on the President's power to remove officers with broad policy responsibilities in areas Congress does not or cannot shelter from presidential policy control clearly should be deemed unconstitutional. We think, for example, that a statute that attempts to limit the President's authority to discharge the Secretary of Defense would be plainly unconstitutional and that the courts would so hold. [FN119] As the Court stated in Morrison, Myers "was undoubtedly correct . . . in its broader suggestion that there are some 'purely executive' officials who must be removable by the President at will if he is to be able to accomplish his constitutional role." 487 U.S. at 690. [FN120] At the other end of the spectrum, we believe that for cause and fixed term limitations on the power to remove officers with adjudicatory duties affecting the rights of private individuals will continue to meet with consistent judicial approval: the contention that the essential role of the executive branch would be imperiled by giving a measure of independence to such officials is untenable under both precedent and principle.

Between these two extremes, the arguments are less clear, and it is imperative that the executive branch carefully examine removal limitations in pending legislation for their impact on the President's ability to exercise his or her conviction . . . that the powers conferred on Congress were the powers to be most carefully circumscribed" and the founders' recognition of the particular "'propensity"' of the legislative branch "'to invade the rights of the Executive."' INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 947 (1983) (quoting The Federalist No. 73, at 442 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961)). Executive branch lawyers thus have a constitutional obligation, one grounded not in parochial institutional interests but in our fundamental duty to safeguard the liberty of the people, to assert and maintain the legitimate powers and privileges of the President against inadvertent or intentional congressional intrusion. As Attorney General William Mitchell put it long ago:

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

> Since the organization of the Government, Presidents have felt bound to insist upon the maintenance of the Executive functions unimpa[i]red by legislative encroachment, just as the legislative branch has felt bound to resist interferences with its power by the Executive. To acquiesce in legislation having a tendency to encroach upon the executive authority results in establishing dangerous precedents.

Constitutionality of Proposed Legislation Affecting Tax Refunds, 37 Op. Att'y Gen. 56, 64 (1933). [FN6]

The Constitution, however, "by no means contemplates total separation of each of these three essential branches of Government." Buckley, 424 U.S. at 121. Instead, "'[w]hile the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government. It enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity."' Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 381 (1989) (quoting Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 635 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring)). The Constitution thus guards against "the accumulation of excessive authority in a single Branch" not by providing mutually exclusive lists of executive, legislative, and judicial powers, but by imposing on each of the three branches "a degree of overlapping responsibility, a duty of interdependence as well as independence." Id. at 381. [FN7] The constitutional boundaries between the powers of the branches must be determined "according to common sense and the inherent necessities of the governmental co-ordination." J.W. Hampton, Jr., & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394, 406 (1928).

Some general observations on the sources and methodology we employ in analyzing separation of powers questions are appropriate. We believe that the constitutional structure obligates the executive branch to adhere to settled judicial doctrine that limits executive and legislative power. While the Supreme Court's decisions interpreting the Constitution cannot simply be equated with the Constitution, we are mindful of the special role of the courts in the interpretation of the law of the Constitution. "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 177 (1803).

The Supreme Court's decisions interpreting the constitutional separation of powers among Congress, the President, and the courts recognize the founders' basic concern over the "encroaching nature" of power, as well as their specific belief that Congress is potentially the most dangerous branch. "It is this concern of encroachment and aggrandizement that has animated our separation-of-constitutional powers and carry out his or her duties. In situations in which Congress does not enact express removal limitations, we believe that the executive branch should resist any further application of the Wiener rationale, under which a court may infer the existence of a for-cause limit on presidential removal, except with respect to officers whose only functions are adjudicatory. [FN121] In reviewing pending legislation, furthermore, we should be aware that legislative silence about the President's removal power over administrative agency officers invites judicial policy choices that may be contrary to those the President or Congress intended.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

2. Congressional Removal Power. Unless it limits its own discretion by statute, Congress enjoys plenary authority to remove its own officers, as do the individual houses of Congress. [FN122] In addition, Congress has the general authority to legislate in ways that in fact terminate an executive branch officer or employee's tenure by defunding a position, for example, or by legislating mandatory retirement rules that apply to incumbents. [FN123] The executive branch, however, has long maintained that the Constitution does not permit this legislative authority to be deployed abusively as a de facto removal power. See Civil Service Retirement Act -- Postmasters -- Automatic Separation from the Service, 35 Op. Att'y Gen. 309, 312-15 (1927) (deeming mandatory retirement statute constitutional because it could not fairly be viewed as an encroachment on the President's removal power). The Supreme Court's decisions confirm the executive position. In Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926), the Court at one point portrayed the issue before it in terms of congressional aggrandizement, id. at 161, and modern decisions have redescribed the enduring rationale of Myers in anti-aggrandizement terms. See Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 686 (1988) ("the essence of the decision in Myers was the judgment that the Constitution prevents Congress from 'draw[ing] to itself . . . the power to remove"'); Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 724-26 (1986). Legislation that can properly be described as exercising the power of removal is unconstitutional, therefore, because it amounts to an attempt on Congress's part "to gain a role in the removal of executive officials other than its established powers of impeachment and conviction." Morrison, 487 U.S. at 686. [FN124] We think, for example, that "ripper" legislation that ostensibly abolished an office while simultaneously proceeding to recreate it would be a transparent, and unconstitutional, attempt to remove the officer in question and therefore would violate the anti-aggrandizement principle. See Constitutionality of Proposed Legislation Requiring Renomination and Reconfirmation of Executive Branch Officers Upon the Expiration of a Presidential Term, 11 Op. O.L.C. 25, 26 (1987).

The executive branch also has resisted attempts by the Senate to "reconsider" the nomination of an officer to whose appointment that body has already given its advice and consent once the President has taken steps to complete the appointment. In 1931, for example, President Hoover declined to return to the Senate resolutions notifying him that it had confirmed three nominees to the Federal Power Commission. The President explained that "the return of the documents by me and reconsideration by the Senate would be ineffective to disturb the appointees in their offices. I cannot admit the power in the Senate to encroach upon Executive functions by removal of a duly appointed executive officer under the guise of reconsideration of his nomination." Message to Senate, January 10, 1931, quoted in United States v. Smith, 286 U.S. 6, 28 n.3 (1932); see also United States v. Smith, 286 U.S. 6, 37-48 (1932) (discussing historical practice). Such senatorial action is both an unconstitutional attempt to remove the officer and a violation of the anti-aggrandizement principle, in that it is a legislative attempt to exercise power after the constitutionally prescribed role of the legislative body has been completed. [FN125]

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

D. Issues Involving the Boundaries of the Legislative Sphere

The Supreme Court decisions articulating the Court's anti- aggrandizement principle make it plain that Congress's formal authority is limited to the enactment of legislation and activities in aid of the legislative process such as investigation and oversight. The Gramm-Rudman Act's vesting in a congressional agent of the power to exercise policy-making control over the post-enactment decisions of executive officials is the paradigmatic example of congressional action in violation of this limitation. See Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714 (1986) (invalidating the relevant provision of the Act). Respect for Congress's legitimate and broad authority to legislate is consistent with our duty as officials of the executive branch to identify instances in which Congress transgresses the boundaries of its constitutional sphere of operations.

1. The Paradox of the Congressional Agencies. From reading the bare text of the Constitution, one might not expect there to exist any formally separate entities within the legislative branch other than the two houses themselves. From an early date, however, Congress has created distinct agencies, under its special supervision, for various purposes. Some of these agencies, or the officers who head them, exercise authority that seems incompatible or at least difficult to reconcile with the Supreme Court's anti-aggrandizement decisions. Of special interest are the Smithsonian Institution (and its subordinate bureaus, such as the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts ("J.F.K. Center")), the Library of Congress, the General Accounting Office ("GAO") (headed by the Comptroller General), the Government Printing Office ("GPO"), and the Office of the Architect of the Capitol. [FN126] The head of each of these agencies exercises authority with respect to executive officials or private persons that could be seen as problematic under Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714 (1986), which held unconstitutional the Comptroller General's exercise of controlling authority over executive branch budgeting.

We believe that many of the powers currently exercised by the presently existing congressional agencies may be deemed constitutionally harmless. Most of the functions undertaken by the Library of Congress, the basic accounting tasks of the GAO, and all of the duties of the Architect of the Capitol can comfortably be described as in aid of the legislative process. See Springer v. Government of the Philippine Islands, 277 U.S. 189, 202 (1928). The activities undertaken by the Smithsonian and its bureaus also seem to fit under a broad construction of that concept, a construction that is supported by historical practice stretching far back into the antebellum Republic. Cf. Springer, 277 U.S. at 211 (Holmes, J., dissenting) ("Congress long ago established the Smithsonian Institution, to question which would be to lay hands on the Ark of the Covenant"). The GPO's involvement in executive branch printing is also supported by a substantial historical pedigree, see Joint Res. No. 25, 36th Cong., 1st Sess., 12 Stat. 117 (1860), but in the twentieth century the executive branch has repeatedly been compelled to resist congressional attempts to empower the GPO to exercise genuine discretion over executive decisions. [FN127] The review authority of the Librarian of Congress over the Copyright Arbitration Royalty Panel, see 17 U.S.C. §§ 801-803, is permissible because the Librarian's tenure is not protected by an explicit for-cause removal limitation, and we therefore infer that the President has at least the formal power to remove the Librarian at will. [FN128] We note that the historical lineage of, and long-standing acquiescence of the Presidents in, these legislative agencies and most of their activities are important to our conclusion that those activities are constitutionally permissible: we think it highly doubtful that Congress constitutionally could create new legislative agencies with operational powers, or afford existing agencies novel powers, with respect to executive officials or private persons.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Our conclusion about the limits on Congress's authority to create legislative branch agencies with powers reaching beyond the legislative branch is consistent with the decision in Hechinger v. Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority, 36 F.3d 97 (D.C. Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 934 (1995), where the court of appeals held unconstitutional Congress's response to the Supreme Court's decision in Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc., 501 U.S. 252 (1991). After MWAA struck down a congressionally constituted board with the power to review and reverse the decisions of the Airports Authority, Congress created a similar, congressionally controlled board of review with the power to delay, but not to control, the Authority's implementation of decisions. The court rejected the argument that the new board's powers were constitutional because of this distinction: the very purpose of this board was to bring congressional policy views to bear on the decisions of the Authority by enabling congressional agents to participate directly in the Authority's decision-making processes. Under the Supreme Court's rigorous understanding of the anti- aggrandizement principle, any such extension of legislative power beyond the legislative sphere is invalid. We therefore believe that Hechinger was correctly decided.

2. Reporting Requirements. Many statutes empower executive branch agencies to take certain actions only after a specified period following the provision of notice or of a report to Congress. The Department of Justice has long acknowledged the constitutionality of such report-and-wait provisions, see, e.g., Constitutionality of Proposed Legislation Affecting Tax Refunds, 37 Op. Att'y Gen. 56, 63 (1933) ("[n]o one would question the power of Congress to provide for delay in the execution of . . . an administrative order"), and the Supreme Court in INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983), "specifically recognized" report-and-wait requirements "as a constitutionally acceptable alternative to the legislative veto." Implementation of the Bid Protest Provisions of the Competition in Contracting Act, 8 Op. O.L.C. 236, 246 (1984); see Chadha, 462 U.S. at 935 n.9, 955 n.19. While individual instances of congressional investigation and oversight may be objectionable on policy grounds, and in certain situations may involve information with respect to which the President is constitutionally entitled to assert executive privilege, the conduct of investigation into, and oversight concerning, executive actions is generally well within the power of Congress. See Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 137-38 (1976) (per curiam). [FN129] Report-and-wait provisions generally are constitutional means of assisting Congress in carrying out these legitimate activities. [FN130]

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Simple reporting requirements, which again are sometimes objectionable on policy grounds, are clearly constitutional as a general matter. "Congress may at all times call on [the heads of executive departments] for information or explanation in matters of official duty." Office and Duties of Attorney General, 6 Op. Att'y Gen. 326, 344 (1854); see Chadha, 462 U.S. at 955 n.19; see also Duties of the Attorney General, 1 Op. Att'y Gen. 335, 336 (1820) (Congress could by legislation require Attorney General to prepare report on claims against the United States). In the past, this Office has made constitutional objections to so-called "concurrent" reporting provisions that require an executive agency to submit a given report simultaneously to the President and Congress. See Constitutionality of Statute Requiring Executive Agency to Report Directly to Congress, 6 Op. O.L.C. 632 (1982); Inspector General Legislation, 1 Op. O.L.C. 16, 17 (1977). The argument is that such provisions interrupt the lines of responsibility within the executive branch and interfere with a presidential prerogative to control the presentation of the executive branch's views to Congress. On the other hand, advocates of such provisions might argue that a concurrent reporting provision does not, as a formal matter, enlarge congressional powers at the expense of the executive, because the power to require information is well within Congress's legitimate legislative authority.

We think that concurrent reporting requirements are best analyzed under the general separation of powers principle. That principle first requires an inquiry into "the extent to which" a given reporting provision "prevents the Executive Branch from accomplishing its constitutionally assigned functions." Nixon v. Administrator of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 443 (1977) (citation omitted). Many conceivable concurrent reporting requirements, particularly ones touching on the President's responsibility for the conduct of foreign affairs and for national defense, would have a serious negative impact on the President's performance of his "constitutionally assigned functions." A statutory requirement that the Secretary of State report simultaneously to the President and Congress on the status of United States relations with a given foreign power, for instance, would fall within that description. [FN131] Similarly, legislation that attempted to impose concurrent reporting requirements across a broad spectrum of executive branch activities might well constitute so serious an interference with the President's fulfillment of his obligations under the Take Care Clause, U.S. Const. art. II, § 3, that it should be deemed invalid. The courts, however, might uphold the validity of a concurrent reporting requirement imposed for a legitimate congressional purpose on a specific agency with limited, domestic, and purely statutory duties.

As a practical political matter, concurrent reporting requirements clearly weaken the President's control over the executive branch and by doing so increase congressional leverage on the President and other officials of the executive branch. By doing so they impair the Constitution's "'great principle of unity and responsibility in the Executive department."' Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 131 (1926) (quoting James Madison). For this reason, we think the presumption should be that the executive branch will object to any concurrent reporting provision in proposed legislation.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

3. Congressional Agents in Non-Legislative Contexts. The Supreme Court's decisions make it clear that legislation placing members or agents of Congress on a board or commission that is outside the legislative branch is immediately suspect. The constitutional "location" of a given entity is not a matter of congressional fiat; Congress cannot define away an anti-aggrandizement problem simply by declaring that a given entity is within or without the legislative branch. [FN132] The question is, we think, a matter of the relationship between the entity's functions and the formal powers Congress can assert over and through it. In Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc., 501 U.S. 252 (1991), for example, the board at issue was the board of review of an entity, the Airports Authority, created by a compact between Virginia and the District of Columbia, and the review board members were appointed by the Authority. However, by federal legislative mandate, the Authority was compelled to appoint a review board made up exclusively of members of Congress selected from a pool determined by Congress. See id. at 268-69. Congress's agents on the board thus were able to exercise ultimate control over important operational decisions of the Authority, in violation of the Constitution's constraints on the exercise of congressional power. Id. at 275-77.

The Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit recently came to a similar conclusion in FEC v. NRA Political Victory Fund, 6 F.3d 821 (D.C. Cir. 1993), cert. dismissed, 115 S. Ct. 537 (1994), in striking down part of a section of the Federal Election Campaign Act, 2 U.S.C. § 437c(a)(1). That section provides that the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House or their designees are to be members of the Federal Election Commission "ex officio and without the right to vote." The Secretary and the Clerk are self-evidently agents of Congress, but the Commission argued that their presence was constitutionally harmless because their only formal role was informational and advisory. The court rejected the argument, reasoning that the very point of placing the Secretary and Clerk on the Commission was to influence the Commission's actions and that > Congress must limit the exercise of its influence, whether in the form of advice or not, to its legislative role. . . . What the Constitution prohibits Congress from doing, and what Congress does in this case, is to place its agents "beyond the legislative sphere" by naming them to membership on an entity with executive powers.

6 F.3d at 827 (citation omitted). We believe that NRA Political Victory Fund was correctly decided: however modest the ability of Congress's agents to influence the Commission's actions may have been formally, the statute placed the agents intended to communicate that influence within the very heart of an agency charged with enforcing federal law. The anti-aggrandizement principle properly can be interpreted to forbid even modest attempts by Congress to intervene in the enforcement of the laws once "its participation [in the passage of legislation] ends." Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 733 (1986). E. The

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

General Separation of Powers Principle

The proper application of the general separation of powers principle is highly specific to context, and thus few generalizations are possible. For example, in the past we have expressed concern that legislation delegating federal authority to state or local officials or private persons could undermine the executive branch's ability to carry out its functions and thereby violate the principle. See, e.g., Constitutional Limitations on "Contracting Out" Department of Justice Functions under OMB Circular A-76, 14 Op. O.L.C. 106, 114-15 (1990) (preliminary print). [FN133] We continue to believe that such delegations can raise questions with respect to the constitutional separation of powers, [FN134] and that in certain circumstances, a congressional delegation of authority to non-federal officials or to private parties might have a significant impact on the executive branch's ability to fulfill its constitutional functions. If so, the delegation might be invalid under the general separation of powers principle. [FN135]

F. Statutory Construction

Issues involving the constitutional separation of powers between the President and Congress most often arise in the context of a statute that raises or proposed legislation that would raise questions under one of the three headings we have identified. For this reason, it is worth recalling the "cardinal principle" of statutory interpretation that statutes be construed to avoid raising serious constitutional questions, where such a construction is reasonably available. See, e.g., Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22 (1932).

An important subset of these questions relate to statutes that do not plainly state that they apply to the President. The Supreme Court and this office have adhered to a plain statement rule: statutes that do not expressly apply to the President must be construed as not applying to the President, where applying the statute to the President would pose a significant question regarding the President's constitutional prerogatives. See, e.g., Franklin v. Massachusetts, 505 U.S. 788, 800-01 (1992); Memorandum for Jack Quinn, Counsel to the President, from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, re: Application of 28 U.S.C. § 458 to Presidential Appointments of Federal Judges (Dec. 18, 1995). This principle has two sources in the constitutional context within which the Congress drafts statutes. The first is the interpretive canon of avoiding serious constitutional questions. See, e.g., Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Bldg. & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575 (1988).

The second source is the constitutional principle of separation of powers. The purpose of the constitutional separation of powers is to prevent an excessive accumulation of authority in any of the three branches of the federal government. The plain statement safeguards "the 'usual constitutional balance"' of power. Will v. Michigan Dept. of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 65 (1989) (quoting Atascadero State Hosp. v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 242 (1985)); see Franklin, 505 U.S. at 800-01. Given the central position that the separation of powers doctrine occupies in the Constitution's design, this rule also serves to "assure[] that the legislature has in fact faced, and intended to bring into issue, the critical matters" of the balance of power between the three branches of the federal government. See United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 349 (1971).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

This plain statement rule has been applied frequently by the Supreme Court as well as this office with respect to statutes that might otherwise be susceptible of an application that would affect the President's constitutional prerogatives, were one to ignore the constitutional context. For instance, in Franklin the Court was called upon to determine whether the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C § 701, authorized "abuse of discretion" review of final actions by the President. The APA authorizes review of final actions by an "agency," which it defines as "each authority of the Government of the United States." 5 U.S.C. § 701(b)(1). From this definition, the APA expressly exempts Congress, the courts, the territories, and the DC government.

Even though the statute defined agency in a way that could include the President and did not list the President among the express exceptions to the APA, Justice O'Connor wrote for the Court, > [t]he President is not explicitly excluded from the APA's purview, but he is not explicitly included, either. Out of respect for the separation of powers and the unique constitutional position of the President, we find that textual silence is not enough to subject the President to the provisions of the APA. We would require an express statement by Congress before assuming it intended the President's performance of his statutory duties to be reviewed for abuse of discretion.

505 U.S. at 800-01 (emphasis added). To amplify, she continued, "[a]s the APA does not expressly allow review of the President's actions, we must presume that his actions are not subject to its requirements." Id. at 801. Numerous other Supreme Court decisions employ this approach. See, e.g., Public Citizen v. United States Dep't of Justice, 491 U.S. 440 (1989) (holding that the Federal Advisory Committee Act does not apply to committees that advise the President on the discharge of his exclusive constitutional functions because doing so would raise serious separation of powers questions); Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, Inc., 113 S. Ct. 2549 (1993) (refusing to give the Refugee Act extraterritorial application because doing so could conflict with the President's constitutionally committed authority); Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731 (1982) (President was immune from suit because Congress had failed to create a cause of action expressly against the President of the United States).

In addition to the Supreme Court precedents, this office has frequently applied the plain statement rule in the context of the separation of powers between the executive and legislative branches. For example, we were asked whether the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"), 29 U.S.C. §§ 621-634, prohibits the President from considering the age of judicial candidates when determining whom to nominate for federal judgeships. See Judges -- Appointment -- Age Factor, 3 Op. O.L.C. 388 (1979). We concluded that the ADEA should not be read to apply to the presidential appointment of federal judges:

> The power to appoint Federal judges, who hold office on good behavior, is by tradition and design one of the most significant powers given by the Constitution to the President. It provides one of the few administrative mechanisms through which the President can exert a long-term influence over the development and administration of law in the courts. The President's present power to exert that influence to the fullest by preferring candidates for appointment who are likely to have long, rather than short, careers on the bench

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

is therefore a matter of constitutional significance. Whether Congress could deny the President that power by requiring him to disregard utterly the age of candidates for appointment has never been considered by the courts, but because of the gravity of the constitutional questions it raises, we would be most reluctant to construe any statute as an attempt to regulate the President's choice in that way, absent a very clear indication in the [statute].
Id. at 389. [FN136]

III. Constitutional Requirements and Policy Concerns

The conclusion that a particular provision of proposed legislation probably would not be held unconstitutional by the courts is not equivalent to a determination that the legislation is constitutional per se. The judiciary is limited, properly, in its ability to enforce the Constitution, both by Article III's requirements of jurisdiction and justiciability and by the obligation to defer to the political branches in cases of doubt or where Congress or the President has special constitutional responsibility. [FN137] In such situations, the executive branch's regular obligation to ensure, to the full extent of its ability, that constitutional requirements are respected is heightened by the absence or reduced presence of the courts' ordinary guardianship of the Constitution's requirements. Furthermore, even where on any view the letter of the Constitution is satisfied, the Constitution's intention to separate the federal government's powers can appropriately be invoked as a sound reason for objecting to legislation that undermines or imperils that separation. The constitutional separation of powers, to make the point in a different way, is a political as well as a legal principle. [FN138]

The Constitution demands of the executive and legislative branches alike an "ethic of institutional responsibility" in defending their respective roles in the overall constitutional structure. [FN139] For example, legislation that attempts to structure the very details of executive decision making, or that imposes onerous and repetitive reporting requirements on executive agencies, is troubling from a separation of powers standpoint even if the individual statutes could not easily be described in themselves as unconstitutional. The overall effects of such micromanagement for the constitutional separation of powers obviously can be tremendous, and yet it is unlikely that judicial intervention can or would preserve the constitutional balance. The executive branch thus has the primary responsibility for presenting, in as forceful and principled a way as possible, the separation of powers problems with all legislation that has such effects. In carrying out this Office's various roles in the executive's review of existing and proposed legislation, we intend to bear this obligation in mind, and we are pleased to be of assistance to other components of the executive branch in their efforts to analyze, from a policy standpoint as well as from a strictly legal basis, the impact of legislation on the constitutional separation of congressional and presidential powers.

Walter Dellinger
Assistant Attorney General

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

FN1 This memorandum supersedes a 1989 memorandum that the Office of Legal Counsel provided to the General Counsels' Consultative Group. See Common Legislative Encroachments on Executive Branch Constitutional Authority, 13 Op. O.L.C. 299 (1989) (preliminary print). While we agree with many of the conclusions of that document, we have determined that subsequent decisions by the Supreme Court and certain differences in approach to the issues make it appropriate to revisit and update the Office's general advice on separation of powers issues.

FN2 Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 722 (1986).

FN3 MWAA, 501 U.S. at 272.

FN4 Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 693 (1988). James Madison described the "policy" lying behind "distributions of power" -- "the constant aim is to divide and arrange the several offices in such a manner as that each may be a check on the other." The Federalist No. 51, at 349 (James Madison) (Jacob E. Cooke ed., 1961), quoted in Buckley, 424 U.S. at 122-23.

FN5 See INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 951 (1983) (the Constitution's separation of powers is designed to counteract the "hydraulic pressure inherent within each of the separate Branches to exceed the outer limits of its power").

FN6 The Attorney General noted that "[t]he first presidential defense of the integrity of the powers of the Executive under the Constitution was made by Washington himself" and that "[f]rom that day to this the Presidents, with very few exceptions, have felt the necessity for refusing to overlook encroachments upon the executive power." 37 Op. Att'y Gen. at 64.

FN7 The Supreme Court repeatedly has rejected the "'archaic view of the separation of powers as requiring three airtight departments of government."' Nixon v. Administrator of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 443 (1977) (citation omitted). In doing so, the Court has noted that such a view is "inconsistent with the origins of th[e] doctrine" as well as with "the contemporary realities of our political system." Id. at 441; see also id. at 442 & n.5 (noting that James Madison in The Federalist No. 47 and Justice Joseph Story in his famous treatise on the Constitution rejected the claim that the Constitution requires an absolute separation).

FN8 We shall refer to this theme in the Supreme Court's separation of powers jurisprudence as "the anti-aggrandizement principle."

FN9 We refer to this line of reasoning as "the general separation of powers principle."

FN10 Indeed, Article II specifically requires the President to take an oath or affirmation "to preserve, protect and defend the Constitution." U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 8.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

powers jurisprudence and aroused our vigilance against the 'hydraulic pressure inherent within each of the separate Branches to exceed the outer limits of its power."' Mistretta, 488 U.S. at 382 (citation omitted). The Court's decisions have employed three distinct principles in resolving separation of powers disputes. First, where "[e]xplicit and unambiguous provisions of the Constitution prescribe and define . . . just how [governmental] powers are to be exercised," Chadha, 462 U.S. at 945, the constitutional procedures must be followed with precision. Second, where the effect of legislation is to vest Congress itself, its members, or its agents with "'either executive power or judicial power,"' the statute is unconstitutional. MWAA, 501 U.S. at 274 (citation omitted). [FN8] Finally, legislation that affects the functioning of one of the other branches may be unconstitutional if it prevents the affected branch "from accomplishing its constitutionally assigned functions." Nixon v. Administrator of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 443 (1977) (legislation affecting the executive branch); accord CFTC v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833, 851, 856-57 (1986) (legislation affecting the judiciary). [FN9]

Our analyses are guided and, where there is a decision of the Court on point, governed by the Supreme Court's decisions on separation of powers. At the same time, the executive branch has an independent constitutional obligation to interpret and apply the Constitution. [FN10] That obligation is of particular importance in the area of separation of powers, where the issues often do not give rise to cases or controversies that can be resolved by the courts. This is due in part to the limits of jurisdiction and justiciability that Article III places on the courts. In addition there may be legislation that violates one of the three principles outlined above and yet is unlikely to reach the courts in a form or context in which the judiciary will be able to identify or remedy the constitutional problem. [FN11] The Attorneys General and this Office have a long tradition of carrying out this constitutional responsibility, one that dates back to Attorney General Edmund Randolph's 1791 opinions on the constitutionality of a national bank. See The Constitutionality of the Bank Bill: The Attorney General's First Constitutional Law Opinions (publication forthcoming in 18 Op. O.L.C. (1994)) (reprinting, with commentary, the bank opinions). [FN12] We believe therefore that it is important in addressing separation of powers matters to give careful consideration to the views of our predecessors and to what seems to us to be the import of the Constitution's text, history, and structure. [FN13]

To be sure, respect for the legislative branch of the government requires a degree of deference to legislative judgments. [FN14] However, it is also the President's "duty to pass the executive authority on to his successor, unimpaired by the adoption of dangerous precedents." Proposed Legislation Affecting Tax Refunds, 37 Op. Att'y Gen. at 65. [FN15] Our constitutional analyses are informed by both of these concerns. [FN16]

A. Express Procedures: The Bicameralism and Presentment Requirements and the Appointments Clause

While the expression "separation of powers" does not appear in the

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

Constitution, the Constitution does require both separation and interdependence on some matters by specifying, expressly and precisely, the procedures that must be followed. Where the constitutional text is unequivocal as to the manner in which the branches are to relate, any attempt to vary from the text's prescriptions is invalid. [FN17] The Court has identified two such express procedures relating to the separation of executive and legislative powers: the bicameralism and presentment requirements for legislation, and the Appointments Clause.

Congress's broad authority to take action that has "the purpose and effect of altering the legal rights, duties, and relations of persons . . . . outside the Legislative Branch," INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 952 (1983), is limited by the procedural requirements of Article I. With a few express exceptions found or rooted in the constitutional text, Metropolitan Washington Airports Auth. v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc., 501 U.S. 252, 276 n.21 (1991), [FN18] Article I requires that Congress take such action "in accord with a single, finely wrought and exhaustively considered, procedure" -- bicameral passage and presentation to the President followed by presidential signature or bicameral repassage by a two-thirds majority. Chadha, 462 U.S. at 951; see U.S. Const. art. I, §§ 1, 7. The classic and often-repeated violation of this express textual requirement is the "legislative veto" mechanism invalidated in Chadha. [FN19]

The Supreme Court has applied a similar analysis to the Appointments Clause of Article II, Section 2. In Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 138-39 (1976) (per curiam), the Court concluded that "Congress' power under [the Necessary and Proper] Clause is inevitably bounded by the express language of Art. II, § 2, cl. 2," and that consequently Congress cannot provide for the appointment of "'Officers of the United States,"' except through a procedure that "comports with" the Appointments Clause. [FN20] Pursuant to the language of the Clause, principal officers must be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, while Congress is limited in providing alternative means for the appointment of inferior officers to the "possible repositories for the appointment power." Freytag v. Commissioner, 501 U.S. 868, 884 (1991). (Those repositories are "the President alone, . . . the Courts of Law, or . . . the Heads of Departments." U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2.)

The rules of law derived from the requirements of bicameralism/presentment and the Appointments Clause have the clear and powerful effect of invalidating any inconsistent congressional action. Congress may not employ any mode of exercising legislative power other than through bicameralism and presentment. The Appointments Clause's list of those who may appoint officers is exclusive, and Congress cannot authorize anyone else to appoint officers of the United States. The major difficulty in applying the bicameralism/presentment and Appointments Clause requirements lies in determining whether a particular action falls within the scope of the prescribed procedures. In section II of this memorandum, we discuss questions that have arisen concerning the scope of both requirements.

B. The Anti-Aggrandizement Principle

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

Although the founders were concerned about the concentration of governmental power in any of the three branches, their primary fears were directed toward congressional self-aggrandizement, [FN21] and the Supreme Court's decisions call for careful scrutiny of legislation that has the purpose or effect of extending Congress's authority beyond the legislative process. Just as the textual requirement of bicameralism and presentment limits the means by which Congress may legislate, so the anti-aggrandizement principle limits the means by which Congress may influence the execution (or adjudication) of the laws. [FN22] The Constitution affords Congress great latitude in making policy choices through the process of bicameral passage and presentment. However, "once Congress makes its choice in enacting legislation, its participation ends," and "Congress can thereafter control the execution of its enactment only indirectly -- by passing new legislation." Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 733- 34 (1986). While Congress may inform itself of how legislation is being implemented through the ordinary means of legislative oversight and investigation, the anti-aggrandizement principle forbids Congress, directly or through an agent subject to removal by Congress, [FN23] from intervening in the decision making necessary to execute the law. See id. at 733-34; FEC v. NRA Political Victory Fund, 6 F.3d 821, 827 (D.C. Cir. 1993), cert. dismissed, 115 S. Ct. 537 (1994). [FN24]

In Bowsher, the Court held that a provision of the Gramm-Rudman Deficit Reduction Act was unconstitutional because it vested in the Comptroller General (an official "removable only at the initiative of Congress," 478 U.S. at 728) the power to make post-enactment decisions about how the executive branch should implement budget reduction legislation. The Court rejected the argument that self-aggrandizing legislation can be upheld when it is as a practical matter harmless or de minimis and dismissed as beside the point Justice White's vigorous argument that "[r]ealistic consideration of the nature of the Comptroller General's relation to Congress . . . reveals that the threat to separation of powers . . . is wholly chimerical." 478 U.S. at 774 (White, J., dissenting); see also Metropolitan Washington Airports Auth. v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc., 501 U.S. 252, 269 n.15 (1991) ("the likelihood that Congress" actually would exercise its authority to remove the members of the review board under consideration in MWAA was "irrelevant for separation-of-powers purposes"). In contrast, the Court upheld the validity of the laws challenged in Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654 (1988) (independent counsel provisions of Ethics in Government Act of 1978), and CFTC v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833 (1986) (regulations implementing section of the Commodity Exchange Act), in part because the Court saw no reason to view those laws as examples of legislative aggrandizement. [FN25]

Like the express requirements of the bicameralism/presentment process and the Appointments Clause, the anti-aggrandizement principle puts a powerful constraint on congressional power: legislative action that falls within the scope of the principle is unconstitutional. [FN26] The complementary limit on the principle is that, as the Court understands it, the principle applies only to congressional action that amounts to formal or direct self-aggrandizement -- for example, the placement of congressional agents on a body with prosecutorial or law enforcement powers -- no matter how limited the power thereby seized by Congress. See NRA Political Victory Fund, 6 F.3d at 826-27. The Court reviews legislation that arguably increases Congress's power indirectly by weakening the executive politically under the less stringent general separation of powers principle. See Morrison, 487 U.S. at 694. A significant difficulty in applying the anti-aggrandizement principle arises from the uncertain line between minor (but unconstitutional) aggrandizements and (constitutional) exercises of Congress's broad investigative and oversight powers. [FN27] In section II, we discuss some of the questions that have arisen.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

C. The General Separation of Powers Principle

Legislation that affects the constitutional separation of powers but is consistent with the requirements of bicameralism/presentment, the Appointments Clause, and the anti-aggrandizement principle is subject to less searching scrutiny. [FN28] While some older judicial opinions used language suggesting that any overlap between the powers wielded by the different branches is illegitimate, [FN29] the modern Supreme Court interprets the general principle of separation of powers in light of Madison's assertion that the separation necessary to free government is violated only "'where the whole power of one department is exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of another department."' Nixon v. Administrator of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 442 n.5 (1977) (quoting The Federalist No. 47, at 325-26 (James Madison) (Jacob E. Cooke ed., 1961) (emphasis in original)). [FN30] Therefore, "in determining whether [an] Act disrupts the proper balance between the coordinate branches, the proper inquiry focuses on the extent to which it prevents the Executive Branch from accomplishing its constitutionally assigned functions." Id. at 443. Cf. CFTC v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833, 856-57 (1986) ("the separation of powers question presented in this litigation is whether Congress impermissibly undermined . . . the role of the Judicial Branch"). An affirmative answer to the question of whether Congress has prevented the executive or judiciary from accomplishing its functions, furthermore, would not lead inexorably to the judicial invalidation of the statute: in that case, the Court has stated, it would proceed to "determine whether that impact is justified by an overriding need to promote objectives within the constitutional authority of Congress." Administrator of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. at 443. [FN31]

The Court's current understanding of the general principle of separation of powers is illustrated by Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654 (1988). [FN32] In Morrison, the Court concluded that the restrictions in the independent counsel statute on the executive's supervisory and removal powers did not violate the principle. While the Court acknowledged that the statute rendered the independent counsel "free from Executive supervision to a greater extent than other federal prosecutors," it was unpersuaded that the limitations placed on that supervision meant that the President would not be able "to perform his constitutionally assigned duties." Id. at 696. [FN33] In light of the narrow range of the independent counsel's jurisdiction, her essential insulation from any significant policy-making role, and the well-established principle that Congress can limit the removal authority of a head of department when granting that officer the power to appoint subordinates, the Court concluded that the independent counsel statute did not fundamentally undermine the executive's constitutional authority.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The Supreme Court's basic formulation of the general principle of separation of powers is consistent with the approach taken by most Attorneys General in the past, and it accords with what we find to be the most persuasive scholarship on the original understanding and early practice of the separation of powers under the United States Constitution. [FN34] However, given the very emphasis the general principle places on evaluating constitutional questions in light of the overall structure and functioning of the federal government, the principle's application to specific questions is unavoidably difficult, and the answers we or the courts reach ordinarily should be viewed as quite specific to context. [FN35] Furthermore, although the general principle marks the boundary of the law of separation of powers, it is inappropriate for the executive to regard this as defining the outer limit of proper separation of powers policy objections to legislation. [FN36] The Constitution's very structure suggests the importance of maintaining the hallmarks of "executive administration essential to effective action" [FN37] as well as the accountability to the public that stems from vesting ultimate authority in a single, politically responsible officer. [FN38] Several quite common types of legislation threaten the structural values protected by the general separation of powers principle even if the courts are unlikely to invalidate them. Examples of such legislation may include burdensome reporting requirements, attempts to dictate the processes of executive deliberation, and legislation that has the purpose or would have the effect of "micromanaging" executive action. Executive branch agencies should be careful to object to any legislation that unduly reduces the accountability of officials or agencies to the President, or that unnecessarily interferes with the flexibility and efficiency of executive decision making and action. Such legislation undercuts the constitutional purpose of creating an energetic and responsible executive branch.

II. Common Separation of Powers Issues

A. Bicameralism/Presentment Questions

The Supreme Court's holding in INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983), was emphatic: Congress can exercise "the legislative power of the Federal Government" only "in accord with a single, finely wrought and exhaustively considered, procedure" -- passage by both houses and presentment to the President. [FN39] Id. at 951. Applying that rule, the Court struck down a statutory mechanism in the Immigration and Nationality Act by which a single house of Congress could override decisions of the Attorney General. The effect of the Court's decision was to invalidate the similar "legislative veto" provisions found in many other statutes. [FN40] In addition to the classic legislative veto mechanism invalidated by Chadha, we think that the requirement of bicameralism and presentment is infringed whenever a single house, committee, or agent of Congress attempts to direct the execution of the laws, to determine the "final disposition of the rights of persons outside the legislative branch" or to promulgate rules or standards intended to bind the actions of executive or administrative officials that have not been approved by both houses and presented to the President. See, e.g., Lear Siegler, Inc., Energy Prods. Div. v. Lehman, 842 F.2d 1102, 1108 (9th Cir. 1988), modified as to attorney fees, 893 F.2d 205 (1989) (en banc); [FN41] cf. Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 396 (1989) (distinguishing Sentencing Guidelines from political policy making on the grounds that "they do not bind or regulate the primary conduct of the public").

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

For many decades, the congressional Joint Committee on Printing ("JCP") has attempted to exercise the legislative authority to promulgate rules and procedures binding on the executive branch's activities relating to printing, publication, and (more recently) data storage. In 1920, President Wilson vetoed an appropriations bill because it purported to confer on the JCP the power to promulgate regulations governing printing by executive officials or agencies: Congress has no power, he explained, to "endo[w] a committee of either House or a joint committee of both Houses with power to prescribe 'regulations' under which executive departments may operate." Veto Message on Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation Bill, H.R. No. 764, 66th Cong., 2d Sess. 2 (1920), reprinted in 59 Cong. Rec. 7,026 (1920); see Constitutionality of Proposed Legislation Affecting Tax Refunds, 37 Op. Att'y Gen. 56, 62-63, 65 (1933) (quoting and endorsing President Wilson's reasoning). In 1984, we concluded that legislation granting the JCP authority to promulgate regulations that "would require executive departments to submit annual plans outlining their intended activities and to seek advance approval of all projected goals, policies, strategies, purchases, publications, and means of distribution" with respect to printing, word processing, and data storage and retrieval was unconstitutional. Constitutionality of Proposed Regulations of Joint Committee on Printing, 8 Op. O.L.C. 42, 42 (1984). The proposed regulations would have established general rules binding the conduct of executive officials without those rules being approved by both houses of Congress and presented to the President, in plain violation of Article I's procedural requirements. [FN42] We have also advised that the statutory provision authorizing the JCP "unilaterally to create exceptions to the [statutory] rule that all printing must be accomplished through the GPO [Government Printing Office]" has no lawful force under Chadha. Id. at 51 & n.14; see also Proposed Legislation Affecting Tax Refunds, 37 Op. Att'y Gen. at 58-60 (bill subjecting Treasury Department decisions on tax refunds to review and disallowance by congressional joint committee would be unconstitutional).

The requirement of bicameralism and presentment also can be violated in more convoluted ways. Section 431 of the General Education Provisions Act, for example, subjected final regulations of the Department of Education to a forty-five day report-and-wait provision [FN43] and provided that the final regulation would not become effective if Congress "by concurrent resolution, find[s] that the final regulation is inconsistent with the Act . . . and disapprove[s] such final regulation." 20 U.S.C. § 1232(d) (Supp. IV 1980). Concurrent resolutions are not legislation within the meaning of the Constitution, see U.S. Const. art. I, § 7, cl. 3, because they are not presented to the President. Accordingly, Attorney General Civiletti advised the Secretary of Education that the subjection of the Education Department's delegated lawmaking authority to congressional control and revision by means other than those required by Article

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

affirmation "to preserve, protect and defend the Constitution." U.S. Const. art. II, § 1, cl. 8.

FN11 An example of such legislation would be an enactment that does not, when viewed in isolation, violate the constitutional principles we have identified, but as to which constitutional difficulties arise when the statute is examined in conjunction with other similar enactments. Because, absent a refusal by the executive to enforce any of these cumulative enactments, the courts may not have an opportunity to review the statute in its full context, it is incumbent upon the executive to object to such legislation before it becomes law. Burdensome reporting requirements may illustrate this problem. Even if no single reporting requirement violates the general separation of powers principle, see Administrator of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. at 443, the cumulative effect of many such requirements might prevent the executive from acting with the dispatch and efficiency that the Constitution intends and that, indeed, Congress expects.

FN12 Persuaded by Secretary of the Treasury Hamilton's opinion defending the validity of the legislation, President Washington declined to accept the Attorney General's arguments that the bank bill was unconstitutional and signed it into law. The Supreme Court upheld the President's conclusion that Congress could charter a national bank in M'Culloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819).

FN13 For an example of an opinion that is, in our view, an exemplary model of the approach this Office should take in interpreting the Constitution, see Article II, Section 2, Clause 3 -- Recess Appointments -- Compensation (5 U.S.C. § 5503), 3 Op. O.L.C. 314 (1979).

FN14 From the beginning of the Republic, the executive branch has interpreted the Constitution with a due regard for the constitutional views of Congress. See, e.g., Thomas Jefferson, The Constitutionality of the Bill for Establishing a National Bank (Feb. 15, 1791) (Opinion of the Secretary of State), in 5 Writings of Thomas Jefferson 284, 289 (Paul L. Ford ed., 1895) (arguing that the President should not veto a bill on constitutional grounds, "if the pro and the con hang so even as to balance his judgment," out of "a just respect for the wisdom of the legislature"). Respect for Congress also demands that the executive, like the judiciary, construe statutes so as to avoid constitutional problems. See, e.g., Appropriations Limitation for Rules Vetoed by Congress, 4B Op. O.L.C. 731, 732 n.3 (1980) ("It is our practice to interpret statutes in ways that avoid constitutional infirmities, whenever possible.").

FN15 Thus, for example, in declining to comply with a request from the House of Representatives that he deemed an intrusion on the treaty power, President Washington explained that "as it is essential to the due administration of the government, that the boundaries fixed by the [C]onstitution between the different departments should be preserved: A just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my Office . . . forbids a compl[i]ance with your request." Message to the House of Representatives (Mar. 30, 1796), reprinted in 35

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

FN54 See Appointments in the Department of Commerce and Labor, 29 Op. Att'y Gen. 116, 118-19, 122-23 (1911) (official authorized to perform all the duties of the Commissioner of Fisheries, who was appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, was an officer; scientists, technicians, and superintendent of mechanical plant in the Bureau of Standards were employees rather than officers); Second Deputy Comptroller of the Currency -- Appointment, 26 Op. Att'y Gen. 627, 628 (1908) ("The officer is distinguished from the employee in the greater importance, dignity, and independence of his position"; official authorized to exercise powers of the Comptroller of the Currency in the absence of the Comptroller was clearly an officer).

FN55 The status of certain officials traditionally appointed in modes identical to those designated by the Appointments Clause is somewhat anomalous. For instance, low-grade military officers have always been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate and understood to be "Officers of the United States" in the constitutional sense; in Weiss v. United States, 114 S. Ct. 752, 757 (1994), the Supreme Court recently indicated its agreement with that understanding. It is at least arguable, however, that the authority exercised by second lieutenants and ensigns is so limited and subordinate that their analogues in the civil sphere clearly would be employees. There are at least three possible explanations. (1) Congress may make anyone in public service an officer simply by requiring appointment in one of the modes designated by the Appointments Clause. The Clause, on this view, mandates officer status for officials with significant governmental authority but does not restrict the status to such officials. This apparently was the nineteenth-century view, see, e.g., United States v. Perkins, 116 U.S. 483, 484 (1886) (cadet engineer at the Naval Academy was an officer because "Congress has by express enactment vested the appointment of cadet-engineers in the Secretary of the Navy and when thus appointed they become officers and not employees"). While recognizing that Congress may make anyone in the public service an officer, Attorney General Kennedy rejected the argument that Congress evinces and effectuates such an intention merely by providing for the public servant to be appointed by a method that coincidentally conforms with the Appointments Clause. See Communications Satellite Corporation, 42 Op. Att'y Gen. 165, 167 (1962) ("it does not follow" from the Constitution that "every appointment authorized by law which is preceded by nomination and confirmation necessarily renders the appointee an officer"). (2) Certain officials are constitutional officers because in the early Republic their positions were of greater relative significance in the federal government than they are today. Cf. Buckley, 424 U.S. at 126 (postmasters first class and clerks of district courts are officers). (3) Even the lowest ranking military or naval officer is a potential commander of United States armed forces in combat -- and, indeed, is in theory a commander of large military or naval units by presidential direction or in the event of catastrophic casualties among his or her superiors.

FN56 In fact, as the Court pointed out, the chief judge of the Tax Court can assign special trial judges to render final decisions in certain types of cases, a power that the government conceded rendered them, in those circumstances,

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

"inferior officers who exercise independent authority." The Court rejected the argument that special trial judges could be deemed inferior officers for some purposes and employees for others. 501 U.S. at 882.

FN57 The text of the Appointments Clause implies that offices in the sense of the Clause must be established in the Constitution or by statute. See U.S. Const. art. II, § 2, cl. 2 (specifying certain officers and then referring to "all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law").

FN58 That an employee may not exercise independent discretion does not, of course, mean that his or her duties may not encompass responsibilities requiring the exercise of judgment and discretion under the ultimate control and supervision of an officer. In Steele v. United States (No. 2), 267 U.S. 505, 508 (1925), the Supreme Court noted that a "deputy marshal is not in the constitutional sense an officer of the United States," yet "is called upon to exercise great responsibility and discretion" in "the enforcement of the peace of the United States, as that is embraced in the enforcement of federal law." But deputy marshals act at the direction of "the United States marshal under whom they serve," id., who is an officer in the constitutional sense.

FN59 See Appointment and Removal of Inspectors of Customs, 4 Op. Att'y Gen. 162, 164 (1843) (Congress may not provide for the appointment of "any employe [e], coming fairly within the definition of an inferior officer of the government," except by a mode consistent with the Appointments Clause).

FN60 Buckley illustrates this last point. The FEC commissioners appointed by congressional officials were undoubtedly employees of the federal government but they could not constitutionally exercise the enforcement powers the statute attempted to grant them because their mode of appointment precluded them from being officers. 424 U.S. at 137-41.

FN61 The delegation to private persons or non-federal government officials of federal-law authority, sometimes incorrectly analyzed as raising Appointments Clause questions, can raise genuine questions under other constitutional doctrines, such as the non-delegation doctrine and the general separation of powers principle. Compare Confederated Tribes of Siletz Indians v. United States, 841 F. Supp. 1479, 1486-89 (D. Or. 1994) (confusing Appointments Clause with separation of powers analysis in holding invalid a delegation to a state governor) with United States v. Ferry County, 511 F. Supp. 546, 552 (E.D. Wash. 1981) (correctly dismissing Appointments Clause argument and analyzing delegation to county commissioners under non-delegation doctrine).

FN62 See Seattle Master Builders Ass'n v. Pacific Northwest Elec. Power & Conservation Planning Council, 786 F.2d 1359, 1365 (9th Cir. 1986) ("because the Council members do not serve pursuant to federal law," it is "immaterial whether they exercise some significant executive or administrative authority over federal activity"), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1059 (1987).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

FN63 One might also view delegations to private individuals as raising the same considerations as suggested by the distinction drawn earlier between appointee and independent contractor -- so long as the statute does not create such tenure, duration, emoluments and duties as would be associated with a public office, the individual is not the occupant of a constitutional office but is, rather, a private party who has assumed or been delegated some federal responsibilities.

FN64 See, e.g., Seattle Master Builders, 786 F.2d at 1364-66. The particular state officials at issue were serving on an entity created by an interstate compact established with the consent of Congress, but that fact is not significant for Appointments Clause purposes. The crucial point was that "[t]he appointment, salaries and direction" of the officials were "state-derived": "the states ultimately empower the [officials] to carry out their duties." Id. at 1365. The Supreme Court's recent decision in New York v. United States, 112 S. Ct. 2408 (1992), which held that Congress cannot "commandeer" state officials to serve federal regulatory purposes, reenforces this conclusion. Where state officials do exercise significant authority under or with respect to federal law, they do so as state officials, by the decision and under the ultimate authority of the state.

Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc., 501 U.S. 252 (1991), does not suggest a different conclusion. The constitutional issue in that case was the validity of a statutory provision subjecting the Airports Authority "to the veto power of" a Board of Review composed of members of Congress purportedly "acting 'in their individual capacities."' Id. at 270. The Supreme Court held that the Board in fact acted as an agent of Congress and that the Board's veto power therefore represented an unconstitutional enlargement of congressional authority. Nothing in the Court's opinion suggests that there would have been any constitutional problem if Congress had delegated the same power to the Authority subject to review by the executive branch.

FN65 See Techworld Dev. Corp. v. D.C. Preservation League, 648 F. Supp. 106, 115-17 (D.D.C. 1986).

FN66 We believe that United States ex rel. Kelly v. Boeing Co., 9 F.3d 743, 757-59 (9th Cir. 1993) (rejecting Appointments Clause challenge to False Claims Act), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1125 (1994), reached the correct result but through an incorrect line of analysis. See id. at 758 (Clause not violated because of the relative modesty of the authority exercised by the relator). The better analysis, in our view, is that of the court in United States ex rel. Burch v. Piqua Engineering, Inc., 803 F. Supp. 115 (S.D. Ohio 1992), which held that "because qui tam plaintiffs are not officers of the United States, the FCA does not violate the Appointments Clause." Id. at 120. We now disapprove the Appointments Clause analysis and conclusion of an earlier opinion of this Office, Constitutionality of the Qui Tam Provisions of the False Claims Act, 13 Op. O.L.C. 249 (1989) (preliminary print) (arguing that the qui tam provisions violate the Clause).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

FN67 Here the Court phrased its analysis in terms of separation of powers, but the challenge to the statute was, at its core, based on the Appointments Clause. See Chesapeake Bay Found. v. Bethlehem Steel Corp., 652 F. Supp. 620, 624 (D. Md. 1987) (Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976) (per curiam), "does not stand for the proposition . . . that private persons may not enforce any federal laws simply because they are not Officers of the United States appointed in accordance with Article II of the Constitution").

FN68 At least where these entities are created on an ad hoc or temporary basis, there is a long historical pedigree for the argument that even the United States representatives need not be appointed in accordance with Article II. See, e.g., Alexander Hamilton, The Defence No. 37 (Jan. 6, 1796), reprinted in 20 The Papers of Alexander Hamilton 13, 20 (Harold C. Syrett ed., 1974):
As to what respects the Commissioners agreed to be appointed [under the Jay Treaty with Great Britain], they are not in a strict sense OFFICERS. They are arbitrators between the two Countries. Though in the Constitutions, both of the U[nited] States and of most of the Individual states, a particular mode of appointing officers is designated, yet in practice it has not been deemed a violation of the provision to appoint Commissioners or special Agents for special purposes in a different mode. The traditional view of the Attorneys General has been that the members of international commissions hold "an office or employment emanating from the general treaty-making power, and created by it and" the foreign nation(s) involved and that members are not constitutional officers. Office -- Compensation, 22 Op. Att'y Gen. 184, 186 (1898).

FN69 Some of our prior opinions express such concerns. Because that view, we now conclude, cannot be reconciled with Appointments Clause principles or caselaw, we expressly disavow it.

FN70 The Court also referred to this as a "policy-implementing" role. Id. at 973. This is to distinguish government agencies and instrumentalities, such as Amtrak, from truly private corporations that, though created pursuant to statutory authority, do not implement any government policy, but instead pursue profit and the policies of their shareholders.

FN71 In some passages, the Court spoke in terms of the First Amendment and individual rights, for instance:
We hold that where, as here, the Government creates a corporation by special law, for the furtherance of governmental objectives, and retains for itself permanent authority to appoint a majority of the directors of that corporation, the corporation is part of the Government for purposes of the First Amendment. Id. We do not, however, believe that the Court meant to imply that it is within Congress's power to exempt federal instrumentalities from the Constitution's structural requirements, such as the Appointments Clause and the separation of powers doctrine, that apply to all other federal agencies. We believe instead that the references to individual rights are explained by two considerations. First, the issue in the case was whether Amtrak had violated the petitioner's First Amendment rights, and so did not raise any structural issues. Second, the

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

Constitution imposes certain obligations on all government entities, state as well as federal. In other words, not all government entities, within Lebron's definition, are part of the federal government; many are part of a state or local government or of an interstate compact. See id. at 973 (citing Pennsylvania v. Board of Directors of City Trusts, 353 U.S. 230 (1957) (per curiam)). These latter entities are not subject to the separation of powers doctrine or the Appointments Clause. Because the Court was concerned with all entities that the Constitution regards as within the government, not just the federal government, it naturally phrased its opinion in terms of the obligations that apply to all organs of government, not just the organs of the federal government. Ultimately, we can conceive of no principled basis for distinguishing between the status of a federal entity vis-a-vis constitutional obligations relating to individual rights and vis-a-vis the structural obligations that the Constitution imposes on federal entities. See Brief of Appellant United States, Wilkinson v. United States, Nos. 95-5144, 91-5174 (D.C. Cir. Nov. 22, 1995). It therefore is not surprising that the Court did not consistently limit its language to individual rights. See, e.g., Lebron, 115 S. Ct. at 973 ("It surely cannot be that government, state or federal, is able to evade the most solemn obligations imposed in the Constitution by simply resorting to the corporate form."). Thus, we do not believe that Congress may evade the "solemn obligations" of the doctrine of separation of powers by resorting to the corporate form any more than it may evade the obligations of the Bill of Rights through this artifice.

FN72 Memorandum for John Schmidt, Associate Attorney General, from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, re: Constitutional Limitations on Federal Government Participation in Binding Arbitration, at 10 (Sept. 7, 1995).

FN73 We nevertheless noted that it is possible for a theoretical binding arbitration mechanism to run afoul of the Appointments Clause. As indicated, arbitrators whose sole or collective decisions are binding on the government exercise significant authority. If any such arbitrator were to occupy a position of employment within the federal government, that arbitrator would be required to be appointed in conformity with the Appointments Clause. See Freytag v. Commissioner, 501 U.S. 868, 881 (1991). Thus, if a federal agency were to conduct binding arbitrations and to employ arbitrators with whom it provided all relevant attributes of an office, all such arbitrators would be required to be appointed in conformity with the Appointments Clause. See Federal Government Participation in Binding Arbitration, at 13.

FN74 The Court also compared the independent counsel's status to that of other officials who had been considered inferior officers in earlier decisions. See 487 U.S. at 672-73 (discussing cases dealing with vice-consuls, election supervisors, and United States commissioners). The Court also took note of its "reference in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 694, 696 (1974), to the Office of Watergate Special Prosecutor -- whose authority was similar to that of [the independent counsel] -- as a 'subordinate officer"' and concluded that this characterization was "consistent" with its conclusion that independent counsels are inferior officers. See 487 U.S. at 673.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

FN75 Buckley simply asserted that the members of the FEC were "at the very least" inferior officers. Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 126 (1976) (per curiam). In Freytag, no one claimed that the special trial judges at issue were principal, as opposed to inferior, officers; instead, the case involved the distinction between inferior officers and employees. Freytag v. Commissioner, 501 U.S. 868, 880-82 (1991). The military judges under review in Weiss, like all commissioned officers in the armed forces, were appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate. Weiss v. United States, 114 S. Ct. 752, 757 (1994). Justice Souter concurred in the Court's opinion on the understanding that the military judges at issue there are inferior officers. Id. at 763. He reasoned that there were substantial points to be made on either side of the question whether they were principal or inferior officers and concluded that the Court should defer "to the political Branches' [implicit] judgment" that the military judges were inferior officers. Id. at 769. Although Justice Souter's admonition that "it is ultimately hard to say with any certainty on which side of the line" between principal and inferior status a given officer may fall, id., is indubitably correct, the executive branch cannot invoke the principle of judicial deference he properly used to decide the issue in Weiss.

FN76 The exception to this broad reading of the Clause was Buckley's unsurprising conclusion that "neither Congress nor its officers [are] included within the language 'Heads of Departments."' Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 127 (1976) (per curiam).

FN77 Freytag, 501 U.S. at 892. The Court in Freytag concluded that it is constitutional for the chief judge of the Tax Court to appoint special trial judges because the Tax Court, though an Article I legislative court, "exercise[s] judicial power and perform[s] exclusively judicial functions" and thus is a "Court[] of Law" within the meaning of the Clause. Id. Justice Scalia argued in a concurring opinion that the Tax Court should be treated as a "Department" and the chief judge as its "Head." Id. at 914-22 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment). Justice Souter recently has suggested that the opinion of the Court in Freytag did not actually resolve the question of whether the judges of the Tax Court, including the chief judge, are principal officers. Weiss v. United States, 114 S. Ct. 752, 768 (1994) (Souter, J., concurring).

FN78 Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654 (1988). In Morrison, the Court indicated that there is some "constitutional limitation on 'incongruous' interbranch appointments," id. at 677, despite the broad language the Appointments Clause uses in describing Congress's discretion on the subject. A statute vesting in a court the power to appoint officers acting in areas in which judges "have no special knowledge or expertise," id. at 676 n.13, for example, might create tension between the court's normal functions and "the performance of [its] duty to appoint." Id. at 676. We think that this limitation is probably of little practical significance with respect to presidential appointments in light of the fact that it is difficult to conceive a plausible argument that vesting the power in the President to appoint any officer (other, perhaps, than some legislative officers) could ever be constitutionally "incongruous."

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

FN79 Silver v. United States Postal Serv., 951 F.2d 1033, 1038 (9th Cir. 1991).

FN80 The Appointments Clause thus differs from Section 4 of the Twenty-fifth Amendment, the language and history of which confirm that the "principal officers of the executive departments" it mentions are the members of the Cabinet. U.S. Const. amend. XXV, § 4; see Freytag, 501 U.S. at 886-87; id. at 917 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

FN81 "The Cabinet, as such, was not provided for by the Constitution and it follows therefore that the interpretation of the Constitution cannot depend upon such consideration." 37 Op. Att'y Gen. at 231; accord Freytag, 501 U.S. at 916-17 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

FN82 While the opinion of the Court in Freytag rejected the argument that "every part of the Executive Branch is a department," 501 U.S. at 885, we do not think that the Court's reasoning is inconsistent with the 1933 Justice Department opinion. The Court's chief concern was that part of the Appointments Clause's purpose is to prevent "the dangers posed by an excessively diffuse appointment power." Id. The Court observed that "[g]iven the inexorable presence of the administrative state, a holding that every organ in the Executive Branch is a department would multiply indefinitely the number of actors eligible to appoint." Id. We do not think that our view that entities other than cabinet-level agencies can be "Departments" for the purposes of the Appointments Clause leads to this constitutionally troublesome result. We assume the continuing validity of United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508 (1879), which held that the head of a bureau within an executive branch department was not the head of a department. Most of the discrete units of the executive branch in fact are subordinate to some larger executive agency, and therefore are not departments under Germaine. The Federal Bureau of Investigation, for example, wields far-reaching law enforcement authority, but as a component of the Justice Department it is not itself a "Department" for purposes of the Appointments Clause. Legislation authorizing the appointment of inferior officers by a subordinate officer within a department with the approval of the head of the department, see United States v. Hartwell, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 385, 392-94 (1868); see also Germaine, 99 U.S. at 511 (explaining Hartwell), does not transgress this principle because for constitutional purposes the appointment should be deemed to be made by the department head. We also note that the four concurring Justices in Freytag expressly adopted the reading of the Appointments Clause set forth in the 1933 Attorney General's opinion: that "the term 'Departments' means all independent executive establishments." 501 U.S. at 919 (Scalia, O'Connor, Kennedy, & Souter, JJ., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

FN83 The court of appeals in Silver found no constitutional problem with a statute vesting the power to appoint an inferior officer, the Deputy Postmaster General, in an entity consisting of the Governors of the Postal Service

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

(principal officers who are collectively the "head of a Department") and the Postmaster General (an inferior officer appointed by the Governors). See 951 F.2d at 1036-41. This conclusion might be justified on either of two rationales. (1) As Justice Souter recently noted, it remains unresolved whether "the Appointments Clause envisions appointment of some inferior officers by other inferior officers," Weiss v. United States, 114 S. Ct. 752, 768 (1994) (Souter, J., concurring), and it may be that there is no constitutional objection to designating one or more inferior officers to be the head of a department with the power to make appointments. (2) It might be argued that although as a general matter the head of a department must be a principal officer and a collective head of department must consist of exclusively principal officers, the association of an inferior officer with a collective head of department in making a specific appointment is constitutionally harmless.

FN84 See Freytag, 501 U.S. at 918 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (noting that most inferior officers in independent agencies are appointed by neither the President nor a Cabinet official).

FN85 In late-eighteenth century English, the term "department" had no specialized governmental or organizational meaning. For example, Dr. Johnson defined "department" as "[s]eparate allotment; province or business assigned to a particular person," 1 Samuel Johnson, A Dictionary of the English Language (1755), to which Webster added the gloss "in which a class of duties are allotted to a particular person." 1 Noah Webster, American Dictionary 58 (1828), quoted in Freytag, 501 U.S. at 920 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (founders chose "Department" to connote "separate organization"). In its foundational legislation, the First Congress used the word both for the Departments of Foreign Affairs (later, State) and War and for the Department of the Treasury, even though it pointedly did not term Treasury an "executive department" as it did State and War. Compare Act of July 27, 1789, ch. 4, 1 Stat. 28-29 (establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs) and Act of Aug. 7, 1789, ch. 7, 1 Stat. 49-50 (establishing the Department of War) with Act of Sept. 2, 1789, ch. 12, 1 Stat. 65-67 (establishing the Department of the Treasury). A substantial body of scholarship views this terminological choice as reflecting an intention to make Treasury at least partially independent of the President, although by means other than limiting the latter's removal power. See Lawrence Lessig & Cass R. Sunstein, supra note 33, at 27-29; Gerhard Casper, supra note 33, at 240-42; Peter M. Shane, supra note 33, at 615-16.

FN86 Buckley noted that the Constitution expressly authorizes the selection of the Speaker of the House and the President pro tempore of the Senate from among the membership of those bodies, see U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 5; id. art. I, § 3, cl. 5, and held that nothing in the Constitution forbids Congress from appointing non-members as legislative branch officials to "perform duties . . . in aid of those functions that Congress may carry out by itself." 424 U.S. at 127-28, 139.

FN87 In this circumstance, Congress's action in lengthening an officer's term does not have the effect of usurping the power of appointment the Constitution vests in the President rather than in Congress. Cf. In re Benny, 812 F.2d 1133, 1142-43 (9th Cir. 1987) (Norris, J., concurring in the judgment):

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

> [T]he Appointments Clause precludes Congress from extending the terms of incumbent officeholders. I am simply unable to see any principled distinction between congressional extensions of the terms of the incumbents and more traditional forms of congressional appointments. Both implicate the identical constitutional evil -- congressional selection of the individuals filling nonlegislative offices.

FN88 See Crenshaw v. United States, 134 U.S. 99 (1890); Civil Service Retirement Act -- Postmasters -- Automatic Separation from the Service, 35 Op. Att'y Gen. 309, 314 (1927) ("If, as stated in [Embry v. United States, 100 U.S. 680, 685 (1879),] Congress may at any time add to or take from compensation fixed, it may also, it would seem, by analogy, at any time shorten or lengthen a term of office.").

FN89 In 1987, this Office issued an opinion that may be read to hold that legislation extending the term of any officer, even one serving at the pleasure of the President, is unconstitutional. See Reappointment of United States Parole Commissioners, 11 Op. O.L.C. 135 (1987). At the time it was issued, that opinion was directly contrary to long-standing executive branch precedent. See, e.g., Displaced Persons Commission -- Terms of Members, 41 Op. Att'y Gen. at 90-91. We recently revisited the question presented in the 1987 opinion and concluded that it was in error. See Legislation Extending the Terms of Office of United States Parole Commissioners (July 15, 1994) (publication forthcoming in 18 Op. O.L.C. (1994)). We therefore reaffirmed the traditional view that legislation extending the term of an officer subject to removal at will does not violate the Appointments Clause and disavowed our 1987 suggestion to the contrary.

FN90 Benny asserted that Wiener v. United States, 357 U.S. 349 (1958), implicitly rejected any Appointments Clause argument against term-extension legislation. 812 F.2d at 1141. We think that this overstates Wiener. Wiener dealt only with the President's removal power and did not consider any issue regarding the Appointments Clause. The date on which the President removed the plaintiff in Wiener from office was in fact within the term of office for which the plaintiff was originally appointed, although part of the backpay the plaintiff ultimately recovered was for a period after his original term would have expired. See 357 U.S. at 350-51 (term should have expired on March 1, 1954 as the law stood at the time plaintiff was appointed; President removed plaintiff on December 10, 1953; plaintiff recovered backpay for four months after March 1, 1954, because commission's authorization was extended after his appointment). The additional Supreme Court cases that Benny and other opinions have cited are distinguishable. See, e.g., Benny, 812 F.2d at 1141 (citing Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U.S. 282 (1893), which upheld legislation imposing additional duties on an officer); In re Tom Carter Enters., 44 B.R. 605, 607 (C.D. Cal. 1984) (citing Shoemaker and cases dealing with issues under the Contracts Clause and the Philippine Organic Act). Benny also pointed out that the First Congress twice extended the tenure of the first Postmaster General. 812 F.2d at 1142. While we agree that this fact supports the argument that Congress generally possesses the power to extend terms, the original Postmaster General served at the pleasure of the President, and thus the First Congress's actions placed no practical limitation on the appointments power.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

FN91 The result reached in the Benny line of cases was as a practical matter much less troublesome than its reverse, which would have put in question an enormous number of decisions within the bankruptcy system. It is therefore possible to characterize these decisions as a sensible resolution of a legal quandary, which may have compromised constitutional logic but did so at no real cost to the ultimate purposes of the Constitution. However, while this view of the cases may be quite sensible from a political-science perspective, it leaves the constitutional law on the subject in some disarray.

FN92 See, e.g., President Buchanan's signing statement dated June 25, 1860, relating to the Civil Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1861, in 5 Messages and Papers of the Presidents, 1789-1897, at 597-98 (1897) (construing Act to avoid the constitutional problem).

FN93 The same possibility is not presented by Congress's power to reduce or limit the duties of an officer. Except with respect to (certain) constitutional officers, Congress has plenary authority to eliminate offices altogether, subject to the general separation of powers principle. The lesser-included power to take away part of an officer's authority does not in itself enable Congress to choose which individual will exercise authority and thus does not implicate the Appointments Clause. See United States v. San Jacinto Tin Co., 125 U.S. 273, 284 (1888) (Congress, as "the legislative body which created the office" of Attorney General, has the authority to put "restrictions . . . upon the exercise of [the Attorney General's] authority").

In Crenshaw v. United States, 134 U.S. 99 (1890), the Supreme Court upheld a statute that affected undergraduates ("cadet midshipmen") at the Naval Academy by redesignating them as "naval cadets" and restricting the circumstances in which they would be commissioned upon graduation. The Court concluded that "Congress did not thereby undertake to name the incumbent of any office. It simply changed the name, and modified the scope of the duties." Id. at 109.

FN94 The Olympic Federal court thought the legislation would have been valid if Congress had created a three-person directorate for the OTS and designated the members of the former board as the directors. (The court reasoned that the germaneness requirement of Shoemaker would be satisfied because OTS was absorbing the duties of the old board as well as acquiring other, related ones.) 732 F. Supp. at 1193. We reached a similar conclusion in 1980 in opining that Congress could merge the Court of Claims and the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals and designate the members of those courts to serve as members of the merged court. See Legislation Authorizing the Transfer of Federal Judges from One District to Another, 4B Op. O.L.C. 538, 541 (1980). The "merger situation . . . involves the end of one institution and the continuance of its major

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

Writings of George Washington 5 (John C. Fitzpatrick ed., 1940).

FN16 The correct resolution of separation of powers questions demands that due respect be given to two distinct constitutional axioms. The first axiom is that the Constitution's creation of a vigorous executive and an independent judiciary must not be undermined by legislative encroachment. The second axiom is that the Constitution delegates to Congress broad power "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers [of Congress], and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 18 (emphasis added). The Necessary and Proper Clause thereby authorizes Congress not only to choose any appropriate means of exercising the legislative powers it has been delegated, but also "to exercise its best judgment in the selection of measures to carry into execution the constitutional powers of the government" as a whole, M'Culloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. at 420, including the powers vested in the President. In our analyses, we fully acknowledge the broad sweep of Congress's powers while insisting, as we must, that those powers cannot be legitimately employed so as to undermine the constitutional authority of the executive branch.

FN17 In such circumstances "the balance" between the branches "already has been struck by the Constitution itself" in the text. Public Citizen v. United States Dep't of Justice, 491 U.S. 440, 486 (1989) (Kennedy, J., concurring).

FN18 The House of Representatives has the power to impeach any civil officer of the United States, see U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 5; id. art. II, § 4, and the Senate to try and, if convinced that the officer is guilty of "high Crimes and Misdemeanors," to remove him or her from office, id. art. I, § 3, cls. 5, 6; id. art. II, § 4. The Senate also acts on its own in exercising its advice and consent powers with respect to treaties and the appointment of officers. Congress and congressional committees, furthermore, may take certain actions in aid of Congress's legislative tasks that have legal consequences for specific persons outside the legislative branch; a congressional committee, for example, may issue a subpoena to a witness. See Lear Siegler, Inc. Energy Prods. Div. v. Lehman, 842 F.2d 1102, 1108 (9th Cir. 1988), modified as to attorney fees, 893 F.2d 205 (1989) (en banc). We disagree with the Lear Siegler court's application of this principle to the question before it.

FN19 The statute at issue in Chadha provided for a one-house "veto" of certain decisions by the Attorney General. A two-house "veto" satisfies bicameralism but is inconsistent with the requirement of presentment, and soon after Chadha the Court summarily invalidated a statute employing this mechanism. See United States Senate v. FTC, 463 U.S. 1216 (1983) (mem.). These Supreme Court decisions vindicated the executive branch's long-held objections to any form of legislative "veto." See Memorandum for the Attorney General from President Franklin D. Roosevelt (Apr. 7, 1941), reprinted in Robert H. Jackson, A Presidential Legal Opinion, 66 Harv. L. Rev. 1353, 1357-58 (1953) (concurrent resolution); Constitutionality of Proposed Legislation Affecting Tax Refunds, 37

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

functions in another," and it was reasonable for Congress "to provide in this context for the relocation of experienced and capable judicial personnel, and for their continuing to perform the functions of the office to which they were originally appointed." Id.

FN95 One possible restriction is notable for its absence from the Constitution: although Articles I and II and the Twelfth Amendment establish citizenship and age requirements for serving as a member of Congress, the President, or the Vice President (and also set varying minimum age requirements), see U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 2 (Representatives); id. art. I, § 3, cl. 3 (Senators); id. art. II, § 1, cl. 4 (the President); id. amend. XII (Vice President), the Constitution places no such limitations on anyone who becomes an officer through one of the processes prescribed by the Appointments Clause.

FN96 After FEC v. NRA Political Victory Fund, 6 F.3d 821 (D.C. Cir. 1993), cert. dismissed, 115 S. Ct. 537 (1994), it appears that designating a member of Congress to serve on a commission with any executive functions, even in what was expressly labeled a ceremonial or advisory role, may render the delegation of significant governmental authority to the commission unconstitutional as a violation of the anti-aggrandizement principle. See id. at 826-27.

FN97 The Incompatibility Clause does not prohibit members of Congress from serving in positions that are not offices in the constitutional sense. See, e.g., Proposed Commission on Deregulation of International Ocean Shipping, 7 Op. O.L.C. 202, 202-03 (1983) (members of Congress may serve as members of a "purely advisory" commission because the members need not be officers).

FN98 Cf. Special Deputization of Members of Congress, at 1 n.1 (May 25, 1994) (publication forthcoming in 18 Op. O.L.C. (1994)) (recognizing Incompatibility Clause requirement but finding it unnecessary to reach that issue).

FN99 The suggestion in this Office's 1977 opinion on the Clause that "exclusive responsibility for interpreting and enforcing the Incompatibility Clause rests with Congress," Reserve Commissions, 1 Op. O.L.C. at 242, thus was an overstatement.

FN100 The most thorough judicial treatment of the issue, which quotes extensively from Attorney General Wirt's 1823 opinion, is United States v. Allocco, 200 F. Supp. 868 (S.D.N.Y. 1961), aff'd, 305 F.2d 704 (2d Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 964 (1963).

FN101 There must be a vacancy in order for the President to exercise the authority granted by the Recess Appointments Clause. See Recess Appointments, 3 Op. O.L.C. at 317 (the power to make a "recess appointment presupposes the existence of a vacancy," and an appointment cannot in itself remove an incumbent so as to create a vacancy). In many situations, whether a vacancy exists will depend on the correct interpretation of a holdover provision in the statute creating the office. The scanty caselaw on this issue -- which is a matter of statutory construction rather than of constitutional law -- is not easily reconciled. Compare Staebler v. Carter, 464 F. Supp. 585 (D.D.C. 1979) with Mackie v. Clinton, 827 F. Supp. 56 (D.D.C. 1993), vacated as moot, Nos. 93-5287 & 93-5289, 1994 WL 163761 (D.C. Cir. Mar. 9, 1994).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

FN102 "In this connection I think the President is necessarily vested with a large, although not unlimited, discretion to determine when there is a real and genuine recess making it impossible for him to receive the advice and consent of the Senate. . . . But there is a point, necessarily hard of definition, where palpable abuse of discretion might subject his appointment to review." 33 Op. Att'y Gen. at 25.

FN103 See, e.g., Appointment of Acting Purser, 6 Op. Att'y Gen. 357, 365 (1854) (executive power of "filling up a vacancy by an appointment of one to act ad interim, and for a particular exigency, in a distant service" could be exercised to make temporary appointment of acting purser despite statutory prohibition on anyone acting as purser prior to Senate confirmation); Executive Power of Appointment, 4 Op. Att'y Gen. 248, 248 (1843) (appointment power is derived from President's Take Care Clause duty, "an obligation imposed by the constitution, and from the authority of which no mere act of legislation can operate a dispensation," although President could not pay interim appointees without an appropriation).

FN104 Indeed, at least one court has indicated a judicial willingness to defer to the views of the Attorney General on the President's authority to make temporary appointments. See Olympic Federal Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Director, Office of Thrift Supervision, 732 F. Supp. 1183, 1197-98 (D.D.C.) ("The Attorney General is charged with responsibility for ensuring that only lawfully appointed officials act on behalf of the United States, and consequently his interpretation of law on this subject is entitled to great deference."), appeal dismissed as moot, 903 F.2d 837 (D.C. Cir. 1990).

FN105 Williams was a challenge to the legality of actions taken by the acting director of the Office of Economic Opportunity on the grounds that the President lacked authority to appoint an acting director of that office and to continue the interim appointment for over four months without submitting to the Senate any nomination to the position of director. The district court declared the President's action unlawful. The court of appeals refused to grant a stay of the district court's order because in its judgment the acting director had failed to show the requisite likelihood of success on the merits. The brief discussion in Williams of the merits emphasized that Article II "unequivocally requires an officer of the United States to be confirmed by the Senate unless different provision is made." The court nevertheless observed that "[i]t could be argued" that the President has "an implied power, in the absence of limiting legislation . . . to appoint an acting director for a reasonable period of time before submitting the nomination of a new director to the Senate" 482 F.2d at 670.

FN106 Our opinions have struggled with the meaning of Williams. See, e.g., Power of the President to Designate Acting Member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, 1 Op. O.L.C. 150, 151-52 (1977) (court of appeals' opinion in Williams "can perhaps be read as disagreeing with" the argument that the President has no non-statutory authority or "as perhaps agreeing" that he does have such authority, "in the absence of a limiting statute," subject, of course, to the condition that he must submit a nomination within a reasonable time).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

FN107 The Vacancies Act only applies to temporary appointments "[w]hen an office[]" is vacant. 5 U.S.C. § 3346 (emphasis added). Because the staff director for the Commission on Civil Rights is not a constitutional officer, the Vacancies Act does not apply. See Olympic Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Director, Office of Thrift Supervision, 732 F. Supp. 1183, 1195 (D.D.C.) (finding that "officer" as used in the Vacancies Act, 5 U.S.C. § 3346, means "constitutional officer"), appeal dismissed as moot, 903 F.2d 837 (D.C. Cir. 1990). Indeed, since the Commission is an exclusively investigatory and advisory body, see Hannah v. Larche, 363 U.S. 420, 441 (1960), none of the positions at the Commission are constitutional offices. See Statement on Signing the United States Commission on Civil Rights Act of 1983, 2 Pub. Papers 1634, 1635 (Nov. 30, 1983) (Statement by the Department of Justice). Accordingly, the Vacancies Act does not apply to the Commission at all.

FN108 A federal district court ruled to the contrary, but its decision has been vacated. See George v. Ishimaru, 849 F. Supp. 68 (D.D.C. 1994), vacated as moot, No. 94-5111 1994 WL 517746 (D.C. Cir. Aug. 25, 1994).

FN109 Professor Gerhard Casper has identified seven "major positions [in the First Congress] on the question of the location of the removal power," ranging from the view that the President has illimitable authority to remove any non-judicial officer to the argument that Congress has plenary discretion over removal issues under the Necessary and Proper Clause. See Gerhard Casper, supra note 33, at 234-35.

FN110 "The constitutional authority in Congress to thus vest the appointment implies authority to limit, restrict, and regulate the removal by such laws as Congress may enact in relation to the officers so appointed. The head of a Department has no constitutional prerogative of appointment to offices independently of the legislation of Congress, and by such legislation he must be governed, not only in making appointments, but in all that is incident thereto." Perkins, 116 U.S. at 485. The President similarly "has no constitutional prerogative" to make appointments without senatorial advice and consent "independently" of congressional authorization -- that is, the President may make appointments without the advice and consent of the Senate only if Congress authorizes the President to do so. See Myers, 272 U.S. at 161- 62 (noting without deciding the question).

FN111 We do not read Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654 (1988), to cast any doubt on the continuing vitality of these decisions. See id. at 689 n.27, 690 n.29 (implicitly reaffirming Perkins).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

FN112 The Court dismissed the argument that the rationale for giving the President plenary removal authority over heads of department and other great officers of state simply did not apply to postmasters with the observation that Congress could extend civil service tenure protection to the latter simply by vesting their appointment "in the head[] of department[] to which they belong." 272 U.S. at 174.

FN113 The statute establishing the FTC included a provision stating that a commissioner "may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office," which the Court construed as intended "to limit the executive power of removal to the causes enumerated, the existence of none of which is claimed here." Humphrey's Ex'r, 295 U.S. at 623, 626.

FN114 Humphrey's Executor expressly repudiated the language in Myers suggesting that the President's general executive powers and Take Care Clause responsibilities rendered it unconstitutional for Congress to reduce or eliminate presidential control over the administration of federal law. "In the course of the opinion [in Myers], expressions occur which tend to sustain the government's contention, but these are beyond the point involved and, therefore, do not come within the rule of stare decisis. In so far as they are out of harmony with the views here set forth, these expressions are disapproved." Humphrey's Ex'r, 295 U.S. at 626.

FN115 See also id. at 628:
The FTC was created by Congress to "carry into effect legislative policies embodied in the statute in accordance with the legislative standard therein prescribed, and to perform other special duties as a legislative or judicial aid. . . . Its duties are to be performed without executive leave and, in the contemplation of the statute, must be free from executive control."

FN116 The rationale of Wiener, which is essentially that Congress must have implied a for-cause removal restriction when the Court believes that the functions of the agency demand such tenure protection, 357 U.S. at 353-56, seems questionable. There would be nothing illogical in a legislative decision, for example, to protect against review or revision of the decisions of the agency, see id. 354-55, while placing the agency's decision makers within the control of the President. Congress has made such decisions from the beginning of the Republic. To the extent that Wiener assumes that control is and ought to be a binary matter -- either plenary or non-existent -- its reasoning is difficult to reconcile with more recent separation of powers decisions that reject such an either/or approach to presidential control. See, e.g., Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654 (1988). Despite these possible flaws in its logic, however, Wiener's holding continues to be followed. See FEC v. NRA Political Victory Fund, 6 F.3d 821, 826 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (concluding that the members of the Federal Election Commission probably are removable only for cause despite the absence of an explicit statutory restriction on removal), cert. dismissed, 115 S. Ct. 537 (1994).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

FN117 Congress's decision was considered legitimate in Humphrey's Executor because the Court viewed the FTC as "a body of experts" "charged with the enforcement of no policy except the policy of the law" and concluded that "[s]uch a body cannot in any proper sense be characterized as an arm or an eye of the executive". 295 U.S. at 624, 628. We do not find the Court's reasoning in Humphrey's Executor completely persuasive. The Court's assertion about the FTC's "enforcement of no policy except the policy of the law," id. at 624, does not differentiate the FTC, except perhaps as a matter of degree, from the many undoubtedly executive agencies upon which Congress imposes mandatory duties. The Court also stated that an FTC member is "an officer who occupies no place in the executive department," but the Court may only have meant that the FTC is "an agency of the legislative or judicial departments of the government," id. at 628, in which case questions would arise under current constitutional doctrine as to the legitimacy of an Article I entity exercising law-making authority without following bicameralism and presentment, see INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983), or of an Article III non-judicial entity "bind[ing] or regulat[ing] the primary conduct of the public," Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 396 (1989). We do not think that the "independent" regulatory agencies could be viewed today as within the legislative or judicial branches. See id. at 386 n.14 (SEC is "not located in the Judicial Branch").

FN118 A much older decision, Shurtleff v. United States, 189 U.S. 311 (1903), had held that a for-cause provision did not oust the President's power, derived from the power of appointment, to remove an officer at will, but after Humphrey's Executor, Shurtleff appeared confined to its factual setting (where the official's tenure had no fixed termination). See Kalaris v. Donovan, 697 F.2d 376, 395 & n.76 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 462 U.S. 1119 (1983). Bowsher, however, cited Shurtleff in connection with a more general suggestion that "the enumeration of certain specified causes of removal" may not "exclud[e] the possibility of removal for other causes." 478 U.S. at 729. Bowsher and Morrison together suggest that a generous reading of the President's (or a department head's) power to remove an inferior officer for cause may be essential to the constitutionality of removal restrictions concerning even those officers whose functions are narrow.

FN119 The Tenure of Office Act of 1867, ch. 154, 14 Stat. 430 (1867), expressly provided the Secretaries of War and the Navy, among others, with terms longer than that of the President who appointed them, subject only to presidential removal with the consent of the Senate. President Andrew Johnson's attempt to remove the Secretary of War was the legal basis for his impeachment and near-removal from office. (The Act had been passed over President Johnson's constitutionally based veto.) GR

FN120 With respect to an officer serving at the President's pleasure, the President may remove the incumbent by direct order or by appointing his or her successor after receiving the advice and consent of the Senate. See, e.g., Quackenbush v. United States, 177 U.S. 20, 25 (1900); Presidential Appointees -- Resignation Subject to the Appointment and Qualification of a Successor, 3 Op.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

O.L.C. 152 (1979).

FN121 On the basis of precedent, and in light of the understandable tendency of Article III judges to value tenure protection positively, it is safe to assume that courts will continue to apply Wiener with respect to officials whose primary duties involve the adjudication of disputes involving private persons.

FN122 The two houses of Congress also have complementary roles in the congressional power to impeach and remove any civil officer of the United States. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 5; id. art. I, § 3, cl. 6.

FN123 Congress's authority in this regard is bounded, to be sure, by independent constitutional limitations such as the Bill of Attainder Clause, U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 3. See United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303 (1946) (provision in appropriations statute prohibiting the payment of compensation to three specified executive branch employees because of their political beliefs was an unconstitutional bill of attainder).

FN124 One could also describe the reasoning directly in terms of the impeachment and removal powers. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 2, cl. 5 (House has "sole Power of Impeachment"); id. art. I, § 3, cl. 6 (Senate has "sole Power to try all Impeachments"); id. art. II, § 4 ("President, Vice President and all civil Officers" are subject to impeachment and removal). These powers stem from "[e]xplicit and unambiguous provisions of the Constitution [that] prescribe and define" the only means by which Congress may remove officers. INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 945 (1983).

FN125 In Smith the Supreme Court rejected a challenge to the right of one of President Hoover's appointees to sit on the Federal Power Commission, but based its holding on its construction of the Senate's rule permitting reconsideration. The Court thus did not reach the executive's constitutional arguments. See 286 U.S. at 34 ("we have, therefore, no occasion to consider the constitutional objection").

FN126 The composition of the Smithsonian's Board of Regents and of the Board of Trustees of the J.F.K. Center presents a separate problem under Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976) (per curiam), because members of Congress serve on these boards through appointment by the Speaker and the President pro tempore. See 20 U.S.C. § 42 (Regents of Smithsonian); Id. § 76h(a) (Trustees of J.F.K. Center).

FN127 Under the modern understanding of the separation of powers, we do not think that Congress validly can empower the GPO to play any role that is not purely ministerial with respect to the executive branch.

FN128 Formal removal authority is sufficient to render the Librarian subject to the President's control for constitutional purposes. See Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 726-27 (1986). We think that under Bowsher the fact that a President

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

is highly unlikely to remove a Librarian is legally irrelevant. Id. at 727 n.5.

FN129 The Constitution presupposes that all executive branch action is taken under the legal authority of officers of the United States and that it is those officers (and not their subordinates) who are constitutionally responsible for those actions. See U.S. Const. art. II, § 4 (civil officers may be impeached). It is our view, therefore, that the executive branch is generally entitled to resist congressional demands that employees be questioned about their actions and that as a matter of constitutional comity Congress ordinarily is obligated to respect an executive decision to send a superior officer to present testimony and answer questions about the actions of a subordinate officer. (The last statement does not apply to congressional investigations connected with impeachment or with other legitimate investigations into the actions of specific officers.) Although the details of executive responses to congressional demands for information have changed somewhat, the general principle that Congress ought not employ its powers of investigation to disrupt the lines of responsibility and authority within the executive branch is very old. See Thomas Jefferson, Opinion of the Cabinet (Apr. 2, 1792), in I The Writings of Thomas Jefferson 304 (Andrew A. Lipscomb ed., 1903) (advising President Washington "that neither the committee nor [the] House [of Representatives] had a right to call on the Head of a Department, who and whose papers were under the President alone; but that the committee should instruct their chairman to move the House to address the President").

FN130 This is not to say that an unconstitutional report-and-wait provision cannot be imagined. A provision that imposed so lengthy a delay as to in effect nullify the executive's power to take action substantively authorized by the Constitution or a statute might be invalid as a violation of the anti-aggrandizement or general separation of powers principle.

FN131 Moreover, such a provision ought to fail the courts' final test under general separation of powers analysis -- whether the statute's impact on the executive "is justified by an overriding need to promote objectives within the constitutional authority of Congress." Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. at 443. The hypothesized reporting requirement could seriously impair the President's ability to formulate foreign policy and conduct negotiations and addresses an area in which Congress's constitutional authority is limited.

FN132 The result in Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714 (1986), for example, would not be changed by a statute providing that the General Accounting Office is an executive branch agency. Through the Comptroller General, an official removable by Congress, the legislature would still be exercising ultimate authority over executive decisions. In fact, the Comptroller General does have obligations to the executive branch as well as to Congress. See Bowsher, 478 U.S. at 746 (Stevens, J., concurring in the judgment).

FN133 The delegation question actually at issue in our 1990 opinion concerned OMB requirements to contract out governmental work. Executive branch delegations

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

1488. Therefore, the court concluded, the provision requiring the governor's concurrence violated the Appointments Clause and the general separation of powers principle. Id. at 1489. We think that the district court went wrong in its description of the legislation it was reviewing: the only final determination the Secretary is "legislatively charged with making" under 25 U.S.C. § 2719(b)(1)(A) is a determination that the statutory conditions -- inter alia, that the relevant governor concurs in the Secretary's findings that granting the waiver will be beneficial to the tribe and harmless to its neighbors -- have been satisfied. The governor's concurrence, from the Secretary's perspective, is as much a fact about the world as the predicted effects of the casino (or the concurrence of the supermajority of farmers at issue in Currin) -- it is one more condition that must be met before the Secretary can exercise the waiver power Congress has provided, albeit a condition that the Secretary may be able to satisfy using different methods (persuasion, for example) than those employed in satisfying other conditions (economic forecasts of the impact of a casino, for example).

For somewhat similar reasons, there is no separation of powers problem with legislation that defines a federal rule of law by reference to state or foreign law. The Supreme Court held in United States v. Sharpnack, 355 U.S. 286 (1958), that the Constitution permits Congress to provide for the application, as bases for federal prosecution, of subsequently enacted state criminal laws in federal enclaves. The Court concluded that such a prospective congressional adoption of "future state legislative action in connection with the exercise of federal legislative power" does not involve "a delegation by Congress of its legislative authority to the States" at all. Id. at 294. On the basis of Sharpnack's reasoning, we think that no special separation of powers issues are raised by the role of the states under such legislation. The courts of appeals have applied the rationale of Sharpnack to a variety of federal statutes that require consideration of state or foreign laws in determining the application of federal law. See, e.g., United States v. Rioseco, 845 F.2d 299, 302 (11th Cir. 1988) ("Congress has delegated no power, but has itself set out its policies and has implemented them").

FN136 See also Memorandum for Jack Quinn, Counsel to the President, from Walter Dellinger, Assistant Attorney General, re: Application of 28 U.S.C. § 458 to Presidential Appointments of Federal Judges (Dec. 18, 1995); Constraints Imposed by 18 U.S.C. § 1913 on Lobbying Efforts, 13 Op. O.L.C. 361, 366-68 (1989) (preliminary print); Prosecution for Contempt of Congress of an Executive Branch Official Who Has Asserted a Claim of Executive Privilege, 8 Op. O.L.C. 101 (1984); Memorandum for Richard T. Burress, Office of the President, from Laurence H. Silberman, Deputy Attorney General, re: Conflict of Interest Problems Arising out of the President's Nomination of Nelson A. Rockefeller to be Vice President under the Twenty-Fifth Amendment to the Constitution, at 2, 5 (Aug. 28, 1974); Memorandum for Egil Krogh, Staff Assistant to the Counsel to the President, from William H. Rehnquist, Assistant Attorney General, re: Closing of Government Offices in Memory of Former President Eisenhower (Apr. 1, 1969).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

FN137 This last point is true not only with respect to true "political questions," i.e., constitutional issues the resolution of which is committed by the Constitution to (one of) the political branches, but also as to areas which, although not absolutely insulated from judicial review, demand extraordinary judicial respect for the decisions of a coordinate branch. See, e.g., United States v. Butenko, 494 F.2d 593, 603, 605 (3d Cir. 1974) (en banc) (broad presidential power to order covert surveillance for foreign affairs and national security purposes does not "justify completely removing" judicial enforcement of the Fourth Amendment; however, the "strong public interest" in "the efficient operation of the Executive's foreign policy-making apparatus" should make a court "wary of interfering").

FN138 Justice Robert Jackson once wrote that "[i]t is hard to conceive a task more fundamentally political than to maintain amidst changing conditions the balance between the executive and legislative branches of our federal system." Robert H. Jackson, The Supreme Court in the American System of Government 62 (1955).

FN139 See Richard A. Champagne, Jr., The Separation of Powers, Institutional Responsibility, and the Problem of Representation, 75 Marq. L. Rev. 839, 844 (1992).
1996 WL 876050 (O.L.C.)
END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

Op. Att'y Gen. 56, 60-62 (1933) (joint congressional committee); Constitutional Issues Raised by Inter-American Convention on International Commercial Arbitration, 4B Op. O.L.C. 509, 512-13 (1980) (one-house veto of "private" action).

FN20 Buckley vindicated the long-standing constitutional view of the executive branch. See, e.g., Constitutionality of Resolution Establishing United States New York World's Fair Commission, 39 Op. Att'y Gen. 61 (1937).

FN21 See Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 411 n.35 (1989) (distinguishing Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714 (1986), as resting on "the special danger recognized by the Founders of congressional usurpation of Executive Branch functions").

FN22 The fact that the anti-aggrandizement principle does not rest on a particular provision of the Constitution does not make it any less important and legitimate a feature of the law of separation of powers than those features such as bicameralism and presentment that do have specific textual loci.
The Framers regarded the checks and balances they had built into the tripartite Federal Government as a self-executing safeguard against the encroachment or aggrandizement of one branch at the expense of the other. . . . This Court has not hesitated to enforce the principle of separation embodied in the Constitution when its application has proved necessary for the decisions of cases or controversies properly before it. Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 122- 23 (1976) (per curiam).

FN23 "The structure of the Constitution does not permit Congress to execute the laws; it follows that Congress cannot grant to an officer under its control what it does not possess." Bowsher, 478 U.S. at 726. An officer subject to removal by Congress is subordinate to Congress as a matter of constitutional law and must be viewed as an agent of Congress for separation of powers purposes. Id. at 730. The Constitution expressly prescribes the only means by which the houses of Congress may participate in the removal from an ongoing office of a non-legislative official -- impeachment by the House and trial by the Senate. Id. at 723.

FN24 Bowsher upheld the view of the Constitution long maintained by the executive branch. See, e.g., Constitutionality of Proposed Legislation Affecting Tax Refunds, 37 Op. Att'y Gen. 56, 56 (1933) (unconstitutional for Congress to give a joint committee of Congress authority "to approve or disapprove executive acts").

FN25 Morrison, 487 U.S. at 694 ("We observe first that this case does not involve an attempt by Congress to increase its own powers at the expense of the Executive Branch."); Schor, 478 U.S. at 856 ("Unlike Bowsher, this case raises no question of the aggrandizement of congressional power at the expense of a coordinate branch.").

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

FN26 The bicameralism/presentment and anti-aggrandizement requirements converge when Congress attempts to vest in itself or its agents the power to take action with legal effects outside the legislative branch by some means other than the textually prescribed procedure of bicameral passage of a bill and presentation to the President. Such an attempt is unconstitutional regardless of whether one views the attempt as a violation of the bicameralism/presentment requirement for legislation or as a self-aggrandizing intrusion into the sphere of activity of another branch. See MWAA, 501 U.S. at 274-77. However, the two requirements do not always work in tandem. A statute providing that the President can exercise additional authority over some issue with the approval of a single house of Congress would not amount to congressional self-aggrandizement but would violate the bicameralism requirement. Similarly, it is difficult to view the designation by statute of agents of Congress to be non-voting members of an extra-legislative decision-making body as leading to the exercise of legislative authority in violation of Chadha, but such designation may well run afoul of the anti-aggrandizement principle. See, e.g., NRA Political Victory Fund, 6 F.3d at 826-27.

FN27 Compare NRA Political Victory Fund, 6 F.3d at 826-27 (unconstitutional for Congress to place agents within an entity exercising final decision-making authority) with McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135 (1927) (constitutional for Congress to issue subpoenas).

FN28 Legislation impinging on the President's responsibilities in the areas of foreign affairs and national defense poses unique issues in the application of the general principle of separation of powers, requiring a more searching examination of the validity of congressional action.

FN29 See, e.g., Springer v. Philippine Islands, 277 U.S. 189, 201 (1928) (discussing the "exclusive character of the powers conferred upon each of the three departments"). On the present Court, Justice Scalia adheres to a version of this view. See, e.g., Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 703-04 (1988) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (criticizing the Court for focusing on "such relatively technical details as the Appointments Clause and the removal power" rather than on "the principle of separation of powers").

FN30 Madison's language about "the whole power of [a] department" should not be construed in a woodenly literalistic manner. As the Supreme Court's decisions indicate, the point is that the principle of separation of powers safeguards the overall constitutional role and function of the affected branch. Indeed, this would seem to have been Madison's view as well: during the great debate in the First Congress over the President's authority to remove executive branch officers, Madison argued against congressional power to limit the President's authority on the ground that such limitations would distort the constitutionally ordained role of the executive. See Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 131 (1926) (quoting Madison).

FN31 Although most of the Court's decisions applying the general separation of

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

powers principle have concerned legislation arguably interfering with the executive or judiciary, the Court's approach is applicable in other circumstances as well. For example, United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974), addressed the argument that a subpoena duces tecum addressed to the President in the course of a criminal proceeding was a judicial encroachment on the executive's autonomy. The Court rejected the argument, holding in the circumstances of the case that the President's "generalized interest in confidentiality" was outweighed by "the demonstrated, specific need [of the courts and the accused] for evidence in a pending criminal trial." Id. at 713. The threat to the President's constitutionally based interest posed by compelled disclosure in such (presumably rare) circumstances was slight, the Court concluded, while "the allowance of the privilege to withhold evidence . . . would . . . gravely impair the basic function of the courts." Id. at 712. The Court built on its reasoning in United States v. Nixon in formulating the test set out a few years later in Administrator of General Services, under which it examined the impact of an adverse decision on the constitutional functions of the executive and judicial branches.

FN32 See also Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361 (1989). Mistretta upheld the validity of Congress's decision to create the Sentencing Commission as an independent entity within the judicial branch composed, in part, of Article III judges against the claim that the Commission violated the general separation of powers principle. Id. at 383. As in Morrison, the Court looked to the impact of the challenged legislation on the ability of the affected branch to fulfill its duties and concluded that the legislation posed no real threat to the integrity or authority of the judiciary. Id. at 384.

FN33 The Court also addressed the statute's imposition of a for-cause requirement on the Attorney General's power to remove an independent counsel, arguably a violation of the rule of Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926) (holding unconstitutional a statute requiring Senate advice and consent to the presidential removal of certain postmasters). Morrison distinguished Myers as based on what we have called the anti-aggrandizement principle, 487 U.S. at 686 (like Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714 (1986), Myers involved "Congress' attempt to involve itself in the removal of an executive official"), and rejected the argument that the constitutionality of a for-cause removal requirement depends on whether an official is classified as "purely executive," id. at 689. The proper inquiry, the Court concluded, was the compatibility of the restriction on the executive's removal power with the general separation of powers principle that Congress cannot legislate in such a way that the President cannot carry out his constitutional functions. Ultimately, the Court was "simply [unable to] see how the President's need to control the [counsel's] exercise of . . . discretion is so central to the functioning of the Executive Branch as to require as a matter of constitutional law that the counsel be terminable at will by the President." Id. at 691-92.

FN34 While we do not rest any conclusions on the potentially shifting ground of scholarly consensus, we note the existence of a number of impressive studies arguing that the principle of separation was originally understood to be flexible, open-ended, and consistent with a variety of actual institutional relationships among the three branches. Furthermore, it seems undeniable that early practice under the Constitution reflected a loose rather than strict understanding of the required separation. See, e.g., Susan Low Bloch, The Early Role of the Attorney General in our Constitutional Scheme: In the Beginning There was Pragmatism, 1989 Duke L.J. 561; Gerhard Casper, An Essay in Separation of Powers: Some Early Versions and Practices, 30 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 211 (1989); William B. Gwyn, The Indeterminacy of the Separation of Powers and the Federal Courts, 57 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 474 (1989); Lawrence Lessig & Cass R. Sunstein, The President and the Administration, 93 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1994); Peter M. Shane, Independent Policymaking and Presidential Power: A Constitutional Analysis, 57 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 596 (1989).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

FN35 Once again, we note that the areas of foreign relations and national defense present unique considerations, in light of the President's much greater constitutional authority to act in those areas.

FN36 In analyzing the validity of congressional action, we are mindful of the respect it is appropriate for the executive branch to pay to an equal and coordinate branch of the government. However, the executive branch is not bound by precisely the same rules of deference that guide the courts in exercising their power of judicial review. Judicial deference to the legislative choices embodied in statutes is one of the means by which the courts themselves avoid interfering improperly with the constitutional powers of the politically responsible branches. (In the case of most statutes, judicial review involves scrutinizing the legal and policy judgments of the President who signed the legislation into law as well as those of the Congress that enacted it.) The courts, it should be remembered, are also deferential to purely executive branch decisions, and for the same basic reason: the constitutional structure makes the President, like Congress, politically responsible. See Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 865 (1984) ("[w]hile agencies are not directly accountable to the people, the Chief Executive is, and it is entirely appropriate for this political branch of the Government to make . . . policy choices").

FN37 Myers, 272 U.S. at 134.

FN38 Rejecting the argument that it was unsafe to delegate the executive power to a single official, Alexander Hamilton wrote that "one of the weightiest objections to a plurality in the executive . . . is that it tends to conceal faults, and destroy responsibility." The Federalist No. 70, at 476 (Alexander Hamilton) (Jacob E. Cooke ed., 1961), cited in In re Sealed Case, 838 F.2d at 527 n.27 (Ginsburg, R.B., J., dissenting). Then-Judge Ginsburg explained that "[t]he unity of the executive branch was intended to serve the ends of responsibility and accountability." Id.

FN39 As a matter of practical reality, much of the federal government's

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

legislative activity is undertaken by officers and agencies outside the legislative branch (in the form of regulations), but as a rule such entities act under statutory delegation from Congress. The delegating legislation is, for Chadha purposes, the congressional exercise of legislative power. See Chadha, 462 U.S. at 953 n.16.

FN40 A statutory provision conditioning the executive's ability to take action on approval by one or both houses of Congress or by a congressional committee is as invalid as a provision enabling one of these bodies to "veto" executive action, and for the same reason: it is a legislative attempt to exercise authority beyond the legislative sphere in a mode not conforming to the requirements of bicameralism and presentment. See, e.g., American Fed'n of Gov't Employees v. Pierce, 697 F.2d 303, 306 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

FN41 We agree with the court of appeals in Lear Siegler that many separation of powers issues can properly be analyzed under either the Chadha rule (forbidding Congress to exercise legislative power except by bicameralism and presentment) or the anti-aggrandizement principle (forbidding Congress to exercise executive power). Attempts to resolve constitutional issues by categorizing an exercise of authority as "in its essence, 'legislative' or 'executive'," can be confusing and, in any event, miss the point that under either analysis, "the critical issue is whether Congress or its agent seeks to control . . . the execution of its enactments without respect to the Article I legislative process." 842 F.2d at 1108 (emphasis in original). In Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc., 501 U.S. 252, 276 (1991), the Supreme Court concluded that it was unnecessary to resolve the categorization issue because the exercise of authority was unconstitutional however it was viewed.

FN42 We also determined that the proposed regulations were not authorized by any of the statutes concerning the JCP. 8 Op. O.L.C. at 43-46. That point was not relevant to the constitutional analysis, however, since Congress cannot circumvent the bicameralism and presentment requirement by delegating legislative authority to a part or agent of itself even by means of a statute itself duly passed and presented.

FN43 In themselves report-and-wait mechanisms usually are valid, as we discuss more fully later in this memorandum.

FN44 The Supreme Court has reasoned that the "congressional power of inquiry" is necessary to "'enable [Congress] efficiently to exercise [the] legislative function[s] belonging to it under the Constitution."' Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 111 (1959) (quoting McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 160 (1927)). Like Congress's substantive powers to legislate -- which it exists only to serve -- the power of inquiry is "subject to the limitations placed by the Constitution on governmental action," id. at 112, including the anti-aggrandizement and general separation of powers principles.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

FN45 As the language of the Appointments Clause suggests, offices in the constitutional sense "are only those established or recognized by the Constitution or by act of Congress." Inventions International Exposition, 18 Op. Att'y Gen. 171, 171 (1885); see also id. ("the President cannot create an office").

FN46 The officers at issue in Buckley were the six voting members of the Federal Election Commission, four of whom were appointed by congressional officials and two by the President, subject to the approval of the Senate and the House of Representatives. The statutory scheme thus violated the Appointments Clause in two distinct ways, by vesting appointment power in officials not listed in the Clause and by subjecting presidential nominees to confirmation by the House. 424 U.S. at 126-27.

FN47 See Appointment of Assistant Secretary of State, 6 Op. Att'y Gen. 1, 1 (1853) ("without there be[ing] express enactment to the contrary . . . the appointment of any officer of the United States belongs to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate").

FN48 We do not state anything novel in observing that the Appointments Clause sometimes presents difficult questions of interpretation. Attorney General Legare remarked in an 1843 opinion that "[n]o points of our fundamental law are more difficult than those involved in this whole subject of appointments." Appointment and Removal of Inspectors of Customs, 4 Op. Att'y Gen. 162, 164 (1843).

FN49 In an opinion discussing an Appointments Clause issue, Attorney General Kennedy referred to Hartwell as providing the "classical definition pertaining to an officer." Communications Satellite Corporation, 42 Op. Att'y Gen. 165, 169 (1962). Hartwell itself cited several earlier opinions, including United States v. Maurice, 26 F. Cas. 1211 (C.C.D. Va. 1823) (No. 15,747) (Marshall, Circuit Justice), see 73 U.S. at 393 n.<<dagger>>, and in turn has been cited by numerous subsequent Supreme Court decisions, including United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508, 511-12 (1879), and Auffmordt v. Hedden, 137 U.S. 310, 327 (1890). These latter two decisions were cited with approval by the Court in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 125-26 & n.162 (1976) (per curiam).

FN50 In this memorandum, the term "officer" will be used to refer exclusively to "Officers of the United States" in the constitutional sense; other full-time government servants will be called "employees."

FN51 Germaine clearly was discussing the concept of "officer" in the constitutional, and not simply a generic, sense: the alternative basis for the holding was that the surgeon was not an officer because he was appointed by the Commissioner who, as the head of a bureau within the Interior Department, could not be a "Head of Department" with the authority to appoint officers. Id. at 510-11.

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Slip Copy
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

FN52 The post-Buckley Supreme Court has often assessed the validity of statutes that would starkly pose Appointments Clause issues if, in fact, the Court had adopted the position that wielding significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States, without more, requires appointment in conformity with that Clause. In none of these cases has the Court even hinted at the existence of an Appointments Clause issue. See, e.g., Thomas v. Union Carbide Agric. Prods. Co., 473 U.S. 568 (1985) (upholding statutory requirement that registrants under a federal regulatory scheme submit to binding arbitration conducted by a panel of arbitrators who are private individuals not appointed by one of the methods specified in the Appointments Clause and are subject only to limited judicial review); FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742 (1982) (upholding requirement that states enforce federal regulatory scheme relating to utilities); Lake Carriers' Ass'n v. Kelley, 456 U.S. 985 (1982) (mem.), aff'g 527 F. Supp. 1114 (E.D. Mich. 1981) (three-judge panel) (upholding statute that granted states authority to ban sewage emissions from all vessels); Train v. National Resources Defense Council, Inc., 421 U.S. 60 (1975) (construing provision of Clean Air Act that gave states authority to devise and enforce plans for achieving congressionally defined, national air quality standards).

FN53 Some recent opinions of this Office have read Buckley more broadly as repudiating the historical understanding of the Appointments Clause and endorsing the proposition we reject here -- that is, that all persons exercising significant federal authority, by virtue of that fact alone, must be appointed pursuant to the Appointments Clause. We are aware of four opinions in which our disagreement with this understanding of Buckley would cause us to reach a different conclusion on the Appointments Clause question presented. See Constitutionality of Subsection 4117(b) of Enrolled Bill H.R. 5835, the "Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990," 14 Op. O.L.C. 170, 171 (1990) (preliminary print) (statutory scheme under which congressional delegations and physicians' organizations of certain states exercise "significant authority" violates Appointments Clause); Constitutionality of the Qui Tam Provisions of the False Claims Act, 13 Op. O.L.C. 249, 264-65 (1989) (preliminary print) (provisions of False Claims Act authorizing qui tam suits by private parties violate Appointments Clause because qui tam relators exercise "significant governmental power"); Representation of the United States Sentencing Commission in Litigation, 12 Op. O.L.C. 21, 31-33 (1988) (preliminary print) (private party acting as counsel for United States agency must be appointed pursuant to Appointments Clause); Proposed Legislation to Establish the National Indian Gaming Commission, 11 Op. O.L.C. 73, 74 (1987) (Appointments Clause problems raised where state and local officials given authority to waive federal statute). Our conclusion that the more limited historical understanding of the Appointments Clause is correct requires us to disavow the Appointments Clause holdings of those opinions. To the extent that our current reading of Buckley is inconsistent with the Appointments Clause reasoning of other opinions of this office, that reasoning is superseded. See Common Legislative Encroachments on Executive Branch Constitutional Authority, 13 Op. O.L.C. 299, 300 (1989) (preliminary print).

Copr. © West 2000 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Source: All Sources : Secondary Legal : Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "executive privilege" and date(aft 1997) and nixon and congress (Edit Search)

*83 Minn. L. Rev. 1191, **

Copyright (c) 1999 Minnesota Law Review
Minnesota Law Review

May, 1999

83 Minn. L. Rev. 1191

LENGTH: 1820 words

SYMPOSIUM: A Response to Professor Johnsen

Mark J. Rozell *

* Ph.D. 1987, University of Virginia. Associate Professor of Politics, The Catholic University of America.

SUMMARY:
... I will nonetheless break precedent here to briefly object to Dawn Johnsen's essay. ... Then she says that I criticize the executive branch "when it reaches an accommodation with Congress." ... Either be serious about using executive privilege or don't use it at all. ... Professor Johnsen says in a footnote that I am wrong to suggest that the practice of keeping OLC legal opinions secret originated with the Bush presidency. ... She implies that I am in error to say that the Bush administration created a secret opinions policy to deny Congress access to a Justice Department memorandum. ... That Judge Norma Halloway Johnson reaffirmed the legitimacy of executive privilege was not exactly some kind of stirring victory for the White House. ... She also claims that there is a need to devote much attention to defining the proper scope and limits of executive privilege and to base decisions in this area on principles. Ultimately it is unclear in her essay whether disputes over executive privilege are in the neat theoretical world in which principles are the guide or in the land of give and take. ... Professor Johnsen's overriding argument is that my approach to executive privilege is "fundamentally misguided." ...

TEXT:
[*1191]

I generally do not believe that it is either necessary or fruitful to respond to responses. I will nonetheless break precedent here to briefly object to Dawn Johnsen's essay. In trying to pick apart my research she repeatedly both misrepresents the facts and my positions. Apparently only she sees the truth whereas others are guilty of mischaracterizations. In the end, she squanders a nice opportunity to contribute something valuable to the debate over executive privilege. Sai Prakash shows the way and though I disagree with his interpretation, clearly Professor Johnsen can learn much from him about good scholarship and argumentative tone.

In light of Professor Johnsen's previous position in the Office of Legal Counsel for the Clinton administration she might feel a bit defensive about the President's actions on executive privilege. It was her job to represent the President's interests in these matters and that surely must have been a tall order. But she destroys her credibility as an academic discussant by presenting a heavy-handed and overly defensive justification for presidential actions with which no credible scholar to my knowledge would agree.

Perhaps she makes a good point here and there in the essay, as many of these more recent events are open to interpretation and all of us are struggling to work with an incomplete record of information on issues of executive privilege. I might, for example, concede that the President's stand on the Freeh memorandum had some merit and I certainly agree that the Burton committee did not always engage in good faith negotiations during that controversy. But in her zeal to attack my presentation of the events she misses the key points that I make: (1) that it weakens executive privilege for a president to assert that power as some kind of opening bid in a negotiating process and then to back down; and (2) that the congressional [*1192] power of investigation must override executive privilege unless the president's claim meets the proper standards for asserting that power.

Neither time nor space allows a full response to Professor Johnsen's many misrepresentations of my article. I would nonetheless like to point out some egregious examples. She claims that I am "harshly critical" of presidents and that I don't convey a "pattern" of criticism. Yet elsewhere she discerns a pattern and then objects to the pattern that I developed (of modern presidents inventing other bases for executive privilege to hide embarrassments and then frequently capitulating, doing further damage to this power). She wrongly conveys the impression that I am dogmatically opposed to presidents using executive privilege and that I am somehow concerned with adding up wins and losses in presidential-congressional battles over access to information. [1] She completely misstates my view in suggesting that I do not properly respect the needs of candid advice within the White House. She claims that I misstate the applicable test of whether Congress's request for information overrides a claim of executive privilege when in fact I am merely presenting my own normative assessments and not describing the controlling case law. Just because I disagree with a judicial interpretation on the proper use of executive privilege that does not mean, as Professor Johnsen claims, that I misstate some facts or ignore some piece of evidence. [2]

Elsewhere Professor Johnsen discusses the issue of political accommodation as though I am completely oblivious to its role in resolving inter-branch disputes. Then she says that I criticize the executive branch "when it reaches an accommodation with Congress." Not only a contradiction, that statement is just flat-out wrong. I criticize presidents who say that they [*1193] are taking a principled stand and then back down because it is politically expedient to do so in the short-term. Either be serious about using executive privilege or don't use it at all. That power should be rarely used and only for the most compelling reasons and is not to be exercised as something in a lawyer's arsenal of tactics to bid with against adversaries.

Professor Johnsen says in a footnote that I am wrong to suggest that the practice of keeping OLC legal opinions secret originated with the Bush presidency. I never said that. She implies that I am in error to say that the Bush administration created a secret opinions policy to deny Congress access to a Justice Department memorandum. But that is exactly what happened in one case. [3]

Professor Johnsen blasts me for speculating about presidential motives in asserting executive privilege, although she discusses motives herself. She tries to score some rhetorical points by comparing my criticisms of President Clinton's actions to those of the Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr. I can understand how in the current overheated political environment this comparison is supposed to be the kiss of death, but let's not forget that we're contributing works of scholarship here and not scoring political points. Besides, Starr prevailed on most of the various privilege issues before the courts, so perhaps I should wear the comparison as a badge of honor. Yet Professor Johnsen suggests that the White House, not the OIC, prevailed in the court on the issue of executive privilege. That Judge Norma Halloway Johnson reaffirmed the legitimacy of executive privilege was not exactly some kind of stirring victory for the White House. Does anyone other than Professor Johnsen actually believe that the President undertook these battles merely for the purpose of protecting the constitutionality of executive privilege rather than as a delaying tactic?

Cannot she acknowledge that the Clinton White House made at least some mistakes in refusing to release documents or in the efforts to prevent certain individuals from testifying before [*1194] the grand jury? By defending Clinton's every action Professor Johnsen surely raises doubts about her own objectivity.

In criticizing my approach to executive privilege Professor Johnsen writes: "The reality of congressional oversight of the executive branch is not a neat theoretical world but one that requires the messy give and take of negotiations." We can all agree to that. I devoted the better part of a book arguing the very point that the messy give and take of the separation of powers system is the only mechanism for resolving executive privilege disputes. [4] That is why I don't believe that Congress should adopt statutory guidelines on executive privilege. But again Professor Johnsen contradicts herself. She also claims that there is a need to devote much attention to defining the proper scope and limits of executive privilege and to base decisions in this area on principles. [5] Ultimately it is unclear in her essay whether disputes over executive privilege are in the neat theoretical world in which principles are the guide or in the land of give and take. She asserts some of her own guidelines but they are so vague it is unclear how they might help to resolve executive privilege disputes. How do the guidelines of greater "flexibility," "balance," and "compromise" get us any closer to understanding how to resolve these disputes?

Professor Johnsen's overriding argument is that my approach to executive privilege is "fundamentally misguided." Ultimately she undercuts her own argument. She says that she agrees with me on the basic legitimacy of executive privilege; that it is proper to focus such research on legislative-executive disputes rather than judicial-executive ones; that in a democratic system the presumption must be in favor of openness but that presidents have secrecy needs; that Nixon created an imbalance against executive privilege; and that Congress should not pass statutory guidelines on executive privilege. How can she agree with almost all of my major arguments and then say that my approach is "fundamentally misguided?" [6]

FOOTNOTES:

n1. This criticism is truly ironic. I wrote my book on executive privilege directly as a challenge to Raoul Berger's dogmatically anti-executive privilege tone. I recognize the legitimacy of executive privilege, when properly invoked. If there is any sense that the current article conveys an anti-presidential tone, it is only because of the particular actions of presidents in the post-Watergate period - the focus of this work.

n2. Furthermore, just because the President's Attorney General sides with the President in a dispute with Congress doesn't mean that the President was right and Congress wrong. In the particular controversy to which Professor Johnsen refers, Attorney General Reno indeed cited the controlling case law but in so doing rendered an incorrect interpretation as I explain in the essay.

n3. See Department of Justice Authorization for Appropriations, Fiscal Year 1992, Before the Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, 102d Cong., at 76-85 (1991) (statement of Steven R. Ross, General Counsel to the Clerk of the House of Representatives). If I follow her point in footnote 5, Professor Johnsen is suggesting that I argue that the secret opinions policy set the precedent for the denying to Congress of secret OLC legal opinions. That is an erroneous reading of my essay and I cannot understand how she came to that conclusion.

n4. Mark J. Rozell, Executive Privilege: The Dilemma of Secrecy and Democratic Accountability (1994).

n5. Professor Johnsen is disturbed that I do not spend what she considers enough space in this essay to fully explain the proper scope and limits of executive privilege. I have written another essay on that topic alone, Executive Privilege: Definition and Standards of Application, Presidential Studies Quarterly (forthcoming December 1999).

n6. Although Professor Johnsen says that she agrees with me on the issue of openness, I see absolutely nothing in her article to lend credibility to that statement. She is in favor of resisting legislative and independent counsel claims for information, giving ground over time only through what she calls a process of "accommodation." The process of accommodation that she favors is entirely one-sided.

Source: All Sources : Secondary Legal : Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "executive privilege" and date(aft 1997) and nixon and congress (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, February 10, 2001 - 5:31 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Source: All Sources : Secondary Legal : Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "executive privilege" and date(aft 1997) and nixon and congress (Edit Search)

*83 Minn. L. Rev. 1191, **

Copyright (c) 1999 Minnesota Law Review
Minnesota Law Review

May, 1999

83 Minn. L. Rev. 1191

LENGTH: 1820 words

SYMPOSIUM: A Response to Professor Johnsen

Mark J. Rozell *

* Ph.D. 1987, University of Virginia. Associate Professor of Politics, The Catholic University of America.

SUMMARY:
... I will nonetheless break precedent here to briefly object to Dawn Johnsen's essay. ... Then she says that I criticize the executive branch "when it reaches an accommodation with Congress." ... Either be serious about using executive privilege or don't use it at all. ... Professor Johnsen says in a footnote that I am wrong to suggest that the practice of keeping OLC legal opinions secret originated with the Bush presidency. ... She implies that I am in error to say that the Bush administration created a secret opinions policy to deny Congress access to a Justice Department memorandum. ... That Judge Norma Halloway Johnson reaffirmed the legitimacy of executive privilege was not exactly some kind of stirring victory for the White House. ... She also claims that there is a need to devote much attention to defining the proper scope and limits of executive privilege and to base decisions in this area on principles. Ultimately it is unclear in her essay whether disputes over executive privilege are in the neat theoretical world in which principles are the guide or in the land of give and take. ... Professor Johnsen's overriding argument is that my approach to executive privilege is "fundamentally misguided." ...

TEXT:
[*1191]

I generally do not believe that it is either necessary or fruitful to respond to responses. I will nonetheless break precedent here to briefly object to Dawn Johnsen's essay. In trying to pick apart my research she repeatedly both misrepresents the facts and my positions. Apparently only she sees the truth whereas others are guilty of mischaracterizations. In the end, she squanders a nice opportunity to contribute something valuable to the debate over executive privilege. Sai Prakash shows the way and though I disagree with his interpretation, clearly Professor Johnsen can learn much from him about good scholarship and argumentative tone.

In light of Professor Johnsen's previous position in the Office of Legal Counsel for the Clinton administration she might feel a bit defensive about the President's actions on executive privilege. It was her job to represent the President's interests in these matters and that surely must have been a tall order. But she destroys her credibility as an academic discussant by presenting a heavy-handed and overly defensive justification for presidential actions with which no credible scholar to my knowledge would agree.

REV_00260078

Perhaps she makes a good point here and there in the essay, as many of these more recent events are open to interpretation and all of us are struggling to work with an incomplete record of information on issues of executive privilege. I might, for example, concede that the President's stand on the Freeh memorandum had some merit and I certainly agree that the Burton committee did not always engage in good faith negotiations during that controversy. But in her zeal to attack my presentation of the events she misses the key points that I make: (1) that it weakens executive privilege for a president to assert that power as some kind of opening bid in a negotiating process and then to back down; and (2) that the congressional [*1192] power of investigation must override executive privilege unless the president's claim meets the proper standards for asserting that power.

Neither time nor space allows a full response to Professor Johnsen's many misrepresentations of my article. I would nonetheless like to point out some egregious examples. She claims that I am "harshly critical" of presidents and that I don't convey a "pattern" of criticism. Yet elsewhere she discerns a pattern and then objects to the pattern that I developed (of modern presidents inventing other bases for executive privilege to hide embarrassments and then frequently capitulating, doing further damage to this power). She wrongly conveys the impression that I am dogmatically opposed to presidents using executive privilege and that I am somehow concerned with adding up wins and losses in presidential-congressional battles over access to information. [1] She completely misstates my view in suggesting that I do not properly respect the needs of candid advice within the White House. She claims that I misstate the applicable test of whether Congress's request for information overrides a claim of executive privilege when in fact I am merely presenting my own normative assessments and not describing the controlling case law. Just because I disagree with a judicial interpretation on the proper use of executive privilege that does not mean, as Professor Johnsen claims, that I misstate some facts or ignore some piece of evidence. [2]

Elsewhere Professor Johnsen discusses the issue of political accommodation as though I am completely oblivious to its role in resolving inter-branch disputes. Then she says that I criticize the executive branch "when it reaches an accommodation with Congress." Not only a contradiction, that statement is just flat-out wrong. I criticize presidents who say that they [*1193] are taking a principled stand and then back down because it is politically expedient to do so in the short-term. Either be serious about using executive privilege or don't use it at all. That power should be rarely used and only for the most compelling reasons and is not to be exercised as something in a lawyer's arsenal of tactics to bid with against adversaries.

Professor Johnsen says in a footnote that I am wrong to suggest that the practice of keeping OLC legal opinions secret originated with the Bush presidency. I never said that. She implies that I am in error to say that the Bush administration created a secret opinions policy to deny Congress access to a Justice Department memorandum. But that is exactly what happened in one case. [3]

Professor Johnsen blasts me for speculating about presidential motives in asserting executive privilege, although she discusses motives herself. She tries to score some rhetorical points by comparing my criticisms of President Clinton's actions to those of the Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr. I can understand how in the current overheated political environment this comparison is supposed to be the kiss of death, but let's not forget that we're contributing works of scholarship here and not scoring political points. Besides, Starr prevailed on most of the various privilege issues before the courts, so perhaps I should wear the comparison as a badge of honor. Yet Professor Johnsen suggests that the White House, not the OIC, prevailed in the court on the issue of executive privilege. That Judge Norma Halloway Johnson reaffirmed the legitimacy of executive privilege was not exactly some kind of stirring victory for the White House. Does anyone other than Professor Johnsen actually believe that the President undertook these battles merely for the purpose of protecting the constitutionality of executive privilege rather than as a delaying tactic?

REV_00260079

Cannot she acknowledge that the Clinton White House made at least some mistakes in refusing to release documents or in the efforts to prevent certain individuals from testifying before [*1194] the grand jury? By defending Clinton's every action Professor Johnsen surely raises doubts about her own objectivity.

In criticizing my approach to executive privilege Professor Johnsen writes: "The reality of congressional oversight of the executive branch is not a neat theoretical world but one that requires the messy give and take of negotiations." We can all agree to that. I devoted the better part of a book arguing the very point that the messy give and take of the separation of powers system is the only mechanism for resolving executive privilege disputes. [4] That is why I don't believe that Congress should adopt statutory guidelines on executive privilege. But again Professor Johnsen contradicts herself. She also claims that there is a need to devote much attention to defining the proper scope and limits of executive privilege and to base decisions in this area on principles. [5] Ultimately it is unclear in her essay whether disputes over executive privilege are in the neat theoretical world in which principles are the guide or in the land of give and take. She asserts some of her own guidelines but they are so vague it is unclear how they might help to resolve executive privilege disputes. How do the guidelines of greater "flexibility," "balance," and "compromise" get us any closer to understanding how to resolve these disputes?

Professor Johnsen's overriding argument is that my approach to executive privilege is "fundamentally misguided." Ultimately she undercuts her own argument. She says that she agrees with me on the basic legitimacy of executive privilege; that it is proper to focus such research on legislative-executive disputes rather than judicial-executive ones; that in a democratic system the presumption must be in favor of openness but that presidents have secrecy needs; that Nixon created an imbalance against executive privilege; and that Congress should not pass statutory guidelines on executive privilege. How can she agree with almost all of my major arguments and then say that my approach is "fundamentally misguided?" [6]

FOOTNOTES:

n1. This criticism is truly ironic. I wrote my book on executive privilege directly as a challenge to Raoul Berger's dogmatically anti-executive privilege tone. I recognize the legitimacy of executive privilege, when properly invoked. If there is any sense that the current article conveys an anti-presidential tone, it is only because of the particular actions of presidents in the post-Watergate period - the focus of this work.

n2. Furthermore, just because the President's Attorney General sides with the President in a dispute with Congress doesn't mean that the President was right and Congress wrong. In the particular controversy to which Professor Johnsen refers, Attorney General Reno indeed cited the controlling case law but in so doing rendered an incorrect interpretation as I explain in the essay.

n3. See Department of Justice Authorization for Appropriations, Fiscal Year 1992, Before the Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, 102d Cong., at 76-85 (1991) (statement of Steven R. Ross, General Counsel to the Clerk of the House of Representatives). If I follow her point in footnote 5, Professor Johnsen is suggesting that I argue that the secret opinions policy set the precedent for the denying to Congress of secret OLC legal opinions. That is an erroneous reading of my essay and I cannot understand how she came to that conclusion.

n4. Mark J. Rozell, Executive Privilege: The Dilemma of Secrecy and Democratic Accountability (1994).

REV_00260080

n5. Professor Johnsen is disturbed that I do not spend what she considers enough space in this essay to fully explain the proper scope and limits of executive privilege. I have written another essay on that topic alone, Executive Privilege: Definition and Standards of Application, Presidential Studies Quarterly (forthcoming December 1999).

n6. Although Professor Johnsen says that she agrees with me on the issue of openness, I see absolutely nothing in her article to lend credibility to that statement. She is in favor of resisting legislative and independent counsel claims for information, giving ground over time only through what she calls a process of "accommodation." The process of accommodation that she favors is entirely one-sided.

Source: All Sources : Secondary Legal : Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "executive privilege" and date(aft 1997) and nixon and congress (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, February 10, 2001 - 5:31 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legislative Affairs

Office of the Assistant Attorney General — Washington, D.C. 20530

June 21, 2000

The Honorable Henry J. Hyde
Chairman
Committee on Judiciary
U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20515

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This responds to your letter, dated February 29, 2000, which questioned the Department's decision to decline to answer certain questions posed in your letter of November 8, 1999, regarding Leonard Peltier's clemency petition.

The Department's position is that clemency is within the exclusive authority of the President under the Constitution, and our responses to the House Judiciary Committee and other congressional committees are consistent with that constitutional mandate. Our willingness to provide information to Congress last year relating to the President's grant of clemency to certain Puerto Rican Nationalists is consistent with our discussions with you and your staff on the Peltier matter. In the Puerto Rican Nationalist matter, the congressional oversight requests were made after the President had already granted clemency and were closely related to a congressional oversight interest in an after-the-fact assessment of the impact of the President's clemency decision on future law enforcement efforts against terrorism. Congress' oversight interest does not extend to the clemency review and deliberative process that led to that presidential decision. In advising the President that he was legally entitled to invoke executive privilege in response to a congressional subpoena seeking information about his clemency grant, the Attorney General stated that "[a] compelling case can be made . . . that Congress has no authority whatsoever to review a President's clemency decision," and that it therefore "appears that Congress' oversight authority does not extend to the process employed in connection with a particular clemency decision, to the materials generated or the discussions that took place as part of that decision, or to the advice or views the President received in connection with a clemency decision." Letter of Attorney General Janet Reno to the President, Sept. 16, 1999, at 2-3.

Your outstanding questions concern precisely such matters. They all are directed at the Department's activities with respect to the pending Peltier clemency request, and seek detailed information concerning the work the Department has undertaken in connection with that request and any communications the Department has had with the White House concerning the request. These questions concern only the clemency review process leading up to a possible presidential decision. It is our position that questions about the conduct and substance of any particular clemency review - regardless of whether the clemency request is pending or closed - are beyond Congress' oversight authority.

REV_00260082

The Department advised the Senate Judiciary Committee earlier this year that legislation designed to regulate aspects of the Department's collection and provision of information and advice to the President on clemency matters is unconstitutional because the President's pardon power is an exclusive presidential prerogative that is not subject to congressional encroachment. Since Congress' oversight power is only derivative of its legislative power, it naturally follows that because Congress cannot legislate regarding the process by which the Department assists the President on clemency matters, Congress' oversight authority does not extend to that process. See Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 111-12 (1959) ("Since Congress may only investigate into those areas in which it may potentially legislate or appropriate, it cannot inquire into matters which are within the exclusive province of one of the other branches of the Government."); United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 128, 147 (1871) ("To the executive alone is intrusted the power of pardon"); see also Public Citizen v. Department of Justice, 491 U.S. 440, 485 (1989) (Kennedy, J., concurring) (reaffirming that pardon power is "commit[ted] . . . to the exclusive control of the President").

Mr. Chairman, we have the highest regard for your Committee and its responsible performance of its oversight and other important functions. However, in light of the constitutional limitations under which we must operate in this matter, we are respectfully responding that your inquiries go toward an exclusive Executive function, and it is our view that we are compelled to respond as we have above.

Sincerely,

Robert Raben
Assistant Attorney General

cc: The Honorable John Conyers, Jr.
Ranking Minority Member

REV_00260083

Duties of their respective Offices." U.S. Const. art. 2, § 2. That clause is evidence that the Framers viewed the President's ability to obtain advice from his principal officers as an essential component of executive power. See Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 810 & n.13 (1982) (principal officers' "essential roles are acknowledged by the Constitution") (citing the Opinions Clause); Freytag v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 501 U.S. 868, 918 (1991) (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (the purpose of the Opinions Clause "was to assure the President's ability to get a written opinion on important matters"); see also Myers, 272 U.S. at 117 ("[T]he President alone and unaided could not execute the laws. He must execute them by the assistance of subordinates."). We are concerned that the bill may unconstitutionally condition the President's power to obtain opinions from his principal officers by requiring that the Attorney General undertake a detailed investigation to gather and make available to the President specific information each time he seeks her advice in his exercise of his exclusive pardon authority.

Thank you for the opportunity to present our views on this important matter. If we may be of additional assistance, we trust that you will not hesitate to call upon us. The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there is no objection from the standpoint of the Administration's program to the presentation of this report.

Sincerely,

Robert Raben
Assistant Attorney General

IDENTICAL LETTER TO BE SENT TO THE RANKING MINORITY MEMBER, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

FEB-01-2001 17:16 DOJ/OFC OF LEGAL COUNSEL 202 305 8524 P.01/13
REV_00260084

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

June 16, 1992

Dear Mr. Chairman:

I am writing in response to your letter of June 11 to the President regarding your June 23 scheduled hearing. In that letter, you invited the Administration to send appropriate Administration officials to testify. We would propose to send Mr. Robert Mueller, Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, Department of Justice, and Mr. Laurence Urgenson, Acting Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, Department of Justice. In addition, I would note that the Administration has previously testified in great detail regarding pre-Desert Storm Iraq policy, the administration of the relevant programs and related investigations. I attach a copy of this testimony and ask that it be made available to all Committee Members before the hearing.

Your letter also requested the appearance of Mr. Nicholas Rostov, Special Assistant to the President and Senior Director for Legal Affairs, National Security Council; and Mr. C. Boyden Gray, Counsel to the President. As I advised the Chairman of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs in response to a similar request, it is the longstanding practice of the Executive Branch to decline requests for testimony by members of the President's personal staff. For that reason, I must decline your request for personal testimony by Messrs. Gray and Rostov. In light of the unusual circumstances presented here, however, the Administration is prepared to work with you to develop an alternative, mutually acceptable mechanism for making available to Members of the Committee the White House officials whose testimony you have sought.

Finally, attached to your letter was a request for documents from the Department of Agriculture, the State Department, the Department of Justice, the White House, the Department of the Treasury/U.S. Customs Service, and the Department of Commerce. In order to expedite a response to that request, we have forwarded it to the listed Departments outside the White House, and have directed them to respond directly to the Committee. In light of the large number of documents requested, it is unlikely that they or the White House will be able to meet the June 18 response date, but we have requested that they respond as quickly as possible.

FEB-01-2001 17:17 DOJ/OFC OF LEGAL COUNSEL 202 305 8524 P.04/15

REV_00260085

Sincerely,

Nicholas E. Calio
Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs

Chairman Jack Brooks
Committee on the Judiciary
House of Representatives
2138 Rayburn House Office Building
Washington, D.C. 20515-6218

cc: The Honorable Hamilton Fish, Jr.

attachments

FEB-01-2001 17:17 DOJ/OFC OF LEGAL COUNSEL 202 305 0524 P.03/13

REV_00260086

O'MELVENY & MYERS

555 13TH STREET, N.W.
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20004-1109

(202) 383-5388

June 11th
1992

600,000-013

The Honorable C. Boyden Gray
Counsel to the President of the
United States
The White House
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Boyden:

Thank you for the clarification today. As I understand it, Senator Howard Baker, Frank Carlucci and similarly situated senior advisers to President Reagan are authorized to meet informally with Members and staff of the Senate Select Committee on POW/MIA affairs to discuss conversations they may have had with Mr. Peret and other non-White House personnel about events in 1986 or 1987, but that such discussions shall not disclose conversations with the President, the Vice President or other White House officials.

In addition, consistent with longstanding White House policy, Senator Baker, Frank Carlucci and other former White House officials are not authorized to provide formal testimony to the Committee about matters occurring during their White House service.

We understand your office is continuing to study this matter and that we may receive additional guidance.

I would appreciate receiving written confirmation of the foregoing. Thank you very much.

Sincerely,

Arthur B. Culvahouse, Jr.

cc: The Honorable Howard H. Baker, Jr.

REV_00260087

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

June 17, 1992

Dear A.B.:

Thank you for your letter. We do not object to Senator Baker and other similarly situated former advisors to the President meeting informally with Members and staff of the Senate Select Committee on POW/MIA Affairs to discuss conversations they may have had with Mr. H. Ross Perot and other non-Executive branch officials. We are not prepared, however, to make a general waiver of Executive privilege with respect to their conversations with the President, the Vice President or other Executive branch officials, including those outside the White House.

In addition, it is long-standing White House policy not to assent to formal testimony to Congressional committees by former White House officials about matters occurring during their White House service.

Finally, we are reserving the option to assert Executive privilege on a specific matter to protect the Presidency. However, as you know, such decisions are not made in the abstract without a specific matter in dispute.

I hope this clarifies our policy. If you have any questions, please call me.

Sincerely,

C. Boyden Gray
Counsel to the President

Mr. Arthur B. Culvahouse
O'Melveny & Myers
555 13th Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20004-1109

REV_00260088

U.S. Department of Justice
Office of the Deputy Attorney General

OLC

The Deputy Attorney General

Washington, D.C. 20530

April 19, 1983

Senator Orrin G. Hatch
Chairman
United States Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources
Washington, D. C. 20510

Senator Edward M. Kennedy
Ranking Minority Member
United States Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources
Washington, D. C. 20510

Dear Chairman Hatch and Senator Kennedy:

This is in response to your letter of March 23, 1983 reiterating your desire to obtain testimony from the Counsel to the President, Fred F. Fielding, with respect to your ongoing investigation of the process, in January and February of 1981, surrounding the confirmation by the United States Senate, of Secretary of Labor Raymond J. Donovan.

Before responding directly to your request for sworn testimony from the Counsel to the President, I believe that it is appropriate to note that, as I am sure you will agree, the Administration has made every effort to cooperate with your Committee's lengthy investigation of this matter. The Department of Justice, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, has provided vast quantities of information to your Committee, including in many instances, access to raw data in the Bureau's possession. The Bureau has also answered numerous written questions, provided you with summaries and other data relative to its internal investigations and has made two of its officials available to your Committee at hearings for lengthy sworn testimony regarding this matter. In addition, the White House has provided your Committee with copies of documents in its possession and has prepared and supplied you with a detailed chronology of relevant events. We are not aware of any previous occasion when so much information has been provided by the Executive Branch to a Senate Committee relative to an appointee's confirmation in either the pre- or post-confirmation period.

FEB-01-2001 17:18 DOJ/OFC OF LEGAL COUNSEL 202 305 8524 P.08/13

REV_00260089

In addition to the information which the Administration has supplied to you directly, we understand that you have been given access to the fruits of the investigation of Special Prosecutor Leon Silverman, an exhaustive investigation into all allegations regarding Mr. Donovan that consumed months of the time of numerous investigators, involved the assistance of a grand jury, and cost hundreds of thousands of dollars.

In short, we believe that the Administration has been most cooperative with your investigation and that your Committee has been provided an extraordinary and unprecedented quantity of information regarding Mr. Donovan and his confirmation. We, of course, remain willing to assist you and your Committee in any reasonable way.

As you know, our concern regarding your desire for the sworn testimony of Mr. Fielding is based upon important principles relative to the powers, duties and prerogatives of the Presidency. We share with previous Presidents and their advisers serious reservations regarding the implications for established constitutional doctrines arising from the separation of powers of a Congressional demand for the sworn testimony of close presidential advisers on the White House staff.

Presidents have historically resisted efforts to obtain sworn testimony from their closest and most immediate advisers on the White House Staff. Congress has customarily honored the President's wishes relative to such matters as a matter of comity toward a respected co-equal branch of government. As you know, these principles do not spring from partisan considerations or any other transitory concerns. The position to which we adhere has been taken consistently by Presidents of either party and has been respected by Congress irrespective of the party in control or the subject matter of the inquiry.

The Counsel to the President serves the President solely and exclusively. He is available for and provides legal advice to the President. His professional responsibility is directly to the President. The President must be able to count on the constant availability of his Counsel, and on the total confidentiality of his services. As an institutional matter, the President cannot permit his Counsel to provide sworn testimony to the Legislative Branch regarding the performance of his duties.

FEB-01-2001 17:18 DOJ/OFC OF LEGAL COUNSEL 202 305 8524 P.09/15

REV_00260090

The Administration wishes to continue to cooperate with your Committee's inquiry and we support your effort to bring this inquiry to a close. To accomplish this, if you feel that you need information beyond that already supplied to you relating to the White House's actions during the confirmation process, we have suggested that Mr. Fielding, consistent with the foregoing principles, would be willing to provide written responses to a reasonable number of relevant written inquiries which you may wish to pose in concluding your inquiry. If this alternative is agreeable to you, I urge that you articulate such a set of questions in a letter and I will undertake to arrange for you to receive written responses to those questions.

Sincerely,

Edward C. Schmults
Deputy Attorney General

FEB-01-2001 17:18 DOJ/OFC OF LEGAL COUNSEL 202 305 8524 P.10/13

REV_00260091

TOTAL P.15

The New York Times

DATE: 2-1-01
PAGE: A23

Essay

WILLIAM SAFIRE

Isn't It Rich?

Clinton sent in the clowns.

WASHINGTON

Mark Rich, the billionaire on the lam for 17 years for helping Iranian kidnappers and South African white supremacists evade U.S. sanctions, was unable to buy off Presidents Reagan or Bush.

But then he hired Jack ("Tell 'em nuthin' ") Quinn, the former White House counsel privy to Bill Clinton's darkest secrets, for what Quinn says is a mere "low six figures." Rich's former wife contributed over $1 million to Democratic campaigns, while Rich's direction of some ill-gotten gains to charities induced Israel's Ehud Barak to use up his one big pardon favor with Clinton, dooming the unrich Jonathan Pollard to a life in jail.

Result: the most flagrant abuse of the presidential pardon power in U.S. history. Even Clinton stalwarts are openly disgusted at their man's departing display of shamelessness. But Rich's hired guns in public relations and the law will soon claim that "every president did it" or that "Rich was persecuted by evil prosecutors."

How can Clinton's final presidential wrong be righted? A constitutional amendment to restrict the undemocratic kingly power is far off, and this unpardonable pardon can never be undone. But though justice in this case is denied, truth can be served, and the truth can hurt Rich and the perpetrators of his pardon.

Congressional hearings will begin next week to determine how the end run was made around all normal procedures. To display nonpartisanship, Dan Burton's Government Reform Committee should call a predecessor chairman, John Conyers, who held hearings a decade ago into Republican failures to bring Rich to trial.

A threshold question: Why did Clinton decide the case on a one-sided presentation by Rich's lawyer, Quinn, with no analysis from Justice's pardon attorney, Roger Adams? Why was Rich's prosecutor in the Southern District of New York, Mary Jo White, kept in the dark rather than asked for her rebuttal?

Quinn says, "I notified the deputy attorney general two months before the pardon was granted." That would be Eric Holder, who is now stonewalling. If Holder was informed, did he then promptly notify the pardon attorney and prosecutor — or did he presume Clinton did not want to see the case against Rich?

Quinn, who slipped past Clinton's revolving-door ethics rule on a clause written by the unpardoned Web Hubbell, told NBC's Tim Russert that "the comments of the Justice Department, when asked about this by the White House ... contributed to its being granted." But who at Justice advised what person at the White House that Rich should be pardoned, and how were "those comments," if such existed, transmitted to Clinton?

I asked Quinn for specifics yesterday. He replied: "Mr. Holder told me, after the fact, he had said to the White House he was 'neutral, leaning positive' on the pardon. The president himself confirmed to me that was the case, and said that had they not had that view from Justice, the pardon would not have been granted."

So, according to Quinn, "the president himself" chose Holder to be the fall guy. When did Quinn, who apparently wants company in leading Clinton into this mess, notify White House Counsel Beth Nolan that Holder was on board? Quinn insists he told counsels Nolan and Bruce Lindsey twice — in mid-December and mid-January — to seek Holder's views: "Contrary to what you hear, this was no surprise. They were working with me."

Congress will want to know if the former Mrs. Rich, a major Clinton contributor who begged Clinton for Rich's pardon, was used as a conduit for the pardonee's funds. And were the C.I.A. and National Security Agency asked if Rich's companies were taped doing business recently with Saddam Hussein, Muammar el-Qaddafi or other previous associates?

If Rich attempts to enter the U.S., House and Senate committees will subpoena him to testify under oath about his pardon campaign. Rich cannot plead the Fifth Amendment because Clinton's pardon gives him immunity. Quinn will advise him to cooperate, "including appearances," but not wishing to risk fresh perjury charges if caught lying about this deal, the unrepentant billionaire may refuse to testify. Chairman Burton could then ask a federal court to jail him for contempt of Congress.

Money doesn't buy pardons from prospective crimes. Send in that clown. □

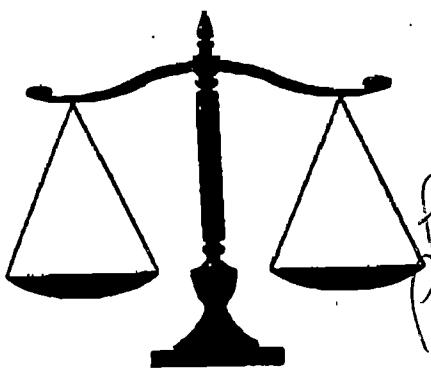
21

FEB-01-2001 17:19 DOJ/OIC OF LEGAL COUNSEL 202 305 0024 P.15/15

REV_00260092

Fax Transmission

Paul P. Colborn
Special Counsel
United States Department of Justice
Office of Legal Counsel
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20530
Phone: 202-514-2048
Fax: 202-305-8524



To: Brett Kavanaugh Date: 4-3-01

Office # ( ) Pages: 21 (including cover sheet)

Fax#: ( ) 456-6279

Subject: Revising Cutler/Rivers memo

Comments: Here are the materials I mentioned. You'll notice I previously sent them to Chris B. in February.

Brett - Please let Paul know your correct fax #
Thanks

* -COMM. JOURNAL- * DATE FEB-06-2001  TIME 17:17  P.01

MODE = MEMORY TRANSMISSION START=FEB-06 17:11 END=FEB-06 17:17

FILE NO.= 091

STN NO.	COM	ABBR NO.	STATION NAME/TEL.NO.	PAGES	DURATION
001	OK	8	94562146	020/020	00:06'37"

-DOJ/OFC OF LEGAL COUNSEL -

* - -  - 202 305 8524- *********

Fax Transmission

Paul P. Colborn
Special Counsel
United States Department of Justice
Office of Legal Counsel
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20530
Phone: 202-514-2048
Fax: 202-305-8524

To: Chris Bartolomucci Date: 2/6/01

Office # ( ) 456-7963 Pages: 20 (including cover sheet)

Fax#: ( ) 456-2146

Subject: Executive Privilege Materials

Comments: Here are the Reagan Memo, the Cutler & Mikva Memos, and documents generated in connection with preparation of a Quern Memo to replace Cutler/Mikva. I had thought there was a draft Ruff memo, but the most recent draft I've found is a 5/7/96 Quern memo.

Also attached is a never-finalized memo concerning executive privilege in the litigation context. This 8/4/94 draft represented a minor revision of a draft from Bush I.

REV_00260094

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Administrative Agency Materials : US Attorney General Opinions
Terms: ("fbi" or "federal bureau of investigation")and director and acting and confirm! (Edit Search)

*1996 OLC LEXIS 6, **

OPINION OF THE OFFICE OF LEGAL COUNSEL

THE CONSTITUTIONAL SEPARATION OF POWERS BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS

This memorandum provides an overview of the constitutional issues that periodically arise concerning the relationship between the executive and legislative branches of the federal government. Although that relationship is shaped in part by the policy and political concerns of the President and Congress of the day, the political interaction between the President and Congress takes place within an enduring constitutional framework that confers powers and responsibilities on both elected branches. In this memorandum we discuss the general principles underlying separation of powers analysis, and we address certain specific questions that have arisen in the past. Any set of examples is necessarily illustrative rather than exhaustive, however, and the Office of Legal Counsel is always available to assist in reviewing legislation or other congressional action for potential separation of powers issues. This memorandum supersedes a 1989 memorandum that the Office of Legal Counsel provided to the General Counsels' Consultative Group. See Common Legislative Encroachments on Executive Branch Constitutional Authority, 13 Op. O.L.C. 299 (1989) (preliminary print). While we agree with many of the conclusions of that document, we have determined that subsequent decisions by the Supreme Court and certain differences in approach to the issues make it appropriate to revisit and update the Office's general advice on separation of powers issues.

1996 OLC LEXIS 6

May 7, 1996

CORE TERMS: appointment, duty, appointed, removal, inferior, entity, federal government, anti-aggrandizement, appoint, presidential, tenure, presentment, advice, bicameralism, per curiam, delegation, legislative branch, vacancy, incumbent, temporary, arbitrator, constitutional authority, secretary, recess, memorandum, Vacancies Act, power to remove, appointee, regulation, reporting

ADDRESSEE:
[*1]

Memorandum for the General Counsels of the Federal Government

OPINIONBY: DELLINGER

OPINION:
Constitutional Separation of PowersOpinion of the Office of Legal Counsel I. General Principles

The Constitution reflects a fundamental conviction that governmental "power is of an encroaching nature, and that it ought to be effectually restrained from passing the limits assigned to it." The Federalist No. 48, at 332 (James Madison) (Jacob E. Cooke ed., 1961), quoted in Metropolitan Washington Airports Auth. ("MWAA") v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc., 501 U.S. 252, 273 (1991). The founders, not content to rely on paper definitions of the rights secured to the people, "viewed the principle of separation of powers consistent with the approach taken by most Attorneys General in the past, and it accords with what we find to be the most persuasive scholarship on the original understanding and early practice of the separation of powers under the United States Constitution. While we do not rest any conclusions on the potentially shifting ground of scholarly consensus, we note the existence of a number of impressive studies arguing that the principle of separation was originally understood to be flexible, open-ended, and consistent with a variety of actual institutional relationships among the three branches. Furthermore, it seems undeniable that early practice under the Constitution reflected a loose rather than strict understanding of the required separation. See, e.g., Susan Low Bloch, The Early Role of the Attorney General in our Constitutional Scheme: In the Beginning There was Pragmatism [*33] , 1989 Duke L.J. 561; Gerhard Casper, An Essay in Separation of Powers: Some Early Versions and Practices, 30 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 211 (1989); William B. Gwyn, The Indeterminacy of the Separation of Powers and the Federal Courts, 57 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 474 (1989); Lawrence Lessig & Cass R. Sunstein, The President and the Administration, 93 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1994); Peter M. Shane, Independent Policymaking and Presidential Power: A Constitutional Analysis, 57 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 596 (1989). However, given the very emphasis the general principle places on evaluating constitutional questions in light of the overall structure and functioning of the federal government, the principle's application to specific questions is unavoidably difficult, and the answers we or the courts reach ordinarily should be viewed as quite specific to context. Once again, we note that the areas of foreign relations and national defense present unique considerations, in light of the President's much greater constitutional authority to act in those areas. Furthermore, although the general principle marks the boundary of the law of separation of powers, it is inappropriate for the executive to regard [*34] this as defining the outer limit of proper separation of powers policy objections to legislation. In analyzing the validity of congressional action, we are mindful of the respect it is appropriate for the executive branch to pay to an equal and coordinate branch of the government. However, the executive branch is not bound by precisely the same rules of deference that guide the courts in exercising their power of judicial review. Judicial deference to the legislative choices embodied in statutes is one of the means by which the courts themselves avoid interfering improperly with the constitutional powers of the politically responsible branches. (In the case of most statutes, judicial review involves scrutinizing the legal and policy judgments of the President who signed the legislation into law as well as those of the Congress that enacted it.) The courts, it should be remembered, are also deferential to purely executive branch decisions, and for the same basic reason: the constitutional structure makes the President, like Congress, politically responsible. See Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 865 (1984) ("[w]hile agencies are [*35] not directly accountable to the people, the Chief Executive is, and it is entirely appropriate for this political branch of the Government to make . 20. 20. policy choices"). The Constitution's very structure suggests the importance of maintaining the hallmarks of "executive administration essential to effective action" Myers, 272 U.S. at 134. as well as the accountability to the public that stems from vesting ultimate authority in a single, politically responsible officer. Rejecting the argument that it was unsafe to delegate the executive power to a single official, Alexander Hamilton wrote that "one of the weightiest objections to a plurality in the executive . 20. 20. is that it tends to conceal faults, and destroy responsibility." The Federalist No. 70, at 476 (Alexander Hamilton) (Jacob E. Cooke ed., 1961), cited in In re Sealed Case, 838 F.2d at 527 n.27 (Ginsburg, R.B., J., dissenting). Then-Judge Ginsburg explained that "[t]he unity of the executive branch was intended to serve the ends of responsibility and accountability." Id. Several quite common types of legislation threaten the structural values protected by the general separation of powers principle even [*36] if the courts are unlikely to invalidate them. Examples of such legislation may include burdensome reporting requirements, attempts to dictate the processes of executive deliberation, and legislation that has the purpose or would have the effect of "micromanaging" executive action. Executive branch agencies should be careful to object to any legislation that unduly reduces the accountability of officials or agencies to the President, or that unnecessarily interferes with the flexibility and efficiency of executive decision making and action. Such legislation undercuts the constitutional purpose of creating an energetic and responsible executive branch.

REV_00260095

REV_00260104

II. Common Separation of Powers Issues

A. Bicameralism/Presentment Questions

The Supreme Court's holding in INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983), was emphatic: Congress can exercise "the legislative power of the Federal Government" only "in accord with a single, finely wrought and exhaustively considered, procedure" -- passage by both houses and presentment to the President. As a matter of practical reality, much of the federal government's legislative activity is undertaken by officers and agencies outside the legislative [*37] branch (in the form of regulations), but as a rule such entities act under statutory delegation from Congress. The delegating legislation is, for Chadha purposes, the congressional exercise of legislative power. See Chadha, 462 U.S. at 953 n.16. Id. at 951. Applying that rule, the Court struck down a statutory mechanism in the Immigration and Nationality Act by which a single house of Congress could override decisions of the Attorney General. The effect of the Court's decision was to invalidate the similar "legislative veto" provisions found in many other statutes. A statutory provision conditioning the executive's ability to take action on approval by one or both houses of Congress or by a congressional committee is as invalid as a provision enabling one of these bodies to "veto" executive action, and for the same reason: it is a legislative attempt to exercise authority beyond the legislative sphere in a mode not conforming to the requirements of bicameralism and presentment. See, e.g., American Fed'n of Gov't Employees v. Pierce, 697 F.2d 303, 306 (D.C. Cir. 1982). In addition to the classic legislative veto mechanism invalidated by Chadha, we think that the [*38] requirement of bicameralism and presentment is infringed whenever a single house, committee, or agent of Congress attempts to direct the execution of the laws, to determine the "final disposition of the rights of persons outside the legislative branch" or to promulgate rules or standards intended to bind the actions of executive or administrative officials that have not been approved by both houses and presented to the President. See, e.g., Lear Siegler, Inc., Energy Prods. Div. v. Lehman, 842 F.2d 1102, 1108 (9th Cir. 1988), modified as to attorney fees, 893 F.2d 205 (1989) (en banc); We agree with the court of appeals in Lear Siegler that many separation of powers issues can properly be analyzed under either the Chadha rule (forbidding Congress to exercise legislative power except by bicameralism and presentment) or the anti-aggrandizement principle (forbidding Congress to exercise executive power). Attempts to resolve constitutional issues by categorizing an exercise of authority as "in its essence, 'legislative' or 'executive'," can be confusing and, in any event, miss the point that under either analysis, "the critical issue is whether Congress or its agent [*39] seeks to control . 20. 20. the execution of its enactments without respect to the Article I legislative process." 842 F.2d at 1108 (emphasis in original). In Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority v. Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise, Inc., 501 U.S. 252, 276 (1991), the Supreme Court concluded that it was unnecessary to resolve the categorization issue because the exercise of authority was unconstitutional however it was viewed. cf. Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361, 396 (1989) (distinguishing Sentencing Guidelines from political policy making on the grounds that "they do not bind or regulate the primary conduct of the public").

For many decades, the congressional Joint Committee on Printing ("JCP") has attempted to exercise the legislative authority to promulgate rules and procedures binding on the executive branch's activities relating to printing, publication, and (more recently) data storage. In 1920, President Wilson vetoed an appropriations bill because it purported to confer on the JCP the power to promulgate regulations governing printing by executive officials or agencies: Congress has no power, he explained, to "endo[w] a committee of either [*40] House or a joint committee of both Houses with power to prescribe 'regulations' under which executive departments may operate." Veto Message on Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation Bill, H.R. No. 764, 66th Cong., 2d Sess. 2 (1920), reprinted in 59 Cong. Rec. 7,026 (1920); see Constitutionality of Proposed Legislation

REV_00260105

Affecting Tax Refunds, 37 Op. Att'y Gen. 56, 62-63, 65 (1933) (quoting and endorsing President Wilson's reasoning). In 1984, we concluded that legislation granting the JCP authority to promulgate regulations that "would require executive departments to submit annual plans outlining their intended activities and to seek advance approval of all projected goals, policies, strategies, purchases, publications, and means of distribution" with respect to printing, word processing, and data storage and retrieval was unconstitutional. Constitutionality of Proposed Regulations of Joint Committee on Printing, 8 Op. O.L.C. 42, 42 (1984). The proposed regulations would have established general rules binding the conduct of executive officials without those rules being approved by both houses of Congress and presented to the President, in plain violation of Article [*41] I's procedural requirements. We also determined that the proposed regulations were not authorized by any of the statutes concerning the JCP. 8 Op. O.L.C. at 43-46. That point was not relevant to the constitutional analysis, however, since Congress cannot circumvent the bicameralism and presentment requirement by delegating legislative authority to a part or agent of itself even by means of a statute itself duly passed and presented. We have also advised that the statutory provision authorizing the JCP "unilaterally to create exceptions to the [statutory] rule that all printing must be accomplished through the GPO [Government Printing Office]" has no lawful force under Chadha. Id. at 51 & n.14; see also Proposed Legislation Affecting Tax Refunds, 37 Op. Att'y Gen. at 58-60 (bill subjecting Treasury Department decisions on tax refunds to review and disallowance by congressional joint committee would be unconstitutional).

The requirement of bicameralism and presentment also can be violated in more convoluted ways. Section 431 of the General Education Provisions Act, for example, subjected final regulations of the Department of Education to a forty-five day report-and-wait [*42] provision In themselves report-and-wait mechanisms usually are valid, as we discuss more fully later in this memorandum. and provided that the final regulation would not become effective if Congress "by concurrent resolution, find[s] that the final regulation is inconsistent with the Act . 20. 20. and disapprove[s] such final regulation." 20 U.S.C. § 201232(d) (Supp. IV 1980). Concurrent resolutions are not legislation within the meaning of the Constitution, see U.S. Const. art. 20I, § 207, cl. 203, because they are not presented to the President. Accordingly, Attorney General Civiletti advised the Secretary of Education that the subjection of the Education Department's delegated lawmaking authority to congressional control and revision by means other than those required by Article I was unconstitutional. "[O]nce a function has been delegated to the executive branch, it must be performed there, and cannot be subjected to continuing congressional control except through the constitutional process of enacting new legislation." Constitutionality of Congress' Disapproval of Agency Regulations by Resolutions Not Presented to the President, 4A Op. O.L.C. 21, 27 (1980) (opinion of the [*43] Attorney General).

Similarly , while Congress has near-plenary authority in deciding to grant, limit or withhold appropriations, the Department of Justice has long contended that the appropriations power may not be used to circumvent the restrictions the Constitution places on the modes of legislative action. See, e.g., Authority of Congressional Committees to Disapprove Action of Executive Branch, 41 Op. Att'y Gen. 230 (1955) (opining that legislation authorizing congressional committees to disapprove Defense Department contracts is unconstitutional). Several years before Chadha, for example, this Office advised that Congress could not validly provide for the indirect implementation of a legislative "veto" by an appropriations rider that would prospectively deny funding for the implementation of any regulation disapproved in the future by such a "veto." See Appropriations Limitation for Rules Vetoed by Congress, 4B Op. O.L.C. 731 (1980). Our reasoning in that opinion is equally applicable to appropriations provisions that attempt to cut off funding that would otherwise be available on the basis of any future expression of disapproval by Congress that does not take the [*44] form of new legislation. The same analysis would apply, as well, to a provision prohibiting the expenditure of funds for some purpose, but allowing a future expression of approval by committee action to remove the prohibition.

REV_00260106

In carrying out its legitimate legislative functions, Congress "enjoys ample channels to advise, coordinate, and even directly influence an executive agency [including by] direct communication with the [agency]." FEC v. NRA Political Victory Fund, 6 F.3d 821, 827 (D.C. Cir. 1993), cert. dismissed, 115 S. Ct. 537 (1994). As a practical matter, therefore, congressional committees and individual members of Congress often are able to sway the decisions of the executive officials with whom they deal. In addition, congressional committees can exercise limited but legally coercive authority over persons outside the legislative branch through the power to issue subpoenas to compel testimony. The Supreme Court has reasoned that the "congressional power of inquiry" is necessary to "'enable [Congress] efficiently to exercise [the] legislative function[s] belonging to it under the Constitution.'" Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 111 (1959) (quoting [*45] McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 160 (1927)). Like Congress's substantive powers to legislate -- which it exists only to serve -- the power of inquiry is "subject to the limitations placed by the Constitution on governmental action," id. at 112, including the anti-aggrandizement and general separation of powers principles. In light of the capacity of Congress to extend its influence beyond the legislative sphere by informal means that are sometimes troubling although not unlawful, it is imperative that the executive branch consistently assert the rule of constitutional law that formal control of executive decision making and administration is subject to the requirements of Article I, and especially to the constitutional authority of the President to participate in the legislative process through the presentment mechanism. The executive branch has a constitutional obligation not to accede to legislative action that does not conform to Article I. Advising the Secretary of Education that she could validly implement departmental regulations despite a legislative "veto," Attorney General Civiletti wrote that "recognition of these concurrent resolutions as legally binding would [*46] constitute an abdication of the responsibility of the executive branch, as an equal and coordinate branch of government with the legislative branch, to preserve the integrity of its functions against constitutional encroachment." Congress' Disapproval of Agency Regulations, 4A Op. O.L.C. at 29.

B. Appointment Clause and Related Questions

The Appointments Clause provides that

> [The President,] shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

U.S. Const. art. 20II, § 2, cl. 2. As the language of the Appointments Clause suggests, offices in the constitutional sense "are only those established or recognized by the Constitution or by act of Congress." Inventions International Exposition, 18 Op. Att'y Gen. 171, 171 (1885); see also id. ("the President [*47] cannot create an office"). In Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976) (per curiam), the Supreme Court held that the terms of the Appointments Clause set out the only means by which Congress may provide for the appointment of "Officers of the United States." The officers at issue in Buckley were the six voting members of the Federal Election Commission, four of whom were appointed by congressional officials and two by the President, subject to the approval of the Senate and the House of Representatives. The statutory scheme thus violated the Appointments Clause in two distinct ways, by vesting appointment power in officials not listed in the Clause and by subjecting presidential nominees to confirmation by the House. 424 U.S. at 126-27. Id. at 124-37. Principal officers must be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate; inferior officers will be appointed in the same manner unless Congress by statute provides for their appointment by the President, the "Head[] of [a] Department[]," or the courts. Id. at 132; See Appointment of Assistant Secretary of State, 6 Op. Att'y Gen. 1, 1 (1853) ("without there be[ing] express enactment to the contrary [*48] . 20. 20. the appointment of any officer of the United States belongs to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate"). see also Freytag v. Commissioner, 501 U.S. 868, 878 (1991) ("the Constitution limits congressional discretion to vest power to appoint 'inferior Officers' to three sources"). Despite the apparent clarity of its language, however, the Appointments Clause has provided the occasion for many opinions of the Attorneys General and of this Office. We do not state anything novel in observing that the Appointments Clause sometimes presents difficult questions of interpretation. Attorney General Legar remarked in an 1843 opinion that "[n]o points of our fundamental law are more difficult than those involved in this whole subject of appointments." Appointment and Removal of Inspectors of Customs, 4 Op. Att'y Gen. 162, 164 (1843).

REV_00260107

1. Who is Required to Be an "Officer of the United States"? Not everyone who performs duties for the federal government is an "officer" within the meaning of the Appointments Clause. From the early days of the Republic, this term has been understood to embrace the ideas of "tenure, duration, emolument, and duties." [49] United States v. Hartwell, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 385, 393 (1868). Because Hartwell has long been taken as the leading statement of the constitutional meaning of "officer," In an opinion discussing an Appointments Clause issue, Attorney General Kennedy referred to Hartwell as providing the "classical definition pertaining to an officer." Communications Satellite Corporation, 42 Op. Att'y Gen. 165, 169 (1962). Hartwell itself cited several earlier opinions, including United States v. Maurice, 26 F. Cas. 1211 (C.C.D. Va. 1823) (No. 15,747) (Marshall, Circuit Justice), see 73 U.S. at 393 n., and in turn has been cited by numerous subsequent Supreme Court decisions, including United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508, 511-12 (1879), and Auffmordt v. Hedden, 137 U.S. 310, 327 (1890). These latter two decisions were cited with approval by the Court in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 125-26 & n.162 (1976) (per curiam). that statement is worth repeating in full:

> An office is a public station, or employment, conferred by the appointment of government. The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties.
>
> The employment of the defendant was in [*50] the public service of the United States. He was appointed pursuant to law, and his compensation was fixed by law. Vacating the office of his superior would not have affected the tenure of his place. His duties were continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary. They were to be such as his superior in office should prescribe. A government office is different from a government contract. The latter from its nature is necessarily limited in its duration and specific in its objects. The terms agreed upon define the rights and obligations of both parties, and neither may depart from them without the assent of the other.

Id. at 393.

Hartwell and the cases following it specify a number of criteria for identifying constitutional officers, and in some cases it is not entirely clear which criteria the court considered essential to its decision. Nevertheless, we believe that from the earliest reported decisions onward, the constitutional definition of officer has involved at least three necessary conditions.

REV_00260108

a. Employment by the Government: The Distinction between Appointees and Independent Contractors. An officer's duties are permanent, continuing, and based upon [*51] responsibilities created through a chain of command rather than by contract. Underlying an officer is an "office," to which the officer must be appointed. As Chief Justice Marshall, sitting as circuit justice, wrote: "Although an office is 'an employment,' it does not follow that every employment is an office. A man may certainly be employed under a contract, express or implied, to do an act, or perform a service, without becoming an officer." United States v. Maurice, 26 F. Cas. 1211, 1214 (C.C.D. Va. 1823) (No. 15,747). Chief Justice Marshall speaks here of being "employed under a contract"; in modern terminology the type of non-officer status he is describing is usually referred to as that of independent contractor. In Hartwell, this distinction shows up in the opinion's attention to the characteristics of the defendant's employment being "continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary," as well as to the suggestion that with respect to an officer, a superior can fix and then change the specific set of duties, rather than having those duties fixed by a contract. 73 U.S. at 393.

The distinction between employees and persons whose relationship to the government takes [*52] some other form also appears in later decisions. In this memorandum, the term "officer" will be used to refer exclusively to "Officers of the United States" in the constitutional sense; other full-time government servants will be called "employees." The question in United States v. Germaine, 99 U.S. 508 (1879), concerned whether a surgeon appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions "to examine applicants for pension, where [the Commissioner] shall deem an examination . 20. 20. necessary," id. at 508 (quoting Rev. Stat. § 204777), was an officer within the meaning of the Appointments Clause. The surgeon in question was "only to act when called on by the Commissioner of Pensions in some special case"; furthermore, his only compensation from the government was a fee for each examination that he did in fact perform. Id. at 512. The Court stated that the Appointments Clause applies to "all persons who can be said to hold an office under the government" and, applying Hartwell, concluded that "the [surgeon's] duties are not continuing and permanent and they are occasional and intermittent." Id. (emphasis in original). The surgeon, therefore, was not an officer of [*53] the United States. Id. Germaine clearly was discussing the concept of "officer" in the constitutional, and not simply a generic, sense: the alternative basis for the holding was that the surgeon was not an officer because he was appointed by the Commissioner who, as the head of a bureau within the Interior Department, could not be a "Head of Department" with the authority to appoint officers. Id. at 510-11.

The Court employed the same reasoning in Auffmordt v. Hedden, 137 U.S. 310 (1890). Pursuant to statute, an importer dissatisfied with the government's valuation of dutiable goods was entitled to demand a reappraisement jointly conducted by a general appraiser (a government employee) and a "merchant appraiser" appointed by the collector of customs for the specific case. Despite the fact that the reappraisement decision was final and binding on both the government and the importer, id. at 329, the Court rejected the argument that the merchant appraiser was an "inferior Officer" whose appointment did not accord with the requirements of the Appointments Clause.

> He is an expert, selected as such. 20. 20. 20. He is selected for the special case. He has no general [*54] functions, nor any employment which has any duration as to time, or which extends over any case further than as he is selected to act in that particular case. 20. 20. 20. He has no claim or right to be designated, or to act except as he may be designated. 20. 20. 20. His position is without tenure, duration, continuing emolument, or continuous duties . 20. 20. 20. Therefore, he is not an 'officer,' within the meaning of the clause.

REV_00260109

Id. at 326-27.

