n77. Id. at 316 (quoting 9 Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice & Procedure 2387, at 278 (1st ed. 1971)).

n78. Id.

n79. Id. at 328 (Jones, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Judge Jones explained his concerns with the district judge's order regarding the manner of trial as follows:

Although each distinct event involved the ingesting of the same drug, it is hard to believe that all eight hundred plus claims can be tied neatly into one package and satisfactorily resolved by the answering of one question, i.e., did Bendectin cause the relevant birth defects? In tying all of these claims together, an argument could certainly be made as to prejudice. That is, by not allowing the plaintiffs to present evidence as to how they were individually affected by the drug, [the court's order] could have resulted in prejudice to them in their attempt to establish the required elements of their case.

REV_00262454

Id. at 327.

n80. Id. On the factual basis for the claims, see Joseph Sanders, The Bendectin Litigation: A Case Study in the Life Cycle of Mass Torts, 43 Hastings L.J. 301, 347 (1992) ("The scientific community seems to have reached something close to a consensus concerning the drug. While no study can remove all residual uncertainty regarding Bendectin's safety, if the drug is a teratogen, it is a relatively mild one....").

n81. See Kenneth S. Bordens & Irwin A. Horowitz, Mass Tort Civil Litigation: The Impact of Procedural Changes on Jury Decisions, 73 Judicature 22 (1989).

Unitary trial juries do tend to ... utilize all the trial evidence while deciding each individual trial issue. Indeed, the initial analysis of the deliberations indicates that unitary trial juries often do not decide liability or causation until they hear evidence concerning damages.

Juries in separated trials appear to employ other, perhaps less sophisticated, heuristics to decide the issues. These latter juries tend to use more extreme heuristics: corporate-capitalist versus the little guy; good guy versus bad guy rhetoric dominates these deliberations. The bifurcation of general causation in the separated trial condition produces greater disbelief about causation yielding fewer verdicts for the plaintiffs. It may be that only more extreme pro-plaintiff juries who appeal to the good guy-bad guy [sic] rhetoric remain in the separated trial condition to vote for the plaintiffs.

Id. at 27.

n82. Maurice Rosenberg, Court Congestion: Status, Causes and Proposed Remedies, in Harry W. Jones, The Courts, the Public, and the Law Explosion 48 (1965).

n83. 9 Wright & Miller, supra note 24, 2390, at 508.

n84. Other procedural devices may produce similar overload problems. See Edward J. Brunet, A Study in the Allocation of Scarce Judicial Resources: The Efficiency of Federal Intervention Criteria, 12 Ga. L. Rev. 701, 710-20 (1978) (exploring ways in which increased intervention may lower the quality of judicial action by overloading the courts).

n85. Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Bills of Peace With Multiple Parties, 45 Harv. L. Rev. 1297, 1297 (1932).

n86. Harris, supra note 14, at 1292 ("The criteria for granting consolidation set forth in rule 42(a) have been the subject of little controversy."); Gaylord A. Virden, Consolidation Under Rule 42 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure: The U.S. Courts of Appeals Disagree on Whether Consolidation Merges the Separate Cases and Whether the Cases Remain Separately Final for Purposes of Appeal, 141 F.R.D. 169, 169 (1991) ("The law in this area is now largely settled.").

n87. See, e.g., 18 Francis A. Darnieder, Hughes Federal Practice 255 (1940) ("It is evident that the court must be given extensive discretionary powers in order to expedite a determination of the issues and avoid delay and inconvenience."); Alexander Holtzoff, New Federal Procedure and the Courts 116 (1940) ("In the interest of expediting and simplifying trials, the court is given broad authority, on the one hand, to consolidate cases for trial and, on the other hand, to order separation of different issues in the same case."); W.S. Simkins, Federal Practice 70 (Alfred Schweppe ed. 1934) (Consolidation "is entirely within the discretionary power of the court.").

REV_00262455

n88. See Memorandum from Richard L. Marcus to Workload Subcommittee, Federal Courts Study Committee re guidelines for consolidation and severance procedures (Oct. 16, 1989) in 1 Federal Courts Study Committee, Working Papers and Subcommittee Reports (1990) [hereinafter Marcus Memorandum]. This memorandum raises several of the concerns mentioned in the text.

n89. Report of the Federal Courts Study Committee 45 (April 2, 1990).

n90. The Manual, Third, supra note 32, 21.631, provides some general guidelines regarding consolidation, but it does not come close to the Project in its attention to the subject.

n91. It should be noted that the then-current draft of the Complex Litigation Proposal was brought to the attention of the Federal Courts Study Committee in connection with its recommendation. See Marcus Memorandum, supra note 88, at 10-12.

n92. Comment, supra note 29, at 381, states:

It is neither possible nor desirable for courts to treat motions under 42(a) with the cold logic Alice displayed in dealing with Rule Forty-Two in Wonderland. What is required is a constant sensitivity to the equities of individual cases in conjunction with the experience courts have gained in handling juries and in administrating the cases on their dockets.

Id.

n93. See Herr, supra note 64, 5.1, at 71 (stating 1407 criteria are merely thresholds, and the statute "is of limited value in determining whether transfer is appropriate in a particular case").

n94. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, 3.02, at 62-70.

n95. See, e.g., H.R. 3406, 101st Cong., 1st Sess. (1991).

n96. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, 5.01-5.03, at 220-62.

n97. Id. 6.01-6.08, at 321-436. These sections have drawn the most fire from academic commentators. See, e.g., Linda S. Mullenix, Federalizing Choice of Law for Mass-Tort Litigation, 70 Tex. L. Rev. 1623 (1992).

n98. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, 5.04 at 263-75.

n99. Id. 5.05, at 275-303.

n100. Id. 4.01, at 177-201.

n101. Id. 4.02, at 201-16, app. B.

n102. Steinman, supra note 58, at 1038-39 (footnote omitted).

n103. In 1991, the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws endorsed a Uniform Transfer of Litigation Act, but it has yet to be used. For discussion of that proposal, see Edward H. Cooper, Interstate Consolidation: A Comparison of the ALI Project With the Uniform Transfer of Litigation Act, 54 La. L. Rev. 897 (1994).

REV_00262456

n104. Richard Epstein, The Consolidation of Complex Litigation: A Critical Evaluation, 10 J.L. & Com. 1, 61-62 (1990).

n105. "Jurisdictional and transfer proposals to facilitate consolidation, then, can proceed from a relatively agnostic position about how worthy consolidated treatment is in various situations...." Thomas D. Rowe, Jr., Jurisdiction and Transfer Proposals for Complex Litigation, 10 Rev. Litig. 325, 326-27 (1991).

n106. Before it embarked on the actual Project, the ALI did a study of complex litigation that explained in its introduction that "this Preliminary Study is inspired by the intuition that the common transaction, series of transactions, or course of conduct from which these complex cases arise should provide a basis for some form of consolidated or coordinated treatment of all of the resulting litigation." American Law Institute, Preliminary Study of Complex Litigation 5 (1987).

n107. See supra text accompanying notes 47-84.

n108. Thomas D. Rowe, Jr. & Kenneth D. Sibley, Beyond Diversity: Federal Multiparty, Multiforum Jurisdiction, 135 U. Pa. L. Rev. 7, 17 (1986).

n109. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 467.

n110. Thus, Professor Rowe and Mr. Sibley suggested that expanded federal jurisdiction for complex cases could be limited to cases involving at least 25 victims. See Rowe & Sibley, supra note 108, at 33, and Congress has considered statutes incorporating similar numerical limitations; see H.R. 3406, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. 2(a) (requiring that at least 25 natural persons be injured, each with damages in excess of $ 50,000).

n111. See ALI Finishes Complex Litigation Project, Makes Progress on Various Restatements, 61 U.S.L.W. 2709, 2710 (1993).

n112. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(1) (allowing class actions only if class members are too numerous to be joined).

n113. See 7A Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice & Procedure, 1762 (1986) (citing cases allowing class status with classes of 25, 35, 40 and 50 members, but also citing cases that deny class certification on numerosity grounds for classes as large as 350).

n114. The ALI Project reports that the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation has almost always found the benefits of transfer were satisfied if there are more than five actions involved. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 52; see also Note, The Judicial Panel and the Conduct of Multidistrict Litigation, 87 Harv. L. Rev. 1001, 1009-10 (1974) (noting transfer is "almost certain ... if more than five actions are involved").

n115. The Project explains in commentary that "exact dimensional criteria" were rejected in part because even when there are very few parties or cases, consolidation may be warranted due to complexity of the issues or volume of discovery, or to "avoid significant duplication of effort [for a] defendant." Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 52-53.

n116. See supra text accompanying notes 32-38.

n117. Edward F. Sherman, Aggregate Disposition of Related Cases: The Policy Issues, 10 Rev. Litig. 231, 256 (1991).

n118. E.g., Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 49 ("A similar test is applied under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3)...."); id. at 117 ("The procedure for the severance of issues under Rule 23(c)(4) is similar to that under Rule 42(b)."); id. at 461 ("This standard is analogous to the criteria applied for class certification under Federal Rule 23(b)(3)...").

REV_00262457

n119. This description for the various consolidation criteria may prove confusing to some readers, so it seems wise to provide a schematic summary of the criteria employed in each of the three formats provided in the Project. As used below, "minimum commonality" means that the consolidation provision only requires that there be some common question. Similarly, "minimum superiority" means that the consolidation provision only requires that consolidation "promote the just, efficient, and fair conduct of the actions," rather than directing that consolidation be ordered only if it would be superior to individual litigation in terms of those criteria.

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

n120. Thus, 5.01's addition of the same transaction requirement is justified on the ground that "this section acts as a jurisdiction, as well as a consolidation, mechanism." Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 225. Similarly, the more stringent requirements of Appendix B are justified on the ground that combining cases from different state courts is more intrusive.

n121. Id. at 461.

n122. Id. at 37.

n123. Id. at 38-39.

n124. Id. at 463.

n125. Id. at 462.

n126. In explaining their use of the predominance standard in Appendix B, the Reporters state:

[A] high threshold ensures a substantial overlap of claims or issues so that the costs to the system and the parties of consolidation and management will not outweigh the costs of allowing the cases to remain dispersed.... The requirement that common questions predominate serves as a fairness safeguard, ensuring that claims or issues bearing no relation to each other will not be gathered together. Treating dissimilar cases alike would be as unfair as treating similar cases differently.

Id. at 463-64.

n127. 7A Wright et al., supra note 113, 1777, at 518-19. Two of the authors of this treatise, Arthur R. Miller and Mary Kay Kane, were, respectively, Reporter and Associate Reporter of the Complex Litigation Proposal.

n128. See supra text accompanying note 123.

n129. "For example, the predominance of individual issues may suggest that consolidation will not promote justice or efficiency." Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 45. Note that this commentary is directed toward the second criterion of 3.01, discussed infra in text accompanying notes 141-52.

n130. Manual, Third, supra note 32, 21.631.

REV_00262458

implications consolidation has for the parties and the court, finding reason for the Federal Courts Study Committee's 1990 call for more detailed guidelines for the use of this technique. Part IV then forms the heart of the analysis by examining the Project's treatment of consolidation criteria, concluding that the Project impressively illuminates the issues but should be fortified by adoption of standards for consolidation that fully parallel those for common question class actions. Part IV also evaluates both the Project's reliance on a newly created Complex Litigation Panel to make the initial decision whether to consolidate, and its propulsion toward fragmenting cases by severance. Finally, Part IV reflects on the questions that will be before Congress should the Project's proposals be introduced there. The Article then turns in Part V to brief reflections on ways the Project's treatment of consolidation could be employed by courts under current statutory arrangements. It concludes with the hope that the Project's work on consolidation will be used by courts even if the proposal's menu of jurisdictional and choice of law changes fostering consolidation languishes unenacted.

II. Consolidation As A Sleeping Giant

Consolidation has been around for a long time. Introduced in England in the eighteenth century by Lord Mansfield, [13] it was first authorized in the federal courts in this country by a statute adopted in 1813. [14] According to Professor Meador, [*883] consolidation for trial was "one of the earliest examples of case management based on inherent authority," and it was viewed in American jurisprudence as "an inseparable aspect of the powers possessed by common-law and equity courts." [15]

Mindful of the risks of comparing joinder attitudes of the 19th century with those of the present, [16] one can comfortably conclude that consolidation initially served largely as an antidote to strict limitations on joinder that precluded combination in a single suit even of closely related claims. One example is the Supreme Court's 1892 decision in Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Hillmon, [17] a case familiar to generations of law students for its rule on hearsay evidence, [18] which involved separate suits against three insurance companies based on separate life insurance policies issued on the life of the same man. [19] Each insurance company denied that the man was dead, and the trial court consolidated the three cases for trial of that question even though plaintiff could not have joined all companies in a single suit under prevailing joinder rules. [20] Under current joinder notions, of course, the combination of these three claims in a single lawsuit would be unexceptional. Defendants contended on appeal that the combination of the cases was improper because the actions did not relate to the same question, but the Court refused to interfere with the trial judge's conclusion that a combined trial would avoid unnecessary delay and expense. [21] In a 1933 case, the Court [*884] added that "consolidation is permitted as a matter of convenience and economy in administration." [22]

Rule 42 carried forward this flexible approach to joinder, building in part on experience in some state court systems. [23] Rule 42 is said to go beyond even the broad initial party joinder opportunities afforded by Rule 20. [24] The courts, however, have sometimes been circumspect in taking advantage of Rule 42's potentially wide scope of combination. [25] For some time, [*885] consolidation was only a sporadic event, and not a device the courts viewed as useful in combating caseload pressures. Thus, when conferences were convened in the 1950s to examine ways to deal with protracted litigation, [26] no substantial consideration was given to consolidation as such a technique. But the problem of the repetitious suit was not far off.

By the 1960s consolidation began to play a more prominent role in some types of cases. Confronted with some 2,000 private actions nationwide resulting from the electrical equipment price-fixing conspiracy, Chief Justice Warren appointed an ad hoc committee of judges to provide consistent treatment of discovery in these cases. Although not precisely consolidation, this was a move in that direction. The experience was sufficiently successful to prompt Congress in 1968 to create the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation. Congress

REV_00262432

n131. See supra text accompanying note 121.

n132. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 43.

n133. The commentary explains:

A more restrictive standard, such as "predominance of common questions," is less desirable because situations might arise in which substantial benefits could be gained by transfer for consolidation even when only a single common factual question is present because it would avoid the duplication of effort that otherwise would result in resolving that issue in separate suits.

Id.

n134. 7A Wright et al., supra note 113, 1778, at 528.

n135. Id. at 528-29.

n136. See, e.g., In re Eli Lilly & Co. Oraflex Prod. Liab. Litig., 578 F. Supp. 422, 423 (J.P.M.L. 1984) ("Although we recognize that the actions in this litigation involve some common questions of fact, we are not persuaded that these common questions of fact will, in the future course of this litigation, predominate over individual questions of fact...."); In re Sears, Roebuck & Co. Employment Practices Litig., 487 F. Supp. 1362, 1364 (J.P.M.L. 1980) ("Individual rather than common factual questions predominate regarding the liability aspects of the five actions before us," and the common factual questions do not "overcome the overall predominance of individual factual questions...."); In re Airline "Age of Employee" Employment Practices Litig., 483 F. Supp. 814, 814 (J.P.M.L. 1980) (denying transfer after district court rejected motion to consolidate under Rule 42 because common questions do not predominate); In re Westinghouse Elec. Corp. Employment Discrim. Litig., 438 F. Supp. 937, 939 (J.P.M.L. 1977) ("Individual rather than common factual questions predominate in this litigation."); In re Asbestos and Asbestos Insulation Material Prod. Liab. Litig., 431 F. Supp. 906, 910 (J.P.M.L. 1977) ("Many factual questions unique to each action or to a group of actions already pending in a single district clearly predominate, and therefore transfer is unwarranted."); In re King Resources Co. Sec. Litig., 342 F. Supp. 1179, 1183 (J.P.M.L. 1972) (noting that parties have argued convincingly that common issues do not predominate); see also In re "The Exorcist" Copyright Infringement Litig., 411 F. Supp. 793, 793-94 (J.P.M.L. 1976) (rejecting argument that common questions do not predominate).

n137. See Close v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc., 1994 WL 761957, at *3 (D.N.H. 1994) ("On the basis of the record before it, the court finds that the plaintiffs have not met their burden of showing that a Rule 42(a) consolidation is appropriate here.... Because individual issues in the civil actions predominate over common issues, separate depositions, interrogatories, and requests for documents will be more beneficial to plaintiffs than consolidated discovery."); Scardino v. Amalgamated Bank, 1994 WL 408180, at *2 (E.D. Pa. 1994) ("Although there are common questions of law or fact in both actions as to the validity of the note and mortgage, these questions are not sufficiently predominant in this action to warrant consolidation."); Maruzen Int'l Co., Ltd. v. Bridgeport Merchandise, Inc., 1991 WL 130170, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) (ordering consolidation because common questions predominate); Henderson v. National R.R. Passenger Corp. 118 F.R.D. 440, 441 (N.D. Ill. 1987) ("Although certain common issues of fact may exist in both actions, the variety of individual issues predominate.").

n138. But see cases cited supra note 136.

n139. 15 Wright et al., Federal Practice & Procedure, 3863, at 515 (2d ed. 1986).

REV_00262459

n140. 347 F. Supp. 1401 (J.P.M.L. 1972).

n141. Id. at 1402.

n142. This case was not unique in the annals of the Panel. In In re Multi-piece Rim Products Liability Litigation, 464 F. Supp. 969 (J.P.M.L. 1979), the Panel transferred 19 actions brought in 14 different districts to recover for injuries related to the failure of multipiece truck wheels. These products were manufactured by four different companies, at least one of which was sued in each case, and 21 other defendants were named in the actions, but 19 of these were named in only one case. Id. at 971. Opponents to the transfer, including plaintiffs in five of the actions and all defendants but one, emphasized that each case involved unique facts. The Panel nevertheless ordered transfer based on the parties' theory that all of the products were "essentially the same, for purposes of this litigation, because they all operate on the same engineering principle." Id. at 974.

Similarly, in In re Multidistrict Commodity Credit Corp. Litig. Involving Grain Shipments, 300 F. Supp. 1402 (J.P.M.L. 1969), 32 separate claims were made against a variety of railroad companies for alleged losses of grain during shipment. Different kinds of grain were involved in different shipments, but all were in covered hopper cars. Although each claim would turn on the individual circumstances involved in that shipment, the Panel found common questions regarding "general standards for loading and unloading hopper cars, general standards for weighing hopper cars, the integrity of the hopper cars by design and manufacture and the amount of shrinkage or loss of moisture which normally occurs in these grains." Id. at 1404.

n143. Cf. Note, supra note 114, at 1016 (characterizing Aviation Products as a questionable use of the Panel's transfer power).

n144. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, 3.01(a)(2), at 37.

n145. Id., app. B, 1(a)(2).

n146. Thus the Reporters are able to note in Appendix B that "the inclusion of a superiority requirement is more demanding than the standard proposed for federal intrasystem consolidation. Compare 3.01(a)(2)." Id. at 464.

n147. 7A Wright et al., supra note 113, 1779, at 552.

n148. See supra text accompanying note 123.

n149. See Edward Brunet, The Triumph of Efficiency and Discretion Over Competing Complex Litigation Policies, 10 Rev. Litig. 273 (1991).

n150. See 28 U.S.C. 1407(a) (1988) (allowing transfer if it "will be for the convenience of parties and witnesses").

n151. Wilson W. Herndon & Ernest R. Higginbotham, Complex Multidistrict Litigation - An Overview of 28 U.S.C.A. 1407, 31 Baylor L. Rev. 33, 43 (1979) ("The Panel has largely eliminated this guideline as a determinative standard."); Note, supra note 114, at 1001, 1003 (1974) ("Once a threshold level of potential savings [of time and effort for judges] is found, however, transfer is almost inevitable.").

n152. Blake M. Rhodes, Comment, The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation: Time for Rethinking, 140 U. Pa. L. Rev. 711, 720 (1991).

n153. Section3.01(b)(2) says one factor "to be considered" is whether "consolidation can be accomplished in a way that is fair to the parties and does not result in undue inconvenience to them and the witnesses." Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, 3.01(b)(2), at 38.

REV_00262460

n154. E.g., Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 44. According to that commentary:

The just and fair resolution of the actions requires a recognition that intrusion on party autonomy and control can be justified only when there is some reason to treat the underlying cases in a coordinated fashion.... Consolidation may be ordered only if it will serve fairness and efficiency goals better than allowing the cases to remain dispersed. A party's desire to exercise individual control over the prosecution or defense of a lawsuit, for instance, is a long recognized, but intangible, interest.

Id. at 51.

Because the proposed standard promotes consolidation for trial as well as pretrial, the convenience of the parties and the witnesses must be accorded more careful consideration than would be the case if transfer and consolidation were limited to the pretrial proceedings.

Id. at 51.

n155. Id. at 52.

n156. See id. at 469.

n157. Brunet, supra note 149, at 275-76 (footnote omitted). A tension between efficiency and fairness clearly exists, but the precise nature of that tension defies a simple, satisfactory definition because both terms incorporate many concepts. Efficiency is a vague idea having numerous meanings both generally and as applied to complex litigation. Similarly, the meaning of fairness may range from an autonomous right to a single trial without cooperating with any co-parties to a seemingly contradictory right to intervene in a complex case initiated by another in order to protect one's interests. Id.

n158. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, 5.01(a), at 220-21.

n159. See id. at 225.

n160. Thus, an oft-cited formulation of the Rule 20 same transaction inquiry is Judge Aldrich's explanation in Eastern Fireproofing Co. v. U.S. Gypsum Co., 160 F. Supp. 580, 581 (D. Mass. 1958): "There can be no hard and fast rule, and ... the approach must be the general one of whether there are enough ultimate factual concurrences that it would be fair to the parties to require them to defend jointly [the several claims] against them...."

n161. See 9 Wright & Miller, supra note 24, 2382, at 432-33.

n162. See Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 225-27. For example, the commentary cites Stanford v. Tennessee Valley Auth., 18 F.R.D. 152 (M.D. Tenn. 1955), seemingly as an example of a case involving what the Project views as "distinct occurrences" that would not satisfy the same transaction test even though they involve common fact issues. Id. at 226. It is true that the court so ruled in that case, but in his treatise on federal practice Professor Miller, one of the Reporters on the Complex Litigation Proposal, says of this case that "the holding that joinder was improper seems quite doubtful." 9 Wright & Miller, supra note 24, 2382, at 433 n.14. Thus the Reporters' own example reinforces the conclusion that the same transaction test really adds nothing.

n163. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 228.

n164. For consolidation pursuant to Appendix B, the Reporters propose creation of an Interstate Complex Litigation Panel of state judges. See Complex Litigation Project, supra note 3, app. B, 2(a). Although this would be a different entity, the nature of the constraint provided by centralization of authority would be similar. Accordingly, this wrinkle is not treated separately in the text.

n165. See Rhodes, supra note 152, at 712; Cooney, supra note 28, at 611.

n166. See Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 64-66.

n167. See id. at 63 (stating that the Panel would develop "a unique competence" to make this decision, and its involvement would promote predictability).

n168. Id. 3.03(a) (stating that the panel should decide on consolidation "as soon as possible" so that parties and court know whether it will occur).

n169. Id. at 68.

n170. See id. 6.01-.08, at 321-436.

n171. Id. at 108. Whether a transferee judge could use 1404(a) to effect consolidation for trial where the Panel had determined that such consolidation should not occur presents a nice question. It is not clear that such an order would be subject to review by the Panel under section3.07(b).

n172. See supra text accompanying notes 151-52.

n173. See supra text accompanying note 149.

n174. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 62.

n175. Id.

n176. "The concept of "convenience of parties and witnesses' takes on an entirely different meaning when a 1404(a) motion, encompassing tens or hundreds of cases, is brought before a 1407 transferee court. In such a setting, the interests of the individual litigants are subordinated to the collective good." Rhodes, supra note 152, at 741.

n177. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, 3.06(a), at 106. Comparable authority is proposed in the Reporters' Appendix B for the transferee state judge who receives cases transferred by the Interstate Complex Litigation Panel. See id. app. B, 6(a).

n178. Id. 3.06(b), at 106.

n179. Id. 3.06(c), at 106.

n180. "Section 5.01(c) ... contemplates intersystem rather than intrasystem bifurcation of a single case before one court." Id. at 237.

n181. See supra text accompanying notes 47-84.

n182. See Henderson et al., supra note 72, at 1684 ("Only very vague standards exist for determining the appropriateness of a judge's decision to hold a bifurcated trial.").

REV_00262462

n183. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 114.

n184. Id. at 114-15.

n185. Id. at 115. The justification for this position seems essentially substantive - to avoid crippling multiple punitive damage awards against defendants.

n186. Id. at 126. For example, it observes that "damage issues that are linked inextricably to factual determinations already made in the magnet court sometimes may benefit from being handled by the transferee judge." Id.

n187. "Issue severance ... must be undertaken with great care in recognition that it alters the tradition of how cases are decided. Before a court adopts the procedure in a particular case, the possible effects severance may have on the proceedings must be considered." Id. at 119-20. For a discussion of these issues, see Richard L. Marcus, Completing Equity's Conquest? Reflections on the Future of Trial Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 50 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 725 (1989).

n188. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 120.

n189. Id. at 120-21; see supra text accompanying note 82.

n190. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 120.

n191. Id. at 125.

n192. Id. at 121-23; see supra text accompanying notes 73-81.

n193. Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 122.

n194. Id. at 123.

n195. Id. at 122.

n196. See id. at 109 ("Allowing for consolidation of issues rather than entire claims increases the possibility that the individual litigant will be represented adequately ... without sacrificing the ability of individual parties to control the litigation of unique issues.").

n197. Id. at 111.

n198. Id. at 123.

n199. Id. 3.07(b), at 129. The Panel would have discretion not to undertake such review.

n200. See id. at 137 ("It does not embrace questions regarding possible prejudice or inefficiencies surrounding a decision to have a consolidated trial on a particular issue or to sever certain issues for individual treatment.").

n201. As the commentary explains:

The potential impact of those decisions warrants an opportunity for discretionary review even though modification is possible. For example, plaintiffs erroneously forced to remain for a consolidated trial in a distant forum may face prohibitive litigation costs, subordination of their individual claims or defenses, or undue delay.... Not only would increased costs pose a hardship to plaintiffs, but also they might affect the outcome of the litigation. Plaintiffs unable to bear the financial burden might feel obliged to settle for less than they otherwise might have secured.

Id. at 136.

n202. Id. 3.07(c), at 130.

n203. Henderson et al., supra note 72, at 1694-95, propose that in mass tort cases bifurcation only be allowed when two conditions are satisfied: "First, any issue to be tried separately must be common to all of the claims. Second, the relevant societal interests must clearly outweigh the interests of individual claimants in ... a single, unified proceeding." But this constraint on judicial decision-making does not seem particularly stronger than the prescription of the Project.

n204. See Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 122 ("Trifurcation is more questionable than bifurcation.").

n205. See supra text accompanying notes 146-57.

n206. Indeed, the Rule 23 analogy tends, if anything, to undercut the constraints this Article urges for consolidation and bifurcation. Rule 23(c)(4)(A) allows the court to certify a class only "with respect to particular issues," implicitly bifurcating the claims of all class members thereby. Although this issue certification power seems to erode the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) by allowing the judge to excise and disregard noncommon issues, we are told that certification of specific issues can be used even if there is only one common issue, and that it should be used in such a circumstance rather than deny class certification. See 7B Wright et al., supra note 113, 1790, at 271, 276. The Project notes the similarity of issue severance under Rules 23(c)(4) and 42(b). See Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 117. Were the attitude of severance rather than denial of aggregation borrowed for consolidation, the consequence might be a stronger push toward bifurcation than the Project endorses.

n207. See supra text accompanying notes 36-91.

n208. Compare quantifiable factors such as the amount in controversy in diversity cases. See 28 U.S.C. 1332(a) (discussing situations "where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $ 50,000").

n209. Rowe, supra note 105, at 327.

n210. E.g., Sherman, supra note 117, at 236-37 ("If plaintiffs cannot get their individual cases tried, aggregation may offer the only realistic opportunity for judicial resolution short of settlement.").

n211. The Federal Courts Study Committee recommended that Congress amend the general venue statute, 28 U.S.C. 1391, (a) to place the then-current authorization of venue in the district "in which the claim arose" with language suggested by the ALI study and (b) to eliminate the disparities then allowed between federal cases based soley on diversity and other federal cases. See Report of the Federal Courts Study Committee, supra note 89, at 94. Congress so amended 1391 in 1990.

n212. "The Project ... really poses a working agenda for only one group - Congress." Shreve, supra note 9, at 1144.

n213. See supra Part II.

REV_00262464

n214. See supra text accompanying notes 88-89.

n215. "As of March 1994, the ALI counted over 125,000 court citations to the restatements. United States Supreme Court Justices invoked the restatements in nine cases during the 1993-94 term. Judges in all fifty states have looked to them." Justice Shirley S. Abrahamson, Refreshing Institutional Memories: Wisconsin and the American Law Institute, Address at the University of Wisconsin Law School (Oct. 28, 1994), in 1995 Wis. L. Rev. 1, 4-5 (footnote omitted).

n216. See, e.g., George L. Priest, The Invention of Enterprise Liability: A Critical History of the Intellectual Foundations of Modern Tort Law, 14 J. Legal Stud. 461, 511-18 (1985) (arguing that 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts - dealing with strict products liability - was insinuated into the restatement by a cabal of law professors); Paul A. Simmons, Government by an Unaccountable Private Non Profit Corporation, 10 N.Y.L. Sch. J. Hum. Rts. 67, 97 (1992) (urging that "ALI publications should not be given precedential effect in any court proceeding unless or until the ALI has been democratized").

n217. See, e.g., Gretchen Craft Rubin & Jamie G. Heller, Note, Restatement of Love (Tentative Draft), 104 Yale L.J. 707 (1994).

n218. "Even if Congress does not enact it, the Proposed Final Draft will undoubtedly influence judicial opinion for many years to come." Symeon C. Symeonides, The ALI's Complex Litigation Project: Commencing the National Debate, 54 La. L. Rev. 843, 844-45 (1994).

n219. See supra note 119 (summarizing the differences in standard between 3.01, 5.01, and app. B of the Project).

n220. For the text of one such proposal, and a critical analysis, see Robert G. Bone, Rule 23 Redux: Empowering the Federal Class Action, 14 Rev. Litig. 79, 109-112 (1994).

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 1995 B.Y.U.L. Rev. 879
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 7:48 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00262465

granted the panel newly created authority to transfer cases pending in a variety of federal courts for coordinated or consolidated pretrial treatment. [27]

Within a few years, it became widely recognized that even though this type of transfer was supposed to be limited to pretrial handling of cases, it usually shifted final responsibility for the cases to the court presiding over the consolidated proceedings, in part because transferee judges frequently used 28 U.S.C. 1404(a) to obtain authority to transfer for all purposes, including trial. [28] Widespread use of transfer provisions thus paved the way for consolidated treatment of significant numbers of antitrust and securities fraud suits.

It has been in tort litigation, however, that consolidation has played its most prominent role in recent years. As early as 1963, a prescient student comment focused on the role of [*886] consolidation in mass tort cases. [29] Under the Multidistrict Litigation Act, transfer and consolidation were often used in mass disaster cases arising out of airplane crashes and hotel fires, and these techniques have also become popular in more dispersed tort cases involving exposure to allegedly toxic substances. The popularity of transfer and consolidation in mass tort cases has, in part, been due to the siege mentality that has gained currency in the judiciary. [30] As judges chafed at some of the prerequisites and limitations of class actions in mass tort cases, [31] the consolidation avenue became more attractive. [32] For example, District Judge Robert Parker of Texas, who had a large docket of asbestos cases, experimented with both consolidation and class action treatment in handling this docket. Eventually, as reported by Professor Mullenix, he became "indifferent as to whether to conduct [his pending asbestos cases] as a Rule 42 consolidation or as a Rule 23 class action." [33] Probably the most aggressive use of the [*887] consolidation power occurred in 1991, when the Multidistrict Litigation Panel transferred over 26,000 asbestos personal injury cases to a single district judge in hopes he could apply "a new, streamlined approach" to them. [34] Recognizing the increased use of consolidation, Professor Resnik, in her comprehensive 1991 study of tendencies toward aggregation of litigation, concluded that "class actions are a visible but probably not dominant form of aggregation." [35]

III. Misgivings About Consolidation

Consolidation holds out a bland, somewhat technocratic, uncontroversial face to the world. Thus, as she worked on her study of procedural implications of consolidation, Professor Steinman was struck by the widespread belief of legal professionals that consolidation would not affect the rights of litigants. [36] But courts are beginning to notice that the reality of consolidation, particularly in mass tort cases, sometimes has very substantial effects on those rights. As the Second Circuit cautioned in upholding a consolidation order in 1992, "The systemic urge to aggregate litigation must not be allowed to trump our dedication to individual justice, and we must take care that each individual plaintiff's - and defendant's - cause [*888] not be lost in the shadow of a towering mass litigation." [37] There is a price to be paid for the bounty of consolidation that needs to be taken into account.

Recognizing these concerns, the appellate courts have not allowed district judges carte blanche to consolidate, even in mass tort cases. In 1993, for example, the Second Circuit overturned two efforts to consolidate mass tort claims. In one, it reversed a judgment for plaintiffs that resulted from a consolidated trial of 600 asbestos cases. [38] The appellate court noted the "herculean task" of coping with mass torts and acknowledged that "pre-trial consolidation for the purposes of discovery, the appointment of special masters to expedite the settlement, and, especially, the liberal use of consolidated trials have ameliorated what might otherwise be a sclerotic backlog of cases." [39] Nevertheless, the court held that consolidation was an abuse of discretion, reasoning that the varied work histories of the plaintiffs had presented the jury with a "dizzying amount" of evidence and that the case was therefore distinguishable from the 1992 case quoted above, which upheld the judgment of a consolidated trial of asbestos claims for workers at a shipyard. [40] One judge dissented, arguing that the majority's view "would likely compel the post-trial reversal of most large-scale consolidated trials of product liability claims" even though "consolidated trials are an indispensable means of resolving the thousands of asbestos claims flooding our state and federal courts, as well as claims arising from other types of mass torts." [41] [*889]

REV_00262433

In another 1993 case, the Second Circuit granted a writ of mandamus to overturn the consolidation of 44 cases involving repetitive stress injury (RSI) allegedly caused by various types of keyboard office equipment. [42] The court emphasized that this alleged condition encompasses a wide variety of problems, that these problems may result from individual-specific conditions such as obesity and high blood cholesterol levels, and that the cases involved a wide variety of office equipment (from cash registers to computers). [43] Moreover, the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation had earlier refused to consolidate all RSI cases on the ground that there was not sufficient commonality. [44] The Second Circuit concluded that "the district court substituted a discussion of so-called mass torts for precise findings as to what are the "common questions of law or fact' justifying consolidation pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 42." [45]

These appellate setbacks for consolidation of mass tort cases emphasize the contemporary importance of consolidation, and also that consolidation can substantially affect the rights and interests of parties. Some of the impetus to submerge the individual features of claims results uniquely from consolidation, while other tendencies in this direction are only compounded by it. In any event, it is important to canvass the sorts of effects consolidation can produce to appreciate consolidation's importance. [46] [*890]

A. Loss of Control

Consolidation is not supposed to diminish a party's control over its case. Professor Moore's treatise thus continues to assure its readers that after consolidation "each party remains free to control its own case and conduct trial procedures." [47] But the reality is often otherwise, and even Professor Moore follows his assurance with a citation to a case that undermines that assurance. [48] A principal impetus behind this loss of control is the need to organize and discipline the numerous parties in a consolidated proceeding. As a New York state court recognized in 1899:

> There can be but one master of a litigation on the side of the plaintiffs. It is also plain that it would be as easy to drive a span of horses pulling in diverging directions, as to conduct a litigation by separate, independent action of various plaintiffs, acting without concert, and with possible discord. [49]

To a substantial extent, this loss of control occurs without consolidation when numerous parties are joined in a litigation, and the loss may be felt by both plaintiffs and defendants. [50]

Courts can and do take actions that magnify loss of control, however. The most important is appointment of lead counsel, [*891] which ordinarily involves circumscribing the latitude of other lawyers in the case. [51] Courts have upheld orders that forbid nonlead counsel from filing motions or undertaking discovery without permission from lead counsel. [52] Beyond appointment of lead counsel, the court may direct that the original pleadings be superseded by a consolidated complaint in order to avoid the confusion that would result from conducting combined litigation with reference to a large number of pleadings. Such consolidated complaints, typically drafted by a committee of lawyers, may have an "everything but the kitchen sink" air that disturbs defendants who find themselves confronting new or expanded charges as a result of the rewriting. [53] The consolidation of the complaint can be disturbing to plaintiffs as well, for it takes control over the content of the complaint away from the individual claimants. [54] Although a court may allow dissenting plaintiffs to abjure certain claims, [55] plaintiffs may be compelled [*892] to pursue claims they prefer not to assert. [56] Assurances that the various cases will be unbundled for trial and the original complaints reinstated [57] seem inherently unreliable since discovery, decisions on motions, and other pretrial orders all focus on the consolidated complaint.

REV_00262434

In sum, as others have noted, consolidation can leave claimants with as little control over their cases as unnamed class members in a class action. [58] Of course, the loss of control may be viewed as a matter of only moderate concern depending on the size and nature of the claims involved. With personal injury claims, however, there is a deep tradition of individual autonomy. [59] But even in personal injury claims, empirical research suggests that tort claimants often do not have a strong sense of control over the cases when handled in the normal manner, [60] and opposition to combined treatment may be due more to the reaction of lawyers than to that of parties. [61] Indeed, although it seems undeniable that claimants like personal involvement in their cases, it may be that alternatives to traditional litigation could offer more promise of actual involvement for most claimants. [62] [*893]

B. The Blending Effect

Combining cases because of their similarities stresses the factors of similarity and can consequently deflect attention from features that distinguish cases from one another. [63] One symptom of this blending effect is the tendency in multidistrict proceedings to defer discovery or other action on unique aspects of cases and instead to focus the consolidated proceedings on common issues. [64] Natural and expedient though this may be, it also bespeaks a shift in emphasis that may prejudice parties on one side or the other, or both.

From the defendants' perspective, the concern is that individualized grounds of defense may be submerged or obscured due to preoccupation with common issues. The marginalization of individual defenses has been a frequent complaint in class actions, and has sometimes caused courts to refuse to allow class treatment. [65] But other courts have solved such problems and facilitated class treatment by streamlining the application of substantive law to shave away elements that would require consideration of individual circumstances. [66] Much as there may be good reason for such refinement in the grounds for liability, [*894] it seems difficult to deny that a prime impetus for the shift has been the judicial desire to handle cases in gross.

From the plaintiffs' perspective, the homogenizing effect of combined litigation is a mixed blessing, depending on the individual circumstances of a given plaintiff. There is already something of a shift toward the mean in individual litigation that leaves claimants with the largest and strongest claims receiving less complete compensation than those with small claims. [67] Consolidation may accelerate this tendency, benefitting plaintiffs with weak claims, while harming plaintiffs with stronger claims.

C. Magnifying the Urge to Sever Issues

Although bifurcation is said to be a "wholly different" procedure from consolidation, [68] it is not an accident that the two are combined in Rule 42. A court may find it desirable to separate issues for trial in order to expedite or simplify the resolution of a case between two parties. Indeed, a 1987 survey of state and federal judges indicated that they "overwhelmingly" supported bifurcation of issues "in appropriate cases." [69] But even in a case with only two parties, the task of segregating certain issues for separate trial may prove daunting. [70] As Judge Posner recently put it, a district judge who orders bifurcation "must carve at the joint." [71] When separate cases are consolidated but still involve unique issues, the urge to consolidate and to extract the common issues for trial, deferring the others [*895] for later action, follows rather naturally. That practice may be troublesome, however, for at least two related reasons. [72]

The first can be called the sterile trial problem. The paradigm recent example was In re

Bendectin Litigation, [73] in which the Sixth Circuit affirmed a defense verdict despite serious misgivings about the district court's order that the issues be trifurcated for trial. Owing to transfer by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation and removal from state court, the district court had before it over 800 cases involving claims of over 1,100 plaintiffs for birth defects allegedly resulting from exposure in utero to defendant's antinausea drug. To expedite the handling of these cases, the district court eventually trifurcated the issues, leading to an initial trial on the question of whether the drug is a proximate cause of birth defects. [74] In addition, the district judge directed that all visibly deformed plaintiffs be excluded from the courtroom during the trial. The appellate court recognized that the judge's order "could possibly prevent the plaintiffs from exercising their right to present to the jury the full atmosphere of their cause of action, including the reality of injury," [75] and that the severance created the risk that the trial would have "a sterile or laboratory atmosphere." [76] Although it found this the "most troubling" aspect of the case, the appellate court affirmed because Rule 42 gives the district court ""virtually unlimited freedom to try the issues in whatever way trial convenience requires.'" [77] Moreover, it noted that individual trial of all these cases could have occupied 182 district judges for a year. [78] A concurring judge criticized the district judge's handling of the case, noting that "the typical procedure in litigation does not involve the splitting up of a case, element by element, and trying each point to the jury separately," [79] but he found no prejudice in this case because [*896] plaintiffs had presented no evidence of any link between the drug and birth defects. [80] The Anglo-American tradition has relied on a complete in-court trial in which the litigant may participate. As in Bendectin, consolidation and bifurcation may undermine that tradition. Separation of issues may also truncate the ability of a jury to assess the case. [81] Thus, the sterile trial risk raises basic concerns.

The urge to extract common issues also leads to a second concern - a pro-defendant shift in results. Thirty years ago it was reported that defendants in personal injury cases won forty-two percent of those cases in which liability and damages were tried together, but seventy-nine percent of those in which liability was tried separately. [82] This difference might indicate [*897] that courts sever more often when the case for liability appears weak, but "when it is seen that the split trial reduces by more than half the cases in which personal injury plaintiffs are successful, it is apparent that bifurcation makes a substantial change in the nature of the jury trial itself." [83]

D. Judicial Burden

Finally, the assumption that consolidation invariably reduces the burden on judges, though popular, seems open to question. Some proponents of broad consolidation seem to act as if the law of diminishing returns has been repealed. But the combination of cases may create an ungainly single litigation in place of a series of commonplace cases. [84] Discovery incentives on both sides may be substantially altered by consolidation, as may the incentives to dispute other matters. A joint trial may be dispositive only if favorable to defendants, and otherwise lead to individualized further proceedings in which the results of the joint trial must be given effect. Thus, even the most forceful justification for consolidation - judicial economy - may, upon examination, prove to be an ambivalent one.

E. The Need for Clearer Guidelines

Over 60 years ago, Professor Chafee intoned that "in matters of justice, ... the benefactor is he who makes one lawsuit grow where two grew before." [85] More recently, however, we have seen reasons for skepticism about consolidation of cases. The foregoing litany of concerns overstates the negative potential of consolidation, but does point up serious grounds for anxiety about when and how consolidation is ordered. Although some conclude that Rule 42 provides adequate guidance on those questions, [86] the reality is that the sole direction in the [*898] Rule is that the trial judge has broad discretion. That orientation was certainly the view when Rule 42 was originally adopted, [87] but given the increased importance of consolidation and the attendant concerns sketched above, that orientation bears reexamination. Confronted with such concerns as those addressed above, [88] the Federal Courts Study Committee recommended in 1990 that either the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure or the Manual for Complex Litigation should include guidelines for consolidation and severance. [89] Neither the newly minted Manual for Complex Litigation, Third, nor the Federal Rules incorporates such specifics, [90] but the ALI Project may be a substitute source for such guidance. [91]

REV_00262436

IV. The ALI Project's Guidance on Consolidation

Rule 42 in Alice in Wonderland had the advantage of providing a precise standard for its application - persons more than a mile high were banned from the court. Although there might be debates on whether the rule applied to a given person - witness Alice's protest that she is not a mile high - it did afford a relatively precise linear measure. The emphasis on discretion lying behind Rule 42 of the Federal Rules of Civil [*899] Procedure precludes similar precision, perhaps for good reason. [92] The Multidistrict Litigation Act similarly lacks hard guidance. [93] But given the centrality of consolidation to the ALI Project, a more focused or confining regime seems in order.

To put this point in context, it is worthwhile to catalogue the array of striking innovations the Project proposes in order to facilitate consolidation. It recommends substituting a Complex Litigation Panel for the current Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation and vesting that body with authority to transfer cases pending in federal court for trial as well as for pretrial purposes. [94] This sort of revision has already been proposed in Congress. [95] The Project goes beyond, however, and proposes authorizing the Panel to order the removal for consolidated treatment of otherwise nonremovable cases pending in state court. [96] It also prescribes controversial approaches to choice of law questions to remove the obstacles to consolidation that could result from having different substantive law apply to different cases. [97] To avoid disruption of the consolidated litigation in the target court, the Project would additionally authorize the transferee court to enjoin "transactionally related proceedings" in state and federal courts [98] and to enter an order that invites nonparties to intervene and binds them by its determinations whether or not they accept the invitation. [99] Moving further beyond current law, the Project would authorize the Panel to direct transfer of cases filed in federal court to a state transferee court under certain circumstances, [100] and it [*900] recommends the adoption of an Interstate Complex Litigation Compact to effect concentration of cases in courts of different states. [101]

This is heady stuff. The proposed authority to shift cases properly filed in federal court to a state court, for example, "would create a system that differs in material respects from anything in our two centuries of constitutional and procedural history." [102] Although the proposed interstate compact has a distant and thus-far unutilized actual analogy, [103] it would also break new ground. Whether or not the Project's proposals would, if adopted, cause "a complete revolution in the way in which mass tort cases are decided today," [104] it is clear that the goal of the Project goes well beyond time-saving and facilitation of litigation. Building on past experience with consolidation, the Project seeks very significantly to enhance the power to consolidate by removing longstanding obstacles that presently prevent or impede consolidation.

It is certainly possible to assess the Project's proposals without focusing on whether increased consolidation itself is a good thing. [105] The Project itself was based on a preliminary study that embraced an "intuition" that consolidation would provide important advantages. [106] But as we have already seen, there can be real costs to consolidation. [107] Before embracing these dramatic changes one would logically move beyond intuition and scrutinize the means adopted to avoid or minimize these costs. The Project basically seeks to channel the power to [*901] consolidate in two ways: by articulating a standard for consolidation and by delegating prime responsibility for the decision whether to consolidate to the Panel that it seeks to create. In addition, the Project provides some guidance on severance. We turn to these proposals now.

REV_00262437

A. The Standard for Consolidation

Until now, consolidation has operated without any carefully articulated statutory or rule-based standards, relying instead on ad hoc judgments by individual judges or by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation. But ever since discussion of expanding consolidation began a decade ago, proponents of reform have recognized that they do not want to create "a legal vacuum cleaner to suck all parties into a single federal court regardless of the consequences." [108]

The problem lies in providing sensible constraints. Buried in Appendix B of the ALI Project, which contains a Reporters' Study outlining a proposed interstate compact for consolidation of cases pending in the courts of various states, is an elegant comment that captures the difficulty confronting one who would fashion such constraints:

Statisticians and epidemiologists describe and evaluate a test with reference to its "sensitivity" and "specificity." The probability that a positive test result will indicate the presence of the characteristic being tested for is its sensitivity. Conversely, the probability that a negative test will indicate the absence of the characteristic being tested for is the test's specificity. The sensitivity and specificity of a test are a function of the threshold for a positive test result. When that threshold is raised, there will be an increase in specificity and a decrease in sensitivity. Thus, by increasing the threshold for eligibility for consolidation, it is more likely that the cases that are selected for consolidation will be best suited for unitary treatment (an increase in specificity). At the same time, some cases that may have benefitted from unitary treatment will not be eligible for consolidation (a decrease in sensitivity). [109]

The problem confronting the framers of the Project was to find the best balance between sensitivity and specificity. [*902]

One approach might be to adopt precise standards like Rule 42 in Wonderland. Other proposals to expand consolidation have relied on precise limits on the number of claimants or the dollar amount involved to provide a definite prerequisite for consolidation. [110] On the floor of the American Law Institute as the Project came up for its final vote, Judge Jack Weinstein proposed that its provisions be conditioned on a similar prerequisite of 5,000 claimants with claims aggregating at least $ 100 million, but this proposal was defeated. [111] The omission of such a numerical prerequisite for consolidation is warranted. A predicate as high as the one proposed by Judge Weinstein could only rarely be satisfied, leaving the entire work product of the Project to sit on the shelf in all but the most extraordinary cases, and even then to come into play only after a great deal of other litigation activity. Even with class actions, which do have a numerosity prerequisite, [112] the actual number necessary for class certification is uncertain and vastly below the number proposed by Judge Weinstein. [113] To adopt a numerical prerequisite closer to the current multidistrict experience [114] would mean that the numerical requirement would be so easily satisfied [*903] that it would place no significant restraint on consolidation. [115] Effective limitations must be sought elsewhere.

The ALI Project goes well beyond any other codified set of consolidation guidelines in attempting to provide such limitations. Although this Article criticizes the vigor with which the Project constrains consolidation in its central provisions, it should acknowledge that the Project's basic scheme appears wise and that the debate is about matters of implementation. The starting point is to recognize, as noted above, [116] that consolidation and class action treatment "have increasingly been regarded as alternative, indeed possibly fungible, mechanisms for accomplishing aggregation." [117] The Project thus borrows overtly from Rule 23, the class action rule, [118] but it also invokes the same transaction standard that is articulated in Rule 20 for permissive joinder of parties.

REV_00262438

Harvard Journal on Legislation
Summer, 1999

*269 FEDERALISM AND FEDERAL LIABILITY REFORM: THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION SUPPORTS REFORM

Victor E. Schwartz [FNa1]
Mark A. Behrens [FNaa1]
Leavy Mathews III [FNaaa1]

Copyright © 1999 President and Fellows of Harvard College; Victor E.

Schwartz, Mark A. Behrens, Leavy Mathews III

Three recent Supreme Court decisions have bolstered the arguments and efforts of opponents of federal tort reform initiatives. This Article contends that these decisions do not stand in the way of liability reform at the federal level. The authors maintain that courts in the modern era have reviewed economic legislation with great deference and should continue to do so. Accordingly, neither the Commerce Clause nor the Tenth Amendment impose limitations on Congress's ability to enact tort reform measures.

Virtually every American has heard the conservative call to protect "states' rights." It is a political staple of conservative causes. [FN1] Ironically, however, in recent debates about federal tort reform legislation, the call to respect states' rights has been trumpeted by some very unlikely sources-- liberal members of Congress [FN2] and consumer advocates who have traditionally supported 270 federal regulation of everything from food package labeling [FN3] to local activities like used car sales [FN4] and funeral home practices. [FN5] Both Presidents Ronald Reagan and George Bush, on the other hand, supported federal product liability reform legislation, notwithstanding their ideological preference for an expanded role for state governments. [FN6]

Civil justice reform has turned the world of states' rights upside down. A basic explanation for this phenomenon is political. Opponents of federal liability reform legislation enjoy pointing out an apparent inconsistency in conservative philosophy. [FN7] They can show that the ascent to power of the Republican-controlled Congress early in 1995 was based, in part, on a pledge that members would reduce the role of the federal government and give more policymaking authority to the states. [FN8] Various federal initiatives sought to "devolve power to the states in areas such as welfare, school lunch programs, legal services for the poor, speed limits on interstate highways, and other spheres in which the federal government had played a dominant role for decades." [FN9] Federal civil justice reform was and continues to be an exception to this pattern.

271 Another explanation for the prominence of federalism in arguments against federal liability reform is more pragmatic. Opponents of reform know that if their political arguments fail to carry the day and such legislation is enacted, the U.S. Constitution may provide the only mechanism to nullify the law. Our experience in working on tort reform at the state level has taught us that, once legislation is enacted, it is likely to be challenged on constitutional grounds by the Association of Trial Lawyers of America ("ATLA") and the political allies of the organized plaintiffs' bar. [FN10]

We believe that there are certain rational goals of civil justice reform that, as a practical matter, can only be accomplished at the federal level. [FN11] The fact that tort law has long been the province of the states does not mean that it should be off-limits to any reform at the federal level. Federal legislation can provide an effective means of addressing liability problems that are rooted in interstate commerce and national in scope.

For example, Congress is uniquely suited to enact a national solution to provide predictability in the product liability system. [FN12] Predictability reduces unnecessary legal costs and allows consumers to know their rights; it also allows manufacturers to understand their obligations. State product liability legislation, as a practical matter, cannot achieve this goal on a national level. [FN13] For that reason, the National Governors' Association ("NGA") has adopted resolutions on several different occasions calling for Congress to enact federal product liability

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, because it abrogated common law causes of action against program participants. [FN169] The court held, however, that plaintiff had "no vested interest in any rule of the common 293 law." [FN170] Moreover, while a replacement or substitution of remedies was "perhaps not technically necessary for due process," Congress did provide "an alternative, efficacious remedy against the United States." [FN171] The court noted that federal statutes similar to the Swine Flu Act had "always been found to be constitutional when challenged," including the Drivers Act upon which the Swine Flu Act was modeled. [FN172]

Plaintiff also alleged an equal protection violation. [FN173] The court noted, however, that "such routine equal protection considerations as 'compelling governmental interest' or 'suspect' classifications or 'fundamental' interests [were] simply not involved" in challenges to economic legislation. [FN174] Thus, the court dismissed plaintiff's challenge. [FN175]

Finally, the court addressed plaintiff's argument that the Swine Flu Act violated the Tenth Amendment. [FN176] The court pointed out that plaintiff's argument rested "mainly upon cases declaring early pieces of New Deal legislation to be unconstitutional ... [and that] the spirit if not the letter of those cases ha[d] been overruled in subsequent decisions." [FN177] The court stated that the Swine Flu Act simply allowed the federal government to work with the states and imposed no coercion on them. [FN178]

Sparks was influential in leading other courts to reject similar constitutional challenges to the Swine Flu Act. In Wolfe v. Merrill National Laboratories, Inc., [FN179] plaintiff's "unarticulated major premise" was that the Swine Flu Act unconstitutionally compelled her participation in the program, causing her to suffer serious injury. [FN180] The court easily dismissed plaintiff's claim, 294 noting that she voluntarily chose to accept the benefit of the federally administered vaccine. [FN181] The court also discussed plaintiff's allegation that the Swine Flu Act violated the Tenth Amendment. [FN182] The court stated that, as a grant program, the Swine Flu Act fell within the power of Congress to spend funds for the "general welfare." [FN183] Accordingly, "Congress acted within its constitutionally ordained powers in passing the Act." [FN184]

8. Atomic Weapons Testing Liability Act

In Hammond v. United States, [FN185] the First Circuit upheld the constitutionality of the Department of Energy National Security and Military Applications of Nuclear Energy Authorization Act of 1985 ("Atomic Weapons Testing Liability Act") [FN186] against a challenge brought by a widow for the death of her husband, a civilian employee of the Department of Defense and observer at several atomic weapons tests, from radiation poisoning. The Atomic Weapons Testing Liability Act created a cause of action against the United States for radiation injuries arising from federal atomic weapons testing programs, retroactively abolished private tort actions against government contractors for such injuries, and made the Federal Tort Claims Act the sole remedy for those injuries. [FN187]

The First Circuit noted that Congress had previously passed laws (the Drivers Act and the Swine Flu Act) that substituted the federal government as the defendant for particular types of tort suits and required plaintiffs to seek relief through the Federal Tort Claims Act. [FN188] The court also noted that when those statutes had been challenged for alleged due process violations, they were consistently evaluated under the rational basis test and declared constitutional. [FN189] The court then evaluated the Atomic Weapons Testing Liability Act under a rational basis standard and concluded that Congress's desire to shield government contractors 295 from public embarrassment arising from litigation was rationally related to its decision to abolish common law tort claims against the contractors. [FN190] In addition, the court reasoned that, since the government was required to pay the judgments obtained against the contractors, it was neither irrational nor arbitrary for Congress to subject all potential plaintiffs uniformly to Federal Tort Claims Act limitations. [FN191] Accordingly, the court held that the Atomic Weapons Testing Liability Act did not violate the Due Process Clause. [FN192]

The court also rejected plaintiff's Tenth Amendment challenge to the Act. [FN193] Plaintiff relied on National League of Cities v. Usery [FN194] to argue that, by abolishing the state common law actions against government contractors, Congress "invaded rights reserved to the states." [FN195] The court, however, determined that plaintiff's argument was without merit, because National League of Cities had been overruled. [FN196]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals dismissed additional constitutional challenges to the Atomic Weapons Testing Liability Act in In re Consolidated United States Atmospheric Testing Litigation. [FN197] Plaintiffs, military and civilian participants in the United States atmospheric nuclear weapons testing program and their families, alleged that the Act constituted a "taking" for purposes of the Fifth Amendment, because it substituted a remedy against the government under the Federal Tort Claims Act for state tort law causes of action against government contractors who participated in the federal weapons testing program. [FN198] In addition, plaintiffs alleged that the Act violated the Due Process 296 Clause of the Fifth Amendment and the separation of powers doctrine. [FN199]

The court began its takings analysis by noting that courts had found it "well settled" that a "plaintiff has no vested right in any tort claim for damages under state law." [FN200] Accordingly, denial of plaintiffs' state tort law cause of action did "not translate into a cognizable taking claim." [FN201] The court also pointed out that the Act did not abrogate claims arising from atomic weapons tests, but instead subjected claimants to a statutory procedure that plaintiffs could reasonably expect to apply to them. [FN202]

Next, the court held that, because Congress had acted within its war powers and Commerce Clause authority, and no fundamental right or suspect classification was involved, the rational basis standard of due process review applied to plaintiffs' due process claim. Under that standard, the court held, plaintiffs had not met their burden of proving that the Act was "wholly arbitrary and irrational in purpose and effect, i.e., not reasonably related to a legitimate congressional purpose." [FN203] According to the court, the weapons testing program had been a crucial government function from its inception, and Congress reasonably believed that relieving contractors of liability would encourage their participation in the program. [FN204]

Finally, the court rejected plaintiffs' separation of powers claim. The court said that legislation does not run afoul of the separation of powers doctrine unless Congress "presumes to dictate 'how the Court should decide an issue of fact (under threat of loss of jurisdiction)' and purports to 'bind the Court to decide a case in accordance with a rule of law independently unconstitutional on other grounds." [FN205] Those limitations did not exist with respect to the Atomic Weapons Testing Liability Act, because Congress did not direct courts to make certain findings or fact or require them to apply an unconstitutional law. [FN206]

297 9. National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act of 1986

The National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act of 1986 [FN207] was enacted to address manufacturers' liability concerns relating to the distribution of vaccines and to minimize the public health dangers posed by low vaccine supplies. [FN208] The Act created a no-fault compensation program for childhood vaccine-injury victims to be funded by an excise tax on each dose of vaccine. As a predicate to receiving compensation under the Act, injured persons are required to file a petition in the United States Court of Federal Claims demonstrating, among other things, harm including "unreimbursable expenses ... in an amount greater than $1,000." [FN209]

In Black v. Secretary of Health and Human Services, [FN210] plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of the $1,000 threshold requirement on Fifth Amendment equal protection grounds. They argued that by making eligibility for the program turn on incurring $1,000 of unreimbursable expenses, Congress made it more difficult for indigent persons to qualify for compensation, because indigents often have their medical expenses defrayed by government programs such as Medicaid. [FN211] The court held, however, that the Act's eligibility requirement "was not designed to disadvantage poor persons, and the fact that it may dispropor-tionately disqualify certain groups, including indigents and persons who enjoy the benefits of other medical programs, d[id] not give rise to an equal protection violation." [FN212]

The court explained that drawing lines to create distinctions for eligibility in social programs was "peculiarly a legislative task" that "may be rational even if it does not do a perfect job of selecting those cases that appear to be appropriate subjects of congressional concern." [FN213] The court then held that "it was rational for Congress to conclude, that as a general matter, those 298 who incur only modest expenses or whose expenses are reimbursed from other sources present less compelling cases for compensation than those who incur large, unreimbursed expenses." [FN214] Thus, there was no constitutional flaw in the $1,000 threshold requirement, "particularly in light of the 'strong presumption of constitutionality' that attaches to legislation conferring monetary benefits." [FN215]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

10. Price-Anderson Act Amendments of 1988

The 1988 Amendments to the Price-Anderson Act ("1988 Amendments") [FN216] created a federal cause of action for nuclear accident claims and provided that public liability actions filed in state courts were retroactively subject to removal. [FN217] After the 1979 Three Mile Island incident near Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, plaintiffs who wished to have their tort claims remain in state court challenged the jurisdictional and removal provisions of the 1988 Amendments in In re TMI Litigation Cases Consolidated II. [FN218] They argued that the legislation violated Article III of the Constitution [FN219] because the public liability actions subject to the Act did not "arise under" the laws of the United States. [FN220]

The Third Circuit began its analysis with a close examination of the scope of Congress's power to authorize federal courts to decide nondiversity cases turning on state law rules of decision. The court noted that the Supreme Court had distinguished between "pure jurisdictional statutes" and those mixing elements of federal and state law. [FN221] The central teaching of those cases, the Third Circuit said, was that a nondiversity case "cannot be said to arise under a federal statute where that statute is nothing more than a jurisdictional grant." [FN222] On the other hand, courts evaluating mixed federal and state schemes have focused upon 299 congressional intent and have formulated their decisions with flexibility "in order to honor the presumption in favor of a statute's constitutionality." [FN223]

Turning to the 1988 Amendments at issue, the Third Circuit examined the legislative history and held that Congress had clearly expressed its intention that state law provide the content of and operate as federal law governing public liability cases resulting from nuclear incidents. [FN224] By federalizing state substantive law, Congress established the constitutional foundation for the Act's jurisdictional and removal provisions. The court then said that it would have reached the same conclusion even if state law itself, rather than state law operating as federal law, formed the basis for decision, because the level of federal involvement in the field of nuclear energy and the need for "uniformity, equity, and efficiency in the disposition of public liability claims" provided sufficient "federal elements" to support the legislation. [FN225]

The Third Circuit then turned to plaintiffs' collateral constitutional arguments that the retroactive application of the 1988 Amendments to cases already pending in state court violated principles of "federalism, state sovereignty, due process, and equal protection." [FN226] The Third Circuit's survey of relevant law led it to conclude that the legislation survived each of these challenges, because the provision for retroactivity was rationally related to Congress's desire to avoid inefficiencies and inconsistent outcomes in claims resulting from a single nuclear incident. [FN227]

11. Federal Employees Liability Reform and Tort Compensation Act

The Federal Employees Liability Reform and Tort Compensation Act of 1988 ("the Westfall Act") [FN228] amended the Federal Tort Claims Act to provide for the substitution of the United States as 300 a defendant in any action where one of its employees is sued for damages as a result of an alleged common law tort committed by the employee within the scope of his or her employment. Congress enacted the Westfall Act to respond to the United States Supreme Court's decision in Westfall v. Erwin, [FN229] which limited a federal official's absolute immunity from tort claims to situations where the official's actions were "within the outer perimeter of an official's duties and discretionary in nature." [FN230] Congress saw the Westfall decision as an erosion of the common law tort immunity formerly available to federal employees. [FN231]

The Westfall Act was challenged in Sowell v. American Cyanamid Co., [FN232] involving a government employee who was seriously injured at work and sought to bring a negligence action against his co-employees. The Eleventh Circuit held that "the great weight of authority" supported the constitutionality of the statute. [FN233] The court also held that the statute's retroactive application did not render it unconstitutional, because "a legal claim affords no definite enforceable property right until reduced to a final judgment." [FN234] The court concluded that Congress's desire to preserve employee morale, maintain federal agencies' ability to carry out their missions, and sustain the vitality of the Federal Tort Claims Act provided a rational basis for the Westfall Act. [FN235]

12. General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994 ("GARA"), [FN236] which created an eighteen-year statute of repose for general aviation aircraft, is the most recent congressional tort policy statute to withstand constitutional scrutiny. At least three courts have declared GARA to be constitutional "economic legislation." [FN237]

*301 B. Federal Tort Laws Should Be Upheld: The Mistake of Lochner Should Not Be Repeated

It is important for courts to follow the significant body of case law discussed above supporting the authority of Congress to enact laws setting national tort policy objectives. Any new decision overturning federal liability legislation would create a precedent that courts in the future could utilize to nullify a wide array of federal legislation, even outside the context of tort reform.

It may be unnecessary to raise this point in light of the very strong record of success that federal liability statutes have had against constitutional challenges. Lest anyone forget, however, it is worth reflecting on a highly discredited period in the Supreme Court's history that began around the turn of the century and ended in the mid-1930s. During this period, known as the "Lochner era" (after the unsound constitutional law decision, Lochner v. New York [FN238]), the Court nullified state and federal legislation that it disagreed with as a matter of public policy, using the Constitution as a cloak to cover its highly personalized decisions. [FN239]

Just as plaintiffs during the Lochner era implored the Supreme Court to utilize an expansive view of the Constitution to override legislation, claimants in the future may seek to convince courts to utilize an expansive view of the Constitution to impose their economic policy views upon the nation. Courts should reject this invitation, as they have done for almost a century in the field of federal tort law.

*302 The need for courts to respect Congress's authority to enact legislation setting tort policy rules is reinforced by the doctrine of stare decisis, and by the importance of the statutes themselves. For example, because of the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, diseases which once threatened to end the lives of American infants prematurely are now prevented with a routine series of childhood vaccinations. [FN240] Without the Price-Anderson Act, the private nuclear power industry in the United States might not have developed. [FN241] The General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994 breathed life back into an important American industry. Instead of continuing on the path toward extinction, the general aviation industry is now booming. [FN242] The Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1998 will help ensure the availability of lifesaving and life-enhancing implantable medical devices, such as pacemakers, heart valves, artificial blood vessels, and hip and knee joints, that are needed by millions of people each year. [FN243]

C. The Supremacy Clause Requires States to Enforce Federal Liability Reform Legislation

Once Congress enacts legislation pursuant to the Constitution, the Supremacy Clause [FN244] prohibits the states from enforcing any local laws that conflict with the statute. To the extent the various states have liability laws that interfere with, or are contrary to, federal laws enacted by Congress, the state laws are preempted. [FN245] As Chief Justice Marshall explained:

> [T]o such acts of the State Legislatures as do not transcend their powers, but ... interfere with, or are contrary to the law of Congress, made in pursuance of the Constitution, ... *303 [i]n every such case, the act of Congress ... is supreme; and the law of the State, though enacted in the exercise of powers not controverted, must yield to it. [FN246]

The Supremacy Clause also requires state courts to enforce federal laws, even though that requirement is in a sense a federal command requiring state court action. [FN247] In Testa v. Katt, [FN248] the Supreme Court addressed the Rhode Island Supreme Court's refusal to enforce the federal Emergency Price Control Act of 1942. [FN249] The Act provided a treble-damages remedy for persons who bought goods for more than the amount of the federal ceiling price and gave jurisdiction over claims under the Act to state as well as federal courts. The Supreme Court upheld the federal program, stating that the position of the Rhode Island Supreme Court "fl[ew] in the face of the fact that the States of the Union constitute a nation" and "disregard[ed] the purpose and effect" of the Supremacy Clause.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN250] State courts were directed to heed the federal Act as "the prevailing policy in every state." [FN251] More specifically, the Court explained:

[T]his Court took occasion in 1876 to review the phase of the controversy concerning the relationship of state courts to the Federal Government. Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U.S. 130. The opinion of a unanimous court in that case was strongly buttressed by historic references and persuasive reasoning. It repudiated the assumption that federal laws can be considered by the States as though they were laws emanating from a foreign sovereign. Its teaching is that the Constitution and the laws passed pursuant to it are the supreme laws of the land, binding alike upon States, courts, and the people, "any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding." It asserted that the obligation of States to enforce these federal laws is not lessened by reason of the form in which they are cast or the remedy which they provide.... [FN252]

*304 III. RECENT TENTH AMENDMENT DECISIONS DO NOT UNDERMINE CONGRESSIONAL AUTHORITY TO ENACT TORT POLICY LEGISLATION

The United States Constitution grants certain powers to the Federal Government. Where federal legislation is authorized by one of those powers, "Congress may impose its will on the States." [FN253] All other powers are reserved for the States under the Tenth Amendment, which provides that:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. [FN254]

A. The Traditional View: Judicial Deference to Congressional Authority

Historically, the Supreme Court has recognized Congress's "extraordinary power" to enact legislation and has been reluctant to invoke the Tenth Amendment to limit that authority. [FN255] Maryland v. Wirtz [FN256] is the archetypal case adopting the traditional view that courts should not apply substantive limits on federal authority under the Tenth Amendment if Congress is exercising one of its enumerated powers and has a rational basis to do so. In Wirtz, the Court upheld the constitutionality of amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA") [FN257] that required the states to adopt federal minimum wage and overtime standards for state employees of hospitals, institutions, and schools. [FN258] The Court refused to distinguish economic activity engaged in by *305 private persons from that engaged in by states, [FN259] and declared that courts should not use the Tenth Amendment to "carve up the commerce power to protect enterprises ... simply because those enterprises happen to be run by the States." [FN260]

In 1976, the Court departed briefly from its longstanding reluctance to invoke the Tenth Amendment and attempted to devise affirmative limits on Congress's Article I powers. In National League of Cities v. Usery, [FN261] the Court declared that the Tenth Amendment prohibited Congress from interfering with the core sovereign functions of the states, even where those functions affected interstate commerce. [FN262] That case challenged the validity of the 1974 amendments to the FLSA. The Court held that, insofar as the amendments operated directly to displace the states' ability to structure "integral operations" in areas of "traditional government functions" (i.e., employee-employer relationships in areas such as fire prevention, police protection, sanitation, public health, and parks and recreation), they were not within Congress's Article I authority. [FN263]

Nine years later, however, the Court overruled the National League of Cities case in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority. [FN264] The Garcia case and a 1988 case, South Carolina v. Baker, [FN265] showed the Court's return to its previous position on the Tenth Amendment. [FN266]

1. Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority

In Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, [FN267] the Court revisited the question of whether the Commerce Clause empowered Congress to enforce the federal wage and overtime *306 requirements in the 1974 amendments to the FLSA against the states in areas of "traditional governmental functions." [FN268] The San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority ("SAMTA") challenged the Act's validity after "the Department of Labor formally amended its [FLSA] interpretive regulations to provide that publicly-owned mass-transit systems were not entitled to immunity under National League of Cities." [FN269]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The Court began its analysis by restating the well-settled principle that Congress's Commerce Clause authority extends to intrastate economic activities that affect interstate commerce. [FN270] The Court noted that, were SAMTA privately owned, it would unquestionably be obligated to follow FLSA's requirements. [FN271] Therefore, any constitutional exemption SAMTA could obtain from FLSA's requirements had to rest on its status as a governmental entity rather than on the nature of its operations. [FN272]

The Court went on to outline the prerequisites for governmental immunity set forth in National League of Cities, focusing in particular on the exception for "traditional governmental functions." [FN273] The Court said that its own attempts to articulate affirmative limits on congressional authority had failed to establish a workable standard for defining "traditional governmental functions." [FN274] Moreover, attempts by federal and state courts to distinguish "traditional" functions from "nontraditional" functions had proven to be "impracticable and doctrinally barren." [FN275] The Court also expressed skepticism that a case-by-case approach would eventually establish a workable standard, citing its own poor experience in the related field of state immunity from federal taxation. [FN276]

Next, the Court explored alternative ways to define state immunity, but rejected those as unmanageable as well. It conceded that making immunity turn on a "traditional" standard would prevent courts from accommodating changes in the historical functions of states. [FN277] In addition, the Court said that it had previously 307 rejected the idea of determining a nonhistorical standard for immunity based on the identification of "uniquely" governmental functions. [FN278]

The Court also expressed concern that any rule that would establish judicially imposed definitions of "traditional," "integral," or "necessary" state governmental functions would "inevitably invite[] an unelected federal judiciary to make decisions about which state policy it favors and which ones it dislikes." [FN279] Accordingly, the Court held:

We, therefore now reject, as unsound in principle and unworkable in practice, a rule for state immunity from federal regulation that turns on a judicial appraisal of whether a particular governmental function is "integral" or "traditional." Any such rule leads to inconsistent results at the same time that it disserves principles because it is divorced from those principles. [FN280]

The Court then turned to the underlying issue that confronted it in National League of Cities--the manner in which the Constitution insulates states from the reach of Congress's power under the Commerce Clause. The Court said that it had "no license to employ freestanding conceptions of state sovereignty" [FN281] in deciding when the Constitution protects "the States as States," [FN282] because the Framers had chosen to ensure a role for the states in the federal system through the structure of the federal government itself. [FN283] The Court stated:

[W]e are convinced that the fundamental limitation that the constitutional scheme imposes on the Commerce Clause to protect the "States as States" is one of process rather than one of result. Any substantive restraint on the Commerce Clause powers must find its justification in the procedural nature of this basic limitation, and it must be tailored to compensate for possible failings in the political process 308 rather than to dictate a "sacred province of state autonomy." [FN284]

The Court reinforced its conclusion that the federal political process effectively preserves the interests of the states by pointing out the high level of funding that states receive from the federal government in the form of general and program specific grants in aid. [FN285]

The Court then held that the federal wage and overtime requirements in the FLSA, as applied to SAMTA, were not "destructive of state sovereignty or violative of any constitutional provision." [FN286] SAMTA was simply being placed in the same position as other employers. The Court also pointed out that, while the FLSA would raise costs for mass-transit systems, Congress had provided countervailing financial assistance--thus reinforcing the Court's "conviction that the national political process systematically protects States from the risk of having their functions in [the area of mass-transit] handicapped by Commerce Clause regulation." [FN287]

2. South Carolina v. Baker

In South Carolina v. Baker, [FN288] the Court was asked to decide the constitutionality of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 ("Tax Act"). [FN289] The Tax Act removed the federal income tax exemption for interest earned on publicly offered long-term bonds issued by state and local governments unless those bonds were issued in registered form. [FN290] Congress believed that 309 the registration requirement would prevent tax evasion that was being facilitated through the exchange of unregistered bearer bonds. [FN291] South Carolina, joined by the National Governors' Association as intervenor, challenged the Tax Act, contending that it violated the Tenth Amendment because it compelled States to issue bonds in registered form. [FN292]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The Court began its analysis by restating its holding in Garcia that the Tenth Amendment provides structural rather than substantive limits on Congress's legislative authority--i.e., that states must find their protection from overreaching congressional acts through elected Members of Congress. [FN293] The Court acknowledged that Garcia left open the possibility that the Tenth Amendment could be invoked to invalidate congressional regulation of state activities where there were "extraordinary defects in the national political process," but held that those defects did not exist with respect to the Tax Act. [FN294] South Carolina, the Court said, did not "even allege[[] that it was deprived of any right to participate in the national political process or that it was singled out in a way that left it politically isolated and powerless." [FN295]

The Court then addressed the states' contention that the Tax Act coerced them into enacting legislation permitting bond registration and into administering the registration scheme. [FN296] In support of their contention, the states cited FERC v. Mississippi, [FN297] which left open the possibility that the Tenth Amendment might limit Congress's power to compel states to regulate on behalf of federal interests. [FN298]

In FERC, the Court had upheld a federal statute requiring state utility commissions to: (1) adjudicate and enforce federal standards; (2) either consider adopting certain federal standards or cease regulating public utilities; and (3) follow certain federally 310 mandated procedures. [FN299] The Court had concluded that, whatever constitutional limitations might exist on the federal power to compel state regulatory activity, Congress had the power to require state utility regulatory commissions to adjudicate federal issues and to require that states regulating in a field open to preemption consider suggested federal standards and follow federally mandated procedures. [FN300]

The Court in Baker did not accept South Carolina's invitation to define whether the Tenth Amendment claim left open in FERC survived Garcia or posed constitutional limitations independent of those discussed in Garcia. It was able to avoid the issue by finding that the Tax Act presented the same type of legislation that was upheld in FERC: both statutes regulated state activities, neither sought to control or influence the manner in which states regulated private parties. [FN301]

The Baker Court concluded its Tenth Amendment analysis by rejecting the states' contention that the Tax Act impermissibly commandeered the state legislative and administrative process by requiring many state legislatures to amend their statutes in order to issue registered bonds, and state officials to devote substantial effort to determine how best to implement a registered bond system. The Court observed that being compelled to take administrative and legislative actions to comply with federal law was a common and often inevitable consequence faced by states wishing to engage in activities subject to federal regulation. [FN302] Furthermore, the Court bluntly pointed out that the states' theory of commandeering would "not only render Garcia a nullity, but would also restrict congressional regulation of state activities even more tightly than it was restricted under the now overruled National League of Cities line of cases." [FN303]

B. Judicially Imposed Limitations on Congressional Authority

The Supreme Court has signaled in two recent cases that the Tenth Amendment may once again return from its basic dormancy. 311 In those decisions-- New York v. United States [FN304] and Printz v. United States [FN305] --the Court addressed the federal government's ability to force states to implement or administer federal regulatory schemes.

1. New York v. United States

New York v. United States [FN306] involved a challenge to the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1985 ("Waste Policy Act"). [FN307] That Act sought to address a looming national shortage of disposal sites for low-level radioactive waste by directing each state to assume responsibility "for providing, either by itself or in cooperation with other States, for the disposal of ... low-level radioactive waste generated within the State" within seven years. [FN308] The State of New York and two counties in which disposal facilities were planned in the state sought a declaratory judgment that the Waste Policy Act was inconsistent with the Tenth Amendment. [FN309]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Petitioners' challenge focused on three sets of "incentives" that Congress included in the Act to encourage states to comply with their statutory obligation to attain local or regional self-sufficiency in the disposal of low- level radioactive waste. [FN310] Monetary incentives allowed states with disposal sites to impose a surcharge on radioactive waste received from other states. The Waste Policy Act also established an escrow account from which the Secretary of Energy allocated a portion of the monies generated by this surcharge to states that complied with the federal timetable. [FN311] Next, access incentives allowed states with disposal sites to increase the cost of access to the sites substantially, and then to deny access altogether, to radioactive waste generated in states that failed to meet the federal timetable. [FN312] Finally, the most severe incentive, the "take title" provision, required states 312 that failed to make arrangements for radioactive waste disposal to take title and possession of waste generated within their borders and to accept liability for all damages directly or indirectly incurred by waste generators as a consequence of the state's failure to make arrangements by the federal deadline. [FN313]

The Court began its discussion by noting that the powers conferred in the Constitution "were phrased in language broad enough to allow for the expansion of the Federal Government's role," [FN314] and that allows for enormous changes in the "scope of the federal government's authority with respect to the States." [FN315] The Court cited its "broad construction" of the Commerce and Spending Clauses, along with the Necessary and Proper Clause and the Supremacy Clause, as particularly important. [FN316] Nevertheless, the Court held, Congress is subject to the limitations contained in the Constitution. Those limitations, the Court explained, are "not derived from the text of the Tenth Amendment itself," but are found elsewhere in the Constitution (i.e., in Article I). [FN317]

The Court then distinguished the Waste Policy Act from statutes at issue in recently decided cases that involved the authority of Congress to subject state governments to generally applicable laws (e.g., Garcia). [FN318] Unlike the statutes at issue in those cases, the Court held, the Waste Policy Act did not seek to subject a state to the same legislation applicable to private parties, but instead attempted to "direct or otherwise motivate the States to regulate in a particular field or a particular way." [FN319]

The Court observed that, while it had "never sanctioned explicitly a federal command to the States to promulgate and enforce laws and regulations," [FN320] the "question whether the Constitution should permit Congress to employ state governments as regulatory agencies was a topic of lively debate among the Framers." [FN321] The Court noted that the Constitutional Convention was convened, in part, because the Articles of Confederation did not give Congress the authority in most respects to govern the 313 people directly. [FN322] The Convention generated many proposals for the structure of the new government, "but two quickly took centerstage." [FN323] One plan, the "Virginia Plan," allowed Congress to regulate individuals "without employing the States as intermediaries." [FN324] The "New Jersey Plan," on the other hand, continued to require Congress to obtain the approval of the states to legislate, as had the Articles of Confederation. [FN325] This plan was criticized, however, because it "might require the Federal Government to coerce the States into implementing legislation." [FN326] Ultimately, the Framers opted to provide for a central government in which Congress "would exercise its legislative authority directly over individuals rather than over States." [FN327] The Court concluded, therefore, that "where Congress has the authority under the Constitution to pass laws requiring or prohibiting certain acts, it lacks the power directly to compel the States to require or prohibit those acts." [FN328]

On the other hand, the Court explained that, while Congress cannot compel state regulation, it is not prohibited from encouraging a state to regulate in a particular way or attempting to influence a state's policy choices through noncoercive incentives. [FN329] The Court identified two tangible methods by which Congress "may urge a State to adopt a legislative program consistent with federal interests." [FN330] First, under its spending power, Congress can attach conditions on the receipt of federal funds as a means of influencing a state's policy. [FN331] Second, Congress can establish a "program of cooperative federalism" in which states may choose to regulate an activity according to federal standards or to have state law preempted by federal regulation. [FN332]

Under these noncoercive approaches to achieving state regulation, the Court pointed out, state governments can

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00262482

remain responsive to the local electorate's policy preferences and accountable to the people. [FN333] In contrast, if the federal government 314 were able to compel states to regulate, political accountability would be diminished. For instance, if members of Congress could impose unpopular policy decisions on state legislators, the state officials would "bear the brunt of public disapproval," while the federal officials who devised the program would "remain insulated from the electoral ramifications of their decision." [FN334]

The Court then proceeded to determine whether the Waste Policy Act's monetary, access, and take-title incentives impermissibly commandeered the states' legislative processes. The Court held that the monetary incentives included in the Act, in which Congress conditioned grants to the states upon the states' attainment of certain milestones, fell "well within the authority of Congress under the Commerce and Spending Clauses." [FN335] The Court also held that the access incentives in the Act, which ultimately authorized states to deny access to low-level radioactive waste generated in other states, represented a permissible exercise of Congress's commerce power. [FN336] Because both sets of incentives were supported by affirmative constitutional grants of power to Congress, neither was inconsistent with the Tenth Amendment. [FN337]

The Court found the Waste Policy Act's "take title" provision to be of a "different character" than the monetary and access incentives. [FN338] The "take title" provision offered states a "choice" of either regulating according to Congress's instructions or accepting ownership of waste and becoming liable for all damages waste generators suffered as a result of failure to meet the federal timetable. [FN339] The Court characterized the forced transfer component, standing alone, as no different than a congressionally compelled subsidy from state governments to radioactive waste producers. [FN340] Likewise, the requirement that states assume the liabilities of waste generators within their borders unconstitutionally directed the states to assume the liabilities of certain state residents. [FN341] Both types of federal actions commandeered the states for federal regulatory purposes and were inconsistent 315 with the Constitution's division of authority between federal and state governments. [FN342]

Significantly, the Court drew a sharp distinction between permissible federal legislation that directs state courts to enforce federal laws and unconstitutional legislation, such as the Waste Policy Act, that directs state officials to create and enforce a congressionally mandated regulatory scheme. [FN343] The Court wrote:

> Some of [the cases cited by the United States in favor of the Waste Policy Act] discuss the well established power of Congress to pass laws enforceable in state courts. See Testa v. Katt, 330 U.S. 386 (1947); Palmore v. United States, 411 U.S. 389, 402 (1973); see also Second Employer's Liability Cases, 223 U.S. 1, 57 (1912); Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U.S. 130, 136-37 (1876). These cases involve no more than an application of the Supremacy Clause's provision that federal law "shall be the Supreme Law of the Land," enforceable in every State. More to the point, all involve congressional regulation of individuals, not congressional requirements that States regulate. Federal statutes enforceable in state courts do, in a sense, direct state judges to enforce them, but this sort of federal "direction" of state judges is mandated by the text of the Supremacy Clause. No comparable constitutional provision authorizes Congress to command state legislatures to legislate. [FN344]

The Court's clarification is particularly relevant to the constitutionality of federal liability reform legislation, because these reform proposals have frequently called upon state courts to enforce federal law. Recently, some opponents of federal tort reform legislation have expansively interpreted the Court's general holding in New York that Congress cannot compel state legislation to suggest that Congress may lack the power to direct state judges to enforce federal liability reform legislation. [FN345] As the Court's opinion in New York demonstrates, however, federal liability reform legislation that compels state court enforcement of federal law is not in violation of the Tenth Amendment. It is 316 constitutionally permissible. This is how FELA has worked for almost a hundred years. Congress's power to act in this regard is still intact.

The concerns the Court had with the Waste Policy Act's "take title" provision in New York simply do not exist with respect to federal liability reform legislation. Most importantly, federal liability reform efforts seek to "exercise ... legislative authority directly over individuals rather than over States." [FN346] Like the legislation upheld in Garcia, and unlike the Waste Policy Act's take title provision that was struck down in New York, federal liability reform bills have been "generally applicable laws." [FN347] They have never compelled state legislation or required state legislatures to enact legislation limiting tort liability.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

In addition, when Congress enacts federal tort policy legislation, there is no potential for a breakdown in the national political process due to a lack of accountability. Clearly, if Congress enacts tort reform legislation, "it is the Federal Government that makes the decision in full view of the public, and it will be federal officials that suffer the consequences if the decision turns out to be detrimental or unpopular." [FN348] This fact strongly supports the constitutionality of federal liability reform legislation.

2. Printz v. United States

Printz v. United States [FN349] involved a challenge to the 1993 Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act amendments to the Gun Control Act of 1968 ("Brady Act"). [FN350] The Brady Act required the Attorney General to establish a national system for instant background checks on prospective handgun purchasers and commanded the "chief law enforcement officer" ("CLEO") of each local jurisdiction to conduct the background checks and perform related tasks until the national system became operative. [FN351] The CLEOs for counties in Arizona and Montana objected to being "pressed into federal service" and contended that 317 the Act impermissibly compelled them to execute a federal law. [FN352]

The Court opened its opinion by noting that no constitutional text directly addressed the extent to which Congress may force state officials to execute a federal law. [FN353] Accordingly, the Court concluded that the answer to the CLEOs' challenge would have to come from historical understanding and practice, the structure of the Constitution, and the Court's jurisprudence. [FN354]

In support of the Brady Act's validity, the Government cited acts of Congress which required state courts to record applications for citizenship, transmit naturalization records, order deportations, and perform other miscellaneous duties. [FN355] The Court held that Congress's power to compel enforcement of federal law by state judges was well settled, but only "establish[ed] ... that the Constitution was originally understood to permit imposition of an obligation on state judges to enforce federal prescriptions, insofar as those prescriptions related to matters appropriate for the judicial power." [FN356] The Court explained:

It is understandable why courts should be viewed distinctively in this regard; unlike legislatures and executives, they applied the law of other sovereigns all the time.... The Constitution itself, in the Full Faith and Credit Clause, Art. IV, § 1, generally required such enforcement with respect to obligations arising in other States. [FN357]

The Court then said that its acceptance of statutes imposing obligations on state courts did not imply that Congress could impose obligations on state executives. [FN358] Moreover, the Court observed that the "utter lack of statutes" imposing obligations on state executives suggested that Congress assumed it did not have the authority to compel state executive officers to carry out federal laws. [FN359] To complete the historical record, the Court acknowledged that "a number of federal statutes enacted within the past few decades [require] the participation of state and local officials," but that the persuasive force of these recent statutes 318 was far outweighed by the almost 200 years of congressional avoidance of the practice. [FN360]

Next, the Court turned to the structure of the Constitution. Pointing to its detailed discussion of the Constitutional Convention in New York, [FN361] the Court reinforced its earlier conclusion that, "[t]he Framers explicitly chose a Constitution that confers upon Congress the power to regulate individuals, not States." [FN362] The Printz Court further concluded that, with respect to the Brady Act, the "power of the Federal Government would be augmented immeasurably if it were able to impress into its service--and at no cost to itself--the police officers of the 50 States." [FN363]

The Court also evaluated whether the Brady Act violated the separation of powers doctrine. [FN364] The Court noted that, under Article II, Section 3, the responsibility for administering federal laws rests with the Executive Branch of the federal government. [FN365] The Court declared that the Brady Act effectively transferred this function to thousands of state CLEOs by requiring them to administer the federally mandated background checks "without meaningful Presidential control." [FN366] The Court viewed Congress's transfer of the federal executive power to state officials as a constitutionally impermissible reduction of the Executive Branch's power by another co-equal branch of the federal government. [FN367] The Court indicated that allowing such a transfer would shatter the unity of the federal executive envisioned by the Framers, because "Congress could act as effectively without the legislation. 272 [FN14] The American Legislative Exchange Council, a bipartisan organization of more than 3000 state legislators from all fifty states formed in principal part to protect states' rights, also supports the enactment of federal product liability reform legislation. [FN15]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Further, as we argue in this Article, federal liability reform has ample basis for support in the Constitution. We address arguments to the contrary [FN16] based on three recent decisions by the Supreme Court--New York v. United States, [FN17] United States v. Lopez, [FN18] and Printz v. United States. [FN19] While these decisions provide limits on the federal government's power over the states, they do not preclude the enactment of civil justice reform at the federal level.

This Article does not advocate any particular bill in the matrix of federal tort reform legislation. Rather, it responds to questions that may be raised in general about whether civil justice reform is constitutional and comports with basic principles of federalism. By focusing on such general principles, this Article is intended to have a long "shelf life" that can contribute to constitutional debates and legal challenges in the courts for many years to come.

Part I of this Article argues that Congress has the power under the Commerce Clause of the Constitution to enact federal liability reform legislation and that state courts are bound to enforce 273 that law under the Supremacy Clause. Part II shows that, for almost a century, Congress has enacted legislation altering state tort law, and that these laws have been held constitutional time after time. Finally, Part III maintains that state court enforcement of federal liability reform legislation would not encroach upon any powers specifically reserved for the States and, therefore, is not inconsistent with the Tenth Amendment.

I. THE COMMERCE CLAUSE EMPOWERS CONGRESS TO ENACT FEDERAL LIABILITY REFORM LEGISLATION

A. The Commerce Clause

The Commerce Clause of the Constitution gives Congress the power to regulate commerce. [FN20] As the Supreme Court has said, "This power, like all others vested in Congress is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution." [FN21]

The Supreme Court has identified "three broad categories of activity" [FN22] that Congress may regulate pursuant to its Commerce Clause authority: (1) the use of the channels of interstate commerce; (2) the instrumentalities of interstate commerce or persons or things in interstate commerce; and (3) activities having a substantial relation to interstate commerce, regardless of whether the activity is local or extends across state boundaries. [FN23]

The Supreme Court has ruled that, while local activity may not have a substantial effect on interstate commerce when considered in isolation, it may have a substantial effect on interstate commerce when considered in the aggregate. In Wickard v. Filburn, [FN24] for example, the Court upheld Congress's regulation of 274 the consumption of homegrown wheat because of its aggregate economic effect on the interstate wheat market. The Court explained that, "even if [the] activity [is] local and though it may not be regarded as commerce, it may still ... be reached by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce." [FN25] The Court also concluded that Congress may regulate activity "irrespective of whether [the] effect is what might at some earlier time have been defined as 'direct' or 'indirect.'" [FN26]

B. Federal Tort Laws

Consistent with its power to regulate commerce pursuant to the Commerce Clause, Congress has enacted a number of laws that preempt state tort law. [FN27]

1. The Early Laws

As far back as 1908, Congress enacted a "tort substitute" for workers' compensation in the railroad field. The Federal Employers' Liability Act ("FELA"), [FN28] a misleadingly named federal statute that defines rights and duties in personal injury cases brought by railroad workers against their employers, was upheld by the Supreme

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00262467

President as with him, by simply requiring state officers to execute its laws." [FN368]

Finally, the Court turned to its prior decisions on the ability of the Federal Government to commandeer state governments to administer federal laws. In Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Association, Inc. [FN369] and FERC v. Mississippi, [FN370] the 319 Court held, it sustained statutes against constitutional challenge only after establishing that they did not require the states to enforce federal law. Accordingly, the Court held, its decision in New York [FN371] striking down a provision of the Waste Policy Act that "unambiguously required the States to enact or administer a federal regulatory program ... should have come as no surprise." [FN372] After rejecting the Government's attempts to distinguish the New York decision, the Court wrote:

We held in New York that Congress cannot compel the States to enact or enforce a federal regulatory program. Today we hold that Congress cannot circumvent that prohibition by conscripting the State's officers directly. The Federal Government may neither issue directives requiring the States to address particular problems, nor command the States' officers, or those of their political subdivisions, to administer or enforce a federal regulatory program. It matters not whether policymaking is involved, and no case-by-case weighing of the burdens or benefits is necessary; such commands are fundamentally incompatible with our constitutional system of dual sovereignty. [FN373]

The Printz decision does not provide a constitutional basis to nullify federal liability reform legislation. The decision makes clear that Congress cannot compel state legislatures or executives to participate in a federal regulatory or administrative scheme, [FN374] but it suggests no constitutional prohibition against legislation that asks state courts to enforce a federal liability law. [FN375] To the contrary, state courts have always been and continue to be obligated to honor such legislation. That role is entirely consistent with the Tenth Amendment and the constitutional mandate found in the Supremacy Clause.

*320 3. Driver's Privacy Protection Act Cases

Recent federal appellate and district court decisions striking down a federal law regulating the disclosure of information contained in motor vehicle registration records have been heavily influenced by the Printz and New York decisions.

In Condon v. Reno, [FN376] the Fourth Circuit permanently enjoined federal enforcement of the Driver's Privacy Protection Act of 1994 ("DPPA"). [FN377] The DPPA restricted the states' dissemination and use of personal information contained in state motor vehicle records and imposed criminal and civil liability on state officials who failed to comply with the federal restrictions. [FN378] The court concluded that the DPPA exclusively regulated the disclosure of information contained in state motor vehicle records, and therefore could not be categorized as a law of general applicability permissible under Garcia. [FN379] Instead, the DPPA violated the Supreme Court's holding in New York that the federal government cannot compel state executives to administer a federal regulatory program. [FN380]

Similarly, in Oklahoma v. United States, [FN381] the court enjoined federal enforcement of the DPPA on Tenth Amendment grounds. Contrary to the provisions of the federal DPPA, Oklahoma law made motor vehicle records a matter of public record. [FN382] Relying primarily on New York and Printz, the court held that the DPPA impermissibly sought to "treat the Oklahoma Department of Public Safety as a subdivision of the United States" by requiring the Department to "create and maintain systems" to enforce the DPPA's provisions. [FN383]

321 Like the New York and Printz cases, the reach of the DPPA cases is limited to situations where state executives (as opposed to state courts) are forced to implement federal policy or where Congress escapes political accountability by forcing state legislators to enact a regulatory scheme. They have no bearing, directly or indirectly, on congressional enactment of a tort law that would be applicable in both federal and state court proceedings.

CONCLUSION

For almost a century, Congress has enacted legislation setting national tort policy rules, and these laws have been declared constitutional time and time again as legitimate exercises of Congress's Commerce Clause authority. Future challenges to federal tort legislation are bound to fail as well, unless courts unwisely choose to abandon that substantial body of well-reasoned precedent. The United States Supreme Court's decisions in New York, Lopez, and

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Printz do not change this conclusion.

The Lopez opinion discussed the Commerce Clause, but it is not truly a Commerce Clause case. As the Court explained, the Gun-Free School Zones Act at issue was a criminal statute that regulated handgun possession. "[B]y its terms," the statute "ha[d] nothing to do with 'commerce' or any sort of economic enterprise, however, broadly one might define those terms." [FN384] The Lopez decision is distinguishable both legally and factually from those cases upholding regulation of activities that arise out of or are connected with commercial transactions, which viewed in the aggregate, substantially effect interstate commerce--cases that directly support Congress's Commerce Clause authority over liability law.

The New York and Printz decisions provide limits on the federal government's power over the states, but they do not preclude the enactment of civil justice reform at the federal level. In fact, the opinions make clear that state court enforcement of federal liability reform legislation would not encroach upon any powers specifically reserved for the states. They expressly distinguish state court enforcement of federal laws from federal laws commanding state legislatures to legislate or requiring state 322 executive officials to administer a federal regulatory scheme. While the former is clearly constitutional and, indeed, mandated by the Supremacy Clause, the latter are not.

[FNa1]. Senior Partner, Crowell & Moring LLP, Washington, D.C.; co-author of PROSSER, WADE AND SCHWARTZ'S CASES AND MATERIALS ON TORTS (9th ed. 1994); author of COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE (3d ed. 1994); member, Advisory Committee of the American Law Institute's RESTATEMENT OF THE LAW OF TORTS: PRODUCTS LIABILITY, APPORTIONMENT OF LIABILITY, and GENERAL PRINCIPLES projects. B.A., Boston University, 1962; J.D., Columbia University, 1965.

[FNaa1]. Of Counsel, Crowell & Moring LLP, Washington, D.C.; Adjunct Professorial Lecturer of Law, The American University, Washington College of Law. B.A., University of Wisconsin-Madison, 1987; J.D., Vanderbilt University, 1990. Comments about this Article can be sent by electronic mail to <mbehrens @cromor.com>.

[FNaaa1]. Associate, Crowell & Moring LLP, Washington, D.C. B.S., Howard University, 1994; J.D., Howard University, 1997.

The authors wish to thank Clifton S. Elgarten for his constructive suggestions during the preparation of this Article.

[FN1]. See Erwin Chemerinsky, The Values of Federalism, 47 FLA. L. REV. 499 (1995).

[FN2]. See H.R. REP. NO. 105-702, at 25-28 (1998) (minority views in House Judiciary Committee Report on Class Action Jurisdiction Act of 1998); S. REP. NO. 105-32, at 64, 78-80 (1997) (minority views in Senate Commerce Committee Report on Product Liability Reform Act of 1997); S. REP. NO. 104-69, at 64-66 (1995) (minority views in Senate Commerce Committee Report on Product Liability Fairness Act); H.R. REP. NO. 104-63, at 27 (1995) (minority views in House Commerce Committee Report on Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act); H.R. REP. NO. 104-64, at 35-36, 40-41 (1995) (minority views in House Judiciary Committee Report on Common Sense Legal Standards Reform Act of 1995).

[FN3]. See 21 C.F.R. § 101 (1995) (requiring uniform labeling of all packaged food products with ingredients and specific nutritional information).

[FN4]. See Used Motor Vehicle Trade Regulation Rule, 16 C.F.R. § 455 (1995) (prohibiting misrepresentation of the mechanical condition of a used vehicle and requiring used car salesmen to disclose warranty information to consumers prior to sale); Odometer Disclosure Requirement, 49 C.F.R. § 580 (1995) (requiring transferor of motor vehicle to provide a written disclosure of odometer mileage and its accuracy to protect purchasers who rely on odometer readings in selecting used cars).

[FN5]. See Funeral Industries Practice Rule, 16 C.F.R. § 453 (1995).

[FN6]. See C. Boyden Gray, Regulation and Federalism, 1 YALE J. ON REG. 93, 96-98 (1983) (explaining the Reagan administration's reasons for supporting national product liability legislation); Joe Davidson, Bill to Limit Product Liability Lawsuits by Consumers Fails in Senate, But Barely, WALL ST. J., Sept. 11, 1992, at C13 (stating that "President Bush strongly supported [federal product liability reform legislation] and made it a hot campaign topic with a comment at the Republican convention").

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN7]. See supra note 2 and accompanying text. Conservatives also enjoy pointing out an apparent inconsistency in liberal philosophy. The same members who have expressed a resounding "no" to federal civil justice and liability reform legislation strongly support the Consumer Products Safety Commission, in part because products flow in interstate commerce. See Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, Federal Product Liability Reform in 1997: History And Public Policy Support Its Enactment Now, 64 TENN. L. REV. 595, 605-06 (1997).

[FN8]. See H.R. Rep. No. 104-63, at 27 (1995) (minority views in House Commerce Committee Report on Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act).

[FN9]. Robert M. Ackerman, Tort Law and Federalism: Whatever Happened to Devolution?, 14 YALE J. REG. 429, 329 (1996) (describing the public policy and constitutional bases for federal involvement in tort law). See also Thomas A. Eaton & Susette M. Talarico, Testing Two Assumptions About Federalism and Tort Reform, 14 YALE J. REG. 371 (1996) (characterizing Republican support for federal tort reform as an exception to the desire to shift policymaking authority from the federal government to the states); Robert L. Rabin, Federalism And The Tort System, 50 RUTGERS L. REV. 1 (1997) (characterizing 1996 federal product liability reform legislation as part of a recent series of efforts to achieve liability reform at the federal level); Nim M. Razook, Jr., Legal And Extralegal Barriers To Federal Product Liability Reform, 32 AM. BUS. L.J. 541 (1995) (suggesting federal liabilty reform is inconsistent with states' rights).

[FN10]. See Victor E. Schwartz, Mark A. Behrens, & Mark D. Taylor, Stamping Out Tort Reform: State Courts Lack Proper Respect for Legislative Judgments, LEGAL TIMES, Feb. 10, 1997, at S34 (discussing judicial nullification of state tort statutes); Victor E. Schwartz, Mark A. Behrens, & Mark D. Taylor, Who Should Make America's Tort Law: Courts or Legislators? (Wash. Legal Found. Feb. 1997) (asserting that legislatures and courts share a role in deciding tort law rules).

[FN11]. See Schwartz & Behrens, supra note 7.

[FN12]. See Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, The Road To Federal Product Liability Reform, 55 MD. L. REV. 1363 (1996); Sherman Joyce, Product Liability Law In The Federal Arena, 19 SEATTLE U. L. REV. 421 (1996).

[FN13]. See U.S. DEPT. OF COMMERCE, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS COMMODITY TRANSPORTATION SURVEY 1-7, tbl. 1 (1977) (indicating that, on average, over 70% of goods manufactured in the United States are shipped out of state and sold).

[FN14]. The NGA's most recent resolution stated in part:

> The National Governors' Association recognizes that the current patchwork of U.S. product liability laws is too costly, time-consuming, unpredictable, and counterproductive, resulting in a severely adverse effect on American consumers, workers, competitiveness, innovation and commerce.... Clearly, a national product liability code would greatly enhance the effectiveness of interstate commerce. The Governors urge Congress to adopt a federal uniform product liability code.

S. REP. NO. 105-32, at 14 (1997) (quoting NGA policy statement).

[FN15]. See id. at 15.

[FN16]. See Jeffrey White, Does Products Bill Collide with Tenth Amendment?, TRIAL, Nov. 1997, at 30; Cynthia C. Lebow, Federalism And Federal Product Liability Reform: A Warning Not Heeded, 64 TENN. L. REV. 665 (1997); Jerry J. Phillips, Hoist by One's Own Petard: When a Conservative Commerce Clause Interpretation Meets Conservative Tort Reform, 64 TENN. L. REV. 647 (1997); Andrew F. Popper, A Federal Tort Law Is Still a Bad

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Idea: A Comment on Senate Bill 687, 16 J. PRODS. & TOXICS LIAB. 105 (1994); Beth Rogers, Note, Legal Reform--At the Expense of Federalism? House Bill 956, Common Sense Civil Justice Reform Act and Senate Bill 565, Product Liability Reform Act, 21 U. DAYTON L. REV. 513 (1996).

[FN17]. 505 U.S. 144 (1992) (discussing the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act).

[FN18]. 514 U.S. 549 (1995) (discussing the Gun Free Zones Act).

[FN19]. 521 U.S. 898 (1997) (discussing the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act).

[FN20]. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3.

[FN21]. United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 553 (1995) (quoting Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 196 (1824)) (reaffirming that, although the Commerce Clause represents a broad grant of federal authority, that authority is not plenary, but subject to outer limits).

[FN22]. Lopez, 514 U.S. at 558.

[FN23]. See id. at 558-59. See also United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 118 (1941) ("The power of Congress over interstate commerce ... extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce ... as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the exercise of the granted power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.").

[FN24]. 317 U.S. 111 (1942).

[FN25]. Id. at 125.

[FN26]. Id. See also Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 277 (1981) ("Even activity that is purely intrastate in character may be regulated by Congress, where the activity, combined with like conduct by others similarly situated, affects commerce among the States ....").

[FN27]. Maritime law, though beyond the scope of this Article, is another field in which Congress has been active in setting tort policy rules. See generally GRANT GILMORE & CHARLES L. BLACK, JR., THE LAW OF ADMIRALTY ch. VI (2d ed. 1975).

[FN28]. Federal Employers' Liability Act, ch. 149, 35 Stat. 65 (1908) (codified as amended at 45 U.S.C. §§ 51-60 (1994)).

[FN29]. See infra notes 78-82 and accompanying text.

[FN30]. 33 U.S.C. §§ 901-944 (1994).

[FN31]. See generally Kane v. United States, 43 F.3d 1446, 1449 (Fed. Cir. 1994) (describing workers' compensation acts).

[FN32]. See Bludworth Shipyard, Inc. v. Lira, 700 F.2d 1046, 1051 (5th Cir. 1983) (holding that, although the LHWCA was enacted to help injured employees, the Act was not intended to provide compensation to injured employees for expenses that are the direct result of the employee's own post- injury misconduct).

[FN33]. Smither & Co., Inc. v. Coles, 242 F.2d 220, 222 (D.C. Cir. 1957) (citing Bradford Electric Co. v. Clapper, 286 U.S. 145, 159 (1932)) (describing the compromises made by both employees and employers through the enactment of statutes like the LHWCA).

[FN34]. See infra notes 93-103 and accompanying text.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN35]. Numerous other congressional tort policy enactments that have been declared constitutional are described later in this Article. See discussion infra Part II.

[FN36]. Pub. L. No. 103-298, 108 Stat. 1552 (codified at 49 U.S.C. § 40101). See generally David Moffitt, Note, The Implications of Tort Reform For General Aviation: The General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994, 1 SYRACUSE J. LEGIS. & POL'Y 215 (1995).

[FN37]. GARA did not provide any new basis for federal court jurisdiction; cases that would have been decided by a state court before GARA became effective on August 17, 1994, remain in state court today, subject to the application of the federal "ceiling" on tort liability. GARA also did not preempt shorter state statutes of repose that may apply to bar a tort claim.

[FN38]. See S. REP. NO. 105-32, at 41-42 (1997) (Senate Commerce Committee Report on Product Liability Reform Act of 1997). See generally Geoffrey A. Campbell, Study: Business Booms After Tort Reform Enacted, A.B.A. J., at 28 (Jan. 1996) ("The light aircraft industry is taking off as reduced liability encourages technological innovation.").

[FN39]. See S. REP. NO. 105-32, at 41.

[FN40]. See id.

[FN41]. See id.

[FN42]. See id.

[FN43]. See id. at 42.

[FN44]. See id.

[FN45]. See id.

[FN46]. See id.

[FN47]. 26 U.S.C. § 104 (Supp. II 1996).

[FN48]. 42 U.S.C. §§ 201, 233 (Supp. II 1996).

[FN49]. 49 U.S.C. § 1136 (Supp. II 1996).

[FN50]. 42 U.S.C. § 1791 (Supp. II 1996).

[FN51]. 15 U.S.C. § 77 (Supp. II 1996) (enacted over the veto of President Clinton).

[FN52]. A product liability reform bill cleared both the House and Senate in the 104th Congress, but was vetoed by President Clinton. That legislation, among other reforms, capped punitive damage awards at the greater of two times the plaintiff's compensatory damages award or $250,000; abolished joint liability for noneconomic damages; limited the liability of product sellers to their own negligence or failure to comply with an express warranty; established a complete defense to liability if the principal cause of an accident was the claimant's abuse of alcohol or illicit drugs; reduced a defendant's liability to the extent the plaintiff's harm was due to the misuse or alteration of a product; and set a 15-year statute of repose on litigation involving workplace durable goods (e.g., machine tools). See H.R. CONF. REP. NO. 104-481 (1996). President Clinton vetoed the bill on May 2, 1996. See John F. Harris, Clinton Vetoes Product Liability Measure, WASH. POST, May 3, 1996, at A14.

[FN53]. 42 U.S.C.S. § 14503 (Law. Co-op. 1998).

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN54]. 49 U.S.C.S. § 28103 (Law. Co-op. 1998).

[FN55]. 21 U.S.C.S. § 1605 (Law. Co-op. 1998).

[FN56]. Pub. L. No. 105-271, 112 Stat. 2386, 2389 (1998) (to be codified at 15 U.S.C. § 78a).

[FN57]. 15 U.S.C.S. §§ 77-78 (Law. Co-op. 1998).

[FN58]. See supra text accompanying note 51.

[FN59]. See S. REP. NO. 105-182, at 3 (1998); H.R. REP. NO. 105-640, at 8 (1998); H.R. REP. NO. 105-803, at 13 (1998).

[FN60]. 514 U.S. 549 (1995). See, e.g., Phillips, supra note 16.

[FN61]. Pub. L. No. 101-647, § 1702(b), 104 Stat. 4789, 4844 (1990) (current version at 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(2)(A) (1998)).

[FN62]. Lopez, 514 U.S. at 551. See also Brzonkala v. Virginia Polytechnic Inst. and State Univ., 1999 WL 111891, at *10 (4th Cir. Mar. 5, 1999) (holding that the Violence Against Women Act, which created a civil cause of action against private parties who commit acts of gender-motivated violence, exceeded Congress's Commerce Clause authority because the activity Congress sought to regulate--violent crime motivated by gender animus--was "not itself even arguably commercial or economic," and it "lack[ed] a meaningful connection with any particular, identifiable economic enterprise or transaction"). See generally Herbert Hovenkamp, Judicial Restraint And Constitutional Federalism: The Supreme Court's Lopez And Seminole Tribe Decisions, 96 COLUM. L. REV. 2213 (1996); Symposium, The New Federalism After United States v. Lopez, 46 CASE W. RES. L. REV. 633 (1996); Symposium, Reflections on United States v. Lopez, 94 MICH. L. REV. 533 (1995).

[FN63]. Lopez, 514 U.S. at 561.

[FN64]. Id. at 567.

[FN65]. See supra notes 22-26 and accompanying text. See also Patrick Hoopes, Tort Reform In the Wake of United States v. Lopez, 24 HASTINGS CONST. L.Q. 785 (1997) (discussing how the Lopez decision represented a retreat from the Supreme Court's traditionally expansive interpretation of Congress's authority under the Commerce Clause).

[FN66]. See Lopez, 514 U.S. at 563 (indicating that Congress has the power to enact legislation regulating firearms possession explicitly connected with or having an effect on interstate commerce). See also Scott M. Richmond, Note, Printz v. United States: If Congress Cannot Force State Legislatures to Implement Federal Policy, Why Should It Be Able to Force State Executives?, 7 WIDENER J. PUB. L. 325, 371 (1998) ("Congress has the power, under the Commerce Clause, to regulate handgun sales involved in interstate commerce.").

[FN67]. 46 U.S.C.A. §§ 181-196 (1994).

[FN68]. 46 U.S.C.A. § 182.

[FN69]. 46 U.S.C.A. § 183.

[FN70]. 109 U.S. 578 (1883).

[FN71]. See id. at 579-80.

[FN72]. Id. at 589.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN73]. 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 558 (1874) (addressing Congress's power to make changes to maritime law).

[FN74]. Providence, 109 U.S. at 589 (quoting The Lottawana, 88 U.S. at 577).

[FN75]. Id. at 590 (quoting The Lottawana, 88 U.S. at 577).

[FN76]. Id.

[FN77]. See id. at 587.

[FN78]. 223 U.S. 1 (1912).

[FN79]. 45 U.S.C. §§ 51-60 (1994).

[FN80]. See supra note 28 and accompanying text. In Howard v. Illinois Central Railroad Co. (the Employers' Liability Cases), 207 U.S. 463, 496-97 (1908), the Court struck down a 1906 version of FELA, finding that the 1906 Act exceeded Congress's Commerce Clause authority because it "embrace[d] ... matters and things domestic [or intrastate] in their character."

[FN81]. See 45 U.S.C. § 56. The Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688 (1994), a FELA-like statute that permits seamen injured in the course of employment to maintain an action for damages at law, also has been interpreted to provide federal and state courts with concurrent jurisdiction to decide Jones Act cases. See Engel v. Davenport, 271 U.S. 33 (1926).

[FN82]. Mondou, 223 U.S. at 50 (emphasis added) (quoting Munn v. Illinois, 94 U.S. 113, 134 (1876)).

[FN83]. Id. at 51.

[FN84]. The Court assumed the clause to be the equivalent of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See id. at 53.

[FN85]. Id.

[FN86]. See Mondou, 223 U.S. at 53.

[FN87]. Id.

[FN88]. Id.

[FN89]. See id. at 54-55.

[FN90]. Id. at 55.

[FN91]. Id. at 56-57.

[FN92]. Id. at 58-59.

[FN93]. 285 U.S. 22 (1932).

[FN94]. 33 U.S.C. §§ 901-950 (1994) (originally entitled "Longshoremen's and Harbor Worker's Act").

[FN95]. See supra notes 30-33 and accompanying text.

[FN96]. See Crowell, 285 U.S. at 39.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN97]. See id. at 41.

[FN98]. See id.

[FN99]. See id.

[FN100]. See id. at 42.

[FN101]. See id. at 42-45 (detailing the significant amount of discretion granted to a single deputy commissioner under the Act).

[FN102]. Id. at 47.

[FN103]. See id. at 54 (holding that the LHWCA's reservation of the judiciary's power to deal with matters of law appropriately preserved the exercise of the judicial function).

[FN104]. 28 U.S.C. § 2679(b)-(e) (1994).

[FN105]. See Carr v. United States, 422 F.2d 1007, 1009 (4th Cir. 1970).

[FN106]. Id. at 1012.

[FN107]. See 28 U.S.C. § 2679(b), (d) (1994).

[FN108]. 225 F. Supp. 881 (W.D. Mo. 1963).

[FN109]. See id. at 881.

[FN110]. See id. at 882. Plaintiffs also argued that the Act violated the Seventh Amendment and the jury trial provision of the Missouri Constitution. See id. The court quickly disposed of plaintiff's Seventh Amendment challenge, holding that "the guarantees of the Seventh Amendment do not apply" to statutory causes of action against the federal government. See id. See also Gustafson v. Peck, 216 F. Supp. 370, 371 (N.D. Iowa 1963) (holding that the Seventh Amendment does not guarantee a right to a trial by jury in a state court); Adams v. Jackel, 220 F. Supp. 764, 765 (E.D.N.Y. 1963) (Seventh Amendment does not guarantee a right to a trial by jury in a claim for restitution against a collector of internal revenue). The court dismissed the plaintiff's argument that the Drivers Act violated the Missouri Constitution's jury trial guarantee, noting that the argument was without merit in light of the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution. See Nistendirk, 225 F. Supp. at 882.

[FN111]. See Nistendirk, 225 F. Supp. at 882.

[FN112]. 280 U.S. 117 (1929).

[FN113]. Nistendirk, 225 F. Supp. at 882 (quoting Silver, 280 U.S. at 122).

[FN114]. See id.

[FN115]. 5 U.S.C. §§ 8101-8193 (1994).

[FN116]. See Noga v. United States, 411 F.2d 943, 944 (9th Cir. 1969).

[FN117]. Carr, 422 F.2d at 1010.

[FN118]. See Vantrease v. United States, 400 F.2d 853 (6th Cir. 1968); Noga, 411 F.2d at 943; Van Houten v. Ralls, 411 F.2d 940 (9th Cir.); Beechwood v. United States, 264 F. Supp. 926 (D. Mont. 1967).

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN119]. 422 F.2d 1007 (4th Cir. 1970).

[FN120]. See id. at 1010.

[FN121]. See id. at 1011.

[FN122]. See id. at 1010 (noting the Court's rejection of the argument's premise in Silver).

[FN123]. Carr, 422 F.2d at 1011.

[FN124]. See id.

[FN125]. Id. at 1012.

[FN126]. Id.

[FN127]. 539 F.2d 955 (3d Cir. 1976).

[FN128]. In Feres v. United States, 340 U.S. 135 (1950), the Supreme Court held that "the Government is not liable under the Federal Tort Claims Act for injuries to servicemen where the injuries arise out of or are in the course of activity incident to service." Id. at 146.

[FN129]. See Thomason, 539 F.2d at 956.

[FN130]. Id. at 957.

[FN131]. See id. at 958.

[FN132]. See id. at 959-60.

[FN133]. See supra notes 123-126 and accompanying text.

[FN134]. See Thomason, 539 F.2d at 959-60.

[FN135]. 428 U.S. 1 (1976).

[FN136]. 30 U.S.C. §§ 901-962 (1994). See generally Allen R. Prunty & Mark E. Solomons, The Federal Black Lung Benefits Program: Its Evolution and Current Issues, 91 W. VA. L. REV. 665 (1989).

[FN137]. See 30 U.S.C. § 901 (1994).

[FN138]. Usery, 428 U.S. at 18.

[FN139]. Id. at 15.

[FN140]. See id at 16.

[FN141]. Id. at 19.

[FN142]. See id. at 20.

[FN143]. Id. at 29.

[FN144]. See id. at 31.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN145]. Id. at 31-32.

[FN146]. Id. at 32.

[FN147]. Id. at 34 (quoting S. REP. NO. 92-743, at 11 (1972), reprinted in 1972 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2305, 2315).

[FN148]. 42 U.S.C. § 2210 (1994).

[FN149]. See Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Envtl. Study Group, Inc., 438 U.S. 59, 65 n.5 (1978). "The defenses of negligence, contributory negligence, charitable or governmental immunity and assumption of the risk are all waived in the event of an extraordinary nuclear occurrence." Id.

[FN150]. See id. at 64.

[FN151]. Id.

[FN152]. 438 U.S. 59 (1978).

[FN153]. See id. at 67.

[FN154]. See id. at 81.

[FN155]. See id. at 84.

[FN156]. Id. at 83.

[FN157]. See id. at 84. Cf. Indemnity Ins. Co. of N. Am. v. Pan Am. Airways, 58 F. Supp. 338, 340 (S.D.N.Y. 1944) (upholding against a due process attack the Warsaw Convention, a treaty which limited the liability of airlines for injuries or deaths to aircraft passengers).

[FN158]. Duke Power, 438 U.S. at 86.

[FN159]. See id. at 88.

[FN160]. Id. at 88 n.32 (quoting Mondou, 223 U.S. at 50 (quoting Munn, 94 U.S. at 134)).

[FN161]. Id. (quoting Silver, 280 U.S. at 122).

[FN162]. Id. at 93.

[FN163]. Id. at 93-94.

[FN164]. Act of Aug. 12, 1976, 90 Stat. 1113 (repealed 1978). See generally Colleen Courtade, et al., 57A Am. Jur. 2d Negligence § 540 (1989).

[FN165]. See Davis v. Wyeth Laboratories, Inc., 399 F.2d 121 (9th Cir. 1968) (holding a polio vaccine manufacturer strictly liable for failure to warn individuals receiving the vaccine); Reyes v. Wyeth Laboratories, Inc., 498 F.2d 1264 (5th Cir.) (same).

[FN166]. See Sparks v. Wyeth Laboratories, Inc., 431 F. Supp. 411, 415 (W.D. Okla. 1977) (detailing the Swine Flu Act's legislative history to explain why it was enacted in haste).

[FN167]. See Act of Aug. 12, 1976, 90 Stat. 1113, 1114 (repealed 1978).

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Court as a constitutional exercise of congressional power. [FN29]

Similarly, in 1927, Congress enacted the Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act ("LHWCA"), [FN30] a FELA-like statute that provides fixed awards to employees or their dependents in cases of employment-related injuries or deaths occurring upon the navigable waters of the United States. [FN31] Congress enacted LHWCA both to provide injured employees with more 275 immediate and less expensive relief than that available in a common law tort action [FN32] and to provide employers with liability that was "limited and determinative." [FN33] Again, the Supreme Court held that Congress had the constitutional power to enact this piece of federal tort legislation. [FN34] These are just two examples among many that illustrate Congress's active, longstanding participation in setting national tort liability rules. [FN35]

2. Recent Laws Setting National Tort Policy Rules: 1993-1998

Almost nine decades after the enactment FELA, the 103d Congress enacted the General Aviation Revitalization Act of 1994 ("GARA"), [FN36] which established an eighteen-year statute of repose, or outer time limit on bringing litigation, for accidents involving general aviation aircraft. [FN37] GARA was predicated on Congress's power to regulate interstate commerce. Enough time has passed to conclude that GARA has been successful in its goal of revitalizing the light aircraft industry, which could not have been accomplished by state action alone.

A March 1997 hearing of the Consumer Affairs Subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee explored GARA's effects. [FN38] John Moore, senior vice president of Human Resources for Cessna Aircraft Company, testified that Cessna withdrew from the single engine aircraft market in 1986, but as a result of 276 GARA, is now back in the single engine aircraft business. [FN39] At the time of the subcommittee's hearing, Cessna's small aircraft division had more than 650 employees and had plans to double employment in 1998. [FN40] John Peterson of the Montgomery County Action Council of Coffeyville, Kansas-- the home of Cessna's new small aircraft plant--testified that, prior to 1995, Montgomery County ranked ninety-eighth out of 105 Kansas counties in economic indicators. [FN41] The county's population was dropping, employment was on the decline, per capita income was down, and property values were depressed. [FN42] After GARA, new housing starts were up 260%, the value of new homes doubled, retail sales were up five percent, per capita income nearly doubled, and nearly 500 people per year were moving into the county. [FN43]

Similarly, Paul Newman, Chief Financial Officer of the New Piper Aircraft Corporation, testified that GARA permitted New Piper to emerge from a Chapter 11 bankruptcy that had idled 1000 workers. [FN44] Likewise, John S. Yodice, General Counsel of the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association ("AOPA"), testified that his members supported GARA, even though it limited their right to sue. [FN45] AOPA members realized that they were paying an extraordinary amount for new aircraft due to manufacturers' "long tail" liability exposure for very old planes--aircraft that had flown safely for more than two decades. [FN46]

The 104th Congress enacted a number of other tort and civil justice reform measures:

The Small Business Job Protection Act of 1996 [FN47] included a provision that: (1) holds punitive damages received in personal injury suits subject to federal income tax by eliminating the possibility for an exclusion from taxable gross income; (2) eliminates the possibility of an exclusion for personal injury damages in cases that do not involve physical injury or illness; and (3) provides that emotional distress is not by itself a physical injury or sickness;

277 The Federally Supported Health Centers Assistance Act of 1995 [FN48] extended Federal Tort Claims Act coverage to community, migrant, and homeless health centers;

The Aviation Disaster Family Assistance Act of 1996 [FN49] limited unsolicited contacts from lawyers and insurance company representatives with airline crash victims or their families;

The Bill Emerson Good Samaritan Food Donation Act of 1996 [FN50] provided limited tort immunity to encourage the donation of food and grocery products to nonprofit organizations for distribution to needy individuals; and

The PrivateSecurities Litigation Reform Act of 1995 [FN51] placed limits on the conduct of private lawsuits under the Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. [FN52]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00262468

[FN168]. 431 F. Supp. 411 (W.D. Okla. 1977).

[FN169]. See id. at 416.

[FN170]. Id.

[FN171]. Id.

[FN172]. Id.

[FN173]. See id. at 417.

[FN174]. Id. at 418.

[FN175]. See id. See also DiPappa v. United States, 687 F.2d 14 (3d Cir. 1982) (holding that Swine Flu Act did not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment). The court also rejected a Seventh Amendment challenge raised by plaintiff, stating that the right to jury trial guarantee is inapplicable where a sovereign waives its immunity and noting that the Seventh Amendment had never been held to apply against the States under the Fourteenth Amendment. See Sparks, 431 F. Supp. at 418-19. See also Ducharme v. Merrill-Nat'l Laboratories, 574 F.2d 1307 (5th Cir. 1978) (holding that Swine Flu Act did not violate Seventh Amendment).

[FN176]. See Sparks, 431 F. Supp. at 418.

[FN177]. Id.

[FN178]. See id. at 420.

[FN179]. 433 F. Supp. 231, 236 (M.D. Tenn. 1977).

[FN180]. Id. at 237.

[FN181]. See id. at 238.

[FN182]. See id.

[FN183]. Id.

[FN184]. Id.

[FN185]. 786 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1986).

[FN186]. 42 U.S.C. § 2212 (1988) (repealed 1990).

[FN187]. See id.; Hammond, 786 F.2d at 9.

[FN188]. See Hammond, 786 F.2d at 12-13.

[FN189]. See id. at 13.

[FN190]. See id. at 13-14.

[FN191]. See id.

[FN192]. See id. The court also held that the Atomic Weapons Testing Liability Act did not violate equal protection for the same reasons. See id. at 15.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN193]. For further discussion of Tenth Amendment challenges to federal tort reform legislation, see infra notes 253-382 and accompanying text.

[FN194]. 426 U.S. 833 (1976), overruled by Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985). See infra notes 267-287 and accompanying text.

[FN195]. Hammond, 786 F.2d at 15.

[FN196]. See id. at 15 (citing Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985)). The court also rejected a claim that the Act violated the prohibition against ex post facto laws, noting that the prohibition applies only to criminal or penal statutes. The court also held that the Act was not punitive, so it did not constitute a bill of attainder. Finally, the court refused to apply the Contracts Clause to the federal government. See id. at 16.

[FN197]. 820 F.2d 982 (9th Cir. 1987).

[FN198]. See id. at 988.

[FN199]. See id. at 989-92.

[FN200]. Id. At 988.

[FN201]. Id.

[FN202]. See id.

[FN203]. Id. at 990 (quoting Hammond, 786 F.2d at 8).

[FN204]. See id. at 991.

[FN205]. Id. at 992 (citations omitted).

[FN206]. See id. The court also held that the Act did not violate the Seventh Amendment, because "[t]here is no right to jury trial against the sovereign." Id.

[FN207]. 42 U.S.C. §§ 300aa-1 to 300aa-34 (1994).

[FN208]. See generally Victor E. Schwartz & Liberty Mahshigian, National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act of 1986: An Ad Hoc Remedy or a Window for the Future, 48 OHIO ST. L.J. 387 (1987); Daniel A. Cantor, Note, Striking A Balance Between Product Availability and Product Safety: Lessons from the Vaccine Act, 44 AM. U. L. REV. 1853 (1995).

[FN209]. 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-11(c)(1)(D)(i).

[FN210]. 93 F.3d 781 (Fed. Cir. 1996).

[FN211]. See id. at 787.

[FN212]. Id.

[FN213]. Id. at 788.

[FN214]. Id.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN215]. Id. (quoting Mathews v. De Castro, 429 U.S. 181, 185 (1976)).

[FN216]. 42 U.S.C. §§ 2014, 2210 (1994).

[FN217]. See id.

[FN218]. 940 F.2d 832 (3d Cir. 1991).

[FN219]. See U.S. Const., Art. III, § 2, cl. 2 ("The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority.").

[FN220]. See In re TMI Litig., 940 F.2d at 835.

[FN221]. See id. at 849-51 (discussing Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 738 (1824); Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480 (1983); and Mesa v. California, 489 U.S. 121 (1989)).

[FN222]. Id. at 849.

[FN223]. Id. at 855.

[FN224]. See id. at 855-56.

[FN225]. See id. at 856-57.

[FN226]. Id. at 860.

[FN227]. See id. at 861. See also In re TMI, 89 F.3d 1106 (3d Cir. 1996) (holding that retroactive application of the 1988 Amendments did not violate due process); O'Connor v. Commonwealth Edison Co., 13 F.3d 1090 (7th Cir. 1994) (upholding constitutionality of the 1988 amendments against an Article III challenge).

[FN228]. 28 U.S.C. § 2679 (1994).

[FN229]. 484 U.S. 292 (1988).

[FN230]. Id. at 300.

[FN231]. See generally Daniel A. Morris, Federal Employees' Liability Since The Federal Employees Liability Reform & Tort Compensation Act of 1988 (The Westfall Act), 25 CREIGHTON L. REV. 73 (1991).

[FN232]. 888 F.2d 802 (11th Cir. 1989).

[FN233]. Id. at 805. See also Connell v. United States, 737 F. Supp. 61 (S.D. Iowa 1990) (holding that retroactive application of the Westfall Act was not unconstitutional).

[FN234]. Sowell, 888 F.2d at 805.

[FN235]. See id. See also Salmon v. Schwarz, 948 F.2d 1131 (10th Cir. 1991) (holding that the Westfall Act did not violate the Seventh Amendment).

[FN236]. Pub. L. No. 103-298, 108 Stat. 1552 (codified at 49 U.S.C. § 40101) (1994).

[FN237]. See Rixon v. Smith, No. 96-714 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 6, 1997) (holding that GARA can be constitutionally applied retroactively); Pollack v. Agusta, S.P.A., Nos. 94-7769, 94-7770 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 6., 1995) (GARA did not violate due process or deprive plaintiffs of a property right); Schneider v. Cessna Aircraft Co., No. 542343 (Super. Ct. Sacramento Cty., Cal. July 29, 1996) (GARA does not violate due process).

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN238]. 198 U.S. 45 (1905). In Lochner, the Court invalidated a New York law that limited the number of hours bakers could work. Justice Holmes argued in his dissent that courts should respect economic legislation that is rationally related to a legitimate policy goal. He wrote:

This case is decided upon an economic theory which a large part of the country does not entertain. If it were a question whether I agreed with that theory, I should desire to study it further and long before making up my mind. But I do not conceive that to be my duty, because I strongly believe that my agreement or disagreement has nothing to do with the right of the majority to embody their opinions in law.

Id. at 75 (emphasis added).

[FN239]. See LAWRENCE H. TRIBE, AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW § 8-2 to 8-7 (2d. ed. 1988).

[FN240]. See Denis J. Hauptley & Mary Mason, The National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act, 37 FED. B. NEWS & J. 452 (1990) (stating that the Act effectively controlled liability costs for vaccine manufacturers, prevented the withdrawal of crucial vaccines from the market, and averted epidemics of certain childhood illnesses in the United States.)

[FN241]. See Duke Power, 438 U.S. at 64 (discussing congressional passage of the Price-Anderson Act in response to concerns that the private sector would be forced to withdraw from nuclear power production).

[FN242]. See supra notes 38-43 and accompanying text.

[FN243]. See H.R. REP. NO. 105-549, pts. 1 and 2 (1998) (reports from the House Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Commerce regarding the Biomaterials Act).

[FN244]. U.S. Const. art. VI, § 2.

[FN245]. See, e.g., Southland Corp. v. Keating, 465 U.S. 1 (1984) (holding California's Franchise Investment Law unconstitutional because it directly conflicted with federal legislation).

[FN246]. Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 211 (1824).

[FN247]. See New York, 505 U.S. at 178-79 (noting that the Supremacy Clause directs state courts to take action to enforce federal law, but that no comparable constitutional provision allows Congress to force state legislators to act); Mondou, 223 U.S. at 57-58 (1912) (stating that, in some instances, action must be taken by state courts to enforce a federally established penalty).

[FN248]. 330 U.S. 386 (1947).

[FN249]. Ch. 26, 56 Stat. 23 (codified at 50 U.S.C. app. § 107 (1976)) (repealed 1947).

[FN250]. Testa, 330 U.S. at 389.

[FN251]. Id. at 393.

[FN252]. Id. at 390-91 (emphasis added).

[FN253]. Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 460 (1990) (discussing how the Supremacy Clause is the textual authority granting the federal government power over the states in the U.S. system of federalism).

[FN254]. U.S. Const. amend. X. See also The Federalist No. 45, at 292 (James Madison) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961) ("The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution ... are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite.").

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00262498

[FN255]. See Gregory, 501 U.S. at 460 ("As long as it is acting within the powers granted it under the Constitution, Congress may impose its will on the States. Congress may legislate in areas traditionally regulated by the States. This is an extraordinary power in a federalist system. It is a power that we must assume Congress does not exercise lightly."). See also LAURENCE H. TRIBE, AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §§ 5-20 (2d. ed. 1988).

[FN256]. 392 U.S. 183 (1968).

[FN257]. 29 U.S.C. §§ 203-218 (1994).

[FN258]. See 29 U.S.C. § 203(d).

[FN259]. See Wirtz, 392 U.S. at 197.

[FN260]. Id. at 198-99.

[FN261]. 426 U.S. 833 (1976), overruled by Garcia v. San Antonio Metro. Transit Auth., 469 U.S. 528 (1985).

[FN262]. See National League of Cities, 426 U.S. at 840-52.

[FN263]. Id. at 852.

[FN264]. 469 U.S. 528 (1985). See generally Martha A. Field, Comment, Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority: The Demise of a Misguided Doctrine, 99 Harv. L. Rev. 84 (1985) (arguing against the concept of the Supreme Court granting the states constitutional immunities as a constraint on Congress's use of its delegated powers).

[FN265]. 485 U.S. 505 (1988).

[FN266]. See also Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 289-90 (1981) (holding that the Tenth Amendment does not prohibit Congress from passing laws that preempt state regulations); FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742, 764 (1982) (same).

[FN267]. 469 U.S. 528 (1985).

[FN268]. Id. at 530.

[FN269]. Id. at 534-35.

[FN270]. See id. at 537.

[FN271]. See id.

[FN272]. See id.

[FN273]. See id. at 537-38.

[FN274]. See id. at 539.

[FN275]. Id. at 557.

[FN276]. See id. at 540.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN277]. See id. at 543.

[FN278]. See Garcia, 469 U.S. at 545.

[FN279]. Id. at 546.

[FN280]. Id. at 547.

[FN281]. Id. at 550.

[FN282]. Id. at 554.

[FN283]. The Court pointed out that "the composition of the Federal Government was designed in large part to protect States from overreaching by Congress." Id. at 550-51. The Framers thus gave the states a role in selecting the executive and legislative branches, provided for the equal representation of states in the Senate, and prohibited any constitutional amendment divesting a state of equal representation in the Senate without the state's consent. See id. at 551.

[FN284]. Id. at 554 (quoting EEOC v. Wyoming, 460 U.S. 226, 236 (1983)). See also Thomas H. Odom, The Tenth Amendment After Garcia: Process- Based Procedural Protections, 135 U. PA. L. REV. 1657, 1666 (1987) (indicating that Garcia is significant because it "calls for the development of new theories of federalism-based limitations on the commerce power").

[FN285]. Garcia, 469 U.S. at 552-553. See also John E. DuMont, Comment, State Immunity From Federal Regulation--Before and After Garcia: How Accurate Was the Supreme Court's Prediction in Garcia v. SAMTA that the Political Process Inherent in Our System of Federalism Was Capable of Protecting the States Against Unduly Burdensome Federal Regulation?, 31 DUQ. L. REV. 391 (1993) (arguing that the political process has protected the states against unduly burdensome federal regulation).

[FN286]. Garcia, 469 U.S. at 554.

[FN287]. Id. at 555. See also William A. Isaacson, Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority: Antifederalism Revisited, 21 U. TOL. L. REV. 147 (1989) (providing historical account of the Constitutional Convention and arguing in support of the holding in Garcia).

[FN288]. 485 U.S. 505 (1988).

[FN289]. 26 U.S.C. § 103(j)(1) (1982).

[FN290]. See id.

[FN291]. Ownership of a registered bond is recorded on a central list, and a transfer of record ownership requires entering the change on that list. Bearer bonds, on the other hand, leave no paper trail. Congress believed that bearer bonds facilitated tax evasion, because they could be used to avoid estate and gift taxes and as a medium of exchange in the illegal sector. See Baker, 485 U.S. at 508-509.

[FN292]. The Court treated the Tax Act as banning the issuance of bearer bonds, because it would force States to increase the interest paid on bearer bonds to exceptionally high rates. Moreover, since the Act became effective, no State had issued a bearer bond. See id. at 511.

[FN293]. See id. at 512.

[FN294]. Id. at 512-13.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN295]. Id.

[FN296]. See id at 513.

[FN297]. 465 U.S. 742 (1982).

[FN298]. See id. at 761-64.

[FN299]. See Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act of 1978, 15 U.S.C. § 3201, 16 U.S.C. § 2611 (1994).

[FN300]. See FERC, 456 U.S. a 759-67.

[FN301]. See Baker, 485 U.S. at 514.

[FN302]. See id. at 514-15.

[FN303]. Id. at 515.

[FN304]. 505 U.S. 144 (1991).

[FN305]. 521 U.S. 898 (1997).

[FN306]. 505 U.S. 144 (1991).

[FN307]. 42 U.S.C. § 2021b-j (1994).

[FN308]. 42 U.S.C. § 2021c(a)(1)(A) (1994).

[FN309]. See New York, 505 U.S. at 154. Petitioners also charged that the Act violated the Guarantee Clause of the Constitution, which directs the United States to "guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government." U.S. Const. art. IV., § 4. The Court easily dismissed this claim. See id. at 183-86.

[FN310]. See New York, 505 U.S. at 152-54.

[FN311]. See id. at 152-53.

[FN312]. See id. at 153.

[FN313]. New York, 505 U.S. at 153-54.

[FN314]. Id. at 157.

[FN315]. Id. at 159.

[FN316]. Id. at 158.

[FN317]. Id. at 156.

[FN318]. See id. at 160-61.

[FN319]. Id. at 161.

[FN320]. Id. (quoting FERC, 456 U.S. at 761-62).

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN321]. Id. at 163.

[FN322]. See New York, 505 U.S. at 163.

[FN323]. Id. at 164.

[FN324]. Id.

[FN325]. See id.

[FN326]. Id.

[FN327]. Id. at 165.

[FN328]. Id. at 166.

[FN329]. See id.

[FN330]. Id. at 166.

[FN331]. See id. at 167.

[FN332]. Id.

[FN333]. See id. at 168.

[FN334]. New York, 505 U.S. at 169.

[FN335]. Id. at 173.

[FN336]. See id.

[FN337]. See id. at 173-74.

[FN338]. Id. at 174.

[FN339]. See id. 174-75.

[FN340]. See id. at 175.

[FN341]. See id.

[FN342]. See id. at 177. See generally Evan H. Caminker, State Sovereignty and Subordinacy: May Congress Commandeer State Officers to Implement Federal Law?, 95 COLUM. L. REV. 1001 (1995); H. Jefferson Powell, The Oldest Question of Constitutional Law, 79 VA. L. REV. 633 (1993); Saikrishna B. Prakash, Field Office Federalism, 79 VA. L. REV. 1957 (1993); Martin H. Redish, Doing It with Mirrors: New York v. United States and Constitutional Limitations on Federal Power to Require State Legislation, 21 HASTINGS CONST. L.Q. 593 (1994).

[FN343]. See New York, 505 U.S. at 178-79.

[FN344]. Id. (emphasis added).

[FN345]. See White, supra note 16, at 34; Lebow, supra note 16, at 690.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN346]. New York, 505 U.S. at 165.

[FN347]. Id. at 177.

[FN348]. Id. at 168.

[FN349]. 521 U.S. 898 (1997).

[FN350]. 18 U.S.C. §§ 921-925A (1994).

[FN351]. See id.

[FN352]. See Printz, 521 U.S. at 904-05.

[FN353]. See id. at 905.

[FN354]. See id.

[FN355]. See id. at 905-10 (citations omitted).

[FN356]. Id. at 907 (emphasis in original).

[FN357]. Id. (citations omitted).

[FN358]. See id.

[FN359]. Id. at 907-08.

[FN360]. Id. at 917-18.

[FN361]. 505 U.S. 144 (1991).

[FN362]. New York, 505 U.S. at 166.

[FN363]. Printz, 521 U.S. at 922.

[FN364]. See id.

[FN365]. See id.

[FN366]. Id.

[FN367]. See id.

[FN368]. Id. at 923.

[FN369]. 452 U.S. 264 (1981).

[FN370]. 456 U.S. 742 (1982).

[FN371]. 505 U.S. 144 (1991).

[FN372]. Printz, 521 U.S. at 926.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN373]. Id. at 935.

[FN374]. See Shawn E. Tuma, Note, Preserving Liberty: United States v. Printz and the Vigilant Defense of Federalism, 10 REGENT U. L. REV. 193 (1998) (discussing the federalism doctrine as a safeguard of individual liberties).

[FN375]. See Vicki C. Jackson, Federalism and the Uses and Limits of Law: Printz and Principle? 111 HARV. L. REV. 2180, 2185-86 (1998) (indicating that the Printz and New York decisions set forth a "clear-cut rule against federal 'commandeering' of state legislative or executive officials," but do not alter the responsibility of state courts to enforce federal laws).

[FN376]. 155 F.3d 453 (4th Cir. 1998). See also Travis v. Reno, 12 F. Supp. 2d 921 (W.D. Wis. 1998), rev'd, 163 F.3d 1000 (7th Cir. 1998) (holding that the Driver's Privacy Protection Act violated the Tenth Amendment because it forced state officials and state employees to administer and enforce a federal regulatory scheme). But see Pryor v. Reno, 998 F. Supp. 1317 (M.D. Ala. 1998) (ruling that the Driver's Privacy Protection Act was authorized pursuant to Congress' Commerce Clause authority and did not violate the Tenth Amendment because, rather than requiring the state to enforce a federal regulatory scheme preventing the disclosure of driver records, the Act merely prohibited the state from releasing such records for impermissible purposes).

[FN377]. 18 U.S.C. §§ 2721-2725 (1994).

[FN378]. See id.

[FN379]. See Condon, 155 F.3d at 463.

[FN380]. See id. at 459.

[FN381]. 994 F. Supp. 1358 (W.D. Okla. 1997).

[FN382]. See id. at 1360.

[FN383]. Id. at 1363.

[FN384]. Lopez, 514 U.S. at 561.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The 105th Congress continued the trend toward greater federal involvement in deciding liability rules by enacting several other tort reform laws:

The Volunteer Protection Act of 1997 [FN53] provided limited immunity for volunteers acting on behalf of a nonprofit organization, creating a national standard of punitive damages liability for volunteers, and abolishing joint liability for noneconomic damages in tort actions involving volunteers;

The Amtrak Reform and Accountability Act of 1997 [FN54] created a federal standard for punitive damages awards in tort cases brought against Amtrak by its passengers and capped Amtrak's tort liability at $200 million for each rail accident;

278 The Biomaterials Access Assurance Act of 1998 [FN55] provided suppliers of the raw materials and component parts used to make implantable medical devices with a mechanism to obtain dismissal, without extensive discovery or other legal costs, in certain tort suits in which plaintiffs allege harm from a finished medical implant;

The Year 2000 Information and Readiness Disclosure Act [FN56] banned, with a few exceptions, the use of "Year 2000 readiness disclosure" statements by plaintiffs as evidence in court to prove the truth or accuracy of a company's assertions about dealing with the Year 2000 computer problem and protects companies from liability for Year 2000 statements they made that are alleged to be false, inaccurate, or misleading unless it is proven that the company knew the statement was false, inaccurate, or misleading and made it with an intent to deceive or mislead; and

The Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act of 1998 [FN57] made federal courts the sole venue for most securities class action fraud lawsuits involving fifty or more parties. The law was enacted to close a loophole in the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995. [FN58] That law raised the standard for filing such suits in federal courts, but was undermined when lawyers shifted their filings to state courts. [FN59]

C. The Lopez Decision Does Not Undermine the Authority of Congress to Enact Liability Reform Legislation

Despite the long history of congressional involvement in matters having an effect on interstate commerce, opponents of federal liability reform have questioned whether Congress has the authority to enact liability reform legislation in light of the holding of United States v. Lopez. [FN60]

In Lopez, the Court considered whether Congress's enactment of the Gun- Free School Zones Act of 1990, which made it a federal offense "for any individual knowingly to possess a firearm at a place that the individual knows, or has reasonable cause to 279 believe, is a school zone," [FN61] was a proper exercise of Congress's Commerce Clause power. The Court held that it was not, because "[t]he Act neither regulate[d] a commercial activity nor contain [[ed] a requirement that the possession be connected in any way to interstate commerce." [FN62]

Conceptually, Lopez was not a Commerce Clause case. Congress was not regulating the firearms market or any other economic activity. As the Court explained, the Gun-Free School Zones Act was "a criminal statute that by its terms has nothing to do with 'commerce' or any sort of economic enterprise, however broadly one might define those terms." [FN63] Moreover, "respondent was a local student at a local school; there [was] no indication that he had recently moved in interstate commerce, and there [was] no requirement that his possession of the firearm ha[d] any concrete tie to interstate commerce." [FN64]

The Lopez decision is distinguishable both legally and factually from those cases upholding regulation of activities that arise out of or are connected with commercial transactions, which viewed in the aggregate, substantially effect interstate commerce. These cases directly support Congress's Commerce Clause authority over liability law. [FN65] In fact, rather than limiting Congress's Commerce Clause authority, the Lopez decision can be read to support legislation that would regulate the firearms industry in a manner more explicitly connected with interstate commerce, such as a limit on the liability of gun manufacturers in order to promote the development of the firearms industry or 280 an imposition of requirements on gun manufacturers to promote firearms safety. [FN66]

II. FEDERAL TORT LAWS HAVE BEEN AND SHOULD BE DECLARED CONSTITUTIONAL

A. Courts Have Respected the Role of Congress in the Development Of Tort Law

For almost a century, the Supreme Court and the lower courts have upheld numerous federal tort law statutes against constitutional challenges. The courts have uniformly held that such economic legislation comes clothed with a presumption of constitutionality that is subject to a highly deferential rational basis standard of review. In every modern case, the legislation has been found to pass constitutional muster.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00262469

1. Limitation of Shipowners' Liability Act

The Limitation of Vessel Shipowners' Liability Act and the Harter Act (collectively "the LSLA") [FN67] were the first major federal tort policy statutes to be challenged in the Supreme Court. The LSLA, enacted to promote commercial shipping, exempted ship owners from liability for any loss or damage to goods on board ship resulting from fire, unless the fire was caused by the design or neglect of the ship owner. [FN68] In addition, the LSLA limited ship owners' liability for any loss or destruction of goods aboard their ships. [FN69]

The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the LSLA in Providence & New York Steamship Co. v. Hill Manufacturing Co. [FN70] The case arose when the Providence Company, a defendant in state tort suits filed by the Hill Company to recover damages 281 arising from a fire aboard one of Providence's ships, sought to limit its liability and suspend the state suits in accordance with the LSLA. [FN71]

The Supreme Court held that there was "no doubt that Congress had [the] power to pass the [LSLA]." [FN72] Quoting from an earlier decision, The Lottawana, [FN73] the Court reaffirmed Congress's "authority under the commercial power ... to introduce such changes [in maritime law] as are likely to be needed," [FN74] and indicated that it "perceive[d] no reason for entertaining any serious doubt" that Congress's power under the Commerce Clause "may be extended to the securing and protection of the rights and title of all persons dealing [in shipping]." [FN75] The Court added that because Congress acted within its lawful authority to regulate interstate commerce, the LSLA was "binding on all courts and jurisdictions throughout the United States." [FN76] The Court went on to hold that the purpose of the LSLA would be frustrated unless the institution of proceedings in a federal district court superseded the prosecution of claims for the same losses and injuries in other courts. [FN77]

2. Federal Employers' Liability Act of 1908

In Mondou v. New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., [FN78] the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Federal Employers' Liability Act of 1908 ("FELA"), [FN79] which established rules governing personal injury and wrongful death actions brought by railroad workers and their families against railroads engaged in interstate commerce. [FN80] Federal and state courts were given concurrent jurisdiction to decide FELA cases. [FN81]

282 In Mondou, railroads unsuccessfully challenged the constitutionality of the legislation on several grounds. The Court in Mondou held that Congress had not exceeded its Commerce Clause authority by enacting tort rules which deviated from the common law. In an oft-quoted passage, the Court held that:

A person has no property, no vested interest, in any rule of the common law. That is only one of the forms of municipal law, and is no more sacred than any other. Rights of property which have been created by the common law cannot be taken away without due process; but the law itself, as a rule of conduct, may be changed at the will ... of the legislature, unless prevented by constitutional limitations. Indeed, the great office of statutes is to remedy defects in the common law as they are developed, and to adapt it to the changes of time and circumstances. [FN82]

The Court also noted that despite the fact that employer liability had traditionally been a matter of state law, Congress had a legitimate interest in replacing the patchwork of state laws with uniform, national legislation "to promote the safety of the [railroad] employees and to advance the commerce in which they are engaged." [FN83]

Furthermore, the Court held that the "classification" created by FELA (i.e., the distinction it makes between interstate railroad carriers, which are subject to liability, and all other parties, which are not) did not doom the statute under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, [FN84] even though it could "occasion some inequalities." [FN85] The Court held that tort law classifications are constitutionally permissible under the Fifth Amendment as long as the classification has a rational basis. [FN86] Tested by that standard, the Court held, FELA was "not objectionable." [FN87] The Court pointed out that it had repeatedly sustained "[l]ike classifications of railroad carriers and employees for like purposes" 283 under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. [FN88]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

After resolving FELA's constitutionality, the Court moved to settle FELA's preemptive effect over state laws covering railroad employer liability. The Court explained that although Congress had chosen not to regulate the field of railroad carrier liability in the past, and although the subject fell within the police power of the states in the absence of congressional action, Congress was not therefore precluded from acting. [FN89] To the contrary, once Congress acted, "the laws of the states, in so far as they cover the same field, [were] superseded, for necessarily that which is not supreme must yield to that which is." [FN90]

The Court went on to explain that FELA did not present federalism problems because Congress was not setting state policy. Rather, Congress was establishing federal policy to be implemented by the states in accordance with the Supremacy Clause. The Court held:

[W]e deem it well to observe that there is not here involved any attempt by Congress to enlarge or regulate the jurisdiction of state courts, or to control or affect their modes of procedure, but only a question of the duty of such a court, when its ordinary jurisdiction as prescribed by local laws is appropriate to the occasion and is invoked in conformity with those laws, to take cognizance of an action to enforce a right of civil recovery arising under the act of Congress and susceptible of adjudication according to the prevailing rules of procedure. [FN91]

The Court added that it did not perceive that FELA would cause any appreciable inconvenience or confusion for state courts, and that in any case, such inconvenience or confusion would not change its holding:

We are not disposed to believe that the exercise of jurisdiction by the state courts will be attended by any appreciable inconvenience or confusion; but, be this as it may, it affords no reason for declining a jurisdiction conferred by law. The existence of the jurisdiction creates an implication of duty to exercise it, and that its exercise may be onerous does not militate against that implication. Besides, it is neither new nor unusual in judicial proceedings to apply different rules 284 of law to different situations and subjects, even although possessing some elements of similarity, as where the liability of a public carrier for personal injuries turns upon whether the injured person was a passenger, an employee, or a stranger. [FN92]

3. The Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act

In Crowell v. Benson, [FN93] the Supreme Court was asked to decide the constitutionality of the Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act ("LHWCA"). [FN94] The LHWCA created a nofault compensation scheme that provided fixed awards to employees injured upon the navigable waters of the United States. [FN95]

The Court began by holding that the federal power to alter, amend, or revise the maritime law gave Congress the authority to define the substantive rights of employees under the LHWCA (in this case, by providing for recovery in the absence of fault, establishing classifications based on type of injury, fixing the range of compensation for disability or death, and designating the classes of beneficiaries). [FN96]

Next, the Court addressed whether the substantive rights created by the LHWCA violated the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. [FN97] The Court, applying a deferential rational basis test, held that neither the classifications created by the statute nor the extent of compensation provided were unreasonable. [FN98] In light of the difficulties associated with determining actual damages in maritime cases, the Court held, Congress was justified in providing for the payment of damages in amounts that would reasonably approximate a claimant's probable damages. [FN99] The Court also noted that the plaintiff's Fifth Amendment objections were substantially similar to those which the Court had rejected in challenges to state workers' compensation laws under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. [FN100]

285 After upholding the constitutionality of the LHWCA's substantive provisions, the Court turned to the LHWCA's procedural requirements. The plaintiff's procedural objections to the LHWCA focused on the administrative authority conferred by the Act. [FN101] The Court held that the use of the administrative method to assess the cause, character, and effect of claimants' injuries fell "easily within the principle of the decisions sustaining similar procedure against objections under the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Amendments," [FN102] and did not constitute an unconstitutional invasion of judicial power. [FN103]

4. The Drivers Act

In 1961, Congress enacted the Drivers Act [FN104] to relieve government drivers from the burden of personal liability for claims arising from vehicular accidents occurring in the course of their employment. Unlike many employers, the United States neither maintained liability insurance to protect its employees nor assisted them in paying for their own insurance against on-the- job accidents. [FN105] "[M]oved by the fact that automobile accident insurance placed such a heavy financial burden on government drivers that it was adversely affecting morale and making it difficult for the government to attract competent drivers into its employ," [FN106] Congress decided to forbid suits against federal drivers, but to permit suits against the United States for tort liability arising out of accidents caused by a driver's negligence. [FN107]

a. Private citizen and federal driver. The Drivers Act was challenged on constitutional grounds in Nistendirk v. McGee, [FN108] a personal injury action arising out of an automobile accident between a private citizen and a federal employee (in this instance, a rural mail carrier). The plaintiff initially brought a negligence action against the mail carrier in Missouri state court. The 286 United States removed the case to federal court and was substituted as the defendant pursuant to the Drivers Act. [FN109] The plaintiff, seeking to obtain full damages and wanting to avoid trying the case under the Federal Tort Claims Act, moved to remand the case to state court on the ground that the Drivers Act violated the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution. [FN110]

The court rejected plaintiff's argument that the Drivers Act violated the Fourteenth Amendment by replacing a common law remedy with a statutory one. [FN111] The court noted that, in Silver v. Silver, [FN112] the Supreme Court, in sustaining the abolition of a nonpaying passenger's right to sue his host for negligence, had held that "the Constitution does not forbid the creation of new rights, or the abolition of old ones recognized by the common law, to attain a permissible legislative object." [FN113] The court concluded that because Congress had a legitimate interest in insulating federal drivers from liability, the Drivers Act constituted a valid exercise of legislative power under the Necessary and Proper Clause of Article I. [FN114]

b. Federal employee and federal driver cases. Most of the litigation involving the Drivers Act has involved claims by federal employees injured by government drivers, since prior to passage of the Act, civilian government workers injured in the course of employment as a result of the negligence of a fellow-employee were not limited to claims against the United States under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act ("FECA"). [FN115] They also had the right to bring a common law tort action 287 against the negligent co- worker. [FN116] Congress, however, did not "specifically consider whether or not this cause of action against a fellow government employee should survive" passage of the Drivers Act. [FN117] That issue was addressed by a number of courts, which uniformly held that the Drivers Act abrogated the traditional common law rule. [FN118] Those decisions, in turn, produced litigation challenging Congress's authority to do so.

The Fourth Circuit addressed the constitutionality of the Drivers Act in Carr v. United States. [FN119] The plaintiff, a government employee injured by a federal driver, argued that the abrogation of a government employee's common law action against a fellow employee for negligence violated the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, because the Drivers Act did not create a new benefit as a quid pro quo. [FN120] Furthermore, the plaintiff argued, the Drivers Act violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fifth Amendment, because it created an impermissible distinction between federal employees injured in vehicular accidents caused by fellow employees and federal workers injured in other job-related activities. Only Drivers Act plaintiffs were specifically barred from bringing tort actions against negligent co- employees. [FN121]

The Fourth Circuit rejected the plaintiff's due process argument, noting that it had already been rejected by the Supreme Court. [FN122] Moreover, even though a common law action could no longer be brought against the United States, the Fourth Circuit said, the Drivers Act itself provided an adequate quid pro quo, because it provided plaintiff with "valuable protection against personal liability for on-the-job automobile accidents for which he might have been responsible." [FN123]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The court rejected the plaintiff's equal protection challenge on the ground that the classification created by the Drivers Act did not penalize the exercise of any constitutional right. [FN124] Therefore, 288 the court held, the statutory classification did not have to be justified by a compelling governmental interest. Rather, it came "clothed with a presumption of constitutionality" and would be upheld as long as Congress had a rational basis for enacting the legislation. [FN125] The court concluded that "the magnitude of the automobile insurance problem justified Congress's separate treatment of this specific problem." [FN126]

The Third Circuit reached a similar conclusion in Thomason v. Sanchez. [FN127] The plaintiff, a serviceman, was injured when he was struck by an automobile operated by another serviceman. He had no remedy at all against the United States, because of the so-called "Feres doctrine," [FN128] and thus presented a highly compelling appeal. [FN129] The plaintiff in Thomason argued that he should be allowed to proceed against the defendant and the defendant's automobile insurer. [FN130]

The Third Circuit, however, rejected the plaintiff's argument that common law tort actions against fellow government employees had survived passage of the Drivers Act. [FN131] The Third Circuit also rejected the plaintiff's argument that the Drivers Act, as applied to him, deprived him of all remedies at law and, therefore, constituted a denial of due process under the Fifth Amendment. [FN132] Adopting the reasoning of the Fourth Circuit in Carr, [FN133] the Third Circuit held that Congress was justified in passing the Drivers Act to relieve the heavy automobile insurance burden on federal drivers. [FN134]

5. Black Lung Benefits Act of 1972

In Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., [FN135] the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of Title IV of the Federal Coal Mine 289 Health and Safety Act of 1969, as amended by the Black Lung Benefits Act of 1972. [FN136] The black lung benefits provisions established a compensation scheme for coal miners allegedly suffering from "black lung disease" (pneumoconiosis) and the survivors of miners who died from or were "totally disabled" by the disease. [FN137] Coal mine operators challenged a number of the black lung benefit provisions as unconstitutional.

First, the operators contended that the Black Lung Benefits Act violated the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause by requiring them to compensate former miners who terminated their work in the industry before the Act passed. The operators argued that "the Act spreads costs in an arbitrary manner by basing liability upon past employment relationships, rather than taxing all coal mine operators presently in business." [FN138]

The Court made it clear that "legislative Acts adjusting the burdens and benefits of economic life come to the Court with a presumption of constitutionality." [FN139] It then held that Congress was justified in its decision to provide for the retroactive application of liability under the Black Lung Benefits Act. [FN140] The Court stated that, whether it would have been wiser for Congress to have chosen a cost-spreading scheme that was broader or more practical under the circumstances was "not a question of constitutional dimension." [FN141]

Second, the coal mine operators challenged the two alternative methods set forth by Congress for proving "total disability" due to black lung disease, a prerequisite for compensation under the Act. [FN142] The Court held, however, that the standards adopted by Congress could not be deemed to be "purely arbitrary" and, thus, were constitutionally valid. [FN143]

Third, the operators argued that a provision of the Act which provided that no claim for benefits could be defeated based solely on the results of a chest x-ray violated due process. The operators argued that x-ray evidence was frequently the only 290 evidence that they could put forth to rebut a black lung claim. [FN144] The Court noted, however, that Congress was presented with "significant evidence" that x-ray testing was not an accurate indicator of the absence of disease. [FN145] Thus, "Congress was faced with the problem of determining which side should bear the burden of the unreliability." [FN146] The Court held that the fact that "Congress ultimately determined 'to resolve doubts in favor of the disabled miner' [did] not render the enactment arbitrary under the standard of rationality appropriate to th[e] legislation." [FN147]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

6. The Price-Anderson Act

The Price-Anderson Act, [FN148] as amended in 1975, limited the aggregate liability for a single nuclear incident to $560 million to be paid from contributions from nuclear power plant operators, private insurance, and the federal government. In addition, the amended Act required operators to waive certain legal defenses in the event of an extraordinary nuclear incident. [FN149]

The Price-Anderson Act was critical to the development of the private nuclear power industry in the United States. [FN150] Congress appreciated that, even though the risk of a major nuclear accident was extremely remote, "the potential liability dwarfed the ability of the nuclear power industry and private insurance companies to absorb the risk." [FN151] Without reasonable and defined limits on liability, there might not be a nuclear power industry as we know it today.

In Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group, Inc., [FN152] individuals who lived close to proposed nuclear power plants and two organizations sought to prevent construction of the planned facilities by obtaining a declaration that the Price-291 Anderson Act was unconstitutional. [FN153] After deciding that plaintiffs had standing to challenge the Act, [FN154] the Supreme Court addressed plaintiffs' argument that the Act violated the Due Process Clause, because of the alleged arbitrariness of the $560 million statutory ceiling on liability. [FN155]

The Court rejected plaintiffs' contention that the Act should be subjected to an intermediate standard of review, holding that the Price- Anderson Act was a "classic example of an economic regulation" that could only be overcome by a showing that Congress acted in an "arbitrary and irrational way." [FN156] In light of this standard, the Court held that the Act passed constitutional muster because the liability cap bore a rational relationship to Congress's desire to stimulate the private sector's involvement in nuclear power. [FN157] Importantly, the Court stated that, while any cap could be characterized as arbitrary in some sense, the decision to fix a $560 million ceiling was not the "kind of arbitrariness" that would flaw an otherwise constitutional law. [FN158]

Plaintiffs' remaining due process objection was that the liability limitation failed to provide a satisfactory quid pro quo for the common law rights of recovery that the Act abrogated. The Court, however, expressed doubt whether the Due Process Clause requires that a statutory compensation scheme either duplicate the recovery available at common law or provide a reasonable substitute. [FN159] The Court cited earlier decisions which "clearly established" that "[a] person has ... no vested interest in any rule of the common law." [FN160] It also cited an earlier decision that held that the "Constitution does not forbid the ... abolition of old [rights] recognized by the common law, to attain a permissible legislative object." [FN161] The Court went on to hold that, even if there were a quid pro quo requirement, the assurance of a 292 $560 million fund provided a "just substitute" for the common law rights replaced by the Act. [FN162]

Finally, the Court held that the Price-Anderson Act did not violate the Equal Protection Clause because the "general rationality" of the Act's liability ceiling provided "ample justification for the difference in treatment between those injured in nuclear incidents and those whose injuries are derived from other causes." [FN163]

7. Swine Flu Act

The National Swine Flu Immunization Program of 1976 ("Swine Flu Act") [FN164] was enacted to deal with the collapse of the commercial liability insurance market for vaccine manufacturers and distributors following judicial decisions holding polio vaccine manufacturers strictly liable for vaccine- related injuries. [FN165] In addition, Congress was concerned about the devastating economic impact that would occur due to lost wages if the population were not inoculated before the start of the flu season. [FN166] Modeled after the Drivers Act, the Swine Flu Act barred common law tort actions against swine flu vaccine manufacturers and providers and created a Federal Tort Claims Act remedy against the United States as the exclusive means of recovery for swine flu-related injuries. [FN167]

The constitutionality of the Swine Flu Act was first addressed in Sparks v. Wyeth Laboratories, Inc. [FN168] Plaintiff, who had suffered serious injuries following a swine flu immunization, alleged that the Act violated the Due

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

31 U. Tol. L. Rev. 425, *

Copyright (c) 2000 The University of Toledo Toledo Law Review

Spring, 2000

31 U. Tol. L. Rev. 425

LENGTH: 10455 words

ARTICLE: WHO IS WINNING THE COLLATERAL SOURCE RULE WAR? THE BATTLEGROUND IN THE SIXTH CIRCUIT STATES

Nora J. Pasman-Green* and Ronald D. Richards Jr.

* Professor of Law, Thomas M. Cooley Law School, Lansing, Michigan.

 J.D., Thomas M. Cooley Law School, 2000.

SUMMARY:
... HYPO: Imagine a freight train carrying iron ore traveling from Michigan's Upper Peninsula to Nashville, Tennessee. ... [16] A few years later, in 1868, Michigan adopted the common law collateral source rule in Perrott v. Shearer. ... [20] After Perrott, the common law collateral source rule was the law of the land, at least in Michigan. ... [35] Bucking the trend, Wisconsin has held the line by retaining the common law collateral source rule. ... " [60] Consequently, Kentucky is left in the same position as Wisconsin - albeit by default - retaining the common law collateral source rule. ... [92] Then, in 1986, Michigan enacted Michigan Compiled Laws Annotated section 600.6303, which abrogated the common law collateral source rule. ...

"Those plaintiffs receiving collateral source payments cannot have their tort remedy denied as punishment for their prudence in obtaining insurance coverage to assist them in the event of a catastrophe, and their misfortune compounded by making them appear to seek damages for which they have no need." [1]

TEXT:

[*425] I. Introduction

HYPO: Imagine a freight train carrying iron ore traveling from Michigan's Upper Peninsula to Nashville, Tennessee. The train's route is through Wisconsin, Illinois, Ohio, and Kentucky, and the train unloads ore in each state. Further imagine that as the train unloads ore, a "spark" ignites a piece of property in each respective unloading site, causing personal injury and property damage to a homeowner. If each homeowner carries homeowner's insurance covering personal injury and property damages, and if each property owner brings suit in their home state's federal district court to recover for damages, an important question is raised - which portion of the insurance benefits paid to each plaintiff-homeowner can the defendant-train company claim as an "offset" to reduce the personal injury and property accurate, and in one sense inflammatory. [*447] Juries may not hear evidence that defendants are insured, [133] but may learn of the exact same evidence regarding plaintiffs. As such, even in Kentucky, the playing field inevitably tilts in favor of defendants and defendants' insurance companies. [134] In this sense, perhaps Wisconsin, holding the line from the beginning, is still at the forefront of equality and consistency within the Sixth Circuit.

V. Conclusion

One thing is certain: under the current state of affairs, similarly situated plaintiffs, wrongdoers, and collateral source providers - mostly insurance companies - receive vastly different treatment in Sixth Circuit states. This discrepancy raises not only technical concerns, such as choice of law issues in federal courts, but also raises fundamental policy questions about which party ought to be served by any kind of collateral source rule. Whether the modern changes to the collateral source rule serve any useful purpose, whether the future is better served by going back to the past formulations of the rule, or whether a different approach altogether is necessary to accomplish a consistent treatment among all parties involved depends on which player ought, as a matter of policy, to benefit from the rule.

Nevertheless, the modern trend clearly favors defendant-tortfeasors and their insurance companies. Perhaps we are satisfied with the current winner of the war on the collateral source rule. If, on the other hand, we are not, then the time has come to decide whether we are satisfied with the rules of engagement, and whether by changing the rules we can affect a more consistent outcome in favor of a more deserving one.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 578 (Ky. 1995).

n2. This hypothetical is generally based on the facts of Perrott v. Shearer, 17 Mich. 48 (Mich. 1868).

n3. See id. at 55. See also discussion infra section II(A).

n4. Scholars generally attribute common law collateral source rule origins to the U.S. Supreme Court opinion The Propeller Monticello v. Mollison, 58 U.S. (17 How.) 152 (1854). See Victor E. Schwartz, Tort Reform: Strict Liability and the Collateral Source Rule Do Not Mix, 39 Vand. L. Rev. 569, 570 & n.4 (1986). Even that attribution, however, is not without its challengers. See, e.g., Joel K. Jacobsen, The Collateral Source Rule and the Role of the Jury, 70 Or. L. Rev. 523, 526-27 (1991).

n5. See Jacobsen, supra note 4, at 525; O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 576.

n6. See Restatement (Second) of Torts 920(A)(2) (1979) ("Payments made to or benefits conferred on the injured party from other sources are not credited against the tortfeasor's liability, although they cover all or a part of the harm for which the tortfeasor is liable.").

REV_00262514

n7. See Michael F. Flynn, Private Medical Insurance and the Collateral Source Rule: A Good Bet?, 22 U. Tol. L. Rev. 39, 42 & n.24 (1990) (citing S. Spieser et al., The American Law of Torts (1985)); Jacobsen, supra note 4, at 527-28; Tiffany Gulley Becker, Note, The Collateral Source Rule in Missouri: Questioning the "Double Recovery" Doctrine, 61 Mo. L. Rev. 633, 637-38 (1996). See also Thomas A. Moore, The Collateral Source Rule, N.Y.L.J., Dec. 3, 1991, at 107.

n8. Indeed, one study reported that 21 states had altered the common law collateral source rule. Mark Thompson, Letting the Air out of Tort Reform, A.B.A. J., May 1997, at 65.

n9. See infra note 29 and accompanying text. Some examples of unsuccessful attempts to abrogate the rule include the following statutes: Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.188 (Banks-Baldwin 1988); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2317.45 (Anderson 1996). Perhaps the most striking example of unsuccessful attempts to abrogate the collateral source rule is in Kansas, where state courts have struck down as unconstitutional Kansas' statutes abrogating the rule three times in eight years. See also Christopher J. Eaton, Comment, The Kansas Legislature's Attempt to Abrogate the Collateral Source Rule: Three Strikes and They're Out?, 42 U. Kan. L. Rev. 913 (1994).

n10. See, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. 13-21-111.6 (1987) (requiring courts to reduce verdict amounts by that amount one "has been or will be wholly or partially indemnified or compensated for his loss by any other person, corporation, insurance company, or fund," except when indemnity or compensation is paid as a result of "a contract entered into and paid for by or on behalf of such person"); Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. 600.6303 (West 1986) (personal injury cases); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2317.45 (Anderson 1996) (tort actions); Tenn. Code Ann. 20-26-119 (1975) (medical malpractice actions).

n11. See Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. 600.6303 (West 1986).

n12. See Jacobsen, supra note 4, at 527-28; Becker, supra note 7, at 637-38.

n13. Currently, of the five states encompassed within the Sixth Circuit, three states retain the common law collateral source rule (two by default), one state abrogated the rule in medical malpractice claims, while another abrogated the rule in personal injury claims only. See infra notes 33-35.

n14. See discussion infra section III. Although the common law collateral source rule is still alive in Ohio and Kentucky, it is only due to the states' respective statutes abrogating the rule having been struck down as unconstitutional. See O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 578 (Ky. 1995); State ex rel. Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers v. Sheward, 715 N.E.2d n15. The Ohio Supreme Court has held twice within the last six years that an Ohio statute abolishing the common law collateral source rule was unconstitutional. See Sheward, 715 N.E.2d at 1111; Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 510 (Ohio 1994). In Michigan, three cases involving the collateral source rule arose in 1996, one involving a direct attack on the statute itself and all involving various aspects of the rule with varying reference to the statute. See Heinz v. Chicago Rd. Inv. Co., 549 N.W.2d 47 (Mich. 1996) (per curium) (direct attack on the statute); Corl v. Huron Castings, Inc., 544 N.W.2d 278, 286 (Mich. 1996) (refusing to extend the collateral source rule to common law contract cases); Citizens Ins. Co. of America v. Buck, 548 N.W.2d 680, 685 (Mich. Ct. App. 1996) (concerning subrogation claims).

REV_00262515

1062, 1111 (Ohio 1999); Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 513 (Ohio 1994).

n16. See supra note 4 and accompanying text (citing the U.S. Supreme Court opinion of The Propeller Monticello v. Mollison, 58 U.S. (17 How.) 152 (1854)). In Mollison, a steamship collided with a schooner in Lake Huron, causing the insured schooner to sink. The insured subsequently accepted a pay-off from the insurer. In the tort action that ensued based on the collision, the steamship owner argued that the insurance pay-off released it from liability. The Court disagreed, however, holding that a defendant has "no concern" with any insurance contract that a plaintiff may have secured. See id. at 155.

n17. 17 Mich. 48 (Mich. 1868). Chief Judge Cooley further stated that the defendant "has no concern with any contract the plaintiff may have with any other party in regard to the goods, and his rights or liabilities can neither be increased nor diminished by the fact that such a contract exists." Id. at 56.

n18. See id. at 55.

n19. See id. at 56.

n20. See id.

n21. See Becker, supra note 7, at 638. See also Helfend v. Southern Cal. Rapid Transit Dist., 465 P.2d 61, 66-67 (Cal. 1970). Under this argument, it is claimed that allowing an offset from insurance benefits is a disincentive to gain insurance, and prevents plaintiffs from receiving the fruits of plaintiff's foresight. See Becker, supra note 7, at 638. See also Perrott, 17 Mich. at 56; Overton v. United States, 619 F.2d 1299, 1306-07 (8th Cir. 1980). In Overton, the court stated that a plaintiff "deserves any additional compensation he may receive because he has "contracted' for it, because it is in the nature of insurance. "One can justify a double recovery where the original source was supplied by the plaintiff, himself, out of resources that would otherwise have been available to him for other purposes.'" Id. at 1306 (quoting Smith v. United States, 587 F.2d 1013, 1015 (3d Cir. 1978)).

REV_00262516

n22. 465 P.2d at 61.

n23. Id. at 66. Further, this theory recognizes that the end result avoids a double recovery by an injured tort victim because of subrogation rights. See O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 576 (Ky. 1995).

n24. See Roth v. Chatlos, 116 A. 332, 334 (Conn. 1922)); Jacobsen, supra note 4, at 528-29; Becker, supra note 7, at 638 (citing Hubbard Broad., Inc. v. Loescher, 291 N.W.2d 216, 222 (Minn. 1980). This argument opines that any resulting windfall should fall to the plaintiff, and not the tortfeasor. See Grayson v. Williams, 256 F.2d 61, 65 (10th Cir. 1958); Hudson v. Lazarus, 217 F.2d 344, 346 (D.C. Cir. 1954). However, this theory has been strongly questioned when one considers the goal of tort recovery - to compensate victims, and not to punish tortfeasors. See David Fellman, Unreason in the Law of Damages: The Collateral Source Rule, 77 Harv. L. Rev. 741, 748 (1964).

n25. Hubbard Broad., 291 N.W.2d at 222.

n26. See Burke Enters., Inc. v. Mitchell, 700 S.W.2d 789, 796 (Ky. 1984) (stating that "to depart from the collateral source rule would provide the tortfeasor a "windfall' to the substantial detriment of the injured party"); Davidson v. Vogler, 507 S.W.2d 160, 164 (Ky. 1974).

n27. O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 576. See also Hamlin v. Charter Township of Flint, 165 F.3d 426, 433 (6th Cir. 1999) (ruling that pension payments from a collateral source are not to be deducted from an Age Discrimination in Employment Act award because "the victim rather than the perpetrator of discrimination should profit").

n28. See Tort Policy Working Group, Report of the Tort Policy Working Group on the Causes, Extent and Policy Implications of the Current Crisis in Insurance Availability and Affordability 70 (1986) (recommending among other ideas, to eliminate the common law collateral source rule as part of tort reform stating that "as to publicly provided collateral sources of compensation, there is no justification for not taking such sources into account in determining plaintiff's ultimate damages").

n29. See Robert A. Henderson & Patrick F. Maroney, Collateral Sources of Indemnity, 21 Fla. St. U. L. Rev. 571, 571-72 & n.5 (1993) (citing Insurance Info. Inst., Insurance Facts, 1987-88 Property/Casualty Fact Book 60 (1987-88)); Thompson, supra note 8, at 64; Eaton, supra note 9, at 916 & n.30 (stating that Kansas legislature enacted statutes abrogating the collateral source rule in response to "a perceived medical malpractice crisis" (citing Bryan W. Smith, Note, The Medical Malpractice Insurance "Crisis": Did Kansas Tort Reform Really Work?, 31 Washburn L.J. 106, 108-09 (1991)); Kamrin Evans, Comment, Settlements with Nonparties: A Closer Look at Colorado's Collateral Source and Contribution Statutes, 66 U. Colo. L. Rev. 195, 195-96 (1995); Daena A. Goldsmith, Comment, A Survey of the Collateral Source Rule: The Effects of Tort Reform and Impact on Multistate Litigation, 53 J. Air L. & Com. 799, 827-29 (1988); Julie A. Schafer, Comment, The Constitutionality of Offsetting Collateral Benefits under Ohio Revised Code Section 2317.45, 53 Ohio St. L.J. 587, 599-600 (1992).

REV_00262517

n30. See Henderson & Maroney, supra note 29, at 572; Thompson, supra note 8, at 65; Becker, supra note 7, at 633 ("Commentators consistently criticize the [collateral source] rule for providing plaintiffs with the windfall of a double recovery."); Eaton, supra note 9, at 913-14; Evans, supra note 29, at 195. See also Thomas A. Moore, The Collateral Source Rule, An Update, N.Y.L.J., Mar. 5, 1996, at 3. For a general discussion regarding the varying degrees of success of the statutes, see generally Eaton, supra note 9 (stating that three different collateral source statutes were struck down as unconstitutional within a span of eight years).

n31. See Thompson, supra note 8, at 64. See also Douglas Hill Schwartz, Comment, The Tortured Path of Ohio's Collateral Source Rule, 65 U. Cin. L. Rev. 643, 644 (1997) (stating the following as reasons for this attack: an alleged insurance crisis, unreasonably high jury awards, liability insurance premiums rising) (citing Schafer, supra note 29, at 587)).

n32. Within the Sixth Circuit, the statues have had mixed success. See discussion infra sections III(A)-(E), explaining how, within the Sixth Circuit, three different statutes that abrogated the collateral source rule were each declared unconstitutional. In Kansas, statutes abrogating the collateral source rule were struck down three separate times as unconstitutional. See Thompson v. KFB Ins. Co., 850 P.2d 773, 777-79 (Kan. 1993); Farley v. Engelken, 740 P.2d 1058, 1068 (Kan. 1987); Wentling v. Medical Anesthesia Servs., 701 P.2d 939, 951 (Kan. 1985). See also Eaton, supra note 9, at 913. However, some statutes have been upheld. See, e.g., Reid v. Williams, 964 P.2d 453, 458, 460 (Alaska 1998) (holding that Alaska Statute section 09.55.548(b), which abrogated the collateral source rule in medical malpractice actions, is constitutional against equal protection and due process challenges).

n33. See, e.g., Lambert v. Wrensch, 399 N.W.2d 369, 376 (Wis. 1987). By default, Kentucky and Ohio each retain the collateral source rule after their respective statutes were declared unconstitutional. See O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 578 (Ky. 1995); State ex rel. Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers v. Sheward, 715 N.E.2d 1062, 1111 (Ohio 1999); Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 513 (Ohio 1994).

n34. See Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. 600.6303 (West 1987) (personal injury actions); Tenn. Code Ann. 20-26-119 (1980) (applying only to medical malpractice actions). Ohio has tried twice to abrogate the rule. See Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2317.45 (Anderson 1994) (all tort actions); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2317.45 (Anderson 2000) (amended by 1996 H.350). However, these attempts were unsuccessful. See discussion infra section III(D).

n35. See Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.188 (Michie 1992) (struck down as violative of Kentucky Constitution in O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571 (1995)). See also discussion infra section III(C).

n36. See Lambert, 399 N.W.2d at 376 ("The collateral source rule has not been abandoned in Wisconsin."); Rixmann v. Somerset Pub. Sch., 266 N.W.2d 326, 330 (Wis. 1978).

n37. 512 N.W.2d 749, 751-52 (Wis. 1994).

n38. Id. at 751-52. See also Milwaukee Mut. Ins. Co. v. State Farm Mut. Auto Ins. Co., 600 N.W.2d 55 (Wis. Ct. App. 1999) (reaffirming Wisconsin's retention of the collateral source rule).

n39. Voge, 512 N.W.2d at 752.

n40. Id. See also Thoreson v. Milwaukee & Suburban Transp. Co., 201 N.W.2d 745, 752 (Wis. 1972) (stating that the collateral source rule has a "penal effect on a tortfeasor"). But see Helfend v. Southern Cal. Rapid Transit Dist., 465 P.2d 61, 69 (Cal. 1970) (stating the rule is not punitive because it applies in all tort cases).

n41. Tennessee Code section 29-26-119 provides:

In a malpractice action in which liability is admitted or established, the damages awarded may include (in addition to other elements of damages authorized by law) actual economic losses suffered by the claimant by reason of the personal injury, including, but not limited to cost of reasonable and necessary medical care, rehabilitation services, and custodial care, loss of services and loss of earned income, but only to the extent that such costs are not paid or payable and such losses are not replaced, or indemnified in whole or in part, by insurance provided by an employer either governmental or private, by social security benefits, service benefit programs, unemployment benefits, or any other source except the assets of the claimants or of the members of the claimants' immediate family and insurance purchases in whole or in part, privately or individually.

Tenn. Code Ann. 29-26-119 (1980) (emphasis added).

n42. 616 F. Supp. 330 (M.D. Tenn. 1985).

n43. Id. at 331 n.2; U.S. Const. amend. XIV, 1 ("No state shall ... deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.").

n44. See Baker, 616 F. Supp. at 331.

n45. See id. at 332.

n46. See id. In so holding, the court stated that "the Court simply does not believe that a medical malpractice litigant's right to receive payment for the same economic injuries from an insurance carrier as compared with litigants in other types of tort claims rises to the level of an "important' interest of constitutional magnitude." Id. at 332 & n.3.

n47. See id. at 332. Under a rational basis test, a statute will be upheld if it is rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective. See id.

n48. Id.

n49. See id. See also Hughlett v. Shelby County Health Care Corp., 940 S.W.2d 571, 575 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1996) (holding that a medical malpractice claimant may recover from a defendant health care provider the amount of the claimant's medical expenses paid by the Tennessee Medicaid program, which is part of the federal Social Security program); Steele v. Ft. Sanders Anesthesia Group, 897 S.W.2d 270, 281-82 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1994) (holding that Tennessee section 29-26-119 was inapplicable in medical malpractice claims when portions of insurance premiums were paid by plaintiff); Newton v. Cox, No. 95025-3, 1992 WL 220189, at 3 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1992) (stating that Tennessee's Medical Malpractice Statute was "intended to contain the cost of medical malpractice litigation"); Nance v. Westside Hosp., 750 S.W.2d 740, 743 (Tenn. 1988) (finding that although worker's compensation benefits are not specifically provided for in section 29-26-119, such benefits are within the general wording "any other source" because worker's compensation benefits are within the same class of benefits for which the statute covers).

n50. See Baker, 616 F. Supp. at 333.

n51. Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.188 (Michie 1992), which provided in pertinent part:

(1) This section shall apply to all actions for damages, whether in contract or tort, commenced after July 15, 1988.

(2) At the commencement of an action seeking to recover damages, it shall be the duty of the plaintiff or his attorney to notify, by certified mail, those parties believed by him to hold subrogation rights to any award received by the plaintiff as a result of the action. The notification shall state that a failure to assert subrogation rights by intervention, pursuant to Kentucky Civil Rule 24, will result in a loss of those rights with respect to any final award received by the plaintiff as a result of the action.

(3) Collateral source payments, except life insurance, the value of any premiums paid by or on behalf of the plaintiff for same, and known subrogation rights shall be an admissible fact in any civil trial.

Id. See also Craig Farrish, Note, Restoration of the Collateral Source Rule in Kentucky: A Review of O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 23 N. Ky. L. Rev. 357, 357-58 (1996).

n52. 892 S.W.2d 571 (Ky. 1995).

n53. See id. at 578.

n54. Id. at 573.

n55. See id. Specifically, the trial court stated the following in rejecting plaintiff's motion in limine: "your objection is on the record and I'll overrule it for the record. We'll go by the statute." Id.

n56. Plaintiff's primary assertion of error on appeal was that section 411.188 was unconstitutional as in violation of the separation of powers doctrine in the Kentucky Constitution, which states the following: ""the powers of the government [are divided] into three distinct departments, each ... a separate body of magistracy,'" and continue to state that no ""persons, being of one of those departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others.'" See id. at 576 (quoting Kentucky Constitution sections 27-28). As a corollary, Kentucky Constitution section 116 provides the Supreme Court with exclusive jurisdiction to create ""rules of practice and procedure for the Court of Justice.'" See id. at 576 (quoting Kentucky Constitution section 116).

n57. See id. at 578. See also Farrish, supra note 51, at 363 (discussing the impact the O'Bryan decision had on Kentucky law).

n58. O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 576.

n59. See id. Another aspect of the court's holding was that the Kentucky legislature violated section 54 of the Kentucky Constitution, which provides that the legislature ""shall have no power to limit the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death, or for injuries to person or property.'" See id. at 578 (quoting Kentucky Constitution section 54). Because section 411.188 denied damages to plaintiffs for medical expenses, section 411.188 violated section 54. See id.

REV_00262521

n60. Id. at 576. Another important note is that Kentucky enacted a task force later to investigate any perceived liability insurance crisis. The results of this task force, however, indicated "no evidence of a litigation explosion in Kentucky." Farrish, supra note 51, at 373 & n.146.

n61. 263 N.E.2d 235 (Ohio 1970). See also Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 509-10 (Ohio 1994) (quoting the syllabus of Pryor). Pryor stated, in pertinent part:

1. In a tort action the measure of damages is that which will compensate and make the plaintiff whole.

2. The collateral source rule is an exception to the general rule of compensatory damages in a tort action, and evidence of compensation from collateral sources is not admissible to diminish the damages for which a tortfeasor must for his negligent act.

3. Under the collateral source rule, benefits in the form of diminished wages, received by a plaintiff from his employer during the period he is not able to work because of a tortfeasor's negligent act, are collateral benefits and are not admissible on the issue of damages.

Sorrell, 633 N.E.2d at 510 n.2 (quoting Pryor v. Webber, 263 N.E.2d 235 (syllabus) (Ohio 1970)).

n62. Section 2317.45 of the Ohio Revised Code provides in pertinent part:

(A)(1) As used in this section:

(a) "Collateral benefits' means benefits that a plaintiff has received, or may be entitled to receive, within the next sixty months after the entry of judgment, as a result of an injury, death, or loss to person or property that is subject to a tort action, from any of the following:

(i) The government of the United States, or any state or any political subdivision of any state, under a program that provides medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health benefits, including, but not limited to, social security, medicare, and medicaid;

(ii) A federal, state, or political subdivision of a state disability income or workers' compensation program, or a wage continuation program, of an employer;

(iii) A medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health insurance program;

(iv) An accident insurance program that provides medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health benefits;

(v) A contract or agreement under which medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health services are provided or under which the costs of those services are paid for or reimbursed.

REV_00262522

(b) "Rights of Recoupment' means rights or recoupment through subrogation, trust agreement, contract, lien, operation of law, or otherwise.

(c) "Tort action' means a civil action for damages for injury, death, or loss to person or property. "Tort action' includes a product liability claim that is subject to sections 2307.71-2307.80 of the Ohio Revised Code, but does not include a civil action for damages for a breach of contract or another agreement between persons.

(d) "Trier of Fact' means the jury or, in a nonjury action, the court.

(B)(1) Except as provided in division (C) of this section, if a plaintiff in a tort action is entitled to an award of compensatory damages, that plaintiff shall disclose to the court after such entitlement is determined all relevant collateral benefits, all rights of recoupment relative to the disclosed collateral benefits, and the costs, premiums, or charges for any of the disclosed collateral benefits paid or contributed within the three-year period immediately preceding the accrual of the cause of action, by the plaintiff, any member of his immediate family or, in a wrongful death action, the decedent, any beneficiary of the action ... or the employer of any member of the immediate family of the decedent of any such beneficiary.

(2) Upon disclosure required by (B)(1) of this section, the court shall do the following:

(a) Determine whether both of the following are satisfied in relation to any of the disclosed collateral benefits:

(i) The plaintiff has received the disclosed collateral benefit or is reasonably certain to receive it within the next six months after the entry of the judgment

(ii) There are no rights of recoupment respecting the disclosed collateral benefit.

(b) As to any disclosed collateral benefits in relation to which both requirements of (B)(2)(a) of this section are satisfied, determine the total costs, premiums, or charges for such benefits paid or contributed within the three-year period immediately preceding the accrual of the cause of action, by the plaintiff, any member of his immediate family, ... [or] the employer of the plaintiff or any member of his immediate family ...;

(c) Prior to entering the judgment for the plaintiff, do both of the following:

(i) Subtract from the compensatory damages that the plaintiff otherwise would be awarded the amount of any disclosed collateral benefits in relation to which both requirements of division (B)(2)(a) of this section are satisfied;

(ii) Subject to the limitation specified in this division, add to the balance derived under division (B)(2)(c)(i) of this section the total of any costs, premiums, and charges described in division (B)(2)(b) of this section. The amount of these costs, premiums, and charges that is added to that balance shall not exceed any amount subtracted pursuant to division (B)(2)(c)(i) of this section from the compensatory damages that the plaintiff would otherwise be awarded.

(3) Except as provided in division (B)(1) of this section, in another section of the Revised Code, or in the Rules of Evidence, evidence of collateral benefits is not admissible in a tort action and shall not be submitted to or considered by the trier of fact in determining whether to award compensatory damages to a plaintiff in a tort action or in determining the amount of any such damages.

(C) This section does not apply as follows:

REV_00262523

damage portions of the damage award? Or, put another way, which plaintiff-homeowner can recover both the insurance benefits for the personal injuries and property damage which he or she suffered, and in addition recover damages from the defendant-train company for the losses covered by plaintiffs' insurance? [2]

In the Sixth Circuit, the answer depends on the state. Some plaintiffs will have their damage awards offset by any collateral source benefits received. Other plaintiffs can avoid any offset sought by the defendant. For example, regarding the Michigan homeowner, the railroad's liability would be most limited. This brings to light Justice Cooley's major concern - that a plaintiff should not be deprived the benefit of his or her bargain that is collateral to the transaction that the defendant has caused to be litigated. [3]

The collateral source rule has been firmly entrenched in the American jurisprudence of the law of damages for over a century. [4] The rule, considered to be [*426] both a rule of evidence and a rule of law, [5] bars the introduction of evidence that a plaintiff has received support from a source collateral to the defendant-wrongdoer, which reduced an element of loss. The rule also prohibits the wrongdoer from reducing his or her liability by denying an offset for the support that the plaintiff has received from the collateral source. [6]

While adhered to without much exception for decades, scholars have debated the common law collateral source rule for years. [7] In the past fifteen years, courts and legislatures have given heed to arguments from the rule's challengers and detractors. Consequently, the collateral source rule no longer enjoys consistent treatment throughout the country. [8] In the name of "tort reform," there has been a steady attempt to avoid what many consider to be the rule's greatest evil: a windfall to the plaintiff by allowing double recovery for loss from both the collateral source and the wrongdoer. Many jurisdictions have abandoned the rule completely, [9] others have modified its application in particular contexts by allowing offsetting of certain kinds of collateral source benefits, or by limiting application of the rule in particular causes of action. [10] Further, some jurisdictions now allow introduction of collateral source evidence, while others have developed post-verdict procedures that enable the trial court judge to reduce the jury award in light of collateral source benefits. [11] The wisdom of these changes, and the issues raised by the inconsistent approach to [*427] the rule nationwide is continually debated. [12] It is thus fair to describe the current jurisprudence regarding the collateral source rule as being in total disarray. [13]

One example of the different approaches to the collateral source rule is particularly telling. Among the states that comprise the United States Sixth Judicial Circuit - Michigan, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Wisconsin - only Wisconsin has held steadfast to the rule in its original form. [14] In the other four states, legislation has altered the rule to one degree or another, and judicial challenges to the statutes have been ongoing. [15] As will be seen, the inconsistency of the legislative and judicial approaches among the sister states creates more problems than it solves. The most basic question which lingers unresolved in the Sixth Circuit, as in others, is that given the purpose(s) underlying the collateral source rule as it has historically been applied, who benefits from the rule in its current versions? Or, perhaps more important, who suffers from the current, inconsistent formulations of the rule?

This article examines the common law collateral source rule's history, policy justifications, and benefactors. Next, the article examines recent challenges to the common law collateral source rule within the Sixth Circuit states, and the rationales behind such challenges. Further, the article analyzes the current state of the law in the Sixth Circuit states, whose courts have been unusually active in the recent past. Finally, this article makes recommendations for where to go from here, given the inconsistencies that will be exposed in the Sixth Circuit states regarding the collateral source.

II. Background

A. History of the Collateral Source Rule

(1) In tort actions against the state in the court of claims or in tort actions against political subdivisions of this state that are commenced under or are subject to Chapter 2744 of the Revised Code;

(2) To any medical claim, as defined in section 2305.11 of the Revised Code.

Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2317.45 (Anderson 1988).

n63. See Schwartz, supra note 31, at 643 & nn.77 & 78 (citing James P. Nolan II, Note, The Collateral Source Rule in Ohio, 16 U. Dayton L. Rev. 413, 422 (1991), and listing Ohio statutes pertaining to specific legal claims).

n64. See Sorrell, 633 N.E.2d at 427. See also Depew v. Ogella, 635 N.E.2d 310 (Ohio 1994) (reversing, based on Sorrell, lower court decision that upheld the constitutionality of Ohio Revised Code section 2317.45); May v. Tandy Corp., 633 N.E.2d 504 (Ohio 1994) (same).

n65. 633 N.E.2d at 506 (syllabus). In Sorrell, plaintiff commenced a battery action against defendant, requested a jury trial, and claimed damages for physical injury, emotional distress, loss of income, and loss of consortium. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, awarding more than $ 10,000 damages in compensatory damages and $ 5,000 for pain and suffering. The jury declined, however, to award any damages for future pain and suffering, and likewise rejected plaintiff's spouse's claim for loss of consortium. See id. Under Ohio Revised Code section 2317.45, the trial court then held a post verdict hearing at which time plaintiff disclosed that she had received collateral benefits. In response, defendant asserted that under Ohio Revised Code section 2317.45(B)(2), he is entitled to a setoff of the entire jury verdict because plaintiff received over $ 14,000 in worker's compensation benefits. See id.

n66. Id.

n67. Id.

n68. See id.

n69. See id. at 513 (holding in a 5-2 decision that the statute was unconstitutional). More specifically, the court stated that the statute violates the Ohio constitutional rights to due process, remedy, open courts, equal protection, and jury trial. See id. at 513. The court found difficulty with the fact that the statute required trial judges to reduce from a plaintiff's jury award collateral benefits which have either already been received or will be received, regardless of whether the benefits actually matched the jury's verdict. The court further stated that this requirement violates a plaintiff's right to have the jury determine all of the facts at issue. See id. at 510.

REV_00262524

n70. See id. at 504. The court actually held that Ohio Revised Code section 2317.45 was unconstitutional on five grounds: due process, right to a remedy, right to open courts, equal protection, and right to a jury trial. However, only due process, equal protection, and the fundamental right to a jury trial are discussed in this article.

n71. See Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 510 (Ohio 1994) ("The statute does not require that damages be allocated between economic or noneconomic damages or even past or future economic damages. The statute merely directs the trial court to deduct the amount of the collateral benefit from the total award."). This is problematic to the court because courts may enter a judgment disregarding the jury's verdict, thus in violation of plaintiff's right to "have all facts determined by the jury, including damages." Id.

n72. See id. Significantly, the court stated that the following: "Plaintiff Sorrell ... has not been fully compensated for her injuries because the specific jury award for her pain and suffering is totally eliminated by her receipt of workers' compensation benefits, even though workers' compensation allows no compensation whatsoever for pain and suffering." Id.

n73. Id. at 511 ("Every person who sustains a legal injury "shall have remedy by due course of law.'"). The Ohio due process provision is equivalent to the due process provision in the Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. See id. at 510-11 (citing Direct Plumbing Supply Co. v. Dayton, 38 N.E.2d 70, 72 (Ohio 1941)).

n74. See id. at 511 ("Governmental action which limits the exercise of fundamental constitutional rights is subject to the highest level of judicial scrutiny."). In Sorrell, the court used strict scrutiny because the statute at issue afflicted the fundamental right to a jury trial in negligence and personal injury actions. See id. Thus, strict scrutiny requires that the statute be struck down unless the statute was necessary to promote a compelling governmental interest. See id. (citing Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 634 (1969); Primes v. Tyler, 331 N.E.2d 723, 726 (Ohio 1975)).

n75. Sorrell, 633 N.E.2d at 511 (citing Mominee v. Scherbeth, 503 N.E.2d 717 (Ohio 1986)). Further, the court stated that the interest in avoiding double recoveries by plaintiffs is applied arbitrarily because the statute does not restrict the court in only deducting from the jury award those collateral benefits for which plaintiff has received. See id.

n76. Id. Moreover, the court stated that the "means employed in the statute to attain the goal are both irrational and arbitrary" because the collateral benefits received may not be part of the damages awarded. Id.

n77. See id. at 512. The Ohio Constitution regarding equal protection is "nearly identical" to the U.S. Constitution's Equal Protection Clause. Id. (citing Kinney v. Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp., 322 N.E.2d 880, 882 (Ohio 1975)).

REV_00262525

n78. Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2305.27 (Anderson 1988).

n79. Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2317.45 (Anderson 1996).

n80. See Sorrell, 633 N.E.2d at 512.

n81. See Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 512 (Ohio 1994). For example, Ohio Revised Code section 2305.27 does not mandate that collateral benefits from insurance proceeds are reduced from an award when the plaintiff or plaintiff's employer pays the premiums. See id. Further, two Ohio courts have held that section 2315.27 does not reduce a jury award when the benefits received are workers' compensation, social security, or Medicare benefits. See id. (citing Savage v. Correlated Health Serv., Ltd., 591 N.E.2d 1216 (Ohio 1992); Hodge v. Middletown Hosp. Ass'n, 581 N.E.2d 529 (Ohio 1991)). Conversely, section 2317.45 requires that those benefits are reduced from all non-medical malpractice tort awards. See id.

n82. See Sorrell, 633 N.E.2d at 512. Quoting from an amicus curiae:

"If there was an insurance crisis, it would be a crisis affecting all tort defendants. There is no rational reason for distinguishing between medical malpractice tort defendants and all other tort defendants. This disparate treatment can result in vastly different results involving the same injury. For example, two tort victims suffer the identical injury, the laceration of an artery resulting in death. One tort victim is injured by a piece of broken glass while driving a company truck within the scope of employment. The other tort victim is injured by the medical negligence of a physician who lacerates an artery during an elective surgery procedure. Both tort victims remain in the hospital for ten days before their death. Due to the difference in the collateral source statutes, these two identical injuries may result in vastly different compensation for the victim. The Equal Protection Clause mandates that those similarly situated be similarly treated."

Id. at 512 (quoting Brief of Amicus Curiae Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers).

n83. See Schwartz, supra note 31, at 663.

n84. Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2317.45 (Anderson 1996). The revised section 2317.45 was passed in late 1996, signed into law by the governor of Ohio on October 28, 1996, and took effect on January 27, 1997. State ex rel. Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers v. Sheward, 715 N.E.2d 1067, 1068 n.2 (Ohio 1999) (syllabus). The revised section provided, in pertinent part:

REV_00262526

(A)As used in this section:

(1) "Collateral benefits" means benefits that are paid by any source, including workers' compensation benefits, to or on behalf of the plaintiff as a result of an injury or loss to person or property, regardless of whether there is an obligation to pay back the money or other benefits, in whole or in part, upon recovery in a tort action. "Collateral benefits" does not include life insurance proceeds.

(2) "Tort Action" means a civil action for damages for injury, death, or loss to person or property. "Tort action" includes a product liability claim but does not include a civil action for damages for a breach of contract or another agreement between persons.

....

(B) In determining the amount of the compensatory damages that are recoverable by the plaintiff in a tort action, the trier of fact shall consider, if presented in the tort action, relevant collateral benefits that have been paid, or that the source of the benefits has acknowledged are payable, from insurance other than insurance for which the plaintiff, spouse of the plaintiff, or parent of the plaintiff if the plaintiff is a minor, has paid a premium, insurance that is subject to a right of subrogation, workers' compensation benefits that are subject to a right of subrogation, or insurance that has any other obligation of repayment, including, but not limited to, evidence of the amount of the collateral benefit and of the costs, premiums, or charges for the collateral benefits.

Ohio Rev. Code Ann. 2317.45 (Anderson 1996). Thus, in essence, the following changes were made in the revised section 2317.45: (1) the legislation provides that only the jury is to be the final decider of compensation awards for plaintiffs; (2) the trial judge does not have the obligation to modify or alter the jury's award of damages; and (3) the two classifications of tort victims have been eliminated after the legislatures repealed the medical malpractice statute which provided disparate treatment to medical malpractice tort victims. Id.

n85. Sheward, 715 N.E.2d at 1101. The named respondents were Court of Common Pleas judges of the following counties: Franklin, Montgomery, and Cuyahoga. Id. at 1068 n.1 (syllabus).

n86. Plaintiffs raised several arguments claiming that the statute was unconstitutional, including arguments regarding separation of powers, one-subject rule, right of trial by jury, right to remedy, and equal protection. Id. at 1069 (syllabus). The breath of Ohio Revised Code section 2317.45 is realized in that it "amends, enacts, or repeals over one hundred sections of the Ohio Revised Code "relative to changes in the laws pertaining to tort and other civil actions.'" Id. at 1073 n.6. Further, the bill "affected eighteen different titles, thirty-eight different chapters, and over one hundred different sections of the Revised Code as well as procedural and evidentiary rules." Id. at 1099. For example, besides changing the collateral source rule, the changes included statutes of repose, liability of liquor permit holders, liability of athletic coaches and officials, actions by a roller skater, and wrongful deaths. See id. at 1073.

n87. See id. at 1101. The court ruled 4-3 that the bill was unconstitutional. See id. at 1062.

REV_00262527

n88. See id. at 1101. Specifically, the court struck down the bill based on separation of powers principles, and under the One-Subject Rule of the Ohio Constitution. See id. at 1105, 1101. The one-subject rule provides that "no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title." Ohio Const. art. II, 15(D). According to the court, "the various provisions in this bill are so blatantly unrelated that, if allowed to stand as a single subject, this court would be forever left with no basis upon which to invalidate any bill, no matter how flawed." Id. at 1100.

n89. Id. at 1089-90. The court conceded that the revised statute does not require a deduction after the verdict, but stated that the revised statute still authorizes a preverdict setoff, which "triggers the constitutional requirement that those payments match the items or categories of damages actually awarded." Id. at 1089 (citing Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 511-12 (1994)). Thus, the court stressed the need to ascertain whether the collateral source payments actually have actually been included within the jury's verdict. See id.

n90. Id. at 1090. The dissent argued that the One-Subject Rule of the Ohio Constitution does not preclude multiple topics that have a common purpose or relationship. According to the dissent, Ohio Revised Code section 2317.45 is not violative of that provision because the bill merely addresses the single subject of tort actions, and tort reform issues, collectively and instead of having "piecemeal" legislation. Id. at 1125.

n91. See Perrott v. Shearer, 17 Mich. 48 (1868).

n92. See, e.g., Kurta v. Probelske, 36 N.W.2d 889, 893 (Mich. 1949); Bartels v. Ford Motor Co., 289 N.W. 322, 324 (Mich. 1939); Cawood v. Earl Paige & Co., 214 N.W. 402, 403 (Mich. 1927) (stating that "defendant's counsel had no right to inquire whether plaintiff was carrying accident insurance"); Wood v. Vroman, 184 N.W. 520, 525 (Mich. 1921) (citing Perrott v. Shearer, 17 Mich. 48 (1868)); Hagen v. Chicago, D & C Grand Trunk Junction R.R. Co., 49 N.W. 509, 510 (Mich. 1891). Additionally, the common law collateral source rule withstood the evolution of Michigan's no-fault automobile insurance statute. See Nasser v. Auto Club Ins. Ass'n, 457 N.W.2d 637, 649 (Mich. 1990) ("The collateral source rule bars evidence of other insurance coverage when introduced for the purpose of mitigating damages.").

n93. Michigan Compiled Laws Annotated section 600.6303 provides:

(1) In a personal injury action in which the plaintiff seeks to recover for the expense of medical care, rehabilitation services, loss of earnings, loss of earning capacity, or other economic loss, evidence to establish that the expense or loss was paid or is payable, in whole or in part, by a collateral source shall be admissible to the court in which the action was brought after a verdict for the plaintiff and before a judgment is entered on the verdict. Subject to subsection (5), if the court determines that all or part of the plaintiff's expense or loss has been paid or is payable by a collateral source, the court shall reduce that portion of the judgment which represents damages paid or payable by a collateral source by an amount equal to the sum determined pursuant to subsection (2). This reduction shall not exceed the amount of the judgment for economic loss or that portion of the verdict that represents damages paid or payable by a collateral source.

REV_00262528

(2) The court shall determine the amount of the plaintiff's expense or loss which has been paid or is payable by a collateral source. Except for premiums on insurance which is required by law, that amount shall then be reduced by a sum equal to the premiums, or that portion of the premiums paid for the particular benefit by the plaintiff or the plaintiff's family or incurred by the plaintiff's employer on behalf of the plaintiff in securing the benefits received or receivable from the collateral source.

(3) Within 10 days after a verdict for the plaintiff, plaintiff's attorney shall send notice of the verdict by registered mail to all persons entitled by contract to a lien against the proceeds of plaintiff's recovery. If a contractual lien holder does not exercise the lien holder's right of subrogation within 20 days after receipt of the notice of the verdict, the lien holder shall lose the right of subrogation. This subsection shall only apply to contracts executed or renewed on or after the effective date of this section.

(4) As used in this section, "collateral source" means benefits received or receivable from an insurance policy; benefits payable pursuant to a contract with a health care corporation, dental care corporation, or health maintenance organization; employee benefits; social security benefits; worker's compensation benefits; or medicare benefits. Collateral source does not include life insurance benefits or benefits paid by a person, partnership, association, corporation, or other legal entity entitled by law to a lien against the proceeds of a recovery by a plaintiff in a civil action for damages. Collateral source does not include benefits paid or payable by a person, partnership, association, corporation, or other legal entity entitled by contract to a lien against the proceeds of a recovery by a plaintiff in a civil action for damages, if the contractual lien has been exercised pursuant to subsection (3).

(5) For purposes of this section, benefits from a collateral source shall not be considered payable or receivable unless the court makes a determination that there is a previously existing contractual or statutory obligation on the part of the collateral source to pay the benefits.

Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. 600.6303 (West 1986).

n94. See Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. 600.6303(1) (West 1986). This evidence was only admissible after the verdict but before judgment was entered. See id.

n95. See, e.g., Corl v. Huron Castings, Inc., 544 N.W.2d 278 (Mich. 1996); RCO Eng'g, Inc., v. ACR Indus., Inc., 597 N.W.2d 534 (Mich. Ct. App. 1999); Citizens Ins. Co. of America v. Buck, 548 N.W.2d 680 (Mich. Ct. App. 1996); Haberkorn v. Chrysler Corp., 533 N.W.2d 373 (Mich. Ct. App. 1995).

n96. 549 N.W.2d 47 (Mich. Ct. App. 1996) (per curiam). See also M. Bryan Schneider & Jody L. Sturtz, Annual Survey of Michigan Law June 1, 1995-May 31, 1996: Civil Procedure, 43 Wayne L. Rev. 439, 587-88 (1997) (summarizing Heinz v. Chicago Rd. Inv. Co.).

n97. See Heinz, 549 N.W.2d at 50.

n98. See id. The plaintiff also received over $ 80,000 in exchange for redeeming all other worker's compensation claims arising out of the slip and fall. As part of this agreement, the plaintiff's worker's compensation provider waived all rights to a lien on any future recovery by the plaintiff against the building owner. See id.

n99. See id.

n100. See id. The defendant then sought to reduce the award by the amount of workers' compensation benefits that the plaintiff received. See id. The court granted the defendant's request, but did not offset the $ 80,000 that the plaintiff received because the court could not determine what the amount represented, that is, future and past medical expenses, future and past wage loss, etc. See id.

n101. See id. at 51-52. The plaintiff also raised other arguments not pertinent to this article, including due process challenges, taking of property without just compensation. See id. at 51-54.

n102. See id. at 55. In fact, the court went one step further and also allowed the defendant to setoff the $ 80,000 worker's compensation benefits that the plaintiff received under his redemption agreement. See id. Judge Neff respectfully dissented in this aspect of the holding, despite recognizing the possibility of a double recovery for the plaintiff if the court refused to allow the redemption amount to be offset from the plaintiff's recovery. See id. at 55 (concurring in all other aspects). Notwithstanding, Judge Neff stated that "there is no way to determine what the redemption payment covered or in what proportion," and thus, he would not allow the offset. Id. at 56.

n103. Id. at 52 (stating that the plaintiff "received the full amount of the damages that the jury determined proper, the source of payment of that amount merely was split between the defendant and the worker's compensation provider").

n104. See Mich. Const. of 1963, art. 1, 2; U.S. Const. amend. XIV.

n105. See Heinz, 549 N.W.2d at 53 (citing Bissel v. Kommareddi, 509 N.W.2d 542, 543 (1993)).

n106. Heinz v. Chicago Rd. Inv. Co., 549 N.W.2d 47, 53 (Mich. Ct. App. 1996). However, the plaintiffs conceded that the exact legislative intent behind the statute was not clear because no statutory history behind the statute's enactment exists. See id. In support of the plaintiff's argument, plaintiff cited caselaw from other jurisdictions, as well as legal scholars. See id.

REV_00262530

n107. Id.

n108. See id. The plaintiff argued that the statute must fail - even under a rational basis test - because the statute creates unjustified class distinctions between personal injury plaintiffs and all other tort plaintiffs. See id. But the court stated that the classification was rationally related because "the Legislature is not required to enact laws affecting all equally, but may "direct its legislation against what it deems an existing evil without covering the whole field of possible abuses.'" Id. Lastly, the court summarily rejected the plaintiff's due process argument because it found that the plaintiff did not have a protectable property right. See id. at 52. See generally Detroit v. Walker, 520 N.W.2d 135 (Mich. 1994) (determining plaintiffs failed to prove they had a protectable property right). Specifically, plaintiff argued that the protectable property interest was the jury verdict. However, in rejecting this argument, the court stated that "[a] jury verdict ... does not become enforceable until the court enters a judgment on that verdict." Id.

n109. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, 1.

n110. Heinz, 567 N.W.2d at 259. Justices Cavanagh and Kelly would have granted leave to appeal.

n111. 544 N.W.2d 278, 281 (Mich. 1996) (Cavanagh, Levin, Boyle, JJ., dissenting).

n112. Id. at 281. In so deciding, the court overruled Pennington v. Whiting Tubular Prods., Inc., 122 N.W.2d 692 (Mich. 1963) (holding that the collateral source rule does apply to breach of contract actions).

n113. See John G. Fleming, The Collateral Source Rule and Contract Damages, 71 Cal. L. Rev. 56, 58 (1983) (discussing the collateral source rule's widespread application to breach of contract claims). See also Seibel v. Liberty Homes, Inc., 752 P.2d 291, 299 (Or. 1988) (holding that in breach of contract action, employer was not entitled to deduct from damage award owed any amount of social security benefits received by employee).

n114. See Perrott v. Shearer, 17 Mich. 48 (Mich. 1868). See also discussion infra section II (A).

n115. The authors are assuming that personal jurisdiction is proper in each state because of defendant-train company's systematic and continuous business transactions. See Helicopteros Nacionales de Columbia, S.A. v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408, 415 (1984); Perkins v. Benguet Consol. Mining Co., 342 U.S. 437 (1952); International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 320 (1945). It is further assumed that venue is proper where defendant-train company does business.

n116. See Lambert v. Wrensch, 399 N.W.2d 369, 376 (Wis. 1987) (finding jury instructions regarding the collateral source rule inapplicable where subrogation rights exist).

n117. See Farrish, supra note 51, at 374. Thus, any collateral source issue may be rendered moot. In this sense, Tennessee may have the best idea. See discussion supra section III(B).

n118. O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 576 (Ky. 1995). Another important note is that Kentucky later enacted a task force to investigate any perceived liability insurance crisis. However, the results of this task force indicated "no evidence of a litigation explosion in Kentucky." Farrish, supra note 51, at 373 & n.146.

n119. See O'Bryan, 892 N.W.2d at 576 ("There is no legal reason why the tortfeasor or his liability insurance company should receive a "windfall' for benefits to which the plaintiff may be entitled by reason of his own foresight in paying the premium or as part of what he has earned in his employment, and benefits received are usually subject to subrogation so there is no "double recovery' by any stretch of the imagination.").

n120. See Tort Policy Working Group, supra note 28, at 70 (recognizing that where an insurer is subrogated to a claim by a plaintiff, "the collateral source rule may not in fact result in any double recovery"). See also Lambert, 399 N.W.2d at 376 (stating that where subrogation rights exist, the collateral source rule is in applicable).

n121. See Helfend v. Southern Cal. Rapid Transit Dist., 465 P.2d 61, 66 (Cal. 1970); O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 576; Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 511 (Ohio 1994).

n122. See discussion supra section III(A)-(E).

n123. Notwithstanding, most plaintiffs' attorneys work on contingency fees of about <fr13>% of the total damage award. See Farrish, supra note 51, at 373-74. Taking both propositions together, a plaintiff is usually left to receive a lower amount than the jury renders. See id.

REV_00262532

n124. See Helfend, 465 P.2d at 66-67; Perrott v. Shearer, 17 Mich. 48, 55-56 (Mich. 1868). Many claim that allowing an offset from insurance benefit is a disincentive to gain insurance, and prevents plaintiffs from receiving the fruits of plaintiff's foresight. See Becker, supra note 9, at 638.

n125. Heinz v. Chicago Rd. Inv. Co., 549 N.W.2d 47 (Mich. Ct. App. 1996).

n126. State ex rel. Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers v. Sheward, 715 N.E.2d 1062, 1111 (Ohio 1999); Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 513 (Ohio 1994).

n127. See Heinz, 549 N.W.2d at 53; Sheward, 715 N.E.2d at 1089-90; Sorrell, 633 N.E.2d at 506 (syllabus).

n128. See supra section III(D)-(E), explaining how each statute faired under a rational basis test. Concededly, the Ohio court in Sorrell struck down the statute using a strict scrutiny standard. Sorrell, 633 N.E.2d at 511. However, it should be pointed out that the Sorrell court stated that the statute would fail under even a rational basis test because the statute "does not bear a real and substantial relationship to the health, safety, morals or general welfare, and it is unreasonable and arbitrary." Id. (citing Mominee v. Scherbeth, 503 N.E.2d 717 (Ohio 1986)).

n129. See Farrish, supra note 51, at 373 & n.146 (citing Legislative Research Comm'n, Report of the Kentucky Insurance and Liability Task Force, Research Report 232, at 15 (1988)).

n130. Sorrell, 633 N.E.2d at 511.

n131. See Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. 600.6303 (West 1986) (abrogating the collateral source rule in personal injury actions).

n132. See Farrish, supra note 51, at 374.

n133. See Fed. R. Evid. 411 ("Evidence that a person was or was not insured against liability is not admissible upon the issue whether the person acted negligently or otherwise wrongfully.").

n134. See generally Wallace v. Leedhanachoke, 949 S.W.2d 624 (Ky. Ct. App. 1996)

As previously stated, the collateral source rule arguably was adopted in the United States in the 1854 case of The Propeller Monticello v. Mollison. [16] A few years later, [*428] in 1868, Michigan adopted the common law collateral source rule in Perrott v. Shearer. [17] In Perrott, plaintiff sued defendant for the full value of goods lost in a fire. Defendant argued that plaintiff's damages should be reduced because plaintiff had an insurance policy covering the goods. [18] Chief Judge Thomas McIntyre Cooley held, however, that the defendant was not entitled to an offset. [19] The court reasoned that the plaintiff did not give away his right to recover for the lost value of the goods merely by purchasing insurance. [20] After Perrott, the common law collateral source rule was the law of the land, at least in Michigan. Thus, tortfeasors were not allowed to deduct damages owed to a plaintiff merely because plaintiff received compensation from a collateral source.

Opinions upholding the collateral source rule stress different rationales. Some claim that plaintiffs ought to realize the "benefit of the bargain" which he or she made. [21] In Helfend v. Southern California Rapid Transit District, [22] the California Supreme Court stated the following in justifying the rule:

[The rule] embodies the venerable concept that a person who has invested years of insurance premiums to assure his medical care should receive the benefits of his thrift. The tortfeasor should not garner the benefits of his victim's providence .... If we were to permit a tortfeasor to mitigate damages with payments from plaintiff's insurance, plaintiff would be in a position inferior to that of having bought no insurance, because his payment of premiums would have earned no benefit. [23]

Similarly, some opinions rationalize that a defendant should pay for the complete damages caused by the defendant-tortfeasor. [24] To that end, one state supreme court [*429] described one purpose of the collateral source rule as "punitive" in that "although the wronged party may be overcompensated, the collateral source rule requires that a wrongdoer pay for the full extent of damages he or she has caused." [25]

Other courts have cited relevance as a justification for the collateral source rule, or more specifically, irrelevance. For example, one court held evidence that a plaintiff received payments from a collateral source was irrelevant to the issue of damages incurred by that plaintiff, and therefore was entitled to recover from the defendant-tortfeasor. [26]

Further, proponents of the rule argue that if one party inevitably receives a "windfall," that party should be the plaintiff, not the defendant-tortfeasor. To that end, one state supreme court stated:

There is no legal reason why the tortfeasor or his liability insurance company should receive a "windfall' for benefits to which the plaintiff may be entitled by reason of his own foresight in paying the premium or as part of what he has earned in his employment, and benefits received are usually subject to subrogation so there is no "double recovery' by any stretch of the imagination. [27]

B. Recent Changes and Troubling Examples

Notwithstanding the widespread, long-standing support for the collateral source rule, it eventually became a target of state legislatures. Despite the rule's long history in the United States, critics strongly lobbied for its abrogation. [28] The rationale behind this movement was (applying Fed. R. Evid. 411 to preclude discussion of whether the defendants possessed liability insurance); O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 573 (Ky. 1995) (where the trial court rejected plaintiff's attempt to exclude evidence that it was insured).

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 10:10 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

to help curb increased insurance costs, litigation costs, and increasingly high jury awards. [29] Further, many sought to eliminate the [*430] common law rule to limit any possible "windfall" to plaintiffs. [30] As a result of this strong, influential lobby, many states enacted statutes abrogating the collateral source rule. [31] As we shall see, however, this tort reform had recurring problems. Time and again state statutes abrogating, in whole or in part, the common law collateral source rule were struck down as unconstitutional. [32] This was no less true within the Sixth Circuit states.

III. Current State of the Law in Sixth Circuit States

A. Wisconsin

The Sixth Circuit's treatment of the collateral source rule spans the entire spectrum. Some courts retain the rule in its common law form. [33] Other state courts have modified the rule in part, [34] while still others have eliminated the rule entirely. [35] [*431] Bucking the trend, Wisconsin has held the line by retaining the common law collateral source rule. [36] Thus, in Wisconsin, tortfeasors may not introduce evidence that a plaintiff has received compensation from collateral sources. In Voge v. Anderson, [37] the Wisconsin Supreme Court reiterated its belief in the collateral source rule. [38] In Voge, an injured motorist sued the tortfeasor and the tortfeasor's automobile insurance company in a personal injury action. After the jury found for the injured motorist, the tortfeasor and insurance company appealed, arguing that the damages awarded to the plaintiff should be reduced by the amount of underinsured motorist benefits and no-fault medical payments made to the plaintiff by his underinsurance carrier.

The court held that the collateral source rule applied; therefore, the defendants were not entitled to a reduction in the judgment for the UIM benefits that plaintiff received. In the opinion, the court recognized that "the results in this case allow the injured party a double recovery," but went on to state that "a contrary conclusion would result in giving the tortfeasor a windfall: the tortfeasor would not have to pay the full amount of damages he would owe even after taking into account the amount of contributory negligence." [39] In Wisconsin, the better result is to deny tortfeasors an offset because "any windfall in benefits should inure to the injured party, not to the tortfeasor." [40] Moreover, the fact remains that a subrogation clause remains the best protection insurance companies have to protect against "windfalls" to plaintiffs. Absent a subrogation clause, however, Wisconsin clearly maintains the common law collateral source rule, yet is the only state to hold the line from the beginning.

B. Tennessee

Contrary to Wisconsin, Tennessee has taken actions to abrogate the collateral source rule, at least regarding medical malpractice actions. In 1980, Tennessee passed Tennessee statute section 29-26-119. [41] The statute's main thrust was to [*432] abrogate the common law collateral source rule in Tennessee malpractice claims in so far as a plaintiff's employer provides the collateral source benefits. However, as to gratuitously provided benefit situations or self-insured plaintiffs, the common law collateral source rule seems to still apply.

In 1985, the constitutionality of this statute was contested in Baker v. Vanderbilt University. [42] In Baker, plaintiffs challenged section 29-26-119, claiming the statute was violative of the Equal Protection Clause of the U.S. Constitution's Fourteenth Amendment. [43] In particular, the plaintiffs claimed that the statute denied equal protection to victims of medical malpractice, as compared to victims of other torts. [44]

The U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Tennessee held that the statute does not violate equal protection. [45] First, the court stated that because the regulation was essentially economic in nature, [46] the appropriate level of scrutiny is rational basis. [47] After determining the appropriate level of scrutiny, the court had "little trouble in upholding the statute." [48]

REV_00262508

Specifically, the court found that reducing medical malpractice insurance premiums and health care costs is a legitimate governmental objective that is furthered by the distinction between malpractice plaintiffs and other plaintiffs. [49] The Tennessee statute was thus upheld as consistent [*433] with the U.S. Constitution's Equal Protection Clause, and remains the law in Tennessee today. [50]

C. Kentucky

Kentucky provides an interesting example of two points: it is one of many states that took action to abrogate the collateral source rule; and it is one of many states that had its statute declared unconstitutional. In 1988, Kentucky enacted section 411.188, [51] which stated that collateral source payments are admissible in any civil trial. The statute, however, did not specify how the jury was to apply evidence of collateral source payments when deciding the amount of damages to award a plaintiff. Nevertheless, this law remained on the books until 1995, when the Kentucky Supreme Court ruled in O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth [52] that section 411.188 was unconstitutional because it violated the separation of powers principles in the Kentucky Constitution. [53]

In O'Bryan, plaintiff and defendant were involved in an automobile accident. [54] Just before trial, the plaintiff made a motion in limine to exclude evidence that plaintiff received collateral source payments. The trial court overruled the motion, forcing the plaintiff to admit evidence of his medical bills, including the amount of collateral source payments received, along with evidence of his personal out-of-pocket expenses. [55] After the jury awarded the plaintiff zero damages for medical expenses for which he received collateral source payments, the plaintiff appealed. [56]

[*434] The Kentucky Supreme Court held that section 411.188 unconstitutionally violated the state's separation of powers doctrine. [57] First, the court stated that the "responsibility for deciding when evidence is relevant to an issue of fact ... must be judicially determined." [58] In promulgating section 411.188, however, it was the Kentucky Legislature, not the Kentucky Judiciary, that determined the admissibility of such evidence. [59] The statute thus violated separation of powers principles.

Also significant to the court's holding was its recognition that damages recovered by a plaintiff normally are subject to subrogation rights. More specifically, the court recognized that because subrogation rights are often present when a plaintiff recovers damages, "there is no "double recovery' by any stretch of the imagination." [60] Consequently, Kentucky is left in the same position as Wisconsin - albeit by default - retaining the common law collateral source rule.

D. Ohio

Another state that attempted to abrogate the collateral source rule, with mixed success, is Ohio. As we shall see, however, Ohio has shown serious resiliency. After one of its statutes abrogating the collateral source rule was declared unconstitutional, Ohio bounced back, passing another statute eliminating the collateral source rule. Once again, however, this statute did not pass muster. The collateral source rule has thus led a storied path in Ohio.

The history of the collateral source rule in Ohio began in 1970, when the state adopted the common law collateral source rule in Pryor v. Webber. [61] This rule of [*435] law, however, was short-lived, In 1988, the Ohio legislature enacted Revised Code section 2317.45, [62] which abolished the collateral source rule for [*436] tort actions, including medical malpractice actions. [63] Nevertheless, in 1994, the Ohio Supreme Court reinstated the common law collateral source rule for cases involving general negligence claims by declaring that the earlier attempt to abrogate the common law collateral source rule in section 2317.45 violated the Ohio State Constitution. [64]

In Sorrell v. Thevenir, [65] the trial court declared that section 2317.45 unconstitutionally violated plaintiffs' fundamental rights to a jury trial, and rights to a remedy under the Ohio State Constitution. [66] According to the trial court, the statute failed under the strict scrutiny test because although ""the statute was enacted to cure a supposed "insurance crisis,'" the court stated that ""there is no demonstrated evidence from which to conclude that a "crisis" ever existed or that cured this "crisis.'" [67] Consequently, the court found that there was no compelling reason to "trample plaintiff's constitutional rights to relieve a particular industry of liability." Accordingly, the trial court awarded the plaintiff the entire amount that the jury found applicable to plaintiff, without reducing the amount by the amount of workers' compensation benefits that the plaintiff received. [68]

On appeal to the Supreme Court of Ohio, the court held that section 2317.45 was unconstitutional in toto. [69] The court's analysis involved three significant aspects. [70] [*437] First, it considered whether the statute violated a plaintiff's fundamental right to a trial by jury. In deciding affirmatively, the court reasoned that the statute impermissibly required trial courts to deduct collateral source benefits received by a plaintiff from a jury award in favor of a plaintiff, regardless of whether the collateral benefits were actually duplicated in the jury's verdict. [71] Thus, while the legislature's goal eliminating plaintiff double recovery was not arbitrary or unreasonable, the statute essentially failed to consider whether the collateral benefits to be deducted were actually within the damages actually found by the jury, especially in general verdict situations. [72]

Second, the Sorrell court decided whether the statute violated the principles of due process. [73] Because the statute afflicted (numerous) fundamental rights, the court used the strict scrutiny standard to determine the statute's validity. [74] Although the court struck down the statute under this standard, it stated that the statute would not even be able to withstand rational basis scrutiny because the statute "does not bear a real and substantial relationship to the health, safety, morals or general welfare, and it is unreasonable and arbitrary." [75] Most foul to the court was the "paucity of credible empirical evidence that a crisis existed, or that there is a relationship [*438] between tort reform legislation and the availability or affordability of insurance." [76] The court thus struck down the statute on due process grounds as well.

Third, the court decided whether the statute violated equal protection provisions of the Ohio Constitution. Because the statute classification affected a fundamental right, the court again analyzed the statute under the strict scrutiny standard. [77] In striking down the statute on equal protection grounds, the court noted that Revised Code sections 2305.27 [78] and 2317.45 [79] classify tort victims as "medical malpractice tort victims and all other tort victims." [80] Under section 2305.27, however, medical malpractice plaintiffs are not subject to the same rule regarding collateral source benefits as are all other tort plaintiffs. [81] Unable to find a justification for this statutory classification, the court stated that the statute must fail because the classification is arbitrary and illogical. [82]

Notwithstanding the Sorrell decision, the Ohio General Assembly thereafter worked to enact legislation that again abrogated the common law collateral source rule adopted in Pryor and reaffirmed in Sorrell. [83] In 1996, Ohio passed a new version of section 2317.45. [84] Less than three years later, however, the Ohio [*439] Supreme Court once again struck down this statute in State ex rel. Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers v. Sheward. [85]

In Sheward, the Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers generally challenged the constitutionality of House Bill 350, which included the revised section 2317.45. [86] In a narrow decision, [87] the court held that the entire bill, including the collateral source statute therein, was unconstitutional in toto. [88] Regarding the revised [*440] collateral source statute, the court stated that section 2317.45 "still fails to take into account whether the collateral benefits held against the general verdict are within the damages actually found by the jury." [89] In its analysis, the court, applying the rational basis test, stated that the relationship between the purported goal of eliminating double recovery and the means employed under section

2317.45 "is so attenuated that one could conclude that the primary goal of [] 2317.45 is simply to reduce damages generally." Therefore, the court concluded that the revised statute's attempt to "sidestep Sorrell" must fail. [90]

E. Michigan

As previously noted, the earliest Sixth Circuit state to follow the collateral source rule was Michigan. [91] For an uninterrupted period of time, this rule was applied across a wide span of claims. [92] Then, in 1986, Michigan enacted Michigan Compiled Laws Annotated section 600.6303, which abrogated the common law collateral source rule. [93] Essentially, the Michigan statute provided that in a personal [*441] injury action, evidence that an expense or loss for which plaintiff was seeking was admissible. [94] The Michigan statute's early existence was quiet; however, this tranquility did not remain. [95]

The most significant challenge to the Michigan statute came in 1996, when the Michigan Court of Appeals upheld the validity of section 600.6303 in Heinz v. Chicago Road Investment Co. [96] Here, the plaintiff was injured in a slip and fall accident while leaving his employer's business. [97] As a result, the plaintiff collected workers' compensation benefits totaling $ 19,824.25 for medical expenses, and $ 38,106.21 for lost wages. [98] He then sued the defendant, owner of the building, for negligence. [99] At trial, the jury awarded the plaintiff the following damages: $ 20,000 for medical expenses; $ 128,000 for lost wages, $ 40,000 in general [*442] damages; and $ 10,000 for loss of consortium. [100] After the court reduced plaintiff's damages award, he appealed, claiming that section 600.6303 violated his right to a jury trial, and the Equal Protection Clause of the Michigan Constitution. [101]

On appeal, the Michigan Court of Appeals, in summary fashion, rejected all of plaintiff's arguments, thus upholding the statute as constitutional. [102] Regarding plaintiff's claim that the statute denied him the right to a trial by jury, the court stated that the statute "does not alter the jury's assessment of the damages," rather, it "merely recognized that plaintiffs were already compensated, in part, for these damages." [103] Thus, the court stated that this argument was meritless.

Next, the court rejected the plaintiff's equal protection argument. [104] Initially, the court stated that the proper scrutiny level to decide the issue is the rational basis test because section 600.6303 addresses an economic matter. [105] As to whether section 600.6303 addressed a legitimate governmental purpose, the plaintiff argued that "the justification for enacting tort reform, an alleged crisis in the insurance industry, is a mere fantasy concocted by the insurance industry to ensure greater profits." [106] The court disregarded this argument, however, finding a legitimate governmental objective existed because the legislature's intent in enacting section 600.6303 was "to promote fairness, i.e., to prevent personal injury plaintiffs from being compensated twice for the same injury." [107] Then, without much explanation, the court found the classification between personal injury plaintiffs and all other tort plaintiffs rationally related to the above legitimate objective. [108]

[*443] Interestingly, the Heinz court never mentioned the Sorrell decision, despite its temporal, logical, and geographical proximity. Indeed, plaintiffs in both Sorrell and Heinz raised similar arguments in asserting a violation of the fundamental right to a trial by jury, and that the respective state statutes violated Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses. [109] Because the Michigan Supreme Court denied leave to appeal in Heinz, no meaningful examination was ever conducted. [110]

Adding to the confusion in Michigan is the decision in Corl v. Huron Castings, Inc. [111] Not content to leave well enough alone, the Michigan Supreme Court got into the fray from another angle by declining review of the collateral source statute. In Corl, the court overruled a fifty-year precedent by holding, without discussion, that the collateral source rule does not apply to contract actions. [112] This holding stands against the great weight of authority. [113]

IV. Analysis and Recommendation

The Sixth Circuit states treat the collateral source rule significantly different. Determining which state, if any, represents the most practical and efficient treatment of the collateral source rule depends to some extent on one's priorities and values. Additionally, the determination lies in the importance one places on consistency. For example, if one desires to prevent plaintiffs from receiving a double recovery by abrogating the collateral source rule, in hopes of limiting the increase in insurance costs, litigation costs, and jury awards, then perhaps the idea of abrogating the collateral source rule seems best. Upon further examination, however, this approach is superficial, unnecessary, and inconsistent. Looking at states that have abrogated the collateral source rule, it seems clear that plaintiffs are treated not only inconsistently within those states, but also unfairly, because of the prevalence of insurance and subrogation rights.

Widespread disparity within the Sixth Circuit states is problematic for many reasons. The problematic nature can best be exemplified by looking back at the hypothetical in the introduction of this article. If each plaintiff-homeowner sued for damages, then plaintiffs in Wisconsin, Kentucky, and Ohio would be able to avoid an offset. Further, plaintiffs in Tennessee would also be able to avoid [*444] an offset because the personal injury did not arise out of malpractice. In Michigan, however, the defendant would be able to offset the personal injury damage award, but not the property damage award.

To illustrate the disparate treatment to a greater degree, let us assume a further complication to our hypothetical. Assume the "incidents" in each state caused delays in the railroad's shipment schedule, causing iron ore purchasers with whom the railroad contracted to sue the railroad for breach of contract. If each of those purchasers possessed business disruption insurance, and if each purchaser sued the railroad to recover lost profits (assuming those profits would have been recoverable under the shipment contracts), to whom is the defendant liable?

Regarding the Michigan purchaser, the railroad's liability would be most limited; yet that is not true for the other purchasers. Further, since business disruption insurance premiums require a much larger financial investment than the average homeowners' policy, Justice Cooley's concern - that a plaintiff should not be deprived the benefit of his or her bargain that is collateral to the transaction that the defendant has caused to be litigated [114] - takes on an even greater force in this scenario. As such, Michigan has really taken an unusual attitude toward the collateral source rule.

This disparate treatment encourages forum-shopping because a plaintiff has incentive to sue in Wisconsin federal court, or likewise, a defendant has incentive to remove to allow some state's rules allowing defendants' offsets to apply. [115] In short, the disparity causes more problems than it solves.

Moreover, it must be stated that subrogation is the best method to avoid much of this debate. Quite simply, where subrogation rights exist, the collateral source rule does not apply. [116] If most defendants are insured, then elimination of the collateral source rule serves no real purpose because of subrogation rights. Further, when considering the collateral source rule and subrogation rights in the medical malpractice context, it seems much more likely that subrogation rights exist against any damage award that a plaintiff may receive. [117] Thus, to a large extent, abrogating the collateral source rule is not necessary to eliminate plaintiffs' receipt of double recoveries.

In fact, significant in the Kentucky Supreme Court's holding in O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth was the court's recognition that damages recovered by a plaintiff are normally subject to subrogation rights. More specifically, the court recognized that because subrogation rights are so often present when a plaintiff recovers damages, [*445] "there is no "double recovery' by any stretch of the imagination." [118] Thus, it is the insurance companies who are in the best position to protect themselves by adding subrogation rights into insurance policies.

Is abrogating the collateral source rule necessary to prevent a "windfall" to plaintiffs? Clearly the answer is "no." If one assumes that one party will inevitably receive a "windfall," and powerful insurance companies are in the best position to help themselves through subrogation clauses, perhaps this is more of a reason to err on the side of allowing any "windfall" to accrue to plaintiffs. Currently, many plaintiffs are punished for exercising the foresight to purchase insurance, at least in those states that have currently abrogated the collateral source rule to one extent or another - Tennessee and Michigan. [119] It seems inappropriate to punish individual plaintiffs for purchasing insurance, while rewarding insurance companies for failing to exercise foresight in implementing subrogation clauses.

If a "windfall" is inevitable on behalf of one party, either plaintiff or defendant, then a value judgment must be made. Choosing to avoid plaintiffs' receipt of "windfalls" may appear helpful to insurance companies. If, however, insurance companies are the party to be protected, certainly there are steps that companies may take to protect themselves. More specifically, insurance companies are in the best position to place subrogation clauses within insurance contracts. This, in turn, would prevent any double recovery on behalf of plaintiffs. [120]

On the other hand, it is becoming more obvious that plaintiffs really do not receive any alleged "windfall" at all. [121] While the statutes abrogating the rule consider past costs of premiums, none consider the impact of future risk assessments. [122] After a plaintiff makes a claim, that plaintiff's insurance rate most certainly rises. Conceding that a plaintiff is already undercompensated after receiving his or her damage award, the fact that his or her premium rates increase is another reason that plaintiff is far from receiving his benefit of the bargain. [123] Indeed, nearly all proponents and opponents of the collateral source rule seek to ensure that plaintiffs receive the benefit of their bargain. With many holes left open, [*446] however, many plaintiffs, in all reality, are not realizing the benefit of their bargain. [124]

Moreover, there is one ironic area left unsettled by the states that have abrogated the collateral source rule. No provision is included that would require plaintiffs' recovery to be offset by gratuitous benefits. If the goal is to prevent double recovery by plaintiffs, it seems illogical not to offset gratuitous benefits received by a plaintiff. Most statutes, however, are silent on this issue.

Is there any way to reconcile the decisions of Heinz [125] in Michigan and Sheward and Sorrell in Ohio? [126] The concept of a liability insurance crisis was at the root of all of the cases, purportedly the justification for the respective statutes. [127] Despite both courts' use of the rational basis standard to test the constitutionality of the respective statutes, Michigan's statute was upheld, while the Ohio Supreme Court struck down its respective statute. [128]

Perhaps the decisions cannot be reconciled given the lack of evidence upon which any asserted liability crisis argument is based. A task force in Kentucky investigated any perceived liability insurance crisis. This group's results, however, indicated that there was "no evidence of a litigation explosion in Kentucky. [129] Likewise, the Ohio Supreme Court in Sorrell stated that one basis for its holding was the "paucity of credible empirical evidence that a crisis existed, or that there is a relationship between tort reform legislation and the availability or affordability of insurance." [130] Thus, as compared to the Sorrell and Sheward majority decisions, the Heinz majority seemed cursory, ignoring the arbitrary and illogical classification that the Michigan statute creates, [131] and the lack of any justifiable basis upon which to conclude that there is an insurance crisis justifying the statute.

Even if Michigan's statute appears constitutional, compared to Ohio and Kentucky's statutes, is it the best alternative? Kentucky's decision striking down the collateral source statute has been described as "reestablishing a level playing field at trial." [132] This, however, is not quite

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Tort Reform Articles] [5]

OA/NARA#: 16,46/1514
9597

Box 59
Folder 3

REV_00262535

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*45 Case W. Res. 1, **

Copyright (c) 1994 Case Western Reserve Law Review.
Case Western Reserve University

1994

45 Case W. Res. 1

LENGTH: 48678 words

ARTICLE: Compulsory Joinder of Compensating Insurers: Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19 and the Role of Substantive Law

June F. Entman *

* Cecil C. Humphreys Professor of Law, Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law, University of Memphis (formerly Memphis State University); B.A., 1967, Smith College; M.A.T., 1969, University of Chicago; J.D., 1981, Memphis State University. I am deeply grateful to my friend and colleague, Professor Robert Banks, Jr., who generously reviewed drafts of this article and offered numerous insights and improvements. I am also indebted to Professors Richard Marcus, Michael Risinger, Carl Tobias, and Ralph Whitten, who provided me with suggestions and encouragement.

SUMMARY:
... The plaintiff's insurance company has partially compensated the plaintiff for that loss and, consequently, the insurer has acquired a right to reimbursement from damages recoverable from the defendant. ... Although the compensating insurer is entitled to reimbursement from the insured's recovery, the insurer does not have an enforceable claim against the third party. ... The Aetna Court gave no further explanation of why the insured and the insurer were necessary parties. ... In Childers v. Eastern Foam Products, Inc., the court required joinder of a partially subrogated insurer on the basis of subdivision (a)(2)(ii). ... The Childers court might have found, as part of its initial inquiry into whether the plaintiff insured was a real party in interest, that the insured was entitled to sue only upon joinder of the insurer. ... For example, in Hancotte v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., the court denied the defendant's motion for compulsory joinder of the plaintiff's insurer, reasoning that the insurer's execution of a "ratification agreement," in which it had agreed to be bound by the results of the insured's action and to waive any right to pursue its subrogation rights outside of that action, eliminated "any danger of the defendant being subjected to multiple or inconsistent obligations." ...

TEXT:
[*1] I. Introduction

The question seems to be a simple one: The plaintiff claims to have suffered a loss through the fault of the defendant. The plaintiff's insurance company has partially compensated the plaintiff for that loss and, consequently, the insurer has acquired a right to reimbursement from damages recoverable from the defendant. If the plaintiff sues the defendant for the loss, may the defendant successfully require joinder of the plaintiff's insurer as a party plaintiff?

substantive," and therefore not applicable in a federal court. [122]

The Hunt court's conclusion that the Kansas rule was merely procedural is not borne out by an examination of the Kansas authorities. The Kansas rule had been announced in City of New York Insurance Co. v. Tice, [123] a case cited but badly misunderstood by the Tenth Circuit in Hunt. In Tice, the Kansas Supreme Court [*31] stated that in a case of partial compensation,

The action should be brought by the property owner, who will hold as trustee for the insurer in respect to such part of the amount recovered as the insurer has been compelled to pay under the policy. If, in such a situation, the property owner refuses to bring action, justice requires that the insurer be permitted to bring action. [124]

On its face, the Kansas rule limited the right of the insurer to bring an action to enforce its interest. When the insured sued for the entire claim, the insurer was limited to the role of beneficiary; it was entitled to bring an action to enforce its claim against the wrongdoer only if the insured did not.

Moreover, the Tice court's rationale for this rule was that "the wrongdoer should not be compelled to defend two actions for the same wrong." [125] The rule concerned more than "the person in whose name the action may be prosecuted," as the Tenth Circuit characterized it. [126] The rule was a substantive limitation on the insurer's right to sue, designed for the protection of the accused tortfeasor. [127] Nonetheless, the Hunt court decided that the Kansas rule was procedural and that the insurer was a real party in interest.

In contrast to the Hunt case, a number of lower federal court decisions have followed state law in deciding that compensating insurers were not real parties in interest with regard to claims asserted by insureds. For example, denying the defendant's motion to join a workers' compensation insurer as a party plaintiff in Pyle v. Kansas Gas & Electric Co., [128] the court first stated that the insurer's right to recover from the defendant was controlled by [*32] Kansas law. [129] Then, after examining the Kansas workers' compensation statute, the court concluded that because the employee had brought suit, the insurer was only entitled to a lien on the employee's recovery and therefore was not subrogated. [130] Several other post-Aetna decisions involving workers' compensation carriers have carefully examined the underlying substantive law and have concluded correctly that the insurers were not real parties in interest when the applicable statutes gave the insurers only a right to reimbursement and not a right to sue the third party. [131]

It is really not surprising to find more accurate assessments of insurers' substantive rights in the workers' compensation cases. Federal courts in those cases often have the benefit of statutes that explicitly address the insurer's right to bring an action against the third party. When a statute creates the right of the insurer to compensation, it is not difficult for the court to ascertain that right and also to appreciate that the state rule is substantive. In cases such as Hunt, on the other hand, the federal court is faced with deciphering state court decisions to determine the right of a compensating insurer to state a claim against a third party. In many instances, it may be considerably more difficult than it was in Hunt to determine the correct answer. [132] Outside of the workers' compensation area, therefore, one more frequently finds federal courts simply concluding that a state rule is procedural, or ignoring state law altogether, and applying the Aetna assumption that insurers are subrogated. [133]
[*33]

2. The Jurisprudence of Labels

Aetna's other legacy is the use of labels to determine compulsory joinder, in particular the label that partially compensating insurers are necessary parties. For example, in Gas Service Co. v. Hunt, [134] after mischaracterizing Kansas law as procedural and deciding that the insurer was a subrogee and a real party in interest, [135] the court quickly resolved the joinder issue. Relying solely upon the Aetna dicta, and without citing Rule 19, the court stated that when either the insured or the subrogated insurer brings suit, the other should be joined upon timely motion of the alleged wrongdoer. [136] Thus, the Hunt court required joinder of an insurer that did not even have a claim for relief against the third party.

REV_00262545

In Wright v. Schebler Co., [137] on the other hand, the district [*34] court had also decided incorrectly that the insurer was subrogated, [138] but it nonetheless declined to order the insurer's joinder. Unlike the Hunt court, the court in Wright distinguished Aetna and relied upon the text of Rule 19. [139] Reading the criterion of subparts (a) and (b) of Rule 19 to be cumulative, the Wright court first found that the insurer had a "joint interest" with the plaintiff, as specified in subpart (a). [140] In light of the insurer's limited interest under the Illinois workers' compensation act, that conclusion was debatable. The court found, however, that the criterion of subpart (b) was not met. [141] Subpart (b) provided that joinder was necessary "if complete relief is to be accorded between those already parties." [142] The court found that complete relief could be granted between those already parties, the insured and the tortfeasor, without joinder of the insurer. [143]

Apparently attempting to cover all bases, the Wright court further stated that an "underlying objective" of Rule 19 is to "avoid multiple suits, and generally promote the economy and efficiency of judicial action." [144] In the situation before it, the court explained, there was no possibility of multiple suits because "there can be but one recovery under Illinois law." [145] Although the court cited no authority for this statement about Illinois law, it was undoubtedly correct. Under the express language of the act, the insurer had no right to sue once the insured had sued. [146]

In Wright, the court escaped an erroneous decision requiring joinder as a plaintiff of an insurer that was not subrogated. The court, moreover, eschewed the jurisprudence of labels and attempt [*35] ed to apply the text of Rule 19. Its statement, however, of a broad purpose in Rule 19 to avoid multiple litigation typifies an unfortunate judicial tendency that has continued even after the 1966 revision of Rule 19. Had the Aetna court provided more accurate guidance in the application of Rule 19, perhaps this trend would not have begun and future courts would have had a clearer idea of federal compulsory joinder doctrine.

V. The Impact of Amended Rule 19

A. The 1966 Amendment

In 1966, Rule 19 was completely rewritten and the labels discarded. The Advisory Committee's aim was to replace "abstract classifications" with "pragmatic considerations" as the correct basis of decision with regard to compulsory joinder. [147] The new rule entirely eliminated the terms "necessary" and "joint" and "united" interests; "indispensable" was retained, but not as a classification. "Indispensable" was instead used as a conclusion to describe the consequence of analysis. [148] The rule spelled out the factors to be considered both in requiring joinder and in deciding whether to proceed in the absence of a party who should be joined. The rule adopted in 1966 provided: [149]

Joinder of Persons Needed for Just Adjudication.

(a) Persons to be Joined if Feasible. A person who is subject to service of process and whose joinder will not deprive the court of jurisdiction over the subject matter of the action shall be joined as a party in the action if (1) in his [the person's] absence complete relief cannot be accorded among those already parties, or (2) he [the person] claims an interest relating to the subject of the action and is so situated that the disposition of the action in his [the person's] absence may (i) as a practical matter impair or impede his [the person's] ability to protect that interest or (ii) leave any of the persons already parties subject to a substantial risk of incurring double, multiple, or otherwise inconsistent obligations by reason of his the claimed interest. If he [the person] has not been so joined, the court shall order that he [the person] be made a party. If he [the person] should join as a plaintiff but refuses to do so, he [the person] may be made a defendant, or, in a proper case, an involuntary plaintiff. If the joined party objects to venue and his joinder [of that party] would render the venue of the action improper, he [that party] shall be dismissed from the action.

REV_00262546

[*36]

(b) Determination by Court Whenever Joinder Not Feasible. If a person as described in subdivision (a)(1)-(2) hereof cannot be made a party, the court shall determine whether in equity and good conscience the action should proceed among the parties before it, or should be dismissed, the absent person being thus regarded as indispensable. The factors to be considered by the court include: first, to what extent a judgment rendered in the person's absence might be prejudicial to him [the person] or those already parties; second, the extent to which, by protective provisions in the judgment, by the shaping of relief, or other measures, the prejudice can be lessened or avoided; third, whether a judgment rendered in the person's absence will be adequate; fourth, whether the plaintiff will have an adequate remedy if the action is dismissed for nonjoinder.

In Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, [150] the United States Supreme Court addressed the significance of the 1966 amendment. The court of appeals reversed plaintiffs' verdicts in a declaratory judgment action brought to determine whether the driver of a vehicle involved in a fatal accident had been using the car with the permission of the owner, Dutcher, who was not a defendant in the suit. [151] The defendants were Dutcher's liability insurer and the estate of the driver, against which one of the plaintiffs had an unsatisfied consent judgment. The court of appeals re [*37] versed on the grounds that Dutcher was an indispensable party. [152] Reversing, the Supreme Court criticized the court of appeals for its failure to base its decision on the new rule's "stated pragmatic considerations." [153] The Court admonished that the inflexible approach adopted by the court of appeals "exemplifies the kind of reasoning that the Rule was designed to avoid." [154] Focusing primarily upon the "equity and good conscience" test of Rule 19(b), the Court concluded that the trial court's judgment should have been permitted to stand in spite of Dutcher's absence. [155]

The 1966 amendment of Rule 19 has not significantly improved the quality of federal decisions with regard to joinder of compensating insurers. As the Supreme Court discovered in the Provident Tradesmens case, improving the text of Rule 19 does not automatically improve judicial understanding of compulsory joinder doctrine. The Aetna legacies have continued to influence analysis, or a lack thereof, in federal decisions concerning compensating insurers. The first Aetna legacy--assuming without sufficient attention to the substantive law that both insured and insurer are real parties in interest entitled to sue--has not been avoided by Rule 19's clearer articulation of compulsory joinder doctrine. As the decisions discussed below illustrate, federal courts have continued to give insufficient attention to the substantive rights of insured and insurer under the applicable law of subrogation.

REV_00262547

The second Aetna legacy--failing to understand and to apply compulsory joinder doctrine properly--has also continued unabated, although it has taken various forms. First, some federal courts, despite the admonitions of Provident Tradesmens, [156] have ignored the criteria of Rule 19 altogether and have relied upon Aetna dicta [157] and other outdated precedent. Second, many courts, applying either the "complete relief" language of Rule 19(a)(1) or the "multiple or otherwise inconsistent obligations" language of Rule [*38] 19(a)(2)(ii), have read Rule 19 incorrectly as a broad prohibition against multiple lawsuits from one transaction. [158]

B. Aetna's Continuing Legacy: Ignoring Rule 19(a)

Illustrative of unquestioning reliance on pre-1966 precedent in requiring joinder of a compensating insurer is the Tenth Circuit opinion in Public Service Co. v. Black & Veatch. [159] In Public Service Co., the court declined to overrule its 1950 holding in Gas Service Co. v. Hunt [160] that a compensating insurer should be joined as a party plaintiff upon motion of a defendant tortfeasor. [161] In calling for the overruling of Hunt, both the plaintiff [162] and the district court [163] focused their concern on jury prejudice, a concern that failed to move the Tenth Circuit. [164] The district court reasoned also that Hunt should not be followed when "the insured brings the action for the entire loss and a rule prohibits another suit by anyone having an interest in the Plaintiff's cause of action." [165] Unfortunately, the lower court failed to explain fully the significance of the Oklahoma rule: because the insurer had no right to enforce its claim, there was no reason for requiring its joinder. [166]

The Tenth Circuit in Public Service Co. merely reaffirmed the rule in Aetna and Hunt that "where the owner has been reimbursed for only a part of his loss, both the insured and the insurer own [*39] portions of the substantive right against the wrongdoer and should appear in litigation in their own names." [167] The court again failed to recognize the need to refer first to the substantive law to determine the rights of insured and insurer before proceeding to the joinder issue. Furthermore, it appears that neither the plaintiff nor either of the courts in Public Service Co. took note of the 1966 amendment of Rule 19. Had they done so, they might have seen the necessity for re-evaluating both Hunt and Aetna, and the new rule may have helped to focus the inquiry on the rights of the parties. [168] Instead, the Tenth Circuit merely reiterated that Hunt was consistent with Aetna and other authorities, [169] most of which predated the 1966 amendment. [170]

One year later, another circuit court of appeals took up the issue, this time taking note of the 1966 amendment. The result, however, fell far short of the careful analysis that the Supreme Court called for in Provident Tradesmens. [171] In Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Electric Corp., [172] the Fourth Circuit granted an interlocutory appeal from the denial of a motion to [*40] dismiss on the grounds that the plaintiff's insurer was a real party in interest and an indispensable party. [173] The insurer in Virginia Electric, unlike the plaintiff insured, shared the citizenship of the defendant, and thus its joinder would have defeated federal diversity jurisdiction. [174] In Virginia Electric, Circuit Judge Craven first determined that under Rule 17 (a) and applicable Virginia law, both the insured and the partially subrogated insurer were real parties in interest. [175] In this case, however, the conclusion that the insured was a real party in interest entitled to sue was in conflict with a cooperation agreement between the insured and the insurer in which the insured agreed "that the conduct of the continuing action to recover . . . for such claims shall be under the exclusive direction and control of the Insurer," and a subrogation instrument providing that the insured "subrogates the Insurer to all of its remaining rights of recovery." [176] Pursuant to this agreement, the insured apparently had conveyed to the insurer all rights to enforce the claim against the defendant. [177] The insured, therefore, had no claim to enforce against the defendant.

REV_00262548

Because the insured in Virginia Electric was not, therefore, a proper plaintiff, the suit simply should have been dismissed for lack of diversity jurisdiction, or on proper motion, via summary judgment. Believing that both insured and insurer were proper plaintiffs, however, Judge Craven then turned to Rule 19. His entire analysis under subdivision (a) consisted of only a citation to Aetna and the conclusion that "it is clear that a partial subrogee is a person to be joined if feasible under Fed.R.Civ.P. 19(a)." [178] Thus, once again, the pre-amendment dicta of Aetna, and not the specific criteria of Rule 19(a), prevailed. [179]

It may be that Judge Craven devoted so little attention to applying Rule 19(a) because he had determined that in any case this was a suit that, under Rule 19(b), should be permitted to proceed in spite of the insurer's absence as a party. [180] In other words, [*41] Judge Craven may have reasoned in a somewhat backwards fashion: The insurer cannot be joined because its presence would defeat jurisdiction. The ultimate question, therefore, is whether the suit may proceed without the insurer. Applying the criteria specified in Rule 19(b), the suit may so proceed. Thus, it matters little whether joinder of the insurer would be required if it were feasible.

Deciding that the insurer was not indispensable under Rule 19(b) led to the same result in Virginia Electric as the court would have reached had it determined that joinder of the insurer was not required by Rule 19(a). The insured was permitted to sue alone for the entire loss. It is unfortunate, however, for a court, especially a court of appeals, to treat the subdivision (a) analysis as merely academic. This methodology creates a body of precedent that, when applied in a case in which joinder is feasible, supports much broader joinder than may be warranted by a careful application of subdivision (a). In Virginia Electric, the court's simple reliance on Aetna and its apparently backwards application of Rule 19 created an influential precedent that leads to misapplication of Rule 19. [181]

Several federal courts have adopted the approach, in cases in which joinder of the absentee is not feasible, of analyzing whether to proceed or dismiss under subdivision (b) without analyzing whether joinder would be required under subdivision (a). [182] Other [*42] federal courts have criticized this approach. [183] Under some circumstances it may be justifiable for a trial court, presented with a motion to dismiss because joinder of an absentee is not feasible, to engage in only the subdivision (b) inquiry. If the court decides to proceed without the absentee as a result of a subdivision (b) analysis, there is no harm done by the court's making the assumption that the absentee is "a person as described in subdivision (a)." [184] If the court is clear that it is operating only upon an assumption, and not a finding, with regard to subdivision (a), the approach will have saved the court unnecessary effort and will not create careless precedent. When the trial court's conclusion, however, is that under subdivision (b) it should not proceed without the absentee, the subdivision (a) application is unavoidable because a suit should be dismissed only if the absentee is "a person as described in subdivision (a)." [185]

The reasons given by Judge Craven for concluding that the insurer was not indispensable under subdivision (b) highlight the inadequacy of his conclusion that the insurer was a person whose joinder was required under subdivision (a). Judge Craven explained that the insurer was not indispensable because a judgment in the [*43] insurer's absence would be "fully adequate to protect both INA [the insurer] and the parties and the public interest in the termination of disputes." [186] Specifically, because of INA's control of the litigation, it would have been bound by any judgment in favor of the defendants. [187] An examination, however, of the subdivision (a) criteria for determining if a person must be joined if feasible reveals that the very reasons Judge Craven cited for finding the insurer not indispensable under subdivision (b) indicate that INA's joinder would not be required under subdivision (a). If INA controlled the litigation and would be bound by a judgment, the factors listed in subdivision (a) did not require joinder. Complete relief could be afforded; INA's interests were protected; and there was no risk of multiple or inconsistent obligations. INA was not, therefore, a "person to be joined if feasible" within the meaning of Rule 19(a).

REV_00262549

Had Judge Craven more carefully considered subdivision (a) of Rule 19, rather than relying exclusively upon the Aetna dicta, [188] he may well have reached the same result without ever having had to consider the problem of indispensability under subdivision (b). Of course, had Judge Craven first reached the conclusion, as he should have, that under the circumstances of this case the insured had no claim and only the insurer was entitled to sue, he would have reached an entirely different result, dismissing the case for lack of diversity of citizenship between the insurer and the defendant. [189] As it was, however, Virginia Electric authorized a fiction in the naming of the plaintiff that not only permitted the exercise of federal jurisdiction where none in fact existed, [190] but that also permitted the insurer to escape the responsibilities it should have borne as the party in control of the litigation. [191] Virginia Electric, therefore, in effect, allowed a type of "use plaintiff." [192]
[*44]

C. Misapplying Rule 19(a)(1)

Other courts have concluded that compensating insurers whose joinder is feasible must be joined under Rule 19(a), but, in contrast to the reliance on outdated precedent found in Public Service Co. and Virginia Electric, have done so by applying the post-1966 language of the rule. These courts have generally found that Rule 19 is designed to prevent multiple litigation and that such a danger exists if an insured is permitted to sue alone to recover a claim that is partially subrogated.

In Potomac Electric Power Co. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co. [193] defendants moved to dismiss the suit on the grounds that the plaintiff's insurers were real parties in interest under Rule 17(a) and indispensable parties under Rule 19(b). [194] The court first determined that the insurers were real parties in interest. [195] One of the insurers, Royal Indemnity Company, had paid part of the insured's loss under a loan receipt agreement. [196] The agreement provided that Royal would have "exclusive direction and control" of any suit to recover for the loss. In addition, officers of Royal were appointed as agents and attorneys in fact "with irrevocable power" to collect any claim resulting from the loss. [197] The court found that the arrangement was not a bona fide loan and did not avoid the conclusion that the insurer was subrogated and was, therefore, a real party in interest in the suit. [198]

In light of the insurer's exclusive control of the claim, the court might have concluded that Royal alone was the real party in interest, thus obviating any issue of Rule 19 in the case. The suit could have been dismissed on the ground that the plaintiff insured had no claim to enforce and that substitution of the insurer, Royal, would defeat subject matter jurisdiction because of loss of diverse [*45] citizenship. Moreover, the court noted in passing that a Maryland rule of procedure required that the insurers be named as parties plaintiff. [199] Had the court examined the Maryland rule and found it to reflect a substantive state policy, the court might have found it controlling. [200] Under either rationale, there was sufficient basis in the substantive law for the court's ultimate decision to dismiss the case for lack of diversity, without applying Rule 19. Not appreciating these potential solutions to its case, however, the Potomac Electric court turned to compulsory joinder under Federal Rule 19.

The court first noted the plaintiff's heavy reliance on the Aetna dicta that neither the insured nor the insurer would be indispensable. [201] The court rejected that authority both because the statement was dicta and because "that case was decided in 1949, long before Rule 19 was amended and put in its present form emphasizing that pragmatic considerations should be controlling." [202] The court then applied amended Rule 19 by finding initially that the insurer was a party whose joinder was required if feasible under subdivision (a)(1). Reasoning that the insurer might be entitled to bring a subsequent action against the defendant if the insurer were dissatisfied with the outcome of the suit brought by its insured, the court found that complete relief would not be "accorded the other parties" in the insurer's absence. [203] The court quoted the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 19, which stated that "the interests that are being furthered [by subdivision (a)(1)] are not only those of the parties, but also that of the public in avoiding repeated lawsuits on the same essential subject matter." [204] Next applying subdivision (b), the court decided that the insurers were indispensable, and, therefore, it dismissed the suit. [205]

REV_00262550

[*46]

The Potomac Electric court's interpretation of Rule 19(a)(1) is one that has been rejected by most authorities, including a number of well-reasoned federal court opinions. In finding that Rule 19(a)(1) identified the insurer as a person to be joined if feasible, the court ignored the plain and specific language of Rule 19(a)(1), which is that absence of the non-party will prevent "complete relief among those already parties." The Potomac Electric court's concern about a subsequent lawsuit prosecuted by the non-party insurer against the defendant is not relevant to the question of complete relief between those already parties--the insured and the defendant. The specific language of subdivision (a)(1) does not encompass consideration of all claims of all persons, parties and non-parties, that may have arisen from the events being litigated. The word "already" in the rule excludes consideration of affording complete relief among parties and those not "already" parties. The Advisory Committee's comment, cited by the Potomac Electric court, about the public interest "in avoiding repeated lawsuits on the same essential subject matter," was made solely in the context of clause (1), which is concerned only with those already parties. [206] The comment, therefore, should only be taken to mean that Rule 19(a)(1)'s purpose is to avoid repeated lawsuits on the same transaction among those who are already parties to the action.

To construe Rule 19(a)(1) as did the court in Potomac Electric would be, in effect, to swallow up a major portion of Rule 20, which provides for permissive joinder of parties plaintiff and defendant. Rule 20 provides for permissive joinder of parties if the claims asserted by or against them arise out of the same transaction or occurrence and if any common question of law or fact will arise in the action. [207] To read Rule 19, as did the Potomac Elec [*47] tric court, to require joinder of a nonparty merely because that person has a claim arising from the same "essential subject matter" [208] is to make Rule 19 compulsory joinder coterminous with Rule 20 permissive joinder.

Prior to 1990, a similar failure to appreciate the interrelationship between Rules 19 and 20 had arisen in the context of defendants' Rule 19 motions to require plaintiffs to join potential joint tortfeasors as defendants. Although the well-established rule has long been that joinder of all joint tortfeasors is not required, [209] some recent decisions, in flagrant opposition to the Advisory Committee's Note to amended Rule 19, [210] had held that Rule 19(a)(1) should be construed to require the joinder of potential joint tortfeasors. [211] In Temple v. Synthes Corp., [212] however, [*48] the Supreme Court firmly established that Rule 19 embodies the traditional rule against compulsory joinder of all joint tortfeasors. The Court acknowledged that the Provident Tradesmens [213] opinion had identified the public interest in limiting multiple litigation as a focus of Rule 19, but it further noted that the Court's recognition of that interest in Provident Tradesmens arose in the context of a subdivision (b) analysis. [214] Regarding the joint tortfeasor situation, the Court in Temple explained that, "here, no inquiry under Rule 19(b) is necessary, because the threshold requirements of Rule 19(a) have not been satisfied." [215] The Court then reached a correct conclusion under subdivision (a), but did so unfortunately in the old language of labels, without explaining the result in terms of the rule itself. The Court simply stated that "as potential joint tortfeasors with Synthes, Dr. LaRocca and the hospital were merely permissive parties." [216] Other courts reaching the same result have been more fastidious in pointing out that Rule 19(a)(1) refers only to complete relief among those who are already parties, and that it does not protect defendants from the necessity of pursuing their contribution or indemnity claims in a separate lawsuit. [217]

Because it was concerned with compulsory joinder of plaintiffs, the Third Circuit opinion in Field v. Volkswagenwerk AG, [218] is even more to the point. Ivana Field was injured in a single car accident while driving a Volkswagen van. Ivana's husband, Arthur, was killed, and her stepson, Michael, injured. Ivana filed suit against Volkswagenwerk AG (VWAG) individually for her own injuries and also in her capacity as administratrix of her husband's estate. In addition, Michael Field's guardian, his mother, asserted a claim as a co-plaintiff seeking to recover for Michael's injuries. After the suit was filed, it was learned that diversity jurisdiction was lacking because of Ivana's Czechoslovakian citizenship. In response to the defendant VWAG's motion to dismiss, Ivana [*49] sought a voluntary dismissal of her individual claim. She also took the necessary steps under New York law to have Michael's mother substituted as administratrix of Arthur Field's estate. [219]

REV_00262551

Defendant VWAG took the position, and the district court agreed, that the entire suit must be dismissed because Ivana Field was an indispensable party to the suit by her stepson and the estate of her husband. [220] The district court apparently based its decision on the assumption that Ivana's negligence was an issue in the case and that without Ivana as a party, VWAG would "be unable to assert Ivana's negligence against the claims of the remaining parties." [221]

In a carefully reasoned opinion, the Third Circuit held that Ivana was not a party whose joinder was required under the criteria of Rule 19(a). [222] With regard to Ivana's role as a co-plaintiff, the court explained that Ivana's absence as a party did not preclude the court from according "complete relief among the parties," as contemplated by subdivision (a)(1), simply because VWAG might later have to defend against a separate action brought by Ivana in her individual capacity. The court explained that if Ivana's joinder were required, "the distinction between Rules 20 and 19 would be rendered practically meaningless. For in just about every case of permissive joinder under Rule 20 the proper party in question, if not joined, would be able to assert rights against the defendant in a separate action." [223] Because Ivana was not even a party to be [*50] joined if feasible, the lawsuit could proceed in her absence and there was no reason to deny her motion to dismiss her claim.

Rule 19(a)(1) is not a broad prohibition against multiple litigation. Even if both insured and insurer have separate claims under the substantive law, Rule 19(a)(1), properly understood, does not provide the defendant a remedy for nonjoinder of the absent insurer. [224] Although the remedy, if there is to be one, [225] may be found in other rules, [226] some federal courts have sought a basis for requiring joinder of compensating insurers in another sub-division of Rule 19.

D. Misapplying Rule 19(a)(2)(ii)

Other courts have required joinder of subrogated insurers out of a concern for preventing multiple litigation, but have relied upon subdivision (a)(2)(ii) of Rule 19(a). This subdivision requires joinder, if feasible, of a person who "claims an interest relating to the subject of the action, and is so situated that the disposition of the action in the person's absence may . . . leave any of the persons already parties subject to a substantial risk of incurring double, multiple, or otherwise inconsistent obligations by reason of his claimed interest." [227]

In Childers v. Eastern Foam Products, Inc., [228] the court required joinder of a partially subrogated insurer on the basis of subdivision (a)(2)(ii). The court in Childers began by examining the substantive rights of the compensating insurer to determine [*51] whether it was a real party in interest. [229] The court found that the absentee insurer was a subrogee and real party in interest on the basis of a Georgia appellate court holding that insured and partially compensating insurer each own part of the claim and "'each owner of a part of the claim has a cause of action and may sue by joining the other part owner.'" [230]

Without further mention of the Georgia rule mandating joinder, the court then turned to Federal Rule 19(a)(2)(ii). The court expressed its concern that because the insurer was not a party, the defendant would be faced with the "substantial risk" of defending against the insurer should the defendant prevail or the plaintiff insureds recover only part of their claim. [231]

The Childers court acknowledged that many cases had held joinder of the insurer-subrogee not required under Rule 19(a), some relying upon the assumption that a non-party who controls litigation is bound by the outcome. [232] Nonetheless, the court concluded that, as joinder was feasible, it was "desirable," because joinder would eliminate any uncertainty about the insurer's subsequent rights against the defendant. [233]

Childers illustrates, once again, a court reading Rule 19(a) so broadly that it is indistinguishable from permissive joinder under Rule 20. "Desirable" joinder should not be equated with compulsory joinder. [234] Rule 19(a)(2)(ii) speaks of protecting the parties from "multiple, or otherwise inconsistent obligations." The rule does not speak of preventing multiple litigation or even of preventing inconsistent judgments, although some courts have read the rule in such a fashion. For example, in Whyham v. Piper Aircraft
[*52] Corp., [235] a Pennsylvania federal district court found that joint tortfeasors were parties who must be joined under subdivision (a)(2)(ii) because the defendant had a right of contribution that would have to be adjudicated "in an unnecessary second suit." [236] The Whyham court also reasoned that two trials might result in different or contradictory findings of the tortfeasors' proportion of liability, which would result in "inconsistent obligations." [237]

This misreading of Rule 19(a)(2)(ii) was rejected by an Ohio federal district court in Bedel v. Thompson, [238] in which the defendant Jones & Co. argued that a bankrupt corporation, D.H. Baldwin Co., was an indispensable party because of Jones's right of contribution or indemnification against Baldwin. The court explained that the defendant Jones was not subject to inconsistent obligations within the meaning of subdivision (a)(2)(ii) merely because of the possible inconsistent results that would occur if Jones were found liable to the plaintiff and, in another action, Baldwin found not liable to Jones. [239] The Childers court was concerned with a risk of multiple litigation if the defendant prevailed or the insured recovered only a part of his claim. [240] But as the Bedel court pointed out, Rule 19(a)(2)(ii) is designed to prevent multiple or inconsistent obligations, not to prevent multiple or inconsistent litigation or results. [241]
[*53]

What the Childers court failed to appreciate was that its concern with preventing multiple litigation had been addressed, not by federal Rule 19, but by the Georgia law of subrogation that should have been followed by the federal court. In defining the rights of insured and insurer in the circumstance of partial compensation, the Georgia court had held that the right of each to sue was conditioned upon joinder of the other as plaintiff. [242] The Childers court might have found, as part of its initial inquiry into whether the plaintiff insured was a real party in interest, that the insured was entitled to sue only upon joinder of the insurer. Requiring joinder on that basis would have generated the same result without an expansive and incorrect reading of Rule 19.

A few cases have noted, however, a more genuine danger of multiple obligations when the insured alone sues to recover a claim that is partially subrogated. If a successful plaintiff-insured fails to reimburse his insurer, and the insurer is then permitted to assert its subrogation claim against the defendant, the defendant may be obliged to pay twice for the same injury.

In some of the decisions holding that Rule 19(a) does not require joinder of the subrogated insurer, courts have recognized this problem, but have concluded that it can be remedied by means short of requiring joinder. For example, in O'Brien v. Tri-State Oil

[*54] Tool Industries, [243] the defendant moved the court to join as a party plaintiff a workers' compensation insurer that had a statutory subrogation lien on the plaintiff's recovery. The defendant contended that without joinder, it would be subject to multiple or inconsistent obligations as described in Rule 19(a)(2)(ii). [244] The defendant's argument in O'Brien presupposed that the insurer would be entitled to bring an action against the defendant to enforce its right to reimbursement. This supposition was not acknowledged or examined by the court in O'Brien, but in most workers' compensation schemes, the insurer would not have such a right, particularly after the employee had filed suit. [245] Both by contract and under the general law of subrogation, an insurer's exclusive remedy when its insured recovers from a third party but neglects to reimburse the insurer is directly against the insured. [246] In any event, the court in O'Brien did not find joinder of the insurer under Rule 19(a) necessary in order to protect the defendant from the plaintiff's failure to reimburse the insurer. Rather, the court suggested that it would entertain a motion that if the plaintiff obtained a verdict, the judgment order would require the parties to satisfy the judgment in a fashion consistent with the insurer's lien interest under the workers' compensation law. [247] The court explained that such a procedure would provide the protection Rule 19(a) was designed to afford while avoiding the addition of another party at a late stage in the litigation. [248] Like the O'Brien court, other courts have concluded that the risk of multiple obligations can be prevented without joinder simply by protecting the insurer's
[*55] pecuniary interest in any judgment obtained by the insured. [249]
[*56]

VI. Reasons for Requiring Joinder of Subrogated Insurers

A. The Problem of Multiple Litigation

Although Rule 19 properly applied does not provide a solution, preventing multiple litigation is a particularly compelling goal in the context of insurance subrogation. Regardless of whether broad joinder of plaintiffs should be generally required for the purpose of efficiency in litigation, [250] insurance subrogation presents particular reasons for requiring joinder. Ordinarily, when several claimants are injured in the same transaction and their claims thus depend largely upon common questions of law or fact, the claimants nonetheless possess distinct claims, which may be subject to distinct defenses. A compensating insurer's subrogation claim, on the other hand, is entirely derivative of the insured's claim. The only issue unique to the insurer's claim is its right to subrogation. [251]

More importantly, subrogation may give more than one person the right to assert the identical claim. Multiple claimants injured by the same transaction are not entitled to assert each other's claims and, therefore, the defendant in such a case does not face the possibility of defending the identical claim twice--only the prospect of defending two suits arising from the same transaction. If the substantive law of subrogation, on the other hand, permits an insurer to state a claim for relief for its portion of the loss after the insured has unsuccessfully prosecuted the entire claim, a defendant is faced with twice defending the identical claim. Even if the insured is entitled to assert only its own portion of the claim, while the insurer is entitled to assert the subrogated portion, the defendant is still placed in the position of twice defending against what was, at [*57] the time it originally occurred, a single claim.

Some federal courts have suggested that doctrines other than compulsory joinder--res judicata and ratification--provide defendants with sufficient protection from multiple litigation. Neither of these other doctrines, however, offers a sufficient remedy to problems of multiple litigation left by Rule 19. For reasons set forth below, [252] res judicata does not provide a fully adequate remedy. Ratification, on the other hand, would seem to cure the problem of multiple litigation, but its use as a device for preventing further litigation brought by a previously unnamed insurer may not be authorized by the federal rules and may also

Since adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1938, federal courts have looked for the answer to this question in Rule 17(a), the real party in interest rule, [1] in Rule 19, the compulsory joinder rule, [2] and sometimes in both rules. [3] State courts with [*3] similar or identical rules of civil procedure have engaged in the same inquiry. [4]

The search for an answer in the rules of civil procedure has not led to uniformity of either result or analysis. Even among the courts that have found an answer in the rules, there is remarkable diversity in their reasons for either requiring joinder or declining to do so. Some have held that Rule 17(a) requires the insurer's joinder. Others have held that Rule 17(a) does not require joinder, but that Rule 19 does. Still others have held that neither rule requires joinder of the insurer. Why has a seemingly simple issue generated not only opposite results, but also divergent and complex analyses? Why have so many spent so much effort litigating and legislating the issue?

The answer to the latter question is perceived jury prejudice: parties are eager to exploit or to avoid the prejudice that many believe will result when a jury is aware that part of the recovery it awards will go to reimburse an insurance company for payments made to the plaintiff under an insurance policy. A few judicial opinions have cited jury prejudice in holding that a compensated insured may appear as the sole plaintiff, [5] but in most decisions this consideration remains unarticulated.

A rationale more frequently expressed by courts and defendants to support requiring a compensating insurer to appear as a party plaintiff is the prevention of multiple litigation. Defendants
[*4] often assert that a lawsuit prosecuted in the name of the insured alone will leave them subject to a subsequent action by the compensating insurer. [6] Sensitive to growing judicial workloads, courts have shown an increasing willingness to read Rules 17(a) and 19 as requiring broad joinder for the purpose of preventing multiple litigation. [7]

The primary reason that there is such variety in judicial applications of Rules 17(a) and 19 is that these two rules simply are not well understood. Both rules embody doctrines that evolved long before the merger of law and equity and have not adapted well to modern litigation. Poor drafting of the rules themselves, along with inadequate judicial understanding of them, has given us results that are chaotic at best. In particular, federal courts have failed to appreciate the role that the substantive law of insurance should play in applying Rules 17 (a) and 19. Federal courts frequently declare that joinder issues are governed by federal rules of procedure and have proceeded to apply those rules without careful analysis of the substantive rights of the parties, sometimes brushing aside applicable state law as merely procedural. [8]

Complicating matters is the fact that the substantive law governing the rights of a compensating insurer varies considerably from state to state. All situations in which an insurer has acquired an interest in its insured's claim are not the same in terms of whether the substantive law entitles the insured or the insurer, or both, to bring and control an action against the third party. [9] If properly applied, Rule 17(a), the real party in interest rule, should direct the court to ascertain and enforce the substantive law's choice as to whether the insured or the insurer has the right to control the asserted claim. Similarly, in determining whether an insurer's joinder is required under Rule 19, the court should consider, along with the policies of Rule 19, what rights the insured
[*5] and the insurer have, or do not have, under the substantive law. [10] All too often, however, courts assume without inquiry that both the insured and the compensating insurer are entitled to control actions against third parties who have caused the loss. [11]

Procedure ought to be the servant of substance, enabling rights to be articulated in litigation. The procedural doctrines of real party in interest and compulsory party joinder have not been very good servants. In an earlier article, I used the compensating insurer problem to interfere with other important policies that depend upon the proper naming of parties. [253]

1. Res Judicata as a Remedy

A few federal courts that have assumed, as did the courts in Potomac Electric [254] and Childers, [255] that Rule 19 is designed to prevent multiple litigation, have concluded, nonetheless, that compulsory joinder of the subrogated insurer is unnecessary and not required by the rule. These decisions have reasoned that the nonjoined insurer will, under principles of res judicata, be bound by a judgment in the insured's suit. Thus, these courts have concluded, none of the Rule 19(a) criteria, including the perceived goal of obviating multiple litigation, requires joinder. [256]
[*58]

The reasons given by these courts, however, for finding that the nonjoined insurer will be bound by the insured's judgment are not entirely satisfactory. It may be true that a judgment for the insured for the entire claim with a trust in favor of the insurer would provide a quick and sufficient basis for disposing of a second lawsuit simply because the insurer's claim is subject to the defense of accord and satisfaction. But what if the judgment is for the defendant, or if the judgment is in an amount that is not satisfactory to the insurer? Courts citing the res judicata solution typically do not fully examine the adequacy of that doctrine as a protection for the defendant. For example, in Prudential Lines, Inc. v. General Tire International Co., [257] the court reached the conclusion that the non-party insurer would be bound because the insurer was "in privity with the plaintiff since it authorized plaintiff to prosecute this action." [258] The court did not explain, however, what acts by the insurer had authorized the plaintiff to bring the action. In Tucson Electric Power Co. v. Bailey Controls Co., [259] the court stated that the insurer "as a nonparty in control of the litigation, will be precluded from relitigating [its insured's] claims." [260]
[*59]

These courts may indeed be correct in their predictions that the insurer will be bound, either because of the insurer's control of the insured's action, [261] or because the insurer is deemed to have been represented in the litigation by the plaintiff insured. [262] What these courts fail to appreciate, however, is that without joinder of the insurer, the defendant may be required to litigate the res judicata issue in a subsequent suit brought by the insurer under circumstances that pose considerable risk. As at least one court has observed, a court rendering judgment in a suit brought only in the name of the insured cannot conclusively determine the res judicata effect of that judgment in a subsequent action brought by the insurer in its own name, and it may be unfair to require the defendant to rely upon a future determination of the res judicata effect of the judgment. [263] To prevail in establishing the res judicata de [*60] fense, the defendant may be required to carry the burden of proving in subsequent litigation what role the insurer actually played in the prior suit. [264] That may be an unreasonable burden, considering that most of the relevant evidence will be under the control of the insured and the insurer. In light of the defendant's legitimate interest in being protected from having to defend against the insured and the subrogated insurer in separate actions, decisions such as Prudential Lines and Tucson Electric appear to be too cavalier in concluding that the defendant will have such protection without joinder of the insurer as a party plaintiff. [265]

2. Ratification as a Remedy

Other federal courts have approved of the device of ratification pursuant to Rule 17(a) [266] as an alternative to what they perceive to be Rule 19's mandate that compensating insurers must be joined as party plaintiffs to prevent multiple litigation. [267] For example, in

REV_00262555

[*61] Hancotte v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., [268] the court denied the defendant's motion for compulsory joinder of the plaintiff's insurer, reasoning that the insurer's execution of a "ratification agreement," in which it had agreed to be bound by the results of the insured's action and to waive any right to pursue its subrogation rights outside of that action, [269] eliminated "any danger of the defendant being subjected to multiple or inconsistent obligations." [270]

There are several problems, both historical and practical, with using the ratification language of Rule 17(a) to solve the problem of multiple litigation. First, ratification can be a solution only if the court has some authority to order dismissal of an action brought in the name of the insured alone. The sole authorization for ratification in the federal rules is the provision in Rule 17(a) for ratification as an alternative to dismissal for failure to name the real party in interest. [271] If the court has no authority to dismiss, it has no authority to require the insurer's ratification as an alternative. When the substantive law permits the insured to sue in his own name, the court has no basis for requiring the insurer to ratify, even if the insurer is also entitled to prosecute an action as subrogee. When the court does have authority to dismiss, [272] however, ratification still is not an appropriate alternative to the naming of the [*62] insurer as a party plaintiff because Rule 17(a) does not authorize ratification in cases of deliberate nonjoinder of the proper plaintiff.

Ratification is an anomaly that slipped into Rule 17(a) in 1966 when admiralty actions were brought under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. [273] Prior to the 1966 amendments, courts exercising admiralty jurisdiction had taken a lax approach to the naming of parties plaintiff because of the difficulty of identifying, at least prior to the expiration of applicable statutes of limitation, the numerous parties who may have enforceable claims arising from the loss of a ship's cargo. [274] According to a leading treatise, even a simple volunteer might institute suit in admiralty against a carrier to recover for loss or damage to cargo. [275] So long as the proper plaintiff or plaintiffs ratified the action before judgment, the action could be saved and judgment entered in the name of the plaintiff on the basis of the unnamed parties' claims. [276] In effect, admiralty had no real party in interest rule.

In 1964 the Advisory Committee on Admiralty Rules proposed the merger of civil and admiralty practice under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The Committee, with the approval of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules, recommended several amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to preserve, after the merger, certain distinct admiralty practices. [277] Among the recommendations by the committee was an amendment to Rule 17 (a) that would have preserved the practice of relation-back of claims through the formerly unnamed parties' "ratification, joinder or substitution." [278] The Committee on Civil Rules then embraced the [*63] idea and modified the proposed amendment so as to make it applicable to all civil actions. [279]

What apparently passed unnoticed, however, was that the provision for ratification, as an alternative to joinder or substitution, introduced into Rule 17(a) a practice that was fundamentally at odds with the rule's basic proposition that every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. [280] The device of ratification reintroduces "use" practice--suit in the name of a nominal party for the use or benefit of the person who actually controls the litigation, and who even may be the only one to bene [*64] fit from it. [281] This was the very practice, however, that the real party in interest rule was intended to abolish. [282]

Even though the provision for ratification appears on its face to authorize a form of use practice, [283] the legislative history of the 1966 amendment strongly suggests that the drafters did not intend to sanction deliberate nonjoinder of a person who should be named as a party plaintiff. [284] The Advisory Committee's Note states that the provision "should not be misunderstood or distorted. It is intended to prevent forfeiture when determination of the proper party to sue is difficult or when an understandable mistake has been made." [285]

Recent decisions, however, allowing parties to use the ratification device deliberately to avoid naming an insurance company as a plaintiff [286] are inconsistent with the expressed legisla [*65] tive intent that the 1966 amendment be available only in cases of mistake.

Use of ratification outside the intended scope of Rule 17(a), as an alternative to otherwise-required joinder or substitution, is illadvised. The ratification device is inconsistent with federal policies of diversity jurisdiction, which depend upon meaningful naming of parties, [287] and with the assumption in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that the party plaintiff is the person in control of the action and thus has certain rights and responsibilities in the litigation. [288] Nowhere do the federal rules define the status of a ratifier in such a way that ratification can be considered the functional equivalent of party status. Nothing in Rule 17(a) itself or its legislative history explains the relationship between ratification and diversity jurisdiction or between ratification and other provisions of the rules, most likely because the rules drafters did not contemplate general use of the device to permit a person to avoid party status. [289]

Some courts have dealt with ratification's lack of definition by requiring that in order to avoid joinder or dismissal, the ratifier must agree to accept various burdens, but there is no consistency in what the courts have required. [290] Ratification may indeed solve the problem of multiple litigation when a subrogated insurer does not appear as a party plaintiff in a lawsuit brought in the name of the insured. Without a satisfactory definition, however, ratification may mean a return to use practice and the undermining of important policies that depend upon the proper naming of parties in [*66] federal litigation.

B. The Problem of Non-Parties in Control of Litigation

The primary reason for requiring joinder or substitution of subrogated insurers, rather than merely ratification by them, is that one in control of litigation, as subrogated insurers so often are, should bear the responsibilities of party status. [291] The matter of who is named as a party plaintiff is important because the federal procedural system is premised upon the assumption that those named as parties have rights and duties in the conduct of the litigation. For example, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, [292] as well as various federal statutes, [293] provide for assessment of costs and sanctions against a "party." Federal Rule 16 authorizes the court to direct the "attorneys for the parties and any unrepresented parties" to appear at pretrial and settlement conferences. [294] Simi [*67] larly, some of the discovery procedures of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure may be used only against parties to the litigation [295] and the scope of an injunction may depend upon party status. [296] Thus, failure to name the proper party plaintiff can circumvent, or at least unduly complicate, a procedural rule that by its terms applies only to a person with the status of a "party." [297]

In addition, federal subject matter jurisdiction based upon diversity of citizenship, including the right of a defendant to remove a case from state court, will often depend upon a proper identification of parties to the lawsuit. [298] The jurisprudence of diversity jurisdiction does not tolerate manipulative naming of parties for the purpose of either creating or defeating diversity of citizenship. [299] Diversity generally is determined by the citizenship of the person who is in actual control of the litigation, not by the citizenship of those who are only beneficially interested in the lawsuit. [300]
[*68]

If a subrogated insurer is in actual control of a lawsuit, but not named as a party, and consequently, its citizenship is ignored for diversity purposes, the requirements for diversity jurisdiction are circumvented. [301] The subrogor-insured who is named as the sole party plaintiff may have some beneficial interest in the suit and may be denominated a "trustee" for the insurer's reimbursement interest, but if the insurer has exclusive actual control of the suit, the insured is in reality merely a nominal or formal party whose citizenship should be ignored for diversity purposes. [302] Cases such as Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Electric Corp., [303] in which the non-diverse subrogated insurer in complete control of the litigation effectively was permitted to sue in the name of its diverse insured, allow the parties to evade the requirement of complete diversity and thus contravene the principle that the federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction. [304]

REV_00262557

In addition, it would seem that the naming of the insured as the sole plaintiff in such a case constitutes a violation of 28 U.S.C. section 1359, which provides that "a district court shall not have jurisdiction of a civil action in which any party, by assignment or otherwise, has been improperly or collusively made or joined to invoke the jurisdiction of such court." [305] Section 1359 admittedly has not traditionally been given a vigorous interpretation. [306] Nonetheless, when a subrogation agreement gives a non-diverse insurer complete control of an action and the right to bring suit in the diverse insured's name, and the court finds that the motivation for the agreement is to create diversity jurisdiction, the court should find that the agreement violates section 1359. [307]
[*69]

C. The Non-Problem of Jury Prejudice

Courts sometimes acknowledge that their decisions about compulsory joinder of compensating insurers are influenced by their belief that a jury's objectivity is adversely affected when an insurance company appears as a party plaintiff. [308] In so doing, they are simply invoking a widely accepted assumption about juries. [309]
[*70] Many courts and writers, however, have either questioned or rejected the assumption that juries are less likely to render a fair verdict when they have direct knowledge of an insurer's interest in the litigation. [310] At least one writer has questioned in particular the relevance of the assumption when the insurer's interest is that of a plaintiff. [311]

Whether the concern with jury prejudice is or is not wellfounded, the concern should not be a factor in implementing the federal rule of compulsory joinder. In cases in which the insured has fully subrogated his claim to his insurers, federal courts have not found concern with jury prejudice sufficient to override the rule that the insurer is the sole proper plaintiff. [312] A case of partial subrogation, in which the insured may properly be named as a co-plaintiff along with the insurance company, should present even less cause for concern because it is not necessary for the jury to know of the insurer's presence merely because the insurer is named in the pleadings. In addition, federal courts commonly deal with such problems with cautionary instructions. [313] The problem of ju [*71] ry prejudice, if there is one, should be dealt with as a matter of trial practice and evidence, and should not be permitted to eclipse the important policies implicated by the naming of parties to a lawsuit. [314]

VII. How to Require Joinder When It Ought to be Required: The Proper Application of Substantive Law

To prevent multiple litigation, joinder of subrogated insurers--those entitled by the substantive law to assert a claim against the third party--ought to be required. [315] Joinder or substitution of subrogated insurers in actual control of litigation should also be required to assure that the party in control is subject to the responsibilities of a party and is properly considered for purposes of diversity jurisdiction in federal court. [316]

Some federal decisions are contrary to these conclusions. [317] Other decisions have achieved these results, but only through erroneous interpretations of Rules 17(a) and 19. [318] Still other federal courts have reached the wrong result in the opposite direction. In some federal decisions, compensating insurers that are neither sub [*72] rogated nor in control of the litigation have been required to join as plaintiffs. [319]

REV_00262558

This unsatisfactory situation arises in large part because federal courts do not permit the substantive law of subrogation, often that of a state, to play its rightful role in determining the parties to the suit. Federal courts have largely ignored or refused to apply various provisions in the law of subrogation that are designed specifically to prevent multiple litigation. State law frequently is brushed aside with the shibboleth that matters of joinder are procedural and, therefore, governed by federal law. [320] Careful analysis reveals, however, that the issue is not that simple and that there are some situations in which federal courts are required to give effect to state law joinder provisions. Doing so, moreover, will solve the problems of multiple litigation that are not remedied by Federal Rule 19 and will facilitate federal policies regarding the naming of parties.

For example, some state law provides that an insured may not sue without joinder of its subrogated insurer. Such a state rule may reflect a policy of protecting the defendant from multiple litigation by conferring a right of action upon two parties that is not enforceable by one alone. In Glacier General Assurance Co. v. G. Gordon Symons Co., [321] the applicable Montana law provided that if an action were instituted by either the insured or the insurer alone, the defendant could compel joinder of the other. [322] The [*73] Ninth Circuit found, however, that "this aspect of Montana law does not bind us. The ability to force joinder of a nonparty in a diversity action is a matter of federal law governed by Fed. R. Civ. P. 19." [323] Then, in a brief Rule 19 application, the court concluded that joinder of the plaintiff's compensating insurers was not required. [324] Unfortunately, the court did not examine underlying state policies to determine the basis for the Montana rule.

When, however, state law provides that a partially compensated insured may sue only if he joins the insurer as a party plaintiff, a finding that the purpose of that rule is to protect a defendant from multiple litigation would justify the conclusion that the state rule is substantive and should be applied by the federal court without reference to Rule 19. As Judge Wyzanski explained in Stevens v. Loomis: [325]

If, as a matter of substantive law, a state does not recognize that a plaintiff has a particular right of action unless he joins with him certain others, then, under Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, the federal diversity court is precluded from giving a plaintiff who fails to join those others an opportunity to proceed as though alone he had a substantive right. [326]

[*74] This principle was applied by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in Jamison v. Memphis Transit Management Co., [327] an action brought by a father to recover for the death of a child. The court dismissed the action because the child's mother could not be joined as a plaintiff without destroying complete diversity. [328] The court explained that the Tennessee wrongful death act vested the right of action in both parents and the defendant "could not obtain complete exoneration from its liability except by payment to both parents or the execution of a release by both the father and mother." [329]

In the subrogation context, Federal Rule 19 should not be permitted to undermine a state's decision to give both the insured and the compensating insurer the right to sue the third party directly, but then to balance that right with the third party's right to insist that only one lawsuit be prosecuted. [330] Courts can not properly apply the rule simply by declaring the preeminence of federal procedure. They must address the substance of the state rule and the policies it is intended to effectuate.

When state law permits the insured to sue alone, it is more difficult to resolve whether a federal court should follow the state rule. The state rule may reflect its policy that in order to protect [*75] the defendant from multiple litigation, only the insured has a claim for relief. [331] It is often the case, however, that such a state rule reflects only the policy of preventing juries

REV_00262559

from knowledge of an insurer's interest, and the state law in fact gives the insurer control of the litigation in the insured's name. [332]

When the state non-joinder rule is designed to protect the defendant from multiple litigation, the federal court should not compel the insurer's joinder. In Gas Service Co. v. Hunt, [333] the Tenth Circuit required joinder of a compensating insurer in spite of the Kansas rule that only the insured was entitled to sue. [334] The Kansas rule was designed to implement an articulated state policy that the wrongdoer "not be compelled to defend two actions for the same wrong." [335] The Hunt court's joinder order did nothing to undermine, or to enhance, the state's goal of protecting the defendant from more than one lawsuit, but it was an unnecessary order because the defendant was protected by the state's determination that the insurer was not entitled to bring its own action. The federal court's order did, however, unnecessarily subject the insurer to the burdens of party status in spite of the fact that the insurer was not even a proper party. [336]
[*76]

A state rule permitting the suit to be brought by the insured alone may not reflect any substantive state policies. The latter conclusion should be reached when state law gives the insurer the actual right to control the litigation but permits the insurer to sue in the name of the insured as the party plaintiff. The apparent state policy for such a rule would be nothing more than a judgment on an evidentiary question--that the jury could not be trusted to decide the case on the merits if it were aware that an insurance company was the actual beneficiary of the suit. The question is simply one of how to achieve accurate adjudication.

In Traveler's Insurance Co. v. Riggs [337] the Fourth Circuit was faced with such a rule in Virginia code provisions that allowed an insurer to sue its in own name or its insured's and prohibited involuntary joinder of the insurer. [338] In opposition to the Virginia rule was the position of the Fourth Circuit in the earlier case of Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Electric Corp., [339] that a partially subrogated insurer may be involuntarily joined as a party plaintiff upon motion of the defendant.

Analyzing the conflict as a "'relatively unguided Erie choice'," [340] the Riggs court found that it was not bound to follow the Virginia statutes. First evaluating the policy behind the state rule, the court explained: "The policy concern that undoubtedly underlies the Virginia rule--to avoid the prejudice that in conventional wisdom is assumed to afflict all insurance companies in jury trials--is clearly a legitimate one. But it has only to do with the conduct of litigation." [341] With regard to the countervailing federal policies, [342] the court found "an approach which abjures concealed [*77] or fictional issues and parties in interest." [343] As discussed above, there are very strong federal policy reasons for insisting that a lawsuit be brought in the name of the person who is in control of the action, [344] and the Riggs court was correct in declining to follow the Virginia rule that permitted the insurer to sue in the name of the insured.

Once the federal court determines that a state law provision permitting enforcement of a subrogated claim in the name of the insured alone is procedural, as many are, [345] the next step should not be to proceed directly to Federal Rule 19. Rather, the court should determine who--insured, insurer, or both--is entitled by the applicable substantive law to assert and control the claim. Making this determination often will be difficult. So long as states permit parties to assert subrogated claims in the name of the insured alone regardless of actual control, insurers will do so, and federal courts will have difficulty locating state court decisions directly addressing the parties' substantive rights in the claim. [346] When insurers invariably bring suit in the name of the insured, there may be no [*78] judicial decisions analyzing whether an insurer may enforce its claim directly against a third party. [347] Similarly, unless some conflict between insured and insurer has been litigated, there might be no decisions discussing whether the insured may enforce the entire claim. [348]

REV_00262560

In many situations, however, the answer will be more accessible. A workers' compensation act, for example, may expressly provide that the insurer has exclusive control of the claim although it is permitted to sue in the name of the insured. [349] The right to control also may be vested in the insurer by a subrogation clause in the policy [350] or by a subrogation agreement between the insured and the insurer. [351] When the federal court finds that an in [*79] surer, pursuant to its right under the substantive law, is in actual control of a suit brought in the name of the insured, the court should require substitution of the insurer as the named plaintiff pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) or Rule 17(a), the real party in interest rule. [352]

In some situations, the federal court may find that the substantive law in fact permits splitting--that it gives the insured and the insurer the right to control their own portions of the claim and that joinder is not required. [353] In such a situation, a suit brought only in the name of the insured for the entire claim still should not be permitted, not on the basis of federal compulsory joinder, but on the basis that the insured has failed to state a claim for relief with regard to that portion of the ad damnum clause in excess of the insured's interest. [354] The insured and the insurer then, of course, [*80] may choose to join as plaintiffs to pursue the claim in one lawsuit.

They may, however, choose to pursue separate actions. If only one of the actions is brought in a federal court, and it is brought prior to a judgment in the other party's action, [355] the question becomes whether the federal court is required to give effect to the state policy permitting separate lawsuits. It would seem that the state's decision to permit each party to control its own portion of the claim would not be impeded by a decision that the parties must do so in one action. If there were some federal rule that required compulsory joinder in this situation, the federal goal of avoiding multiple litigation would permit application of that rule despite a state procedural rule eschewing compulsory joinder. Because of Rule 19's limited scope, however, there is no such federal rule.

Happily, state law rarely creates this situation. In almost all cases, state law of subrogation permits only one lawsuit, either by requiring joinder or by vesting the right to control the entire claim in only one of the parties. If federal courts give effect to that state law, they will enforce the substantive law's policy intended to prevent multiple litigation and, at the same time, will further the important federal policies that require the party in control to appear as the named plaintiff.

In most instances, therefore, it is not necessary to broaden Rule 19 in order to achieve the goal of preventing multiple litigation in the insurance subrogation context. [356] State law designed for this [*81] purpose should be given effect in federal courts. Applying these principles to joinder of compensating insurers is not necessarily an easy task, but it achieves better results and is probably no more difficult than the task that federal courts have been performing of applying Rule 19 without regard to state law.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See generally June F. Entman, More Reasons for Abolishing Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 17(a): The Problem of the Proper Plaintiff and Insurance Subrogation, 68 N.C. L. Rev. 893 (1990); V. Woerner, Annotation, Proper Party Plaintiff, Under Real Party in Interest Statute, to Action Against Tortfeasor for Damage to Insured Property Where Insured Has Paid Part of Loss, 13 A.L.R.3d 140 (1967).

n2 See Jean F. Rydstrom, Annotation, Who Must Be Joined in Action as Person "Needed for Just Adjudication" Under Rule 19(a), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 22 A.L.R. Fed. 765, 809-11 (1975) (listing decisions requiring joinder of insurer under Rule 19); see infra parts IV.B.2, V.C-D.

n3 See, e.g., Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 485 F.2d 78, 84-85

REV_00262561

(4th Cir. 1973) (finding an "overlap" between Rules 17(a) and 19), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 935 (1974); Carpetland, U.S.A. v. J.L. Adler Roofing, Inc., 107 F.R.D. 357, 359-60 (N.D. Ill. 1985) (holding that Rule 17(a) is "an independent authority for compulsory joinder" in addition to Rule 19(a)). The issue is presented in several ways: a defendant's motion either to dismiss for failure to name the real party in interest under Rule 17(a), or for failure to join an indispensable party under Rule 19, or a motion to compel joinder under Rule 19.

n4 See, e.g., Capitol Fuels, Inc. v. Clark Equip. Co., 342 S.E.2d 245, 251 (W. Va. 1986) (holding that joinder of a partially subrogated insurer as a real party in interest under Rule 17 (a) in a suit brought by the insured for the total loss may not be compelled under Rule 19(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure). In many states, however, the issue has been resolved by specific provisions in statutes or rules of civil procedure. See Ala. R. Civ. P. 17 (a); Ind. R. Trial P. 19(e)(3); La. Code Civ. Proc. Ann. art. 697 (West 1960); Me. R. Civ. P. 17; Mass. R. Civ. P. 17(a); Miss. R. Civ. P. 17(b); N.Y. Civ. Prac. L. & R. 1004 (McKinney 1976); Ohio R. Civ. P. 19(A)(3); Pa. R. Civ. P. 2002(d); R.I. R. Civ. P. 17(a); Tenn. R. Civ. P. 17.01; Vt. R. Civ. P. 17(a); Va. Code Ann. section 38.2-207 (Michie 1994); Wis. R. Civ. P. 803.03(2).

n5 See infra note 308.

n6 See, e.g., Potomac Elec. Power Co. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 54 F.R.D. 486, 492 (D. Md. 1972) (defendants argued that only through joinder of the insurer could defendants be assured that principles of res judicata would operate to protect them from a subsequent suit by the insurer on the same claim).

n7 See, e.g., Prestenback v. Employers' Ins. Co., 47 F.R.D. 163, 165 (E.D. La. 1969) ("In these days of exploding dockets, we welcome the opportunity to explore the pragmatical aspects of joinder problems as dictated by amended F.R.C.P. 19."); infra parts V.C-D.

n8 See, e.g., Gas Serv. Co. v. Hunt, 183 F.2d 417, 419 (10th Cir. 1950) (finding joinder a procedural issue governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure); see infra part VII.

n9 See infra part II.

n10 See infra part VII.

n11 See infra part IV.B.1.

n12 Entman, supra note 1.

n13 See Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr., Indispensable Party: The Historical Origin of a Procedural Phantom, 61 Colum. L. Rev. 1254, 1289 (1961) (arguing that the indefensible result of the indispensable party rule is to deprive plaintiff of a perfectly valid remedy).

n14 338 U.S. 366 (1949).

n15 See Robert G. Bone, Mapping the Boundaries of a Dispute: Conceptions of Ideal Lawsuit Structure from the Field Code to the Federal Rules, 89 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 114 (1989) (concluding that the historic function of compulsory joinder has been lost); Richard D. Freer, Avoiding Duplicative Litigation: Rethinking Plaintiff Autonomy and the Court's Role in Defining the Litigative Unit, 50 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 809, 813 (1989) [hereinafter Freer, Avoiding Duplicative Litigation] (advocating expanding the federal courts' power to order joinder for the express purpose of avoiding duplicative litigation); Richard D. Freer, Rethinking Compulsory Joinder: A Proposal to Restructure Federal Rule 19, 60 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1061, 1064 (1985) [hereinafter Freer, Rethinking Compulsory Joinder] (proposing statutory authorization of minimal diversity, nationwide service of process and relaxed venue restrictions for compulsory joinder of some absentees); Carl Tobias, Rule 19 and the Public Rights Exception to Party Joinder, 65 N.C. L. Rev. 745, 747 (1987) (arguing that there should be no absolute "public rights" exception to compulsory joinder).

REV_00262562

n16 See Strate v. Niagara Mach. & Tool Works, 160 F. Supp. 296, 299 (S.D. Ind. 1958) (holding that because insurer has no right of action against third party, it is not subrogated, although it has a lien on insured's recovery).

n17 Robert E. Keeton & Alan I. Widiss, Insurance Law section 3.10(a) (1988); see Entman, supra note 1, at 908-11 ("An insurer's subrogation rights may be judicially created, may derive from the insurance policy or a settlement with the insured, or may be provided by legislation."); Spencer L. Kimball & Don A. Davis, The Extension of Insurance Subrogation, 60 Mich. L. Rev. 841, 844 (1962) (discussing "where the law draws the line between policies to which legal subrogation applies and those to which it does not").

n18 See, e.g., Cleaves v. DeLauder, 302 F. Supp. 36, 38 (N.D. W. Va. 1969) (finding that under West Virginia law, partially compensating automobile collision insurer's right is only a contingent interest in the litigation; insurer could not maintain an action in its own name); Farmers Ins. Co. v. Effertz, 795 S.W.2d 424, 426 (Mo. Ct. App. 1990) (if insurer's rights arise by operation of law, without assignment from the insured, "legal title remains in the insured and he retains the exclusive right to bring the suit" (quoting State Farm Mut. Ins. Co. v. Jessee, 523 S.W.2d 832, 834 (Mo. Ct. App. 1975))); 2A Arthur Larson, The Law of Workmen's Compensation section 74.14 (1993) (identifying workers' compensation schemes in which the employee has the exclusive right to bring suit for a specified period of time).

When the insured otherwise has control of the claim, but fails or refuses to assert it, some jurisdictions then permit the insurer to bring the claim. See, e.g., City of New York Ins. Co. v. Tice, 152 P.2d 836, 842 (Kan. 1944) (insured should sue for itself and as trustee for the insurer, but if the insured refuses to sue, "justice requires that the insurer be permitted to bring action"). There do not appear to be any situations in which an insured who has received total compensation retains control of the claim.

n19 The insurer may be entitled to a lien on the insured's recovery or to intervene in the action to protect its interest in any judgment awarded. See, e.g., Wright v. Schebler Co., 37 F.R.D. 319, 321 (S.D. Iowa 1965) (stating that employer becomes statutory lienholder to the extent of its claim in employee's recovery); see also infra note 249 (discussing subject matter jurisdiction limitations upon insurer's intervention).

n20 See 2A Larson, supra note 18, sections 74.14-74.15 (identifying workers' compensation acts that establish a sequence in which either the employee or the insurer first has the exclusive right to bring suit against a third party, and then, after a specified time, the other has the exclusive right). Subrogation clauses in insurance policies typically confer upon the insurer the right to control the claim. For example, the "Business Auto Coverage Form (1985)" provides:

5. TRANSFER OF RIGHTS OF RECOVERY AGAINST OTHERS TO US

If any person or organization to or for whom we make payment under this Coverage Form has rights to recover damages from another, those rights are transferred to us. That person or organization must do everything necessary to secure our rights and must do nothing after "accident" or "loss" to impair them.

Keeton & Widiss, supra note 17, app. G at 1113. See also Tucson Elec. Power Co. v. Bailey Controls Co., 145 F.R.D. 102, 103 (D. Ariz. 1992) (loan receipt agreement provided that litigation against third party was to be brought in insured's name and maintained "at the expense of and under the exclusive direction and control of" the insurance company).

REV_00262563

When the insurer, however, because of a conflict of interest, is not likely to protect the insured's interest, a court may permit the insured to bring and control his own suit. See, e.g., Czaplicki v. The Hoegh Silvercloud, 351 U.S. 525, 532 (1956) (subrogated insurer was also defendant's liability insurer). But see Rodriguez v. Compass Shipping Co., 451 U.S. 596, 603 (1981) (holding that injured longshoremen, who offered no excuse for their delay, could not prosecute personal injury action against third party after right to recover had been assigned to employer by terms of Longshore Act, and it was not material that employers failed to pursue the assigned claims).

n21 See, e.g., Arkwright-Boston Mfrs. Mut. Ins. Co. v. City of New York, 762 F.2d 205, 209 (2d Cir. 1985) (determining that claim by insured for its deductible amount and claim by insurer for amount paid to insured are "separate and distinct, and do not constitute unlawful splitting under New York law"); 2A Larson, supra note 18, section 74.13 (discussing cases where insurer's action against tortfeasor was determined independent of insured's action). Larson discusses cases construing workers' compensation statutes to "give a right to the employer [or its insurer] without taking anything away from the employee, with the result that the subrogation or assignment has the effect of creating parallel rights of action which may be asserted by either employer or employee." 2B Arthur Larson, The Law of Workmen's Compensation section 75.42, at 14-699 (1994).

n22 See, e.g., Miss. R. Civ. P. 17(b) ("If the subrogor still has a pecuniary interest in the claim the action shall be brought in the names of the subrogor and the subrogee."); Lindsey v. Samoluk, 219 S.E.2d 464, 466 (Ga. Ct. App. 1975) (insured and partially compensating insurer each "has a cause of action and may sue by joining the other part owner"), rev'd on other grounds, 223 S.E.2d 147 (Ga. 1976); 2B Larson, supra note 21, section 75.42, at 14-699 n.21.

n23 See, e.g., Joyner v. F & B Enters., Inc., 448 F.2d 1185, 1187-88 (D.C. Cir. 1971) (noting that under the Longshore Act, a consequence of the employee's bringing suit is that the compensating insurer has no substantive right against the tortfeasor); Klick v. American Mut. Ins. Co., 80 F.R.D. 711, 712 (E.D. Wis. 1978) (describing Wisconsin workers' compensation act, which provided that when either the employee or the insurer brings suit alone, the other is bound by the judgment if given notice of the action).

n24 33 U.S.C. section 933(h) (1988).

n25 See Holland v. Sea-Land Serv. Inc., 655 F.2d 556, 558-59 (4th Cir. 1981) (concluding that although worker was engaged in maritime employment for purposes of compensation under the Longshore Act, his claim against third party arose under state law), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 919 (1982); Ward v. Norfolk Shipbuilding & Drydock Corp., 770 F. Supp. 1118, 1121 (E.D. Va. 1991) (finding that when employee covered by Longshore Act was injured on navigable waters, his claim against third party arose from federal maritime law, not from either state law or the Longshore Act). See also Cook v. Stuples, 74 F.R.D. 370, 371-72 (W.D. Okla. 1976) (noting that in plaintiff's diversity action for negligence of defendant in automobile accident, the Medical Care Recovery Act, 42 U.S.C. section 2651, governed recovery by the United States for medical care it furnished the plaintiff).

n26 See, e.g., Koepp v. Northwest Freight Lines, 10 F.R.D. 524, 526 (D. Minn. 1950) (holding that the Wisconsin employee, injured in Minnesota, has the right to recover against the tortfeasor under Minnesota law, but that the Wisconsin insurer's right to be joined as party plaintiff was determined by Wisconsin law).

n27 Fed. R. Civ. P. 17(a) provides:

Every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. An executor, illustrate how Rule 17(a) has been widely misunderstood and misapplied, and why that rule should be abolished. [12] Part II of this article summarizes the variety found in the substantive law of subrogation and how Rule 17(a) has failed as a mechanism for enforcing that law. Similarly, from its very beginnings compulsory party joinder doctrine has been ill-conceived and frequently has obscured and frustrated, rather than supported, the substantive law. [13] The problems are well-illustrated by examining the forms that compulsory joinder rules have taken over time and how each of these forms has been applied to the issue of the proper party plaintiff in cases involving compensating insurers.

REV_00262564

Part III describes the two different practices governing the naming of subrogated insurers as parties that applied in law and equity prior to merger, and the difficulties with the assimilation of these doctrines into the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The law courts adopted "use practice," the naming of only the insured as the plaintiff in all cases. "Use practice" was an acknowledged fiction that served little purpose except to provide an easy answer and to protect insurance companies, in every case, from having their presence disclosed to the trier of fact. Pre-merger equity, on the other hand, applied its compulsory joinder doctrines of "necessary" and "indispensable" parties, which formed the basis for the original version of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19, to determine whether compensating insurers must be named as plaintiffs.

Part IV describes how the labelling of insurers as "necessary" parties became fixed in federal practice in the United States Supreme Court's 1949 opinion in United States v. Aetna Casualty & [*6] Surety Co., [14] and how the legacy of Aetna has been a widespread failure of federal courts to give proper effect to the substantive law of subrogation. Part V describes the 1966 amendment of Rule 19, which was intended to free compulsory joinder doctrine from the jurisprudence of labels and to redirect judicial attention to basing compulsory joinder upon the substantive rights of the parties. The amended rule, however, has also failed in this endeavor. While some federal courts have continued to follow the Aetna opinion after the 1966 amendment, others have misconstrued amended Rule 19 in a variety of ways and continue to treat all compensating insurers alike without regard to their actual relation to the lawsuit.

When Rule 19 is properly understood, it does not mandate joinder of compensating insurers, even those that are partially subrogated to the plaintiff's claim. Whether Rule 19 or some other rule should require joinder, is the subject of Part VI, which examines the problem of multiple litigation, the more significant problem of non-parties in control of lawsuits, and whether the problem of jury prejudice nonetheless militates against joinder.

Several commentators have identified weaknesses in Rule 19 and modern compulsory party joinder doctrine and have proposed improvements in drafting and interpretation designed to broaden the rule's effect. [15] Part VII concludes, however, that there is no need in many cases to involve federal compulsory party joinder doctrines to achieve joinder of compensating insurers when that joinder should be required. The problems that federal courts have sought to solve through Rule 19 have been, for the most part, adequately addressed in the substantive law of insurance. If the courts would simply give that law its proper application, fair results would be achieved and the debate over the meaning of Rule 19 could be [*7] ended, at least in the context of compensating insurers.

II. The Relationship Between Insurance Subrogation and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

When an insurer has the right to bring and control a claim against a third party who has caused some payment by the insurer to the insured, the insurer is said to be subrogated to the insured's claim. Compensating insurers may be entitled, however, only to reimbursement from proceeds the insured recovers from third parties. When the insurer has only a claim administrator, guardian, bailee, trustee of an express trust, a party with whom or in whose name a contract has been made for the benefit of another, or a party authorized by statute may sue in that person's own name without joining the party for whose benefit the action is brought; and when a statute of the United States so provides, an action for the use or benefit of another shall be brought in the name of the United States. No action shall be dismissed on the ground that it is not prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest until a reasonable time has been allowed after objection for ratification of commencement of the action by, or joinder or substitution of, the real party in interest; and such ratification, joinder, or substitution shall have the same effect as if the action had been commenced in the name of the real party in interest.

REV_00262538

n28 See Charles E. Clark, Handbook of the Law of Code Pleading section 22, at 160 (2d ed. 1947) (defining the real party in interest as he who by substantive law has the right of action); 6A Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure section 1543, at 334 (2d ed. 1990) (defining real party in interest as the "person who, according to the governing substantive law, is entitled to enforce the right"); John E. Kennedy, Federal Rule 17(a): Will the Real Party in Interest Please Stand?, 51 Minn. L. Rev. 675, 678 (1967) ("Thus the real party is the one with legal power to control the lawsuit and may be different from the person who will ultimately be benefited if the suit is successful."); Lewis M. Simes, The Real Party in Interest, 10 Ky. L.J. 60, 61 (1921) ("The real party in interest is the one to whom the substantive law of the case gives the right to bring and control the action."). See also Entman, supra note 1, at 898-902 (discussing origins of real party in interest rule).

n29 See Entman, supra note 1, at 900-01 & n.41 (defining the real party in interest as determined by who has the right to assert and control the claim).

n30 Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) provides in pertinent part:

Every defense, in law or fact, to a claim for relief in any pleading . . . shall be asserted in the responsive pleading thereto if one is required, except that the following defenses may at the option of the pleader be made by motion: . . . (6) failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

n31 The function of Rule 17(a) is virtually identical to the function of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. Both rules require that the federal court apply state law when, as is often the case, state law governs the right of the compensated insured and the compensating insurer to bring and control an action against a third party. See Entman, supra note 1, at 901 (comparing Rule 12(b)(6) with Rule 17(a)).

n32 This result has widely, but not universally, been obtained in cases of full subrogation, in which the insured does not retain even a pecuniary interest in the claim. See United States v. Aetna Casualty & Sur. Co., 338 U.S. 366, 380-81 (1949) (stating that subrogee who has paid entire loss suffered is the only real party in interest); V. Woerner, Annotation, Proper Party Plaintiff, Under Real Party in Interest Statute, to Action Against Tortfeasor for Damage to Insured Property Where Loss is Entirely Covered by Insurance, 13 A.L.R.3d 229 (1967).

n33 See Entman, supra note 1, at 913-22 (discussing misapplication of real party in interest rule).

n34 See, e.g., Public Serv. Co. of Okla. v. Black & Veatch, 467 F.2d 1143 (10th Cir. 1972) (discussed infra part V.B.); Blacks v. Mosley Mach. Co., 57 F.R.D. 503, 506 (E.D. Pa. 1972)

REV_00262565

(discussed infra note 208).

n35 See U-Haul Int'l, Inc. v. Jartran, Inc., 793 F.2d 1034, 1038 (9th Cir. 1986) ("Although the parties have addressed this problem solely in the context of Fed. R. Civ. P. 17, we also must consider Fed. R. Civ. P. 19 . . . . Fed. R. Civ. P. 17 governs only the right of plaintiff to bring the suit. It is Fed. R. Civ. P. 19 that tells us whether the appropriate parties are before the court."); Tucson Elec. Power Co. v. Bailey Controls Co., 145 F.R.D. 102, 104 (D. Ariz. 1992) (following U-Haul); Whitcomb v. Ford Motor Co., 79 F.R.D. 244, 245 (M.D. Pa. 1978) (holding that Rule 19 analysis, not Rule 17(a), should be used to decide joinder issue); Kint v. Terrain King Corp., 79 F.R.D. 10, 11 n.2 (M.D. Pa. 1977) (construing motion as one under Rule 19 notwithstanding defendant's ostensible reliance upon Rule 17, and declining to reach any Rule 17 issues). See also 6A Wright et al., supra note 28, section 1543, at 339-40 ("The question of who should or may be joined in the action must be determined under Rule 19 and Rule 20 rather than Rule 17(a)."); Kennedy, supra note 28, at 680 ("Rule 17(a) should not be construed to compel joinder without reference to Rule 19.").

n36 See infra text accompanying note 149.

n37 See, e.g., Public Serv. Co., 467 F.2d at 1143 (discussed infra text accompanying notes 159-70).

n38 See discussion infra parts VI.B & VII.

n39 338 U.S. 366 (1949) (discussed infra part IV.A).

n40 See infra part III.A.

n41 See infra part III.B.

n42 Walter W. Cook, Alienability of Choses in Action, 29 Harv. L. Rev. 816, 830 (1916).

n43 Subrogation originated in equity from principles of unjust enrichment, I George E. Palmer, The Law of Restitution section 1.5(b) (1978); see also 2 John N. Pomeroy, Jr., Equitable Remedies sections 921-22 (1905) (discussing parties entitled to subrogation and stating that "subrogation is purely an equitable right") (citation omitted).

n44 Mobile & Montgomery Ry. v. Jurey, 111 U.S. 584, 594 (1884) (holding that insurer's payment for a total loss works as an equitable assignment); Charles E. Clark & Robert M. Hutchins, The Real Party in Interest, 34 Yale L.J. 259, 270 n.79 (1925) (stating that subrogation may be called an equitable assignment). At one time it was common for there to be an actual assignment to the insurer upon its payment to the insured, so that it made little difference whether the insured's rights were considered from the standpoint of assignment or subrogation. Thomas E. Atkinson, The Real Party in Interest Rule: A Plea for Its Abolition, 32 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 926, 943 (1957).

n45 See Mandeville v. Welch, 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) 277, 283 (1820) (discussing assignment); Hart v. Western R.R., 54 Mass. (13 Met.) 99, 107 (1847) (discussing subrogation).

n46 Hart, 54 Mass. (13 Met.) at 108 ("A recovery against the underwriter is no bar to a suit by the assured against the party primarily liable[.]"). The principle that a personal injury claimant's recovery is not reduced by the amount of compensation received from sources independent of the tortfeasor came to be known as the "collateral source rule." See Rixmann v. Somerset Pub. Sch., 266 N.W.2d 326, 329-32 (Wis. 1978) (discussing the relationship between subrogation and the collateral source rule).

n47 See, e.g., Peoria Marine & Fire Ins. Co. v. Frost, 37 Ill. 333, 336 (1865). The court stated:

When an injury is done to property, the remedy must be sought in the courts of common law, by some person who has an estate in the property, legal or equitable, which the law recognizes. But the insurance company had no estate or ownership in this property of any kind whatever.

See also Pittsburgh, C.C. & St. L. Ry. v. Home Ins. Co., 108 N.E. 525, 529 (1915). This court stated:

Common-law pleading looked to the entire legal interest, and did not directly recognize the beneficial interest or equitable right . . . . In the view of common-law procedure, he who was clothed with this legal title had the exclusive right of action, although the entire beneficial interest, with the equitable title, was in someone else.

See generally Bone, supra note 15, at 25 (discussing how common law procedure was an obstacle to common law courts' attempts to enforce rights formerly recognized only in equity).

n48 Aetna Ins. Co. v. Hannibal & St. J.R., 1 F. Cas. 207, 208 (C.C.E.D. Mo. 1874) (No. 96) ("The wrongful act was single and indivisible, and gives rise to but one liability.").

n49 Mandeville, 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) at 288-89 (discussing partial assignments). In Peoria Marine, 37 Ill. at 337, the court stated:

It very often happens that valuable property is insured in several companies at the same time. If the property is burned through the carelessness of some third person, can such person be liable to as many suits as there are insurances? Is there more than one cause of action against him? And can that be indefinitely divided? . . . It is still [the defendant's] right to have that loss adjusted in a single suit.

n50 Hall & Long v. Railroad Cos., 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 367, 370 (1871) ("It has often been ruled that an insurer, who has paid a loss, may use the name of the assured in an action to obtain redress from the carrier whose failure of duty caused the loss."); Mandeville, 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) at 285 (determining that assignee can sue only in the name of assignor); Hannibal & St. J.R., 1 F. Cas. at 208 ("The suit, though for the use of the insurer, must be in the name of the person whose property was destroyed."); Hart, 54 Mass. (13 Met.) at 108 (stating that insurer can sue in the name of the insured); Clark, supra note 28, section 21, at 157 (stating that one having an equitable interest could sue only in the name of the person having legal title).

n51 Bone, supra note 15, at 20 n.41 (describing how common law judges adopted fictions to assimilate new disputes into the existing, seemingly inflexible, forms of action).

n52 See, e.g., Peoria Marine, 37 Ill. at 338 ("The insurance company will, however, be at liberty to bring a suit in the name of [the insured], to its use, indemnifying them, if they require it, against the costs, and this suit will be under the control of the company."); Benjamin J. Shipman, Handbook of Common Law Pleading, sections 27-29 (2d ed. 1895) (stating that use plaintiff must give indemnity for costs to holder of legal interest in whose name action must be brought).

REV_00262567

n53 See, e.g., Rockingham Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Bosher, 39 Me. 253, 255 (1855) (finding that the owner, having recovered payment from the underwriter, stands as trustee); Hart, 54 Mass. (13 Met.) at 108 ("After a payment by the insurer . . . the assured becomes trustee for the insurer[.]"); Gales v. Hailman, 11 Pa. 515, 521 (1849) ("The shipper has sued on the contract of bailment, not only in his own right for the unpaid balance due to himself, but as a trustee for what has been paid by the insurer in ease of the carrier[.]").

n54 In Hart, 54 Mass. (13 Met.) at 107, the court said that "if the trust consists in an equitable liability to pay money, it will be recognized and enforced in a suit at law."

n55 Restatement (Second) of Trusts sections 82, 192 (1959) (trustee has sole responsibility for determining whether to sue, to settle, etc.); 4 Austin W. Scott, Law of Trusts section 282, at 25-29 (4th ed. 1989) (commenting that in most cases trustee has exclusive authority to sue third parties who injure the beneficiary's interest in the trust). Nonetheless, the notion of insured-subrogor as trustee--and, therefore, that the insured is the only proper plaintiff in a suit to recover a subrogated claim--has continued to reverberate in judicial and legislative treatment of the problem. See Atkinson, supra note 44, at 946 (criticizing New York legislative treatment of a subrogor in same category as a trustee). For a description and criticism of modern decisions that use the trustee analogy to hold that joinder of a subrogated insurer, otherwise required, is excused by Rule 17(a)'s provision that trustees may sue in their own names without joining beneficial parties, see Entman, supra note 1, at 940-42.

n56 See Gales, 11 Pa. at 520-22. The court held:

The insurer, who in this case bore a part of [the loss] for [the carrier], has a right to be reimbursed, and there must be a remedy of some sort to enforce it . . . . In this case, the insurer and the shipper could not sever; and the action was well brought, respectively for the use of each, in the name of him who had the legal title.

See also Mobile & Montgomery Ry. v. Jurey, 111 U.S. 584, 594-95 (1884) (holding that the use of only the insured's name in the complaint was sufficient) (citing Gales, 11 Pa. 515 and Hall & Long v. Railroad Cos., 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 367 (1871)); Hall & Long, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) at 371, 373 (holding that an insurer may file suit in the name of the insured against a carrier who was responsible for the loss) (citing Gales, 11 Pa. at 515). See generally, G.J. Couch, Annotation, Proper Party Plaintiff to Action Against Tort-Feasor for Damage to Insured Property Where Insurer is Entitled to Subrogation to Extent of Loss Paid by It, 96 A.L.R. 864, 865-73 (1935) (noting both federal and state cases).

n57 See Clark, supra note 28, section 24, at 174-79 (criticizing the continuation of use practice as inconsistent with the codes' real party in interest rule). Under code pleading, courts continued to use the trustee analogy as a rationale for suit in the name of the insured alone, noting that the real party in interest rule permitted the trustee of an express trust to sue alone without joining the beneficiaries. The analogy, however, was often inconsistent with the reality of the relationship between the insured and the insurer. For example, in Peoples Oil & Fertilizer Co. v. Charleston & W.C. Ry., 83 S.C. 530 (1909), the partially compensated insured gave each of three compensating insurers a subrogation receipt that assigned its right of action, to the extent of payment received, to the insurer and authorized the insurer "to sue, compromise or settle in our names, or otherwise . . . ." Id. at 535. The court held that "notwithstanding the words of assignment . . . plaintiff [the insured] still has legal title to the cause of action, subject to the equitable right of subrogation" and can sue alone as trustee of an express trust. Id. at 536. But see Pratt v. Radford, 8 N.W. 606, 607 (Wis. 1881) (arguing that the trust created by subrogation arises by implication of law and is, therefore, not an express trust within the meaning of the real party in interest rule).

REV_00262568

n58 See, e.g., Van Wie v. United States, 77 F. Supp. 22, 33 (N.D. Iowa 1948) ("In cases of partial subrogation the action could be maintained by the insured in his own name for the entire loss."); Grace v. United States, 76 F. Supp. 174, 178 (D. Md. 1948) ("In general . . . where the insurer has paid less than the whole loss the suit must be brought in the name of the person who has sustained the damage but with the notation that suit is also for the use and benefit of the insurer."); Gray v. United States, 77 F. Supp. 869, 871 (D. Mass. 1948) (holding that insurer-subrogee may not sue tortfeasor in its own name but that insured is entitled to sue for entire loss and holds sum paid to him by the insurer as trustee), rev'd sub nom. State Farm Mut. Liab. Ins. Co. v. United States, 172 F.2d 737 (1st Cir. 1949); Dayton Veneer & Lumber Mills v. Cincinnati, N.O. & T.P. Ry., 1 F.R.D. 444, 445 (E.D. Tenn. 1940) (denying motion to dismiss suit by property owner although he had collected insurance for the damage). See generally, M.L.C., Annotation, Proper Party Plaintiff to Action Against Tort-Feasor for Damage to Insured Property Where Insurer is Entitled to Subrogation to Extent of Loss Paid by It, 157 A.L.R. 1242 (1945) [hereinafter Annotation, Proper Party Plaintiffs] (noting both federal and state cases).

n59 In Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Bremner, 25 F.2d 75 (8th Cir. 1928), separate suits were filed, one by the insured for his personal injuries and unreimbursed property damages, the other by the insurer for its subrogation interest. Holding that a judgment against the defendant in the insured's action barred the suit by the insurer, the court stated that "the right of action remains in the insured for the entire loss, the insured becoming a trustee for the insurer . . . . . " Id. at 76. In Subscribers at Casualty Reciprocal Exch. v. Kansas City Pub. Serv. Co., 91 S.W.2d 227 (Mo. Ct. App. 1936), overruled by Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Co. v. Anderson, 360 S.W.2d 314, 321 (Mo. Ct. App. 1962), an insurer, pursuant to an insurance policy with a $ 50 deductible, paid its insured $ 567.55 for damage to the insured's automobile and notified the defendant of its claim for subrogation. The insured, however, gave the tortfeasor a release of all claims in exchange for $ 50. The court affirmed dismissal of the insurer's suit against the tortfeasor, citing the rule that where subrogation is partial, only the insured may sue. Subscribers at Casualty Reciprocal Exch., 91 S.W.2d at 231. But see Hart v. Western R.R., 54 Mass. (13 Met.) 99, 108 (1847) (refusing to permit the insured's release of the defendant to defeat the insurer's right to reimbursement).

n60 In Kennebec Coal & Ice Co. v. Wilmington & N.R.R., 2 Chester County Rep. 29 (Pa. C.P. 1883), for example, an insured ice company, whose premises had been destroyed by fire, refused to sue or to authorize its compensating insurers to sue in its name, apparently because the company was dependent upon the defendant railroad company for its supplies of ice. The court held that under such circumstances the insurers have a right to institute suit in the name of the insured without its consent. Id. at 31-32. See also Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia v. Wells, 94 A. 619, 620 (N.J. 1915) (holding that partially subrogated insurer may sue in insured's name even without insured's consent when insured has given release to defendant; insured's release to defendant is no defense to insurer's claim); Hart, 54 Mass. (13 Met.) at 108 (holding same as Wells, 94 A. at 620).

n61 See Bone, supra note 15, at 22 ("The common law's restrictive party and cause of action joinder rules, for example, stood as obstacles to the adjudication of all pieces of a complex dispute in one proceeding when consolidated adjudication was necessary in order to fashion the best remedy.").

n62 United States v. Aetna Casualty & Sur. Co., 338 U.S. 366, 371-72 & n.8, 381 (1949) (noting, in particular, Rule 17(a)); see infra part IV.

n63 See infra part VI.A.2. See also Entman, supra note 1, at 905-08, 942-46 (discussing judicial use of ratification in Rule 17(a) analysis); Steven D. Plissey, Note, Compulsory Joinder of Partial Subrogees: Implications of the Alaska Rule, 1 Alaska L. Rev. 171, 177 (1984) ("The amended version of Rule 17 contains a provision for ratification that actually encourages the device of use plaintiffs.").

REV_00262569

n64 See Ind. R. Trial P. 19(e)(3); Me. R. Civ. P. 17(c); Mass. R. Civ. P. 17(a); N.Y. Civ. Prac. L. & R. 1004 (McKinney 1976); Pa. R. Civ. P. 2002(d); R.I. R. Civ. P. 17(a); Tenn. R. Civ. P. 17.01; Vt. R. Civ. P. 17(a); Va. Code Ann. section 38.2-207 (Michie 1994); Catalfano v. Higgins, 188 A.2d 357 (Del. 1962); Holyoke Mut. Ins. Co. v. Concrete Equip., 394 So.2d 193 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1981); Montello Shoe Co. v. Suncook Indus., 26 A.2d 676 (N.H. 1942). Provisions permitting the insurer to control the action but to sue in the name of the insured also appear in some workers' compensation statutes. See, e.g., Ill. Ann. Stat. ch. 820, para. 305/5(b) (Smith-Hurd 1993). Some states permit suit in the name of the insured alone when there has been partial, but not total, subrogation. See, e.g., Scheibel v. Groeteka, 538 N.E.2d 1236, 1253 (Ill. App. Ct. 1989) ("If an insured plaintiff has even a de minimis pecuniary interest in the lawsuit, that interest is sufficient to allow a subrogation action to be maintained in plaintiff's name.") (citation omitted). In addition, other states permit insurers to use loan receipt agreements to avoid suing in their own names while in fact controlling the litigation. See Entman, supra note 1, at 925-31 (discussing the use of loan receipts by insurers to control litigation); E. Michael Johnson, Note, The Real Party Under Rule 17(a): The Loan Receipt and Insurers' Subrogation Revisited, 74 Minn. L. Rev. 1107 (1990); V. Woerner, Annotation, Insurance: Validity and Effect of Loan Receipt or Agreement Between Insured and Insurer for a Loan Repayable to Extent of Insured's Recovery from Another, 13 A.L.R.3d 42 (1967).

n65 See generally Stephen N. Subrin, How Equity Conquered Common Law: The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in Historical Perspective, 135 U. Pa. L. Rev. 909, 922 (1987) ("The underlying philosophy of, and procedural choices embodied in, the Federal Rules were almost universally drawn from equity rather than common law.").

n66 Equity courts permitted assignees and subrogees, even those not entitled to the entire claim, to sue in their own names. Saint Louis Ry. v. Commercial Union Ins. Co., 139 U.S. 223, 235 (1891). This equity practice came to be known as the "real party in interest rule," in contrast to the law courts' essentially fictitious "use" or "name" practice. Atkinson, supra note 44, at 927; Entman, supra note 1, at 899-901. Equity went so far as to find the interest of the assignor or subrogor of a fully assigned claim so nebulous that only the assignee or subrogee could enforce the claim. Clark & Hutchins, supra note 44, at 260.

n67 Clark, supra note 28, section 56, at 348-50 (discussing the limits the common law placed on joinder of parties, as in contract and property damage cases); Bone, supra note 15, at 7 (describing common-law procedure as "rights-centered," assuming that a lawsuit involved only one right or obligation).

n68 Clark, supra note 28, section 56, at 353-57 (discussing compulsory joinder, permissive joinder, nonjoinder and misjoinder in equity); Bone, supra note 15, at 34 (discussing Pomeroy's justification of equity jurisdiction to "render a decree ideally suited to the dispute as a whole").

n69 Hazard, supra note 13, at 1255; Benjamin Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee: 1966 Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (I), 81 Harv. L. Rev. 356, 359 (1967) (emphasizing, however, that complete joinder was not an absolute rule; courts would proceed with a case if it were impossible or impractical to join an "interested party"); John W. Reed, Compulsory Joiner of Parties in Civil Actions, 55 Mich. L. Rev. 327, 331-32 (1957).

n70 David W. Louisell et al., Cases and Materials on Pleading and Procedure 737 (6th ed. 1989); Charles A. Wright, The Law of Federal Courts section 70 (4th ed. 1983); Bone, supra note 15, at 62-66 (discussing the desire to protect absent parties); Kaplan, supra note 69, at 365 (discussing possibility of prejudice to absent parties as well as the exposure of defendants to "double" liability); Reed, supra note 69, at 330; Note, Indispensable Parties in the Federal Courts, 65 Harv. L. Rev. 1050 (1952).

REV_00262570

n71 Bone, supra note 15, at 63; Hazard, supra note 13, at 1254-55; Kaplan, supra note 69, at 358-59.

n72 Hazard, supra note 13, at 1254-56 (discussing development of indispensable party concept). See generally Bone, supra note 15, at 62-66 (outlining development of equity joinder rules).

The nomenclature used to describe the two classes of parties--those who should be joined but whose joinder can be excused, and those without whom the court cannot proceed--has not been uniform and, consequently, has generated considerable confusion. See Bone, supra note 15, at 62 ("Semantic confusion contributed to the opacity of equity party doctrine."); Reed, supra note 69, at 328-30 (discussing the role of semantics in "diversity of results in factually similar cases"). Sometimes the terms "conditionally necessary" and "contingently necessary" are used. Howard P. Fink, Indispensable Parties and the Proposed Amendment to Federal Rule 19, 74 Yale L.J. 403, 422-25 (1965) (describing the evolution of the terms and their usage); Note, Developments in the Law--Multiparty Litigation in the Federal Courts, 71 Harv. L. Rev. 874, 879 n.16 (1958) [hereinafter Note, Multiparty Litigation] (stating that "necessary" has been used to refer to both the "indispensable" and the "conditionally necessary" classifications).

n73 Wright, supra note 70, section 70 at 458. See also Jack H. Friedenthal et al., Civil Procedure section 6.5, at 335-36 (1985) (describing the difficulty of the distinction between "indispensable" and "necessary" parties).

n74 58 U.S. (17 How.) 130 (1854).

n75 Id. at 139. There are three classes of parties to a bill in equity:

1. Formal parties. 2. Persons having an interest in the controversy, and who ought to be made parties, in order that the court may act on that rule which requires it to decide on, and finally determine the entire controversy, and do complete justice, by adjusting all the rights involved in it. These persons are commonly termed necessary parties; but if their interests are separable from those of the parties before the court, so that the court can proceed to a decree, and do complete and final justice, without affecting other persons not before the court, the latter are not indispensable parties. 3. Persons who not only have an interest in the controversy, but an interest of such a nature that a final decree cannot be made without either affecting that interest, or leaving the controversy in such a condition that its final termination may be wholly inconsistent with equity and good conscience.

Id.

n76 The Code of Civil Procedure in New York, passed in 1848, is commonly "referred to as the 'Field Code' for David Dudley Field (1805-94), the renowned New York practitioner who spearheaded the reform effort to abolish[] the existing forms of action and mandate[] that there be 'but one form of action'." Richard L. Marcus et al., Civil Procedure: A Modern Approach 113 (1989). Field was the principal drafter of the First Report of New York Commissioners on Practice and Pleading, from which the 1848 New York Code of Civil Procedure was derived. More than half of the states eventually adopted codes of civil procedure based on the Field Code. Clark, supra note 28, at 22, 24.

n77 First Report of New York Commissioners on Practice and Pleadings section 99 (1848). According to Clark, from this provision, "it is evident that the codes thus adopt the equity rule that all whose interests would be directly affected by the decree are necessary parties, and such is the result of the decisions." Clark, supra note 28, at 358-59. Field Code section 99 provided in full:

Of the parties to the action, those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants; but if the consent of any one, who should have been joined as plaintiff, cannot be obtained, he may be made a defendant, the reason thereof being stated in the complaint.

First Report of New York Commissioners on Practice and Pleadings, supra. See Hazard, supra note 13, at 1279 (tracing the use of the term "united in interest" to describe parties whose joinder is required back to Joy v. Wirtz, 13 F. Cas. 1172 (C.C.D. Pa. 1806) (No. 7553)).

As amended in 1849, section 122 (formerly section 102) of the Field Code also provided:

The court may determine any controversy between parties before it, when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights; but when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court may order them to be brought in.

An Act to Amend the Code of Procedure, 1849 N.Y. Laws 613, 640. In the amended code, the text of former section 99 appears in section 119. Id. at 639.

n78 Rules of Practice for the Courts of Equity of the United States, Rule 37, reprinted in 226 U.S. 627, 659 (1912):

Parties Generally--Intervention. Every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, but an executor, administrator, guardian, trustee of an express trust, a party with whom or in whose name a contract has been made for the benefit of another, or a party expressly authorized by statute, may sue in his own name without joining with him the party for whose benefit the action is brought. All persons having an interest in the subject of the action and in obtaining the relief demanded may join as plaintiffs, and any person may be made a defendant who has or claims an interest adverse to the plaintiff. Any person may at any time be made a party if his presence is necessary or proper to a complete determination of the cause. Persons having a united interest must be joined on the same side as plaintiffs or defendants, but when anyone refuses to join, he may for such reason be made a defendant.

Anyone claiming an interest in the litigation may at any time be permitted to assert his right by intervention, but the intervention shall be in subordination to, and in recognition of, the propriety of the main proceeding.

n79 Rule 19, entitled "Necessary Joinder of Parties," provided:

(a) Necessary Joinder. Subject to the provisions of Rule 23 and of subdivision (b) of this rule, persons having a joint interest shall be made parties and be joined on the same side as plaintiffs or defendants. When a person who should join as a plaintiff refuses to do so, he may be made a defendant or, in proper cases, an involuntary plaintiff.

(b) Effect of Failure to Join. When persons who are not indispensable, but who ought to be parties if complete relief is to be accorded between those already parties, have not been made parties and are subject to the jurisdiction of the court as to both service of process and venue and can be made parties without depriving the court of jurisdiction of the parties before it, the court shall order them summoned to appear in the action. The court in its discretion may proceed in the action without making such persons parties, if its jurisdiction over them as to either service of process or venue can be acquired only by their consent or voluntary appearance or if, though they are subject to its jurisdiction, their joinder would deprive the court of jurisdiction of the parties before it, but the judgment rendered therein does not affect the rights or liabilities of absent persons.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 19, reprinted in 39 F.R.D. 69, 87-88 (1966). With regard to the "involuntary plaintiff doctrine," reflected in the second sentence of subsection (a), and also included in the rule as amended in 1966, see infra note 108 and accompanying text.

n80 Professor Wright concludes that the rule was unsatisfactory, "not because it necessarily led to bad results but because it did not point to the factors properly relevant to decision." Wright, supra note 70, section 70, at 459. In a recent article, Professor Bone discusses the decision by the 1938 rules drafters to eschew a pragmatic approach and to include in Rule 19 the "conceptual baggage" of the late 19th century. Bone, supra note 15, at 110.

n81 The syntax of Rule 19 led to additional confusion. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 19 advisory committee's notes (1966) (discussing the textual defects in the original version of Rule 19). Subdivision (a) appeared to define necessary parties as those with joint interests; however, subdivision (b) stated that the court shall summon persons who are not indispensable, but "who ought to be parties if complete relief is to be accorded between those already parties." See supra note 79 (text of 1938 version of Rule 19). The two criteria apparently were derived from separate sections of the Field Code. See supra note 77. The rule thus appeared to give two different criteria of "necessary" and it provided no basis for distinguishing the "necessary" from the "indispensable," placing this distinction in the court's discretion. Wright, supra note 70, section 70, at 459-61 (discussing the judiciary's discretionary application of Rule 19); Kaplan, supra note 69, at 363-64 (evaluating the ambiguous language of the original Rule 19). Professor Bone has concluded that the rules drafters composed a confusing rule because they were confused themselves. Bone, supra note 15, at 113. Even a defender of the rule noted that the rule was not well understood and that it could be construed properly only if its derivations were considered. See Fink, supra note 72, at 410-11 (arguing that Rule 19 has been misunderstood by those who have failed to appreciate how the rule encompasses its derivations). Professor Wright, commenting on the original Rule 19, said, "and so you had to read into it a very heavy gloss of court decisions and of the writings of the commentators to understand when parties fell under the time-honored labels of indispensable, necessary, or proper." Charles A. Wright, Proceedings of the Twenty-Ninth Annual Judicial Conference, Third Judicial Circuit of the United States, 42 F.R.D. 437, 561 (1966).

n82 Reed, supra note 69, at 345-46.

n83 Id. at 346. Kaplan describes this phenomenon as "naive self-delusion in the reliance on disembodied categories." Kaplan, supra note 69, at 359. Professor Chafee, discussing classifications of class action lawsuits, wrote, "I often have as much perplexity in telling a 'common' right from a 'several' right as in deciding whether some ties and dresses are green or blue." Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Some Problems of Equity 257 (1950).

n84 Kaplan, supra note 69, at 362 & n.24 (citing as an example the proposition derived from Shields "that in actions to rescind a transaction or cancel an instrument all original parties are indispensable."). For other slogans, or "rubrics," see, e.g., 2 James W. Moore &

REV_00262573

Joseph Friedman, Moore's Federal Practice section 19.03 (1st ed. 1938); Note, Multiparty Litigation, supra note 72, at 880 (describing the development of the rules as a response to deeper policies, but then acquiring "a force of their own").

n85 Under the Conformity Act that governed procedure in federal courts prior to adoption of the federal rules in 1938, joinder in actions at law was determined by the law of the state in which the federal court sat. In many cases, this meant code pleading. Joinder in suits in equity was governed by the federal equity rules. Wright, supra note 70, at section 61.

n86 See, e.g., National Garment Co. v. New York, C. & St. L. R.R., 173 F.2d 32, 35 (8th Cir. 1949) (finding both insured and insurer real parties in interest even though insured was satisfied with payment from insurer because such payment may not have satisfied all claims with the tortfeasor); State Farm Mut. Liab. Ins. Co. v. United States, 172 F.2d 737, 739 (1st Cir. 1949) (stating that insured, as a partial subrogee, is a necessary party); Simpson v. Hartranft, 283 N.Y.S. 754, 757 (App. Div. 1935) (recognizing insurer as a necessary party and granting plaintiff's request to join insurer as party defendant); Verdier v. Marshallville Equity Co., 46 N.E.2d 636, 638-39 (Ohio Ct. App. 1940) ("[Insurer] was united in interest with the plaintiff in a single and indivisible claim against the defendant" and therefore the trial court erred in refusing "to accord to the defendant the right to have the insurance company made a participating party in the litigation before verdict."); Pratt v. Radford, 8 N.W. 606, 607 (Wis. 1881) (stating that the insured and insurers "have a united interest in the cause of action" and insurers must be joined as plaintiffs with insured); Clark, supra note 28, at 177 & n.89 (citing cases and adding that "many of these cases describe insurer and insured as 'joint owners of the cause of action.'"); 2 Moore & Friedman, supra note 84, section 17.08, at 2057 (stating that partial subrogee retains part of his substantive right as a real party in interest); Annotation, Proper Party Plaintiffs, supra note 58, at 1253-55 (detailing both state and federal cases).

n87 See, e.g., Van Wie v. United States, 77 F. Supp. 22, 33 (N.D. Iowa 1948) (stating that despite partial subrogation, right of action for the entire loss remains with insured). Judge Clark was critical of courts that continued to permit or require suit in the name of the insured alone, attributing the practice to a failure to appreciate the real party in interest rule and the advantages of compulsory joinder. Clark, supra note 28, at 177-79. Suit by the insured alone often was rationalized on the theory that the insured was a trustee for the insurer and that the real party in interest rule, Rule 17(a), authorized the insurer's nonjoinder regardless of the requirements of compulsory joinder. Gray v. United States, 77 F. Supp. 869, 871 (D. Mass. 1948) (entitling insurer to sue for entire loss and holding sum paid to him by the insurer as trustee), rev'd sub nom. State Farm Mut. Liab. Ins. Co. v. United States, 172 F.2d 737 (1st Cir. 1949); see supra note 53 (insured as trustee). A procedural rule that treats an insured as a trustee and an insurer as a beneficiary in all cases, however, is as guilty as the necessary parties slogan of ignoring the substantive law of subrogation, which is not uniform with regard to the relative rights of the insured and insurer. See Entman, supra note 1, at 940-42 (discussing the use of the trustee/beneficiary concept in the misapplication of the real party in interest rule).

n88 For example, the holding in Insurance Co. of N. Am. v. United States, 76 F. Supp. 951, 954 (E.D. Va. 1948), appeared to approve both use practice and joinder simultaneously: "The pleadings should be made to reveal and assert the actual interest of the claimant. The insured and insurer can be compelled to join, and the action brought in the name of the insured for the use of himself and of his insurer . . . to meet the requirements of Rule 17(a)."

n89 338 U.S. 366 (1949).

n90 Id. at 368-69.

n91 28 U.S.C. section 931 (1940) (current version at 28 U.S.C. section 2674 (1988)).

REV_00262574

against its insured for reimbursement, and not a claim directly against the third party, the insurer is not considered to be subrogated. [16]

The rights of a compensating insurer depend upon the applicable law of insurance subrogation, the type of insurance involved, and the terms of the particular insurance contract. [17] In some circumstances, the exclusive right to control any claim against a third party remains in the insured. [18] Although the compensating insurer is entitled to reimbursement from the insured's recovery, the insurer does not have an enforceable claim against the third party. [19] In [*8] other circumstances, the insurer entitled to reimbursement is further entitled to assert and control the claim against the third party. [20] Finally, the insured and insurer sometimes each have separate claims against the third party. [21] In the latter situation, however, the law of subrogation usually further provides that either joinder of both insured and insurer is required [22] or the filing of suit by [*9] one precludes enforcement of the claim by the other. [23]

Either state or federal law may govern the insurance relationship and, therefore, determine the insurer's right to reimbursement or subrogation and the consequences to the insured of accepting compensation from its insurer. In some cases, the source of the applicable insurance law may differ from the source of law that governs the underlying claim against the third party. For example, the subrogation rights of one who pays workers' compensation benefits to a longshoreman are governed by the federal Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, [24] although the tort claim against the third party may arise under either federal or state law. [25] Similarly, the law of one state may determine the injured party's right to recover against the tortfeasor, while the law of another state may determine whether an insurer is subrogated to the injured party's claim. [26]

The function of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 17(a), [27] the [*10] real party in interest rule, is to require that the plaintiff be the person who, under the substantive law, has the right to bring and control the action. [28] When an injured party has been compensated by his insurer, therefore, Rule 17(a) means that the court should require the naming of the party plaintiff to conform to the answer found in the law of subrogation to the question of who has the right to sue. [29]

If Rule 17(a) were properly understood and applied, it alone (or better yet, Rule 12(b)(6) [30] alone) would be sufficient in many cases to resolve the question of whether an insurer must be joined as a plaintiff when its compensated insured brings an action against a third party. [31] If, for example, the applicable subrogation law denies the insured's right to assert the claim that once was his, the insured should not be permitted to proceed as the party plaintiff.

[*11] The insurer that has acquired through subrogation the right to assert the claim, and who is in actual control of the lawsuit that has been brought, is the only proper plaintiff. [32] There is no joinder issue, only a real party in interest, or Rule 12(b)(6), issue.

Unfortunately, Rule 17(a) rarely has been construed in the subrogation context to resolve party plaintiff issues in so straightforward a fashion. Rule 17(a) has been misapplied in a number of ways that have resulted in decisions either to require or not to require joinder of insurers without careful reference to the underlying substantive law. The frequent result is that federal courts fail to enforce the substantive law of subrogation, often the law of a state, that ought to control whether the insured or the insurer is named as the plaintiff. [33] In addition, by concluding erroneously that both the insured and the insurer are entitled to assert a claim against the third party, the federal courts create an unnecessary issue of compulsory joinder. [34]

The problem is only compounded when federal courts apply Rule 19 in response to a defendant's motion to require naming of a compensating insurer as a party plaintiff. [35] Rule 19 requires joinder on the basis of the nonparty's relationship to the claims

REV_00262539

n92 Aetna, 338 U.S. at 368-69.

n93 31 U.S.C. section 203 (1951) (current version at 31 U.S.C. section 3727 (1988)).

n94 In one of the cases, the plaintiff insurance company was the workers' compensation carrier of the injured party's employer. Having paid the injured person's claim under the New York Workmen's Compensation Law, the insurance company's rights were created by the New York law, which provided that if the injured person failed to commence an action within one year after the accident, his inaction operated as an assignment to the insurer of his cause of action. Aetna, 338 U.S. at 368. In the other three cases, the insureds had suffered property damages and the Court's opinion did not discuss what substantive law, if any, gave the insurance companies rights of subrogation. Id. at 369.

n95 Id. at 368.

n96 Id. at 373-80.

n97 Id. at 380.

n98 Id. at 381.

n99 In one of the cases before the Court, the Second Circuit specifically had found that, under the New York workers' compensation statute, the plaintiff insurer, which had paid only partial compensation, was the only real party in interest. The employee's failure to sue within a year operated as an assignment of the claim to the carrier, who then had to share with the employee any recovery in excess of the amount of compensation paid. Aetna, 338 U.S. at 368 n.3.

For a more detailed criticism of the Aetna court's misunderstanding of the real party in interest rule, see Entman, supra note 1, at 913-16.

n100 Even if the court had concluded correctly that the insured was not entitled to sue and was not, therefore, a real party in interest, the joinder issue would not be entirely foreclosed. There was nothing in the text of Rule 19 at the time, or even now, requiring that a party joined under that rule necessarily qualify as a real party in interest. See Farrell Constr. Co. v. Jefferson Parish, La., 896 F.2d 136, 140 (5th Cir. 1990) ("Even if a party is not the real party in interest, Rule 19 requires that party's joinder if it is 'necessary for a just adjudication' of the action."); Burger King Corp. v. American Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 119 F.R.D. 672, 676 (N.D. Ill. 1988) ("[Rule 19(a)] does not state that the absent party must have an interest in the action; instead, it requires only that he have an interest 'relating to the subject matter of the action'."); Tobias, supra note 15, at 774-76 (discussing how courts should evaluate the absentee's "interest" under Rule 19(a)(2)(i)). But see Kennedy, supra note 28, 679-80 & n.23 (stating that the relationship between Rules 17(a) and 19 "has not been fully developed," but quoting Koepp v. Northwest Freight Lines, 10 F.R.D. 524, 527 (D. Minn. 1950), for the proposition that "Rule 19(a) necessarily assumes that the parties who may be joined under it as plaintiffs are real parties in interest."). On the other hand, determining whether a party qualifies for compulsory joinder under Rule 19 does require accurate understanding of that party's legal relationship to the dispute.

n101 In case no. 36, both insured and insurer had sued to recover their respective interests. In case nos. 35, 37 and 38, the insurers alone had sued to recover the amounts paid to their insureds. Aetna, 338 U.S. at 368-69.

n102 Id. at 371-72, 381.

n103 Id. at 381. The Court's quotation marks around the word "own" signal, at least to this reader, the Court's tentativeness about its own understanding of the substantive rights of the parties and the real party in interest doctrine.

REV_00262575

n104 Id. at 381-82. The Court also cited Delaware County v. Diebold Safe & Lock Co., 133 U.S. 473, 488 (1890), but noted that this was a case applying a state code under the Conformity Act. Aetna, 388 U.S. at 381-82. The Delaware County case, moreover, involved suit by an assignee of a construction contract, and did not involve subrogation. Delaware County, 133 U.S. at 473.

n105 Aetna, 338 U.S. at 382.

n106 See infra part V.C.

n107 Aetna, 338 U.S. at 382 n.19. The Court's statement brings to mind Gegan's law and its corollary: "Gegan's Law: The tendency for any conclusion to be called clear is in inverse ratio to the reasons available to support it. Corollary: Clarity tends to obscure and absolute clarity obscures absolutely." Bernard E. Gegan, Constructive Trusts: A New Basis for Tracing Equities, 53 St. John's L. Rev. 593, 602 n.34 (1979).

n108 Aetna, 338 U.S. at 382. Insofar as this statement by the Court refers to a lack of personal jurisdiction over the absentee, it assumes that the doctrine of the involuntary plaintiff would not apply to permit joinder of the absentee. The doctrine is expressed in the provision of Rule 19(a) that, "if the person should join as a plaintiff but refuses to do so, the person may be made a defendant, or, in a proper case, an involuntary plaintiff." Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(a). It is generally agreed that this provision, derived from Independent Wireless Tel. Co. v. Radio Corp. of Am., 269 U.S. 459 (1926), permits involuntary joinder as a plaintiff of a party over whom there otherwise is no personal jurisdiction, and further means that the party so joined will be bound by res judicata. For the most part, the doctrine has been applied only in cases, such as patent claims brought by a licensee, in which the absentee (owner of the patent) has a duty to join in the suit or to permit use of his name. 3A James W. Moore et al., Moore's Federal Practice paragraph 19.06 (2d ed. 1994); Jean F. Rydstrom, Annotation, What Constitutes "Proper Case" Within Meaning of Provision of Rule 19(a) of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure That When Person Who Should Join as Plaintiff Refuses to Do So, He May Be Made Involuntary Plaintiff "In a Proper Case," 20 A.L.R. Fed. 193 (1974).

The involuntary plaintiff doctrine is not often implicated in the issue of compulsory joinder of subrogated insurers because lack of personal jurisdiction over the insurer generally is not a problem. If there is any jurisdictional problem, it is that the insurer's joinder would defeat diversity jurisdiction. If the absentee insurer is subject to personal jurisdiction, therefore, the involuntary plaintiff doctrine does not apply. The correct procedure is to bring the insurer into the lawsuit by service as a defendant and then to realign the insurer to reflect its position as a plaintiff and to ascertain diversity. See 3A Moore, et al., supra note 84, paragraph 19.06, at 19-86 to 19-87 (explaining applicability of "involuntary plaintiff" doctrine); 7 Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure sections 1605-1606 (2d ed. 1986) (discussing joinder of absentees as defendants and involuntary plaintiffs). In most judicial decisions and, consequently, in this article, however, the procedure is simply referred to as joining the insurer as a party plaintiff. But see Blacks v. Mosley Mach. Co., 57 F.R.D. 503, 505-06 (E.D. Pa. 1972) (stating, incorrectly, that ordering joinder of the compensating insurer was an extension of the involuntary plaintiff doctrine).

n109 58 U.S. (17 How.) 130 (1854).

n110 Aetna, 338 U.S. at 382 n.19 (quoting Shields, 58 U.S. at 139).

n111 Id. at 381-82 (citing "3 Moore, Federal Practice (2d ed.)").

n112 3A Moore, et al., supra note 108, paragraph 17.09 [2.-1]. Although the 1948 edition is continuously updated, the section cited here, [2.-1], begins with the following notation:

REV_00262576

"The discussion in this subhead was approved by the Supreme Court in United States v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co. . . . discussed in subhead [2.-2], infra." Id. at 17-77 n.1.

n113 Clark, supra note 28, section 24, at 177-79.

n114 3A Moore et al., supra note 108, paragraph 17.09 [2.-1], at 17-78 to 17-79.

n115 Moore's treatise states:

If the insurer satisfies his liability to the insured, but the insured sues and recovers his entire original loss, the recovery is impressed with a trust for the insurer up to the amount to which he was entitled by principles of subrogation. The insurer, therefore, owned that portion of the substantive right, and the insured owned the remainder. There are two real parties in interest and either or both may sue, although as in the case of partial assignments, if the defendant makes a timely objection, the joinder of insurer and insured should be compelled.

Id.

n116 Professor Bone refers to Professor Moore's treatment of compulsory joinder as "unusually superficial." Bone, supra note 15, at 112. Bone states that "the bulk of Moore's discussion of Rule 19 in his 1938 treatise consists of a lengthy summary of existing precedent defining necessary and indispensable parties in different types of cases without any clear account of the purpose the Rule was supposed to serve." Id. at 111.

Professor Moore's treatise now includes in the section on Rule 19 a discussion of the overlap between Rules 17(a) and 19, in which the writer suggests that the matter is best treated under Rule 19 and that, applying the criteria of Rule 19(a), joinder of the insurer should not be required. 3A Moore et al., supra note 108, paragraph 19.07--1 [2.-2], at 19-113 to 19-116. As this discussion is based upon the requirements of Rule 19 as amended in 1966, however, it would not have been part of the 1948 treatise. Moreover, Moore's comments favoring joinder continue to appear in his chapter on Rule 17(a) and to be cited for that approach, without reference to his discussion to the contrary in the section on Rule 19. See Truckweld Equip. Co. v. Swenson Trucking & Excavating, Inc., 649 P.2d 234, 237 (Alaska 1982) (citing Moore's treatise discussion on Rule 17(a) favoring joinder).

n117 See infra parts IV.B.2, V.B.

n118 Entman, supra note 1, at 916-31.

n119 183 F.2d 417 (10th Cir. 1950).

n120 Id. at 419.

n121 Id.

n122 Id.

n123 152 P.2d 836 (Kan. 1944).

n124 Id. at 842. The second sentence describes the actual holding in Tice. The insurer had brought suit in its own name after the insured settled with the tortfeasor for her $ 50 deductible and indicated her reluctance to participate in the action. Id. at 837-38.

n125 Id. at 840.

REV_00262577

n126 Gas Serv. Co. v. Hunt, 183 F.2d 417, 419 (10th Cir. 1950).

n127 In fairness, the Tenth Circuit may have been misled by the Tice court's statement that both insured and insurer were real parties in interest, 152 P.2d at 842, a statement that is incorrect with regard to an insurer who is not entitled to sue. On the other hand, the Hunt case may illustrate how federal circuit courts of appeals are less capable of appreciating and applying state law than are the federal district judges in those states. But see Salve Regina College v. Russell, 499 U.S. 225, 238 (1991) (rejecting argument that "a district judge is better positioned to determine an issue of state law than are the judges on the court of appeals").

n128 23 F.R.D. 148 (D. Kan. 1959).

n129 Id. at 149.

n130 Id. at 150-51.

n131 See Entman, supra note 1, at 918-19 (discussing other federal decisions correctly construing workers' compensation acts that did not give insurers subrogation rights). A number of other federal decisions, however, have concluded erroneously that insurers were subrogated when the workers' compensation statutes gave the insurer a pecuniary interest in the employee's recovery, but not a claim against the third party. See, e.g., Wright v. Schebler Co., 37 F.R.D. 319, 321 (S.D. Iowa 1965) (stating that workers' compensation insurer was a real party in interest because, under the applicable Illinois compensation act, the insurer was a statutory lienholder); Entman, supra note 1, at 916-18 (discussing Wright and other similar cases). Federal courts have also misunderstood applicable substantive law and found that insureds were real parties in interest even though the insurer had the exclusive right to assert any claim against the third party. See id. at 919-22 (discussing cases in which substantive law was misapplied).

n132 See Entman, supra note 1, at 923-25 (discussing the difficulty of distinguishing between substantive and procedural state law and the difficulty of finding state law addressing insurers' right to sue).

n133 Both sides of the coin are illustrated in Cook v. Stuples, 74 F.R.D. 370 (W.D. Okla. 1976), in which the court correctly analyzed the substantive subrogation rights of the United States for medical expense compensation under a federal statute. Id. at 371-72. With regard to the plaintiff's partially compensated property damage, however, the court engaged in no such analysis. The court simply stated that the insurer "by virtue of its payment . . . possesses substantive rights in this litigation . . . in accordance with Gas Service Co. v. Hunt." Id. at 372.

Courts sometimes pay lip service to the role of the substantive law, but then reveal that they do not really understand the concept. In Brocklesby Transp. v. Eastern States Escort Serv., 904 F.2d 131, 133 (2d Cir. 1990), the court stated that "federal law governs the issue of in whose name a lawsuit must be brought, even though state law controls the underlying substantive right of an insured to recovery." Then, however, with no inquiry into the state law of subrogation, the court stated that "under federal law . . . if the insured is only partially compensated by the insurer, both the insurer and the insured are real parties-in-interest." Id. (citing United States v. Aetna Casualty & Sur. Co., 338 U.S. 366, 380-82 (1949) and 3A James W. Moore et al., Moore's Federal Practice, paragraph 17.09 [2.-04] (2d ed. 1989)).

n134 183 F.2d 417 (10th Cir. 1950).

n135 See supra text accompanying notes 119-27.

n136 Hunt, 183 F.2d at 419-20. Also requiring joinder of purported insurer-subrogees on the basis of Aetna: Maryland v. Baltimore Transit Co., 37 F.R.D. 34, 36 (D. Md. 1965); Brown v. Fisher Skylights, Inc., 31 F.R.D. 532, 532-33 (E.D.N.Y. 1962); Poleski v. Moore-McCormack Lines, 21 F.R.D. 579, 581 (D. Md. 1958) (citing Aetna, 338 U.S. at 381, for the proposition that the insurer "is a necessary party, and may be brought in on motion of the defendant"); Carlson v. Consumers Power Co., 164 F. Supp. 692, 695 (W.D. Mich. 1957) (Stewart, Potter, Cir. J.) (noting that Aetna was not "controlling on the facts," but finding it to be "strong support" for compulsory joinder). See also Continental Bus Sys., Inc. v. Rohwer, 172 F. Supp. 487, 490 (D. Colo. 1959) (following Hunt, 183 F.2d 417, and further holding that although the share of the partial subrogee insurer in the total claim was less than the jurisdictional amount, joinder did not defeat jurisdiction because the plaintiffs are enforcing "a single title or right, in which they have a common and undivided interest") (citation omitted); Kennedy, supra note 28, at 693-94 (discussing other cases construing Aetna to require joinder of the insurer). For later decisions requiring joinder on the basis of Aetna, even after the 1966 amendment of Rule 19, see infra part V.B.

REV_00262578

n137 37 F.R.D. 319 (S.D. Iowa 1965).

n138 The insurer in Wright was a workers' compensation carrier that had a lien interest in the employee's recovery, but no right to assert a claim against the third party. See supra note 131.

n139 For the full text of Rule 19 as it read at the time of Wright, see supra note 79.

n140 Wright, 37 F.R.D. at 322.

n141 Id.

n142 See supra note 79 (text of Rule 19(b)).

n143 Wright, 37 F.R.D. at 322. See infra part V.C for a discussion of this same criteria in Rule 19(a) as amended in 1966.

n144 Wright, 37 F.R.D. at 322.

n145 Id. The Wright court also distinguished Aetna on the ground that the defendants in Aetna were faced with the "possibility of multiple suits or 'split causes of action.'" Id. See also Braniff Airways v. Falkingham, 20 F.R.D. 141, 144 (D. Minn. 1957) (also distinguishing Aetna on the grounds that there is no risk of multiple litigation when the insured sues to recover the entire claim), cited by Wright, 37 F.R.D. at 322.

n146 See Pyle v. Kansas Gas & Elec. Co., 23 F.R.D. 148, 150-51 (D. Kan. 1959) (reading the language of the Kansas workmen's compensation statute to expressly preclude insurer from bringing suit once the insured had initiated suit against tortfeasor).

n147 Fed. R. Civ. P. 19 advisory committee's note (1966).

n148 Id. Old terminology and its confusion refuses to die, however. See, e.g., Glacier Gen. Assurance Co. v. G. Gordon Symons Co., 631 F.2d 131, 134 (9th Cir. 1980) (after quoting amended Rule 19(a), the court held "that the reinsurers are not necessary parties under this standard"); Landon v. Lief Hoegh & Co., 521 F.2d 756, 761 (2d Cir. 1975) (referring to "an indispensable party under Rule 19(a)" and "a necessary party under 19(b)"), cert. denied, 96 S. Ct. 783 (1976).

n149 Fed. R. Civ. P. 19, reprinted in 39 F.R.D. 88-89 (1966) (parts 19(c) & (d) omitted). In 1987, the rule was amended for the purpose of "gender-neutralization." The words deleted in 1987 are underlined and the words added are in brackets. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 19.

REV_00262579

n150 390 U.S. 102 (1968).

n151 Id. at 106.

n152 Id.

n153 Id. at 106-07.

n154 Id. at 107. The Court also rejected the court of appeals' conclusion that "the 19th century joinder cases in this Court created a federal, common-law, substantive right in a certain class of persons to be joined in the corresponding lawsuits." Id. at 119. Rather, the Court explained, joinder was a federal procedural question, although state law questions might arise in determining what interest the outsider actually had. Id. at 116-25, 119 n.22.

n155 Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 390 U.S. 102, 109 (1968).

n156 Id. at 102.

n157 See supra part IV.A.

n158 See generally Rydstrom, supra note 2. Professor Bone observes that amended Rule 19, like its predecessor, is not a rule requiring broad joinder of parties and is largely redundant of impleader, interpleader, and intervention. He explains that while the original rules drafters generally favored broad permissive joinder for purposes of trial convenience, they took a very narrow approach to compulsory joinder, giving the plaintiff wide latitude in structuring his lawsuit. He concludes that, "the historic function of compulsory joinder has been lost to modern procedural law and with it much of the sense of Rule 19." Bone, supra note 15, at 108-14.

n159 467 F.2d 1143 (10th Cir. 1972).

n160 183 F.2d 417 (10th Cir. 1950) (discussed supra text accompanying notes 119-27, 134-36).

n161 Public Serv. Co., 467 F.2d at 1143.

n162 Id. at 1144.

n163 Public Serv. Co. v. Crane Co., 48 F.R.D. 424, 425 (N.D. Okla. 1969).

n164 Public Serv. Co., 467 F.2d at 1144.

n165 Public Serv. Co. v. Crane Co., 48 F.R.D. at 425.

n166 See Cleaves v. DeLauder, 302 F. Supp. 36, 37-38 (N.D. W. Va. 1969) (finding that under West Virginia law insurer has no right to sue third party and, therefore, joinder of insurer not required by Rule 19). See also Farrell Constr. Co. v. Jefferson Parish, 896 F.2d 136, 141-43 (5th Cir. 1990) (holding that subcontractor, who had no right to sue owner under Louisiana law, was not a person whose joinder was required by Rule 19 in contractor's suit against owner).

n167 Public Serv. Co., at 467 F.2d at 1144. The Tenth Circuit quoted a passage from 6 Charles A. Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure section 1546, at 659-60 (1971), which stated in part that "the insurer who pays a part of the loss is only partially subrogated to the rights of the insured . . . . Either the insured or the insurer may sue in his own name." 467 F.2d at 1145. The passage, currently found at 6A Wright et al., supra note 28, section 1546, at 360, certainly gives the unfortunate impression that the rights of the insured and insurer to sue in a case of partial compensation are procedural issues that do not require reference to the substantive law.

REV_00262580

n168 See Landon v. Lief Hoegh & Co., 521 F.2d 756, 761 (2d Cir. 1975) (compensating employer under Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act is not a party whose joinder is required by Rule 19 because the employer has no claim until the plaintiff has recovered against the ship), cert. denied, 96 S. Ct. 783 (1976).

n169 Public Serv. Co. v. Black & Veatch, 467 F.2d 1143, 1144-45 (10th Cir. 1972).

n170 Also relying upon Aetna without reference to the 1966 amendment of Rule 19: Wright v. Albuquerque Auto-Truck Stop Plaza, 591 F.2d 585, 586-87 (10th Cir. 1979) (ordering insurer's joinder on the basis of Public Service Co. and Aetna); Wadsworth v. United States Postal Serv., 511 F.2d 64, 66-67 (7th Cir. 1975) (stating, erroneously, that the holding in Aetna was that a partially subrogated insurer should be joined); City Stores Co. v. Lerner Shops, 410 F.2d 1010, 1012 (D.C. Cir. 1969); Wattles v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 82 F.R.D. 446, 448-49 (D. Neb. 1979); Cook v. Stuples, 74 F.R.D. 370 (W.D. Okla. 1976) (discussed supra note 133); Chaplin v. Bruce, 57 F.R.D. 487, 488 (W.D. Okla. 1972) (relying on Hunt); Ward v. Franklin Equip. Co., 50 F.R.D. 93, 94-95 (E.D. Va. 1970); Neal v. Trim Master Corp., 48 F.R.D. 390, 394 (N.D. Miss. 1969); Cross v. Harrington, 294 F. Supp. 1340, 1341-42 (N.D. Miss. 1969). For pre-1966 cases that relied upon Aetna in requiring joinder of insurers, see supra note 136.

n171 Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 390 U.S. 102 (1968) (discussed supra text accompanying notes 150-53).

n172 485 F.2d 78 (4th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 935 (1974).

n173 Id. at 81.

n174 Id.

n175 Id. at 83-84.

n176 Id. at 82 nn.1-2. For criticism of the interpretation and application of Rule 17(a) in Virginia Electric, see Entman, supra note 1, at 920-22, 931-32, 947-48.

n177 Virginia Elec., 485 F.2d at 82, 86.

n178 Id. at 85.

n179 See supra note 170.

n180 See Virginia Elec., 485 F.2d at 86 (discussing why insurer's presence as party was not necessary).

n181 See, e.g., Travelers Ins. Co. v. Riggs, 671 F.2d 810, 813 (4th Cir. 1982) (relying upon Virginia Electric in requiring insurer's joinder); Lightner v. Duke Power Co., 719 F. Supp. 1310, 1317 (E.D. Va. 1989) (following Virginia Electric and ordering joinder of workers' compensation insurer with no discussion of insurer's rights under substantive law); Edwards, Inc. v. Arlen Realty & Dev. Corp., 466 F. Supp. 505, 514 (D.S.C. 1978) (reluctantly following Virginia Electric and ordering joinder).

See also Jefferson v. Ametek, Inc., 86 F.R.D. 425, 429-30 (D. Md. 1980), in which the court followed Virginia Electric and stated that "the question remains whether it [the insurer] must be joined as a named plaintiff because it is an indispensable party." This statement is nonsense, of course, because by definition an indispensable party may never be joined. The statement illustrates, however, the confusion caused by failing to carefully separate the issues resolved under each of the subdivisions of Rule 19.

REV_00262581

n182 See, e.g., Gonzalez v. Cruz, 926 F.2d 1, 5-7 (1st Cir. 1991) (analyzing dismissal under subdivision (b) and altogether ignoring subdivision (a)); Dayton Indep. Sch. Dist. v. U.S. Mineral Prod., 906 F.2d 1059, 1067-68 (5th Cir. 1990) (using subdivision (b) analysis without considering subdivision (a)); Schutten v. Shell Oil Co., 421 F.2d 869, 874 (5th Cir. 1970) ("Under subdivision (a) the Levee Board is clearly a party 'to be joined if feasible.'"). This trend may have begun with Provident Tradesmens. Stating that "we may assume, at the outset, that Dutcher falls within the category of persons who, under section (a), should be 'joined if feasible,'" the Court gave a very cursory, three-sentence analysis in support of this assumption before proceeding to its much more thorough subdivision (b) analysis. Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 390 U.S. 102, 108 (1968).

n183 See, e.g., Field v. Volkswagenwerk AG, 626 F.2d 293, 300 (3d Cir. 1980). In Volkswagonwerk AG, the court stated:

Rule 19(b) itself is applicable only if a person who should be joined under the provisions of Rule 19(a) cannot be made a party for some reason. 'By proceeding in this orderly fashion the court will be able to avoid grappling with the difficult question of indispensability whenever it initially decides that the absentee's interest is not sufficient to warrant compelling his joinder.'

(quoting 7 Wright et al., supra note 108, section 1604, at 39-40). See also Bates v. Cekada, 130 F.R.D. 52, 57 (E.D. Va. 1990) ("Rule 19 requires the Court to make a two-part inquiry. The first part of the inquiry is governed by Rule 19(a) . . . . "); Burger King Corp. v. American Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 119 F.R.D. 672, 676 (N.D. Ill. 1988) (criticizing courts for avoiding the Rule 19(a)(2) problem by "assuming arguendo that the absent person is necessary and moving directly to the 'indispensability' test. "); Edwards, 466 F. Supp. at 512 (criticizing Virginia Electric for "bypassing the analysis provided for in Rule 19(a)"). See generally Tobias, supra note 15, at 773-74 (explaining the relationship between subdivision (a) analysis and subdivision (b) analysis).

n184 Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(b).

n185 Id. See Sindia Expedition, Inc. v. Wrecked & Abandoned Vessel, 895 F.2d 116, 121 (3d Cir. 1990) ("If a district court failed to make an explicit 19(a) determination but dismissed an action on 19(b) grounds, the appellate court must independently analyze whether an absent party was required to be joined under 19(a)."). Especially in light of a judicial tendency to readily dismiss under subdivision (b) whenever an alternative forum is available, see infra note 205, a mere assumption that an absentee is a person whose joinder is required under subdivision (a) would lead to unjustified loss of a federal forum for many plaintiffs.

n186 Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 485 F.2d 78, 86 (4th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 935 (1974).

n187 Id.

n188 See supra text accompanying note 178.

n189 Compare Virginia Elec., 485 F.2d 78 with State Sec. Ins. Co. v. Frank B. Hall & Co., 109 F.R.D. 99, 101 (N.D. Ill. 1986) (finding that Illinois law did not permit the partially compensated insured to sue for the entire claim and, therefore, dismissing suit because of insurer's non-diverse citizenship).

REV_00262582

n190 See infra part VI.B. Cf. Potomac Elec. Power Co. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 54 F.R.D. 486, 492 (D. Md. 1972) ("If indispensability is a benefit which can be waived by a party for the purpose of securing diversity jurisdiction, federal courts would lose control over their jurisdictional boundaries.").

n191 See infra part VI.B.

n192 See also Garcia v. Hall, 624 F.2d 150, 152 (10th Cir. 1980) (holding that suit may proceed in the name of the insured alone where the partially subrogated insurer is non-diverse and "has instituted this suit in the name of the insured for the entire loss and will be bound by the judgment").

n193 54 F.R.D. 486 (D. Md. 1972).

n194 Id. at 487. The plaintiff insured had originally brought the suit in its own name "to its own use and to the use of" its two compensating insurers. Upon the defendants' motion to dismiss for lack of diversity jurisdiction between the defendants and the insurers, the plaintiff moved to drop the nondiverse "use plaintiffs." The defendants opposed the motion on the grounds that the insurers were indispensable under Rule 19. Id.

n195 Id. at 489.

n196 See Entman, supra note 1, at 925-31 (discussing loan receipt agreements).

n197 Potomac Elec., 54 F.R.D. at 489.

n198 Id.

n199 Id. at 492 n.8.

n200 See infra part VII.

n201 United States v. Aetna Casualty & Sur. Co., 338 U.S. 366, 382 n.19 (1949).

n202 Potomac Elec., 54 F.R.D. at 493. A number of other courts have declined to rely upon Aetna for the same reasons. See, e.g., Dudley v. Smith, 504 F.2d 979, 983 (5th Cir. 1974) (distinguishing Aetna on the facts); Kint v. Terrain King Corp., 79 F.R.D. 10, 11 n.3 (M.D. Pa. 1977) (stating that "detailed step-by-step analysis is necessary notwithstanding the dicta in . . . Aetna . . . where . . . the Court stated that partially subrogated insurers are necessary parties under Rule 19").

n203 Potomac Elec., 54 F.R.D. at 490.

n204 Id.

n205 Id. at 491. The court explained that the subdivision (b) factor that it considered most determinative was that an alternative forum--a state court--was available in which all parties could be joined. Id. The court also noted its concern with the possibility that the nonjoined insurers would be entitled to relitigate the case, or at least to force the defendants to prove in another court that principles of res judicata or collateral estoppel would bar such relitigation. Nonetheless, the court stated that if no alternative forum were available, it would have no hesitation in concluding that the suit should proceed without the insurers. Id. at 492. See also Reliance Ins. Co. v. Wisconsin Natural Gas Co., 60 F.R.D. 429, 431 (E.D. Wis. 1973) (holding that the insured was an indispensable party under Rule 19(b)); Freer, Rethinking Compulsory Joinder, supra note 15, at 1077-78 (noting that federal courts have elevated the alternative forum question to primary importance in Rule 19(b) analysis).

REV_00262583

n206 Fed. R. Civ. P. 19 advisory committee's note to 1966 amendment.

n207 Fed. R. Civ. P. 20 provides in pertinent part:

(a) Permissive Joinder. All persons may join in one action as plaintiffs if they assert any right to relief jointly, severally, or in the alternative in respect of or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences and if any question of law or fact common to all these persons will arise in the action. All persons . . . may be joined in one action as defendants if there is asserted against them jointly, severally, or in the alternative, any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences and if any question of law or fact common to all defendants will arise in the action.

n208 Potomac Elec. Power Co. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 54 F.R.D. 486, 490 (D. Md. 1972). See also Blacks v. Mosley Mach. Co., 57 F.R.D. 503, 506 (E.D. Pa. 1972) (ordering an insurance carrier with a workers' compensation lien joined as a plaintiff under Rule 19(a), even though the insurer did not institute the proceedings or control the litigation, because "its interests are the same as plaintiff's"). Two years later, the author of the Blacks opinion, Judge Newcomer, held that joinder of a subrogated insurer was not required by Rule 19, in part because any judgment in the insured's action would be binding on the insurer because of the insurer's control of the action. White Hall Bldg. Corp. v. Profexray Div. of Litton Indus., 387 F. Supp. 1202, 1207 (E.D. Pa. 1974), aff'd mem., 578 F.2d 1377 (3d Cir. 1978) and aff'd mem. sub nom. Quaglia v. Profexray Div. of Litton Indus., 578 F.2d 1375 (3d Cir. 1978). Judge Newcomer got it exactly backwards. The insurer in Blacks should not have been joined because it had no right to sue, while the insurer in White Hall should have been the sole plaintiff.

n209 Temple v. Synthes Corp., 498 U.S. 5, 7 (1990).

n210 The Advisory Committee's Note to 1966 amendment reads:

The description [of persons to be joined if feasible under rule 19(a)] is not at variance with the settled authorities holding that a tortfeasor with the usual 'joint-and-several' liability is merely a permissive party to an action against another with like liability . . . . Joinder of these tortfeasors continues to be regulated by Rule 20; compare Rule 14 on third-party practice.

n211 See, e.g., Whyham v. Piper Aircraft Corp., 96 F.R.D. 557, 560 (M.D. Pa. 1982) (finding that joint tortfeasors were "necessary" parties because all three criteria of subdivision (a) were satisfied and stating that "the goal of Rule 19(a)(1) is to protect the interests of the parties by affording complete adjudication of the dispute"); see also Wisconisco Creek Watershed v. Kocher Coal Co., 641 F. Supp. 712, 715-16 (M.D. Pa. 1986) (following Whyham).

n212 498 U.S. 5 (1990).

n213 Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 390 U.S. 102 (1968).

n214 Temple, 498 U.S. at 7-8.

n215 Id. at 8.

REV_00262584

[*12] asserted in the lawsuit. [36] If the court fails to determine correctly the nonparty insurer's rights with regard to the insured's claim, its application of Rule 19's criteria may yield a result that is inconsistent with the substantive law. [37]

The practice of ignoring substantive law in designating the proper plaintiff to a claim did not originate, however, with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Even prior to the enactment of the federal rules, federal courts encountered considerable difficulty in determining the proper party plaintiff in a suit to enforce a claim that had been compensated by insurance. The decision has been a difficult one to make because it implicates a number of important substantive and procedural policies. [38]

III. Compulsory Joinder of Compensating Insurers: Pre-Aetna

Prior to the 1949 United States Supreme Court decision in United States v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., [39] federal and state courts followed one of two different doctrines for identifying the proper party plaintiff in a case involving insurance subrogation. One approach, which originated in the law courts prior to merger and adoption of the real party in interest rule, was "use practice," under which the suit would be brought in the name of the insured alone "for the use" of the insurer to the extent of its subrogation interest. [40] The other approach was to apply the compulsory joinder doctrines of "necessary" and "indispensable" parties, which had originated in courts of equity. [41]

A. Use Practice and the Rule That Only the Insured May Sue

Common-law courts initially were hostile to assignments and considered choses in action to be unassignable. [42] Nor were they receptive to subrogation, which was a creation of equity [43] some [*13] times described as an equitable assignment. [44] In the nineteenth century, however, the law courts began to recognize the right of an assignee or subrogee to reimbursement, at least when the assignee or subrogee had acquired the entire claim. [45] Law courts accepted the substance of subrogation to the extent of refusing to permit a defendant to defeat an insured's claim on the grounds that the insured, having been compensated by insurance, had suffered no loss. [46]

The law courts were never fully comfortable, however, with the idea that a subrogee, having only an equitable interest, could directly enforce its claim against a third party. [47] Many courts also expressed the view that the insured's cause of action was "indivisible" [48] and that permitting a subrogee to prosecute its claim would [*14] result in multiple lawsuits when there was more than one subrogee or when subrogation was partial. [49] An assignee or subrogee, therefore, was allowed to sue only in the name of the assignor or subrogor. [50]

Use practice was a typical common-law fiction. [51] When the claim was fully subrogated, the subrogee controlled the suit and was liable for costs. [52] Many decisions described the insured-subrogor as a trustee, [53] an analogy that perhaps helped to explain how the equitable right of subrogation could be enforced in a law court. [54] But it was an odd trusteeship indeed when, in a case of full subrogation, the insured-trustee was only a nominal plaintiff
[*15] and the insurer-beneficiary had actual control of the action. [55]

Eventually, common-law courts adopted use practice to allow actions to be brought in the name of the insured in cases of partial, as well as complete, subrogation. [56] Use practice, or at least a simple rule that suits must be in the name of the insured alone, continued to be followed in many code states with merged systems of law and equity, [57] and in a number of federal courts following

n216 Id.

n217 See, e.g., Field v. Volkswagenwerk AG, 626 F.2d 293, 298 (3d Cir. 1980) (pointing out that Rule 19(a) does not protect defendant from having to pursue independent indemnity claim); Bedel v. Thompson, 103 F.R.D. 78, 80-81 (S.D. Ohio 1984) ("The 'complete relief' provision of Rule 19 relates to those persons already parties and does not concern any subsequent relief via contribution or indemnification for which the absent party might later be responsible.").

n218 626 F.2d 293 (3d Cir. 1980).

n219 Id. at 295.

n220 Id. at 296.

n221 Id. at 297-98.

n222 Id. at 302. In contrast to some courts' backwards approach to subdivisions (a) and (b) of Rule 19, see supra notes 181-85 and accompanying text, the court in Field noted the importance of analyzing subdivision (a) first. Field, 626 F.2d at 300.

Discussing the argument that Ivana's negligence rendered her a joint tortfeasor who must be joined as a defendant, the court noted that VWAG would suffer no prejudice from the dismissal of Ivana as a party. If VWAG wished to assert a right of contribution or indemnity against Ivana, it would be able to do so by bringing a third-party claim against Ivana pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 14. Id. at 298.

n223 Field, 626 F.2d at 301. The court also quoted Moore's Federal Practice for the proposition that "mere theoretical considerations of disposing of the whole controversy should not be employed to dismiss an action where it appears unlikely that absent persons could be adversely affected." Id. (quoting 3A Moore et al., supra note 108, paragraph 19.071[1], at 19-93 to 19-97). See also Arkwright-Boston Mfrs. Mut. Ins. Co. v. City of New York, 762 F.2d 205 (2d Cir. 1985), in which the subrogated insurers alone brought suit and the defendant moved to dismiss on the ground that the non-diverse insured, which retained a $ 100,000 deductible interest, was an indispensable party. The Second Circuit affirmed the district court's denial of the motion, explaining that Rule 19(a)(1) refers only to complete relief among those already parties. Citing Aetna, the court further noted: "The fact that the defendants may be required to defend more than one action arising from the same tort is not grounds for finding the insured an indispensable party to its insurer's partial subrogation action." Id. at 209.

n224 It may seem curious that the rules drafters created a rule with so unambitious a reach. Professor Bone suggests that the rules drafters have never had a clear idea of what "complete relief" means. Bone, supra note 15, at 112. Professor Bone further noted, however, that modern concern with efficiency may "breathe new life" into subdivision (a)(1). Id. at 77 n.249. Cases such as Potomac Electric would seem to prove his point. Professor Freer at one time suggested elimination of subdivision (a)(1), reasoning that, "because most courts do interpret Rule 19(a)(1) correctly, very few invoke it . . . . Thus, Rule 19(a)(1) has had minimal impact on the compulsory joinder doctrine." Freer, Rethinking Compulsory Joinder, supra note 15, at 1081-82. Later, however, Professor Freer proposed that subdivision (a)(1) be "redrafted and invigorated to allow the court to consider whether failing to join the absentee creates a manifest risk of multiplicity." Freer, Avoiding Duplicative Litigation, supra note 15, at 844.

n225 See infra part VII.

n226 See infra part VI.A.

n227 Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(a)(2)(ii).

n228 94 F.R.D. 53 (N.D. Ga. 1982).

n229 Id. at 55-57. This inquiry was particularly complicated in Childers by the fact that the insurer had made part of its payments to the insured through a loan receipt agreement. With regard to loan receipts and subrogation, see Entman, supra note 1, at 925-31.

n230 94 F.R.D. at 57 (citing Lindsey v. Samoluk, 219 S.E.2d 464, 464 (1975), rev'd on other grounds, 223 S.E.2d 147 (1976)).

n231 Id.

n232 Id. See infra part VI.A.1.

n233 Childers, 94 F.R.D. at 58. See also Reliance Ins. Co. v. Wisconsin Natural Gas Corp., 60 F.R.D. 429, 431 (E.D. Wis. 1973) (holding the insured indispensable in a suit by the subrogated insurer, the court stated without explanation that the defendant "may be subject to inconsistent obligations").

n234 The Childers court's use of this term may be attributable to the Advisory Committee's statement that, "new subdivision (a) defines the persons whose joinder in the action is desirable." Fed. R. Civ. P. 19 advisory committee's note to the 1966 amendment.

n235 96 F.R.D. 557 (M.D. Pa. 1982).

n236 Id. at 561.

n237 Id. See also Wisconisco Creek Watershed v. Kocher Coal Co., 641 F. Supp. 712, 715-16 (M.D. Pa. 1986) (following Whyham).

n238 103 F.R.D. 78 (S.D. Ohio 1984).

n239 Id. at 81 (citing 3A Moore et al., supra note 108, paragraph 19.07-1[2-2]). See also Boone v. General Motors Acceptance Corp., 682 F.2d 552, 554 (5th Cir. 1982) (holding that the threat of inconsistent obligations, not the possibility of multiple litigation, determines Rule 19 considerations); Field v. Volkswagenwerk AG, 626 F.2d 293, 298 (3d Cir. 1980) (holding that failure to join all possible defendants does not necessarily lead to inconsistent results, although it may lead to subsequent litigation). For situations that present an actual threat of inconsistent obligations, not merely inconsistent results, see Shimkus v. Gersten Co., 816 F.2d 1318 (9th Cir. 1987) (holding in housing discrimination suit by class of black persons against property management business that non-black minorities must be joined as plaintiffs because obligations to give preferential treatment will at some point become inconsistent); Helzberg's Diamond Shops v. Valley W. Des Moines Shopping Ctr., 564 F.2d 816 (8th Cir. 1977) (finding absentee a party to be joined if feasible because of risk of subjecting defendant to inconsistent contractual obligations, but concluding that the absentee was not indispensable); Freer, Rethinking Compulsory Joinder, supra note 15, at 1090-96 (discussing protecting the defendant in compulsory joinder cases).

n240 Childers v. Eastern Foam Prod., 94 F.R.D. 53, 57 (N.D. Ga. 1982).

n241 This is not to say that avoidance of multiple litigation is not at all a concern of Rule 19. The societal interest in the efficient administration of justice has been, from the beginning, a concern underlying the development of rules of compulsory joinder. See supra part III.B. Rule 19(a), however, is not broad enough to incorporate that interest as a reason for requiring joinder, except with regard to subsequent litigation between those already parties. See Bone, supra note 15, at 110-14 (stating that compulsory joinder does not reach as far as permissive joinder because the 1938 rules drafters did not believe that concerns for efficiency ought to limit the autonomy of the litigants); supra text accompanying note 206.

REV_00262586

On the other hand, the Supreme Court has found that avoidance of multiple litigation is to be taken into account in determining, under Rule 19(b), whether the suit should be dismissed or allowed to proceed without the absentee who cannot be joined. In Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 390 U.S. 102, 111 (1968), the Court stated:

Fourth, there remains the interest of the courts and the public in complete, consistent, and efficient settlement of controversies. We read the Rule's [19(b)'s] third criterion, whether the judgment issued in the absence of the nonjoined person will be 'adequate,' to refer to this public stake in settling disputes by wholes, whenever possible . . . .

See Temple v. Synthes Corp., 498 U.S. 5, 7-8 (1990) (noting that Provident Tradesmens' discussion of the public interest in limiting multiple litigation is in the context of subdivision (b), not subdivision (a)); Tobias, supra note 15, at 777.

n242 See supra note 230 and accompanying text.

n243 566 F. Supp. 1119 (S.D. W. Va. 1983).

n244 Id. at 1124.

n245 See supra part II.

n246 The defendant is also protected from multiple obligations in the event of a settlement with the insured because the substantive law of subrogation generally provides that an insured's release of a tortfeasor bars the insurer from asserting its subrogation claim, unless the tortfeasor had knowledge of the insurer's interest. The insurer's remedy for a release that impairs its subrogation interest is against the insured, not against the defendant who accepted the release in good faith. See Entman, supra note 1, at 909 n.102.

These protections also explain why reference to subdivision (a)(2)(i) is largely absent from judicial decisions about joinder of compensating insurers. Subdivision (a)(2)(i) is designed to protect the absentee when disposition of the action without him may impair his ability to protect his interest. See generally Tobias, supra note 15. When suit is brought by the insured, however, the absentee insurer is protected by its agreement with its insured. The insurer, moreover, may be in actual control of the litigation, and generally is resisting the joinder.

n247 O'Brien, 566 F. Supp. at 1124.

n248 Id.

n249 See Dudley v. Smith, 504 F.2d 979, 983 (5th Cir. 1974) ("Any multiplicity of suit risk can be obviated by final judgment of the district court at the request of appellant."); Clark v. Hutchison, 161 F. Supp. 35, 39 (D.C.Z. 1957) (denying compulsory joinder of insurers, but responding to the defendant's concern about further litigation should the plaintiff fail to reimburse the subrogees, the court stated that it would "entertain a motion to make them parties for the purpose of precluding double recovery and directing that they receive their proportionate share of the judgment rendered"); Braniff Airways v. Falkingham, 20 F.R.D. 141, 144-45 (D. Minn. 1957) (stating that insured's "recovery may be impressed with a trust in favor of the party claiming the right to subrogation").

REV_00262587

Occasionally an insurer that is not entitled to assert a claim directly against the defendant will seek to intervene for the limited purpose of protecting its lien or interest in the plaintiff's judgment. In Strate v. Niagara Mach. & Tool Works, 160 F. Supp. 296 (S.D. Ind. 1958), the federal court granted a workers' compensation insurer's motion for limited intervention, enforcing an Indiana statute granting the insurer a right to intervene to protect its statutory lien. A federal court will not be able to permit the insurer's intervention, however, if joinder of the insurer will defeat complete diversity of citizenship upon which the court's subject matter jurisdiction depends. The subject matter jurisdiction limitation is more likely to bar intervention since the 1990 enactment of the supplemental jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. section 1367. The statute provides that federal courts shall not have supplemental jurisdiction over "claims by plaintiffs against persons made parties under Rule . . . 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or over claims by persons . . . seeking to intervene as plaintiffs under Rule 24 . . . when exercising supplemental jurisdiction over such claims would be inconsistent with the jurisdictional requirements of section 1332." 28 U.S.C. section 1367 (b) (1990); see Larry L. Teply & Ralph U. Whitten, Civil Procedure 670-79 (1994) (discussing interpretations and effect of 28 U.S.C. section 1367(b) with regard to intervention).

Illustrative of the problem is Krueger v. Cartwright, 996 F.2d 928 (7th Cir. 1993), in which an insurer that had paid $ 19,268.25 in economic losses to its insured sought to participate in the insured's diversity action against a tortfeasor. The insurer sought either to assert its statutory lien on a proposed $ 75,000 settlement or, in the alternative, to assert its subrogation claim against the defendant. The trial court adjudicated the issue of the insurer's lien, determining that the settlement did not include economic losses, and then dismissed the insurer's claim against the defendant for want of jurisdiction, apparently because the insurer and the defendant were not of diverse citizenship. Although the court of appeals did state at one point that the trial court had granted the insurer's "motion to intervene," id. at 930, the insurer had moved to "be joined as a party plaintiff under Rule 19(a)." Id. at 932. The court of appeals analyzed the issue as one of whether the insurer was a party that could be joined without defeating the court's jurisdiction within the meaning of Rule 19(a). Having concluded that the district court lacked supplemental jurisdiction and that joinder would in fact defeat diversity, the court of appeals then concluded that the insurer was not a party whose presence was indispensable under the 19(b) criteria and that the insurer was thus improperly joined as a party-plaintiff. Id. at 934.

If the question in Krueger is viewed solely as one of compulsory joinder, the court of appeals' analysis may have been correct. Had the court of appeals, however, analyzed the issue simply as one of intervention under Rule 24(a), as the trial court apparently did, it might have affirmed the trial court's holding and result. With regard to its asserted lien, the insurer was not seeking to intervene as a plaintiff. Rather the insurer was asserting a claim adverse to the plaintiff, which was not excluded by the provisions of section 1367(b). Consequently, the insurer's claim of a lien on the plaintiff's settlement was within the court's supplemental jurisdiction, although there was no independent or supplemental basis for jurisdiction over the insurer's claim against the defendant.

n250 See Freer, Avoiding Duplicative Litigation, supra note 15, at 844 (advocating broadening compulsory joinder to avoid the risk of multiple litigation, especially to force joinder of plaintiffs in "transactionally related tort cases").

n251 See Edwards, Inc. v. Arlen Realty & Dev. Corp., 466 F. Supp. 505, 513 (D.S.C. 1978):

The insurance company's claim is by way of contractual or common-law subrogation and is therefore purely derivative of the insured's claim. The insurance company's claim rises and falls on the same facts, is subject to the same prima facie burdens of proof, and same defenses as if the claim had never been assigned and the insured never indemnified.

REV_00262588

n252 See infra part VI.A.1.

n253 See infra part VI.A.2.

n254 Potomac Elec. Power Co. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 54 F.R.D. 486 (D. Md. 1972) (discussed supra part V.C).

n255 Childers v. Eastern Foam Prods., Inc., 94 F.R.D. 53 (N.D. Ga. 1982) (discussed supra part V.D).

n256 See Glacier Gen. Assurance Co. v. G. Gordon Symons Co., 631 F.2d 131, 134 (9th Cir. 1980) (stating that joinder of reinsurers is not required under Rule 19(a) because defendants "are protected from future actions by the reinsurers"); Dudley v. Smith, 504 F.2d 979, 983 (5th Cir. 1974) (finding Rule 19(a) requires joinder when there is a substantial risk of "multiplicity of suits," but requirement of 19(a) not met when insured sues for the full amount of the loss); Tucson Elec. Power Co. v. Bailey Controls Co., 145 F.R.D. 102, 105 (D. Ariz. 1992) (finding criteria of Rule 19(a) do not reach insurer); Prudential Lines v. General Tire Int'l Co., 74 F.R.D. 474, 475 (S.D.N.Y. 1977) ("res judicata would protect the defendant from another suit"); White Hall Bldg. Corp. v. Profexray Div. of Litton Indus., 387 F. Supp. 1202, 1206 (E.D. Pa. 1974) (finding nonparty is bound by a judgment "if he had a sufficient interest in the suit and participated in and controlled the litigation;" therefore, Rule 19 does not require joinder of insurers), aff'd mem., 578 F.2d 1377 (3d Cir. 1978) and aff'd mem. sub nom. Quaglia v. Profexray Div. of Litton Indus., 578 F.2d 1375 (3d Cir. 1978). These cases also are notable for their rejection of pre-1966 precedent, including Aetna, in favor of performing the flexible analysis under amended Rule 19 that the Supreme Court called for in Provident Tradesmens. In Dudley v. Smith, the Fifth Circuit distinguished Aetna and other contrary authority by pointing out that these cases had not been reasoned in terms of the Rule 19 criteria. 504 F.2d at 983. Courts also have distinguished Aetna on the ground that Aetna did not involve a question of compulsory joinder of an insurer and, thus, its pronouncement that the insurers were "necessary" parties was dicta. White Hall Bldg. Corp., 387 F. Supp. at 1207; Prudential Lines, 74 F.R.D. at 475.

n257 74 F.R.D. 474 (S.D.N.Y. 1977).

n258 Id. at 476.

n259 145 F.R.D. 102 (D. Ariz. 1992).

n260 Id. at 105. See Glacier General, 631 F.2d at 134 (stating that the defendants "are protected from future actions by the insurers") (citing Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 485 F.2d 78, 84 & n.15. (4th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 935 (1974)). The citation to Virginia Electric is apparently to that court's assertion that, "even without joinder the partial subrogee is generally precluded from bringing a subsequent action . . . where a judgment has been rendered in a suit by the subrogor for the entire loss." 485 F.2d at 84. The Ninth Circuit gave no reason, other than the Fourth Circuit's statement about what is "generally" true, in support of its conclusion that the non-party insurers would be bound by its decision in the case before it. In Virginia Electric, moreover, the insurer had agreed to be bound by any judgment, id. at 83 n.3, but there is no indication of such an agreement in Glacier General.

See also the court's observation in Celanese Corp. v. John Clark Indus., 214 F.2d 551, 556 (5th Cir. 1954):

It was understood by all that the counsel for the insurance companies were in active conduct of the suit and the judgment entered would have barred them whether or not they were actually in the cause, so that defendant was at no time concerned with the question of lack of finality of the judgment or the possibility of its being again sued.

See also Acro Automation Sys. v. Iscont Shipping Ltd., 706 F. Supp. 413, 422 (D. Md. 1989) (stating that the insurer's "complete control over the present litigation will preclude it from relitigating any of the issues which will be litigated in this action"); White Hall Bldg. Corp., 387 F. Supp. at 1207 (stating that insurers will be bound "even though they are not parties of record, because of their interest in and control of plaintiff's case") (discussed supra note 208).

n261 See Montana v. United States, 440 U.S. 147, 155-58 (1979) (holding that although United States was not a party to prior litigation, it had exercised sufficient control to be bound by principles of res judicata); Restatement (First) of the Law of Judgments section 84 (1942):

A person who is not a party but who controls an action, individually or in cooperation with others, is bound by the adjudications of litigated matters as if he were a party if he has a proprietary or financial interest in the judgment or in the determination of a question of fact or of a question of law with reference to the same subject matter or transaction; if the other party has notice of his participation, the other party is equally bound.

See also Restatement (Second) of the Law of Judgments section 39 (1982) ("A person who is not a party to an action but who controls or substantially participates in the control of the presentation on behalf of a party is bound by the determination of issues decided as though he were a party."). As comment b to section 39 states: "The rule stated in the Section applies to issue preclusion, and not to claim preclusion, because the person controlling the litigation, as a non-party, is by definition asserting or defending a claim other than one he himself may have." Id.

n262 See Restatement (Second) of the Law of Judgments section 41 (1982). There is also no risk of multiple litigation, of course, if the insurer has no right of subrogation following an action by the insured. See Cleaves v. DeLauder, 302 F. Supp. 36, 38 (N.D. W. Va. 1969) (finding no risk of multiple litigation because partially compensating insurer under West Virginia law has no claim against tortfeasor); Entman, supra note 1, at 911 & n.106 (discussing when suit instigated by either employee or insurer precludes other from also filing suit).

n263 Potomac Elec. Power Co. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 54 F.R.D. 486, 492 (D. Md. 1972) (discussed supra part V.C). Cf. Klick v. American Mut. Ins. Co., 80 F.R.D. 711, 713 (E.D. Wis. 1978) (holding that joinder of insurer not required by Rule 19 because Wisconsin workers' compensation statute provided that insurer is bound by the judgment if it has notice of the insured's action against third party).

n264 Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(c) places upon the defendant the burden of pleading res judicata.

n265 See supra notes 257-60 and accompanying text.

n266 Fed. R. Civ. P. 17(a) provides, in pertinent part:

No action shall be dismissed on the ground that it is not prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest until a reasonable time has been allowed after objection for ratification of commencement of the action by, or joinder or substitution of, the real party in interest; and such ratification, joinder, or substitution shall have the same effect as if the action had been commenced in the name of the real party in interest.

REV_00262590

n267 United Coal Cos. v. Powell Constr. Co., 839 F.2d 958, 960 (3d Cir. 1988) (trial court took no action on defendant's motion to add subrogated insurers because the insurers executed ratification agreements); Sovereign Chem. & Petroleum Prods. Inc. v. Ameropan Oil Corp., 148 F.R.D. 208, 210 (N.D. Ill. 1992) (holding partially subrogated insurer not indispensable because it had ratified action brought in name of insured, which had assigned to insurer right to sue in insured's name); Prosperity Realty v. Haco-Canon, 724 F. Supp. 254, 258 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) (finding that insurer's substitution as plaintiff is not required where insurer has filed affidavit ratifying suit and agreeing to be bound by decision); Acme Mkts. v. Shaffer Trucking, 102 F.R.D. 216, 218 (E.D. Pa. 1984) (explaining ratification as an alternative to joinder); Stouffer Corp. v. Dow Chem. Co., 88 F.R.D. 336, 338 (E.D. Pa. 1980) (finding ratification agreement protected party against multiple litigation); Whitcomb v. Ford Motor Co., 79 F.R.D. 244, 245 (M.D. Pa. 1978) ("Compulsory joinder is not appropriate where, as here, the partially subrogated insurers have authorized plaintiffs insureds to prosecute the action for them and have agreed to be bound by the results of the action."); Kint v. Terrain King Corp., 79 F.R.D. 10, 11 (M.D. Pa. 1977) (describing situation where subrogated insurer filed a "certificate authorizing plaintiff insured to prosecute the action 'for its benefit' and agreeing to be bound by the results of the litigation;" consequently, insurer is not a party to be joined under Rule 19(a)).

Some federal courts have ordered that insurers file ratifications of the insureds' actions in order to avoid the defendants' objections to nonjoinder of the insurers. See, e.g., In re Wuttke, 2 B.R. 362, 364 (Bankr. D.N.J. 1980); Lister v. Plunk, 77 F.R.D. 359, 360 (N.D. Miss. 1977); James v. Nashville Bridge Co., 74 F.R.D. 595, 597 (N.D. Miss. 1977); Pace v. General Elec. Co., 55 F.R.D. 215, 219 (W.D. Pa. 1972). The ratification solution was also suggested by Edwards, Inc. v. Arlen Realty & Dev. Corp., 466 F. Supp. 505, 512-13 (D.S.C. 1978), in which the court lamented that it was bound to require joinder by the Fourth Circuit decision in Virginia Electric.

n268 93 F.R.D. 845 (E.D. Pa. 1982).

n269 Id. at 846. Ratification should be distinguished from waiver. If the insurer has actually waived all its rights against the third party and is not in control of the insured's action, there is no substantive basis for the insurer's presence as a party plaintiff, Lister v. Marangoni Meccanica S.P.A., 133 F.R.D. 177, 179 (C.D. Utah 1990), and ratification of the insured's action is simply irrelevant.

n270 Hancotte, 93 F.R.D. at 847.

n271 See supra note 266.

n272 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), 17(a). When the plaintiff-insured is not a proper party under the substantive law, the court has authority to dismiss the action for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted or to order substitution of the insurer. In addition, as argued below, infra part VII, federal courts sometimes have authority to find the insurer's joinder required on the basis of state substantive law.

n273 See Entman, supra note 1, at 906-08 (discussing the provision for ratification and the resulting reintroduction of "use" practice).

n274 Preliminary Draft of Proposed Amendments to Rules of Civil Procedure for the United States District Courts, Part I - Amendments to Effect Unification of Civil and Admiralty Procedure, Rule 17(a) Advisory Committee's Note, reprinted in, 34 F.R.D. 325, 341-42 (1964) [hereinafter Preliminary Draft]; see Saint Paul Marine Transp. Corp. v. Cerro Sales Corp., 505 F.2d 1115, 1118 (9th Cir. 1974) (noting admiralty practice to allow owners to sue on behalf of master and crew).

REV_00262591

n275 2A Ellen Flynn & Gina A. Raduazzo, Benedict on Admiralty section 53, at 6-10 (7th ed. 1992).

n276 Id. section 53, at 6-11 to 6-13.

n277 Preliminary Draft, supra note 274, 34 F.R.D. at 331-36.

n278 The Committee proposed that the following concluding sentence be added to rule 17 (a):

No action for loss or misdelivery of, or damage to, maritime cargo, or for general average contribution to such cargo, or for salvage, and no action for personal injury or death governed by section 33 of the Longshoremen's and Harborworkers' Compensation Act, as amended . . . shall be dismissed on the ground that it is not prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest until a reasonable time has been allowed after objection for ratification of commencement of the action by, or joinder or substitution of, the real party in interest; and such ratification, joinder or substitution shall have the same effect as if the action has been commenced in the name of the real party in interest.

Id. at 341.

n279 The Reporter later explained that the relation-back effect of the amendment would:

prevent failure of actions for reasons not going to the merits when the defendant had been informed through the institution of the action against him that rights were being asserted . . . . So sound did this proposed amendment of the rule seem that when it reached the Court it had been enlarged to cover all civil cases, not merely the particular maritime actions, and in that form it was approved.

Kaplan, supra note 69, at 411.

It is at least arguable that an amendment to Rule 17(a) was not necessary to achieve this purpose because a 1966 amendment of Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(c) provided for relation back under the same circumstances, although the latter rule did not explicitly apply to parties plaintiff. Entman, supra note 1, at 904-05.

n280 The failure to realize the conflict between the real party in interest rule and admiralty's ratification practice is evident in the Reporter's comment that, "Apparently something on the order of a real party in interest doctrine applied in admiralty." Kaplan, supra note 69, at 411 n.209. An admiralty authority, however, does seem to have appreciated the conflict, remarking:

The admiralty principles discussed hereinabove in this chapter [see supra notes 273-76 and accompanying text (regarding proper parties and ratification in admiralty)] have been established by the decisions of the courts over many years. The application of Rule 17(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure to admiralty cases is bound to affect the principles discussed but the extent of the impact remains for future decisions. Certainly, when possible, the plaintiff named in a complaint should be the party who has suffered the loss. However, it is sometimes impossible to ascertain what party has legally suffered loss of cargo until after the time for suit will have expired and, in such cases, suit in the name of the shipper from whom title has passed or in the name of a volunteer, may be the only practical course to follow.

REV_00262592

Flynn & Raduazzo, supra note 275, section 54, at 6-14. It appears, ironically, that admiralty has had more of an impact on civil procedure than vice versa.

n281 With regard to use practice, see supra part III.A.

n282 See Entman, supra note 1, at 899-900. Professor Atkinson stated that abolition of use practice was "the real party in interest statute's only real accomplishment." Atkinson, supra note 44, at 946; see also United States v. Aetna Casualty & Sur. Co., 338 U.S. 366, 381 (1949) ("Under the Federal Rules, the 'use' practice is obviously unnecessary, as has long been true in equity . . . .").

n283 See Plissey, supra note 63, at 177-78 (stating that the provision in Rule 17(a) for ratification "actually encourages the device of use plaintiffs").

n284 See 6A Wright et al., supra note 28, section 1555, at 417-18. Wright, Miller, and Kane explain:

The reference to "ratification" in Rule 17(a) seems to be a carryover from the original draft of the sentence added in 1966, which was to apply only to certain maritime proceedings, and probably was intended to adopt the procedure in salvage actions by which nonparties seek their share of the recovered property. Nonetheless, some federal courts have interpreted the word to validate an arrangement by which the real party in interest authorizes the continuation of an action brought by another and agrees to be bound by its result, thereby eliminating any risk of multiple liability.

n285 Fed. R. Civ. P. 17 Advisory Committee's Note (1966); see also Clarkson Co. v. Rockwell Int'l Corp., 441 F. Supp. 792, 797-98 (N.D. Cal. 1977) (finding ratification justified on grounds of difficulty of determining proper plaintiffs); Hobbs v. Police Jury of Morehouse Parish, 49 F.R.D. 176, 180 (W.D. La. 1970) (explaining that when determination of the proper party to bring the action was not difficult and when no excusable mistake had been made, the last sentence of Rule 17(a) is inapplicable and the action should be dismissed); Friedenthal et al., supra note 73, at 322 n.28 (stating that the key factors to be considered in permitting the amendment are whether the delay will prejudice the defendant and whether the plaintiff has some reasonable excuse for the error as to the real party in interest); 6A Wright et al., supra note 28, section 1555, at 415 ("A literal interpretation of the last sentence of Rule 17(a) would make it applicable to every case in which an inappropriate plaintiff has been named. However, the rule should be applied only to cases in which substitution of the real party in interest is necessary to avoid injustice.").

n286 See supra note 267.

n287 See infra part VI.B.

n288 See infra part VI.B.

n289 Cf. Mansfield v. Paxon, 899 F.2d 649, 651 (7th Cir. 1990) (denying compensation insurer's motion to intervene as a "silent party plaintiff" because no such status is sanctioned by federal rules).

REV_00262593

n290 Compare ICON Group, Inc. v. Mahogany Run Dev. Corp., 829 F.2d 473, 478 (3d Cir. 1987) (stating that "proper ratification" requires that the ratifying party authorize the action and agree to be bound by its result, but assumption of financial obligations was unnecessary in light of the interest and solvency of the named plaintiff) with Clarkson Co. Ltd. v. Rockwell Int'l Corp., 441 F. Supp. 792, 797 (N.D. Cal. 1977) (ratifying entities agreed "to be bound by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for purposes of discovery in the action") and with Municipality of Anchorage v. Baugh Constr. & Eng'g Co., 722 P.2d 919, 924-26 (Alaska 1986) ("Under Alaska Civil Rule 17(a) . . . the ratifying party is subject to any orders the court may make concerning discovery or attorney's fees . . . . Ratification assures that all interested parties bear the burdens of claims litigated on their behalf."). Cf. United Coal Cos. v. Powell Constr. Co., 839 F.2d 958, 965 (3d Cir. 1988) (ratifying subrogated insurers were "co-plaintiffs" for purposes of attorney-client privilege, and apparently all other purposes).

n291 Others have been much more sanguine about nonparty insurers controlling litigation. In Prosperity Realty v. Haco-Canon, 724 F. Supp. 254 (S.D.N.Y. 1989), the court declined, because of a ratification agreement, to order joinder of the subrogated insurer. The defendant argued that the insurer should be named because it was controlling the litigation. The court responded: "That argument is not persuasive. 'As a practical matter, . . . the insurance company will control the prosecution no matter in whose name it is brought.'" Id. at 258 (quoting 6 Wright & Miller, supra note 167, section 1546, at 656). The substance of the quotation is currently found at 6A Wright et al., supra note 28, section 1546, at 354. See also Albert E. Jenner, Jr. & Philip W. Tone, Pleading, Parties and Trial Practice, 50 Nw. U. L. Rev. 612, 612 (1955) ("An insured under an automobile collision policy who has collected for property damage under the policy ordinarily has no control over a subrogation action brought subsequently in his name by the insurer under the subrogation provision of the policy.").

n292 Fed. R. Civ. P. 11 (authorizing sanctions against represented parties for violations of the rule's requirements for pleadings, motions, and papers), 16(f) (authorizing sanctions against parties for violations of the rule's requirements for scheduling and pretrial orders and conferences), 37 (applying sanctions for failure to comply with court order), 54(d) (allowing prevailing party to recover costs) & 68 (requiring offeree to pay costs if judgment is not more favorable than offer).

n293 See Independent Fed. of Flight Attendants v. Zipes, 491 U.S. 754, 761 (1989) (holding that district court may award Title VII attorney's fees against party intervenor not charged with Title VII violation, but only if intervenor's action is frivolous, unreasonable, or without foundation); Truckweld Equip. Co. v. Swenson Trucking & Excavating Co., 649 P.2d 234, 238 (Alaska 1982) (stating that joinder of insurer should be required because of Alaska's "broad costs and attorney's fees provisions . . . . Where a party's claim is directly litigated before the courts of this state, we believe that party should bear the burdens as well as the benefits of the litigation."). See also New York News, Inc. v. Kheel, 972 F.2d 482 (2d Cir. 1992) (holding aggrieved non-party who is target of baseless allegations in a complaint does not have standing to move for Rule 11 sanctions).

n294 See G. Heileman Brewing Co. v. Joseph Oat Corp., 871 F.2d 648, 650 n.1 (7th Cir. 1989) (en banc) (stating that Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 16 does not limit district court's inherent authority to require party represented by counsel to attend pretrial settlement conference). In a case that illustrates the problem of nonparties in control of litigation, the Eleventh Circuit held that district courts have no authority, either inherent or under Rule 16, to order the appearance at a settlement conference of an employee of the defendant's liability insurer, even though only the employee, and not the defendant or his attorney, had settlement authority. In re Novak, 932 F.2d 1397, 1403-08 (11th Cir. 1991).

n295 See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 30 (duty to appear at deposition); 33 (interrogatories to a party); 35 (physical or mental examination of a party or person under control of a party); 36 (requests for admissions).

REV_00262594

[*16] adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. [58]

While use practice or suit in the name of the insured alone may have appeared to be a workable solution to the problem of the proper plaintiff when there had been partial subrogation, it really did no more than mask the underlying problem, which was how to recognize the rights of both insured and insurer without creating a risk of multiple litigation. If the rule were to have achieved its goal, it would have required that the insurer be bound by the judgment in any action brought in the name of the insured to recover the subrogated claim. But in a case of partial subrogation, if the rule really meant that only the insured, like a trustee, was entitled to control an action against the third party, then the rule effectively reduced the insurer's subrogation right to a claim for reimbursement. [59]

Some courts, therefore, while generally following the rule that [*17] the insured alone is the only proper plaintiff, carved out exceptions to protect the interests of the partially subrogated insurer. For example, some courts permitted the insurer to prosecute an action in the name of the insured when the insured declined to bring the claim. [60] Carving out exceptions, however, did not adequately deal with the problems caused by the rule that the insured was the only proper named plaintiff in a subrogation action. Such a rule is simply not a satisfactory way of dealing with the complexity that subrogation introduces into litigation. [61] It merely simplifies the question of whom to name as the plaintiff by rendering the name meaningless, and defers resolution of problems to other stages in the litigation.

The United States Supreme Court appeared to announce the demise of use practice when it stated in 1949 that the practice was "obviously unnecessary" under modern rules of civil procedure. [62] Use practice, nevertheless, has not disappeared. It has found a new incarnation in the device of ratification under the 1966 amendment to Rule 17(a). [63] As of 1992, moreover, twelve states explicitly permitted suit in the name of the insured alone even with total subrogation. [64]
[*18]

B. Necessary Parties

The other pre-merger approach to resolving questions of proper parties and insurance subrogation was to apply doctrines of compulsory joinder that originated in equity and were ultimately incorporated into the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. [65] Courts of equity, of course, had no difficulty in accepting a subrogee as a party plaintiff on the basis of its equitable and beneficial right to recovery. [66] With both subrogor and subrogee permitted to enforce a claim, however, the issue then arose whether both must appear as plaintiffs when one chose to bring suit.

Joinder of parties in law courts had been quite limited: plaintiffs were compelled to join when their rights were "joint," and no other joinder was permitted. [67] In equity, on the other hand, joinder of all interested parties was encouraged to prevent a multiplicity of suits. [68] In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, equity's per [*19] missive attitude toward joinder was combined with the idea that equity should do complete justice by requiring the joinder of all persons, known as "necessary parties," having an interest in the subject matter of the litigation, thus leading to a rule of compulsory joinder. [69] Authorities generally agree that compulsory joinder of "necessary" parties was motivated by three purposes: 1) to protect absentees whose out-of-court situations might be adversely affected by the litigation; 2) to protect the defendant from subsequent litigation reaching inconsistent results; 3) to protect both the parties and society from unnecessary multiplicity of litigation. [70]

At first, courts excused joinder of necessary parties when joinder was impossible, impractical or unduly complicated. [71] Later, however, the doctrine of indispensability emerged. According to this doctrine, there are "indispensable" parties whose relationship to the controversy is so n296 See Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(d) (binding only parties to the action and certain others to court orders granting injunction or restraining order).

REV_00262541

n297 See also United States v. City of Oakland, 958 F.2d 300, 301 (9th Cir. 1992) ("Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure 3 and 4 clearly contemplate that only parties may file a notice of appeal.").

n298 See Entman, supra note 1, at 946-49 (discussing the relationship between diversity jurisdiction and the real party in interest rule).

n299 See generally 14 Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure section 3637 (devices to create diversity jurisdiction), section 3638 (change of state citizenship), section 3639 (assignments), section 3640 (appointments), section 3641 (devices to defeat diversity jurisdiction), section 3642 (utilization of John Doe defendants) (1985).

n300 See Navarro Sav. Ass'n v. Lee, 446 U.S. 458, 464-66 (1980) (holding that individual trustees of a Massachusetts business trust may invoke diversity jurisdiction on the basis of their own citizenship, regardless of the citizenships of the trust beneficiaries because the trustees, and not the beneficiaries, exercised control of the litigation); 3A Moore et al., supra note 108, paragraph 17.04, at 17-14; 13B Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure section 3606, at 418-19 (1984).

There are exceptions to the general rule. 28 U.S.C.A. section 1332(c)(2) (West Supp. 1993) states:

The legal representative of the estate of a decedent shall be deemed to be a citizen only of the same State as the decedent, and the legal representative of an infant or incompetent shall be deemed to be a citizen only of the same State as the infant or incompetent.

Similarly, in a direct action against an insurer, the insurer is deemed a citizen of the state of which the insured is a citizen, as well as the insurer's state of incorporation and principal place of business. Id. section 1332(c)(1).

n301 See Entman, supra note 1, at 946-49 (discussing misapplication of Rule 17(a) and analyzing the adverse effect on the principles of diversity jurisdiction).

n302 See 13B Wright et al., supra note 300, section 3606, at 418 (discussing the principle that diversity jurisdiction should be based on the citizenship of the parties in actual control of the litigation, not on that of a nominal representative).

n303 485 F.2d 78 (4th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 935 (1974).

n304 See Entman, supra note 1, at 920-22, 947-48; supra notes 172-92 and accompanying text (discussing Virginia Electric); see also Garcia v. Hall, 624 F.2d 150, 152 (10th Cir. 1980) (holding that suit may proceed in the name of the insured alone where the partially subrogated insurer is non-diverse and "has instituted this suit in the name of the insured for the entire loss and will be bound by the judgment").

n305 28 U.S.C. section 1359 (1988).

n306 See 14 Wright et al., supra note 299, sections 3637-42 (showing that section 1359 has not been aggressively applied by federal courts until recently).

n307 See Pratt v. First Hays Banshares, Inc., 682 F. Supp. 1177, 1180-82 (D. Kan. 1988)

(dismissing suit pursuant to 28 U.S.C. section 1359; diverse party had shown no reason unrelated to diversity jurisdiction for turning over all rights except his name in settlement agreement, when full assignment would have destroyed diversity). In Unigard Sec. Ins. Co. v. M.W. Carlson Assocs., 657 F. Supp. 1146 (N.D. Ill. 1987), the court held that an insured's assignment to its insurer of its entire interest in the lawsuit against the defendant for $ 100, the amount of its deductible, violated 28 U.S.C. section 1359. Id. at 1147-48. Prior to the assignment, the court had held that because of the insured's pecuniary interest, the insured was an indispensable party plaintiff. Unigard Sec. Ins. Co. v. M.W. Carlson Assocs., No. 86 C 6898, 1987 WL 6623, at *1 - *2 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 9, 1987). Unfortunately, Unigard may be a case in which the section 1359 ruling was both unfortunate and ultimately unfair. Had the court appreciated that the insured was not an indispensable, or even proper, plaintiff merely because it had a pecuniary interest, the court might have found that there was complete diversity and it would not have been faced with the insurer's attempt to reach that result through the assignment.

n308 See, e.g., Celanese Corp. of Am. v. John Clark Indus., Inc., 214 F.2d 551, 556-57 (5th Cir. 1954) (suggesting that the defendant's reason for attempting to join the plaintiff's insurance companies was to inform the jury that the plaintiff was insured, and thereby potentially prejudice the plaintiff's case); Acro Automation Sys. v. Iscont Shipping, Ltd., 706 F. Supp. 413, 421 (D. Md. 1989) ("[The defendants] would consider it a strategic advantage to have the jury know that a plaintiff has another source of recovery other than from them."); Stouffer Corp. v. Dow Chem. Co., 88 F.R.D. 336, 338 (E.D. Pa. 1980) ("There is a substantial risk of prejudice to an insurer which is forced to join as a plaintiff, as the presence of an insurer may affect a jury's decision on the merits."); Kint v. Terrain King Corp., 79 F.R.D. 10, 12 n.4 (M.D. Pa. 1977) (citing prejudice to the plaintiff as one factor supporting a decision denying a motion under Rule 19 to join the plaintiff's insurance companies); Public Serv. Co. v. Crane Co., 48 F.R.D. 424, 425 (N.D. Okla. 1969) (indicating a "strong possibility" that presence of an insurance company as a party "will generate prejudice or favoritism in the jury process"), aff'd, 467 F.2d 1143 (10th Cir. 1972); Thrasher v. United States Liab. Ins. Co., 225 N.E.2d 503, 507 (N.Y. 1967) ("The law maintains the fiction that the insured is the real party in interest at the trial of the underlying negligence action in order to protect the insurance company against overly sympathetic juries."). But see Tucson Elec. Power Co. v. Bailey Controls Co., 145 F.R.D. 102, 104 (D. Ariz. 1992) (asserting that concern about jury prejudice is irrelevant to Rule 19 motion).

n309 See, e.g., Rozark Farms, Inc. v. Ozark Border Elec. Coop., 849 F.2d 306, 308-09 (8th Cir. 1988) (holding that it is prejudicial error to admit irrelevant evidence of insurance coverage); Adams Lab., Inc. v. Jacobs Eng'g Co., 761 F.2d 1218, 1226 (7th Cir. 1985) (stating that references to opposing party's insurance coverage may be prejudicial error if made intentionally and designed to prejudice the jury); City of Cleveland v. Peter Kiewit Sons' Co., 624 F.2d 749, 758 (6th Cir. 1980) (indicating that an attorney runs the risk of a mistrial by raising the issue of insurance improperly); Dow Chem. Corp. v. Weevil-Cide Co., 630 F. Supp. 125, 128-29 (D. Kan. 1986) (holding that application of Wisconsin direct action statute would violate Kansas public policy of avoiding the potential prejudice caused by a jury's knowledge of a defendant's liability insurance); Larsen v. Powell, 16 F.R.D. 322, 324 (D. Colo. 1954) (stating that knowledge of insurance might prejudice the jury).

n310 See, e.g., Pace v. General Elec. Co., 55 F.R.D. 215, 218 (W.D. Pa. 1972) ("We feel compelled to say a good word for juries . . . . With the universality of insurance covering so many aspects of their lives, they show no prejudice against the organization providing this service . . . ."); Truckweld Equip. Co. v. Swenson Trucking & Excavating, Inc., 649 P.2d 234, 238 n.4 (Alaska 1982) ("We are not impressed by abstract claims of prejudice resulting from the jury's knowledge of partial coverage. Insurance is a widely accepted fact of life."); 2A Larson, supra note 18, section 74.41(c), at 14-627 (referring to the concern about jury prejudice as a "bugaboo"). See also Atkinson, supra note 44, at 944 ("It may well be that the best solution of the problem, regardless of whether an insurer is a party or not is that the court should caution the jurors that either party or both may be protected by insurance with which the jury has nothing to do, and that their job is to determine the defendant's liability upon the basis of fault."); Kennedy, supra note 28, at 715 (concluding that regardless of joinder, the judge "ought to inform the jury fully as to any subrogation interests in the plaintiff's claim" because "frank disclosure to the jury of the real interests involved is the only way to elicit good verdicts").

REV_00262596

n311 Johnson, supra note 64, at 1133-35 (observing that jury prejudice may be more relevant when the insurance company is a defendant because a jury may assess damages on a deep-pocket theory). Contra Alan Calnan, The Insurance Exclusionary Rule Revisited: Are Reports of Its Demise Exaggerated?, 52 Ohio St. L.J. 1177, 1203 (1991) (describing empirical evidence that jurors are affected by knowledge of plaintiff's insurance coverage).

n312 See, e.g., United States v. Aetna Casualty & Sur. Co., 338 U.S. 366, 380-81 (1949) ("If the subrogee has paid an entire loss suffered by the insured, it is the only real party in interest and must sue in its own name.").

n313 See Fed. R. Evid. 105 ("When evidence which is admissible as to one party or for one purpose but not admissible as to another party of for another purpose is admitted, the court, upon request, shall restrict the evidence to its proper scope and instruct the jury accordingly."); see generally Jeanean Kirk, Comment, Instructing the Jury on the Irrelevancy of Insurance Coverage, 20 Ariz. St. L.J. 1069 (1988) (discussing cautionary jury instructions on disclosure of insurance coverage).

n314 See Travelers Ins. Co. v. Riggs, 671 F.2d 810, 814 (4th Cir. 1982) (noting that federal policy "abjures concealed or fictional issues and parties in interest and attempts to avoid unfair prejudice by jury voir dire, cautionary instructions, and other corrective measures rather than by a concealment of interests that is likely to be ineffectual in any event").

n315 See supra part VI.A.

n316 See supra part VI.B.

n317 See, e.g., Glacier Gen. Assurance Co. v. G. Gordon Symons Co., 631 F.2d 131 (9th Cir. 1980) (discussed supra note 260 and infra text accompanying notes 321-23); Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 485 F.2d 78 (4th Cir. 1973) (discussed supra part V.B), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 935 (1974); Tucson Elec. Power Co. v. Bailey Controls Co., 145 F.R.D. 102 (D. Ariz. 1992) (denying defendant's motion to join compensating insurer who was in exclusive control of litigation); White Hall Bldg. Corp. v. Profexray Div. of Litton Indus., 387 F. Supp. 1202 (E.D. Pa. 1974) (discussed supra notes 208, 260 and accompanying text), aff'd mem., 578 F.2d 1377 (3d Cir. 1978) and aff'd mem. sub nom. Quaglia v. Profexray Div. of Litton Indus., 578 F.2d 1375 (3d Cir. 1978).

n318 See, e.g., Potomac Elec. Power Co. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 54 F.R.D. 486 (D. Md. 1972) (discussed supra text accompanying notes 193-208); Ward v. Franklin Equip. Co., 50 F.R.D. 93, 95 (E.D. Va. 1970) ("Although this action is instituted in the name of the insured, it is clear the insurer is in control of the litigation and caused it to be filed . . . . Pursuant to the provisions of Rule 19(a) . . . it is ordered that the insurer be joined as a party plaintiff . . . .").

n319 See, e.g., Public Serv. Co. of Okla. v. Black & Veatch, 467 F.2d 1143 (10th Cir. 1972) (discussed supra notes 159-70 and accompanying text).

n320 See, e.g., Gas Serv. Co. v. Hunt, 183 F.2d 417, 419 (10th Cir. 1950) (discussed supra notes 119-27, 134-36 and accompanying text); Jefferson v. Ametek, Inc., 86 F.R.D. 425, 427 n.2 (D. Md. 1980) (noting that federal, not state, rules control determination of the proper parties in a federal court); Cross v. Harrington, 294 F. Supp. 1340, 1341 (N.D. Miss. 1969) (holding that compulsory joinder is governed by federal law because it is a procedural aspect of a case); Wright v. Schebler Co., 37 F.R.D. 319, 321 (S.D. Iowa 1965) ("Whether or not a defendant can compel a compensation carrier to be joined as a party is a procedural problem. The Illinois rule thereon is not binding upon this Court; the federal rule governs.") (discussed supra notes 137-43 and accompanying text); Braniff Airways v. Falkingham, 20 F.R.D. 141, 143 (D. Minn. 1957) (holding that while state law is used to determine substantive rights, the issue of whether a party is "necessary" is procedural, governed by federal rules). See also Wadsworth v. United States Postal Serv., 511 F.2d 64, 66 (7th Cir. 1975) (stating that plaintiff's attorney was incorrect in following Illinois practice rather than Aetna, which requires insurer's joinder); Childers v. Eastern Foam Prods., Inc., 94 F.R.D. 53, 57-58 (N.D. Ga. 1982) (noting a Georgia appellate decision requiring joinder, but ordering joinder pursuant to Federal Rule 19) (discussed supra part V.D); Potomac Elec., 54 F.R.D. at 492 (noting, but otherwise ignoring, a Maryland rule requiring joinder) (discussed supra notes 193-208 and accompanying text).

n321 631 F.2d 131 (9th Cir. 1980).

n322 Id. at 134 (citing State ex rel. Slovak v. District Court, 534 P.2d 850, 852 (Mont. 1975)).

n323 Id.

n324 Id.; see also supra note 260. But see Travelers Indem. Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 429 F.2d 77, 79-80 (5th Cir. 1970) (dismissing suit by partially subrogated insurer because of absence of nondiverse insured and other nondiverse insurer, relying upon both Louisiana statute and Rule 19).

n325 223 F. Supp. 534 (D. Mass. 1963), aff'd, 334 F.2d 775 (1st Cir. 1964).

n326 Id. at 536 (citation omitted). See also Kroese v. General Steel Castings Corp., 179 F.2d 760, 761 n.1 (3d Cir. 1950) ("3 Moore's Federal Practice 2153, under Par. 19.07 (2d ed. 1948), states flatly that whether parties are indispensable should be determined in federal court by federal rather than state rules. We think this statement cannot apply where the question of the indispensability of a party depends upon substantive law which in the diversity case, is a matter of the law of the state."); John W. Reed, Compulsory Joinder of Parties in Civil Actions (continuation), 55 Mich. L. Rev. 483, 517 (1983):

In diversity cases the question of indispensability well may be decided upon the basis of state rules. To the extent that required joinder is determined by reference to the character of the parties' rights or interests the problem is essentially substantive and must be settled by reference to the governing law-usually state, under Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, but sometimes federal, as, for example, where copyrights and patents are involved.

(footnotes omitted).

The mandate of Erie applies, of course, not only to the "federal diversity court," but any time a federal court adjudicates a claim for which state law provides the rule of decision, regardless of the basis for federal subject matter jurisdiction. See Henry J. Friendly, In Praise of Erie--And of the New Federal Common Law, 39 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 383, 408 n.122 (1964).

Although Judge Wyzanski relied upon the Erie doctrine, the reasoning and result in Stevens would also be called for by Rules 12(b)(6) and 17(a), each of which requires that the plaintiff be entitled under the substantive law to enforce the claim asserted. See supra notes 27-31 and accompanying text.

n327 381 F.2d 670 (6th Cir. 1967).

REV_00262598

n328 Id. at 677.

n329 Id. at 676. Similarly, in Kuchenig v. California Co., 350 F.2d 551, 557 (5th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 985 (1966), the court held that the plaintiff's demand for a declaration of ownership of certain land must be dismissed because Louisiana law required the presence as a defendant of the adverse claimant's lessor, who could not be joined.

n330 In Kuchenig, 350 F.2d 551, Judge Wisdom discussed the effect of the then-recent decision in Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 472 (1965), in which the Court announced that federal courts should follow federal rules of civil procedure, rather than state law, on "matters which, though falling within the uncertain area between substance and procedure, are rationally capable of classification as either." Kuchenig, 350 F.2d at 553-55. Judge Wisdom concluded that notwithstanding Hanna, the issue of indispensability should be treated as "a run-of-the-mine Erie problem, requiring the usual balancing of substantive and procedural elements." Id. at 555. See also Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 390 U.S. 102, 119 (1968) ("Rule 19 does not prevent the assertion of compelling substantive interests; it merely commands the courts to examine each controversy to make certain that the interests really exist.").

n331 See, e.g., Cleaves v. DeLauder, 302 F. Supp. 36, 38 (N.D. W. Va. 1969) (stating that West Virginia follows "what is said to be the majority rule" that only the insured may sue because of "'the right of the wrongdoer not to have the cause of action against him split up so that he is compelled to defend two actions for the same wrong'" (citation omitted)).

n332 Cf. Kuchenig, 350 F.2d at 556-57:

The mere fact that state law labels a missing person "indispensable" may not always be controlling in federal court. If, for instance, a state indispensability rule were based purely on some administrative or procedural consideration, conceivably that rule might not conclude a federal diversity action. The nature and purpose of the state rule must be determined in each case.

n333 183 F.2d 417 (10th Cir. 1950).

n334 Id. at 419.

n335 City of New York Ins. Co. v. Tice, 152 P.2d 836, 840 (Kan. 1944); see discussion of Hunt, 183 F.2d 417, and Tice, supra notes 119-27 and accompanying text. See also Public Serv. Co. v. Black & Veatch, 467 F.2d 1143 (10th Cir. 1972) (discussed supra notes 159-70 and accompanying text).

n336 Cf. Cleaves v. DeLauder, 302 F. Supp. 36, 38 (N.D. W. Va. 1969) (the insurer "could not maintain an action in its own name in a state court and under the dictates of Erie R.R., this Court may not elevate the partial subrogee's interest above that given by state law") (citation omitted). In Lister v. Marangoni Meccanica S.P.A., 133 F.R.D. 177, 179 (D. Utah 1990), the court distinguished Hunt, 183 F.2d 417, reasoning that the subrogated Workers Compensation Fund was not a real party in interest, and need not be joined, because of its ratification of the employee's action and waiver of its right under Utah law to sue the third party. Lister's analysis is sound, so long as the Fund was not, in spite of its waiver, in actual control of the litigation.

n337 671 F.2d 810 (4th Cir. 1982).

REV_00262599

n338 Id. at 813.

n339 485 F.2d 78 (4th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 935 (1974) (discussed supra notes 172-92 and accompanying text).

n340 Riggs, 671 F.2d at 813 (quoting Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 471 (1965)). Apparently, it was not clear to the Riggs court whether the Virginia Electric rule was derived from Rule 19 and, therefore, required to be applied under the Hanna decision. The Riggs court avoided having to decide that issue by finding the federal rule applicable in any event under Erie.

n341 Id. The court also found that choice of a contrary federal rule would not be outcome-determinative in the sense of Guaranty Trust Co. v. York, 326 U.S. 99 (1945), because "any encouragement it lends to the limited forum shopping that is possible for defendants is simply of the kind that attends any federal rule of procedure thought by litigants to provide tactical advantage." Riggs, 671 F.2d at 814.

n342 Riggs, 671 F.2d at 814 (citing Byrd v. Blue Ridge Rural Elec. Coop., 356 U.S. 525 (1958)).

n343 Id. In support of this proposition, the court quoted the following passage from United States v. Aetna Casualty & Sur. Co., 338 U.S. 366, 382 (1949): "The pleadings should be made to reveal and assert the actual interest of the plaintiff, and to indicate the interests of any others in the claim." The Riggs court may have been reading a bit too much into that particular passage, which may have referred only to the Rule 19 requirement that the pleadings set forth the names of persons who ought to be parties, but who are not joined, and account for their nonjoinder. Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(c).

There are other bases for the Riggs court's assertion that are not cited in the opinion. See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 10(a) (requiring that "in the complaint the title of the action shall include the names of all the parties); Doe v. Frank, 951 F.2d 320, 322-24 (11th Cir. 1992) (indicating that only in exceptional cases may a plaintiff proceed under a fictitious name); National Commodity & Barter Ass'n v. Gibbs, 886 F.2d 1240, 1244-45 (10th Cir. 1989) (citing Rule 10(a), the court sua sponte dismissed the claims of unnamed plaintiffs who had not sought permission to proceed anonymously, and stated that "the federal courts lack jurisdiction over the unnamed parties, as a case has not been commenced with respect to them").

n344 See supra part VI.B. Requiring the insurer to be a party plaintiff in Riggs was correct, not because its joinder was required under Rule 19(a) as the Virginia Electric court suggested, but because it was undisputed that the insurer had commenced the action, as it was entitled to do by Virginia law. Riggs, 671 F.2d at 812-13.

n345 See, e.g., Tenn. R. Civ. P. 17.01 ("A party to whose rights another is subrogated . . . may sue in his own name without joining with him the party for whose benefit the action is brought . . . ."). Similarly, some states permit insurers to use loan receipt agreements to avoid appearing as the party plaintiff in lawsuits that they in fact control. See Entman, supra note 1, at 925-31 (discussing loan receipt agreements, where the insurer makes a loan to the insured equal to the amount of the claim, with an agreement that the insured repay the insurer only if the insured recovers from a third party).

n346 See Entman, supra note 1, at 923-25.

n347 One unusual case is United Sec. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 278 N.W.2d 29 (Iowa 1979), in which the partially compensating insurer, entitled under state law to bring suit in the name of the insured, brought suit in its own name, apparently because the insured was barred from suing by spousal immunity. The court held that the insurer was not a real party in interest entitled to maintain the action because of the Iowa rule that stated:

The right of action remains in the insured for the entire loss, the insured becoming a trustee for the insurer (to the extent of the loss paid by the insurer) in the recovery secured by it; that the right of action for the entire loss is single and cannot be split and separately maintained by the owner and the various insurers who have paid parts of the loss.

Id. at 31 (quoting Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Bremmer, 25 F.2d 75, 76 (8th Cir. 1928)).

n348 In White Hall Bldg. Corp. v. Profexray Div. of Litton Indus., 387 F. Supp. 1202 (E.D. Pa. 1974), aff'd mem., 578 F.2d 1377 (3d Cir. 1978) and aff'd mem. sub nom. Quaglia v. Profexray Div. of Litton Indus., 578 F.2d 1375 (3d Cir. 1978), the court, attempting to identify the proper plaintiff under Rule 17(a) when a loan receipt had been used, observed:

Not surprisingly, this Court's research reveals no Pennsylvania case on point. Under the terms of the loan receipt method of transaction, the insured rather than the insurer initiates any court action brought against a third party and thus neither Pennsylvania's nor other courts would likely encounter the issue of whether the insurer itself could bring the action. It thus becomes necessary to attempt to ascertain what Pennsylvania's courts would do if such issue were in fact raised.

Id. at 1204.

n349 See, e.g., Ill. Ann. Stat. 820, para. 305/5 (Smith-Hurd 1993):

In the event the employee or his personal representative fails to institute a proceeding against such third person at any time prior to 3 months before such action would be barred, the employer may in his own name or in the name of the employee, or his personal representative, commence a proceeding against such other person for the recovery of damages on account of such injury or death to the employee . . . .

n350 See supra note 20.

n351 See, e.g., Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 485 F.2d 78, 82 (4th Cir. 1973) (discussed supra notes 172-92 and accompanying text), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 935 (1974); Tucson Elec. Power Co. v. Bailey Controls Co., 145 F.R.D. 102, 103 (D. Ariz. 1992) (noting that the loan receipt agreement provided that litigation against third party was to be brought in insured's name and maintained "at the expense of and under the exclusive direction and control of" the insurance company).

n352 In K-B Trucking Co. v. Riss Int'l Corp., 763 F.2d 1148 (10th Cir. 1985), the court explained:

The forum state's procedural statute or rule defining the real party in interest concept is not applicable, however, because it only governs who may sue in the state courts; under Rule 17 (a), the federal courts are concerned only with that portion of state law from which the specific right being sued upon stems.

REV_00262601

Id. at 1153 (footnote omitted) (quoting 6 Wright & Miller, supra note 167, at 647-48).

n353 See Arkwright-Boston Mfrs. Mut. Ins. Co. v. City of New York, 762 F.2d 205, 209 (2d Cir. 1985) (stating that claim by insured for its deductible amount and claim by insurer for amount paid to insured are "separate and distinct, and do not constitute unlawful splitting under New York law"); Blatz v. City of Rock Falls, 434 N.E.2d 807, 808 (Ill. App. Ct. 1982) (holding that, under Illinois statute, insured and insurer each may prosecute an action to enforce their beneficial interest). See also Ill. Ann. Stat. ch. 735, para. 5/2-403 (Smith-Hurd 1993) ("A judgment in an action brought and conducted by a subrogee . . . whether in the name of the subrogor or otherwise, is not a bar or a determination on the merits of the case or any aspect thereof in an action by the subrogor to recover upon any other cause of action arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions."); Jenner & Tone, supra note 291, at 613 (explaining that the drafters of the original version of Ill. Ann. Stat. ch 735, para. 5/2-403 recognized the "undesirable effect" of requiring the defendant to litigate the same issues twice, but concluded "that this factor was overbalanced by considerations of fairness to the subrogor who had not had his day in court" in the subrogee's action).

n354 See Wadsworth v. United States Postal Serv., 511 F.2d 64, 66 (7th Cir. 1975), in which the district court had granted the defendant's Rule 17(a) motion to reduce the plaintiff insured's ad damnum to $ 60, the amount of the insured's uncompensated loss. The court of appeals, however, held that under United States v. Aetna Casualty & Sur. Co., 338 U.S. 366 (1949), the district court should have required joinder of the insurer upon a proper motion by the defendant. Wadsworth, 511 F.2d at 67. In Executive Jet Aviation, Inc. v. United States, 507 F.2d 508, 514 (6th Cir. 1974), the defendant argued for a "pro tanto dismissal" of the plaintiff insured's action to the extent of the insurers' claims. The court held that the insurers, who had used a loan receipt agreement to avoid having to sue in their own names, should be given an opportunity to join in the action as plaintiffs. Id. at 515. Because the insurers, under the loan receipt agreement, were to bear the expense and to assume direction and control of the litigation, id. at 510, the court probably should have required substitution of the insurer as the sole party plaintiff. Regarding loan receipts, see Entman, supra note 1, at 925-31.

n355 If both actions are brought in federal court, the court may be able to consolidate them. Fed. R. Civ. P. 42(a). If the first action is resolved in a state court prior to the filing of the federal action, the federal court will not be able to bar the second action because 28 U.S.C. section 1738 requires the federal court to give the state court judgment the same effect that it would be given by the state's courts. 28 U.S.C. section 1738 (1988). In that circumstance, however, the federal court will not be subjected to trying more than one lawsuit.

n356 Cf. Freer, Avoiding Duplicative Litigation, supra note 15, at 844 (advocating broadening compulsory joinder to avoid the risk of multiple litigation, especially to force joinder of plaintiffs in "transactionally related tort cases").

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 10:17 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

substantial that not only should they be joined, but in their absence the court cannot proceed and the action must be dismissed altogether. [72]
[*20]

In the second half of the nineteenth century, equity's flexible principles of compulsory joinder calcified into what came to be known as a "jurisprudence of labels." [73] In the much-quoted and highly influential case of Shields v. Barrow, [74] the Supreme Court described equity's compulsory joinder doctrines in terms of classifications of parties in which "necessary" parties are those "having an interest" in the controversy, but whose "interests are separable from those of the parties before the court," while "indispensable" parties are those whose interests are not separable. [75] Rules of procedure provided similar disembodied abstractions for identifying necessary and indispensable parties. The Field Code [76] provided that "of the parties to the action, those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants." [77] Federal Equity Rule [*21] 37 spoke in terms of "persons having a united interest." [78] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19, as adopted in 1938, [79] retained the [*22] labels "necessary" and "indispensable" [80] and mandated joinder of persons having "a joint interest." [81]

Compulsory joinder decisions under these rules, including the Shields decision itself, have been widely criticized for employing abstractions and labels rather than applying the underlying purposes of compulsory joinder to the facts of the case at hand. [82] As Professor Reed described the problem, "Judges, with human preference for the simplicity and apparent certainty of pat concepts and rules of thumb, tend to lapse into the terminology of joint rights, inseparable rights, and the like, instead of striving (through factual analysis) for a balance of equity and convenience." [83] Similarly, the [*23] Shields formulation has been accused of resulting in "classification of cases by a kind of sloganeering process in which important factual detail was overlooked." [84]

One such slogan widely, though not unanimously, adopted by both state and federal courts [85] was that partially compensated insureds and their compensating insurers were necessary parties when either brought suit. [86] Many courts, on the other hand, held that the insurer was not a necessary party and continued the older practice of suit in the name of the insured alone, at least when subrogation was only partial. [87] Still other courts simply were con [*24] fused by the whole business. [88] In this sloganeering process, however, the courts overlooked the substantive law of insurance subrogation and the underlying purposes of compulsory joinder. And there was no more guilty party than the United States Supreme Court, which in 1949 put its stamp of approval on one of the slogans in a case that vividly illustrates how the jurisprudence of labels diverts attention from the underlying substantive law.

IV. The Aetna Decision and Its Legacy

A. United States v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co.

In the four cases consolidated for appeal in United States v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., [89] an insured allegedly had been injured by the negligence of a federal government employee. [90] The injured parties' insurers had brought suit against the United States pursuant to the Federal Tort Claims Act [91] to recover the amounts they had paid in compensating the injured parties. [92] The issue before the Court was whether an insurer's subrogation claim against the United States was prohibited by the Anti-Assignment Statute, which barred "transfers and assignments" of claims against the United States. [93]

Without discussing whether the compensating insurers were, in

REV_00262542

[*25] fact, subrogated under the substantive law of insurance that applied to each claim, [94] the Court framed the issue before it as whether an insurance company may "bring suit in its own name against the United States upon a claim to which it has become subrogated by payment to an insured who would have been able to bring such an action[.]" [95] The Court concluded that the Anti-Assignment Statute did not bar assignments by operation of law, such as subrogation. [96] Consequently, the right of a subrogee to bring suit against the government under the Tort Claims Act was the same as the subrogee's right to bring suit against a private person. [97]

In concluding its decision, the Aetna Court briefly discussed the proper parties to a suit seeking to recover damages that have been compensated by insurance. Having already assumed that the compensating insurers were subrogees, the Court announced that, under Rule 17(a), a subrogee that has paid an entire loss must sue in its own name alone, while in a case of partial compensation, "both the insured and insurer (and other insurers, if any, who have also paid portions of the loss) have substantive rights against the tortfeasor which qualify them as real parties in interest." [98] Like the Court's facile assumption that a compensating insurer is necessarily subrogated and entitled to enforce a claim, the Court erroneously assumed that the insured's remaining pecuniary interest rendered it a "real party in interest" also entitled to sue. [99]

The Court next discussed the joinder issue. [100] Addressing [*26] whether the insurer might sue alone, [101] or whether the suit must be in the name of the insured for the use of the insurer, or whether all parties in interest must join in the action, the Court first rejected the notion of "use" practice as "obviously unnecessary" under Federal Rule 17(a). [102] The Court added that "no reason appears why such a practice should now be required in cases of partial subrogation, since both insured and insurer 'own' portions of the substantive right and should appear in the litigation in their own names." [103]

The Court then turned to compulsory joinder under Rule 19. In a classic example of labelling, the Court stated that:

Although either party may sue, the United States, upon timely motion, may compel their joinder . . . . 3 Moore, Federal Practice (2d ed.) p. 1348. Both are "necessary" parties. Rule 19 (b), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The pleadings should be made to reveal and assert the actual interest of the plaintiff, and to indicate the interests of any others in the claim. [104]

[*27]

The Aetna Court gave no further explanation of why the insured and the insurer were necessary parties. The Court did not even cite Rule 19(a), which defined "necessary" parties as those with joint interests. Perhaps the Court considered the insured and the insurer to be "necessary" simply because of their "joint" interests, but this reasoning was not in the opinion. Rather, the Court cited subdivision (b), which provided for compulsory joinder of persons who are not "indispensable," but "who ought to be parties if complete relief is to be accorded between those already parties." [105] The Court did not explain why the presence of either the insured or the insurer would be needed to provide complete relief between those already parties. In fact, it would seem that the opposite is true--that a court could resolve the dispute between either insured or insurer and the alleged tortfeasor without the presence of the other party interested in the claim. [106]

The Aetna Court also noted that although it considered both the insured and the insurer to be "necessary" parties, they "clearly" would not be "indispensable" under Rule 19. [107] Thus, the Court suggested that if the party who is not joined is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, the suit may nevertheless proceed without him under Rule 19(b) and the defendant may have to defend two or more actions on the same tort. [108] Again, the Court did not ex [*28] plain its conclusion. The Court stated simply that neither absent party would meet the Shields v. Barrow [109] test that indispensable parties are those with "'an interest of such a nature that a final decree cannot be made without either affecting that interest, or leaving the controversy in such a condition that its final termination may be wholly inconsistent with equity and good conscience.'" [110]

The Aetna decision created an unfortunate, although highly influential, precedent for compelling joinder of a compensating insurer under Rule 19 without regard to either the substantive law or any policies of compulsory joinder. Moreover, the Court's broad statement that the defendant may compel joinder of either insurer or insured was dicta with regard to joinder of the insurer. In each of the cases before the Court, the insurer had brought suit. The Court's failure to analyze the application of Rule 19 or its underlying policies make it difficult to assess the proper precedential value of its dicta. Had the Court at least explained why the insureds were necessary, but not indispensable, it might be possible to determine whether the same reasoning should apply to the insurer, or whether there is any distinction between insured and insurer in this situation that would call for a different result.

The Court's failure to justify its joinder pronouncements in the Aetna opinion is probably attributable to its heavy reliance on Moore's Federal Practice, which had recently been published in second edition. [111] In the 1948 version of the second edition, Pro [*29] fessor Moore described principles for joinder of compensating insurers in his discussion of Rule 17 (a). [112] He echoed Clark's preference [113] for the analogy to partial assignment--that in a case of partial subrogation, either subrogor or subrogee may sue, but that upon defendant's objection, joinder of the other should be compelled. [114] The Moore treatise and the Aetna decision both imply that the role of the substantive law ends with the conclusion that the insurer is entitled to reimbursement. Whether the insured or the insurer each may assert and control a claim against the third party, and whether joinder of the other is required or may be dispensed with, are all treated as matters of federal procedure. [115] And even as to matters of federal procedure, both Moore and Aetna reinforce a jurisprudence of labels, oblivious to underlying policies of compulsory joinder. [116] This approach, in turn, was reflected for many years in lower court decisions, even after the [*30] 1966 amendment to Rule 19 should have settled that the scope of federal compulsory joinder is much narrower and depends upon careful analysis of the substantive rights of the parties. [117]

B. Aetna's Legacy

1. Finding the Real Party in Interest Without Understanding the Substantive Law

One legacy of the Aetna opinion, explored in some detail elsewhere, [118] was a large number of lower court decisions finding that insurers and insureds were both real parties in interest in spite of substantive law to the contrary. The importance of this legacy for present purposes is that an incorrect determination that both insured and insurer are entitled to state a claim for relief against the third party creates an unnecessary joinder issue and, in some cases, an erroneous decision to require joinder.

An illustrative case is Gas Service Co. v. Hunt, [119] decided by the Tenth Circuit one year after the Aetna decision. In Hunt, the circuit court assigned error to the trial court's denial of a defendant's motion to require joinder of subrogated insurers as plaintiffs in an action brought by the insured. The Tenth Circuit reversed and required joinder. [120] The Hunt court first stated that under Kansas law both the insured and the partially compensating insurer were real parties in interest with the substantive right to sue the wrongdoer for their respective shares of the claim. [121] Acknowledging that Kansas permitted the insured to sue alone for the entire claim, the Tenth Circuit concluded that this rule was "procedural rather than

REV_00262544

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*93 Colum. L. Rev. 75, **

Copyright © 1993 The Columbia Law Review.

Columbia Law Review

JANUARY, 1993

93 Colum. L. Rev. 75

LENGTH: 25434 words

ARTICLE: PRIVATE INSURANCE, SOCIAL INSURANCE, AND TORT REFORM: TOWARD A NEW VISION OF COMPENSATION FOR ILLNESS AND INJURY.

Kenneth S. Abraham and Lance Liebman *

* Kenneth S. Abraham is Class of 1962 Professor of Law, University of Virginia School of Law. Lance Liebman is Dean and Professor of Law, Columbia Law School. This Article had its origins in a series of background papers and chapters that the authors prepared for the American Law Institute, Reporters' Study, Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury (1991). We are grateful to our colleagues on that project and to the Institute for their support and assistance. In addition, we thank Lynn Baker, Saul Levmore, William Stuntz, and participants in workshops at Columbia Law School and the University of Pennsylvania Law School for their comments on an earlier draft.

SUMMARY:
... The United States does not have a system for compensating the victims of illness and injury; it has a set of different institutions that provide compensation. ... But unlike many of those programs, in our view, tort law is not a very sensible system of victims' insurance: it makes compensation available only when the injurer's fault can be demonstrated; it reduces compensation to the extent that the victim was at fault; its transactions costs are high; it covers pain and suffering in unlimited amounts even though many victims would wish limited or no such coverage ex ante; and in providing first-dollar coverage without explicit deductibles or coinsurance, it makes itself vulnerable to ex post moral hazard. ... Conversely, the proponents of health and disability insurance reform usually talk of reform without referring at all to the relation between these fields and the tort, workers' compensation, and other no-fault systems. ... In connection with illness and injury, the major additional changes required would be the provision of catastrophic health insurance to the thirty million or more individuals who are now uninsured and the roughly similar number who have limited health insurance, and the expansion of total disability insurance to assure that persons suffering such disability were assured of subsistence-level income in the event of their inability to work. ...

TEXT:
[*75] The United States does not have a system for compensating the victims of illness corrective justice and deterrence unless premiums (or taxes) financing the system were calibrated to responsibility for the losses covered by the system and paid by potential injurers, who might in some cases be potential victims themselves. For instance, oil companies, automobile manufacturers, and smokers would have to be charged higher taxes to finance a national health insurance program than pillow manufacturers and nonsmokers. In effect, financing would have to be cause-based even while the right to compensation was loss-based. Such an approach is theoretically possible, but it would pose enormous administrative difficulties. For this reason, it is unsurprising to see that no existing compensation system falls in the top right cell of the matrix, although private loss-insurance programs seek modestly to achieve deterrence by charging risk-classified premiums and employing other cost-containment measures.

Similarly, it would be extremely difficult to use a fault-based system to achieve wealth redistribution from those with high incomes to those with low incomes. [59] If poor people do not suffer a disproportionately [*92] high (or low) share of the injuries resulting from malpractice or defective products, then an expansive (or restrictive) right to recover in tort for such injuries will not benefit the poor disproportionately. And even if tort law could be shaped so as to benefit poor plaintiffs disproportionately, one would have to take into account the impact of imposing liability on particular categories of defendants and the resulting effect on their employees and customers before one could be certain that a particular rule had a net redistributional effect. Consequently, there is no form of tort liability for personal injury whose main goal is income redistribution, and the bottom left cell of the matrix is empty.

What the matrix does not reveal, however, is why the remaining cells are filled the way they are. Some of the possible explanations make sense, but some require closer analysis. For example, because both fault- and cause-based systems of compensation have the potential to promote deterrence, a nondeterrence explanation for the allocation of some compensation functions to the tort system and others to cause-based systems is desirable. The differences between the capacity of these systems to achieve corrective justice is one possibility. As we noted earlier, [60] however, although the fault system takes the form of a corrective justice system, the widespread incidence of liability insurance limits the degree of correction that flows directly from the defendant to the plaintiff. Moreover, some cause-based systems preserve an attenuated sort of corrective justice by employing a financing mechanism that charges the parties associated with injury-causing activities the cost of compensating for these injuries. On the other hand, some cause-based systems -- most notably auto no-fault -- have no capacity to promote even this attenuated form of corrective justice, because they are financed through premiums paid by potential victims, not by potential injurers. Thus, it may be that the appearance of corrective justice influences the choice between fault- and cause-based systems.

Overall, however, the allocation of functions between fault- and cause-based systems may be determined as much by practical considerations as by reasons of principle or appearance. First, the kinds of personal injuries that have been carved out of the tort system and transferred to cause-based systems often are those believed (sometimes correctly and sometimes not) to be technically susceptible to treatment on a causal basis. Work- and auto-related injuries, vaccine side effects, black lung disease, and birth-related neurological defects are thought to be both easily discernible and in the main distinguishable from other [*93] kinds of injuries or diseases with other causes. [61] The development of broad-based medical, products, or environmental injury compensation systems based on causal responsibility has not yet been possible, however, precisely because of the difficulty of defining a conceptually sound and easily applied compensable event in these fields -- a difficulty that has long been recognized. [62]

Second, as a matter of practical politics, it is almost always easier to adopt a cause-based system if its cost is no greater than the cost of the component of the tort system it replaces. [63] Thus one characteristic of cause-based systems that recommends them is that they generally pay beneficiaries their economic losses only, and often only partial economic losses at that. The tort system, in contrast, purports to pay both economic and noneconomic losses in full. But when the number of injuries resulting from fault is small in comparison to the number caused without fault by the activity in question, even restricting payment to economic losses alone may not be sufficient. Because compensating the economic losses of all eligible claimants might cost more than the component of the tort system a proposed cause-based system would replace, employing cause-based systems runs into political obstacles.

REV_00262612

Similarly, the decision to retain fault-based and cause-based systems at all when they overlap with loss-based systems is easy enough to explain, but not always as easy to justify in principle. Even when it would be feasible to employ broader-based loss insurance systems exclusively, [*94] we have retained tort liability, workers' compensation, and auto no-fault, for example, because of our unwillingness to surrender entirely the possibility of achieving corrective justice and deterrence in the classes of cases that these systems cover. But these systems' capacity to achieve corrective justice and deterrence is inherently limited. Some of the well over $ 100 billion per year spent by these systems -- especially a portion of their transactions costs -- might be better spent compensating the losses of those who suffer illness and injury but are ineligible for recovery in tort or from any cause-based system and are not covered by private or social loss insurance. Proponents of fundamental reform of the tort system commonly make this suggestion, [64] though sometimes without a sufficient appreciation for the difficulties of expanding our various systems of loss insurance. Conversely, the proponents of health and disability insurance reform [65] usually talk of reform without referring at all to the relation between these fields and the tort, workers' compensation, and other no-fault systems. To get a sense of the possibilities, in the next section we examine how these relationships actually operate and then turn in Part III to several visions of the future.

B. Coordination of Benefits

The different programs for compensating the victims of injury and illness analyzed thus far relate to each other not only conceptually; in actual operation the coverage provided by the different programs sometimes overlaps. Examining the methods these programs employ -- or fail to employ -- in coordinating coverage in the event of such duplication is yet another way of understanding the American compensation "system."

Focusing first on the relationship between the tort system and the different cause-based compensation programs, it is apparent that in many instances there is no duplication. For example, workers' compensation is almost always an exclusive remedy against a claimant's employer; a claimant under the Florida and Virginia birth-injury programs generally has no cause of action in tort, [66] and an auto no-fault policyholder whose claim falls below the statutory tort "threshold" may not bring an action alleging negligence by the driver who injured her. In these instances a shift from the emphasis on corrective justice that is [*95] the hallmark of tort law toward forced insurance -- a characteristic goal of cause-based programs -- has been decisively made.

In other situations, however, neither tort law nor a cause-based program is the exclusive vehicle of recovery. Under such circumstances, each system has essentially three options: (1) to allow duplicate (or overlapping) compensation; (2) to allocate primary coverage responsibility to the tort system; or (3) to allocate primary coverage responsibility to a cause-based system. Although cause-based systems occasionally employ the first approach, for the most part they adopt either the second or third. For example, workers' compensation takes the second approach. When an employee who has been paid workers' compensation brings a suit against a third party (for example, the maker of a product that caused the employee's injuries), the employer or its insurer has a right to indemnification out of any tort recovery received by the employee from the third party. The ostensible effect of this arrangement is that the product maker, not the employer, bears the full cost of the loss. Although in the long run the purchase price of the product may be adjusted to take account of this effect, the message clearly reflected in this arrangement is that the goals of tort law are of greater importance than the goals of workers' compensation. In auto no-fault, by contrast, the third option is employed. Here, the tortfeasor is relieved of a portion of his or her liability, because auto no-fault benefits typically are offset against any tort recovery obtained by a no-fault policyholder. The message of this approach is that the goals of the no-fault program take precedence over the goals of the tort system. While there may be political explanations for this inconsistency, we can see no persuasive basis for it in principle.

REV_00262613

Loss-based systems also tend to interact quite inconsistently with both fault- and cause-based systems. For example, until recently the principle of coordination that applied when loss-based and other systems overlapped was similar to the principle by which tort and workers' compensation recoveries currently are coordinated. In tort law, the collateral source rule allowed the plaintiff to recover from the defendant sums already paid to the plaintiff by loss-based systems of compensation. Loss-based systems could be reimbursed out of these recoveries pursuant to contractual or statutory rights of subrogation. [67] As a result, at least in theory, loss-based systems did not compensate for losses paid by the tort system. [68] Similarly, as between cause- and loss-based compensation systems, the former shouldered ultimate coverage responsibility. For example, Social Security Disability benefits were, and still are, reduced by sums paid or payable by workers' compensation. [69] [*96] In short, loss-based insurance did not compensate for losses paid by fault- or caused-based compensation programs.

Thus, coverage priority ran from fault-, to cause-, and finally to loss-based compensation systems. The importance of corrective justice and deterrence seemed to explain these priorities. When both fault- and loss-based compensation were available, corrective justice and deterrence suggested that the tortfeasor or its liability insurer should bear primary responsibility for compensating the victim. When both cause- and loss-based compensation were available, concern for the promotion of deterrence through cost-internalization required allocating primary coverage responsibility to the cause-based system. In both situations, loss-based systems served as secondary sources of compensation and the other systems were primary sources.

This overall consistency has recently been shattered, however, by changes in the collateral source rule in tort law and by the development of analogous changes within some of the newer cause-based systems. The collateral source rule was partially or completely abolished by legislation in more than a dozen jurisdictions during the last decade. [70] As a consequence, in these jurisdictions most loss-based systems of private and social insurance bear primary responsibility for losses that would otherwise be compensable in tort. To complicate matters further, even where this new scheme is applicable, it is subject to an exception for Medicare and Medicaid benefits. State rules governing coordination between these benefits and other sources of compensation are preempted by provisions in the federal statutes creating Medicare and Medicaid, under which the programs bear only secondary or tertiary coverage responsibility. [71] Similarly, several of the new cause-based compensation schemes that have been carved out of the tort system reverse the traditional coverage priorities described above. For example, in many states, auto no-fault benefits are payable only to the extent that workers' compensation and loss-based sources of compensation are not available; [72] and the Florida and Virginia birth-related neurological defect funds pay medical expenses only to the extent that such benefits are not payable by health insurance. [73]

[*97] One motive for these changes has almost certainly been the desire to reduce the costs of the system that is made a secondary source of compensation for the loss in question. Whatever else might be said in favor of this motive, at the level of principle it is nearly empty, since the change merely shifts costs from one system to another without reducing them overall. Indeed, to the extent that the older fault-over-cause-over-loss approach to coverage priorities could be justified on deterrence grounds, the recent reversal of priorities is likely to increase marginally rather than decrease costs overall, because of the loss of deterrence resulting from the reversal.

REV_00262614

A very different justification for these changes, however, may well have an arguable basis in principle. Under the traditional collateral source rule, loss-based compensation rights were seen as assets of the tort plaintiff -- assets from which the defendant should not benefit and which therefore were not offset against the plaintiff's recovery in tort. For the same reason, payments from loss-based systems did not reduce cause-based recoveries. It might now be argued that the recent reversals of these traditional coverage priorities reflect the fact that cause- and loss-based sources of compensation have proliferated. Employer-provided health and disability insurance and Social Security Disability benefits, for example, are so widespread that they no longer need be considered uniquely individual assets. Rather, according to this argument, the implicit assumption underlying the new priorities is that nearly everyone has such insurance. Since no one has made a conscious decision to purchase these forms of insurance instead of consuming other goods, rules denying the parties responsible for payment under fault- or cause-based systems the benefit of the existence of loss-based compensation have become unnecessary. The fact that the new rules do not apply to life insurance -- which remains largely a personal consumption item purchased in varying amounts by different individuals -- supports this thesis.

The assumption upon which this interpretation is based, however, is inaccurate. Although private and social loss insurance is much more widespread than it was even several decades ago, such coverage is not as pervasive as the assumption suggests. As we noted in Part I, [74] thirty million people have no health insurance, approximately 78% of the workforce has no private insurance against long-term disability, and the maximum Social Security Disability benefit covers only a portion of the income lost from permanent total disability. Medicaid and SSI are also incomplete programs of coverage. Thus, while there has been a trend towards greater protection, substantial gaps in the fabric of private and social insurance remain. Moreover, the reversal of coverage priorities that makes loss insurance primary has been incomplete in two ways. First, while some states have revised the traditional collateral source [*98] rule, others have not. Even in those states that have revised the rule, the shift in priorities has been limited by the federal preemption in the Medicare and Medicaid statutes. Second, workers' compensation has retained the traditional priorities, while several but not all of the newer cause-based systems have reversed them.

All this makes the effort to discern any principle or principles in the American system of compensating for illness and injury extremely difficult. The system is a patchwork of different programs that are loosely and inconsistently coordinated. That condition is perhaps only natural for a set of programs that did not grow up as a system and that are only now being perceived as potentially systematic. For those whose proposals for reform anticipate the development of a genuine "system" of compensation, the challenge is to understand the obstacles that stand in the path of such development and to devise ways of overcoming them.

III. TOWARD A COHERENT SYSTEM OF COMPENSATION

If the different American compensation programs are to be woven into a coherent and coordinated system, then greater attention will have to be paid both to the scope of the individual programs and to the relationships among them. We shall offer three different models of more expansive, more coherent systems. These include: (1) a tort system oriented mainly to achieving corrective justice and deterrence combined with greater private and social insurance protection -- a model we call "broader categorical subsistence"; (2) a scheme embodying a similarly limited tort system but more systematic private and social insurance protection, which we call "full subsistence"; and (3) a scheme with a very limited tort system and private and social insurance against virtually all the economic losses suffered by individuals as a result of illness and injury, which we call "full welfare."

Our aim is not to recommend one approach over others, although it is obvious that, because any actual expansion will likely be incremental, a "broader categorical subsistence" approach is in reality more likely to be adopted than the other two more expansive approaches. Rather, we want to analyze the obstacles that would impede a commitment to any one of these intellectually valid approaches, and sketch the contours of each approach, outlining the three different models toward which the current system might evolve.

REV_00262615

A. Obstacles to Expansion

Expanding the current patchwork of compensation programs would generate considerable, but not insurmountable problems. In what follows we discuss separately the difficulties that would be encountered in expanding health and disability insurance, for the two forms of coverage face different challenges.

[*99] 1. Health Insurance. -- The insurance system has shown itself quite capable of providing adequate health insurance to the vast majority of the American middle class, although without more adequate cost controls it is uncertain whether that system will be able to continue in its present form. Largely for reasons of cost, the system has not provided health insurance to the working poor. The Pepper Commission estimated that the additional federal cost (in 1990 dollars) of providing adequate health insurance and long-term care to the entire population would be $ 66 billion per year, about two-thirds of which would be net new spending. [75] In one sense, this may be a low estimate, since without more effective cost controls, the addition of this much demand is likely to push health care costs even higher, with corresponding subsequent increases in the cost of the new programs. But it seems highly likely that any major health insurance initiative will not only focus on the financing of additional care, but include far-reaching cost-containment measures as well. These measures might counteract cost increases that could otherwise be anticipated.

Moreover, in several other ways the Pepper Commission's estimate of the cost of providing universal health care coverage may be misleadingly high. First, certain overhead cost savings could be expected from a universal health care program even if it retained reliance on the private market to supply the lion's share of coverage. For example, if legislation prescribed several different model forms of coverage that the private market would be permitted to offer, the costs of determining eligibility, complying with insurers' different documentation requirements, and processing claims would decline. [76]

Second, it is possible that with the advent of universal health insurance, reducing the scope of tort liability would find more political favor than at present, and that the savings from this reform could be used to help finance the health insurance system. For example, a significant portion of the tort system's dollars are spent processing and litigating auto-accident claims -- yet auto liability ranks low in its capacity to achieve either corrective justice or deterrence. Similarly, a portion of tort dollars is spent on the kind of long-latency disease claims that we argued earlier also have a limited capacity to achieve corrective justice or deterrence. [77] If automobile and long-latency tort liability were reformed, the resulting savings could help offset the cost of universal health insurance. Indeed, although major stand-alone tort reform is [*100] politically improbable at present, legislation enacting health insurance reform is a promising vehicle for accomplishing a trade-off between health insurance expansion and the reduction of tort liability. [78]

Third, the American health insurance system is only at the beginning of an era in which preventive care, designed to minimize the incidence of illness and injury, and "managed care" measures, directed at deterring excessive and unnecessary treatment, are being employed. Moreover, in the case of any partial substitution of health insurance for tort liability, preventive and managed care might well accomplish certain forms of deterrence at which tort law and many cause-based systems have been less successful because they tend to pay compensation without using explicit deductibles, coinsurance, or other cost-minimizing devices. The cost sacrifice that results from reduced deterrence of injurers may thus be at least partially offset by the cost savings generated by devices that focus on post-accident victim deterrence, albeit by reducing actual compensation somewhat.

REV_00262616

Finally, a considerable portion of the cost of a universal health care program would not constitute "new," but rather shifted costs. Admittedly, some portion of the Pepper Commission's estimated costs of such a program would appear to be entirely new; that is, they would be costs that previously were not incurred, because some patients receiving care under the new program would not have received such care in the past. But the remainder of the cost of the program would be for care that has been provided in some other way in the past -- free of charge by a public hospital, private hospital, or physician and either charged off as a bad debt or recovered from an insurer as overhead reimbursement. Under the new system, the cost of this previously provided care would be a saving to insureds, providers, and insurers that should be offset against the gross cost of the new program in order to calculate its net cost. [79]

In addition, there is a strong argument that in calculating the net cost of a universal health insurance program, two other kinds of savings should also be offset against even the entirely new cost of such a program: (1) the savings in future health care costs resulting from increased preventive care under the program; and (2) the increased social productivity that additional health care would generate. Although the magnitude of these potential savings is not easy to estimate, the savings would undoubtedly have a measurable effect on the net cost of universal health insurance.

In short, in an era of economic and budgetary hard times, the $ 66 billion price tag on universal health and long-term care insurance poses a daunting obstacle to the adoption of such a system. But that is a [*101] gross-cost estimate, against which it is reasonable to offset unquantifiable but probably substantial savings that would result from the enactment of such a program.

2. Disability Insurance. -- In contrast to health insurance, which is provided on a widespread basis to the middle class, the failure of the American compensation system to provide adequate long-term disability insurance even to the American middle class has no immediately obvious explanation. Why does private disability insurance play so small a role in the American system of compensation for the consequences of illness and injury? Of course, one possible answer is that the potential beneficiaries of such compensation simply do not want it. We believe that this explanation is both inaccurate and simplistic, however, for it ignores the factors that inhibit the development of a robust market in disability insurance on both the supply and the demand sides of this market.

a. The Nature of the Problem. -- The history of private disability insurance is mainly the story of a series of lessons learned by the insurance industry and of the progressive sophistication of the instruments used to provide disability insurance coverage in response. Two periods are particularly noteworthy. First, after the Great Depression, it became clear that there was a strong linkage between economic conditions and the frequency and severity of claims. [80] Second, the extension of SSD to virtually all Social Security participants after 1956, the growth of some state disability protection programs, and the indexing of SSD benefits in 1972 essentially have made the lower-income market an unlikely source of private disability insurance policyholders. [81] Insurers have recognized that disability insurance is a specialty line, requiring a fund of experience and an operation designed to confront and neutralize the factors that render the line volatile. Disability insurance [*102] is not regarded as a ready source of easy profit. On the contrary, because insurers are wary about disability insurance, it is not widely marketed on an individual basis, and competition in the line does not appear to be intense.

If the history of disability insurance were all there were to explain this state of affairs, it would be reasonable to wonder why the insurance industry's entrepreneurial incentives had not created a more active market by now. With its hard-won sophistication, the industry would be able to place appropriate limits on its exposure through underwriting prudence and carefully drafted policy provisions, tap the reservoir of demand for disability protection, and write vastly expanded amounts of coverage. Unfortunately, more than mere caution born of the history of this line of insurance stands in the way of such an expansion. Two separate obstacles afflicting the supply side of the market place severe and probably inescapable limits on the potential scope of the private disability insurance market.

REV_00262617

First, the threat of adverse selection limits the supply of disability insurance. [82] The consequence of adverse selection, of course, is higher premium charges for standard and low-risk policyholders. In the absence of adverse selection, premiums for these individuals would be lower; more would apply for coverage, and those who insure notwithstanding the higher rates would purchase more coverage than under the present regime. The magnitude of the impact of adverse selection on disability premiums is difficult to estimate, but the problem undoubtedly [*103] is partly responsible for the inactivity of the market. [83]

Second, the problem of moral hazard so afflicts the entire market that there are effective limits on the form and amount of disability insurance that insurers can safely sell. Moral hazard is the tendency of an insured party to exercise less care to minimize losses than he would exercise if he were uninsured. [84] In disability insurance, moral hazard is present both ex ante and ex post. That is, the insured individual is more likely than the uninsured individual to become disabled, to recover from a disability more slowly, and never to recover from a disability. [85] Disability insurers try to combat the different forms of moral hazard that afflict disability insurance by providing the insured with incentives to remain healthy and to recover as quickly as possible from any disability that is suffered. For example, disability insurance usually is written to cover no more than roughly 60% of the potential after-tax income loss that would be caused by a disability, and insurers attempt to coordinate coverage so that this ceiling is not exceeded even when the insured is entitled to disability payments from other sources, such as SSD or workers' compensation. Even this ceiling, however, may not be sufficient to combat moral hazard completely. [86] And the obvious consequence [*104] of this device is that those who are genuinely disabled may be unable to maintain their previous standard of living because their losses are only partially insured.

Finally, psychological factors may affect the market for disability insurance. Potential policyholders may misperceive the risk of suffering a disability, and this inadequate knowledge of or concern about the prospect of disability may thereby limit the demand for disability insurance. [87] We would not be at all comfortable relying exclusively on this [*105] psychological factor to explain the small role played by private, voluntarily-purchased disability insurance in the United States. This explanation, however, may help to round out the picture of a market in which the supply of coverage is seriously limited by the need to combat adverse selection and moral hazard, and in which demand is unduly low because of misperception of the risk of suffering an uninsured disability. In any event, the prospect for the development of a more robust voluntary private market for disability insurance is extremely weak.

b. Filling the Gap. -- In light of the foregoing analysis, disability insurance poses a challenge very different from the health insurance problem. In the health insurance context, the key question is how to fill the gap in coverage that afflicts a minority of the population. In the disability insurance context, however, the threshold question is whether the gap affecting the majority of the population should be filled. Given the impact of adverse selection on the voluntary market for disability insurance, mandated private coverage or expanded provision by the government are probably the only feasible approaches. Yet this could entail considerable cost.

Estimating the cost of a mandatory universal total disability insurance system is difficult for both conceptual and practical reasons. Social consensus as to what events are appropriate reasons for not being at work is continually evolving. The current controversy over "family leave" is an excellent example. [88] Estimating the costs of long-term disability compensation, moreover, requires decisions about which reductions in earning ability -- some of which are predictable results of aging, for example -- should count as "disabilities" for purposes of measurement.

REV_00262618

Even setting aside these important conceptual questions and using definitions of disability adopted by existing studies of the issue, [89] estimating costs poses practical problems. Nonetheless, an estimate of the order of magnitude of the costs involved is possible. We calculate that public and private insurance benefits for disability under six months [*106] duration probably now total about $ 20 billion of the roughly $ 55 billion in income lost each year from such disability, leaving a shortfall of about $ 35 billion. [90] Estimating the shortfall for disability exceeding six months is more difficult, because there are no comparable figures regarding total income lost from such disability. Assuming that the ratio of benefits paid to total income lost is roughly the same for short-term and long-term disability, [91] then the approximately $ 60 billion in current public and private long-term disability benefits paid falls short of providing full compensation by about $ 100 billion per year. Putting these very rough estimates of the compensation shortfalls in disability protection together, the total compensation shortfall is in the neighborhood of $ 130 billion. [92] An efficient system of compensation, however, would not provide full payment for all these losses. A 30 to 40% deductible or coinsurance feature for disability insurance would be sensible, in order to combat moral hazard and create appropriate incentives against overconsumption of benefits. Taking these features into account, the additional cost of a system that adequately compensated the disabled for the economic consequences of both short- and long-term disability would probably be in the range of $ 100 billion per year.

As in the case of health insurance, a portion of this additional cost of universal disability insurance would probably not be "new," but rather, shifted cost. Those who now lose wages because of uninsured disability bear this cost themselves; a universal disability insurance program would remove these costs from the uninsured and channel them through the new program. In contrast to the healt insurance example, however, a higher portion of the cost of universal disability insurance would in fact be truly new cost. Under universal disability insurance, both ex ante and ex post moral hazard would be likely to increase the frequency and extent of disability; and there would be fewer offsetting savings from such measures as preventive and managed care because these measures are far less developed in the disability field than in the health insurance field.

3. The Public-Private Issue. -- It is commonplace to regard reliance on the private market for the provision of even mandatory insurance (for example, auto liability insurance) as preferable to governmentally provided coverage. Competition among private insurers is thought to [*107] preserve the virtues of efficiency and autonomous choice that are widely valued in our society. Aside from the obstacles to expanding health and disability insurance, the question whether such expansion should rely on the private market or occur through the development of social insurance therefore must also be addressed.

In our view, the choice between the private and social insurance alternatives is both more problematic and, in certain respects, less important than the prevailing view suggests. First, at least in some respects, a universal social insurance system could capture economies of scale and uniformity that the private market now lacks. For example, the administrative costs of our decentralized private health insurance system may account for more than half the difference in cost between the Canadian and American systems. [93] Such savings could go a long way toward offsetting the decreased efficiency that could result from the absence of a competitive insurance environment. Clearly this issue is far from settled; our point is simply that the private insurance market is subject to its own inefficiencies and that these must be compared to the inefficiencies of social insurance in choosing between the two.

Second, the differences between private and social insurance are less important when both approaches have mixed goals, combining limited deterrence and modest income redistribution with the predominant goal of forced insurance. Whether the evolution is from the direction of the tort system, in which the deterrence goal predominates, or from traditional social insurance, in which income redistribution is primary, the expanded programs of health and disability insurance that we describe in the next section would lie midway between these extremes. Whether private or governmentally operated, universal health insurance would employ preventive and managed care measures, risk classification, deductibles, and coinsurance features to deter unnecessary cost; perhaps universal disability insurance would develop analogous devices that are only modestly used at present. At the same time, charges to those capable of paying for coverage ("premiums" if the programs were private, "taxes" if they were not) could be set with an eye toward financing the provision of coverage for those incapable of paying for it, either through private insurance pools, governmentally provided coverage, or some combination of the two. In short, many of the concerns we have been analyzing could be effectively addressed by either alternative.

REV_00262619

B. Models of Expansion

The United States does not have a complete explanation for the scope and character of the liability and insurance programs that currently [*108] compensate the victims of illness and injury. [94] Available explanations -- including forced insurance and income redistribution -- would suggest expanding current programs. Indeed, one of the best arguments for expanding the system is that current programs can only be explained by principles that suggest expansion. European countries and Japan provide such expanded protection. [95] The United States has developed some, arguably even most, of the technology and devices necessary to provide it.

Partly out of default, the tort system is now performing certain aspects of the task of compensating the victims of illness and injury. Yet for reasons elaborated above, tort law is a highly unsatisfactory system of compensation. [96] Random victims are protected at giant overhead costs. Large sums go to lawyers rather than to compensating victims or funding additional accident reduction. Thus it seems sensible to consider adjusting private and social insurance programs to perform the compensation function that is needed, while pursuing the legitimate goals of tort law -- corrective justice and deterrence -- in different ways. Adapting existing programs to attain new goals is hardly unknown; workers' compensation and auto no-fault are the product of just this sort of approach, the first now more than seventy-five years old and even the second quite mature intellectually. Other recently adopted cause-based systems have begun to follow suit. [97]

Any expansion of individual insurance programs should be combined with the institution of a coherent system to govern interaction among the programs. Three models of expanded compensation for illness and injury are plausible: broader categorical subsistence protection, full subsistence protection, and full welfare protection. Each of these loss-based models also carries with it implications for existing and potential fault- and cause-based systems. Hence, we focus our analysis not only on the scope of individual new or expanded programs, but also on the relationships among the different components of the three models.

The compensation system currently in force in this country can be most accurately described as a collection of categorical subsistence programs. Compensation is categorical in the sense that it is provided to a victim of illness or injury only if the victim fits within the category covered by a particular program. And with the exception of the tort system, which at least in theory compensates all the losses victims have [*109] suffered, virtually all compensation programs provide what amounts to subsistence-level protection against the economic consequences of illness and injury. Small losses tend to be generously compensated, but catastrophic losses receive only partial compensation.

The major gaps in this categorical subsistence protection result from both of its features. Because the protection is categorical, a major portion of the population -- the working poor -- does not have health insurance. Moreover, individuals with even comparatively generous health insurance are likely not to be fully insured against catastrophic losses because of monetary ceilings on and exclusions from coverage. Because most sources of disability insurance assure beneficiaries of only subsistence, rarely is full income replaced in the event of disability.

REV_00262620

Fault- and cause-based compensation schemes exhibit a kind of ambivalence toward these gaps. On the one hand, these compensation schemes have expanded, in part to fill the gaps in the system of loss insurance. As we argued in Part II, [98] in certain ways tort law has moved beyond assuring corrective justice and deterrence in order to provide compensation that would otherwise be unavailable or incompletely available to the victims of severe injury and disease. Partly in reaction to these expansions of the fault system, cause-based compensation programs have been developed to deal with particular classes of illness or injury as these expansions of the fault system have become objectionable. For example, a rise in obstetrical malpractice claims brought about the enactment of birth-related neurological defect compensation funds in two states, [99] and the threatened disappearance of childhood vaccines prompted the enactment of a federal vaccine side-effect compensation program. [100] On the other hand, the recent reversals of coverage priorities (through modification of the collateral source rule) that render loss-based insurance the primary source of coverage over fault- and cause-based compensation serve to contract the scope of the latter systems.

Thus, fault and causal systems appear to expand when loss insurance is incompletely available and to contract when such insurance is available. The extent of the expansion and contraction, however, varies from state to state and with the type of fault- or cause-based compensation involved. The challenge posed for our first model for change is how to bring greater principle and consistency into this system. The challenge posed for any efforts that would go beyond this model is how to build on the principle and consistency toward which the first model would move.

1. Model I: Broader Categorical Subsistence. -- Our first model would restrict the expansion of tort law so that corrective justice and deterrence [*110] remain its predominant goals, and would regularize the expansion of the current categorical subsistence approach. The model would eliminate ad hoc expansions and contractions of fault- and cause-based compensation and set priorities for expansion. We believe that provision of subsistence-level health care protection to the working poor should be a high priority. This would extend protection to the individuals who comprise the bulk of the thirty million people without health insurance. [101] Assuring basic health care insurance at affordable rates to everyone in the United States would thus be a principal task of Model I.

Potential expansions of disability insurance programs might assume any of four forms: protection against partial disability; protection for the dependents of the disabled; protection for those whose disability is partly the product of advancing age; and protection against temporary disability.

a. Partial Disability. -- By imposing the requirement of total disability, SSD and most private disability insurance programs do not provide compensation for partial disabilities -- those that prevent a person from engaging in a prior occupation but do not completely eliminate that person's ability to work. This requirement makes eligibility a yes-no question, with a claimant being found completely ineligible or fully eligible. A substantial percentage of all applicants are near the borderline of eligibility: something is wrong with them, perhaps they could work with difficulty or pain, and while it is reasonable for society to exempt them from further employment, others with similar difficulties continue to work.

The requirement of total disability is a major cause of the dissatisfaction with the outcomes of the vast adjudication system that labors to make SSD eligibility decisions. Because an individual's application requires such a subjective determination, and because so many of the cases are near the yes-no line, every student of the system concludes that outcomes depend on which decisionmaker sees a case, where in the country an application is filed, and what words a physician may have chosen to describe a condition. [102] and injury; it has a set of different institutions that provide compensation. We rely on both tort law and giant programs of public and private insurance to compensate the victims of illness and injury. These institutions perform related functions, but the relationships among them are far from coherent. Indeed, the institutions sometimes work at cross-purposes, compensating some victims excessively and others not at all.

REV_00262621

The absence of a coherent system of compensation is reflected even in suggested reforms of existing institutions. Proposals to reform tort law [1] often do not recognize the role played by public and private [*76] insurance programs in compensating for health care expenses and lost income, even though insurance programs dwarf tort law as a system of reimbursement. [2] Similarly, those who offer proposals for altered private or public insurance protection -- and many put changes in the nation's system of health insurance at the top of the domestic agenda [3] -- usually ignore the connections between a family's insurance protection (whether provided by government, by an employer, or by first-party purchase) and the ill or injured victim's claims against a tortfeasor. Moreover, insurance reform proposals often ignore a fundamental insight of modern tort theory: when a system provides compensation for expenses not previously reimbursed, the entire cost of this new compensation is not an added social cost. The added cost of a new program may, in the broader social context, merely be shifted from victims or another program. The blindnesses of these proposals to their institutional "neighbors" are easy to explain. Because of academic and practice specialization, many of the persons most knowledgeable and creative about tort law know little about private and social insurance, while insurance and social-welfare experts often know little about tort law.

In contrast, other countries have articulated the principles that underlie [*77] their systems of injury and illness compensation. [4] Developing a clearer sense of the principles animating the institutional arrangements for compensation in the United States is an essential prerequisite to creating a more coherent system of protection and to assigning proper roles to tort law, private insurance and social insurance. [5]

The goal of this Article is to take the first step in this direction. The Article seeks to expose the existing relationships among tort law and the private and social insurance systems; to identify the gaps and overlaps in the existing network of compensation institutions; to analyze the obstacles to the achievement of a different regime; and to indicate the choices that must be made in constructing a coherent compensation system. Our angle of attack is more analytical than programmatic. Part I describes the "system" of compensation now in place in the United States. Part II analyzes relationships among different existing institutions, isolating points of tension and inconsistencies [*78] of principle. Part III seeks to confront the problems ignored by most current proposals for compensation reform -- the obstacles to expansion of the current compensation web. Part III also offers several models designed to guide thinking about the relationships among private insurance, social insurance, and tort.

I. THE EXISTING FABRIC OF PROTECTION

The United States has no "system" of compensation for the victims of illness and injury and has not adopted the principle that all such victims should receive full compensation. Consequently, we have a collection of different compensation programs, with gaps between and overlaps among them, leaving many victims undercompensated and some actually overcompensated. These different institutions employ different criteria for determining whether the victim of illness or injury receives benefits. Responsibility for compensation is based sometimes on fault, sometimes on cause, and sometimes on loss. For example, tort liability for accidental injury is generally imposed only upon proof of the defendant's fault; workers' compensation and similar no-fault systems pay compensation upon the occurrence of an illness or injury that can be ascribed to a particular cause, regardless of fault; and first-party private and social insurance cover particular occasions of loss, regardless of fault or cause.

REV_00262604

A partial disability insurance system might alleviate some of the difficulties associated with the SSD total-disability approach. Certainly, the importance of decisions involving claimants on the borderline between total and partial disability would diminish under such a system. However, a partial disability insurance system would face the daunting administrative task of determining degrees of disability. In addition, the cost of such a system is uncertain. As we noted above, the bulk of [*111] workers' compensation payments are made to compensate permanent partial disabilities. It is likely that a program to compensate for non-work-related permanent partial disabilities would be correspondingly expensive, at least in part because of the various moral hazards associated with disability insurance of any sort.

b. Compensation for Minor Dependents of the Disabled. -- In a sense, existing disability insurance programs already provide compensation to all the minor dependents of the disabled by replacing a portion of the income lost by those who had supported the dependents in the past. It would be a relatively simple matter to adapt the current Social Security Survivors program to replace more of the lost earnings of deceased providers. [103] It would be much more difficult, however, to expand it into, or to add, a program providing replacement income for children when a parent remains alive but disabled in some way that reduces the support available to the child. Providing adequate support for the child in such a situation would almost certainly require transferring funds to the parent directly. Yet at that point it would be hard to see the program as anything other than a minimum income for the young (or, in European parlance, a "children's allowance"), but without a rationale for the provision of such an allowance only to children of the disabled rather than to all children in need.

c. Disability Resulting from Advancing Age. -- The magnitude of the problem of disability resulting from advanced age has been a major force behind the decisions in both the United States and Europe to [*112] limit public disability benefits to only the most compelling claimants. [104] As a general matter, it is immensely difficult to apply the concept of a disabling illness or injury to individuals who are declining in capacity and energy, especially when the workplace is changing because of new technology and the capacities of younger workers. Some individuals beyond age fifty also have difficulty adapting to new types of work and being selected for vacant positions. Any compensation initiative directed at this phenomenon would have to separate those to whom something compensable has occurred from those who are merely tired or not as able as they were formerly. [105] A disability insurance program directed at those suffering disabling illness and injury would therefore have implications for society's policy toward those whose jobs disappear. [106]

[*113] d. Temporary Disability. -- In five states, government programs pay benefits to persons medically disabled for a temporary period. [107] In addition, sick leave is a largely unregulated system of temporary disability insurance, subject to the discretion of employers and, where applicable, collective bargaining. It would be possible to expand these programs into a general compensation scheme offering payments to all who do not work for a period of time and whose nonwork is socially approved. [108] Such a program might compensate those medically unable to work; those who lost jobs under circumstances not regarded as their "fault" and who do not have new jobs; and those not working because of pregnancy or the need to care for elderly parents ("family leave" [109]).

Our own view is that from an insurance standpoint, such a program should receive relatively low priority among the alternatives that might be adopted. [110] Temporary disabilities are by definition less catastrophic than permanent disabilities and therefore less sensible to insure against than the latter. Indeed, the absence of such coverage can be considered a kind of deductible or self-insurance requirement of existing permanent disability compensation devices. Sick leave is a popular fringe benefit, perhaps in part because it is the kind of insurance which many, rather than just a few beneficiaries, actually recover. But this is precisely the reason that this form of coverage should be a low priority for inclusion in a universal disability insurance program -- short-term disability is less a risk than an expected and fairly predictable loss.

REV_00262622

The advantage of a temporary disability compensation program, however, would be its capacity partially to fill certain gaps now plugged by the tort and cause-based systems of compensation. The new program would identify those out of work for less than six months, select those among them who should be barred from receiving benefits (for example, those whose behavior at work was egregious), and compensate all others to an appropriate extent. The cost could be met either by a payroll tax or by mandated benefits from employers. The major [*114] issues in designing the new program would include how to relate the compensation level to prior income; how to supervise work searches, and what standards to adopt for reviewing refusals of work; how to establish a benefit structure that would provide economic incentives to take a job; and whether payments should be made only for an arbitrarily fixed period, as is the case under the current unemployment insurance program. But the fundamental and most difficult question would be whether only sub-groups of those in need should be compensated. If individuals who worked and lost their jobs due to injury, illness, or reduced demand for their kind of labor are eligible, why not include those who have never been lucky enough to have a job?

2. Model II: Full Subsistence. -- A second model would expand loss insurance beyond the broader categorical subsistence described above by assuring full subsistence protection to the entire American population. In connection with illness and injury, the major additional changes required would be the provision of catastrophic health insurance to the thirty million or more individuals who are now uninsured and the roughly similar number who have limited health insurance, and the expansion of total disability insurance to assure that persons suffering such disability were assured of subsistence-level income in the event of their inability to work. This is a simple enough expansion to describe, although as we indicated earlier, it would be politically and economically difficult to implement. Setting aside these difficulties, however, some of the most interesting issues this model poses involve the roles that would be played by fault- and cause-based compensation systems.

The first issue would be whether use of fault- and cause-based systems for corrective justice and deterrence purposes should continue. On the one hand, nothing in a societal decision to assure that the victims of illness and injury receive subsistence-level protection would preclude the effort to achieve either of these other goals through fault- and cause-based systems. On the other hand, the requirements of these goals might change as universal loss insurance lost its initial status as a newly acquired individual asset and evolved into a characteristic of residency in the United States. For example, we might cease to consider the negligent infliction of the economic costs of illness and injury (such as health care expenses or lost wages) to be a wrong requiring corrective justice through the imposition of tort liability, since such costs would be automatically insured. In effect, these expenses would no longer be considered personal losses, because they would be automatically reimbursed. This change in attitude might suggest complete repeal of the collateral source rule in tort law as it applies to subsistence-level loss insurance, [111] though the rule might be retained as applied [*115] to voluntarily purchased private insurance against losses above subsistence level.

From a deterrence perspective, however, the issue would be more complicated. Because the economic costs of accidents are real even when they are fully insured, it would be rational to deter those accidents worth deterring even under a full-subsistence system. Retention of this goal would require application of the traditional collateral source rule in tort law and its analogues in cause-based systems. Otherwise, the parties paying the claims under these systems would not be held responsible for the full cost of the losses they had caused. Interestingly, then, although corrective justice concerns might become weak enough to permit the partial withering away of the fault- and cause-based systems under a full-subsistence model, deterrence concerns might require these systems to continue in the same forms they have taken in the past. And since a compensation gap with respect to above-subsistence losses would remain, the current tendency to employ fault- and cause-based systems to fill part of this gap would probably persist.

REV_00262623

3. Model III: Full Welfare. -- Our vision of a full-welfare system of compensation for the consequences of illness and injury consists of full-subsistence protection plus one other component: relatively "full" insurance against economic loss resulting from both total and partial disability, up to a fairly high ceiling -- for example, insurance that would fully replace the lost income of all but the top 10% of American wage earners, subject to a coinsurance provision designed to mitigate moral hazard. In describing this model as a "welfare" scheme, we do not mean to suggest that it would be governmentally operated, that the health and disability benefits provided to the middle and upper classes should not be financed entirely by these classes, or that the financing scheme should not be income-redistributional. On the contrary, we expect that the political and economic conditions that would make any such scheme possible would require self-financing by these classes and include a heavy element of redistribution to those with lower incomes.

The major implication for the fault- and cause-based systems of the adoption of a full welfare system would be the elimination of virtually all need to employ these systems in order to fill compensation gaps. Full-welfare loss insurance would assure nearly full compensation for the consequences of illness and injury. In turn, fault- and cause-based systems would be designed exclusively to promote corrective justice and deterrence, but only to the extent that these goals persisted and only to the extent that these systems could be effectively used to promote these goals.

Since most economic losses would be covered by a combination of private and social insurance, tort liability might be imposed only in cases of severe wrongdoing or in the limited number of situations in which noneconomic losses cried out for compensation. In effect, there [*116] would be high thresholds of harm and blame below which causes of action in tort would normally be abolished. With occasional exceptions, it might then be preferable to pursue deterrence of recurring injury or illness through more easily administrable cause-based compensation systems, financed by the parties largely responsible for these losses. The reason for imposing fault- or cause-based liability, then, would ordinarily have little to do with the provision of compensation for economic loss, since loss insurance would already be available to perform this function. Rather, the fault- and cause-based systems would exist almost exclusively to right severe wrongs and to influence future behavior. Therefore, as in the full-subsistence system we described above, [112] in order to perform these functions, each fault- and cause-based system would have to be a primary source of coverage whenever its jurisdiction was triggered. A version of the traditional collateral source rule in tort and its equivalent in the causal systems would be applied, [113] and responsible parties would be directly liable to the loss insurance system for all losses paid or payable to the victim by that system.

Interestingly, this approach might begin the transformation of the fault and causal systems into little more than cost-accounting mechanisms. Concern for administrative efficiency would dictate that the loss insurance system bundle its claims for economic losses against tortfeasors and process them collectively against these parties' liability insurers, except in cases in which detailed fact-finding was necessary. Processing of claims compensable in the causal systems would be even more collective and clerical, for disputes over coverage and the need for fact-finding would be even rarer here than in the case of claims compensable in tort. Only in cases in which an individual was entitled to pursue a claim for compensable pain and suffering might tort claims continue to exist.

In short, under a full-welfare system, conventional tort liability would not be abolished. But it might slowly wither away, as the demands of corrective justice declined in the face of socially provided insurance against the economic consequences of injury and disease. The liability that remained would be imposed almost exclusively for the purposes of deterrence, under circumstances that would resemble the allocation of expenses among different components of a conglomerate business, not the adjudication of civil liability.

CONCLUSION

REV_00262624

It is time for the United States to develop a coherent system for compensating the victims of illness and injury. This system need not be based exclusively on principle; cost is certainly an appropriate concern, [*117] as is the difficulty of making the transition from the series of categorical compensation programs that have grown up independently. But as the boundaries of these programs have reached toward and actually overlapped each other, the justifications for their independence have weakened. The programs are no longer normatively or even logically independent, since many of the arguments for the very existence and character of any particular program depend on the existence and character of the others.

In our view, the necessary first step is to assure basic health care insurance to the entire population. It is difficult to justify a set of programs that assures the middle class and the very poor basic health care and compensates the victims of tortious, work-related, and auto accidents for their health care expenses, but denies the working poor full access to health care unless their needs fall fortuitously into one of the foregoing categories. Although providing such insurance will not be inexpensive, some of the additional cost will be more apparent than real. The uninsured currently receive some care from public and non-profit hospitals. Some savings could be generated by incorporating more effective measures to contain the cost of health care provided to the already-insured population, and the extension of preventive care to those who are now uninsured could result in long-run savings in health care costs and increased national productivity.

A second step would require addressing the disability insurance gap. This is admittedly a more substantial challenge, because adverse selection, moral hazard, and other factors that impede the effective functioning of disability insurance cannot be completely combatted. The rationale for a program providing compensation for disability-related losses but not for other misfortunes is also open to question. Are the disabled any more deserving of compensation than, for example, those who have become homeless because of unemployment? As a "system" for compensating the victims of illness and injury in this country emerges, therefore, it will have to be harmonized with broader policies toward social welfare in general. Nonetheless, if for no other reason than the high priority we almost automatically accord to relieving physical suffering, compensation of the disabled for the losses consequent to their disability should follow the provision of basic health care to the American population.

Once a system containing these elements of compensation is developed, the role of the tort system in compensating the victims of illness and injury could be de-emphasized. Because compensation for health care expenses and lost income would already be assured independently of the tort system, the desirability of providing compensation for these losses through tort recoveries would substantially decline. Tort law could return to its traditional role of assuring corrective justice and deterrence, and what corrective justice required by way of compensation might even decline, since compensation for out-of-pocket health care [*118] expenses and wage losses would already be provided to all who incurred those costs, regardless of their cause. Tort law would thus become an even more ancillary feature of the constellation of American compensation programs than it is at present.

Although we are not sanguine about the immediate prospects for the emergence of a full-blown compensation "system" in this country, the recent presidential campaign debate about health insurance provides considerable evidence that a new era may be beginning, in which the scope of previously obscure compensation programs is a continuing political issue, and the unsystematic character of these programs a matter of public concern. Public recognition of these issues may not be a sufficient condition for change to occur, but it certainly is a necessary condition. With the additional ingredient of informed analysis from a variety of quarters, we may find it possible to move toward a new vision of compensation for illness and injury in the United States.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 Some reform advocates would do away with tort law and replace it with insurance. See, e.g., Peter W. Huber, Liability: The Legal Revolution and Its Consequences 193-206 (1988) (advocating replacement of tort by direct insurance, contract, and agency regulation of large-scale societal risks); Stephen D. Sugarman, Doing Away with Personal Injury Law: New Compensation Mechanisms for Victims, Consumers, and Business 127-48 (1989) (arguing for replacing tort system with social insurance system and new regulatory scheme to prevent accidents). Some would extend the reach of tort law. See, e.g., Glen O. Robinson, Probabilistic Causation and Compensation for Tortious Risk, 14 J. Legal Stud. 779, 781-83 (1985) (advocating tort liability for creation of risk of harm); David Rosenberg, The Causal Connection in Mass Exposure Cases: A "Public Law" Vision of the Tort System, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 849, 866-68, 881-87 (1984) (arguing for proportionality approach to proof of causation in mass tort litigation). Some would reorder tort law by transferring many of its compensation and deterrence functions to other institutions and strengthening the tort law that would remain. See, e.g., George L. Priest, The Current Insurance Crisis and Modern Tort Law, 96 Yale L.J. 1521, 1587-90 (1987) (calling for removal of insurance function of tort law, leaving deterrence function only); Richard B. Stewart, Crisis in Tort Law? The Institutional Perspective, 54 U. Chi. L. Rev. 184, 190-95, 198 (1987) (suggesting changes in allocation of functions among existing compensation institutions). Finally, some would create methods by which victims and injurers could elect alternatives to tort law. See, e.g., Jeffrey O'Connell, Neo-No-Fault: A Fair-Exchange Proposal for Tort Reform, in New Directions in Liability Law 186, 190-94 (Walter Olson ed., 1988) (advocating legislation allowing defendant to offer plaintiff mandatory settlement limited to value of economic loss).

REV_00262625

n2 Although more than forty states adopted tort reform legislation of some kind during the last decade, on the whole this legislation has merely tinkered with tort law doctrine and cannot be seen as fundamental change. The most common reforms include placing ceilings on the amount of pain and suffering damages recoverable, modifying the collateral source rule, and restricting the scope of joint and several liability. For a catalogue of the measures enacted, see Joseph Sanders & Craig Joyce, "Off to the Races": The 1980s Tort Crisis and the Law Reform Process, 27 Hous. L. Rev. 207, 217-23 (1990).

n3 The prominence of the health care issue in the recent presidential election is particularly notable. Comprehensive health care proposals have been on the U.S. political agenda for fifty years. Currently discussed reforms range from the Republican proposal to create tax incentives for the purchase of health insurance and to support the creation of health insurance pools for small businesses, to proposals for Canadian-style "national" health insurance, see U.S. Gen. Accounting Office, Canadian Health Insurance: Lessons for the United States (1991) [hereinafter Canadian Health Insurance], to the Pepper Commission's recommendations for the institution of "universal" health and long-term care insurance for all Americans, see U.S. Bipartisan Comm'n on Comprehensive Health Care, 101st Cong., 2d Sess., Recommendations to the Congress: Access to Health Care and Long-Term Care for All Americans 1-3 (1990) [hereinafter Pepper Recommendations]. In between lie a variety of proposals for the provision of health insurance through employers or other groups, including "play or pay" proposals that would permit employers to provide such coverage ("play") or "pay" a tax to finance a publicly-operated insurance pool covering the residual population of uninsured persons. See Alain C. Enthoven, Managed Competition: An Agenda for Action, Health Aff., Summer 1988, at 25, 45; see also Alain C. Enthoven & Richard Kronick, A Consumer-Choice Health Plan for the 1990s: Universal Health Insurance in a System Designed to Promote Quality and Economy, 320 New Eng. J. Med. 29, 32 (1989) (advocating "pay or play" as part of a broader scheme to provide universal health insurance).

n4 For discussions of the health insurance systems of other industrialized countries, see generally Canadian Health Insurance, supra note 3 (1991); U.S. Gen. Accounting Office, Health Care Spending Control: The Experience of France, Germany, and Japan (1991). For a comparative discussion of disability and other protections, see P. R. Kaim-Caudle, Comparative Social Policy and Social Security: A Ten-Country Study 290-312 (1973). For a similar analysis of civil liability schemes, see Werner Pfennigstorf & Donald G. Gifford, A Comparative Study of Liability Law and Compensation Schemes in Ten Countries and the n5 Numerous scholars have explored the principles underlying existing institutions, contributing to the quest for a more principled and coherent system. Charles Reich saw that for contemporary citizens health, retirement, and disability benefits play the role that land performed in early modern times. See Charles A. Reich, The New Property, 73 Yale L.J. 733, 733 (1964). Others have extended the metaphor of estates in land to positions in the modern welfare state. See Lance Liebman, The Definition of Disability in Social Security and Supplemental Security Income: Drawing the Bounds of Social Welfare Estates, 89 Harv. L. Rev. 833, 864-67 (1976).

REV_00262626

United States (1991).

Today, some scholars press for a comprehensive benefit system, pursuing horizontal equity for those placed in need by harsh events. See Eli P. Bernzweig, By Accident Not Design: The Case for Comprehensive Injury Reparations 157-62 (1980) (proposing a statutory social insurance scheme premised on the notion of social responsibility to accident victims). Among the most inventive in suggesting devices for allowing individuals to protect themselves against economic loss is Jeffrey O'Connell. See Jeffrey O'Connell, Expanding No-Fault Beyond Auto Insurance: Some Proposals, 59 Va. L. Rev. 749, 773-75 (1973) (arguing for enterprise liability for injury resulting from typical risks inherent in the enterprise's activity). All of these studies look with interest at the comprehensive system in place in New Zealand. For a description of the New Zealand model, see Report of the Royal Commission of Inquiry, Compensation for Personal Injury in New Zealand 177-88 (1967); Geoffrey Palmer, Compensation for Incapacity: A Study of Law and Social Change in New Zealand and Australia 222-30 (1979).

Other scholars, however, are much more skeptical. They see diverse functions, especially deterrence, being performed by the current mix of programs and worry that a comprehensive social welfare alternative to current arrangements will generate large costs in reduced deterrence of those who could take precautions to avoid illness and injury. See, e.g., Michael J. Trebilcock, Incentive Issues in the Design of "No-Fault" Compensation Systems, 39 U. Toronto L.J. 19, 20 (1989).

n6 See Jeffrey O'Connell & James Guinivan, An Irrational Combination: The Relative Expansion of Liability Insurance and Contraction of Loss Insurance, 49 Ohio St. L.J. 757, 759 (1988).

n7 See id.

n8 See 1 Arthur Larson, The Law of Workmen's Compensation § 5.30, at 39 (1992).

n9 See Bureau of the Census, U.S. Dep't of Commerce, Statistical Abstract of the United States 368 (1991) [hereinafter Statistical Abstract].

n10 See William J. Nelson, Jr., Workers' Compensation: 1980-84 Benchmark Revisions, Soc. Security Bull., July 1988, at 4, 9 (figures cited are for 1982).

n11 See Josephine Y. King, No Fault Automobile Accident Law 7-14 (1987); O'Connell & Guinivan, supra note 6, at 767 n.2.

n12 See Fla. Stat. Ann. §§ 766.301-766.316 (West Supp. 1992); Va. Code Ann. §§ 38.2-5000-38.2-5021 (Michie 1990 & Supp. 1992).

n13 See Statistical Abstract, supra note 9, at 369.

n14 See 42 U.S.C. § 300aa-15(j) (1988).

n15 See Statistical Abstract, supra note 9, at 93, 360.

REV_00262627

n16 See American Council of Life Ins., Life Insurance Fact Book Update 17 (1991) [hereinafter Fact Book] ($ 24.5 billion in life insurance benefits paid in 1990); Health Ins. Ass'n of Am., Source Book of Health Insurance Data 7 (1991) [hereinafter 1991 Source Book] ($ 185 billion in health insurance benefits paid in 1989); Health Ins. Ass'n of Am., 1988 Update: Source Book of Health Insurance Data 9 (1988) [hereinafter 1988 Update] ($ 5.6 billion in disability insurance benefits paid in 1986). Although classifying this coverage as "private" is a useful way to distinguish it from insurance provided through "on-budget" governmental expenditures, in some respects the classification is problematic. Most health and disability insurance, for example, is group coverage provided (or offered for purchase) as a fringe benefit of employment. The terms of coverage are regulated by a federal statute (Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA), 29 U.S.C. §§ 1001-1461 (1988)) as well as by state statutes and regulations. The fact that such heavily regulated coverage has become so common for middle-class wage earners and their families has important implications for the direction in which expansions might occur. See infra part III. Thus, it is also worth recognizing the tripartite distinction among individually purchased private insurance; heavily regulated, "private" employer-provided insurance; and governmentally operated "social" insurance.

n17 See 1991 Source Book, supra note 16, at 7.

n18 See id.

n19 Congressional Research Serv., 100th Cong., 2d Sess., Health Insurance and the Uninsured: Background Data and Analysis 93 (Comm. Print 1988).

n20 See id. at 3-4.

n21 See id. In 1988, Congress attempted to address part of this problem by enacting "catastrophic" coverage for the elderly. See Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act of 1988, Pub. L. No. 100-360, 102 Stat. 683. The costs were to be borne by a tax on relatively well-off older beneficiaries. But when the tax was imposed, taxpayers protested, and in 1989 the program was repealed. See Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Repeal Act of 1989, Pub. L. No. 101-234, 103 Stat. 1979 (1989).

n22 The extent of this cost-shifting is a matter of some debate, and it varies from state to state. See Jack A. Meyer, Financing Uncompensated Care with All-Payer Rate Regulation, in Uncompensated Hospital Care 167, 167-68 (Frank A. Sloan et al. eds., 1986).

n23 See Joel Weissman & Arnold M. Epstein, Case Mix and Resource Utilization by Uninsured Hospital Patients in the Boston Metropolitan Area, 261 JAMA 3572, 3575-76 (1989) (analysis indicating shorter lengths of stay and fewer procedures for uninsured patients); Steffie Woolhandler & David U. Himmelstein, Reverse Targeting of Preventive Care Due to Lack of Health Insurance, 259 JAMA 2872, 2873-74 (1988) (lack of insurance is strongest predictor of failure of women to receive screening tests).

n24 See 1988 Update, supra note 16, at 7 (statistics are for 1984 and 1986 respectively).

n25 See id. at 9. By contrast, annual disability benefits paid by public programs and workers' compensation are ten times as large: over $ 60 billion in 1988. See Statistical Abstract, supra note 9, at 360.

n26 See Fact Book, supra note 16.

n27 See id. at 4.

n28 See id.

REV_00262628

n29 See id. at 7 (1990 statistics).

n30 See id.

n31 There are, of course, other social insurance programs based mainly on economic need, but typically these do not provide compensation for losses expressly associated with illness or injury. Programs such as Aid to Families with Dependent Children and General Relief, while "categorical" (eligibility may require, for example, being a single parent and engaging in efforts to find work), fall into this category. See infra note 42 and accompanying text. Workers' compensation, which we regard as the paradigmatic example of cause-based protection, is sometimes described as social insurance in that government mandates and regulates such employer-paid insurance. And unemployment insurance is in a sense triggered by limited forms of fault or cause as well as by loss, since those out of work after they quit or are fired for cause are ineligible. No easy conceptual taxonomy organizes these large programs, because they were invented at different times to respond to different problems, and to reflect different social judgments.

n32 Medicare and Medicaid were created by Congress in 1965. See Health Insurance for the Aged Act, Pub. L. No. 89-97, 79 Stat. 290 (1965) (codified as amended at 42 U.S.C. § 1395 (1988)); Grants to States for Medical Assistance Programs Act, Pub. L. No. 89-97, 79 Stat. 343 (1965) (codified as amended at 42 U.S.C. § 1396 (1988)).

n33 Medicare pays approximately $ 94 billion of this sum, and Medicaid pays the remaining $ 65 billion. See 1991 Source Book, supra note 16, at 38-39.

n34 See id. at 40-41.

n35 See 42 U.S.C. §§ 1395c, 1395o (1988).

n36 See id. § 1396 (1988).

n37 SSD was created by Congress in 1956. See Social Security Amendments of 1956, Pub. L. No. 84-880, 70 Stat. 807 (codified as amended at 42 U.S.C. § 401 (1988)). SSI was created sixteen years later. See Supplemental Security Income for the Aged, Blind and Disabled Act, Pub. L. No. 92-603, 86 Stat. 1465 (1972) (codified as amended at 42 U.S.C. §§ 1381-1383d (1988)).

n38 In 1988, SSD paid benefits of approximately $ 24 billion; SSI paid approximately $ 11 billion. See Statistical Abstract, supra note 9, at 360.

n39 See 42 U.S.C. §§ 423(c)-(d) (1988).

n40 Id. §§ 423(d)(1)(A), (d)(2)(A) (1988).

n41 See Jerry L. Mashaw, Bureaucratic Justice: Managing Social Security Disability Claims 108-21 (1983).

n42 See Aid to Families with Dependent Children Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 601-687 (1988). Although AFDC is America's chief minimum income program, benefits are available only for families with children, and in no state do benefits place families at or above the so-called poverty line. $ 29 billion was spent on this program in 1988. See Statistical Abstract, supra note 9, at 358.

n43 42 U.S.C. § 1382c(a)(3)(A) (1988).

n44 Some proposals call for a less rigorous standard of disability in SSI than that used in

REV_00262629

SSD, premised on the idea that a minimum income at the SSI level should be available to anyone who is not in good health and cannot in fact find work. See Sheila R. Zedlewski & Jack A. Meyer, Toward Ending Poverty Among the Elderly and Disabled Through SSI Reform 47-70 (1989).

n45 In 1989, for example, these programs paid out $ 2.7 billion. See Soc. Security Bull., Spring 1992, at 124. The five states are California, New Jersey, New York, Hawaii, and Rhode Island. See id.

n46 See 1 American Law Inst., Reporters' Study, Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury 24-33 (1991) (noting this argument and its proponents).

n47 See Kenneth S. Abraham, Distributing Risk: Insurance, Legal Theory, and Public Policy 64-83 (1986).

n48 See Donald N. Dewees, Economic Incentives for Controlling Industrial Disease: The Asbestos Case, 15 J. Legal Stud. 289, 317-19 (1986) (arguing that in asbestos context, the presence or absence of tort liability has little effect on a firm's incentives to reduce worker exposure).

n49 See Ronald H. Coase, The Problem of Social Cost, 3 J.L. & Econ. 1, 6-8 (1960).

n50 See George L. Priest, The Current Insurance Crisis and Modern Tort Law, 96 Yale L.J. 1521, 1550-63 (1987) (discussing failure of tort law as an insurance mechanism).

n51 In contrast, the federal Black Lung Benefits Program, financed largely by the coal industry, is less a forced insurance scheme among victims than a redistributive program for them. See Black Lung Benefits Act, 30 U.S.C. §§ 901-945 (1988).

n52 See Health Ins. Ass'n of Am., Source Book of Health Insurance Data 5 (1989) (health insurance); Health Ins. Ass'n of Am., Source Book of Health Insurance Data 16 (1984-85) [hereinafter 1984-85 Source Book] (disability insurance).

n53 But see Haw. Rev. Stat. §§ 392, 393 (1988) (requiring employers to provide temporary disability and health care benefits for employees). Steps toward mandatory health insurance have been taken in Massachusetts, Oregon, and Vermont.

n54 Of course, efforts at cost containment can raise profound questions of fairness. See, e.g., McGann v. H&H Music, 946 F.2d 401, 404-08 (5th Cir. 1991) (holding that an employer may impose a low dollar limit on medical reimbursement for AIDS treatment after an employee has tested HIV-positive), cert. denied, 60 U.S.L.W. 3582 (U.S. Nov. 9, 1992) (No. 91-1283).

n55 This characterization is a bit oversimplified. SSD can be regarded as somewhat progressive because the benefit formula is skewed toward low-wage workers. Medicare can be regarded as somewhat regressive because richer people live longer and consume greater amounts of expensive medical care.

n56 See Bernzweig, supra note 5, at 33.

n57 See Marilyn E. Manser, Historical and Political Issues in Social Security Financing, in Social Security Financing 21, 35 (Felicity Skidmore ed., 1981).

n58 See supra notes 35-36, 42-44 and accompanying text.

n59 In fact, it probably is true that in certain respects the wealthy are treated better by the tort system than the poor. For example, in all likelihood the wealthy have disproportionately greater access to the tort system than the poor for two reasons. The first is cultural -- the wealthy may be more likely than the poor to feel comfortable with and be willing to use the legal system for redress. The second is a function of the recoverability of full damages for wages lost as a proximate result of tortious action. Because the wealthy are likely to suffer more lost wages from any given injury than the poor, attorneys are more likely to be willing to represent them on a contingent-fee basis. Moreover, whenever liability is imposed on a party in a direct or indirect contractual relationship with the plaintiff, full recovery of lost wages in tort has a regressive income redistributional effect, since all purchasers pay the same "premium" for tort liability "insurance" as part of the price of a product or service, regardless of the magnitude of the income they can expect to lose if they are the victim of tortious action for which a seller is responsible. See Priest, supra note 50, at 1559. Placing a ceiling on the amount of lost wages recoverable in tort (whatever else one thinks of the idea) would tend to reduce this income-regressive effect.

REV_00262630

n60 See supra notes 46-47 and accompanying text.

n61 Part of the explanation for the current troubles facing workers' compensation, however, may well lie in the new difficulty of drawing the work-/nonwork-relatedness distinction. When workers' compensation was created to deal mainly with injury, it was clear that a broken leg on the job was work-related. But with the advent of disease claims that may or may not be work-related (for example, asbestosis, stress, heart attacks), the work exposure allegedly responsible for the loss may have occurred decades earlier, cigarette smoking by the employee may have magnified the probability of loss by ten, and other factors may have intervened to render the work-relatedness determination highly difficult and more costly to make.

n62 See, e.g., Clark C. Havighurst & Lawrence R. Tancredi, "Medical Adversity Insurance" -- A No-Fault Approach to Medical Malpractice and Quality Assurance, 51 Milbank Memorial Fund Q. 125 (1973) (proposing no-fault medical adversity insurance); James Henderson, The Boundary Problems of Enterprise Liability, 41 Md. L. Rev. 659, 662-76 (1982) (calling for concrete lists of events triggering liability, yet admitting that "techniques for avoiding errors of inclusion and exclusion have obvious limits").

n63 This insight can be traced back in the academic literature at least as far as Walter J. Blum & Harry Kalven, Jr., Ceilings, Costs, and Compulsion in Auto Compensation Legislation, 1973 Utah L. Rev. 341, 342-43. Of course, this political fact of life may rest as much on oversimplification as on accurate cost accounting. Some apparently "new" costs may merely be shifted from one source to another rather than newly incurred. The point holds not only for cause-based but also for loss-based programs. Expanded health insurance costs more if more people get care, but if they are getting it already, then the political debate about "increased" costs may merely misread or misreport which current costs are being replaced. The point holds for cost "cutting" as well. Medicaid can be "cut" by pushing the working poor into hospital charity and then letting the cost of charity be passed to Blue Cross.

n64 See, e.g., Huber, supra note 1 (arguing that incentives to assess and avoid risk are best promoted through ex ante private contract and private insurance); Sugarman, supra note 1 (arguing for the replacement of personal injury law with a generous system of social insurance).

n65 See, e.g., Enthoven, supra note 3 (proposing a system of managed competition); Enthoven & Kronick, supra note 3 (same).

n66 See Fla. Stat. Ann. §§ 766.301-766.306 (West Supp. 1992); Va. Code Ann. §§ 38.2-5000-38.2-5021 (Michie 1990 & Supp. 1992).

n67 The exception was and is life insurance, which in general is not subject to rights of subrogation or reimbursement.

REV_00262631

A. Fault-Based Compensation

Although certain tort law doctrines impose true strict liability, most tort liability for illness or injury is predicated on some form of fault on the part of the defendant. Despite the considerable attention devoted to the subject, tort recovery is a modest compensation program in the context of the other systems of compensation available in the United States for the consequences of illness and injury. For example, in 1984, tort recoveries totaled $ 39 billion -- something over $ 50 billion in current dollars. [6] But this sum comprised only one-tenth of the total paid by all systems. Moreover, this comparison ignores federal and state income maintenance programs. [7] If the sums paid by these programs are included, the quantitative significance of tort is even smaller. It would be foolhardy, therefore, to assess possible changes in tort law without considering the scope of these other programs and the obstacles that stand in the way of their expansion.

B. Cause-Based Compensation

In contrast to the tort system, which pays compensation after a determination [*79] of fault, cause-based compensation programs pay as long as a loss arises out of or is caused by a particular activity or exposure. Workers' compensation is the most widespread of these programs, having been adopted in all fifty states. [8] It provides roughly $ 30 billion in benefits per year to workers who suffer illness or injury as a consequence of employment. [9] Benefits include full payment of medical costs and a percentage of lost wages up to a specified ceiling. In addition, workers' compensation makes lump-sum payments for designated injuries (for example, loss of a limb) under the infamous "meat chart," and pays survivors' benefits. Wage-loss and lump-sum payments comprise about 60% of the program's expenditures.

Unlike the loss-based insurance programs discussed below, which disburse only long-term benefits for total disability, workers' compensation pays benefits for both temporary total and permanent partial disability. About three-fourths of all workers' compensation cases involve payments for temporary total disability, but these comprise only 18% of all the money paid as benefits. In contrast, about one-fourth of the cases are permanent partial disability claims, which account for about 70% of all benefit payments. [10]

In addition to workers' compensation, a number of other cause-based compensation programs have been adopted in recent years. The most prominent of these are the auto no-fault plans, adopted in fourteen states, which pay over $ 2 billion annually. [11] Two states have also recently adopted cause-based programs to compensate the victims of birth-related neurological injury. [12] At the federal level, the Black Lung Benefits Program pays approximately $ 1.5 billion per year, [13] the National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program is projected to pay $ 80 million per year, [14] and Veterans' benefits for military service-related health care and disability total over $ 21 billion per year. [15]

Although these different cause-based programs have no particular relation to each other, and although Veterans' benefits are partly "welfare" rather than injury or illness compensation, it is nonetheless useful for comparative purposes to note that the total compensation that cause-based programs pay, approximately $ 55 billion, is roughly equal to the $ 50 billion paid by the tort system to its beneficiaries.

[*80] C. Loss-Based Compensation

Two basic forms of loss insurance provide compensation for the economic consequences of illness and injury: private insurance and social insurance. Together the sums paid by these two sources dwarf those paid by both the fault-based and cause-based systems of compensation.

1. Private Insurance. -- The principal forms of private loss insurance provide coverage for health care expenses, income lost because of disability, and loss of life or limb. Each form of n68 In practice, however, double compensation of certain losses probably occurred because insurers did not exercise their rights of subrogation or reimbursement out of policyholders' tort recoveries. See 2 American Law Inst., supra note 46, at 170-71.

n69 See 42 U.S.C. § 424a (1988).

n70 For a catalogue of these and other tort reforms of the past decade, see Sanders & Joyce, supra note 2, at 255-58.

n71 See 42 U.S.C. § 1396b(o) (1988); see also Rubin v. Sullivan, 720 F. Supp. 840, 844-46 (D. Haw. 1989) (holding that Hawaii no-fault insurance statute exempting Medicaid recipients from coverage was preempted by federal statute); Abrams v. Heckler, 582 F. Supp. 1155, 1163-65 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) (upholding federal regulation prohibiting Medicare payments where state law's no-fault insurance benefits are secondary to Medicare).

n72 This allocation is subject to the exception for Medicare and Medicaid described supra note 71 and accompanying text.

n73 See Fla. Stat. Ann. § 766.31(a) (West Supp. 1992); Va. Code Ann. § 38.2-5009(1) (1990).

n74 See supra notes 19, 24, 41-42 and accompanying text.

n75 See Pepper Recommendations, supra note 3, at 21. Of the $ 23 billion of this sum that would be devoted to health insurance, about $ 12 billion would be net new spending, since $ 11 billion would be offset by savings to employers and the states. See U.S. Bipartisan Comm'n on Comprehensive Health Care, A Call For Action 67 (1990) (Final Report) [hereinafter A Call for Action].

n76 One recent study suggests that there could be considerable savings from such a move. See Canadian Health Insurance, supra note 3, at 62-70.

n77 See supra note 48 and accompanying text.

n78 The Pepper Commission itself estimated that approximately $ 1.5 billion could be saved through imposition of a cap on liabilities. See A Call For Action, supra note 75, at 66.

n79 The Commission estimated this savings at $ 9.5 billion in 1990 dollars. See id.

n80 Prior to World War I, disability insurance was available but uncommon. Between 1918 and 1929, however, the industry grew significantly and coverage was more widely purchased. See Charles E. Soule, Disability Income Insurance: The Unique Risk 4 (1989). When the depression of 1929 struck, disability insurers experienced for the first time the special problems with which they continue to struggle today. As unemployment increased, both the number of disability insurance claims and the average period of disability grew with it. In addition, the policyholder's will to work influenced his or her likelihood and rate of recovery. At this point, many of the insurers then writing disability coverage recognized that this line of insurance is much more volatile and requires very different underwriting and claims management skills than does life insurance. They tended to withdraw from the market, leaving it largely to specialty carriers, who revised their policies in an attempt to guard against the claims incentives they had created. This state of affairs continued for roughly the next 25 years. After several decades of stability, however, many companies entered the market during the 1960s. In addition, recognizing that the professional and the self-employed markets were potentially highly profitable, insurers increased maximum benefit levels available under disability insurance policies. By the early 1970s, benefits of $ 3500 per month were common. See id. at 10.

REV_00262632

n81 See id. at 11-13.

n82 All voluntary insurance is afflicted to some extent by adverse selection, the disproportionate tendency of those who are more likely to suffer losses to seek insurance against those losses. Disability insurance is especially susceptible to adverse selection, however, because the application-screening and risk-classification processes that can be used to neutralize this problem tend to be least effective in the disability insurance context. The effectiveness of each method depends on the insurer's ability to determine the probability that an applicant will suffer a disability. If insurers can identify high-risk applicants, either their applications can be declined or they can be charged appropriately higher premiums than standard risks.

Information about these probabilities is likely to be less available in disability insurance, however, than in many other lines. One reason is that morbidity data is neither as available nor as reliable as, for example, mortality data. During the past twenty years more reliable information has been developed on both the frequency of disability claims and the rate of recovery. But the persistent lack of reliable data has contributed to adverse selection problems, which in turn have limited the market for coverage and prevented the accumulation of reliable data. The problem has thus to some extent been self-perpetuating. See id. at 16. A second reason the problem of adverse selection is especially severe in disability insurance derives from the nature of the insured event itself. Disability is not merely an objective phenomenon like injury or death; it also is a subjective product of illness, injury, or disease. Insurers can of course estimate the probability that an individual will be injured or become sick. But the probability that the injury or sickness will disable any given individual depends in part on his or her personality and character, both of which are likely to be more difficult to assess. Both the underwriting and risk-classification decisions in disability insurance are therefore unusually subjective and may fail to neutralize adverse selection.

n83 For technical discussions of the nature and magnitude of the effect of adverse selection in insurance markets, see Michael Rothschild & Joseph Stiglitz, Equilibrium in Competitive Insurance Markets: An Essay on the Economics of Imperfect Information, 90 Q.J. Econ. 629, 634-38 (1976); Charles Wilson, A Model of Insurance Markets with Incomplete Information, 16 J. Econ. Theory 167, 187-202 (1977).

n84 See Abraham, supra note 47, at 14-16.

n85 Moral hazard troubles most forms of insurance, but like adverse selection, it is especially severe in disability insurance. Admittedly, the most blatant form of ex ante moral hazard -- intentionally suffering a loss -- is likely to be minimal because of the insured party's self-interest in avoiding injury or disease, although perhaps for some people the prospect of even disabled leisure may be more attractive than working in good health. But undoubtedly the greater ex ante moral hazard in disability insurance is the possibility of "false positives" -- claims of disability when none exists. Some of these may border on fraud; others are likely to be the product of economic conditions that reduce the job prospects of the marginally able and in effect push them into the disabled category. Because the very concept of disability and its corresponding definition in disability policies is partially subjective in the ways we noted above, see supra notes 40-41 and accompanying text, such ineligible claims are difficult to detect, and some are paid. Moreover, the cost of detection and the percentage of contested claims are comparatively high.

False positive disability insurance claims are a potential problem not only ex ante, but also ex post. Even after a genuine disability, the prospect of continued subsidized leisure is likely to be more attractive for some people than returning to work; and because of economic conditions, claimants who become marginally able to work may remain "disabled" because they cannot find a job.

REV_00262633

n86 The existence of a variety of government benefits, for example, sometimes makes the calculation of this ceiling difficult for private insurers. Of course they could operate their payment schedule so as to pay only in addition to what any government program pays and only a total that is, for example, 80% of pre-disability earnings. But government program rules sometimes prohibit offsets and reductions (this is a complicated issue in various programs, with interesting recent law), and even when permitted, it may be expensive and intrusive for the insurer to discover a policyholder's other sources of income (for example, from part-time or unreported work). Thus, there are real world situations in which continued disability actually pays more than returning to work (especially on an after-tax and after-work-expenses basis), making moral hazard a continued threat.

n87 There are two reasons why, in theory, potential purchasers of private disability insurance may be "underconsuming" this product. First, psychological studies of decision-making under uncertainty suggest that people typically underestimate the risk of low-probability, unpleasant events. See Daniel Kahneman & Amos Tversky, Prospect Theory: An Analysis of Decision Under Risk, 47 Econometrica 263, 275, 282-83 (1979). For a theoretical application of this literature to disability insurance purchases, see Samuel A. Rea, Jr., Disability Insurance and Public Policy 28-35 (1981). Below a certain threshold level of probability, such risks are ignored. If total disability is perceived as a low-probability event, then this perception may partly explain the comparatively limited individual demand for disability insurance. Second, potential purchasers may assume that the forms of insurance that already cover them against certain kinds of disability -- workers' compensation and social security -- provide broader or more generous coverage than in fact they do.

Some corroboration of this "underconsumption" theory can be found in the actual pattern of disability insurance purchases. Counting paid sick leave as short-term disability insurance, more than twice as many people are covered by short-term than by long-term disability insurance. See 1984-85 Source Book, supra note 52, at 16. Long-term total disability obviously is a much lower probability event than short-term disability, and many people may simply ignore this risk, even though it is potentially more devastating. A perfectly rational insurance consumer might be better advised to bear a greater portion of the short-term disability risk herself and insure more of the long-term risk.

How much influence these two possible risk misperceptions may have on the demand for coverage is hard to say, in part because there is no objectively correct insurance level against which to compare the levels actually purchased. The very notion that the demand for disability insurance is "low" is therefore problematic. There is no objective way to determine the "proper" amount of insurance for any individual. Insurance consumption decisions are affected by the price of the product, funds available for purchase, and the degree of risk aversion associated with the risk to be insured. An effort to determine whether aggregate demand for disability insurance is adequate in any ultimate sense therefore would not be sensible.

Nonetheless some insight into the nature of the demand for disability insurance can be gained by comparing the risk of suffering a disability, the risk of dying, and the amount of disability and life insurance purchased nationwide. At any given age the risk of being disabled for more than six months is about equal to the risk of dying within a year. See Soc'y of Actuaries, Part 6 Study Notes: Group Long-Term Disability Coverages 2 (1976). Yet the nation spends considerably more on life insurance than on long-term disability insurance. See Statistical Abstract, supra note 9, at 360, 519-20. Moreover, only a small portion of the total expenditure on disability insurance is for voluntary private (individual or group) coverage; the bulk is for social insurance that is either publicly funded and mandatory (SSD) or privately financed and effectively mandatory (workers' compensation). In contrast, most life insurance is voluntarily and privately purchased in the commercial market. Of course, the comparison is not entirely fair since disability is merely a risk, while death at some point is certain. But many people do not buy "permanent" life insurance; they purchase term insurance or forms of whole life insurance that has coverage that terminates or can be transferred into accumulated cash-value. Consequently, although the comparison is not entirely fair, it is revealing. Given the apparent contrast in demand for insurance against the roughly equivalent statistical risks of annual long-term disability and death within a year, the risk misperception hypothesis is at least plausible.

REV_00262634

n88 The Family Leave Act, S.5, 102d Cong., 1st Sess. (1991), was vetoed by President Bush. The veto was overridden in the Senate but not the House. See Kenneth J. Cooper, House Fails to Override Bush Veto of Family Leave, Wash. Post, Oct. 1, 1992, at A7.

n89 See Daniel N. Price, Cash Benefits for Short-Term Sickness: Thirty-Five Years of Data, 1948-83, 49 Soc. Security Bull., May 1986, at 5.

n90 For the 1983 estimates on which this very crude projection is based, see id.

n91 This assumption itself may be somewhat suspect, since major federal benefit programs (most notably SSD) compensate some long-term disability but little or no short-term disability. See supra note 40 and accompanying text.

n92 Rough confirmation that at least the order of magnitude of this estimate is accurate is provided by a recent study conducted by the RAND Institute for Civil Justice. That study found a wage-loss compensation shortfall for the victims of nonfatal accidents (that is, the estimate excluded wages lost because of fatal accidents and all illness, but included income loss from both short- and long-term disability) of approximately $ 51 billion per year. See Deborah R. Hensler et al., Compensation for Accidental Injuries in the United States 85 (1991).

n93 See Steffie Woolhandler & David U. Himmelstein, The Deteriorating Administrative Efficiency of the U.S. Health Care System, 324 New Eng. J. Med. 1253 (1991).

n94 For an argument that there is a rationale for the patchwork of social insurance programs that evolved from the Social Security Act of 1935 -- programs that form a part, but only a part, of the entire picture, see Theodore R. Marmor et al., America's Misunderstood Welfare State (1990).

n95 See supra note 4.

n96 See supra notes 46-50 and accompanying text.

n97 See the Black Lung Benefits Program, 30 U.S.C. §§ 901-945 (1988), and Veterans' Benefits, 38 U.S.C. §§ 101-5228 (1988).

n98 See supra notes 46-50 and accompanying text.

n99 See supra note 12.

n100 See supra note 14.

n101 See Congressional Research Serv., supra note 19, at 94.

n102 For analyses of issues concerning the Social Security Disability program, see Edward D. Berkowitz, Disabled Policy: America's Programs for the Handicapped 79-104 (1987); Mashaw, supra note 41, at 21-46; Deborah A. Stone, The Disabled State 3-14 (1984); Liebman, supra note 5, at 836-55 (1976).

n103 In marked contrast to other developed nations, the United States has no program that provides a minimum income to each child. The most important program providing income to dependents that currently exists in the United States is represented by the "S" in OASDHI

REV_00262635

(Social Security). See 42 U.S.C. §§ 401-433 (1988). It makes income-support payments to "survivors" of a deceased person who had achieved eligibility. See id. § 402. The payments are based on the earnings of the late worker (normally a parent or a spouse), and are made until a minor survivor reaches age 18. See id. § 402(d). The program pays over $ 35 billion in benefits each year. See Statistical Abstract, supra note 9, at 360.

Because survivor benefits, like OASDHI payments to the aged and the disabled, are determined by a progressive formula (replacing a large percentage of smaller incomes and a smaller percentage of larger incomes) and because there are no benefits for wages above the maximum ($ 51,000 in 1990), this program is relatively adequate wage-loss replacement for spouses and children of those with low incomes and a much less complete replacement for dependents of those earning more. For discussion of this program and of policy issues concerning benefit levels and taxes, see Martha Derthick, Policymaking for Social Security (1979); Theodore R. Marmor & Jerry L. Mashaw, Social Security: Beyond the Rhetoric of Crisis (1988); Alicia H. Munnell, The Future of Social Security (1977). Concerning the benefits provided through the Social Security system to surviving children, see Stephen D. Sugarman, Children's Benefits in Social Security, 65 Cornell L. Rev. 836 (1980). Because of its relevance to issues of gender fairness, there has been more literature about "derivative" Social Security benefits for surviving spouses. See, e.g., Grace G. Blumberg, Adult Derivative Benefits in Social Security, 32 Stan. L. Rev. 233, 233-92 (1980); Peter W. Martin, Social Security Benefits for Spouses, 63 Cornell L. Rev. 789, 789-840 (1978).

n104 For good historical accounts of the attitudes of those who added disability protection to the U.S. Social Security system in the 1950s, the growth in the number of recipients to levels beyond those predicted, the legislative effort by the Carter administration to remove from the rolls those no longer eligible, and the political firestorm that erupted when the Reagan administration sought to implement the 1980 statutory amendments, see Berkowitz, supra note 102, at 61-78, 106-43; Lance Liebman & Richard B. Stewart, Bureaucratic Vision, 96 Harv. L. Rev. 1952, 1955-56 (1983) (reviewing Jerry L. Mashaw, Bureaucratic Justice (1983)).

Of course, there is already in place a very substantial income maintenance program for the elderly. The "OA" (for "old age") in OASDHI is a vast program making $ 157 billion in payments each year to retired persons. See Statistical Abstract, supra note 9, at 360. Benefits are a formulaic replacement keyed to covered wages during the final years of work. See 42 U.S.C. § 402(a) (1988). In addition, the old-age segment of the Supplemental Security Income program provides a minimum income to the elderly poor; to be eligible an individual must have very little income and few assets. This program pays approximately $ 3 billion per year. See Committee on Ways and Means, 102d Cong., 2d Sess., Overview of Entitlement Programs (1992 Green Book) 823 (1992).

n105 This is the reason for the dramatic growth since World War II, in the United States and Europe, in the percentages of persons above age 50 leaving the workforce and seeking disability benefits. Given improving levels of health, the growth of disability claimants is anomalous. Explanations include the availability of income transfer benefits, evolving social norms (how much pain should an individual bear, for example), and rapidly changing technology.

n106 See Virginia P. Reno & Daniel N. Price, Relationship Between the Retirement, Disability, and Unemployment Insurance Programs: The U.S. Experience, Soc. Security Bull., May 1985, at 24. Pursuant to a federal statute, all states administer Unemployment Insurance programs. See id. at 26. These provide roughly $ 15 billion per year in income replacement benefits, paid as a percentage of prior salary up to a maximum, to individuals who have become involuntarily unemployed after establishing eligibility by an adequate period of covered employment. In all states eligibility is for 26 weeks and in some states it continues for 39 weeks. See id. at 27. To maintain eligibility, an individual must be available for work and accept a suitable job if one is offered.

REV_00262636

States vary widely in their evaluations of reasons for leaving work. In some states, good personal reasons -- a sick relative, the desire to follow a friend to another city -- make a departure involuntary. In other states, resigning rather than being dismissed usually results in ineligibility for Unemployment Insurance benefits. See Saul J. Blaustein, Job and Income Security for Unemployed Workers (1981) (discussing and evaluating state programs); Paul L. Burgess & Jerry L. Kingston, An Incentives Approach to Improving the Unemployment Compensation System (1987) (same); Walter Corson et al., Nonmonetary Eligibility in State Unemployment Insurance Programs: Law and Practice 1-10 (1986) (same).

n107 See supra note 45 and accompanying text.

n108 See Stephen D. Sugarman, Short Term Paid Leave: A New Approach to Social Insurance and Employee Benefits, 75 Cal. L. Rev. 465, 465-66 (1987) (offering the outlines of such a program, with benefits of one day of sick leave for every eight days of work). Currently, about two-thirds of American medium- and large-size firms offer sick leave. See Statistical Abstract, supra note 9, at 420.

n109 See supra note 88 and accompanying text.

n110 We set aside here the separate question whether, for reasons of gender equity or other social policies, compensation for pregnancy or family leave should receive a higher priority than we would accord it for purely insurance purposes.

n111 See supra text accompanying note 67.

n112 See supra part III.B.2.

n113 See supra text accompanying note 67.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 10:18 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00262637

coverage is first-party insurance or victim's coverage, as distinguished from third-party or liability insurance which covers a party's liability as an injurer. Private first-party health, disability, and life insurance pay approximately $ 220 billion annually. [16]

a. Health Insurance. -- Health care costs in the United States exceed $ 800 billion per year, and have been growing annually at a rate of 10%. [17] Basic private health insurance, including Blue Cross and Blue Shield and coverage provided by commercial carriers, covers various combinations of physician's services, hospitalization, rehabilitation, and nursing care. In addition, Major Medical insurance covers certain costs above the specified limits of coverage under primary policies. Together these sources of coverage pay roughly $ 185 billion in insurance benefits each year. [18]

Sizable as these benefits are in absolute terms, more than thirty million Americans have no private or socially provided health insurance, [19] and about one-quarter of those who are covered by health insurance of some sort have inadequate coverage. For example, in 1987, [*81] an estimated 15.3% of all insured families incurred health care costs greater than 5% of their income, and 3.7% of all insured families incurred costs greater than 25% of their income. [20] These costs included policyholder/beneficiary contributions in the form of deductibles and coinsurance payments and costs for services not covered under the policies or subject to lifetime benefit limitations. [21]

While these estimates provide a useful reference point, it is important to recognize that people who have no health insurance are not necessarily denied health care. Many of the uninsured are treated at public and nonprofit hospitals, which do not collect most of the charges billed to uninsured patients. Such hospitals then often include a portion of these unrecovered costs in the sums for which they are reimbursed by private health and social insurance. [22] In effect, insured patients provide partial insurance to uninsured patients; the "owners" of public and nonprofit hospitals then absorb the remaining cost of treating the uninsured. This system of "insuring" the uninsured, however, is far from ideal. Public and nonprofit hospitals have an incentive either not to treat or to under-treat the uninsured, and this incentive has its effects: people without health insurance receive less primary and preventive care than those who are insured. [23]

b. Disability Insurance. -- Disability insurance protects the insured party against income lost as a result of physical or mental inability to perform his current or, in the case of some coverage, any occupation. This form of coverage usually insures against losses caused by total disability, although some policies also cover partial disability, often simply by providing short-term coverage for occupational disability and long-term coverage for general disability.

Disability insurance is the least prevalent form of private loss insurance. About 60 million people (roughly 55% of the workforce) are covered by private short-term disability insurance, defined as coverage against disability lasting for less than two years; but only about 24 million [*82] people (roughly 22% of the workforce) are covered by long-term disability insurance. [24] Private disability insurance pays only about $ 6 billion in benefits annually. [25]

c. Life Insurance. -- General-purpose life insurance, whether whole-life or term, covers death resulting from any cause; special-purpose accidental death and dismemberment policies or endorsements to general-purpose policies (for example, providing "double indemnity") cover death or grievous bodily harm resulting from accidents. However, special-purpose policies and endorsements appear to provide so small a percentage of total life insurance payments that they are not even separately reported in the industry's own statistical summaries. [26]

The gross amounts of life insurance in force and paid in benefits annually are substantial. Life insurance payments to beneficiaries, as distinguished from payments to policyholders and annuitants as some form of return on savings, totalled $ 24.5 billion in 1990. [27] In the same year over $ 9 trillion in life insurance was in force, providing an average of $ 121,000 in life insurance per insured household in the United States. [28] Although the size of this average death benefit is more than nominal, much of the population probably has only modest coverage at most. On the one hand, roughly 80% of all policies, providing 64% of all coverage, insure persons with incomes of less than $ 50,000 per year. [29] But on the other hand, 47% of all policies provide 72% of all coverage. [30] It seems fairly clear, therefore, that slightly less than half of the population is protected by the vast majority of life insurance that is in force in the United States. The other half of the population is far less well protected.

2. Social Insurance. -- Most governmentally provided "social" insurance against illness and injury in this country is loss-based; that is, benefits are payable upon the occurrence of a specified form of economic loss regardless of fault or cause. [31] Each American social insurance [*83] program was designed individually to meet particular needs. As a result, the programs taken as a whole do not reflect a clear vision of communal responsibility for an identifiable subset of the economic risks of modern life.

a. Health Insurance. -- Medicare and Medicaid provide the lion's share of federally supported health care insurance. [32] In the aggregate, these two programs pay roughly $ 159 billion per year for health care provided to the elderly and the poor. [33] Other federal and state health care insurance and similar programs pay roughly $ 40 billion in benefits annually. [34]

Medicare provides reimbursement for hospital costs and physicians' services for individuals who are eligible for the Social Security old age and disability insurance programs, for nearly all elderly individuals not eligible for Social Security, and for persons with end stage renal disease. [35] The hospital-cost insurance program known as Part A is provided free of charge; under Part B, eligible individuals must pay premiums to obtain insurance for the costs of physicians' services. Medicaid is the federal program that matches the states' provision of health care assistance to low-income individuals regardless of age. [36] The amount of assistance provided varies considerably from state to state.

b. Disability Insurance. -- Two large federal programs, Social Security Disability (SSD) and Supplemental Security Income (SSI), provide benefits to persons who are permanently and totally disabled. [37] Together these programs pay annual benefits of approximately $ 35 billion. [38]

Most workers who become permanently disabled are eligible for SSD benefits, which are monthly payments calculated in virtually the [*84] same manner as Social Security retirement benefits. Eligibility requires that a claimant (1) have worked at covered employment for the requisite number of quarters; (2) suffer from an inability to work that is "medical" in nature; and (3) be permanently and totally disabled. [39] "Permanently" is defined as suffering from an affliction likely to last for one year or more, and "totally" as being unable to perform "any other kind of substantial gainful work which exists in the national economy." [40]

The second eligibility condition, that a claimant's inability to work be "medically determinable," excludes from coverage workers whose unemployment is caused by declines in capacity or willingness to work that cannot be explained medically. This requirement, which results in major dispute-resolution difficulties over such issues as eligibility for individuals affected by alcoholism and drug addiction, is central to the political and moral judgments that underlie the program. Congress has chosen to compensate some individuals for the unfortunate things that happen to them, but not to compensate others who are in economic need. In part, the distinction attempts to separate those whose own choices and decisions brought about their inability to work from those whose behavior is socially unobjectionable but who have been victimized by a medical event.

In fact, of course, the social judgment embodied in the program is imperfectly captured by the line between medical and nonmedical disabilities. Millions of people have shortcomings that result at least partially from injury, disease, or physical or mental decline and that restrict their employment opportunities. The real issue in determining whether they should qualify for benefits is not whether their disability can be diagnosed as medical. Rather, the thousands of cases that have been decided by written opinions show administrative and judicial decision-makers analyzing a complex series of factors, including the claimant's physical and mental abilities, age, sex, level of education and skills, as well as the structure of the relevant labor market. [41]

REV_00262607

SSD is in a sense a supplement to the permanent total disability component of workers' compensation described earlier. Whereas workers' compensation covers only work-related disability, SSD is available whether or not a person's handicapping illness or injury was caused by employment. But SSD uses the same benefit formula as the Social Security retirement program, and therefore replaces only a small percentage of wages for all but the lowest-income workers. Thus most workers with a non-work-related disability will suffer a substantial income loss unless they have bought disability insurance on their own, their employers have provided it, or they have a cause of action in tort.

[*85] Another federal program paying benefits to the totally disabled that resembles insurance, SSI, makes means-tested payments to persons who are medically unfit for labor but either did not work enough to achieve Social Security eligibility or receive some Social Security payments but have so little income and assets as to be eligible for SSI supplementation. Included in this category are persons who are born with a disability, those disabled during childhood, and those disabled as adults before achieving sufficient participation in the labor force. Unlike Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) [42] or general relief arrangements, SSI benefits are not conditioned on a work search or acceptance of "improvement" services. Like SSD, however, SSI claimants must also satisfy the statutory disability standard of being "unable to engage in any substantial gainful activity by reason of any medically determinable physical or mental impairment" [43] likely to result in death or to extend for twelve months. [44]

Finally, five states and Puerto Rico operate short-term disability programs that pay over $ 2 billion in benefits per year. [45] These programs impose taxes on employers or employees and create funds from which payments are made to persons who become totally disabled for a period of months.

II. RELATIONSHIPS AMONG COMPENSATION PROGRAMS

The most striking feature of the "system" of compensation that we have just described is that it is not systematic at all. The United States lacks an intellectual structure to undergird its web of programs compensating the victims of illness and injury. In attempting to understand the different principles that underlie the current system and the directions that future development might take, two issues merit particular attention: (1) the goals of current compensation programs and (2) the methods by which they coordinate the benefits they pay. Analysis of each of these issues helps to uncover the relationships among American compensation programs and sets the stage for our discussion of the possibilities for expanding and restructuring the system in Part III.

[*86] A. The Goals of Existing Programs

In Part I, we isolated the three bases upon which American compensation programs pay the victims of illness and injury: fault, cause, and loss. These programs can serve one or more of four principal goals: corrective justice, deterrence, forced insurance, and income redistribution. It is possible at least in theory to envision at one extreme a program concerned exclusively with corrective justice and deterrence -- a system of civil liability for blameworthy behavior. At the other extreme would lie programs concerned exclusively with the redistribution of income to those suffering illness and injury. In between would lie programs of forced insurance, which, through various methods of pricing and risk classification, would combine elements of deterrence with elements of income redistribution.

REV_00262608

While existing programs serve a mixture of these goals, typically one of the goals predominates. The dominant goal of each existing program can be discerned by examining the sources of funds used to pay claims, the nature of the events that are compensable, and the measure of compensation employed by the program.

1. Fault-Based Systems. -- The tort system is the primary fault-based system for compensating victims of personal injury. Under the tort system, the injurer is the source of payment. Compensation is paid for full out-of-pocket loss and pain and suffering, except when the victim was also at fault, in which case damages are reduced (or denied entirely, in the few states which still adhere to contributory negligence) in proportion to the negligence attributable to the victim. Corrective justice and optimal deterrence are the conventionally understood goals of this arrangement. But in several respects the matter is more complicated than this simple analysis suggests. First, as many commentators have noted, the existence of liability insurance tends to undermine both the corrective justice and deterrence rationales for the imposition of tort liability. [46] An insured defendant does not personally correct the injustice done in causing injury to the plaintiff; rather, the defendant's liability insurer performs this correction. When the magnitude of the defendant's insurance premiums is not closely related to the magnitude of the defendant's liabilities, the defendant does not even perform this correction indirectly. Under these circumstances, the threat of tort liability may not only fail to achieve corrective justice, but may also fall short of promoting optimal deterrence, because a defendant can externalize the risk of liability through the purchase of liability insurance. [47]

Second, even aside from the impact of liability insurance, the imposition of liability in the long-latency toxic tort cases that have increasingly [*87] become the focus of controversy within the tort system is unlikely to achieve the goals of corrective justice and optimal deterrence. In such cases the management and shareholders at the time a wrongful act is committed are unlikely to be those who, decades later, sustain the cost of any liability that is imposed for the consequences of the act of a defendant corporation. Consequently, the parties who are wrongdoers or benefit from wrongdoing do not correct the injustice suffered by the victims of long-latency torts. Rather, that injustice is corrected later by others, assuming that the party or parties held liable are solvent. On occasion, the price of shares in a business incorporates a discount for an already-identified probability that the business will be held liable for some past conduct. In such instances, those responsible for the conduct may well bear the cost of its predicted consequences. But when a particular risk of future harm has not yet been recognized nor potential liability for the risk accurately gauged, no such specific discount occurs. Thus, unless the risks associated with a particular pattern of conduct are recognized at the time the conduct takes place, the threat of tort liability for its consequences is unlikely to have the optimizing effect on risk at the core of the deterrence rationale. [48]

Third, in a large group of tort cases, the plaintiff and the defendant are not strangers, but stand in a direct or indirect contractual relationship with each other. Patients and their physicians fall into this category, as do product purchasers and sellers. Economic theory predicts that in efficiently operating markets these parties will contract for the mix of safety, liability, and compensation they prefer, [49] and so satisfy their desire for corrective justice and optimal deterrence. Yet, in prescribing a particular mix of liability and compensation and in making most forms of tort liability for personal injury nondisclaimable, tort law precludes such contractual arrangements. One perfectly plausible explanation for this blanket no-disclaimer rule is that, on balance, the markets for health care services and consumer products are not sufficiently efficient to permit contract to displace tort, and case-by-case inquiry regarding whether the requisite conditions for permitting displacement had existed would be prohibitively expensive. A complementary explanation is that the no-disclaimer rule has a paternalistic motive: to force potential victims to insure themselves against personal injury. If tort liability could be disclaimed, potential victims might not use the resulting price savings to insure themselves against the risk that they would be injured by the health care or the products they purchased. The no-disclaimer rule assures that victims are "insured" [*88] against losses caused by tortious action, with the likely consequence that potential injurers will charge potential victims at least part of the cost of this "insurance" through increased charges for health care or consumer products.

REV_00262609

Finally, even when the threat of tort liability does have a deterrent effect on potential injurers, it may fail to create optimal incentives for potential victims to avoid injury and to reduce their losses after injury. The effects of the doctrine of comparative negligence on victim behavior are uncertain. Moreover, the recoverability of compensation in tort that is not subject to monetary deductibles or coinsurance creates ex post moral hazard: victims sure of recovery in tort are more likely to consume excessive medical care and not to return to work after injury than are victims without any prospect of recovery in tort.

In short, the conventional picture of the tort system as a corrective justice and deterrence regime is overly simple. Tort liability is also a forced-insurance arrangement, under which potential victims are required to insure themselves against the risk of suffering injury from the provision of health care or the sale of a product. In this respect, at least, tort law constitutes a disguised insurance program that resembles some of the programs that more explicitly perform this function. But unlike many of those programs, in our view, tort law is not a very sensible system of victims' insurance: it makes compensation available only when the injurer's fault can be demonstrated; it reduces compensation to the extent that the victim was at fault; its transactions costs are high; it covers pain and suffering in unlimited amounts even though many victims would wish limited or no such coverage ex ante; and in providing first-dollar coverage without explicit deductibles or coinsurance, it makes itself vulnerable to ex post moral hazard. [50]

2. Cause-Based Systems. -- Certain of the cause-based programs perform the forced-insurance function much more effectively. In fact, each major non-means-tested cause-based program incorporates a forced-insurance feature. For example, workers' compensation, a cause-based system of nearly absolute liability for work-related personal injury, is obviously much less concerned with corrective justice than tort law and relatively more concerned with assuring compensation for those suffering such injury. Like the nondisclaimability of tort liability, the mandatory character of workers' compensation can be viewed as a reflection of this aim. At least part of the cost of the employer's liability is financed indirectly by employees, who in effect pay a mandatory premium (through wages that are lower than they would otherwise be) for the insurance protection they receive through workers' compensation. The other major cause-based system of compensation, auto no-fault, quite transparently incorporates a forced-insurance [*89] feature, since it requires potential victims themselves to purchase insurance protection. [51]

Because workers' compensation and auto no-fault are cause-based systems, however, they retain some capacity to promote deterrence. And because they employ less than perfectly-refined risk classification, they also embody some income redistribution from potential to actual victims of work- and auto-related injury and illness. In effect, these are intermediate, mixed programs whose main goal appears to be forced insurance, but that incorporate deterrence and income redistribution as subsidiary goals.

3. Loss-Based Systems. -- The structure and financing of the non-means-tested loss-based insurance programs reveal that forced insurance is also one of their major goals. Over 80% of private health and disability insurance is purchased on a group basis, generally as a fringe-benefit of employment. [52] In most states, the provision of this coverage is not legally mandatory, [53] but health insurance and short-term disability coverage have become such ordinary benefits of employment by medium-size and large firms that their existence reflects a social precommitment to insurance in these settings, reinforced by the income tax subsidy provided such benefits. Many employment-based private loss insurance programs, however, also use reasonably refined risk classification and managed-care features that are likely to have at least mild deterrence effects. [54]

REV_00262610

Similarly, because the two major non-means-tested social insurance programs, SSD and Medicare, are both partially financed by potential beneficiaries and are mandatory, they contain a strong forced-insurance component. They respectively help to assure that virtually all disabled citizens have minimum insurance against loss of income resulting from disability and that the elderly have minimum insurance against the cost of hospitalization. Given the demands that would be placed on the public fisc in the absence of this component of SSD and Medicare, the method of financing these two programs can be regarded in part as a nonprogressive [55] tax that avoids the income redistribution to the disabled [*90] and the elderly that might otherwise occur. But SSD is financed by a wage tax that is paid half by employers and half by employees, [56] and Medicare is financed partly by the same type of wage tax and partly from general federal revenues. [57] This component of SSD and Medicare financing makes them more purposefully redistributional.

Income redistribution, however, clearly is the major function of the two principal means-tested loss-based insurance programs: Medicaid, which provides health care assistance to the poor, and SSI, which provides income support to the disabled who are not eligible for SSD. Both programs are noncontributory, and both insure only those with very low or no income. [58] But this is income redistribution on a fairly limited basis. Many of the working poor are ineligible for SSI because they have been forced to insure themselves under SSD; and the same individuals are ineligible for Medicaid in many states even if they have no other health insurance, as is likely to be the case.

All of these loss-based programs, like the cause-based ones discussed above, contrast sharply with the tort system in one salient respect. To varying degrees, these programs employ techniques designed to manage or contain the incentives of insured victims to consume a greater than optimal quantity of medical care or disability protection. These techniques for dealing with ex post moral hazard -- deductibles, coinsurance, managed care, ceilings on coverage, waiting periods -- vary from program to program, but each is directed at the kind of post-accident "victim deterrence" that is notably missing from the tort system, which in effect fully "insures" the victims it compensates.

4. A Comparison of the Systems and Their Goals. -- Arraying the bases upon which American compensation programs make payment and the programs' varied goals along two different axes reveals the following structure:

	FAULT	CAUSE	LOSS
CORRECTIVE JUSTICE/ DETERRENCE	Tort among strangers	Traditional strict liability
	Medical malpractice	Workers' compensation	SSD
FORCED INSURANCE	Products liability	Auto no-fault	Medicare
		Birth-Injury funds	Private insurance
		Vaccine Fund
INCOME REDISTRIBUTION		Black Lung Benefits Program	Medicaid
			SSI

[*91] In light of the preceding discussion of the mixed goals of these programs, we have obviously oversimplified by suggesting in the matrix that each program serves only one goal. But the matrix is nonetheless revealing. The empty cells at the top right and bottom left demonstrate that certain goals cannot easily predominate within certain kinds of programs. For example, a loss-based compensation system could not achieve precise and focused

REV_00262611

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*21 Fla. St. U.L. Rev. 571, **

Copyright © 1993 Florida State University Law Review.

Florida State University Law Review

Fall, 1993

21 Fla. St. U.L. Rev. 571

LENGTH: 6587 words

COLLATERAL SOURCES OF INDEMNITY

Robert A. Henderson* & Patrick F. Maroney **

* Legislative Counsel, United Services Automobile Association; B.A., 1974, University of South Florida; M.B.A., 1976, University of Tennessee; J.D., 1982, Florida State University.

 Professor, College of Business, Florida State University; B.A., 1971, Florida State University; J.D., 1975, University of Florida.

SUMMARY:
... However, where there are multiple payers for the same injury, the questionarises as to how one provider of benefits obtains reimbursement from the others. ... As defined by one court, "under the collateral source rule,' benefits received by the plaintiff from a source wholly independent of and collateral to the wrongdoer will not diminish the damages otherwise recoverable from the wrongdoer." ... In Matthews, the court addressed whether section 627.7372, which prohibited double recovery by an insured tort victim in a motor vehicle accident, also prohibited recoupment by the health insurer from the tortfeasor. ... As part of their review, the task force examined the general collateral source rule and the auto rule, and discussed the elimination of the right of subrogation by the first-party insurer. ... III. 1993 Revisions to Florida's Collateral Source Laws ... The law also expands the exception to the collateral source offset for which a right of subrogation exists to sources which have a right of reimbursement. ... Further, a provider will have no right of subrogation or reimbursement for collateral source payments made after the date of waiver, settlement or judgment. ... Finally, a collateral source provider claiming a right of subrogation or reimbursement must cooperate with the claimant. ...

TEXT:
[*571]

MEMBERS of our society strive to financially protect themselves from unforeseen circumstances causing illness or injury through the purchase of adequate insurance coverage. However, where there are multiple payers for the same injury, the questionarises as to how one provider of benefits obtains reimbursement from the others. This issue of payments from, and reimbursement by, collateral source providers was addressed by the 1993 Regular Session of the Florida Legislature. After review and analysis, the Legislaturechose to revise one and repeal another of Florida's laws addressingcollateral sources of indemnity. [1] Committee Substitute for House Bill 975 repealed section 627.7372, Florida Statutes, which higher costs of establishing third party liability have been determined. Id.

n58. Id. at 76. The task force also found that if first party insurers do not consistently exercise their right of subrogation in actions in which damages are awarded, the plaintiff will receive a windfall. Any moneys not recovered by the first party insurer are costs incurred by such provider. Id. at 75.

n59. Id. at 76.

n60. Id. Again, the task force operated from a lack of empirical data as to which approach would hold down the cost of liability insurance. Id.

n61. Id.

n62. Id.

n63. Id. at 76-77.

n64. Id. at 77. The Motor Vehicle Insurance Task Force of 1989 shared this concern with the task force. See Motor Vehicle Insurance Task Force of 1989, Report 35 (Mar. 30, 1990).

n65. While it can be argued that a jury, unaware of the collateral sources paid to a claimant, is more inclined to return a higher verdict than one aware of such collateral sources, such a result will not necessarily occur. An empirical study that used mock juries tested the hypothesis that jury verdicts would be reduced if juries were instructed not to award for, or to decrease the judgment by, collateral sources of recovery. Some believe that juries will reduce the overall amount awarded just because they are aware that the plaintiff has already received compensation for out-of-pocket expenses. The study found that juries did not respond to changes in the treatment of collateral source recovery by the plaintiff in the manner anticipated. The hypotheses that informing the jury of the plaintiff's recovery from collateral sources and instructing it to deduct that recovery from the award would result in lower jury verdicts was not supported by the data. However, the degree of injury and the amounts of collateral sources provided may have affected the result. Patrick F. Maroney, Jack M. Nelson & Pamela L. Perrewe, Modification of the Collateral Source Rule, 8 J. Ins. Reg. 408, 415-21 (June 1990).

n66. Academic Task Force, supra note 53, at 77.

n67. Ch. 93-245, 1, 1993 Fla. Laws 2436, 2436 (amending Fla. Stat. 768.76). Committee Substitute for House Bill 975 amended section 768.76, Florida Statutes, which applied to collateral sources of indemnity in situations other than motor vehicle accidents. However, it would appear that effective October 1, 1993, this general collateral source rule will apply to collateral sources in motor vehicle accident situations as well. The statutory law for PIP benefits, section 627.736(3), Florida Statutes, will continue to apply as well since it was not addressed by the Legislature in 1993.

n68. Id. (amending Fla. Stat. 768.76(2)(a)1.).

n69. Id.

n70. Id. (amending Fla. Stat. 768.76(2)(b)).

n71. Id. (amending Fla. Stat. 768.76(1), (4)). Committee Substitute for House Bill 975 also amended section 641.31, pertaining to health maintenance contracts. The bill provided that a health maintenance organization providing benefits or payments to a subscriber who suffers illness or injury by virtue of the negligent act of a third party is entitled to reimbursement from the subscriber in accordance with section 768.76(4). Id. 2, 1993 Fla. Laws at 2438

REV_00262647

(amending Fla. Stat. 641.31(8)).

n72. Id. 1, 1993 Fla. Laws at 2436 (amending Fla. Stat. 768.76(4)).

n73. Id. (amending Fla. Stat. 768.76, to be codified at Fla. Stat. 768.76(5)).

n74. Id.

n75. Id. (amending Fla. Stat. 768.76, to be codified at Fla. Stat. 768.76(6)). If suit has been filed by the claimant at the time notice is sent, a copy of the complaint against the tortfeasor must be sent with the notice. Id.

n76. Id.

n77. Id. (amending Fla. Stat. 768.76, to be codified at Fla. Stat. 768.76(8)).

n78. Id. (amending Fla. Stat. 768.76, to be codified at Fla. Stat. 768.76(9)). Such cooperation includes producing information necessary for the claimant to prove the nature and extent of the value of the collateral sources provided.

n79. Id.

n80. Dem., Wilton Manors.

n81. See Fla. H.R. Jour. 89 (Reg. Sess. Feb. 9, 1993).

n82. Id.

n83. Fla. Legis., Final Legislative Bill Information, 1993 Regular Session, History of House Bills at 236, CS for HB 975 [hereinafter History of House Bills].

n84. Id.

n85. Staff of Fla. H.R. Comm. on Judiciary, CS for HB 975 (1993) Staff Analysis 5 (final June 8, 1993) (on file with comm.).

n86. History of House Bills, supra note 83, at 236.

n87. Fla. H.R. Jour. 307 (Reg. Sess. Mar. 2, 1993).

n88. Id. at 993 (Reg. Sess. Mar. 30, 1993).

n89. Id. at 994.

n90. Fla. S. Jour. 943 (Reg. Sess. Apr. 1, 1993).

n91. Id. at 1119 (Reg. Sess. Apr. 2, 1993).

n92. Id. Senator John Grant, Republican, Tampa, offered the amendment. Id.

n93. Id.

n94. History of House Bills, supra note 83, at 236.

n95. Ch. 93-245, 4, 1993 Fla. Laws 2436, 2439.

REV_00262648

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 10:19 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

applied to actions arising out of the operation of a motor vehicle. [2] Section 768.76, Florida Statutes, which applies to non-motor vehicle actions arising from tort or contract, was also revised by the same act. [3] In this Article, the authors trace the history of Florida's collateral source laws and discuss the latest enactment.

I. Origin Of The Collateral Source Doctrine

At common law, the collateral source rule prevented the defendant from introducing into evidence other sources from which the plaintiff had received reimbursement. As defined by one court, "under the collateral source rule,' benefits received by the plaintiff from a source wholly independent of and collateral to the wrongdoer will not diminish the damages otherwise recoverable from the wrongdoer." [4] The common law doctrine was codified in several states as a byproduct of the "tort reform" of the 1980s. [5] [*572]

Prior to October 1, 1993, Florida had three distinct statutory provisions that each constituted a collateral source rule. [6] Two of the laws addressed causes of action stemming from motor vehicle accidents, [7] while the third statute applied to other actions for damages arising from tort or contract. [8]

The Florida statutory scheme is somewhat complex and will be examined by reviewing these three distinct statutory provisions that apply to collateral sources of indemnity.

II. Florida's Collateral Sources of Indemnity Laws

A. The Collateral Source Provisions Applicable to Personal Injury Protection Benefits

Under Florida's Motor Vehicle No-Fault Law, any owner or operator of a motor vehicle must obtain Personal Injury Protection [PIP] coverage up to $ 10,000 for losses sustained as a result of bodily injury, sickness, disease, or death arising out of the ownership, maintenance, or use of a motor vehicle. [9] A person injured as a result of a motor vehicle accident is entitled to eight percent of all reasonable expenses for medical bills, sixty percent of any loss of gross income and earning capacity, and death benefits of $ 5,000. [10] An injured party who is entitled to bring suit under the No-Fault Law is not entitled to recover any damages for which PIP benefits are paid or payable. [11] Thus, the statute provides that the plaintiff may prove all of his special damages notwithstanding this limitation, but, if such damages are introduced into evidence, the trier of fact, whether judge or jury, cannot award damages for PIP benefits paid or payable. [12] In all cases in which a jury is required to determine the existence of damages, the court must instruct the jury that the plaintiff cannot recover special damages for which PIP benefits have been paid or are payable. [13] This provision, section 627.736(3), Florida Statutes, which provides that [*573] PIP benefits cannot be included in an award for negligence, was not amended by the 1993 Legislature.

B. Collateral Sources of Indemnity Applicable to Motor Vehicle Accidents Other Than PIP Situations

The second collateral source provision applicable to motor vehicle accidents was found in section 627.7372, Florida Statutes. This provision will be referred to hereinafter as the auto rule. Originally enacted in 1977, this collateral sources of indemnity law provided that all specified collateral sources paid to the claimant before trial were admissible into evidence in automobile tort actions. [14]

When enacted, the auto rule provided: "In any action for personal injury or wrongful death arising out of the ownership, operation, use or maintenance of a motor vehicle, the court shall admit into evidence the total amount of all collateral sources which have been paid to the claimant prior to the commencement of the trial." [15] Any amounts paid by the claimant to secure the collateral source were also admissible. [16] Collateral sources were defined as any payments made to the claimant, or on his behalf, pursuant to the United States Social Security Act, any federal, state, or local income disability act, and any other public programs providing medical expenses, disability payments, or other similar benefits. [17] Collateral sources also included any health, sickness or income disability insurance, automobile accident insurance that provided health or disability benefits, except life insurance, any contract of any group or organization to pay for the costs of any health care services, and any contractual or voluntary wage contribution plan provided by employers which provided wages to the claimant during a period of disability. [18]

The auto rule was expanded the following year to require the court to instruct the jury to deduct from its verdict the value of all benefits received by the claimant from any collateral source. [19] This broadening of the law required the court to admit into evidence the total amount of all collateral sources paid to the claimant prior to the commencement of trial. [20] The Legislature also removed the requirement that the [*574] court admit into evidence any amount paid by the claimant to secure the collateral sources. [21]

In 1979, the definition of a collateral source was amended to exclude any benefits received under the Workers' Compensation Act. [22] The effect of the change was to ensure that the claimant would receive full workers' compensation benefits in addition to any amounts recovered from the tortfeasor or his insurer.

While addressing Florida's mandatory PIP requirement, the 1985 Legislature revised the definition of a motor vehicle to exclude any type of vehicle used as a taxicab or limousine. [23] Owners of these types of vehicles would not be required to maintain PIP coverage. [24] However, the previous all-inclusive definition of a motor vehicle (including taxicabs and limousines) would still be applicable for actions subject to the collateral source rule. [25] Thus, any first-party benefits (other than PIP coverage) provided under an insurance policy covering the occupants of a taxicab or limousine would still be deemed collateral sources for purposes of section 627.7372.

In 1986, the Legislature again revised the definition of collateral sources to specifically exclude benefits received under the Medicaid program of Title XIX of the Social Security Act. [26] Any benefits received from any medical services program administered by the Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services were also carved out of the definition. [27] These changes comported with the 1979 revision excluding workers' compensation benefits from any collateral source offset. The net effect of restricting the collateral source definition was to ensure that those claimants who are entitled to certain first-party governmental health benefits based on their income still would be allowed to collect their full benefits from the government as well as the total amount of damages from the tortfeasor.

The law was next revised in 1989 when the Legislature further amended the definition of collateral sources to exclude benefits received by the claimant under Medicare or any other federal program that provided for a federal government lien on the plaintiff's recov [*575] ery. [28] Any benefits received under such a program would not be admitted into evidence to reduce the jury awards.

In 1993, the Legislature repealed the auto rule, effective October 1, 1993. [29] After that date, section 768.76, Florida Statutes , will be the only collateral source rule in effect besides the provision specific to PIP benefits.

C. Collateral Sources of Indemnity Applicable to Tort and Contract Actions

Section 768.76 was enacted as part of the Tort Reform and Insurance Act of 1986. [30] This collateral source law applies to any action for damages, whether in tort or contract, arising on or after July 1, 1986. [31] However, to the extent it conflicts with any other provision of the Florida Statutes (e.g., the PIP collateral source rule), the other law applies. [32] This rule will be referred to hereinafter as the general collateral source rule.

REV_00262640

The general collateral source rule was similar to the auto rule in that collateral source payments were to be considered in any action in which damages were awarded in determining the total amount awarded to the claimant. However, whereas the auto rule required the court to instruct the jury to deduct from its verdict the value of all collateral source benefits received by the claimant, under the general rule, the court is to reduce the award by the total amount of the collateral source payments. [33]

The effect of the first-party payor's right to subrogation for any benefits provided to the claimant also differentiates the two rules. The general rule does not allow the claimant's award to be reduced based upon amounts recovered from collateral sources for which a right of subrogation exists. [34] However, the auto rule provided that the proceeds from the collateral source offset the claimant's damages regardless of the existence of the first-party payor's right of subrogation. [35] [*576]

After reducing the award by any collateral source benefits received, the general rule applies an offset to the extent of any amount paid, contributed or forfeited by the claimant or a member of the immediate family to secure the right to any collateral source benefit received. [36] The general rule defines collateral sources as any payments made to the claimant pursuant to the Social Security Act, any federal, state, or local income disability act, any health, sickness or income disability insurance, except life insurance benefits, any contract to provide health care services, and any employee wage continuation plan. [37] The general rule also provides that benefits received under the Medicaid program of Title XIX of the Social Security Act, or from any medical services program administered by the Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services, are not considered a collateral source. [38]

Under the general rule, a claimant's attorney's contingent fee is based on the net amount of the award reduced by the amount of any money received from collateral sources. [39] Additionally, a provider of collateral sources that has a right of subrogation will have a right to be reimbursed by a claimant to whom collateral sources were provided, if the claimant recovered all or part of the collateral sources from a tortfeasor. [40] The provider's right of reimbursement is limited to its pro rata share of collateral sources provided, minus the pro rata share of costs and attorneys' fees incurred by the claimant in recovering amounts from the tortfeasor. [41] In determining the provider's pro rata share of costs and attorneys' fees, the provider must deduct from its recovery that percentage that constitutes the percentage of judgment or settlement for costs and the attorneys' fees. [42]

When the Florida Legislature enacted section 768.76 in 1986, it was aware that a case was pending before the Florida Supreme Court concerning the constitutionality of section 627.7372. In Blue Cross & Blue Shield v. Matthews, the plaintiff sued a tortfeasor alleging that the tortfeasor's negligent operation of his vehicle seriously injured the plaintiff. [43] Blue Cross sought to intervene in the suit to recover over $ 18,000 it had paid for health care. The trial court denied intervention [*577] on the basis that, since section 627.7372 barred the plaintiff from recovering these collateral source payments, Blue Cross was also precluded from recovering such amounts. [44] The district court affirmed the trial court, finding that the statute did not deny equal protection and was not preempted by the Employment Retirement Income Security Act. [45]

On appeal, the Florida Supreme Court reversed, holding that the statute did not bar the subrogation rights of the health care insurer. [46] Therefore, the constitutional and preemption issues were obviated.

In Matthews, the court addressed whether section 627.7372, which prohibited double recovery by an insured tort victim in a motor vehicle accident, also prohibited recoupment by the health insurer from the tortfeasor. [47] The court found that section 627.7372 did not bar a cause of action by an insured or his insurer. [48] The court also distinguished the effects of the No-Fault Law on liability insurers from the effects on health insurers. The court wrote that liability insurers receive both benefits and detriments:

REV_00262641

In other words, losing the right to sue other motor vehicle insurers is washed out by gaining the right not to be sued by other such insurers. This equitable arrangement breaks down, however, if the other insurer is a health insurer. The arrangement becomes a one-way transaction with the health insurers always transferring money to the vehicle insurers. The motor vehicle insurance industry would benefit from transferring part of its claims cost to the health insurance industry which might, conceivably, result in lower vehicle insurance rates. However concerned it was with high motor vehicle insurance rates, we do not believe the legislature intended to disguise the costs of such insurance by transferring part of the burden to the health insurance industry and its customers. [49]

Thus, the court held that section 627.7372 did not bar the health insurer from recovering from the tortfeasor the costs of benefits paid to the insured. [50]

As part of a major legislative enactment on insurance reform, a five-member task force was created in 1986 to study Florida's tort and insurance laws. [51] The Academic Task Force for Review of the Insur [*578] ance and Tort Systems was charged with examining Florida law and the possible impact of the tort and insurance law changes contained in the 1986 Act. [52] The task force consisted of the presidents of both state universities that have law schools, the president of a private university that has schools of law and medicine, plus two other members appointed by these three. [53] As part of their review, the task force examined the general collateral source rule and the auto rule, and discussed the elimination of the right of subrogation by the first-party insurer. [54]

The task force found that subrogation by a first-party provider should keep down the cost of first-party insurance. [55] While elimination of the right of subrogation might reduce the cost of liability insurance, such a reduction in third-party coverage would occur only at the expense of increasing first-party coverage. [56] Thus, consumers would realize no additional savings in the cost of insurance if subrogation rights were abolished, except for the elimination of transaction costs incurred in obtaining subrogation. [57]

Based on the above reasoning, the value of subrogation was found to be the equitable reassignment of costs between payers of first-party insurance and payers of liability insurance. [58] Consequently, the task force recommended that the right of subrogation be retained. [59]

The task force also examined whether the collateral source offset calculation should be performed by the judge or jury. [60] In making its decision, the task force referred to a survey of attorneys in which forty-eight percent of those responding thought it made no difference. [61] Upon reviewing responses from defense attorneys, forty per [*579] cent thought that having juries make the offset would reduce costs, while thirty-eight percent thought that having judges make the offset would reduce costs. [62] As to plaintiffs' attorneys, four times as many respondents thought that having judges make the offset would reduce costs. [63]

The task force noted that having a uniform procedure for both the general and auto collateral source statutes would reduce the number of jury instructions and thus the possibility for confusion and mistake. [64] However, since the statutes employed different procedures, a comparative study may be helpful to determine the optimum approach. [65]

The task force concluded that neither the auto collateral source rule nor the general collateral source rule should be changed as to who ultimately should make the offset of collateral source payments. [66]

III. 1993 Revisions to Florida's Collateral Source Laws

The most recent revision to the general collateral source rule occurred in 1993 when the Legislature restricted the type of payments that qualify as collateral sources, expanded the exemption for calculating the offset, and established requirements for recovering benefits paid by a collateral source provider. [67] [*580]

REV_00262642

Benefits paid pursuant to Title XVIII and Title XIX of the Social Security Act are excluded from the statutory definition and are not deemed to be collateral sources. [68] Payments prohibited by federal law and those expressly excluded by law as collateral sources are also not included in the definition. [69] Additionally, benefits received under Medicare, or any other federal program providing for a federal government lien on the plaintiff's recovery, as well as the workers' compensation law, are not considered collateral sources. [70]

The law also expands the exception to the collateral source offset for which a right of subrogation exists to sources which have a right of reimbursement. [71] Additionally, the provider's right of reimbursement will be limited to the actual amount of collateral sources recovered by the claimant, less its pro rata share of costs and attorney's fees incurred by the claimant in recovering damages from the tortfeasor. [72] Any disputes between the claimant and the provider as to amounts recovered by the claimant from the tortfeasor will be subject to court determination. [73] In determining the amount of collateral sources recovered by the claimant, the court must consider offsetting the amount of settlement or judgment for any comparative negligence of the claimant, amount of liability insurance available to the tortfeasor, or any other factors which the court deems appropriate. [74]

The law imposes new requirements on both parties regarding the collection of benefits from the claimant by the collateral source provider. First, the claimant must send the collateral source provider, by certified or registered mail, notification of the claimant's intent to claim damages from the tortfeasor. [75] Additionally, the notice must include a statement that the provider of collateral source benefits will waive any right to subrogation or reimbursement unless it provides a statement, in which it asserts payment of benefits and right of subro [*581] gation, within thirty days following receipt of the claimant's notice. [76] Further, a provider will have no right of subrogation or reimbursement for collateral source payments made after the date of waiver, settlement or judgment. [77]

Finally, a collateral source provider claiming a right of subrogation or reimbursement must cooperate with the claimant. [78] A court may consider failure to cooperate in determining the right to, or amount of, reimbursement. [79]

IV. Legislative History of the 1993 Law

House Bill 975 was sponsored by Representative Tracy Stafford [80] and introduced in the Florida House of Representatives on February 9, 1993. [81] Upon introduction, the bill was referred to the Committees on Judiciary and Appropriations. [82] On February 11, 1993, the bill was referred to the Subcommittee on Court Systems, Probate and Consumer Law where it was placed on the Subcommittee's agenda for February 15, 1993. [83] At the Subcommittee meeting, the bill was favorably reported and was placed on the February 17, 1993, agenda of the House Committee on Judiciary. [84]

At the meeting of the Committee on Judiciary, the bill was amended to remove the provision that insurers and health maintenance organizations have no right to subrogation or reimbursement unless they can establish that monetary returns on subrogation claims have been factored into the insurance premiums charged. [85] Following the adoption of the amendment, the Committee adopted a Committee Substitute for House Bill 975. [86] Committee Substitute for House Bill 975 was then placed on the House Calendar and read for the first time on March 2, 1993. [87] The bill was read on the House floor a second [*582] time on March 30, 1993, where it was amended to require that any notice from the claimant to the collateral source provider of the claimant's intent to seek damages from the tortfeasor must include a statement that the provider will waive any right to subrogation, unless it provides the claimant with a statement asserting payment of benefits and the right of subrogation within thirty days. [88] The same day, the bill passed the House by a vote of eighty-three to thirty-two and was sent to the Florida Senate. [89] In the Senate, Committee Substitute for House Bill 975 was referred to the Committees on Judiciary, Health Care and Commerce. [90] On April 2, 1993, the bill was withdrawn from all three committees, and substituted for Committee Substitute for Senate Bill 1590. [91] At that time, on the Senate floor, an amendment was offered to the House bill to expand the definition of collateral sources to include uninsured motorist benefits. [92] The amendment failed and Committee Substitute for House Bill 975 passed the Senate by a vote of thirty-three to zero. [93] On April 29, 1993, the bill was signed by the Senate President and the Speaker of the House and presented to the Governor. [94] The Governor allowed the bill to become law on May 15, 1993, without his signature. [95]

REV_00262643

V. Conclusion

Florida's new collateral source law will have a widespread effect on all actions involving damages recovered by a claimant who is entitled to multiple sources of benefits. Providers of collateral sources must carefully adhere to procedural deadlines or waive their right to subrogation or reimbursement. Additionally, except where PIP benefits apply, causes of action stemming from motor vehicle accidents will no longer be treated differently than any other tort or contract matter involving a collateral source provider. Thus, the rule now provides that when a collateral source carrier has a right of subrogation or reimbursement, the judge will not reduce the amount of the award by the total amount that was paid for the benefit of the claimant from collateral sources.

Although one uniform law may simplify compliance with the statutory requirements for seeking recovery of amounts paid to a claimant [*583] for damages caused by a third party, it will be interesting to examine the future effect of the new collateral source law on the cost of motor vehicle and health insurance in Florida.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. Ch. 93-245, 1993 Fla. Laws 2436.

n2. Id. 3, 1993 Fla. Laws at 2439 (repealing Fla. Stat. 627.7372).

n3. Id. 1, 1993 Fla. Laws at 2436 (amending Fla. Stat. 768.76 (1991)).

n4. Farley v. Engelken, 740 P.2d 1058, 1059 (Kan. 1987).

n5. Specifically, Alabama, Alaska, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, New York, North Dakota, Oregon, Rhode Island and Tennessee enacted tort reform measures during the last decade that addressed issues involving the doctrine of collateral sources. See Insurance Info. Inst., Insurance Facts, 1987-88 Property/Casualty Fact Book 60 (1987-88).

n6. Fla. Stat. 627.736(3), .7372, 768.76 (1991 & Supp. 1992).

n7. Id. 627.736(3), .7372 (1991 & Supp. 1992).

n8. Id. 768.76 (1991).

n9. Id. 627.736(1) (Supp. 1992).

n10. Id. 627.736(1)(a)-(c).

n11. Further, no insurer shall have a lien on any recovery in tort by judgment, settlement, or otherwise for PIP benefits, regardless of whether suit has been filed or settlement has been reached by the parties. Id. 627.736(3).

REV_00262644

n12. Id.

n13. Id. Allowing the jury to deduct the amount of the award by the amount of PIP benefits paid would serve as a disincentive for the claimant to obtain the required amount of coverage pursuant to the Florida Motor Vehicle No-Fault Law.

n14. Ch. 77-468, 34, 1977 Fla. Laws 2057, 2081 (codified at Fla. Stat. 627.7372 (1977)).

n15. Id. (codified at Fla. Stat. 627.7372(1) (1977)).

n16. Id.

n17. Id. (codified at Fla. Stat . 627.7372(2) (1977)).

n18. Id.

n19. Ch. 78-374, 5, 1978 Fla. Laws 1041, 1043 (amending Fla. Stat. 627.7372(1)).

n20. Id. The legislative staff advised that this expansion of the collateral source rule should assist in the reduction of the amount of final verdicts. However, an exact economic impact was not determined as the ultimate savings depended upon the reported frequency and severity of projected accidents. Staff of Fla. S. Comm. on Com., CS for SB 1308 (1978) Staff Analysis 2 (final June 1, 1978) (on file with comm.).

n21. Ch. 78-374, 5, 1978 Fla. Laws 1041, 1043 (amending Fla. Stat. 627.7372(1)).

n22. Ch. 79-40, 115, 1979 Fla. Laws 215, 301 (codified at Fla. Stat. 627.7372(3) (1979)).

n23. Ch. 85-320, 1, 1985 Fla. Laws 1937, 1937 (amending Fla. Stat. 627.732(1)(b)).

n24. At the time, common carriers from South Florida contended that the legislation was necessary because private passenger PIP insurers had subrogation rights against the owner or insurer of commercial vehicles, yet the owner or insurer of commercial motor vehicles did not have subrogation rights against insurers of private passenger vehicles. Staff of Fla. S. Comm. on Com., CS for SB 713 (1985) Staff Analysis 3 (rev. June 19, 1985) (on file with comm.).

n25. Ch. 85-320, 1, 1985 Fla. Laws 1937, 1937 (amending Fla. Stat. 627.732(1)(b)).

n26. Ch. 86-220, 70, 1986 Fla. Laws 1603, 1660 (amending Fla. Stat. 627.7372(3)).

n27. Id.

n28. Ch. 89-203, 1, 1989 Fla. Laws 839, 839 (amending Fla. Stat. 627.7372(3)).

n29. Ch. 93-245, 3, 1993 Fla. Laws 2436, 2439 (repealing Fla. Stat. 627.7372).

n30. Ch. 86-160, 55, 1986 Fla. Laws 695, 751 (codified at Fla. Stat. 768.76 (Supp. 1986)).

n31. Fla. Stat. 768.76 (Supp. 1986).

n32. Id.

n33. The primary distinction between the provisions of the general collateral source rule and the auto rule is that under the general rule, the jury is not informed of payments to the plaintiff from collateral sources and is not instructed to deduct from its verdict (or, alternatively, not award) the value of collateral source benefits received or payable. Under the statutory scheme envisioned by the general rule, the court rather than the jury reduces the verdict by the amounts of collateral sources paid or available, and juries are unaware of the receipt of collateral sources.

REV_00262645

n34. Fla. Stat. 768.76(1) (Supp. 1986).

n35. Id. 627.7372(1) (1991).

n36. Id. 768.76(1) (Supp. 1986).

n37. Id. 768.76(2).

n38. Id.

n39. Id. 768.76(3).

n40. Id. 768.76(4).

n41. Id.

n42. Id.

n43. 498 So. 2d 421 (Fla. 1986).

n44. Id. at 422.

n45. Id.

n46. Id.

n47. Id.

n48. Id. The court also stated: "We see no reason in law or equity why a health insurer should not be entitled to a single recovery of costs caused by the tortfeasor." Id. at 423.

n49. Id.

n50. Id.

n51. Ch. 86-160, 63, 1986 Fla. Laws 695, 756-59.

n52. Id.

n53. Id. The Task Force members consisted of Marshall Criser, President of the University of Florida; Bernard Sliger, President of the Florida State University; Edward Foote II, President of the University of Miami; Preston Haskell; and P. Scott Linder. See Academic Task Force for Review of the Insurance and Tort Systems, Final Recommendations (Mar. 1, 1988) [hereinafter Academic Task Force].

n54. Academic Task Force, supra note 53, at 74.

n55. Id. at 75.

n56. Id.

n57. Id. The task force concluded that such transaction costs would be insignificant compared to overall system costs because the right of subrogation is perfected only after the

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*47 Case W. Res. 1075, **

Copyright (c) 1997 Case Western Reserve Law Review.
Case Western Reserve University

Spring, 1997

47 Case W. Res. 1075

LENGTH: 23778 words

NOTE: Preserving the Collateral Source Rule: Modern Theories of Tort Law and a Proposal for Practical Application

Christian D. Saine

SUMMARY:
... The collateral source rule has long been a mainstay of Amer- ican tort law. ... Specifically, the collateral source rule has been criticized by commentators and scholars for conflict- ing with modern purposes of tort liability and the tort system in general. ... Another argument against the collateral source rule is that it is too rooted in a punitive or deterrence theory of tort liability. ... Although the argument is a potentially serious consideration for the debate over whether to retain tort law liability at all, it does not damage the allocative argument to retain the collateral source rule in our current tort liability system. ... Extensive use of subroga- tion by insurers, along with continued operation of the collateral source rule, would solve the double-recovery problem and still pro- mote the allocative and deterrence purposes of tort liability. ... In addi- tion, an insurer's subrogation rights will prevent inappropriate incentives for the insured to cause or fabricate losses to effect a double recovery. ... If subrogation can be utilized to its full potential, then the collateral source rule can survive tort reform and the benefits of placing full tort liability on the parties that cause injuries can be retained.

TEXT:
[*1075]

Introduction

The collateral source rule [1] has long been a mainstay of Amer- ican tort law. Recently, however, the traditional tort system has undergone tremendous scrutiny. Specifically, the collateral source rule has been criticized by commentators and scholars for conflict- ing with modern purposes of tort liability and the tort system in general. [2] This criticism prompted many state legislatures to change the rule. In Ohio, for example, the Supreme Court recently struck down the Legislature's attempt to do away with the rule. [3] Based on the criticism the rule has received and the fervor with which tort plaintiffs and their attorneys cling to the traditional rule, it is clear that the rule has important implications for all parties partici- pating in the tort system and for those attempting to redesign it.

This Note concludes that the collateral source rule should be retained. The history and traditional justifications of the collateral source rule are reviewed in Part I. More recent criticism of the traditional rule from scholars and commentators who disagree about the relative importance of these justifications, as well as the result- ing legislative and judicial activity, [4] are discussed in Part II. Parts III-V discuss three separate justifications of the tort appealing. As this section will show, however, it may have limited applicability in some cases.

REV_00262650

The double recovery argument applies most strongly to a case in which an injured person receives compensation for damages without paying premiums for the contractual right to receive the compensation. The double recovery argument would also be strengthened if this gratuitous compensation returns the injured person to the precise condition before the accident occurred. In such a case, the additional recovery from the tortfeasor would be a windfall to the injured person. There is no doubt that he has recov- ered twice for his injuries and has actually reaped a profit from becoming injured. If the only purpose of imposing liability on the tortfeasor was to fairly compensate injured parties, then additional compensation in such a limited case would be an inefficiency in [*1098] the tort system. However, as this Note proposes, the allocative and deterrent purposes of the tort system must be considered when assessing the overall impact of this inefficiency argument in light of the collateral source rule debate. [118] It is possible that the inef- ficiency of a plaintiff's double recovery is met or exceeded by the benefits of the allocative and deterrent impact of imposing tort liability on the injurer. If so, then retaining the collateral source rule would be beneficial, even though it produces some compensa- tion inefficiencies.

In addition, the increased use of subrogation or reimbursement rights by first-party insurers against tortfeasors, with a concerted effort to reduce the transaction costs of these arrangements, will significantly decrease the inefficiencies of double or multiple recov- ery by the plaintiff. [119]

Before subrogation is considered, this Part will focus on two factors that mitigate the double recovery inefficiency and decrease the likelihood of the existence of a perfectly and freely compensat- ed plaintiff who has received a double recovery. These factors may help tip the balance so that the allocative and deterrent purposes of tort law outweigh the compensation inefficiencies. These factors are the nature of the insured's contract with the insurer and the extent to which tort damages can truly compensate for tort injuries.

A. Benefit of the Bargain

Critics of the collateral source rule contend that the rule turns the insurance contract into a wager of the premium for a chance at double recovery. [120] If an insured acted out of prudence and fore- sight in obtaining the insurance, then the only reasonable expecta- tion would be to receive the insurance benefits and no more. The collateral source rule, however, allows insureds to add a tort judg- ment to their insurance benefits.

The main opposition to the wager-for-double-recovery argu- ment is that the plaintiff's contract with the insurer is just that, a contract. [121] Since the private contract with the insurer is separate [*1099] and distinct from the plaintiff's tort relationship with the tortfeasor, the plaintiff's right to recover damages from the tortfeasor via the legal process should not be disturbed by a collateral source setoff statute. [122] Of course, the plaintiff can also contract not to receive both the insurance proceeds and damages from the defendant via a subrogation or reimbursement clause in the insurance contract. [123] Since many insurers do include these types of clauses in their policies, it may seem a moot argument for the victim to assert the contractual right to receive both the insurance proceeds and damage awards. However, insureds prefer insurance contracts with subroga- tion costs due to lower premiums. [124] Therefore, the insured's right to choose which type of policy to enter into, to the extent that this is possible, is the right that is protected when the collater- al source rule is retained.

Additionally, the insurer has already been paid, ex ante, by the plaintiff to provide benefits in case of injury. [125] If the defendant also has a liability insurer who will pay the damages to the plain- tiff, then this insurer also has already been pre-paid. These insureds have both paid a premium equivalent to the amount the insurers must pay to the insureds, discounted by the risk of the loss occur- ring. This shifts the loss to the insurers. Insurance companies do business by assuming many risks of loss, with the knowledge that a majority of them will not materialize. Paying benefits to an in- sured when a loss occurs is simply a cost of doing this business. A collateral source setoff statute operates to relieve the defendant's insurer from paying the plaintiff's damages and the insurer is re- lieved of the duty of paying benefits for which the insurer has already been compensated and has previously contracted to pay. [*1100] The operation of a new collateral benefit setoff rule clearly gives the defendant's liability insurer a windfall that it did not expect when it wrote the defendant's liability insurance policy.

REV_00262659

As mentioned earlier, [126] opponents of the collateral source rule contend that the insured is wagering with the pre-paid contract that he will be injured by a solvent tortfeasor, thus giving the insured a double recovery. Under the indemnity theory of insurance law, [127] insurance benefits should only compensate for the loss suffered by the insured. If an injured person has a claim against the tortfeasor for his loss, then the indemnity theory would hold that there were actually no losses for which the insurer should pay benefits. The indemnity theory arose with clear policy consider- ations against using insurance contracts as wagers since this would create an "evil" incentive to destroy property or lives in order to recover insurance benefits. [128]

Under this pure indemnity theory of insurance, in a system where the collateral source rule operates to give a double recovery for injuries, there is no doubt that an insured is wagering so he can receive both insurance benefits and damages from a tortfeasor. He would be foolish not to make this wager since there is always the possibility of being injured by an insolvent tortfeasor or in a true accident. Those opposed to the collateral source rule contend that insureds wager with insurance policies in order to receive double recoveries. This contention is not persuasive because it is a financial necessity to provide oneself and one's family with insur- ance coverage.

In addition, if an insured is said to be wagering with an insur- ance contract that the loss will occur, then it can also be said that the insurance company is wagering that the loss will not occur. Although both parties hope that the accident will not occur, only the insurance company is doing so through purely monetary objec- tives, [129] since a non-occurring loss is one less income statement debit entry for the company. In that sense, as between the two parties, the insurance company's wager is even more tainted than the insured's wager. The insured may be wagering on the contract, [*1101] but he is also buying security against monetary loss by shifting the risk of a loss to a party that is less risk-averse. [130]

B. Ability of Tort Damages to Compensate

As has already been conceded, [131] if collateral benefits re- ceived by a victim fully compensate for damages, then the double recovery argument is fairly strong. The conditional assumption that the benefits were fully compensatory, however, is as strong and misleading. It is true that the pecuniary damages incurred, such as medical costs and lost earnings, can be fairly compensated through collateral sources. If a jury awards damages solely on the belief that the plaintiff suffered only previously compensated pecuniary damages, then the double recovery argument, in its strong form, would justify offsetting this award with collateral benefits received by the victim. The array of alternative damages potentially avail- able to a plaintiff, [132] however, shows that the tort system recog- nizes that many other types of injuries can be incurred that are not traditionally covered by insurance benefits. [133]

In a case where the jury knew the exact cost of insured medi- cal expenses incurred and provided a categorized award, it would be easy to determine the jury's intent and compute a setoff. The Sorrell case, however, is an excellent example of a setoff provision frustrating the intent of the jury. Ms. Sorrell was awarded damages for medical expenses, lost wages, and pain and suffering. [134] The [*1102] sum of these damages was actually less than the amount of worker's compensation benefits she and her medical provider had received for her pecuniary losses only. It is difficult to understand how the jury handled Ms. Sorrell's pecuniary damages. If it is assumed, however, that they were not aware of the worker's compensation benefits she received, due to the inadmissibility of collat- eral benefits evidence, their low estimate of the cost of medical care is understandable. The jury's intent was clear, however, in that they wanted to award Ms. Sorrell $ 5,000 for pain and suffer- ing. [135] The effect of the Ohio setoff statute in this case would have totally setoff the sum of Ms. Sorrell's pecuniary and non- pecuniary jury awarded damages. This is true since the statute does not differentiate between or attempt to align the setoff between similar collateral insurance benefits and jury awards. The jury's pain and suffering award could have been nullified by the statute. Indeed, the plaintiff in Sorrell argued that the benefits should cor- respond to the jury awards that are being reduced. [136]

REV_00262660

If a solution to the double recovery problem is still called for, a better setoff statute would more clearly align the insurance bene- fits received with the corresponding component of the jury award. If medical expenses or lost wages were paid by collateral sources, then the setoff for these benefits should only apply to a jury award that specifies these two types of damages. As the statute in Ohio was originally crafted, total collateral benefits are subtracted from total compensatory damages. [137] Since this could interfere with a jury's award of non-economic damages such as for pain and suffer- ing, simply limiting the setoff to identifiable economic damage awards would solve the problem. [138] In the Sorrell case, if this limitation were imposed, the jury's pain and suffering award would have been left intact. Ms. Sorrell's $ 15,000 of worker's compensa- tion benefits would have only offset the jury award for medical expenses and lost wages and she would have received the $ 5,000 in pain and suffering damages that the jury deemed that she had incurred. Unless an economic-award-only setoff provision is incor- [*1103] porated into these setoff statutes, the value of jury compensation for non-economic damages will be seriously compromised.

VI. Subrogation & Efficiency Proposals

A. Subrogation--Background

Subrogation has been recommended as a solution to the dou- ble recovery problem that arises under the operation of the tradi- tional collateral source rule. [139] Subrogation is the legal or con- tractual right of an insurer to substitute itself in place of its insured in regard to some or all of the insured's rights to recover damages from the defendant. [140] In a case such as Sorrell, if the insurer providing benefits was subrogated to the plaintiff's right of recovery, the insurer could bring suit on its own behalf, or on behalf of the plaintiff, in order to recover damages from the defendant. The defendant would pay the benefits directly to the insurer as reim- bursement for the insurance benefits paid to the plaintiff. [141] Hence, there would be no double recovery by the plaintiff and the insurance industry would have only paid one set of benefits to the victim. Specifically, the defendant's liability insurer would pay the tort judgment to the plaintiff's insurer. Extensive use of subroga- tion by insurers, along with continued operation of the collateral source rule, would solve the double-recovery problem and still pro- mote the allocative and deterrence purposes of tort liability.

There are, however, a few difficulties with subrogation that result in it not being used without exception in insurance contracts. Traditionally subrogation has been limited to property insurance policies and has had limited application in personal medical bene- [*1104] fits policies. [142] Subrogation procedures are also extremely expen- sive in relation to the benefit they give to insurers. [143]

In spite of these problems, both supporters [144] and oppo- nents [145] of the collateral source rule have offered subrogation as a solution to the double recovery problem. In light of the allocative and deterrent benefits presented in this Note that favor the contin- ued use of the collateral source rule, the increased use of subroga- tion in conjunction with the collateral source rule would limit the double-recovery problem as well as preserve the benefits of the rule. Schwartz's call to investigate the feasibility of subrogation should be pursued in order to determine if the benefits of the collateral source rule justify retaining the rule. [146] This Note pro- poses that subrogation can be beneficial to insurers, insureds, and society as a whole due to the allocative and deterrence effects of full tort liability. [*1105]

On a theoretical level, the argument that subrogation is benefi- cial is well supported. Posner contends that insurers should be able to contract for the right to be reimbursed for benefit payments made to their insureds when the insured has recoverable rights against a third party. [147] In addition, the insurers could demand that the insured assign her legal rights against the tortfeasor to the insurer. [148]

Shavell agrees and, in fact, contends that both insurers and insureds will prefer insurance contracts giving subrogation rights to the insurer. [149] This is so because the existence of subrogation rights in insurance policies is socially optimal. Insureds as a group will gain more utility from lower premiums than from a few possi- ble double recoveries from defendants and insurers will be able to recover portions of the judgment from the defendant. [150] In addi- tion, an insurer's subrogation rights will prevent inappropriate incentives for the insured to cause or fabricate losses to effect a double recovery. [151] Shavell recognizes the limitations of legal re- straints on subrogation, the doubt that it actually lowers premiums, and the increased transaction costs due to a rise in subrogation litigation. He argues, however, that these constraints work against both the insured and insurer. [152] In light of the efficiency gains of subrogation to both parties that Shavell discusses, both parties have incentives to overcome these limitations.

The general legal constraints against subrogation in health and medical insurance policies are eroding. [153] Clauses granting such rights to insurers are becoming more and more common in other types of insurance policies. In fact, there is even some support for allowing subrogation to life insurers, [154] an area that has tradition- [*1106] ally disallowed subrogation. [155] The increased use of subrogation clauses would obviate the need for collateral source setoff statutes and allow for free operation of the collateral source rule without the maligned double-recovery problem.

Given the support of economic theory and relaxation of subro- gation's legal constraints, the problem on a more practical level is how to promote the efficient use of subrogation. If the costs of subrogation are too high, or if its use is limited, then the benefits of imposing full liability on tortfeasors and their insurers will be outweighed by the costs of subrogation and the continued ineffi- ciency of double recovery. If Professor Schwartz' mandate to in- vestigate the costs and benefits of subrogation before completely eviscerating the collateral source rule is to be followed, [156] then serious attempts to install a cost-effective and pervasive subrogation program should be undertaken. This Note proposes that a statutory solution can address the inefficiencies of tort compensation through enforcement of subrogation rights. Without statutory impetus, or at least a consideration of the policies underlying such a proposal, insurers will not have the incentive to push subrogation as a solu- tion to the double-recovery problem. Instead, insurers will rely on the expensive and spotty process that is now in place. Pointing to the "evils" of double recovery and the costs of the current subroga- tion practice, insurers instead will continue pushing for statutory revision of the collateral source rule and other tort reform mea- sures.

Set out below are the various issues to be considered and addressed by a statutory reform of subrogation procedures. [157] The main topics to be addressed include coordination between plaintiff and defendant's insurers, allocation of subrogation recovery be- tween plaintiff and his insurer, attorney's fees, mandatory arbitra- tion, and possible procedural changes to combine arbitration with speedier subrogation recovery by first-party insurers. [*1107]

B. Coordination of Tort Judgment or Settlement

Before an injured insured even enters the tort system, the inefficiencies of compensation have already been encountered. In many cases, a victim may be over-compensated by excess insur- ance coverage or by insuring with more than one insurer. [158] The multiple-compensation problem is mostly addressed by insurers' increased use of "Other Insurance" clauses. Until multiple recover- ies from different insurers are eliminated, however, the insurance industry can hardly complain of the tort system's double-recovery problems.

Insurer's attempts to coordinate insurance benefits can easily be adapted and applied to the enforcement of subrogation agree- ments by the insurer against other insurers. [159] The legal mecha- nisms that promote the coordination of insurance benefits and con- tractually limit coverage for the benefit of the insurer can similarly be used to give the insurer the contractual right to recover part of the tort judgment. These mechanisms are already in place in insur- ance policies that include subrogation clauses. However, the prob- lem of promoting the information exchange and extending the use of these provisions remains.

An objection to relying on subrogation as a remedy for double recovery, even when it is permitted by law and included in the insurance contract, is that monitoring lawsuits and securing reim- bursement at their conclusion is too expensive. This precludes [*1108] enforcement in cases involving small sums. [160] As inefficient as small-claims enforcement may be, it does not change the fact that the mechanisms that monitor and prevent double insurance cover- age could just as easily be used for subrogation monitoring purpos- es as well. The costs involved in monitoring tort suits would seem to parallel, and not exceed, the monitoring costs for double insur- ance coverage. The cost/benefit ratio of enforcing subrogation rights for small sums would probably be similar to enforcing "Oth- er Insurance" clauses; this is something that the industry seems perfectly willing to do.

If the goal of increased subrogation is to decrease double recovery costs to the industry, then defendants' liability insurers, who often also write first-party coverage, will have an economic incentive to cooperate and ensure that the plaintiff's insurer is reimbursed. Offsetting this cooperative incentive is a collusive incentive between the defendant's insurer and the plaintiff to preclude the plaintiff's insurer's subrogation rights by entering a secret settlement. By not notifying the plaintiff's insurer of the settlement, the two parties could divide the subrogation recovery among themselves. The defendant's insurer would pay out less and the plaintiff would receive more under this secret settlement.

In order to promote the reimbursement of the plaintiff's insur- er and to avoid this type of collusion, a statutory escrow or trust arrangement could be utilized. [161] The liability insurer would hold the portion of the judgment or settlement corresponding to the benefits paid by the insurer. [162] In addition to the overall econom- ic incentives of full reimbursement, statutorily requiring a liability insurer to hold that portion of the judgment deemed pecuniary would give the liability insurer the incentive to investigate any pending subrogation rights. This investigation would not necessarily be extensive, and placing the burden of a reasonable inquest on the escrow agent would avoid any possibility of collusion. [*1109]

If the defendant's insurer does not fulfill this imposed duty, the plaintiff's insurer's remedy would be full reimbursement from the defendant's insurer regardless of whether the plaintiff had re- ceived funds nominally representing the plaintiff's insurer's subro- gation fund. This remedy is consistent with placing the investigato- ry and escrow burden on the defendant's insurer. Before entering into a settlement with the plaintiff, the specter of paying twice for the compensatory damages, once to the plaintiff and again to the plaintiff's insurer, will cause the defendant's insurer to investigate the existence of subrogation rights of the plaintiff's insurer.

C. Allocation of Tort Judgment or Settlement

Once the industry has protected itself against multiple pay- ments through a pervasive coordination of benefits program, and the subrogation funds are held in escrow, the question will remain as to how to allocate these funds among the insurer, the insured, and the insured's attorney.

REV_00262663

Of course, the first-party insurer will have an interest in re- covering the full amount of medical expenses or lost wages paid. This may not be a problem in jury trials where these items are often presented to the jury for easy inclusion in a special jury verdict. The more difficult problem is in the settlement arena where the negotiations often involve total dollars and not categori- cal damages. [163] In that case, if a settlement is reached for less than the plaintiff's claimed total damages, including pain and suf- fering, then reimbursing the insurer for total benefits paid would leave the plaintiff's pain and suffering damages less than fully compensated. Conversely, reimbursing the insurer with only a por- tion of total benefits paid would not give full effect to the subro- gation agreement. [164] In the interest of facilitating administration and predictability, these types of allocation conflicts should be resolved either by the insurance contract subrogation agreement or by statute. [*1110]

There are three basic methods for allocating recovery when the total settlement fund is not sufficient to reimburse the insurer and fully compensate the plaintiff: (1) insurer reimbursement first; (2) proration of third party recovery between insurer and insured in proportion to percentage of total original loss compensated by the insurer; and (3) insured reimbursement for total loss first. [165] A simple example should illustrate these methods more clearly. As a result of a third-party's negligence, a victim incurred $ 10,000 of insured medical expenses and $ 20,000 in pain and suffering. If the plaintiff settled the claim for a flat $ 20,000, then under the first allocation option the insurer would be fully reimbursed and the victim would be undercompensated by $ 10,000. The second option, proration of the $ 20,000 settlement fund, would give one-third to the insurer and two-thirds to the victim. [166] Under the third op- tion, the victim would be fully compensated, but the recovery fund would be fully depleted, barring the insurer's recovery.

None of these solutions is satisfactory in light of the conflict between full compensation and subrogation recovery mentioned above. The second option, proration, may intuitively be the best solution since in the absence of an express contract provision it would be the most likely result of an arm's-length negotiation between the parties. [167] A problem arises, however, due to the dif- ficulty in measuring the relative value of the insured's pain and suffering damages at the settlement stage without the jury's ver- dict. [168] As a result of this difficulty, the plaintiff will have an in- centive to overstate a claim for these damages to obtain a greater share of a proration allocation.

In order to avoid the inevitable conflicts of interest and dis- putes between insurer and insured over the intangible damages, the first allocation method, fully reimbursing the insurer first, should be used. Not only does this eliminate any possible conflicts and provide full subrogation recovery, it also recognizes that medical costs are much more definite and predictable than pain and suffer- ing damages. These damages may turn on the whim of a jury or [*1111] the settlement negotiation prowess of the plaintiff's attorney. Statu- torily providing for this option will further streamline the subroga- tion process from a dispute standpoint and create foreseeable and certain results.

D. Attorney Fees

Another problem that will arise when an insurer seeks reim- bursement from a tort judgment or settlement relates to the exact amount that the insurer should expect to receive. The insurer will claim the full amount of the benefits it paid to the insured. If the plaintiff's attorney has done all of the work in obtaining the award, however, he will certainly demand a reasonable fee. If this fee demand is paid, it will most likely decrease the insurer's recovery. This creates a conflict between the basic goal of fully reimbursing the insurer from the tort judgment and giving the plaintiff, or more likely his attorney, the incentive to essentially do the insurer's job of subrogation recovery.

These opposing goals are difficult to balance. If the insurer is fully reimbursed, then it has received a windfall from the plaintiff's attorney's hard work. This is a windfall because the insurer would have expended its own legal costs to obtain the subrogation recov- ery if the insured had not retained his own attorney. In the interest of the overall goal of streamlining the process of subrogation, there is no reason that this problem has to be left to hardball negotia- tions between the insurer and the plaintiff's attorney. The fee rate for subrogation recovery to be paid by the insurer can be set out in the subrogation clause of the insurance contract or it can be statutorily mandated. [169] The fee for this type of arrangement could be set at a "reasonable" level to correlate with the level of the plaintiff's attorney's fees in that case. On the other hand, in the interest of providing fuller reimbursement, the rate could be a lower set rate, ranging from ten to twenty percent. It may seem like the plaintiff's attorney is unjustly benefiting from any added fee, but if it is realized that the insurer would have to expend [*1112] similar amounts to recover on its own, then the fee-shifting onto the insurer is just.

REV_00262664

E. Arbitration

The discussion to this point has assumed that the insurer is not actively involved in the plaintiff's lawsuit. This may not be very realistic since in a limited number of cases with large subro- gation recoveries at stake the insurer will be directly involved with the litigation or settlement process to protect its own interests. [170] This scenario may create many problems including conflicts of interest between the insurer and insured. However, the problem to be addressed is containing subrogation costs. With the addition of the insurer/subrogee, these costs now include direct litigation costs. These costs are a burden on the insurer and should only be viewed as a detriment to the subrogation process. It may seem that since the insurer is enforcing its right to recover sums from the defen- dant, the insurer should bear the burden of finding ways to limit these costs or to more economically make the decision whether to become involved in the litigation. [171] The goal, however, is to en- courage more subrogation through more efficient processes. If the insurer needs to be involved in the litigation, then faster, more effi- cient methods should be used so as to decrease the total subroga- tion costs.

Arbitration and other forms of alternate dispute resolution are commonly used in insurance litigation. [172] Arbitration agreements between insurers provide many benefits including quicker resolution of conflicts, lower costs than standard trials leading to lower insur- ance premiums, more informal settings that provide a more con- ducive atmosphere to conflict resolution, and an easing of the [*1113] caseloads of overburdened courts. [173] Clearly, arbitration of dis- putes involving subrogation recoveries by insurers has benefits in excess of simply reduced litigation costs. Arbitration is not cost- free, however, and these costs must be taken into account when making the subrogation cost/benefit analysis.

Arbitration between insurers can be statutorily mandated. [174] When arbitration is required, whether in all cases or under a threshold-type statute such as New York's, insurers will have more incentive to efficiently utilize the process to their advantage. As repeat players in such an informal setting, with the added possi- bility that the same insurer may have both subrogation payouts and recoveries in the same venue, the arbitration option is ideal for encouraging the intra-industry cooperation needed to reduce subro- gation costs.

F. Arbitration Plus Allocation of Tort Judgment or Settlement

As discussed earlier, the allocation of an award between in- sured and an insurer with subrogation rights can be fraught with difficulties. [175] The case becomes even more complicated when the insurer is a party to the litigation. Whether in early negotiation, arbitration, or even at trial, the insurer's interests may conflict with those of the insured. Depending on the method of recovery alloca- tion used, the insurer may be more or less willing to settle than the insured. [176] This conflict is especially acute when the plaintiff is seeking large pain and suffering damages from the defendant. The plaintiff is less concerned about the subrogation recovery since that money will be paid to the insurer in either case. [177] If the [*1114] plaintiff seeks pain and suffering damages, and the insurer reimbursement, then the plaintiff's interests could be compromised. This may happen if the insurer's attorney was also representing the plaintiff, or if the insurer's attorney was controlling the case.

In this scenario, it makes sense to bifurcate the proceeding into a insurer's cause of action for subrogation recovery and a plaintiff's cause of action for pain and suffering damages. The insurer's action would be statutorily limited to mandatory, non- binding arbitration. [178] The plaintiff would have the option of uti- lizing the same arbitration proceeding, a separate arbitration panel, or resorting to a traditional trial resolution. [179]

1. Benefits of Arbitration and Bifurcated Proceedings

The benefits of bifurcating the proceedings and more fully utilizing arbitration would include the possibility of full and speedy subrogation reimbursement. It would be simple for the insurer to prove the amount of benefits paid to the insured. In the arbitration setting, in addition to the normal arbitration savings, procedural relaxations would reduce evidentiary proof to the simple introduc- tion and verification of the insurer's benefit payments. Since the insured is not involved in this proceeding, except possibly as a witness, the conflict of interest consideration would not come into play. There would be no award allocation problems since the insur- er would directly receive reimbursement for benefits paid. Also, the insurer would not have to pay the insured's attorney fees for ob- taining the recovery. Undoubtedly, the insurer will have its own legal fees; however, in-house counsel would surely cost the insurer less than the plaintiff's attorney.

The plaintiff would also benefit from this arrangement. First, the potential absence of the insurer from whatever option the plain- tiff chooses would eliminate the conflict of interest problems for the plaintiff as well. The plaintiff and his attorney would be free to [*1115] determine the viability of the suit without outside pressure from the insurer.

Second, the plaintiff could also benefit from the parallel pro- ceeding in his own arbitration or trial. The plaintiff's compensatory damages would have already been established in the insurer's arbi- tration. The plaintiff could use the already proven damages at the later trial to help establish the underlying basis for his nonpecuni- ary damages. As a result of the bifurcated causes of action, the plaintiff would be barred from recovering these compensatory dam- ages. [180] In addition, since the arbitration proceeding would pre- sumably have included a fault determination by the arbitrators, this determination could potentially be introduced as evidence at the jury trial. [181] With both compensatory damages and fault estab- lished, the plaintiff's proceeding would be even more streamlined and consist mainly of a trial for nonpecuniary damages.

Third, not losing sight of the larger picture, if subrogation is streamlined by this procedural bifurcation, all insureds should theo- retically benefit from lower premiums. This is simply a corollary benefit from the increased efficiency of arbitration. [182]

2. Problems with Arbitration and Bifurcated Proceedings

Bifurcated proceedings and additional arbitration would surely have their difficulties. Obviously, adding another layer of litigation seems counter-intuitive to the goal of reducing costs and streamlin- ing the subrogation process. However, this may only apply to the overall cost of litigating the entire dispute. The costs relating to the actual insurance subrogation will be greatly reduced by limiting it to early arbitration. The cost to the plaintiff of independently mounting an additional lawsuit may add another layer with some duplicative costs. But if the plaintiff can utilize the compensatory damage and fault findings from the earlier arbitration hearing, [183] [*1116] not all the costs will be duplicative. In addition, without the pres- ence of his insurer and the possible conflicts of interest, it will be easier for the plaintiff to decide whether to further pursue the defendant.

REV_00262666

As the plaintiff attempts to utilize findings from the prior proceedings in his own trial, the procedural hurdle to overcome is collateral estoppel. [184] An underlying policy of collateral estoppel is to reduce litigation costs by preventing multiple litigation on the same issue. Generally, collateral estoppel would work to the benefit of the plaintiff in this type of case. The plaintiff would offensively assert collateral estoppel to prevent relitigation of the issues deter- mined in the arbitration. [185] Precluding relitigation of these issues would clearly fulfill the primary policy of collateral estoppel: re- ducing litigation costs and increasing subrogation efficiency.

Before the plaintiff can successfully assert collateral estoppel, a number of aspects of the proposed bifurcated proceeding, which cut against allowing collateral estoppel, must be addressed. First, in order to preclude the liability insurer from relitigating the fault issues, the burden of proof and the rigidity with which factual findings are made must be the same between the two proceed- ings. [186] Clearly this requirement is not satisfied as between a tra- ditional arbitration hearing and a full jury trial. An arbitration hear- ing has more relaxed evidentiary procedures, and the arbitrators tend to make compromised determinations that blur factual determi- [*1117] nations. [187] A full jury trial, on the other hand, consists of the fa- miliar onerous evidentiary procedures. However, the distinctions be- tween the two types of proceedings can be decreased by requiring the arbitrator to make more rigid evidentiary findings and to clear- ly state the basis for those findings.

Second, under the collateral estoppel doctrine of mutuality, only parties involved in the prior proceeding may take advantage of its determinations. [188] Since the plaintiff was not a party to the arbitration, this would seem to allow the liability insurer and the defendant to relitigate the issues of fault and even damages. How- ever, adherence to the doctrine of mutuality has been eroding steadily as many courts have expanded the notion of privity to enable a greater binding effect of the prior determination. [189] Par- ties are deemed to be in a privity relationship when they have interests which are so intertwined that a decision involving one should necessarily bind or benefit the other. [190] This enhanced view of privity requires an analysis into whether the non-party's interests were fully represented in the prior proceeding. [191] In the proposed bifurcation, the likely similarity of interests (both parties have similar interests in damages and fault) indicates that plaintiff and the plaintiff's insurer should have privity. [192] The plaintiff will be able to take advantage of the prior damage and fault deter- minations by offensively asserting collateral estoppel against the defendant and the defendant's insurer.

Identity of interests between plaintiff and insurer does not fully satisfy a proposal to grant privity to the plaintiff in order to utilize the previous findings. Arbitration is significantly different from litigation in that the fact-finding process can vary widely and the arbitrator's findings are often "unexplained and difficult to [*1118] interpret." [193] The defendant and liability insurer will certainly ob- ject to the use of these findings in a later proceeding where they can present the same evidence to a jury and subject it to more rigorous screening processes. These are important differences and ideally the gap between the two processes should not be so wide. However, the policy considerations of decreasing litigation costs and determining these issues early [194] outweigh any prejudice to the defendant.

In addition, the policies that support utilizing arbitration to reduce subrogation costs also clearly support precluding costly relitigation on the same issues in a later trial. The defendant's insurer may argue that he is prejudiced by this preclusion. How- ever, if the cooperative interests in seeing subrogation costs re- duced are recognized, then the defendant's insurer will also want to conclude the issue as early as possible through collateral estoppel issue preclusion. [195]

Since the insurer's sole subrogation remedy of arbitration has already been established, there are few other substantial statutory provisions required to effectuate this bifurcation. The plaintiff's right to continue on his own behalf is well-settled, and the proce- dural issues of collateral estoppel are best left to judicial determi- nation and party negotiation as outlined above.

REV_00262667

Since entering the subrogation process in the first place is discretionary in cases where the insurer determines it would be uneconomical to recover small amounts or where the defendant's fault was in serious doubt, the insured's claim against the defen- dant for insured compensatory damages would be valid until the insurer's subrogation rights had been settled by arbitration. This will return the proposal to the traditional starting point: the plaintiff [*1119] will be able to bring suit for full pecuniary and nonpecuniary dam- ages, just as with the traditional collateral source rule.

Conclusion

This Note discusses whether the collateral source rule is justi- fied in light of modern theories of tort law. In recent years the rule has received much attention from commentators since it seemed antiquated and at odds with the evolving theory of tort law. In addition, the insurance industry has lobbied the state legislatures to ease the burden on the industry and help control runaway liability insurance premiums. The collateral source rule was an easy target for these initiatives. Moreover, the public perception that plaintiffs were receiving exorbitant damages awards, due in part to the rule, led to the passage of many tort reform packages that eliminated the collateral source rule. The rule was replaced with setoff provisions by which defendants could reduce their liability by the amount of insurance received by the plaintiff.

The collateral source rule debate is hardly over. Many states have not changed the traditional rule and some that have changed it have had the statute overturned by state supreme courts. Parties to this debate should take a more careful look at the purposes of the tort system and the large impact a change in the collateral source rule will have.

This Note presented three main areas of consideration in sup- port of retaining the rule. First, if the collateral source rule is changed, the ability of society to effect, via price mechanisms, the correct levels of safe or valuable behavior will be impaired. Sec- ond, the notion that the deterrent impact of tort liability is out- dated and serves no purpose in modern society is no longer uncon- tested in the current literature. Empirical evidence, while still hotly debated, shows that the deterrent impact of tort liability still has a place in the modern tort system. Third, a collateral source setoff provision can seriously impair the rights of injured parties to enjoy the contractual benefits of insurance as well as their rights to be compensated completely and effectively by the tort liability system.

In recognition of the conflict between the benefits of the col- lateral source rule and the drain on the insurance industry caused by overcompensated plaintiffs, this Note proposes a pervasive pro- gram of increased use of subrogation. Subrogation is currently used by insurers to reduce their costs, and its efficiency can also be used to reduce the costs of overcompensation. If subrogation can [*1120] be utilized to its full potential, then the collateral source rule can survive tort reform and the benefits of placing full tort liability on the parties that cause injuries can be retained.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 Generally, the collateral source rule allows an insured tort plaintiff to retain both insurance benefits from an insurer and full damages from the defendant. See infra notes 5-8 and accompanying text.

n2 See infra notes 23-35 and accompanying text.

n3 See infra notes 36-53 and accompanying text.

n4 Ohio is used as an example of this activity. The experience in Ohio is fairly rep- resentative of the legislative reforms and litigation regarding the statutory changes that have system that [*1076] support retaining the rule. These justifications include proper allocation of tort-caused losses, deterrence of risky behavior, and com- pensation for injuries. This Note argues that taken together these analyses will support retaining the rule.

REV_00262668

While allowing a plaintiff to retain both insurance benefits and tort damages may produce inefficiencies of double payment, this Note proposes, in conjunction with retaining the traditional collater- al source rule, that the practice of subrogation or reimbursement of the insurer out of the tort damages should be used more often and more efficiently as a method of decreasing any duplicitous recovery by the injured plaintiff. After discussing broad proposals for in- creasing the use and efficiency of subrogation/reimbursement prac- tices in Part VI, this Note concludes that the collateral source rule can still be an important part of the tort recovery system.

I. Background

The collateral source rule provides that "if an injured person receives compensation for his injuries from a source wholly inde- pendent collateral of the tort-feasor, the payment should not be deducted from the damages which he would otherwise collect from the tort-feasor." [5] In other words, an injured plaintiff in a tort ac- tion can recover twice, from his own insurance policy and from the defendant. The rule has both damages and evidentiary aspects. First, as noted above, the damages aspect is that benefits received by the plaintiff from other sources are not credited or set-off against the tortfeasor's liability. [6] Second, since "the receipt of col- lateral benefits is deemed irrelevant and immaterial on the issue of damages, it follows, as a necessary concomitant . . . that the re- ceipt of such benefits is not to be admitted in evidence, or other- wise disclosed to the jury." [7] The jury is not permitted to hear this information in order to foreclose any improper inferences as to the amount of damages or the liability of the defendant. [8] [*1077]

The history of the collateral source rule in the United States is often traced to The Propeller Monticello v. Mollison. [9] Monticello was a Supreme Court admiralty case in which the defendant-steam- ship raised as a defense that the plaintiff-schooner, rammed and sunk by the steamship, had been insured and fully compensated. [10] The Court, effectively espousing the collateral source rule, affirmed the circuit court's holding denying this defense and stated that the defendant cannot avail himself of the benefit of the plaintiff's insurance "wager." [11] The Court explained that it was merely stat- ing a rule that was well established at common law. [12]

The rule's vitality continued in the United States and has been established in almost every state. [13] In Ohio, the leading case is Pryor v. Webber. [14] In Pryor, the defendant attempted to introduce into evidence wages received by the plaintiff from her employer while she was injured. [15] The court reaffirmed Ohio's adherence to the collateral source rule and held that the evidence was inadmissi- ble. [16]

Although the collateral source rule may have originated as an evidentiary or damages rule, other justifications have been offered by modern courts and scholars to explain its continued use. First, the wrong-doing tortfeasor should not be allowed to benefit, or be relieved of liability, due to the plaintiff's foresight in obtaining insurance. [17] If the defendant is found liable to the plaintiff for damages, then offsetting the insurance benefits against the damages is a boon to the defendant.

Second, if a tort recovery made after insurance benefits are received is considered a windfall to the plaintiff, it is preferable to [*1078] giving the defendant a windfall by relieving him of liability. [18] Since the tortfeasor is the more culpable party and was merely lucky to injure an insured victim, the windfall should not go to the tortfeasor.

Third, permitting recovery from both the plaintiff's insurer and the defendant is favored since money cannot truly compensate for physical injuries or pain incurred. [19] Since the injured been occurring throughout the United States and should give the reader a flavor for the controversy.

REV_00262651

n5 Black's Law Dictionary 262 (6th ed. 1990).

n6 See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 920A(2) (1977).

n7 Pryor v. Webber, 263 N.E.2d 235, 239 (Ohio 1970). But see Joel K. Jacobsen, The Collateral Source Rule and the Role of the Jury, 70 Or. L. Rev. 523, 525-26 (1991) (arguing that rote categorization of the rule as both a damages and evidence rule is un- necessary and confusing and that evidence of collateral benefits should be admissible when offered for purposes other than reducing damages).

n8 See Pryor, 263 N.E.2d at 239.

n9 58 U.S. (17 How.) 152 (1854).

n10 See id. at 154.

n11 See id. at 155.

n12 See id.

n13 See Linda J. Gobis, Note, Lambert v. Wrensch: Another Step Toward Abrogation of the Collateral Source Rule in Wisconsin, 1988 Wis. L. Rev. 857, 860.

n14 263 N.E.2d 235 (Ohio 1970).

n15 See id. at 238 (explaining that the defendant's relevance theory was that the plain- tiff had lied about her true damages since she was "compensated" for her injuries by her disability wages).

n16 See id. at 243.

n17 See Gobis, supra note 13, at 862. But see Lawrence P. Wilkins, A Multi-Perspec- tive Critique of Indiana's Legislative Abrogation of the Collateral Source Rule, 20 Ind. L. Rev. 399, 401-02 (1987) (arguing that there is no logical reason that a third-party cannot benefit from the plaintiff's insurance contract and only a court's moral opposition to giv- ing a benefit to a wrong-doer prevents such a result).

n18 See Christopher J. Eaton, Comment, The Kansas Legislature's Attempt to Abrogate the Collateral Source Rule: Three Strikes and They're Out?, 42 U. Kan. L. Rev. 913, 920 (1994).

n19 See id.; Hudson v. Lazarus, 217 F.2d 344, 346 (D.C. Cir. 1954) (stating that com- pensatory damages do not really compensate since a person would not be willing to sell a body part). But see Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law §§ 6.11-.12 (3d ed. 1986) (discussing the need to estimate damages and stating that all damages are mea- surable in an economic sense).

n20 See Jacobsen, supra note 7, at 531-32 (expressing this argument as the benefit-of-the-bargain rationale). The agreement between the insurer and the insured may also have provided the insurer with subrogation rights to the plaintiff's claim against the defendant, in which case the insurer would have priority to the damages received from the defen- dant. Subrogation is discussed more fully at infra notes 139-195 and accompanying text and is proposed as part of the solution to the collateral source rule debate.

n21 See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 901(c) (1977) (stating that one of the purposes of tort damages is to "punish wrongdoers and deter wrongful conduct").

REV_00262669

n22 See Eaton, supra note 18, at 920 (stating that to allow evidence of collateral bene- fits to reduce a tortfeasor's liability would lessen the deterrent effect that civil liability offers).

n23 See Julie A. Schafer, Note, The Constitutionality of Offsetting Collateral Benefits Under Ohio Revised Code Section 2317.45, 53 Ohio St. L.J. 587, 589 (1992) (arguing that the compensation and deterrence goals of tort law are irreconcilable).

n24 See John G. Fleming, The Collateral Source Rule and Loss Allocation in Tort Law, 54 Cal. L. Rev. 1478, 1478 (1966).

n25 See Schafer, supra note 23, at 590.

n26 See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 901(a) (1977) (stating that tort damages exist "to give compensation, indemnity, or restitution for harms").

n27 See Schafer, supra note 23, at 590.

n28 See Robert E. Keeton & Alan I. Widiss, Insurance Law: A Guide to Fun- damental Principles, Legal Doctrines and Commercial Practices § 3.1(c) (Practi- tioner's ed. 1988) (describing that if an insured could realize a net gain from insurance, it would encourage using insurance as a way of wagering).

n29 See Eaton, supra note 18, at 922 (stating that tort law should focus on the injury and not on deterring unsafe behavior).

n30 See Gary T. Schwartz, Reality in the Economic Analysis of Tort Law: Does Tort Law Really Deter?, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 377, 381-387 (1994) (providing a comprehensive list of recent authors who doubt the deterrent effect of tort liability and the factors they suggest mitigate deterrence).

n31 See Eaton, supra note 18, at 922; Gobis, supra note 13, at 885 (stating that the deterrent effect of the collateral source rule is "speculative" and "unrealistic").

n32 See Schwartz, supra note 30, at 381-87; see also infra notes 84-92 and accompa- nying text.

n33 See Report of the Tort Policy Working Group on the Causes, Extent and Policy Implications of the Current Crisis in Insurance Availability and Affordability 1, 4, 70, 80 (Feb. 1986) (recommending that the collateral source rule be abolished). But see Leonard W. Schroeter & William J. Rutzick, "Tort Reform"--Being an Insurance Company Means Never Having to Say You're Sorry, 22 Gonz. L. Rev. 31 (1987) (providing an impassioned rebuttal of the actual existence of an insurance crisis in this country and accusing the insurance industry of perpetrating a fraud on the public in order to persuade legislative officials to pass beneficial tort reform legislation and justify large premium increases). Determining whether a crisis existed in the insurance industry during the 1980s is beyond the scope of this Note and may be impossible in any case. There are persuasive arguments and statistics on each side. Regardless of the outcome of this debate, basing statutory reforms on controversial and inconsistent data is questionable at best, and partisan politicizing at worst. A more rational and conservative approach, with deference to common law traditions and in conjunction with more efficient loss cost re- covery as this Note suggests, is a better policy.

n34 It is important to note that the traditional collateral source rule only provides a double recovery for the economic damages portion of the award. First-party medical insur- ance does not cover non-economic damages such as pain and suffering and punitive dam- ages. Since the plaintiff would retain these types of damages from a jury verdict if there was no collateral source rule, the double recovery argument should be separated from the recoil against high punitive or intangible damage awards. It is true, however, that the collateral source rule could provide multiple recoveries of economic damages if the victim was insured by more than one insurer for the same injury. This is a coordination of benefits problem with the insurance policies which would occur even if the victim did not enter the tort system. This problem would occur, for example, if the victim had both medical insurance and a personal injury rider on his automobile insurance policy. See Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, at § 3.11 (d) (indicating that many health insurance policies do not limit coverage based on excess insurance carried by the insured).

n35 See Cal. Civ. Code § 3333.1 (West Supp. 1996); Fla. Stat. Ann. § 768.76 (West Supp. 1996); see also 4 Fowler V. Harper et al., The Law of Torts 219-22 (2d ed., 1996 Cum. Supp. No. 1, 1986) (providing a more complete summary of states with statutorily modified collateral source rules); Schafer, supra note 23, at 608 n.99.

n36 Am. Sub. H.B. 1, 117 G.A., Reg. Sess. (Ohio 1987-88).

n37 Id.

n38 See Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2317.45 (Banks-Baldwin 1994). The pertinent text of § 2317.45(B)(2)(c) is as follows:

(c) Prior to entering judgment for the plaintiff, [the court shall] do both of the following:

(i) Subtract from the compensatory damages that the plaintiff otherwise would be awarded the amount of any disclosed collateral benefits. . . .

§ 2317.45(B)(2)(c).

n39 See § 2317.45(B)(2)(c). Placing the hearing at the conclusion of the trial makes a concession to the evidentiary concerns created if the defendant was allowed to present evidence of the plaintiff's collateral benefits to the jury. See § 2317.45(B)(3) (stating that evidence of collateral benefits is not admissible before the trier of fact). Also, the statute recognized that the plaintiff may have paid for the collateral benefits and allowed for a reduction in the offsets for premiums paid for the insurance coverage. See § 2317.45(B)(2)(c)(ii). The setoff statute does not apply to collateral benefits which are subject to "rights of recoupment" or subrogation claims by an insurer. See § 2317.45(B)(2)(a)(ii) & (B)(2)(b). This would allow an insurer to recover the benefits it had paid to the insured. See also infra notes 139-157 and accompanying text (discussing subrogation).

n40 See Stanton G. Darling II, Ohio Civil Justice Reform Act 131 (1987) (pro- viding interpretations and legislative history commentary on the entire tort reform act). Darling served as special advisor on tort and civil justice matters to the Office of the Speaker of the House in 1987 and drafted much of House Bill 1.

n41 See Schafer, supra note 23, at 597-607 (describing Ohio cases dealing with these new statutes).

n42 See Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504 (Ohio 1994).

n43 See Sorrell v. Thevenir, No. 91 CA 4, 1992 Ohio App. LEXIS 5098, at *2 (Gallia Cty. Sept. 30, 1992).

n44 See id.

n45 See id.

REV_00262671

n46 See id. at *2-*3.

n47 In fact, the defendant, only partially in jest, suggested that Ms. Sorrell owed him and his attorneys the difference between the judgment and her worker's compensation benefits. See Brief of Plaintiffs-Appellants at 1-2, Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504 (Ohio 1994) (No. 91-CA-04).

n48 See Sorrell v. Thevenir, No. 91 CA 4, 1992 Ohio App. LEXIS 5098, at *3 (Gallia Cty. Sept. 30, 1992).

n49 See id.

n50 See id. at *10. The Court of Appeals emphasized that they were not passing on the legislative wisdom of the statute, but rather relying on Supreme Court precedent ap- proving a similar collateral source setoff statute for medical malpractice claims. See id. (citing Morris v. Savoy, 576 N.E.2d 765 (Ohio 1991) (upholding R.C. § 2305.27 under state constitutional equal protection and due process attack)). The court also welcomed Supreme Court review of the issue in this case. See id.

n51 See Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 510-513 (Ohio 1994) (R.C. § 2317.45 restricts the right to a jury trial, does not provide due process of law to tort victims, is constitutionally infirm on equal protection grounds, and hinders the plaintiff's rights to a remedy and to an open court). Other state courts have also declared collateral source setoff statutes to be unconstitutional on similar grounds. See, e.g., Denton v. Con-Way S. Express, Inc., 402 S.E.2d 269 (Ga. 1991) (striking down Ga. Code Ann. § 51-12-1 (1987), an evidentiary abolition of the collateral source rule, as violating the Georgia Constitution's impartial and complete protection of person and property). But see Fein v. Permanente Medical Group, 695 P.2d 665 (Cal.) (upholding Cal. Civ. Code § 3333.1 (Michie Supp. 1995) as not violating medical malpractice plaintiff's due process or equal protection rights), appeal dismissed, 474 U.S. 982 (1985).

n52 See Sorrell, 633 N.E.2d at 508 (stating that the Court's duty is merely to deter- mine the constitutionality of the statute as an exercise of legislative power).

n53 The plaintiff may not be fully compensated if required to offset the verdict with collateral benefits. See id. at 510. The tortfeasor is granted a windfall if he does not have to pay for the damages he caused. See id. The collateral source setoff statute may or may not ease the liability insurance crisis. See id. at 511. The statute prevents the plaintiff from receiving a double recovery. See id. The plaintiff has a right to both the insurance proceeds and the verdict damages since the insurance benefits were previously bargained for. See id. at 511-12. The dissenting judge argued that this holding ignores the underly- ing purpose of the tort system to only compensate the victim for the amount of damages or the amount the jury deems a just and appropriate reward. See id. at 513 (Moyer, C.J., dissenting).

n54 In Ohio, the State House of Representatives revised the setoff statute as part of the 1995 Tort Reform Package. H.B. 350, (A) § 2317.45 (Ohio 1995). The much abbreviated provision simply allows both plaintiff and defendant to present evidence to the jury of premiums paid to and benefits received from a collateral source. See § 2317.45. The House intended to do away with the common law rule and address the Sorrell court's constitutional objections to the previous setoff statute. See comments to H.B. 350 at (E). The new version did not survive the committee hearings and the House eventually passed a bill that only allows the defendant to introduce evidence of insurance benefits for which the plaintiff did not pay a premium. See Am. Sub. H.B. 350, (A) § 2317.45; Catherine Candisky, House Passes Measure: Tort Reform, The Columbus Dispatch, Feb. 8, 1996, at 1C. The bill was finally sent to Governor George Voinovich, who indicated he would sign it, on September 26, 1996. See Thomas Suddes, House OK's Bill to Cap Personal- Injury Awards, The Plain Dealer (Cleveland), Sept. 27, 1996, at 5B.

REV_00262672

n55 See Schroeter & Rutzick, supra note 33 (describing previous instances of insurance crises which prompted insurance companies' efforts at tort reform).

n56 The party becomes more complicated when insurers, attorneys, lobbyists, legislators, and activist courts are added.

n57 See supra notes 17-35 and accompanying text (discussing the standard arguments for and against the collateral source rule).

n58 See Kenneth S. Abraham, What is a Tort Claim? An Interpretation of Contempo- rary Tort Reform, 51 Md. L. Rev. 172, 192-93 (1992) (hypothesizing that the rule origi- nated when insurance was an uncommon phenomenon in order to ensure those prudent enough to purchase insurance the receipt of their benefits, but also stating that increased insurance coverage may have changed the need for the rule).

n59 The question may be posed this way: if there were no collateral source rule, given the current state of the tort system and the goals which it achieves or we wish it could achieve, would we create a rule similar to the common law rule to enhance the purposes of the tort system?

n60 See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 901A (1977) (listing "deterrence of tortfeasor" as one purpose of the tort system).

n61 See infra Section IV, notes 77-116 and accompanying text.

n62 Guido Calabresi calls these different aspects specific deterrence and general deter- rence respectively. See Guido Calabresi, The Costs of Accidents: A Legal and Economic Analysis 131-97 (1970) [hereinafter Calabresi, The Costs of Accidents].

n63 See William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, The Economic Structure of Tort Law 13 (1987).

n64 See Guido Calabresi, Some Thoughts on Risk Distribution and the Law of Torts, 70 Yale L.J. 499, 502 (1961) [hereinafter Calabresi, Thoughts on Risk Distribution]; see also Stanley Ingber, Rethinking Intangible Injuries: A Focus on Remedy, 73 Cal. L. Rev. 772, 793-819 (1985) (quoting extensively from Calabresi's works and applying the theory to his discussion on the tort system's mechanisms for dealing with intangible or non-pecu- niary injuries).

n65 See Calabresi, Thoughts on Risk Distribution, supra note 64, at 502.

n66 See id.

n67 This above- or below-optimal purchasing is an inefficiency introduced by the exter- nalization of the cost of the damages from the producer to the consumers. See Calabresi, The Cost of Accidents, supra note 62, at 70.

n68 See Steven Shavell, Economic Analysis of Accident Law 21-32 (1987). Actually, in the absence of liability, the injurer will engage in an activity up to the point where additional activity is actually a burden on the injurer. See id. at 22 n.29. Shavell's level of activity analysis is similar to the situation where a firm engages in the produc- tion of goods and is sensitive to consumer demand based on price levels. See id. at 49.

n69 In the case of a firm producing a level of goods in response to consumer demand, the firm could still produce goods without giving thought to the injuries or damages caused up to the point where the supply of the good is still met by consumer demand.

n70 A no-fault automobile insurance plan, see generally Robert E. Keeton & Jeffrey O'Connell, Basic Protection for the Traffic Victim (1965) (describing the objec- tives of the automobile claims system), allocates the cost of the activity without using fault as a criterion for the allocation of damages. See Calabresi, The Cost of Acci- dents, supra note 62, at 7-10. However, no-fault insurance is designed to provide first- party compensation in accidents where both parties are usually involved in the same activ- ity. In that special case, the allocation of damages is de facto placed correctly on the injury causing activity, driving. In a more general tort case, however, if the victim was not also participating in the same activity as the injurer, or was simply a consumer of goods, then allocating damage costs to a victim under a no-fault type compensation plan would not correctly allocate the costs to the activity that caused the damages.

n71 In the simplest case, with the plaintiff incurring only medical costs and lost wages, a collateral benefit setoff rule would result in a 100% setoff of tortfeasor liability because of benefits received by the plaintiff. The effect of the rule, then, is no liability.

n72 See, e.g., Stephen D. Sugarman, Doing Away With Tort Law, 73 Cal. L. Rev. 555, 613-16 (1985) (arguing additionally that the allocation of resources argument may be confused with other justifications for tort liability; that it may not fully consider the prop- er allocation of damages from accidents which are truly nobody's fault; that its purpose may be defeated by the self-externalizing function of insurance premiums; and that the inherent inefficiency of tort damages in correctly allocating costs may destroy any allocative benefits from assigning tort liability).

n73 See id. at 615.

n74 See Richard S. Markovits, Monopoly and the Allocative Inefficiency of First-Best-Allocatively-Efficient Tort Law in Our Worse-Than-Second-Best World: Some Whys and Some Therefores, 46 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 313, 316-17 (1996) (defining the "second best" theory).

n75 See id.

n76 If drastic changes were made, such as a conversion to an all-encompassing govern- ment social insurance for accidents or to an entirely no-fault based system for all tort accidents, the collateral source rule would almost by definition be unnecessary or unwork- able.

n77 See Eaton, supra note 18, at 922 (stating that none of the mainstream theories of human behavior support the likelihood that tort sanctions appropriately deter unsafe behav- ior); Gobis, supra note 13, at 885 (explaining that increased defendant liability is a specu- lative deterrent).

n78 See infra notes 80-116 and accompanying text (discussing both theoretical and empirical arguments in support of the law and economics inspired resurgence of the deter- rence purpose of tort liability).

n79 See infra notes 80-92 and accompanying text (discussing the theoretical arguments); notes 93-116 and accompanying text (discussing the empirical findings).

n80 See Posner, supra note 19, § 6.14; Restatement (Second) of Torts § 901 (1979) (stating that deterrence of wrongful conduct is accorded at least equal importance to compensation of harms caused as a purpose of tort law).

n81 See Posner, supra note 19, § 6.13.

n82 See id.

REV_00262674

n83 See Schwartz, supra note 30, at 378 (coining the weak/moderate/strong nomenclature: the weak view is that held by collateral source rule opponents and tort law critics; the moderate view is that the deterrent effect, while still an important aspect of tort liabil- ity, is somewhat mitigated by other factors). Shavell also supports the deterrent impact of liability in the strong form. His determination of the effects of different liability schemes rests on a measurement of total social welfare or utility that includes the full measure or costs of liability on the decision whether to engage in risky behavior. Shavell, supra note 68, at 5-46 (equating total social welfare to utility from engaging in behavior less costs of taking care not to cause accidents less costs of accidents (tort liability)).

n84 See Schwartz, supra note 30, at 382-83.

n85 See Sugarman, supra note 72, at 561-64 (concluding that there would be a gap between how people would act under only these constraints and what is socially desirable, but arguing that tort law fails to fill in the remaining deterrent incentive).

n86 See Schwartz, supra note 30, at 384.

n87 See Sugarman, supra note 72, at 573 (explaining that complete liability insurance protection shifts the direct economic insurance pressure of tort law from the tortfeasor to the insurance companies).

n88 See Schwartz, supra note 30, at 385 (noting that insurance premiums rise for those who drive negligently). But see Sugarman, supra note 72, at 577-81 (arguing that despite the potential deterrence-inducing mechanisms available to insurers, their actual use and resulting impact on risky behavior is minimal).

n89 See Schwartz, supra note 30, at 383, 385-86.

n90 See id. at 386.

n91 See id. at 386-87; see also Sugarman, supra note 72, at 569-73 (suggesting that many firms and individuals intentionally discount the risks of tort liability due to the inability of the tort system to assess the correct penalties; the fact that the potential gains from acting dangerously may outweigh the risks; and the small percentage impact even large tort liability may have on large corporations).

n92 See Schwartz, supra note 30, at 387.

n93 See infra notes 95-100 and accompanying text.

n94 See infra notes 102-116 and accompanying text.

n95 See generally Schwartz, supra note 30, at 397-404.

n96 See Helling v. Carey, 519 P.2d 981, 983 (Wash. 1974) (holding doctors liable for malpractice as a matter of law for not testing for glaucoma during a routine eye examination).

n97 See Tarasoff v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 551 P.2d 334, 342 (Cal. 1976) (re- quiring therapists to warn potential victims of patients' intent to harm them).

n98 See Canterbury v. Spence, 464 F.2d 772, 781-92 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (discussing the evolution of the physician's duty to adequately inform his patient).

n99 See Schwartz, supra note 30, at 399.

REV_00262675

n100 See id. at 402 (quoting significantly from Paul C. Weiler, et al., A Measure of Malpractice 733 (1993) (indicating that liability, along with continuing medical edu- cation, peer review, and practice guidelines, is a factor in determining a doctor's standard of care)). There is no doubt that potential liability has greatly increased the practice of defensive medicine and added to skyrocketing health care costs. See id. at 402. This prob- lem is, however, beyond the scope of this Note. The focus is rather on the ability of potential liability to encourage doctors to take these precautions at all in the light of the counter-argument that liability insurance dampens the deterrent effect of tort liability.

n101 The elimination of the collateral source rule can be compared to the elimination of tort liability generally. Although the use of a setoff rule for collateral benefits would only reduce a defendant's liability to the extent of the benefits received by the plaintiff, the reduction of the deterrent effect would be similar. The magnitude of the reduction may be smaller, but it would be a reduction nonetheless.

n102 Elisabeth M. Landes, Insurance, Liability, and Accidents: A Theoretical and Empiri- cal Investigation of the Effects of No-Fault Accidents, 25 J.L. & Econ. 49, 62 (1982) [hereinafter Landes, The Effects of No-Fault].

n103 See id. at 59. Landes' calculations accounted for such variables as population, population density, variances in medical costs across states, each state's dollar threshold to bar tort recovery, age, sex, race, and the dramatic effect on the amount of driving due to gasoline price changes in the early 1970s. See id.

n104 See Jeffrey O'Connell & Saul Levmore, A Reply to Landes: A Faulty Study of No-Fault's Effect on Fault?, 48 Mo. L. Rev. 649 (1983).

n105 See id. at 650-52 (stating that since fatal accidents produce tort claims in all no- fault plans, the study should have concentrated on injury causing accidents where the boundaries of no-fault may encompass the claims; that such a hypothetical driver is tech- nically inconsistent; and that omitted variables included weather, police enforcement, road quality, and medical care). Landes' stated reason for using fatalities is that the data is much more reliable. See Landes, The Effects of No-Fault, supra note 102, at 57-58 & 58 n.10. See also Sugarman, supra note 72, at 588-89 (partially rejecting O'Connell and Levmore's criticisms of Landes' study and offering as an alternative conclusion that in- stead of driving less carefully in no-fault states, drivers are simply driving more in the absence of liability).

n106 Paul Zador & Adrian Lund, Re-Analyses of the Effects of No-Fault Auto Insurance on Fatal Crashes, 53 J. Risk & Ins. 226, 234 (1986) (including data collected through 1980 and criticizing the statistical methodology of Landes' study, not her choice of vari- ables).

n107 See Frank A. Sloan et al., Tort Liability versus Other Approaches for Deterring Careless Driving, 14 Int'l Rev. L. Econ. 53, 66 (1994). Sloan concludes that overall, tort liability has a deterrent effect on careless driving. See id. at 68. However, he conced- ed that the United States "is not the ideal location to study the effects of no-fault laws." Id. at 69.

n108 It is interesting to note that at the time her study was published, Landes was associated with the University of Chicago. See Sugarman, supra note 72, at 588 n.147. The law and economics school of thought, centered at the University of Chicago with Richard Posner and William Landes, clearly supports tort law as a deterrent. Additionally, the Zador-Lund study was supported by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, a group that would probably support no-fault insurance.

n109 See supra note 107.

n110 See Schwartz, supra note 30, at 395.

REV_00262676

n111 Marc Gaudry, Measuring the Effects of the 1978 Quebec Automobile Insurance Act with the DRAG Model, in Contributions to Insurance Economics 471, 491 (Georges Dionne ed. 1992) (indicating that other mitigating factors such as increased reporting prac- tices under no-fault insurance and adverse risk selection by forcing young drivers to in- sure and therefore drive more may mitigate these increases).

n112 Rose Anne Devlin, Liability versus No-Fault Automobile Insurance Regimes: An Analysis of the Experience in Quebec, in Contributions to Insurance Economics 499, 513-14 (Georges Dionne ed. 1992) (concluding that "a no-fault system . . . severs the link between compensation for an accident and amount of driving care").

n113 Rose Anne Devlin, Some Welfare Implications of No-Fault Automobile Insurance, 10 Int'l Rev. L. Econ. 193 (1990).

n114 See id. at 198-99. These computations were based on Gaudry's results in his study on the increase in accidents, see supra note 111 and accompanying text, but could equal- ly apply to Devlin's own results.

n115 See Posner, supra note 19, § 6.14.

n116 See supra note 101 (comparing the creation of a collateral source setoff statute to the removal of tort liability as in the case of no-fault insurance plans).

n117 See supra notes 25-28 and accompanying text.

n118 See supra notes 60-76 and accompanying text (discussing the allocation of resourc- es purpose of tort liability); see also supra notes 77-116 and accompanying text (discuss- ing the deterrence purpose of tort liability).

n119 See infra notes 158-195 and accompanying text (discussing improvements to subro- gation and reimbursement procedures).

n120 See Brief of Amicus Curiae Defendant-Appellee at 22, Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504 (Ohio 1994).

n121 See Jacobsen, supra note 7, at 531-32 (pointing out that the plaintiff receives the insurance benefits not because of the injury-causing accident, but because of the contract, paid for by the insurance premiums, which entitles him to the right to receive the bene- fits).

n122 See John Barrow, The Contracts Clause and the Collateral Source Rule, Trial, July 1988, at 33, 36 (arguing that if the plaintiff's benefits are paid under a nonsubrogated insurance contract that was entered into before the statutory elimination of the collateral source rule, denying the plaintiff full damages would impair the plaintiff's vested property rights obtained when the insurance contract was executed). The flaw in this argument is that a setoff statute would not disturb the plaintiff's contractual right to receive insurance benefits, it would only disturb the plaintiff's tort rights.

n123 See infra notes 139-157 and accompanying text (discussing subrogation). In fact, Shavell contends that both the insurer and insured will prefer insurance contracts with subrogation rights. See infra notes 149-152 and accompanying text.

n124 See Shavell, supra note 68, at 235-40.

n125 See Landes & Posner, supra note 63, at 252-53; Posner, supra note 19, § 6.14.

n126 See supra note 120 and accompanying text.

REV_00262677

n127 See Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, § 3.1(c).

n128 See id.

n129 Even if the insured is wagering, he probably is not hoping to be injured due to a fear of pain and the inconvenience of recuperation.

n130 See Shavell, supra note 68, at 186-205 (discussing the allocation of risk and the theory of insurance).

n131 See supra, Section V, para. 2.

n132 Such alternatives include damages for pain and suffering, loss of future earning capacity, loss of consortium by the family, and punitive damages. See Restatement (Second) of Torts §§ 905(b) and comment, 906(c), & 908.

n133 These losses are very difficult to measure. See Posner, supra note 19, §§ 6.11-.12 (discussing damages for loss of earning capacity and for pain and suffering); Shavell, supra note 68, at 134 (discussing the difficulty of estimating nonpecuniary losses). The question of what value to place on human life or pain and suffering is a difficult one. It can be given to a jury to draw on its collective life experiences. See Ingber, supra note 64, at 778 & n.26 (stating that courts rely on juries to quantify such intangible injuries using their "enlightened conscience" and their "good sense and good judgment as men and women of affairs"). In contrast, this question can be totally ignored by the court and nothing is awarded. See Posner, supra note 19, §§ 6.11-.12 (explaining the difficulty of valuing the loss of future enjoyment of life, or hedonic damages, and loss of future earn- ings of children). It is clear though, that allowing juries to award nonpecuniary damage awards, even high awards, is a valued and traditional part of our tort system.

n134 See Sorrell v. Thevenir, No. 91 CA 4, 1992 Ohio App. LEXIS 5098, at *2 (Gallia Cty. Sept. 30, 1992).

n135 See id.

n136 See Brief of Plaintiff-Appellant at 11-15, Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504 (Ohio 1994).

n137 See Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2317.45(B)(2)(c)(i) (Banks-Baldwin 1995).

n138 See Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 52-225a (West 1991) (limiting the collateral source setoff to economic damages).

n139 See Gary T. Schwartz, A National Health Care Program: What Its Effect Would Be On American Tort Law and Malpractice Law, 79 Cornell L. Rev. 1339, 1347 (1994) (presenting variations on the collateral source rule under possible future tort law regimes).

n140 See Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, § 3.10(a)(1); see also Spencer L. Kimball & Don A. Davis, The Extension of Insurance Subrogation, 60 Mich. L. Rev. 841 (1962).

n141 See Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, §§ 3.10(b)(1), 3.10(c)(1) (discussing an insurer's right and ability to bring suit on its own or on the insured's behalf and various methods of allocating tort judgments to insured and insurer under a subrogation agreement).

n142 See id. at § 3.10(a)(7) (explaining that subrogation rights were denied due to rules against the assignability of causes of action for injury to another person); see also Kimball & Davis, supra note 140, at 860-61 (explaining that the traditional objection to legal party's dam- ages are only a guess by the insurance company or jury, additional recovery protects against low estimates.

REV_00262678

Fourth, the insurance company and the plaintiff previously contracted for the payment of these benefits. The insurer has a duty to pay the benefits and the plaintiff has a right to the benefits regardless of the plaintiff's ability to recover from a third-party tortfeasor. [20] Since the insurance company has already been paid premiums to bear an actuarial risk, the benefit payments it must make are simply a cost of doing business that has already been contracted and paid for by the plaintiff.

Lastly, unless the defendant is made to pay for the damages caused, the deterrent purposes of tort liability [21] will be under- mined. [22]

II. Recent History

Despite its deeply ingrained roots in American common law, the collateral source rule has been criticized by commentators and [*1079] scholars. The rule is said to have evolved from opposing theories of tort law, [23] and has been called a high-ranking oddity of acci- dent law. [24] One of the most frequent objections to the collateral source rule is that the plaintiff should not receive a fortuitous double-recovery simply for being the victim of tortious conduct and receiving insurance benefits at the same time. [25] Since an im- portant purpose of tort compensation is to indemnify only the harm suffered by the victim, [26] this double-recovery would overcompen- sate the plaintiff and put him in a better position than before the tort occurred. [27] A serious implication of a double-recovery for the plaintiff is that it could produce a moral hazard. [28] If the plaintiff were to receive a double-recovery, the plaintiff would have incen- tive to become a tort victim; certainly this is an incentive society would not want to promote.

Another argument against the collateral source rule is that it is too rooted in a punitive or deterrence theory of tort liability. [29] The importance and efficacy of the deterrent impact of tort liability has been hotly debated for many years. [30] Relying on the argument that tort liability does not affect human behavior and deter unsafe conduct, opponents of the collateral source rule consider deterrence a weak justification. [31] In addition, mitigating factors such as lia- bility insurance and the inability of tort liability to deter inadver- tent conduct, may dull the deterrent impact of tort liability. [32] [*1080]

These theoretical arguments pale in comparison to the argu- ments of the insurance industry. Industry analysts argued that the collateral source rule's double recovery for plaintiffs was a contrib- uting factor to the liability insurance availability and affordability crises in this country in the early to mid-1980s. [33] The collateral source rule is an easy target for insurance company lobbyists due to the windfall nature of a double recovery and increasing public indignation of highly-publicized jury verdicts. [34] Based on the per- ceived need for a solution to this crisis, many state legislatures passed comprehensive tort reform packages in the latter half of the 1980s. Statutory elimination of the collateral source rule in some form was a common factor among these different packages. [35] [*1081]

The Ohio Legislature passed a comprehensive tort reform bill in 1987. [36] The purpose of the bill was "to make changes in civil justice and insurance law, thereby reducing the causes of the cur- rent insurance crisis and preventing future crises." [37] This Bill changed Ohio's common law collateral source rule; it required courts to subtract collateral benefits received by the plaintiff from compensatory damages awarded by the jury. [38] The new law re- quired the plaintiffs to disclose collateral benefits to the court at the conclusion of the trial. Such benefits were then subtracted from the compensatory damage verdict. [39]

In addition to helping solve the liability insurance crisis, the change in the common law collateral source rule was "designed to prevent double recovery" by a plaintiff. [40] Not surprisingly, with potentially large verdicts and attorney fees at stake, this new rule subrogation in medical benefit cases is that, absent an express contract provision, insurance of a personal nature cannot be subject to subrogation by the insurer). But see Smith v. Travelers Ins. Co., 362 N.E.2d 264, 265-66 (Ohio 1977) (holding that a subroga- tion clause is enforceable in a medical benefits case, and reflecting the trend towards allowing subrogation in these insurance contracts). Smith is representative of the trend towards including subrogation provisions in many medical insurance policies, including Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans. See Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, § 3.10(a)(7).

REV_00262652

n143 See Wilbur C. Leatherberry, No-Fault Automobile Insurance: Will the Poor Pay More Again?, 26 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 101, 150 (1975); see also Jeffrey O'Connell, A Proposal to Abolish Contributory and Comparative Fault, With Compensatory Savings by also Abolishing the Collateral Source Rule, 1979 U. Ill. L.F. 591, 604-05 (supplying selected subrogation cost statistics, showing the minute percentage of losses subrogation actually recovers for the insurer, and arguing for the elimination of subrogation due to the expense of the process).

n144 See Schwartz, supra note 139, at 1347 (calling for further investigation into the costs and application of subrogation rights).

n145 See Gobis, supra note 13, at 890; Schafer, supra note 23, at 590. In fact, Ohio R.C. § 2317.45 provides exemption from the setoff statute to plaintiff's insurers who have legal or contractual "rights of recoupment" from the defendant. Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2317.45(B)(2)(a)-(b) (Banks Baldwin 1995). This preserves the subrogation rights of the insurer and recognizes the ability of these rights to limit the double recovery. But see 2 ALI Reporters' Study, Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury 170-71, 177- 82 (1991) (arguing that the use of subrogation, with or without a traditional collateral source rule, is prohibitively expensive and difficult to enforce due to legal and practical restraints).

n146 See Schwartz, supra note 139, at 1348-49 (criticizing the ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 145, as "premature in writing off . . . subrogation" and inviting regulators and scholars to continue a cost/benefits analysis of subrogation).

n147 Posner, supra note 19, at § 6.13 (arguing that premiums would be less where the insured would be required to assign any legal rights from the injury to the insurer).

n148 See id.

n149 See Shavell, supra note 68, at 235-40.

n150 See id. at 236.

n151 See id. at 237.

n152 See id. at 237-38 (arguing that the increased cost of litigation and transaction costs due to subrogation litigation is a problem that may be difficult to resolve, but that these are not inherent problems of subrogation; rather, they are a reflection of the justice sys- tem as a whole).

n153 See supra note 142.

n154 See George S. Swan, Subrogation in Life Insurance: Now is the Time, 48 Ins. Counsel J. 634 (1981).

n155 See Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, § 310(a)(6).

n156 Supra note 146 and accompanying text.

REV_00262679

n157 This proposal only generally addresses these issues. Different insurance programs such as worker's compensation, social security, Medicare/Medicaid, automobile, medical and health, malpractice, and general liability may require individualized analysis.

n158 See Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, § 3.11(d) (discussing the reluctance of courts to deny insureds multiple coverage and basing this tendency on policy borrowed from the traditional collateral source rule). However, the trend is increasingly towards enforcing insurers' "Other Insurance" clauses which serve to limit multiple coverage. See id. § 3.11(a)(1) & (d); see also Kenneth S. Abraham & Lance Liebman, Private Insur- ance, Social Insurance, and Tort Reform: Toward a New Vision of Compensation for Illness and Injury, 93 Colum. L. Rev. 75, 94-98 (1993) (describing the United States system as a web of various compensation schemes, including both cause- and fault-based systems, with a complex coordination of benefits between the different systems based on these types of clauses).

n159 See Abraham & Liebman, supra note 158, at 116 (linking the loss compensation system to a cost-accounting mechanism which simply bundles its claims for reimbursement against liability insurers for more efficient loss-cost transfer). The proposal to more closely enforce subrogation rights just as multiple insurance provisions are enforced may have limited applicability where the insurer is actually involved in the tort dispute. In that case the resolution of fault issues will force the insurer to incur litigation costs that probably exceed those found in "Other Insurance" clause disputes. However, multiple insurance disputes which require dispute resolution are also common. See Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, § 3.11(d).

n160 See 2 ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 145, at 170.

n161 See id. at 178-80 (questioning the desirability of this arrangement due to possible conflicts of interest among the parties). But if the industry-wide interest in promoting subrogation is considered, the defendant's insurer will be more likely to participate in this type of arrangement on a reciprocal basis among all insurers.

n162 In order for the escrow agent to be able to retain the judgment or settlement proceeds for the first-party insurer's recovery, the judgment or settlement would have to resemble a jury special verdict form. The award would have to be specifically segregated into pecuniary (reimbursable) and nonpecuniary damages.

n163 See 2 ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 145, at 180 (discussing the settlement with subrogation conflict and suggesting that there is no suitable solution); see also Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, § 3.10(b)(1)-(4) (outlining three main subrogation allocation methods, suggesting that not one of the three is used predominately, and indi- cating that the result reached is often a compromise between the insurer and insured).

n164 See 2 ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 145, at 180.

n165 See Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, § 3.10(b)(1).

n166 The one-third/two-thirds proration results from the original ratio of benefits received to total injury (20,000/30,000).

n167 See Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, § 3.10(b)(1).

n168 See supra note 162 and accompanying text (discussing the necessity of jury special verdicts specifically segregating the award into pecuniary and non-pecuniary damages).

n169 See, e.g., Va. Code Ann. § 65.2-311 (Michie 1995). This Virginia Worker's Compensation statute provides that the attorney's fees for subrogation recovery by the plaintiff on behalf of the insurance carrier are to "be apportioned pro rata between the employer insurer and the employee." § 65.2-311. If a plaintiff's attorney's standard fee is one-third of the recovery, then the insurer's subrogation recovery is decreased by one-third.

n170 "Asserting a subrogation right is usually viewed as 'standing in the shoes' of the insured so that the insurer's rights are equal to, but no greater than, those of the in- sured." Keeton & Widiss, supra note 28, § 3.10(a)(1).

n171 In the litigation setting, the plaintiff's insurer may be at the mercy of the defendant's insurer in terms of limiting costs and speeding up the process. However, intra-industry cooperation via information exchange and statutory escrow agents, and the realization that the insurers are repeat players in this context should lead to a more efficient process. See supra notes 158-162 and accompanying text.

n172 See William K. Jones, Strict Liability for Hazardous Enterprise, 92 Colum. L. Rev. 1705, 1732 n.135 (1992) (indicating that informal inter-company settlement proce- dures are used extensively in automobile collision litigation); Schwartz, supra note 139, at 1348 (stating that major Southern California auto insurers have entered into an "intercom- pany arbitration agreement" to keep down costs on subrogation claims).

n173 See Gerald Asken, Arbitration of Automobile Accident Cases, 1 Conn. L. Rev. 70, 71, 76-78 (1968); see also Arbitration: Commercial Disputes, Insurance, and Tort Claims 215-341 (Alan Widiss ed. 1979) (discussing both policy and practical consider- ations of arbitration for various types of insurance and tort disputes).

n174 See, e.g., N.Y. Ins. Law § 5105 (McKinney 1985) (including a section of the motor vehicle insurance statute entitled "Settlement between Insurers" and providing arbi- tration as the sole subrogation recovery remedy for the payer of first-party benefits against the insurer of the third-party tortfeasor). This New York statute also implements a thresh- old where arbitration is only available if the defendant was driving a truck over 6500 pounds or a bus. See § 5105.

n175 See supra notes 163-169 and accompanying text.

n176 If insurer first, then the insurer will quickly settle. If insured first, then the insurer will press the litigation on until it reaches full compensation.

n177 The plaintiff would be concerned if an insurer-first or proration-allocation method was being used and the judgment or verdict possibilities seemed below actual damages because the plaintiff would be undercompensated in those cases.

n178 See supra notes 172-74.

n179 This option prevents violating the plaintiff's constitutional right to a jury trial or equal protection rights. See, e.g., U.S. Const. amend. VII; Ohio Const. art. I, § 5. Al- though mandatory, non-binding arbitration has been found to be constitutional, requiring only the insurer to submit to arbitration sufficiently addresses the need to reduce subroga- tion costs. See, e.g., Beatty v. Akron City Hosp., 424 N.E.2d 586 (Ohio 1981) (holding Ohio's medical malpractice mandatory arbitration statute, Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2711.21 (Baldwin 1981) (amended to non-mandatory in 1987), constitutional against due process and equal protection challenges).

n180 It may be beneficial to allow the plaintiff to present the compensatory damages as if the plaintiff were trying to recover them. This recognizes the evidentiary concerns raised in traditional collateral source rule operations. See supra notes 7-8 and accompany- ing text. If successful, the plaintiff would simply deduct this amount from the verdict before the defendant paid the award.

REV_00262681

n181 It is also possible that the issue of fault could be conclusively determined at the arbitration. The plaintiff would not have to reprove the issue; the defendant could simply stipulate to the earlier finding. See infra notes 184-195 and accompany text (discussing collateral estoppel concerns).

n182 See supra note 173 and accompanying text.

n183 See supra note 181 and accompanying text.

n184 The law of collateral estoppel precludes the relitigation of matters that have already been determined in order to preserve judicial resources, foster reliance on the finality of judicial decisions, and reduce the possibility of inconsistent decision. See Jack H. Friedenthal et al., Civil Procedure § 14.9 & n.2 (2d ed. 1993) (quoting Montana v. U.S., 440 U.S. 147 (1979)). There may be a question of whether a non-judicial proceed- ing such as arbitration is subject to collateral estoppel. Arbitration findings, however, have often been subject to the doctrine. See G. Richard Shell, Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel Effects of Commercial Arbitration, 35 UCLA L. Rev. 623, 649 (1988).

n185 In a bifurcated proceeding such as the one proposed, if the defendant's liability insurer received an unfavorable fault determination in the arbitration proceeding, he would attempt to relitigate the issue of fault before the jury in the later proceeding. The offen- sive use of collateral estoppel by the plaintiff, however, would prevent the defendant and the defendant's insurer from relitigating an issue that had already been determined. See Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, 439 U.S. 322, 326-32 (1979) (distinguishing offensive and defensive collateral estoppel, promoting the use of offensive collateral estoppel when judi- cial efficiency was not harmed, but warning of possible abuse by plaintiffs who vexatious- ly increase litigation via the use of collateral estoppel).

n186 See Friedenthal, supra note 184, § 14.10.

n187 See Shell, supra note 184, at 632-33.

n188 See Friedenthal, supra note 184, § 14.14. Collateral estoppel can benefit parties (such as the plaintiff in this case) or it can bind a party to a previously adverse finding (such as the defendant here). The defendant cannot assert that he cannot be bound be- cause he is a party to both proceedings. The defendant can only assert that the plaintiff should not benefit since the plaintiff was not involved in the prior proceedings.

n189 See id; see also Parklane Hosiery, 439 U.S. at 328 (approving the use of collateral estoppel in case where strict mutuality requirements are not met).

n190 See Friedenthal, supra note 184, § 14.13.

n191 See id. § 14.13-.14.

n192 An insured will not want privity with the insurer when the arbitration findings are adverse since the plaintiff will be bound by the findings. However, the plaintiff should not be able to choose when he is or is not bound by the arbitration proceedings.

n193 Shell, supra note 184, at 659.

n194 See id. at 660 (explaining that these fundamental interests are shared by both the arbitration and litigation systems).

n195 Arbitration is essentially a contractual issue even if mandated by statute. See id. at 661-63. The defendant's and plaintiff's insurers will have an interest in agreeing on the extent to which each side will be bound in the later proceedings. Recognition of these contract principles provides great flexibility to a court to delve into the intent of the par- ties as to whether certain issues would be precluded by the arbitration. Since, theoreti- cally, both parties to the arbitration are interested in reducing the total costs of subroga- tion, this flexibility will be utilized by the parties to achieve this cost reduction by limit- ing issue relitigation as much as possible. See id.

REV_00262682

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 10:16 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

generated much litigation in Ohio courts. [41] Although the state courts of appeal consistently held R.C. Section 2317.45 to be con- stitutional, the Ohio Supreme Court agreed to grant review to such a case in 1994. [42] [*1082]

In Sorrell, the plaintiff suffered back injuries when the defen- dant jokingly grabbed her from behind while she was bent over sweeping dirt into a dust pan. [43] The plaintiff had re- ceived $ 14,335 in worker's compensation benefits as a result of her injury. [44] At trial the plaintiff was awarded $ 1,700 for lost wages, $ 3,428 for medical expenses, and $ 5,000 for pain and suffering. [45] Following the trial, the court held a hearing to determine the amount of collateral benefits to be used to offset the jury award. [46] Theoretically, the jury verdict would have been totally offset by the worker's compensation benefits which were higher than the verdict; Ms. Sorrell would have received nothing. [47] At the hearing, the plaintiff argued that the collateral source setoff was unconstitution- al. [48] The trial court agreed and declared the statute unconstitu- tional. [49]

The Court of Appeals reversed. [50] The Supreme Court, in turn, reversed the Court of Appeals and declared the statute uncon- stitutional on a number of grounds. [51] It is interesting that the [*1083] Court vowed to ignore policy implications of the statute and to refrain from debating the wisdom of the legislature's action. [52] In fact, the Court's opinion is scattered with references to policy justifications for and against the collateral source rule. [53] The Court simply ignored its own limitation, and proceeded to base its decision on policy grounds. Whether or not the Sorrell court im- properly invaded a legislative policy-making domain is an impor- tant question, however, its answer is beyond the scope of this Note.

This type of judicial opposition to changes in the traditional rule shows that the debate is still open at the state level. If state legislatures pursue this type of tort reform measure, they must decide whether or not to redraft a change to the common law rule that will satisfy the court's constitutional requirements. Although legislative activity on this count has been minimal, [54] it is quite possible that the liability insurance industry, given its cyclical nature, [55] will find itself in another investment return/premium competition squeeze. When that happens, industry lobbyists will [*1084] surely knock down state house doors across the country clamoring for relief just as they did in the 1980s. It is likely that changes to the traditional collateral source rule will be part of the relief mea- sures offered if the rule has not yet been modified.

If a state legislature considers a collateral source setoff statute, more careful thought should be given to the justifications for and against the traditional rule than has been given in the past. Clearly, the current collateral source rule debate is too simple, short-sighted, and partisan. The opposing sides, divided right down plaintiff-de- fendant party lines, [56] either favor the traditional rule or condemn it with wholly self-interested views. [57] The plaintiffs want what they think is rightfully theirs, and the defendants want to avoid paying damages to a previously compensated plaintiff. The debate has lost sight of the reasons why the traditional rule developed--to foster and enhance the purpose of the tort system as it existed at the time of the development of the common law rule. [58] In order to reach a resolution, it must be determined whether the collateral source rule performs or does not perform a similar function under our current tort system. [59]

This Note extends the debate past the narrow party-minded arguments toward a more positive analysis of whether the rule is supported by modern theories of tort law and whether the rule has a place in the tort system. Three major justifications of the tort system found in the recent literature define the analysis: (1) risk allocation/loss-spreading; (2) deterrence; and (3) compensation.

A conclusion that the collateral rule does not magically fit all of the justifications given for tort liability does not require that it be dismissed as out-dated. It must be determined whether the costs [*1085] associated with the traditional collateral source rule are outweighed by the benefits.

III. Risk Allocation & Scale of Activity

Many justifications for the tort system focus on the actions of the tortfeasor and the deterrent effect of tort liability. [60] The most common concept of deterrence is whether the threat of liability prevents an individual or firm from engaging in risky behavior. [61] This section of the Note will discuss a less common concept termed "scale of activity" deterrence. [62] It is clear that a goal of tort liability is to optimize, not eliminate, risky behavior. [63] Some risky behavior is considered valuable by our society even if it results in damages. The difficulty lies in determining what level of risky behavior is socially optimal. The amount or level of risky behavior being measured is called the scale of an activity.

Many law and economics scholars believe that an optimal scale of activity can be more closely attained by the use of tort liability. Guido Calabresi terms the determination of the optimal level of risky behavior the "allocation of resources" justification of tort liability. [64] His thought was that if society wants certain goods, then obstacles to production should be overcome, and the goods should be produced. [65] To enable society to make the opti- mal choice between the desirable goods or activities and the risks associated with them, the full cost of producing the good or engag- ing in the activity must be included in the price society pays for that good or activity. These costs include the normal cost of inputs such as labor and materials, as well as the damages caused by [*1086] producing the good or engaging in the activity. If the value to society of a particular good or activity is equal to or more than the cost of production, then production or activity will increase and society will pay for it. If the value to society is less that the cost of production, including damages, then production or activity will decrease. This function of price, reflecting full cost, is an important component of society's choice of whether to buy the good or en- gage in the activity. [66]

Clearly, the only way that the full cost can be reflected in the price is if the producer must pay for damages caused by the pro- duction of the good or activity. If the producer is monetarily liable, then the price charged to consumers will reflect this liability so that the producer can cover the costs of production. If the price of the good does not reflect damages caused, as would be the case if the producer is not monetarily liable for damages caused, then society will buy more of a good or engage in more of an activi- ty. [67] Since society's demand for a good or activity has increased due to the lower than optimal price, the producer will respond by increasing the supply of the good or activity above the socially optimal level.

More recently, Steven Shavell has shown that if an injurer is not liable for the damages he causes, he will over-engage in an activity. [68] Since the injurer, in the absence of liability, does not have to pay for the damages caused or expend his own resources to try to prevent accidents from occurring, theoretically, he could engage in a dangerous activity without thinking about its conse- quences. [69]

The traditional collateral source rule correctly places the mone- tary liability for damages caused due to wrongful behavior on the injuring party. [70] According to Calabresi and Shavell, if the full [*1087] cost of the damages caused by the activity or production of goods is not reflected in the price or borne by the injuring party, then too much activity will be engaged in or too many goods will be pro- duced. The collateral source rule places the cost of damages on the injuring party so that it is reflected in the cost of the good. If the collateral source rule did not apply in tort liability cases, then the injuring party would not be fully liable for the damages. [71] There would then be no reason for the monetary liability to be reflected in the cost of the good produced.

The scale of activity or allocation of resources argument for imposing tort liability on the injurer is not without its critics. [72] Stephen Sugarman argues that these theories are not strong enough to justify retaining tort liability. His most compelling objection is that simply internalizing the costs of torts may not lead to a more efficient allocation of resources. [73] This uncertainty stems from the economic theory of "second-best." [74] As applied to the allocation of tort liability, this theory suggests that simply making one alloca- tion of cost, based on fault or damage causation, has an unpredict- able effect on the optimal level of production due to the many other economic factors that are simultaneously affecting the level [*1088] of production. Changing one factor in the mix in an attempt to improve the situation may actually worsen it, since the interplay of other factors with the changed factor is not known. [75]

REV_00262654

Although the argument is a potentially serious consideration for the debate over whether to retain tort law liability at all, it does not damage the allocative argument to retain the collateral source rule in our current tort liability system. That is so since the collateral source rule debate is practicably limited to the world where no drastic or overwhelming changes will be made in the fault-based system through which tort victims are compensated. Since that system is unlikely to change, [76] the allocative argument for retaining the rule operates within the framework of the current fault-based system. Sugarman's "second-best" theory on tort liabil- ity does not extend to this framework; it is limited to the broader question of whether tort liability should be retained.

Within a fault-based framework, the "second-best" theory does not indicate that the collateral source rule distorts the level of production. Keeping the cost of accidents on the injurer via the collateral source rule will not result in a more drastic distortion in the allocation of resources than those distortions that already occur in the tort liability system. In fact, in choosing between placing full liability on the injurer under the traditional rule or in reducing liability under a setoff statute, the theory of "second-best" would imply that it would be difficult to determine which allocation is more efficient. It is possible that reducing tort liability to the ex- tent of collateral benefits may distort the allocation to the same extent as imposing full liability.

For the scale of activity rationale to be effective in helping society choose the optimal level of goods to produce or activity to engage in, the traditional collateral source rule should be retained. Without the collateral source rule, injuring parties and producers of goods will engage in too much dangerous activity or produce too many dangerous goods. In turn, this would increase the injuries and damages beyond the optimal level that society, if given the [*1089] choice, would select through pricing and supply/demand mecha- nisms.

IV. Deterrence of Unsafe Behavior

Many commentators contend that because the deterrence pur- pose of tort liability has faded in importance, it is also no longer a supportable justification for the continued use of the collateral source rule. [77] The deterrence justification for tort liability has been revived recently, however, through the law and economic positivist analysis. [78] For this reason, it is difficult for these com- mentators and litigants to continue to maintain that deterrence has no scholarly support as a purpose of the tort system or the collat- eral source rule.

The difficulty in determining whether the deterrence theory is a valid justification is that there are persuasive theoretical argu- ments both for and against the efficacy of this theory. Additionally, the actual deterrent impact of tort liability is difficult to measure in any satisfactory empirical fashion. Early attempts at empiricism were often apocryphal investigations into the impact of a few cele- brated cases. The later attempts at investigating the impact of lia- bility have been more structured and scientific, but even these studies have been criticized. [79] Even so, if it is accepted that deter- rence still plays a role in the tort system, then abolishing the col- lateral source rule will certainly decrease the deterrent impact of tort liability and lead to a higher than optimal level of risky behav- ior. As explained below, the setoff of liability by collateral benefits will fully or partially reduce the deterrent effect of tort liability. Deterrence of risky behavior may not by itself justify preserving the traditional rule. As this Note argues, however, in combination with the allocation of resources and compensation arguments, plus more efficient subrogation, an increase in the deterrence of risky [*1090] behavior will swing the balance towards retaining the traditional rule.

REV_00262655

A. Deterrence--Theoretical Arguments

Posner states that the major economic function of tort law and the imposition of liability on tortfeasors is not compensation, but rather the deterrence of inefficient accidents. [80] Allowing the defen- dant in an accident liability case to use the victim's insurance as an offset to the defendant's liability would decrease the deterrent effect of liability on the defendant. [81] For instance, if a defendant were liable for $ 10,000 in damages, but the liability was offset by the collateral benefits received by the plaintiff, then the defendant's incentive to spend up to $ 10,000, discounted for the probability of the accident occurring, would be reduced by this discounted val- ue. [82] The view that tort law deters unsafe behavior to the full economic extent of the tort liability can be called the "strong" form of the deterrence argument. [83]

The critics of the strong form offer realistic objections to the deterrent impact of liability. Such objections include: the deterrent effect of other behavior controls besides tort liability, the diluting effect of liability insurance on deterrence, the inability of liability to deter unintentional behavior, and the psychological limitation of individuals to properly perceive and respond to risks. [84]

The first objection, the existence of other behavior controls, may raise the question of whether tort liability can be partially or wholly supplanted as a deterrent. Parties who engage in unsafe behavior may be deterred by other incentives such as moral obliga- [*1091] tions not to injure or by self-serving interests in personal safety. [85] An example of the latter would be personal safety concerns that prevent driving at excessive speeds when the risk to self is possi- bly greater that the risk to others. These other incentives, in and of themselves, probably cannot prevent people from engaging in risky behavior. They can, however, supplement the efficacy of tort liabil- ity. [86]

The remaining objections to the deterrent effect of tort liability reflect more on its effectiveness, when it is imposed, at deterring unsafe conduct. Liability insurance may create a buffer between the defendant and his tort liability obligations by shifting Posner's full economic deterrent pressure from the tortfeasor to the liability insurer. [87] If a defendant simply relies on an insurer to fulfill the liability, then the defendant has not faced any of the monetary penalties imposed by the jury that supposedly create a deterrent effect. The actual functioning of liability insurance coverage, how- ever, may offset this shifting effect through the operation of de- ductibles, caps, and experience rating pricing mechanisms which shift the costs of tort liability back to the tortfeasor. [88] While lia- bility insurance probably does reduce the full impact of tort liabili- ty for defendants, thereby eroding Posner's "strong" deterrent theo- ry, the threat of increasing rates and incurring fixed and unavoid- able costs certainly has an important impact on activities.

Since negligent torts are by definition committed unintentional- ly, it is argued that mental awareness of tort liability cannot deter someone from unintentionally causing an accident. [89] Inadvertent behavior, however, can be somewhat modified by certain precau- tionary choices: fixing a broken stairway in the case of homeowner negligence, engaging in proactive informed consent in medical malpractice, or improving compliance with manufacturing safety [*1092] regulations in product defect cases. [90] These actions may not pre- vent accidents, but they will help prevent the portion of accidents that has an inherent element of preventability.

In addition, although some individuals may be aware of tort liability possibilities and may even affirmatively attempt to reduce risky behavior, they are unable to perceive the true risk level and cannot take the optimal level of precautionary measures. [91] Again, this mitigating factor is probably subject to offsetting considerations that will retain some of the deterrent impact of liability. In fact, the inability to assess risks properly may lead to an equal amount of overestimation or underestimation. However, if there is an awareness of the possibility of liability, there may be incentives to become educated about the risk levels. These incentives include the liability if risks are underestimated and the waste of resources if risks are overestimated. [92]

B. Deterrence--Empirical Evidence

The question of whether tort liability deters socially unaccept- able risky behavior is also an empirical one. Although this is a difficult measurement to make, attempts have been made to mea- sure the decrease in accidents due to the imposition of liability. [93] More interesting, though, are studies that show increased accidents when liability is partially removed. Such is the case when no-fault automobile insurance regimes are instituted. [94] As mentioned earli- er, empirical studies in this area are scarce, the results subject to heavy criticism, and the conclusions perhaps unpersuasive. This difficulty of proof, however, may not be fatal to the argument to preserve the collateral source rule.

An example of whether the imposition of liability changes behavior is the extent to which physicians have gone in order to reduce medical malpractice liability. [95] If the argument is that tort [*1093] law does not deter tortious behavior due to the buffer of liability insurance, then it would follow that physicians would not undertake precautions to prevent malpractice. Schwartz provides many exam- ples of how liability pressures have increased activity by the medi- cal profession to reduce accidents. Some examples include in- creased under-age-forty glaucoma testing, [96] increased awareness of requirements to notify potential victims of dangerous patients, [97] increased efforts to improve patient informed consent procedures and standardize physician utilization of the process, [98] and in- creased awareness of surgical tools left in patients. [99] These are specific examples of heightened awareness due to publicized cases. Data also exists showing general attempts to improve the standard of care prompted by the increasing threat of liability and rising malpractice insurance premiums. [100] These procedural changes sup- port the moderate deterrent effect argument. The specter of tort liability has helped increase the awareness and prevention of unsafe activity in medical procedures.

The second and more interesting type of empirical measure- ment that highlights the deterrent effect is whether there is an increase in risky behavior when tort liability is removed. [101] A common area of study on this issue is whether the imposition of no-fault automobile insurance causes an increase in accidents or fatalities. Either the strong or moderate form of deterrence would, [*1094] in theory, indicate that moving from a fault-based system of acci- dent liability to a no-fault system would result in reduced safety precautions by drivers and an increase in accidents. This would result from decreased incentives to drive carefully in the absence of liability.

This theory has generally held true. In a study that is often quoted, Elisabeth Landes showed that a $ 1,500 liability threshold, below which claims for damages must enter the no-fault first party insurance compensation scheme, "implies an increase in fatal acci- dents of more than 10 percent!" [102] Landes performed a regression analysis on fatal accident rates for the period 1967-76 in states that enacted no-fault automobile insurance. [103] The study's intent was to isolate the effect on fatal accident rates due solely to the advent of no-fault insurance. If the ten percent figure is accurate, then aside from the serious policy implications on no-fault plans, the study supports a more general theory that in the absence of tort liability, more accidents occur due to the decreased deterrent effect of that liability.

Landes' study, however, has been criticized. Jeffrey O'Connell and Saul Levmore criticized Landes for her methodology. [104] They faulted her use of fatal accidents instead of injuries from accidents as a focus of study, her hypothetical driver who "superrationally" discounts his own injuries while being fooled by liability thresholds into driving less carefully, and her omission of many other impor- tant variables. [105] [*1095]

Since Landes' study, other economists and statisticians have attempted to prove or disprove similar hypotheses with mixed results. A 1986 study by Paul Zador and Adrian Lund, sponsored by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, directly attacked Landes' methodology and came to the conclusion that "multiple regression analyses . . . provides no support for the claim that the adoption of no-fault laws that restrict the liability for pain and suffering increased the frequency of fatal motor vehicle crash- es." [106] However, a 1994 study by Frank Sloan found that barring twenty-five percent of tort liability claims through a no-fault pro- gram increases the fatality rate by eighteen percent. [107] Although Landes' results may have been reincarnated by Sloan's studies, the empirical side of the deterrence question is not satisfactorily an- swered by these studies. [108]

As Sloan indicated, the United States may not be the ideal case study for the no-fault question. [109] The 1978 implementation of a no-fault insurance plan in Quebec may provide better data for such a study since that plan provides for unlimited out-of-pocket losses and entirely does away with tort liability for personal inju- ries. [110] Statistical studies of the Quebec plan will thereby avoid the threshold problem in United States studies where tort liability is retained above a certain nominal dollar amount. The studies on the Quebec plan more conclusively show that the removal of the deterrent of tort liability increased the accident rate. [*1096]

In his study of the Quebec plan, Marc Gaudry found that fatal accidents increased by seven percent, injury-only accidents in- creased by twenty-six percent, and property damage-only accidents by eleven percent. [111] Rose Anne Devlin was even more conclu- sive than Gaudry. She argued that regardless of an accident report- ing effect, fatal accidents, which cannot be falsified or avoided, in- creased by almost ten percent in Quebec after the passage of the no-fault insurance regime in 1978. [112] Devlin has also published a report that attaches dollar values to the added accidents and com- pares them to the administrative savings from the additions of no- fault in Quebec. [113] She concluded that the increase in accidents under no-fault cost $ 247 million as compared to administrative cost savings of $ 94 million. [114]

These somewhat surprising statistics highlight one of the much-criticized features of no-fault insurance plans. No-fault insur- ance plans wholly ignored the deterrent impact of tort liability, attempted to decrease the overall costs of the accident compensa- tion system by reducing transaction costs, and focused on increas- ing the availability and affordability of insurance. [115] The plans may have made insurance more available and affordable, but if the statistics cited above are believed, then the plans failed in even maintaining the level of accidents. If the increased accident costs were lower than the decreased transactions costs combined with the benefits of improved coverage, then the no-fault plans may have been justified. However, as the broad cost-benefit analysis of the fault to no-fault shift in Quebec shows, that was not the case. [*1097]

The arguments in favor of retaining the collateral source rule surely benefit from these studies. [116] If a setoff statute were used, then the deterrent effect of tort liability would be reduced by the extent of the setoff. A setoff statute of that type would, in effect, create a no-fault regime for tortfeasors who are lucky enough to injure insured victims.

This may seem like a return to the "whose windfall is prefera- ble" refrain, but it is not. The deterrent impact of tort liability will support placing liability on the tortfeasor in order to reduce the level of risky behavior and thereby reduce the cost of accidents. Although the mitigating factors, especially the dampening effect of liability insurance, may refute the strong theory of deterrence, there is no reason to believe that the moderate form of deterrence is harmed. A moderate form of deterrence may not alone be enough to support tort liability and the collateral source rule in the face of critics. It is, however, an additional factor that can help swing the balance in favor of retaining the collateral source rule.

V. Compensation for Injuries

Probably the most persuasive argument against the collateral source rule is that it overcompensates the plaintiff by creating a double recovery. [117] Admittedly, this argument is

REV_00262658

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*75 Wash. U. L. Q. 697, **

Copyright (c) 1997 Washington University
Washington University Law Quarterly

Spring, 1997

75 Wash. U. L. Q. 697

LENGTH: 16352 words

NOTE: THE COLLATERAL SOURCE RULE AND STATE-PROVIDED SPECIAL EDUCATION AND THERAPY

Richard C. Witzel Jr.

SUMMARY:
... A portion of the damages the Does seek from the doctor are to cover the expenses associated with providing their child with the special education and therapy that he will require throughout his school-age years. ... As part of the substantive law of damages, the collateral source rule dictates that compensation received from a source wholly independent from the tortfeasor will not be deducted from the plaintiff's recovery from the tortfeasor. ... In Enson v. Wilson, the Supreme Court of Alabama also addressed the application of the collateral source rule to state- provided special education and therapy. ... The Alabama Supreme Court, in Williston v. Ard, recently reaffirmed its decision regarding the application of the collateral source rule to stateprovided special education and therapy. ... In this regard, the application of the collateral source rule to free, state-provided special education and therapy injects a societal cost into personal injury awards that far outweighs any possible deterrent effect the rule may have in the modern tort system. ... An approach which prevents the summary reduction of a plaintiff's damage award to account for the existence of free, state-provided special education and therapy promotes a judicial system which avoids arbitrary results. ...

TEXT: [*697]

I.

Introduction

Two years ago, Jane and John Doe had a child [1] who suffered from oxygen deprivation during childbirth. [2] The lack of oxygen at this critical time caused the child to suffer severe mental retardation and cerebral palsy. [3] Jane and John have filed a medical malpractice action against the doctor who delivered their child. [4] The Does' complaint alleges that the doctor negligently failed to diagnose and treat their child's fetal distress. A portion of the damages the Does seek from the doctor are to cover the expenses associated with providing their child with the special education and therapy that he will require throughout his school-age years.

Assuming the Does are successful in their malpractice claim, under the traditional application of the collateral source rule [5] they will be entitled to recover damages for the cost of special answers the problems inherent in awarding damages to a plaintiff in need of special education and therapy. This approach protects the plaintiff from arbitrary results while addressing the concerns of society and fostering the goals of the judicial system. Therefore, in keeping with this approach, courts and legislatures should follow the lead of the Florida and Missouri courts recognizing that the traditional application of the collateral source rule cannot be applied soundly to state-provided special education and therapy. [140] By preventing summary reduction and promoting full introduction of evidence, courts and legislatures will find a workable solution to awarding damages in cases which involve a plaintiff in need of special education and therapy.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. Courts have considered the applicability of the collateral source rule to free, state-provided special education and therapy in seven cases. See infra notes 74-114. This hypothetical is based on a compilation of facts from five of the seven cases. The remaining two cases considering the collateral source rule in this context involved injuries to young children. The age of these plaintiffs and the enormous cost of providing them with special education until they reach adulthood make the application of the collateral source rule to free, state-provided special education and therapy a crucial factor in determining the amount of the plaintiff's recovery for economic damages.

n2. Commonly referred to as oxygen deprivation, fetal anoxia or intrauterine asphyxia may result from a "prolapse of the [umbilical] cord, placenta abruption, [or] compression of the umbilical vein." Agnes C. Frenay & Rose M. Mahoney, Understanding Medical Terminology, 298 (9th ed. 1993).

n3. A full discussion of the link between oxygen deprivation, mental retardation and cerebral palsy is beyond the scope of this Note. For purposes of this hypothetical, the traditional view that such a causal link exists is presumed. For an opposing view, see David G. Duff, Compensation for Neurologically Impaired Infants: Medical No Fault in Virginia, 27 Harv. J. on Legis. 391, 395 (1990) (noting that a "reassessment" of the traditional view is necessary in light of recent medical research).

n4. This hypothetical assumes that the state where the Does live has not adopted a no-fault system of compensation for neurologically impaired infants suffering severe mental injuries during childbirth. Several states, including Virginia have adopted such a system. For a discussion of the Virginia approach, see id.

n5. The traditional approach has been followed by five of the seven jurisdictions considering the application of the collateral source rule to free, state-provided special education and therapy. See infra notes 74-102 and accompanying text.

n6. The right of a child with disabilities to receive free, state-provided special education and therapy is mandated by federal statute. See 20 U.S.C. 1412 (1990). The statute provides that to receive federal funding, states must assure "all children with disabilities the right to a free appropriate public education ... available for all children with disabilities between the ages of three and twenty-one ... regardless of the severity of their disability ...." Id.

In accord with federal law, most states also have laws guaranteeing children with disabilities free, state-provided special education and therapy. For an example of one of these statutes, see infranote 86.

n7. See infra notes 17-18 and accompanying text.

n8. See infra note 76 and accompanying text.

REV_00262693

n9. See infra note 82 and accompanying text.

n10. Hubbarb Broadcasting, Inc. v. Loescher, 291 N.W.2d 216, 222 (Minn. 1980).

n11. Restatement (Second) of Torts 920A(2) (1977); See also Kistler v. Halsey, 481 P.2d 722, 724 (Colo. 1971) ("Compensation or indemnity received by an injured party from a collateral source, wholly independent of the wrongdoer ... will not diminish the damages otherwise recoverable from the wrongdoer.").

n12. See, e.g., Richard C. Maxwell, The Collateral Source Rule in the American Law of Damages, 46 Minn. L. Rev. 669, 675 (1962); Robert A. Sedler, The Collateral Source Rule and Personal Injury Damages: The Irrelevant Principle and the Functional Approach, 58 Ky. L.J. 36, 41 (1969). But see, Joel K. Jacobsen, The Collateral Source Rule and the Role of the Jury, 70 Or. L. Rev. 523, 525-526 (1991). Jacobsen eschews as "hermaphroditic" the traditional notion that the collateral source rule is both part of the substantive law of damages and a rule of evidence. Id. Instead, Jacobsen argues that "properly analyzed, the collateral source rule is a substantive rule of damages and not a rule of evidence." Id.

n13. See Jacobsen, supra note 12, at 525 (noting that classification of the collateral source rule as a rule of evidence would appear to make the collateral source rule "an exception to Federal Rule of Evidence 101 ... and the Erie doctrine" which mandates "that federal law govern[ ] evidentiary questions in federal courts").

n14. Although most jurisdictions apply the rule in its traditional form, incorporating both the substantive and evidentiary components, some jurisdictions have retained the substantive aspect of the rule - prohibiting the outright deduction of collateral source benefits while abandoning the rule's evidentiary component. In these jurisdictions, the defendant is entitled to introduce evidence that all or a portion of the plaintiff's damages were paid by a collateral source. The plaintiff is then entitled to introduce evidence about the cost to obtain the collateral source benefit (in most situations this evidence will be of paid insurance premiums). The fact finder is then entitled to consider this evidence in calculating the plaintiff's damages, but is not required to summarily reduce the plaintiff's award by the amount of the collateral benefits. This approach to the collateral source rule typically applies when a plaintiff seeks damages for medical or hospital expenses. See, for example, Ala. Code 12-21-45 (1995), which provides:

(a) In all civil actions where damages for any medical or hospital expenses are claimed and are legally recoverable for personal injury or death, evidence that the plaintiff's medical or hospital expenses have been or will be paid or reimbursed shall be admissible as competent evidence. In such actions upon admission of evidence respecting reimbursement or payment of medical or hospital expenses, the plaintiff shall be entitled to introduce evidence of the cost of obtaining reimbursement or payment of medical or hospital expenses.

Id.

n15. The collateral source rule only applies if the source of the benefit is wholly independent of the tortfeasor. The rule has no application if the tortfeasor or a person acting on behalf of the tortfeasor makes payments to the plaintiff to compensate him for the injuries he sustained. In this situation, the tortfeasor is entitled to a pro tanto reduction of the plaintiff's damage award. See, e.g., Restatement (Second) of Torts 920A(1) (1977) ("A payment made by a tortfeasor or by a person acting for him to a person whom he has injured is credited against his tort liability, as are payments made by another who is, or believes he is, subject to the same tort liability.").

n16. For example, in a case where the plaintiff recovers $ 100 from the tortfeasor for injuries sustained as a result of the tortfeasor's negligence, the tortfeasor is not entitled to have the judgment reduced to $ 75 where the plaintiff's medical insurer paid medical bills of $ 25. Rather, under the traditional application of the collateral source rule, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the full $ 100 from the tortfeasor.

REV_00262694

n17. The evidentiary component of the collateral source rule only precludes a plaintiff from offering evidence of collateral source benefits to mitigate the amount of damages the plaintiff suffered. The collateral source rule does not preclude the defendant from offering evidence that the plaintiff received collateral source benefits when this evidence is offered for purposes other than to mitigate the amount of damages the plaintiff suffered. For example, in Moore v. Missouri Pacific R.R. Co., 825 S.W.2d 839, 842-843 (Mo. 1992), the court allowed the defendant to introduce evidence of collateral benefits received to rebut the plaintiff's contention that the defendant's conduct caused the plaintiff to suffer financial distress which precluded him from continuing medical treatment. The court held "the raising of plaintiff's financial condition ... permits the opposing party to attack [the plaintiff's] claims of financial distress by showing that other financial assistance was available." Id. at 843. Similarly, where the plaintiff is seeking damages for lost wages and there is evidence that the plaintiff has been malingering in (i.e., not returning to work because of payments from collateral sources such as unemployment compensation and social security benefits), evidence of the collateral payments is admissible. See, e.g., Corsetti v. Stone Co., 483 N.E.2d 793, 802 (Mass. 1985).

n18. Although this evidentiary component may appear similar to the substantive law of damages component discussed above, a closer examination reveals a significant difference. While the substantive component of the collateral source rule precludes an outright deduction of the amounts received from the collateral source, the evidentiary component of the collateral source rule precludes the defendant from offering evidence that the plaintiff has received a benefit from a collateral source - evidence that could mitigate the amount of damages that the plaintiff has suffered. Thus, the collateral source rule effectively precludes a defendant from offering evidence that the plaintiff never really suffered the damages claimed because those damages were reimbursed by a collateral source. At least one commentator has focused on this component of the collateral source rule as an invasion of the province of the jury and its fact finding role. SeeJacobsen, supranote 12 at 541.

n19. The term "collateral" was first used to describe the benefit conferred upon the plaintiff by a third party in Harding v. Town of Townsend, 43 Vt. 536, 538 (1871) (holding proceeds of plaintiff's liability insurance should not reduce the amount of damages the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant). See Albert Averbach, The Collateral Source Rule, 21 Ohio St. L.J. 231, 233 (1960).

n20. 58 U.S. (17 How.) 153 (1854). The Propeller Monticello arose from a collision on Lake Huron between the propeller and a schooner - both carrying cargo. The schooner, which sank, was insured. The insurer accepted the abandonment of the schooner and paid its owners for the loss. Id. at 153-156. In a subsequent tort action brought by the schooner's owner, the steamship owner argued that an insurance pay-off released it from liability. Id. The Supreme Court disagreed:

The contract with the insurer is in the nature of a wager between third parties, with which the trespasser has no concern. The insurer does not stand in the relation of a joint trespasser, so that satisfaction accepted from him shall be a release of others.

Id. at 157-60; see, e.g., Deana A. Goldsmith, A Survey of the Collateral Source Rule: The Effects of Tort Reform and Impact on Multistate Litigation, 53 J. Air L. & Com. 799 (1988); Maxwell, supra note 12, at 671 n.6. But see, Jacobsen, supra note 12, at 527. Jacobsen argues that scholars tracing the collateral source rule to The Propeller Monticello are incorrect. Id. Rather, Jacobsen maintains that The Propeller Monticello simply abolished the common-law rule that releasing one tortfeasor from liability was a bar against seeking recovery from a joint-tortfeasor. Id. Jacobsen points out that the defendant in The Propeller Monticello "did not raise the issue of insurance proceeds as mitigation, but rather as a total defense." Id.; cf. O'Connor, "Collateral Source" Rule and Full Special Damages, 1957 Trial & Tort Trends, 642, 645 (suggesting that Althorf v. Wolfe, 22 N.Y. 355 (1860), was the first American case to apply the collateral source rule).

REV_00262695

n21. Even though the collateral source rule has been the subject of abundant criticism from academics and students alike, see, e.g., Charles W. Peckinpaugh, Jr., An Analysis of the Collateral Source Rule, 1966 Ins. L.J. 545; Note, Unreason and the Law of Damages, 77 Harv. L. Rev. 741 (1964) (frequently cited student piece critical of the collateral source rule), its proponents are no less passionate in their defense of the rule; see Thomas F. Lambert, Jr., The Case for the Collateral Source Rule, 1966 Ins. L.J. 531 (arguing that the collateral source rule "must be protected not only against frontal assault but against the erosions of side-door evasions and back-door intrusions"); see also Maxwell, supra note 12, at 695 ("At its best, in some cases, [the collateral source rule] operates as an instrument of what most of us would be willing to call justice.".) There is no doubt that intense passion on both sides has forced even legislatures hostile to the collateral source rule to modify or abrogate the rule only in specific types of actions or for specific types of damages. For a discussion of the various approaches taken by state legislatures in statutes abolishing or modifying the collateral source rule, see Michael Flynn, Private Medical Insurance and the Collateral Source Rule: A Good Bet?, 22 U. Tol. L. Rev. 39, 49-64 (1990).

n22. Traditionally the tort system was thought of as having two primary goals: 1) just and fair compensation of the injured party and 2) deterrence of wrongful or negligent conduct. The continued validity of these goals has been the subject of debate in light of the rise in the availability of liability insurance and social welfare programs. See infra notes 63-65 and accompanying text.

n23. See James D. Ghiardi, The Collateral Source Rule: Multiple Recovery in Personal Injury Actions, 1967 Ins. L.J. 457, 458. An example of a typical collateral source problem faced by nineteenth century courts was as follows:

The plaintiff, an elderly woman of modest means, was injured by the clear negligence of defendant's servant. It is probable that the defendant did not carry liability insurance ... The plaintiff needed medical and nursing care as a result of her injuries, so her two sons came from out of state to care for her. Their services were performed gratuitously. At the trial, the tortfeasor asked the court to not allow the jury to award the plaintiff the "reasonable compensation for nurse hire and attendance" since she had received these services for free from her sons.

Banks McDowell, The Collateral Source Rule - The American Medical Association and Tort Reform, 24 Washburn L.J. 205, 207 (1985) (footnote omitted). The trial court was then faced with the choice of denying the plaintiff a significant portion of her damages or making the tortfeasor answer for the injuries his servant caused. Given this choice, the decision was relatively easy. Id. at 207-08.

n24. Sedler, supranote 12, at 39.

n25. Id. In the latter part of the nineteenth century, a tortfeasor would only be liable if found negligent "under the rather strict concepts of negligence that existed ... and if the plaintiff was not barred by contributory negligence, assumption of the risk, the fellow-servant rule, or one of the other liability-limiting devices developed ... to protect the new industrial enterprises." Id. Moreover, the general unavailability of liability insurance meant the deterrent goal of the tort system would be furthered as the defendant who was forced to pay the full amount of the plaintiff's damages, even though a portion of those damages were offset by a collateral source, quickly realized the negative consequences of her actions. Id.

REV_00262696

n26. Grayon v. Williams, 256 F.2d 61, 65 (10th Cir. 1958) (holding that the plaintiff could recover the reasonable value of medical and hospital expenses plus charges of special nurses, even though the special nurses were paid for by a hospital association to which plaintiff contributed).

n27. While the application of the collateral source rule most commonly arises in the context of a plaintiff who has brought a tort action against the defendant, the rule has also been employed in breach of contract cases, see John G. Fleming, The Collateral Source Rule and Contract Damages, 71 Cal. L. Rev. 56 (1983) (arguing that the difference in policies underlying contract and tort does not by itself justify the reluctance to use the collateral source rule in contract cases), civil rights actions brought under section 1983, see Linda L. House, Section 1983 and the Collateral Source Rule, 40 Clev. St. L. Rev. 101 (1992) (discussing the different treatments the collateral source rule receives in various state and federal courts considering the application of the rule in civil rights actions), and employment discrimination actions brought under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, see Thomas W. Lee, Deducting Unemployment Compensation and Ending Employment Discrimination: Continuing Conflict, 43 Emory L.J. 325 (1994) (examining whether unemployment compensation is truly collateral to the defendant employer in an employment discrimination case where the employer has made payments to the unemployment compensation fund).

n28. Although the collateral source rule expanded into other areas, payments by the plaintiff's insurer to the plaintiff that cover a portion of her damages, most commonly medical expenses, still represent the most common situation in which the application of the collateral source rule arises. This fact has made abolishing or modifying the collateral source rule an important goal of those seeking to reform the U.S. health care system. See infranote 49.

n29. The issue of collateral source benefits arises in the context of employment benefits when an employer continues to make payments to an employee who has been injured by the conduct of a third party and is unable to work. Typical of these types of employer provided collateral benefits are paid vacation and paid sick-days. Many cases address the collateral source rule in these contexts. See, e.g., Lewis v. County of Contra Costa, 278 P.2d 756 (Cal. Ct. App. 1955) (sick leave); Hawthorne v. Southeastern Fid. Ins. Co., 387 So. 2d 26 (La. Ct. App. 1980) (vacation time); McCary v. Caperton, 601 So. 2d 866 (Miss. 1992) (sick leave); Amiker v. Brakefield, 473 So. 2d 939 (Miss. 1985); Ellard v. Harvey 231 S.E.2d 339 (W. Va. 1976) (sick leave); Fisher v. Thompson, 275 S.E.2d 507 (N.C. Ct. App. 1981) (sick leave).

n30. When the collateral source rule is applied to gratuitous services, the plaintiff is usually permitted to recover the reasonable value of the services rendered even though she incurred no cost. See Cates v. Wilson, 361 S.E.2d 734, 739 (N.C. 1987) (plaintiff entitled to recover value of medical services provided for free by family member); Scott v. Southern Ry. Co., 97 S.E.2d 73, 76 (S.C. 1957) (automobile furnished to plaintiff for free while his vehicle was repaired); Degen v. Outboard Marine Corp., 241 N.W.2d 703, 708 (S.D. 1976) (plaintiff entitled to recover for medical bills even though his parents paid the bills).

n31. As divorced from modern concepts as this may appear, defendants in earlier times attempted to argue that a widow's remarriage to a wealthier husband reduced the amount of damages she was entitled to recover for the death of her husband. This argument was universally rejected by the courts. See, e.g., Bunda v. Hardwick, 138 N.W.2d 305, 308 (Mich. 1965); Moore v. Ready Mixed Concrete Co., 329 S.W.2d 14, 21 (Mo. 1959).

n32. One commentator has called this a "very important" but "indirect" application of the collateral source rule. See Lee R. West, The Collateral Source Rule Sans Subrogation: A Plaintiff's Windfall, 16 Okla. L. Rev. 395, 405 (1963). In this situation the collateral source rule operates in the following manner: Under section 104(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code, damages for personal injuries, even damages for lost wages are tax free. 26 U.S.C. 104(a)(2) (1994). Thus, defendants sought to have a plaintiff's award of damages for lost wages reduced to reflect what the plaintiff would have received had the money been earned and hence subject to income tax. The majority of courts addressing this issue have held that the plaintiff's award should not be reduced. See, e.g., Mitchell v. Emblade, 298 P.2d 1034, 1037 (Ariz. 1956); Hall v. Chicago & N.W. Ry. Co., 125 N.E.2d 77, 85 (Ill. 1955).

REV_00262697

n33. The collateral source rule has been applied to benefits received by plaintiffs from various governmental agencies and social programs including: Social Security, see, e.g., Allen v. Louisiana, 535 So. 2d 903, 913 (La. Ct. App. 1988); Pacesetter Corp. v. Barrickmen, 885 S.W.2d 256, 260 (Tex. Ct. App. 1994); Medicaid and Medicare, see, e.g., Williamson v. St. Francis Medical Center, Inc., 559 So. 2d 929, 934 (La. Ct. App. 1990); Badgett v. Davis, 411 S.E.2d 200, 202 (N.C. Ct. App. 1991); and veteran's benefits, see, e.g., Hudson v. Lazurus, 217 F.2d 344, 347 (D.C. Cir. 1954) (collateral source rule applied to plaintiff's treatment at a Veteran's hospital). See also Restatement (Second) of Torts 920A cmt. (4)(c) (1977) ("Social legislation benefits, welfare payments, pensions under special retirement acts, all are subject to the collateral-source rule.").

n34. See supra notes 28-33 and accompanying text.

n35. For a discussion of the reform-minded state legislatures' goals and the various steps undertaken to achieve those goals, see Eleanor D. Kinney, Malpractice Reforms in the 1990's: Past Disappointments, Future Successes?, 20 J. Health Pol. Pol'y & L. 99 (1995).

n36. See Flynn, supra note 21, at 49-64. Flynn classifies legislative actions attempting to reform the operation of the collateral source rule into four categories: 1) statutes which provide that the plaintiff's recovery from the defendant must be reduced by the amount of the collateral source benefits; 2) statutes that permit the admission of facts that the plaintiff has received collateral source benefits to mitigate the amount of damages the plaintiff has suffered into evidence; 3) statutes which narrow the description of recoverable damages to those damages not payable by a collateral source; and 4) the use of automobile no-fault insurance systems which specifically provide for the "admission and use of collateral source benefits to reduce any tort recovery by an injured party." Id. at 64.

n37. A number of the state statutes modifying or abrogating the collateral source rule have encountered serious constitutional obstacles. See generally, Faye L. Ferguson, Note, Equal Protection Challenges to Legislative Abrogation of the Collateral Source Rule, 44 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 1303 (1987). The bulk of these challenges were based on the argument that abolishing or modifying the operation of the collateral source rule for only a particular class of plaintiffs or defendants violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment Id. at 1306-07. Ferguson noted that the constitutionality of the statutes depended on the level of scrutiny the particular court chose to use. Id. at 1330; see also Christopher J. Eaton, Comment, The Kansas Legislature's Attempt to Abrogate the Collateral Source Rule: Three Strikes and They're Out?, 42 Kan. L. Rev. 913 (1994) (discussing three separate occasions when the Kansas Supreme Court declared the Kansas statute unconstitutional); Julie A. Schafer, Note, The Constitutionality of Offsetting Collateral Benefits Under Ohio Revised Code Section 2317.45, 53 Ohio St. L.J. 587 (1992); Calvin R. Wright, Note, The Collateral Source Rule in Georgia: A New Method of Equal Protection Analysis Brings a Return to the Old Common Law Rule, 8 Ga. St. U. L. Rev. 835 (1992).

n38. See Martha Middleton, A Changing Landscape, 81 A.B.A. J. 56 (1995) (discussing proposed federal reforms of the tort system and noting that since 1986 eight states have focused on the abolition or modification of the collateral source rule as a key reform).

n39. Abolition of the collateral source rule is seen by many as a key ingredient in containing health care costs in the United States. Many reformers believe the collateral source rule causes an upward pressure on medical malpractice premiums which in turn causes an increase in health care costs. For a discussion of the various legal reforms linked to health care reforms, see Christopher S. Kozak, A Review of Federal Medical Malpractice Tort Reform Alternatives, 19 Seton Hall Legis. J. 599 (1995). The Health Security Act, proposed by the Clinton presidency in 1993, contained provisions to reform medical malpractice - including the abolition of the collateral source rule. See S. 1757, 103rd Cong. (1993).

REV_00262698

n40. See infra notes 42-73 and accompanying text.

n41. See infra notes 42-73 and accompanying text.

n42. See, e.g., Rexroad v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 388 P.2d 832, 842 (Kan. 1964) ("The reasons generally given for the rule are that the contract of insurance and the subsequent conduct of the insurer and insured in relation thereto are matters with which the wrongdoer has no concern and which do not affect the measure of his liability.") (citation omitted).

n43. The desire to protect the benefit of the plaintiff's bargain with an insurance company has led one commentator to classify this rationale as the "foresight theory." See West, supra note 32, at 413. Under this theory, the plaintiff should not be punished for his "foresight" in obtaining insurance to protect himself by the reduction of his award from the tortfeasor to account for the proceeds of the insurance policy. Id. Closely related to the "foresight theory" is the notion that the collateral source rule encourages the socially useful practice of individuals maintaining private insurance policies. See, e.g., Helfend v. Southern Cal. Rapid Transit Dist., 465 P.2d 61, 66 (Cal. 1970) (en banc) ("The collateral source rule expresses a policy judgment in favor of encouraging citizens to purchase and maintain insurance for personal injuries and for other eventualities.").

n44. See Jacobsen, supra note 12, at 523. While voicing his own criticisms of the collateral source rule, Jacobsen acknowledges that critics who base their attacks solely upon the grounds that the plaintiff's recovery is more than his out-of-pocket expenses overlook the "[collateral source] rule's legitimate function of protecting the plaintiff's investment in insurance." Id. The same logic that is used in the benefit of the bargain rationale is similar to the reasoning that allows for the application of the collateral source rule to benefits rendered to the plaintiff gratuitously with a slightly different twist. In cases of services or benefits rendered gratuitously, the justification for applying the collateral source rule is that to do otherwise would not only deprive the plaintiff of an intended gift, but also frustrate the intent of the donee who intended to confer the gift on the plaintiff and not upon the tortfeasor. See Lambert, supra note 21, at 543.

n45. See Note, supra note 21, at 751. The author asserts that in purchasing insurance, the plaintiff purchased the security of "prompt and sure payments without the necessity of litigation and without regard to the liability and financial resources of prospective defendants." Id. Therefore, the author reasons that the application of the collateral source rule to insurance proceeds in cases where the defendant is capable of paying the judgment provides the plaintiff with more than he bargained for in purchasing insurance. Id.

n46. Id.

n47. Black's Law Dictionary defines subrogation as "the substitution of one person in the place of another with reference to a lawful claim, demand or right ...." Black's Law Dictionary 1427 (6th ed. 1990).

n48. In the context of the collateral source rule, subrogation would work as follows: A injures B. B's insurer, C, pays B for the losses he sustains. Subrogation would give C the legal right to recover the costs of B's injuries from A. This would prevent B from obtaining a windfall, while at the same time providing B and all insureds with reduced premiums because a portion of an insurance company's payouts would be recoverable. Moreover, in paying C, A would still be responsible for the full amount of the damages he caused B to suffer. For an article proposing the use of subrogation to alleviate the problems associated with the collateral source rule, see West, supra note 32, at 398. West's proposal is not limited to cases involving insurance. Rather, West argues that even providers of gratuitous benefits to the plaintiff receive a right of subrogation. Id. at 419. See also Ghiardi, supra note 23, at 463 ("If subrogation is employed, a plaintiff receives compensation once and not twice. And only one insurer pays the loss rather than two, as is the case when the collateral source rule is employed.").

REV_00262699

However, the use of subrogation to alleviate some of the perceived problems with the collateral source rule has met with some sharp criticism. See McDowell, supra note 23, at 217-19. The notion that subrogation benefits everyone because it lowers insurance rates has also been the subject of debate. See Flynn, supra note 21, at 50 (arguing that empirical evidence suggests that in states were subrogation has been utilized, there has not been a decrease in insurance premiums).

n49. This approach to modifying the collateral source rule has been embraced by many state legislatures searching for a way to reform the collateral source rule. Statutes generally abrogating the rule, but allowing the plaintiff to recover the cost of obtaining the collateral benefit, most typically insurance premiums, have been enacted in several states. See, e.g., Fla. Stat. Ann. 768.76(1) (1996). The statute provides:

In any action to which this part applies in which liability is admitted or is determined by the trier of fact and in which damages are awarded to compensate the claimant for losses sustained, the court shall reduce the amount of such award by the total of all amounts which have been paid for the benefit of the claimant, or which are otherwise available to him, from all collateral sources .... Such reduction shall be offset to the extent of any amount which has been paid, contributed, or forfeited by, or on behalf of, the claimant or members of his immediate family to secure his right to any collateral source benefit which he is receiving as a result of his injury.

Id.

n50. See Fleming, supra note 27, at 58 ("benefits from a public source cannot be attributed either to the plaintiff's thrift or prescience..."); James A. Lorentzen & Ronald M. Rankin, The Collateral Source Issue: Forging a Middle Ground, 35 Fed'n of Ins. Couns. Q. 3, 21-22 (1984) ("A plaintiff receiving medicare or some other form of government assistance has not paid for the coverage as in the case of accident and health insurance."). Taking a slightly different perspective on the application of the collateral source rule, Richard Maxwell rejects the argument that the collateral source rule should not apply to benefits from social programs because the tortfeasor has contributed to those programs with his taxes making them not "wholly independent" sources. See Maxwell, supra note 12, at 689. He concluded that "only in the most indirect sense can the benefits be said to have been provided by the wrongdoer." Id.

n51. 217 F.2d 344, 346 (D.C. Cir. 1954).

n52. Id.; see also Lambert, supra note 21, at 542. In his argument in support of the collateral source rule, Lambert notes: "Litigation at its best is inconvenient and at its worst, an ordeal, facts which should be considered when pondering the rejection of the collateral source rule. The conventional rules of damages allow no compensation for such inconvenience." Id. For Lambert and other proponents of the collateral source rule, one of the ways to compensate the plaintiff for this inconvenience is to follow the traditional application of the collateral source rule.

REV_00262700

n53. See Lorentzen & Rankin, supranote 50, at 11. The authors argue that "the plaintiff is more likely to settle [for a smaller sum with the application of the collateral source rule because she knows] that she has collateral sources from which to gain a full and complete recovery." Id. The authors conclude, however, that this argument, despite an element of truth, "hardly seems the proper foundation for the wide-ranging and pervasive way in which the collateral source rule has been applied." Id.

n54. See, e.g., McDowell, supranote 23, at 213. In criticizing the collateral source rule, McDowell labeled the under compensation/under payment of legal fees rationale as the only possible justification that can be advanced in light of the dramatic changes that the tort system has seen since the rule was originally developed. Id. McDowell then concludes that the application of the collateral source rule actually does not improve the position of the plaintiff, but instead forces her to pay more in legal fees. Id. at 213-15.

n55. See Peckinpaugh, supra note 21, at 552. Peckinpaugh also contends that even as a device to account for the alleged undercompensation of plaintiffs the collateral source rule is a failure as the amount received from the collateral source rule is "fortuitous" and bears no relation to the actual amount a particular plaintiff is undercompensated. Id. Moreover, Peckinpaugh is quick to point out that the collateral source rule provides no assistance to a plaintiff who is undercompensated by our present system yet has no collateral source from which to recoup this loss. Id.; see also Ghiardi, supra note 23, at 461. In rejecting the collateral source rule, Ghiardi argues in similar terms that "if we accept the premise that plaintiffs never are fully compensated, we should change the system to assure adequate compensation and not perpetuate a rule which overcompensates some and undercompensates others." Id.

n56. Under the so-called "American rule" each party to the litigation is responsible for its own legal fees. In contrast, under the "English rule" the losing party in the litigation is charged with the responsibility of paying not only its own legal fees and costs, but also the legal fees and costs of the prevailing party. The abolition of the "American rule" in favor of the "English rule" has been the subject of intense debate among those seeking to reform the U.S. tort system. For a discussion of this issue, see Herbert M. Kritzer, The English Rule, 78 A.B.A. J. 54 (1992).

n57. See, e.g., Jacobsen, supranote 12, at 534. These critics point out that this argument in favor of the collateral source rule is really an attack on the "American rule" and argue that if the abolition of the "American rule" is necessary to reform the tort system, it should be openly abolished rather than "by subterfuge under the cover of collateral source rule." Id.

n58. See, Note, supra note 21, at 750. The author argues that juries recognize that plaintiffs must pay legal fees and use awards of damages for pain and suffering to compensate plaintiffs for these added fees and costs. Id.

n59. John G. Flemming, The Collateral Source Rule and Loss Allocation in Tort Law, 54 Cal. L. Rev. 1478, 1483 (1966) (noting the common argument in favor of the collateral source rule is that "the defendant is a wrongdoer who should not be >let off' from any portion of what is his due ...") (emphasis added).

n60. See Lambert, supranote 21, at 544. A staunch supporter of the collateral source rule, Lambert argues that "if civil liability is a deterrent to accidents, then undiminished and unabated damages for wrongdoing should exert an even more admonitory pressure towards accident prevention." Id.

n61. See supra note 51 and accompanying text; see also Flynn, supra note 21, at 67. In arguing for the continued application of the collateral source rule to medical insurance payments, Flynn claims that "absent the Collateral Source Rule the insured who receives medical benefits, the >winnings' from payment of insurance premiums, loses his legal right to full compensation from a guilty tortfeasor." Id. (emphasis added).

REV_00262701

n62. See West, supranote 32, at 412. West claims that the punitive aspect of the collateral source rule is a "historical hangover from the days when torts and crimes were administered by the same court and in the same action." Id.

n63. See Lorentzen & Rankin, supra note 50, at 6 (arguing that "in today's complex litigation - where manufacturers can be found liable without proof of fault and where culpable plaintiffs can collect under comparative negligence ... the concept that defendants deserve to pay because they are at fault in causing injury is fallacious in many cases").

n64. See, Flemming, supra note 59, at 1547-48; see also Sedler, supra note 12, at 46. Sedler argues that wrongdoers today do not act morally wrong, but rather the basis of modern liability "is really that it is an efficient loss distributor." Id. Proponents of this view note that by focusing on "loss distribution" the modern tort system recognizes the impact liability insurance has had in diminishing the ability to deter conduct with monetary damages. These authors point out that individual tortfeasors shift the major burden of the loss to their liability insurance carriers. While the tortfeasor may realize a slight increase in insurance premiums, the "real cost will be spread out to all insureds of the defendant's class." See Flynn, supra note 21, at 48-49; see also McDowell, supra note 23, at 210.

n65. The principle of mitigation is clearly embodied in the Restatement (Second) of Torts 920 (1977) which states:

When the defendant's tortious conduct has caused harm to the plaintiff or to his property and in so doing has conferred a special benefit to the interest of the plaintiff that was harmed, the value of the benefit conferred is considered in mitigation of damages, to the extent that this is equitable.

n66. The prospect of a "windfall" or "double-recovery" for the plaintiff led one critic to argue that the collateral source rule should be named the "double-recovery rule." See Ghiardi, supra note 23, at 457 (arguing that "the collateral source rule exists as an anomaly in the law of personal injury reparations which should be excised").

n67. See supra notes 17-18 and accompanying text.

n68. See Peckinpaugh, supranote 21, at 551. This argument is presumably based on the assumption that the jury would consider the evidence of the collateral source payments as an indication that the plaintiff did not suffer the full amount of the damages claimed. The jury would likely use this information to reduce the amount of the plaintiff's recovery in violation of the collateral source rule. Id.

n69. Id.at 554 (discussing the argument that the jury will be confused by the introduction of evidence of collateral source benefits and the tax free status of compensatory damages); see also supra note 32. The notion that the jury may become confused if exposed to evidence of collateral sources is applicable to any item of damages involving uncertainty to future collateral benefits. Several courts addressing the issue of the applicability of the collateral source rule to free, state- provided special education and therapy have focused on this argument in their decisions to apply the rule. See infra note 95 and accompanying text.

n70. See Jacobsen, supra note 12, at 523.

n71. See Lorentzen & Rankin, supra note 50, at 7. In analyzing this aspect of the collateral source rule, the author states that "the public at large must feel or believe that the collateral source rule is unjustified; otherwise there would be no concern about keeping collateral source information away from the jury." Id.; see also Peckinpaugh, supranote 21, at 551.

REV_00262702

education and therapy - despite the fact that their state of residence provides, as a matter of right, free special [*698] education and therapy to all disabled children. [6] Moreover, under the traditional application of the collateral source rule, no evidence relating to the existence of the free, state-provided services will be admissible at trial if it is offered to mitigate the damages suffered by the Does. [7] Rather, the only evidence the jury may consider when computing the damages will be the expenses associated with providing special education and therapy for the child in a private educational institution for children with disabilities. [8] Furthermore, under the collateral source rule, the Does will be entitled to recover the reasonable cost of providing special education and therapy for their child even if they intend to avail themselves of the special education and therapy the state will provide to their child at no cost. [9]

This Note offers a critical analysis of the collateral source rule as it is applied to free, state-provided special education and therapy. Part II of this Note briefly introduces the collateral source rule and its application in a modern court. Part III provides a brief history of the collateral source rule and its development since its inception in the mid-nineteenth century. Part IV examines the various justifications and critiques offered for the collateral source rule. Part V discusses the few occasions that courts have examined the application of the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy. Part VI presents a critical analysis of the application of the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy. Finally, Part VII offers a proposal for dealing with the existence of free, state-provided services in cases where the plaintiff seeks an award of damages for the cost of special education and therapy.

II.

Definition and Operation of the Collateral Source Rule

In its most basic form, the "collateral source rule provides in general that compensation received from a third party will not diminish the recovery [*699] against a wrongdoer." [10] Section 920A(2) of the Restatement (Second) of Torts states the rule in similar terms: "Payments made to or benefits conferred on the injured party from other sources are not credited against the tortfeasor's liability, although they cover all or a part of the harm for which the tortfeasor is liable." [11]

No matter what precise language is used to define the rule, most courts and commentators characterize the collateral source rule as functioning both as part of the substantive law of damages and as a "rule" of evidence. [12] Although this characterization has caused some confusion, [13] it is nevertheless an accurate description of the role the collateral source rule plays in most jurisdictions which apply the rule. [14] [*700]

As part of the substantive law of damages, the collateral source rule dictates that compensation received from a source wholly independent from the tortfeasor [15] will not be deducted from the plaintiff's recovery from the tortfeasor. [16] In furtherance of this objective, the collateral source rule also incorporates an evidentiary component, which precludes the introduction of evidence relating to any benefits the plaintiff may have received from a collateral source, when offered by the tortfeasor to mitigate [17] the amount of damages suffered. [18] [*701]

III.

History and Development of the Collateral Source Rule

REV_00262685

n72. See Sedler, supra note 12, at 43 ("The plaintiff must recover all damages, past and prospective, in a single action, and we are making no more than a guess - only to some extent, an educated guess - as to what they are.").

n73. Critics point out that juries are already required to decide the outcome of very complex issues whose resolution often depends on evidence with which the jury is wholly unfamiliar. See, Peckinpaugh, supra note 21, at 554. These types of situations often arise in complex cases such as medical malpractice or toxic tort actions. Id. Moreover, the estimation of future losses is simply a product of our jury system which requires that all damages be reduced to their present value. Id. Indeed, concerns of the jury speculating about future benefits "form a weak foundation for the law of damages." See Jacobsen, supranote 12, at 536. One critic has even suggested that the exclusion of collateral source benefits works to the detriment of plaintiffs who are not the beneficiaries of collateral source payments because the jury assumes that most people have insurance and adjust the amount of the award accordingly. See McDowell, supra note 23, at 215.

n74. 378 A.2d 540 (Conn. 1977).

n75. The defendants' truck collided with the plaintiffs' car. The plaintiffs' seven and one-half year old son flew from the car. The boy sustained brain damage and suffered from epilepsy after the accident. Id. at 542-43.

n76. Id. at 546.

n77. Id. At the time of the appeal, the boy "was receiving special education at no cost through a public school program provided by the town of Newtown." Id.

n78. Id. The court specifically held that "proof as to whether or not [the municipality] would continue its special education program in its public school system was not relevant under the collateral source rule." Id.

n79. 481 N.E.2d 957, 960 (Ill. App. Ct. 1985).

n80. The defendant was a doctor who admitted liability for negligently failing to diagnose and treat the meningitis and ventriculitis the plaintiff developed shortly after birth. Id. at 959.

n81. Id. at 960.

n82. Id. The court offered no other rationale for its decision, and it did not consider how the future availability of state-provided services supported the exclusion of evidence or that prior to trial, the plaintiff was receiving free, state- provided special education and therapy. By the time the case reached the appellate court, the plaintiff had availed himself of several years of free, state-provided "physical, occupational, speech and music therapy, adaptive physical education and special transportation." Id. at 959.

n83. 519 So. 2d 1244 (Ala. 1978).

n84. Id. at 1246-50.

n85. Id. at 1266.

n86. The defendants were referring to the Alabama Exceptional Child Education Act, Ala. Code 16-39-3 (1975). The statute provides:

Each school board shall provide not less than 12 consecutive years of appropriate instruction and special services for exceptional children, beginning with those six years of age, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter. Such public school instruction and special services shall be made available at public expense for each school year .... No matriculation or tuition fees or other fees or charges shall be required or asked of exceptional children or their parents or guardians, except such fees or charges as may be charged uniformly of all public school pupils.

REV_00262703

Id.

n87. See supra note 6.

n88. Ensor, 519 So. 2d at 1266.

n89. Id. at 1266-67. The court stated the general proposition that evidence of benefits conferred on the plaintiff from collateral sources "is not relevant, its existence renders neither more probable nor less probable any material fact in the case ...." Id. at 1266 (quoting 22 Am. Jur. 2d Damages 206 (1988)).

n90. 611 So. 2d 274 (Ala. 1992).

n91. The defendant was a doctor sued for negligently causing a child to suffer severe brain damage during the course of a "routine appendectomy." Id. at 276.

n92. Id. at 278.

n93. Id. The court stated: "an amount of damages is not decreased by the benefits received by a plaintiff from a source wholly collateral to and independent of the wrongdoer, including services provided by the state at government expense or decreased by institutionalization at government expense." Id.

n94. 361 S.E.2d 734 (N.C. 1987).

n95. Id. at 737-39. Cates was a medical malpractice action brought on behalf of a child who suffered brain damage and cerebral palsy during birth due to the defendant doctor's alleged negligence. Id. at 736.

n96. Id. at 737.

n97. Id. (referring to Pub. Law No. 94-142).

n98. Id.

n99. Id. at 738. In making this assertion, the court felt the plaintiff should not be denied the opportunity of utilizing private care and cited Sedler for the proposition that the plaintiff should be able to recover the cost of future medical services, since he is likely to prefer private care, and it is his "right" to have it. It may be that he will employ the free care for which he is eligible ... but ... at the time of suit there is no way of knowing what he will choose to do.

Id. (quoting Sedler, supra note 12, at 186).

n100. Cates, 361 S.E.2d at 738-39. The court was concerned that public benefits could not be counted on to exist throughout the plaintiff's lifetime, especially in light of the increasing budget constraints that both federal and state governments face. Id. Other judges have also found the uncertainty of continued funding to be a significant factor behind their support of the application of the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy. See Florida Physician's Ins. Reciprocal v. Stanley, 452 So. 2d 514, 516-17 (Fla. 1984).

REV_00262704

n101. The court noted that the collateral source rule should apply to future public benefits because the utilization of these benefits hinges on the plaintiff's continued indigence. Cates, 361 S.E.2d at 739. However, the court observed that under North Carolina law access to special education did not hinge on financial status. Id. Most likely, the court discussed this rationale in reference to the other public services, such as Medicaid and Aid to Families with Dependent Children, whose availability does depend on financial need.

n102. Id.

n103. Physician's, 452 So. 2d at 515. Like most of the cases considering the collateral source rule in the context of state-provided special education and therapy, this action was brought on behalf of a child who claimed that the doctor's negligence during delivery caused his mental retardation and cerebral palsy. Id. at 514.

n104. In Physician's three justices concurred with the majority's written opinion, while three justices offered a vigorous dissent.

n105. Physician's, 452 So. 2d at 515.

n106. Id. In taking this approach, the Florida court cited with approval Peterson v. Lou Bachrodt Chevrolet Co., 392 N.E.2d 1, 5 (Ill. 1979). In Peterson, the Illinois Supreme Court refused to apply the collateral source rule to gratuitous medical services. Physician's, 452 So. 2d at 516. The dissent in Physician's was quick to point out the factual dissimilarities between the case it was considering and Peterson. Id. at 516-17 (Shaw, J., dissenting). In particular, the dissent focused on the fact that in Peterson, the plaintiff voluntarily applied for and received free medical services at the Shriner's Hospital prior to seeking compensation for the same services from the tortfeasor. The dissent in Physician's interpreted Peterson to mean that "an individual is not entitled to recover for the value of previously rendered free services he has voluntarily obtained." Id. at 516 (Shaw, J., dissenting). Moreover, the majority apparently took no notice of the fact that the Illinois Court of Appeals specifically rejected the application of Peterson's approach to state provided special education in Northern Trust.

n107. Id. at 517 (Shaw, J., dissenting).

n108. Id. (Shaw, J., dissenting). The dissent was unwilling to allow taxpayer contributions to "become a device for reducing the legal liability of a tortfeasor." Id. (Shaw, J., dissenting).

n109. 897 S.W.2d 611 (Mo. 1995).

n110. Id. at 615.

n111. The court considered and rejected the following: the benefit of the bargain rationale; the punishment rationale; the windfall for the plaintiff rationale; the argument that the rule is necessary to protect the injured plaintiff from the uncertainty of continued funding and availability of public benefits; and the argument that the collateral source rule is needed to compensate the plaintiff for the costs incurred in the form of legal fees and expenses. Id. at 619.

n112. Id. at 621.

n113. The court also indicated in dicta that an additional justification for allowing this mitigation evidence was the fact that the plaintiff "opened the door to this issue by injecting testimony of [the plaintiff's] financial condition into the case." Id. This is consistent with the approach taken by other courts, see supra note 17.

REV_00262705

n114. Barnes, 897 S.W.2d. at 621.

n115. A "fundamental" tenant of jurisprudence is that a principle of law cannot be applied once courts have strayed from the foundation upon which the principle is based. See Victor E. Schwartz, Tort Law Reform: Strict Liability and the Collateral Source Rule Do Not Mix, 39 Vand. L. Rev. 569, 573 (1986) (arguing that if the defendant is found liable under strict liability, the courts are no longer applying the collateral source rule as originally intended or justified).

n116. For a discussion of this rationale, see supranotes 42-44 and accompanying text.

n117. A taxpayer's contribution to the state special education system may take a variety of different forms, but a common method of funding special education and therapy is through a property tax. See, e.g., Mo. Ann. Stat. 162.920 (Vernon 1995).

n118. See supra notes 50, 105 and accompanying text.

n119. For a discussion of this rationale, see supra note 43 and accompanying text.

n120. For a discussion of this argument in favor of the collateral source rule, see supra notes 59-61 and accompanying text.

n121. See supra notes 23-25 and accompanying text.

n122. For a discussion of the changes in the tort system, see supra notes 62-63 and accompanying text.

n123. See supra note 64 and accompanying text.

n124. See supra note 64 and accompanying text for a discussion of the way tortfeasors and insurance companies shift the burden for damage awards to consumers in the form of increased prices and premiums. Under this system of loss redistribution, the application of the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy increases the amount of loss that a tortfeasor must redistribute. The application of the collateral source rule to state-provided special education increases the amount of damages for special education and therapy recoverable by an injured plaintiff. This increased amount of damages for education and therapy increases the total amount of damages, which in turn increases the total amount of damages that must be redistributed.

n125. See supra notes 61-64 and accompanying text for an examination of the modern tort system's decreased deterrent ability.

n126. For a discussion of this argument in favor of the collateral source rule, see supranotes 67-69 and accompanying text.

n127. See supranote 73 and accompanying text.

n128. For a discussion of this rationale, see supranotes 51-53 and accompanying text.

n129. See supra note 72 and accompanying text.

n130. See supra note 54.

n131. See supra Part VI for an analysis of the application of the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy in light of the traditional justifications for the rule.

n132. For an explanation of substantive and evidentiary components of the collateral source rule, see supra notes 12-18 and accompanying text.

n133. See supra notes 15-16 and accompanying text.

n134. In the absence of the rule's substantive component, the plaintiff's award of damages would be reduced by the amount of the collateral source benefit. In the context of state-provided special education and therapy, the absence of the rule's substantive component would allow for the reduction of the plaintiff's damage award to reflect the value of the free, state-provided services. Such a reduction would effectively preclude the plaintiff from choosing to receive special education and therapy from a private provider because her damage award would not provide funds for private services. The failure to adhere to the substantive component of the rule would be extremely harsh to a plaintiff whose special education and therapy needs could not be adequately met by the state-provided services.

n135. In this context, the plaintiff may seek to introduce a wide variety of information. Perhaps most importantly, the plaintiff would introduce any evidence that would tend to show that the state-provided services would fail to meet her special education needs. For example, the plaintiff may introduce evidence that she requires a particular service which can be more readily obtained at a private institution. The plaintiff would also introduce any evidence to support the notion that the continued existence of free, state-provided services was uncertain. The plaintiff also would offer evidence relating to the proximity of state-provided services compared to private services and any other evidence indicating that private services would better meet her special education and therapy needs.

n136. See supra note 134 for an explanation of how the absence of the substantive component of the collateral source rule could force the plaintiff to utilize state-provided services.

n137. See supra notes 62-64 and accompanying text.

n138. See supra note 117 and accompanying text for an explanation of how various taxes are used to fund state-provided special education and therapy.

n139. See supranote 64 and accompanying text for an explanation of the way consumers pay for increased jury awards in the form of higher prices and increased insurance premiums. For a discussion of how members of society can actually pay twice for the cost of providing an injured plaintiff with special education and therapy, see supra notes 124-25 and accompanying text.

n140. See supra notes 103-14 and accompanying text.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 10:20 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00262707

REV_00262708

Most commentators agree that the collateral source rule [19] traces its roots to an 1854 Supreme Court case, The Propeller Monticello v. Mollison. [20] The date of this decision is important for two reasons. First, the date provides the collateral source rule with almost one hundred and fifty years of precedental value - a factor that has made abolition or even modification of the rule a difficult process. [21] Second, the date of the decision provides the context for understanding a rule which, at first glance, appears to be far removed from modern notions of the proper functioning of the tort system. [22] [*702]

The collateral source rule developed at a time when the various collateral sources available to assist today's plaintiff were almost completely unknown. [23] "People paid their medical bills out of private funds or savings, or a member of the family paid for them.... Those who were unable to pay were treated in the 'poor ward' of a hospital or at a "charity' hospital....'" [24] Moreover, the existing theories of recovery upon which an injured plaintiff could base her claim for damages made it clear that the tortfeasor was thought of as a "wrongdoer" deserving to pay for the harm that she caused. [25]

From a plaintiff's perspective, the attractiveness of such a rule was readily apparent. The collateral source rule has been articulated as follows:

> Where a part of the wrongdoer's liability is discharged by payment from a collateral source ... the question arises who shall benefit therefrom, the wrongdoer or the injured person. No reason in law, equity or good conscience can be advanced why a wrongdoer should benefit from part payment from a collateral source of damages caused by his wrongful act. [26]

[*703] There can be no doubt that this articulation, as well as the ability to provide compensation to injured plaintiffs, led to a rapidly expanding application of the collateral source rule. [27] Courts applied the collateral source rule to the following: payments to the plaintiff by insurers, [28] benefits provided by employers, [29] gratuitous services, [30] damages due regardless of a widow's remarriage to a wealthier husband, [31] savings from the tax- free status of compensatory damages, [32] and various services provided by governmental [*704] agencies. [33]

While the early and middle part of this century saw the judicial application of the collateral source rule expand, [34] beginning in the 1970s the collateral source rule became the prime target of state legislatures looking for a way to check the rising costs of medical malpractice insurance. [35] Numerous states enacted statutes eliminating or qualifying the collateral source rule. [36] Although these legislative attempts to encroach upon the collateral source rule have not met with complete success, [37] the abolition or modification of the [*705] collateral source rule remains a central focus of those seeking to reform not only the tort system, [38] but also the health insurance system in the United States. [39]

IV.

Justifications And Criticisms of the Collateral Source Rule

Courts and commentators have generally advanced four justifications or rationales for the collateral source rule. [40] Each of these justifications has been the subject of vigorous attacks by opponents of the rule. [41]

A. Benefit of the Bargain Rationale

One of the most common arguments in support of the collateral source rule is that the plaintiff should not be denied the benefit of contractual arrangements he has made with third parties for compensation in the event of a loss. [42] This rationale for the rule frequently arises where the plaintiff has purchased some form of an insurance policy. [43] Proponents of the collateral [*706] source rule argue that allowing the defendant to offset the amount that the plaintiff has received from these sources would "deny" the plaintiff the benefit of the bargain for which he contracted. [44]

Critics of the collateral source rule have attempted to undermine the benefit of the bargain rationale by pointing out its inherent weaknesses. One commentator has noted that in purchasing insurance purchasers contract for the security that insurance provides in the event that their injuries are otherwise uncompensable. [45] Purchasers are not wagering on the possibility that they might realize a double recovery through the application of the collateral source rule. [46] Moreover, while some commentators recognize the legitimate end of protecting the plaintiff's investment in insurance, they point out that providing the plaintiff's insurer with a right of subrogation [47] would both protect this investment in insurance and avoid the taboo of a "double-recovery" for the plaintiff. [48] Others advocate abrogating the collateral source [*707] rule, but in a manner which allows the plaintiff to recover from the tortfeasor the cost of obtaining the collateral benefit. [49] Still others assert that the benefit of the bargain rationale is inappropriate for some collateral sources - most notably government assistance and social programs. [50]

B. Legal Compensation Does Not Adequately Compensate the Plaintiff

Another argument commonly advanced in support of the collateral source rule is that legal compensation does not adequately compensate the plaintiff. This rationale was most clearly stated in Hudson v. Lazarus: [51]

Legal "compensation" for personal injuries does not actually compensate. Not many people would sell an arm for the average or even the maximum amount that juries award for loss of an arm. [*708] Moreover the injured person seldom gets the compensation he "recovers", [sic] for a substantial attorney's fee usually comes out of it. There is a limit to what a negligent wrongdoer can fairly, i.e., consistently with the balance of individual and social interests, be required to pay. But it is not necessarily reduced by the injured person's getting money or care from a collateral source. [52]

Moreover, some proponents of the collateral source rule contend that in its attempt to assist plaintiffs obtain complete recovery, the rule actually encourages plaintiffs to forgo litigation and settle for less. [53]

The notion that applying the collateral source rule is justified because it helps the plaintiff obtain a full and complete recovery has been the subject of intense criticism. [54] Charles Peckinpaugh claims that this argument "is actually a criticism of our system of litigation, and more particularly [relies on the assumption] that a jury is incapable of performing its proper function of awarding full compensation to an injured plaintiff." [55] In a similar manner, opponents of the rule assert that this argument is really nothing more than an [*709] unprincipled critique of the "American rule" [56] and hence an inappropriate justification for the collateral source rule. [57] Other critics attack this justification of the collateral source rule by arguing that juries recognize that the plaintiff must pay her legal fees and adjust the amount of the verdict accordingly. [58]

C. The Wrongdoer Deserves to Pay/Any Windfall Should Go to the Plaintiff

A third common argument in support of the collateral source rule is the contention that as the wrongdoer, the defendant deserves to pay. [59] Proponents of the collateral source rule taking this position contend that forcing defendants to bear the full cost of the damages they cause, furthers the tort system's goal of deterrence. [60] Recognizing that application of the collateral source rule will often provide the plaintiff with what critics call a windfall (i.e., recovery for damages already reimbursed or provided for by a collateral source), some supporters of the rule maintain that if there is any "windfall," it is better that it be bestowed upon the "innocent" plaintiff rather than the "guilty" defendant. [61] [*710]

Critics of the collateral source rule attack this justification of the rule as being far detached from modern concepts of the proper functioning of the tort system. [62] They contend that the tort system has evolved in such a way to prevent defendants, even defendants who have been found civilly liable, from being considered "guilty" or "wrongdoers." [63] Many commentators also contend that the increasing use and availability of liability insurance, coupled with the rise of the modern welfare state, has shifted the primary focus of the tort system away from deterrence and towards compensation. [64] These commentators argue that a key component of a system that strives for fair and just compensation is the mitigation of damages, [65] which the collateral source rule fundamentally undermines by allowing the plaintiff to recover for damages he really never suffered. [66]

D. Evidence of Collateral Source Benefits Will Prejudice and Confuse the Jury

The collateral source rule generally precludes the introduction of evidence relating to payments or services provided to the plaintiff by collateral [*711] sources. [67] This prohibition on the introduction of collateral source evidence is thought to protect the plaintiff in two ways. Most importantly, the prohibition aims to prevent the jury from using the collateral source evidence to reduce the amount of the plaintiff's award. [68] Additionally, particularly in regard to future and continuing collateral source benefits, the prohibition on the introduction of evidence relating to collateral source payments is designed to prevent jury confusion. [69]

Joel Jacobsen, one of the staunchest critics of evidence exclusion relating to collateral source benefits, maintains that the collateral source rule has a "tendency to diminish the jury's fact-finding role by concealing facts relevant to the calculation of damages." [70] Other commentators have interpreted the evidentiary exclusion as evincing a lack of public support for the collateral source rule. [71] Moreover, critics of the collateral source point out that the introduction of future or contingent collateral source benefits is simply the product of a system in which all damages must be sought in one action. [72] They further contend that such evidence is no more confusing to a jury than other types of complicated evidence which the jury is already forced to consider. [73] [*712]

V.

Courts Considering the Application of the Collateral Source Rule to State- Provided Special Education and Therapy

A. Majority Approach

In Healy v. White, the Supreme Court of Connecticut was the first to address the application of the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy. [74] In Healy, the plaintiffs sought recovery for injuries their son sustained as a result of the defendant's negligence. [75] At trial, the plaintiffs introduced evidence that the child would require special education at a private school that would cost between $ 8,000 and $ 16,000 annually. [76] On appeal following a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, the defendant argued that the plaintiffs' might not incur the full amount of the damages because all or part of the special education services would be provided by the municipality. [77] The Connecticut Supreme Court held that such evidence "would not be relevant because Connecticut follows the majority rule in this country regarding collateral sources." [78]

REV_00262688

The application of the collateral source rule to state- provided special education and therapy was next addressed in Northern Trust Co. v. County of Cook. [79] In Northern Trust, the defendant [80] appealed the trial court's refusal to admit evidence of the availability of free, state-provided services for handicapped children. [81] Noting the uncertainty of the future availability of state-provided services, the court of appeals affirmed the trial court's decision [*713] to exclude as evidence the existence of free, state-provided special education and therapy. [82]

In Enson v. Wilson, the Supreme Court of Alabama also addressed the application of the collateral source rule to state- provided special education and therapy. [83] The parents of a premature child who suffered a degree of brain damage and retardation brought a medical malpractice action against the delivering obstetrician. [84] The court granted the plaintiffs' motion in limine "to preclude any reference by defendants to the special education and therapy available to [the child] from governmental sources." [85] On appeal, the defendants challenged the motion in limine contending that they were entitled to introduce evidence that Alabama [86] and federal laws [87] conferred an absolute right on the child to receive special education and related services, thus reducing the child's future financial needs. [88] In affirming the trial court's exclusion of the evidence, the Alabama Supreme Court relied in part on Healy and found "no reason" to distinguish special education and therapy from other government services that courts had found were covered by the collateral source rule. [89]

The Alabama Supreme Court, in Williston v. Ard, recently reaffirmed its decision regarding the application of the collateral source rule to state- [*714] provided special education and therapy. [90] In Williston, the defendant [91] sought to introduce testimony from the local special education coordinator about the availability of programs in the county school for multihandicapped children like the plaintiff. [92] The trial court had excluded the evidence under the collateral source rule. On appeal, the Alabama Supreme Court reaffirmed its decision in Ensor and upheld the trial court's refusal of the special education coordinator's testimony. [93]

The Supreme Court of North Carolina, in Cates v. Wilson, adopted a similar application of the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy. [94] In Cates, the North Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the reversal of a trial court's decision to allow testimony about the existence of state-provided special education and therapy in a medical malpractice action. [95] During the trial, the defendant's expert testified that the plaintiff's local public school "provided excellent training for mentally and physically handicapped persons until age 22." [96] The defendant's expert also testified that under North Carolina law, [97] special education was available to all, regardless of their financial status, and that while there could be no guarantee of continued availability, public funding for special education had been "reliable." [98]

In finding that the trial court committed prejudicial error in admitting the expert's testimony, the North Carolina Supreme Court identified several reasons for applying the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy. First, the court stated that if the collateral source rule were not applied to special education, the "compensatory goal underlying our tort system" would be thwarted because the plaintiff would be forced "to [*715] depend on public coffers." [99] The court then reasoned that the lack of certainty to the future availability of public resources made mitigating damages premised on the continued existence of public benefits unwise. [100] Finally, [101] the court concluded "as between defendants who tortiously inflict injury and innocent taxpayers who fund [these special education programs] ... we think it better that the loss fall on the tortfeasor." [102]

B. Minority Approach

Taking a strikingly different approach than the majority of jurisdictions, in Florida Physician's Insurance Reciprocal v. Stanley the Supreme Court of Florida held that the collateral source rule did not preclude the introduction of evidence relating to the availability of state-provided special education. [103] In so holding, the court reversed the appellate court which found error in the trial court's decision to allow the defendant to cross-examine the plaintiff's expert about the existence of state - provided special education and therapy. The four person majority [104] of the Florida Supreme Court reasoned that the "collateral source rule should be limited to those benefits earned in some way [*716] by the plaintiff." [105] Building on this reasoning, the court found that "governmental or charitable benefits available to all citizens, regardless of wealth or status, should be admissible for the jury to consider in determining the reasonable cost of necessary future care." [106]

REV_00262689

Three dissenting justices voiced concern about the "speculative value of future public assistance." [107] The dissent further reasoned that "by denying the victim full compensation for the cost of future care, the majority opinion transfers the responsibility for the tort from the tortfeasor, where it legally and morally belongs, to the victim and the community." [108]

Recently, the Missouri Supreme Court, in Washington v. Barnes Hospital, unanimously followed the approach taken by the Florida Supreme Court. [109] In Barnes, the plaintiff brought a medical malpractice suit against defendant doctors and hospital for failure to diagnose her placental abruption which caused permanent brain damage to the fetus. At trial, the court denied the defendants' request to introduce evidence about the availability of free, public special education and therapies. [110] On appeal, the Missouri Supreme Court examined the various rationales advanced in support of the collateral source rule. [111] Finding these rationales inapplicable in the context of free, state-provided special education and therapy, the Missouri Supreme Court reversed the decision of the trial judge and held that the collateral source rule did not [*717] preclude introducing evidence of the availability of free, state-provided education and therapy offered to mitigate the plaintiff's damages. [112] Rather, the court held that the evidence was admissible [113] and that, at retrial, the plaintiffs would be entitled to "respond to this evidence with arguments of [the state-provided services'] inadequacy, the risk of its continued availability, etc." [114]

VI.

Analysis of the Justifications for the Application of the Collateral Source Rule to Free, State-Provided Special Education and Therapy

A rule of law is only valid to the extent that the application of the rule furthers the substantive polices which the rule embodies. [115] The simple fact that a common-law rule is firmly entrenched in our system cannot justify the application of that rule in situations where it loses touch with its traditional justifications. The application of the collateral source rule to prevent the admission of evidence of free, state-provided special education and therapy is a clear example of a situation in which a rule of law has been applied without regard to its origins and policies.

The benefit of the bargain rationale traditionally advanced in support of the collateral source rule [116] does not sustain the application of the rule to state-provided special education and therapy. Individuals do not contract with the state to provide special education and therapy in the event that such services become necessary. At most, a potential plaintiff may have contributed to the state special education system by paying taxes. [117] This form of indirect payment does not establish the same type of indemnity policy as the payment [*718] of medical or life insurance premiums. [118] Indeed, any payment of taxes in support of the state special education system does not raise the same concerns about protecting a plaintiff who has had the independent foresight to obtain some form of indemnity insurance in the event of tragedy. Thus, the failure to extend the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy does not undermine the socially beneficial goal of individually maintained private insurance policies. [119]

Similarly, the deterrence/windfall justification [120] for the collateral source rule offers no support for the application to state-provided special education and therapy. While the deterrent/windfall argument may have originally offered sound footing for the collateral source rule, [121] the tort system has undergone profound changes since the rule's inception. [122] The increase of liability insurance has decreased the importance of the deterrent goal of the tort system and given rise to a system that focuses on loss allocation. [123] When viewed from this perspective, the application of the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy places an extremely heavy burden on society. Under the modern tort system, a strong argument can be made that the collateral source rule's exclusion of evidence relating to the availability of free, state-provided special education and therapy results in higher costs to consumers. [124] Furthermore, the application of the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy may cause members of society to suffer yet an additional blow: even though the rule may allow an injured plaintiff to recover the full cost of his special education and therapy needs, members of society still may be forced to bear the cost of providing the injured plaintiff with special education and therapy if the [*719] plaintiff chooses to utilize the state-provided special education system. In this regard, the application of the collateral source rule to free, state-provided special education and therapy injects a societal cost into personal injury awards that far outweighs any possible deterrent effect the rule may have in the modern tort system. [125]

REV_00262690

Contending that juries will be confused by the introduction of state-provided special education and therapy evidence does not support arguments against the application of the rule. [126] Juries are already entrusted with the responsibility of considering extremely difficult and foreign evidence to reach their verdicts in a variety of complex cases. [127] The introduction of state- provided special education and therapy evidence would certainly not be any more confusing. Indeed, it could be argued that nothing could be more confusing than the approach under the traditional application of the collateral source rule because jurors know from their own life experience that the state provides free special education services - often services of considerable quantity and quality - to handicapped children and yet are not instructed how to deal with that knowledge in reaching the amount of their verdict.

Moreover, the contention that under our tort system a plaintiff never fully recovers for his injuries [128] also falls short of offering a sound justification for applying the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy. Certainly no amount of money can truly compensate a person for the loss of their mental or physical abilities, but that is just one of many harsh facts inherent in our tort system. It is a reflection of the limitations of a system in which the best that can be done is make a rough estimate of the plaintiff's injury and reduce that estimation to a money judgment. [129] Indeed, if no amount of money will ever compensate an injured plaintiff for the loss of mental or physical capacity, it is certainly difficult to quantify the degree to which the additional dollars provided by applying the collateral source rule assist in compensating an injured plaintiff. Thus, while perhaps offering the most emotionally appealing argument in favor of applying the collateral source rule to state-provided special education and therapy, the notion that an [*720] injured plaintiff is never fully compensated for his injuries fails to offer a principled basis for the rule's application. [130]

VII.

Proposal

None of the arguments commonly offered to justify the application of the collateral source rule supports the traditional application of the rule to free, state-provided special education and therapy. [131] While these arguments fail to support the traditional application of the collateral source rule, [132] the substantive component of the rule continues to have merit. The substantive component reflects a principle which should be maintained when considering the award of damages to a plaintiff requiring special education and therapy (i.e., a defendant should never be allowed to summarily deduct from the plaintiff's damages the amount that the plaintiff receives in compensation for her injuries from outside sources). [133] In light of the importance of this principle, an approach which precludes the summary reduction of the plaintiff's damages based on the availability of free, state-provided special education and therapy yet allows for the introduction of evidence relating to both the existence and quality of the state-provided services, not only meets the needs of an injured plaintiff, but also addresses the concerns of a society and a judicial system attempting to reach a just award of damages for a plaintiff in need of special education and therapy.

REV_00262691

In terms of educational expenditures, a severely injured plaintiff requires an award of damages which allows her to obtain the special education and therapy that she requires. An approach to state-provided special education and therapy which prevents the summary reduction from the plaintiff's damages to account for the availability of free, state-provided special education and therapy, yet allows for the introduction of evidence relating to the existence and quality of the state-provided services, ensures that this need is fulfilled. The prohibition against the summary reduction of the plaintiff's damage award prevents forcing the plaintiff to use the state-provided services if those services will not satisfy her needs. [134] In a similar fashion, under this approach, [*721] the plaintiff will provide the jury with a range of evidence relating to the state-provided services, including any evidence that these services will not fulfill her needs. [135] All of the information that the plaintiff provides to the jury will assist the plaintiff to obtain an award which accurately assesses her special education needs.

In the context of a plaintiff in need of special education and therapy, society is primarily concerned with providing her with appropriate services at an appropriate overall cost. An approach which prevents a summary deduction from the plaintiff's damage award, yet allows for the full and complete introduction of evidence relating to state-provided services, fosters this goal. First, the prohibition against summary reduction prevents a plaintiff from being denied access to appropriate services. [136] Second, if the jury concludes that the state-provided services meet the plaintiff's needs, then the plaintiff's damage award could be adjusted accordingly. Under modern theories of loss shifting, [137] reducing the plaintiff's award would prevent society from paying twice for the special education services it provides: once in the form of taxes [138] and again in the form of higher consumer prices. [139] Thus, society is able to fulfill efficiently the plaintiff's special education [*722] needs while avoiding duplicate costs.

Similarly, the judicial system's goal of accurately assessing the injured plaintiff's special education needs to establish just and fair compensation is satisfied by an approach that bars summary reduction of the plaintiff's damages and encourages introducing a range of state-provided services evidence. An approach which prevents the summary reduction of a plaintiff's damage award to account for the existence of free, state-provided special education and therapy promotes a judicial system which avoids arbitrary results. Indeed, under this approach, instead of automatically deducting the value of the state-provided services from the plaintiff's damage award, the court considers a range of evidence relating to the state-provided services and is able to make an informed decision. The ability to make an informed decision in light of all relevant evidence, including evidence of free, state-provided services, enables the court to make an accurate assessment of the plaintiff's true special education needs. The ability to make an accurate assessment of the plaintiff's needs avoids overcompensation and assists the court in establishing a just and fair result.

VIII.

Conclusion

In its traditional form, the collateral source rule should not be applied to free, state-provided special education and therapy. However, an approach which preserves the substantive component of the rule - preventing the summary reduction of the plaintiff's damage award, but also promoting the full introduction of evidence relating to the state-provided services -

REV_00262692

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Tort Reform Articles] [6]

OA/NARA#: 1646/1514
9597

Box 59
Folder 4

REV_00262709

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*53 Ohio St. L.J. 587, **

Copyright (c) 1992 Ohio State Law Journal
Ohio State Law Journal

Spring, 1992

53 Ohio St. L.J. 587

LENGTH: 13226 words

NOTE: The Constitutionality of Offsetting Collateral Benefits Under Ohio Revised Code Section 2317.45.

Julie A. Schafer

SUMMARY:
... Beginning in the early 1980s a number of state legislatures, having perceived a "crisis" in the insurance industry, enacted statutes that limited the amount of damages a plaintiff could recover in a tort action. ... Although an insurance crisis certainly was a motivating force, at least in Ohio there was a concern over the plaintiffs who, under the collateral source rule, were receiving a double recovery. ... The fact that the source of the collateral benefit in this case was workers' compensation buttressed the court's statement that "[p]ayments made under Ohio Workers' Compensation Program are not, and were never meant to be complete compensation for an injured employee. ... Attention must also be paid to the trend in most states toward limiting tort liability, either through damage caps or through abrogation of the collateral source rule. ... The most compelling argument made by the common pleas court in Cook is that workers' compensation did not adequately compensate the victim for his injury. ... The prevalence of statutes limiting liability in all types of tort actions indicates that the abrogation of the collateral source rule will continue. ... If the goal of tort law is primarily to compensate the injured victim, then the elimination of the collateral source rule may serve this purpose more effectively than damage caps. ...

TEXT:

[*587] I. INTRODUCTION

Beginning in the early 1980s a number of state legislatures, having perceived a "crisis" in the insurance industry, enacted statutes that limited the amount of damages a plaintiff could recover in a tort action. [1] These statutes took a number of forms, including caps on noneconomic damages, the elimination of joint and several liability, and the elimination of the collateral source rule. [2]

The primary focus of this Note is upon the theories that underlie the abrogation of the collateral source rule. This analysis will center upon a critique of Ohio's statutory elimination of the collateral source rule, as well as the various legislative modifications of the collateral source rule undertaken in other states.

Part II discusses the general theories behind liability caps. Part III analyzes the history of the

REV_00262710

The court also held that the post-verdict proceeding to determine collateral benefits controls the amount that should be offset. According to the court, "it does not matter whether the jury was aware of the medical expenses in order [*606] for them to be deductible. . . . [T]he collateral benefits adjustment is a post verdict adjustment. It is a proceeding wherein additional evidence can be taken, but wherein a jury is not involved." [85]

4. Sorrell v. Thevenir

In January 1991, the Ohio Court of Common Please for Gallia County held that section 2317.45 was unconstitutional. [86] The case currently is on appeal before the Ohio Court of Appeals for the Fourth District. [87] The lower court, concluded that "it is absurd to finance the tortious conduct of the defendant by appropriations from the Workers' Compensation system. Plaintiff's employer did not cause her injury but yet it is his premium that may be increased because of defendant's conduct." [88] The lower court held that section 2317.45 was unconstitutional because it violates the right to a jury trial, the right to a remedy found in the Ohio Constitution, and the right to due process under the Fourteenth Amendment and under the Ohio Constitution. [89]

The facts of Sorrell illustrate the hardship that section 2317.45 can cause; whether that hardship justifies a finding of unconstitutionality is another issue entirely. In Sorrell, the plaintiff, a convenience store employee, successfully sued a customer who allegedly injured her during one of his frequent visits to the store. [90] The jury awarded the plaintiff $ 10,128.26 in damages, $ 5,128.26 allocated to lost wages and medical benefits, and $ 5,000 for pain and suffering. [91] The plaintiff had received $ 10,906.96 of workers' compensation benefits, and an additional $ 3,428.26 paid by the workers' compensation fund to the plaintiff's doctor. [92] The defendant argued that this amount should be offset from the jury award, thereby leaving the plaintiff with no recovery from the defendant. [93]

[*607] On appeal, both the plaintiff and the defendant essentially put forth the arguments presented in the Cook case. [94] Hopefully, the court of appeals will reverse the lower court's decision in Sorrell just as the court of appeals did in Cook.

C. Analysis

The court of common pleas in Cook identified a number of inconsistencies in the collateral benefits statute; none of these inconsistencies alone, however, justified holding section 2317.45 unconstitutional. By stretching each inconsistency to its extreme, the lower court found no reasonable basis for the statute. The court of appeals properly reversed the lower court's decision. Hopefully, courts in other districts will follow the lead established in Cook.

The court of appeals decision in Cook was correct for a number of reasons. First, although there may be some evidence that the insurance industry concocted an insurance crisis in order to push H.B. 1 through the Ohio legislature, there is an abundance of evidence that such a crisis did indeed exist. [95] In addition, there is strong evidence that a primary purpose of the statute is to prevent the plaintiff from receiving a double recovery. [96] This interest is independent of the insurance issue, and may instead suggest that the legislature is more concerned about other aspects of tort liability. According to one commentator,

Tort scholars suggest that three of the tort system's primary objectives are promoting justice, deterring potentially injurious activities, and compensating accident victims. Although the justice and deterrence objectives often require the same outcomes, the compensation objective may require an outcome inconsistent with the other two goals. This potential inconsistency, coupled with the tort system's poor design for adequately compensating victims, suggests that compensation is at most a subsidiary goal of tort law, and perhaps is merely a means of fulfilling the justice and deterrence objectives. [97]

Consequently, even though some evidence may arguably suggest that the insurance situation in Ohio was not of crisis proportions, other legitimate reasons remain for eliminating the collateral source rule. [98]

REV_00262719

[*608] Attention must also be paid to the trend in most states toward limiting tort liability, either through damage caps or through abrogation of the collateral source rule. This reform is not limited to the medical malpractice area. By 1990, as many as ten states had altered the traditional collateral source rule. [99]

Neither court in Cook mentioned another Ohio statute that provides for the offsetting of collateral benefits against a political subdivision. This statute, Ohio Revised Code section 2744.05, provides that "[i]f a claimant receives or is entitled to receive benefits for injuries or loss allegedly incurred from a policy or policies of insurance or any other source, the benefits shall be disclosed to the court, and the amount of the benefits shall be deducted from any award against a political subdivision recovered by that claimant." [100]

The Ohio Supreme Court has held that this statute is constitutional. [101] The court rejected an equal protection challenge, and applied rational basis review. [102] Given that the two other Ohio statutes that provide for a deduction of collateral benefits have survived equal protection scrutiny, it is likely that the third statute will be upheld as well.

The most compelling argument made by the common pleas court in Cook is that workers' compensation did not adequately compensate the victim for his injury. This argument parallels the earlier discussion concerning whether workers' compensation benefits could legitimately be deducted from an award for emotional pain and suffering. Although this argument may be persuasive in the appropriate case, the jury verdict in Cook illustrates that this is not a concern here. The jury verdict form is reproduced below:

(A) State the total amount of compensatory damages, past and future, to the Plaintiffs.

STATE YOUR ANSWERS IN FIGURES IN INK $ 400,000.00

(B) What portion of your answer to Interrogatory (A) is past damages, if any, to the Plaintiffs?

STATE YOUR ANSWERS IN FIGURES IN INK $ 34,000.00

(C) What portion of your answer to Interrogatory (A) is future damages, if any, to the Plaintiffs?

STATE YOUR ANSWERS IN FIGURES IN INK $ 366,000.00

IF YOU FIND THAT THERE ARE FUTURE DAMAGES, MOVE TO INTERROGATORY (D). IF YOU FIND THAT THERE ARE NO [*609] FUTURE DAMAGES, DO NOT ANSWER THE REMAINING QUESTIONS

(D) What are the portions of the future damages shown in your answer to Interrogatory (C) that fall into the following:

(1) Future economic loss $ 366,000.00

(2) Future noneconomic loss

THE TOTAL OF THESE TWO AMOUNTS MUST EQUAL YOUR ANSWER TO INTERROGATORY (C)

(E) What are the portions, if any, of future economic loss shown in your answer to Interrogatory (D)(1), if any, that fall into the following:

REV_00262720

(1) Wages, salaries or other lost compensation (earning capacity) (fringe benefits) $ 300,000.00

(2) (Expenditures) (expenses) (costs) for medical care or treatment, rehabilitation services, or other care, treatment, services, products, or accommodations $ 66,000.00

(3) Any other (expenditures) (expenses) (costs) brought on by injury to person

THE TOTAL OF FUTURE ECONOMIC LOSS MUST EQUAL YOUR ANSWER TO INTERROGATORY (D)(1). [103]

As the jury verdict form shows under (E)(1), the amount of wages, salaries, or other lost compensation totaled $ 300,000, and the costs for medical care or treatment totaled $ 66,000. The workers' compensation benefits in this case compensated the victim for precisely the type of harm that the jury deemed should be compensated. Therefore, the common pleas court's comments concerning inadequate compensation of an injured party who receives workers' compensation are inapplicable to the present case. [104]

V. CONCLUSION

The prevalence of statutes limiting liability in all types of tort actions indicates that the abrogation of the collateral source rule will continue. At least ten states have modified the collateral source rule either for medical malpractice actions or for personal injury actions. [105] Despite the argument that these statutes deprive a plaintiff of a full recovery while granting the defendant a windfall, these statutes allow a jury to determine the total compensation to which the plaintiff is entitled. The plaintiff then receives this amount -- although he may not receive the entire amount from the defendant -- and he may receive [*610] the amount over a period of years, but the plaintiff does receive the amount his injury is deemed to be worth. Damage caps, on the other hand, limit compensation to the statutory amount, regardless of the "true" value of the injury. If the goal of tort law is primarily to compensate the injured victim, then the elimination of the collateral source rule may serve this purpose more effectively than damage caps.

Ohio's latest modification of the collateral source rule, when considered with its provisions for medical malpractice actions and actions against political subdivisions, essentially abolishes the collateral source rule. Section 2317.45 is quite thorough in defining what types of benefits qualify as offsetting collateral benefits. The statute is much less clear concerning the procedures to enforce and review the disclosures made by the plaintiff. Section 2317.45, unlike some other statutes, defines the time period in which collateral benefits must be disclosed. Given the long time span covered by the statute, defendants need an opportunity to verify the accuracy of the collateral benefits, and to obtain review during the five-year period following the entry of judgment.

The injustice of offsetting workers' compensation benefits, thereby creating a windfall for a defendant, could be remedied by explicitly excluding workers' compensation benefits from the provisions of the statute, or by providing a statutory right of subrogation for workers' compensation benefits.

The Ohio legislature may wish to avoid the problem of attorneys' fees by amending the statute to include terms similar to Alaska's statute, [106] requiring the court to award costs and attorneys' fees before evidence of collateral benefits may be introduced. This would eliminate one of the strong incentives parties may have to continue litigating.

Until the Ohio Supreme Court decides the constitutionality of section 2317.45, the statute likely will be challenged throughout the state. Given the earlier decisions by the supreme court, which permit the offsetting of collateral benefits in medical malpractice actions, it seems unlikely that the court would not permit offsetting of collateral benefits in other actions. The supreme court may be concerned that an injured plaintiff in a workers' compensation case could be denied a pain and suffering recovery. Rather than strike the entire statute, the court could require that, in order for the statute to apply, the jury's verdict must be divided into separate damage amounts. In that way, it would be clear whether the plaintiff was receiving a double recovery.

REV_00262721

As a whole, section 2317.45 is a reasonable statute. Those who oppose the statute argue that the insurance crisis is a result not entirely of large verdicts, but of attorneys and insurance companies. [107] Even if this is true, this does not justify overturning section 2317.45. Instead, other statutes should be passed to deal with all of the forces that push insurance rates unreasonably high. The [*611] workers' compensation bureau and other administrative agencies that also battle rising costs can remedy the perceived unfairness of section 2317.45 by providing for subrogation rights. By doing so, these agencies would fall outside of the statute. Rather than overrule one important attempt to contain rising insurance costs, the courts and the legislature should resolve some of the finer details of section 2317.45, and concentrate upon containing costs in other areas.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See Ruth Gastel, The Civil Justice System, INSURANCE INFORMATION INSTITUTE (Feb. 1991); Linda J. Gobis, Note, Lambert V. Wrensch: Another Step Toward Abrogation of the Collateral Source Rule in Wisconsin, 1988 WIS. L. REV. 857 (1988); Amanda E. Haiduc, Note, The Tale of Three Damage Caps: Too Much Too Little and Finally Just Right, 40 CASE W. RES. L. REV. 825 (1990); L. Timothy Perrin, Comment, The Collateral Source Rule in Texas: Its Impending Demise and a Proposed Modification, 18 TEX. TECH L. REV. 961 (1987); see generally Ralph D. Gaines Jr. & William K. Hancock, Tort Reform in Alabama: A Proponent's Perspective, 18 CUMB. L. REV. 649 (1988); Perry Pazer & Tim Hogan, The New Collateral Source Rule: Is It Constitutional?, 18 TRIAL L. Q. 9 (1987).

n2 See sources cited supra note 1.

n3 Haiduc, supra note 1, at 825. See generally Ruth Gastel, Medical Malpractice, INSURANCE INFORMATION INSTITUTE (Feb. 1991).

n4 See Haiduc, supra note 1, at 825; Gastel, supra note 3.

n5 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2307.43 (Baldwin 1990). In August, 1991, the Ohio Supreme Court held that section 2307.43 was unconstitutional. Morris v. Savoy, 576 N.E.2d 765 (Ohio 1991).

n6 Nancy L. Manzer, Note, 1986 Tort Reform Legislation: A Systematic Evaluation of Caps on Damages and Limitations on Joint and Several Liability, 73 CORNELL L. REV. 628, 628 (1988). Some writers blame attorneys for the rising costs of insurance. See Dennis McLellan, Surfeit of Civil Suits is a Crime, Advocate of Tort Reform Says, L.A. TIMES, Aug. 15, 1990, at E1 (Orange County ed.). In this article, McLellan discusses a recent book by Robert V. Wills, entitled "Why Lawyers are Killing America." Id. Wills blames the rise in litigation for the spiraling costs of liability insurance. Id. Another author writes that "[t]he courts, insurance carriers and defense lawyers are the three main culprits in rising insurance defense costs," which translates into higher overall insurance rates. Defense Lawyer Fingers Culprits in Cost Spiral, THE NATIONAL UNDERWRITER COMPANY PROPERTY & CASUALTY/EMPLOYEE BENEFITS Edition 26 (Nov. 19, 1990).

n7 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. §§ 2305.27, 2743.02, 2317.45 (Baldwin 1990).

n8 STANTON DARLING, OHIO CIVIL JUSTICE REFORM ACT (1987). The Sixth Circuit agreed that the state legislature intended to prevent double recoveries with section 2317.45.

The purpose of the Ohio law . . . seems to be to prevent injured plaintiffs from receiving a windfall due to their injury. The statute requires that damage awards be adjusted for collateral benefits received as a result of . . . the injury so that a plaintiff will receive, in total, only the amount that a jury has determined to be adequate compensation for the particular injury.

REV_00262722

Baker v. Goldblatt, No. 91-3508, 1992 WL 12679, at *5 (6th Cir. Jan. 30, 1992).

n9 DARLING, supra note 8, at 3.

n10 Id.

n11 Perrin, supra note 1, at 961.

n12 Id. at 966.

n13 Id. at 983.

n14 Joseph F. Cunningham, Collateral Source: Double Judgment or Double Trouble, 9 DISTRICT LAW 34, 35 (1985).

n15 Gobis, supra note 1, at 860-61.

n16 263 N.E.2d 235 (Ohio 1970).

n17 Id. at 239.

n18 Id.

n19 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45 (Baldwin 1990).

n20 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(1). The relevant sections of the statute are reproduced below:

(A)(1) As used in this section:

(a) "Collateral benefits" means benefits that a plaintiff has received, or may be entitled to receive within the next sixty months after the entry of judgment, as a result of an injury, death, or loss to person or property that is a subject of a tort action, from any of the following:

(i) The government of the United States, or any state or any political subdivision of any state, under a program that provides medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health benefits, including, but not limited to, social security, medicare, or medicaid;

(ii) A federal, state, or political subdivision of a state disability income or workers' compensation program, or a wage continuation program of an employer;

(iii) A medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health insurance program;

(iv) An accident insurance program that provides medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health benefits;

(v) A contract or agreement under which medical, hospital, sickness, dental, or other health services are provided or under which the cost of those services are paid for or reimbursed.

(b) "Rights of recoupment" means rights or [sic] recoupment through subrogation, trust agreement, contract, lien, operation of law, or otherwise.

REV_00262723

(c) "Tort action" means a civil action for damages for injury, death, or loss to person or property. "Tort action" includes a product liability claim that is subject to sections 2307.71 to 2307.80 of the Revised Code, but does not include a civil action for damages for a breach of contract or another agreement between persons.

(d) "Trier of fact" means the jury or, in a nonjury action, the court.

(2) As used in this division and divisions (B)(2)(a) and (c)(i) of this section, "plaintiff" includes, in a wrongful death action, the decedent and all beneficiaries of the action.

(B)(1) Except as provided in division (C) of this section, if a plaintiff in a tort action is entitled to an award of compensatory damages, that plaintiff shall disclose to the court after such entitlement is determined all relevant collateral benefits, all rights of recoupment relative to the disclosed collateral benefits, and the costs, premiums, or charges for any of the disclosed collateral benefits paid or contributed within the three-year period immediately preceding the accrual of the cause of action, by the plaintiff, any member of his immediate family, or the employer of the plaintiff or any member of his immediate family or, in a wrongful death action, the decedent, any beneficiary of the action, the employer of the decedent or any beneficiary of the action, any member of the immediate family of the decedent or any such beneficiary, or the employer of any member of the immediate family of the decedent or any such beneficiary.

n21 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(2). The full text of this subsection reads as follows:

(B)(2) Upon the disclosure required by division (B)(1) of this section, the court shall do all of the following:

(a) Determine whether both of the following are satisfied in relation to any of the disclosed collateral benefits:

(i) The plaintiff has received the disclosed collateral benefit or is reasonably certain to receive it within the next sixty months after the entry of judgment;

(ii) There are no rights of recoupment respecting the disclosed collateral benefit.

n22 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(2)(b). The full text of this subsection reads as follows:

(b) As to any disclosed collateral benefits in relation to which both requirements of division (B)(2)(a) of this section are satisfied, determine the total of the costs, premiums, or charges for such benefits paid or contributed within the three-year period immediately preceding the accrual of the cause of action, by the plaintiff, any member of his immediate family, or the employer of the plaintiff or any member of his immediate family or, in a wrongful death action, the decedent, any beneficiary of the action, the employer of the decedent or any beneficiary of the action, any member of the immediate family of the decedent or any such beneficiary, or the employer of any member of the immediate family of the decedent or any such beneficiary[.]

Two federal courts recently interpreted this subsection. In Deaton v. Dreis and Krump Manufacturing Co., 134 F.R.D. 219 (N.D. Ohio 1991), the district court held that in determining the amount of workers' compensation premiums paid by the employer that will be added back to the jury award, the employer's contribution is not limited to the amount paid on behalf of the particular employee. Id. at 225. That is, although the employer had paid only $ 5.27 in workers' compensation premiums for the plaintiff-employee, the court added back to the plaintiff's award the total amount of workers' compensation benefits the employer paid during the three years prior to the plaintiff's injury. Id. In this case, the employee had received $ 11,618.64 in workers' compensation, and the employer had paid $ 15,624 in premiums. Id. at 225. Therefore, the court concluded that the plaintiff's workers' compensation "which the statute requires be deducted from the verdict, is entirely offset by his employer's contribution." Id.

The Sixth Circuit disagreed with this interpretation in Baker v. Goldblatt, No. 91-3508, 1992 WL 12679 (6th Cir. Jan. 30, 1992). According to the court, "collateral benefits received by a plaintiff should be adjusted only by that portion of en employer's workers' compensation premiums directly related to the employment fo the particular plaintiff." Id. at *4.

n23 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(2)(c). The full text of this subsection reads as follows:

(c) Prior to entering judgment for the plaintiff, do both of the following:

(i) Subtract from the compensatory damages that the plaintiff otherwise would be awarded the amount of any disclosed collateral benefits in relation to which both requirements of division (B)(2)(a) of this section are satisfied;

(ii) Subject to the limitation specified in this division, add to the balance derived under division (B)(2)(c)(i) of this section the total of any costs, premiums, and charges described in division (B)(2)(b) of this section. The amount of those costs, premiums, and charges that is added to that balance shall not exceed any amount subtracted pursuant to division (B)(2)(c)(i) of this section from the compensatory damages that the plaintiff otherwise would be awarded.

An example of how this would operate is as follows: Suppose that the jury renders a verdict for the plaintiff for compensatory damages in the amount of $ 10,000.00. Based upon evidence presented by the defendant, the judge determines that the plaintiff is entitled to collateral benefits from her insurance company of $ 6,000.00. The judge then subtracts the $ 6,000.00 of collateral benefits from the jury award for compensatory damages, which leaves the plaintiff with a $ 4,000.00 recovery. However, because the plaintiff paid $ 1,000.00 in premiums for the insurance coverage she received, the court adds this $ 1,000.00 to the $ 4,000.00 recovery. The result is that the plaintiff is entitled to receive $ 5,000.00 from the defendant.

n24 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(3). The full text of this subsection reads as follows:

(3) Except as provided in division (B)(1) of this section, in another section of the Revised Code, or in the Rules of Evidence, evidence of collateral benefits is not admissible in a tort action and shall not be submitted to or considered by the trier of fact in determining whether to award compensatory damages to a plaintiff in a tort action or in determining the amount of any such damages.

n25 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(1), (B)(2). Ohio's statute is unique with respect to the duration of its disclosure requirements. See, e.g., CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 52-225a (West 1990) (providing that benefits up to the date of judgment may be deducted). See also MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. § 600.6303 (West 1990) (Court must first determine that there is a previously existing contractual or statutory obligation on the part of the collateral source to pay the benefits before they may be deducted).

n26 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2317.45(B)(2)(a)(i).

n27 22 AM. JUR. 2D Damages § 23 (1988). Black's Law Dictionary defines compensatory damages as "such as will compensate the injured party for the injury sustained, and nothing more; such as will simply make good or replace the loss caused by the wrong or injury." BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 390 (6th ed. 1990). Dan Dobbs writes that "[t]he damages award is substitutionary relief, that is, it gives the plaintiff money mainly by way of compensation, to make up for some loss that was not, originally, a money loss, but one that ordinarily may be measured in money." DAN DOBBS, REMEDIES 135 (1973).

REV_00262725

n28 In Ohio, workers' compensation legislation became effective in 1913. See OHIO REV. CODE ANN. §§ 4123.01-4123.99 (Baldwin 1990). The Ohio Constitution mandates the establishment of workers' compensation by employers. OHIO CONST. art. II, § 35. There is no right of subrogation included in the workers' compensation statutes, which means that an employee who receives workers' compensation benefits will fall within the scope of § 2317.45.

n29 81 AM. JUR. 2D Workmen's Compensation §§ 1-3 (1976).

n30 Id. at § 2.

n31 Ohio Manufacturers' Association, THE FACTS ABOUT WHY OHIO NEEDS TOTAL REFORM FOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION 7 (Fall/1985 Reform Proposal).

Workers' Compensation rests upon the economic principle that those persons who enjoy the product of a business -- whether it be in the form of goods or services -- should ultimately bear the cost of the injuries or deaths that are incident to the manufacture, preparation and distribution of the product. . . . If the cost is a predictable incident of the operation, sound business judgment demands that it be included as an element of the price.

WEX S. MALONE, ET. AL., CASES AND MATERIALS ON WORKERS' COMPENSATION AND EMPLOYMENT RIGHTS 39 (1980).

n32 See OHIO REV. CODE ANN. §§ 2317.45(B)(1), (B)(2)(c)(i).

n33 ALASKA STAT. § 09.17.070 (1990).

n34 See supra note 31.

n35 Perrin, supra note 1, at 991. Subrogation is "the substitution of one person in the place of another with reference to a lawful claim or right. . . . It is the machinery by which the equities of one man are worked out through the legal rights of another." 73 AM. JUR. 2D § 1 (1974). Conceptually, subrogation resembles other equitable doctrines which are designed to prevent unjust enrichment. "[Subrogation] is not an absolute right, but one which depends on the equities and attending facts and circumstances of each case." Id. at § 11. The factors to consider when determining whether a right of subrogation exists include: the secondary liability of the person claiming subrogation rights, or "the necessity of acting to protect his own interests, or . . . an agreement that he is to have security." Id.

n36 Morris v. Savoy, 576 N.E.2d 765 (Ohio 1991).

n37 Id. at 772.

n38 Id.

n39 Id. at 773.

n40 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. 14841, 1991 WL 131485 (Ohio Ct. App., Summit Cty. July 17, 1991).

n41 Id. at *1.

REV_00262726

n42 Id.

n43 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. CV88 08 2737, 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *5. (Summit Cty. Oct. 8, 1990). Although the analysis of section 2317.45 is quite extensive, it is important to note that the judge adopted plaintiffs' brief, and incorporated it, verbatim, as the opinion of the court.

n44 Id. at *6. Although the research in the plaintiff's brief cites research to the contrary, there is an abundance of literature which cites a litigation explosion as a primary cause of rising insurance rates. See sources cited supra note 1.

n45 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *6.

n46 Id.

n47 Id. at *6-7.

n48 Id. at *8-9. What is noticeably absent from the court's opinion is a discussion of the legislature's response to the insurance crisis in Ohio. Also absent from the court's analysis was a discussion of the widespread trends in other states which limited recoveries in tort actions. See supra notes 1-6.

n49 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., 1991 WL 131485, at *4 (Ohio Ct. App Summit Cty. July 17, 1991).

n50 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *11. See OHIO CONST. art. I, § 5.

n51 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *11.

n52 Id. at *13.

n53 Id. at *13-14. Although this analogy has some merit, arguably the true effect of the statute is to achieve an equitable apportionment of damages; this is the crucial difference between remittitur and section 2317.45. Remittitur occurs "[i]f money damages awarded by a jury are grossly excessive as a matter of law, [whereupon] the judge may order the plaintiff to remit a portion of the award." BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 1295 (6th ed. 1990). In contrast, the judge's deduction of collateral benefits under section 2317.45 is not based upon the assumption that the jury's award was excessive. Instead, the deduction is based upon the realization that the plaintiff's recovery was excessive. Under section 2317.45, the injured party still receives the compensation awarded by the jury. If remittitur were applied, the total recovery to which the injured party is deemed entitled would be reduced.

n54 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *15.

n55 Id.

n56 Id. at *16.

n57 Id. at *16-17. This particular comment suggests that because the benefits are deducted from what a defendant otherwise would pay, justice was not achieved. Such a position ignores one of the primary goals of tort law: to compensate the injured party. This argument perhaps would be more persuasive in the criminal context where there are multiple purposes to be served by the judicial system. See generally SANFORD H. KADISH & STEPHEN J. SCHULHOFER, CRIMINAL LAW AND ITS PROCESSES (1989).

n58 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. 14841, 1991 WL 131485, *5 (Ohio Ct. App. Summit Cty. July 17, 1991).

REV_00262727

n59 OHIO CONST. art. 1, § 16.

n60 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *20.

n61 1991 WL 131485 at *5-6.

n62 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. CV88 08 2737, 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *24 (Summit Cty. Oct. 8, 1990).

n63 The statute violated due process under both the Ohio Constitution and the United States Constitution. U.S. CONST. amend. XIV., OHIO CONST. art. I, § 16.

n64 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *33.

n65 Id.

n66 Id. at *34-35.

n67 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. 14841, 1991 WL 131485 at *7 (Ohio Ct. App. Summit Cty. July 17, 1991).

n68 Id.

n69 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *42-43.

n70 Id. at *43. According to the court, "heightened rational basis" could be applied to the statute if an "important" rather than a "fundamental" right is infringed. Id. at *46-47.

n71 Morris v. Savoy, 576 N.E.2d 765 (Ohio 1991).

n72 Id. at 772.

n73 Id.

n74 Jeffers v. Phillips Ready Mix, No. 90 CA 0057, 1991 Ohio App. LEXIS 50 (Greene Cty. Jan 8, 1991). The court makes no reference to the Cook decision. It appears that the constitutionality of section 2317.45 was not challenged.

n75 Id. at *1.

n76 Id.

n77 Id.

n78 Id. These collateral benefits were from workers' compensation. Id. This case is similar to Cook in that the plaintiffs received workers' compensation even though the employer had no responsibility for plaintiffs' injuries, yet the plaintiffs also received jury awards from defendants.

n79 Id. at *3.

n80 Id. at *4-5. Essentially, plaintiff is arguing that workers' compensation did not compensate him for this future pain and suffering, and therefore that this amount should not be deducted. See supra notes 28-32 and accompanying text.

REV_00262728

collateral source rule, and Part IV examines the statutory elimination of the collateral source rule in Ohio and the accompanying case law. Part V suggests some improvements to the current Ohio statute.

II. PURPOSE OF LIABILITY CAPS

Much of the motivating force behind the enactment of liability caps came from a dramatic increase in medical malpractice litigation across several states. [3] Studies in these states concluded that because of the high dollar recoveries by plaintiffs in medical malpractice actions, insurance coverage was growing prohibitively expensive for a large portion of the population. [4] Consequently, [*588] state legislatures enacted laws to limit plaintiffs' recovery of damages, particularly punitive damages. Ohio is among those states. [5]

While much of the emphasis in tort reform was upon controlling the rising cost of medical insurance, in large part due to high malpractice verdicts, there also was a concern about rising insurance rates in other highly litigious areas. One commentator suggested that in addition to rising insurance costs, state legislatures increasingly believed that the judicial system was not working efficiently and therefore that some sort of statutory damage limitation was necessary. "Although the 'insurance crisis' was the most widely publicized factor that led states to adopt tort reform measures, the state legislatures also were responding to scholarship indicating that the tort system failed to achieve its compensatory objectives and therefore should be substantially modified or even eliminated." [6]

This perceived crisis in insurance led many states, including Ohio, to abolish the collateral source rule altogether. Ohio enacted statutes to eliminate the collateral source rule first for medical malpractice claims and for claims regarding political subdivision immunity, and then for general negligence claims. [7] Although an insurance crisis certainly was a motivating force, at least in Ohio there was a concern over the plaintiffs who, under the collateral source rule, were receiving a double recovery. [8] According to the author of Ohio's [*589] most recent statute abolishing the collateral source rule, the primary purpose of the statute is to prevent an injured party from receiving a double recovery. [9] The author noted previous legislative attempts to reduce awards by collateral benefits, including Ohio Revised Code section 2305.27, which applies to medical malpractice actions. [10]

III. HISTORY OF THE COLLATERAL SOURCE RULE

Before addressing the specifics of the statutory modifications of the collateral source rule, it first seems appropriate to consider the rule's long history. The rule has both an evidentiary and a damage component. As one commentator explains, "[a]s a rule of evidence, it precludes introduction into evidence of any benefits the plaintiff obtained from sources collateral to the defendant. As a rule of damages, it forces the defendant to pay for the entire loss he caused despite independent recoveries by the plaintiff for the same loss." [11]

One popular justification for the collateral source rule is that the defendant should not benefit from his wrongful conduct. [12] Other justifications are that "the plaintiff should retain any benefit he obtained on his own or which was intended for him alone, and . . . the defendant should not benefit from plaintiff's receipt of compensation from sources independent of the defendant." [13]

Another commentator stated that "[i]t is considered better that an injured party receive double recovery than that a wrongdoer be relieved of liability for damages, especially since one purpose of accessing [sic] damages is to deter negligent conduct and encourage due care in the future." [14] However, another writer recognized that:

The collateral source rule has evolved from opposing principles of tort law. First, the rule conflicts with the compensatory function of tort law. Full compensation is provided when the plaintiff is restored to the position he or she occupied before the tort occurred. If a plaintiff n81 1991 Ohio App. LEXIS 50, at *6. This argument actually presents the opposite of what is discussed earlier. See supra notes 25-26 and accompanying text. That is, it seemed that one of the problems with section 2317.45 is that the defendant would have to rely upon the plaintiff's disclosure of collateral benefits. In this case, however, the plaintiff did not inform the jury of all his medical expenses, and the defendant had evidence of benefits which exceed these disclosed expenses. In other words, the plaintiff has to be careful to inform the jury of all expenses, because he will be held accountable for all of the benefits, even if the jury was underinformed.

REV_00262711

n82 1991 Ohio App. LEXIS 50, at *4.

n83 Id.

n84 Id. at *5. By holding this way, the court does overlook one of the purposes of section 2317.45: to prevent a double recovery.

n85 Id. at *6. Although the court does not explicitly say so, it appears that plaintiffs' argument in Cook that section 2317.45 deprived them of a jury trial had little merit in this court. See supra notes 50-58 and accompanying text.

n86 Sorrell v. Thevenir, slip op., No. 89 CL 121 (Ohio Ct. C.P. Gallia County Jan. 14, 1991).

n87 See Defendant's Notice of Appeal in the appendix to Defendant-Appellant's Brief at i, Sorrell (No. 91-CA04).

n88 Sorrell, slip. op. No. 89 CL 121, at 9.

n89 Id. at 5-12.

n90 Id. at 1.

n91 Id. at 2.

n92 Defendant-Appellant's Brief at 1-2, Sorrell (No. 91-CA-4).

n93 Id. at 2.

n94 See Defendant-Appellant's Brief, Sorrell (No. 91-CA04); Plaintiffs-Appellees Brief, Sorrell (No. 91-CA-4). See also supra notes 40-70 and accompanying text.

n95 See supra notes 8-9 and accompanying text. See generally PETER W. HUBER, LIABILITY (1988). Huber writes eloquently of the insurance crisis that spread across the United States over the past two decades.

n96 See supra note 8 and accompanying text.

n97 Id.

n98 See supra notes 96-97 and accompanying text.

n99 See ALASKÅ STAT. §§ 09.17.070 (1989), 09.55.548 (Supp. 1986); ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 12-565 (1989); CAL. CIV. CODE § 333.1 (West 1990); CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 52-225a (West 1990); FLA. STAT. ANN. § 768.76 (West 1990); IND. CODE ANN. § 34-4-36-2 (West 1990); MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. § 600.6303 (West 1990); MINN. STAT. § 548.36 (1990); OR. REV. STAT. § 18.580 (1989); UTAH CODE ANN. § 78-14-4.5 (1990).

n100 OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2744.05 (Baldwin 1990).

REV_00262729

n101 Menefee v. Queen City Metro, 550 N.E.2d 181 (Ohio 1990).

n102 See id.

n103 Cook v. Wineberry Deli, Inc., No. CV88 08 2737, 1990 Ohio Misc. LEXIS 6, at *55-56 (Summit Cty. Oct. 8, 1990).

n104 See supra notes 55-56 and accompanying text. The court in Jeffers alluded to the potential unfairness of deducting benefits that had not already compensated the injured party. See supra note 84 and accompanying text.

n105 See supra note 99 and accompanying text.

n106 See supra note 33 and accompanying text.

n107 See supra notes 46-48 and accompanying text.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 10:20 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00262730

receives compensation from a third party not connected to the defendant, receipt of these benefits should in theory be used to reduce the tortfeasor's total damages. However, the collateral source rule requires the tortfeasor to pay the judgment even though the plaintiff has already been partly or completely compensated for the injuries suffered. [*590] Thus, double recovery is possible and the plaintiff can be put in a better position than before the tort occurred. The collateral source rule also conflicts with the damage mitigation principle . . . because receipt of benefits from a collateral source does not act to mitigate damages. [15]

The leading Ohio case on the collateral source rule is Pryor v. Webber. [16] In Pryor the plaintiff brought a negligence action and argued that evidence of diminished wages paid by her employer should not have been admitted. The Ohio Supreme Court agreed. In construing the collateral source rule, the court held that "the receipt of collateral benefits is deemed irrelevant and immaterial on the issue of damages." [17] Because the court held that the benefits were irrelevant, the jury should not hear evidence concerning plaintiff's receipt of employer benefits, nor should the court deduct the benefits.

The court stated that "[t]he entire theory of the collateral source rule is to keep the jury from learning anything about the collateral income so that it will not influence the decision of the jury." [18] The jury may decide in a plaintiff's favor regardless of whether the evidence of collateral benefits is introduced; however, the jury could deduct from its award an amount equal to, or greater than, the admitted benefits. Such an outcome could not be controlled or predicted by the trial judge.

IV. ABROGATION OF THE COLLATERAL SOURCE RULE

The Ohio legislature eliminated the collateral source rule by enacting Ohio Revised Code section 2317.45 (also referred to as H.B. 1), effective in 1988. [19] The scope of the statute is extremely broad. The statute provides:

[I]f a plaintiff in a tort action is entitled to an award of compensatory damages, that plaintiff shall disclose to the court after such entitlement is determined all collateral benefits, all rights of recoupment relative to the disclosed collateral benefits, and the costs, premiums, or charges for any of the disclosed collateral benefits paid or contributed within the three-year period immediately preceding the accrual of the cause of action. [20]

[*591] Once disclosure is made by the plaintiff, the court must determine whether "[t]he plaintiff has received the disclosed collateral benefit or is reasonably certain to receive it within the next sixty months after the entry of judgment" and that "[t]here are no rights of recoupment respecting the disclosed collateral [*592] benefit." [21] Following this determination, the court must calculate the costs of premiums paid for the collateral benefit. [22] Then, the court must, "prior to entering judgment for the plaintiff . . . subtract from the compensatory damages that the plaintiff otherwise would be awarded the amount of any disclosed collateral benefits . . . [and] add to the balance derived . . . the total of any costs, premiums, and charges." [23]

[*593] According to the statute, the court makes all determinations concerning the offset of the collateral benefits, and "evidence of collateral benefits is not admissible in a tort action and shall not be submitted to or considered by the trier of fact in determining whether to award compensatory damages to a plaintiff . . . or in determining the amount of any such damages." [24]

A. Analysis

Certainly one of the most problematic aspects of Ohio's collateral benefits statute is the time frame during which benefits must be disclosed. The plaintiff [*594] is required to disclose all collateral benefits which meet the definitions in subsection (A)(1) and which were received three years prior to the accrual of the cause of action or which may be received up to five years following judgment. [25] According to subsection (B)(1), the plaintiff would wait until he or she is awarded damages before informing the court of any collateral benefits. If this is the case, not only will it be difficult for a plaintiff to collect and report all the benefits received, but it will be equally, if not more difficult, for the defendant to determine the accuracy and completeness of the plaintiff's disclosures. For example, if the judgment is entered three years after the cause of action accrued, the plaintiff must account for payments made up to six years earlier. In addition, the plaintiff must predict five years into the future what benefits will be received, and the defendant must rely upon this prediction. The statute does not provide for any special policing mechanism. If the plaintiff is "reasonably certain" to receive a benefit within five years, the court will consider it. [26] Although it is conceivable that the plaintiff will receive unanticipated benefits, the statute does not provide for a re-evaluation or opportunity for another hearing during the five-year period.

REV_00262712

Another potential problem area concerns the meaning of "compensatory" damages as used in the statute. In general, compensatory damages are defined as:

[D]amages in satisfaction of, or in recompense for, loss or injury sustained. They compensate a plaintiff for actual injury or loss resulting, for instance, from bodily injury or property damage. The term covers all loss recoverable as a matter of right and includes all damages (beyond nominal damages) other than punitive or exemplary damages. [27]

The meaning of compensatory damages in the context of section 2317.45 becomes important when considering an offset of workers' compensation [*595] benefits. [28] Workers' compensation is awarded upon a scale based upon the type of injury sustained, and its purpose is to prevent the hardship to an employee of proving employer negligence. [29] Workers' compensation essentially operates so that "a right to compensation is given for all injuries incident to the employment . . . the amount of which is limited and determined in accordance with a definite schedule." [30]

There are many theories underlying workers' compensation. According to the Ohio Manufacturers' Association:

The fundamental principle of the [Workers' Compensation Act] was the establishment of a balance between the interests of labor in receiving fair compensation for injured members of the work force, and the interests of industry in being able to anticipate the costs of compensation as a portion of its overall cost of doing business. Concessions were made on both sides in the attempt to balance these interests. Injured workers gave up the right to sue their employers by agreeing that their sole remedy would be compensation through a newly created state insurance fund. In return, employers agreed to prompt payment of compensation regardless of fault. [31]

The issue with respect to workers' compensation and the operation of section 2317.45 is the following: Suppose that a plaintiff has received workers' compensation benefits, and receives a special jury verdict that includes damages for emotional pain and suffering. Theoretically, it is unclear whether the workers' compensation benefits should be deducted from the plaintiff's [*596] recovery, since workers' compensation benefits are not intended to compensate the plaintiff for emotional pain and suffering.

Thus, in the case of the plaintiff/employee who receives a large jury award for emotional pain and suffering, there is a strong argument that this plaintiff was never compensated by workers' compensation, and that, therefore, there should be no offset, particularly when the purported interest in enacting the statute was to prevent a double recovery. If a plaintiff was never compensated for pain and suffering, then there hardly could be a double recovery.

Although this is a theoretically sound argument, the legislature explicitly refers to the term "compensatory" throughout the text of section 2317.45. [32] If the legislature's ultimate goal was to limit judgment amounts as much as possible, then compensatory damages clearly would include traditional compensatory damages. Most likely the legislature's concern was upon limiting the final dollar amount of a plaintiff's recovery, as is the case with damage caps, rather than upon a direct correlation between the type of collateral benefit received and the particular type of damages awarded.

REV_00262713

Yet another problematic area involves the awarding of attorneys' fees. In the typical case the jury most likely will render a verdict far enough in excess of the collateral benefits received that the attorney will be able to recover a fee from the excess. However, it is possible to imagine a situation in which, for example, over the course of several years the plaintiff has received, and spent, $ 20,000 in collateral benefits. After years of litigation, the plaintiff finally receives a jury verdict in an amount that is $ 20,000 or less. Because the collateral benefits are deducted before the defendant pays the judgment, there is no money available for the attorney. This poses several interesting issues.

First, this could deter a plaintiff's attorney from handling a case he otherwise might have because of a fear that no money will remain to pay his fee. Second, rather than discourage costly litigation, the statute encourages it. When faced with little or no recovery, both the plaintiff and the plaintiff's attorney have increased incentive to fight over the deduction of benefits. Third, an offset of nearly all of the judgment would result in an extremely dissatisfied plaintiff. An individual who was injured two or three years earlier, and who received benefits during those years, may have received only $ 200 or $ 300 per week, which probably was spent as it was received. After going through the time and expense of a trial, and after being awarded damages, the plaintiff still receives nothing. Such a result could encourage both the plaintiff and the plaintiff's attorney to settle for an amount below which the plaintiff may otherwise be willing to settle.

Alaska has solved the dilemma of recovering attorneys' fees by providing in its collateral benefits statute:

[*597] [A]fter the fact finder has rendered an award to a claimant, and after the court has awarded costs and attorneys fees, a defendant may introduce evidence of amounts received or to be received by the claimant as compensation for the same injury from collateral sources that do not have a right of subrogation by law or contract. [33]

There remains the troubling issue that was the root of the collateral source rule: Should the defendant benefit from his wrong? When the collateral benefits consist of workers' compensation benefits, it appears even more unjust that the defendant should escape financial responsibility for his wrong while the state workers' compensation bureau does not.

On the other hand, if the view of the Ohio Manufacturers' Association is accepted, then workers' compensation should absorb a loss which is an "incident" of employment. [34] While it seems unfair for the plaintiff to receive a double recovery, it also may seem unfair for workers' compensation to pay the defendant's bill. Perhaps the appropriate response to this issue would be to expand those programs that have subrogation rights. [35] Then, the defendant would be required to pay the amount of the judgment, the plaintiff would not receive a double recovery, and workers' compensation funds would be replaced. Rather than repeal the statute or declare it unconstitutional because of this discrepancy, those institutions that regularly pay such types of benefits could adopt subrogation rights.

B. Ohio Case Law

Relatively little litigation has arisen concerning the application and constitutionality of section 2317.45. The Ohio Supreme Court has not directly addressed the statute; however, given the split of opinion that is developing in the lower courts, it is likely that the supreme court will need to resolve the constitutionality of section 2317.45.

[*598] 1. Morris v. Savoy

REV_00262714

In August, 1991, the Ohio Supreme Court held that the Ohio statute that placed a cap upon medical malpractice recoveries was unconstitutional. [36] Interestingly, however, the court held that section 2305.27, which abrogated the collateral source rule for medical malpractice claims, was constitutional. The court made a number of statements regarding the ability of the state legislature to modify the collateral source rule that indicate that, should the constitutionality of section 2317.45 be challenged, the court would hold it constitutional.

According to the court, the legislature's intent in enacting section 2305.27 was to prevent particular kinds of double recoveries, "specifically those which would duplicate recovery from funds that are directly, or indirectly, supported by the general public or the business community, e.g., public welfare or workers' compensation. . . ." [37]

The court distinguished the unconstitutional damages cap from section 2305.27: "Such a setoff may inure to the benefit of the tortfeasor, but it does not do so to the detriment of the victim as does the damage cap of R.C. 2307.43. . . ." [38] The court also permitted a setoff of plaintiff's future workers' compensation payments "to the extent they can be determined with a reasonable degree of certainty." [39]

2. Cook v. Wineberry Deli

In July 1991, the Court of Appeals for Summit County reversed a common pleas court decision holding section 2317.45 unconstitutional. [40] Because this case provides the most comprehensive analysis of section 2317.45 to date, the arguments provided by the lower court, and rejected by the court of appeals, will be discussed in detail. The arguments addressed in these two decisions comprise the major arguments in opposition to the constitutionality of section 2317.45.

After bringing a personal injury and loss of consortium action against defendant Wineberry Deli, the plaintiffs, Timothy and Karen Cook, received a jury award of $ 400,000 in compensatory damages. [41] Defendant moved to apply section 2317.45 to the $ 33,646.97 of workers' compensation benefits [*599] plaintiff received. [42] The common pleas court denied this motion and held that section 2317.45 unconstitutionally deprived plaintiffs of "their right to a jury trial, their right to an open court and a remedy, their right to due process, and their right to equal protection under the law." [43]

Before analyzing the constitutional issues posed by the collateral benefits statute, the common pleas court reviewed some of the legislative history presented by plaintiffs. The court noted that the Ohio Alliance for Civil Justice "supported [the statute], originally citing a 'litigation explosion' as the root cause of unaffordable or unavailable liability insurance. It was also claimed that high jury awards caused liability insurance premiums to rise, making it impossible for business to operate with a safety net of insurance, consequently having a detrimental effect on investment and production." [44] The court also noted that the Ohio Alliance for Civil Justice received its support primarily from business and insurance companies. [45]

One group opposing the passage of section 2317.45 was the Ohio Public Interest Campaign. The group argued that "the insurance industry had contrived the insurance crisis solely for the purpose of promoting and protecting 'organized price gouging' by underwriters." [46]

Relying upon several studies, the common pleas court discussed evidence that [I]nsurance industry profits had actually increased by 505% since 1985. Furthermore, the insurance industry enjoyed net gains of approximately 75 billion dollars between 1976 and 1985. A National Association of Attorneys General Report states that since 1975 the property/casualty stock index has risen more than 500%. This rise was five times the increase in the Dow Jones Industrial Average. [47]

REV_00262715

The court concluded that:

[T]he purpose of [the statute] was not to end the insurance crisis that was contrived by businesses and insurance companies. . . . [The statute] did not seek fairness for all; it favored businesses and insurance companies. . . . [It] [*600] was enacted as neither a means of ensuring the availability of insurance coverage, as set out in the bill's preamble, nor as a measure of fairness to all Ohio citizens, as stated by its backers. Rather, it was enacted in response to an 'insurance crisis' contrived by the insurance industry to promote and protect price gouging by underwriters, a basis having no relationship to its stated purpose. [48]

The court of appeals did not address this lengthy legislative history. Instead the court noted:

[I]n enacting R.C. 2317.45, the Ohio Legislature was responding to what it perceived as a crisis in the insurance industry due to rising costs and premiums. To relieve this crisis, the legislature determined that the common law collateral source rule should be partly abrogated, thus relieving the insurance industry -- and, ultimately, the public -- of the burden of paying compensation in excess of that required to make injured parties whole. [49]

a. Right to a Jury Trial

According to the common pleas court, section 2317.45 violates article 1, section 5 of the Ohio Constitution because it "plainly violates a negligently injured person's right to have all the facts in her or his case determined by a jury." [50] The court based its conclusion upon its perception that "the General Assembly has empowered the judiciary to 'materially change' and limit the right to have a jury determine the amount of any damages to be awarded in tort cases." [51]

The common pleas court advanced two additional reasons that section 2317.45 violated the right to a jury trial. First, the court stated that "[t]he effect of the statute is closely akin to that of an automatic remittitur, a court determined reduction of the damages awarded by a jury because the court considers them excessive, even though they are not the result of passion or prejudice." [52] The court then noted that "[r]emittitur is looked on with disfavor [*601] in the Ohio courts, and historically, it may be done only with the consent of the plaintiff." [53]

Second, the court disregarded the argument advanced by the defendant that the statute is designed to "prevent[] a double recovery by the plaintiff." [54] The court regarded this argument as "fallacious" and stated that it "presumes that the collateral benefit has completely compensated the tort victim." [55] The fact that the source of the collateral benefit in this case was workers' compensation buttressed the court's statement that "[p]ayments made under Ohio Workers' Compensation Program are not, and were never meant to be complete compensation for an injured employee. Consequently, it is wholly inappropriate to subtract Workers' Compensation benefits from [plaintiffs'] compensatory award." [56]

The lower court also stated that even if it were to accept defendant's argument that plaintiffs would be receiving a double recovery, "[t]he wrong done to plaintiff by the defendant is not diminished in any way by the plaintiff's receipt of collateral benefits." [57] The plaintiff was held to be the party most entitled to benefit from the defendant's wrong.

The court of appeals rejected the lower court's reasoning. According to the court:

R.C. 2317.45 specifically preserves the inadmissibility of evidence of collateral benefits at trial, and therefore does not in any way invade the province of the jury in its determination of the central issues of liability and the damages suffered by the plaintiff. The true significance of R.C. 2317.45 does not come into operation until after trial and after the jury's verdict. Cook's argument [*602] ignores the obvious -- that the issue of collateral benefits was never before the jury under the collateral source rule, and this situation is not altered under R.C. 2317.45. Therefore, R.C. 2317.45 neither removes nor adds to any issues before the jury, nor does it alter the trial proceedings in any manner. [58]

REV_00262716

b. Open Courts and Right to a Remedy

The common pleas court held that section 2317.45 violated Ohio Constitution article I, section 16, which provides that "all courts shall be open, and every person, for an injury done to him in his lands, goods, person or reputation, shall have remedy by due course of law." [59] The court reasoned that the plaintiff is denied a remedy when the jury renders a verdict for compensatory damages and the judge then deducts from that verdict. The court stated:

The parties are being told by the legislature that, regardless of what the finder of fact has determined, the defendant will not be held responsible for the full extent of plaintiff's resulting injuries. . . . The statute] strips a jury verdict of its purpose and significance. It is rendered a sterile, meaningless gesture and a mockery of what is supposed to be a meaningful remedy. [60]

The court of appeals strongly disagreed with this argument. The court of appeals stated:

[I]n Cook's view, a meaningful remedy can be had only by holding the negligent tortfeasor responsible to the full extent of injuries suffered, regardless of the extent to which the plaintiff may already have been made whole through other sources of compensation. . . . By enacting R.C. 2317.45, the legislature has now shifted the emphasis in tort actions away from punishing the merely negligent tortfeasor, and toward ensuring that the plaintiff is fully compensated and made whole, regardless of the sources of compensation. Such a decision was properly within the province of the legislature to make. [61]

c. Due Process

Because the right to a jury trial and to a remedy are considered fundamental, the common pleas court held that the state must demonstrate that [*603] the statute furthered a "compelling" state interest in order to comply with the requirement of due process of law. [62]

The lower court found a number of flaws in the statute, each of which it held violated due process. [63] One problem which the court found particularly troublesome was the possibility of a "double deduction." [64] That is, even though the jury will not be informed of a plaintiff's receipt of collateral benefits, "there is no procedural safeguard for plaintiffs to prevent the jury from discounting the verdict to reflect their own sensibilities regarding collateral benefits and 'double recoveries.'" [65]

The common pleas court was troubled by the fact that the defendant, and the defendant's insurance company would "reap the benefits of plaintiff's Workers' Compensation benefits. . . . Consequently, the injured party is saddled with the additional burden of supporting the liability insurance industry, rather than that burden properly being upon the defendant." [66]

The court of appeals dispensed with this line of argument rather quickly. Treating both the due process and equal protection claims together, the court of appeals applied rational basis review because section 2317.45 "neither implicates any fundamental or substantive rights, nor creates any suspect classifications. . . ." [67] With respect to Cook's contention that the insurance crisis was a "hoax," the court of appeals responded by stating that the

[A]rguments, both pro and con, were thoroughly presented to and considered by the legislature when it deliberated the enactment of R.C. 2317.45. Even a cursory review of these arguments makes it clear that, at the very least, there were legitimate, debatable questions of whether an insurance crisis existed, and whether the remedy undertaken by the legislature was appropriate. [68]

REV_00262717

d. Equal Protection

Relying upon article I, section 2 of the Ohio Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, the common pleas court held that section 2317.45 violates equal protection because "it treats tort victims who are injured at work or who are entitled to certain government [*604] benefits differently from tort victims who receive benefits from a private insurer, therefore, requiring different treatment of those within the classification." [69] The court also regarded the classification as unconstitutional because it separates victims of medical malpractice from the victims of other forms of negligence. Therefore, the court applied strict scrutiny. [70]

Although the court of appeals rejected the lower court's equal protection argument, the court of appeals did not provide any substantive analysis to guide future cases. In this respect the recent Ohio Supreme Court decision in Morris v. Savoy [71] may be helpful. In Morris the supreme court considered, and rejected, the argument that the collateral benefits statute for medical malpractice claims violated equal protection. [72] According to the supreme court, "a line is drawn -- the statute covers only a 'medical claim' -- but does not make any internal distinctions among class members. All plaintiffs in medical malpractice must confront the same setoff of benefits from collateral sources." [73] The same is true for section 2317.45 -- all plaintiffs face the same setoff.

3. Jeffers v. Phillips Ready Mix

In January, 1991, the Ohio Court of Appeals for the Second District upheld section 2317.45, and applied the statute in order to deduct workers' compensation benefits from plaintiff-appellant's jury award. [74] In this case, plaintiff-appellant Jeffers (hereinafter referred to as plaintiff) sued the defendant, a third party, for injuries plaintiff suffered while working for Sowder Concrete Corporation. [75] Both the plaintiff and the defendant were found negligent. [76] The jury awarded the plaintiff $ 39,500 in damages, and then reduced this amount by 40% due to plaintiff's negligence. [77] The net amount of damages totaled $ 23,700. However, the plaintiff also received collateral benefits totaling $ 22,403.14. [78] The plaintiff appealed the trial court's deduction of these benefits from the $ 23,700 jury award.

[*605] The plaintiff made three arguments relevant to this Note. First, the plaintiff argued that "the collateral benefits should be subtracted from the damages assessed by the jury before factoring in [plaintiff's] comparative negligence." [79] Second, the plaintiff argued that because the jury awarded $ 14,000 for future pain and suffering although he would not have future medical expenses, this amount should not be offset. [80] Third, the plaintiff argued that the jury received evidence of $ 10,292.36 in medical bills as proof of the plaintiff's injury, but that the judge deducted $ 22,403.14 of collateral benefits. [81]

The court systematically and straightforwardly overruled each of the plaintiff's objections to the operation of section 2317.45. The court held that collateral benefits are to be deducted from the jury award, reduced by the plaintiff's negligence. [82] The court reasoned that "[t]he answer is found in R.C. 2317.45 (B)(2)(c)(i), the operative portion of which reads . . . 'compensatory damages that the plaintiff otherwise would be awarded.'" [83] The plaintiff, but for the collateral benefits, would receive $ 23,700. Therefore, that is the amount from which the benefits should be deducted.

The court also rejected the plaintiff's future pain and suffering argument. The court did not consider whether in fact the plaintiff would receive a double recovery. Instead, the court held that "[t]he way the statute is written, compensatory damages includes all damages except punitive damages. While future pain and suffering is not something for which collateral benefits are received, it is not the province of the court to revise plain legislative enactments." [84]

REV_00262718

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*23 N. Ky. L. Rev. 357, **

Copyright (c) 1996 Northern Kentucky University
Northern Kentucky University Law Review

Spring, 1996

23 N. Ky. L. Rev. 357

LENGTH: 10018 words

NOTE: RESTORATION OF THE COLLATERAL SOURCE RULE IN KENTUCKY:A REVIEW OF O'BRYAN V. HEDGESPETH

by Craig L. Farrish

SUMMARY:
... In 1988, in response to the perceived crisis, the Kentucky General Assembly passed House Bill 551, An Act Relating to Civil Actions (Act). ... The Rule has both an evidentiary and a damage component. ... The second major issue discussed by the court of appeals was whether KRS section 411.188 violated section 116 of the Kentucky Constitu- tion. ... First, the abrogation of the collateral source rule by KRS section section 411.188 was unconstitutional. ... The court overruled Edwards and declared KRS section 411.188 unconstitutional on the grounds that "all evidence of collateral source payment was constitutionally impermis- sible, and prejudicial to the jury's consideration of damages." ... The O'Bryan opinion then addressed the principle holding in Edwards v. Land, that KRS section 411.188 should be embraced in lieu of the collateral source rule under the principle of comity. ... The two main holdings of O'Bryan are: (i) a rejected motion in limine is sufficient to preserve the right to appeal, despite the presentation of adverse evidence at trial, and (ii) KRS section 411.188 was an unconsti- tutional abrogation of the collateral source rule. ...

TEXT:
[*357]

I. INTRODUCTION

During the mid-1980's, in response to what was deemed a liability insurance crisis, state legislatures throughout the nation enacted a variety of tort reform measures designed to address the perceived crisis. [1] In 1988, in response to the perceived crisis, the Kentucky General Assembly passed House Bill 551, An Act Relating to Civil Actions (Act). [2] This legislation consisted of twenty-six sections addressing a wide range of legal issues including apportionment of damages, municipal corporation immunity, punitive damages, personal liability of corporate officers and directors, and the collateral source rule. [3]

Section four of the Act, which was codified as KRS section 411.188, abrogated the collateral source rule. [4] The collateral source rule is a com- mon law rule which provides that if an injured person receives compensa- tion for his injuries from a third party independent of the tort-feasor, the amount of that compensation should not be deducted from any award obtained from the tort-feasor. [5]

The primary issue raised on appeal in O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth was the constitutionality of the General Assembly's action in abrogating the col- lateral source rule. [6] A secondary issue reestablish or affirm the Rule. [157] In the past two [*375] years, twenty-six state supreme courts have heard cases which addressed the Rule, and in the overwhelming number of those cases, twenty, the courts have decided in favor of the Rule. [158] Given this strong trend in support of the Rule, it seems very unlikely that the abrogation of the Rule will be included in future attempts of civil litigation reform by the legislature.

V. CONCLUSION

O'Bryan impacts two important aspects of Kentucky civil litigation. First, the decision reestablished the common law collateral source rule. As noted by the court, "the right of every individual in society to ac- cess a system of justice to redress wrongs is basic and fundamental to our common law heritage." [159] The rule prevents a defendant from reducing his liability and, thereby, receiving a windfall based on the plaintiff's private contractual relationships. This decision restored a plaintiff's right to recover the entire amount of expenses incurred as a result of a defendant's wrongful actions.

The second important aspect of the decision is that it clarified the use of motions in limine, with respect to preserving an objection for appeal. The result is that a plaintiff's presentation of evidence adverse to itself at trial pre-empts the defense from later raising unflattering inferences as to the plaintiff through its introduction of the same evidence, without waiv- ing the right to appeal the decision of the trial court on a motion in limi- ne to exclude the evidence.

Together, the two holdings in O'Bryan reestablish a level playing field at trial. First, a plaintiff is now able to exclude prejudicial evidence relating to third party payments. Second, trial counsel may use a wider range of tactical options in presenting evidence, secure in the knowledge that they are not waving a right to appeal the admission of the evidence.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See e.g., Robert R. Sparks, A Survey of Kentucky Tort Reform, 17 N. Ky. L. Rev. 473 (1990); See also, W. Kip Viscusi and Patricia Born, The National Implications of Liability Reforms for General Liability and Medical Malpractice Insurance, 24 Seton Hall L. Rev. 1743 (1994); Julie A. Schafer, Note, The Constitutionality of Offsetting Collateral Benefits under Ohio Revised Code Section 2317.45, 53, Ohio St. L.J. 587 (1992).

n2 An Act relating to civil actions, ch. 224, 1988 Ky. Acts 557.

n3 Sparks, supra note 1, at 474.

n4 An Act relating to civil actions, ch. 224, 1988 Ky. Acts 557.

n5 Black's Law Dictionary 262 (6th ed. 1990).

n6 O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571 (Ky. 1995).

n7 Id. at 574.

n8 Nancy L. Manzer, Note, 1986 Tort Reform Legislation: A Systematic Evaluation of Caps on Damages and Limitations on Joint and Several Liability, 73 Cornell L. Rev. 628, 629 (1988).

n9 Viscusi & Born, supra note 1, at 1744.

n10 Id.

n11 Manzer, supra note 8, at 629.

REV_00262740

n12 Viscusi, supra note 1, at 1744.

n13 Id.

n14 Id.

n15 Lisa Genasci, Product-Liability Suits Dropping; Sexual-Harassment Filings Rise, Louisville Courier-J., Oct. 9, 1994, at E3.

n16 Sparks, supra note 1, at 473.

n17 Legislative Research Commission, Report of the Kentucky Insurance and Liability Task Force, Research Report No. 232, 1-2 (1988) [hereinafter Commission]. The Task Force was comprised of attorneys, state legislators, county and municipal officials, members from groups ranging from the Kentucky Medical Association to the United Mine Works Union.

n18 Id.

n19 Sparks, supra note 1, at 473.

n20 Commission, supra note 17, at 15.

n21 Sparks, supra note 1, at 474.

n22 Dag E. Ytreberg, Annotation, Collateral Source Rule: Injured Person's Hospitalization or Medical Insurance As Affecting Damages Recoverable, 77 A.L.R.3d 415, 419 (1977).

n23 Id.

n24 Id.

n25 Schafer, supra note 1, at 589.

n26 Id.

n27 Id.

n28 See generally Kenneth S. Abraham, What is a Tort Claim? An Interpretation of Contemporary Tort Reform, 51 Md. L. Rev. 172, 190 (1992).

n29 Id.

n30 Id.

n31 Id. at 192. Medicare and Medicaid programs do the same in the public arena.

n32 An Act relating to civil actions, ch. 224, 1988 Ky. Acts 557.

n33 Sparks, supra note 1, at 473.

n34 Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. section 411.188 (Baldwin 1995). The statute provides in its entirety:

(1) This section shall apply to all actions for damages, whether in contract or tort, commenced after July 15, 1988.

(2) At the commencement of an action seeking to recover damages, it shall be the duty of the plaintiff or his attorney to notify, by certified mail, those parties believed by him to hold subrogation rights to any award received by the plaintiff as a result of the action. The notification shall state that a failure to assert subrogation rights by inter- vention, pursuant to Kentucky Civil Rule 24, will result in a loss of those rights with respect to any final award received by the plaintiff as a result of the action.

REV_00262741

(3) Collateral source payments, except life insurance, the value of any premiums paid by or on behalf of the plaintiff for same, and known subrogation rights shall be an admis- sible fact in any civil trial.

(4) A certified list of the parties notified pursuant to subsection (2) of this section shall also be filed with the clerk of the court at the commencement of the action.

n35 Id.

n36 Id.

n37 Id.

n38 851 S.W.2d 484 (Ky. Ct. App. 1992), review denied, 858 S.W.2d 698 (Ky. 1993), overruled by O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571 (1995).

n39 858 S.W.2d 798 (Ky. 1993); see O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 575.

n40 Edwards, 851 S.W.2d at 484.

n41 O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 573.

n42 Id. at 578.

n43 Edwards, 851 S.W.2d at 484.

n44 The title of the Act is "An Act relating to civil actions."

n45 Edwards, 851 S.W.2d at 484.

n46 Ky. Const. section 51.

n47 Edwards, 851 S.W.2d at 486.

n48 Id. at 487.

n49 Id.

n50 Id. (citing Farris v. Shopper's Village Liquors, Inc., 669 S.W.2d 213, 214 (Ky. 1984)).

n51 Id.

n52 Id. (citing Owsley v. Commonwealth, S.W.2d 408, 410 (Ky. Ct. App. 1988)).

n53 Id.

n54 Id.

n55 Id. at 488.

REV_00262742

n56 Ky. Const. section 116.

n57 Edwards, 851 S.W.2d at 488.

n58 Id. (citing Commonwealth v. Reneer, 734 S.W.2d 794, 797 (Ky. 1987)) (emphasis added).

n59 See generally Black's Law Dictionary 267 (6th ed. 1990). The Kentucky Supreme Court's formulation of comity can be found in Ex Parte Farley, 570 S.W.2d 617, 624 (Ky. 1978). The Supreme Court held:

It is not our disposition to be jealous or hypertechnical over the boundaries that separate our domain from that of the legislature. Where statutes do not interfere or threaten to interfere with the orderly administration of justice, what boots it to quibble over which branch of government has rightful authority? We respect the legislative branch, and in the name of comity and common sense are glad to accept without cavil the application of its statutes pertaining to judicial matters.

Id. at 624.

n60 Ex parte Auditor of Public Accounts, 609 S.W.2d 682, 688 (Ky. 1980).

n61 Id.

n62 Id.

n63 Ky. Const. section 54.

n64 Edwards v. Land, 851 S.W.2d 484, 488 (Ky. Ct. App. 1992).

n65 Id.

n66 Id.

n67 Id.

n68 Id.

n69 O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 574 (Ky. 1995).

n70 Id. at 573.

n71 Id.

n72 Id. The evidence presented by the appellant, Richard O'Bryan was his medical bills which totaled $ 48,068.04. The bills were divided into his out-of-pocket expenses of $ 18,390.08 and the collateral source payments he had received of $ 30,000. Id.

n73 Id. at 573-74.

n74 Id.

n75 Id.

n76 Id.

n77 Id.

n78 Id.

n79 Id.

n80 Id. at 574-78.

n81 Id. at 574.

n82 Id.

n83 Id.

n84 Id. (emphasis added).

n85 Ky. R. Evid. 103(d) (Baldwin). Rule 103(d) provides, in pertinent part: "a party may move the court for a ruling in advance of trial on the admission or exclusion of evi- dence . . . . A motion in limine resolved by order of record is sufficient to preserve error for appellate review." Id.

n86 O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 575 (Ky. 1995).

n87 Id.

n88 Id.

n89 Id.

n90 Id.

n91 Ky. Const. section 51.

n92 O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 576.

n93 Id.

n94 Id.

n95 Id.

n96 Ky. Const. sections 27, 28.

n97 Ky. Const. section 116.

n98 Ky. R. Evid. 401. Rule 401 defines relevant evidence as evidence having any tenden- cy to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Id.

n99 0571*000576 O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 576.

n100 Id.

n101 Id.

n102 Id.

REV_00262744

n103 See, e.g., Davidson v. Vogler, 507 S.W.2d 160, 164 (Ky. 1974).

n104 Burke Enter., Inc. v. Mitchell, 700 S.W.2d 789, 796 (Ky. 1985).

n105 O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 576.

n106 Id.

n107 See, e.g., Abraham, supra note 28, at 190. See also Sparks, supra note 1, at 489.

n108 O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 576.

n109 Id.

n110 Id.

n111 736 S.W.2d 294 (Ky. 1987). The statute attempted to define a common term in broad form deeds.

n112 860 S.W.2d 280, 283 (Ky. 1993).

n113 O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 577, 578.

n114 Id. at 577.

n115 Id. (citing Black's Law Dictionary 242 (5th ed. 1979)).

n116 Ky. Sup. Ct. R. 1.010, 1.020(1)(a).

n117 O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 577.

n118 Id.

n119 Id.

n120 Id.

n121 734 S.W.2d 794 (Ky. 1987). This case was cited in Edwards v. Land by the court of appeals as authority to uphold KRS 411.188 under the doctrine of comity. The case dealt with sentencing procedure.

n122 00892000571*000577 O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 577.

n123 Id.

n124 Id. at 578.

n125 Id.

n126 Id.

n127 Id.

n128 Catherine Murr Young, Should A Motion In Limine Or Similar Preliminary Motion Made In The Federal Court System Preserve Error on Appeal Without a Contemporaneous Objection?, 79 Ky. L.J. 177, 179 (Fall 1990).

REV_00262745

n129 Edward J. Imwinkelried, The Pretrial Importance and Adaptation of the "Trial" Evidence Rules, 25 Loy. L.A. L. Rev. 965, 977 (April 1992).

n130 Id.

n131 Id.

n132 See generally John B. Trawick, Motions in Limine Preserving Error on Appeal When a Party Loses a Motion in Limine, 18 Am. J. Trial Advoc. 485, 486 (Fa ll 1994). See also Colleen R. Courtade, Annotation, Sufficiency in Federal Court of Motion in Limine To Preserve for Appeal Objection to Evidence Absent Contemporary Objection at Trial, 76 A.L.R. Fed. 619, 622 (1986).

n133 See Courtade, supra note 135, at 623.

n134 See generally Courtade, supra note 135, at 623. See also Young, supra note 128, at 180.

n135 Courtade, supra note 135, at 623.

n136 See Trawick, supra note 135, at 486.

n137 Young, supra note 131, at 178.

n138 Id. at 179.

n139 Id. at 179.

n140 Id.

n141 O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 574 (Ky. 1995).

n142 Id.

n143 See, e.g., Tungate v. Commonwealth, No. 93- CA-001765-MR, 1995 WL 10696 (Ky. Ct. App. Jan. 13, 1995), aff'd, 901 S.W.2d 41 (Ky. 1995).

n144 1818000892000571*000575 O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 575.

n145 Sparks, supra note 1, at 490.

n146 Id. at 473 (citing Legislative Research Commission, Report of the Kentucky Insurance and Liability Task Force, Research Report 232, at 15 (1988)).

n147 Id. at 490.

n148 Id.

n149 Id.

n150 O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 576 (Ky. 1995).

n151 Id.

n152 See, e.g., Edwards v. Land, 851 S.W.2d 484, 488 (Ky. Ct. App. 1992), review denied, 858 S.W.2d 698 (Ky. 1993), overruled by O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571 (1995). See also O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d at 575.

n153 O'Bryan, 892 S.W.2d at 576.

n154 Id. at 577.

n155 Id.

n156 Id.

n157 Since 1993, twenty-six state supreme courts have addressed the issue of the collateral source rule. Twenty states, including Kentucky, have either reestablished or affirmed the rule. Peters v. Pierce, 858 S.W.2d 680 (Ark. 1993); Smith v. Zufelt, 880 P.2d 1178 (Colo. 1994); Fleming v. Garnett, 646 A.2d 1308 (Conn. 1994); The Medical Ctr. of Delaware, Inc. v. Mullins, 637 A.2d 6 (Del. 1994); Safeway Stores, Inc. v. Buckmon, 652 A.2d 597 (D.C. App. 1994); Amalgamated Transit Union Local 1324 v. Roberts, 434 S.E.2d 450 (Ga. 1993); Sato v. Tawata, 897 P.2d 941 (Haw. 1995); Thompson v. KFB Ins. Co., 850 P.2d 773 (Kan. 1993); O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571 (Ky. 1995); Potvin v. Seven Elms, Inc., 628 A.2d 115 (Me. 1993); Washington v. Barnes Hosp., 897 S.W.2d 611 (Mo. 1995); Cyr v. J.I. Case Co., 652 A.2d 685 (N.H. 1994); Sanchez v. Clayton, 877 P.2d 567 (N.M. 1994); Baxley v. Nationwide Mut. Ins. Co., 430 S.E.2d 895 (N.C. 1993); 04*000504 Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504 (Ohio 1994); Moniz v. Providence Chain Co., 618 A.2d 1270 (R.I. 1993); Otis Elevator, Inc. v. Hardin Const. Co. Group, Inc., 450 S.E.2d 41 (S.C. 1994); Wheeler v. Catholic Archdiocese of Seattle, 880 P.2d 29 (Wash. 1994); Johnson v. General Motors Corp., 438 S.E.2d 28 (W. Va. 1993); and Voge v. Anderson, 512 N.W.2d 749 (Wis. 1994).

Five states have affirmed or upheld the abrogation of the rule. Senn v. Alabama Gas Corp., 619 So. 2d 1320 (Ala. 1993); Jackson v. Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Co., 528 N.W.2d 516 (Iowa 1995); Kiss v. Jacob, 650 A.2d 336 (N.J. 1994); Greco v. United States, 893 P.2d 345 (Nev. 1995); and Dewitz v. Emery, 508 N.W.2d 334 (N.D. 1993). One state, Montana, in Knutson v. Barbour, 879 P.2d 696 (Mont. 1994), refused to address the issue because it was not properly before the court, but suggested it would reestablish the rule if properly presented.

n158 Id.

n159 O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571, 578 (Ky. 1995).

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" /25 subrogation and date(aft 1990) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 10:20 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

addressed by O'Bryan was wheth- er a denied motion in limine preserves the right to appeal without offer- ing a second objection during trial. [7] [*358]

This note first discusses the legislative and judicial background affect- ing the court's decision in O'Bryan. Also, the note provides a brief over- view of the collateral source rule. Following the background material, this note reviews the court's reasoning in O'Bryan and then concludes with a discussion of O'Bryan's impact on Kentucky law.

II. BACKGROUND

A. Overview of the Liability Insurance Crisis

During the early 1980's, the insurance industry was faced with mount- ing financial losses. In response, the industry raised premiums, canceled or refused to renew existing policies, and refused to issue certain high- risk policies. [8] Companies unable to obtain liability insurance were forced to limit services or to drop business lines. [9] For example, the Coney Is- land Cyclone ride was closed temporarily, municipal parks closed play- grounds, motels removed diving boards from their swimming pools, the private aircraft industry in the United States virtually shut down altogeth- er, almost all pharmaceutical manufacturers abandoned the production of vaccines, and U.S. contraceptive research came to a halt. [10] This inability of businesses and municipalities to obtain reasonably priced insurance is what became commonly known as the liability insurance crisis. [11]

An illustration of the evidence cited to support the claim of a liability insurance crisis was the level of insurance premiums firms paid for liabil- ity insurance coverage. [12] For example, general liability insurance pre- miums increased nearly 300 percent from a national aggregate of $ 6.5 billion in 1984, to $ 19.4 billion in 1986. [13] Indeed, much of the impetus for the tort liability reform efforts came from a perception that the insur- ance markets were in a state of crisis during this period. [14] During the 1980's, a concerted and largely successful effort, led by large corpora- tions and the insurance industry, was made to convince the public that the reason for the liability insurance crisis was an out-of-control civil justice system and that legal reforms were required. [15] [*359]

B. Kentucky's Response to the Liability Insurance Crisis

In response to the liability insurance crisis, the Kentucky General Assembly formed the Kentucky Insurance and Liability Task Force (Task Force). [16] The Task Force was composed of a variety of private groups and public officials. [17] It was formed to examine the liability insurance crisis, report on its causes, and to review legislation from other states that had been enacted to address the liability insurance crisis. [18]

The Act was essentially the Kentucky General Assembly's adoption of the Task Force recommendations for reform of the civil justice system. [19] It is interesting to note that the Task Force specifically found no evidence that a litigation explosion was responsible for causing the liability insur- ance crisis in Kentucky. [20] However, the Task Force justified its pro- posed reforms by concluding that they were required in order to improve the efficiency, predictability, and cost-effectiveness of the civil justice system. [21]

C. Overview of the Collateral Source Rule

One of the Task Force recommendations which was adopted by the General Assembly was to abrogate the collateral source rule. The col- lateral source rule (Rule), which originated as early as 1823 in England and was first adopted in this country in 1854, expresses a two fold public policy judgment. [22] First, the Rule encourages citizens to purchase and maintain insurance for personal injuries and for other eventualities. [23] Second, the Rule prevents tort- feasors from being able to avoid liability for the full amount of damages caused by their actions. [24]

REV_00262732

The Rule has both an evidentiary and a damage component. [25] As a [*360] rule of evidence, it precludes introduction into evidence of any benefits the plaintiff obtained from collateral sources. [26] The Rule affects the de- termination of damages by forcing the defendant to pay for the entire loss he caused despite independent recoveries by the plaintiff for the same loss. [27]

The main criticism of the Rule is that it permits double payment of damages to a plaintiff for the same injury. [28] Double payment can occur in cases where a plaintiff has not suffered out-of-pocket expenses as a result of reimbursement received from third party payor sources, such as insurance companies, and liability is imposed on a defendant for the en- tire amount of costs incurred by the plaintiff, without subtracting com- pensation received by the plaintiff from third party sources. [29]

The main arguments in support of the Rule are: (i) the damages in- curred by the plaintiff are real, even if the cost is borne by a third party; (ii) plaintiff is not always compensated for all of their costs, therefore duplicate recovery of one expense may compensate for other unrecovered costs; (iii) plaintiffs should not be denied the benefit of their foresight in purchasing insurance; and (iv) double compensation of the plaintiff can be avoided by permitting the plaintiff's insurer to have the right of subro- gation. [30] Since insurance companies generally provide in their policies for subrogation rights against tort-feasors, the plaintiff does not, in fact, realize a double payment for the same injury. [31]

D. Abrogation of the Collateral Source Rule in Kentucky

1. Legislative Action

As discussed above, the Kentucky General Assembly passed the Act [32] in response to a perceived liability insurance crisis. [33] Section four of the Act, which was codified as KRS section 411.188, abrogates the collateral source rule. [34] The statute abrogates the collateral source rule by requir- [*361] ing "collateral source payments . . . to be an admissible fact in any civil trial." [35] It further requires that parties holding subrogation rights to any portion of the award the plaintiff seeks to recover be listed and noti- fied. [36] The law requires that the notification to third parties state that a failure to assert subrogation rights by intervention, pursuant to Kentucky Civil Rule 24, will result in a loss of those rights with respect to any final award received by the plaintiff. [37]

2. Judicial Development

The constitutionality of the statute was first addressed in 1992, by the Kentucky Court of Appeals, in Edwards v. Land. [38] T he Kentucky Su- preme Court denied discretionary review of the Edwards decision. [39]

One possible explanation for denying discretionary review in Edwards and granting it in O'Bryan is the procedural posture of the two cases. Edwards was on appeal from the Boyle County Circuit Court, which granted a motion in limine finding the Act, and consequently KRS section 411.188, unconstitutional. [40] O'Bryan, in contrast, was appealed after a full trial, where the final damages awarded were less than the special damages presented by the plaintiff at trial. [41]

In declaring KRS section 411.188 unconstitutional, the Kentucky Su- preme Court specifically overruled the decision in Edwards. [42] In order to place the holding of O'Bryan in proper context, a brief review of the [*362] rationale and holding in Edwards is required.

a. Edwards v. Land

The court of appeals reversed the Boyle County Circuit Court's finding that the Act and KRS section 411.188 were unconstitutional as a matter of law. [43] The Boyle County Circuit Court determined that the Act ad- dressed a plurality of subjects, only some of which relate to civil ac- tions, [44] in contravention of section 51 of the Kentucky Constitution. [45] Section 51 provides, in pertinent part, that "no law enacted by the Gener- al Assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be ex- pressed in the title." [46]

REV_00262733

The court of appeals noted that the Boyle Circuit Court found KRS section 411.188 "does fit within the title," but declared that the Act's violation of section 51 of the Kentucky Constitution rendered the whole act unconstitutional. [47] The statute, as one component of the Act, was consequently declared unconstitutional despite the fact that the statute was within the legitimate ambit of the Act's title. [48]

The court of appeals addressed several issues in its decision. However, only three major issues were specifically discussed by the Kentucky Supreme Court in O'Bryan. First, the court of appeals held that the lower court's determination that the Act violated section 51 of the Kentucky Constitution was incorrect as a matter of law. [49] In addition, the court of appeals stated that "it has long been the rule in Kentucky that when a subject foreign to the title of an act is introduced . . . that subject or those subjects may be omitted from the act, and the subjects conforming to the title retained, thereby rendering the act, thus distilled, constitution- al." [50] Further, the court noted that Kentucky recognizes the general principle of jurisprudence that a court should refrain from addressing issues not before it. [51]

The court of appeals summarized the previous two points by stating that "we have demonstrated an unwillingness to excise sections from acts [*363] which do not appear to conform to the title, when the court is being called upon to adjudge the constitutionality of only a certain section or certain sections within the act." [52] Accordingly, the court of appeals spe- cifically held, for the two reasons stated above, that as a matter of law, the trial court erred in determining the Act to be unconstitutional in its entirety and that the trial court erred by not restricting its analysis to the conformity of KRS section 411.188. [53] The court of appeals concluded its holding on this issue by noting that the trial court was "clearly correct" in finding KRS section 411.188 to be constitutional with respect to sec- tion 51 of the Kentucky Constitution because the statute addressed an issue relating to civil actions. [54]

The second major issue discussed by the court of appeals was whether KRS section 411.188 violated section 116 of the Kentucky Constitu- tion. [55] Section 116 grants the Kentucky Supreme Court the authority to promulgate rules of practice and procedure in the courts of Kentucky. [56] The court of appeals stated that the constitutional grant of power to the judiciary is "by no means an inflexibly exclusive authority." [57] The court of appeals quoted the Kentucky Supreme Court's decision in Common- wealth v. Reneer, in which the court held that even if a statute constitutes "an encroachment by the General Assembly upon the prerogatives of the judiciary, it is, nevertheless, not an unreasonable encroachment if it can be accepted under the principles of comity." [58]

Comity is generally defined as the principle by which courts will give effect to legislative acts, not as a matter of obligation, but out of defer- ence and respect. [59] The test employed by the Kentucky Supreme Court [*364] to determine when the principle of comity may be applied is whether an act constitutes an unreasonable interference with the functioning of the courts. [60] Although the court of appeals conceded that KRS section 411.188 does encroach upon the authority granted to the judiciary, the court ruled that the encroachment was reasonable and, therefore permissi- ble under the principles of comity. [61]

The third major point discussed by the court of appeals was whether KRS section 411.188 violated section 54 of the Kentucky Constitution. [62] Section 54 of the Kentucky Constitution provides that "the General Assembly shall have no power to limit the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death, or for injuries to person or property." [63] Land, the appellee, argued that by repealing the collateral source rule, the legislature effectively limited the amount a plaintiff could recover. [64] Further, the appellee contended that allowing evidence of collateral source payments would obviously invite a jury to reduce an award of damages. [65]

REV_00262734

The court of appeals fundamentally disagreed with the appellee's con- tention. [66] Justice Leibson stated that "nowhere in KRS section 411.188 is any sort of cap set on the recovery available in a civil action for injury or death. The statute makes no mention at all of limiting damages." [67] Although the court of appeals upheld that statute, it acknowledged that "the statute may serve to reduce the level of recovery awarded in some civil actions" but concluded that "no limitation on recovery is to be found in the statute." [68]

b. O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth

Because the Kentucky Supreme Court denied discretionary review of th e Edwards decision, Edwards was controlling authority when O'Bryan reached the appellate level. [69] Prior to trial, O'Bryan, the plaintiff, made a motion in limine to exclude evidence of collateral source payments and objecting to any mention of collateral source payments during the course [*365] of this trial. [70] The trial judge rejected the motion and stated that "your objection is on the record and I'll overrule it for the record. We'll go by the statute." [71] At trial, O'Bryan introduced evidence of his medical bills, indicating the amount of his out-of-pocket expenses as well as collateral source payments. [72]

Three arguments were presented by O'Bryan in the Kentucky Supreme Court against the trial court's decision, affirmed by the court of appeals, to reject his motion in limine. First, the abrogation of the collateral source rule by KRS section section 411.188 was unconstitutional. [73] Sec- ond, regardless of the constitutionality of the statute, the trial court should have excluded evidence regarding the portion of collateral source payments which constituted payment of no-fault benefits. [74] Finally, fail- ure to award damages for permanent impairment of earning power was inadequate as a matter of law. [75]

The Kentucky Supreme Court granted discretionary review only to consider the question of whether KRS section 411.188 was unconstitu- tional. [76] Justice Leibson's rationale was that the constitutionality of KRS section 411.188 was an issue "of institutional importance because the statute impacts the trial of a great many civil actions." [77] The court did not address the question of the classification of no-fault benefits as collat- eral source payment because it was not properly raised on appeal. [78] As to the third issue raised, the court held that "we would not second-guess the court of appeals' decision affirming the jury award of zero dollars for permanent impairment of earning power." [79]

In its opinion, the O'Bryan court first strongly rejected a threshold challenge by Hedgespeth, the defendant, that O'Bryan's motion in limine, when denied, failed to preserve his objection to evidence of collateral source payments. The court then discussed four arguments against the constitutionality of KRS section 411.188. [80] The court overruled Edwards [*366] and declared KRS section 411.188 unconstitutional on the grounds that "all evidence of collateral source payment was constitutionally impermis- sible, and prejudicial to the jury's consideration of damag es." [81]

III. THE COURT'S REASONING

As discussed in the previous section, the Kentucky Supreme Court's opinion addressed two main issues: (i) wavier of the right to appeal the introduction of collateral payment evidence at trial and (ii) the constitu- tionality of KRS section 411.188. This section will first review the court's analysis of the waiver issue, followed by a discussion of each of the four main points addressed by the court in deciding the constitutionality of KRS 411.188.

A. Waiver

The court flatly rejected Hedgespeth's claim that O'Bryan's motion in limine, when denied, failed to preserve the right to object to evidence of collateral source payments. [82] The court took note that O'Bryan elected to go forward with the evidence of collateral source payments once his motion in limine was overruled, rather than leaving it to Hedgespeth to present the evidence. Justice Leibson reasoned that leaving the evidence of collateral source payments to be presented by Hedgespeth, after O'Bryan had concluded his case, would have given the appearance that O'Bryan had attempted to conceal the evidence, which "would have been even more devastating, adding insult to injury." [83] Hedgespeth's counter argument, that the court should not assume that the defendant would have presented evidence of collateral source payments, was rejected by the court. The court responded by holding that "the likelihood the defen- dant would not present this evidence after prevailing against the motion in limine borders on absurdity." [84]

REV_00262735

Justice Leibson then addressed the broader issue of the operation of motions in limine under Kentucky law. In practice, the court noted, the effect of motions in limine on the presentation of evidence and the right to subsequent appeal was "somewhat uncertain" until it was codified in the Kentucky Rules of Evidence section 103(d). [85] The court held that [*367] "the only reasonable interpretation of KRE 103(d) is that, as a general rule, once a motion in limine to exclude evidence has been overruled, a party may go forward with adverse evidence to avoid the appearance of concealment and still 'preserve error for appellate review.'" [86] In support of its holding, the court concluded that "to construe a motion in limine as waived in present circumstances would defeat the purpose of KRE 103(d) and destroy the value of having such a rule." [87]

B. Constitutionality of KRS section 411.188

The issue of the constitutionality of K RS section 411.188 was one of first impression for the Kentucky Supreme Court. [88] The court noted that the main arguments raised against the constitutionality of KRS section 411.188 are similar to arguments rejected by the court of appeals in Ed- wards v. Land. [89] Edwards was followed by the court in deciding the appeal in this case. [90]

1. Section 51 Subject/Title

The first point addressed by the court related to section 51 of the Kentucky Constitution, the "subject/title" clause, which provides, in pertinent part, that "no law enacted by the General Assembly shall re- late to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." [91] The court rejected section 51 as a reason to declare the present statute unconstitutional. [92] The court agreed with the Edwards v. Land analysis of section 51 which held that the subject of the section of the Act, which was codified as KRS section 411.188, was within the ambit of the title of the Act and therefore did not violate section 51 of the Kentucky Constitution. [93]

2. Separation of Powers Doctrine [*368]

The next argument, which formed the basis of the court's holding, centers on the separation of powers doctrine. [94] The argument was based on sections 27, 28 and 116 of the Kentucky Constitution. [95] Sections 27 and 28 divide "the powers of the government . . . into three distinct departments, each . . . a separate body of magistracy" and further speci- fy that no persons, "being of one of those departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others." [96] Section 116 of the Kentucky Constitution vests exclusive jurisdiction in the Kentucky Su- preme Court to prescribe "rules of practice and procedure for the Court of Justice." [97]

The issue of which branch of government is responsible for determin- ing what evidence is relevant is at the heart of the court's holding in O'Bryan. [98] The Kentucky Supreme Court held that the "responsibility for deciding when evidence is relevant to an issue of fact . . . must be judicially determined." [99] Justice Leibson stated that the critical facts in the case were those facts which relate to the expenses incurred by O'Bryan. [100] In addition, the court stated that medical expenses incurred for treatment of personal injuries would fall "squarely within the parame- ters of 'practice and procedure' assigned to the judicial branch by the separation of powers doctrine and section 116." [101]

REV_00262736

Justice Leibson observed that, prior to the enactment of KRS section 411.188, the collateral source rule excluded evidence of payments to the plaintiff from medical or disability insurers as irrelevant. [102] The control- ling authority in Kentucky case law held that such payments had no bearing on the issue of damages the plaintiff had incurred and would be entitled to recover from the wrongdoer. [103] Citing its holding in Burke Enterprises, Inc. v. Mitchell, [104] the court stated that "to depart from the collateral source rule would provide the tort-feasor a 'windfall' to the [*369] substantial detriment of the injured party." [105] In dicta, Justice Leibson stated "there is no legal reason why the tortfeasor or his liability insur- ance company should receive a 'windfall' for benefits to which the plain- tiff may be entitled." [106] The opinion also dismissed the principle criti- cism of the collateral source rule, double recovery by the plaintiff, [107] by holding that any damages recovered by the plaintiff are ordinarily subject to subrogation, as a result "there is no 'double recovery' by any stretch of the imagination." [108]

Justice Leibson noted that collateral source payments should have no bearing on the plaintiff's right to recover damages from the defen- dant. [109] It was the opinion of the court that KRS section 411.188 en- courages juries to disregard the plaintiff's evidence as to the medical bills incurred and to temper their verdict with the irrelevant consideration of collateral source payments. [110]

The court cited Akers v. Baldwin, in which the Kentucky Supreme Court declared a statute that transgressed the court's fact-finding function unconstitutional. [111] The O'Bryan court also cited its recent decision in Ward v. Harding, [112] which reiterated the separation of powers principle that the legislature must not intrude by statute into the judicial preroga- tive. Justice Leibson then concluded that, as a rule of practice and proce- dure, KRS section 411.188 is constitutionally defective under the separa- tion of powers doctrine. [113]

3. Comity $ T The O'Bryan opinion then addressed the principle holding in Edwards v. Land, that KRS section 411.188 should be embraced in lieu of the collateral source rule under the principle of comity. [114] The court defined comity as the judicial adoption of a statute or rule unconstitutionally enacted by the legislature "not as a matter of obligation, but out of defer- ence and respect." [115] Citing Supreme Court Rules, [116] the court de- [*370] clared that the court of appeals had overstepped its authority by utilizing comity as the basis for upholding KRS section 411.188, holding that the decision to accept an otherwise unconstitutional act under the doctrine of comity is reserved to the Supreme Court. [117] Justice Leibson concluded by stating that "once having determined the collateral source payment statute violated the separation of powers doctrine, the Court of Appeals should have ruled the statute unconstitutional." [118]

4. Vagueness

The court also criticized KRS section 411.188 as too vague to be applied fairly. [119] Drawing on the facts of the case, the court provided the following example of the vagaries of KRS section 411.188:

When evidence of collateral source payments totaling $ 30,000 is admitted at trial, and the verdict reduced accordingly because the jury assumes the plaintiff will get the sum awarded, who gets the award? If the plaintiff gets it, the entities who paid collateral source benefits are cut off from their subrogation rights contrary to the statute. On the other hand, if the subrogees now get the $ 18,000 awarded, does the plaintiff who is out-of- pocket $ 18,000 then recover nothing? In this scenario, even if the plaintiff gets nothing and the entities paying collateral source benefits get the $ 18,000 to which they are subrogated, these entities are still out-of-pocket $ 12,000, the difference between $ 30,000 and $ 18,000. [120]

REV_00262737

To further illustrate the point that KRS section 411.188 was vague, the court distinguished KRS section 411.188 from the statute addressed in Commonwealth v. Reneer. [121] Justice Leibson noted that the statute did nothing to enhance the jury's fact-finding function nor did it provide a framework for the jury to relate the evidence received to the amount of damages the plaintiff was entitled to recover. [122] He concluded that the statute only confused the jury with respect to the amount of damages to be awarded to the plaintiff. [123] [*371]

Justice Leibson quickly dismissed the remaining argument which cen- tered on equal protection and due process guarantees found in the Ken- tucky Constitution, sections 2, 59 and 60. [124] The court held that since the statute violates the separation of powers sections of the Kentucky Constitution, it was unnecessary to address the further argument based the equal protection and due process clauses of the Kentucky Constitu- tion. [125]

In summary, the court concluded that KRS section 411.118 was uncon- stitutional and that Edwards v. Land should be overruled. [126] The court ruled that the statute is a violation of the Kentucky constitutional mandate of the separation of powers in state government. [127]

IV. ANALYSIS

The two main holdings of O'Bryan are: (i) a rejected motion in limine is sufficient to preserve the right to appeal, despite the presentation of adverse evidence at trial, and (ii) KRS section 411.188 was an unconsti- tutional abrogation of the collateral source rule. Both holdings establish significant precedent in Kentucky law. The first holding, relating to the practice and procedure of motions in limine, resolves a procedural para- dox in Kentucky civil practice. The second holding restores the tradition- al, common law collateral source rule. The significance of each holding is discussed in detail below.

A. Motion In Limine

A motion in limine is made by a party in an effort to exclude prejudi- cial evidence from being presented at trial. [128] As recently as fifty years ago, the use of motions in limine was not common. [129] However, since the 1980's its use has been reinvigorated, [130] both in civil and criminal cases. [131]

Currently, jurisdictions on both the state and federal level are split on [*372] the requirements needed to preserve an appeal from an adverse ruling on a motion in limine. [132] The majority of jurisdictions take the position advanced by Hedgespeth in the subject case, that a party's pre-trial objec- tion to evidence is waived if that party presents the evidence at trial. [133]

The Kentucky Supreme Court's decision places Kentucky with a mi- nority of states and federal circuits that have adopted the contrary posi- tion. [134] The minority position acknowledges the practical dynamics of a jury trial. [135] Recognizing the precarious position that denial of the mo- tion in limine creates for the movant, minority jurisdictions hold that the movant's right to appeal the denial of his motion is not affected when he introduces the evidence that he previously sought to exclude. [136]

Once a motion in limine is denied, the movant typically wishes to preserve the error for appeal. [137] The general belief is that once evidence is heard by the jury during a trial, the damage is done. [138] The simple fact being, that it is difficult for a jury to ignore what it has already heard, despite instructions by the court to the contrary. [139] In fact, objec- tions to evidence in front of the jury may only tend to focus their atten- tion on it. [140]

As demonstrated in O'Bryan, pre-trial rulings on the admissibility of evidence can drastically alter a party's trial strategy. After having a motion in limine denied by the trial court, O'Bryan was faced with the dilemma of having Hedgespeth present evidence of collateral source payments received by O'Bryan or present the potentially prejudicial evi- dence himself. [141] The risk in allowing Hedgespeth to present the evi- dence, as noted by the court, was that it might appear to the jury that O'Bryan was attempting to hide the payments. [142]

REV_00262738

The Kentucky General Assembly enacted KRE 103(d) and the Ken- [*373] tucky Supreme Court adopted it in 1990 to codify Kentucky's common law. [143] The court's interpretation of KRE 103(d) resolved the trial strat- egy dilemma discussed above. As the court concluded in O'Bryan, "To construe a motion in limine as waived in present circumstances would defeat the purpose of KRE 103(d) and destroy the value of having such a rule." [144]

B. Collateral Source Rule

The main point addressed in O'Bryan was the constitutionality of the statutory abrogation of the collateral source rule by KRS section 411.188. The General Assembly's promulgation of KRS section 411.188 was viewed as a "restrained response" to the perceived liability insurance crisis. [145] It is interesting to note that the Kentucky Insurance and Liabil- ity Task Force, formed by the General Assembly to find solutions to the perceived crisis, specifically found no evidence of a litigation explosion in Kentucky. [146] Absent a pressing need to reform the civil justice sys- tem in Kentucky, at least for the stated reason, KRS section 411.188 lacked a compelling reason to justify the abrogation of the Rule.

Several aspects of the statute were deemed beneficial or "restrained" in relation to statutes enacted in other states. The primary benefit of KRS section 411.188 was that it only required that collateral source payment evidence be presented to the jury for consideration. [147] The statute did not require the jury to automatically reduce an award by the amount of payments received from third party sources. [148] However, as demonstrat- ed by O'Bryan, in practice, KRS section 411.188 caused most juries to automatically reduce an award by the amount of collateral benefits re- ceived, thereby defeating its purported benefit.

Another perceived benefit of KRS section 411.188 was that it reduced the risk of "double recovery." [149] In practice, the risk of double recov- ery is extremely low. Given that plaintiffs' attorneys typically receive contingent fees equal to one third of the damages awarded, and that [*374] insurance companies ordinarily have subrogation rights against the amount awarded to the plaintiff, the net position of the typical plaintiff is less than the amount awarded by the jury. Justice Leibson referred to the reduction in liability for a defendant as a "windfall" [150] and concluded that "there is no 'double recovery' by any stretch of the imagination." [151]

O'Bryan reaffirmed the findings of the court of appeals in both Ed- wards and O'Bryan, [152] that KRS section 411.188 violated the separation of powers doctrine expressed in sections 27, 28, and 116 of the Kentucky Constitution. [153] As discussed above, absent a compelling reason to em- brace the legislative intrusion into an area of judicial authority, O'Bryan strongly rejected the statute on the grounds of judicial comity. [154] The court also pre-empted the use of the doctrine of comity by the lower courts when deciding const itutional issues. [155] Justice Leibson firmly held the following:

The decision whether to give life through comity to a statute otherwise unconstitutional because it violates separation of powers doctrine is one of institutional policy reserved for the Supreme Court level. The responsibili- ty of lower courts, including the Court of Appeals, is to follow the law, which includes constitutional separation of powers doctrine, and to correct error accordingly, even if to do so means declaring a legislative enactment unconstitutional. [156]

The court's decision in O'Bryan is consistent with a recent trend among the states to

REV_00262739

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*30 J. Legal Stud. 383, **

Copyright (c) 2001 The University of Chicago
The Journal of Legal Studies

June, 2001

30 J. Legal Stud. 383

LENGTH: 7590 words

ARTICLE: Subrogation and Insolvency

Alan O. Sykes*

* Frank and Bernice J. Greenberg Professor of Law, University of Chicago. I thank workshop participants at Chicago and the American Law and Economics Association annual meeting for their comments and gratefully acknowledge support from the Lynde and Harry Bradley Foundation and the Sarah Scaife Foundation.

SUMMARY:
... If the insured has already received money from the injurer, the insured may hold such funds in "constructive trust" for the insurer because of the insurer's subrogation rights. ... But it does not follow that such harms should be or are insurable or that the rules of subrogation ought to shift to an insurer the risk that an insured may be unable to collect these awards from a partially solvent injurer. ... The increase in the marginal utility of money caused by the accident increases the amount of insurance coverage that the insured would like to carry to an amount in excess of the pecuniary loss. ... When such underinsurance is coupled with a partially solvent injurer, we again confront the question of whether the insurer or the insured should take first from the injurer's assets. ... Where underinsurance arises for the purpose of reducing moral hazard, we again confront the question of whether the insurer or the insured should take first from the assets of a partially solvent injurer. ... When an accident occurs, the probability that an injurer is liable is [alpha], and the probability that no injurer is liable is (1 - [alpha]). ... In each of the cases considered save one, the optimal insurance contract requires that the insurer be made whole from the assets of the partially solvent injurer before the insured receives anything. ...

ABSTRACT

When tort judgments exceed the assets of tortfeasors and the tort victim has first-party insurance for a portion of the loss suffered, the question arises as to how the recovery from the tortfeasor should be divided between' the tort victim on the one hand and the insurer via its rights of subrogation on the other. A common view among the courts and legal commentators is that the insured should be made whole before the insurer recovers subrogation. This paper employs simple models of optimal insurance contracts to show that the opposite rule will often be optimal. Accordingly, there is little basis for judicial interference with freedom of contract when the insurance agreement provides that the insurer must be made whole before the insured receives any portion of the recovery. The

REV_00262748

Substitute the first constraint into the objective function and formulate the Lagrangean:

L = (1 - p)u[n](z - p[1]C[1] - p[2]C[2]) + p[1]u[a](z - p[1]C[1] - p[2]C[2] - L + C[1] + D) + p[2]u[a](z - p[1]C[1] - p[2]C[2] - L + C[2]) + [lambda][1](L - C[1]) + [lambda][2](L - C[2]).

The Kuhn-Tucker necessary (and sufficient [22] in this case) conditions for an optimum can then be written as

[SEE FORMULA IN ORIGINAL] . (A1)

[SEE FORMULA IN ORIGINAL] (A2)

[*397] [SEE FORMULA IN ORIGINAL] (A3)

[SEE FORMULA IN ORIGINAL] (A4)

L - C[i] >/= 0, [lambda][i] >/= 0, [lambda][i](L - C[i]) = 0. (A5)

Conjecture that the solution is interior. With both coverage levels positive, conditions (A1) and (A3) hold with equality. An interior solution implies further that the [lambda][i] terms equal zero. Divide p[1] out of condition (A1) and p[2] out of condition (A3), then subtract (A3) from (A1) to establish that u'[a](z - [pi] - L + C[1] + D) = u'[a](z - [pi] - L + C[2]). Substituting this result back into condition (A1) further implies u'[n](z - [pi]) = u'[a](z - [pi] - L + C[1] + D) = u'[a](z - [pi] - L + C[2]). (A6)

In words, if the solution is interior, then the marginal utility of money must be equalized across all states of nature. Were it otherwise, the insured could profit by shifting money from a low marginal utility state to a high marginal utility state through adjustments in coverage levels.

Furthermore, condition (A6) establishes that C*[1] = C*[2] - D. In words, the optimal amount for the insurer to receive through subrogation is D, the amount of damages collected from the injurer. This will be true regardless of the value of D--that is, regardless of the degree to which the injurer is insolvent.

Although we have characterized an interior solution, we have not established that the interior solution is feasible (recall that any solution satisfying the necessary conditions is indeed an optimum because the necessary conditions are here sufficient). Its feasibility will depend on the relation between un and ua, as well as on the magnitude of D.

1. Suppose that u'n [identical to] u'a. The optimal contract provides C*[2] = L and C*[1] = max [L - D, 0].

Proof. Condition (A6) implies C*[2] = L (full coverage against pecuniary loss) and C*[1] = L - D. For this solution to satisfy nonnegativity, we must in turn have D </= L--the collectable damages are less than the pecuniary loss. When collectable damages exceed the pecuniary loss L, the optimum becomes C*[1] = 0 (this follows from the fact that condition (A1) is negative evaluated at C[1] = 0 and from the nonnegativity constraint). Q.E.D.

2. Suppose that u'n > u'a, for all w. The optimal contract here provides C*[2] < L and C*[1] = max [C*[2] - D, 0]. It is possible that C*[2] = C*[1] = 0.

Proof. Conjecture once again that an interior solution arises. Condition (A6) again implies that C*[1] = C*[2] - D. It further implies that C*[2] < L because utility is strictly concave. If this solution is to be the optimum, the marginal utility of coverage C[2] must be positive at C

REV_00262757

[2] = 0: from condition (A3), one can deduce that u'n > u'[a](z - L) is necessary. Were it otherwise, the purchase of insurance would transfer wealth from a high marginal utility state to a low marginal utility state. Assuming that C*[2] > 0 (subrogation is uninteresting unless some insurance is purchased), then a contract in which C*[1] = C*[2] - D will be feasible if D < C*[2]. Otherwise, C*[1] = 0 for the same reason as before. Q.E.D.

3. Suppose that u'n < u'a, for all w. The optimal contract requires C*[2] = L and $ y [ILLEGIBLE TEXT].

Proof. Condition (A6) now requires $ y [ILLEGIBLE TEXT], which is impermissible, so C*[2] = L and [lambda][2] > 0. Conditions (A1) and (A3) now imply [398] C[1] > L - D or conceivably C*[1] = L, depending on the degree to which the marginal utility of money in the accident states exceeds the marginal utility of money in the no-accident state. But if the recovery from the injurer exceeds L by a sufficient amount, it is still possible to have C*[1] = 0. Q.E.D.

II. ACTUARIALLY UNFAIR PREMIUMS

The optimal contract in this model will provide that C*[2] < L and C*[1] = max [C*[2] - D, 0].

Proof (Sketch). The solution procedure is as before. Using the analogs to conditions (A1) and (A3) above (the necessary conditions are once again sufficient), one can derive that, for an interior solution, u'(z - [pi] - L + C[1] + D) = u'(z - [pi] - L + C[2]) or that C*[1] = C*[2] - D. This interior solution will be feasible as long as C*[2] - D >/= 0. Intuitively, the insured once again equalizes the marginal utility of money in the accident states if it is possible to do so--the optimality of doing so follows from the fact that the markup per dollar of coverage is the same in both states.

Substituting this result into the analog to condition (A1) and rearranging terms yields, for an interior solution, u'(z - [pi] - L + C[2])/u'(z - [pi]) = (1 - p + [tau] - p [tau])/(1 - p - p [tau]) > 1.

From the concavity of u(w), it follows that C*[2] < L at the optimum. We already know that C*[1] = C*[2] - D as long as the nonnegativity constraint is satisfied. It is trivial to show that C*[1] = 0 otherwise. Q.E.D.

III. MORAL HAZARD

The optimal contract in this model will provide that C*[2] < L and C*[1] = max [C*[2] - D, 0].

Proof. The Kuhn-Tucker sufficiency theorem is not in general satisfied for this problem, but I will assume that the first-order conditions have a unique solution. Substitute the first constraint into the objective function and formulate the Lagrangean:

L = [1 - p(x)]u[z - [alpha] p(x)C[1] - (1 - [alpha])p(x)C[2] + [alpha] p(x)u[z - [alpha] p(x)C[1] - (1 - [alpha])p(x)C[2] - L + C[1] + D] + (1 - [alpha])p(x)u[z - [alpha] p(x)C[1] - (1 - [alpha])p(x)C[2] - L + C[1] + D] - m(x) + [lambda] [[alpha] p'u[z - [alpha] p(x)C[1] - (1 - [alpha])p(x)C[2] - L + C[1] + D] + (1 - [alpha])p'u[z - [alpha] p(x)C[1] - (1 - [alpha])p(x)C[2] - L + C[1] + D] - p'u[z - [alpha] p(x)C[1] - (1 - [alpha])p(x)C[2]] - m'].

It will suffice to write the analogs to conditions (A1) and (A3) above (replacing the expression for [pi] for notational simplicity):

[SEE FORMULA IN ORIGINAL] (A1')

REV_00262758

[*399] and

[SEE FORMULA IN ORIGINAL] (A3')

Conjecture an interior solution. Divide (A1') by [alpha] p and (A3') by (1 - [alpha])p, then subtract (A3') from (A1'). After considerable algebra, one obtains which implies u'(z - [pi] - L + C[1] + D) = u'(z - [pi] - L + C[2]). Again, unless the non-negativity constraint on C[1] prevents it, the insured will want to equalize marginal utility across the accident states, and C*[1] = C*[2] - D.

[u'(z - [pi] - L + C[1] + D) - u'(z - [pi] - L + C[2])][1 + [lambda] p'/p] = 0,

Substituting this result into (A1') yields, again after considerable algebra,

(1 - p)[u'(z - [pi] - L + C[1] + D) - u'(z - [pi])] + ([lambda] p'/[alpha] p)[(1 - p)[[alpha] (1 - [alpha])]u'(z - [pi] - L + C[1] + D) + [alpha] pu'(z - [pi] - L - C[2])] = 0.

The second term is negative, implying that the first term is positive and, hence, u'(z - [pi] - L + C[1] + D) > u'(z - [pi]).

In words, the marginal utility of money in the accident state in which an injurer is liable (equal to the marginal utility in the other accident state for an interior solution) must exceed the marginal utility of money in the no-accident state. Using the concavity of u(w), we can deduce that the wealth of the insured is lower in the accident states. Thus, for the interior solution, we have C*[1] + D = C*[2] < L.

This contract is feasible as long as it obeys the nonnegativity constraint on C[1]. Otherwise (and I omit the details of the derivation), we have C*[1] = 0. Q.E.D.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 Black's Law Dictionary 1595 (4th ed. 1968).

n2 See John F. Dobbyn, Insurance Law in a Nutshell 285-90 (3d ed. 1996). The common-law logic in providing or denying subrogation for different types of policies is interesting in its own right and raises puzzles that are beyond the scope of the analysis here. Life insurers are not entitled to subrogation, for example, on the rather artificial theory that they contract not to cover the economic losses of the insured but rather to pay a stipulated sum in the event of the insured's death--their contract is more of an investment than an insurance contract, it is often said. Id. at 285-86.

n3 Id. at 284.

n4 The issues are addressed in a fine student note, Jeffrey A. Greenblatt, Insurance and Subrogation: Where the Pie Isn't Big Enough, Who Eats Last? 64 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1337 (1997). Greenblatt does not employ the tools of insurance economics used here, however, and thus his analysis is quite different from the analysis in this paper.

n5 Dobbyn, supra note 2, at 293.

n6 See Garrity v. Rural Mutual Insurance Co., 77 Wis. 2d 537, 253 N.W.2d 512 (1977); Rimes v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co., 106 Wis. 2d 263, 316 N.W.2d 348 (1982); Higgin-botham v. Arkansas Blue Cross and Blue Shield, 312 Ark. 199, 849 S.W.2d 464 (1993); Powell v. Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Alabama, 581 S.2d 772 (Ala. 1990). In Powell, for example, the policy provided that "separate from and in addition to the Administrator's right of subrogation . . . the right to reimbursement of the Administrator comes first even if a Member is not paid for all of his claim for damages." 581 S.2d at 774.

n7 See Gibson v. Country Mutual Insurance Co., 193 Ill. App. 3d 87, 549 N.E.2d 23 (1990).

n8 See Magsipoc v. Larsen, 639 S.2d 1038 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1994).

n9 Kenneth S. Abraham, Distributing Risk: Insurance, Legal Theory and Public Policy 155 (1986).

n10 See Rimes v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co.; Higginbotham v. Arkansas Blue Cross and Blue Shield.

n11 Classic treatments of insurance economics may be found in Kenneth J. Arrow, Essays in the Theory of Risk Bearing (1974); Karl H. Borch, Economics of Insurance (1990).

n12 The point has been made by others, including Steven Shavell, Economic Analysis of Accident Law 233-34 (1987). Shavell also notes that there may be a divergence between the optimal damages award for insurance purposes and the optimal award for deterrence purposes. Where, for example, insureds would not desire insurance against nonpecuniary losses, the optimal award for insurance purposes would not include them. Yet because nonpecuniary losses are a real cost of accidents, optimal deterrence may require that injurers bear those costs. There may then arise a case for "decoupling" damages paid from damages received or for using fines paid to the state in lieu of some of the damages paid to victims, particularly if the liability rule is strict liability rather than negligence (the issue does not arise in negligence models for the most part because no one is ever rationally negligent in equilibrium). See id. at 247-54. The results here are very much related to Shavell's on these points.

n13 For an extensive discussion of whether consumers desire to purchase pain and suffering insurance and whether the market is capable of supplying it, see Steven P. Croley & Jon D. Hanson, The Non-pecuniary Costs of Accidents: Pain-and-Suffering Damages in Tort Law, 108 Harv. L. Rev. 1785 (1995).

n14 Thus, my model can be seen as one concerning the optimal level of reimbursement rather than subrogation, but the two are analytically equivalent. The insured can typically collect from both the insurer and the injurer in practice, by the way, because of the "collateral source rule," which holds that an injured party's first-party insurance recovery does not reduce the liability of a tortfeasor.

n15 Some readers may note a connection between this result and the considerable literature on the difference between damages that provide optimal deterrence and damages that provide optimal insurance. Perhaps the leading paper is Steven Shavell, On Liability and Insurance, 13 Bell J. Econ. 120 (1982). Where damages that are optimal for deterrence purposes must exceed damages that are optimal for insurance purposes, some "decoupling" between damages paid by injurers and damages received by victims may be desirable. Litigation costs also factor into such analyses. See, for example, A. Mitchell Polinsky & Yeon-Koo Che, Decoupling Liability: Optimal Incentives for Care and Litigation, 22 Rand J. Econ. 562 (1991).

n16 This point can be found in numerous standard microeconomics textbooks. See, for example, David M. Kreps, A Course on Microeconomic Theory 91-93 (1990); Hal R. Varian, Microeconomic Analysis 180-81 (3d ed. 1992).

n17 Thus, I assume that insurance is actuarially unfair at the margin. By contrast, if actuarial unfairness arose entirely as a fixed cost per policy that did not vary with the amount of coverage purchased, one can readily show that rational insureds would still purchase full coverage if they bought insurance at all. Then, the underinsurance problem essential to the tension between subrogation and insolvency would not arise. The assumption that insurance premia are actuarially unfair at the margin is a realistic one, I believe. As coverage increases, various costs of claims processing seem likely to increase, such as the costs of investigating the validity of claimed casualty losses and valuing them, the costs of processing claims for medical care, and so on.

REV_00262760

n18 A further implicit assumption of the model warrants brief discussion. Note that the markup [tau] is assumed to be the same for coverage in both states in which loss occurs. One could imagine that administrative costs for the insurance company might be higher in the state in which an injurer is liable, however, because of the costs of pursuing subrogation. The markup in that state, therefore, might be assumed to be higher. I do not treat this case in detail here, but it is worth noting that if the markup for coverage in the state in which an injurer is liable exceeds the markup in the other state, the result that the insurer should be made whole before the insured is strengthened. The intuition is that if the marginal price of coverage when an injurer is liable is greater than the marginal price when no injurer is liable, the amount of coverage that an insured will purchase for the state in which the injurer is liable declines relative to the amount the insured will purchase for the state in which no injurer is liable.

n19 On the moral hazard problem generally and some of the devices for dealing with it, see generally Bengt Holmstrom, Moral Hazard and Observability, 10 Bell J. Econ. (1979); Mark V. Pauley, The Economics of Moral Hazard: Comment, 58 Am. Econ. Rev. 531 (1968); Stephen A. Ross, The Economic Theory of Agency: The Principal's Problem, 63 Am. Econ. Rev. 134 (Papers & Proc. 1973); Steven Shavell, On Moral Hazard and Insurance, 93 Q. J. Econ. 541 (1979); Richard Zeck-hauser, Medical Insurance: A Case Study of the Tradeoff between Risk-Spreading and Appropriate Incentives, 2 J. Econ. Theory 10 (1970).

n20 More precisely, the market may have "unraveled" because of insurers' prior experience, which led to losses, premium increases, and the further exodus of low-risk insureds. The classic exposition is Michael Rothschild & Joseph Stiglitz, Equilibrium in Competitive Insurance Markets: An Essay on the Economics of Imperfect Information, 90 Q. J. Econ. 629 (1976). Of course, market solutions to the adverse-selection problem can and do emerge.

n21 This scenario is easy to formalize as well. I will supply the details to any interested readers.

n22 The objective function is strictly concave in the choice variables, and the constraints are linear, so the problem satisfies the Kuhn-Tucker sufficiency theorem. See, for example, Alpha C. Chiang, Fundamental Methods of Mathematical Economics 722 (2d ed. 1974).

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "collateral source rule" and date(aft 1997) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 23, 2001 - 10:05 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

analysis also provides some support for allowing the insurer to take first as a default rule at common law.

TEXT:

[*383] "SUBROGATION" is "the substitution of one person in place of another with reference to a lawful claim." [1] For example, if Blue Cross/Blue Shield pays the medical expenses of a policyholder who has been injured by a negligent driver, Blue Cross/Blue Shield may then have the right to recover those expenses from the negligent party in a subrogation action. If the insured has already received money from the injurer, the insured may hold such funds in "constructive trust" for the insurer because of the insurer's subrogation rights. An action by the insurer against the insured to recover such funds is often termed an action for "reimbursement."

Subrogation rights are common in insurance relationships and may arise by contract or at common law. In most jurisdictions, the common law provides a subrogation right to insurers under property, liability, and some casualty policies. Although subrogation was not generally available at common law in health and medical policies, most such policies now include subrogation [*384] clauses expressly. [2]

When injurers are fully solvent--able to pay damages judgments against them in full--subrogation (or reimbursement) prevents the injured party from achieving a double recovery (one from the insurer and one from the injurer). The public policy against such "windfalls" is an oft-stated rationale for subrogation. [3] An economist might rephrase the policy concern as one for excessive moral hazard that might arise if injured parties actually came out ahead after an accident, as well as one for suboptimal risk bearing that would arise if risk-averse insureds were more than made whole after covered losses. For these reasons, the insurer's right of subrogation is clearly part of the optimal insurance contract when injurers are fully solvent. Similarly, if all of the insured's losses are covered by first-party insurance, subrogation is also plainly optimal (whether or not the injurer is fully solvent) because the insured is made whole by first-party coverage. Any recovery by the insured from the injurer under these circumstances would again be a "double recovery."

The more difficult case--and the case that has been the subject of considerable litigation--arises when the injurer is not fully solvent and the insured's losses are not fully covered by first-party insurance. If the injurer has no assets at all, of course, the nature of subrogation rights is of no consequence. But suppose that an injurer has some assets, though less than the insured's total loss (I will term such injurers "partially solvent"), and that the insured has been made partially whole by first-party insurance benefits. How should the injurer's limited assets be divided between the insurer and the insured? To make it concrete, suppose that an insured has been injured by a negligent driver and a first-party insurer has paid medical bills in the amount of $ 200,000. The insured has no other applicable insurance coverage. The insured obtains a judgment against the negligent driver in the amount of $ 500,000, reflecting the $ 200,000 in medical bills, $ 100,000 in lost wages, and $ 200,000 in pain and suffering. The tortfeasor has assets of $ 200,000. Claiming subrogation rights, the insurer then insists that it is entitled to this $ 200,000. Should such a claim be allowed? At common law? If the insurance contract provides for it? To my knowledge, these issues have not been addressed in the law and economics literature. [4]

The courts have been forced to address them, however, and have come to [*385] no consensus. According to John Dobbyn, "In the absence of stipulations to the contrary in the insurance contract, the majority of courts direct that the insured is to be compensated first . . . to the extent to which his loss exceeds the insurance proceeds." [5] This rule is sometimes called the "made-whole doctrine"--the insured must be made whole before the insurer can recover anything. Dobbyn's statement of the made-whole doctrine suggests that parties to an insurance contract can readily agree to alternative arrangements, but in fact a number of courts insist that the insured be made whole before the insurer receives anything despite a seemingly clear provision to the contrary in the contract. [6] Other courts do allow the insurer to recover first if the contract so provides. [7] Still others have applied a sharing rule that divides the recovery in proportion to the losses borne by the insurer and the insured. [8]

Which of these approaches, if any, is the best? A naive response rests on the simple observation that the insured is risk averse and the insurer is approximately risk neutral. Therefore, one might suggest, optimal risk sharing requires that the insurer recover nothing until the insured has been made whole. Some commentators, including Kenneth Abraham in his well-known insurance treatise, argue from this intuition against any subrogation recovery by the insurer that would impair the insured's ability to obtain full indemnity. [9]

This line of thinking is mistaken, however, for it ignores the question of why the insured was underinsured in the first place. One reason for underinsurance is that risk-averse individuals do not desire insurance against all legally compensable losses--only those losses that cause the marginal utility of money to increase relative to other states of nature. Another reason for underinsurance relates to the fact that the price of insurance often is not "actuarially fair." Underinsurance may also arise because devices such as coinsurance and deductibles are valuable for controlling moral hazard. This paper explores these possibilities with the aid of simple formal models and sets out the optimal subrogation rule for each case.

The analysis suggests that it is optimal under a wide range of circumstances for insurers to be reimbursed in full before insureds receive anything from the partially solvent injurer, even though the consequence is that the insured is not made whole. The details depend on the reason why the insured lacks [*386] full coverage for losses, but the general intuition may be expressed as follows: from the standpoint of optimal risk allocation, the fortuitous presence of an injurer who is liable for the insured's losses does not affect the risk that the insured should optimally bear. Thus, if it is optimal for the insured to bear the risk of uncovered losses associated with accidents in which no injurer is liable, the insured should bear the same risk in accidents in which an injurer is liable. Accordingly, no violence is done to optimal risk sharing if the insurer is reimbursed first by the partially insolvent injurer. The caveats all relate to the possibility that underinsurance is not optimal for the insured, presumably because of some market failure (at least relative to the first best).

The analysis is the same whether the case against the injurer is litigated to conclusion or is settled. I mention the latter group of cases only because they present a special problem for the made-whole doctrine: when an insured settles with a partially solvent injurer, the insured can credibly argue that the settlement amount is less than the amount that a court would have awarded at the conclusion of litigation (because the settlement negotiations took into account the injurer's limited assets) and thus that the settlement is not enough to make the insured whole. Yet because of the settlement, the amount required to make the insured whole will not be independently determined by a court as part of the action against the injurer. As a result, some courts considering reimbursement claims have required a "minitrial" under the made-whole doctrine to determine the insured's loss. [10] If the made-whole doctrine is a mistake, however, such actions are unnecessary.

I will proceed by considering in turn various explanations for the insured's lack of complete coverage against loss. A concluding section gathers the results and summarizes their implications for the law.

I. NONPECUNIARY LOSSES

Insurance markets arise because it is valuable for individuals to shift money from "states of nature" in which the marginal utility of money is low (ordinary situations in which the insured pays premiums) to states in which the marginal utility of money is high (situations in which a covered loss has occurred and the insured receives a positive net payment from the insurance company). Conventional insurance economics further posits that the marginal utility of money is diminishing for individuals and, hence, that the states in which the marginal utility of money is high will ordinarily be the states in which the insured's wealth has suffered a significant decline. [11]

In personal injury cases, however, substantial damages are regularly awarded for nonpecuniary losses, such as pain and suffering. Such awards are defensible [*387] on optimal deterrence grounds, as the social cost of accidents assuredly includes these nonmonetary harms. But it does not follow that such harms should be or are insurable or that the rules of subrogation ought to shift to an insurer the risk that an insured may be unable to collect these awards from a partially solvent injurer.

Indeed, we do not observe pain and suffering insurance in the marketplace, for at least two reasons. First, the monetary value of pain and suffering is not readily ascertainable, and pain is often difficult to verify. Pain and suffering insurance might then create significant moral hazards, at least for certain types of accidents. Second, and perhaps more fundamental, it is hardly clear that the marginal utility of money is higher for people in states of the world in which they experience pain and suffering. If their economic losses (such as medical expenses) in those states are covered by insurance, the marginal utility of additional dollars may well be lower rather than higher in comparison to other states of the world because a person suffering pain may be less able to enjoy consumption expenditures. [12] And if that is the case, it will be irrational for them to reduce their wealth (by paying insurance premiums) in states in which the marginal utility of money is higher in order to receive money in states in which it is lower. A fortiori, the made-whole doctrine will be undesirable at least to the extent that it requires the insurer to forfeit subrogation rights until the insured has been fully compensated for pain and suffering.

This proposition can be illustrated and elaborated using a simple model. Consider an insured who maximizes expected utility. The insured's (Von Neumann-Morgenstern) utility function is un in the "no-accident" state of nature and ua in an "accident" state, where w denotes wealth. The difference in utility across the no-accident and accident states reflects the nonpecuniary loss attributable to the accident. Thus, we imagine that un > ua at every wealth level.

I make the conventional assumption that utility is increasing in wealth but that marginal utility is decreasing in wealth (the utility functions are upward sloping and strictly concave). Let p denote the probability of an accident. If an accident occurs, the probability that an injurer will be held liable is p[1]. The probability that no injurer will be held liable is p[2] (perhaps the injurer [*388] cannot be found, the injurer is not negligent, or the accident is caused by the insured). Thus, p = p[1] + p[2].

In the event of an accident, the insured suffers a pecuniary loss equal to L. The initial wealth of the insured is z. The insured can purchase insurance coverage, and the amount of coverage can depend on whether an injurer is liable for the accident or not. Let C[1] be the amount of coverage when an injurer is liable for the accident, and let C[2] be the amount of coverage when no injurer is liable. In this model, I assume that the price of insurance is actuarially fair (that the expected value of the insurance policy net of premiums paid is zero) and will denote the insurance premium by [pi]. I will further assume that the insured cannot purchase coverage in excess of the pecuniary loss L, an assumption that accords with the fact that we do not observe insurers offering "pain and suffering" insurance in practice. [13]

In the state in which an injurer is liable for an accident, the judgment against the injurer entered by a court is J. The judgment presumably exceeds the pecuniary loss L because it contains an element of compensation for the nonpecuniary loss. The injurer may be only partially solvent, however, so the amount collectable from the injurer is only D </= J. Without loss of generality, I assume that these damages are collected by the insured [14] and that the insurer's "share" in accordance with its subrogation right appears as a reduction in C [1]. Thus, we can interpret C[1] as net coverage, equal to C[2] less the amount received by the insurer in accordance with its subrogation rights when an injurer is liable. By allowing the insured to select C[1] and C[2] freely, I am implicitly assuming that freedom of contract prevails and that the parties to the insurance contract can choose the optimal amount for the insurer to receive through subrogation.

The insured's optimization problem is then to select coverage levels C[1] and C[2] to maximize expected utility, subject to several constraints. This problem can be written as subject to [pi] = p[1]C[1] + p[2]C[2],

[SEE FORMULA IN ORIGINAL]

C[1], C[2] </= L,

C[1], C[2] >/= 0.

[*389] The first constraint states that the insurance premium is actuarially fair (equal to expected payments by the insurer under the policy), so the insurer breaks even on the contract. The second set of constraints states that coverage cannot exceed the pecuniary loss. The third set of constraints states that coverage is nonnegative.

The problem is a nonlinear programming problem. I give the solution in some detail in the Appendix and simply provide a verbal summary of the key results here. The results turn on how the nonpecuniary loss affects the marginal utility of money. Although those effects might be complex in practice, I will consider three simple cases--where the marginal utility of money remains the same, where it falls uniformly, and where it increases uniformly. Optimal values of the choice variables are denoted with an asterisk.

1. Suppose first that u'n [identical to] u'a. That is, suppose the nonpecuniary loss takes the form of some fixed disutility that does not affect the marginal utility of money. (This is true if we can write un = ua + K, where K is a constant.)

In this case, the optimal insurance policy provides full coverage against the pecuniary loss (C*[2] = L). Although I assume that insurance in excess of this amount is unavailable, the insured would not wish to purchase it anyway because coverage equal to the pecuniary loss is sufficient to equalize the marginal utility of money across the no-accident and accident states of nature. Furthermore, the optimal policy requires that any money collected from the injurer be paid to the insurer as reimbursement up to the amount of the pecuniary loss. Any excess over that amount goes to the insured. This leaves the insured with the same marginal utility whether or not an injurer is liable for the accident, except where the amount collected from the injurer exceeds the pecuniary loss. In that event, the insured has a lower marginal utility of money when an injurer is liable, but such a situation is optimal given the nonnegativity constraint on coverage (C[1] >/= 0). [15]

2. Now suppose that the marginal utility of money in the no-accident state exceeds the marginal utility of money in the accident states for given wealth: u'n > u'a, for all w. Intuitively, we might imagine that the accident renders the insured less able to enjoy consumption expenditures (holding wealth constant).

In this case, optimal insurance coverage will be less than the full amount of the pecuniary loss and may be zero. The reason is that the reduction in [*390] the marginal utility of money caused by the accident makes it optimal for the insured to consume more wealth in the no-accident state. Where insurance coverage is positive, the optimal amount for the insurer to receive through subrogation is again equal to the collectable damages or the amount of coverage payable when no injurer is liable, whichever is less--this again equalizes the marginal utility of money across the accident states if possible (subject to the nonnegativity constraint). Thus, as in case 1, the optimal contract requires the insurer to be reimbursed fully for its outlays from the recovery against the injurer before the insured receives anything from the injurer. The made-whole doctrine, which imposes the opposite rule, is clearly suboptimal.

REV_00262752

3. Finally, suppose that the nonpecuniary loss increases the marginal utility of money, holding wealth constant: u'n < u'a, for all w. Perhaps the accident leaves the insured less able to enjoy inexpensive activities such as walking and bicycling, and enjoyment must be found in more costly pursuits.

The increase in the marginal utility of money caused by the accident increases the amount of insurance coverage that the insured would like to carry to an amount in excess of the pecuniary loss. On the assumption that the market will not sell such coverage, the insured will do as well as possible by buying coverage equal to the pecuniary loss. In the accident state in which an injurer is liable, the optimal amount payable to the insurer through subrogation may now be less than before--in effect, if the contract allows the insured to keep some of the collectable damages before the insurer is reimbursed, it may partially overcome the problem caused by the refusal of insurers to sell the insured as much insurance as the insured wishes to purchase.

The difference between this case and the prior two is driven by my assumption that the market will not sell coverage exceeding pecuniary losses, even though such coverage is optimal in a first-best sense. Nothing in the model explains the market's resistance to selling such coverage, but factors outside the model may arise in practice to make coverage for nonpecuniary losses unavailable. Within the model, this problem can be partly overcome as noted by modifying the subrogation provision to allow the insured to obtain more coverage than would otherwise be available in the state in which an injurer is liable.

But this result should not be taken too seriously. First, it is unclear how often the phenomenon that necessitates it--an increase in the marginal utility of money because of an accident--will occur. Second, just as factors outside the model must explain why insurers are unwilling to sell coverage in excess of pecuniary losses, so might they argue against allowing the insured to obtain such coverage in a roundabout fashion through a modification of the subrogation rule. Certainly one can wonder whether a court can do better than the parties to the insurance contract in designing the optimal subrogation [*391] arrangement for these cases. Notwithstanding the result here, therefore, I do not regard it as an argument for judicial interference with freedom of contract (more on this issue in the concluding section). The results as a whole for the nonpecuniary loss model suggest that a rule under which the insurer takes first from any damages collected from the injurer--the rule seemingly written into many insurance contracts in practice--may well be optimal much of the time.

II. ACTUARIALLY "UNFAIR" PREMIUMS

When insurance is actuarially fair, a risk-averse insured will prefer to purchase full coverage against pecuniary losses. The reason relates to the fact that regardless of the amount of coverage purchased, the insured's expected wealth will be the same (the insurance policy has a net expected value of zero). Hence, the risk-averse insured can eliminate all risk, and maintain the same expected wealth, by purchasing full coverage--the insured will surely wish to do so because the elimination of risk, holding expected wealth constant, always raises expected utility for the risk averse.

In reality, of course, the expected value of insurance policies must be negative on average. Insurers have administrative expenses that must be covered, and their shareholders wish to earn a reasonable rate of return on investment. Insurance premiums may also exceed actuarially fair levels because insureds are not perfectly separated by risk category, so at times relatively low risk insureds will be pooled with relatively high risk insureds.

When insurance premiums exceed the expected value of payments to the insured under the policy, insureds may rationally purchase less than full coverage against pecuniary losses. [16] When such underinsurance is coupled with a partially solvent injurer, we again confront the question of whether the insurer or the insured should take first from the injurer's assets.

The formal treatment of this case is much the same as in the last section but simpler, and the notation will remain the same except for the following changes: we no longer need to consider nonpecuniary losses, so the utility function is simply u(w). Furthermore, in the absence of nonpecuniary losses, it is unnecessary to distinguish the judgment from the size of the pecuniary loss. I thus assume that the judgment is now L, the value of the pecuniary loss, and that the amount of damages collectable from the injurer is D </= L.

To capture the notion that insurance premiums exceed the actuarially fair level, I will assume that the premium for each dollar of coverage in each [*392] state carries a "markup" of [tau]. [17] The constraints C[1], C[2] </= L can also be dropped, as they will be seen to be nonbinding at the optimum.

The insured's optimization problem is now

[SEE FORMULA IN ORIGINAL]

subject to [pi] = p[1](1 + [tau])C[1] + p[2](1 + [tau])C[2],

C[1], C[2] >/= 0.

I again sketch the details of the solution in the Appendix. In words, the insured purchases less than full coverage against pecuniary loss in this model. Consequently, the insured will not equalize the marginal utility of wealth across all states of nature but will have a higher marginal utility of wealth in the accident states. The reason is that reductions in risk are accompanied by reductions in expected wealth, and the insured must strike a trade-off between the two. At the optimum, the insured will accept some reduction in expected wealth to reduce risk but does not eliminate risk altogether because it is too costly.

The optimal amount for the insurer to receive through subrogation will equal the damages collectable from the injurer or the total amount of first-party coverage payable for the accident, whichever is less (in other words, the optimal contract will call for the insurer to be made whole before the insured). [18] Intuitively, it makes no sense to purchase more net coverage when the injurer is liable than when no injurer is liable. Instead, subject to the constraint that net coverage can never be negative, it is best to equalize the marginal utility of money across the accident states by ensuring that the insured's net wealth is the same in each.

[*393] III. MORAL HAZARD

When insurers cannot observe the precautionary behavior of their insureds or when courts cannot verify precautionary behavior after the fact, it becomes impossible for insurers and insureds to contract for jointly optimal precautions against loss. And when insurance coverage cannot be conditioned on proper precautions against loss, an externality arises (from the insured's perspective) owing to the existence of insurance--the insured (typically) bears the costs of precautions against loss, but the benefits of those precautions are realized by the insurance company to the degree that the loss is insured. The result is an insufficient incentive for the insured to take precautions, known as "moral hazard."

Various responses to the moral hazard problem can be imagined. In some cases, the insurer could bear the cost of the precautions. In others, some observable and verifiable datum may exist (other than information on the loss itself) that is imperfectly correlated with precautionary behavior, on which coverage can be conditioned in whole or in part. Another response (perhaps in conjunction with those above) is to leave some of the loss on the insured to provide some incentive for the insured to take precautions against loss. [19] Where underinsurance arises for the purpose of reducing moral hazard, we again confront the question of whether the insurer or the insured should take first from the assets of a partially solvent injurer. A variant of the model developed above will allow us to address the issue.

REV_00262754

I will assume that utility takes the form $v(w, x) = u(w) - m(x)$, where $u(w)$ is a strictly concave function of wealth as before, x is a nonmonetary precautionary action that is continuously measurable, and $m(x)$ is the utility equivalent of that action. The probability of an accident is now $p(x)$, a decreasing, convex function (additional precautions reduce the probability of an accident, but at a decreasing rate). The accident causes a pecuniary loss of L, as before. When an accident occurs, the probability that an injurer is liable is [alpha], and the probability that no injurer is liable is (1 - [alpha]). The damages collectable from the injurer are again $D <= L$. In this model, I assume that insurance premiums are actuarially fair.

The insured will select coverage levels C[1] and C[2] and the precaution level x to maximize expected utility. The "first-best" insurance contract would simply maximize expected utility subject to the constraints that premiums be actuarially fair and that coverages be nonnegative. This first-best optimum [*394] is unattainable in practice, however, because the insured cannot be required by contract to choose the first-best level of precautions. Instead, in choosing precautions, the insured will take the level of coverage and the associated insurance premium as parameters and choose a precaution level that is privately optimal. The fact that the insured will behave "selfishly" in this way adds an additional constraint to the problem, which may now be written subject to [pi] = [alpha] p(x)C[1] + (1 - [alpha])p(x)C[2],

[SEE FORMULA IN ORIGINAL]

C[1], C[2] >/= 0,

[SEE FORMULA IN ORIGINAL]

The first constraint states that the insurance premium is actuarially fair. The second constraints are the familiar nonnegativity restrictions on the level of coverage. The third constraint states that the precaution level x must be "incentive compatible"; that is, it must maximize the insured's expected utility taking the level of coverage and the insurance premium as parameters. For simplicity, I assume that the solution entails an "interior" value of x, so additional constraints on its magnitude are unnecessary. I also omit the constraints C [1], C[2] </= L because they will be seen to be nonbinding at the optimum.

Although it is more complicated to derive (see the Appendix), the solution here is almost identical for present purposes to the solution for the model with actuarially unfair premiums. Because of moral hazard, full coverage against pecuniary loss is undesirable. Instead, the insured will bear some loss to induce greater care. The amount of the loss borne by the insured should be the same whether or not an injurer is liable (subject to the nonnegativity constraint on net coverage) to equalize the marginal utility of money to the insured in the accident states. Thus, except where the recovery from the injurer exceeds the amount paid out by the insurer, the amount recovered from the injurer should be paid to the insurer rather than the insured. In all events, the insurer will be made whole before the insured receives any portion of the recovery.

IV. CONCLUSION AND EXTENSIONS

In each of the cases considered save one, the optimal insurance contract requires that the insurer be made whole from the assets of the partially solvent [*395] injurer before the insured receives anything. Such a requirement, of course, is the precise opposite of the made-whole doctrine so prevalent in U.S. courts. All of the results are driven by the fact that the optimal amount of loss for the insured to bear does not vary according to whether an injurer happens to be liable for harms to the insured. Thus, if it were optimal for the insured to collect from the injurer and thereby receive more than the insured's first-party insurance benefits when an injurer is liable, it would also be optimal for the insured to have bought more insurance against the contingency that the same injury would occur under circumstances in which no injurer is liable (or has assets to satisfy a judgment).

The one exception considered in the formal analysis arose in the case in which nonpecuniary losses from the injury increased the marginal utility of money, thereby leading the insured to desire coverage in excess of pecuniary losses, but the insurance market was assumed to be unwilling to sell the insured an amount of coverage that exceeds pecuniary losses. Then, if the insured can collect from the partially solvent injurer before the insurer, the insured can in effect increase coverage in some states of nature toward the level that the insured desires but that the market will not supply.

This last result is generalizable to other circumstances in which the market will not supply the "first-best" amount of coverage. For example, imagine a small company with one or two workers. Perhaps the workers would like to obtain disability insurance against the possibility that an injury will leave them unable to work. Yet it is conceivable that disability insurers will not accept business from such small firms (I have no idea whether this is true in practice) because of the adverse-selection problem--they may be afraid that anyone who applies for insurance will represent an exceptionally high risk. [20] Here again, by allowing the insured to collect from the partially solvent injurer ahead of (say) the insured's health insurer, that insurer in effect sells some of the desired disability insurance that the market will not otherwise supply. [21]

In these types of cases, courts could in theory make insureds better off by allowing them to take first from the assets of a partially solvent injurer. Insurance companies would presumably charge them for the privilege through higher premiums, of course, but by hypothesis insureds are willing to pay a competitive price for such coverage and simply cannot obtain it. Furthermore, the problem is one that, by definition, is unlikely to be susceptible to a contractual solution. Insurers will no more make exceptions to their usual [*396] subrogation provisions to make up for their unwillingness to supply more coverage than they will sell the desired coverage in the first place.

To say that courts can improve matters in theory, however, hardly establishes that they can do so in practice. Most fundamental, how can a court identify insureds who should be able to buy more coverage when insurers are unable to identify them? The same information problems that impede insurers must also afflict courts, and indeed courts may be at an added disadvantage because they lack the actuarial experience and savvy of insurers. If subtle subrogation rules might in theory be used to ameliorate a "market failure" elsewhere, therefore, that failure seems to be one that courts cannot hope to fix in practice.

Furthermore, with reference to the existing state of the law, the made-whole doctrine seems seriously at odds with sound policy. The analysis here suggests that the opposite rule--that the insurer should be made whole first--will be best for insureds except when the insured is unable to purchase efficient amounts of insurance coverage. I can imagine no basis for thinking that that situation is the rule rather than the exception.

These conclusions hold whether the subrogation rights in question arise by operation of contract or at common law. Accordingly, it provides support for a default rule at common law that allows insurers to be made whole first, as well as for the enforcement of express contractual provisions that provide for that arrangement.

APPENDIX

I. NONPECUNIARY LOSSES

REV_00262756

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "mass torts" and ("punitive damages" /5 "jury trial" and "seventh amendment") (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*48 DePaul L. Rev. 479, **

Copyright (c) 1998 DePaul Law Review
DePaul Law Review

Winter, 1998

48 DePaul L. Rev. 479

LENGTH: 14244 words

COMMENTARY: JUDICIAL AVOIDANCE OF JURIES IN MASS TORT LITIGATION

Peter H. Schuck *

* Simeon E. Baldwin Professor, Yale Law School, and John Marshall Harlan Visiting Professor, New York Law School (Spring 1999). Kim DeMarchi, Yale Law School Class of 2000, provided fine research assistance.

SUMMARY:
... The jury casts an immense shadow over mass tort litigation. ... Nevertheless, most defendants in mass tort cases are as eager to avoid a jury trial as plaintiffs say they are to have one. ... Punitive damages, which vastly increase the stakes in the outcome and thus prod risk-averse parties - especially defendants - toward settlement, are possible in mass tort cases, if only because discovery may support an inference that defendants knew (or had reason to know) about the serious risks that they were creating for a large number of people, or even that they actively concealed these risks. ... Because of the long and variable latency periods associated with many mass toxic torts, it is also hard to predict when the future claims will be filed, when the manifestation of injury will transform those future claims into current claims for actual physical harms, and which harms those transformed claims will allege. ... Judges in mass tort litigation have learned how to exploit these and other sources of uncertainty strategically in order to encourage settlements. ... Only this kind of comprehensive or "global" class action can enable mass tort defendants to resolve these claims finally, completely, and (relatively) swiftly through dismissal, summary judgment, or settlement. ...

TEXT:
[*479]

The jury casts an immense shadow over mass tort litigation. On this point, at least, all of the participants - plaintiffs' and defendants' lawyers, their clients, jurors, judges, and commentators - seem to agree. [1]

Plaintiffs and their lawyers are probably the most ardent advocates of the jury trial, at least in their public statements. They ostentatiously maintain that they have total confidence in juries and want nothing more than to get their cases before them. If they can only do so, they assert, the jury will find the plaintiffs' grievous sufferings to be compelling, their claims meritorious, and their corporate opponents culpable, if not criminal. Plaintiffs' lawyers especially value juries in mass tort litigation where, almost by definition, the compensatory effectuation of settlements. [92] This is especially true of asbestos and other mass tort litigation in which the claims' heterogeneity would otherwise generally preclude them from satisfying the commonality and certain other requirements of Rule 23 [93] and its state law counterparts. But what is perhaps more interesting and disturbing to the Supreme Court and some lower appellate courts, [94] as well as to some commentators, [95] is the possibility that class actions are sufficient to induce settlements because of the irresistible incentives that they create for both sides to avoid trial. Plaintiffs' lawyers may be under great presssure to compromise the interests of some members of the class in order to benefit other members - and themselves - through negotiated or court- awarded counsel fees. [96] As we have seen, mass tort defendants who might be bankrupted by an adverse decision in the class action may have little choice but to settle, almost without regard to the claims' merits, precisely because they fear the pervasive uncertainty and the variability of jury decisions in such cases. [97] For these reasons, as well as for the more conventional doctrinal reasons for doubting that Rule [*498] 23 applies to most mass toxic torts, [98] some appellate courts have limited, and sometimes overruled, trial courts' determination to avoid jury trials through class action settlements. [99]

REV_00262762

D. Categorical Exclusions of Evidence

A fourth technique by which courts avoid jury trials in mass tort litigation is their growing willingness to exclude certain types of plaintiffs' evidence from reaching the jury under the Federal Rules of Evidence and in states that have adopted the gatekeeping approach required by the Supreme Court in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. [100]

The problem arises primarily in the case of claims in which the plaintiff complains of a "non-signature" disease like lung cancer that could have more than one possible cause. Such diseases characterize almost all mass tort injuries; the major apparent exceptions are asbestosis and mesothelioma, which seem unique to asbestos exposure, and the vaginal carcinoma that seems distinctive to DES exposure. In the more common instance of a non-signature injury, the courts have struggled to identify the appropriate scientific methodologies for assuring that any admissible evidence will be sufficiently reliable to support findings on the issues of general and specific causation. These struggles have produced some blanket exclusions of evidentiary categories, which can then justify courts in using directed verdicts or motions for summary judgment in favor of defendants in order to avoid jury trials. [101]

The courts have taken a number of approaches to the question of admissibility on the issue of causation, particularly general causation. Sometimes flatly inconsistent, sometimes not, these approaches have the effect of establishing that some mass tort cases will not reach the jury because plaintiffs lack the kind of scientific evidence that can satisfy the court's categorical standards of admissibility in such cases. Most courts favor epidemiological evidence. [102] Because it involves [*499] human populations, it does not suffer from many of the well-known methodological limitations of animal studies, [103] and unlike clinical evidence, which ordinarily cannot distinguish among the various possible causes of a non-signature disease, epidemiological evidence can (at least in principle) isolate the causal contributions of those possible causes by comparing the experiences of large, differentially exposed populations, subject to appropriate controls.

Some courts, such as Judge Weinstein in his decision granting defendants summary judgment in the Agent Orange opt-out cases, [104] have ruled that only epidemiological evidence can prove causation in such cases, which effectively denies many plaintiffs access to a jury. In his view, "all the other data supplied by the parties rests on surmise and inapposite extrapolations from animal studies and industrial accidents" [105] or on clinical evidence that, although identifying the patient's condition, could not demonstrate which of the possible causal agents was responsible for it. [106] For the same reason, the appellate courts in the later, decisive stages of the Bendectin litigation also ruled for defendants, holding that only epidemiological evidence could prove general causation in such cases. [107] More recently, some other courts have taken similar positions categorically excluding non- epidemiological evidence. [108]

REV_00262771

[*500]

IV. Complexity Exception to the Right to Jury Trial?

The technical character of much contemporary litigation has led some commentators to call for the recognition of a complexity exception to the Seventh Amendment right to jury trial in certain types of civil cases in which ordinary lay jurors, selected in the customary manner, are deemed not competent to decide some of the factual issues presented to them. [109] Although a number of courts have rejected this argument, [110] one circuit court has suggested that such an exception may derive from the Due Process Clause, not the Seventh Amendment. [111] The Supreme Court, however, has not accepted this suggestion. Were the Court to recognize such an exception, [112] it could conceivably apply it to mass tort litigation, given the centrality of complex, controversial scientific evidence to the resolution of causation, market share liability, and other issues.

I do not propose to take any position here on the desirability, much less the constitutionality, of a complexity exception in general or on the appropriateness of applying this exception (were the Court to recognize one) to mass torts in particular. For now, I am agnostic on both questions. Nevertheless, I confess to a certain initial skepticism about the wisdom of such a reform, even before considering the implementing detail that might enable one to assess how such an exception would actually work in practice. At this point, I simply want to raise briefly some questions that ought be be asked (and hopefully answered) before one takes a position on the merits of this question.

[*501] First, are mass toxic torts any more complex than many other kinds of litigation that are tried to juries? Antitrust litigation, for example, involves evidence concerning market definition, market shares, and a host of other highly technical questions of economic theory and effects on competition and prices. Securities litigation often involves a long chain of intricate commercial and financial transactions, comprehension of which requires immersion in arcane terminology, practices, and concepts. The same is true of some white collar crime prosecutions under RICO. Patent litigation is also technically demanding, [113] as are medical malpractice cases and litigation involving engineering issues. In short, it is not at all clear that the kind of evidence with which juries must grapple in mass tort cases is any more daunting than the kinds of evidence presented in these other areas of litigation in which juries are routinely used.

Second, how does the growing corpus of empirical research on jury comprehension - much of it conducted by participants in this symposium - bear on this question? The type of litigation studied in this literature that seems most analogous to mass tort cases is probably medical malpractice, which often involves conflicting evidence by scientists, some of it quite technical and statistical. Work by Neil Vidmar, Valerie Hans, and other researchers, however, suggests a high degree of juror comprehension of the evidence in such cases. [114] On the other hand, the evidence in malpractice cases may be more easily understood than in mass tort cases because jurors can often look to testimony on standard medical practice as a kind of benchmark against which the defendant's conduct can be evaluated, whereas such benchmarks may be less readily available to prove product defect in mass tort cases. Even the scientific evidence bearing on causation may be more accessible in malpractice cases, as it too is likely to depend on clinical testimony of a more familiar kind.

A third question concerns the extent to which scientific evidence can be made more comprehensible to jurors through reforms in the trial process. Reformers have long recommended certain adjustments in traditional trial practice designed to facilitate juror comprehension, especially in long trials. Some of these proposed changes would permit jurors to take notes, bring them home with them, and put questions to the lawyers (through the judge). Others would allow the [*502] judge to instruct the jury on general rules of law at the outset of the case and not just at the end, provide the instructions in writing, display documents in evidence on a computer screen or overhead that the jury can view and retrieve, and so forth. Studies are needed of the effects of such innovations on jury comprehension.

REV_00262772

Fourth, can trial lawyers acquire - or do many of them already possess - the forensic skills to humanize and simplify even the most technical scientific evidence so as to make it intelligible to the lay juror? If so, special juries are unnecessary. After all, bringing evidence down to the jurors' level is preeminently the trial lawyer's job; it is what they are trained to do effectively. Some lawyers are better at this than others, of course, but that kind of skill inequality also affects many other aspects of lawyers' performance in all kinds of cases; it is not peculiar to the task of presenting complex evidence.

Finally, which fact-finder would replace the lay jury under a complexity exception for mass tort cases, how would it be selected, and would it be superior to the jury? These are difficult questions, especially since any new fact-finding institution will probably entail some characteristic disadvantages as well as advantages. Consider, for example, replacing the jury with a single judge who, although probably scientifically untrained, might be more sophisticated in the evaluation of expert testimony because the judge is more familiar with it. On the other hand, however, the variance around a "true" finding of fact is likely to be greater for a single judge than for a jury of twelve (or even six) individuals, whose biases would tend to balance and neutralize each other. [115] By the same token, a blue-ribbon jury of technically trained experts, which some commentators have proposed, [116] would surely exhibit their own kinds of "trained incapacities." [117] I am not suggesting that no improvements over the lay jury as fact-finder in mass tort cases are possible, [118] but only that assessing whether a particular change does indeed constitute an improvement may ultimately be as much a normative question (deciding which of the alternative sets of tradeoffs is best on balance) as it is an empirical one that "legal science" can answer.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. Peter H. Schuck, Mass Torts: An Institutional Evolutionist Perspective, 80 Cornell L. Rev. 941, 977 (1995) (stating that trial lawyers, judges, and litigants tend to respect juror fact-finding, which carries enormous normative force in American legal and political culture).

n2. Michael L. Rustad, Unraveling Punitive Damages: Current Data and Further Inquiry, 1998 Wis. L. Rev. 15.

n3. Although good data on this question are lacking, defendants appear to be successful in many, possibly even most, of the mass tort cases that go to trial. In this respect, asbestos cases in recent years constitute an exception. Plaintiffs, of course, have won victories at trial in many other mass tort cases, especially those involving defective products such as DES, thalidomide, and heart valves.

n4. For a useful, but tendentious, explanation of this phenomenon, see Peter Huber, Junk Science and the Jury, 1990 U. Chi. Legal F. 273.

n5. This is primarily due to the intangible component of both compensatory and punitive damages and the lack of meaningful legal guidance or constraint for juries in assessing either type - other than the prospect of post-trial remittitur or court-reduced judgments, procedures of which jurors are presumably ignorant. See Kenneth S. Abraham, What is a Tort Claim?: An Intepretation of Contemporary Tort Reform, 51 Mo. L. Rev. 172, 177-78 (1992)

REV_00262773

(noting that a successful tort claimant is entitled to recover unlimited damages).

n6. As Judge Richard Posner put it in rejecting a class certification:

They [defendants in mass tort cases] may not wish to roll these dice. That is putting it mildly. They will be under intense pressure to settle.... Judge Friendly, who was not given to hyperbole, called settlements induced by a small probability of an immense judgment in a class action blackmail settlements.

In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 1298 (7th Cir. 1995).

Posner's observation seems correct; it is difficult to find any other explanation for the willingness of defendants to pay enormous sums - the breast implant and tobacco litigation are only the most recent and dramatic examples - to settle claims with little scientific basis or subject to strong legal defenses. The same can be said of the Agent Orange class action settlement to which the defendant chemical companies agreed despite the court's findings, affirmed in this respect by the appellate court, that both their factual defenses (on causation) and their legal defenses (e.g., the government contract defense) were not merely strong but dispositive. See Peter H. Schuck, Agent Orange on Trial: Mass Toxic Disasters in the Courts (enlarged ed., 1987). Although the $ 180 million settlement amount, approved in 1984, seems trifling compared to the settlement amounts proposed in recent years, it was the largest mass tort settlement up to that time.

n7. Shari S. Diamond, What Jurors Think, in Verdict: Assessing the Civil Jury System 282, 285-86 (Robert E. Litan ed., 1993) (discussing studies that indicate jurors report a favorable attitude toward jury duty after serving).

n8. Dan Drazen, The Case for Special Juries in Toxic Tort Litigation, 72 Judicature 292, 294 (1989) (arguing that toxic tort litigation is too complex for lay jurors); see The Jury's Capacity to Decide Complex Civil Cases, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 1489 (1997).

n9. E.g., Paula L. Hannaford et al., How Judges View Civil Juries, 48 DePaul L. Rev. 247, 248- 52 (1999). Thomas Munsterman and Nancy King noted at the Clifford Symposium many judges' markedly paternalistic attitudes toward "their" juries.

My own impression, formed through confidential conversations with mass tort judges, is that their private views of juries are often more critical than they are prepared to state publicly. This impression may or may not be inconsistent with the upbeat survey data, depending on whether judges responding to surveys consider their responses "public" in a sense, even when they will be treated as anonymous.

n10. The Agent Orange litigation vividly illustrates all of these difficulties. See Schuck, supra note 6.

n11. In doing so, of course, they are in a sense pushing against an open door, given the incentives of both plaintiffs' and defendants' lawyers to settle cases before trial. See infra text accompanying notes 20-35.

n12. Schuck, supra note 6.

n13. Michael D. Green, Bendectin and Birth Defects: The Challenges of Mass Toxic Substances Litigation (1996).

n14. Richard B. Sobol, Bending the Law: The Story of the Dalkon Shield Bankruptcy (1991).

REV_00262774

n15. Kai Erikson, Everything In Its Path: Destruction of Community in the Buffalo Creek Flood (1976); Gerald M. Stern, The Buffalo Creek Disaster (1976).

n16. Jonathan Harr, A Civil Action (1995).

n17. According to a communication with the author from Deborah Hensler, Director of the Institute for Civil Justice, RAND, in May 1998, it appears that there are no data on the proportion of mass tort cases, as distinct from other kinds of cases, that go to trial.

n18. Marc Galanter & Mia Cahill, Most Cases Settle: Judicial Promotion and Regulation of Settlement, 46 Stan. L. Rev. 1339, 1340 (1994) (citing Herbert Kritzer, Adjudication to Settlement: Shading in the Gray, 70 Judicature 161, 163-64 (1986)) (stating that in an analysis of 1,649 cases in five federal circuits and seven state courts, only 7% of cases went to trial and reached a jury verdict or court decision); see Michael Saks, Do We Know Anything About the Behavior of the Litigation System and Why Not?, 140 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1147 (1992).

n19. See Schuck, supra note 1, at 987.

n20. See supra text accompanying notes 3-6.

n21. E.g., James S. Kakalik et al., Variations in Asbestos Litigation Compensation and Expenses (Institute for Civil Justice, RAND Corp., No. R-3132-ICJ, 1984).

n22. Francis E. McGovern, Resolving Mature Mass Tort Litigation, 69 B.U. L. Rev. 659 (1989); Schuck, supra note 1, at 948-62.

n23. This was the pattern of tobacco litigation until 1997 when the unprecedented and unexpected agreement between the industry, states, and plaintiffs' lawyers dramatically altered the situation. Gary T. Schwartz, Tobacco Liability in the Courts, in Smoking Policy: Law, Politics and Culture 131 (Robert L. Rabin & Stephen D. Sugarman eds., 1993). In the wake of the collapse of that agreement and some new legal and political developments favorable to the industry's position, the states' claims were settled on terms much more favorable to the industry.

n24. For example, this was the pattern of the Bendectin and silicone gel breast implant litigations.

n25. Geressy v. Digital Equip. Corp., 980 F. Supp. 640, 660-74 (E.D.N.Y. 1997).

n26. Id. at 664-74.

n27. Shari S. Diamond et al., Juror Judgments about Liability Damages: Sources of Variability and Ways to Increase Consistency, 48 DePaul L. Rev. 301 (1999).

n28. See, e.g., Ealy v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 897 F.2d 1159 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (reversing $ 95,000,000 verdict); Richardson v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 857 F.2d 823 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (affirming district court's grant of j.n.o.v. on $ 1,000,000 verdict); Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., v. Havner, 953 S.W.2d 706 (Tex. 1997) (reversing $ 33,750,000 verdict); Blum v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., 560 A.2d 212 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1989) (affirming $ 19,200,000 verdict), aff'd, 626 A.2d 537 (Pa. 1993); Oxendine v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., 506 A.2d 1100 (D.C. App. Ct. 1986) (reversing trial court's grant of j.n.o.v. on $ 750,000 verdict).

n29. See, e.g., Dow Chem. Co. v. Mahlum, Civ. No. 28,600 (2d Dist. Nev. Nov. 7, 1995) (returning a verdict of $ 12 million); Gina Kolata, Panel Can't Link Breast Implants to Any Diseases, N.Y. Times, Dec. 2, 1998, at A1.

REV_00262775

n30. Statistically, such a situation exists when the mean outcome promises to be far higher than the median one.

n31. This, of course, is precisely the kind of situation to which Judge Posner refers in the passage cited earlier. See Abraham, supra note 5.

n32. Michael D. Green, The Inability of Offensive Collateral Estoppel to Fulfill its Promise: An Examination of Estoppel in Asbestos Litigation, 70 Iowa L. Rev. 141 (1994).

n33. I do not mean to suggest that this financial self-interest is the only, or even the primary, motive animating defense lawyers, who are presumably as scrupulous about their duties toward their clients (and to the court) as any fiduciaries confronted with such conflicts.

n34. See George L. Priest & Benjamin Klein, The Selection of Disputes for Litigation, 13 J. Legal Stud. 1 (1984). This important article has spawned a significant, often critical literature. See, e.g., Orley Ashenfelter et al., Politics and the Judiciary: The Influence of Judicial Background on Case Outcomes, 24 J. Legal Stud. 257 (1995); Theodore Eisenberg, Testing the Selection Effect: A New Theoretical Framework with Empirical Tests, 19 J. Legal Stud. 337 (1990).

n35. See, e.g., Peter H. Schuck, The Role of Judges in Settling Complex Cases: The Agent Orange Example, 53 U. Chi. L. Rev. 337 (1986) (analyzing the judge's role in settling complex civil cases like Agent Orange cases).

n36. Owen M. Fiss, Against Settlement, 93 Yale L.J. 1073 (1984) (arguing that because consent is often coerced and bargaining is done without authority, settlement is a highly problematic technique for streamlining dockets, which often results in injustice).

n37. Schuck, supra note 1, at 961.

n38. Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734 (5th Cir. 1996); In re American Med. Sys., Inc., 75 F.3d 1069 (6th Cir. 1996).

n39. E.g., Amchen Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 117 S. Ct. 2231 (1997); In re General Motors Corp. Pick-Up Truck Fuel Tank Prod. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768, 818-19 (3d Cir. 1995).

n40. Lexecon, Inc. v. Milberg, Weiss, Bershad, Hynes & Lerach, 118 S. Ct. 956 (1998).

n41. I say "complicated" rather than "blocked" because while these decisions ostensibly make global settlements more difficult, the decisions may in other respects tend to encourage settlements, and it is not at all clear how settlement on balance will be affected.

n42. See, e.g., William W. Schwarzer, Settlement of Mass Tort Class Actions: Order Out of Chaos, 80 Cornell L. Rev. 837 (1995).

n43. Civil Justice Reform Act of 1990, 28 U.S.C. 471-82 (1997).

n44. This is especially likely after the Supreme Court's decision in Amchen Products, 117 S. Ct. 2231, but it was true even before Amchen Products. See, e.g., In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 982 F.2d 721, 739-45 (2d Cir. 1992).

n45. Green, supra note 32, at 197.

n46. This encourages them to render what Chief Judge Richard Posner has called a "kind of Esperanto instruction" to the jury. In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 1300 (7th Cir. 1995).

REV_00262776

n47. The asbestos litigation helped precipitate some bankruptcies among many manufacturers. See Peter H. Schuck, The Worst Should Go First: Deferral Registries in Asbestos Litigation, 15 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y 541, 555 (1992). A.H. Robins Co. filed for bankruptcy in the Dalkon Shield litigation. See Sobol, supra note 14. Dow Corning filed for bankruptcy in the silicone gel breast implant litigation. In re Dow Corning Corp., No. 95-20512, 1995 WL 49597, at *3 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. Aug. 9, 1995).

n48. E.g., Wayne D. Brazil, Special Masters in Complex Cases: Extending the Judiciary or Reshaping Litigation, 53 U. Chi. L. Rev. 394, 394-98 (1986).

n49. In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 611 F. Supp. 1223, 1260 (E.D.N.Y. 1985), aff'd on other grounds, 818 F.2d 187 (2d Cir. 1987).

n50. Turpin v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., 959 F.2d 1349, 1361 (6th Cir. 1992); Christopher v. Allied-Signal Corp., 902 F.2d 362, 368 (5th Cir. 1990).

n51. E.g., Peter Huber, Galileo's Revenge: Junk Science in the Courtroom (1991); David E. Bernstein, Junk Science in the United States and the Commonwealth, 21 Yale J. Int'l L. 123 (1996).

n52. Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 597 (1993).

n53. General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 118 S. Ct. 512, 514 (1997).

n54. The Supreme Court has pressed the lower courts to grant summary judgment more liberally, including in mass tort cases. See Celotex Corp. v. Carrett, 477 U.S. 317 (1986).

n55. The canonical article is Judith Resnik, Managerial Judging, 96 Harv. L. Rev. 376 (1982). For subsequent evolution in this area, see Judith Resnik, From "Cases" to "Litigation," Law & Contemp. Probs., Summer 1991, at 5.

n56. Schuck, supra note 1, at 956-58.

n57. See, e.g., In re Bendectin Litig., 857 F.2d 290, 307 (6th Cir. 1988) (trifurcation); see Kenneth S. Bordens & Irwin A. Horowitz, Mass Tort Civil Litigation: The Impact of Procedural Changes on Jury Decisions, 73 Judicature 22 (1989).

n58. Robert G. Bone, Statistical Adjudication: Rights, Justice, and Utility in a World of Process Scarcity, 46 Vand. L. Rev. 561, 563 (1993).

n59. Schuck, supra note 1, at 958-60.

n60. See Green, supra note 32.

n61. Judge Weinstein jolted the lawyers with an early trial date in the Agent Orange litigation, Schuck, supra note 6, at 113, 118-19, but its effects on settlement negotiations in all cases are well-understood by even novice trial judges.

n62. The greater prominence of federal judges than their state court counterparts is by no means limited to mass tort litigation. However, it is regrettable and especially misleading in this area where most cases - more than two-thirds of the asbestos cases, for example - are litigated in the state courts, the administrative resources available to the state judges are invariably more limited, and the state law rules - on class actions and damages, for example

REV_00262777

- often differ significantly from the federal rules.

n63. The judicial resources required by the Agent Orange litigation, the first of its kind, were staggering, Schuck, supra note 6, at 4-5, but it was ultimately litigated and settled largely as a single, consolidated case. Partly for this reason, the fragmented asbestos litigation has demanded far more of the courts. This was readily apparent early on. Report of the Judicial Conference Ad Hoc Committee on Asbestos Litigation (Mar. 1991).

n64. Brazil, supra note 48, at 396-97.

n65. Schuck, supra note 6, at 5.

n66. For example, special masters have sometimes been used to determine defendants' solvency, which helped to guide the judges' decisions about whether the preconditions for the use of a mandatory class action were satisfied. Marvin Frankel, a former federal judge, performed this function for Judge Weinstein in the asbestos litigation.

n67. The most prominent practitioners of these arts are Francis McGovern and Kenneth Feinberg, who have performed as special masters in many of the leading mass tort litigations.

n68. Sobol, supra note 14.

n69. Schuck, supra note 6.

n70. Harr, supra note 16.

n71. Disputes between corporate defendants and their insurance carriers over liability coverage of mass tort claims have been common and protracted in the asbestos and silicone gel breast implant litigations, among others. Green, supra note 32, at 160.

n72. Liability insurance policies usually do not cover punitive damages.

n73. Such knowledge and concealment have been alleged in the tobacco, asbestos, and silicone gel breast implant litigations, among others.

n74. See Special Issue: The Future of Punitive Damages, 1998 Wis. L. Rev. 1.

n75. This tendency may be increased by recent amendments to the Internal Revenue Code that make punitive damage awards in personal injury cases taxable to the recipient as income while compensatory damages are not taxable. I.R.C. 104 (1998).

n76. Judge Jack R. Weinstein suggested during his remarks entitled The Future of Class Actions in Mass Tort Cases: A Roundtable, presented at Fordham Law School on September 25, 1997, that courts can use Rule 706(b) panels to help them estimate the parameters of future claims.

n77. See Schuck, supra note 6, at 205-06. In the tobacco and breast implant litigations, this underestimation was so large that it helped to undo the original global settlements. In global settlements such as the one in the asbestos litigation invalidated in Amchen Products, Inc. v. Windsor, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 2251 (1997), defendants therefore insist on provisions enabling them to opt-out in the event that the number of future claims exceeds certain levels. See Schuck, supra note 1, at 967-68.

n78. Priest & Klein, supra note 34, at 4.

REV_00262778

n79. Schuck, supra note 35, at 343.

n80. See discussion and examples in Helen E. Freedman, Class Actions for Mass Torts in State Courts: A State Court Judge's Response to Professor Vairo, N.Y. Litigator, May 1998, at 13.

n81. 117 S. Ct. 2231. The Supreme Court recently heard oral arguments in another case challenging the certification of an asbestos class action. Ortiz v. Firbreboard Corp., 118 S. Ct. 2339 (1998).

n82. See, e.g., Richard Nagareda, In the Aftermath of the Mass Tort Class Action, 85 Geo. L.J. 295, 301-09 (1996) (noting that before Amchen Products that de-certifications had already been ordered in litigation involving tobacco, prosthetic devices, and blood products). For other decertifications, see Freedman, supra note 80.

n83. Amchen Prods., Inc., 117 S. Ct. at 2251-52. After Amchen Products, some federal trial courts took the initiative to decertify classes that they had previously certified and to refuse to certify classes. See, e.g., Walker v. Liggett Group, Inc., 175 F.R.D. 226, 233 (S.D. W. Va. 1997); Georgene M. Vairo, Amchen Products, Inc. v. Windsor: Where Will the Mass Tort Class Actions Go?, N.Y. Litigator, May 1998, at 6. Federal courts of appeals decertified many of those that remained. Id. at 8 n.37. In the Ortiz case, now pending in the Supreme Court, the Fifth Circuit reaffirmed its class certification. In re Asbestos Litig., 134 F.3d 668 (5th Cir. 1998).

n84. For dissenting views, see Richard A. Epstein, The Consolidation of Complex Litigation: A Critical Evaluation of the ALI Proposal, 10 J.L. & Com. 1 (1990); Roger H. Transgrud, Mass Trials in Mass Tort Cases: A Dissent, 1989 U. Ill. L. Rev. 69.

n85. See supra note 6.

n86. I use the qualifier "often" because a mass tort defendant's calculation of whether it would be better off defending in a class action (which of course can take a variety of quite different forms, even within a particular Rule 23 type) instead of in a large number of individual actions, or in some non-class form that aggregates claims, is a complicated one that depends on a variety of factors often cutting in different directions. The decision by a plaintiffs' lawyer as to whether to seek class certification, and if so in which form, is similarly complicated.

n87. In the case of settlement class actions, of course, the settlement occurs simultaneously with the certification, not later. The viability of settlement class actions, however, has been called into question by the Amchen Products decision, at least in the circumstances presented there.

n88. When Congress in 1995 amended the Securities Act, 15 U.S.C. 77z-1 (1995), to impose a variety of new obstacles to maintaining securities class actions in the federal courts, the plaintiffs' lawyers responded by filing their cases in state courts, where such limitations did not apply. As a result, Congress recently enacted legislation that seeks to overcome these strategies by imposing similar restrictions on such class actions in state courts. Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act of 1998, Pub. L. No. 105-353, 112 Stat. 3227.

n89. Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797 (1985).

n90. Matsushita Elec. Ind. Co. v. Epstein, 516 U.S. 367 (1996).

n91. For a discussion of New York's more conservative approach to class actions, see Freedman, supra note 80, at 14.

REV_00262779

n92. Nagareda, supra note 82, at 309.

n93. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.

n94. In re General Motors Corp. Pick-Up Truck Fuel Tank Prod. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768, 784 (3d Cir. 1995); Nagareda, supra note 82, at 308.

n95. See, e.g., Paul D. Carrington & Derek P. Apanovitch, The Constitutional Limits of Judicial Rulemaking: The Illegitimacy of Mass-Tort Settlements Negotiated Under Federal Rule 23, 39 Ariz. L. Rev. 461 (1997); John C. Coffee, Jr., Class Wars: The Dilemma of the Mass Tort Class Action, 95 Colum. L. Rev. 1343 (1995).

n96. See, e.g., Amchen Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 2251 (1997); Coffee, supra note 95, at 1384.

n97. See In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 1299 (7th Cir. 1995).

n98. See, e.g., Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734, 740-52 (5th Cir. 1996); In re American Med. Prods., 75 F.3d 1069, 1078-83 (6th Cir. 1996). In contrast, mass accident cases such as airline disasters or fires can more easily satisfy Rule 23's requirements.

n99. See Amchen Prods., Inc., 117 S. Ct. at 2252; General Motors, 55 F.3d at 818-19; Nagareda, supra note 82. But see In re Asbestos Litig., 134 F.3d 668 (5th Cir. 1998).

n100. 509 U.S. 579, 592-95 (1993).

n101. In theory, a court in a mass tort case could grant a dispositive motion in favor of the plaintiff, but I am unaware of any such case. Even with a signature disease like mesothelioma, other issues such as product identification, adequate warning, or comparative fault are likely to remain for the jury to decide.

n102. In order for the epidemiological evidence to be admissible, of course, it is not sufficient that the particular evidence be of the categorically favored type. In addition, it must satisfy the other judicial criteria of relevance, probity, and reliability that normally apply to such evidence. See, e.g., Hall v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 947 F. Supp. 1387, 1398 (D. Or. 1996) (requiring epidemiological evidence, but also requiring, as courts typically do, that such evidence demonstrate at least a doubling of the background risk before it can be admitted to prove general causation under the conventional preponderance of the evidence standard); see Lopez v. Wyeth- Ayerst Labs, No. 97-15143, 1998 WL 81296, at *2 (9th Cir. 1998) (finding analytical gap between epidemiological and other studies and conclusions).

n103. As is equally well known, of course, epidemiological studies suffer from their own distinctive limitations, especially the notorious difficulties of cost, of obtaining accurate exposure data, and of controlling for all of the variables other than exposure to the agent in question that might have affected the observed condition in the exposed population.

n104. In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 611 F. Supp. 1223, 1264 (D.C.N.Y. 1985).

n105. Id. at 1231. For a partial critique of Judge Weinstein's approach to this issue, see Schuck, supra note 6, at 234-44.

n106. Agent Orange, 611 F. Supp. at 1231-35.

n107. In the Bendectin litigation, this evidence failed to demonstrate general causation. See Ealy v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 897 F.2d 1159, 1160-62 (D.C. Cir. 1990); Richardson v.

REV_00262780

damages may be quite large. Although punitive damages are rare, [2] especially in mass torts, they are always an alluring possibility to plaintiffs' lawyers, especially where incriminating corporate documents can be unearthed and paraded before the jury. In a single stroke, then, the mass tort jury can render justice to the plaintiffs and enrich their lawyers.

Regardless of what plaintiffs' lawyers say in public, however, most would strongly prefer to settle. After all, even the credible threat of a jury trial can induce mass tort defendants to settle before trial, thereby enabling plaintiffs to gain their judgments and the lawyers to obtain their fees (and also to burnish their reputations in ways that translate into greater bargaining power with future clients and defendants) without incurring the high costs of trial and the substantial risks of defendant verdicts or reversal on appeal. [3]

[*480] Defendants' lawyers also praise the institution of the civil jury. Most defendants, one suspects, genuinely believe in the correctness of their legal arguments and respect the intelligence and fairness of jurors as factfinders. Moreover, they often succeed in persuading juries. Nevertheless, most defendants in mass tort cases are as eager to avoid a jury trial as plaintiffs say they are to have one. The reason is that these defendants confront the overriding, remorseless logic of the law of small numbers. Even those that feel confident that juries will support their positions actually experience relatively few trials. As a result, the variability in trial outcomes - even assuming that the underlying facts are identical - may be significant. [4] And because this variability is linked to a tort system in which juries may award virtually unlimited damages, [5] most mass tort defendants can successfully defeat almost every claim, yet still be threatened with bankruptcy if even a single adverse jury decides to impose ruinous liability. [6]

Jurors are seldom heard from on the issue of how well they think juries perform - or indeed on any other subject relating to their service. Studies confirm what common experience teaches - that jurors [*481] overwhelmingly take pride and satisfaction in the experience. [7] Even so, mass tort trials tend to be very protracted, tedious, and technical, and it would therefore be surprising indeed if jurors in many cases did not share the view of some legal commentators that lay juries cannot comprehend such cases, much less fairly and reasonably decide them. [8] The fact that other fact-finding entities may be no better at the task, of course, does not necessarily mean that these doubts about jury competence are unfounded.

Judges, when asked publicly for their assessment, almost invariably extol the virtues of juries. [9] Nevertheless, judges admit to deep concerns about the long delays, crowded dockets, and high transaction costs of mass tort litigation. They are also concerned about the problems for courts and litigants occasioned by the large number of related claims in mass torts - the inconsistent verdicts; the first-come, first-served distribution of the often inadequate resources available for compensation; the legal uncertainties; the daunting procedural requirements; the compromise of individual rights; the unfairness of bundling together strong, weak, and frivolous claims; and the unusual administrative demands that they impose. [10]

However genuine the judicial assurances of confidence in the civil jury system may be, a more striking fact is that they have devised remarkably effective ways to keep mass tort cases away from juries. [11] My comments will elaborate on this theme of judicial jury avoidance. Specifically, I wish to touch on four aspects of this phenomenon: (1) the infrequency of jury trials; (2) the judicial motives for jury avoidance; (3) the judicial techniques of jury avoidance; and (4) the possi [*482] bility of a "complexity exception" to the right to a jury trial in mass tort cases. Needless to say, there is a great deal more to be said on each of these points than I can discuss in these brief comments.

Before turning to this discussion, however, let me frame it with a few preliminary observations designed to narrow somewhat the focus on mass torts. First, it is important for some purposes to distinguish three types of mass tort cases: accidents (e.g., airline

REV_00262763

Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 649 F. Supp. 799, 803 (D.C. Cir. 1986), aff'd, 857 F.2d 823, 831-32 (D.C. Cir. 1988).

n108. See, e.g., In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 52 F.3d 1124, 1137 (2d Cir. 1995); Grimes v. Hoffman-LaRoche, Inc., 907 F. Supp. 33 (D.N.H. 1995); Ambrosini v. Upjohn Co., 1995 WL 637650, at *8 (D.D.C. 1995); cf. Sanderson v. International Flavors & Fragrances, Inc., 950 F. Supp. 981, 1002 (C.D. Cal. 1996); Mascarenas v. Miles, 968 F. Supp. 582 (W.D. Mo. 1997); Nelson v. American Sterilizer Co., 566 N.W.2d 671, 673-76 (Mich. Ct. App. 1997).

On the other hand, some courts have seemed to reject this categorical evidentiary rule, admitting non-epidemiological evidence, at least in situations in which no epidemiological studies were available. E.g., Zuchowitz v. United States, 140 F.3d 381, 387 (2d Cir. 1998); Ambrosini v. Labarraque, 101 F.3d 129, 141 (D.C. Cir. 1996); Graham v. Playtex Prods., Inc., 993 F. Supp. 127, 131-32 (N.D.N.Y. 1998); Lakie v. Smithkline Beecham, 965 F. Supp. 49, 56-58 (D.D.C. 1997). In the same spirit, other courts have declined to accord any special preference to, much less require, epidemiological evidence. E.g., Benedi v. McNeil-P.P.C., Inc., 66 F.3d 1378, 1384-85 (4th Cir. 1995); National Bank of Commerce v. Dow Chem. Co., 965 F. Supp. 1490, 1493-97 (E.D. Ark. 1996); Casey v. Ohio Med. Prods., 877 F. Supp. 1380, 1385 (N.D. Cal. 1995); Bowers v. Northern Telecom, Inc., 905 F. Supp. 1004, 1010-13 (N.D. Fla. 1995); Pick v. American Med. Sys., Inc., 958 F. Supp. 1151, 1158 (E.D. La. 1997); Vice v. Northern Telecom, Inc., Civ. No. 94-1235, 1996 WL 200281, at *7 (E.D. La. 1996); Valentine v. Pioneer Chlor Alkali Co., 921 F. Supp. 666, 673 (D. Nev. 1996); Callahan v. Cardinal Glennon Hosp., 863 S.W.2d 852, 860 (Mo. 1993).

n109. See, e.g., Note, The Right to a Jury Trial in Complex Civil Litigation, 92 Harv. L. Rev. 898, 900-04 (1979). Lord Devlin has shown that especially complex cases were sometimes retained by the Chancellor in equity. Patrick Devlin, Jury Trial of Complex Cases: English Practice at the Time of the Seventh Amendment, 80 Colum. L. Rev. 43, 63 (1980).

n110. E.g., SRI Int'l v. Matsushita Elec. Corp. of America, 775 F.2d 1107, 1117 (Fed. Cir. 1985); In re United States Fin. Sec. Litig., 609 F.2d 411, 424-31 (9th Cir. 1979).

n111. In re Japanese Elec. Prods. Antitrust Litig., 631 F.2d 1069, 1084 (3d Cir. 1980).

n112. The Court recently had an opportunity to do so in Markman v. Westview Instruments, Inc., 116 S. Ct. 1384, 1389-92 (1996), a patent case, but the Court there did not discuss the complexity exception issue.

n113. See, e.g., id. at 1393-96 (discussing cognate issue).

n114. Joe S. Cecil et al., Citizen Comprehension of Difficult Issues: Lessons from Civil Jury, 40 Am. U. L. Rev. 727, 752-56 (1991); Neil Vidmar, Are Juries Competent to Decide Liability in Tort Cases Involving Scientific/Medical Issues? Some Data From Medical Malpractice, 43 Emory L.J. 885, 896-99 (1994).

n115. For example, jury simulations indicate that the variability of outcome is greater among individual jurors than among juries as a whole. See Diamond et al., supra note 27.

n116. See, e.g., Dan Drazen, The Case for Special Juries in Toxic Tort Litigation, 72 Judicature 292, 297 (1989); Note, The Case for Special Juries in Complex Litigation, 89 Yale L.J. 1155, 1172-76 (1980).

n117. Philip Selznick, TVA and the Grass Roots: A Study in the Sociology of Formal Organization 250-61 (1949).

REV_00262781

n118. See Hannaford et al., supra note 9, at 259-63.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "mass torts" and ("punitive damages" /5 "jury trial" and "seventh amendment") (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, September 27, 2002 - 3:50 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

crashes); product-related injuries (e.g., silicone gel breast implants); and toxic substance-related injuries (e.g., asbestos). I am concerned here with the second and third types, which sometimes overlap as when the toxic substance is contained in a consumer or industrial product - for example, asbestos in automobile brake linings. Second, I am primarily concerned here with the issues of general and specific causation. Although mass tort disputes usually involve many other complex legal and factual issues as well, such as product identification, determining causation is the problem that most strongly impels the courts' jury avoidance efforts. Finally, the discussion is necessarily speculative and impressionistic. I am unaware of any rigorous studies of a significant sample of mass tort cases, as distinguished from the few detailed case studies that have been published on particular mass tort disputes such as Agent Orange, [12] Bendectin, [13] Dalkon Shield, [14] Buffalo Creek, [15] and the Woburn toxic dump [16] cases. Asbestos, the mass tort in which the largest number of individual claims have actually gone to trial, is probably the most jurisdictionally fragmented, fact-specific, and differentially lawyered of them all, making it also the one that is most resistant to systematic analysis and generalization.

I. The Infrequency of Mass Tort Jury Trials

The vast majority of mass tort claims never reach a jury, as they are either dropped or settled. [17] This is hardly surprising; approximately 95% of all tort cases are resolved short of trial. [18] If anything, mass [*483] tort claims probably result in some payment to plaintiffs more often than in other tort cases because of the relatively comprehensive ("global") nature of the settlements reached in some of the most important mass tort litigations. [19]

Whatever the militant public rhetoric deployed by mass tort litigants might suggest, their lawyers are seldom eager to go to trial, as noted earlier. [20] It is easy to understand why. Trying a mass tort case is notoriously costly, especially in the early stages of the tort's evolution. [21] Unless and until the tort "matures," the essential facts underlying the complex questions of general causation, liability, and damages are not firmly established, the most important legal issues have not been authoritatively resolved by the appellate courts, the lawyers have neither tested their mettle nor routinized the litigation, and thus claim values are still unsettled. [22]

In addition to the costs of trying such cases, the stakes for both sides are likely to be high. The defendants not only face a large number of current claims for already manifested injuries. Defendants may also be vulnerable to a flood of future claims for injuries that are not yet manifest, depending on the product distribution and consumer exposure patterns, latency periods, plaintiffs' bar aggressiveness, and other factors. If defendants can avoid a decisive defeat in the early cases, they can hope to dig in for a long, costly war of attrition that will discourage the plaintiffs' lawyers, induce settlement of current claims, and stave off the filing and prosecution of new ones. [23] If instead they go to trial in an early case and lose, they will almost certainly be deluged with a flood of new claims generated by plaintiffs' lawyers drawn by the smell of blood. [24] By the same token, and for much the same [*484] reason, plaintiffs' lawyers are reluctant to precipitate an early test of strength that they might lose, although a trial - with all of the attendant risks - is sometimes the only way in which they can hope to weaken defendants' future litigation prospects and bring them to the bargaining table.

The parties' difficulties in making these calculations are compounded by the high variability of outcomes in many mass tort jury trials. In the Brooklyn Navy Yard asbestos cases, for example, Judge Jack Weinstein noted a great deal of variation among the damage awards received by different plaintiffs with similar injuries and demographic characteristics. Judge Weinstein also found unwarranted variability in the outcomes of some of his repetitive stress keyboard cases, [25] although his sample was of course very small relative to that in the asbestos litigation. Indeed, so troubled was he by this variability that he developed a grid to guide future juries. [26]

REV_00262764

Conceivably, much or all of this variation (or some substantial fraction of it) might be due to factual differences in the claims - for example, the circumstances surrounding the injury - that a jury may legitimately consider in assessing culpability and damages. Empirical studies of jury performance in more conventional litigation suggest that most of the variation can indeed be explained in this way. [27] It is much harder, however, to justify variable outcomes in cases where the identical factual issue-lack of general causation - is (or at least should be) dispositive of all of them, yet mass tort cases often violate the basic principles of system rationality and horizontal equity. In the Bendectin litigation, for example, a series of directed verdicts for defendants based on lack of general causation was both bracketed and interrupted by several large plaintiffs' verdicts. [28] Similarly, in the silicone gel breast implant litigation, where the evidence on general causation of immunological disorders was always weak and became progressively weaker over time, most of the juries rendered defend [*485] ants' verdicts, but some of them awarded large damages to plaintiffs, even after a string of defendant victories. [29]

This variability in outcomes for cases that appear similar on their facts or that implicate identical dispositive legal principles or facts should trouble any system of justice that aspires to rationality, fairness, and predictability. It is especially regrettable when the different outcomes appear to reflect differences in the lawyer's skill, or in the location of the court, which is common in tort law generally. This variability also engenders great uncertainty for the parties, but especially for defendants. Whether or not the variation is warranted by different underlying facts, a defendant facing the risk not merely of an adverse outcome, but of a truly catastrophic one, [30] is likely to be highly risk averse, [31] preferring even a bad settlement to a precedent- setting trial unless it is almost certain that it can prevail at trial. Yet, such confidence is impossible given this variability, whatever its source.

If the plaintiffs' lawyers feel confident of a favorable jury verdict, of course, they will not acquiesce in the defendants' risk-averse strategy. This confidence may be justified or may instead be born of myopia and wishful thinking. But even if the plaintiffs' lawyers are less confident than this, they are more likely than defendants to press for trial. They usually have less to lose from a defeat in an early case than defendants do; unlike defendants, plaintiffs' lawyers can usually keep bringing new cases until they win one, as collateral estoppel has little application in such cases. [32] Moreover, their power to extract a favorable settlement from defendants may depend not only on the strength of their underlying case but also on whether their threat to go to trial is credible. Unless they are well-financed (and perhaps even then), plaintiffs' lawyers are usually under severe economic pressures to resolve cases quickly.

These incentives contrast sharply with those of defendants, who tend to benefit from delay, for at least three reasons. They continue to enjoy the investment value of the money during the period that they retain it. They hope to wear down the other side by exploiting its [*486] need for immediate cash. Finally, they hope that new scientific evidence will over time weaken plaintiffs' causation claims, as has been the pattern with a number of mass torts including Agent Orange, Bendectin, breast implants, asbestos in buildings, and perhaps repetitive stress keyboard injuries. Defendants' optimal strategy, then, is to communicate an adamant unwillingness to settle, at least until they are "on the courthouse steps" where so many disputes are ultimately resolved.

Defendants' incentives often diverge from those of their outside counsel, who have traditionally billed their clients by the hour and thus tend to benefit financially from protracted litigation rather than early settlement. [33] Many corporate clients, increasingly conscious of and concerned about these conflicts of interest and about their ability to monitor their lawyers effectively, have begun to adopt more stringent controls and more efficient incentives, including greater use of in- house counsel and alternative forms of compensation for their outside lawyers. Moreover, judges have devised techniques for circumventing the lawyers and communicating directly with the clients and their insurers-for example, inviting them to attend the trial and speaking to them in chambers about how they view the dispute. The parties' lawyers are sometimes present when these communications occur, sometimes not (although the court will almost surely inform them about what transpired).

REV_00262765

For these reasons (and perhaps others), the well-known Priest-Klein model of litgation behavior, [34] which predicts that the cases in which outcomes are most uncertain are precisely the ones most likely to go to trial rather than settle, seems inaccurate as a general account of mass tort litigation. The asymmetric incentives and the risk aversion exhibited by mass tort plaintiffs (and their lawyers) and by mass tort defendants evidently exert a powerful gravitational pull away from trials and toward settlement despite - or perhaps because of - the enormous legal, factual, and procedural uncertainties surrounding these [*487] cases. Many judges both exploit and magnify this incentive-driven tendency toward settlement. [35]

II. The Judicial Motives for Avoiding Jury Trials

In a sense, there is little to explain about judges' desires to avoid mass tort trials. They almost always seek to avoid trials, whether mass tort or not, by encouraging settlements, and their reasons for doing so apply at least as strongly to mass tort cases as to other kinds of litigation. I shall not enter into the largely academic debate over whether genuinely consensual settlements of large-scale litigation are socially desirable or whether - as my colleague Owen Fiss believes, [36] and I do not [37] - the social interest in elaborating public values makes even consensual settlements undesirable. Suffice it to say that trial judges behave as if they were convinced that settlement in mass tort cases is generally not only desirable but imperative.

As I discuss below, recent decisions by the Supreme Court and the federal appellate courts limiting certain uses of some claims aggregation techniques, particularly litigation class actions, [38] settlement class actions, [39] and multi-district litigation ("MDL"), [40] have complicated trial courts' efforts to settle mass tort litigation. [41] In this section, then, I shall focus on the distinctive features of mass torts that reinforce this already powerful judicial inclination to settle such cases short of trial.

Beyond judges' concerns about the frequent irrationality and disparity of mass tort verdicts discussed above, the most important reason why they prefer to settle cases is their growing concern over lengthening court dockets. [42] Naturally enough, judges wish to conserve their scarce trial time for those cases that simply cannot be settled. For this reason alone, they view with some alarm the prospect of [*488] trying any case that may take months or even years to try, consuming much of the court's administrative resources in the process as well. Obviously, this implies an even greater concern about mass tort litigation, which has particularly large docket-clogging implications. This motive to conserve resources increasingly coincides with a bureaucratic one. Mass torts began to strain judicial dockets during the late 1970s and early 1980s when asbestos claims proliferated, and they have accelerated ever since. At the same time a combination of appellate court superiors, legislative directives, and court administrators pressed judges to process and complete more cases more quickly. Congress institutionalized this pressure at the federal level by enacting the Civil Justice Reform Act of 1990, [43] requiring the courts to develop procedures for expeditiously resolving cases. Mass torts were the 800- pound gorillas that demanded immediate attention, for they threatened to wreak havoc not only on court dockets but also on the judges' own performance ratings.

Mass tort litigation is also notoriously difficult to organize for trial. Jurors must be found who can serve through what may be a very protracted proceeding, which means that these jurors are often demographically atypical. Where multiple defendants are involved, as is often the case in mass torts, the sheer number of lawyers whose activities must be accommodated and coordinated can be daunting. Because of the many novel legal issues, opportunities for judicial error abound and interlocutory appeals can cause further delay and confusion. The economic stakes to lawyers in managing mass tort litigation are so high that the court must constantly supervise and control their famously aggressive conduct. In class or consolidated actions, choice of law issues and other differences among the plaintiffs concerning the level of their exposures and the timing and nature of their claims may necessitate the establishment of subclasses. [44] Such differences also limit the court's ability to use collateral estoppel and issue preclusion to reduce the number of trials. [45] In federal court diversity cases, judges must often apply unfamiliar and dynamic state tort doctrines. [46] The prospect of bankruptcies, which have been common among mass [*489] tort defendants, [47] further complicate both the legal issues and the litigation process. Because massive documentation and complex scientific evidence are endemic in mass tort cases, courts must often appoint special masters to supervise their production. [48] Other unusual measures are also necessary to enable the jurors to retrieve and comprehend the evidence.

REV_00262766

Fairly early in the evolution of mass tort litigation, some controversial judicial decisions reinforced the willingness and authority of trial courts to avoid jury trials despite the existence of what many observers viewed as material issues of fact. In the Agent Orange opt-out cases, Judge Weinstein granted summary judgment for the defendants on the general causation issue despite the proffer by plaintiffs of testimony purporting to support their factual claims, a ruling that was affirmed by the Second Circuit on other grounds. [49] Similarly, in several early Bendectin cases, appellate courts nipped the litigation in the bud by dismissing plaintiffs' general causation arguments as a matter of law. [50] Such decisions were designed not only to facilitate the dismissal of existing claims but also to foreclose the flood of marginal or spurious new claims that often follow in the wake of class certifications, plaintiffs' verdicts, and favorable settlements. They surely emboldened subsequent courts to be more aggressive in preventing what they regarded as weak cases from proceeding to trial.

This judicial aggressiveness in policing doubtful claims was reinforced by the increasingly strident denunciations by a number of commentators of "junk science in the courtroom." These critiques became commonplace by 1990 [51] and seemed only to increase the courts' skepticism about plaintiffs' scientific claims. Growing concerns about the quality of the scientific evidence that typically underlies mass tort cases surely help to explain the Supreme Court's recent insistence that [*490] the trial courts function as more demanding gatekeepers in reviewing this evidence [52] and that the appellate courts broadly defer to those gatekeeping decisions. [53] These rulings tend to favor mass tort defendants.

III. The Techniques of Jury Avoidance

Courts avoid jury trials in mass tort cases in two standard ways. They decide dispositive motions (i.e., motions to dismiss, for summary judgment, and for directed verdict) in favor of defendants, [54] and they facilitate or approve negotiated settlements. (I know of no mass tort case in which plaintiffs chose a bench trial). The techniques through which they produce these outcomes, however, are more varied and to some extent overlapping. I shall briefly discuss four of them: forceful judicial management of litigation, exploitation of uncertainty, decisions on class action issues, and categorical exclusions of certain kinds of scientific evidence.

A. Judicial Management

In no area of litigation is managerial judging [55] more obvious and central than in mass torts. [56] Judges can shape the sequence and character of the discovery process in order to identify and focus certain issues that might be dispositive before trial, such as general causation, statute of limitations, or the government contractor defense. They can "polyfurcate" and sequence the trial so that certain issues will be resolved before others, which can confer on one party or another a tactical advantage that may help to induce settlement. [57] Judges can also nudge the parties into settlement discussions by signaling how the court is inclined to decide crucial issues (e.g., choice of law, punitive damages, market share liability, insurer good faith), or by organizing the litigation so as to help clarify claims values at a relatively early stage through the use of representative plaintiffs, bellwether cases, mini-trials, or other forms of what Professor Robert Bone has called [*491] "statistical adjudication," [58] methods that lend themselves to extrapolating values from a small number of claims to a much larger set. [59] In this way, one or a few early jury trials may obviate the need for others, even given the limited applicability of collateral estoppel in mass torts. [60] By all accounts, however, the most effective way for judges to accelerate settlement discussions is to set an early trial date and then doggedly adhere to it, a tactic that sharply focuses the parties' minds, clarifies their stakes, and makes lawyers' delaying tactics both less credible and more costly. [61]

REV_00262767

Not surprisingly, mass torts have attracted a number of unusually strong-willed state and federal judges. Although mass torts are predominantly a state court phenomenon, certain federal trial judges - for example, Jack Weinstein, Robert Merhige, Tom Lambros, Sam Pointer, Carl Rubin, and Robert Parker - are the jurists most strongly associated with these disputes. [62] These judges have dominated the field almost since its inception, often jockeying to gain control of the most challenging and notorious cases. Each of them has employed a broad range of managerial tactics in order to shape the litigation so as to discourage weak claims, avoid jury trials, and forge settlements.

The use of special masters in mass tort litigation must be viewed in this light. The enormous size and complexity of these cases impose substantial resource demands on the courts. [63] Most trial judges have responded by appointing special masters who can provide them with procedural flexibility, multiple channels of communication with the parties, and other administrative resources that can be used to expedite the litigation, clarify issues and claim values, and facilitate settle [*492] ment negotiations. [64] Indeed, Judge Weinstein actually used six special masters in the Agent Orange case, four or five of them simultaneously. [65] Courts use special masters, among other things, to coordinate and manage discovery, investigate special facts relevant to a judge's decision, [66] mediate among the lawyers, broker settlement negotiations, determine attorneys fee awards and costs, and design and administer techniques to process and evaluate claims and to distribute settlement funds. [67]

Artfully deploying their special masters, mass tort judges have sometimes used what might be called strong-arm tactics in order to pressure lawyers into reaching agreement in cases that might otherwise have gone to trial. This was apparently true, for example, of Judge Merhige in the Dalkon Shield litigation, [68] Judge Weinstein in the Agent Orange case, [69] and Judge Samuel Skinner in the Woburn toxic dump case. [70]

B. Uncertainty

Even more than other areas of litigation, mass torts are pervaded by uncertainty. This uncertainty reflects a number of factors. A relatively new genre of litigation, it involves many novel and complex questions of fact, substantive law, procedure, remedies, evidence, insurance, legal ethics, and other diverse fields that are difficult for the courts and counsel to master and effectively integrate. As we have seen, the great variability in jury verdicts in mass tort cases compounds the other risks of proceeding to trial, while the prospect of uncontrollable transaction costs magnifies the uncertainty not only for the immediate parties and their lawyers but also for insurers, who have greater incentives to deny liability under existing policies when mass tort defendants demand that the carriers undertake their defense. [71]

[*493] The two most significant wild cards in mass torts, however, are punitive damages and future claims. Punitive damages, which vastly increase the stakes in the outcome and thus prod risk-averse parties - especially defendants - toward settlement, are possible in mass tort cases, [72] if only because discovery may support an inference that defendants knew (or had reason to know) about the serious risks that they were creating for a large number of people, or even that they actively concealed these risks. [73] Together with the law's inadequate guidance and constraint of the juries that may assess punitive damages, these factors magnify the unpredictability of outcomes and hence the attractiveness of settlements.

REV_00262768

Still, it is easy to exaggerate the actual significance of punitive damages. [74] In fact, they are only rarely imposed, and even then they are often reduced by trial judges or appellate courts. In the end, moreover, many punitive damage awards do not actually get paid. For this reason, courts sometimes sever the punitive damages portion of the case and defer it indefinitely, by which time the dispute may be settled or the punitive damages issue dropped. This does not mean that punitive damages are irrelevant, but only that they are bargaining chips that affect the settlement negotiations. [75]

Future claims, which are of course far more common than punitive damages, introduce immense uncertainties. It is simply impossible for the parties, insurers, or the court to accurately predict how many future claims will be filed; [76] the number of future claims has often exceeded the expectations of even the plaintiffs' lawyers. [77] Because of the long and variable latency periods associated with many mass toxic torts, it is also hard to predict when the future claims will be filed, when the manifestation of injury will transform those future claims into current claims for actual physical harms, and which harms those [*494] transformed claims will allege. Such uncertainties are perhaps greatest in the tobacco litigation because unlike almost all other mass torts, cigarettes continue to be a legally sanctioned product. These claims, therefore, may be filed not only by those who have been exposed but are not yet manifesting illness; they may also be filed by those who have not even been exposed yet but who will be exposed in the future when they take up smoking.

The uncertainty surrounding future claims, however, is by no means limited to the issues of the number, timing, and nature of such claims. Predicting the strength, and hence the litigation value, of those claims is also problematic. As a practical matter, all that the parties can do is to extrapolate from current claims. This extrapolation, of course, assumes that the pattern of future claims will mimic that of current claims. For a number of reasons, however, future claims may be quite different. Changes may occur in exposure patterns, the law, the science, the known facts about defendants' conduct, claimant's expectations, and other litigation variables. If so, the decisions of juries will also change, thereby affecting the lawyers' expectations and settlement demands.

Judges in mass tort litigation have learned how to exploit these and other sources of uncertainty strategically in order to encourage settlements. By selectively deploying information and intimations about the risks to each party's position that a jury trial would present, and by making its own decisions tentative and contingent, the court can hope to bring the parties closer together. In these ways, it may succeed in using uncertainty, which some models of litigation view as an obstacle to settlement, [78] as a goad to settlement. Although such strategic judicial behavior is not easy to document, I have shown how Judge Weinstein exhibited this pattern in fashioning a settlement in the Agent Orange litigation. [79] There is every reason to believe that other judges, equally eager to avoid a long jury trial, behave similarly.

C. Class Actions

Trial courts have often certified mass tort cases as class actions. [80] Even before Amchen Products, [81] however, appellate courts as often [*495] vacated or significantly modified these certifications. [82] In doing so, they reaffirmed the strong misgivings about personal injury class actions originally expressed by the framers of Rule 23, misgivings that the Supreme Court has now authoritatively embraced as doctrinal orthodoxy, at least in litigation

REV_00262769

as "sprawling" and heterogeneous as asbestos. [83]

The eagerness of trial courts to certify class actions is not at all difficult to understand; it reflects the same reasons that incline them to avoid juries and settle cases. Class actions minimize the risk of inconsistent jury verdicts. They are easier to organize (and, if necessary, try) than a comparable number of claims litigated in individual actions. [84] Perhaps most important, they are easier to settle than a multitude of individual cases because class actions can bring all current and future claims and all defendants before the court at one time and place. Only this kind of comprehensive or "global" class action can enable mass tort defendants to resolve these claims finally, completely, and (relatively) swiftly through dismissal, summary judgment, or settlement. It alone can secure for them the certainty and peace for which they seem willing to pay large premiums - even as to claims to which they believe they have strong defenses. [85] In this respect, the parties often [86] view the class action not merely as a desirable mechanism for settling mass tort claims, but as an indispensable one.

A trial court's jury avoidance strategy, then, is likely to center on certifying mass tort claims as class actions in order to facilitate a set [*496] tlement that they will later [87] help to fashion. Because this inclination is sure to survive Amchen Products, plaintiffs' lawyers may simply decide to file their class actions in state courts instead. [88] After all, some state jurisdictions are now more receptive to mass tort class actions than are the federal courts. State court actions, moreover, are likely to exhibit fewer problems of choice of law and heterogeneity than are federal courts. Finally, the Supreme Court's decisions in Phillips Petroleum [89] and Matsushita [90] have accorded state courts considerable latitude under the Due Process and Full Faith and Credit clauses to adjudicate and settle class actions under their own rules. [91]

Whichever system entertains a class action, trial courts often go beyond class certification to determine how the class action will be managed and hence who will be the key stakeholders and decisionmakers on the plaintiffs' side. A judge's power to design the structure of the plaintiffs' management group and designate its membership significantly shapes the future course of a class action. Courts can exercise much greater influence over this group than it generally exerts over trial lawyers in non-class action cases. The courts' enhanced influence arises both because class action judges usually assume a special trustee-like responsibility to monitor the lawyers' performance on behalf of the class members (who at this stage are largely anonymous and even at later stages tend to be passive spectators), and because the judges ultimately determine the amount of the counsel fees and reimbursable costs, and their distribution among the plaintiffs' lawyers.

Accordingly, the leading plaintiffs' lawyers compete fiercely to persuade the court to appoint them to the management group whose members will eventually receive the great bulk of the fees. In selecting this group, the court must often choose between two types of lawyers who tend to differ both in temperament and in their patterns of [*497] legal practice. Trial specialists are eager to conduct discovery and go before a jury to try the case if necessary. In contrast, class action specialists' main skills tend to lie elsewhere: in advertising to and assembling a class, maximizing its size, deciding on subclasses, designing effective class notice, supplying or obtaining the necessary financing, working with local counsel, spinning the media, and negotiating settlements with the defendants and their insurers. While courts often place members from both camps on the management committee, they seem to prefer the latter - in part, one supposes, because the court thinks that they are more likely to reach a settlement that can avoid a protracted jury trial, with all of its attendant costs and uncertainties for the parties, their lawyers, and the system.

If class actions are not, strictly speaking, a necessary condition of settlement of mass tort claims, the profusion of settlement class actions prior to Amchen Products nonetheless strongly suggests that both sides find them highly conducive to the negotiation and

REV_00262770

INITIAL ISSUE: Whether to have a freestanding bill or amendment to the Defense Production Act.

[SEC. 101. The Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App 2061) is amended by adding at the end the following:]

TITLE VIII – COMPENSATION FOR INSURED LOSSES FROM ACTS OF TERRORISM

SEC. 801. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the "Terrorism Risk Insurance Act of 2001."

SEC. 802. CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

(a) FINDINGS. The Congress finds that:

(1) The September 11 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon have created widespread market uncertainties with regard to the risk of losses arising from future terrorist attacks.
(2) These market uncertainties have disrupted the current ability of private insurance companies to price property and casualty insurance coverage for losses resulting from future attacks, thereby threatening the continued availability of affordable insurance for such losses.
(3) Property and casualty insurance is a crucial financial service that has played an important role in the recovery from the September 11 attacks.
(4) The continued availability of property and casualty insurance is essential to economic growth and development, particularly in areas at high risk for future potential terrorist attacks.
(5) The unavailability of affordable property and casualty insurance for terrorist acts threatens the growth and stability of the U.S. economy, including impeding the ability of financial services providers to finance commercial and residential property acquisitions and new construction. This will ultimately lead to increased consumer costs, particularly in the transportation, energy and real estate sectors.
(6) In the past, the private insurance markets have shown an ability to expand their capacity in response to changed circumstances. However, the nation's property and casualty insurance industry has had limited actuarial basis for pricing and providing coverage for terrorism risk and is not prepared, in the short term, to provide adequate affordable coverage for undefined parameters of this new risk.
(7) In as much as terrorism is a national concern and terrorist attacks are attacks on the government and people of the United States, the federal government should provide financial assistance to limit immediate market disruptions, encourage economic stabilization and facilitate a transition to a viable market for private terrorism risk insurance.

assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall be deemed to sit in all judicial districts in the United States.

(b) TRANSFER OF CASES FILED IN OTHER FEDERAL COURTS. Any civil action for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism that is filed in a federal district court other than the federal district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall be transferred to the federal district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation.

(c) REMOVAL OF CASES FILED IN STATE COURTS. Any civil action for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism that is filed in a state court shall be removable to the federal district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation.

(d) FEDERAL CAUSE OF ACTION. There shall exist a federal cause of action for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism. This cause of action shall be the exclusive cause of action and remedy for claims for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism. This section preempts all state causes of action of any kind otherwise available arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism.

(e) PUNITIVE DAMAGES. Punitive damages, exemplary damages, and other damages not intended to compensate the plaintiff for actual losses shall not be available in any civil action subject to this section.

(f) OFFSET. In determining the amount of any money damages available under this section, the court shall offset any compensation or benefits received or entitled to be received by the plaintiff or plaintiffs from any collateral source, including the United States or any federal agency thereof, in response to or as a result of the act of terrorism.

(g) NON-ECONOMIC DAMAGES. Each defendant shall be liable only for the amount of non-economic damages allocated to the defendant in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility of the defendant for the harm to the claimant. No plaintiff may recover non-economic damages unless the plaintiff or [decedent] suffered physical harm.

(h) SUBSTANTIVE LAW. The standard of care for the federal cause of action in subsection (d) of this section shall be gross negligence. Unless otherwise specified in this title, the district court shall derive other substantive principles of liability for the federal cause of action from the principles of the common law.

(i) STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS. Any claim for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism shall be filed within one year. This period shall be computed from the date of discovery of the injury by the plaintiff or the date such injury should have been discovered by the plaintiff through the exercise of reasonable diligence, whichever is earlier.

REV_00262792

(j) CLAIMS AGAINST TERRORISTS. Nothing in this section shall in any way limit the ability of any plaintiff to seek any form of recovery from any person, government or other entity that was a participant in, or aider and abettor of, any act of terrorism.

REV_00262793

(b) PURPOSE. The purpose of this Act is to establish a temporary federal program that provides for a transparent system of shared public and private compensation for insured losses resulting from future acts of terrorism in order to:

(1) Protect consumers by addressing current market disruptions and ensure the continued widespread availability and affordability of property and casualty insurance for terrorism risk; and
(2) Allow for a transitional period for the private markets to stabilize, resume pricing of such insurance and build capacity to absorb futures losses, while preserving state insurance regulation and consumer protections.

SEC. 803. DEFINITIONS AND CERTIFICATION

For purposes of this Act –

(a) ACT OF TERRORISM –
The term "act of terrorism" means any act, certified by the Secretary in concurrence with the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, as a violent act or act dangerous to human life, property or infrastructure, within the United States, that is committed by an individual or individuals acting on behalf of foreign agents or foreign interests as part of an effort to coerce the civilian population of the United States or to influence the policy or affect the conduct of the U. S. government by coercion. No act shall be certified as an act of terrorism if (1) the act is committed in the course of a war declared by the Congress of the United States [Option: or (2) if property damage resulting from the act does not exceed $25 million.] Any certification, or determination not to certify, under this subsection shall be final and shall not be subject to judicial review.

(b) INSURANCE COMPANY –
The term "insurance company" means any primary insurance company, including its subsidiaries and other affiliates, licensed or admitted to engage in the business of insurance in any state, or a nonadmitted eligible surplus line carrier listed on the National Association of Insurance Commissioners' "Quarterly Listing of Alien Insurers," that has issued a policy covering an insured loss from an act of terrorism and that meets any other criteria the Secretary may prescribe. The term "insurance company" shall not include a reinsurer or provider of retrocessional insurance.

(c) INSURED LOSS –
The term "insured loss" means –
(1) any loss in the United States, and
(2) any loss to an air carrier (as defined in section 40102 of title 49, United States Code) no matter where it occurs covered by any type of property and casualty insurance policy or endorsement for commercial property, commercial liability, commercial automobile, workers' compensation, private passenger automobile and homeowners insurance.

REV_00262784

☐ Option A. The term "insured loss" does not include any loss covered by any type of business interruption or life or health insurance policy.

☐ Option B. The term "insured loss" includes up to six months of business interruption coverage. The term insured loss does not include any loss covered by any type of life or health insurance policy. [Explanatory note: Business interruption coverage is subject to extensive terms, conditions and limitations in standard property and casualty policies. Treasury staff recommend against trying to create a de novo definition that could create ambiguity with regard to limitations that have already been built into business interruption coverage. Instead of trying to redefine business interruption coverage, if limitations on current industry coverage are desired, we recommend limiting coverage to six months (the typical term is 12 months) or excluding lost profits.]

☐ Option C. The term "insured loss" includes business interruption coverage, excluding lost profits. The term "insured loss" does not include any loss covered by any type of life of health insurance policy. [See explanation above].

☐ Option D. Include as "insured loss" business interruption coverage only for small businesses, with reference to the Small Business Act of 1958, Section 3 of Pub. Law 85-536.

(d) NON-ECONOMIC DAMAGES –
The term "non-economic damages" means damages for losses for physical and emotional pain, suffering, inconvenience, physical impairment, mental anguish, disfigurement, loss of enjoyment of life, loss of society and companionship, loss of consortium, hedonic damages, injury to reputation, and all other non-pecuniary losses of any kind or nature.

(e) PERSON –
The term "person" means any individual or business or non-profit entity (including a partnership, limited liability company, corporation or association) or a trust or estate or a state or political subdivision of a state or other governmental unit.

(f) PROGRAM –
The term "Program" means the Terrorism Insured Loss Shared Compensation Program established by this Act.

(g) PROPERTY DAMAGE –
The term "property damage" means physical injury to or destruction of tangible or intangible property, or loss of tangible or intangible property that has not been physically injured or destroyed but has been evacuated, withdrawn from, or otherwise rendered inaccessible.

(h) SECRETARY –
The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Treasury.

(i) STATE –

The term "state" means any State of the United States and the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, American Samoa, Guam, or any of the U.S. Virgin Islands.

(j) UNITED STATES –
The term "United States" means all States of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, American Samoa, Guam and the U. S. Virgin Islands.

SEC. 804. TERRORISM INSURED LOSS SHARED COMPENSATION PROGRAM

(a) IN GENERAL. There is hereby established a Terrorism Insured Loss Shared Compensation Program in accordance with this Act. Notwithstanding any other provision of state or federal law, the Secretary is authorized to pay compensation in accordance with this Act to any person or persons for insured losses resulting from an act of terrorism.

(b) CONDITIONS FOR FEDERAL PAYMENT. Conditions for compensation under this Program for insured losses arising from an act of terrorism are as follows:

(1) the insurance company must offer property and casualty insurance for acts of terrorism for insured losses covered by this Program and a person's insurance coverage for acts of terrorism shall not be materially different from the terms, amounts, and other coverage limitations in the person's policy that apply to insured losses arising from non-terrorist acts;
(2) a person that suffers an insured loss as a result of an act of terrorism, or a person acting on behalf of that person, must file a claim with the person's insurance company;
(3) at the time of offer, purchase and renewal of each policy, the insurance company must provide clear and conspicuous disclosure in the policy to the policy holder of the premium charged for insured losses covered by the Program and the federal government's share of compensation payments for insured losses under the Program;
(4) the insurance company must process the claim according to its standard business practices and any procedures that the Secretary may prescribe; and
(5) the insurance company must pay the portion of the losses not covered by the Program under the schedule established in subsection (c) and must submit verification and certification of that payment and verification of the underlying claim, and must certify compliance with the conditions of this subsection, at the time the company files a claim with the Secretary.

(c) SHARED INSURED LOSS COVERAGE.
(1) The Secretary shall pay compensation for insured losses that result from any act or acts of terrorism, in accordance with the following schedule and limitations:

☐ 1st year Option A for acts of terrorism occurring on the date of enactment of this Act through December 31, 2002, 90 percent of insured losses in excess of $10 billion;

☐ 1st year Option B

for acts of terrorism occurring on the date of enactment of this Act through December 31, 2002, 80 percent of insured losses in excess of $10 billion;

☐ 1st year Option C

for acts of terrorism occurring on the date of enactment of this Act through December 31, 2002, 50 percent of insured losses between $10 billion and $20 billion and 90 percent of insured losses in excess of $20 billion;

☐ 2nd year Option A (if $10 billion deductible)

☐ Suboption 1. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2003 through December 31, 2003, 90 percent of insured losses in excess of $10 billion;

☐ Suboption 2. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2003 through December 31, 2003, 80 percent of insured losses in excess of $10 billion;

☐ Suboption 3. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2003 through December 31, 2003, 50 percent of the insured losses between $10 billion and $20 billion and 90 percent of insured losses in excess of $20 billion;

☐ 2nd year Option B ($20 billion deductible)

☐ Suboption 1. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2003 through December 31, 2003, 90 percent of insured losses in excess of $20 billion;

☐ Suboption 2. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2003 through December 31, 2003, 80 percent of insured losses in excess of $20 billion;

☐ Suboption 3. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2003 through December 31, 2003, 50 percent of the insured losses between $20 billion and $40 billion and 90 percent of insured losses in excess of $40 billion; and, if the Program is extended to a third year by the Secretary pursuant to Section 808,

☐ 3rd year Option A (if $10 billion selected for 2nd year)

☐ Suboption 1. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2004 through December 31, 2004, 90 percent of insured losses in excess of $20 billion;

☐ Suboption 2. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2004 through December 31, 2004, 80 percent of insured losses in excess of $20 billion;

☐ Suboption 3. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2004 through December 31, 2004, 50 percent of insured losses between $20 billion and $40 billion and 90 percent of insured losses in excess of $40 billion.

☐ 3rd year Option B (if $20 billion selected for 2nd year)

☐ Suboption 1. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2004 through December 31, 2004, 90 percent of insured losses in excess of $30 billion;

REV_00262787

☐ Suboption 2. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2004 through December 31, 2004, 80 percent of insured losses in excess of $30 billion;

☐ Suboption 3. for acts of terrorism occurring on January 1, 2004 through December 31, 2004, 50 percent of insured losses between $30 billion and $60 billion and 90 percent of insured losses in excess of $60 billion.

(2) The Secretary shall announce the applicable percentage of insured losses to be paid by insurance companies, and may adjust as appropriate the applicable percentages, in accordance with the schedule and limitations contained in paragraph (1).

(3) If claims for insured losses from acts of terrorism exceed any of the threshold levels contained in paragraph (1), the Secretary shall reimburse or seek repayment from, on a pro rata basis, insurance companies that have submitted claims for insured losses on behalf of policy holders to ensure that, as of the end of each applicable time period referenced in paragraph (1), each such insurance company pays the applicable percentage of insured loss incurred during the applicable time period, in accordance with the schedule and limitations contained in paragraph (1) of this subsection.

(4) The Secretary, in his sole discretion, may determine the timing of any final netting of payments for insured losses under the Program, including payments due to the Secretary and to any insurance company, to effect the insured loss sharing established by this subsection.

(5) Any determination of the Secretary under this subsection shall be final and not subject to judicial review.

(d) CAP ON ANNUAL LIABILITY. Notwithstanding section 804(c) of this Act or any other provision of federal or state law -

☐ Option A. ($100 billion total cap in each year of Program)

(1) the Secretary shall not pay compensation under this Act in excess of $__ billion for insured losses arising from any act of terrorism occurring on the date of enactment through December 31, 2002; $__ billion for insured losses arising from any act of terrorism occurring in 2003, and, if the Program is extended to a third year pursuant to section 808, $__ billion for insured losses arising from any act of terrorism occurring in 2004; [dollar amount depends on choices in subsection (c)]

☐ Option B. (no caps for the Government or for industry)

☐ Option C. ($100 billion cap on the Government and industry in 1st year only)

(1) The Secretary shall not pay compensation under this Act in excess of $___ for insured losses arising from any act of terrorism occurring on the date of enactment through December 31, 2002 and no insurance company or companies shall be liable for more than $__ billion of insured losses arising from any act of terrorism occurring on the date of enactment through December 31, 2002. [dollar amounts depend on choices in (c).]

REV_00262788

☐ NEW OPTION (no caps on the Government; 1st year cap on individual company losses)

(1) no individual insurance company shall be liable for more than 10 percent of gross premiums collected by that company on all commercial property and casualty lines of coverage for commercial insured losses during the 12 months prior to the act of terrorism and 10 percent of gross premiums collected for all residential property and casualty lines of coverage for residential insured losses during the 12 months prior to the act of terrorism. [Explanatory note for Option C: Arguments for a per company cap: a) the cap would be during the first year of the program only and would limit industry losses on an aggregate basis to about $30 billion. (Premiums collected by the property and casualty industry last year totalled over $300 billion.); b) the cap would respond to concerns by all insurers – large and small – and echoed by the Consumer Federation of America and National Association of Insurance Commissioners, that some per company limit is necessary to help them manage risk exposure at least in the first year; c) per company cap would help insurers manage risk and therefore underwrite at reasonable rates coverage for high risk properties, and thus is responsive to concerns raised by Sen. Schumer and others who represent concentrated urban areas; and d) a cap would provide some incentives to keep premiums down because the higher the premium, the higher the cap. Arguments against a per company cap: a) it is possible that some insurers may qualify for government payments before aggregate industry losses reach $10 billion and b) there may be lack of incentives to mitigate claims once the cap is hit – a problem with any industry-only cap.]

[If Option A selected, then (2)]

(2) no insurance company or companies shall be liable for more than $__ billion of insured losses arising from any act of terrorism occurring on the date of enactment through December 31, 2002; $__ billion for insured losses arising from any act of terrorism occurring in 2003, and, if the Program is extended pursuant to section 808, $__ billion for insured losses arising from any act of terrorism occurring in 2004. [dollar amounts depend on choices in subsection (c).]

(3) the Secretary shall notify Congress if claims under the Program exceed the Secretary's authority to pay and Congress shall determine the procedures for and source of any such excess payments; and

(e) FUNDING –

(1) PAYMENT AUTHORITY. – This title constitutes payment authority in advance of appropriation Acts and represents the obligation of the federal government to provide for the amounts for compensation under this Program.

(2) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS. There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary such sums as may be necessary to pay the administrative expenses of this Program.

REV_00262789

SEC. 805. ADMINISTRATION OF CLAIMS FOR FEDERAL INSURED LOSS COMPENSATION UNDER PROGRAM

(a) GENERAL AUTHORITY. The Secretary shall have the powers and authorities necessary to carry out this Program, including authority to prescribe regulations and procedures establishing the manner in which insurance companies may file and certify claims for insured losses; to investigate, audit, adjust or settle claims under the Program and otherwise to implement the Program.

(b) SUBROGATION RIGHTS. The U.S. government shall have the right of subrogation or salvage at law or in equity to any payment made by the United States in connection with this Program.

(c) CONTRACT FOR SERVICES. The Secretary may employ persons or contract for services with third parties, as may be necessary to implement the Program.

(d) CIVIL PENALTIES. [The Secretary may assess civil money penalties for violations of this Act in the same manner as an appropriate federal banking agency may assess civil money penalties under section 8 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, 12 U.S.C. 1818 et seq.]

SEC. 806. RELATIONSHIP OF INSURANCE PROGRAM WITH OTHER LAWS

(a) EXCLUSIVE DEFINITION FOR ACT OF TERRORISM. The definition of "act of terrorism" contained in section 803 of this Act shall be the exclusive definition for purposes of compensation for insured losses under this Act and shall preempt any inconsistent state law to the extent such law applies to any insurance policy relating to terrorism risk in the United States.

(b) NO STATE PREAPPROVAL OF RATES. Rates for terrorism risk insurance covered by this [Act/title] and filed with any state shall not be subject to prior approval or a waiting period, provided that nothing in this [title /Act] shall affect the ability of a state to deny a rate as excessive, inadequate or unfairly discriminatory.

SEC. 807. DISCRETIONARY EXTENSION; TERMINATION OF FEDERAL TERRORISM LOSS COMPENSATION

(a) DISCRETIONARY EXTENSION. This Act shall terminate on December 31, 2003, unless the Secretary, determines, after considering the Report and Findings described in this section, that the Program should be extended for one additional calendar year, until December 31, 2004, and promptly notifies the Congress of his determination and the reasons therefore. The Secretary's determination shall be final and not subject to judicial review.

REV_00262790

(b) REPORT TO CONGRESS. Not later than 18 months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall submit a report to the Congress regarding the availability of insurance coverage for acts of terrorism, the affordability of such coverage including the effect of such coverage on premiums, and the capacity of the insurance industry to absorb future losses resulting from acts of terrorism. The report shall consider the impact of the Program on each of these factors, the probable impact on these factors should the Program terminate on December 31, 2003, and shall consider whether the Program should be expanded to include life and health insurance coverage.

(c) FINDING REQUIRED. In making the determination required by subsection (a), the Secretary must find that--

(1) widespread market uncertainties continue to disrupt the ability of insurance companies to price insurance coverage for losses resulting from acts of terrorism, thereby resulting in the continuing unavailability of affordable insurance for consumers, and

(2) extending the Program for an additional year would likely encourage economic stabilization and facilitate a transition to a viable market for private terrorism risk insurance.

(d) CONTINUING AUTHORITY TO PAY OR ADJUST COMPENSATION. Notwithstanding the date on which the Program terminates under subsection (a), the Secretary may take any actions necessary to ensure payment, reimbursement, or adjustment of compensation for insured losses arising out of any act of terrorism occurring within the time periods referenced in section 804(c) of this Act.

SECTION 808. SENSE OF THE CONGRESS

It is the sense of the Congress that the insurance industry should build capacity and aggregate risk to provide affordable property and casualty coverage for terrorism risk.

SEC 809. PROCEDURES FOR CIVIL ACTIONS.

(a) SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION. Notwithstanding any other law, within 90 days of an act of terrorism the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall assign a single federal district court to conduct pre-trial and trial proceedings in all pending and future civil actions for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from a single act of terrorism and shall transfer all such pending civil actions to that district court. The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall select and assign the district court based on the convenience of the parties and the just and efficient conduct of the proceedings. The district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction over all such actions. For purposes of personal jurisdiction, the district court

REV_00262791

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: ("punitive damages" /5 "jury trial" and punitive damages /25 "seventh amendment") (Edit Search)

↶Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*65 U. Chi. L. Rev. 179, **

Copyright (c) 1998 University of Chicago
University of Chicago Law Review

Winter, 1998

65 U. Chi. L. Rev. 179

LENGTH: 27363 words

ARTICLE: Why Judges, Not Juries, Should Set Punitive Damages

Paul Mogin *

* Partner, Williams & Connolly, Washington, D.C.

SUMMARY:
... The Supreme Court has never decided whether the Seventh Amendment, which preserves the right to a jury trial in civil cases brought in federal court, confers a right to have punitive damages set by a jury. ... In several cases, the Supreme Court has applied a two-pronged test in deciding whether a party is entitled to a jury trial on a cause of action unknown to the English common law: the first prong compares the new cause of action with actions brought in eighteenth century England and asks whether similar causes of action were tried to a jury; the second prong examines the nature of the remedy sought. ... Not only has the Supreme Court never held that the Seventh Amendment guarantees a right to a jury trial on the amount of punitive damages, but in its 1987 decision in Tull v United States, the Court ruled that the Seventh Amendment does not entitle a defendant to have a jury determine the amount of a civil penalty. ... Since the existence of a right to have a jury set punitive damages is an open question under Supreme Court precedent, the critical questions are whether jury determination of the amount of punitive damages was within "the 'substance of the common law right of trial by jury,'" and was one of the "most fundamental elements" of the jury-trial system in eighteenth century England. ...

TEXT:
[*179]

In March 1989, the Exxon Valdez ran aground and spilled millions of gallons of oil into Prince William Sound. The trial court phase of the private civil suit concerning that accident culminated in 1996 in a $ 5.057 billion judgment against Exxon. [1] Almost the entire judgment was based on a jury's award of $ 5 billion in punitive damages [2] --the largest monetary penalty ever imposed in an American court.

If Exxon had been convicted of a crime, a judge would have determined its sentence. [3] If Exxon had been found liable for a civil penalty under the Clean Water Act, a judge would have set the amount of its penalty. [4] Punitive damages "share key characteristics of criminal sanctions" [5] and are also similar to civil statutory penalties. [6] But because Exxon's penalty was in the form of [*180] punitive damages, a jury determined how much Exxon should pay.

REV_00262794

large awards of punitive damages. [131] The Court surely would have been aware of the potential implications of its decision for punitive damages; indeed, its broad language questioning whether the right to jury trial extends to the determination of remedies at all [132] may well have been included for the very purpose of inviting a rethinking of the treatment of punitive damages. In light of Tull, as well as the recent statement of three Justices that "the level of punitive damages is not really a 'fact' 'tried' by the jury," [133] whether a party has a right under the Seventh Amendment to have a jury set punitive damages is very much an open question. [134] [*200]

IV. Punitive Damages in Eighteenth Century England

Since the existence of a right to have a jury set punitive damages is an open question under Supreme Court precedent, the critical questions are whether jury determination of the amount of punitive damages was within "the 'substance of the common law right of trial by jury,'" [135] and was one of the "most fundamental elements" [136] of the jury-trial system in eighteenth century England. While the vagueness of these formulations means that their application to specific issues will almost always be debatable, they would appear to indicate that there is no right under the Seventh Amendment to have a jury set punitive damages.

A. Absence of Right to Have a Jury Determine Damages

In his opinion for the Court in Tull, Justice Brennan strongly questioned whether the Seventh Amendment was intended to guarantee a right to a jury in "the remedy phase of a civil trial," [137] but failed to cite any authority suggesting that the Jury Trial Clause was not intended to apply to determinations of remedy. Perhaps because of the terseness of the Court's discussion, this part of Tull has not been accorded much significance in subsequent cases in the lower federal courts or in state courts concerning the existence of a right to have a jury set punitive damages. [138]

The distinction suggested in Tull does in fact find support in the English common law. The common-law allocation of responsibility to determine damages calls into question whether the Seventh Amendment even guarantees the right to have a jury set compensatory damages, let alone punitive damages. [*201]

In jury trials at common law, the jury could award damages. [139] When it did so, the amount of its award was subject to only limited review. [140] But there was no right to have damages determined in a trial by jury.

Damages were frequently assessed in a separate proceeding conducted by a sheriff rather than in a trial by jury. This separate proceeding was held when a plaintiff obtained an interlocutory judgment by confession, default, or the overruling of a demurrer. [141] Following the interlocutory judgment, damages were determined pursuant to a writ of inquiry. [142] A writ of inquiry was issued by the court in which the action was pending and was executed by the sheriff. It stated that "the plaintiff ought to recover his damages . . . . But because it is unknown what damages he hath sustained . . . , the sheriff is commanded, that by the oath of twelve honest and lawful men of his county, he diligently inquire the same; and return the inquisition into court." [143] The inquest jury sometimes had more than twelve members. [144]

When a writ of inquiry was executed, the inquiry into damages was conducted before the sheriff or an undersheriff. [145] According to one estimate, in the seventeenth century there were five times as many inquiries into damages before sheriffs as there were trials involving damages before nisi prius judges. [146]

The English courts recognized that there was "a difference between a principal verdict of a jury, and a writ of inquiry of [*202] damages; the latter being only an inquest of office to inform the conscience of the Court, and which they might have assessed themselves without any inquest at all." [147] It was recognized that courts, "if they please, may themselves assess the damages." [148] Although courts seldom set aside a verdict returned pursuant to a writ of inquiry, [149] their power to assess damages themselves without an inquest was not questioned. [150]

REV_00262803

At common law, when a defendant contested liability but did not file a demurrer, damages as well as liability were decided in a jury trial. [151] But the practice following default, confession of judgment, and overruling of a demurrer suggests that in other cases damages were decided by a jury as a matter of convenience, rather than because a party was deemed to have a right to have a jury assess them. [152]

The case law in this country concerning defaults supports this interpretation. In 1797, in a case in which a federal trial [*203] court assessed damages itself after a default, the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment, [153] necessarily rejecting the defendant's claim that damages should have been assessed by the jury. [154] The defendant had relied upon the provision of the Judiciary Act of 1789 requiring that all issues of fact be decided by a jury.

[155] Similarly, the lower federal courts have almost uniformly held that the Seventh Amendment does not confer a right to have a jury determine damages after a default. [156] The rule that there is no right to a jury trial after a default has been applied not just against defaulting defendants, but against plaintiffs seeking a jury trial on damages after a defendant's default. [157] These decisions thus cannot be attributed to an unstated doctrine of waiver or forfeiture; they instead are a latter-day reflection of the absence at common law of a right to a jury trial on damages.

B. Considerations Peculiar to Punitive Damages

The absence at common law of a right to have the amount of damages decided by a jury suggests that it might even be consistent with the Seventh Amendment for federal judges to determine the amount of compensatory damages. [158] But whether or not [*204] such a practice would be permissible, there are considerations peculiar to punitive damages that confirm that the Seventh Amendment should not be interpreted to require that punitive damages be set by juries.

First, the English cases prior to 1791 that endorsed punitive damages (which were then referred to as exemplary damages) spoke of the power of the jury to award such damages, not of any right of a party to have a jury set them. For example, in Wilkes v Wood, [159] the Court of King's Bench stated that "a jury have it in their power to give damages for more than the injury received." Moreover, punitive damages were not restricted to jury trials. In Benson v Frederick, [160] one of the early decisions upholding a damage award in excess of the plaintiff's loss, the damages had been determined not in a trial by jury but in an inquest before a jury pursuant to a writ of inquiry.

The absence of English authority recognizing a right to have a jury determine the amount of punitive damages is not surprising in light of the English practice in criminal cases. Judges, not juries, determined sentences (though juries sometimes refused to find the defendant guilty because of concern about the harsh punishment he could face if convicted). [161] Since there was no right to have a jury determine the degree of punishment in criminal cases--where a defendant's life or liberty was at stake--it would have been anomalous to recognize a right to have a monetary punishment fixed by a jury.

Second, although the common law had developed over several centuries, punitive damages were first recognized in 1763. [162] The awards of punitive damages returned in jury trials in a number of cases between 1763 and 1791 hardly made jury determination of such damages one of the most fundamental elements of the jury-trial system. [163] [*205]

REV_00262804

As the Supreme Court stressed in Galloway v United States, the rules of the common law "were constantly changing and developing during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries." [164] Because capacity for change was an inherent part of the common law, the common law of England in 1791 possessed the capacity to adopt changes in the procedures for resolving particular issues, including punitive damages. Since punitive damages were only a recent arrival on the legal scene, had not been awarded exclusively in jury trials, and had not been declared to be triable to a jury as of right, [165] it is not reasonable to interpret a constitutional amendment preserving the right of trial by jury in suits "at common law" as forever requiring that juries set such damages.

Third, there are important differences between punitive damages under modern American law and punitive damages under eighteenth century English law. As Professor Charles McCormick noted, "it is only in America that the cases clearly have separated exemplary from compensatory damages." [166] In this country punitive damages are the subject of separate instructions, and in nearly all states the jury, if it chooses to award such damages, identifies in its verdict separate sums for compensatory and punitive damages. In contrast, in eighteenth century England, punitive damages typically were not a separate element of recovery. In Huckle v Money, [167] one of the first cases to recognize such damages, the jury returned an undifferentiated verdict of <Sterling>300. Lord Camden had instructed the jurors that "they were not bound to any certain damages"; [168] there was no instruction to consider separately what damages the jurors might deem appropri- [*206] ate as punishment. Similarly, the report of Wilkes v Wood, a related case in which the jury awarded <Sterling>1000, indicates that Lord Pratt gave instructions to the jury to the effect that a jury have it in their power to give damages for more than the injury received. Damages are designed not only as a satisfaction to the injured person, but likewise as punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the action itself. [169]

This instruction identified punishment as an additional purpose of damages, but did not ask the jury to return a separate award of punitive damages.

In several of the pre-1791 English cases that endorsed punitive damages, not only were such damages not a distinct element of recovery, but the rationale of punishment or setting an example was blended with the compensatory rationale of remedying an insult to the plaintiff. For example, in Tullidge v Wade, [170] the court upheld a jury's verdict of <Sterling>50 against a defendant who "got [the plaintiff's daughter] with child." Again there is no indication that the jury was instructed to consider what sum should be awarded as punitive damages or as punishment. And two of the three judges stressed the insult to the plaintiff in concluding that the verdict should stand. [171]

C. Criminal Cases

A comparison to criminal cases is also instructive. Just as the Seventh Amendment preserves the right to jury trial in civil cases, both the Sixth Amendment and Article III, Section 2, guarantee the right to jury trial in criminal cases. Indeed, the Supreme Court has called the Sixth Amendment right to jury [*207] trial "fundamental to the American scheme of justice" and has held that that right--unlike the Seventh Amendment right to jury trial--must be honored in state as well as federal court. [172]

But the Court also has held that the Sixth Amendment does not give a criminal defendant a right to have a jury determine his sentence. [173] Even in a capital case, it is permissible to assign full responsibility for deciding the defendant's sentence to the judge. [174] If a citizen whose life or liberty is at stake does not have a right to have a jury determine his punishment, it is difficult to fathom why a citizen seeking punitive damages or seeking to avoid their imposition should have a right to have a jury determine the amount.

REV_00262805

V. The Reasons Why Judges Rather than Juries Should Set Punitive Damages

If the Seventh Amendment does not dictate that juries set punitive damages, then the allocation of power to set such damages, in cases brought in federal court, is a matter of policy. This Part first will examine several considerations supporting allocation of this power to trial judges, and then show that the general justifications for jury trials in civil cases do not outweigh those considerations.

A. Policies Supporting Assessment of Punitive Damages by Judges

More than a century ago, the Supreme Court of Texas observed:

A power such as may be exercised by juries in awarding exemplary damages is liable to great abuse,--may often lead to great oppression. . . . In cases based on facts which merit condemnation, or even punishment, though not by law constituting crime, juries, under commendable impulses, but with judgment warped by passion, no doubt often render excessive verdicts. [175]

[*208] This observation was made in support of the need to exercise, "firmly and fearlessly," the power to grant a new trial when a jury's punitive damages award is excessive, [176] but it also points to a reason that judges are better equipped than juries to set punitive damages in the first place. Just as the Supreme Court has held that judges are better suited than juries to construe patents, [177] judges are also better suited to mete out punishment. They are more likely to be able to base the severity of the penalty on a rational assessment of the facts, rather than an emotional reaction to the defendant's misconduct. As was said in an analysis of the allocation of power to determine sentences in criminal cases, "juries are more easily influenced by emotional factors than judges, who, due to their experience, are better able to make an objective determination of the penalty to be inflicted." [178]

It might be objected that the argument proves too much, for emotional factors also may influence jury awards of compensatory damages, yet juries are nevertheless asked to set compensatory damages. But assigning the determination of punitive damages to an emotion-prone decisionmaker is much more troubling than assigning the determination of compensatory damages to such a decisionmaker. In the words of the Supreme Court, punitive damages are "private fines." [179] But unlike criminal fines and civil statutory penalties, they are generally not subject to any cap. [180] The criteria that govern the determination of the amount of punitive damages confer enormous discretion. [181] Yet punitive damages [*209] are awarded without the necessity for proof beyond a reasonable doubt and without many of the other protections afforded in criminal cases to minimize the risk of punishing the innocent. It is extremely problematic to give a broad power to punish to a decisionmaker that is particularly susceptible to passion and emotion, in a proceeding that lacks many of the safeguards that usually precede the meting out of punishment. [182]

A related consideration that favors having judges set punitive damages derives from the role that the defendant's wealth plays in setting punitive damages. In most civil cases, evidence of a party's wealth is inadmissible. [183] "The underlying reason for the rule is that such evidence tends to inject into the case a foreign, diverting, and distracting issue which may effectuate prejudicial results." [184] But when the amount of punitive damages is at issue, a plaintiff is allowed to introduce evidence of the defendant's finances, [185] on the theory that "the degree of punishment or deterrence resulting from a judgment is to some extent in proportion to [*210] the means of the guilty person." [186] Whatever the merits of the theory, [187] evidence that a defendant has a huge net worth often contributes to a staggering verdict.

REV_00262806

The Supreme Court recognized this problem in Honda Motor Co v Oberg, [188] in which it held that a state violates due process by letting juries set punitive damages but not permitting review by a trial or appellate court for excessiveness. The Court stressed that "the presentation of evidence of a defendant's net worth creates the potential that juries will use their verdicts to express biases against big businesses, particularly those without strong local presences." [189] Unless the amount of punitive damages is determined in a separate phase of the trial, it seems clear that admission of evidence of wealth also may skew the jury's assessment of liability for compensatory and punitive damages and of the amount of compensatory damages. The significant increase in income inequality among Americans since the 1960s [190] has likely exacerbated the risk created by admission of evidence of wealth.

Judges are better suited than juries to give appropriate weight to a defendant's finances. They are less likely to be swayed by arguments that seek to base the calculation of punitive damages on a percentage of the defendant's net wealth or income.

Because of their responsibility for sentencing in criminal cases and for imposing civil statutory penalties, judges ordinarily have much more experience than jurors in determining punishments and far more familiarity with the sanctions imposed for [*211] various types of misconduct. [191] Referring to Alabama's procedures for setting punitive damages, Justice Powell once observed in a draft opinion that "the jurors who pass sentence on tort defendants according to these procedures probably have never decided a punitive damages case before. Thus, they have no basis for de- [*212] termining what penalties are common in particular kinds of cases." [192]

Because judges are in a better position to impose a punishment that is in line with the punishments imposed for similar misconduct, determination of the amount of punitive damages by judges would promote the interest in treating like cases alike. [193] As Professor Colleen Murphy has written, "with professional and ongoing experience in matters of public policy, the judge presumably effectuates public policy goals with greater consistency than the one-time jury." [194]

Whereas jury verdicts awarding punitive damages simply indicate a dollar amount, a judge could be required to state the reasons for the amount of punitive damages awarded. [195] This would greatly facilitate appellate review. [196] Under the current procedure, one can only speculate as to what led the jury to award punitive damages in the amount it chose. It may have relied upon an improper premise or one unsupported by the record, but the error may never be known. A requirement that a judge state the reasons for a punitive damages award would reduce the risk of undisclosed error.

Although trial judges' statements of reasons would reveal some errors that might go uncorrected on appeal if made by a jury, in general shifting to judges the responsibility to set punitive damages would have the salutary effect of reducing the role of appellate courts in setting punitive damages. [197] Under the ex- [*213] isting system of jury awards of punitive damages, the real determination of punitive damages often takes place on appeal. [198] In countless cases, appellate courts have drastically reduced awards of punitive damages. [199] Appellate courts have taken such action despite the vagueness of the criteria governing the determination of the amount of punitive damages. [200] [*214]

If trial judges were responsible for awarding punitive damages, there would likely be fewer enormous awards. The occasions for appellate intervention would be fewer, and appellate courts could be expected to heed more closely precedents that ostensibly limit appellate review of the amount of damages awarded. [201] The result of having trial judges set punitive damages would be to reduce the frequency with which punitive damages are effectively set on a cold record by judges who heard none of the testimony presented at trial. [202]

REV_00262807

Judges are also better equipped than juries to give proper weight to other sanctions that have been imposed on the defendant for the same conduct. Under the law of many states, prior fines, civil penalties, or awards of punitive damages militate in favor of a lower punitive award. [203] As a practical matter, however, to require a defendant to present such proof to a jury is virtually to eliminate prior punishment as a mitigating factor. As Judge Sarokin observed with respect to evidence of prior punitive awards, "to require a defendant to present such prejudicial evidence to a jury as its only alternative is to place it between Scylla and Charybdis." [204] Evidence that another jury, court, or agency [*215] has sanctioned the defendant is at least as likely to lead a jury to increase its award as it is to lead it to reduce the award.

If judges set punitive damages, cases in which such damages were found to be warranted also could be resolved more quickly and with less expense. Today it is not unusual for a jury's punitive damages award to be followed by further proceedings at the trial court level that may stretch out over several months. In addition to memoranda of law supporting and opposing a remittitur, evidence not before the jury is often tendered and considered. [205] If the trial judge grants a remittitur which the plaintiff accepts, the defendant may still appeal. Vesting in judges the authority to set punitive damages would significantly shorten the process.

B. The Insufficient Advantages of Assessment by Juries

The foregoing considerations strongly support shifting to judges the responsibility to decide the amount of punitive damages. They are not outweighed by the interests that might be served by leaving that responsibility with juries.

The Supreme Court has said that the purpose of jury trials in civil cases is "to assure a fair and equitable resolution of factual issues." [206] Although other interests are served by civil jury trials, the notion that a jury has a superior ability to decide issues of credibility and other factual issues is plainly one of the principal justifications for civil jury trials.

This justification provides little support for asking juries to set punitive damages. No doubt the parties may dispute some facts relevant to the amount of punitive damages. In general, however, fact resolution is likely to be less significant than the exercise of judgment as to how large an award is warranted to serve the purposes of punitive damages. [207] When the amount of punitive damages is considered, ordinarily the jury already will have found that the defendant committed a wrong that caused injury to the plaintiff, determined the extent of the plaintiff's injuries (economic and noneconomic), and determined that the defendant acted with the degree of culpability necessary to permit an award of punitive damages. Factual disputes certainly can remain, just as in a criminal case there can be factual disputes relating to sentencing. But in most cases the determination of the [*216] amount of punitive damages is driven not by factual questions but by a subjective judgment as to the amount that will serve the purposes of punitive damages (typically, punishing the defendant and deterring both the defendant and others from similar conduct in the future [208]). As Professor Ellis has observed, determining the amount of punitive damages "does not require answering a 'what happened' question. Rather, it embodies the question, 'what ought to happen' to the defendant." [209]

Jury determination of the amount of punitive damages also might be deemed preferable because a jury's verdict reflects the judgment of all the jurors, whereas a judge's determination is the judgment of one man or woman. [210]

A nineteenth century Supreme Court decision, Railroad Co v Stout, [211] though not involving punitive damages, endorsed the wisdom-of-many justification for jury trials. Stout, a six-year old, seriously injured a foot while playing on an unguarded railroad turntable located near a public road. The facts were not in dispute. The jury returned a verdict of $ 7,500 against the railroad. [*217] In the Supreme Court the railroad argued that, since the facts were undisputed, the issue of its negligence should have been decided by the judge as a matter of law. [212] The Court rejected the argument, explaining that in most cases of alleged negligence, upon the facts proven in such cases, it is a matter of judgment and discretion, of sound inference, what is the deduction to be drawn from the undisputed facts. . . . Twelve men of the average of the community, comprising men of education and men of little education, men of learning and men whose learning consists only in what they have themselves seen and heard, the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, the laborer; these sit together, consult, apply their separate experience of the affairs of life to the facts proven, and draw a unanimous conclusion. This average judgment thus given it is the great effort of the law to obtain. It is assumed that twelve men know more of the common affairs of life than does one man, that they can draw wiser and safer conclusions from admitted facts thus occurring than can a single judge. [213]

REV_00262808

Today civil juries in federal court generally have only six or eight members rather than twelve. More importantly, however, the nature of the decision involved in awarding punitive damages suggests that the wisdom of a judge is preferable in this instance to the collective wisdom of a jury. Choosing an amount of punitive damages differs fundamentally from the determination of whether a party was negligent and from other applications of law to fact that are submitted to the jury even when the facts are undisputed (if reasonable persons could disagree about the outcome). The determination of whether a party was negligent, though certainly subjective in part, is guided by consideration of what a reasonable person in the defendant's shoes would have done. For most other issues decided by a jury there are similar objective criteria. The choice of the amount of punitive damages is not guided in any comparable way that makes the jury's knowledge of "the common affairs of life" [214] particularly useful. [*218]

Another justification often advanced for jury trials in civil cases is the risk of judicial bias. This justification was advanced by the Anti-Federalists, [215] who in urging a jury-trial guarantee for civil cases quoted the following statement by Blackstone:

The impartial administration of justice, which secures both our persons and our properties, is the great end of civil society. But if that be entirely entrusted to the magistracy, a select body of men, and those generally selected by the prince or such as enjoy the highest offices in the state, their decisions, in spite of their own natural integrity, will have frequently an involuntary bias towards those of their own rank and dignity; it is not to be expected from human nature that the few should be always attentive to the interests and good of the many. [216]

In Pennsylvania, the Anti-Federalists cited an outrageous search by a constable that had resulted in an award of damages by a jury, and predicted that a "lordly court of justice" sitting without a jury would be "ready to protect the officers of government against the weak and helpless citizens." [217]

It cannot be denied that in some instances bias could infect determinations of punitive damages by federal judges. But this possibility does not provide a good reason for continuing to leave those determinations in the hands of juries in all cases. First, a check against the operation of judicial bias would be provided by the fact that the amount of punitive damages would not be decided by the judge unless the jury first determined that the defendant was liable for punitive damages. Second, the strong tradition of independence and professionalism that has developed in the federal judiciary reduces the risk of judicial bias. [218] Third, the [*219] risk of judicial bias could be further reduced by having juries continue to set punitive damages in cases involving alleged abuses of government power, in which a judge's status as part of the government might be a source of bias. [219]

REV_00262809

It has been suggested that juries should set punitive damages because juries better represent the values of the community. [220] One of the functions of the jury system undoubtedly is to permit the ideals and beliefs of ordinary citizens to influence the administration of the law. [221] This function of jury trials provides little justification, however, for having juries set punitive damages.

Any allocation of decisionmaking authority to judges could be said to reduce the influence that community values exert through jury verdicts, but the law entrusts many important decisions to [*220] judges, such as sentencing, imposition of civil penalties, and grant or denial of injunctions and declaratory judgments. Moreover, as Judge Kozinski has noted recently, whereas "legislators are popularly elected and represent a variety of geographic and other interests . . . [,] any group of six or 12 individuals may have views wholly unrepresentative of the community at large." [222] The reduction in the size of civil juries in federal cases makes particularly suspect the notion that a jury is a reliable barometer of community values. When the issue of the proper amount of punitive damages arises, the defendant already has been found, ordinarily by a jury, to have engaged in culpable conduct. Particularly given the other considerations suggesting that judges are better equipped than jurors to set punitive damages, it seems better to bypass this one opportunity for the expression of community values through juries, and to rely on judges to be guided by established norms of which they will be well aware (such as the need to respect persons and property).

Jury trials also afford citizens an opportunity to participate in government. As one AntiFederalist tract argued,

The trial by jury in the judicial department, and the collection of the people by their representatives in the legislature, are those fortunate inventions which have procured for them, in this country, their true proportion of influence, and the wisest and most fit means of protecting themselves in the community. Their situation, as jurors and representatives, enables them to acquire information and knowledge in the affairs and government of the society; and to come forward, in turn, as the centinels and guardians of each other. [223]

The participatory function of jury trials is important, but it does not deserve great weight with respect to the allocation of power under consideration here. To assign judges the power to set punitive damages would merely confer on judges the power to decide one aspect (the determination of amount) of one remedy (punitive damages). It would not substantially reduce the opportunity for public participation in government through jury service. [224]
[*221]

It has been argued that juries should set punitive damages because "the right to trial by jury lends credence to the decisions of our courts and engenders public confidence in the legal system," and "any efforts on behalf of the judiciary to substantially detract from that right . . . will weaken the confidence of the people in the courts." [225] Although it is true that jury trials traditionally have been thought to be important in maintaining confidence in the legal system, the reality is that awards of punitive damages returned by juries are set aside altogether or reduced in an extraordinarily high percentage of cases. [226] If anything, taking determinations of the amount of punitive damages away from juries might well increase public confidence in the judicial system, because it would end a type of jury verdict that is partially or entirely overturned with exceptional frequency--perhaps more often than any other type of jury verdict. Moreover, the suggested change would merely take from the jury one part of one issue; juries would still determine liability for compensatory damages, amount of compensatory damages, and liability for punitive damages.

REV_00262810

C. Summary

In cases brought in federal court, the responsibility to set punitive damages should rest with the trial judge (except in cases involving alleged abuses of governmental power). [227] The jury could be asked to return an advisory verdict on the amount of punitive damages; Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 39(c) expressly authorizes the use of advisory juries. [228] Ultimately, however, the power to determine the proper amount of punitive damages should rest with the trial judge, subject to appellate review. [229]

VI. Implementing the Change

It might be questioned whether federal courts, even if disposed to do so, can implement the change recommended here on their own, or whether they must await a statute or an amend- [*222] ment to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. No statute or amendment to the Rules is necessary.

In Colgrove, [230] the Supreme Court upheld a local federal court rule providing that juries in civil cases would consist of six persons. Not only was there no statute or Federal Rule of Civil Procedure authorizing six-person juries, but at that time Rule 48 provided that "the parties may stipulate that the jury shall consist of any number less than twelve" [231] and thus contemplated a twelve-person jury absent such a stipulation. The Court held that Rule 48 was no obstacle to the local rule, because it was drafted in light of the assumption, held in Colgrove to be incorrect, that a trial by jury meant a trial by a jury of twelve persons. [232] Since no provision of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure even reflects the assumption that juries are to set punitive damages, under Colgrove federal courts are free to adopt local rules providing for judicial determination of the amount of punitive damages. Even absent a local rule, an individual judge presumably may consider providing in a pretrial order that the amount of punitive damages will be set by the court if liability for such damages is found by the jury. [233]

Conclusion

An award of punitive damages is a "windfall" to the plaintiff. [234] As one court put it, the plaintiff "is the fortuitous beneficiary of such an award simply because there is no one else to receive it." [235] It would be anomalous if the fortuitous beneficiary of a windfall had a constitutional right to choose the decisionmaker who determines the amount of the windfall. It would also be anomalous if defendants in civil cases had a constitutional right [*223] to have punitive damages set by a jury, whereas in criminal cases judges determine sentences of imprisonment (and in some cases even death [236]). Because the Seventh Amendment need not and should not be interpreted to entitle either plaintiffs or defendants to have a jury fix punitive damages, judicial assessment of punitive damages merits much more consideration than it has received, as an alternative to caps and other reforms designed to curb excessive awards.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 In re Exxon Valdez, No A-89-0095-CV (D Alaska, Sept 24, 1996), appeal pending.

n2 In re Exxon Valdez, No A-89-0095-CV, 1995 US Dist LEXIS 12952, *12 (D Alaska).

n3 In criminal cases (other than capital cases) sentences are determined by judges in both federal court and the courts of all but eight states. By statute, defendants in six states have a right, in cases triable to a jury, to have a jury fix their punishment, within the limits established by statute. Ark Code Ann <sect> 5-4-103 (Michie 1993); Ky Rev Stat Ann <sect> 532.055(2) (Baldwin 1990 & Supp 1997); Miss Code <sect><sect> 97-3-67, 97-3-71 (1994) (granting this right only for crimes of rape and statutory rape); 57 Okla Stat Ann <sect> 353 (West 1991); Tex Crim Proc Code Ann Art 37.07 <sect> 2(b)(2) (Vernon 1981 & Supp 1997) (giving defendant right to choose judge or jury); Va Code <sect> 19.2-295 (1995 & Supp 1997). In Tennessee, defendants have such a right in misdemeanor cases. Tenn Code Ann <sect> 40-20-104 (Michie 1990). In Missouri, a trial judge can impose a sentence less than or equal to the sentence chosen by the jury. Mo Ann Stat <sect> 557.036 (3) (Vernon 1979 & Supp 1997).

REV_00262811

Pursuant to a court-approved settlement with the state and federal governments, Exxon had pled guilty in 1991 to four misdemeanors, paid a $ 25 million fine (remitted from $ 150 million because Exxon had spent $ 2.5 billion in cleanup costs), and agreed to pay $ 900 million in additional cleanup costs. Judge Endorses $ 1 Billion Exxon Valdez Settlement, Wash Post A4 (Oct 9, 1991); Tom Kenworthy and Hal Bernton, $ 1 Billion-Plus Accord Reached in Exxon Spill, Wash Post A6 (Oct 1, 1991).

n4 See 33 USC <sect> 1319(d) (1994); Tull v United States, 481 US 412, 426-27 (1987).

n5 Landgraf v USI Film Products, 511 US 244, 281 (1994) (holding that the punitive damages provision of Section 102(b)(1) of the Civil Rights Act of 1991 cannot be applied to conduct that occurred before the law was enacted).

n6 Tull, 481 US at 422 n 7.

n7 Juries set punitive damages in the first instance in federal court and in the courts of nearly every state that permits the recovery of such damages. The exceptions are the Kansas courts and, in certain actions, the Connecticut courts. Kan Stat Ann <sect> 60-3701(a) (Supp 1992); Gen Stat Conn <sect><sect> 31-290a(b), 35-53(b), 36a-618, 42-110g(a), 46a-98(d), 52240b (1997).

n8 Atlas Food Systems & Services v Crane National Vendors, 99 F3d 587, 594-95 (4th Cir 1996).

n9 The Fourth Circuit acknowledged that juries are well suited to determine facts relevant to the amount of punitive damages, but stressed that "other policy-related elements--e.g., the likelihood that an award will deter the defendant or others from engaging in similar conduct--are not factual questions and, therefore, are more appropriately decided by the trial judge." Id at 594. The Fourth Circuit concluded that "when reviewing the amount of a jury's punitive award under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 59, the district court has a participatory decisionmaking role that it does not have when reviewing a jury's findings based solely on facts." Id. "While a district court must give due respect to a jury's comparative advantages in initially deciding upon the amount of punitive damages to award, the court may depart from that award to the extent that it concludes that its own comparative advantages warrant such a departure. . . . The court's review of the amount of a punitive damage award should involve comparison of the court's independent judgment on the appropriate amount with the jury's award to determine whether the jury's award is so excessive as to work an injustice." Id at 595.

n10 See S 5, 105th Cong, 1st Sess <sect> 108 (Jan 21, 1997); S 648, 105th Cong, 1st Sess <sect> 108 (Jan 21, 1997). In March 1996, Congress passed a bill containing similar provisions, but President Clinton vetoed it. Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act of 1996, introduced as Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act of 1995, HR 956, 104th Cong, 2d Sess (Feb 15, 1995), in 141 Cong Rec H 1849 (Feb 15 1995). On May 6, 1996, the House failed to override the veto.

n11 In 1991, President Bush's Council on Competitiveness advocated shifting the power to assess punitive damages from juries to judges. See A Report from the President's Council on

REV_00262812

The Exxon Valdez litigation epitomizes a disparity in the allocation of penalty-setting power that exists both in federal court and in nearly all state courts. [7] Noting this disparity, the Fourth Circuit recently adopted a new and more stringent standard for post-trial review of jury awards of punitive damages. [8] It concluded that, to the extent that a punitive damages award rests on a policy judgment (as opposed to a determination of the facts), a trial judge deciding a motion for remittitur may independently assess how much the defendant should be punished. [9]

Similarly, bills concerning product liability cases introduced in Congress in recent years would have given both federal and state trial judges a greater role in awarding punitive damages. In general, the bills would cap punitive damages at the greater of $ 250,000 or two times compensatory damages, and a jury's award exceeding the cap could stand only if the trial judge determined in a separate proceeding that the jury's award was warranted. [10]

This Article considers whether, as to cases brought in federal court, the courts can and should go further than either the Fourth Circuit or the recent bills, and squarely place all of the [*181] power to decide the amount of punitive damages with trial judges. [11] The Supreme Court has never decided whether the Seventh Amendment, which preserves the right to a jury trial in civil cases brought in federal court, [12] confers a right to have punitive damages set by a jury. [13] Three Justices recently implied that the Amendment confers no such right, observing, in Gasperini v Center for Humanities, Inc, [14] that "the level of punitive damages is not really a 'fact' 'tried' by the jury." [*182]

The Supreme Court's 1987 decision in Tull v United States [15] also indicates that the Seventh Amendment may not require jury assessment of the amount of punitive damages. Tull held that a citizen sued by the United States for a penalty under the Clean Water Act had a right to have a jury determine his liability for a penalty, but not its amount. The Court broadly stated that "nothing in the Amendment's language suggests that the right to a jury trial extends to the remedy phase of a civil trial," [16] and that it had seen "no evidence that the Framers meant to extend the right to a jury to the remedy phase of a civil trial." [17]

It is time to recognize that, at least in federal court, asking juries to set punitive damages is neither constitutionally required nor sound policy. The responsibility to decide the amount of punitive damages, if the jury finds the defendant liable for such damages, should rest with the trial judge.

Part I of this Article discusses the origins of the Seventh Amendment and the basic principles reflected in the Supreme Court decisions interpreting it. Special attention is given to the Supreme Court decisions establishing that the Seventh Amend- [*183] ment preserves only the substance of the right of trial by jury that was recognized by the English common law in the eighteenth century.

Part II examines certain Supreme Court decisions that some courts and commentators have read as establishing a Seventh Amendment right to a jury determination of the amount of punitive damages. This Part concludes that the decisions do not establish the existence of such a right.

Part III analyzes the Supreme Court's decision in Tull.

Part IV demonstrates that having juries fix punitive damages is not necessary to preserve the substance of the common-law right to trial by jury. Under the English common law, there was no right to a trial by jury on the issue of damages. In some cases damages were determined in a trial by jury before a judge, but often they were set by an inquest jury in a proceeding before a sheriff pursuant to a writ of inquiry. Such an inquest was intended to inform the conscience of the court, which could instead assess damages itself. Moreover, the Competitiveness, Agenda for Civil Justice Reform in America 22 (1991). A Senate committee has done likewise. See S 44, 98th Cong, 2d Sess <sect> 12(c) (1984) (proposed law providing for judicial assessment of punitive damages in product liability cases in federal court), discussed in Product Liability Act, S Rep No 476, 98th Cong, 2d Sess 59 (1984) (committee report accompanying S 44). See also S 100, 99th Cong, 1st Sess <sect> 12(c) (1985) (bill containing similar provision); HR 5214, 98th Cong, 2d Sess <sect> 11(b), (c) (1984) (providing for judicial determination of both liability for, and amount of, punitive damages); S 2631, 97th Cong, 2d Sess <sect>13(c) (1982) (same). Many commentators agree. See, for example, Lisa M. Sharkey, Comment, Judge or Jury: Who Should Assess Punitive Damages?, 64 U Cin L Rev 1089, 1128-29 (1996); David G. Owen, Comment, Civil Punishment and the Public Good, 56 S Cal L Rev 103, 120 (1992); Dorsey H. Ellis, Jr., Punitive Damages, Due Process, and the Jury, 40 Ala L Rev 975, 1005-07 (1989); Richard C. Ausness, Retribution and Deterrence: The Role of Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Ky L J 1, 124 (1985); James B. Sales and Kenneth B. Cole, Jr., Punitive Damages: A Relic That Has Outlived Its Origins, 37 Vand L Rev 1117, 1167-68 (1984); Jane Mallor and Barry Roberts, Punitive Damages: Toward a Principled Approach, 31 Hastings L J 639, 664 (1980). Judge Kozinski also has questioned the assignment to juries of the power to set punitive damages. See Alex Kozinski, The Case of Punitive Damages vs. Democracy, Ind Law 12 (Oct 30-Nov 12, 1996).

REV_00262795

n12 "In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." US Const, Amend VII.

n13 Unlike nearly all of the other protections of the Bill of Rights, the guarantees of the Seventh Amendment have not been held to apply to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. "The Seventh Amendment . . . governs proceedings in federal court, but not in state court." Gasperini v Center for Humanities, Inc, 116 S Ct 2211, 2222 (1996) (footnote omitted). See Walker v Sauvinet, 92 US 90, 92 (1875) (Seventh Amendment is not a "privilege or immunity . . . which the states are forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment to abridge."). The Seventh Amendment governs the right to jury trial in diversity as well as federal question cases. Simler v Conner, 372 US 221, 222 (1963).

n14 116 S Ct 2211, 2235 (1996) (Scalia, joined by Rehnquist and Thomas, dissenting). Justice Scalia was quoting the Re-examination Clause of the Seventh Amendment, which provides that "no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." US Const, Amend VII. The issue in Gasperini, which involved an award of compensatory damages, was whether the Re-examination Clause precludes appellate review when a trial court denies a motion seeking a new trial because the jury's verdict was excessive. The Court held that the Re-examination Clause does not preclude such review. 116 S Ct at 2223-24. Justice Scalia, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Thomas, would have held that the Re-examination Clause prohibits appellate review of awards of compensatory damages, but apparently would have reached a different conclusion as to punitive damages because the amount of punitive damages is not a "fact" tried by a jury. Id at 2231-36.

Whether state jury-trial guarantees entitle a party to have a jury set punitive damages is similarly an open question in most states. Forty-seven state constitutions protect the right to jury trial in civil cases in state court. See Ala Const, Art I, <sect> 11; Alaska Const, Art I, <sect> 16; Ariz Const, Art II, <sect> 23; Ark Const, Art II, <sect> 7; Cal Const, Art I, <sect> 16; Conn Const, Art I, <sect> 19; Del Const, Art 1, <sect> 4; Fla Const, Art I, <sect> 22; Ga Const, Art I, <sect> 1, <para> 11; Hawaii Const, Art I, <sect> 13; Idaho Const, Art I, <sect> 7; Ill Const, Art I, <sect> 13; Ind Const, Art I, <sect> 20; Iowa Const, Art I, <sect> 9; Kan Const, Bill of Rights <sect> 5; Ky Const, Bill of Rights <sect> 7; Me Const, Art I, <sect> 20; Md Const, Declaration of Rights, Art 23; Mass Const, pt I, Art 15;

REV_00262813

Mich Const, Art I, <sect> 14; Minn Const, Art I, <sect> 4; Miss Const, Art III, <sect> 31; Mo Const, Art 1, <sect> 22(a); Mont Const, Art II, <sect> 26; Neb Const, Art I, <sect> 6; Nev Const, Art I, <sect> 3; NH Const, pt I, Art 20; NJ Const, Art I, <para> 9; NM Const, Art II, <sect> 12; NY Const, Art I, <sect> 2; NC Const, Art I, <sect> 25 (limiting preservation of civil jury trial to "all controversies at law respecting property"); ND Const, Art I, <sect> 13; Ohio Const, Art I, <sect> 5; Okla Const, Art II, <sect> 19; Or Const, Art VII, <sect> 3; Pa Const, Art I, <sect> 6; RI Const, Art I, <sect> 15; SC Const, Art I, <sect> 14; SD Const, Art VI, <sect> 6; Tenn Const, Art I, <sect> 6; Tex Const, Art I, <sect> 15; Utah Const, Art I, <sect> 10 (held to protect civil jury right in International Harvester Credit Corp v Pioneer Tractor and Implement, Inc, 626 P2d 418, 421 (Utah 1981)); Vt Const, ch I, Art 12; Va Const, Art I, <sect> 11; Wash Const, Art I, <sect> 21; W Va Const, Art III, <sect> 13; Wis Const, Art I, <sect> 5. Compare Smith v Printup, 254 Kan 315, 866 P2d 985, 994 (1993) (holding that there is no right to have a jury set punitive damages), with Zoppo v Homestead Insurance Co, 71 Ohio St 3d 552, 644 NE2d 397, 401 (Ohio 1994), cert denied, 116 S Ct 56 (1995) (voiding statute that permitted court to set punitive damages), and Henderson By Hartsfield v Alabama Power Co, 627 S2d 878, 885-86, 893-94 (Ala 1993) (striking down legislative cap on punitive damages as violating the right to trial by jury).

n15 481 US 412, 426-27 (1987).

n16 Id at 426 n 9.

n17 Id. The Fourth Circuit relied upon Tull in its recent decision endorsing more stringent review of jury awards of punitive damages. Atlas, 99 F3d at 595.

n18 See Wilkes v Wood, Lofft 1, 98 Eng Rep 489, 498-99 (CP 1763); Huckle v Money, 2 Wils KB 205, 95 Eng Rep 768, 769 (KB 1763).

n19 See Benson v Frederick, 3 Burr 1845, 97 Eng Rep 1130, 1130 (KB 1766).

n20 US Const, Art IV, <sect> 2, cl 3.

n21 See Edith Guild Henderson, The Background of the Seventh Amendment, 80 Harv L Rev 289, 295 (1966).

n22 Jonathan Elliot, 3 The Debates in the Several State Conventions, on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 658 (2d ed 1836) ("Elliot's Debates").

n23 1 Elliot's Debates at 328-29.

n24 Ralph Ketcham, ed, The Anti-Federalist Papers and the Constitutional Convention Debates 219 (Mentor 1986); 1 Elliot's Debates at 326.

n25 See, for example, Federalist 83 (Hamilton), in Clinton Rossiter, ed, The Federalist Papers 495, 498-99 (Mentor 1961).

n26 See Charles W. Wolfram, The Constitutional History of the Seventh Amendment, 57 Minn L Rev 639, 666 (1973).

n27 See, for example, 3 Elliot's Debates at 579, 651-52.

n28 US Const, Amend VII.

n29 1 Stat 98 (1789).

n30 See Wolfram, 57 Minn L Rev at 730 (cited in note 26) (reviewing the constitutional history of the Seventh Amendment).

REV_00262814

n31 The Seventh Amendment has generated extensive scholarly commentary. Some of the leading articles are Wolfram, 57 Minn L Rev 639 (cited in note 26); Martin H. Redish, Seventh Amendment Right to Jury Trial: A Study in the Irrationality of Rational Decision Making, 70 Nw U L Rev 486 (1975) (arguing that the Supreme Court should take account of social conditions when interpreting the Seventh Amendment); Harold Chesnin and Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr., Chancery Procedure and the Seventh Amendment: Jury Trial of Issues in Equity Cases Before 1791, 83 Yale L J 999 (1974) (showing that jury practice was in transition in England during the 1790s, and suggesting that Seventh Amendment interpretation is more complex than previously thought); Henderson, 80 Harv L Rev 289 (cited in note 21) (arguing that the Seventh Amendment was not intended to codify existing jury practice because there was no consistent practice in 1791); and Austin Wakeman Scott, Trial by Jury and the Reform of Civil Procedure, 31 Harv L Rev 669 (1918) (discussing historical features of trial by jury and examining methods for controlling jury power).

n32 Compare, for example, Dimick v Schiedt, 293 US 474, 487 (1935) ("Here, we are dealing with a constitutional provision which has in effect adopted the rules of the common law, in respect of trial by jury, as these rules existed in 1791."), with Gasperini v Center for Humanities, Inc, 116 S Ct 2211, 2224 n 20 (1996) (noting that the meaning of the Seventh Amendment was not fixed as of 1791). See also notes 60, 75-76, and accompanying text.

n33 Markman v Westview Instruments, Inc, 116 S Ct 1384, 1389 (1996); Baltimore & Carolina Line, Inc v Redman, 295 US 654, 657 (1935); Dimick, 293 US at 476-77; Thompson v Utah, 170 US 343, 350 (1898), overruled on other grounds by Collins v Youngblood, 497 US 37 (1989). See United States v Wonson, 28 F Cases 745, 750 (Cir Ct D Mass 1812) (opinion by Story). Compare Markman, 116 S Ct at 1389 n 3 ("Our formulations of the historical test do not deal with the possibility of conflict between actual English common law practice and American assumptions about what that practice was, or between English and American practices at the relevant time.").

n34 See notes 45-68, 76-77, and accompanying text.

n35 See, for example, Markman, 116 S Ct at 1389-93.

n36 Parsons v Bedford, 28 US (3 Pet) 433, 447 (1830).

n37 See Wooddell v International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 502 US 93, 97-98 (1991); Chauffeurs, Teamsters and Helpers Local 391 v Terry, 494 US 558, 565 (1990) (plurality opinion); Granfinanciera, SA v Nordberg, 492 US 33, 42 (1989); Tull, 481 US at 417-18. In its recent decision in Markman, where it was undisputed that the cause of action at issue triggered a right to jury trial on some issues, the Court applied the first prong of this test but not the second. 116 S Ct at 1389-92. Earlier cases had treated the second prong as more important. See Terry, 494 US at 565 (plurality opinion); Granfinanciera, 492 US at 42; Tull, 481 US at 421. See also Curtis v Loether, 415 US 189, 194 (1974) (implying that "the relief sought here" prong is "more important" than analogous common law actions).

At least two cases applying the two-pronged test treated the presence of a claim for money damages as a factor strongly indicating that a particular cause of action triggered a right to a jury trial. See Terry, 494 US at 570; Curtis, 415 US at 196-97.

In dicta in a 1970 decision, the Court identified a third factor bearing on whether an issue is triable as of right to a jury: "the practical abilities and limitations of juries." Ross v Bernhard, 396 US 531, 538 n 10 (1970). Most of the Court's Seventh Amendment decisions since Ross have ignored this factor. See, for example, Terry, 494 US at 565 (using two-prong test); Granfinanciera, 492 US at 42 (same). Part of the Markman opinion can be read as reviving it as a significant consideration when history does not supply a clear answer. 116 S Ct at 1395.

REV_00262815

n38 Markman, 116 S Ct at 1389-90; Tull, 481 US at 427.

n39 116 S Ct 1384 (1996).

n40 Id at 1389.

n41 See, for example, Columbus Mills, Inc v Freeland, 918 F2d 1575, 1578 (11th Cir 1990); Pan Am World Airways, Inc v Ramos, 357 F2d 341, 342 (1st Cir 1966); Swofford v B & W, Inc, 336 F2d 406, 413 (5th Cir 1964).

n42 Markman, 116 S Ct at 1389; Colgrove v Battin, 413 US 149, 156-57 (1973); Baltimore & Carolina Line, Inc v Redman, 295 US 654, 657 (1935). See Capital Traction Co v Hof, 174 US 1, 23 (1899) ("It is not 'trial by jury,' but 'the right of trial by jury,' which the Amendment declares 'shall be preserved.'").

n43 Galloway v United States, 319 US 372, 392 (1943).

n44 Tull, 481 US at 426, quoting Colgrove, 413 US at 156 n 11 (quoting Scott, 31 Harv L Rev at 671 (cited in note 31)); Markman, 116 S Ct at 1389.

n45 See Baylis v Travellers' Insurance Co, 113 US 316, 320-21 (1885); Oscanyan v Arms Co, 103 US 261, 266-67 (1880); Pleasants v Fant, 89 US (22 Wall) 116, 120-21 (1874); Parks v Ross, 52 US (11 How) 362, 372-73 (1850).

n46 Fidelity & Deposit Co v United States, 187 US 315, 319-21 (1902).

n47 165 US 593, 594-95 (1897).

n48 Id at 596-97.

n49 Id at 596.

n50 253 US 300, 310 (1920).

n51 Id at 307-08.

n52 Id at 309-10.

n53 283 US 494, 500 (1931).

n54 See id at 497.

n55 319 US 372, 404-05 (1943).

n56 Id at 390-92 (footnotes omitted).

n57 413 US 149, 157, 160 (1973).

n58 Compare Richard Arnold, Trial by Jury: The Constitutional Right to a Jury of Twelve in Civil Trials, 22 Hofstra L Rev 1 (1993) (criticizing Colgrove).

n59 See Colgrove, 413 US at 176-77 (Marshall dissenting); Arnold, 22 Hofstra L Rev at 8.

REV_00262816

n60 See Slocum v New York Life Insurance Co, 228 US 364, 397 (1913); Maxwell v Dow, 176 US 581, 586 (1900) (criminal case noting that Seventh Amendment right "implies that there shall be an unanimous verdict of twelve jurors"); Capital Traction Co, 174 US at 13. Several other cases assume twelve-person juries, without discussing the Seventh Amendment. See Crowell v Benson, 285 US 22, 61 (1932); Herron v Southern Pacific Co, 283 US 91, 95 (1931); Railroad Co v Stout, 84 US (17 Wall) 657, 664 (1873).

n61 Colgrove, 413 US at 155.

n62 Id at 155-56 (footnotes omitted).

n63 Id at 157.

n64 Id.

n65 439 US 322 (1979).

n66 Id at 324-25.

n67 Id at 337.

n68 See id at 335-37.

n69 116 S Ct at 1389, 1396.

n70 Id at 1389.

n71 Id at 1390.

n72 Id (citations omitted).

n73 See 116 S Ct at 2222.

n74 Id at 2216-17. The verdict in Gasperini was for compensatory damages only.

n75 See, for example, Lincoln v Power, 151 US 436, 437-38 (1894); Railroad Co v Fraloff, 100 US 24, 31-32 (1879).

n76 116 S Ct at 2223.

n77 Id at 2224 n 20 (citations omitted). See also id at 2225-30 (Stevens dissenting) (disagreeing with the majority on another issue, but agreeing that the Seventh Amendment did not bar appellate review and stating that "there is nothing in its history or language to suggest that the Amendment had any purpose but to preserve the essentials of the jury trial as it was known to the common law before the adoption of the Constitution," quoting Dimick, 293 US at 490 (Stone dissenting)). "Judgment as a matter of law" is the term added to FRCP 50 in 1991, replacing the terms "directed verdict" and "judgment notwithstanding the verdict" in federal practice. 28 USCA Rule 50 (1992 & Supp 1997) (Advisory Committee notes).

n78 116 US 550 (1886).

n79 See, for example, Henderson By Hartsfield v Alabama Power Co, 627 S2d 878, 888-91 (Ala 1993).

n80 See Barry, 116 US at 565.

REV_00262817

n81 Id at 558.

n82 Id at 562.

n83 Id.

n84 Id at 565 (latter emphasis added), quoting Whipple v Cumberland Manufacturing Co, 29 F Cases 934, 937-38, 2 Story 661, 670 (Cir Ct D Me 1843).

n85 Barry, 116 US at 562 ("It is equally clear . . . that the plaintiff is not limited in his recovery to the mere value of the property taken," and may "be entitled to exemplary damages.").

n86 Id at 566 ("The dignity and value of the rights assailed, and the power and authority of the source from which the assault proceeds, are elements to be considered in the computation of damages, not only compensation for the direct loss inflicted, but a remedy and prevention for the greater wrong and injury involved in the apprehension of its repetition.").

n87 Id at 565.

n88 See id at 558.

n89 See id.

n90 Id at 565.

n91 In Defender Industries, Inc v Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co, 938 F2d 502 (4th Cir 1991) (en banc), the Fourth Circuit cited Kennon v Gilmer, 131 US 22 (1889), to support its conclusion that the Seventh Amendment right to jury trial extends to the amount of punitive damages. 938 F2d at 506. In Kennon, a jury awarded compensatory damages of $ 20,750. On appeal, the territorial supreme court held that the damages were excessive and reduced the judgment to $ 10,750, without allowing the plaintiff to choose a new trial instead. 131 US at 24. The United States Supreme Court held that this reduction violated the Seventh Amendment. 131 US at 27-30. For two reasons, Kennon does not indicate that the Seventh Amendment entitles a party to a jury determination of the amount of punitive damages. First, there is no indication that the case involved an award of punitive damages. Second, what issues were triable to a jury was not in question; the issue of damages had been submitted to the jury. The Supreme Court's decision was based on the appellate court's action in substituting its estimate of the damages for the jury's and not affording the plaintiff the opportunity for a new trial if he found unacceptable whatever remittitur the court ordered. See 131 US at 29-30. Kennon is properly understood as a decision based on the Re-examination Clause rather than the Jury Trial Clause.

n92 415 US 189, 189-90 (1974).

n93 42 USC <sect> 3604(a) (1994).

n94 415 US at 190 & n 1.

n95 Id at 190-91.

n96 Id at 191.

n97 Id at 194.

REV_00262818

n98 Id at 195.

n99 Id.

n100 Id at 196 (footnote omitted).

n101 Id at 197 (footnote omitted).

n102 See id at 191.

n103 See id at 198.

n104 See id at 190 n 1.

n105 Id.

n106 See id at 196 & n 13. In 1991, Title VII was amended to permit recovery of compensatory and punitive damages, and to afford a right to a jury trial when damages are sought. Civil Rights Act of 1991, Pub L No 102-166, <sect> 102, 105 Stat 1071 (1991), codified at 42 USC <sect> 1981a (1994).

n107 Curtis, 415 US at 197.

n108 See, for example, Restatement (Second) of Torts <sect> 908 comment d (1979); Shepherd Components, Inc v Brice Petrides-Donohue & Associates, Inc, 473 NW2d 612, 619 (Iowa 1991) ("We have stated that punitive damages are not allowed as a matter of right and are discretionary."); Alabama Power Co v Rembert, 282 Ala 5, 208 S2d 205, 206 (1968) ("Punitive damages are not recoverable as a matter of right except as provided by statute.").

n109 Curtis, 415 US at 196.

n110 336 F2d 406, 414 (5th Cir 1964). The other cases cited were Mitchell v De Mario Jewelry, Inc, 361 US 288 (1960), and Porter v Warner Holding Co, 328 US 395 (1946).

n111 359 US 500 (1959).

n112 369 US 469 (1962).

n113 Swofford, 336 F2d at 414.

n114 Id at 413 (emphasis added). Swofford involved a claim of patent infringement, but the court's holding that there was no right to a jury trial on exemplary damages was based on the nature of that remedy, not on the nature of the claim; the court specifically noted that "a claim for damages based upon a charge of infringement of patent is plainly a 'legal' claim." Id at 410 n 5. The opinion in Swofford was written by Judge Rives and joined by Chief Judge Tuttle and Judge Wisdom.

n115 See Curtis, 415 US at 190 n 1.

n116 481 US at 426-27.

n117 33 USC <sect> 1319(d) (1994). See Tull, 481 US at 414.

n118 Tull, 481 US at 415.

REV_00262819

n119 Id.

n120 Id at 424-25.

n121 Id at 425-27.

n122 Id at 426-27.

n123 Id at 425-26 (footnotes omitted), quoting Colgrove, 413 US at 157.

n124 481 US at 426 n 9.

n125 Id.

n126 Id at 426 (citations omitted).

n127 Id at 427.

n128 Id, citing Albemarle Paper Co v Moody, 422 US 405, 442-43 (1975) (Rehnquist concurring). In his concurring opinion in Albemarle, Justice Rehnquist suggested that if backpay were routinely awarded under Title VII upon a finding of discrimination, rather than on a case-by-case basis in the discretion of the court, the right to a jury trial would be triggered. 422 US at 443. (In 1991, Congress amended Title VII to provide a right to a jury trial whenever damages are sought. See note 106.)

n129 481 US at 422 n 7. See also id at 422 (describing punitive damages as an example of a remedy "intended to punish culpable individuals" that was "issued by courts of law, not courts of equity"); Minneapolis and St Louis Railway Co v Beckwith, 129 US 26, 36 (1889) (describing punitive damages as "one mode of imposing a penalty for the violation of duty"). The statements in Tull about punitive damages appear in the part of the opinion holding that the defendant had a right to have a jury decide his liability for a penalty. 481 US at 422-25.

n130 See 481 US at 428 (Scalia, joined by Stevens, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I can recall no precedent for judgment of civil liability by jury but assessment of amount by the court. Even punitive damages are assessed by the jury when liability is determined in that fashion.").

n131 Three weeks before Tull was decided, the Court decided a case involving what was then the largest punitive damages award ever, a $ 3 billion award against Texaco. See Pennzoil Co v Texaco, Inc, 481 US 1, 4 (1987). See also Bankers Life & Casualty Co v Crenshaw, 480 US 915 (1987) (noting probable jurisdiction in case involving constitutional challenges to $ 1.6 million punitive award), decided on other grounds, 486 US 71, 80 (1988); Aetna Life Insurance Co v Lavoie, 475 US 813, 816 (1986) (involving a $ 3.5 million punitive award).

n132 See Tull, 481 US at 425-26.

n133 Gasperini, 116 S Ct at 2235 (Scalia, joined by Rehnquist and Thomas, dissenting).

n134 See Colleen P. Murphy, Integrating the Constitutional Authority of Civil and Criminal Juries, 61 Geo Wash L Rev 723, 803 (1993) (arguing that the Seventh Amendment does not require that a jury determine the amount of punitive damages). In 1989, two years after Tull, a panel of the Fourth Circuit held, in Shamblin's Ready Mix, Inc v Eaton Corp, 873 F2d 736, 742 (4th Cir 1989) (opinion by Butzner), that there is no right to a jury trial on the amount of punitive damages. In 1991, the Fourth Circuit, sitting en banc, overruled

REV_00262820

Shamblin's. Defender Industries, Inc v Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co, 938 F2d 502, 507 (4th Cir 1991). In Defender Industries, the trial court, upon finding the jury's punitive damages award to be grossly excessive, had not followed the familiar procedure of ordering a new trial unless the plaintiff accepted a remittitur, but instead had ordered that judgment be entered in a reduced amount. Id at 505. Because the jury had been asked to return a verdict assessing punitive damages, with no suggestion that the verdict would be simply advisory, the Fourth Circuit could have overturned the trial court's ruling solely on the basis of the Re-examination Clause. Compare Browning-Ferris Industries of Vermont, Inc v Kelco Disposal, Inc, 492 US 257, 280 & n 26 (1989) (relying in part on Seventh Amendment in according considerable deference to trial court's denial of new trial motion in case involving large punitive damages award). But the Fourth Circuit went further, concluding that "assessment by a jury of the amount of punitive damages is an inherent and fundamental element of the common-law right to trial by jury." 938 F2d at 507. See also Johnson v Hugo's Skateway, 974 F2d 1408, 1416 (4th Cir 1992) (en banc); Mattison v Dallas Carrier Corp, 947 F2d 95, 107-08 (4th Cir 1991).

More recently, a Fourth Circuit panel has relied upon Tull, notwithstanding Defender Industries, in adopting a novel and more demanding standard to govern post-trial review of punitive damages awards. Atlas Food Systems and Services v Crane National Vendors, 99 F3d 587, 594-95 (4th Cir 1996) (discussed in note 9).

n135 Tull, 481 US at 426, quoting Colgrove, 413 US at 157.

n136 Galloway, 319 US at 392.

n137 481 US at 426 n 9.

n138 See, for example, Defender Industries, 938 F2d at 506 (noting that "Tull does contain some rather broad language," but concluding that Tull "cannot stand for the proposition that a plaintiff bringing a state common-law cause of action does not have a right to a jury determination of the amount of punitive damages").

n139 See, for example, Grey v Grant, 2 Wils KB 251, 95 Eng Rep 794, 795 (KB 1764).

n140 See Sharpe v Brice, 2 Black W 942, 96 Eng Rep 557, 557 (CP 1774); Beardmore v Carrington, 2 Wils KB 244, 95 Eng Rep 790, 793 (KB 1764).

n141 See Clinton W. Francis, The Structure of Judicial Administration and the Development of Contract Law in Seventeenth Century England, 83 Colum L Rev 35, 64 & n 139 (1983); Thomas Chitty, 2 Archibold's Practice of the Courts of Queen's Bench in Personal Actions and Ejectment 930, 982-86 (H. Sweet 11th ed 1862). If, however, issues of fact were tried to a jury before the argument on a demurrer and resolved in the plaintiff's favor, the jury trying such issues would also assess damages. James Stephen, Lush's Practice of the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster 596 (C. Reader 2d ed 1856).

n142 See William Blackstone, 3 Commentaries on the Laws of England 397-98 (Chicago 1979); Francis, 83 Colum L Rev at 64. An exception developed in the eighteenth century for actions in which the damages could be calculated with certainty. Damages in such cases were calculated by a court officer. See Clinton W. Francis, Practice, Strategy, and Institution: Debt Collection in the English Common-Law Courts, 1740-1840, 80 Nw U L Rev 807, 815 n 20 (1986); Chitty, 2 Archibold's Practice at 983-84.

n143 William Tidd, 1 The Practice of the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas 573 (Robert E. Small 4th ed 1856).

n144 See, for example, Proceedings on a Writ of Inquiry of Damages between His Royal

REV_00262821

Highness James Duke of York, in an Action upon the Statute de Scandalis Magnatum, and Titus Oates, 3 St Trials 987, 987 (KB 1684) (inquest jury comprised of fifteen men).

n145 See Francis, 83 Colum L Rev at 64; Chitty, 2 Archibold's Practice at 987.

n146 See Francis, 83 Colum L Rev at 64.

n147 Beardmore, 95 Eng Rep at 792. See also Bruce v Rawlins, 3 Wils KB 61, 95 Eng Rep 934, 934 (KB 1770); Hewit v Mantel, 2 Wils KB 372, 95 Eng Rep 868, 870 (KB 1768).

n148 Bruce, 95 Eng Rep at 934. See Hewit, 95 Eng Rep at 870; Beardmore, 95 Eng Rep at 792; Chitty, 2 Archibold's Practice at 992-93 (cited in note 141). See also Welch v Tennessee Valley Authority, 108 F2d 95, 99 (6th Cir 1939) ("Courts of England, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, did not lack the power to fix damages in many cases at common law. They frequently fixed the amount on judgment by default and on demurrer."); Editorial, Assessment of Damages Upon Default, 7 Yale L J 311, 311 (1898) ("At common law, upon a default, the assessment of damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, was never referable of right to a jury.").

n149 See Francis, 83 Colum L Rev at 90-91 (cited in note 141). See also Burges v Nightingale, Barnes 230, 94 Eng Rep 890, 890 (CP 1736) ("Where the jury find any damages, the inquisition must stand.").

n150 In Dimick v Schiedt, 293 US 474 (1935), Justice Sutherland's opinion for the Court discussed writs of inquiry as follows:

The power of the court to increase or diminish damages assessed upon a writ of inquiry was likewise upheld; but this upon the ground that the justices might themselves have awarded damages without the writ, and the inquisition, therefore, was nothing more than an inquest for their information. But even this rule seems long since to have fallen into disuse, the more modern practice being to award a new writ of inquiry in all cases in which the court would award a new trial.

Id at 478-79 (citations omitted). The Court did not suggest that as of 1791 any question had been raised as to the power of English judges to assess damages themselves without a writ of inquiry, or that the English courts had recognized a right to have damages assessed in a jury trial rather than pursuant to a writ of inquiry.

n151 See Tullidge v Wade, 3 Wils KB 18, 95 Eng Rep 909, 909 (KB 1769).

n152 See Raymond v Danbury & NR Co, 20 F Cases 332, 333 (Cir Ct D Conn 1877) ("The assessment of damages by a jury, in actions, of tort, was . . . a matter of practice, and not of right."); Pierre v Eastern Air Lines, Inc, 152 F Supp 486, 488 (D NJ 1957) ("At common law the assessment of damages in a default, in tort and in contract, was not considered a function of the jury and stood upon a different footing from the trial of issues of fact. The measuring of damages by a jury, therefore, would seem to be a matter of practice rather than of right.").

n153 See Brown v Van Braam, 3 US (3 Dall) 344, 356 (1797).

n154 See id at 347-48 (stating defendant's claim).

n155 See id at 352, citing An Act to regulate Processes in the Courts of the United States, <sect> 34, 1 Stat 92 (1789).

n156 See Goldman, Antonetti, Ferraiuoli, Axtmayer & Hertell v Medfit International, Inc, common law developed for centuries before 1791, but punitive damages were not recognized until 1763. [18] In one of the early cases allowing damages in excess of the plaintiff's injury, damages were decided by a jury pursuant to a writ of inquiry. [19] Punitive damages today also differ significantly from punitive damages in eighteenth century England.

REV_00262822

Part V argues that, as a matter of policy, the power to set punitive damages in federal court should rest with trial judges, subject to appellate review, rather than with juries. Judges are less susceptible to emotional factors, less likely to be unduly influenced by a defendant's wealth, more experienced in imposing punishment, and more knowledgeable of the punishment imposed in other cases.

Finally, Part VI shows that neither a new statute nor an amendment to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is necessary to permit federal trial judges to determine the amount of punitive damages.

I. History of the Seventh Amendment and Its Interpretation

The Constitution approved in September 1787 by the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia guaranteed the right to a [*184] jury trial in criminal cases, [20] but it said nothing of the right to a jury trial in civil cases. It also lacked a bill of rights. The proposed Constitution became the focus of a vigorous debate throughout the country, with the Anti-Federalists vociferously attacking it and the Federalists defending it. The Anti-Federalists objected most strongly to the lack of a bill of rights, the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction as to law and fact, and the absence of a civil jury-trial guarantee. [21]

In several states, the Anti-Federalists succeeded in obtaining support for proposed amendments protecting the right to jury trial in civil cases. The Virginia Ratifying Convention urged the adoption of an amendment providing that, "in controversies respecting property, and in suits between man and man, the ancient trial by jury is one of the greatest securities to the rights of the people, and is to remain sacred and inviolable." [22] New York's convention proposed essentially the same amendment. [23] The Massachusetts and New Hampshire conventions proposed an amendment stating that "in civil actions between Citizens of different States every issue of fact arising in Actions at common law shall be tried by a Jury, if the parties, or either of them, request it." [24]

In response, the Federalists denied that the Constitution was intended to limit jury trials in civil cases, [25] and they promised to enact legislation to protect the right to a jury trial in such cases. [26] The Anti-Federalists insisted, however, on a constitutional guarantee. [27] Their efforts led to the inclusion in the Bill of Rights of what became the Seventh Amendment, guaranteeing a jury trial in suits at common law and restricting re-examination of jury verdicts:

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be pre- [*185] served, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law. [28]

The Bill of Rights was approved by Congress in September 1789, [29] and obtained the required approval of three-fourths of the states in late 1791. [30]

Although the general words of the Seventh Amendment were sufficient to secure agreement in 1791, their meaning has been sharply disputed many times in the two centuries since. [31] The Supreme Court has interpreted the Seventh Amendment in dozens of decisions, not all of them consistent with each other. [32]

Despite the controversy and uncertainty that have surrounded the Seventh Amendment, n157 See Benz v Skiba, Skiba & Glomski, 164 FRD 115, 116 (D Me 1995); Johnson v Bridgeport Deoxidized Bronze & Metal Co, 125 F 631, 632 (Cir Ct D Conn 1903); Raymond, 20 F Cases at 333-34. See In re Dierschke, 975 F2d 181, 185 (5th Cir 1992) ("It is also 'clear . . . that in a default case neither the plaintiff nor the defendant has a constitutional right to jury trial on the issue of damages,'" quoting James W. Moore, 5 Moore's Federal Practice <sect> 38.19[3] (Matthew Bender 1996)).

REV_00262796

982 F2d 686, 692 n 15 (1st Cir 1993); Adriana International Corp v Thoeren, 913 F2d 1406, 1414 (9th Cir 1990); Eisler v Strizler, 535 F2d 148, 153 (1st Cir 1976); Henry v Sneiders, 490 F2d 315, 318 (9th Cir 1974); Midland Contracting Co v Toledo Foundry & Machine Co, 154 F 797, 799-800 (7th Cir 1907) (discussing Seventh Amendment rights, although deciding case on state-law grounds); Frankart Distributors, Inc v Levitz, 796 F Supp 75, 76 (E D NY 1992); Kormes v Weis, Voisin & Co, Inc, 61 FRD 608, 609 (E D Pa 1974); Gill v Stolow, 18 FRD 508, 510 (S D NY 1955), revd on other grounds, 240 F2d 669, 670 (2d Cir 1957). See FRCP 55(b)(2) (providing for jury trial on the issue of damages after a default only when required by a federal statute). But see Byrd v Keene Corp, 104 FRD 10, 12 (E D Pa 1984) (noting that although the decision whether to enter a default judgment is left to the court's discretion, the "parties may exercise their statutory and constitutional right to jury trial at that hearing").

n158 In Dimick v Schiedt, 293 US 474 (1935), however, which held that additur violates the Re-examination Clause, the five-Justice majority stated that, when a verdict is excessive or inadequate, "both parties remain entitled as they were entitled in the first instance, to have a jury properly determine the question of liability and the extent of the injury by an assessment of damages." Id at 486 (emphasis added). (Dimick did not involve an award of punitive damages.) In 1791, compensation was also a basic and long-established purpose of common law causes of action. See, for example, Anonymous, YB 6 Edw 4, fol 7, pl 18 (KB 1466). A powerful argument can be made that the jury's role would be impermissibly trivialized if even compensatory damages were determined by the judge.

n159 Lofft 1, 98 Eng Rep 489, 498 (CP 1763).

n160 3 Burr 1845, 97 Eng Rep 1130, 1130 (KB 1766).

n161 See Leon Radzinowicz, 1 A History of English Criminal Law and its Administration from 1750 93-95 (Stevens 1948) (discussing acquittals in cases involving small offenses punishable by death).

n162 See Wilkes, 98 Eng Rep at 498; Huckle v Money, 2 Wils KB 205, 95 Eng Rep 768, 769 (KB 1763).

n163 In Defender Industries, Inc v Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co, 938 F2d 502, 507 (4th Cir 1991) (en banc), the Fourth Circuit cited, as support for its conclusion that the Seventh Amendment confers a right to have a jury set punitive damages, the Supreme Court's statement in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co v Haslip, 499 US 1, 15 (1991), that "under the traditional common-law approach, the amount of the punitive award is initially determined by a jury." In context, however, it is apparent that the Court's statement in Haslip--which involved a challenge under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to a punitive damages award in a trial in state court not subject to the Seventh Amendment--was not directed to the English common law, but to the common law in the United States prior to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868. The Court had no reason to consider, and there is no indication that it did consider, whether jury determination of the amount of punitive damages was a significant part (if it was any part at all) of the right to jury trial in eighteenth century England.

n164 319 US at 391 (footnote omitted). See also Gasperini, 116 S Ct at 2224 n 20

REV_00262823

(meaning of the Seventh Amendment not fixed as of 1791); Wolfram, 57 Minn L Rev at 736-37 (cited in note 26) (arguing that the understanding in 1791 of "common law" involved "flexibility and capacity for growth in order to respond to changing social pressures").

n165 See text accompanying notes 139-53 and 159-64.

n166 Charles T. McCormick, Handbook on the Law of Damages 278 (West 1935).

n167 2 Wils KB 205, 95 Eng Rep 768 (KB 1763).

n168 Id at 769.

n169 98 Eng Rep at 498-99.

n170 3 Wils KB 18, 95 Eng Rep 909, 909 (KB 1769).

n171 See id at 909 (opinion by Wilmot) ("the plaintiff having received this insult in his own house"), 910 (opinion by Bathurst) ("In actions of this nature, and of assaults, the circumstances of time and place, when and where the insult is given, require different damages."). See also Benson, 97 Eng Rep at 1130 (opinion by Lord Mansfield) (arguing that the plaintiff, "though not much hurt indeed, was scandalized and disgraced"); Grey, 95 Eng Rep at 795 ("The plaintiff has been used unlike a gentleman by the defendant."). In 1935, Professor McCormick wrote that "in England . . . it is still not entirely clear whether the accepted theory [of punitive damages] is that they are a distinct and strictly punitive element of the recovery, or they are merely a swollen or 'aggravated' allowance of compensatory damages permitted in cases of outrage." McCormick, Handbook at 278 (cited in note 166) (footnote omitted).

n172 Duncan v Louisiana, 391 US 145, 149 (1968).

n173 See Walton v Arizona, 497 US 639, 647-49 (1990); Hildwin v Florida, 490 US 638, 640-41 (1989) (per curiam); McMillan v Pennsylvania, 477 US 79, 93 (1986); Spaziano v Florida, 468 US 447, 459 (1984).

n174 Walton, 497 US at 647-49; Hildwin, 490 US at 640-41.

n175 Tynberg v Cohen, 76 Tex 409, 13 SW 315, 317 (1890).

n176 Id ("There is no class of cases in which the conservatism of the judge should more frequently find field for action.").

n177 See Markman, 116 S Ct at 1395 (holding that judges rather than juries should construe patents in part because "a jury's capability to evaluate demeanor, to sense the 'mainsprings of human conduct,' or to reflect community standards, are much less significant than a trained ability to evaluate the testimony in relation to the overall structure of the patent") (citations omitted).

n178 Comment, Consideration of Punishment by Juries, 17 U Chi L Rev 400, 406 (1950). See also Moreno v Consolidated Rail Corp, 99 F3d 782, 792 (6th Cir 1996) (en banc) (declining to hold that punitive damages are available under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 USC <sect> 794 (1985 & Supp 1997), in part because "the whole issue of punitive damages is becoming an increasingly problematic one, of course, as a sort of game-show mentality leads some contemporary juries to award punitive damages in amounts that seem utterly capricious").

n179 Gertz v Robert Welch, Inc, 418 US 323, 350 (1974).

REV_00262824

n180 A minority of jurisdictions have statutory caps on punitive damages in some or all actions. See, for example, Fla Stat Ann <sect> 768.73 (West 1997); Tex Civ Pract & Rem Code Ann <sect> 41.008 (Vernon 1997).

n181 See, for example, Guzman v Western State Bank of Devils Lake, 540 F2d 948, 954 (8th Cir 1976) ("In reviewing an award of punitive damages there is no basis from which an appellate court may measure damage."); Rowlett v Anheuser-Busch, Inc, 832 F2d 194, 207 (1st Cir 1987) (same).

n182 The National Law Journal's annual surveys of large jury verdicts, while perhaps not complete, suggest the frequency with which juries return enormous awards of punitive damages. The 1993 survey reported four punitive damages awards of $ 250 million or more, three awards of approximately $ 100 million, ten awards of between $ 20 million and $ 100 million, and ten awards of between $ 5 million and $ 20 million. Despite Tort Reform, Huge Verdicts Continue Climbing, Natl L J S2-S12, S14, S16-S17 (Jan 17, 1994). The 1994 survey reported the $ 5 billion award in the Exxon Valdez case, a $ 1.2 billion award in a suit for human rights abuses brought against the estate of Ferdinand Marcos, an award of $ 173 million, sixteen awards of between $ 20 million and $ 100 million, and thirteen more awards of between $ 5 million and $ 20 million. Verdicts: The Big Numbers of 1994, Natl L J C2-C16 (Feb 6, 1995). The 1995 survey reported a $ 400 million award, two $ 300 million awards, a $ 175 million award, six awards of between $ 50 million and $ 70 million, seven awards of between $ 20 million and $ 25 million, and seven awards of between $ 7 million and $ 19 million. Verdicts: The Big Numbers of 1995, Natl L J C2-C15 (Feb 5, 1996). The 1996 survey reported a $ 386 million award, a $ 210 million award, a $ 200 million award, six awards of between $ 100 million and $ 150 million, seven awards of between $ 23 million and $ 60 million, seven awards of between $ 12 million and $ 18 million, and three awards of approximately $ 10 million. Verdicts: The Big Numbers of 1996, Natl L J C2-C10, C12, C14 (Feb 10, 1997).

A study of jury awards in state courts of general jurisdiction in the seventy-five largest counties in cases involving tort, contract, and real property claims, for the year ended June 30, 1992, identified 364 awards of punitive damages; the mean award was $ 735,000 and the median award $ 50,000. Bureau of Justice Statistics Special Report: Civil Jury Cases and Verdicts in Large Counties 1, 8 (DOJ 1995).

n183 See, for example, Geddes, PMC v United Financial Group, 559 F2d 557, 560 (9th Cir 1977); Eisenhauer v Burger, 431 F2d 833, 837 (6th Cir 1970); Blankenship v Rowntree, 219 F2d 597, 598 (10th Cir 1955). See also Parkins v Brown, 241 F2d 367, 368 n 2 (5th Cir 1957) (allowing evidence of wealth "only if the evidence develops a case warranting the jury in awarding punitive or exemplary damages").

n184 Blankenship, 219 F2d at 598.

n185 See Gerald W. Boston, Punitive Damages in Tort Law <sect> 32:1 at 2-3 (Clark, Boardman 1993).

n186 Restatement (Second) of Torts <sect> 908 comment e (1977).

n187 In the case of organizational defendants, the theory has been sharply criticized on the ground that profit-maximizing organizations are interested in the marginal (not the total) costs of activities relative to the marginal benefits. The total wealth of the organization generally has little to do with the expected marginal costs or benefits of actions. It has been argued that, by linking punitive damages to wealth, the law creates too much deterrence for large corporations and too little for small ones. See Robert D. Cooter, Punitive Damages for Deterrence: When and How Much?, 40 Ala L Rev 1143, 1176-77 (1989); Malcolm E. Wheeler,

REV_00262825

A Proposal for Further Common Law Development of the Use of Punitive Damages in Modern Product Liability Litigation, 40 Ala L Rev 919, 950-51 (1989); Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S Cal L Rev 1, 62 (1982). See also Zazu Designs v L'Oreal, SA, 979 F2d 499, 508 (7th Cir 1992); Thomas v E.J. Korvette, Inc, 329 F Supp 1163, 1170 (E D Pa 1971), revd on other grounds, 476 F2d 471 (3d Cir 1973) ("It is probably safe to assume that any substantial amount of punitive damages would have deterrent effect, irrespective of the size of the corporation.").

n188 512 US 415, 432 (1994).

n189 Id.

n190 See Daniel A. Weinberg, A Brief Look at Postwar U.S. Income Inequality, Current Population Reports P60-191 (Census Bureau June 1996) (finding 22.4 percent increase in income inequality from 1968 to 1994, using the Gini index of income concentration).

n191 See Atlas Food Systems and Services, Inc v Crane National Vendors, Inc, 99 F3d 587, 594 (4th Cir 1996):

Policy-related elements--e.g., the likelihood that an award will deter the defendant or others from engaging in similar conduct--are not factual questions and, therefore, are more appropriately decided by the trial judge. The judge's unique vantage point and dayto-day experience with such matters lend expertise and consistency. . . . The district courts . . . themselves are required frequently to impose penalties for punishment and deterrence in a wide array of circumstances, both in civil and in criminal contexts. Indeed, in criminal cases, our system gives juries virtually no input, except in capital cases, to determine the amount of penalties.

See also Gilbert v St. Louis-San Francisco Railroad Co, 514 F2d 1277, 1280-81 (5th Cir 1975) (stressing that compensatory and punitive damages "are not administrable in the same fashion," and upholding remittitur of award from $ 225,000 to $ 60,000 because trial judge "could not justify, on principles of legal policy, a jury award in this case which so vastly exceeded an earlier award in a stronger case"); Owen, Comment, 56 S Cal L Rev at 120 (cited in note 11) ("Judges have more familiarity than do juries with distinguishing 'wrong' from 'very wrong' behavior (and fixing the appropriate level of punishment therefor) upon a formal social scale . . . ."); Zoppo v Homestead Insurance Co, 71 Ohio St 3d 552, 644 NE2d 397, 404 (1994) (Wright, joined by Moyer, dissenting):

In order to reach a fair punishment, the decision-maker must be able to compare the wrongful conduct in this case against similar conduct in other cases. Additionally, such a broad perspective is essential in order to set a level of damages which, while fair, will adequately deter such wrongful conduct in the future. This broad perspective, which is necessary to give effect to the purposes of punitive damages, makes the judge and not the jury the appropriate decision-maker. The knowledge and experience necessary to set punitive damages effectively are unique to the judge alone.

The Zoppo majority held that a statute ordering judicial assessment of punitive damages violated the right to jury trial protected by the Ohio Constitution, id at 401, and did not address whether, as a matter of policy, judges or juries are better suited to assess punitive damages. Compare Torres v North American Van Lines, Inc, 135 Ariz 35, 658 P2d 835, 841 (Ariz App 1982) (relying in part on trial judge's experience in personal injury lawsuits in affirming remittitur that cut punitive damages award by 75 percent). Since they took effect in 1987, the Federal Sentencing Guidelines have been interpreted by many courts to limit significantly the ability of federal judges to tailor sentences to the facts of the case. In Koon v United States, 116 S Ct 2035 (1996), however, the Supreme Court emphasized the importance of taking into account individual circumstances in sentencing under the Guidelines. Id at 2053 ("It has been uniform and constant in the federal judicial tradition for the sentencing judge to consider every convicted person as an individual and every case as a unique study in the human failings that sometimes mitigate, sometimes magnify, the crime and punishment to ensue."); see also id at 2044 (noting that Congress "acknowledged the wisdom, even the necessity, of sentencing procedures that take into account individual circumstances"). Even when a court does not depart from the Guidelines range deemed to be applicable, it must exercise discretion in choosing a sentence within the range.

REV_00262826

n192 Aetna Life Insurance Co v Lavoie, 475 US 813 (1986) (draft opinion of Powell), excerpted in Lewis Powell, The 'Bizarre Results' of Punitive Damages, Wall St J A21 (Mar 8, 1995).

n193 Compare Markman, 116 S Ct at 1396 (holding that judges rather than juries should construe patents in part because of "the importance of uniformity in the treatment of a given patent").

n194 Murphy, 61 Geo Wash L Rev at 739-40 (cited in note 134) (footnotes omitted).

n195 Some state appellate courts have imposed similar requirements with respect to trial court rulings on post-trial motions challenging a jury's punitive damages award as excessive. See, for example, VF Corp v Wrexham Aviation Corp, 112 Md App 703, 686 A2d 647, 660 (1996), cert granted, 346 Md 28, 686 A2d 647 (1997); Hodges v S.C. Toof & Co, 833 SW2d 896, 902 (Tenn 1992).

n196 See Redish, 70 Nw U L Rev at 504 n 75 (cited in note 31) (noting that factual findings by district judges "must be made explicitly, and are subject to appellate review," but "fact findings by juries . . . usually come in the form of an enigmatic general verdict, and are less susceptible to appellate review"). See also Charles E. Wyzanski, Jr., A Trial Judge's Freedom and Responsibility, 65 Harv L Rev 1281, 1292-93 (1952) (arguing that judges should state the reasons for sentences in criminal cases, as a safeguard against "emotion or other transient factors").

n197 See generally Charles Alan Wright, The Doubtful Omniscience of Appellate Courts, 41 Minn L Rev 751, 752-58 (1957).

n198 A study of punitive damage awards returned in product liability cases between 1965 and 1990 found that roughly 55 percent were affirmed; the remainder were reversed or reduced. Michael Rustadt, Demystifying Punitive Damages in Product Liability Cases: A Survey of a Quarter Century of Trial Verdicts 31-32 (Roscoe Pound Foundation 1991).

n199 See, for example, Lee v Edwards, 101 F3d 805, 812-13 (2d Cir 1996) (reducing jury's $ 200,000 punitive damages award to $ 75,000); Continental Trend Resources, Inc v OXY USA, Inc, 101 F3d 634, 643 (10th Cir 1996), cert denied, 117 S Ct 1846 (1997) (reducing $ 30 million punitive damages award to $ 6 million); Vasbinder v Scott, 976 F2d 118, 121-22 (2d Cir 1992) (reducing two $ 150,000 punitive damages awards to $ 20,000 and $ 30,000); Mason v Texaco, Inc, 948 F2d 1546, 1561 (10th Cir 1991) (halving $ 25 million punitive damages award); Rowlett v Anheuser-Busch, Inc, 832 F2d 194, 206-07 (1st Cir 1987) (reducing punitive damages award from $ 3 million to $ 300,000); Hollins v Powell, 773 F2d 191, 194, 198 (8th Cir 1985) (reducing $ 500,000 punitive damages award to $ 2,000); Ramsey v American Air Filter Co, 772 F2d 1303, 1314 (7th Cir 1985) (reducing $ 150,000 punitive damages award to $ 20,000); Morrill v Becton, Dickinson and Co, 747 F2d 1217, 1225 (8th Cir 1984) (reducing $ 20 million punitive damages award to $ 3 million); Bell v City of Milwaukee, 746 F2d 1205, 1267 (7th Cir 1984) (reducing $ 350,000 punitive damages award to $ 50,000). See generally Eric Schnapper, Judges Against Juries--Appellate Review of Federal Civil Jury Verdicts, 1989 Wis L Rev 237, 334-36. For similar state decisions, see, for example, Texaco, Inc v Pennzoil Co, 729 SW2d 768, 784, 865-66 (Tex App 1987)

REV_00262827

(reducing $ 3 billion punitive damages award to $ 1 billion); Faulk v Aware, Inc, 244 NYS2d 259, 266 (NY App Div 1963) (reducing two $ 1.25 million punitive damages awards to $ 50,000 and $ 100,000), affd, 14 NY2d 899, 200 NE2d 778 (1964); Miller v Schnitzer, 78 Nev 301, 371 P2d 824, 829, 831 n 3 (1962) (reducing $ 50,000 punitive damages award to $ 5,000).

n200 Judge Lee Sarokin described judicial intervention with respect to punitive damages as follows:

With the vague guidance given to juries as to the means for calculating punitive damages, it is difficult to justify judicial intercession on the basis that the amount of the award is invalid as a matter of law. What occurs in reality is an independent factual finding by the court simply that the penalty is too great.

Juzwin v Amtorg Trading Corp, 705 F Supp 1053, 1057 (D NJ 1989), modified on other grounds, 718 F Supp 1233 (D NJ 1989). Although it is submitted that Judge Sarokin was incorrect in using the term "factual finding" to describe the determination of the proper amount of punitive damages, he shrewdly looked behind the rhetoric of deference that often obscures a de novo judicial assessment of how severe the penalty should be. See also Miller, 371 P2d at 829 (citations omitted):

One cannot avoid thinking that the general rules offered to explain the reviewing court's decision are tailored to fit its feeling about the particular case before it. If that court does not approve the verdict it will state that the jury was motivated by passion or prejudice or that a "reasonable relationship" between the punitive and compensatory awards does not exist; or that the amount of the award is "enormous." On the other hand, the reviewing court in affirming the award may rely upon the converse of the reasons just mentioned, or upon a strong presumption in favor of the verdict as confirmed by the trial judge in refusing a new trial, or some other equally plausible statement.

Under traditional doctrine, a plaintiff may decline a remittitur and insist upon a new trial. See, for example, Vasbinder, 976 F2d at 122-23. With respect to punitive awards, some appellate decisions have departed from this principle, remanding with instructions to enter judgment in a reduced amount, rather than affording the plaintiff the option of a new trial. See, for example, Rowlett, 832 F2d at 207; Guzman, 540 F2d at 954.

n201 See, for example, Browning-Ferris Industries of Vermont, Inc v Kelco Disposal, Inc, 492 US 257, 279 (1989) (holding that trial court's ruling on motion for remittitur is reviewable "under an abuse-of-discretion standard") (footnote omitted). In BMW of North America, Inc v Gore, 116 S Ct 1589, 1598-1604 (1996), the Supreme Court identified three "guideposts" that led it to conclude that an award of punitive damages was so excessive as to violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The application of the due process limitation established in BMW may not be subject to the abuse-of-discretion standard.

n202 On a related point, see Patrick E. Higginbotham, Juries and the Death Penalty, 41 Case W Res L Rev 1047, 1065 (1991) ("We should submit the capital sentencing decision either to the judge or to the jury but not to both, and we should not permit it to be made independently by an appellate court.").

n203 See, for example, Green Oil Co v Hornsby, 539 S2d 218, 224 (Ala 1989). See generally Restatement (Second) of Torts <sect> 908 comment e (1977) ("Another factor that may affect the amount of punitive damages is the existence of multiple claims by numerous persons affected by the wrongdoer's conduct.").

REV_00262828

n204 Juzwin, 705 F Supp at 1056, modified on other grounds, 718 F Supp 1233 (D NJ 1989). See also Garnes v Fleming Landfill, Inc, 186 W Va 656, 413 SE2d 897, 909 (1991) (Judge rather than jury should consider prior criminal sanctions or civil awards.); Model Punitive Damages Act <sect> 10(a), 14 ULA 63 (Cum Ann Pkt Pt 1997) (Court may reduce punitive damages award if defendant was previously found liable for punitive damages under a final judgment arising from the same course of conduct, and the second award would be unfairly duplicative.).

n205 See, for example, Dunn v HOVIC, 1 F3d 1371, 1389-91 (3d Cir 1993) (en banc).

n206 Colgrove, 413 US at 157, citing Gasoline Products Co v Champlin Co, 283 US 494, 498 (1931).

n207 Compare Markman, 116 S Ct at 1395.

n208 See Boston, Punitive Damages at <sect><sect> 2:6-2:7 (cited in note 185).

n209 Ellis, 40 Ala L Rev at 1004 (cited in note 11). See Murphy, 61 Geo Wash L Rev at 802 (cited in note 134) ("Even if some factors are questions of pure fact--for example, the profitability of defendant's misconduct--the calculation of punitive damages cannot be said to be fact-dependent . . . .") (footnote omitted). See also Gasperini, 116 S Ct at 2235 (Scalia dissenting) ("The level of punitive damages is not really a 'fact' 'tried' by the jury."). The distinctive character of punitive damages determinations was aptly described by a Justice of the Supreme Court of Oregon:

In the trial of a criminal case the jury finds the facts and two days thereafter the judge imposes sentence. I have never heard it suggested that the judge in so doing is finding the facts. He is exercising a purely discretionary power to impose punishment, a power which is limited by the statutory maximum sentence which may be imposed. In the same manner the jury, in determining whether to assess punitive damages and in what amount, exercises a purely discretionary power based upon the facts which it has already found, a power which resembles that of the trial judge, except for the fact that his discretion is limited by statute whereas theirs is without limit unless the court imposes one.

Van Lom v Schneiderman, 17 Or 89, 210 P2d 461, 475-76 (1949) (Brand concurring in part and dissenting in part). See also Prince v Peterson, 538 P2d 1325, 1329 (Utah 1975) (noting that in awarding punitive damages "the jury exercises a quasi-judicial function") (footnote omitted).

That setting punitive damages may involve some factual questions does not suggest that judges are incapable of setting such damages. "Courts pass upon a vast number of questions of fact. . . . There is not, and never was, any such thing in jury trials as an allotment of all questions of fact to the jury. The jury simply decides some questions of fact." James Thayer, A Preliminary Treatise on Evidence at the Common Law 185 (Kelley 1969) (originally published 1898).

n210 See Charles Jared Knight, Note, State-Law Punitive Damage Schemes and the Seventh Amendment Right to Jury Trial in the Federal Courts, 14 Rev Litig 657, 683 (1995).

n211 84 US (17 Wall) 657, 663-64 (1873).

n212 Id at 659.

n213 Id at 663-64. See Bailey v Central Vermont Railway, Inc, 319 US 350, 353 (1943)

REV_00262829

("The fact that fair-minded men might reach different conclusions, emphasizes the appropriateness of leaving the question to the jury."); Orkin Exterminating Co v Truly Nolen, Inc, 117 S2d 419, 423 (Fla Dist Ct App 1960).

n214 Stout, 84 US at 664.

n215 See Centinel, in Herbert J. Storing, ed, 2 The Complete Anti-Federalist 143, 149 (Chicago 1981).

n216 Blackstone, 3 Commentaries on the Laws of England at 379 (cited in note 142) (emphasis added).

n217 Pennsylvania Packet (Oct 23, 1787), in John Bach McMaster and Frederick D. Stone, eds, Pennsylvania and the Federal Constitution 154 (Hist Soc Penn 1888). The author went on to say that if federal officers "commit similar or greater indignities, in such cases a trial by jury would be our safest resource, heavy damages would at once punish the offender and deter others from committing the same." Id. See also Essays by a Farmer, Maryland Gaz (Feb 15, 1788), in Storing, ed, 5 The Complete Anti-Federalist at 14.

n218 See Redish, 70 Nw U L Rev at 504 n 75 (cited in note 31) ("Because of the generally careful selection process, federal judges are likely to be highly experienced, intelligent individuals steeped in traditions of the law. Thus, it is probable that at least in most cases judges will be better able to control their prejudices than will jurors.").

n219 Punitive damages were first recognized by English courts in cases in which official power had been abused and juries returned awards far in excess of the plaintiffs' actual loss. See Wilkes, 98 Eng Rep at 498-99; Huckle, 95 Eng Rep at 768-69.

If further protection against judicial bias in the award of punitive damages were deemed important, a proposal made years ago by the late Judge Edward J. Devitt could be adopted in part. Although Judge Devitt advocated amending the Constitution to eliminate the right to a jury trial in civil cases, he also suggested that, short of such an amendment, the statute permitting a party to seek disqualification of a judge based on bias or prejudice, 28 USC <sect> 144, be amended "to provide a peremptory challenge when counsel questioned the fairness of the assigned judge," so that more litigants would be willing to waive a jury trial. Edward J. Devitt, Federal Civil Jury Trials Should Be Abolished, 60 ABA J 570, 572 (1974). Such a peremptory challenge could be provided in cases in which punitive damages are sought. In 1997, bills were introduced in Congress that would have given each side in a case in federal court one opportunity to request reassignment of the case to a different judge. HR 520, 105th Cong, 1st Sess <sect> 2 (1997) (civil and criminal cases); HR 1252, 105th Cong, 1st Sess <sect> 6 (1997) (civil cases only).

The Anti-Federalists also touted jury trials in civil cases as a safeguard against corruption, on the ground that it is more difficult to bribe jurors than judges because "it is not, generally, known till the hour the cause comes on for trial, what persons are to form the jury." Federal Farmer 15 (Jan 18, 1788), in Storing, ed, 2 The Complete Anti-Federalist at 321 (cited in note 215). See also Federalist 83 (Hamilton), in Rossiter, ed, The Federalist Papers at 500 (cited in note 25) ("there is always more time and better opportunity to tamper with a standing body of magistrates than with a jury summoned for the occasion"). The extended length of many modern jury trials would seem to make the lack of pretrial knowledge of the jurors' identity a poor safeguard against bribery. Moreover, bribery of judges has been an extremely rare occurrence in the federal judicial system.

n220 See Alan Howard Scheiner, Note, Judicial Assessment of Punitive Damages, the Seventh Amendment, and the Politics of Jury Power, 91 Colum L Rev 142, 188-89, 196-97 (1991). See also Knecht v Radiac Abrasives, Inc, 219 Ill App 3d 379, 579 NE2d 1248, 1251

REV_00262830

(1991) ("The jury, with its unique ability to articulate community values, should decide whether punitive damages should be imposed.").

n221 See, for example, Markman, 116 S Ct at 1395 (referring to jury's ability "to reflect community standards"); Oliver Wendell Holmes, Law in Science and Science in Law, 12 Harv L Rev 443, 459-60 (1899) (citing the jury's role in keeping the law in accord with community values as a function served by entrusting determinations of negligence to the jury).

n222 Kozinski, Ind Law at 12 (cited in note 11). See also Martin A. Kotler, Reappraising the Jury's Role as Finder of Fact, 20 Ga L Rev 123, 171-72 (1985) (arguing that juries are not "representative of the same group of persons as the legislature").

n223 Federal Farmer 4 (Oct 12, 1787), in Storing, ed, 2 The Complete Anti-Federalist at 249-50 (cited in note 215). See Scheiner, Note, 91 Colum L Rev at 195 (cited in note 220) ("Jury participation in the assessment of damages is a living form of direct democracy.").

n224 See, for example, Comment, Criminal Safeguards and the Punitive Damages Defendant, 34 U Chi L Rev 408, 421 (1967) ("Democracy will not falter if a jury does not participate in every proceeding.").

n225 Knight, Note, 14 Rev Litig at 683-84 (cited in note 210).

n226 See notes 198-99.

n227 See text accompanying notes 218-20.

n228 See generally Note, Practice and Potential of the Advisory Jury, 100 Harv L Rev 1363, 1364-67 (1987).

n229 Where not precluded by a jury-trial guarantee of the applicable state constitution, the proposal advanced here may also merit consideration in state court systems with a strong tradition of a professional and independent judiciary.

n230 413 US at 163-64.

n231 See id at 185 (Marshall dissenting).

n232 See id at 163-64. Rule 48 was amended in 1991 to direct trial courts to seat juries of not fewer than six and not more than twelve members. 28 USCA Rule 48 (1992).

n233 In diversity cases, a state practice of asking juries to fix punitive damages need not be followed unless it is bound up with state-created rights and obligations. The allocation of power between judges and juries is ordinarily a matter of federal procedural law, not an issue on which state law must be followed under the Erie doctrine. See Byrd v Blue Ridge Rural Electric Cooperative, 356 US 525, 535-40 (1958); Meyers v Selznick Co, 373 F2d 218, 222 n 1 (2d Cir 1966). Compare Tingley Systems, Inc v Norse Systems, Inc, 49 F3d 93, 96 (2d Cir 1994) (provision of Connecticut Unfair Trade Practices Act assigning determination of punitive damages to judge would have justified a new trial in case brought in federal court, where the district court has submitted the issue of punitive damages to the jury).

n234 City of Newport v Fact Concerts, Inc, 453 US 247, 267 (1981).

n235 Katko v Briney, 183 NW2d 657, 662 (Iowa 1971).

n236 See Ala Code <sect> 13A-5-47(e) (Michie 1994); Fla Stat Ann <sect> 921.141(3) (West 1996).

REV_00262831

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: ("punitive damages" /5 "jury trial" and punitive damages /25 "seventh amendment") (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, September 27, 2002 - 5:02 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

several pertinent principles concerning its scope are reasonably well established. The Supreme Court has held that the "common law" referred to in the Seventh Amendment is the common law of England, [33] though not all aspects of the English jury-trial system that existed in 1791 [*186] are preserved against change. [34] As a result, opinions interpreting the Amendment have often included attempts to delve into the law of eighteenth century England. [35] The Court has also held that the Jury Trial Clause and the Re-examination Clause are independent. [36] Thus, even if a matter is not triable of right to a jury under the Jury Trial Clause, if it is so tried the Re-examination Clause limits post-trial and appellate review of the jury's verdict.

Although the Jury Trial Clause refers to "Suits at common law," it has been interpreted to guarantee a jury trial not only on causes of action that existed under the English common law, but also on many causes of action not recognized until long after 1791. In several cases, the Supreme Court has applied a two-pronged test in deciding whether a party is entitled to a jury trial on a cause of action unknown to the English common law: the first prong compares the new cause of action with actions brought in eighteenth century England and asks whether similar causes of action were tried to a jury; the second prong examines the nature of the remedy sought. [37]

It is well-settled that, even if a given cause of action triggers a right to a jury trial, that right does not necessarily encompass all issues relating to that cause of action. [38] In its most recent discussion of this aspect of Seventh Amendment doctrine, the Supreme Court explained in Markman v Westview Instruments, [*187] Inc [39] that, "if the action in question belongs in the law category, we then ask whether the particular trial decision must fall to the jury in order to preserve the substance of the common law right as it existed in 1791." [40] For example, even if a statutory cause of action triggers the right to a jury trial under the Seventh Amendment, a discretionary award of attorney's fees under the statute may be determined by the trial court, not by a jury. [41]

The statement from Markman just quoted also embodies another established--but far from precise--principle of Seventh Amendment jurisprudence: the principle that the Amendment preserves only "the substance of the common law right" of trial by jury. [42] The Supreme Court has declared that "the Amendment was designed to preserve the basic institution of jury trial in only its most fundamental elements," [43] and that "only those incidents which are regarded as fundamental, as inherent in and of the essence of the system of trial by jury, are placed beyond the reach of the legislature." [44]

A series of nineteenth century Supreme Court decisions applying this fundamental-elements principle approved the directed verdict without pointing to any clear precedent for it in eighteenth century English law. [45] Similarly, early in this century the Court held that the Seventh Amendment does not prohibit summary judgment, a procedural device that was unknown in England in 1791. [46]

The fundamental-elements principle also was reflected in the Court's 1897 decision in Walker v New Mexico & Pacific Railroad Co, [47] where a jury's answers to special interrogatories were inconsistent with its general verdict. The issue was whether the trial court could enter judgment based on the answers to the special [*188] interrogatories or could only grant a new trial. The Supreme Court did not cite any precedent in the English common law for entering a judgment contrary to the jury's general verdict. [48] But it held that the Seventh Amendment posed no obstacle to entry of such a judgment, because the purpose of the Amendment "is not to preserve mere matters of form and procedure but substance of right." [49]

Numerous decisions in this century reflect the continuing importance of the fundamentalelements principle. In 1920, the Supreme Court held in Ex parte Peterson [50] that the Seventh Amendment was not violated by the appointment of an auditor to make a preliminary investigation, hear witnesses, examine financial records, and prepare a report to be admitted at trial as prima facie evidence. The Court acknowledged that "there did not exist in England, or so far as appears in any of the colonies, any officer, permanent or temporary, who, in connection with trials by jury, exercised the powers of an auditor above described." [51] The Court nonetheless found no constitutional violation, because "new devices may be used to adapt the ancient institution [of jury trial] to present needs and to make of it an efficient instrument in the administration of justice." [52]

REV_00262797

In 1931, the Court held in Gasoline Products Co v Champlin Refining Co [53] that when a new trial is granted because of an error relating to one issue, the retrial may be limited to that issue, provided that "the issue to be retried is so distinct and separable from the others that a trial of it alone may be had without injustice." The Court so held despite the settled rule of the English common law that a retrial had to be of the entire case. [54]

In the 1943 case Galloway v United States, [55] Justice Black, joined in dissent by Justices Douglas and Murphy, attacked as violative of the Seventh Amendment the expanded use of the directed verdict that had been approved in a series of Supreme Court decisions between 1871 and 1929. In response, a six-Justice majority emphasized that the Constitution preserved only the most fundamental elements of the English jury-trial system: [*189]

The Amendment did not bind the federal courts to the exact procedural incidents or details of jury trial according to the common law in 1791, any more than it tied them to the common law system of pleading or the specific rules of evidence then prevailing. Nor were "the rules of the common law" then prevalent, including those relating to the procedure by which the judge regulated the jury's role on questions of fact, crystallized in a fixed and immutable system. On the contrary, they were constantly changing and developing during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. In 1791 this process already had resulted in widely divergent common-law rules on procedural matters among the states, and between them and England. And none of the contemporaneous rules regarding judicial control of the evidence going to juries or its sufficiency to support a verdict had reached any precise, much less final, form. In addition, the passage of time has obscured much of the procedure which then may have had more or less definite form, even for historical purposes.

. . .

The Amendment was designed to preserve the basic institution of jury trial in only its most fundamental elements, not the great mass of procedural forms and details, varying even then so widely among common-law jurisdictions. [56]

In its 1973 decision in Colgrove v Battin, [57] a sharply divided Court relied upon the fundamental-elements doctrine in holding that the "jury trial," as guaranteed by the Seventh Amendment, may be a trial before a jury of only six persons. [58] The Court so held despite the tradition of twelve-person juries dating back at least to the fourteenth century, [59] and despite the fact that many of the Court's own decisions had assumed that the Seventh Amendment requires a twelve-person jury. [60] In an opinion by [*190] Justice Brennan, the Court explained that the divergence of state practices in 1791 had meant that the civil jury-trial provision of the Bill of Rights "would necessarily have to be general," and that in fact "the right was limited in general words to 'suits at common law.'" [61] The Court could "only conclude . . . that by referring to the 'common law,' the Framers of the Seventh Amendment were concerned with preserving the right of trial by jury in civil cases where it existed at common law, rather than the various incidents of trial by jury." [62] The Court framed the question as "whether a jury of 12 is of the substance of the common-law right of trial by jury," [63] and concluded that it was not. [64]

REV_00262798

In its 1979 decision in Parklane Hosiery Co v Shore, [65] the Court again relied upon the fundamental-elements principle. The Securities and Exchange Commission ("SEC") had brought an equitable action in which it had secured a declaratory judgment against a corporation for issuing a false and misleading proxy statement. [66] The Court held that the Seventh Amendment posed no obstacle to applying the doctrine of collateral estoppel against the corporation in a subsequent legal action by a class of stockholders, thus precluding the corporation from denying that the proxy statement was false and misleading. [67] The Court so ruled even though at common law mutuality of parties was required before a party could be bound by a prior judgment, and the stockholders had not been parties to the SEC action. [68]

In its 1996 decision in Markman, the Court held that the Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial, though applicable to patent-infringement actions, does not confer a right to have a patent construed by a jury. [69] The critical question, the Court said, was "whether the particular trial decision must fall to the jury in order to preserve the substance of the common-law right as it existed in 1791." [70] To answer the question, the Court explained, "the sounder course, when available, is to classify a mongrel practice . . . by using the historical method, much as we do in charac- [*191] terizing the suits and actions within which they arise." [71] If an "exact antecedent" is lacking, "the best hope lies in comparing the modern practice to earlier ones whose allocation to court or jury we do know, . . . seeking the best analogy we can between an old and the new." [72]

Gasperini, the Court's most recent Seventh Amendment decision, is also instructive, although it involved the Reexamination Clause rather than the Jury Trial Clause. [73] At issue was the permissibility of appellate review of the denial of a motion to set aside a jury verdict as excessive. [74] In several opinions from the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Court had interpreted the Seventh Amendment to bar such review. [75] In Gasperini, however, the Court held such review to be "reconcilable with the Seventh Amendment as a control necessary and proper to the fair administration of justice." [76] The Court cited no precedent for the practice in eighteenth century English law. Instead, the Court indicated that the meaning of the Seventh Amendment was not frozen in 1791:

If the meaning of the Seventh Amendment were fixed at 1791, our civil juries would remain, as they unquestionably were at common law, 'twelve good men and true' . . . . But see Colgrove v. Battin (six-member jury for civil trial satisfies Seventh Amendment's guarantee). Procedures we have regarded as compatible with the Seventh Amendment, although not in conformity with practice at common law when the Amendment was adopted, include new trials restricted to the determination of damages, and Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 50(b)'s motion for judgment as a matter of law. [77]

[*192]

The principle that the Seventh Amendment preserves only the most fundamental incidents of the English jury-trial system has greatly restricted the reach of the Amendment. The impact of the fundamental-elements principle can be seen today in matters as basic as the number of jurors in the jury box; motions made before, during, and after trial; and the scope of appellate review.

II. Supreme Court Cases Purportedly Establishing the Right to Have a Jury Set Punitive Damages

Some courts and commentators have suggested that certain decisions of the Supreme Court involving awards of damages establish that the Seventh Amendment right to jury trial extends to determining the amount of punitive damages. This Part shows why those cases do not resolve this issue.

A. Barry v Edmunds

REV_00262799

The Supreme Court's 1886 decision in Barry v Edmunds [78] has been cited as authority that the Seventh Amendment confers a right to have a jury set punitive damages. [79] The Court held that an action for trespass should not have been dismissed by the trial court for failure to satisfy the federal amount-in-controversy requirement, which at that time was $ 500. [80] The trial court had explained that "if the jury should render a verdict for ($ 500) five hundred dollars damages such verdict would be excessive, and the court would feel compelled to set it aside." [81] The Supreme Court concluded that, to the contrary, a jury could award more than $ 500, because the value of the horse forcibly taken from the plaintiff by the defendant ($ 100) "would not necessarily cover [the plaintiff's] actual, direct, and immediate pecuniary loss," [82] and because the jury could award punitive damages. [83]

Of particular pertinence is the following passage in the Supreme Court's opinion:

There was clear error in the Circuit Court in its ruling, as matter of law, that there could be no lawful recovery . . . of an amount equal to that which is necessary to support the [*193] jurisdiction of the court. The same error was repeated in acting upon the statement, that a verdict, if rendered for that amount, would be excessive and set aside for that reason--a statement which could not, at any rate, be judicially made before such a verdict was in fact rendered. It adds, indeed, to the principal error, if any distinction can be made, that which consists in encroaching upon the province of the jury. . . . In such cases as the present, and other actions for torts where no precise rule of law fixes the recoverable damages, it is the peculiar function of the jury to determine the amount by their verdict. . . . A verdict will not be set aside in a case of tort for excessive damages "unless the court can clearly see that the jury have committed some very gross and palpable error, or have acted under some improper bias, influence or prejudice, or have totally mistaken the rules of law by which the damages are to be regulated"--that is, "unless the verdict is so excessive or outrageous," with reference to all the circumstances of the case, "as to demonstrate that the jury have acted against the rules of law, or have suffered their passions, their prejudices, or their perverse disregard of justice to mislead them." In no case is it permissible for the court to substitute itself for the jury, and compel a compliance on the part of the latter with its own view of the facts in evidence, as the standard and measure of that justice, which the jury itself is the appointed constitutional tribunal to award. [84]

It is clear from the parts of the opinion immediately preceding [85] and following this passage [86] that the "damages" referred to included punitive as well as compensatory damages. Therefore, the Court's statement that "the jury itself is the appointed constitutional tribunal to award" damages [87] could be read to mean that the Jury Trial Clause entitles a party to have a jury determine the amount of punitive damages. [*194]

But, considered in its entirety, Barry does not so hold. Whether compensatory damages or punitive damages were to be determined by a jury if the case proceeded to trial was not at issue; the trial court had explicitly assumed that damages would be for the jury to assess if the case were tried. [88] The trial court had nevertheless dismissed the action because it had concluded that any jury verdict of more than $ 500 would have been excessive. [89] The Court's statement that "the jury itself is the appointed constitutional tribunal to award" damages followed a discussion that focused on the limitations of a court's power to set aside as excessive a jury's verdict in a tort action. [90] The statement thus appears to have been made with reference to the Re-examination Clause rather than the Jury Trial Clause. The Court also spoke generally of damages in tort, and did not specifically address punitive damages. [91]

B. Curtis v Loether

Eighty-eight years after Barry, the Court addressed the right to a jury trial in another case involving a prayer for punitive damages. But, again, it did not hold that there was a right to have the jury set those damages.

In Curtis v Loether, [92] an African-American woman alleged that two white men had refused to rent her an apartment because of her race, in violation of Title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968. [93] Her complaint sought injunctive relief and punitive [*195] damages (which the statute permitted in the amount of $ 1,000 or less). The prayer for injunctive relief was decided before trial, and at trial the plaintiff sought to recover compensatory as well as punitive damages. [94] The trial court refused the defendants' request for a jury trial. [95] After a bench trial, it found no actual damages but awarded $ 250 in punitive damages. [96]

The Supreme Court held that the defendants should have been afforded a jury trial. "The Seventh Amendment does apply," the Court declared, "to actions enforcing statutory rights, and requires a jury trial upon demand, if the statute creates legal rights and remedies, enforceable in an action for damages in the ordinary courts of law." [97]

The Court concluded that the action was one to enforce "legal rights." [98] First, "a damages action under the statute sounds basically in tort--the statute merely defines a new legal duty," and the cause of action is "analogous to a number of tort actions recognized at common law." [99] Second, and according to the Court more important, "the relief sought here--actual and punitive damages--is the traditional form of relief offered in the courts of law." [100] The Court also commented that, whatever might be the merit of circuit court decisions that had characterized backpay awarded in Title VII employment discrimination cases as "equitable," "there is surely no basis for characterizing the award of compensatory and punitive damages here as equitable relief." [101]

Like Barry, Curtis does not establish that the Seventh Amendment entitles a party to have a jury set punitive damages. In Curtis the trial court had decided all issues without a jury--including whether the defendants had discriminated against the plaintiff because of her race, whether she had suffered actual damages, whether punitive damages were warranted, and if so what the amount of punitive damages should be. [102] In holding that the defendants had been improperly denied a jury trial, the Supreme Court did not specify whether a judge or a jury should determine the amount of punitive damages. [103] [*196]

In defending the denial of a jury trial, the plaintiff had stressed in the Supreme Court that the only damages she sought in her complaint were punitive damages. [104] Significantly, the Court did not state that it made no difference whether only punitive damages were sought, but instead noted that the plaintiff "later sought to recover actual damages as well," that the pretrial order listed actual damages as an issue to be tried, and that at trial the plaintiff unsuccessfully attempted to prove such damages. [105]

In distinguishing fair housing actions under Title VIII from employment actions for reinstatement and backpay under Title VII (which several courts of appeals had held did not trigger the right to a jury trial), [106] the Curtis Court stressed that "the decision whether to award backpay is committed to the discretion of the trial judge," whereas "there is no comparable discretion [under Title VIII]: if a plaintiff proves unlawful discrimination and actual damages, he is entitled to judgment for that amount." [107] The Court's distinction depended on the presence of a claim for actual damages. Furthermore, in this respect punitive damages are similar to backpay under Title VII, not to actual damages under Title VIII. Punitive damages are awarded as a matter of discretion; there is no entitlement to them. [108]

The Court also stated that "we need not, and do not, go so far as to say that any award of monetary relief must necessarily be 'legal' relief." [109] Immediately following that statement, the Court cited two of its prior decisions and, in a footnote, page 414 of the Fifth Circuit's decision in Swofford v B & W, Inc. [110] The Fifth Circuit stated there that the Supreme Court's decisions in Beacon Theatres, Inc v Westover [111] and Dairy Queen, Inc v Wood [112] [*197]

REV_00262801

had not "converted typical non-jury claims, or remedies, into jury ones" and had not "suddenly converted any money request into a money claim triable by jury." [113] Moreover, the Swofford court had made those statements in support of its conclusion that "exemplary damages and attorneys' fees are not money claims triable by jury, although they are awarded in a 'legal' action." [114]

The Supreme Court's citation of Swofford, together with the care the Court took to point out that the issue of actual damages had been tried, [115] suggests that the Court did not intend to decide whether there is a right to have a jury set punitive damages.

III. Tull v United States

Not only has the Supreme Court never held that the Seventh Amendment guarantees a right to a jury trial on the amount of punitive damages, but in its 1987 decision in Tull v United States, the Court ruled that the Seventh Amendment does not entitle a defendant to have a jury determine the amount of a civil penalty. [116]

Tull involved an action by the federal government against a real estate developer, Edward Tull, for a civil penalty under the Clean Water Act ("CWA"). [117] The government sought a penalty of nearly $ 23 million. [118] The trial court denied Tull's demand for a jury trial and, after a bench trial, held him liable and assessed a penalty of $ 325,000. [119]

In an opinion by Justice Brennan, the Supreme Court held that Tull had a right to a jury trial on his liability for a penalty, [120] but not on the amount of the penalty. [121] It was permissible, the Court ruled, for Congress to vest trial judges with the power to set the amount of penalties under the CWA. [122] The Court explained that having the jury "determine the remedy in a trial in [*198] which it must determine liability" is not "necessary" "to preserve the 'substance of the common law right of trial by jury.'" [123] In a footnote, the Court added the very broad statement that "nothing in the Amendment's language suggests that the right to a jury trial extends to the remedy phase of a civil trial." [124] The Court said it had been "presented with no evidence that the Framers meant to extend the right to a jury to the remedy phase of a civil trial." [125]

The Court went on to explain:

> The assessment of a civil penalty is not one of the "most fundamental elements." Congress' authority to fix the penalty by statute has not been questioned, and it was also the British practice. In the United States, the action to recover civil penalties usually seeks the amount fixed by Congress. The assessment of civil penalties thus cannot be said to involve the "substance of a common-law right to a trial by jury," nor a "fundamental element of a jury trial." [126]

The Court added two other justifications for its conclusion that Tull had no right to have a jury determine his penalty. First, "since Congress itself may fix the civil penalties, it may delegate that determination to trial judges." [127] Second, "in this case, highly discretionary calculations that take into account multiple factors are necessary in order to set civil penalties under the Clean Water Act. These are the kinds of calculations traditionally performed by judges." [128]

Although Tull involved a statutory civil penalty rather than punitive damages, the Court's opinion specifically notes that "the remedy of civil penalties is similar to the remedy of punitive damages, another legal remedy that is not a fixed fine." [129] More- [*199] over, while two dissenting Justices argued that the decision was inconsistent with the traditional treatment of punitive damages, [130] the majority did not distinguish punitive damages or indicate that its decision would have no impact on claims for punitive damages. When Tull was decided, the Supreme Court had begun to devote increasing attention to cases involving

REV_00262802

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 83 Nw. U.L. Rev. 908,AT 928

*83 Nw. U.L. Rev. 908, **

Copyright (c) 1989 Northwestern University Law Review Northwestern University Law Review

SUMMER, 1989

83 Nw. U.L. Rev. 908

LENGTH: 43466 words

PUBLIC POLICY: VALUING LIFE AND LIMB IN TORT: SCHEDULING "PAIN AND SUFFERING".

Randall R. Bovbjerg, * Frank A. Sloan,  and James F. Blumstein ***

* Senior Research Associate, The Urban Institute, Washington, D.C. The manuscript for this Article was written with support from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation (Grant No. 12412), in part using data acquired under a project for the National Center for Health Services Research (No. 1RO1 HS05683-02). The work of Professor Blumstein was also supported in part by a grant from the HCA Foundation. This support is gratefully acknowledged. We also thank Thomas Metzloff, Joseph P. Newhouse, Jeffrey O'Connell, Wayne Vroman, and Walter Wadlington for their contributions to our thinking. The authors are solely responsible for the contents of this Article.

 Centennial Professor of Economics and Director, Health Policy Center, Institute for Public Policy Studies (VIPPS), Vanderbilt University.

 Professor of Law and Senior Research Fellow, Institute for Public Policy Studies (VIPPS), Vanderbilt University.

SUMMARY:
... Tort law's traditional methods of computing damages for personal injury and death are under attack -- and understandably so. ... Some reformers, however, would go even further, barring pain and suffering altogether as an element of personal injury awards. ... When it comes to actually computing a damage award, however, the substantive law of personal injury gives only very general, qualitative guidelines, with no meaningful quantitative guidance. ... Pain and suffering may be used as a catch-all category for the jury's consideration of all nonpecuniary losses in a case of nonfatal injury, subsuming other qualitative categories, like mental anguish or humiliation. ... This Section presents data that our project compiled on jury findings in Florida and Kansas City personal injury cases from 1973-87. ... In this vein, we present three alternative scheduling models: (1) a system of standardized awards set according to a matrix of dollar values based on victim age and injury severity; (2) a scenario-based system that employs descriptions of prototypical injuries with corresponding award values designed to be given to juries as guides to valuation; or (3) a system of flexible ranges of award floors and caps that reflect the various categories of injury severity. ...

TEXT:

damages for personal injury and death. Other tort reforms are already widespread, and political willingness to consider change remains high. [107] So the precedent exists for legislative action to curb jury discretion and modify judicial practice, and improvements in the valuation of damages seem quite timely and valuable.

II. THE LURE OF COMPREHENSIVE "SCHEDULING" FOR DAMAGE AWARDS

A. A New Liability System with Comprehensive Scheduling

Having identified the problems of variability and high cost in the existing liability system, it is tempting to replace the present system and "schedule" all tort damages -- economic and non-economic -- to make determinations simpler, less expensive, and more predictable. [108] A similar approach is taken by workers' compensation programs and disability plans, which make award determinations in an administrative or insurance forum and pay only limited wage losses and medical benefits. [109] But these approaches are mainly calculated to change the forum of claim resolution and to de-emphasize non-economic damages, not to codify or simplify damage law.

Many observers would prefer a uniform compensation system for all [*929] accidents. Such a system could be achieved through a strict or enterprise liability regime, [110] financed by third-party liability insurance. Alternatively, a no-fault compensation system could operate through mandatory first-party coverage (like no-fault auto insurance), [111] or a social insurance scheme (like New Zealand's). [112] These comprehensive systems have attractive characteristics. They reduce compensation per paid claim and make administration less expensive per dollar delivered, but increase the total number of claims compensated. [113] Such systems also offer far more compensation in total than today's fault-based regime, and may even maintain an element of deterrence (for instance, through experience rating [114] of premiums). Given the number of reasonable alternatives to the existing tort liability scheme, a legislature or study commission charged with making a social accommodation could readily do so, so long as there was sufficient political will supporting change.

We do not, however, recommend that the existing tort recovery system be completely scrapped and replaced with a new system of comprehensive and uniform scheduling. First, the creation of a system that essentially expands social funding seems politically -- and perhaps economically -- infeasible at this time. Such a system would expand the amount of total compensation paid and thus would be very expensive because many claims would be filed that are not now brought, at least among easily identified injuries. Second, current understanding of award variability is inadequate. Some of the variation we are unable to explain may be legitimate, particularly in economic damages, so the elimination of the compensation system's responsiveness to real differences between claimants would be unsound. Third, some types of injury may not be readily identified as compensable. Mass toxic torts and medical care mistakes, for example, would be much more difficult to discover and compensate without the inducement of large recoveries (and corresponding attorneys' fees) to reward those who ferret out the source of harm. [115]

[*930] B. The Current Liability System with Comprehensive Scheduling

Other observers advocate comprehensive scheduling of all damage awards even within the fault-based liability system, [116] perhaps with a change in forum. [117] We disagree. Such scheduling would cut payment levels (especially for intangible damages), and thus undercut the deterrence function of the present fault-based system. Society already accepts considerable limits on injured parties' right to recover damages (for example, liability rules, burdens of proof, and the high cost of prosecuting claims) in order to promote the appropriate (i.e., efficient) level of precaution. Effective deterrence, in turn, demands a level of awards that recognizes the full range of socially-incurred losses, not merely those losses that are insurable. A reduction in total awards to injured parties would promote under-precaution by potential tortfeasors, since the costs of protecting against nonpecuniary injuries might well exceed the costs of compensating injured parties under the schedule. Essentially, the argument turns on one's opinion of the validity and fairness of non-economic damages, a fundamental topic warranting longer discussion below. [118]

REV_00262842

Another reason for not adopting comprehensive scheduling for all damages is that many elements of damage -- for example, economic loss (especially past economic loss) -- are very idiosyncratic and relatively easy to observe and tabulate. A schedule or formula for total awards could only very roughly match payments to need, and a "one size fits all" damage schedule would inevitably be unfair both to claimants having greater pecuniary losses and defendants causing lesser pecuniary harm. Overall, the performance of the existing tort liability system in matching damages to severity of injury is much better than its reputation. [119] We conclude that the system's central tendencies are reasonable and should be reinforced through reforms, rather than repudiated by a damage matrix or algorithm for calculating total awards.

[*931] III. THE CASE FOR IMPROVING, NOT ABANDONING, NON-ECONOMIC DAMAGES

A. The Arguments Against Awards for Pain, Suffering and Other Intangible Damages

Many legal commentators and some courts have cited shortcomings in the law of non-economic damages. As one court put it:

Thoughtful jurists and legal scholars have for some time raised serious questions as to the wisdom of awarding damages for pain and suffering in any negligence case, noting, inter alia, the inherent difficulties in placing a monetary value on such losses, the fact that money damages are at best only imperfect compensation for such intangible injuries and that such damages are generally passed on to, and borne by, innocent consumers. [120]

Some legal commentators have accordingly called for the abolition of recovery for non-economic damages, [121] often in exchange for easing recovery of other damages, by law [122] or by contract. [123]

Some economists have likewise argued for limiting non-economic damages, albeit from a different perspective. [124] Their main argument is that neither private health or life insurance nor public programs that pay [*932] for disability and loss of life countenance awards for pain and suffering. [125] Thus, if people do not choose to purchase such compensatory policies on their own or through social programs, they should not be forced to "buy" these elements of damage through the liability system. [126]

Economic theory is also cited to explain why a fully informed individual may not purchase insurance for pain and suffering. [127] Insurance functions to transfer resources from the healthy to the injured state. [128] Money cannot directly replace nonpecuniary loss resulting from injury. According to the theory used by economists to analyze uncertain situations, in deciding how much insurance coverage to purchase, the individual compares the marginal utility of wealth in the healthy state with the marginal utility of wealth in the injured state. [129] Coverage will exceed pecuniary loss if, after replacing pecuniary loss, the marginal utility of wealth is increased by the accident (that is, coverage for non-economic loss will be bought); conversely, if the marginal utility of wealth falls after an accident, optimal coverage will be less than pecuniary loss. One recent empirical study found that injury reduces the marginal utility of wealth. [130]

B. The Validity of Pain, Suffering and Other Intangible Damages

In the final analysis, the case against non-economic damages is [*933] weak. First, it does not follow that the private market's failure to provide insurance coverage for pain and suffering means that the tort system should not pay for intangible losses either. There are good reasons for buyers not to buy and sellers not to sell such insurance -- other than its allegedly low value.

REV_00262843

From the potential buyers' perspective, informed consumers know that pain and suffering is compensable in tort cases; they are already covered when someone else is to blame for their injury. Given that they thus have a limited need for such coverage, its absence is not proof of its lack of value. Moreover, potential victims of negligence may feel that, ethically, it is not their responsibility to pay for pain and suffering inflicted upon them by others. All that can be legitimately inferred from the seeming lack of demand for pain and suffering coverage is that people seem willing to assume the risk of such losses where others are not legally responsible. This is not evidence that pain and suffering lack importance in the context of tortious injury.

From the potential sellers' perspective, offering coverage for intangible losses is a practical impossibility. Any insurance company that offered more than economic damages under a disability or injury policy would suffer significant "adverse selection" -- that is, the policy would disproportionately attract people having a higher risk of loss and slower rate of recovery. [131] Similarly, policies covering non-economic loss would face significant "moral hazard" -- that is, the natural tendency of policy-holders to overstate their losses and seek higher recoveries than they would if they had to pay out of their own pocket. [132] In the case of coverage for non-economic loss, the insured harms of pain, suffering, and other intangibles would be extremely difficult to monitor. If insurers attempted to control for such moral hazard while paying for non-economic damages, they would face the same problems that a court does in the liability context -- how to determine precisely what non-economic damages are appropriate and what constitutes undue reward for malingering and fraud. This would at a minimum increase the administrative cost of first-party insurance, driving it to levels similar to that of third-party liability coverage. [133] Insurers almost uniformly respond to moral hazard [*934] problems by paying less than full economic damages, [134] and sometimes imposing waiting periods prior to payment. In short, a private insurance market for pain and suffering probably cannot function. Presently, injured persons should consider themselves lucky to recover even most of their economic damages from private insurance. Publicly administered social disability and life insurance programs are even less generous than their private counterparts, [135] as taxpayer reluctance to redistribute resources adds to the fear of moral hazard as a constraint.

Second, the practice of private and public compensatory programs should not necessarily govern tort law, in which a key goal is deterrence, and even a modicum of vengeance to inhibit private efforts at self-help. [136] If the legal and liability insurance systems acted as merely compensation systems like first-party insurance, we would have junked them long ago. [137] Tort law does not seek to compensate all injuries; rather, it focuses on those injuries caused through the fault of others or otherwise judged worthy and capable of being deterred. From this perspective, it makes theoretical and practical sense to assess liability for more than economic loss, so that careless behavior is sufficiently deterred. [138] To consider only economic loss places at particular risk persons with little or no earnings, such as homemakers, children, and retirees. [139]

Not only is the case against awarding damages for intangible losses weak, but strong arguments exist in favor of such awards. First, from an economic perspective, there is good evidence that people value their own lives and health at considerably higher levels than is reflected by merely measuring "pure" economic loss. [140] People place value on the loss of life and limb in addition to the compensation they know they will receive through such programs as workers' compensation and health, life, and [*935] disability insurance. The observed values, then, are even farther above economic loss than first appears. The "value of life" work and other studies using different methodologies [141] document the economic value of "intangible" losses, further justifying their inclusion in tort law.

Second, from a legal perspective, intangible damages have clearly won a place in legal theory and practice. Modern jurisprudence has generally expanded the recovery for non-economic damages in tort. [142] The common law tradition and the increasing willingness of legislatures to waive sovereign immunity indicate a social desire for at least some non-economic damages to be considered "real" and compensable in cases of faulty injury. Moreover, as a practical matter, it can also be remarked [*936] that the considerable expense of individually adjudicating liability and determining damages must somehow be paid. A tacit role of awards for non-economic damages is to help pay a plaintiff's legal expenses without cutting into the economic recovery needed to meet actual, out-of-pocket losses caused by the injury. [143] The problem with non-economic damages is, in sum, not that they are inappropriate or unreal, but rather that they are extremely difficult to consistently monetize in the absence of quantitative standards. This difficulty is, of course, exacerbated by a sort of sympathetic moral hazard that juries face when making awards on an ad hoc basis and spending money that is not their own.

C. The Need to Reform the Law of Non-Economic Damages

Although non-economic damages are real and should be compensable in a fault-based system, this conclusion does not support totally unstructured decisionmaking about the appropriate levels of awards. All of the previously reviewed arguments concerning vague legal standards and the resulting variability, unfairness, and high expense still hold. In fact, as one might expect of the least well-specified of all elements of damage, non-pecuniary awards show an even greater variability than do total valuations. Table 3 presents the range of values for awards for pain and suffering. [144] Table 3 is based on empirical analysis of the same Florida and Kansas City jury verdicts used to describe total valuations in Table 2 above, [145] but with fewer observations included. [146] The distribution of awards for non-economic loss shows even wider dispersion than the distribution for total awards shown in Table 2. Additionally, the award levels for extreme outliers [147] exceed the means by even more when analysis is restricted to the non-economic component of awards. Thus, awards [*938] for pain and suffering and other intangible losses may be unreasonably inconsistent within the relatively discrete and unambiguous categories for injury severity.

[*937]

TABLE 3

JURY VALUATIONS a OF NON-ECONOMIC LOSS b VARY EVEN MORE WIDELY: DISTRIBUTION BY SEVERITY OF INJURY

(in thousands of 1987 dollars)

	Severity Level c		Number of Cases d	2.5% Critical Value e	25th Percentile	Median
1		(emot.)	1	--	--	25
2			69	0	0	2
3			106	0	0	9
4		(temp.)	16	0	4	36
5			104	0	3	46
6			29	0	9	292
7		(perm.)	15	0	336	1,642
8			5	0	778	1,832
9		(death)	15	0	260	545
		Total	366	0	1	21

a. Valuation = amount of jury award, adjusted for comparative negligence, if any.

b. Non-economic loss calculated as valuation less reported economic loss; negative values are reported as Zero.

REV_00262845

c. See Table 1 for severity levels.

d. Six cases missing data on severity are included in the total; cases of no liability and those missing data on economic loss are omitted from the table.

e. For severities with fewer than 40 observations, the 2.5% critical value (or 97.5% critical value) is equivalent to the minimum (or maximum) value.

Severity Level c		Mean	75th Percentile	97.5% Critical Value e	Standard Deviation
1	(emot.)	25	--	--	--
2		10	7	93	37
3		53	56	403	98
4	(temp.)	62	60	284	85
5		160	152	1,507	345
6		386	598	1,564	467
7	(perm.)	2,309	3,466	8,970	2,429
8		4,252	8,936	14,207	5,715
9	(death)	1,242	1,247	10,759	2,668
	Total	301	135	1,642	1,171

c. See Table 1 for severity levels.

e. For severities with fewer than 40 observations, the 2.5% critical value (or 97.5% critical value) is equivalent to the minimum (or maximum) value.

Nonetheless, just as for total valuations, both legitimate and illegitimate factors may help explain the variations. Moreover, as for awards in general, although individual cases vary enormously, the medians and means show an upward progression across severity levels that one would expect, again with a drop-off for death cases. Reform is therefore in order -- but to improve, rather than abandon, the tort liability system.

IV. THREE TYPES OF SCHEDULING REFORMS FOR NON-ECONOMIC DAMAGES

This Section proposes three alternative ways to "schedule" amounts allowable for pain and suffering and other non-economic damages. Scheduling can provide rational standards -- heretofore unavailable -- for valuation, thus improving the tort system's current approach, rather than abolishing or arbitrarily limiting nonpecuniary damages. We propose that these models be legislatively implemented, [148] although some change might be accomplished by the judiciary alone, perhaps through a state's judicial conference. Dollar values for the schedules could be based on past jury awards, or possibly on findings of the "value of life" research, with legislative or judicial adjustments to either.

The three scheduling models discussed here are designed for ordinary cases of bodily harm and mental distress. [149] The first reform model [150] creates a matrix of values that would award fixed damage amounts according to the severity of injury and age of the injured party. However contructed, the matrix's values would be binding of jury findings of nonpecuniary damages, although the possibility of unusually severe or minor cases may call for ranges of values within the matrix, or some other provision permitting special attention to "outliers." The second proposal [151] also gives juries systematic information on appropriate awards based on past experience. However, rather than a binding matrix of awards, it provides a small set of paradigmatic injury "scenarios," with associated dollar values. These values would serve as nonbinding benchmarks for assessing the case at trial. A jury would be free to award any amount, but the benchmarks would serve to guide their award and [*939] review by trial and appellate judges. The third approach [152] mandates fixed limits on awards of non-economic damages, as many state legislatures have already done. But we suggest replacing today's dominant approach of placing a single arbitrary cap on all non-pecuniary awards with a system of flexible floors and ceilings that vary with injury severity and victim age. [153] Table 4 summarizes the three approaches and the choices that must be made to implement any of them.

TABLE 4: THREE WAYS TO SCHEDULE NON-ECONOMIC LOSSES: MATRIX, SCENARIOS, AND RANGES

	Reform Model	Basic Approach	Main Source of Scale, Values
A.	Award Matrix	Relative value scale, plus dollar numeraire	1. Past awards, scaled by severity of injury & age of injured person or 2. Value of life findings, plus relative injury scales (in either approach, dollar values modified during implementation)
B.	Injury Scenarios	Listing of prototypical injuries and approved accompanying values	Descriptions of cases from legislature or judiciary, values from past awards, as judgmentally adjusted
C.	Flexible Ranges of Awards	Caps and floors on awards by severity level	Value of limits set to exclude extreme outliers (e.g., top and bottom 5%, outside two standard deviations)

	Reform Model	Model-Specific Choices of Implementation	General Implementation Choices [applicable to all models]
A.	Award Matrix	Suggest using 9 severity levels, 6 age groupings (could be more or fewer) Suggest values be binding	Suggest new reporting system for awards as source of benchmarks Suggest special verdicts in

REV_00262847

		on fact finder (could be advisory) Suggest "point value" for each cell of matrix (could be range) Suggest applying to both injuries and deaths (could leave out deaths, now subject to different valuation rules)	all cases (could be left to general verdicts) Suggest establishment of "outlier" system for small number of cases Suggest that all valuations be made by jury Need ultimately to consider how to treat derivative claims -- could be kept within schedules or handled outside scheduled amounts .
		Suggest using past awards to guide most values, value of life findings for death cases
Injury	Suggest providing small Scenarios	Suggest that all values number of scenarios (each representing a paradigm case) for each of 6 age groups of injured persons (could use fewer scenarios for all ages, or let judge select)	be based on past experience, but adjusted by legislative judgment, with judicial input (could be mechanistically calculated, without change) Suggest that all personal injuries be included (not malpractice only)
		Suggest scenarios be binding only as boundary lines, so awards can be at any reviewable for reasonableness	dollar level, yet
C.	Flexible Ranges of Awards	Suggest mandatory application (could be voluntary, e.g., standards for additur and remittitur by trial judge)	Suggest that all values be increased for inflation annually, periodically recalibrated as to relativities

A. Creating an Award Matrix for Non-Economic Damages

We suggest developing a relatively simple matrix for juries to compute non-economic loss, using the severity of injury and age of the injured person as objective, classifying factors for determining damage awards. It is important that classification be objective so that the system can achieve similar results in similar cases and be seen clearly to do so. We prefer that valuations for the scheduling matrix be based on past jury verdicts, although we also believe that the "value of life" research could serve as a supplementary source. In either case, constructing a matrix requires policymakers to decide the categories of injury to use, the "worth" of the categories relative to one another, and the general dollar level of recoveries desirable.

REV_00262848

1. The Basic Matrix Approach. -- Award levels should be based on objective factors reasonably related to non-economic loss. The most appealing three measures now obtainable for classifying purposes are the severity of injury, the injured person's age, and the body part affected. The resulting categories can then be arrayed in a matrix with values given to each cell of that matrix.

With regard to severity of injury, intuition suggests that higher severity should mean higher non-economic damages, although awards would not necessarily progress upward in a linear fashion. Permanent injuries are bound to cause greater pain and suffering than temporary ones; similarly, major injuries are expected to cause greater emotional trauma than [*941] minor ones. Age is another objective indicator, and one expects different age groups to react differently to injury. For temporary injuries, a younger person should recover more quickly from psychic harm than an older one, just as their bodies recover more quickly from physical injury. For permanent injuries, however, a younger person can be expected to endure the attendant intangible effects across a greater life expectancy. [154] One would also expect to find a relationship between the body part injured and the level of nonpecuniary harm. [155]

We investigated the influence of these and other factors empirically for their influence on past patterns of awards for non-economic loss. The influence of severity alone, uncontrolled for other factors, was presented in Table 3. Our findings are based on regression analysis that controls for the influence of various factors, including jurisdiction. [156] This analysis shows that the severity of injury is the strongest correlate of amount, with the age of the victim next. Body part alone is not as predictive of non-economic damages as injury severity. Moreover, it is not possible to use body part in the same regression as severity because it is too closely correlated with the nine-point severity scale. [157]

We are thus encouraged to use age and severity as the classifying variables; beyond their statistical suitability, they are also objective measures easily applied in practice. Using nine injury-severity classifications [*942] and six age groups yields a matrix of fifty-four cells. [158] This would allow a wide range of specific values and considerable differentiation by type of case without becoming unmanageably complex. Moreover, boundary disputes should be uncommon. Age is, of course, completely objective. The nine severity categories are also relatively objective and mutually exclusive, thus permitting little upward "creep" into higher severity levels, despite claimant motivation to seek higher rankings once severity categories are linked to payment amounts. With regard to duration of injury, one might like to better adjust for the precise length of suffering, but the severity categories already do that in a rough way (temporary versus permanent), [159] and greater precision would perhaps create considerable moral hazard.

2. Sample Matrix with Values Based on Past Awards. -- We suggest basing matrix values on the awards for nonpecuniary injury of past juries, preferably as adjusted by the trial and appellate courts. This Section presents a sample matrix and explains its development and proposed use. We offer this matrix solely as an example and to begin serious debate on this type of reform. We do not suggest that these particular values are somehow "correct" for all injuries, in all jurisdictions, or that it is ready for implementation. Better reporting of damage awards [160] and a review of past experience within each jurisdiction [161] are needed before any reform is implemented.

Table 5 presents the sample award matrix for non-economic damages that results from our empirically based estimates of jury valuations for one important jurisdiction, the state of Florida, for which we have analyzed considerable data. [162] Recall that award levels vary considerably [*943] across jurisdictions, [163] and that these values are derived from estimates of juries' nonpecuniary awards at verdict, not at final settlement or after judgment on appeal. Our nine categories of injury severity are collapsed into seven in the sample matrix because two categories had too few observations involving non-economic damages; a more complete data set would allow the full nine severity categories. We grouped victim ages into six discrete categories. Table 5 is a good sample of what is possible using analytic techniques, even without the support of a fully reliable underlying data system.

REV_00262849

The values in Table 5 consist of relative weightings, not absolute dollar amounts. A value of 100 is assigned to the amount of non-economic harm caused by the death of a statistically average person aged 65 or over. The other values are set relative to this standard amount, in each case using regression analysis to hold more tangential factors constant. The result is a "relative value" matrix similar to the relative value scales used for pricing of such diverse items as physicians' services and auto repairs. The matrix amounts must be multiplied by a dollar "numeraire" to derive the actual dollar amounts that would be awarded under the matrix. [164]

Table 5 simply charts the past central tendencies of jury valuations, with no "second guessing" of the rules of law that were applied or the correctness of outcomes. Results from all types of past lawsuits are averaged together on the assumption that the law of damages is the same for all, although evidence reveals that recoveries presently differ by case type. Injuries resulting from medical malpractice are "worth? the most, and those due to auto accidents the least, controlling for age, severity, and other observed factors known to influence recoveries. [165] Depending on one's view of the reasons for past differences in result, it may not be appropriate to treat all awards as if they were founded on the same legal theory and otherwise the same. [166] Blending the award experience of all [*944] types of cases into a single matrix has the practical effect of raising awards in auto cases somewhat, and considerably lowering those for malpractice and products liability. Note also that all personal characteristics of plaintiffs (other than age) and defendants are irrelevant to levels of non-economic damage under the matrix; sex, race, occupation, and income are ignored as classifying factors regardless of their current impact in the "real world." [167]

TABLE 5

A POTENTIAL INJURY MATRIX FOR NON-ECONOMIC LOSS:
ONE JURISDICTION'S RELATIVE VALUES,
BY AGE AND SEVERITY OF INJURY a (using age 65 and over and death = 100)

		Age in Years
Severity Level		10 & under	11-17	18-35	35-50	51-64	65 & over
1,2 b		2	4	5	3	6	2
3	(temp.)	4	9	10	7	12	5
4		5	9	11	7	13	5
5		7	14	16	11	20	8
6	(perm.)	30	61	68	48	88	35
7,8 b		199	401	448	317	574	228
9	(death)	87	176	197	139	252	100

a. This index is based on regression results with positive non-economic loss only; observations = 284. See also notes to Tables 2 and 3.

b. Categories combined because of low number of valuations.

Source: Calculated from unpublished jury verdict data, 1973-87, compiled by Urban Institute/Vanderbilt University project.

REV_00262850

The matrix gives a single, fixed "relative value" for each possible combination of age and injury severity. Thus, a permanent, significant injury (level 6) to a 30-year-old plaintiff would result in an award roughly two-thirds the size of that awarded for the death of a plaintiff aged 65 or older. In general, as noted previously, higher injury severities have higher values, with a major jump from level 5 to level 6 and from level 6 to levels 7 and 8. [168] Deaths, however, are valued at relatively lesser amounts, reflecting not only common sensibilities that some fates are worse than death, but also relatively restrictive legal rules regarding non-economic losses in death cases. [169] Nonetheless, the derived values for [*945] non-economic damages in death cases are higher than one might expect, given that the main recovery in a survival action is probably for conscious pain and suffering prior to death. Values might be considerably lower in jurisdictions with less generous juries or more restrictive legal rules.

Importantly, in states that now award relatively lower amounts in death cases, it might be inappropriate to scale the award matrix around death cases. It is better to choose an intermediate value around which to scale the others -- that is, to fix as 100 on the matrix. If possible, the chosen intermediate value should be in a particularly clear and discrete category in order to anchor the matrix and facilitate policy discussion of the values.

Valuations in Table 5 also rise with age, and more smoothly than for severity, although with an odd dip for the 35-50 category and an expected drop for those aged 65 and over. Given this matrix of values, the lowest awards for nonpecuniary harm would be for insignificant-temporary injuries to children under 10; the highest awards would go to 51-64 year olds with major and grave permanent injuries.

The final step in creating this type of schedule is to choose a particular "numeraire," or dollar multiplier, to use with the relative value matrix. This fixed value numeraire is multiplied by the relative value indicated by the matrix for the victim's age and injury severity to calculate theactual award for non-economic damages in a given case. The observed numeraire from the statistical analysis of Florida cases was almost $ 6,500 (in 1987 dollars), so that the death of a 65-year-old -- the anchor category in the sample matrix -- was "worth" about $ 650,000 as a jury finding of non-economic damages. Other jurisdictions would differ; additionally, the use of an even more complete data set might well change results. Like the accompanying relative values, the dollar multiplier simply embodies the central tendencies of past jury valuations without considering post-trial adjustments. [170] Before embracing any such statistically calculated valuation, policymakers should decide whether the derived dollar amounts are in some sense "too much" (or "too little"), thereby fine tuning the matrix to conform with ideas of fairness and political judgment.

3. Implementation and Outliers. -- The sample matrix presented by Table 5 offers sufficient complexity to reflect a wide range of pain, suffering, loss of enjoyment, and other elements of non-economic loss in individual circumstances, but is sufficiently simple to understand and administer that it should result in greater predictability and cost-savings in dispute resolution. Severity and age as classifying measures are intuitively [*946] and empirically related to the subjective assessments of the extent of pain and suffering likely to have been experienced, yet they are sufficiently objective to facilitate their application in particular cases and to avoid "gaming" by the parties.

Given these attributes, the matrix's fixed values as adopted by any jurisdiction would be mandatorily applied. Juries would be instructed that, given liability, they should award exactly the indicated amount, adjusted only for comparative negligence. [171] Before verdict or on appeal, parties would be free to compromise on different amounts, just as now. Juries, however, would not have the freedom to compromise awards, something that is theoretically prohibited, but not practically enforceable. [172] Under a scheduling approach, non-economic awards should be based on a relatively small set of objective standards that accomplish much greater predictability and consistency -- and at a lower cost, so that jury discretion should be correspondingly limited. Additionally, a mandatory matrix gives the parties specific guidance

REV_00262851

[*908] Tort law's traditional methods of computing damages for personal injury and death are under attack -- and understandably so. Legal reformers have long argued that present law, when combined with jury discretion, inflates damage awards and creates problematic outcome variability. [1] The open-ended and unpredictable nature of tort exposure has, in turn, threatened the liability insurance system that funds most tort compensation. Determination of awards on an ad hoc and unpredictable basis, especially for "non-economic" losses, [2] also tends to subvert the credibility of awards and hinder the efficient operation of the tort law's deterrence function. Moreover, award levels differ considerably by type of legal action, with claims sounding in medical malpractice and products liability theories resulting in greater compensation than claims arising from automobile accidents for similar injuries. [3]

Legislatures have characteristically responded by enacting tort reforms, initially limiting the scope to medical malpractice, where crisis first provoked reform in the mid-1970s, but more recently with the promulgation of "generic" reforms in the wake of the general liability crisis that arose in the 1980s. [4] Many of these reforms significantly curtail [*909] plaintiffs' prerogatives and limit juries' discretion to award damages, most notably for non-economic harm. [5] Some reformers, however, would go even further, barring pain and suffering altogether as an element of personal injury awards. [6] Nonetheless, empirical findings tend to support the importance of non-economic losses, even showing that prevailing damage valuations may in fact be too low. [7] When people contemplate taking a dangerous job or investing in safety precautions, they value their own lives and health well beyond the potential medical costs and loss of earnings that could be caused by an accident. Use of these findings as a new kind of evidence in liability cases might further unsettle the insurance markets by considerably increasing the size and variability of damage awards. [8]

This Article proposes three alternative frameworks to perfect the valuation of non-economic damages in the current liability system. Each of these proposed models would constrain the operation of vague and open-ended legal rules and the wide latitude of discretion heretofore given legal decisionmakers. Increasingly sophisticated knowledge about the values that people place on the nonpecuniary aspects of life offers a good opportunity to reconsider the ad hoc valuation methods of today's personal injury law.

By focusing on the issue of non-economic damages, this Article addresses the least well-defined and most variable component of damage awards. Suggestions are aimed at all cases of personal injury and death. Given that much past analysis and legislation have focused on medical malpractice litigation, though, our examples are often drawn from this area. We suggest a variety of methods that could be used to guide juries and trial judges in their valuations of injury. The main goals of our proposals are common to each of these methods, however: to improve the accuracy and fairness of awards for non-economic damages, and to control the rate of growth over time, thus making litigation over damages less expensive and more predictable. Clearer signals of likely outcomes should promote earlier settlement of cases, inspire greater confidence in the fairness and predictability of the tort recovery system (thereby helping to maintain the efficient operation of the deterrent function of tort law), and make legal liability a more insurable event.

I. REASONS TO REFORM THE VALUATION OF DAMAGES

A. The Vagueness of the Law of Damages for Personal Injury

There is universal agreement that the compensatory goal of tort law [*910] requires making the successful plaintiff "whole," [9] a reasonably precise objective. The substantive law attempts to achieve this objective by compensating for many categories of economic expense and nonpecuniary loss. [10] When it comes to actually computing a damage award, however, the substantive law of personal injury gives only very general, qualitative guidelines, with no meaningful quantitative guidance. Hornbooks and jury instructions alike offer only generalities, [11] and some judges almost delight in opining that there are no objective standards. [12] for settlement negotiation; a looser or more discretionary matrix would not have similar effects. [173]

REV_00262834

One complaint concerning matrices like that in Table 5 -- that is, ones comprised of discrete "point values" -- is predictable: despite a large number of valuation "cells," there will remain legitimate variation in nonpecuniary injuries within each of the proposed categories that fixed values suppress, along with illegitimate variation. For example, one may contend that the pain and suffering attending deaths of people aged 65 and over vary too much to limit awards to a single amount; rather, even more individualized processes and rules are needed. [174] It is a truism that [*947] not all cases, even within a narrow category, can be "average"; there is inevitably variation.

One response to allegations that the two-variable matrix is too imprecise, is that accepting some imprecision in some individual cases is the cost of achieving greater precision across cases, of simplifying litigation, and of assuring all litigants that their awards are relatively fair compared with others similarly situated. Moreover, it can be seen as a strength, not a weakness, that the matrix mandates similar awards regardless of many factors that might influence a jury -- including the race, sex, and social status of the litigants. Additionally, any unacceptable imprecision in the two-variable matrix can be perhaps remedied by including more classifying factors to reflect other legitimate sources of variation. Proponents of greater precision should indicate the additional objective factors that should be considered (e.g., body part affected and duration of injury). [175] At some point, however, it should be realized that a multivariable classifying scheme becomes too complex to be administrable and credible.

A second level of complaint is that some relevant factors are inherently subjective and cannot be objectified or quantified in advance. [176] One example of such a subjective factor might be protracted agony at the time an injury is incurred. [177] Likewise, plaintiffs claiming unusual sensitivity to pain or humiliation (a claim that, of course, can be raised by anyone after the fact) might argue that the two-variable, point-value matrix fails to appreciate their peculiar circumstances.

Such subjective and case-specific matters cannot be accommodated within a point-value matrix, which accepts some degree of "leveling" of potentially legitimate variation in order to achieve simplicity, ease of administration, and consistency of results. Moreover, the present system -- with ad hoc decisionmaking and unpredictable results -- makes no promises of accurately reflecting legitimate variation across cases. The enormous range of awards within categories that is found in our data suggests that current results include both overcompensation and undercompensation. A point-value matrix eliminates the extremes and implicitly ensures that the ordinary victim [178] is appropriately compensated for such factors as agony and sensitivity to pain. Ultimately, however, the extent to which nonpecuniary damages should attempt to individualize [*948] valuations according to wholly subjective factors is a matter of judgment.

For those states that like the matrix approach, but still want to allow more flexibility to accommodate unusual subjective factors, we briefly outline two alternatives. The first modifies the matrix by adopting ranges of values, rather than point values, for each cell. Within each range, juries would retain their traditional discretion to individualize nonpecuniary awards. Under this approach, Table 5's cells would each contain two values -- a low end and a high end. [179] The point value now shown in each cell would be the center of a range, with boundaries between adjacent cells in a row being set at some point between the two center values. [180] Consider the top line of Table 5 -- the category combining severity level 1 and 2 injuries. As shown, the age 11-17 group is allotted a relative value of 4. As a range, this could be set as 3 to 4.5 -- exactly halfway toward its neighboring cells on either side. These values, again, are given merely as examples. [181] process for considering unusual, outlier cases. A plaintiff dissatisfied with the amount awarded through application of the matrix would be permitted to apply to a single statewide agency empowered to make supplementary awards. [182] A single reviewer for each state would maintain consistency of approach and result. We suggest an administrative agency because the courts have not normally played such a role; an administrative approach also seems appropriate where funds must be managed and disbursed across multiple cases.

A second way to change the matrix approach is to create a separate, post-trial administrative

If this modification to the pure matrix approach is made, an annual or biannual amount of money should be designated as available for additional distribution to outlier plaintiffs. Such funds could be accumulated by withholding a certain percentage of each court-ordered judgment in personal injury cases. [183] This fund would then be used to pay successful [*949] applicants during the budgeted period. The agency would have to make preliminary findings throughout the period, then make end-of-period adjustments if funds were insufficient, potentially seeking new and higher funding for future periods. Some method is also needed to discourage most litigants from seeking extra awards, as the matrix is designed to fairly compensate the ordinary range of cases. Losing applicants could, for example, be assessed the agency's (and perhaps the defendants') costs. A complete proposal would, of course, need to cover this and other details of operation.

4. Judgmental Adjustments and Other Policy Choices. -- A scheduling matrix similar to Table 5 could be constructed for any jurisdiction or combination of jurisdictions for any time period, given sufficient data. [184] Award levels can be adjusted over time to reflect changing legal rules, economic conditions, social attitudes and other factors. The matrix values could be computed mechanistically, with each category assigned the precise relative value indicated by analysis of past awards, including post-trial modifications.

Nonetheless, we recommend critical review by policymakers prior to final implementation. [185] Matrix values derived directly from statistics may be deemed arbitrary or otherwise "wrong." It is not obvious, for example, that the law should accept the lower values for the 35-50 age category that Table 5 shows. The set of relative values generated statistically should be tempered in accordance with common sense notions of reasonableness to eliminate or moderate incongruities.

Moreover, before accepting any statistically calculated amount, legislators or judges need to decide whether that value is in some sense "too much" or "too little." Common sense, interest group presentations, and possibly new research might also guide such normative choices. Policy-makers might decide to skew matrix-based awards toward the low or high end of present awards, rather than toward today's average awards (represented in Table 5), for example. General issues that concern this and the other possible scheduling approaches are discussed in more detail below. [186]

5. The Relevance of "Value of Life" Research. -- Ted Miller argues that value of life findings can help guide the determination of damage awards, especially for nonpecuniary elements of loss. [187] His findings are highly relevant to the law's substantive approach to damages in death [*950] cases and form a very instructive adjunct to the scheduling approaches discussed in this Article. However, such research fails to create a practicable schedule for non-economic damages. From a scheduling perspective, the key problems are that there is no consensus on the best estimate of the basic value of a lost life (or life year) [188] and that relevant factors needed to individualize values are insufficiently objective.

a. Death Values and Legal Rules. -- The traditional law of wrongful death and survival tends to undervalue death losses from the perspective of deterrence. [189] Legal commentators have long noted the irony that tortfeasors could be better off killing people than injuring them, [190] controverting common-sense intuitions that death is usually a less desirable result than injury. In particular, the absence of nonpecuniary damages in a death case greatly undervalues the actual loss from deaths, as the value of life research confirms. The creation of a schedule for nonpecuniary damages offers an opportunity to expand recoverability in death cases. Such an extension of the law would not only benefit decedents' survivors, but also promote more efficient deterrence. Whereas the adoption of any matrix would lead to more consistent calculation of nonpecuniary damages, use of a schedule for these purposes would effect a substantive legal change.

REV_00262853

Much of the traditional reluctance to allow higher recoveries in death cases comes from fear of unlimited awards and a sense that paying for non-economic loss cannot compensate the decedent, but rather constitutes a pure windfall to survivors or heirs. [191] Scheduling, however, controls the overall size of death awards, preventing defendants from facing open-ended liability. Moreover, a recovery model can be designed to avoid unjust windfalls without fully barring assessments for very real nonpecuniary losses. For example, tortfeasors could be required to pay the full non-economic loss indicated by the schedule, but not pay the full amount to survivors and heirs. Instead, a large share (perhaps, fifty percent) of the non-economic component of awards in death cases (net of lawyers' fees) could be placed in a public fund of some kind.

Of course, some reasonable share must go to plaintiffs, or there will be too little incentive to bring suit -- and thereby promote deterrence. [192] Evenly [*951] splitting the award balances the need for appropriate deterrence with the need to avoid windfalls. Courts could administer the fund, using proceeds to pay for the data reporting system proposed here. [193] Alternatively, the money could be used to pay for unusually high, outlier cases that exceed matrix-based amounts. [194] The substantive and procedural change in the law of death damages is also appealing from the perspective of blunting political and constitutional challenge; unlike most past "tort reform," it gives a clear new benefit to claimants rather than simply curtailing traditional prerogatives. [195]

How would one set award values for death cases? Past jury awards reflect legal restrictions on nonpecuniary recoveries and, therefore, offer little guidance for a new approach. Here, a legislature might well weigh the value of life evidence might be weighed, despite the defects that make it unwise to use only such evidence for creating damages schedules. [196] The value of life approach seems stronger when tempered by common sense adjustments, such as a legislature might make in adopting a matrix or other schedule for death cases. One could also use the age categories of the valuation matrix (Table 5), applying those relative weightings to the dollar numeraire set by the best estimate of the value of life research.

b. Injury Cases. -- The value of life findings give only a death-related numeraire; [197] to apply the research in such a way as to place values on nonfatal injuries, supplemental evidence is necessary to scale such injuries [*952] relative to death. Most such scales, however, rely on either expert assessment of disability and pain or the self-reported ability of the injured party to conduct normal activities. Used this way, value of life research becomes simply an adjunct to a system based on jury awards, rather than an independent source of values.

Overall, the approach of combining a dollar value for life with a scale of relative values has more conceptual than practical appeal, on at least four grounds. First, as noted before, the basic value of a life lost in the value of life literature is insufficiently determinate. [198] Second, there is no agreed methodology for determining relative values, nor a research or practical consensus on what whose relativities are. Thus, it is more plausible to expect such valuation to find acceptance in the regulatory framework where rough, average valuations of injuries are sufficient for ex ante regulatory decisionmaking than to expect state legislatures to accept similar imprecision in ex post valuation of individual injuries in tort litigation. Moreover, considerable methodological sophistication is needed to tease out values, making it hard to explain to laypeople and undercutting the attractiveness of the approach in political settings. [199]

Third, applying such scales in a liability case would require expert testimony concerning relevant relativities and the plaintiff's precise rank on the scoring system. This complex undertaking is more likely to lead to battles of the experts than simplification of damage computations and more predictable results. Fourth, the categories within the relative-value scales are extremely subjective and open to moral hazard. Most depend entirely too much on truthful self-reporting, which is put to a stern test when considerable money rides on whether claimants report that they are "anxious or depressed" as opposed to "happy and relaxed," "able to sleep normally" versus having "considerable difficulty in sleeping," or relatively "capable of activities of daily life" rather than "incapable" of normal functioning. [200] Moral hazard in the form of injury exaggeration already exists in the current system; [201] making a particular disability [*953] score the basis for a fixed award of non-economic damages would only make matters worse.

B. Valuation "Scenarios" to Assist Juries

1. The General Approach. -- Instead of a numerical matrix, a second form of damages scheduling might be to give juries a limited number of standardized injury "scenarios," with associated dollar values of non-economic loss for each. These descriptions of prototypical circumstances of injury would help jurors assess the non-economic damages in a given case, relative to the approved values in the scenarios. For each lawsuit, a relevant spectrum of scenarios would be provided, ranging from less severe to more severe injury. In effect, a set of scenarios would constitute a relative-value scale in readily grasped, qualitative terms. These scenarios would be best promulgated by legislatures or judiciaries, based upon the types of data reviewed for Table 5, with appropriate normative adjustments.

The scenarios would resemble the legal "hypotheticals" so beloved by law professors, but would focus on the circumstances of injury, rather than on the law. A small number of them, perhaps up to ten, would be included as jury instructions, preferably given in writing and allowed into the jury room. The jury would be instructed that no single scenario is expected to fit their own case perfectly, but that the scenario values are approved benchmarks by which to assess their case. They should decide which scenarios most nearly resemble the injury in the case they are deciding, then make the appropriate level of award somewhere near those values. The scenario values would thus be advisory rather than mandatory. [202] Even so, while juries would retain discretion to choose intermediate amounts between the scenario levels, their choices would be subject to more active judicial review to maintain consistency of valuation across cases.

The scenario approach reflects the normal mental response of people to difficult valuation problems outside the jury room -- that is, making comparisons to other cases. A person looking to buy or sell a house wants to know the selling price of other three-bedroom, two-bath houses in the neighborhood. Certainly, every house is unique, and small variations in location or features make a difference. Nonetheless, having a quantitative benchmark is essential to reasonable valuation -- and it also helps buyer and seller agree more rapidly than they otherwise might. Similarly, when psychological researchers have asked people to consider how they value certain states of injury, it has proven helpful to present [*954] scenarios about the extent of disability and pain. [203] Moreover, trial and appellate judges use a very similar approach when reviewing a jury award for excessiveness or inadequacy -- that is, they consider prior awards, drawing upon their personal experience, relying on the parties' briefs, or consulting published listings of awards. In contrast, adoption of the scenario approach would require a legislature to review and incorporate a complete body of information into the standardized scenarios and their valuations.

2. Scenario Content. -- Valuation scenarios must offer descriptions that are vivid enough to be comprehensible and offer a practical guide. They must not, however, consist of cases that are memorable for being unusual, but rather ones truly typical of each level of injury represented. As with any scheduling approach, it is vital to keep matters simple. The most important factors to reflect in a scenario are the physical severity of the injury, the victim's age or life expectancy, the extent of pain endured, the extent of incapacity to engage in normal activities, and the duration of each factor. Physical injury and age are relatively unambiguous and so help "anchor" the scenario objectively. The importance of duration

(even if only given as temporary versus permanent) is obvious. These objective factors alone considerably help distinguish among injuries, as shown by the sample matrix and supporting data discussed previously.

Pain and inability to function, though highly subjective, are also intuitively important. Moreover, they correspond to the two main types of intangible harm previously noted -- newly imposed suffering and loss of former enjoyment of life. For them, one might use fairly simple descriptors, such as the strength of drug needed to control pain and the type of activities curtailed. [204] These are subjective measures, so plaintiffs will tend to exaggerate their suffering while defendants try to minimize it; but the situation will be no worse than at present. [205]

In general, the scenarios should describe only circumstances of injury relative to damages, not to responsibility or causation. The degree of "color" to provide in a scenario must still be determined. One could give only neutral descriptors, as in the nine-point severity scale; alternatively, the scenarios could offer more engrossing depictions of the injury. Particularized details make a scenario seem more real, but may also make it overly case-specific and difficult to generalize to other cases. A typical neutral scenario might read:

Permanent minor injury (level 5). Life expectancy 25 years. Mild persistent [*955] pain, usually controllable with aspirin. Unable to engage in more than light housework.

A more colorful version might explain:

Plaintiff Peters has completely and permanently lost the use of her left arm. Her life expectancy is 25 years, according to standard life insurance tables. Her arm throbs painfully most of the time, but the pain can usually be controlled with aspirin. She cannot do more than light housework.

Another issue is the handling of death cases. One could maintain the traditional restrictive approach to nonpecuniary losses, limiting the description to conscious pain and suffering endured by the decedent. Alternatively, in the interest of greater deterrence, one could describe the emotional losses of survivors and perhaps also the enjoyment of life lost by the decedent. This choice is a matter of substantive law, however, and not strictly a problem of constructing scenarios.

3. Creating Scenarios. -- How many scenarios would be needed to represent the spectrum of non-economic damages fairly? To an observer steeped in courtroom process, the answer might well be "an infinite number," for the types and degrees of suffering and loss of life's enjoyment are indeed infinite. [206] Nonetheless, a fixed number of guideposts can cover the spectrum; a relatively small number of scenarios applicable to any given case would suffice, and, once the law approves a set number of qualitative descriptions, future advocates are left to argue the appropriate placement of their cases among these scenarios. In any event, it does not seem feasible to expect a jury to cope with a large number of qualitative scenarios at once. The capacity (and patience) of juries is limited, and ten scenarios for each case may be the outside limit. [207]

The simplest approach would base nine scenarios on the nine levels of the severity scale, [208] but would give a much more thorough description of prototypical injury for each level. A reasonable objection to this approach is that there would be too great a difference between adjacent injury values. Nine widely-spaced scenarios provide far more information than jury instructions now provide, but admittedly one might still prefer a more finely differentiated approach. Even so, the number of scenarios actually supplied a jury in a given case must be kept manageable.

One way to utilize more scenarios without overburdening juries [*956] would be to create a large inventory of scenarios describing a full universe of injuries, but use only a small number of relevant ones in a given case. For example, one could have a six-scenario spectrum for each severity category on the nine-point scale. The number actually given the jury could be kept to a manageable size in several ways. First, the whole inventory of scenarios could be treated as part of the pattern jury instructions, with each side advocating particular sets to be submitted and the judge deciding which is appropriate. Alternatively, the judge could independently rule on the severity category of the case (for example, whether the evidence supported a category 7 or 8 injury), then direct the jury to consider the dozen or so scenarios associated with those two categories. The key problem with these judge-based approaches is that they arguably shift at least part of the jury's fact-finding function to the judge. A third approach would cluster the scenarios around a preliminary finding of one totally objective consideration -- the injured party's age, perhaps in the same six or seven classes used for the matrix -- so that the judge's determination would be uncontroversial. A fourth, and preferable, approach would give the jury instructions sequentially: once the jury reached a decision on liability and the appropriate category of injury, it would request the associated scenarios to determine nonpecuniary damages. [209]

REV_00262856

The scenario descriptions and associated dollar values could be developed from a variety of sources of inspiration -- the severity-scale categories, cases in jury verdict reporters, appellate court decisions, and value of life research scenarios. Dollar valuations could draw on the same sources as matrix scheduling -- reported past awards held not excessive or inadequate, value of life findings, and decisionmakers' own judgment and experience. These choices could be made by a state legislature, perhaps with guidance from a study commission. Many states have adopted a process for developing pattern jury instructions; this same process could also be used to create valuation scenarios. Alternatively, a state's judiciary could take the lead. The national, state, and local bar associations would no doubt be heard in any process.

C. Flexible Ranges in Lieu of Caps for Non-Economic Damages

1. The Present "Flat" Caps. -- Since 1975 legislatures have addressed concerns about the open-endedness of liability by enacting "caps" on some or all the damages awardable in personal injury cases. [210] By the end of 1988, most states had capped awards in some fashion. Most [*957] 1980s caps are applied broadly, rather than being limited to malpractice cases. [211] Most caps limit only the non-economic components of awards, presumably reflecting a general feeling that it is unfair to cap awards for economic losses, given the potential for very large medical and other bills. [212]

The caps almost always limit recovery for non-economic damages in all suits at a fixed amount, most commonly $ 250,000 or $ 500,000, but ranging from a low of $ 150,000 to a high of $ 1,000,000. [213] The caps prevent juries from awarding large amounts beyond provable economic losses as a form of quasi-punitive damages. Reformers also promote caps as necessary to keep insurance affordable, and the caps have been found to reduce liability insurance payments and premiums. [214] Nonetheless, flat caps are troubling, especially on issues of basic fairness, because the [*958] arbitrary limits come into play only in the most severe cases. [215] Moreover, caps are designed to address only potential jury overvaluation, and only in those cases with the very highest awards. They fail to address any undervaluation or overvaluation below the ceiling.

Thus, despite their popularity, caps are inferior to matrices or scenarios as a means of structuring nonpecuniary awards. A better system of limits could be developed.

2. An Improved, Flexible Range: Floors and Caps. -- Should states still prefer to set ceilings rather than adopt matrices or scenarios, they should address four key weaknesses of flat caps. First, they should hesitate to single out medical malpractice or other single areas for special treatment, given the similarity of the law of damages for all personal injuries. Second, recognizing that some injuries are much more severe than others, states should not apply a single, flat cap to all awards. [216]

REV_00262857

Third, states should avoid the arbitrariness of today's caps, whose levels bear no particular relation to the expected savings in liability insurance premiums (the generally stated rationale for enactment) nor any relationship to the correction of possible errors in jury valuation (this Article's primary concern). Even if a cap of, say, $ 250,000 is somehow "correct" when enacted, it is unlikely to remain so when unadjusted over time. [217] A more rational cap would somehow define unduly high awards, perhaps targeting the top 5% as unreasonable outliers. [218]

[*959] Fourth, states should not so readily assume that some awards are "too high," but that no award is too low -- an implicit assumption of flat caps. Proponents of caps seem to have articulated no basis for this assumption. The best rationale would seem to be that caps correct for an inherent asymmetry of the law -- defendants are liable for unlimited amounts, but plaintiffs can do no worse than zero recovery. [219] However, if mistakes occur at the high end of damage awards, perhaps because of an unusually sympathetic plaintiff, presumably they occur at the low end of awards as well, perhaps because of an unusually sympathetic defendant.

Flat caps have the virtue of leaving most assessments unaffected, but also the accompanying vice of giving no guidance to juries in most cases. We prefer matrices or scenarios as a means to improve valuation in all cases, but offer the following suggestions for states wanting to leave most jury verdicts unaffected. Instead of a single, arbitrary cap, we propose a set of varying floors and ceilings bounding jury awards at both the high and low ends of valuation. These limits should be tailored to reflect severity of injury or, better yet, severity and age combined. A minimum improvement would create a sliding scale of caps with award limits for the different categories of injury on the nine-point severity scale. This would allow higher recoveries than past caps in the most severe cases and decrease the maximum allowable award for less severe injuries. A further improvement would mandate minimum recoveries for injuries at each severity level. [220] Finally, the floors and ceilings could employ both injury severity and age as classifying factors, as in the matrix and scenario approaches.

A flexible set of floors and caps that accounts for injury severity could readily be created from the distribution of past jury findings -- for instance, setting the limits to invalidate the estimated top and bottom five percent of each group. [221] Because these are boundaries, affecting only far outliers, and not schedules to be applied to all cases, juries would still be free to tailor awards to fit precise circumstances, but would not be able to abuse their discretion by going too high or too low. Like current caps, juries might or might not be told about the existence of the flexible range. [222]

Flexible ranges aimed only at extreme outliers would presumably [*960] still leave considerable unexplained variability across jury valuations, even allowing larger awards to less severely injured plaintiffs than more severely injured ones. This effect distinguishes ranges set by flexible floors and ceilings from the matrix approach, even when the matrix's values consist of ranges rather than point values. [223] Floors and caps do not attempt to encourage equal results in equal cases, but rather only to correct errors of inadequacy and excessiveness. In this way, a system of flexible floors and caps is analogous to formalized standards of additur and remittitur.

D. Cross-Cutting Issues of Implementation

Regardless of the scheduling approach preferred by a particular jurisdiction, a number of practical issues common to all three models should be addressed. Underlying each of the proposals are concerns involving the data to be used as a foundation for scheduled award values, particularly the accumulation of a reliable data base and the weight to be given prior jury awards. There are additional procedural matters, such as the respective roles of judge and jury and employment of special verdicts as a procedural check on any tendency to pad awards. Finally, residual issues remain that must be considered -- namely, providing for changes in value over time and the treatment of less meritorious suits. [224]

REV_00262858

1. Accumulating a Data Base: A New Reporting System. -- A major strength of our proposed reforms is the use of actual past awards in scheduling award values. No entirely reliable and comprehensive compilation of jury awards is now available. [225] At least one court has remarked that awards in analogous cases would be helpful in providing "some sense of a reasonable range in awards" on review. [226] We propose that all states maintain reporting systems for damage awards, in a standard format, and corrected for subsequent judicial proceedings. [227]

[*961] Some time would elapse before any significant data could accumulate for any jurisdiction. Before then, general consideration of the matrix, scenario, and flexible-range reforms could begin. Less quantitative information is needed for scenarios and ranges than for matrices, so a legislative committee, judicial conference, or other policy body could use information from jury verdict reporters or other unofficial sources, with due regard to the need for informed judgment to correct for shortcomings of these reporters. Moreover, a jurisdiction could draw on better-documented experience in another state deemed comparable. Once a good reporting system is in place, superior information will be useful not only for initial construction of a scheduling model, but also for keeping current over time and shifting approaches in response to observed outcomes.

2. The Weight To Be Given Prior Jury Findings. -- Another matter for policymakers to resolve in scheduling valuations is the way in which prior jury valuations should be used. A premise of this Article is that the aggregate wisdom of prior findings of nonpecuniary damages should be codified in some fashion, and our three scheduling approaches offer different ways of doing so. In each case, we propose assigning dollar values to categories of injury severity based on prior jury findings. Arguably, the distribution of prior awards for non-economic damages is not an absolutely reliable basis for scheduling future awards. After all, it is the very lack of guidelines for awards that is the impetus for our proposed reforms, and one cannot fully and accurately assess what portions of past awards have been economic versus non-economic, especially in the absence of special verdicts and standardized reporting. Nonetheless, the use of the aggregate wisdom of past practice is quite reasonable -- certainly more so than reinventing dollar values in each case.

As already indicated, better data on the non-economic portions of awards would be helpful, and some judgmental adjustment may also be needed. Legislatures (or judiciaries) are free to add a normative dimension to the empirical analysis of past valuations in the course of promulgating a scheduling system. They can readily smooth the irregularities of past award distributions or choose different levels for floors and caps. [228] They, of course, might even depart from historical patterns altogether, although it would be difficult to defend such an action from a charge of arbitrariness. Linkage to past awards, in short, provides a helpful empirical foundation upon which to base -- and justify -- policy judgment.

[*962] 3. The Roles of Juries and Judges. -- The proposed schedules should generally be applied by juries rather than judges, for the schedules have been conceived as an improvement on the currently vague law of nonpecuniary damages, and valuing such damage is a traditional jury function. If juries cannot be trusted with making valuations under the scheduling models, then the entire validity of trial by jury seems dubious. [229] The trial judge has the power of remittitur and additur, adequate safeguards for reasonable use of the schedules, assuming that special verdicts are in place. [230] The trial judge's decisions are further subject to appellate review for reasonableness, an additional protection. Moreover, the very existence of new, quantitative standards for nonpecuniary damages greatly facilitates the review of awards, correcting the existing problem caused by the lack of good benchmarks against which to judge adequacy and excessiveness.

4. The Need for Special Verdicts. -- Regardless of the approach preferred, successful application of scheduling requires that juries specify their nonpecuniary awards through special verdicts. [231] The need for separate information on awards for non-economic damages is two-fold: (1) to develop an accurate reporting system, and (2) to make awards reviewable by trial and appellate judges under the new scheduling rules.

REV_00262859

Once special rules apply to non-economic damages, more careful specification of economic damages is also in order. It is not enough that juries merely report separate conclusions on economic and non-economic injury. Dollars are fungible, so a jury -- wanting to achieve a certain overall dollar result [232] and aware of a cap or other special rule on non-economic damages that constrains its discretion -- can simply alter its findings on economic damages to achieve its desired "bottom line." Legislatures and courts are aware of this potential. It explains the typical rule that trial judges are not to tell the jury of a cap on non-economic loss, but instead apply it themselves after a special verdict. [233]

Thus, economic calculations need to be justified so that they can be reviewed for reasonableness and to ensure adherence to the scheduling [*963] provisions. Otherwise, the supposedly separate total for non-economic damages will be equally unreviewable, at least in a meaningful manner. At a minimum, juries should disclose their findings on past and future allowances for wage loss and medical expenses, plus the inflation and discount rates used. The reasonableness of both economic and non-economic awards could then be reviewed using more objective standards than are now available. [234]

5. Changes in Values Over Time. -- Policymakers should also consider the importance of increasing matrix award levels (or scenario values or ceiling and floor amounts) over time. Common sense suggests that values should increase over time -- just to keep pace with inflation. [235] This issue is of extreme interest to liability insurers and reinsurers, as stability is vital to projecting their future claims expense. A schedule need not change the general level of awards immediately to have a large impact on the projected claims history of an insurance policy sold today; many injuries arising now will only be resolved some time in the future.

Increases in scheduled values could be formulated in a variety of ways. For example, one could project scheduled values forward at the rate of past growth, as plotted over a number of years. More likely, though, a legislature would choose an index related to inflation in consumer prices or periodically update the values judgmentally. Finally, policymakers should periodically re-examine not only the absolute values of the schedules, but also the relativities among categories in the matrix, scenarios, or sliding-scale ranges.

6. Dealing with Less Meritorious Suits. -- The prospect of more certain recovery for nonpecuniary loss under the proposed scheduling reforms may well induce more people to seek jury trial, especially those with relatively uncertain cases on liability grounds. To varying degrees, the scheduling approaches also undercut a jury's traditional, if covert, ability to compromise damages in a relatively weak case on liability. Hence, under a scheduling regime, particular attention must be paid to the problem of less meritorious claims. This problem is best addressed through ancillary measures of judicial administration. Past statutory tort reforms have ranged from certification of meritorious suits [236] to imposition of costs, including legal fees, on the losing party. [237] Other measures may also be appropriate.

[*964] E. Pros and Cons of the Forms of Scheduling

Which type of scheduling model should a jurisdiction prefer? Policy decisions will be influenced by policymakers' judgments along many dimensions, but their answers to two questions are central. First, to what extent do legitimate factors not captured by objective analysis cause the observed variation in awards in the existing tort regime? Those who believe that most of the current variability in awards is legitimate will seek to maintain maximum jury discretion -- if they support reform at all -- by supporting such proposals as floors and caps to deal with extreme outliers, perhaps advisory scenarios as aids to juries, and possibly matrices containing ranges of values. Those who see award variability as caused mostly by illegitimate factors or random jury error are more likely to support the more standardizing approaches, like point-value matrices and more rigorous scenarios.

REV_00262860

A second significant policy decision is the relative importance of doing justice in individual cases versus arriving at fair results across cases. The strongest attribute of a matrix-based regime is the ability to achieve equal dollar results in equal cases of all types and severities, especially when the point-value format is used. A point-value matrix may, however, insufficiently respond to unusually worthy (and unworthy) cases, a weakness that may necessitate the adoption of a process to handle outliers. In sharp contrast, a flexible range of floors and caps addresses only the outliers, maintaining jury discretion in the vast majority of cases, but also likely maintaining the current wide, inconsistent, and unexplained disparity among cases. Any individual method, while arguably meant to achieve fairness in each case, will most likely fail to achieve fairness across cases -- continuing past failures in this regard. The ability to discriminate can readily yield inconsistent and inappropriate results, whether or not intended by a particular jury. The scenario approach lies between that of matrices and sliding-scales of ranges -- giving considerable quantitative guidance to jury valuation of small and large cases alike, [*965] yet leaving broad discretion to a jury's idiosyncratic views of particular circumstances. Scenarios would not, however, greatly simplify the process of jury valuation, and awards based on scenarios may be more difficult to review than determinations under the other proposals.

As an aid to policy discussion, Table 6 provides a summary of the relative strengths and weaknesses of the three proposed models of scheduling.

TABLE 6: STRENGTHS AND WEAKNESSES OF SCHEDULING APPROACHES: MATRIX, SCENARIOS, AND RANGES

	Reform Model	Strengths
A.	Award Matrix	All cases covered in evenhanded manner, should make results very comparable in comparable cases A wide range of valuations provided, in well differentiated categories (e.g., 54-cell matrix) Classifying factors objective, well related to loss intuitively and according to past jury findings, so overall fairness of system apparent Appropriate valuations very clearly established, jury awards easy to review If desired, "point values" can be replaced with range of values in each cell of matrix, further tempered by "outlier" system
B	Injury Scenarios	All cases covered in evenhanded manner Entire range of awards covered Great flexibility in tailoring awards to circumstances Readily assimilable by jury, not

REV_00262861

Computation of "special" damages -- items of economic expense that plaintiffs must specifically plead and prove, like medical bills or wage loss -- seems relatively straightforward and amenable to common-sense resolution without detailed jury instructions. At least this is generally [*911] the case for losses incurred up to the date of settlement. [13] For future losses, however, substantive law varies considerably. Although at one time many courts denied recovery for future losses on the grounds that such estimates were too speculative and uncertain, the general rule now is that "reasonable certainty" of loss is sufficient to support an award. [14] Still, no general agreement exists for discounting future losses to present values. [15] Experience shows that there can be enormous differences of opinion. [16] Future economic losses in death cases are subject to separate, more restrictive rules; the approach used most often permits recovery of lost future earnings only net of the decedent's own expected future consumption. [17]

"Pain and suffering" and other intangible or non-economic losses are even more problematic. Physical pain and attendant suffering have for centuries been recognized as legitimate elements of damages, [18] and "modern" tort law has seen a marked expansion of the rights to recover for forms of mental anguish. [19] Some courts have even permitted recovery for emotional trauma unaccompanied by physical injury, [20] including derivative losses stemming from injuries to family members. [21] The precise elements of compensable non-economic loss vary by jurisdiction. Pain [*912] and suffering may be used as a catch-all category for the jury's consideration of all nonpecuniary losses in a case of nonfatal injury, subsuming other qualitative categories, like mental anguish or humiliation. [22] More commonly, though, other non-economic elements -- such as "loss of enjoyment of life" -- are accorded independent standing and separate jury instructions. [23]

In cases of death, the common law completely denied the right to sue, and even under wrongful death and survival statutes, rules on nonpecuniary damages have traditionally been les generous than for injury cases. [24] Generally, a decedent's conscious pain and suffering are compensable, but not the loss of enjoyment of their foregone lifespan nor the mental anguish of survivors. [25] Nonpecuniary damages payable in death cases are more restricted than those in injury cases mainly on the theory that the decedent is beyond awareness of suffering and that any award for nonpecuniary losses would be an overcompensatory windfall to heirs or survivors. [26]

Whatever the categories of non-economic damages allowed in a given jurisdiction, the law provides no objective benchmarks for valuing them. As one commentator notes, "Courts have usually been content to say that pain and suffering damages should amount to 'fair compensation' or a 'reasonable amount,' without any more definite guide." [27] Jurors are not to apply a kind of compensatory "golden rule" and ask what [*913] they themselves would want in compensation if they were in the shoes of the plaintiff; [28] nor are they to measure what amount a volunteer might demand to undergo equivalent suffering, for there is no market in pain. [29] By contrast, recent empirical research forcefully concludes that intangible harms like the loss of enjoyment of life are economic losses, [30] and proponents apply a disarmingly straightforward calculus to compute the monetary value of such losses. [31] Courts also differ about such relatively objective matters as whether awards for future pain and suffering should be discounted to present value. [32] But for intangible losses as for overall damages, conventional wisdom seems almost to revel in the imprecision of valuation. [33] Appellate judges consequently struggle to supply some reasoned basis for their review of pain and suffering awards. [34] The law is imprecise even within a single jurisdiction; if one considers cross-jurisdictional variation, the discrepancies are substantially magnified. [35]

This imprecision in the substantive law forces the jury to rely on the [*914] presentations of the parties when computing losses. The parties are typically free to provide detailed evidence, not only on every possible facet of harm in the particular circumstances of an injury, but also in suggesting a theory of how the jury should compute the value of the losses. Each jury dealing with future losses, for instance, must separately determine many highly technical Continues traditional trust in jury decisions, but with jury awards easier to review

C.	Flexible	Closest to current system, including enacted caps
	Ranges	Tailored to hit extreme outliers only, high and low Shares burden of cuts across severity levels, balances with increases in "floors" Affects large share of dollars in system, because distribution so skewed to high awards Reasonable statistical rationale exists for levels chosen, modifiable by legislature

	Reform Model	Weaknesses
A.	Award	May raise lower awards more than it reduces upper ones,
	Matrix	depending on values ultimately chosen for matrix May bring more cases into the system, as plaintiffs "guaranteed" certain recovery if of certain severity System quite inflexible, may not account for subtle variation in nature of injuries in a single cell of matrix, at least where only "point values" given In "point value" form, may seem to intrude on jury, replacing informed human judgment with "damages by computer"
B.	Injury	Probably will have less practical effect on variation across cases
	Scenarios	than matrix Hard to create truly paradigmatic injury descriptions that will help guide all cases May offer fewer guidelines of value than matrix May increase lower cases as much or more as it lowers upper ones

C.	Flexible legislature, court	Caps often successfully opposed in Precise levels of ranges' "ceilings" and "floors" still somewhat arbitrary Does not improve predictability of 95% of cases May eventually promote "creep" of lower awards toward ceilings

V. POLITICAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES

A. Legislative and Judicial Roles in Reform

Tort law is state law, and state legislatures are the natural locus of tort reform. Almost all American tort reform has occurred by statute. [238] Of course, most developments in tort law occur on a common-law basis by judicial decision, and there is Canadian precedent for a common-law cap on awards for pain and suffering. [239] However, the changes we propose are more complex than the single, arbitrary dollar cap imposed in Canada, [240] and we instead follow the California Supreme Court in suggesting that rules for pain and suffering awards should be revised by legislative action rather than judicial decision. [241]

There is no "gold standard" by which to judge the specific dollar levels or overall appropriateness of the award-scheduling matrices, scenarios, or floors and caps proposed here. Deciding upon such values is ultimately a matter of social choice that requires the balancing of many competing interests, with results bearing not merely upon the resolution of disputes over individual injuries, but also upon general public health, [*967] insurance policy, and redistribution of income. [242] The entity with the greatest social legitimacy in making such broad trade-offs is the state legislature. [243] Furthermore, our proposals are best accomplished by building upon the accumulated experience of prior awards and new research such as the value of life findings, requiring the collection of considerable background information. [244] This is more in the style of legislative investigation than judicial dispute resolution.

Unquestionably, however, experienced judges could contribute to the design of better valuation methods and help identify potential problems of courtroom application to be avoided in advance. [245] In a more administrative mode, the judiciary could readily oversee the design of a set of injury scenarios or adopt a relatively simple set of floors and ceilings for nonpecuniary awards. A more sophisticated matrix with empirically derived dollar values might be more difficult, although, as already noted, a judicial conference might undertake such reforms, perhaps aided by a special committee of the bar.

Perhaps the ultimate dividing line between the state legislature and [*968] judiciary is budgetary, however. Regardless of issues like social legitimacy and the capability to form policy, legislation would be needed to fund any new data collection system or systematic study of past results. Thus, legislative action would seem a prerequisite to the adoption of any of our proposed reforms.

B. Policy Context: Distinguishing Scheduling From Prior Reforms

Past tort reforms have been attacked in legislatures, in print, and in court on similar grounds. Opponents have attacked past reforms on a number of grounds, arguing among other things that: (1) the alleged insurance crisis is a mere pretext for pro-defense, special-interest legislation; (2) it is unfair to take away traditional, common law prerogatives of plaintiffs without a compensatory quid pro quo being given in return; (3) malpractice-only reforms (once very popular) unfairly single out medical practitioners for protections, to the detriment of malpractice plaintiffs who face corresponding cutbacks in remedies; (4) flat caps unfairly single out the most severely injured people to bear the cost of reform; and (5) reforms abrogate the sanctity of trial by jury. [246]

REV_00262863

Very little in these attacks is directly relevant to the scheduling reforms proposed here, however, because the goals, means chosen, and likely effects of scheduling are quite different from those of prior tort reforms. This creates a very different policy context within which to counter political and constitutional attacks. Nevertheless, opponents are likely to characterize scheduling as yet another tort reform, subject to attack on the same grounds as previous reforms. So we pause to highlight the relevant differences.

Scheduling aims primarily to promote the integrity of the judicial system in the valuing of nonpecuniary damages -- not to help the insurance industry, doctors, manufacturers, or any other special interest. In contrast, most prior reforms were enacted under pressure from defendants and insurers, at times even under the threat of a physicians' strike. [247] Our scheduling proposals are designed to apply across the spectrum of personal injury suits, not merely to malpractice, products liability, or some other select class of personal injury litigation.

The rationales underlying the scheduling models are not merely hollow justifications of preconceived changes in traditional tort prerogatives of plaintiffs. Rather, the design of our proposed scheduling models derives directly from careful analysis of past problems of jury valuation. The specific schedule categories themselves are based largely on injury severity and age and are, thus, related closely to expected losses -- both [*969] intuitively and empirically. Scheduling is even-handed not only across the variety of case types (malpractice, products, auto), but also with regard to case size (big or small); matrices and scenarios would apply to all cases, and caps and floors would impact both high and low value awards in parallel fashion.

Furthermore, the schedules are not mere "take-aways" of plaintiffs' prerogatives. Instead, our scheduling proposals are designed to be eminently fair and balanced. Under the award matrix and scenario approaches, all plaintiffs receive a standard measure of adequate compensation; the sliding-scale approach, alternatively, balances award caps with corresponding floors. In short, there is a quid pro quo for alleged losses. Some plaintiffs will receive more than they might otherwise, while others receive less. Finally, all litigants will likely benefit from lower litigation costs and greater ease of settlement.

The dollar amounts suggested quite reasonably derive from the award histories of past juries, with perhaps some judgmental adjustment. Unlike past caps, the values are not arbitrarily selected. In operation, the schedules would directly and immediately achieve their main goal -- bringing standards to a previously standardless area of law and consistency to previously inconsistent judicial outcomes. Well-designed scheduling approaches have the potential to improve both equity (fair valuation of each case and consistent valuations across cases) and efficiency (enhanced predictability that simplifies proof, facilitates settlements, and eases insurance rating). [248]

C. Constitutional Considerations [249]

1. Equal Protection and Due Process. -- The constitutional validity of the three scheduling proposals would almost certainly be sustained against federal equal protection and due process challenges. Review under federal equal protection [250] and due process analysis would most [*970] likely proceed under the traditional rationality standard that applies to economic and social welfare legislation. [251] In such circumstances, a law need only be rationally related to a legitimate state interest to be constitutionally valid. [252]

REV_00262864

This somewhat mechanistic and toothless standard does not require courts to investigate the weightiness of the governmental interest asserted and does not typically require a close fit between the means chosen to effectuate the goal and the goal itself. For example, it would be "rational" in this sense to burn down a barn to kill a rat. Further, courts will not allow an empirically based challenge to undo a legislative classification. Even if dubious on empirical grounds, the legislation will be sustained if the legislative judgment was logically plausible. [253] It is therefore unsurprising that nearly all legislative classifications have been sustained when courts apply this standard. [254] Thus, the scheduling reforms proposed here would most likely pass muster [255] under this traditional form of constitutional review.

At the state level, the federal approach to equal protection and due process generally prevails, but there have been some successful challenges to past efforts at tort reform. [256] Decisions striking down medical malpractice reforms in North Dakota [257] and New Hampshire [258] are well known, but the durability of tort reforms against state constitutional attack exceeds their general reputation. [259] In California and Indiana, the [*971] two "strongest" examples of malpractice reform have been upheld, [260] and reviewing courts have generally been quite deferential to legislative reforms, typically applying the federal rational basis test of validity. [261] Indeed, more recent state court decisions show a clear trend away from intensified scrutiny of state tort reform legislation, [262] with two of the more aggressive states, Kansas and Montana, backing away from earlier decisions in their most recent pronouncements. [263]

To the extent that state equal protection and due process analysis accords with the permissive federal standard, [264] the reforms proposed in this Article will likely be found constitutional. Moreover, our proposals would also likely pass constitutional muster even in those jurisdictions that apply a more rigorous and searching degree of scrutiny. More searching review can require an examination of the weightiness of the interest being promoted and a tighter fit between the goals and the means adopted in furtherance of those goals. In either case, [265] our proposals are appropriate.

[*972] First, with respect to the importance of the interest promoted, the proposed reforms address the fundamental integrity of the judicial process -- the desirability of achieving fairness among litigants by assuring that similarly situated plaintiffs receive comparable damage awards for pain and suffering. They are also designed to facilitate the smooth functioning of the insurance market, a fundamental component of the current liability-compensation system. These reasons are surely sufficiently weighty to justify legislative action, even under heightened judicial scrutiny.

Second, the fit between the proposed policy approach and the underlying policy objective is quite close and should pass any reasonable standard requiring such a fit. The proposals are designed to deal directly with the fairness and efficiency of judicial administration of personal injury awards, especially for nonpecuniary damages, which now lack any systematic standards and show considerable variability in ostensibly similar cases. Moreover, the proposals accomplish their objectives without unduly burdening any class of litigant, since each of the reforms acts to prevent undervaluation as well as overvaluation.

2. Jury Trial. -- Damage caps have recently been challenged in federal and state courts on right-to-jury-trial grounds. The argument is that legislatively set caps impinge upon jury prerogatives in the award of damages. Both the Third [266] and Fourth [267] Circuits have recently rejected such challenges under the Seventh Amendment. Damage caps have been invalidated, however, in a few state supreme courts on the basis of jury trial provisions in state constitutions. [268] Nonetheless, these attacks have not had uniform success; at least one state supreme court has upheld a flat cap against a jury trial challenge. [269]

Courts that have invalidated damage caps on jury trial grounds have worried that the province of the jury is impermissibly invaded by legislative countermanding of jury verdicts. Believing that the jury's role extends to the remedies phase of litigation, [270] the Washington

REV_00262865

Supreme Court in Sofie v. Fibreboard Corp. [271] found that, without a change in underlying substantive law, a damage cap impermissibly deprives the [*973] jury of its role in setting damages. Under the typical cap, a jury decides the amount of damages in accordance with existing principles of substantive law, and then the court imposes the legislatively determined cap to reduce the jury award. From a formalistic viewpoint, the jury's determination appears to be countermanded.

In our view, the Washington court's equation of the power of the jury to determine damages and the power of the jury to award an amount of damages beyond a legislatively established maximum is unsatisfying. It leads us to probe more deeply to understand the concerns of the Sofie majority. Our conclusion is that the issue is a matter of characterization. If one thinks of the damage cap as a matter of substantive law, [272] then it is appropriate to respect the legislative determination of remedial bounds. The legislature is viewed as merely establishing the parameters within which a jury's factfinding deliberations proceed. [273]

The Washington Supreme Court expressed concern that a jury's findings of fact "go unheeded" when a court, applying a statutory cap, adjusts the jury's award. [274] Such an approach, it said, only "pays lip service to the form of the jury but robs the institution of its function." [275] The court seemed troubled by the failure of the legislature to directly alter the underlying principles of law that govern tort litigation. Non-economic damages were permitted (as before), and juries were permitted to determine the amount of nonpecuniary loss actually incurred (as before), but the statute operated to reduce the amount of damages actually awarded if the jury's determination exceeded that permitted by the statute's formula. [276] Thus, the Washington court viewed the cap not as a [*974] change in substantive law, but rather as legislative second-guessing of a factual determination entrusted to the jury.

The concerns of the Sofie majority can be addressed by drawing an analogy to the area of procedural due process. There, a successful plaintiff must show the deprivation of a liberty or property interest protected by the fifth and fourteenth amendments. [277] If an interest is protected under state law, the procedures required when that interest is impaired must pass constitutional scrutiny. The adequacy of state procedures of redress is subject to scrutiny under federal due process standards. [278] Thus, while states can modify the substantive law and thereby modify the scope of the "property" interest, they are bound by the federal due process clause once that entitlement exists. [279]

The procedural due process analogy would seem to capture the concerns of the Sofie majority. Once specific damage determinations are left up to the jury, then the legislature must allow the jury's determination to stand. If the legislature wishes to change the rules for assessing damages, however, it can circumscribe the jury's discretion and establish new standards. In the latter situation, there would be no after-the-fact, legislative countermanding of actual jury findings. Rather, the reform would fall within the legislature's inherent and legitimate power to declare rules prospectively -- that is, to legislate.

Our three alternative proposals for scheduling awards for non-economic damages thus appear to satisfy the concerns voiced in Sofie. They do not leave intact existing standards for the determination of awards for pain and suffering, but instead establish a new basis for the assessment of non-economic damages. There is no jury determination that is countermanded by judicial implementation of a legislatively-enacted cap nor is there any inference that the jury's calculation of loss is untrustworthy. Rather, the jury is relied upon to categorize the level of injury severity in its factfinding capacity, under a new legislatively-mandated method of determining damages.

In sum, the proposals quite clearly change the substance of the law of non-economic damages. They are not merely arbitrary restraints upon a jury's power to award a large amount of damages. For these reasons, our proposals satisfy even the interpretation of jury trial requirements enunciated by the high courts of Washington and Kansas.

REV_00262866

[*975] VI. CONCLUSION

This Article proposes to reform the calculation of "pain and suffering" and other non-economic damages, the least well-defined and most variable element of recovery for personal injuries. We suggest limiting the currently open-ended liability by replacing a system reliant on broad jury discretion with a system of quantitative "scheduling" of awards for nonpecuniary loss. In this vein, we present three alternative scheduling models: (1) a system of standardized awards set according to a matrix of dollar values based on victim age and injury severity; (2) a scenario-based system that employs descriptions of prototypical injuries with corresponding award values designed to be given to juries as guides to valuation; or (3) a system of flexible ranges of award floors and caps that reflect the various categories of injury severity.

We prefer matrices or scenarios to a system of floors and caps, primarily because they more comprehensively address the problems of variability and predictability in damage awards. Floors and caps, alternatively, deal only with the problem of extreme outliers, thus preventing excessive over- and under-valuation, but maintaining broad jury discretion (and variability in outcomes) for awards within the range. Whether matrices or scenarios are preferred depends primarily on how much one thinks non-economic damages should be individualized, how much one trusts juries to exercise discretion, and the importance one attaches to achieving similar results in similar cases.

Regardless of the scheduling model adopted, the relative levels and absolute sizes of allowances should be based on past award history, as modified and promulgated by state legislatures and, possibly, judiciaries. (We also suggest a substantive change to provide for non-economic loss in wrongful death.) The increase in values over time should be controlled, so that longer-term predictability is maintained. Our proposals are all fairer and more consistent with past results than the arbitrary flat caps now frequently enacted by legislatures -- but not infrequently invalidated by the courts. Scheduling-oriented reforms promise to increase the consistency of awards across cases, as similar cases would achieve more similar results. These are important goals in their own right. Moreover, the enhanced predictability of awards would promote settlement and make tort liability a more readily insurable event.

Most tort reform debate has pitted the advocates of defendants against those for plaintiffs in an adversary political process that mirrors the courtroom. As in the courtroom, the drama is played as a zero-sum game -- plaintiffs lose exactly what defendants win, and vice versa. From collateral source offset to various sorts of caps on awards, every dollar saved for defendants (or their insurers) is a dollar taken directly from plaintiffs (or their attorneys). Very few reforms allow both sides to gain. However, by improving accuracy and predictability, the scheduling of non-economic loss promises to help both sets of advocates. And, not [*976] insignificantly, the proposed reforms would promote confidence in the fairness of the legal system.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See infra notes 56-85 and accompanying text.

n2 We follow conventional usage in referring to pain, suffering, and other nonpecuniary or intangible losses as "non-economic," even though they have a demonstrable value in the marketplace. See infra notes 101-02 and accompanying text.

n3 See infra note 165 and accompanying text.

n4 See Bovbjerg, Legislation on Medical Malpractice: Further Developments and a Preliminary Report Card, 22 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 499 (1989).

n5 See infra notes 210-15 and accompanying text.

REV_00262867

n6 See infra notes 120-23 and accompanying text.

n7 See infra notes 105-06 and accompanying text.

n8 See infra notes 100-04 and accompanying text.

n9 See, e.g., RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 901 (1965) (the purposes for which actions in tort are maintainable: "(a) to give compensation, indemnity or restitution for harms; (b) to determine rights; (c) to punish wrongdoers and deter wrongful conduct; and (d) to vindicate parties and deter retaliation or violent and unlawful self-help"). For a broader view emphasizing the social role of accident prevention, see G. CALABRESI, THE COSTS OF ACCIDENTS (1970). Tort actions can also be justified by the need for social fairness in distributing innumerable liability insurance payments. For a discussion of numerous goals attributed to personal injury law, see ABA SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE TORT LIABILITY SYSTEM, TOWARDS A JURISPRUDENCE OF INJURY: THE CONTINUING CREATION OF A SYSTEM OF SUBSTANTIVE JUSTICE IN AMERICAN TORT LAW, 4-1 to 4-225 (1984) [hereinafter ABA COMM. REPORT]. The appropriate level of awards may vary according to whether the focus is on individual compensation or general deterrence.

n10 Punitive damages may also be available where a defendant's conduct is egregious. See W. KEETON, D. DOBBS, R. KEETON & D. OWEN, PROSSER & KEETON ON THE LAW OF TORTS 9-15, 213 (5th ed. 1984) [hereinafter PROSSER & KEETON]. This Article does not deal with punitive damages, which call for a different analysis. In any event, they are granted in a low percentage of cases. See Daniels, Punitive Damages: The Real Story, A.B.A. J., Aug. 1, 1986, at 60. Our jury verdict research, described infra at notes 144-46, also found very few cases in which punitive damages have been awarded.

n11 See, e.g., D. DOBBS, HANDBOOK ON THE LAW OF REMEDIES (1973); C. McCORMICK, HANDBOOK ON THE LAW OF DAMAGES (1935). For a standard judicial charge to a jury, see 8 AMERICAN JURISPRUDENCE PLEADING & PRACTICE FORMS (1982):

In determining the amount of plaintiff's damages, if any, you may take into consideration the following elements as shown by the evidence: 1. The [plaintiff's] pain and suffering, disabilities or disfigurement, and any accompanying mental anguish. . . . 2. The reasonable and necessary medical expenses incurred or paid. . . . 3. The loss of time or earnings. . . . In arriving at the amount of your award, you will take into consideration the nature, extent, and duration of the plaintiff's injuries, if any, his age, and his general health and condition both before and after the occurrence of the injuries complained of.

Id. at 274.

n12 See, e.g., The "City of Panama," 101 U.S. 453, 464 (1879) ("[T]here cannot be any fixed measure of compensation for the pain and anguish of body and mind, . . . but the result must be left to turn mainly upon the good sense and judgment of the tribunal assigned by law to ascertain what is a just compensation for the injuries inflicted."); Beagle v. Vasold, 65 Cal. 2d 166, 172, 417 P.2d 673, 675, 53 Cal. Rptr. 129, 131 (1966) ("No method is available to the jury by which it can objectively evaluate [nonpecuniary] damages, and no witness may express his subjective opinion on the matter."); Botta v. Brunner, 26 N.J. 82, 92-93, 138 A.2d 713, 718 (1958) ("There is and there can be no fixed basis, table, standard, or mathematical rule which will serve as an accurate index and guide to the establishment of damage awards for personal injuries.").

n13 There can, however, be considerable disputes in some cases. For example, the parties may disagree about the degree of causation and fault, the necessity of certain medical expenses and other services, the duty of the plaintiff to mitigate losses, and the appropriate rate (if any) of prejudgment interest.

REV_00262868

n14 See D. DOBBS, supra note 11, §§ 3.2-.4; 4 F. HARPER, F. JAMES & O. GRAY, THE LAW OF TORTS § 25.3 (2d ed. 1986); Schaefer, Uncertainty and the Law of Damages, 19 WM. & MARY L. REV. 719 (1978).

n15 There are at least three approved approaches: exact offset of inflation against discount rate, yielding a zero rate (so the jury is to use nominal current dollars); partial offset to achieve one discount rate (e.g., to one to three percent, a "real interest rate"); or separate calculation of inflation and discount rates, to be applied jointly. See 22 AM. JUR. 2D Damages §§ 143-50 (1988).

n16 Many variables are involved in projecting future losses, even before applying various discount rates. See generally M. BROOKSHIRE, ECONOMIC DAMAGES: THE HANDBOOK FOR PLAINTIFF AND DEFENSE ATTORNEYS (1987).

n17 See, e.g., PROSSER & KEETON, supra note 10, at 949-51.

n18 See D. DOBBS, supra note 11, § 3.1, at 135-38. The first award for pain and suffering seems to date from 1763. U.S. DEPT. OF TRANSP., AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE AND COMPENSATION STUDY: MOTOR VEHICLE CRASHES AND THEIR COMPENSATION IN THE UNITED STATES 35 (1971).

n19 Compare Goodrich, Emotional Disturbance as Legal Damage, 20 MICH. L. REV. 497 (1922) (noting the common law requirement that mental anguish be accompanied by some physical injury for recovery) with Bell, The Bell Tolls: Toward Full Recovery for Psychic Injury, 36 U. FLA. L. REV. 333 (1984) (arguing in favor of liability for negligently caused emotional distress, even absent physical harm).

n20 See, e.g., Rodrigues v. State, 52 Haw. 156, 472 P.2d 509 (1970). See generally Miller, The Scope of Liability for Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress: Making "The Punishment Fit the Crime," 1 U. HAW. L. REV. 1 (1979).

n21 E.g., Weitl v. Moes, 311 N.W.2d 259 (Iowa 1981) (loss of society and companionship of parent); see also Leibson, Recovery of Damages for Emotional Distress Caused by Physical Injury to Another, 15 J. FAM. L. 163 (1977); Love, Tortious Interference with the Parent-Child Relationship: Loss of an Injured Person's Society and Companionship, 51 IND. L.J. 590 (1976).

n22 See, e.g., Capelouto v. Kaiser Found. Hosps., 7 Cal. 3d 889, 892-93, 500 P.2d 880, 883, 103 Cal. Rptr. 856, 859 (1972) ("pain and suffering" a "unitary concept" that "has served as a convenient label under which a plaintiff may recover not only for physical pain but for fright, nervousness, grief, anxiety, worry, mortification, shock, humiliation, indignity, embarrassment, apprehension, terror or ordeal").

n23 D. DOBBS, supra note 11, at 548-49 n.59; see also Cramer, Loss of Enjoyment of Life as a Separate Element of Damages, 12 PAC. L.J. 965 (1981). It is logical to consider new, negative harms caused by an injury (e.g., pain, distress) separately from the loss of previously enjoyed, positive benefits of uninjured existence (e.g., loss of enjoyment of life, loss of consortium), although the legal issues do not seem to be framed in just these terms. This distinction normally makes little practical difference, for loss of enjoyment typically accompanies conscious pain; it matters greatly, however, in cases of death, shortened life expectancy, or permanent coma where there is arguably no conscious suffering. Compare Flannery v. United States, 718 F.2d 108 (4th Cir. 1983) (no award under Federal Tort Claims Act for loss of enjoyment of life when claimant is permanently comatose and cannot benefit personally from the use of money), cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1226 (1984) with Flannery v. United States, 297 S.E.2d 433 (W. Va. 1982) (as a question of state law, certified from the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, recovery for the lost enjoyment of life was allowable) and Shaw v. United States, 741 F.2d 1202 (9th Cir. 1984) (recovery for lost enjoyment of life allowed where child was severely injured, but partially conscious).

REV_00262869

n24 See generally D. DOBBS, supra note 11, at 557-62; PROSSER & KEETON, supra note 10, at 949-54; S. SPEISER, RECOVERY FOR WRONGFUL DEATH AND INJURY (3d ed. 1988).

n25 See PROSSER & KEETON, supra note 10, at 949-54. Even so, the survivors' loss of society and comfort and the pecuniary value of lost services may be recoverable. Id. at 951.

n26 Historically, legislatures have also simply feared extravagant awards. See PROSSER & KEETON, supra note 10, at 951.

n27 D. DOBBS, supra note 11, at 545.

n28 Id.; Dunlap v. Lee, 257 N.C. 447, 450-52, 126 S.E.2d 62, 65-66 (1962).

n29 See Botta v. Brunner, 26 N.J. 82, 93, 138 A.2d 713, 718 (1958) ("No market place exists at which . . . malaise is bought and sold. A person can sell quantities of his blood, but there is no mart where the price of a voluntary subjection of oneself to pain and suffering is or can be fixed."); see also 8 AMERICAN JURISPRUDENCE PLEADING & PRACTICE FORMS 278 (1982) (standard jury instruction stating that "[p]ain and suffering have no market value; they are not capable of being exactly and accurately determined; and there is no fixed rule or standard whereby such damages can be measured").

n30 See Miller, Willingness to Pay Comes of Age: Will the System Survive?, 83 NW. U.L. REV. 876 (1989); Viscusi, Pain and Suffering in Product Liability Cases: Systematic Compensation or Capricious Awards?, 8 INT'L REV. L. & ECON. 203 (1988).

n31 The dollar value of nonpecuniary los is equivalent to the difference between what people are willing to pay to avoid a particular risk or injury or death and the solely financial component -- medical expenses, lost earnings -- associated with that risk. For example, even someone fully insured against economic losses is nonetheless willing to pay for some safety measures and will require a wage premium to run risks at work. Such behavior shows the economic value of "non-economic" losses. See generally Miller, supra note 30; Viscusi, supra note 30. See also infra notes 100-05 and accompanying text.

n32 Compare Chiarello v. Domenico Bus Serv., 542 F.2d 883, 886 (2d Cir. 1976) (discount) with Ball v. Burlington N. Ry., 672 S.W.2d 358, 361 (Mo. App. 1984) (no discount). See generally D. DOBBS, supra note 11, § 8.8, at 574.

n33 See supra notes 12 and 29; see also McDonald v. Union Pac. Ry., 42 F. 579 (C.C.D. Colo. 1890), aff'd, 152 U.S. 262 (1894) ("[T]here is no price-list, there is no price-current, for pain, for human suffering. . . . The value that shall be put upon pain and suffering is left to [the jury and its] own good common sense and experience. . . ."). One standard jury instruction nearly apes the language affirmed by the Supreme Court in McDonald, telling the jury "that the law cannot give you a precise formula or yardstick . . ., but the law contemplates that twelve intelligent jurors, exercising common sense and calling upon their experiences in life, can satisfactorily fix and determine a proper award of money. . . ." 8 AMERICAN JURISPRUDENCE PLEADING & PRACTICE FORMS 278 (1982).

n34 See Zelermyer, Damages for Pain and Suffering, 6 SYRACUSE L. REV. 27 (1954).

n35 In the aftermath of a 1979 airplane crash, one expert estimated that the likely awards for the deaths of people of identical age and background ranged from a low of $ 10,000 to a high of $ 2 million, depending on the varying legal rules in different states. Warren, How Much is a Human Life Worth?, Chicago Sun-Times, May 25, 1980, at 5, col. 1 (cited in ABA COMM. REPORT, supra note 9, at 2-26).

REV_00262870

n36 See generally M. BROOKSHIRE, supra note 16. Most large awards involve very substantial amounts for future economic and non-economic losses. Juries have discretion concerning the discount rate to apply in the face of conflicting expert testimony. When calculating losses over a plaintiff's expected lifetime (at the extreme, perhaps 75 years for a child injured at birth), the present value depends greatly on whether the discount rate net of inflation is, say, 2% or 4% -- either of which could be justified depending upon different assumptions about appropriate rates or future developments.

n37 See 5 M. BELLI, MODERN TRIALS §§ 64.1-65.0 (2d ed. 1982). Mr. Belli claims to have devised the "dollar a day pain and suffering" rule. Id. § 64.1, at 3.

n38 Most courts allow the use of such a mathematical formula, although a few do not, fearing that it lends an inappropriate aura of precision. D. DOBBS, supra note 11, at 545-48.

n39 PROSSER & KEETON, supra note 10, at 469-75.

n40 Id. at 475-77. Statutory modification of the traditional joint and several rule of liability has been a popular tort reform, especially in the 1980s. Id. at 475 nn.59-60; see also Bovbjerg, supra note 4, at 526-27, 539.

n41 C. MCCORMICK, supra note 11, § 16, at 64 (jurors are not permitted to compromise among themselves nor agree on a "quotient" process -- i.e., to average the damage assessments of the 12 jurors); accord 8 AMERICAN JURISPRUDENCE PLEADING & PRACTICE FORMS 267 (1982) (Form 137: "In arriving at your verdict you must not make a compromise between the question of liability and the amount of damages, if any.").

n42 See City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 256 n.12 (1981) ("Ordinarily, an error in the charge is difficult, if not impossible, to correct without retrial, in light of the jury's general verdict.").

n43 See C. MCCORMICK, supra note 11, § 16 (noting that courts protect jury verdicts from attack by making it hard for jurors to impeach their own verdicts later and limiting appellate review of a trial court's refusal to grant a new trial); see also District of Columbia v. Woodbury, 136 U.S. 450 (1890) (amount of damages is a jury question, to be determined in view of the circumstances of each particular case).

n44 C. MCCORMICK, supra note 11, § 19.

n45 Id. §§ 16-19. One classic formulation would allow remittitur only where damages are "flagrantly outrageous" or "extravagant," showing the jury to have acted from "passion, partiality, prejudice, or corruption." 22 AM. JUR. 2D Damages § 1022 (1988).

n46 Judges do have the benefit of some level of experience with prior cases, through, and may hear post-verdict argument regarding the results in similar cases.

n47 Not all appeals filed result in appellate decisions, of course; rather, most are settled or dropped. According to a major systematic study, post-trial adjustments are made to 20% of all jury verdicts (including defense verdicts) and 25% of plaintiff verdicts; almost all adjustments are reductions. M. SHANLEY & M. PETERSON, POSTTRIAL ADJUSTMENTS TO JURY AWARDS 26-27 (Rand Corp. No. R-3511-ICJ, 1987) (based on random sample of verdicts from Chicago, San Francisco, and selected California counties). Of the reductions, 62% result from private settlement, 23% from court action, and 13% from collection problems; of the court actions, most occurred on motion to the trial court, rather than through the appeals process. Id. at 45-46. Shanley and Peterson do not report what proportion of verdicts are appealed. Among closed malpractice claims from Florida (1985-88), 4,759 closed after suit but before verdict, 696 closed at verdict, and 66 closed on appeal.

REV_00262871

general issues, including the inflation rates expected in different sectors of the economy, the rates of productivity growth, and the applicable discount rate, if any.

With regard to economic damages, parties in each case are able to argue for and against various methods of projecting losses, and of discounting them to present value. [36] With regard to non-economic damages, it is commonplace for attorneys to present a variety of wholly subjective ways for juries to compute awards for pain and suffering. For example, some suggest that the jury award the plaintiff a small amount per period of time (such as a day); when this seemingly small amount is multiplied by the plaintiff's life expectancy, however, it results in a large total dollar award. [37] Under this "per diem" or "unit of time" approach to valuation, [38] seemingly inconsequential differences in values per unit of time lead to very large differences in awards.

Other factors may also influence variation in awards. The same injury should, of course, be compensated differently when comparative negligence applies, [39] or when suit is brought against only one of multiple tortfeasors and that defendant is not jointly liable for the harm caused by the others. [40] Damage awards, however, are meant to compensate the plaintiff for harm suffered, and not to be influenced by the degree of culpability of a particular defendant (except in cases of comparative negligence). Defendant culpability is a matter for punitive awards. Nor are juries supposed to compromise damage awards to reflect uncertain liability, causation or credibility of proof. [41] Nonetheless, award variation [*915] predicated on such factors is nearly impossible to observe or control directly.

The wide latitude that the substantive law gives juries is matched by the procedural discretion also conferred, as juries have traditionally operated through general verdicts -- single findings of liability with an associated award of all damages. Thus, the key decisionmakers need not explain their rationale or methods for arriving at a particular award figure, and their findings are difficult to review. [42] Judicial oversight only marginally curbs jury discretion. [43] Trial judges have long enjoyed the power to alter a jury verdict -- by decreasing it (remittitur) or raising it (additur), by entering judgment notwithstanding the verdict, or by ordering a new trial (in the case of an obviously compromised verdict, for instance). [44] But such changes occur infrequently; the law disfavors judicial intervention and calls for change only in cases of egregious error. [45] Moreover, trial judges, like juries, lack objective standards for deciding when to apply these powers or what award levels to deem adequate and not excessive. [46] Appeals are commonly taken, adding another level of potential oversight; [47] but appellate judges are also required to defer to damage findings below [48] and lack objective standards for altering [*916] awards. [49] Most post-verdict changes in jury awards occur by virtue of settlement, just as far more cases are settled prior to verdict than are decided by a jury. [50]

Damage awards in tort cases thus emerge from an intensive investigation of very particularized circumstances -- an investigation that is evaluated under only the most general of guidelines. Moreover, no reservoir of experience accumulates to guide juries and judges. There is simply no judicial analogue to the guidance of common law and the role of precedent when judges and juries turn to the quantification of damages; reported decisions discuss only general approaches. Not surprisingly, this system causes considerable variation in awards. Some experienced observers go so far as to characterize the entire legal process as a "lottery," which plaintiffs are enticed to play through the (uncertain) prospect of a "jackpot" recovery. [51] The general perception of what juries do and how awards are determined is very important; although most cases are settled through an insurance process, [52] the parties' predictions of a jury's decision influences their decisions about whether to drop a case, settle it (and for how much), or continue toward trial and verdict.

Why does the law countenance such imprecision? Lawyers, after all, generally pride themselves on promoting standards and accountability. For one thing, the current law of damages focuses on fairly resolving disputes between specific parties -- not on achieving consistency across the vast spectrum of cases. [53] It seeks to achieve retail justice for the n48 Appellate courts generally will not intervene in a trial court's decision unless there is "clear abuse" of discretion, e.g., Bingaman v. Grays Harbor Community Hosp., 103 Wash. 2d 831, 699 P.2d 1230 (1985), and are to view the evidence in a light favorable to upholding the judgment of the trial court, e.g., Seffert v. Los Angeles Transit Lines, 56 Cal. 2d 498, 507, 364 P.2d 337, 342, 15 Cal. Rptr. 161, 166 (1961).

REV_00262836

Sloan & Hsieh, Variability in Medical Malpractice Payment: Is the Compensation Fair?, Table 2 (forthcoming).

n49 See Zelermyer, supra note 34, at 27-30. On review, appellate courts may consider the size of awards in similar cases. See, e.g., Precopio v. Detroit Dep't of Transp., 415 Mich. 457, 473-81 & nn.29-30, 330 N.W.2d 802, 809-13 & nn.29-30 (1982); Gaspard v. LeMaire, 245 La. 239, 257-59, 158 So. 2d 149, 155-56 (1963). On rehearing in Gaspard, however, the Louisiana Supreme Court disavowed the value of comparing awards in analogous cases. Id. at 264-72, 158 So.2d at 158-60; see also infra note 155.

n50 See M. SHANLEY & M. PETERSON, supra note 47, at 45-46.

n51 E.g., J. O'CONNELL, THE LAWSUIT LOTTERY 8-9 (1979).

n52 According to a recent nationwide survey, about 90% of malpractice claims were closed prior to verdict. U.S. GEN. ACCOUNTING OFFICE, MEDICAL MALPRACTICE: CHARACTERISTICS OF CLAIMS CLOSED IN 1984 37, Table 2.20 (1987) [hereinafter GAO STUDY].

n53 The ABA Special Committee on the Tort Liability System found it "lamentable that the system yields dissimilarities in treatment of cases which appear to be the same." ABA COMM. REPORT, supra note 9, at 4-143. See also generally W. BLUM & H. KALVEN, PUBLIC LAW PERSPECTIVES ON A PRIVATE LAW PROBLEM (1965) (addressing the variety of approaches proposed to handle auto accident injuries and compensation).

n54 The ABA Committee Report, in addressing concerns about unequal damage awards for similar injuries, focused on the use of legal theories (e.g., strict liability versus negligence). ABA COMM. REPORT, supra note 9, at 4-140 to 4-145. Recognizing the tension between the axiomatic command to treat like cases alike and the system's failure to achieve such outcome uniformity, the committee "rational"-ized this phenomenon by concluding that the process as a whole worked to permit courts to "confront[ ] social and technological change . . . in . . . diverse factual situations." Id. at 4-143.

n55 Id. In 1986, the property/casualty insurance industry collected $ 176.5 billion in premiums. INSURANCE INFORMATION INST., INSURANCE FACTS: 1987-88 PROPERTY/CASUALTY FACT BOOK 16 (1987).

n56 see, e.g., P. HUBER, LIABILITY: THE LEGAL REVOLUTION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES (1988). Much is made of the argument that the open-ended threat of very high awards hurts defendants in negotiation, but this effect is easily exaggerated. Equally overemphasized are the anecdotal reports of seemingly frivolous cases that result in large jury awards or settlements. See, e.g., Sorry, Your Policy Is Canceled, TIME, Mar. 24, 1986, at 16.

n57 There is relatively little dispute about the generally arising frequency of insurance claims and litigation through the mid-1980s. See, e.g., Danzon, The Frequency and Severity of Medical Malpractice Claims: New Evidence, 49 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS. 57 (Spring 1986); Priest, The Current Insurance Crisis and Modern Tort Law, 96 YALE L.J. 1521 (1987). However, the precise reasons people bring liability claims are unclear, at least for medical malpractice. Numerous factors other than the injury seem to affect the probability of a claim being made. See Zuckerman, Koller & Bovbjerg, Information on Malpractice: A Review of Empirical Research on Major Policy Issues, 49 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS. 85, 94-97 (Spring 1986). And the frequency of insurance claims has fallen as unexpectedly as it has risen -- notably, in the aftermath of the publicity and legal reforms generated by the 1970s malpractice crisis and the 1980s general liability crisis. See Bovbjerg, supra note 4, at 510-11, 551-52; Schiffman, Medical-Malpractice Insurance Rates Fall: Drop in Number of Claims Cuts Insurers' Costs, Wall St. J., Apr. 28, 1989, at B1, col. 3; Malpractice: The Tide Recedes, THE ECONOMIST, June 24, 1989, at 29.

REV_00262872

n58 Both sides, of course, must bear the costs of litigation, which affect total losses and gains, but neither insured defendants nor plaintiffs represented on a contingent-fee basis bear many of those costs directly.

n59 See J. O'CONNELL, supra note 51, at 18-19, 28. Professor O'Connell recounts numerous examples of the dynamics of settlement negotiations, including a malpractice case involving an infant in which the defendant hospital raised its settlement offer from $ 85,000 (made after the claim was filed) to $ 425,000 (after ten days of trial). Both figures were rejected. While the jury was out, the defendant agreed to a compromise figure of $ 500,000, only to learn that the jury was about to exonerate the hospital. Id. at 3-4.

n60 Discussion often highlights million dollar awards. See, e.g., M. SHANLEY & M. PETERSON, COMPARATIVE JUSTICE: CIVIL JURY VERDICTS IN SAN FRANCISCO AND COOK COUNTIES, 1959-1980, at 27-29 & Fig. 9 (Rand Corp. No. R-3006-ICJ, 1983). This and other Rand research on jury verdicts note that million dollar verdicts were almost nonexistent in these two jurisdictions in the early 1960s, but account for most of the dollars awarded by juries today. Id.; see also M. PETERSON & G. PRIEST, THE CIVIL JURY: TRENDS IN TRIALS AND VERDICTS, COOK COUNTY, ILLINOIS, 1960-1979 20-29 (Rand Corp. No. R-2881-ICJ, 1982); M. PETERSON, CIVIL JURIES IN THE 1980s: TRENDS IN JURY TRIALS AND VERDICTS IN CALIFORNIA AND COOK COUNTY, ILLINOIS 33, 37, 52-53 (Rand Corp. No. R-3466-ICJ, 1987). These are high-award jurisdictions, and amounts paid in settlement (pre- or post-verdict) are typically less.

n61 See supra notes 25-26 and accompanying text. Some legislatures initially even set low ceilings on recovery for wrongful death. D. DOBBS, supra note 11, § 8.5. In the era of the original statutes, death was the common catastrophic injury. Modern medical care, however, has created the truly catastrophic event -- survival from injury in debilitated condition and in need of continuing, expensive medical attention. These injuries claim the highest recoveries. See infra Table 2; GAO STUDY, supra note 52, at 41, Table 3.3.

n62 See, e.g., P. HUBER, supra note 56; 4 WORLD & I (1989) (symposium on the tort crisis published by the Washington Times); Sorry, Your Policy Is Canceled, supra note 56.

n63 See, e.g., U.S. TORT POLICY WORKING GROUP, AN UPDATE ON THE LIABILITY CRISIS 34-41 (1987) (assembling data compiled by Rand Corp. and Jury Verdict Research, Inc.); M. SHANLEY & M. PETERSON, supra note 60, at 26-36.

n64 The mid-1970s crisis in medical malpractice coverage and the mid-1980s general liability upheaval have been thoroughly chronicled. See generally P. DANZON, MEDICAL MALPRACTICE: THEORY, EVIDENCE, AND PUBLIC POLICY (1985); S. LAW & S. POLAN, PAIN AND PROFIT: THE POLITICS OF MALPRACTICE (1978); Bovbjerg, supra note 4, at 501-10; Harrington & Litan, Causes of the Liability Insurance Crisis, 239 SCIENCE 737 (1988); Priest, supra note 57; Robinson, The Medical Malpractice Crisis of the 1970's: A Retrospective, 49 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS. 5 (Spring 1986). For a review of empirical evidence on the existence of a crisis, see generally F. SLOAN & R. BOVBJERG, MEDICAL MALPRACTICE: CRISES, RESPONSE, AND EFFECTS ON HEALTH CARE & COVERAGE (1989) (Research Bulletin from the Health Insurance Association of America).

n65 One study of cases in Chicago and parts of California found that jury awards were altered after tiral, typically by a reduction, in about 20% of cases. Very large awards were even more likely to be reduced. As a result, payments averaged only 71% of the initial jury award. M. SHANLEY & M. PETERSON, supra note 47, at 27-47.

REV_00262873

n66 See infra notes 82-85 and accompanying text.

n67 It seems clear that the severity of insurance claims, that is, the average payment per claim, has risen rather steadily for some time. See Danzon, supra note 57. But the cost of living has also grown, and the injury severity, that is, the extent of real damage done, has also been subject to change. Controlling for inflation and injury severity, there are indications that the growth in awards has not been extensive, at least for medical malpractice. Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 47.

n68 See infra notes 100-06 and accompanying text.

n69 According to common wisdom, pain and suffering damages are perceived to comprise a high proportion of large awards. Trebilcock, The Social Insurance-Deterrence Dilemma of Modern North American Tort Law: A Canadian Perspective on the Liability Insurance Crisis, 24 SAN DIEGO L. REV. 929, 964 (1987). There is some evidence to the contrary. See NAT'L ASSOC. OF INS. COMM'RS, MALPRACTICE CLAIMS: FINAL COMPILATION 48-66 (M. Sowka ed. 1980) [hereinafter NAIC STUDY]; accord Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 47 (malpractice indemnity payments in Florida rise by less than a dollar for every additional dollar of economic loss, implying that large awards have smaller non-economic component).

n70 The Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice abstracted personal injury cases from jury verdict reporters covering Chicago, San Francisco, and some other parts of California. See, e.g., M. PETERSON, supra note 60; see also M. PETERSON & G. PRIEST, supra note 60; M. SHANLEY & M. PETERSON, supra note 60. In cooperation with Rand, we used a similar data collection format to abstract jury verdict data for Florida and Kansas City. We, but not Rand, used the nine-point injury severity scale described in Table 1, infra. Rand used a five-point scale and a severity of injury index. Because we prefer the nine-point scale, we have limited our empirical analysis in this Article to data from the Florida and Kansas City reporters; because we are presenting scheduling reforms for jurisdiction-by-jurisdiction adoption, the text is limited to analysis of our larger jurisdiction, Florida.

n71 A national 1977 product liability database has been used in several studies by Duke University economist W. Kip Viscusi. See, e.g., Viscusi, supra note 30. Two national databases covering malpractice settlements are also available. See NAIC STUDY, supra note 69 (data on claims closed between 1975 and 1978); GAO STUDY, supra note 52 (data on claims closed in 1984). Some states also require insurers to report medical malpractice claims to their respective state departments of insurance. See, e.g., CAL. BUS. & PROF. CODE § 801(b) (West Supp. 1989); IND. CODE ANN. § 16-9.5-6-1 (West 1984 & Supp. 1989). We have analyzed data from 1976-88 on closed malpractice claims in Florida. See Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 47.

n72 So as to increase the number of observations for empirical analysis, we also merged Florida and Kansas City compilations. The results were not materially different and are not presented here.

n73 See, Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 47.

n74 See NAIC STUDY, supra note 69, at 10.

n75 For temporary injuries, the duration of injury is the major classification factor. The terms "recovery delayed" and "no delay" reflect the scale's origins in medical malpractice, in which patients already under medical care claim further injury due to alleged negligence by their health care provider.

REV_00262874

n76 This category is least satisfactory because it encompasses an extremely wide range of harm. Unlike the categories of physical injury, the "fright" category lumps together temporary, minor distress (e.g., a relative's fainting in the hospital at the sight of blood) with much more serious, long-term psychological damage (such as that likely caused a patient raped by a medical provider).

n77 E.g., GAO STUDY, supra note 52; Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 47.

n78 Data came from two Florida jury verdict reporters (covering the entire state) and from a Kansas City reporter (covering the two-state metropolitan area); both state and federal court verdicts are included. About two-thirds of the cases come from the larger jurisdiction, Florida; the Kansas City data is included to create a larger pool of observations for statistical examination. Our regression analysis is controlled for the jurisdictional effect on valuation. Cases included auto injuries, medical malpractice, products liability, and all suits against governmental defendants. We coded the data using modified versions of the latest Rand Corporation forms and coding instructions. For a description of verdict reporters and the coding process, see M. PETERSON & G. PRIEST, supra note 60, at 61-69. All jury determinations are stated as full damage awards, adjusted for findings of comparative negligence. Note that this is not the same as actual payment made in the cases. See supra note 65 and accompanying text. All amounts are expressed as thousands of 1987 dollars (brought to current value by the Consumer Price Index).

n79 Only one case involved emotional injury that was unaccompanied by physical harm; thus, the "emotional only" category cannot be separately considered in our analysis of jury awards. For malpractice insurance payments, however, category 1 injuries generally result in higher payment than those in category 2. Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 47.

n80 One significant factor is jurisdiction. In our data base, award values in Florida cases alone are higher than those presented in Table 2, which combines data from Florida and Kansas City to increase the statistical reliability. For instance, the mean for all Florida awards is $ 552,000 rather than the $ 490,000 reported in Table 2. On other influential factors, see infra notes 84-85.

n81 For the regression analysis supporting this statement, see Bovbjerg, Githens & Sloan (forthcoming). A similar analysis using only malpractice data, but also including settlements, appears in Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 47.

n82 The variation coefficient is quite large for settlements within any given severity category, and the coefficients are similar for available data on jury verdicts and on settlements. See id.

n83 To avoid giving the extreme awards undue statistical prominence, Table 2 omits the 5% of values farthest from the median. Part of the extremely wide variation in these severity level distributions is due to combining relatively higher Florida valuations with relatively lower Kansas City ones. Another factor may be selective reporting of jury awards in the verdict reporters; plausibly, plaintiff attorneys are likely to overreport large awards, while the defense overreports small ones. Similar variations, however, exist in the Florida malpractice closed claim data base, see Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 47, which includes all insurance payments in the state. Moreover, Kansas City awards are consistently lower than Florida ones, although only urban courts are in the former area and many rural ones are in the latter. Subsequent regression results, see infra note 156, control for jurisdiction.

n84 Injury severity, age, economic loss, and other objective factors used in our analysis mainly relate to the outcome of an injury and the prognosis for the future (e.g., lifetime care). By hypothesis, these factors should be reasonably accurate predictors of the economic consequences of an injury. But suffering and other nonpecuniary damages may also arguably relate to the process of injury. For instance, one may reasonably suppose that more short-run suffering occurs when an injured person is trapped in wreckage for many hours after an auto accident than when the identical injury occurs under general anesthesia in the course of surgery. This argument, however, is less persuasive with regard to injuries involving ongoing suffering.

REV_00262875

n85 A large part of the observed variation in awards, however, plausibly reflects errors in awards, that is discrepancies between the amount awarded and the plaintiff's actual losses, or at least what a more typical jury would have awarded. Of course, juries cannot presently be told what other juries have awarded in similar cases.

n86 There is no mechanism for even monitoring, much less assuring, horizontal equity across cases. Cf. D. DOBBS, supra note 11, at 550 (wide variations in awards for pain and suffering raise "substantial doubts whether the law is evenhanded in the administration of damage awards"). Where outcome variation is too extreme, it may be unconstitutional, as small criminal juries have been held to be. See Ballew v. Georgia, 435 U.S. 223, 235 (1978) (holding five-member criminal jury to be unconstitutional denial of sixth and fourteenth amendment right to jury trial, after reviewing social science research raising "significant doubts about the consistency and reliability of the decisions of smaller juries").

n87 See generally Mistretta v. United States, 109 S. Ct. 647 (1989) (upholding constitutionality of federal sentencing guidelines); Prisons: There Must Be a Better Way, THE ECONOMIST, Apr. 22, 1989, at 29-30 (general overview).

n88 See G. CALABRESI, supra note 9.

n89 This argument assumes, plausibly, that physicians and other defendants are risk averse; if they were not, they would not buy insurance. It may also explain physicians' apparent belief in the need for defensive medicine. See Danzon, The Medical Malpractice System: Facts and Reforms, in THE EFFECTS OF LITIGATION ON HEALTH CARE COSTS 28, 29-30 (1985).

n90 See Priest, supra note 57, at 1568; Steptoe, Dispirited Doctors: Hassles and Red Tape Destroy Joy of the Job for Many Physicians, Wall St. J., Apr. 10, 1987, at 1, col. 1. Not all changes in medical practice result from liability fears, however. See F. SLOAN & R. BOVBJERG, supra note 64, at 24-37.

n91 See Ulen, The Economics of the Tort Liability Crisis, 4 WORLD & I 507, 507-08 (1989).

n92 Trial results may be more predictable, however, than the variation shown in Table 2 indicates. The table does to some degree reflect true differences in losses among cases -- difference known to the parties, but unobservable through analysis of the jury verdict reporters. Nonetheless, to the extent that part of the award variation reflects errors in valuation, such errors impede settlement because the resulting unpredictability makes it more difficult for the parties to agree on damages. The more similar their pretrial expectations, the more likely the parties are to settle -- and, at far less cost to themselves and the system. Were there more general agreement on the rules and likely amount of damages in particular cases, one major element of the system's expense could be considerably reduced. See Wittman, Dispute Resolution, Bargaining, and the Selection of Cases for Trial: A Study of the Generation of Biased and Unbiased Data, 17 J. LEGAL STUD. 313 (1988).

Of course, unpredictable results may make risk-averse parties more willing to settle, thereby saving litigation costs. See Fournier & Zuehlke, Litigation and Settlement: An Empirical Approach, 71 REV. ECON. & STATISTICS 189 (1989). Fournier and Zuehlke suggest that defendants are more risk-averse than plaintiffs. Id. at 193. In one sense, this result is plausible. Some defendants -- physicians in medical malpractice cases and firms in product liability cases, for example -- may have much to lose in terms of damaged reputations. In Viscusi's analysis of risk aversion in the contest of product liability, however, the firm is risk neutral and the plaintiff is assumed to be risk averse. Viscusi, Product Liability Litigation with Risk Aversion, 17 J. LEGAL STUD. 101 (1988). One could also argue that some plaintiffs' lawyers have a stake in establishing a reputation by winning big, while corporate defendants keep their reputations relatively unsullied by staying out of the newspaper. Clearly, there is room for much more empirical analysis of these issues.

REV_00262876

n93 See J. KAKALIK & N. PACE, COSTS AND COMPENSATION PAID IN TORT LITIGATION 74 (Rand Corp. No. R-3391-ICJ, 1986) (net compensation paid claimants is 52% of total litigation expense for auto torts, 43% for other torts). Unsubstantiated claims exist that up to four times as much is spent on litigation as on compensating injured victims or their survivors. E.g., Grad, Medical Malpractice and the Crisis of Insurance Availability: The Waning Options, 36 CASE W. RES. L. REV. 1058, 1088 (1986).

n94 The "allocated loss expense" (i.e., administrative cost) of malpractice insurers averaged 25.18% of total losses (indemnity plus allocated loss expense) during 1977-86; for commercial auto physical damages, 10.27%; for workers' compensation, 11.11%; and for health insurers, an average of only 3.9% (but 4.9% in 1986). See A.M. BEST CO., BEST'S AGGREGATES & AVERAGES, PROPERTY/CASUALTY 88-91 (1987). Public health care programs, whose administration is even more straightforward, typically cost even less to administer -- for Medicare and Medicaid, less than 5% of total spending. See HEALTH CARE FINANCING ADMINISTRATION, MEDICARE AND MEDICAID DATA BOOK (1986).

n95 "Shocks" resulting from unanticipated large awards would be especially difficult for small insurers (and self-insurers) to absorb. For an interesting analysis linking fluctuations in losses to cycles in the availability and price of liability insurance, see Winter, The Liability Crisis and the Dynamics of Competitive Insurance Markets, 5 YALE J. ON REG. 455 (1988).

n96 See U.S. TORT POLICY WORKING GROUP, supra note 63, at 22-31.

n97 See GAO STUDY, supra note 52, at 19 (payments of $ 250,000 and more accounted for only nine percent of paid malpractice claims in 1984, but fully 61% of total indemnity paid).

n98 Traditionally, primary insurers seek "reinsurance" for large losses. Kramer, The Nature of Reinsurance, in REINSURANCE 1, 5-7 (R. W. Strain ed. 1980). Because there is literally no upper bound to damage awards, reinsurers are extremely concerned about participating to the high levels Purpose of Reinsurance, in REINSURANCE, supra, at 33, 41-42 (explaining the limitations of reinsurance). This may help explain the reduced availability of coverage for medical malpractice in the mid-1970s, and for all liability coverage in the mid-1980s.

n99 See R. MEHR & E. CAMMACK, PRINCIPLES OF INSURANCE 30-32 (1980) (pooling of risks to take advantage of "law of large numbers").

n100 See Miller, supra note 30, at 906-07.

n101 For an early symposium on this topic, see Valuing Lives, 40 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS. 1 (Autumn 1976); for contemporary summaries, see W. VISCUSI, RISK BY CHOICE 93-113 (1983); Miller, supra note 30.

n102 See Sherrod v. Berry, 629 F. Supp. 159, 162-63 (N.D. Ill. 1985) (ruling that evidence on the "hedonic" value of life is admissible), rev'd, 856 F.2d 802 (7th Cir. 1988); see also Barrett, New Legal Theorists Attach a Dollar Value to the Joys of Living, Wall St. J., Dec. 12, 1988, at A1, col. 1.

n103 E.g., Sherrod, 629 F. Supp. 159 (N.D. Ill. 1985).

n104 E.g., Leiker v. Gafford, 978 P.2d 823 (Kan. 1989) (loss of enjoyment of life is not a separate element of damages); Nussbaum v. Gibstein, 73 N.Y.2d 912, 536 N.E.2d 618, 539 N.Y.S.2d 289 (1989) (same); Singleton v. Shur, No. 100,462 (Ohio App., May 18, 1989) (1989 WESTLAW 54383) (disallowing evidence of loss of enjoyment of life in wrongful death action).

REV_00262877

n105 Miller, supra note 30, at 893.

n106 Because Table 2's values are derived predominantly from Florida, a high-award jurisdiction, the impact of recognizing value of life evidence would be even greater in most jurisdictions.

n107 Past enactments have generally addressed damage awards rather than standards for liability. Little attention has been paid to making the system more accurate, more predictable, or less expensive to administer. Some reforms have, however, addressed the high cost of administration. See Bovbjerg, supra note 4, at 531.

n108 See Danzon, Medical Malpractice Liability in LIABILITY: PERSPECTIVE AND POLICY 101, 118-19, 122 (R. E. Litan & C. Winston ed. 1988) (arguing that tort rules of damages are economically "inefficient" because they result in greater compensation than other compensation systems, and suggesting that malpractice damages be scheduled by age and severity of injury).

n109 See generally A. LARSON, WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION (rev. ed. 1989) (leading workers' compensation treatise).

n110 Cf. 4 F. HARPER, F. JAMES & O. GRAY, supra note 14, at 495 (asserting that society is moving toward a system of enterprise liability without fault, and with lower damages, in view of the speculative nature of many nonpecuniary items).

n111 The seminal book on this topic is R. KEETON & J. O'CONNELL, BASIC PROTECTION FOR THE TRAFFIC VICTIM (1965).

n112 The New Zealand Accident Compensation Act of 1972 created a nearly comprehensive no-fault system for compensating most injuries. See Accident Compensation Act, No. 181 (N.Z. 1982).

n113 In the medical malpractice arena, a similar trade occurred in the recent "no fault" statutes enacted by Virginia and Florida for the compensation of certain severely deformed newborns. See FLA. STAT. ANN. § 766.301-.316 (West Supp. 1989); VA. CODE ANN. § 38.2-5000 to -5021 (1950 & Supp. 1989). In some jurisdictions, an increase in the number of claims paid may be a necessary quid pro quo for the constitutional validity of reforms that limit damages awardable or plaintiffs' prerogatives. See infra note 264.

n114 Experience rating is simply the insurance practice of raising or lowering premiums to reflect the number and amount of claims paid (and projected to be paid) over the life of a policy.

n115 Cf. Keeton, Compensation for Medical Accidents, 121 U. PA. L. REV. 590, 614-15 (1973) (arguing that uncertain causation makes medical malpractice inappropriate for no-fault reform).

n116 E.g., Danzon, supra note 108, at 122-23.

n117 The American Medical Association has proposed a fault-based administrative payment scheme with partially scheduled damages that has been introduced in some state legislatures. See AMERICAN MEDICAL SOC'Y, MODEL MEDICAL LIABILITY AND PRACTICE REFORM ACT (1989); AMERICAN MEDICAL SOC'Y, A PROPOSED ALTERNATIVE TO THE CIVIL

REV_00262878

JUSTICE SYSTEM FOR RESOLVING MEDICAL LIABILITY DISPUTES: A FAULT-BASED, ADMINISTRATIVE SYSTEM (1988).

n118 See infra notes 120-43 and accompanying text.

n119 This is demonstrated by Table 2, supra.

n120 Fein v. Permanente Medical Group, 38 Cal. 3d 137, 159, 695 P.2d 665, 680-81, 211 Cal. Rptr. 368, 383-84, appeal dismissed, 474 U.S. 892 (1985). It may also be argued that non-economic losses are not "real" damages and that many damage actions do not allow recovery for intangible losses. For example, mental suffering can attend breach of contract, yet is not generally compensable. There is much mental anguish occasioned by others that the law does not attempt to "monetize" and assign to its cause.

n121 E.g., J. O'CONNELL, supra note 115. Other commentators have also been critical of the present method of awarding non-economic damages, but have stopped short of calling for outright abolition. See Jaffe, Damages for Personal Injury: The Impact of Insurance, 18 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS. 219 (1953) (disapproving of current method of computing damages); James, Some Reflections on the Bases of Strict Liability, 18 LA. L. REV. 293, 297 (1958) (opposing awards for pain and suffering when the cost is ultimately passed on to the innocent beneficiaries of the wrongdoer's enterprise); Morris, Liability for Pain and Suffering, 59 COLUM. L. REV. 476, 495 (1959) (foreshadowing pressure by the insurance industry on legislatures to limit awards for pain and suffering); Plant, Damages for Pain and Suffering, 19 OHIO ST. L.J. 200, 210-11 (1958) (proposing ceiling on non-economic damages as a way of achieving greater award predictability); Seavey, Torts and Atoms, 46 CALIF. L. REV. 3, 11-12 (1958) (limit pain and suffering to cases of conscious wrongdoing and wrongful acts).

n122 Workers' compensation is the archetype for statutorily limiting non-economic recoveries in exchange for guaranteed recovery of economic losses. See 1 A. LARSON, supra note 109, § 1, at 1-4. "No-fault" automobile insurance is another example. See, e.g., Compulsory Motor Vehicle Liability Insurance, MASS. ANN. LAWS ch. 90, § 34A (Law. Co-op. 1985) (first-in-nation provision originally enacted Aug. 13, 1970); see also R. KEETON & J. O'CONNELL, supra note 111.

n123 See O'Connell, Neo-No-Fault Remedies for Medical Injuries: Coordinated Statutory and Contractual Alternatives, 49 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS. 125, 131-34 (Spring 1986); O'Connell, Offers That Can't Be Refused: Foreclosure of Personal Injury Claims by Defendants' Prompt Tender of Claimants' Net Economic Losses, 77 NW. U.L. REV. 589 (1982). Professor O'Connell has also proposed that plaintiffs forgo awards for pain and suffering in exchange for guaranteed payment of attorneys' fees. O'Connell, Proposal to Abolish Defendants' Payment for Pain and Suffering in Return for Payment of Claimants' Attorneys' Fees, 1981 U. ILL. L. REV. 333.

n124 E.g., P. DANZON, supra note 64, at 153, 160, 171.

n125 No health coverage, public or private, explicitly pays for non-economic damages; indeed, group health plans "coordinate benefits" where two or more plans are involved, to assure that they do not pay in excess of actual medical costs. See HEALTH INS. OF AM., GROUP HEALTH INSURANCE 51-52, 224-25 (1976). Private disability coverage typically pays less than actual wages lost, in recognition of taxes avoided and to encourage an early return to work and discourage malingering. Public disability programs not only pay small amounts but also impose significant "waiting periods" during which the injured party receives no support -- five months for Disability Income under Social Security. See HOUSE COMM. ON WAYS & MEANS, 101ST CONG., 1ST SESS., BACKGROUND MATERIAL AND DATA ON PROGRAMS WITHIN THE JURISDICTION OF THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS 42 (Comm. Print 1989) [hereinafter WAYS & MEANS REPORT]. Note, however, that coordination of benefits rarely reaches the proceeds of individual health insurance coverage, and people often buy policies that advertise that benefits are "paid directly to you, not the hospital," thus recovering more than economic losses.

REV_00262879

n126 Cf. P. HUBER, supra note 56, at 3-17 (unfairness of involuntary "tort tax").

n127 E.g., Danzon, supra note 108, at 114-16.

n128 This economic explanation of insurance essentially embodies a thought experiment. In buying coverage, an individual or household decides to pay a certain amount in the present to receive a right to payment following the uncertain contingency of a particular future loss. Thus, the policyholder moves wealth from the immediate world of today to a hypothetical world in which some calamity has occurred. The theory addresses the decision of how much to transfer from the "normal" world of no injury to the imagined postinjury state of affairs.

n129 See S. SHAVELL, ECONOMIC ANALYSIS OF ACCIDENT LAW 245-47 (1987).

n130 Viscusi & Evans, Utility Functions That Are Dependent on One's Health Status: Estimates and Economic Implications, AM. ECON. REV. (forthcoming). It remains hypothetically plausible, however, that some injuries result in increased marginal utility of wealth relative to the uninjured state. For example, a quadriplegic may desire to have special care and may need specialized, expensive equipment merely to engage in commonplace activities such as typing or watching television.

n131 If insurance companies could accurately assess these characteristics, they might respond simply by charging higher premiums, but such assessment is generally seen as too costly or even impossible. Generally, insurers have trouble distinguishing among persons based on probability of loss prior to the sale of coverage. See Hosios & Peters, Repeated Insurance Contracts with Adverse Selection and Limited Commitment, 104 Q.J. ECON. 229 (1989).

n132 Such behavior is not necessarily immoral, just normal self-interest. People naturally want more when someone else is paying. Cf. R. MEHR & E. CAMMACK, PRINCIPLES OF INSURANCE 20-21 (1980) (BOTH DISHONESTY AND INDIFFERENCE TO LOSS ARE FORMS OF MORAL HAZARD).

n133 After the fact insurance valuation of non-economic damages might not be possible at all, for private insurers cannot impose their findings on policyholders in the same way a court can. To help control moral hazard, however, private insurers could "schedule" (ex ante, and as part of the policy) fixed amounts of compensation. See O'Connell, Harnessing the Liability Lottery: Elective First-Party No-Fault Insurance Financed by Third-Party Tort Claims, 1978 WASH. U.L.Q. 693, 698 n.27. Scheduled payments for non-economic loss would still invite exaggeration by claimants in order to move to a higher category of injury (and compensation), however.

n134 By way of deductibles and copayment requirements, for example.

n135 See WAYS & MEANS REPORT, supra note 125, at 40-44.

n136 See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 901 (1965).

n137 The best justification for our elaborate liability systems is its deterrent effect. As merely a system for compensating injured parties, it pays too few claimants after too long a delay and at a very high administrative cost. Cf. Bovjerg, Medical Malpractice on Trial: Quality of Care Is the Important Standard, 49 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS. 321, 328-35 (Spring 1986) (same point in medical malpractice context).

n138 See Fisher, Chestnut & Violette, The Value of Reducing Risks of Death: A Note on New Evidence, 8 J. POL'Y ANALYSIS & MGMT. 88 (1989); V. K. Smith, Public Choices and Private Risks: The Role of Economic Analysis 13-14, Benjamin H. Hibbard Memorial Lecture Series, University of Wisconsin-Madison (Oct. 21, 1988).

REV_00262880

n139 To a certain extent, developments in damage law have already helped homemakers by allowing recovery for the loss of services, with evidence taken on the market cost of replacing household help. See, e.g., Rindahl v. National Farmers Union Ins. Cos., 352 N.W.2d 837 (Minn. Ct. App. 1984); Garza v. Berlanga, 598 S.W.2d 377 (Tex. Civ. App. 1980).

n140 See Miller, supra note 30, at 881-83.

n141 One survey asked persons to place a dollar value on different body parts lost in an accident. The values were amounts the respondents would have considered adequate compensation from an insurer. Responses varied widely according to the type of respondent. For example, daytime university students valued the loss of an eye, hand, or leg at a median of $ 50,000 (1971 dollars); the same body parts were valued at $ 500,000 by evening university students. Estimates by other groups were well below these figures. For instance, geriatric women valued the loss of a finger at a mere $ 75, and a leg at only $ 500. Plutchik, Conte & Weiner, Studies of Body Image II: Dollar Values of Body Parts, 28 J. GERONTOLOGY 89 (1973). Note, however, that many of these values (even the very low ones) might far exceed economic loss.

Another approach has been to apply statistical analysis to data on jury awards to measure pain and suffering. See Cohen, Pain, Suffering and Jury Awards: A Study of the Cost of Crime to Victims, 22 LAW & SOC'Y REV. 537 (1988). Cohen used data from Jury Verdict Research, Inc., to measure pain and suffering stemming from various criminally inflicted injuries. He appears to have subtracted the amount of economic loss from the total award. Then he regressed the estimated payment for "pain and suffering" on medical plus wage loss for various types of injuries. The regression for gunshot victims was:

pain and suffering = $ 17,957 + [$ 5.20 X (medical + wage loss)]

Id. at 542. The R<2> and standard errors of estimates were not presented, but the R<2> was said to be nearly one. Cohen used regression results and other data to estimate the mean value for pain and suffering associated with various kinds of injuries. In the examples provided, average pain and suffering loss far exceeded economic loss. For example, for gunshot wounds, the mean medical cost and lost wages was $ 3,844, compared to $ 59,344 for pain and suffering. Broken bones or teeth caused $ 1,700 in economic loss, but $ 15,273 in non-economic damage.

W. Kip Viscusi analyzed payments for pain and suffering using data from the Insurance Services Office (ISO) Product Liability Closed Claim Survey, containing data on all claims closed by 23 insurance companies during 1976-77. Viscusi, supra note 30, at 205. To obtain a measure of pain and suffering payment, Viscusi subtracted estimated economic loss from the total payment. When economic loss exceeded the total payment, he set the value of pain and suffering payment at zero. He estimated two equations -- a probit equation with the dependent variable set equal to one if payment was made for pain and suffering, and a tobit equation with the dependent variable defined as the natural logarithm of $ 1 + pain and suffering award. He added $ 1 to the payment because one cannot take the logarithm of a zero value. He included variables for causes of the loss (e.g., laceration, cancer, brain damage), financial loss, and legal theory used in the case, in addition to distinguishing characteristics of the claimant as explanatory variables. He found that payments for pain and suffering in product liability cases are not random, but are also not a constant mark-up of financial losses. Id. at 213. Rather, payments vary most systematically according to injury type (a proxy for severity of injury). Id. Pain and suffering payments were also higher for younger claimants and those who were married or had dependents. Id. at 212. These personal characteristics are likely to increase economic damages, too.

REV_00262881

immediate parties, offering elaborate procedural fairness and minute investigation of the individual circumstances of an injury and the resulting economic and other losses. It virtually ignores larger questions of fairness in valuation [54] and the place of individual cases in a large liability [*917] and insurance system. [55] The fundamental, practical problem is that the law lacks objective standards to guide juries and to assess the reasonableness of their awards on review, whether by the trial judge or an appeal.

B. High Awards and Open-Ended Liability

One result of broad jury discretion and the absence of clear standards is freedom to make very large awards. It is frequently argued that the civil liability system is out of control, compensating claims far too generously, [56] especially given the increasing frequency of lawsuits for personal injury and death. [57] A particular focus of complaint is tort law's ever-increasing willingness to countenance "pain and suffering" and other such "intangible" or "non-economic" damages on an open-ended basis. There is virtually no upper bound to defendants' potential liability, while plaintiffs have an inherent and fixed lower bound of zero. [58]

More and more plaintiffs and their contingent fee attorneys are tempted to "hold out" for the change of a "jackpot" recovery, according to this line of thinking. Moreover, even the slim possibility of an enormous verdict may lead defendants to settle non-meritorious cases. [59] Such [*918] attacks embody a common-sense judgment that jury awards, settlements in expectation of jury awards, and the resulting insurance premiums have simply grown "too high." [60] Some discussion harks back to the traditional reluctance to allow excessive recoveries, notably in death cases. [61] The "system gone bad" argument often proceeds on anecdotal grounds. [62] Past levels of recovery -- which are said to have been lower -- tend to be used as yardsticks for comparison. [63] The main spur to public action, however, has come not from consideration of damage awards, but rather from the recent "crises" in liability insurance, marked by steep rises in premiums and, sometimes, by the unavailability of coverage at any price. [64]

We do not purport in this Article to assess the appropriateness of present award levels in bodily injury and death cases. To do so correctly would require agreement on the appropriate standards of recovery (now lacking) and detailed examination of a large body of cases (information that is also lacking). Certainly, some awards are very high, especially jury verdicts (which are often publicized before reduction by remittitur [*919] or on appeal), [65] but some are extremely low as well. [66] Moreover, it is not clear whether -- and, if so, to what degree -- damage awards have risen much faster than inflation, especially given the severity of claimed injuries. [67]

The "value of life" literature, which for death cases in particular urges considerably higher damage awards than those found in the tort and insurance system, provides an emerging "yardstick" for measuring the appropriateness of awards. [68] At root, one's attitude about the liability system generally, and damage awards specifically, seems to depend a great deal on one's attitude concerning non-economic damages, the main focus of this Article. Our view, discussed at greater length below, is that non-economic damages are real and compensable. It is true, better standards are needed to guide recovery. [69] But the problem of the absolute size of awards seems ambiguous and much less pressing than a somewhat different issue -- the variability and unpredictability of awards, to which we turn next.

C. Variability and Unpredictability of Awards

Fortunately, more than anecdotal evidence is available on jury awards in personal injury cases [70] and insurance settlements in medical [*920] malpractice and product liability cases. [71] This Section presents data that our project compiled on jury findings in Florida and Kansas City personal injury cases from 1973-87. [72] n142 See PROSSER & KEETON, supra note 10, at 19, 54-66, 359-67.

REV_00262837

n143 D. DOBBS, supra note 11, at 550.

n144 Values are calculated by subtracting known economic losses from jury findings of total loss, adjusted for comparative negligence. Some variation may result from this technique, given that the jury verdict reporters do not give uniform data on economic loss and may or may not give present values. Moreover, some cases are lost to analysis altogether because they do not report whether there was any economic loss. We have located two other studies that similarly examine the extent of nonpecuniary damages using multiple regression analysis and similar data bases, although variability is not their focus. See Cohen, supra note 141; Viscusi, supra note 30.

n145 Again here, we combined data from multiple jurisdictions to increase the number of observations and improve statistical confidence in analytic results. However, simple tabulations are not tremendously different for the jurisdictions considered separately, and the patterns are similar, even though Florida awards are systematically higher than those in Kansas City. Consider, for example, that valuations for level 3 injuries in Table 3 vary from less than $ 500 to over $ 56,000 between the bottom and top 25% of awards. Considering cases from Florida alone, the range is more limited, but still extremely large: from $ 20,000 to $ 158,000 for level 3 injuries, and from $ 29,000 to $ 220,000 for level 5 injuries. These categories have enough cases to be statistically credible.

n146 Where a jury verdict reporter contained no statement about economic loss, the case was omitted from the analysis. See supra note 144.

n147 Cases falling two standard deviations from the mean, or at the 2.5% and 97.5% critical values.

n148 See infra notes 238-45 and accompanying text.

n149 Claims that are derivative to the principal bodily injury may call for a distinct variation in the suggested approaches. See infra note 236. In some special cases, an altogether different measure of damages may be appropriate. One such case is "wrongful birth" -- in which the measure of damages is intrinsically different from conventional injuries. Other possibilities include claims primarily vindicating a legal right rather than making a claimant whole and deterring physical injury, such as medical "informed consent" cases.

n150 See infra notes 154-201 and accompanying text.

n151 See infra notes 202-210 and accompanying text.

n152 See infra notes 211-223 and accompanying text.

n153 We do not discuss an obvious, but less appropriate, form of "scheduling" -- setting the non-economic award as a mark-up over economic losses, a more documentable amount. A standard negotiating ploy for personal injury lawyers is to seek as "general," or non-economic, damages some multiple of "special," or economic, damages. See H. ROSS, SETTLED OUT OF COURT (1970). Cohen and Viscusi have independently assessed the relationship between economic loss and payment for non-economic loss. See supra note 141; see also NAIC STUDY, supra note 69, at 48-51, Table 2.6 (non-economic "mark-up" over economic loss decreases for larger and more severe cases, with very large cases and severity level 8 victims actually settling for less than economic loss). Obviously, no simple, fixed multiplier would be acceptable. Moreover, even a variable set of multipliers would fail to be acceptable. First, such a variable set of multipliers would assume that pain, suffering, and loss of enjoyment of life are higher for higher-income people (whose wage loss and medical bills, other things being equal, would be higher than for lower income people). Second, it would provide too great an incentive for malingering and other forms of moral hazard which would increase economic harm, and therefore potential economic and non-economic damage awards.

REV_00262882

n154 For permanent injuries that shorten life expectancy, age may relate less well to duration of suffering. American courts have not traditionally allowed damages for lost expectation of life as such. See D. DOBBS, supra note 11, at 549.

n155 Many current award listings are arranged solely by body part. See, e.g., 5 M. BELLI, supra note 37, §§ 67.1-.10 (a leading plaintiff attorney's handbook for his brethren); Special Project, A Quantum Study of Pain and Suffering Awards for Personal Injuries in the Louisiana Appellate Courts (1983-85) 31 LOY. L. REV. 889 (1986) (a survey of Louisiana appellate court holdings for pain and suffering awards); 22 AM. JUR. 2D Damages §§ 293-397 (1988) (encyclopedic listing).

n156 We based the regression analysis on jury verdict reporter data from Florida and Kansas City. See supra note 78. In addition to age and severity level, defined as sets of binary variables (zero-one variables), we included explanatory variables for: type of defendant (pure government, government and other, other only); type of case (product liability, auto, medical malpractice, other); and jurisdiction (Florida; Kansas City, Missouri; Kansas City, Kansas). We also included binary variables indicating whether or not the injury aggravated a pre-existing medical condition, where the case was tried (federal versus state court), and whether the case involved loss of consortium (including any similar derivative claims). The dependent variable, payment for non-economic loss, was defined as in Viscusi, supra note 30.

These are the key findings: The equation explains 62% of the variation in payment for non-economic loss (58% when the R<2> is adjusted for degrees of freedom). Valuations are highest for persons having level 7 and 8 injuries (see Table 1 for definitions), and lowest for those in the severity 1 and 2 categories. The relationship between age and payment for non-economic loss is roughly an inverted U. Medical malpractice cases result in the highest awards, on average; the lowest awards come from auto liability cases. Payments are much higher in Florida than in the two Kansas City jurisdictions. Cases in which loss of consortium is claimed result in higher payment for non-economic loss. See also Bovbjerg, Githens & Sloan, supra note 81 (more detailed analysis across five jurisdictions, using Rand data from Chicago and California as well).

n157 If body part were to be used as a classifying variable, greater attention would need to be given to the number and definition of categories, as borderline cases would be more of a danger.

n158 We suggest a fifty-four cell matrix only for discussion purposes. One might well vary the nine-point injury severity scale, creating ten severity levels by distinguishing between short- and long-term "emotional only" injuries, for example. See supra note 76 and accompanying text. Similarly, a distinction could be drawn between permanent injuries limited to disfigurement and those causing functional impairment. See infra note 205.

The number of age categories could also be expanded. In fact, we would prefer to add a seventh age classification for newborns under six months or a year old. Injuries to newborns are an important area of litigation, especially for medical malpractice, but our small data base made separate analysis of this area impracticable.

n159 Arguably, the severity categories also implicitly distinguish between short- and long-duration temporary injuries, as some severe, temporary injuries will inherently involve longer recovery periods than relatively minor, temporary injuries.

REV_00262883

n160 Current jury verdict reporters, used in our research, are insufficient as now organized. A particular failing is the lack of information on post-verdict proceedings. We recommend creating a systematic public reporting system to compile this data. See infra notes 225-27 and accompanying text; see also Bovbjerg, Sloan & Blumstein, Two New Approaches for Assessing Tort Damages for Personal Injuries (submitted for publication).

n161 We suggest that state legislatures perform the sort of policy-minded review we have in mind. See infra notes 238-45 and accompanying text.

n162 The underlying empirical analysis uses data from both Florida and Kansas City, but we estimate values only for Florida. To construct Table 5 from our regression results, we multiplied the coefficients on the case type variables by their respective means and set variables for Kansas city (Florida is the omitted reference category), pre-existing condition, loss of consortium, and federal court (state court is the omitted reference category) equal to zero.

n163 From the regression analysis, it is evident thay jury awards are significantly lower in the Kansas City metropolitan area than in Florida. Awards are about the same in Chicago and a variety of California jurisdictions. See Bovbjerg, Githens & Sloan, supra note 81.

n164 See infra note 170 and accompanying text.

n165 See, e.g., M. SHANLEY & M. PETERSON, supra note 60, at xiii-xv, 30-32; Bovbjerg, Githens & Sloan, supra note 81.

n166 In brief, the extent to which past award differences are legitimate or illegitimate is not clear. One hypothesis is that observed differences in valuation result from pretrial selection -- that malpractice and product liability cases tried to verdict are somehow more severe than auto cases, for instance, in ways not captured by the nine-point severity scale and other objective measures of injury. A competing explanation is that jury sympathies are different in different types of cases, impacting recoveries at all levels of injury. See generally Bovbjerg, Githens & Sloan, supra note 81. To the extent that the former is true, adjustments to past results seem in order for any damages matrix to be employed in the future.

n167 Rand analyses of jury verdicts have found a racial effect, e.g., M. PETERSON, supra note 60, at 2-3. The persuasiveness of one's lawyer would also play a lesser role in influencing damages in a matrix scheduling regime than in a system in which attorneys document injury and losses.

n168 The latter categories are combined in Table 5 because, if taken separately, the number of observations in our data would be too small for statistical confidence.

n169 See supra notes 24-26 and accompanying text.

n170 Most post-trial adjustment is downward, so the total award values (relative values multiplied by the numeraire) are somewhat inflated. See M. SHANLEY & M. PETERSON, supra note 47, at viii, 16-17, 26-28.

n171 Awards might also be adjusted to account for other factors, particularly timing of payment. Even awards for non-economic damages are appropriately brought to present value. A state might also reduce scheduled values under other circumstances where not all the damages are attributable to the actions of the defendant, including revisions to the doctrine of joint and several liability making particular defendants liable for less than 100% of damage, a common tort reform. See Bovbjerg, supra note 4, at 526-27, 541. Regardless of current practice, states might consider reductions for claimants whose injury aggravated a pre-existing condition, for malpractice claimants who allege failure to diagnose a disease (for instance, cancer that progresses due to delayed treatment), and other areas in which there is joint causation or the defendant's action deprives the claimant of only a chance at being "whole," but not the reality of a normal life. See generally King, Causation, Valuation, and Chance in Personal Injury Torts Involving Pre-existing Conditions and Future Consequences, 90 YALE L.J. 1353 (1981) (proposing solutions to the "loss of change" dilemma in personal injury litigation).

REV_00262884

n172 See supra note 41 and accompanying text.

n173 It seems undesirable, though technically feasible, to create a different payment schedule for pre-verdict settlements. The appropriate extent of compromise would vary widely by party assessments of liability issues, and by precisely when settlement occurred. Private negotiation is better suited to resolve such concerns than statistical analysis.

n174 This contention would be part of an equal protection attack on a point-value matrix. See infra notes 250-65 and accompanying text.

n175 Suggested factors should be suitable for use in scheduling -- objective, verifiable, and so forth.

n176 Although juries must ultimately quantify all factors, objective and subjective, used to make awards, they have the advantage of operating after the fact and presently need not explain how they arrive at a given award value.

n177 The relative influence of this factor may well diminish as injuries become more severe. No matter how arduous the circumstances under which one incurs an injury, presumably these circumstances pale beside the enduring suffering accompanying such injuries as those resulting in lifetime quadriplegia.

n178 By "ordinary victim," we mean the victim whose sum total of subjective factors is within a normal range for people suffering similar injuries (e.g., experiences a normal amount of pain and suffering, possesses neither abnormal sensitivity or insensitivity to pain).

n179 This alternative to the point-value matrix is closely akin to adopting a sliding scale of ceilings and floors for awards. See infra notes 211-23 and accompanying text.

n180 Since the outlier theory recognizes that recoveries can be below or above average, one should also allow amounts below the minimum and above the maximum values shown in Table 5. How far below and above is a matter of judgment. Halfway to the next cell does not work, for there is no next cell at the margins. Perhaps the increment should be scaled to the other differences between adjacent cells in that severity category.

n181 If a state should balk at the concept of specifying jury assessments either as point values or as relatively narrow ranges, an alternative would be to use the ranges as a means of providing information about previous awards to the jury or constraining their discretion. For example, awards within the approved range could be considered presumptively valid; awards outside the matrix-suggested range could require support by evidence showing the case to be atypical. This approach is analogous to establishing guidelines for judicial additur and remittitur.

n182 Logically, matrix-based awards could exceed the justifiable award level for low outlier cases. Thus, a state must decide whether to allow the reduction of awards in addition to increases.

n183 It does not seem feasible or desirable to require settlements to contribute to the pool. This approach to funding would also reward the parties for settling.

n184 For our proposal to create an ongoing data system, see infra notes 225-27 and accompanying text; see also Bovbjerg, Sloan & Blumstein, supra note 160.

REV_00262885

n185 Either legislators or judges could take the lead in developing a matrix-based system of damage awards. For the roles of legislatures and courts, see infra notes 238-45 and accompanying text.

n186 See infra notes 224-37 and accompanying text.

n187 Miller, supra note 30.

n188 Miller estimates that the value of a lost life is between $ 1,000,000 and $ 3,000,000. Id. at 881-83. Adjustments to find the best value for legitimate nonpecuniary damages make the amount even more indeterminate. Overall, the studies range at least as widely as jury awards, with less variation in what they purport to measure. See also infra notes 198-201 and accompanying text.

n189 See W. LANDES & R. POSNER, THE ECONOMIC STRUCTURE OF TORT LAW 186-87 (1987).

n190 See PROSSER & KEETON, supra note 10, at 942 n.24.

n191 See supra notes 25-26 and accompanying text.

n192 If some allowance is not made for rewarding plaintiffs and their attorneys, no cases will be brought and no valuable deterrence achieved. See S. SHAVELL, supra note 129, at 265-70. Similar suggestions have been made for punitive damages, whose raison d'etre is deterrence. See P. DANZON, supra note 64, at 171 & n.26. Some states already mandate that part of any punitive damage award be placed in a fund. E.g., COLO. REV. STAT. § 13-21-102(4) (1987) (one-third of punitive damages payable to state general fund); IOWA CODE ANN. § 668A.1 (West 1987)(75% of punitive award payable to fund unless trier of fact finds willful and wanton act directed specifically at plaintiff).

n193 See infra notes 225-27 and accompanying text.

n194 See supra notes 182-83 and accompanying text.

n195 See infra notes 211-15 and accompanying text; see also infra note 264. Moreover, as a practical legal matter, the maturing of the value of life literature may raise death awards anyway, perhaps in the form of allowing recovery for "economic" value of loss of enjoyment of life, sometimes called "hedonic" damages. But see supra note 104.

n196 The value of life literature should not be read as suggesting a single lump payment for any life lost. Uniform awards for all death cases (say, $ 2,000,000) are unacceptably crude, even accepting a given value as the "best estimate" of the statistically average life. Ted Miller's suggestion that life-year values be used, Miller, supra note 30, at 895, is sensible. However, considerable assumptions are needed to recompute the loss per life-year lost (e.g., making allowance for the age and possibly other demographic characteristics of the people at risk in the studies).

Moreover, adding a possible allowance for pain and suffering, id. at 894, would be problematic. When applying values so derived, one must further calculate precise years of life expectancy lost on an individual basis before finally making an award. This process can be accomplished with expert testimony, but as of now it remains a matter of jury factfinding, not a truly objective scheduling of values.

n197 "Value of life" studies are not "value of injury" studies. The better studies do separately estimate the values of injuries, but they do not sufficiently differentiate degrees of injury as a schedule does. See, e.g., Viscusi, Occupational Safety and Health Regulation: Its Impact and Policy Alternatives, in 2 RESEARCH IN PUBLIC POLICY ANALYSIS AND MANAGEMENT 281, 285 (J. Crecine ed. 1981) (value of a "typical job injury" is in the $ 20,000 to $ 30,000 range).

REV_00262886

n198 See supra notes 105 and 108 and accompanying text. Despite this shortcoming, policymakers could decide to anoint a particular value as "correct" in a particular state.

n199 Cf. Miller, supra note 30. A seldom addressed additional complication comes from the assumption that an observed value of avoiding a risk of death can be divided by that risk to give the value of an entire life. In fact, valuations probably vary considerably by level of risk faced. See W. LANDES & R. POSNER, supra note 189, at 187-89.

n200 See M. DRUMMOND, G. STODDART & G. TORRANCE, METHODS FOR THE ECONOMIC EVALUATION OF HEALTH CARE PROGRAMMES 115-17, 122-23 (1987); Miller, Narrowing the Plausible Range Around the Value of Life (forthcoming 1990).

n201 See, e.g., Crane, Is That Malpractice Victim Faking It?, MED. ECON., June 5, 1989, at 40 (insurers and defense attorneys estimate that only five percent or less of malpractice claims are "greatly exaggerated or outright phonies"). Crane recounts numerous incidents of exaggeration and even fraud by malpractice claimants, such as a plaintiff who claimed to be "unable to work, drive a car, or engage in sex or any strenuous physical activity," but was filmed hiking, swimming, and playing tennis. Id. at 40, 42-43.

n202 If mandatory, the scenario approach would work as a point-value matrix of as few as ten values. A predictable objection to mandatory application of such an approach is that ten values offer too little variation to adequately fit the award to circumstances. Hence, scenarios should operate as guideposts. Far more than ten may be created, but a smaller number would go to the jury in any given case. See infra notes 208-09 and accompanying text.

n203 See Miller, supra note 30, at 898.

n204 Id. at 898-99.

n205 Nondisabling disfigurement is difficult to accommodate within this or any other system because it is qualitatively different from literal pain and affects enjoyment of life in a mental rather than physical way. It may be that a separate set of scenarios is needed for such cases, and they are extremely difficult to categorize. The same point holds true for the other scheduling approaches.

n206 See McCORMICK, supra note 11, § 88, at 316 ("The various forms of mental suffering are as numberless as the capacities of the human soul for torturing itself.").

n207 Currently, juries must work from the relatively few "benchmarks" supplied by parties' arguments at trial. Such benchmarks include arguments that pain is worth a certain number of dollars per day. See supra notes 37-38 and accompanying text. Alternatively, parties employ expert doctors to testify that the plaintiff is, for example, 90% disabled or that his impairment is worse than that of three-quarters of the patients seen by the expert.

n208 For the standard severity scale, see supra Table 1. One might prefer 10 levels, providing different categories for permanent and temporary "emotional only" injuries. See supra note 76. Additional levels might be provided for disfiguring, but not disabling, injuries. See supra note 205.

n209 Sequential jury instructions would be easy to employ given the adoption of special verdicts as we recommend. See infra notes 231-34 and accompanying text. All evidence regarding liability and damages would be presented as part of this unitary proceeding.

REV_00262887

n210 See, e.g., CAL. CIV. CODE § 3333.2 (West Supp. 1989) ("noneconomic" loss cap of $ 250,000 in malpractice cases); OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2307.43 (Baldwin 1989) (cap on general damages in medical claims not involving death). The Ohio statute was held unconstitutional in Duren v. Suburban Community Hosp., 24 Ohio Misc. 2d 25, 495 N.E.2d 51 (1985).

n211 See Bovbjerg, supra note 4, at 525 nn. 115-17, 543 nn. 188-90. A recent malpractice task force report for the Department of Health and Human Services also recommended not a cap on all damages -- like that applicable in then-Secretary Bowen's home state of Indiana -- but rather a cap on non-economic damages only. U.S. DEP'T OF HEALTH & HUMAN SERVICES, REPORT OF THE TASK FORCE ON MEDICAL LIABILITY AND MALPRACTICE 130-32 (1987); see also U.S. TORT POLICY WORKING GROUP, supra note 63, at 80 (recommending $ 200,000 cap on non-economic damages). Note that as Governor of Indiana, Secretary Bowen had been a major supporter of that state's cap on overall malpractice awards, yet in his federal role recommended that states enact caps only on pain and suffering.

n212 Ohio's cap on "general damages" was declared unconstitutional because the cap limited economic damages and therefore violated due process and equal protection principles. Duren v. Suburban Community Hosp., 24 Ohio Misc. 25, 27-29, 495 N.E.2d 51, 55-56 (1985). But see Etheridge v. Medical Center Hosps., 237 Va. 87, 376 S.E.2d 525 (1989) (upholding total damages cap of $ 750,000).

n213 Of the 23 state enactments through calendar year 1987, four set a $ 250,000 cap and four others $ 500,000. See Bovbjerg, supra note 4, at 543 & n.18; see also Boyd v. Bulala, 647 F. Supp. 781, 785 n.2 (W.D. Va. 1986) (listing states upholding and overturning all types of damage caps). The range of caps is quite broad. See, e.g., CAL. CIV. CODE § 3333.2 (Deering 1989) (1975 cap of $ 250,000 subsequently held constitutional in Fein v. Permanente Medical Group, 38 Cal. 3d 137, 695 P.2d 665, 211 Cal. Rptr. 368, appeal dismissed, 474 U.S. 892 (1985)); S.D. CODIFIED LAWS ANN. § 21-3-11 (1988) ("total damages" cap of $ 1,000,000 in malpractice cases); TEX. REV. CIV. STAT. ANN. art. 4590i, § 1103 (Vernon 1987) (1977 statute providing for cap of $ 150,000 on non-economic damages in malpractice cases to become effective if preferred $ 500,000 cap on total damages in § 11.02 were held unconstitutional); WIS. STAT. § 893.55 (1985-86) ($ 1,000,000 cap on non-economic damages in malpractice cases). The Texas Supreme Court has held unconstitutional both the $ 500,000 cap on total damages and the fallback provision capping non-economic damages at $ 150,000. Lucas v. United States, 757 S.W.2d 687 (Tex. 1988).

Some state legislatures have had the foresight to "index" their damage caps for inflation. See, e.g., MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. § 600.1483(4) (West 1989); MO. REV. STAT. § 538.210 (1988).

n214 See generally F. SLOAN & R. BOVBJERG, supra note 64, at 18-24. Caps do not, however, guarantee reductions in overall awards. A ceiling may become a target or even a floor; in New Zealand, for example, a cap on non-economic damages quickly became the standard payment, perhaps in part because it was set quite low, at least by American standards. See generally G. PALMER, COMPENSATION FOR INCAPACITY: A STUDY OF LAW AND SOCIAL CHANGE IN NEW ZEALAND AND AUSTRALIA 227 (1979). Moreover, caps can be circumvented because all damages are subject to wide variation in reasonable ranges and because the dollar-denominated components of awards are fungible. A jury (or judge) facing a cap on non-economic damages could readily increase the award amount for economic loss to make up the difference. See Green v. Franklin, 190 Cal. App. 3d 93, 103-04, 235 Cal. Rptr. 312, 322-23 (1987); Kalven, The Jury, the Law, and the Personal Injury Damage Award, 19 OHIO ST. L.J. 158, 161 (1958).

n215 Because of this unfair impact against the most severely injured plaintiffs, some reviewing courts have held flat caps to be unconstitutional, generally on equal protection grounds. Some courts have similarly been troubled by the application of caps to malpractice cases only. See infra notes 257-60 and accompanying text.

REV_00262888

n216 There is to date one example of a flexible cap with varied limits for non-economic awards. See WASH. REV. CODE § 4.56.250 (1988) (held unconstitutional in Sofie v. Fibreboard Corp., 112 Wash. 2d 636, 771 P.2d 711 (1989), because of the statute's abridgment of the right to trial by jury). Washington's statute uniquely provided that claimants could not recover for non-economic damages in excess of a formula: 43% of the average annual wage in the state multiplied by the life expectancy of the injured person, counted as not less than fifteen years. According to one report, the resulting maximums ranged in 1986 from $ 117,000 to $ 573,000. AMERICAN MED. ASS'N, DEP'T OF STATE LEGISLATION, DIV. OF LEGISLATIVE ACTIVITIES, LIMITS ON RECOVERY (1987). This approach, however, relies too much on one factor, life expectancy, which is not even unambiguous in its expected impact on intangible losses. See Table 5, supra, and accompanying text. The relevant life expectancy under the statute was apparently that of a normal person, not that of the particular plaintiff, however enfeebled as a result of the injury or damage. It also took no account of the severity of the plaintiff's injury, the single most important variable.

n217 Most caps are not adjusted to account for changes in economic conditions over time, like inflation. But see MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. § 600.1483(4) (West 1989); MO. REV. STAT. § 538.210 (1988).

n218 Apparently, drafters of the California cap thought their $ 250,000 level would affect 5% of cases -- in 1976. See Fein v. Permanente Medical Group, 38 Cal. 3d 137, 172, 695 P.2d 665, 690, 211 Cal. Rptr. 368, 393, appeal dismissed, 474 U.S. 892 (1985).

n219 Expenses of litigation yield a negative recovery in losing cases, but this risk is borne by contingent-fee attorneys in 85-98% of cases. J. KAKALIK & N. PACE, supra note 93, at 37.

n220 There is precedent for a floor for nonpecuniary damages. As a general rule, where special damages have been shown, general damages should also be awarded. 22 AM. JUR. 2D Damages § 42 (1988). A jury should be so instructed when a request is made, Wheeler v. Huston, 288 Or. 468, 480-81, 605 P.2d 1339, 1346 (1980), and verdicts have been overturned for failure to include awards for pain and suffering in such cases. See, e.g., Webster v. City of Colfax, 250 Iowa 181, 93 N.W.2d 91 (1958).

n221 Legislators could, of course, opt for some other percentile.

n222 Applied by trial judges, sliding-scale caps and floors would closely resemble the traditional judicial process of reviewing a jury award for excessiveness or inadequacy. Indeed, legislatures would do well to pose the sliding scale in these familiar terms.

n223 The matrix, of course, aims to create less variable results in all cases, rather than merely cutting off the extremes.

n224 In addition to these practical concerns shared by all the proposed scheduling models, there are political and constitutional concerns that are addressed later in this Article. See infra notes 238-79 and accompanying text.

n225 Existing jury verdict reporters do not include information on all cases, nor are data verified and kept in a consistent format. Moreover, post-trial alterations are not included. Finally, and fundamentally, not all jurisdictions are even covered by existing reporters.

n226 Precopio v. Detroit Dep't of Transp., 415 Mich. 457, 471-72, 330 N.W.2d 802, 808-09 (1982).

REV_00262889

n227 For a detailed exposition of this proposal, see Bovbjerg, Sloan & Blumstein, supra note 160.

States might also consider including information on settlements. Our proposal, however, focuses scheduling on the publicly determined valuations made by juries and judges. Those values are the only "official" determinations of the liability system, even though 90% or more of personal injury claims are settled, and expectations of the results of adjudication heavily influence settlements. So we recommend against including such data. Moreover, it is difficult to obtain accurate data and because too many external factors influence settlement amounts, including compromises on liability. According to research on malpractice claims, preverdict settlements pay less for all severity categories than do jury awards -- though a higher proportion of malpractice claims settle than other types of claims. See Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 47.

n228 See supra text accompanying notes 185 and 221.

n229 For a longer exposition of this view, see Bovbjerg, Sloan & Blumstein, supra note 160.

n230 See infra notes 231-34 and accompanying text on special verdicts. Additor would appear to be unavailable in federal courts because of the seventh amendment. See Dimick v. Scheidt, 293 U.S. 474 (1935).

n231 Some tort reform statutes already mandate special verdicts. See, e.g., CAL. CIV. CODE § 3333.2 (West Supp. 1989); N.Y. CIV. PRAC. L. & R. 4111(d) (McKinney Supp. 1988).

n232 There is evidence that jury decisionmaking focuses more on reaching a single "bottom line" than on adding up separately calculated elements of damages. Kalven, supra note 214, at 161 (juries seldom make awards on an item-by-item basis, but rather usually arrive at a single dollar amount without detailed analysis).

n233 See Green v. Franklin, 190 Cal. App. 3d 93, 103-04, 235 Cal. Rptr. 312, 322-23 (1987) ("an instruction [on a damage cap] would only serve to increase the possibility that a jury may simply label damages that otherwise would have been denominated noneconomic as economic losses").

n234 Side-stepping of schedules by juries might also be minimized (though probably not eliminated) simply by instructing jurors that the schedules fairly and equally treat parties in similar circumstances and that the values have been derived from the hard work of prior jurors like themselves.

n235 Policymakers may also wish to modify schedule values to reflect other economic or social circumstances.

n236 See, e.g., CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 52-190a (West Supp. 1989).

n237 See, e.g., MINN. STAT. § 549.21 (1988) (nonmeritorious claims only); FLA. STAT. § 768.56 (1981) (all losing suits). The Florida statute was upheld in Florida Patient's Compensation Fund v. Rowe, 472 So. 2d 1145 (Fla. 1985), but repealed by the state legislature in 1986.

Another cross-cutting issue, not considered in detail here, is how scheduling should deal with derivative claims, including suits for loss of consortium, support and so forth. Such claimants have not suffered actual bodily injury and hence cannot themselves be readily classified as to severity of injury. Most current award caps appear to cover all claims together, e.g., WASH.

REV_00262890

REV. CODE § 4.56.250(1)(B) (1988) ("loss of consortium . . . and all other derivative claims . . . are to be included"), and some judicial authority supports this approach, e.g., Yates v. Pollack, 194 Cal. App. 3d 190, 239 Cal. Rptr. 387 (1987) (applying single cap to all claims by multiple survivors), although such consolidation has been questioned. See Jordan v. Long Beach Community Hosp., 201 Cal. App. 3d 1402, 248 Cal. Rptr. 651 (1988) (opinion decertified for publication) (under state's cap on non-economic damages, limit applies to each separate and distinct cause of action). Obvious options include scheduling only one amount for nonpecuniary loss without regard to derivative claims, scheduling derivative claims separately, or allowing some percentage add-on for derivative claims. This Article takes no position on these issues, which call for more investigation.

n238 One exception is the regulation of lawyers' contingency fees, in which both judiciaries and legislatures have been active, the former under their power to control the bar. See, e.g., Florida Bar re Amendment to the Code of Professional Responsibility, 494 So. 2d 960 (Fla. 1986); FLA. STAT. ANN. § 766.109 (West Supp. 1989).

n239 See Andrews v. Grand & Toy Alberta, Ltd., [1978] 2 S.C.R. 229 (Can.); Thornton v. Board of School Trustees, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 267 (Can.); Arnold v. Teno, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 287 (Can.).

n240 Many policy choices must be made to implement a scheduling reform. Each jurisdiction must decide the general scheduling approach to adopt and make numerous specific design choices. For example, implementing a matrix-based reform requires agreement on at least the following: (a) that using age and injury severity as the only classifying variables is reasonable; (b) that the chosen categories for age and severity are appropriate; (c) that the aggregate wisdom of past awards is reasonable and should thus be institutionalized; (d) that the relative values computed from past jury findings are intuitively reasonable; (e) normative or other adjustments are needed to relativities; and (f) the dollar numeraire to apply in a given year. It is certainly conceivable that a state supreme court could "legislate" a scheduled approach to damages for pain and suffering, if only as a guide to additur and remittitur. A complex schedule seems more plausible as a matter of judicial administration, however, than as a decision in a single lawsuit.

n241 Fein v. Permanente Medical Group, 38 Cal. 3d 137, 158-60 n. 16, 695 P.2d 665, 680-81 n. 16, 211 Cal. Rptr. 365, 384 n. 16, appeal dismissed, 474 U.S. 892 (1985). The California Supreme Court cited with approval the dissent by Justice Traynor in Seffert v. Los Angeles Transit Lines, 56 Cal. 2d 498, 511, 364 P.2d 337, 345, 15 Cal. rptr. 161, 169 (1961) (questioning the desirability of pain and suffering awards, but deferring to legislative judgment).

n242 A number of legitimate state interests underlie the scheduling proposals. The major policy concern is the fairness and efficiency of judicial administration of personal injury awards. The integrity of the judicial process itself may also be at risk in the absence of assurance that similar cases will receive similar results and undue variability in results may have a constitutional dimension.

A subsidiary public concern is the smooth functioning of liability insurance, traditionally a state-regulated industry. Without insurance, today's liability-compensation system could not function, and many businesses would not accept the legal risks of operating. Long-run legal predictability is desirable, especially to facilitate reinsurance of "long tail," high-dollar risks like medical malpractice and toxic torts. When awards change markedly without warning, as they can under the present, open-ended system, then long-run predictability is undermined. Improved legal stability will not necessarily end periodic short-term "crises" in insurance markets, however, and doing so is not the rationale of the proposals.

The fairness of compensation to injured parties also affects the public health, though less directly, as accident victims should be assured access to sufficient compensation for their Jury findings of damage vary considerably. Nonetheless, some scenarios are more likely than others to yield high awards. The best available single predictor of award amount is the severity of injury, [73] as measured on the nine-point scale conventionally used for evaluating malpractice insurance cases. [74] Table 1 presents this ranking system, with level 1 (fright) indicating the least severe type of injury and level 9 (death) the most severe.

TABLE 1

SEVERITY OF INJURY SCALE

Severity of Injury	Examples
1. Emotional only	Fright, no physical damage.
2. Temporary insignificant	Lacerations, contusions, minor scars, rash. No delay.
3. Temporary minor	Infections, misset fracture, fall in hospital. Recovery delayed.
4. Temporary major	Burns, surgical material left, drug side-effect, brain damage. Recovery delayed.
5. Permanent minor	Loss of fingers, loss or damage to organs. Include non-disabling injuries.
6. Permanent significant	Deafness, loss of limb, loss of eye, loss of one kidney or lung.
7. Permanent major	Paraplegia, blindness, loss of two limbs, brain damage.
8. Permanent Grave	Quadriplegia, severe brain damage, lifelong care or fatal prognosis.
9. Death

Source: National Association of Insurance Commissioners, supra note 69, at 10.

Boundaries between severity levels are relatively well-defined, with successively higher categories on the index indicating increasingly severe injuries. Death cases (level 9) are unambiguous, although the legal consequences may vary according to how many survivors, if any, bring suit in addition to the estate. Physical injuries (levels 2-8) are reasonably divided into groupings for temporary and permanent damage (levels 2-4 for temporary, 5-8 for permanent). Further distinctions create gradations within the discrete subcategories. [75] These categories are intuitively appealing -- with the possible exception of the "fright" or "emotional only" category (level 1) [76] -- and the scale works well in practice. It has been adopted for official insurance reporting of closed malpractice claims in Florida and New York, and has been used as a tool for injury research. [77]

Table 2 shows a sample distribution of jury awards in personal injury cases by severity category. [78] These data area for verdicts only, and [*921] include any reported additur or remittitur, but not any changes on appeal.

TABLE 2

JURY VALUATIONS a OF PERSONAL INJURY VARY WIDELY: DISTRIBUTION BY SEVERITY OF INJURY

(in thousands of 1987 dollars)

Severity Level	Number of Cases c	2.5% Critical Value	25th Percentile	Median
1 (emot.)	1	--	--	37

REV_00262838

losses. The public health is also affected by the ability of the tort system to maintain appropriate levels of deterrence to prevent injury in the first place. These concerns, of course, are best served by ensuring adequate, but not excessive, levels of compensation, both in individual cases and in the aggregate.

n243 It has been argued that federal action is necessary. Cf. Smith, Battling a Receding Tort Frontier: Constitutional Attacks on Medical Malpractice Laws, 38 OKLA. L. REV. 195, 229 (1985) ("vulnerability" of state tort reforms to state court constitutional attacks "suggests the wisdom of federal tort reform legislation"). Nonetheless, tort law is traditionally a state concern, and healthy federalism calls for keeping it so. See Blumstein, Medical Malpractice: Thinking About the Federal Role, 12 J. OF HEALTH & HUMAN RESOURCES ADMIN. 149 (Summer 1989). Moreover, we believe that our proposals would in fact pass state constitutional muster. See infra notes 250-79 and accompanying text.

n244 Moreover, substantial state legislative hearings might add to the political legitimacy of a system of scheduled nonpecuniary damages.

n245 In many states, one could expect joint legislative-judicial efforts. A legislature could enlist assistance from the state's judiciary through an advisory commission of sitting or recently retired judges. Legislative committees could also seek the advice of their state judiciaries acting in their administrative capacity. A hybrid legislative-judicial model of implementation is provided by the history of criminal sentencing guidelines, which addressed a similar problem of undue variation in legal results. See Mistretta v. United States, 109 S. Ct. 647 (1989).

n246 For examples of political and academic attacks, see Goddard, The American Medical Association Is Wrong: There Is No Malpractice Insurance Crisis, L.A. Daily J., May 17, 1985, at 97, col. 1; Cunningham & Lane, Malpractice -- The Illusory Crisis, 54 FLA. B.J. 114 (1980).

n247 See F. SLOAN & R. BOVBJERG, supra note 64, at 1.

n248 Other advantages of our proposals for scheduling reform are institutional and practical. For example, we envision the seeds of some reform being nurtured in the judiciary, a notable change from past reliance on legislation alone. Coordinated reform benefits from both enhanced legitimacy and an increased likelihood of political viability and longevity, as demonstrated by the criminal sentencing guidelines.

The probability of long-term survival for our proposals is also enhanced by mechanisms that allow the scheduling reforms to respond to changes over time. Unlike most flat caps, which remain static and unaltered, we propose a system that not only provides for such basic things as inflationary adjustment, see supra note 235 and accompanying text, but also promotes monitoring and feedback by developing a comprehensive data base for information on awards. See supra notes 225-27 and accompanying text.

n249 A comprehensive analysis of constitutional issues is beyond the scope of this Article. As part of a discussion of implementation issues, however, a brief consideration of potential constitutional matters is important and appropriate. For more detail on constitutional principles applied to tort reforms, see Blumstein & Smith, Constitutional Attacks on Medical Malpractice Laws, in LEGAL LIABILITY AND QUALITY ASSURANCE IN NEWBORN SCREENING 167 (L. Andrews ed. 1985).

n250 The identification and establishment of an allegedly discriminatory set of classifications is a fundamental threshold requirement for a party to mount an equal protection challenge. This is not a trivial issue because our proposals do not single out for separate treatment any particular class of claimants, as happens under malpractice-only reforms and flat caps on damages.

REV_00262892

Even so, plaintiffs presumably would assert that the categories set forth in a matrix or set of scenarios improperly classify the amount of damages allocable for pain and suffering. A complainant could argue that there is considerable overlap across categories that the schedules overlook, and that the use of age and injury severity as measures of pain and suffering is the use of an improper proxy for case-by-case damages assessment.

n251 See Boyd v. Bulala, 877 F.2d 1191, 1196 (4th Cir. 1989) ("a limitation on a common law measure of recovery does not violate a fundamental right or create a suspect classification"). It is extremely doubtful that any form of heightened scrutiny or even rationality review with bite would be applied. See Davis v. Omitowoju, 883 F.2d 1155, 1158-59 (3d Cir. 1989); Lucas v. United States, 807 F.2d 414, 421-22 (5th Cir. 1986); Hoffman v. United States, 767 F.2d 1431, 1435-37 (9th Cir. 1985); Continental Ins. Co. v. Illinois Dep't of Transp., 709 F.2d 471, 475 (7th Cir. 1983).

n252 See Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 (1970).

n253 See Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery, 449 U.S. 456, reh'g denied, 450 U.S. 1027 (1981).

n254 There are some rare exceptions. See, e.g., Allegheny Pittsburgh Coal Co. v. County Comm'n, 109 S. Ct. 633 (1989) (invalidating a crazy quilt pattern of differential property taxation); Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Ward, 470 U.S. 869 (1985) (holding illegitimate state's asserted purpose in differentially taxing in-state and out-of-state insurance companies).

n255 See Davis v. Omitowoju, 883 F.2d 1155 (3d Cir. 1989); Boyd v. Bulala, 877 F.2d 1191 (4th Cir. 1989).

n256 See generally Blumstein & Smith, supra note 249 (more detailed analysis of state constitutional challenges to past tort reforms).

n257 Arneson v. Olson, 270 N.W.2d 125 (N.D. 1978).

n258 Carson v. Maurer, 120 N.H. 925, 424 A.2d 825 (1980).

n259 See Bovbjerg, supra note 4, at 548.

n260 Fein v. Permanente Medical Group, 38 Cal. 3d 137, 695 P.2d 665, 211 Cal. Rptr. 368, appeal dismissed, 474 U.S. 892 (1985); Johnson v. St. Vincent Hosp., 273 Ind. 374, 404 N.E.2d 585 (1980).

n261 See, e.g., State ex rel. Strykowski v. Wilkie, 81 Wis. 2d 491, 507-10, 261 N.W.2d 434, 442-43 (1978).

n262 See, e.g., Hoffman v. Powell, S.C. , 380 S.E.2d 821 (1989); Etheridge v. Medical Center Hosps., 237 Va. 87, 376 S.E.2d 525 (1989).

n263 Compare Leiker v. Gafford, Kan. , 778 P.2d 823 (1989) and Samsel v. Wheeler Transp. Servs., Inc., 244 Kan. 726, 771 P.2d 71 (1989) with Farley v. Engelken, 241 Kan. 663, 740 P.2d 1058 (1987); see also Meech v. Hillhaven West, Inc., Mont. , 776 P.2d 488 (1989) (overruling prior cases).

n264 Several jurisdictions have applied due-process-like principles under state constitutional open courts provisions to invalidate damage caps. See, e.g., Smith v. Department of Ins., 507 So. 2d 1080 (Fla. 1987); Kansas Malpractice Victims Coalition v. Bell, 243 Kan. 333, 757 P.2d 251 (1988); Lucas v. United States, 757 S.W.2d 687 (Tex.

REV_00262893

1988). Under these cases, "when a common-law remedy is modified or abolished, an adequate substitute remedy must be provided to replace it." Kansas Malpractice Victims Coalition, 243 Kan. at , 757 P.2d at 260. These courts substantively evaluate the fairness of the restriction, requiring that a cut-back in a common-law right be accompanied by a provision of a "reasonable alternative remedy or commensurate benefit." Smith, 507 So. 2d at 1088. Only if the state can show that there is an "overpowering public necessity for the abolishment of the right and no alternative method of meeting such public necessity" can the lack of a substantive quid pro quo be justified. Id.

Unlike the damages caps held invalid in Florida, Kansas, and Texas, our proposals are not takeaways, nor do they redistribute benefits from any burdened group or shift them to any subclass of potential beneficiaries. The proposals are designed to compensate all victims for non-economic losses fairly and in accordance with the severity of the injury adjusted for age. All three approaches work to counteract undervaluation of damages in addition to overvaluation. Moreover, under the matrix and scenario proposals, all plaintiffs will benefit to the extent that increased predictability promotes settlement and lowers litigation costs. There is, therefore, a mutual shared advantage without clearly identifiable winners or losers. No substantive common-law right is infringed or abolished, and the proposed alternatives to the existing system enhance overall fairness and predictability without disadvantaging, in the name of the common weal, any discrete and clearly identifiable group. For these reasons, our proposals would satisfy any quid pro quo requirements applied by the states.

n265 Compare Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976) with Pickett v. Brown, 462 U.S. 1 (1983).

n266 Davis v. Omitowoju, 883 F.2d 1155 (3d Cir. 1989).

n267 Boyd v. Bulala, 877 F.2d 1191 (4th Cir. 1989).

n268 See, e.g., Kansas Malpractice Victims Coalition v. Bell, 243 Kan. 333, 757 P.2d 251 (1988); Sofie v. Fibreboard Corp., 112 Wash. 2d 636, 771 P.2d 711 (1989).

n269 See Etheridge v. Medical Center Hosps., 237 Va. 87, 376 S.E.2d 525 (1989) (upholding against jury trial challenge a total damage cap of $ 750,000 for malpractice cases).

n270 This is apparently contrary to the United States Supreme Court's interpretation of the Seventh Amendment. See Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 426 n.9 (1987) (Nothing in the [Seventh] Amendment's language suggests that the right to a jury trial extends to the remedy phase of a civil trial. . . . We have been presented with no evidence that the Framers meant to extend the right to a jury to the remedy phase of a civil trial.")

n271 112 Wash. 2d 636, 771 P.2d 711 (1989).

n272 The Virginia Supreme Court viewed damage caps precisely in this way -- as a matter of substantive law -- in Etheridge v. Medical Center Hosps., 237 Va. 87, 376 S.E.2d 525 (1989).

n273 The Virginia Supreme Court reasoned that since the legislatively mandated damages cap "does nothing more than establish the outer limits of a remedy provided by the [legislature]," and since "[a] remedy is a matter of law, not a matter of fact," a legislatively established cap on damages "does not infringe upon the right to a jury trial because [it] does not apply until after a jury has completed its assigned function in the judicial process." Id. at 270, 376 S.E.2d at 529. In sum, even if the right to a jury trial includes the right to have a jury assess damages -- a position apparently at odds with the United States Supreme Court's interpretation of the seventh amendment's jury trial provision, see supra note 270 -- that right does not include the right "to have a jury dictate through an award the legal consequences of its assessment." Id. at , 376 S.E.2d at 529. In the context of a damage cap, the jury resolves the disputed facts and assesses damages. If the assessment of damages exceeds that which is authorized by law, then the judge must reduce the amount of the award to bring it into conformity with the provisions of the statutory maximum.

REV_00262894

n274 Sofie v. Fibreboard Corp., 112 Wash. 2d 636, , 771 P.2d 711, 721 (1989).

n275 Id. at , 771 P.2d at 721.

n276 The Washington Supreme Court opined that, since the legislature had not done away with a cause of action or with the right of civil trial, it could not "deny[] litigants an essential function of the jury." Id. at , 771 P.2d at 719. The statute in question in Sofie had the effect of "directly chang[ing] the outcome of a jury determination. The statute operates by taking a jury's finding of fact and altering it by a predetermined formula." Id. at , 771 P.2d at 720. The consequence was to disregard the jury's deliberations, an unconstitutional encroachment of the powers and prerogatives of the jury.

n277 See Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564 (1972).

n278 See Cleveland Bd. of Educ. v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532 (1985) (rejecting the so-called "bitter-with-the-sweet" doctrine that allowed states to condition conferral of a "property" interest on acceptance of a specified procedure).

n279 Cf. Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 427 (1987) (Scalia, J., concurring and dissenting) (acknowledging a similar principle in the jury context: Congress can prescribe a fixed statutory amount of damages, but if it chooses not to set the specific amount, then the determination will be within the domain of the jury).

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 83 Nw. U.L. Rev. 908,AT 928
View: Full
Date/Time: Monday, October 29, 2001 - 9:09 PM EST

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00262895

2		113	1	3	7
3	(temp.)	221	1	8	26
4		48	3	42	82
5		283	3	35	106
6	(perm.)	67	13	156	438
7		45	31	523	1,422
8		16	d 147	2,118	4,214
9	(death)	95	19	239	622
	Total	898	1	17	82

a. Valuation = amount of jury award, adjusted for comparative negligence, if any.

c. Nine cases for which no indication of severity was available are included in the total; all verdicts finding no liability are omitted from the table.

d. Because category has fewer than 40 observations, the critical values are the minimum and the maximum.

Severity Level		Mean	75th Percentile	97.5% Critical Value	Standard Deviation
1	(emot.)	37	--	--	--
2		22	24	104	46
3	(temp.)	69	95	320	98
4		204	263	971	362
5		245	250	1,296	427
6	(perm.)	639	985	2,022	652
7		2,087	2,732	8,827	2,174
8		5,068	6,611	d 18,106	4,503
9	(death)	1,224	1,422	7,777	1,879
	Total	490	328	3,570	1,317

d. Because category has fewer than 40 observations, the critical values are the minimum and the maximum.

Source: Calculated from unpublished jury verdict data, 1973-87, compiled by Urban Institute/Vanderbilt University project.

Two phenomena are most striking in Table 2. First, severity directly influences the level of damages, as one would expect. In general, more severe injuries result in larger recoveries, and there is an upward progression as severity increases, at least within the categories of physical injury. [79] The median value (50th percentile) rises steadily from $ 7,000 for level 2 injuries to $ 4.2 million for level 8 injuries; not surprisingly, the values jump greatly at the level of permanent significant injuries (four time higher for level 6 than for level 5), but fall for death cases (level 9) [*923] to "only" $ 620,000 for the median case. The pattern for the mean (arithmetic average) is similar, but with higher dollar values for each level of severity. All the information in Table 2 comes from simple tabulation of data coded directly from the reporters (with correction for comparative negligence); no allowances are made for other factors that may influence particular awards. [80] We have also used multiple regression analysis to examine the influence of other factors that one would logically expect to affect jury awards. All together, observed factors explain about three-fifths of the aggregate variation in jury valuations. [81] Severity of injury alone explains about two-fifths of the variation.

REV_00262839

Second, the table reveals that the variation in awards is enormous. [82] Within an individual severity level, the highest valuation can be scores of times larger than the lowest. Awards for the most serious permanent injuries (level 8, the most costly injury) range in value from a low of $ 147,000 to a high of $ 18,100,000. Even considering only the spread between the top and bottom quartiles, the range is great. All the awards in the top 25% of level 6 cases, for example, are at least six times larger than any of the bottom 25%; the ranges are even larger for lower severity cases. Very large awards are also disproportionately present; the distributions skew to the high end of values, as mean values always far exceed the medians. [83] Much of this variation may legitimately reflect claimants' precise individual circumstances, as the tort system intends. Table 2 does not, for instance, control for the age of the claimant, a factor that strongly influences duration of permanent injury. Nor does it control for pre-injury earnings, or the amount of medical care received. Including many other factors in a multiple regression analysis in addition to severity as valuation predictors helps explain some of the differences in awards within individual severity categories. It is not possible to fully and objectively adjust for other circumstances that plausibly influence a jury's valuation, [*924] such as the subjective nature of how an injury occurred. [84] No amount of adjusting, however, is likely to fully account for the extreme values. For example, a range of $ 147,000 to $ 18,100,000 for awards in compensation for quadriplegia and other injuries requiring lifelong care (level 8 injuries) is inexplicably wide by any standard. [85]

Table 2 documents that the current system works rationally and fairly in an aggregate sense. "Vertical" equity, the fairness between separate categories of injury, is rather good. The main problem is the absence of "horizontal" equity -- the extent of variation within a single category. Although the median, and even mean, awards in a given category may be considered relatively reasonable, the seemingly uncontrolled variability of awards is cause for concern -- similar to anxiety about drowning in a pool averaging only two feet in depth.

D. Resulting Problems of Variability

Why is variability a problem? There are important values served by improving the accuracy and predictability of damage awards. First, fundamental fairness requires similarly situated parties to be treated in a similar fashion by the legal system. It comforts parties little that jury valuations are reasonable in the aggregate when the award in their particular case varies greatly from the norm for the type and severity of the injury suffered. Rather, they are left to accept on faith alone that the discrepancy is warranted. [86]

Second, the inability to achieve sufficiently similar results in similar cases tends to erode general confidence in justice and the integrity of what has become a very large system for personal injury compensation. Harmonizing results across cases, is important as individual tort actions, especially [*925] in the aggregate, have great social impact (e.g., on insurance, product costs, availability of medical care). Similar concerns about variations in criminal sentencing, a process once left almost wholly to the discretion of trial judges, have led to mandatory minimum sentences and sentencing guidelines to assure comparable results by category. [87]

Third, highly variable, unpredictable valuations undercut the deterrence function of tort law. Where liability costs are relatively predictable, they can be avoided (where it is efficient to do so) or "built in" to the costs of goods and services. This is how deterrence is supposed to make the world safer. [88] But errors in valuation may cause overdeterrence -- the taking of too many costly precautions, or withdrawal from risky activity altogether. [89] For example, during the liability insurance crisis of the 1980s, many obstetricians reportedly stopped delivering babies, [90] and some manufacturers ceased development or production of certain drugs and goods. [91] Systematic "risk management" of personal injuries is implausible when potential defendants lack confidence in the predictability and stability of awards. To send more effective -- and efficient -- deterrent signals to defendants, the system should focus primarily on consistency, predictability, and prompt settlement.

REV_00262840

Fourth, today's very particularized (yet standardless) system of valuation is very expensive to run. Each case must start "from scratch" with a fresh and uninitiated jury having no awareness of prior awards. Parties find it more difficult to reach settlement where results at trial are unpredictable. [92] The "handling" expense of delivering compensation through [*926] the liability system is high, amounting to about fifty cents on the dollar, [93] far more than that of many other systems. [94] Some of this administrative expense derives from having to make difficult liability decisions, but some also arises from the difficulty inherent in the present method of determining damages. Any reduction in this latter difficulty would lower such expenses by reducing the needlessly spent time of judges and jurors, and by prodding parties toward earlier settlement.

Finally, high payment variability, especially at the upper end of the scale, together with the prospect of further unpredictable changes over time, may affect the very availability of liability insurance. Without the liability insurance system, tort law could not effectively function as a compensation and deterrence system. [95] Recent developments in damage awards have made the insurance markets extremely "skittish." [96] The few very large cases that account for a very large proportion of total dollars involved [97] are a special cause for concern. [98] Insurers normally [*927] make risk predictable by diversification -- that is, by pooling together large numbers of similar insureds so that unexpected losses are offset by unexpected gains. [99] Non-random fluctuation, however, cannot be diversified away, and the possibility that the tort system will convulsively increase available damages is not a random risk. Rather, such a systematic increase in available awards would affect the coverage of all the insureds of a liability insurer, thus threatening another liability crisis.

E. Timely Reform and the Potential Impact of "Value of Life" Findings

Given these problems, reform seems desirable, especially reform undertaken in a measured, principled fashion, before the political maelstrom of the next liability insurance crisis. Early action might also help forestall a further unpredictable jump in the level of awards and a widening in the variance among awards that could well follow the entry of "value of life" testimony into courtrooms. [100]

Evidence on the "value of life" comes from accumulating findings about how people value risks of injury and death, both on the job and at home. [101] Several studies justify a very expansive approach to valuing life, including its positive, intangible aspects like the pleasure of living, sometimes called the "hedonic" value of life. [102] Such studies are already an established part of regulatory decisionmaking, and they could soon influence everyday suits for tortious injury and death because of the methodological and regulatory foundation laid. Testimony on the "hedonic" value of life has already been heard in some cases, [103] although it has been rejected in others. [104] The most obvious application of this expertise is in lawsuits for wrongful death and survival actions, but it would also be relevant to pain and suffering, loss of pleasure of life, and other new notions of intangible loss in personal injury cases. These losses would be newly supportable as "economic" elements of loss, and would [*928] have corresponding and specific dollar values, not merely vague verbal descriptions.

The "value of life" studies suggest that a typical life is worth one to three million dollars [105] -- an amount above the average recovery for death cases shown in Table 2, and well above the median. [106] This body of work documents the financial value of "intangible" losses, further justifying their inclusion in tort law. It also promises to substantially increase damage awards, at least for death cases, and, if applied in an ad hoc fashion by various juries, would greatly exacerbate the problem of award variability. Such developments would further threaten the viability of liability insurance and undermine the interest of fairness.

Now is a good time to seek fundamental reform of the way the liability system computes

REV_00262841

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Tort Reform Articles] [7]

OA/NARA#: 16446/1514
9597

Box 59
Folder 5

REV_00262896

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: vidmar and ("non-economic damages" /25 percentage) (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*43 Duke L.J. 217, **

Copyright (c) 1993 Duke Law Journal
Duke Law Journal

November, 1993

43 Duke L.J. 217

LENGTH: 22374 words

EMPIRICAL EVIDENCE ON THE DEEP POCKETS HYPOTHESIS: JURY AWARDS FOR PAIN AND SUFFERING IN MEDICAL MALPRACTICE CASES

Neil Vidmar *

* Professor of Social Science and Law, Duke University School of Law.

This research was supported in part by a Perry Nichols Fellowship Grant from The National College of Advocacy and by a grant from the Duke University Research Coun- cil. Additional support was provided by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, the State Justice Institute, and Duke University School of Law. The jury experiment was conducted in collaboration with Laura Ann Hellstern and Susan Smith. Dr. Jeffrey Rice provided assistance on the medical details. I am grateful to Judge Robert Farmer and Jury Clerk Helen Sewell of Wake County Superior Court for allowing us to recruit volunteer jurors. Professors Valerie Hans, Richard Lempert, Michael Saks, and Joseph Sanders made im- portant comments on an earlier draft of the Article; so did David Landau, my very able research assistant. The opinions and conclusions expressed in the Article are my own and do not necessarily reflect the views of the funding sources or my colleagues.

SUMMARY:
... The jury system seems to show a desire for punitive action and retribution above and beyond the degree of injury--"let's get the rich doctor." ... In the context of medical malpractice, four overlapping empir- ical assertions have been made: (1) juries give larger awards in malpractice cases than in other types of cases, particularly automo- bile negligence cases, even when injuries are objectively simi- lar--the deep pockets hypothesis; (2) the rates of plaintiff victories in malpractice cases have increased in recent years; (3) the sizes of awards have increased; and (4) the awards for non-economic dam- ages such as pain and suffering in particular are out of control. ... Most of the concern with the deep pockets effect and other factors relating to juror damage awards centers on the non-eco- nomic components of damages, particularly pain and suffering. ... The facts that the mean and median awards were actually slightly larger for single defendants when liability for the injury was ascribed to automobile as opposed to medical negligence and that the overall mean award was slightly larger for medical negli- gence can be ascribed to chance fluctuations in the data. ...

TEXT:
The jury system seems to show a desire for punitive action and retribution above and beyond the degree of injury--"let's get the rich doctor." [1]

A final piece of contrary evidence is more indirect. Danzon's California study, [100] the Rand studies, [101] and subsequent studies comparing jury verdicts with the seriousness of plaintiffs' alleged injuries [102] have consistently concluded that the best predictor of the size of the award is the severity of the injury. [103] If the deep pockets effect is real, these later findings suggest, it must have an effect over and above injury severity, or at least an effect that combines with severity in some unspecified way.

E. Conclusion: Little Evidence One Way or the Other

Influential authors and organizations have made claims about the deep pockets hypothesis. These claims are widely disseminated to the public, legislators and other policymakers, judges, the busi- ness community, and the legal and scientific communities. They play a major role in debates about the tort system. My detailed critique, however, makes it clear that the empirical evidence sup- porting the claim is at best flimsy, and at worst non-existent. On the other hand, my critique does not allow the conclusion that the deep pockets hypothesis is wrong. It simply points out that we cannot say, one way or the other, whether it is wrong on the basis of available data. Aggregate statistics on jury verdicts are not capable of providing the crucial evidence because they cannot rule [*240] out a host of plausible alternative explanations. Clearly, then, some other types of data are necessary to test the deep pockets hypoth- esis. One approach is through a controlled experiment.

II. An Experiment and the Results

A. Overview

My students and I conducted an experiment to test the deep pockets hypothesis without the confounding of other variables that occurs in studies of aggregate verdict statistics. The experiment also provided an opportunity to get a direct glimpse of the atti- tudes and beliefs of prospective jurors. A sample of 147 veniremen was asked to award damages for pain and suffering in a case in- volving a young woman who suffered a broken leg and resultant complications. For some jurors, negligence was ascribed to health care providers: either one doctor, two doctors, or a hospital. For other jurors, the cause was ascribed to negligence involving the operation of a motor vehicle and, in parallel fashion to the medi- cal negligence cases, involved either one defendant, two defen- dants, or a business corporation.

B. Rationale

The research strategy was to vary two factors most central to the deep pockets hypothesis while keeping all of the other vari- ables constant. The first factor was the cause of the accident. For approximately half of the subjects, the injury was caused by medi- cal negligence, and the defendants were health care providers. For the remaining jurors, the injury was described as caused by an automobile accident. An auto injury was chosen as the comparison case since most critics have used it as the baseline against which malpractice cases are judged. [104]

The second factor was the number or type of defendants. We hypothesized that one crucial distinction between automobile injury cases and medical malpractice cases was that the former frequently have a single defendant, whereas the latter typically have multiple defendants. As I will discuss in more detail below, a new, although still not well understood, body of research evidence suggests that juries may assess responsibility and damages differently for corpo- [*241] rate acts than for acts by single individuals. [105] Consequently, of the jurors who were told that medical negligence caused the inju- ry, some had a version in which the negligence was ascribed to a single physician, some had a version with two physicians, and some had a version in which the hospital was the defendant. Jurors who received the auto accident version of the case had parallel con- ditions of one defendant, two defendants, or a business corpora- tion.

REV_00262906

Thus, the study can be described as a 2x3 factorial experi- ment, yielding six conditions: a malpractice case involving three types of defendants and a motor vehicle case involving three types of defendants. To control for differences in liability, the case mate- rials presented to the jurors asserted that the defendant had been found legally negligent and that the jurors' only task was to assess the amount of damages.

Most of the concern with the deep pockets effect and other factors relating to juror damage awards centers on the non-eco- nomic components of damages, particularly pain and suffering. The apparent assumption is that assessment of this component is so subjective that any juror biases can find free expression. For in- stance, Weiler stated that "the most troublesome feature of large tort verdicts is the amount of damages awarded for pain and suf- fering, not for direct medical costs." [106] As a consequence, we de- signed the case materials so that the defendant(s) stipulated medi- cal expenses; the jurors were asked only to determine the amount of damages for pain and suffering.

As discussed earlier, assertions about the deep pockets effect are usually accompanied by speculation about the psychological attitudes of the jurors who produce those awards. Hammitt, Carroll, and Relles speculated that jurors may balance "the benefit of greater compensation for the plaintiff against the harm to the defendant;" that jurors may believe that doctors are heavily in- sured; and that jurors' sensibilities are insulted by the breach of special trust a patient places in his doctor. [107] Huber asserted that the public has come to view accidents as "malign and calculated intrusions on the settled order of things" with the consequence that hospitals and surgeons are viewed as thick-skinned, well-in- [*242] sured, callous, and unwilling to take measures to prevent acci- dents. [108] None of these assertions about juror attitudes can be assessed from jury verdict reporters, but our experiment allowed us to study juror attitudes on these matters in the context of the specific case to which they were exposed.

C. Juror Sample and Research Procedure

The sample of jurors consisted of 147 veniremen waiting to be called for jury selection in the Wake County (Raleigh), North Carolina state court. They were told that the researchers were studying juror decisionmaking and were asked to volunteer; they also were told that participation was not part of their jury service and that their answers would be anonymous. The sample consisted of equal numbers of women and men. Their average age was 42, their average education level was high school graduate with some post-high school work, and they lived in households with yearly incomes that averaged $ 42,800. We did not inquire about race on the questionnaires, but blacks appeared to participate in numbers proportionate to their representation in the jury pool. The sample appears to approximately mirror the demographic characteristics of the jury pool.

The case materials were randomly ordered so that jurors were randomly assigned to one of the six experimental conditions. A few jurors did not complete the study after volunteering, resulting in an uneven number of jurors per condition. Although the statisti- cal tests that we applied to the data take unequal numbers into account and weight the data accordingly, the numbers of jurors per condition are as follows:

Condition Number of Jurors

(1) medical negligence, 1 defendant 21 jurors

(2) medical negligence, 2 defendants 26 jurors

(3) medical negligence, hospital 23 jurors

(4) auto negligence, 1 defendant 25 jurors

REV_00262907

(5) auto negligence, 2 defendants 26 jurors

(6) auto negligence, corporate defendant 26 jurors

[*243]

D. Case Materials

Each juror was given a packet of materials consisting of back- ground facts, results of a prior judicial proceeding establishing defendant liability, excerpts of the plaintiff's testimony about her pain and suffering, three photographs of the plaintiff demonstrat- ing the injury, and legal arguments from attorneys for both sides. Instructions from the judge stipulated economic (medical expenses and wages) damages of $ 34,268 and provided standard guidance on awards for pain and suffering. Following these materials, the jurors received a verdict sheet, the questionnaire on juror perceptions and attitudes, and seven questions pertaining to the jurors' demo- graphic characteristics.

1. Medical Negligence, One Defendant. The plaintiff was described as a seventeen-year-old female who elected surgery under general anesthesia to have a benign cyst removed from her back. She was given a sedative prior to general anesthesia and brought into the operating room. When the anesthesiologist negli- gently moved away from the disoriented patient, she fell off the operating table. She was placed back on the table and the opera- tion was completed, but when she awoke in the recovery room with excruciating pain in her leg, doctors discovered that she had a broken femur. The leg was set in a plaster cast, and the patient was discharged the next day. However, she required pain medica- tion for two weeks, and when the cast was removed in two months, it was discovered that the fracture had not healed proper- ly, resulting in a two-inch shortening of her leg. The result was determined not to be the fault of the doctor who set the leg. During the next six months, the plaintiff was unable to attend school or participate in normal physical activities and had to un- dergo four separate corrective surgeries: an osteotomy to lengthen the leg bone; osteosynthesis to attach a metal plate to the leg; surgery to remove the metal plate; and plastic surgery to cosmetic- ally disguise the scars. During part of this time, the evidence (illus- trated by a photograph) showed that she was on crutches with an exterior metal plate on her leg. Testimony indicated that she also underwent intense and painful physical therapy.

The ultimate result was a good one: she recovered fully, and plastic surgery successfully corrected the surgical scars. However, she sued the anesthesiologist for medical expenses and her pain and suffering over the lengthy period of her recovery. The lawyer [*244] for the defendant did not dispute liability and conceded the eco- nomic damages of $ 34,268, but he argued that the amount for past pain and suffering should be $ 30,000. The lawyer for the plaintiff argued that compensation for pain and suffering should be be- tween $ 180,000 and $ 220,000. [109]

2. Medical Negligence, Two Defendants. The facts of the case were identical except that in this instance, the surgeon began the operation before the patient was fully anesthetized, causing her to kick and fall off the table. Prior judicial proceedings ascertained that both doctors were liable because the anesthesiologist is re- quired to ensure that the patient is anesthetized and the surgeon is required to check with the anesthesiologist before beginning sur- gery.

3. Medical Negligence, Hospital Defendant. The facts of this case were identical except that hospital orderlies negligently dropped the patient when transferring her from the operating ta- ble, causing the broken femur.

4. Auto Injury Negligence, One Defendant. In contrast to the medical negligence conditions, the broken femur resulted from a driver who negligently caused his vehicle to swerve into an on- coming lane of traffic, striking the plaintiff's vehicle. All of the other facts about the plaintiff and her recovery remained identical.

REV_00262908

5. Auto Injury Negligence, Two Defendants. In this condi- tion, two drivers were responsible for the plaintiff's broken leg. One driver was distracted while talking on his cellular phone, and the other impatiently attempted to pass him near a curve. The startled first driver swerved, forcing the second into the path of the plaintiff's vehicle.

6. Auto Injury Negligence, Corporate Defendant. This ver- sion was similar to the single driver version, except that the driver was an employee of the Allied Products Company; under the [*245] doctrine of respondeat superior, the corporation was held liable for the accident.

E. Dependent Measures

Regardless of condition, each juror was instructed to award $ 34, 268 for medical bills and affix a sum for past pain and suffer- ing under the following instructions:

Damages should include such amount as you find, by the greater weight of the evidence, is fair compensation for the actual physi- cal pain and mental suffering which were the immediate and necessary consequences of the accident. There is no fixed formu- la for evaluating pain and suffering. You will determine what is fair compensation by applying logic and common sense to the evidence.

Following their verdict on damages, jurors were asked to explain in their own words what factors were important or unimportant in their decisions and why.

Next, they were asked to respond to thirteen questions, each accompanied by a ten-point scale. These questions were intended to assess juror attitudes and perceptions about the plaintiff's suffer- ing, degrees of legal and moral responsibility for the accident, the reasonableness of the amounts suggested by the attorneys, the risks a person assumes in driving a car or undertaking a medical procedure, and attitudes about litigation. [110] [*246]

Four additional questions ascertained the juror's gender, age, education, and household income. Three final questions asked whether the juror or members of his family had ever been injured by a health care provider, injured in a car accident, or caused an auto accident in which someone had been injured.

F. Results

1. Awards. The mean (average) pain and suffering award and the standard deviation, a measure of the variability of awards, [111] for each of the six conditions, plus aggregate statistics, are presented in Table 1. Consider the aggregate statistics first. The bottom right-hand figure, $ 89,908, is the mean award summed over all conditions. The two figures immediately above it report the mean awards for all jurors for whom the cause of the accident was medical negligence ($ 93,999) and for auto negligence ($ 87,783). Overall, the mean malpractice award was $ 6216 more than the mean auto negligence award. The bottom row of three figures ($ 102,506, $ 75,682, and $ 94,484) are the mean awards, summed across the causes of injury for one defendant, two defen- dants, and hospital/corporation defendants, respectively. [*247] $ SE

Before attempting to put any substantive meaning to these figures, consider the results of a statistical test, called analysis of variance, that we applied to the data. The purpose of the test was to ascertain whether these differences were meaningful in a statis- tical sense or, alternatively, whether they could be ascribed to chance variation. [112] The analysis of variance indicated that nei- ther the $ 6216 difference between the medical and auto negligence causes of the injury nor the difference between the defendant con- ditions was statistically significant, although there was a "cause by defendant" interaction effect. [113] Put in layperson's terms, the test indicates several things. First, there is no support for the hypothesis that jurors would be prejudiced against medical providers in comparison to motor vehicle operators or to corporations who are legally responsible for them. Second, there was no general support for the hypothesis that the number or type of defendants makes a [*248] difference, despite the fact that the mean for the two-defendant conditions ($ 75,682) appears substantially lower than the means for the one defendant ($ 102,506) and corporation conditions ($ 94,484). There is support for the hypothesis that the cause of the injury and number of defendants interact with one another. However, further statistical analyses [114] indicated that this interaction effect was due solely to the fact that the mean award was lower in the condition involving two defendants who were medically negligent ($ 67,709); the award in the two-defendant motor negligence condi- tion ($ 83,655) was not statistically different from the other condi- tions.

REV_00262909

These findings may be better understood by first examining the standard deviations, which are reported in parentheses for each condition in Table 1. The standard deviation is a statistical mea- sure of how much awards varied from the average. [115] The table shows that in each condition, there was considerable variability. Consider the one-defendant conditions. The standard deviation of $ 60,482 in the medical negligence condition indicates that two-thirds of the awards ranged from $ 39,468 to $ 160,432. (i.e., the mean of $ 99,950 +/- $ 60,482). In the motor vehicle condition, two- thirds of awards ranged from $ 35,592 to $ 174,534. (i.e., $ 105,063 +/- $ 69,471). With this kind of variability in awards, it is not surprising that although the mean award in the motor vehicle negligence condition was $ 5113 larger than the medical negligence condition, the difference was probably due to chance fluctuation. The same reasoning can be applied to comparisons between the other condi- tions.

Another way to understand these data is to look at the medi- an awards, which are the midpoint of the award distribution. The medians are reported in Table 2. These medians of the award dis- tributions are somewhat lower than the means and reflect the fact that in each condition a few high awards (i.e., $ 180,000 to $ 220,000) raised the mean. Note that the patterns of medians in Table 2 is similar to the pattern of means in Table 1. A statistical test of these alternative summary statistics yielded a result similar [*249] to the means: medical negligence was not treated differently than motor vehicle negligence with respect to the size of awards. The number and type of defendants did not produce statistically meaningful results either.

To avoid any misinterpretation, let me repeat the conclusion to be drawn from these findings about the pain and suffering awards. The facts that the mean and median awards were actually slightly larger for single defendants when liability for the injury was ascribed to automobile as opposed to medical negligence and that the overall mean award was slightly larger for medical negli- gence can be ascribed to chance fluctuations in the data. Statistical tests of the data lend no support for the hypothesis that jurors would treat medical and automobile negligence cases differently.
$ SE

2. Perceptions and Attitudes. Jurors were asked a series of thirteen questions about their perceptions and attitudes toward the case. [116] These answers were analyzed to determine if there were any meaningful differences between conditions. There were only a few statistically significant effects. The malpractice cause of the accident was seen as more avoidable than the automobile accident (Question 3). [117] There was a small but statistically significant difference on Question 4, suggesting that the jurors perceived the plaintiff as bearing more of the responsibility for the accident when it resulted from motor vehicle negligence. [118] Mirroring [*250] Question 4, the jurors saw both single and multiple defendants as more negligent when medical negligence caused the injury (Ques- tion 5). [119] Question 11 asked about the degree to which people assume some of the risk for an accident that happens to them during surgery; those jurors assigned to the medical negligence conditions were more inclined to disagree about patient responsi- bility than in the auto injury conditions. [120] These effects suggest that despite the fact that liability was stipulated in the same way in all conditions, jurors did tend to perceive the plaintiff as less responsible for the injury when it was ascribed to medical negli- gence. [121]

3. Correlations Among Perceptions, Demographics, and Awards. We also attempted to ascertain the degree to which the amounts of individual jurors' awards could be predicted from their perceptions and attitudes, as measured by the thirteen questions, and their demographic characteristics. There were positive correla- tions between the degree to which a juror perceived the plaintiff's suffering as severe [122] and the extent to which the juror believed that it might have a negative effect on the plainitff's life, [123] and between perceived severity and the amount of the award that the juror gave. Perceptions that the defendant had moral, as opposed to legal, responsibility also were directly related to the amount that jurors awarded. [124] It was not surprising that the more jurors saw the plaintiff's demand as reasonable [125] and the less they saw the defendant's offer as reasonable, [126] the greater their award was. The more that a juror disagreed that patients assume some [*251] degree of risk for surgery, the greater was the amount of the award. [127] Finally, the juror's gender, age, and household income were not related to the size of the award. Those jurors who were better educated, however, tended to give smaller awards. [128]

It is noteworthy that although jurors varied in the extent to which they endorsed the beliefs that "too many people file law- suits in the hope of making a fast buck" and that "medical doctors are sued too often," these litigation attitudes were not related to the size of awards.

4. Juror Explanations of Their Awards. The jurors also were asked to comment in their own words about their reasons for giving the award. The responses were quite varied, but they pro- vide important insights about jurors' reasoning processes.

Some jurors focused on responsibility. A juror in the single- physician condition wrote, "I think a 46 year old Dr. should have the expertise not to make careless mistakes on human life. That his job is to see that people are helped and treated with care" (awarded $ 220,000). Another juror in the same condition stated, "The doctor had major responsibility for the care and safety of his patient. Undue stress placed on the patient for an incident not even related to her original condition warrants such an amount" (awarded $ 127,000). A juror in the two-physician condition wrote, "The doctors allowing her to fall off the operating table is unpar-donable. She suffered 20 times the pain which her cyst removal should have caused" (awarded $ 30,000). Another, also in the con- dition with two physician defendants, commented, "We depend on doctors not to be careless. We are leaving our lives in their hands. Basically, I feel that doctors should not make these kinds of mis- takes" (awarded $ 100,000). Still another said, "It is my belief that in a job situation such as surgery or any medical area that each step should be double check sic to prevent unnecessary or previ- ous incorrect performance of that job" (awarded $ 100,000).

The above examples indicate that some jurors did focus on the role and responsibilities of physicians. However, jurors ex- pressed parallel attitudes about responsibility in the motor vehicle negligence conditions: "The man's total carelessness should be thoroughly punished" (awarded $ 200,000); "Accident was [*252] avoidable . . . . Terrible ordeal because of carelessness with his car" (awarded $ 165,732); " The driver should pay attention to the highway because you have to drive for yourself and other people too" (awarded $ 10,000).

In both the medical and vehicle negligence conditions, some jurors commented on what they perceived to be the defendant's acceptance of responsibility: "The doctors' attitudes about accept- ing responsibility was sic important" (awarded $ 50,000); "The fact that the hospital accepted responsibility was also important al- though I thought that the amount they were willing to pay for pain and suffering was not adequate" (awarded $ 80,000); "The willingness of the negligent corporate vehicle defendant to accept responsibility limited amount of pain and suffering' award" (awarded $ 100,000); "Important: Defendant motor vehicle negli- gence admitted his negligence--honesty" (awarded $ 30,000); "Time--it is now 5 years later and the hospital is stalling" (award- ed $ 75,000).

These examples indicate that despite the fact that the jurors' task was defined solely as assessing the amount of damages, their attitudes about defendant responsibility frequently appeared to affect their decisions. It is noteworthy, however, that in both the hospital and the parallel corporate responsibility conditions, there were many fewer comments about responsibility than in the condi- tions in which the defendants were individuals. We will return to this point later. [129]

The responses commenting on the plaintiff's pain and suffering showed wide variation. Some jurors made much of the fact that a 17-year-old girl had a very traumatic experience: " T ime lost early in life may never be regained" (awarded $ 50,000); "She trusted the doctors and now she will always be afraid of hospitals and doctors" (awarded $ 100,000); " eight months of life taken from her . . . . The Dr. was distracted from his job. One second is all it took to destroy her" (awarded $ 200,000). Several jurors mused about future events, contrary to judicial instructions and the evi- dence that was presented: " Alluding to potential problems with early arthritis or with child bearing" (awarded $ 150,000); " T his situation could trigger psychological problems later" (awarded $ 125,000); "I think events at that age will be carried into adult- [*253] hood" (awarded $ 220,000). Others, however, minimized the trauma or took the position that sometimes pain must just be borne: "She had pain and suffering. But these things don't last long and you can learn how to get around the way you are" (awarded $ 220,000); " She lost a year. However, it is quite possible to carry on in a cast--personal experience" (awarded $ 30,000); "Pain is a part of life and money will not remove the pain. Mistakes occur daily by all people no matter what their occupation. We are all human, this action mistake by doctors was not negligence, it was an oversight (mistake) . . . . Life goes on" (awarded $ 30,000); "We all go through hardships in life . . . . I do not feel anyone is deserving of massive amounts for an incident in her life that she has totally re- covered from except for memory" (awarded $ 30,000).

Concerns about getting something for nothing and the impacts of awards on society were also prominent in some jurors' respons- es: "The legal system has gotten out of hand in its pursuit of financial rewards due to damages through litigation that apparently does not apply in this case, but an award should be what is fair and right for both sides" (awarded $ 150,000); "I have a hard time giving enormous amounts of $ to victims even though I acknowl- edge her right to receive something" (awarded $ 50,000); "Acci- dents happen; no perm anent damage. I can't believe in lawsuits for excessive amounts" (awarded $ 0); "Personally, I think financial judgments in general are too high and accordingly went with the lowest figure mentioned" (awarded $ 30,000); "I do not think she should get rich because of this accident, and accidents do happen and both doctors admitted that it did happen" (awarded $ 50,000); "I tried to balance award . . . keeping in mind very large awards may encourage other lawsuits for the sake of potential large set- tlements" (awarded $ 75,000).

It is also clear that jurors uniformly commented on the diffi- culty of putting a price on pain and suffering and used different methods of calculating the awards. [130] Some roughly split the dif- ference between the defendant's and the plaintiff's suggested fig- ures. One juror doubled what the defendant said was fair, and another said it should be three times medical expenses. One juror said, " Eight months of pain and suffering missing out of her teen years. She should receive no more than what most people make in a year" (awarded $ 50,000). A number of jurors assessed pain and [*254] suffering on a per month basis, such as $ 4000 or $ 5000 and multi- plied by the eight months that the plaintiff was incapacitated. Other jurors indicated that they just came up with a figure that they thought was fair.

REV_00262912

Of the 147 jurors, only one mentioned that the ability of the defendants to pay was a consideration and that juror was in the two-defendant vehicle negligence condition: "Not knowing the ability of the defendants to pay an exorbitant amount and consid- ering an average salary to be $ 35,000 per year, I feel both men could pay $ 70,000 together."

These explanations in the jurors' own words show highly var- ied responses to the case. Some expressed punitiveness and a desire to blame, but these responses were offset by those of the majority of jurors, who attempted to come up with what they thought was a fair award. Further, it appears that punitiveness and blame was not disproportionately applied to cases of medical negli- gence; motor vehicle negligence evoked similar responses in jurors.

G. Summary of Findings

This experiment yielded no support for the deep pockets hypothesis or the psychological dynamics that are posited to be behind it. Whether medical or automobile negligence caused the accident made no difference in the amounts of awards. There were some small differences in juror perceptions consistent with the view that plaintiff responsibility may be perceived to be less in medical negligence accidents, although these differences were not reflected in awards. Jurors' explanations of their reasoning demon- strated widely varying approaches to whether and under what conditions awards for pain and suffering were appropriate. [131]

[*255]

III. Further Perspectives on the Deep Pockets Phenomenon

A. Corporate Responsibility

The claims about jurors' propensities toward deep pockets defendants have not been confined to medical malpractice cases. It is alleged that the phenomenon extends to many areas in which large corporations are defendants. [132] The small but important body of empirical literature that has recently developed on the topic of attitudes toward corporations provides additional insights about the results of the experiment reported in Part II and the other empirical literature bearing on the deep pockets hypothesis in medical negligence cases.

Consistent with the conceptual analysis presented in this Arti- cle, Valerie Hans has argued that the deep pockets hypothesis posits that if all other factors in the case were the same--that is, if corporations engaged in the same behavior and caused the same harm as individuals--jurors would assess larger awards against corporate defendants than individual defendants. [133] She has pro- posed three potential explanations as to why juries treat corporate defendants differently. [134] One, the primary claim of jury critics, is that juries make their decisions solely on the basis of the defendant's ability to pay. [135] The second is that juror attitudes about business might be negative or that businesses might be held to a higher standard of appropriate behavior than individuals. A third explanation involves structural differences between individuals and corporations. For example, because corporations are composed of many individuals, it may be that people perceive them as hav- ing greater capacity to foresee and control negative events associ- [*256] ated with their behavior. [136] Hans observes, however, that it may be more difficult to ascribe responsibility for negative outcomes of group activity because it is difficult to identify individual decisionmakers or the process of decisionmaking. Her research program has attempted to tease out these factors.

In a first study, Valerie Hans and David Ermann varied the defendant's identity in a personal injury lawsuit involving workers who were harmed by toxic waste but kept every other aspect of the case the same. [137] Half of the simulating jurors in the experi- ment learned that Mr. Jones had hired the workers, and the other half learned that the Jones Corporation had done so. The jurors tended to hold the corporate defendant more morally and legally responsible for the injuries, saw it as more reckless and blamewor- thy, and awarded significantly higher levels of compensation against it. [138] Further analyses, however, indicated that the amount of the award was more strongly related to perceptions of the corporation's recklessness, not its perceived financial re- sources. [139] In short, the larger awards in the corporation condi- tion appeared to be tied more to the fact that corporations were held to higher standards of behavior than to their perceived finan- cial resources.

REV_00262913

In a second study, Valerie Hans and William Lofquist inter- viewed 141 jurors who had recently decided actual cases involving corporate defendants. [140] Most of these jurors said that they treat- ed corporations the same as individuals. They ascribed this behav- ior to the fact that the lawyers had admonished them in voir dire and closing statements and that the judge had instructed them to do so. They further indicated that during deliberations, they re- minded one another of their legal responsibilities to treat the corporation like they would an individual. Some jurors did indicate that the fact that the defendant was a corporation made a differ- ence but suggested that a corporation should be held to higher standards of responsibility because of the number of persons available to solve problems and its greater potential to cause harm [*257] to many persons; ability to pay, however, was not a frequently stated consideration.

In a third study, 450 randomly selected Delaware residents were asked in a telephone survey to respond to scenarios that varied the defendant as either a corporation, a non-profit business, or a for-profit business. [141] Within each of these conditions, the survey respondents were told either that the defendant had assets less than $ 100,000, over $ 1 million, or were told nothing about assets. Participants judged for-profit business defendants as more negligent and reckless than individuals and assessed higher awards against them. Contrary to the deep pockets hypothesis, however, awards against defendants did not vary as a function of their fi- nancial assets. In independent experimental research, Robert MacCoun also found that whether the defendant was an individual or corporation affected how people judged cases but the defendant's wealth did not. [142]

B. Responsibility Components of Medical Negligence

The research on judgments of corporate behavior raises an attributional issue about medical negligence that was given only passing attention in Part I. Medical providers are in professional and fiduciary relationships with their patients; the patients place themselves in the hands of the professionals with trust that the professionals will not be negligent in performing those services. Like their apparent response to corporate defendants, jurors may hold doctors to a higher standard of care. This response could help explain Chin and Peterson's finding that jurors assessed high- er awards against both doctors and hospitals when they were de- fendants in malpractice than when they were defendants in other personal injury suits. [143] It is also consistent with the written com- ments of some of the jurors who participated in the present exper- iment [144] and with the other findings that the injury was seen as more avoidable and the defendants as more negligent in malprac- [*258] tice than in motor vehicle cases. [145] One reason why these effects may not have translated into differences in awards was the fact that in our experiment, both the medical and motor vehicle negli- gence cases stipulated defendant liability. [146] The corporate re- sponsibility research indicated that jurors may have a hard time assessing responsibility for corporate behavior. This finding might help account for Sloan and Hsieh's finding that jurors assessed lower awards against hospital defendants than against individual doctor defendants. [147] [*259]

These hypotheses should be viewed as complementary to the other selection, structural, and process dimensions that distinguish malpractice from motor vehicle cases. Also, they should be treated as descriptive, rather than prescriptive, hypotheses; we leave to others the question of whether it is appropriate for jurors to hold physicians to a higher standard.

C. Comparative Perspective on Pain and Suffering

REV_00262914

Although our research found no evidence to support the deep pockets hypothesis, a question may arise about the average award of $ 98,908. [148] Weiler and others have raised concerns about the magnitude of pain and suffering awards. [149] One can ask whether the awards to the teenage plaintiff were appropriate for an injury that was only a temporary interlude in her life.

As Harry Kalven and Hans Zeisel observed in their classic research on juries, judgments about the quality of jury decisions have to be made in comparison to the possible alternatives: for example, a professional decisionmaker such as a judge or arbitra- tor. [150] With respect to the issue of damages, some authors assert that professionals can do a better job than jurors because their legal training makes them less susceptible to legally irrelevant emotional factors and because their experience and knowledge with regard to other cases gives them a more realistic perspective on the monetary worth of particular cases. [151]

In contrast to this reasoning, Kevin Clermont and Theodore Eisenberg found that in a large sample of cases filed in federal courts, judges gave larger awards than juries. [152] In an experimen- tal study, Jeffrey Rice and I found no difference between the average awards for pain and suffering and disfigurement rendered [*260] by jurors and senior attorneys, including former trial court judg- es. [153] Furthermore, in direct contradiction of the "professionals are superior" claim, we found evidence that jurors are likely to exhibit less variability in their awards than single judges or arbi- trators. [154]

We obtained data similar to the Vidmar and Rice study to provide a comparative perspective on the juror awards in the present experiment. Fifty-six senior North Carolina attorneys, representing both plaintiffs and defense bars, were given the same case materials that the jurors had been provided in four of the six conditions in the experiment and asked to render an award. [155] Summed over the four conditions, the average award was $ 100,821. The comparable figure for jurors in the same four conditions was $ 98,594. The difference was not statistically significant. [156] Howev- er, the variability of the attorneys, as determined by the standard deviations of their awards, was more than twice as large as the variability that I estimate twelve-person juries would exhibit. [157] In summary, jurors and legal professionals responding to the same case facts, on average, rendered essentially the same awards, but it is likely that juries would produce more reliable estimates of dam- ages for pain and suffering.

D. Generalizability of the Experimental Research

Invariably, criticisms are raised about the generalizability of experimental research, particularly when it contradicts widely held views. Although we studied real jurors, the task was artificial; for example, the jurors did not deliberate.

The response to this criticism is that when different studies using different methodologies all point in the same direction, we [*261] gain confidence about the generalizability of the experimental re- sults. The present experiment seems generally consistent with the research on corporate responsibility. The data also are congruent with the findings from jury verdict statistics that contradict the deep pockets hypothesis. The explanations jurors gave in our experiments are similar in many respects to those the jurors who had decided real cases in the Hans and Lofquist study offered [158] and with interviews obtained from jurors who decided real malpractice and motor vehicle negligence cases in North Carolina. [159] North Carolina jurors who made awards against doctors indicated that they were worried about the doctor's ability to pay and the effect on the doctor and his practice but, following the judge's instruc- tions, attempted to set their concerns aside and decide the case on the merits. [160] Conversely, jurors who rendered a $ 205,000 award against a tow truck operator and his employer in a wrongful death trial arising out of motor vehicle negligence explained afterward that they worried about the financial impact on the defendants. They ultimately concluded that if the defendants did not have liability insurance, it was their own misfortune because the concern

REV_00262915

In real life, any theory will do as long as it gets the case to the jury, whose natural sympathies will usually produce a large judg- ment without much concern for the legal technicalities. [2]

[*218]

J urors have become accustomed to huge award requests, and they are more willing to reach into the deep pockets of mal- practice insurers to compensate the victims generously--more willing than when they encounter the victims of automobile acci- dents, for in these cases the insurance premiums at risk are paid directly by jurors themselves. [3]

Introduction

The role of the jury in medical negligence cases ranks among the most contentious issues in contemporary debate about the merits of the tort system. [4] As the above quotations demonstrate, a common complaint from all sides of the political spectrum is that jurors are biased against doctors and hospitals because they be- lieve that someone ought to pay when a serious medical injury oc- curs and that doctors and hospitals have the "deep pockets" to provide the compensation. In this Article, I first review these claims and critique the prior empirical research alleged to support them. I then describe a controlled experiment that tested the hy- pothesis that jurors are prone to award excessive amounts for pain and suffering when the defendants are doctors or hospitals. Nei- ther the prior research nor the experiment's results support the deep pockets hypothesis. The final Parts of the Article discuss these findings in the context of other research as well as the de- bate about medical negligence and the tort system.

I. The Claims and the Evidence: A Critique

A. The Claims

The three prefatory assertions about juries do not stand alone. Physicians, liability insurers, and commentators critical of the American tort system frequently raise the argument that juries are biased against doctors and hospitals. In a 1988 proposal advocating [*219] a fault-based administrative system for medical malpractice as an alternative to the tort system, the American Medical Association (AMA) declared,

In the medical liability context, a source of at least some of the problem sic for physicians and other health care providers with the existing system appears to many to be the jury . . . . Prob- lems with the jury include decisions that are not based on a thorough understanding of medical facts and awards that increase at an alarming rate and in a fashion that seems uniquely to dis- advantage physicians as compared with other individuals who are found to have acted negligently . . . .

What makes the damage awards in professional liability lawsuits particularly disconcerting is the fact that identical injuries will command much higher recoveries in malpractice cases than in other tort suits, such as automobile accidents. [5]

The North Carolina Hospital Association claimed, should be with fairly compensating the heirs to the estate, as the judge had instructed them to do. [161] In short, the findings of the present study have substantial plausibility.

REV_00262898

IV. Conclusion

A careful analysis of the research findings on which propo- nents of the deep pockets hypothesis in medical negligence cases have relied is methodologically flawed beyond redemption--the findings do not justify a conclusion that there is a deep pockets effect. Our experimental research, which controlled for alternative hypotheses, yields no support for the deep pockets effect and is corroborated by other research findings.

Unfortunately, we still do not have a clear understanding of precisely how jurors respond to medical negligence cases, particu- [*262] larly, how judgments of liability influence damage awards. We also do not have reliable data on what percentage of jury awards can be ascribed to non-economic damages, but it is clear that the widely reported claim that they average up to fifty percent or more of total awards [162] is without foundation.

It is intriguing to question why belief in the deep pockets effect and the excessiveness of non-economic damages are so wide- spread and why many authors and policymakers have failed to recognize the flimsy or contrary evidence documented in this Arti- cle. Let me offer some hypotheses that bear on the answer to these questions. First, the deep pockets hypothesis could be ex- plaining real phenomena that persons intimate with the legal sys- tem--e.g., judges, defense lawyers--have apprehended; the meth- odological shortcomings of prior studies have just failed to un- equivocally demonstrate their existence. This remains a viable explanation, except that the present experiment and other data de- scribed in this Article appear to contradict it. Second, although the deep pockets effect may not exist in malpractice cases, it may occur in other types of cases, such as products liability. There is only a small amount of evidence to support the deep pockets effect in any context, [163] but even if it does exist, generalizations may be improperly made to malpractice cases. A third explanation is that belief in the deep pockets effect is consistent with intu- itive--but incorrect--assumptions about how jurors behave. From its modern inception as a factfinder in seventeenth-century Eng- land to the present day, the jury has had its critics. Some legal professionals have questioned how a group of laypersons can make intelligent and unbiased judgments in tasks to which professionals devote years of education and their entire careers. [164] At the same time, doctors and their professional organizations have ques- tioned whether any group of persons other than physicians can make judgments about medical negligence because of the difficult and complex technical medical questions that they allege are in- volved in malpractice disputes. [165] For any legal or medical pro- [*263] fessional holding such views, there is no reason to closely examine statistics that "confirm" things that "everybody already knows anyway." A fourth explanation is that the methodological and other data limitations of the empirical studies that I have identi- fied in this Article are not obvious ones that laypersons can identi- fy. I include lawyers and doctors in the definition of laypersons; most have not been trained in analysis of the types of data sets or statistical techniques used in the verdict outcome studies that I have critiqued in this Article.

It is not so clear to me, however, why the social scientists who conducted the studies have ignored such major methodologi- cal shortcomings, since many of the problems are common to social science research, are well-known, and have been extensively discussed in the academic literature. [166] I can suggest three factors that may have contributed to the problem. The first can be la- belled, awkwardly, the "seduction of large data sets." Although some authors appear to have been unaware of the methodological problems of looking only at verdicts, others have acknowledged some of them, particularly the selection problem, but have subse- quently ignored or minimized them when drawing substantive con- clusions. [167] Verdict report data chronicle real jury decisions and involve hundreds or thousands of cases that on their face, promise to tell judges, policymakers, and social scientists about the role of juries in the legal system. They also entail substantial financial investment to code and analyze. In this context, it is perhaps not surprising that researchers would be inclined to rationalize away methodological problems and emphasize possible substantive con- clusions.

REV_00262916

Simultaneously, difficulties may also occur from the possibility that researchers were focused on prior assumptions and the regres- sion models under which the data were analyzed, rather than on the potential problems involved in the data sets themselves. Being trained in econometric and regression analysis, unfortunately, does not ensure careful attention to the limitations of the databases on [*264] which models are tested. Yet, as my critique of some of the stud- ies has shown, to ignore or underestimate the conceptual and methodological problems in these data sets is to build on a ques- tionable foundation.

Another source of the problem derives from the fact that a number, although not all, of the studies supporting the deep pock- ets effect were published without going through independent peer review. Rather, they were published as technical reports, policy pa- pers, or in law reviews. [168] The peer review process prevalent in science and social science journals requires other experts in the field to undertake independent and usually blind reviews of articles to assess methodological and conceptual shortcomings. Peer review is far from a perfect process, but it does serve to weed out many inadequate studies or at least to require the author to attend to methodological problems and unequivocally state any limita- tions. If it is not apparent from my critique in Part I, I submit that a number of the empirical studies would likely have failed peer review.

A final explanation has been explored by Stephen Daniels, Robert Hayden, Michael Saks, and Kenneth Chesebro. [169] They have separately documented the fact that powerful interest groups have exploited and misrepresented findings about jury malfeasance in order to further agendas of tort reform. [170] Because the civil jury plays a prominent role in the legal system, it has been used as a symbol of "the litigation crisis." [171] Non-representative data, misleading data, and horrific anecdotes of a jury system out of control have been presented at legislative hearings and portrayed [*265] in stories and advertisements in the mass media. This propaganda creates and reinforces beliefs about the deep pockets effect not only in the general public [172] but in the legal, medical, and legis- lative communities as well. Propagandists have no interest in meth- odological confounds when the statistics appear consistent with their goals.

There are, then, multiple and overlapping explanations for the widespread belief in the deep pockets hypothesis. In fact, the issue deserves more extensive treatment that I have given it here, but some mention of it is appropriate in the conclusion of this Article.

Finally, I want to enter the caveat that this Article does not attempt to address the much broader controversy about medical negligence and the tort system. [173] However, because the deep pockets hypothesis and jury behavior in general play such a central role in claims about the failures of the tort system, [174] the Article raises serious problems for critics. More research may modify or contradict these findings, but in the meantime, we may conclude that on present evidence, the jury's reputation for reaching into the perceived deep pockets of health care providers and giving excessive awards for pain and suffering is not warranted.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 U.S. General Accounting Office, Medical Malpractice: Case Study in North Carolina 20 (1986) hereinafter N.C. Case Study (alteration in original).

n2 T.R.B., The Tort Explosion, The New Republic, Nov. 18, 1985, at 4. The article further stated that "high settlements lead to skyrocketing insurance rates. And soon so much cost is being absorbed that the activity in question, be it practicing gynecology or manufacturing a vaccine or being on the city council, is no longer economically practica- ble." Id.

n3 Paul C. Weiler, Medical Malpractice on Trial 48 (1991).

n4 See, e.g., Marc Galanter, The Civil Jury as Regulator of the Litigation Process, 1990 U.

REV_00262917

Chi. Legal F. 201 hereinafter Galanter, The Civil Jury ; Marc Galanter, Read- ing the Landscape of Disputes: What We Know and Don't Know (And Think We Know) About Our Allegedly Contentious and Litigious Society, 31 UCLA L. Rev. 4 (1983); Mi- chael J. Saks, Do We Really Know Anything About the Behavior of the Tort Litigation System--And Why Not?, 140 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1147 (1992); Neil Vidmar, The Unfair Criti- cism of Medical Malpractice Juries, 76 Judicature 118 (1992).

n5 American Medical Association Specialty Society Medical Liability Project, A Proposed Alternative to the Civil Justice System for Resolving Medical Liability Disputes: A Fault-Based, Administrative System 7-8, 9-10 (1988) hereinafter, AMA Proposed Alternative Report . This report was rewritten to appear as a law review article. See Kirk Johnson et al., A Fault-Based Administrative Alternative for Resolving Medical Malpractice Claims, 42 Vand. L. Rev. 1365 (1989).

n6 N.C. Case Study, supra note 1, at 21-22.

n7 Physician Payment Review Commission, Annual Report to Con- gress--(1991) (citing Patricia Danzon, Medical Malpractice 53-56 (1985)). Danzon reported data from Cook County, Illinois compiled in Rand Corporation reports authored by Mark Peterson, George Priest, and Michael G. Shanley. See Mark A. Peterson & George L. Priest, The Rand Corporation, The Civil Jury: Trends in Trials and Verdicts, Cook County, Illinois, 1960-1979 (1982); Michael G. Shanley & Mark A. Peterson, The Rand Corporation, Comparative Justice: Civil Jury Verdicts in San Francisco and Cook County, 1959-1980, (1983). I will address and critique these studies in Section I(B).

n8 Liability: Injustice for All (Manhattan Institute for Policy Research 1992).

n9 Peter Huber, Liability: The Legal Revolution and Its Consequences 12 (1989).

n10 Id. at 185.

n11 See, e.g., Renslow v. Mennonite Hosp., 367 N.E.2d 1250, 1265 (Ill. 1977) (Ryon, J., dissenting) (arguing that "sympathetic juries and an increasingly efficient plaintiff's bar have managed to inflate the size of verdicts" and commenting on the "deep pockets" phenomenon); Albert W. Alschuler, Mediation with a Mugger: The Shortage of Adjudica- tive Services and the Need for a Two-Tier Trial System in Civil Cases, 99 Harv. L. Rev. 1808 (1986); Dorsey D. Ellis, Punitive Damages, Due Process, and the Jury, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 975 (1989); Kirk B. Johnson, Beyond Tort Reform, 257 JAMA 827 (1987); Richard E. Leahy, Rational Health Policy and the Legal Standard of Care: A Call for Judicial Deference to Medical Malpractice Guidelines, 77 Cal. L. Rev. 1483 (1989); Richard J. Mahoney & Stephen E. Littlejohn, Innovation on Trial: Punitive Damages Versus New Products, 246 Science 1395 (1989). Clark Havighurst asserts,

Although it is customary in our adversary system to regard a jury trial as a "black box" the outcomes of which (on nonlegal questions) are granted a pow- erful presumption of legitimacy, realism compels recognition that juries are often poorly positioned to choose reliably between the well argued, but often highly confusing, theories of the two sides' experts. As a result, they often fall back on such irrelevancies as the witnesses' demeanor and style of presentation or sympathy for the plaintiffs' plight or the defendants' reputation.

Clark C. Havighurst, Health Care Law and Policy 778 (1988).

n12 Weiler, supra note 3, at 54.

REV_00262918

n13 AMA Proposed Alternative Report, supra note 5, at 9 (citing Danzon, supra note 7). See also Johnson et al., supra note 5, at 1369 ("Because large portions of the awards depend upon subjective and emotional considerations, some injured patients recover nothing, some receive less than fair compensation, and others recover amounts far in excess of their losses, both economic and noneconomic.") (footnotes omitted). For a discussion of Danzon's research, see infra subsection I(C)(3).

n14 Physician Payment Review Commission, Annual Report to Congress 201 (1992) (citation omitted). In Medical Economics, James D. Griffith, an attorney specializ- ing in the defense of malpractice cases, argued that "there's no limit on what jurors can award for pain and suffering so too often they act like Santa Claus, handing out millions of dollars in cases involving comparably minor injuries." James D. Griffith, What Will It Take to Resolve the Malpractice Crisis, Medical Econ., Sept. 27, 1982, at 195. In 1991, the centerpiece of President Bush's draft proposal on health care was a proposal to limit the amounts that malpractice victims can collect for pain and suffering. Philip J. Hilts, Bush Enters Malpractice Debate with Plan to Limit Court Awards, N.Y. Times, May 31, 1991, at A1.

n15 Patricia Danzon, Report on Awards for Noneconomic Loss, in Florida Medical Malpractice Policy Guidebook 132 (Henry G. Manne ed., 1985).

n16 See infra subsection I(C)(3).

n17 Weiler, supra note 3, at 55 (citing Danzon, supra note 15, at 128-42); see id. at 55 n.36. Weiler's other sources were a study by Viscusi that attempted to eliminate pain and suffering awards in products liability cases, id. at 55 (applying W. Kip Viscusi, Pain and Suffering in Product Liability Cases: Systematic Compensation or Capricious Awards?, 8 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 203, 205-19 (1988)), and an unsupported allusion to the " w idespread sentiment that pain and suffering awards were out of control that inspired many states in the eighties to establish caps solely on this type of damages," id.

Weiler evidently determined that awards for non-economic damages were too high because state legislatures acted on the belief that they were too high. This is a dangerous predicate for empirical assumptions because legislative tort reform efforts are frequently based on erroneous assertions. See, e.g., Neil Vidmar et al., An Empirical Examina- tion of a Legislated Procedural Reform: Court-Based Management of Medi- cal Malpractice Litigation 84-88 (1992) (discussing North Carolina reforms); Joseph Sanders & Craig Joyce, "Off to the Races": The 1980s Tort Crisis and the Law Reform Process, 27 Hous. L. Rev. 207, 276-80 (1990) (discussing Texas reforms).

n18 AMA Proposed Alternative Report, supra note 5, at 9.

n19 Id. (citing Danzon, supra note 15). This claim was not included in the Johnson article which was based on the AMA report. See Johnson et al., supra note 5.

n20 Danzon, supra note 15, at 133.

n21 Patricia M. Danzon, The "Crisis" in Medical Malpractice: A Comparison of Trends in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, and Australia, 18 Law, Med. & Health Care 48, 49 (1990).

n22 See infra subsection I(C)(3).

n23 Weiler, supra note 3, at 48.

n24 Huber supra note 9, at 186; see also Frederick D. Watkins, Social Inflation: Our Next Trial, 77 Insurance Mag. 42, 44-45 (1976) (arguing that juries routinely perceive corporate defendants as being better able to "foot the bill" for injuries than plaintiffs).

n25 13 Barb. 9 (N.Y. App. Div. 1852). This case and related history are reviewed in Stephan Landsman, The Civil Jury in America: Scenes from an Unappreciated History, 44 Hastings L.J. 579 (1993).

n26 Haring, 13 Barb. at 15-16.

n27 See Audrey Chin & Mark A. Peterson, The Rand Corporation, Deep Pockets, Empty Pockets: Who Wins in Cook County Jury Trials (1985). The Chin and Peterson study builds upon two earlier reports. See Peterson & Priest, supra note 7; Mark A. Peterson, The Rand Corporation, Compensation of Injuries: Civil Jury Verdicts in Cook County (1984).

n28 Verdict reporters are compilations of jury verdicts and other data bearing on jury outcomes in specific jurisdictions. They are primarily subscription services for lawyers, judges, insurance companies, businesses, and local government bodies. See, e.g., Chin & Peterson, supra note 27, at 63-91; Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Jury Verdicts and the "Crisis" in Civil Justice, 11 Just. Sys. J. 321, 328 (1986); Stephen Daniels, Civil Ju- ries, Jury Verdict Reporters, and the Going Rate, Paper Presented at the Annual Meet- ing of the Law & Society Association (May 29-June 1, 1986) (on file with author).

n29 Chin & Peterson, supra note 27, at vii.

n30 Id.

n31 James K. Hammitt et al., Tort Standards and Jury Decisions, 14 J. Legal Stud. 751 (1985).

n32 Id. at 754-55.

n33 Id. at 756.

n34 Daniels & Martin, supra note 28, at 321; see also Stephen Daniels, Tracing the Shadow of the Law: Jury Verdicts in Medical Malpractice Cases, 14 Just. Sys. J. 4 (1990).

n35 Id. at 339.

n36 Id. at 343.

n37 Id. at 326-27.

n38 Id. at 325.

n39 Randall R. Bovbjerg et al., Juries and Justice: Are Malpractice and Other Person- al Injuries Created Equal? 54 Law & Contemp. Probs., Winter 1991, at 5. The five other jurisdictions were Kansas City, Missouri, Kansas City, Kansas, San Francisco and several other counties in California, and Cook County, Illinois. Id. app. 1.

n40 See id. at 31.

n41 Id. at 35-36.

n42 Id. The selection hypothesis will be considered in more detail in subsection I(C)(1).

n43 Mark A. Peterson, The Rand Corporation, Civil Juries in the 1980s: Trends in Jury Trials and Verdicts in California and Cook County, Illinois (1987).

REV_00262920

n44 Id. at 17.

n45 Id. at 22. Between 1960 and 1964, the median award was $ 35,000. Between 1980 and 1984 it was $ 121,000. Differences in the mean or average amounts, which are inflat- ed by extreme amounts, were even more dramatic: from $ 52,000 in 1960-1964 to $ 1,179,000 in 1980-1984. The findings for San Francisco were similar. See A. Russell Localio, Variations on $ 962,258: The Misuse of Data on Medical Malpractice, 13 Law, Med. & Health Care 126 (1985) (discussing issues relating to the interpretation of means and medians).

n46 See, e.g., Saks, supra note 4, at 1212-13, 1226 (reporting that 10% of medical malpractice cases proceed to trial).

n47 For an extensive discussion of this matter, see Theodore Eisenberg, Testing the Selection Effect: A New Theoretical Framework with Empirical Tests, 19 J. Legal Stud. 337 (1990); Samuel R. Gross & Kent D. Syverud, Getting to No: A Study of Settlement Negotiations and the Selection of Cases for Trial, 90 Mich. L. Rev. 319 (1991); Saks, supra note 4.

n48 See Neil Vidmar, Making Inferences About Jury Behavior From Jury Verdict Statistics: Cautions About the Lorelei's Lied (1993) (unpublished manuscript, on file with author); see also Saks, supra note 4, at 1244. Saks points out that complications go be- yond cases that are filed. Different types of cases may have different rates of injury incidence, numbers of claims arising out of incidents, and pre-litigation settlement rates. This fact further complicates attempts to compare jury verdicts across different types of cases. Id.

n49 See, e.g., Hammitt et al., supra note 31. Interestingly, although the other Rand researchers consistently recognized the selection problem at various places in their re- ports, they continued to make conclusions that the changes in win ratios and awards over time constituted or implied changes in jury behavior. For instance, Peterson stated that "there may have been differences over time or across jurisdictions," Peterson, supra note 43, at xii, but stated that the data showed that "plaintiffs are increasingly advan- taged in jury trials," id. at ix, and "Cook County jury verdicts were increasingly favorable to plaintiffs . . . ," id. at vii.

n50 We can push the example still further in any number of ways. Suppose that between Years 1 and 5, more Type B cases were filed and went to trial so that at Year 5, juries were deciding ten Type A cases and twenty Type B cases. In this instance, the average award would be $ 70,000. Alternatively, consider an example in which only half of the Type A cases are diverted to alternative dispute resolution. We also can vary the example using liability, rather than damages, e.g., defendants start settling cases in which they have a low chance of prevailing at trial. Equally important, we also can concoct statistical scenarios in which juries actually do become more generous toward plaintiffs (as to liability or damages, or both) between Year 1 and Year 5, but simultaneous changes in the mix of cases going to trial yield results that reflect no change in plaintiff win ratios or damage awards. In the most extreme example, suppose that at Year 5, juries become really perverse and award ten Type A cases $ 100,000 each and ten Type B cases only $ 10,000 each; despite this stunning change in behavior, the average award would be the same as Year 1: $ 100,000.

n51 Peterson, supra note 43, at 11. These are the data that show plaintiff win ratios increasing from one in four to two in four, id. at 17, and the median award increasing from $ 35,000 to $ 121,000, id. at 22.

n52 Id. at 7-9. I want to emphasize again that although Peterson clearly recognized these and other methodological confounds throughout the report, he nevertheless was tempted to ignore them and draw the unqualified conclusion in the executive summary that "plaintiffs are increasingly advantaged in jury trials:" Id. at ix. I want to acknowl- edge that the hypothesis could be correct; the point, however, is that Peterson's conclu- sion is not scientifically valid given the data he explored.

n53 Id. at 11. In the 1960-1964 period, there were 56 cases. In the 1980-1984 period, there were 162. Id.

n54 Id. at 13.

n55 See Galanter, The Civil Jury, supra note 4, at 210; David B. Rottman, Tort Liti- gation in the State Courts: Evidence from the Trial Court Information Network, St. Ct. J., Fall 1990, at 4; Saks, supra note 4, at 1228; see also Danzon, supra note 7, at 56 (" L awsuits are filed in only 20 percent of automobile claims, and only 1 percent are litigated to verdict, whereas suits are filed in 58 percent of malpractice cases and 7 per- cent are litigated to verdict."). Indeed, Gross and Syverud report data showing that the percentage of auto injury cases going to trial was only 0.9% in 1988-1989, whereas other personal injury suits proceeded to trial at a rate of 2.4%. See Gross & Syverud, supra note 47, at 360 n.95.

n56 I reached this conclusion following discussions with plaintiffs' attorneys in North Carolina. Weiler also draws this conclusion. See Weiler, supra note 3, at 48; cf. Gross & Syverud, supra note 47, at 349-52, 360-62.

n57 Bovbjerg et al., supra note 39, at 35-36.

n58 See, e.g., Chin & Peterson, supra note 27, at 50 (reporting win rates of 53% for auto and 33% for malpractice); Peterson, supra note 43, at 17 (finding that in 1980-1984, the win rate in auto accidents was 70% in San Francisco and 64% in Cook County; in contrast, the win rates in malpractice cases tried in those cities were 53% and 49%, respectively); Kevin M. Clermont & Theodore Eisenberg, Trial by Jury or Judge: Transcending Empiricism, 77 Cornell L. Rev. 1124, 1175 (1992) (finding that the win rate was 60% for motor vehicle plaintiffs and 30% for medical malpractice); Henry S. Farber & Michelle J. White, Medical Malpractice: An Empirical Examination of the Liti- gation Process, 22 Rand J. Econ. 199, 203 (1991) (reporting that in a sample of 326 cases against a single large hospital between 1977 and 1989, only 13, or 5.2%, were tried to verdict and all were decided in the defendant's favor).

n59 See, e.g., Chin & Peterson, supra note 27, at 49-56.

n60 In North Carolina, the average malpractice case filed between 1984 and 1987 had 3.2 defendants. Less than one-third of the cases initially had only a single defendant; the number of defendants ranged as high as 21. (unpublished data, on file with the author). One reason for multiple defendants is the fact that increasingly, health care is highly spe- cialized; a team of health care providers share responsibility for the patient's welfare. Furthermore, a "manager" organization may be responsible for delivery of these services. For further discussion, see The Institute For Civil Justice, The Rand Corpora- tion, Health Care Delivery and Tort 18-23 (Elizabeth Rolph ed., 1992) herein- after Health Care Delivery .

n61 Chin & Peterson, supra note 27, at 56; Weiler, supra note 3, at 46; Bovbjerg et al., supra note 39, at 33 n.108.

n62 See, e.g., Health Care Delivery, supra note 60, at 17-28; Chin & Peterson, supra note 27, at 49-51.

n63 Bovbjerg et al., supra note 39, at 33 n.108.

n64 See, e.g., Dale W. Broeder, The University of Chicago Jury Project, 38 Neb. L. Rev. 744, 756-60 (1959); Edith Greene, On Juries and Damage Awards: The Process of Decisionmaking, 52 Law & Contemp. Probs., Autumn 1989, at 225, 229; Harry Kalven, Jr., The Jury, the Law, and the Personal Injury Damage Award, 19 Ohio St. L.J. 158, 167-68

REV_00262922

(1958).

n65 There are some exceptions to zero percent patient responsibility: cases in which the defendants argue that the patient was told of risks of a procedure and gave informed consent; cases in which the patient did not follow physician instructions during or after treatment; and cases in which the illness leading to the treatment contributed to the ef- fects of the negligent injury.

n66 See Gross & Syverud, supra note 47, at 356-66. In auto injury cases, 85% of plaintiffs had an offer of settlement prior to trial, but only 40% of malpractice plaintiffs had similar offers. Id. at 346. My interviews with attorneys suggest that this result is also likely to be found in North Carolina, but, unlike the malpractice cases, I have no system- atic data on auto negligence cases.

n67 This conclusion was derived from interviews with both plaintiff and defense mal- practice attorneys in North Carolina as part of a larger study of medical malpractice litigation. See Vidmar, supra note 4, at 124; Vidmar et al., supra note 17. My conclu- sions from the interview data were supported by a survey of 25 cases filed in North Carolina that went to trial between July 1987 and December 1989. In 16 cases, the plain- tiff called expert testimony on damages and the defense called no evidence; in five cases, both plaintiff and defendant had expert evidence on damages; in four cases, neither side called experts on the issue of damages. This difference is statistically significant. A Chi- square test yields a value of 10.68, which is significant at the .01 level of confidence.

n68 Weiler, supra note 3, at 48.

n69 Id. For a general discussion of day-in-the-life evidence, see, for example, J. Ric Gass, Defending Against Day-in-the-Life Videos, 34 For Def., July 1992, at 8.

n70 See Weiler, supra note 3, at 19-26; Robert C. Clark, Why Does Health Care Regulation Fail?, 41 Md. L. Rev. 1, 5-8 (1981); Eleanor D. Kinney & Marilyn M. Wild- er, Medical Standard Setting in the Current Malpractice Environment: Problems and Pos- sibilities, 22 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 421, 440-42 (1989).

n71 See Danzon, supra note 15.

n72 AMA Proposed Alternative Report, supra note 5, at 9.

n73 Weiler, supra note 3, at 55 n.36.

n74 Danzon, supra note 21, at 49.

n75 Danzon supra note 15, at 132. Danzon arrives at this estimate of the number of 1984 cases by projecting from 1983 claims in Florida and the 1980 National Association of Insurance Commissioners report, cf. National Association of Insurance Commis- sioners, Malpractice Claims (M. Patricia Sowka ed., 1980). In using this latter study, Danzon implicitly assumed that the trial rate in Florida was the same as nationwide averages and, further her study is contaminated by cases that might have been settled at trial, decided in a bench trial, or by some other disposition. Danzon's description of how the figure of 322 potential jury cases was arrived at is as follows:

A total of 2,539 malpractice claims were closed in Florida 1983. Since unpublished St. Paul data show no increase in frequency in 1984, the same number is used for 1984 claims. On average, 87.3 percent of malpractice claims are dropped or settled out of court; the remaining 12.7 percent of claims go to trial and are resolved either by final judgment by jury or judge, by dismissal, or by other disposition. These numbers imply a total of 322 court dispositions in Florida in 1984.

REV_00262923

Danzon supra note 15, at 132 (citations omitted). In an article published in 1986, Danzon observed that other data showed "significant differences in claim frequency for 1983, by type of insurer." Patricia M. Danzon, The Frequency and Severity of Medical Malpractice Claims: New Evidence, 49 Law & Contemp. Probs., Spring 1986, at 57, 61 n.15. Danzon continued to cite results from the Florida study in her 1990 article accompanied by a footnote indicating some of the sources of possible error in generalizing from her data, but she did not address the confounds that are discussed in this Article. See Danzon, supra note 21, at 49 & n.9.

n76 Danzon, supra note 15, at 132.

n77 Id.

n78 Id. at 133.

n79 Id.

n80 Id.

n81 Id. at 134.

n82 Id.

n83 Id. at 136. These "not implausible" conclusions were repealed in a subsequent ar- ticle by Danzon with some qualifications in a footnote. See Danzon, supra note 21, at 49 & n.9.

n84 Nevertheless, at least a lengthy footnote should call attention to another matter. I am concerned about the databases used to estimate non-economic damages and the meaning that should be ascribed to the estimates. The concern applies not only to the Danzon study in question but to other researchers' attempts to calculate non-economic damages, particularly pain and suffering, from verdict reporters and closed-claim files. For a more extensive discussion of the problems with verdict reporter data, see Vidmar, supra note 48; see also Peterson, supra note 27, at 8-9 (researchers estimated disabili- ties from plaintiffs' injuries); Bovbjerg et al., supra note 39; Frank A. Sloan & Chee R. Hsieh, Variability in Medical Malpractice Payments: Is the Compensation Fair?, 24 Law & Soc'y Rev. 997 (1990); Viscusi supra note 17. To calculate non-economic damages, the known special damages are subtracted from the total verdict (less punitive damages, if any); the residual is the figure used for non-economic damages. Usually researchers label the residual simply "pain and suffering."

There are several major reasons to be concerned about the use of these figures. First, the databases are often missing extensive information. In Medical Malpractice, Danzon used closed-claims insurance files. She stated that these data "only report the insurance company's estimate of economic loss" and concluded that "the data on earnings were particularly poor." Danzon, supra note 7, at 40. Peterson, using verdict reporters, stated that " o ccasionally the Reporter included a plaintiff's income and the length of time that his or her income was lost because of an injury," and presumably for similar reasons, Peterson did not report information about future medical expenses or future lost income. Peterson, supra note 27, at 9. Viscusi similarly conceded problems with making estimates of pain and suffering from closed-claim files.

REV_00262924

The loss figures . . . are reported losses, not actual losses. The amount of the loss is recorded in the data set by the insurance company. To the extent that this variable reflects the insurance company's loss estimate, the financial loss will be understated . . . . B ias may also vary with the loss level. Very large loss claims with substantial long-term medical costs may have a very wide possi- ble variance, so that the propensity for underestimation by the insurance com- pany and overestimation by the claimant will be especially great.

Viscusi, supra note 17, at 206; see also Sloan & Hsieh, supra, at 1012-13, 1019. The truth of the matter is that in these data sets, economic data are frequently missing to an ex- tensive degree. In fact, I have reviewed convenience samples of closed-claim files from three different professional liability insurers in North Carolina. Sometimes, the financial estimates are presented only in the most general terms; much of the time, they are missing altogether.

The second problem is vaguely identified in the Peterson study, see Peterson, supra note 27, and by Viscusi, see Viscusi, supra note 17, at 206, but needs to be made explicit. Both economic and non-economic damages have many potential components, and there is often no bright line dividing the two. Economic damages may consist not only of past and present medical expenses and lost wages but also future medical expenses, fu- ture lost income, future housekeeping expenses (including modifications to homes and automobiles), and when dependent children are involved, future costs for education. Any observer of trials or settlement negotiations will quickly agree that the assumption that special damages can be "easily ascertained" and "usually . . . documented by routine business records," Peterson, supra note 27, at 9, is facile, since bitter disputes over past lost income occur on a regular basis. Furthermore, disagreement over future income and medical costs, reduced to present value, may exceed past economic losses by at least several points on a Richter scale. Indeed, even experts arrive at wildly varying figures. For instance, one case in the Duke Medical Malpractice Project study involved a severe birth injury in which the biggest point of contention regarded future medical and associat- ed costs. See Vidmar, supra note 4, at 122. The plaintiff's expert produced a plausible case for an award exceeding $ 6 million. The defendant had obtained estimates from three separate experts; these ranged from $ 2.1 million to $ 4.3 million. See id. What, then, was the correct figure, and what does this example say about the ease with which economic damages are calculated? How reliable are the accounts of economic damages in closed- claim files and in verdict reporters, and how are they computed?

When we turn to non-economic damages, the problem becomes even more difficult. There should be no debate that past and future pain and suffering is a non-economic loss. Possibly, we could reach agreement that loss of consortium, nurturance for depen- dents, and loss of enjoyment of life's amenities are also non-economic losses. Does severe disfigurement constitute an economic or a non-economic loss? It might affect a person's self-esteem and happiness, but it might also affect earning capacity. Is it reasonable to label the difference between economic and total damages "pain and suffering" when it may contain some or all of the above components?

Still further problems can be identified from discrepancies in figures contained in published reports about unreliability of damage awards. See, e.g., Randall R. Bovbjerg et al., Valuing Life and Limb in Tort: Scheduling "Pain and Suffering," 83 Nw. U. L. Rev. 908 (1989). I compared figures for median "total awards," id. at 922, and "non-economic" awards, id. at 937, and found: (a) that in one instance the "non-economic award" exceed- ed the total award (median total award in cases of permanent major injury was $ 1,422,000, whereas the median non-economic award in such cases was $ 1,642,000, or 115% of the total); and (b) that the reported median non-economic award for various injury levels ranged between 29% and 115%, but the median non-economic award for the total data set was reported as only 26%. Both of these findings are not logically possible. The discrepancies may accrue in part

Often awards have little relationship to the seriousness of the injury. There is no way to predict how a jury will rule on a par- ticular set of facts. Often awards bear no relationship to econom- ic losses . . . . Today, juries often make awards regardless of the "fault" of anyone--out of sympathy for an injured person. More and more the public attitude is that insurance will compensate the injured party and the defendant will not sustain any loss . . . . Too often, juries appear to award on the basis of emotion as opposed to facts and/or realistic evaluation of case circumstances. [6]

In its annual report to Congress in 1991, the Physician Payment Review Commission stated, Malpractice injuries seem to be compensated more than are com- parable injuries arising from nonmedical settings. For example, researchers estimated that median awards for a leg amputation were $ 199, 999 in an automobile accident case, $ 330,000 in a pri- vate property owner case, $ 687,000 in a product liability case, [*220] $ 754,000 in a medical malpractice case against a physician, and $ 761,000 in a Workmen's compensation case. The disparities may be due to jurors' knowledge that physicians are heavily insured or that the claimant's legal fees must be taken out of the judg- ment. This does not indicate which is the appropriate level of compensation, only that payments are inconsistent across con- texts. [7]

In a twenty-minute videotape produced in 1992 by The Manhattan Institute for Policy Research, C. Everett Koop, former Surgeon General of the United States, relates a hypothetical situation in which a child is born with cerebral palsy. Although the doctor has no control over the condition, the family seeks to blame him. Dr. Koop goes on to say that "if they attempt to sue their physician they're very likely to find a sympathetic jury that will award some- thing to that family not necessarily because they think the doctor is guilty of negligence or malpractice but because their sympathy for the family dictates it." [8]

Claims about the deep pockets effect also extend to products liability, government defendants, and other types of cases in which critics assert that jury sympathies lie with injured parties and against defendants who have the ability to pay large sums. In Liability: The Legal Revolution and Its Consequences, popular writer and critic of the tort liability system, Peter Huber, wrote of legal outcomes in the 1970s and 1980s that "judges and juries were, for the most part, committed to running a generous sort of charity. If the new tort system cannot find a careless defendant after an accident, it will often settle for a merely wealthy one." [9] Huber also offered an explanation: "The only human reaction to the individual tragedy, viewed close up, is unbounded generosity, which any large corporation or insurer can surely afford to under- [*221] write." [10] Judicial opinions, law reviews, and scientific journals ex- press similar opinions. [11]

In the context of medical malpractice, four overlapping empir- ical assertions have been made: (1) juries give larger awards in malpractice cases than in other types of cases, particularly automo- bile negligence cases, even when injuries are objectively simi- lar--the deep pockets hypothesis; (2) the rates of plaintiff victories in malpractice cases have increased in recent years; (3) the sizes of awards have increased; and (4) the awards for non-economic dam- ages such as pain and suffering in particular are out of control.

With respect to this last assertion, Weiler writes, " T he most troublesome feature of large tort verdicts is the amount of damag- es awarded for pain and suffering, not for direct medical costs." [12] The AMA Proposed Alternative Report, drawing on a study by Patricia Danzon, asserted that "for larger claims . . . non-economic injury is often the largest from the fact that the cases from which the non- economic data were taken constituted a subsample of the total sample from which the total awards were derived, but the fact of the discrepancies itself raises serious questions about the reliability of the estimates set forth in this study.

Finally, the above insights about the difficulty and unreliability of estimating both economic and non-economic damages lend an alternative explanation to the conclusion of Bovbjerg's study that the wide variation in jury awards, even within categories of injury severity, is due primarily to the unreliability of juries. Id. at 923-26. The conclusion is predicated on the assumptions that: (a) economic losses for different plaintiffs do not vary greatly; (b) the parties, or outside observers, will agree as to what those losses are; and (c) stable estimates were placed into evidence before the juries. To the extent that these assumptions are not warranted, and the above analysis suggests that they likely are not, ascribing the variation in damages to jury caprice or incompetence is not valid. I do not suggest that there is no unreliability in jury awards. The data from the experiment de- scribed infra Part II and previous research by Neil Vidmar and Jeffrey Rice indicate some unreliability does exist. See Neil Vidmar & Jeffrey J. Rice, Assessments of Non- economic Damage Awards in Medical Negligence: A Comparison of Jurors with Legal Professionals, 78 Iowa L. Rev. 883 (1993); see also Greene, supra note 64 (finding that the decisionmaking process of jurors depends on the complexity of the case). My point, however, is that substantial variation also can be ascribed to prior variation in the stan- dards by which earlier researchers have judged verdicts and that these researchers have not given adequate recognition to the problem. .

In summary, all of the published empirical studies of pain and suffering awards should be viewed with great suspicion as to their reliability, validity, and meaning.

n85 See supra text accompanying note 3.

n86 See supra text accompanying notes 8-10.

n87 Bovbjerg et al., supra note 39, at 35-36. I want to be fair: Bovbjorg's group of researchers, in contrast to the other authors, stated the matter only as a hypothesis. Id.

n88 Subsequent to the publication of the above articles speculating on jury motives, a 1993 issue of The National Law Journal reported the results of a survey of 783 former jurors with the following headline: "Many Jurors Consider Deep Pockets and Ignore Presumption of Innocence." Although reporting that " m ore than a third of all civil ju- rors thought that members of their jury took into account the defendant's ability to pay damages," the headline distorted the finding that " f ifty-three percent said they didn't consider a defendant's finances" and that some of the jury experts who commented on the survey results offered alternative explanations for the findings. Many Jurors Consider Deep Pockets and Ignore Presumption of Innocence, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 22, 1993, at S12. Moreover, the survey suffers from methodological weaknesses; the answers were retro- spective and the question, as reported in the article itself, asked the respondents to spec- ulate about the minds of other jurors, rather than asking them whether they themselves took a defendant's finances into account when reaching their verdict.

n89 E.g., Chin & Peterson, supra note 27, at vii.

n90 Danzon, supra note 15, at 132-33.

n91 Danzon, supra note 7, at 38.

n92 Vidmar, supra note 4, at 118, 119.

n93 E.g., Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 58, at 1162 (finding 30% plaintiff win rates for product liability and medical malpractice trials, 60% for others); Gross & Syverud, supra note

REV_00262926

47, at 334 (finding 29.2% plaintiff win rate in medical malpractice trials); see also Bovbjerg et al., supra note 39, at 22 (finding 30% plaintiff win rate in malpractice trials). Also, although their data set included settlements as well as jury ver- dicts, Sloan and Hsieh concluded that " c ontrary to the notion that payment is higher when the defendant has deep pockets . . . cases involving hospitals as named defendants resulted in lower rather than higher payments" compared to physician-only malpractice cases. Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 84, at 1024.

n94 See supra text accompanying note 58; see also Peterson & Priest, supra note 20, at 19 (reporting that the average plaintiff win rate for medical malpractice between 1960 and 1979 was 33% and that the plaintiff win rate for auto accidents was 53%).

n95 See supra subsection I(C)(1).

n96 Danzon draws a similar conclusion. "The data on the issue of liability are . . . limited, but clearly refute the extreme charge that juries compensate without regard to fault in cases of severe injury." Danzon, supra note 7, at 50.

n97 Mark I. Taragin et al., The Influence of Standard of Care and Severity of Injury on the Resolution of Medical Malpractice Claims, 117 Annals Internal Med. 780 (1992). Taragin also found that verdicts on liability were positively correlated with judg- ments of negligence made by reviewing physicians acting in a neutral capacity. Id at 781.

n98 See Chin & Peterson, supra note 27, at 54-56.

n99 Unless, of course, jurors are aware of liability insurance coverage and assume the limits are higher in malpractice cases than in auto injury or slip-and-fall cases, or if, as Weiler implies, jurors distinguish between awards they perceive may affect their own in- surance rates and those that will not while calculating damages. Weiler, supra note 3, at 48.

n100 Danzon, supra note 7, at 50 ("Damage awards are strongly influenced by the plaintiff's economic loss and by the law defining and sometimes limiting compensable damages.").

n101 Chin & Peterson, supra note 27; Peterson, supra note 27.

n102 E.g., Bovbjerg et al., supra note 84; Taragin et al., supra note 97.

n103 Severity of injury accounts for about 50% of the variability in these studies, leaving the possibility that some proportion of the remaining variability is due to the deep pockets effect, but this possibility has yet to be demonstrated, as the present cri- tique shows. Additionally, keep in mind my severe critique of these studies. See supra Section I(C).

n104 See supra Part I.

n105 See infra Section III(A).

n106 Weiler, supra note 3, at 54.

n107 Hammitt et al., supra note 31, at 756.

n108 Huber, supra note 9, at 120.

n109 These figures were derived from comparable injuries listed in the Personal Injury Valuation Handbook: Case Evaluation Manual III L-Z (1993), and would be within the range of what a plaintiff's attorney might demand in such a case.

REV_00262927

n110 The thirteen items were as follows:

1. How severe do you think Katherine Link's pain and suffering was in the months following the accident?;

2. To what extent do you believe that the accident and the medical compli- cations that followed will have a negative, or bad, effect on the rest of Katherine's life?;

3. To what extent do you believe that the accident was avoidable?;

4. To what extent do you believe that the plaintiff, Katherine Link, bears some responsibility for the accident?;

5. To what extent do you believe that the defendant was negligent in Katherine's accident?;

6. To what extent do you believe that the defendant should be held morally responsible for the accident?;

7. To what extent do you believe that the defendant should be held legally responsible for Katherine's accident?;

8. To what extent do you believe the lawyer for the plaintiff was reasonable or unreasonable in suggesting that Katherine should receive $ 220,000 for the accident?;

9. To what extent do you believe that the defense lawyer was reasonable or unreasonable in suggesting that Katherine should receive $ 65, 268 for the accident?;

10. Some people say that when you drive a car you should assume some of the risk for any accident that happens. To what extent do you agree or disagree with this view?;

11. Some people say that if you go to a hospital for surgery you have to as- sume some of the risk for any medical accident that happens. To what extent do you agree or disagree with this view?;

12. Some people say that today too many people file lawsuits in hope of making a fast buck. Do you feel that too many people file lawsuits for that purpose?;

13. Some people say that today medical doctors and hospitals are sued too often. To what extent do you agree that they are sued too often?

n111 See, e.g., Quinn McNemar, Psychological Statistics 20-25 (1962).

n112 Id. at 252-373.

n113 The F value for the cause factor was 0.29, df=1,138, and probability was not statistically significant. The F value for number/type of defendants was 2.70, df=2,138, and probability was not significant. The F value for cause by defendant interaction was 3.06 with df=2,138; the probability was less than .05, a statistically significant result.

n114 These analyses compared the individual conditions against one another to deter- mine which, if any, are statistically significant. None of the individual conditions was significant except for the two-defendant medical negligence condition, which differed from all other conditions.

REV_00262928

n115 See McNemar, supra note 111.

n116 For a list of these questions, see supra note 110.

n117 The mean for medical negligence was 9.2 on the 10-point scale and for vehicle negligence it was 8.0. F value was 7.31, df=1,141, p< .01.

n118 The mean for medical negligence was 1.2 and for vehicle negligence it was 1.5. F=4.75, df=1,142, p< .05.

n119 The means for medical and vehicle negligence were 2.4 and 3.6, respectively. F=5.56, df=1,143, p< .05.

n120 The means for medical and vehicle negligence were 2.4 and 3.7, respectively. F=7.36, df=1,142, p< .01.

n121 The analyses of variance also revealed interactions among three of the questions: Question 2, the degree to which the injury had a bad effect on the plaintiff; Question 9, whether the defendant's offer was reasonable; and Question 10, the extent to which a driver assumes risk in operating a motor vehicle. However, the data did not yield inter- pretable patterns of data, and the effects were small. They are ignored in the remainder of this Article.

n122 Question 1, r=.29, p< .001.

n123 Question 2, r=.49, p< .001.

n124 Question 6, r=.21, p< .01.

n125 Question 8, r=.75, p< .001.

n126 Question 9, r=.42, p< .001.

n127 Question 11, r=.22, p< .01.

n128 r= -.20, p< .01.

n129 See infra Section III(A).

n130 For a similar observation, see Greene, supra note 64, at 225.

n131 One interesting finding was that jurors who made strong statements about the ir- responsibility of the defendant(s) and those who expressed sympathies for the plaintiff did not necessarily give the highest awards. This lack of correlation between juror reac- tions and size of awards leads to the hypothesis that even if the juror were inclined to punish the defendant or give the plaintiff a windfall, the actual amount judged appropri- ate to accomplish the goal differed. Thus, one juror might deem a $ 40,000 award big punishment of the defendant, whereas another juror who does not wish to punish might consider $ 100,000 fair compensation for the pain and suffering. Our data do not allow further exploration of this hypothesis.

n132 Chin & Peterson, supra note 27, at 3; Huber, supra note 9. For further dis- cussion, see Mahoney & Littlejohn, supra note 11, at 1397; Valerie P. Hans & William S. Lofquist, Jurors' Judgments of Business Liability in Tort Cases: Implications for the Lit- igation Explosion Debate, 26 Law & Soc'y Rev. 85, 86 (1992).

REV_00262929

n133 Valerie Hans, Factors Affecting Lay Judgments of Corporate Wrongdoing, Paper Presented at Third European Conference of Law and Psychology, Oxford, England, Sept. 19, 1992, at 3 (on file with author).

n134 Id. at 4.

n135 Id. at 5. This, of course, constitutes the primary claim against medical negligence juries. See supra Section I(A). Hans also correctly observes that the phenomenon, if it exists, could as likely be labelled the "empty pockets" phenomenon if jurors undercompensate when defendants are individuals. Hans, supra note 133, at 5. This possi- bility raises the issue of what standards are to be used to determine if an award is "ap- propriate."

n136 Conversely, it may be that it is easier to empathize with the plight of individual defendants. Id. at 6.

n137 Valerie P. Hans & M. David Ermann, Responses to Corporate Versus Individual Wrongdoing, 13 Law & Hum. Behav. 151, 155-56 (1989).

n138 Id.

n139 Id.

n140 Hans & Lofquist, supra note 132, at 90.

n141 Hans, supra note 133, at 6.

n142 Robert MacCoun, Deep Pockets or Corporate Identity: Understanding the Effects of Defendant Identity on Civil Jury Verdicts, Paper Presented at the Annual Meeting of the Law and Society Association (June 28, 1991) (on file with author).

n143 Chin & Peterson, supra note 27, at 54.

n144 See supra subsection II(F)(4).

n145 See supra text accompanying note 65.

n146 Research and theory in other contexts indicates that people in positions of au- thority or who possess special expertise are held more accountable and responsible for their actions. See V. Lee Hamilton & Joseph Sanders, Everyday Justice (1992); Stephen M. Rosoff, Physicians as Criminal Defendants: Specialty, Sanctions, and Status Liability, 13 Law & Hum. Behav. 231, 234-35 (1989) (finding that physicians in high- status areas of medical practice are held more accountable for criminal actions than phy- sicians in lower-status areas of practice).

As the present Article was being written, the author learned of an unpublished experiment by Bourgeois and Horowitz that bears directly on the responsibility hypothe- sis. Martin J. Bourgeois & Irwin Horowitz, Summary of Damage Award Study (study summary on file with the author and reported with permission of Professor Horowitz). In the simulation, jurors were instructed to award damages in a wrongful death suit in which defendant liability had previously been established and pain and suffering was not at issue because the plaintiff had died instantly. Half of the jurors were told that the cause of death was a surgical mishap, and half were told the plaintiff's death was due to an automobile accident. In each of these two conditions, the defendant was either a doctor (who committed a surgical error or who drove the automobile that caused the death) or a hospital that either was liable for the surgical error or that owned the vehi- cle the physician was driving. The average awards in the four conditions were as follows: doctor/malpractice = $ 1,387,600; doctor/automobile = $ 463,812; hospital/malpractice = $ 1,640,062; hospital/automobile = $ 1,309,267. The results may lend partial support for the deep pockets hypothesis in that the hospital defendant paid almost three times more than the physician defendant in the automobile negligence condition, although an alternative interpretation is that the jurors discounted the award for the physician automobile negli- gence defendant rather than increased it for the hospital. See Hans & Lofquist, supra note 132, at 102-04 (using similar reasoning). For our purposes, however, the more in- teresting finding is the comparison of jurors' assessments of responsibility in the doc- tor/malpractice and in the doctor/auto negligence conditions. Although the award was greater when the doctor caused the death through malpractice, rather than through negli- gent driving, the jurors also ascribed significantly greater responsibility to the doctor in the former condition than in the latter. This result is consistent with the responsibility findings in our own experiment, with our analyses of differences in contributory negli- gence between malpractice and auto negligence cases, see supra Section II(F), and with Hans's analysis, see Hans, supra note 133.

REV_00262930

n147 Sloan & Hsieh, supra note 84, at 1024. Obviously, in light of the methodological problems in verdict and closed-claim data already discussed, we must consider other possibilities as well, e.g., different types of evidence, different theories of liability, and differ- ing abilities of plaintiffs' and defense attorneys. See supra text accompanying notes 68-69.

n148 See supra Table 1.

n149 Weiler, supra note 3, at 54-61; AMA Proposed Alternative Report, supra note 5, at 9; Bovbjerg et al., supra note 84, at 911-13; Griffith, supra note 14, at 195.

n150 Harry Kalven & Hans Zeisel, The American Jury 9 (1966); Harry Kalven, Jr., The Dignity of the Civil Jury, 50 Va. L. Rev. 1055, 1063 (1964); see also Valerie Hans & Neil Vidmar, Judging the Jury 114-15 (1984).

n151 For a review of this literature, see Bovbjerg et al., supra note 84; Vidmar & Rice, supra note 84, at 884-89.

n152 Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 57, at 1126. The authors took note that much of the difference may be due to the fact that judges and juries get different types of cas- es. Id. Samuel Gross argues that almost all of the differences in Clermont and Eisenberg's data can be ascribed to case selection. Samuel R. Gross, Settling For a Judge: A Comment on Clermont and Eisenberg, 77 Cornell L. Rev. 1178 (1992).

n153 Vidmar & Rice, supra note 84, at 892-93.

n154 Id. at 897. The awards of legal professionals had a standard deviation of $ 16,730 in contrast to an estimated standard deviation of $ 10,970 for twelve-person juries.

n155 The four conditions were as follows: malpractice case with individual defendant; malpractice case with hospital defendant; auto negligence case with individual defendant; auto negligence with corporate defendant. A more detailed account of the attorney data will be reported in a subsequent article.

n156 A t test yielded a value of 0.25, with 149 degrees of freedom; this difference is not statistically significant.

n157 The standard deviation for the experienced attorneys was $ 46,452, and that for twelve-person juries was $ 22,893. These data will be reported in more detail in a subsequent report.

n158 Hans & Lofquist, supra note 132.

n159 See Vidmar, supra note 4; see also Neil Vidmar & Jeffrey Rice, Jury-Determined Settlements and Summary Jury Trials: Observations About Alternative Dispute Resolution in an Adversary Culture, 19 Fla. St. U. L. Rev. 89 (1991). Reports of these interviews are on file with the author.

n160 See Vidmar, supra note 4, at 120.

n161 For a synopsis of this case, see Vidmar & Rice, supra note 159, at 100 n.51.

n162 See supra notes 15-21.

n163 See Hans & Lofquist, supra note 132, at 106-07; Hans, supra note 133, at 5, 11.

n164 See generally Hans & Vidmar, supra note 150, at 113-16; Johnson et al., supra note 5, at 1371 ("Even under the best of circumstances, juries can never be as effective as specialized triers of fact at deciding malpractice cases . . . ."); Landsman, supra note 25.

n165 See AMA Proposed Alternative Report, supra note 5, at 7-8; Johnson et al., supra note 5, at 1370-71.

n166 See, e.g., Earl R. Babbie, The Practice of Social Research (3d ed. 1983); Donald T. Campbell & Julian C. Stanley, Experimental and Quasi-Experimen- tal Designs for Research (1963); Thomas D. Cook & Donald T. Campbell, Quasi-Experimentation: Design & Analysis Issues for Field Settings (1979); Hans Zeisel, Say It With Figures (6th ed. 1985).

n167 See Vidmar, supra note 48; Section (I)(C).

n168 For example the Danzon study, see Danzon, supra note 15, was part of a policy report. The Bovbjerg study, see Bovbjerg et al., supra note 39, was published in a law review with student editors, and such editors infrequently possess sophistication or experi- ence in data analysis. The Rand Studies, see, e.g., Peterson, supra note 27; Chin & Peterson, supra note 27; Peterson & Priest, supra note 7, were published by the Rand Corporation itself. Although it is my understanding that the Rand reports do un- dergo in-house peer review, the process is not the same as would occur in a social sci- ence or science journal.

n169 See Kenneth Chesebro, Galileo's Retort: Peter Huber's Junk Scholarship, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1637 (1993); Daniels, supra note 28; Robert M. Hayden, Neocontract Polemics and Unconscionable Scholarship, 24 Law & Soc'y Rev. 863 (1990); Saks, supra note 4.

n170 See id.; Hayden, supra note 169; Saks, supra note 4, at 1156-66.

n171 Marc Galanter, Jury Shadows: Reflections on the Civil Jury and the "Litigation Explosion," in The 1986 Chief Justice Earl Warren Conference on Advocacy: The American Civil Jury 15 (The Roscoe Pound-American Trial Lawyers Foundation ed., 1987); Galanter, The Civil Jury, supra note 4.

n172 See, e.g., Hans, supra note 133; Edith Greene et al., Jurors' Attitudes About Civil Litigation and the Size of Damage Awards, 40 Am. U. L. Rev. 805 (1991).

n173. See, e.g., WEILER, supra note 3; HEALTH CARE DELIVERY, supra note 60.

n174. See, e.g., AMA PROPOSED ALTERNATIVE REPORT, supra note 5; Kenneth S. Abraham, Medical Liablity Reform: A Conceptual Framework, 260 JAMA 68, 70 (1988) ("The chief characteristic of the American jury system that impinges on the medical liability proble is the use of lay jurors."); Arnold S. Relman, Changing the Malpractice Liability System, 322 NEW ENG. J. MED. 626, 626 (1990) (arguing that measures "to fundamentally flawed assumptions on which the system rests--namely, that trial by jury is and accompanying text; see also Stephen Daniels, The Question of Jury Competence and the Politics of Civil Justice Reform; Symbols, Rhetoric, and Agenda-Building, 52 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS., Autumn 1989, at 269; Saks, supra note 4, at 1274-77.

Source: All Sources > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: vidmar and ("non-economic damages" /25 percentage) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Monday, October 29, 2001 - 8:59 PM EST

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

component of the award." [13] The 1992 Annual Report to Congress of the Physician Payment Review Commission states, [*222]

Much of the unpredictability and inconsistency of malpractice awards is due to non-economic damages (i.e., pain and suffering), which constitute about half of total payments . . . . Such damages are highly subjective. Reducing this unpredictability and removing the open-ended nature of these damages would probably improve decisionmaking during the course of a lawsuit. [14]

The evidentiary base for the AMA's and Weiler's conclusion that the problem of awards for pain and suffering is particularly acute is rather scanty. The assertion is apparently derived from a study by Danzon. [15] Danzon's study combined databases from sev- eral sources and attempted to estimate the components of awards that can be ascribed to pain and suffering. [16] It is important to note, however, that Weiler's claim, citing Danzon, that "damages for pain and suffering, broadly defined, now make up nearly 50 percent of total tort damages paid for medical cases, with the largest awards taking the lion's share of this money," cannot be found in the Danzon study. [17] Similarly, the AMA Proposed Al- ternative Report's claim that Danzon's study found that "the pain [*223] and suffering portion of awards in excess of $ 100,000 accounts for 80 percent of the total verdict in such cases" [18] also cannot be found in that source. [19] Danzon did conclude that of those plain- tiffs who won a verdict in large damage award cases, 51% received a pain and suffering award in excess of $ 100,000. [20] Even these figures, however, must be interpreted in relation to the total amount of the awards. In a subsequent interpretation of her study's findings, Danzon stated that " p ayments in excess of $ 100,000 for pain and suffering on malpractice cases increased from 1.8 percent to 12.8 percent of total payments to plaintiffs on all tort cases." [21] There are some very serious problems of inter- pretation and communication in the Danzon report, as I will dem- onstrate below, [22] but it is clear that neither the 50% nor the 80% estimates for pain and suffering were made by Danzon. In the way I was taught mathematics 12.8% cannot easily be rounded to "nearly 50%," let alone to "80%."

The deep pockets hypothesis rests on three interrelated psy- chological assumptions about medical negligence costs. Unreason- able awards are purported to result from: (1) jurors' tendency in medical negligence cases to focus on plaintiff needs rather than liability; (2) jurors' belief in health provider defendants' capacity to pay; and (3) jurors' failure to perceive a connection between an award and its potential effect on their own lives or on society. Weiler claims that in contrast to jurors in medical negligence cases, jurors in automobile accident cases consider the impact of large awards on their own lives because "the insurance premiums at risk are paid directly by the jurors themselves." [23] Huber expounds a parallel thesis: "The layperson votes in favor of expansive liability out of compassion when sitting in the jury box but votes over- whelmingly in favor of limiting liability when the legal rules are put to public referendum." [24] [*224]

It is worth observing that assertions that sympathy for plain- tiffs drives jurors' decisions date back at least 140 years. Indeed, Judge Barculo's opinion in Haring v. New-York and Erie Railroad Co. [25] has a very contemporary ring:

We can not shut our eyes to the fact that in certain controversies between the weak and the strong--between a humble individual and a gigantic corporation, the sympathies of the human mind naturally, honestly and generously, run to the assistance and support of the feeble, and apparently oppressed; and that com- passion will sometimes exercise over the deliberations of a jury, an influence which, however honorable to them as philanthro- pists, is wholly inconsistent with the principles of law and the ends of justice. [26]

REV_00262900

B. The Evidence

Although the deep pockets hypothesis is an integral part of American legal folklore, examination of the text and footnotes of the writings of contemporary jury critics indicates that recent claims about the deep pockets hypothesis emanate from several empirical studies. Audrey Chin and Mark Peterson, two research- ers with the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice, com- pared the outcomes of over 1000 civil trials that took place in Cook County, Illinois between 1959 and 1979. [27] The data were derived from verdict reporters, [28] comprehensive accounts of all trials within the county that provide basic data about the case, [*225] such as the nature of the claim, the seriousness of the alleged in- jury, and estimates of the amount of economic losses, as well as the outcome of the trial. After controlling for severity of injury, Chin and Peterson concluded that in cases in which the plaintiff was not severely injured, corporate and health care provider de- fendants paid approximately thirty percent more than other defen- dants paid for similar injuries. When plaintiffs were severely in- jured, however, corporate and health care provider defendants had to pay up to more than four times the amount assessed against individual defendants in similar cases. [29] Additionally, Chin and Peterson concluded that even when the seriousness of injury was similar, doctors and hospitals who were defendants in ordinary lawsuits, such as slip-and-fall cases, paid substantially less than when they were defendants in malpractice cases. [30]

Working from some of the same data, James Hammitt, Ste- phen Carroll, and Daniel Relles, three other Rand researchers, specifically examined doctors and hospitals as defendants. [31] They concluded that "medical malpractice awards against doctors are almost 2.5 times as great as awards against other individuals in average case types, and awards against hospitals are 85 percent larger." [32] These authors offered several possible explanations for this finding. First, jurors may balance the plaintiff's financial needs against the financial harm to the defendant. Second, jurors may act on their beliefs that doctors and hospitals are heavily insured or wealthy. Third, jurors may feel that these types of harm carry a special "insult" because of the trust a patient places in the doctor and that larger awards are therefore appropriate. [33]

Two other studies have found the same pattern of data as that found in the Hammitt, Carroll, and Relles study. In one, Ste- phen Daniels and Joanne Martin examined over 23,000 jury ver- dicts from forty-three counties in ten states. [34] They concluded that awards in medical malpractice and product liability cases were [*226] "generally much higher than those in other legal areas." [35] Howev- er, Daniels and Martin cautioned that these cases may have in- volved more serious injuries than other types of personal injury cases. [36] They also questioned the representativeness of the data Chin and Peterson used [37] and concluded that there is "little sys- tematic evidence concerning actual jury verdicts." [38] In the other study, Randall Bovbjerg, Frank Sloan, Avi Dor, and Chee Ruey Hsieh analyzed verdicts from the Rand database together with verdicts from five other jurisdictions to determine whether mal- practice cases yield different verdicts than cases involving automo- bile injuries, product liability, or government defendants. [39] Using multiple regression analysis to statistically control for a number of variables (such as injury severity), they concluded that the expect- ed value of malpractice verdicts was larger than for other types of cases, particularly automobile injuries. In a subsample of cases in which the injuries resulted in death, the amount of the awards for malpractice cases was, on average, more than twice the amount for injuries resulting from automobile accidents. [40] The researchers suggested, however, that much of the difference may be due to the fact that the malpractice and auto injury cases that actually make it to trial have different kinds of plaintiffs; malpractice attorneys specifically select for trial cases in which plaintiffs appeal to jurors' sympathies. [41] According to this explanation, it may not be deep pockets, but rather case selection, that causes the observed differ- ence. [42]

REV_00262901

In another Rand study, Mark Peterson compared jury verdicts in Cook County, Illinois and San Francisco County, California from 1960 to 1984. [43] In both jurisdictions, the probability of [*227] plaintiff verdicts in medical negligence trials increased from about one chance in four to one chance in two. [44] The amounts awarded to prevailing plaintiffs also increased dramatically; in Cook County, for example, the median award more than tripled. [45]

C. Problems with the Evidence

Taken at face value, the above studies appear to support the notion of a deep pockets effect. Examined more closely, however, none can support the conclusions that have been drawn from them, and for a very compelling reason: they are methodologically flawed to the point that very plausible alternative explanations of the data cannot be discarded. Moreover, on the issue of liability, the data appear contrary to the deep pockets hypothesis; so do some of the data regarding amounts awarded as damages. Finally, there are no data at all to support the contentions that jurors are psychologically motivated by uncontrolled sympathy for plaintiffs and a belief that the rich ought to pay.

1. The Case Selection Problem. The databases for the em- pirical studies on which proponents of the deep pockets hypothesis rely are limited to cases that went to trial. They provide no infor- mation about the lawsuits that were settled, dropped, or disposed of through judicial rulings. Sources tell us that depending on the type of case, only 2 to 12% of lawsuits culminate in a jury trial. [46] Moreover, the numbers and types of cases that proceed to trial vary over time and between jurisdictions. [47] The thrust of this in- sight is that different mixes of cases in each category may reach [*228] trial; juries may be deciding very different proportions and types of cases, rather than deciding similar cases differently. [48]

Since this elementary fact seems to have escaped some experi- enced researchers and was conveniently forgotten by others, [49] an elementary example is not out of order. Assume that in a particu- lar jurisdiction, the only cases that go before juries are ones in which defendants are found liable and that the only task of the jury is to decide damages. Assume further that at Year 1, two types of cases are selected for jury trial: Type A cases are worth $ 10,000, and Type B cases are worth $ 100,000. During Year 1, ten Type A cases and ten Type B cases are tried. The juries are reli- able, so that on average, Type A plaintiffs each receive $ 10,000, and Type B plaintiffs each receive $ 100,000. If we calculate the average jury award for the year, it is: ((10 trials x $ 10,000) + (10 trials x $ 100,000)) divided by 20 trials = $ 55,000. Assume now that between Year 1 and Year 5, the state introduces an alternative dispute resolution program for cases worth $ 10,000 or less and that it is so successful that all Type A cases are settled in Year 5. Only Type B cases are left, of which there are still 10 per year, to go to trial. Each type B case still receives $ 100,000. The average award at Year 5 is: (10 trials x $ 100,000) divided by 10 = $ 100,000. Thus, the average jury award has increased $ 45,000 (from $ 55,000 to $ 100,000), or 82%, between Year 1 and Year 5. Can we conclude that juries have become more magnanimous over the five-year period? Of course not; the change in the types of cases going to trial caused the change in the average award. Similarly, we would not be justi- fied in concluding that juries had become less generous if, for some reason, Type B cases settled and only Type A cases went to [*229] trial. [50] Without knowing about the base of cases from which trials were selected and about any changes in that base, we can con- clude nothing about changes in jury behavior from verdict reports.

The jury verdict data in the Rand studies do not provide direct information on changes in case selection, but they do strongly suggest that such factors may have been operating. For example, in San Francisco, the annual number of malpractice jury trials decreased by almost half between the 1960-1964 period and the 1980-1984 period, from 95 trials to 55. [51] Unless one assumes that the number of malpractice suits also declined by half--a most unlikely hypothesis--we must infer that cases were being settled differently. In fact, the Rand report notes that in California a vigorous alternative dispute resolution program was instituted in the courts in the 1980s. [52] It is highly probable, therefore, that in 1984, juries were deciding a different mix of cases than in 1960.

The case selection problem also plagues attempts to compare jury verdicts across jurisdictions because of possible differences in "legal cultures." For example, although Peterson's data show that the number of malpractice cases going to trial in San Francisco between 1960 and 1984 was almost halved, the number of cases in Cook County, Illinois almost tripled. [53] Peterson recognized this [*230] difference and speculated that there were more Chicago lawyers willing to try small stakes cases and that Chicago courts might make less aggressive use of alternative dispute resolution tech- niques. [54] Despite similarities in plaintiff win ratios and award trends in these two counties, absent information on how cases were selected for trial, one cannot conclude that juries were be- having the same way--or differently.

Finally, the case selection problem also confounds facile at- tempts to compare verdicts across types of cases. There is, for example, evidence that smaller percentages of automobile negli- gence lawsuits go to trial than malpractice lawsuits. [55] There is also evidence that at the front end of the litigation process, mal- practice attorneys select their cases differently than do auto negli- gence attorneys. [56] Bovbjerg speculated that because of the costs and risks of malpractice litigation, attorneys select cases whose plaintiffs are likely to appeal to the sympathies of the jury. [57] We also know from other recent empirical studies that although the plaintiff win rate in malpractice jury trials hovers around 30%, the plaintiff win rate for automobile negligence trials is around 60 to 70%. [58] As I have just illustrated in my example using Type A [*231] and Type B cases, the fact that these differences exist proves noth- ing absent other data about the cases, but it still raises serious questions about whether juries are deciding cases that are inher- ently different because of case-selection processes.

To sum up, because jury verdict data do not provide informa- tion about the proportions of cases selected for trial or the various dimensions along which cases may differ as a result of different selection processes, it is not possible to determine from such data what changes may be occurring in jury behavior. It is not neces- sary to specify the exact nature or extent of these confounding variables to challenge the validity of previous authors' conclusions about the meaning of trends over time, across jurisdictions, or between different types of cases if they raise the possibility of plausible alternative explanations.

2. Multiple Dimensions: The Apples and Oranges Prob- lem. Even if the differential case selection problem did not exist, it would still be difficult to compare verdicts in malpractice cases with verdicts in auto injury cases and to ascribe any differences to the deep pockets effect. The two types of cases differ on many dimensions other than the fact that defendants in the former may be seen as having a greater ability to pay large damage awards. Consider a partial listing of the differences.

Auto injury cases typically involve a single defendant, the driver of the automobile, but sometimes they involve multiple plaintiffs, e.g., several persons riding in the car that was hit. [59] In contrast, malpractice cases typically involve a single plaintiff, the injured patient, but frequently involve multiple defendants, e.g., two or more doctors, and perhaps the hospital, who acted as a team in the patient's medical treatment. [60] Many, perhaps most, auto injuries arise between persons with no prior relationship, [*232] whereas malpractice suits arise out of a professional and financial relationship between patient and physician. [61] Furthermore, auto injuries typically involve a single theory of liability; malpractice cases often involve multiple theories of causation and liability. [62] In auto negligence cases, the jurors may perceive the plaintiff as having contributed to the accident, whereas most often the medical accident plaintiff was a passive, if not completely anesthetized, party during the events that led to the injury. [63]

This last difference alone could have a major impact on ver- dicts because most jurisdictions today apply comparative negligence standards. It has long been thought that even in jurisdictions with contributory negligence laws, juries frequently adjust their awards with their own rough comparative negligence standards. [64] Thus, in auto negligence cases, the jurors can almost always conceive of ways that the plaintiff shares some responsibility for the accident, e.g., she should have practiced better defensive driving. In contrast, jurors would not typically perceive the medical negligence plaintiff as having contributed to the injurious event, since she trusted the health care providers' professional judgments and skills. [65] In short, discounting under comparative negligence standards, whether by law or by de facto jury equity, might explain why automobile injury awards are lower than medical negligence awards.

REV_00262903

The trial itself also may be different. Research by Samuel Gross and Kent Syverud indicates that a high proportion of mal- practice cases that went to trial appeared to be contested solely on the issue of liability, whereas this pattern was much less likely to occur in motor vehicle suits. [66] In North Carolina, malpractice de- [*233] fense lawyers have expressed a reluctance to dispute the amount of damages or present expert evidence on damages on the theory that the mere mention of damages would cause the jury to assume liability. [67] This assumption may be less operative in auto injury cases, particularly if they are taken to the jury in a dispute that is primarily about damages. In addition, it is often asserted that malpractice cases are litigated by attorneys who specialize in mal- practice, whereas generalist lawyers may be more likely to litigate auto injury cases; [68] specialists have become very sophisticated in presenting day-in-the-life evidence and introducing expert evidence on economic and non-economic damages, such as pain and suffer- ing. [69]

Finally, the decision rule that juries are required to apply differs in the two types of cases. In automobile cases, as in almost all other areas of torts, the negligence rules are based on the rea- sonable man standard. In contrast, in medical malpractice cases, the rule is whether the health care provider's treatment violated professionally accepted standards of practice in his area of spe- cialization, in that community, and during that period of time. [70]

To the extent that these other dimensions distinguish malprac- tice cases from other types of cases and have an impact on jurors, they provide additional alternative explanations for the data seem- ing to support the deep pockets hypothesis. [*234]

3. Tenuous Findings About Non-Economic Damag- es. Danzon's study on non-economic damages, [71] which the AMA [72] and Weiler [73] cited to support their claims that jurors are overly generous with pain and suffering awards, and which Danzon cited in a subsequent article claiming that the percentage of pain and suffering awards is growing, [74] has methodological problems that most social scientists would consider grave. Danzon's primary data were based on Florida malpractice claims closed in 1984. Of a projected total of 322 cases that went to jury trial, some of the cases may have been tried to the judge or dismissed by the court. [75] From this contaminated sample, Danzon estimated that 84 cases resulted in a plaintiff verdict but conceded that "the pre- cise number could be as low as 45 or as high at sic 132." [76] She conceded that these data were subject to "great sampling variabili- ty" [77] and were discrepant from other, more comprehensive data showing substantially lower plaintiff win rates in Florida. She then went on to estimate from this unreliable sample that of plaintiffs [*235] who won a verdict, 51% received a pain and suffering award in excess of $ 100,000. However, she conceded that the figure could easily be "as low as 23 or as high as 67." [78] In fact, the 51% fig- ure was not based on Florida data, but rather on estimates from the Cook County, Illinois data in the Rand studies. [79] Danzon merged these data sets, concluding that " t he Cook County expe- rience is therefore reasonably representative for Florida as a whole." [80] She also included decade-old data from a nationwide survey of closed claims that included settled cases as well as jury verdicts, [81] which Danzon conceded was not representative of mal- practice cases. After merging these data sets, she concluded that the "data imply that 2.7 percent of all claims or 5.6 percent of paid claims receive compensation for pain and suffering in excess of $ 100,000." [82] The report continued with more acknowledge- ments of bias in the data and concessions of "best estimate s ," but regardless of these major deficiencies, Danzon asserted that her conclusions were "not implausible." [83] Although much more could be said about the flaws in the Danzon study, this incomplete recitation is sufficient to show that its method and conclusions are, to say the least, seriously compromised. [84] [*236]

4. Missing Evidence on Juror Motives. As noted above, the claims about the deep pockets hypothesis typically involve asser- tions about the attitudes, perceptions, and motivations that lead jurors to malfeasance. Weiler, for example, speculated that jurors worry about the size of awards when they perceive awards as affecting their car insurance rates but ignore such factors in mal- practice cases. [85] Koop and Huber argued that jurors ignore the question of negligence out of sympathy for injured plaintiffs and levy awards based on their beliefs that deep pocket defendants can and should pay. [86] The Bovbjerg group speculated that in compari- son to other tort cases, malpractice attorneys select cases that in- volve plaintiffs who are most likely to appeal to the sympathies of [*237] the jurors, presumably leading to larger awards for medical negli- gence. [87]

Verdict reporters and closed-claim files do not contain inter- views with jurors or psychological profiles of jurors in the cases that were decided. Similarly, neither the Rand studies nor the Bovbjerg study presented any evidence of jurors' mindset. The authors who have made these claims report no studies of post-trial juror interviews. [88] In short, the evidence to support the claims about juror attitudes and beliefs is pure, unsubstantiated conjec- ture.

D. Contrary Evidence

Several findings provide evidence that appears to be contrary to the deep pockets hypothesis. In the various Rand studies, plain- tiff win rates never exceeded 50%; in fact, the best estimate from the various reports was that plaintiffs prevailed on the issue of lia- bility in less than one-third of the trials. [89] Danzon reported that in Florida, plaintiffs won only 13.8% of cases taken to trial; [90] in another Danzon study of malpractice cases in California in 1974 and 1976, plaintiffs won only 28% of cases tried to verdict. [91] In North Carolina, the win rate was about 20%. [92] Other researchers have reported figures in the vicinity of 30%. [93] In contrast, plain- [*238] tiff win rates for other types of tort cases, as noted earlier, are substantially higher, sometimes approaching 70%. [94] As discussed previously, the ways in which cases are chosen for trial substantial- ly influence plaintiff win ratios; [95] however, the consistent findings of low win ratios in malpractice cases clearly suggest that juries do not automatically give plaintiffs the benefit of the doubt over doc- tors and hospitals. Otherwise, plaintiff win ratios would be much higher. [96]

A recent study by Mark Taragin and his co-researchers, in- volving over 8000 malpractice cases in New Jersey, concluded that the probability of the plaintiff prevailing on the issue of liability at trial was not correlated with the severity of the plaintiff's injury. [97] If juror sympathy for plaintiffs were a significant factor, we should have expected a positive correlation in which more severely in- jured plaintiffs would win more cases.

Perhaps, however, the deep pockets effect applies only after liability has been determined. None of the authors or organizations making claims about the deep pockets effect has articulated a two- stage hypothesis, but we should be willing to entertain one and focus attention on the question of whether the deep pockets phe- nomenon applies only to damage awards after liability has been found.

Chin and Peterson's finding that doctors and hospitals paid lower awards when they were found liable in non-malpractice cases than when they were found liable in malpractice cases would [*239] seem contrary to the deep pockets hypothesis. [98] The health care providers' perceived ability to pay should not vary by the type of case. [99] This finding suggests that one of the other factors distin- guishing medical and other tort negligence, discussed above, may account for the difference.

REV_00262905

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*38 Harv. J. on Legis. 469, **

Copyright (c) 2001 President and Fellows of Harvard College
Harvard Journal on Legislation

Summer, 2001

38 Harv. J. on Legis. 469

LENGTH: 7766 words

SYMPOSIUM: REFORMING PUNITIVE DAMAGES: The Punitive Damage Debate

Robert A. Klinck

SUMMARY:
... Although punitive damages are awarded in only two to four percent of the civil cases in which plaintiffs prevail, they are an oft-maligned part of the American judicial system. ... The $ 2.9 million punitive damage award rendered to a woman who was injured by spilling hot McDonald's coffee on herself, for example, became a "rallying cry" for tort reformers. In addition to disturbing many American citizens, these high punitive damage awards have led many legal commentators to call for reform. ... BACKGROUND: THE PUNITIVE DAMAGE DEBATE ... Finally, there is significant policy disagreement about whether punitive damage law should be reformed. ... Many critics advocate for caps upon punitive damage awards, and such caps have become a prominent reform enacted by state legislatures. ... Congressman Barr urged the passage of tort reform to limit the occurrence of punitive damage awards. ... She is the author of Injured Women Before Common Law Courts, 1860-1930. ... Professor Schkade argued that in order to overcome the anchoring problem, the decision-maker should consider past cases in determining the punitive damage award. ... The instructions and facts presented to the jurors provided a specific range of appropriate values for the punitive damage award. ... Professor Bogus concluded that we should not remove the democratic element from punitive damage awards. ...

On March 13, 2001, the Harvard Journal on Legislation held a public symposium addressing the debate surrounding proposals to reform punitive damages, *both at the state and national levels. This piece discusses the primary areas of disagreement with respect to punitive damages, followed by a brief summary of the opening remarks of each panelist at the symposium. **

* The symposium was made possible, in part, with assistance from the following sponsors: The Center for Legal Policy at the Manhattan Institute; Exxon Mobil Corp.; Lexis Publishing; Ropes & Gray LLP; and Barbri, Inc.

TEXT:
[*469] Although punitive damages are awarded in only two to four percent of the civil cases in which plaintiffs prevail, [1] they are an oft-maligned part of the American judicial system. In recent years, the seemingly exorbitant and unjust nature of many punitive damage awards has raised the ire of the American public. [2] The $ 2.9 million punitive damage award rendered to a woman who was injured by spilling hot McDonald's coffee on frequently argued, however, that punitive damages do not actually deter. See, e.g., E. Donald Elliott, Why Punitive Damages Don't Deter Corporate Misconduct Effectively, 40 ALA. L. REV. 1053, 1057-58 (1989) (arguing that the unpredictability of punitive damages makes them an inefficient means of deterring corporate conduct).

REV_00262934

n11 See, e.g., Luban, supra note 1, at 378-79.

n12 See, e.g., Galanter & Luban, supra note 7, at 1432 (arguing that retribution theory calls for a scaling of punitive damages to the heinousness of the behavior). But see infra note 69 (citing arguments in opposition to redistribution as a justification).

n13 Michael Rustad & Thomas Koenig, The Historical Continuity of Punitive Damages Awards: Reforming the Tort Reformers, 42 AM. U. L. REV. 1269, 1320-21 (1993) (quoting Note, Punitive Damages and Libel Law, 98 HARV. L. REV. 847, 851 (1985)).

n14 See, e.g., Sebert, supra note 9, at 1570; see also Rustad & Koenig, supra note 13, at 1321-22 (asserting that some jurisdictions view compensation as yet another goal of punitive damages).

n15 See Sebert, supra note 9 (discussing how the legal rules of contract systematically under-compensate plaintiffs); Rustad & Koenig, supra note 13, at 1321-22.

n16 Partlett, supra note 5, at 793-95.

n17 Lynda A. Sloane, Note, The Split Award Statute: A Move Toward Effectuating the True Purpose of Punitive Damages, 28 VAL. U. L. REV. 473, 488 (1993) (summarizing the findings of the RAND study).

n18 See, e.g., W. Kip Viscusi, The Social Costs of Punitive Damages Against Corporations in Environmental and Safety Torts, 87 GEO. L.J. 285, 333 (1998); Michael J. Saks, Do We Really Know Anything About the Behavior of the Tort Litigation System--And Why Not?, 140 U. PA. L. REV. 1147, 1254 (1992) (quoting Vice President Dan Quayle's claim of "arbitrary, even freakish application" of punitive damages).

n19 Ostrom, supra note 2, at 238.

n20 Eisenberg & Wells, infra note 21, at 393-94 (explaining that about half of the variance in punitive damage awards can be explained by the compensatory damage award and that once the outer five percent of awards are excluded, there are hardly any extreme awards); see also Michael Rustad, In Defense of Punitive Damages in Products Liability: Testing Tort Anecdotes with Empirical Data, 78 IOWA L. REV. 1, 50 (1992) (indicating that punitive damage awards in products liability cases are generally proportional to the actual damages).

n21 Theodore Eisenberg & Martin T. Wells, Punitive Awards After BMW, A New Capping System, and the Reported Opinion Bias, 1998 WIS. L. REV. 387, 388-89; see also Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 MINN. L. REV. 1, 4 (1990) (arguing that critics' empirical "propositions are based on scanty empirical data and highly questionable interpretations of those data").

n22 Sebert, supra note 9, at 1656-57. It is important to note, however, that the author makes this suggestion even though punitive damage awards are already most prevalent in contract cases. See Ostrom, Rottman & Goerdt, supra note 2, at 238-39 (asserting that the vast majority of punitive damage awards occur in contract cases and that the dollar value of punitive damages in contract cases exceeds the dollar value in tort cases).

n23 Sebert, supra note 9, at 1566-67.

REV_00262943

n24 Id. at 1566-69.

n25 Id. at 1570. The proposed expansion of punitive damages in contract cases may be coming to fruition. Galanter & Luban, supra note 7, at 1415-16 (indicating that punitive damage awards are on the rise in contract cases).

n26 See, e.g., Eisenberg & Wells, supra note 21, at 406-07 (urging a cap of ten times the compensatory award); Linda Babcock & Greg Pogarsky, Damage Caps and Settlement: A Behavioral Approach, 28 J. LEGAL STUD. 341, 343-44 (1999) (indicating that one of Vice President Dan Quayle's major reform proposals was a cap on punitive damages).

n27 See, e.g., GA. CODE ANN. § 51-12-5.1(g) (1998) (limiting punitive damages to $ 250,000, except for product liability cases); VA. CODE ANN. § 8.01-38.1 (2000) (capping punitive damages at $ 350,000).

n28 See, e.g., CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 52-240b (1991) (limiting punitive awards in product liability cases to twice the compensatory award); FLA. STAT. ANN. § 768.73(1)(a) (West Supp. 2001) (capping punitive damages at three times the amount of the compensatory award or $ 500,000, whichever is greater).

n29 See, e.g., KAN. STAT. ANN. § 60-3701(e)-(f) (Supp. 2000) (providing that punitive damages are generally limited to lesser of the defendant's highest annual income in the last five years or $ 5 million).

n30 See, e.g., NEV. REV. STAT. ANN. § 42.005 (Supp. 1999) (capping punitive damages at three times the compensatory damages if those damages are above $ 100,000, and limiting punitive damages to $ 300,000 if the compensatory award is less than $ 100,000); TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. CODE ANN. § 41.008 (Vernon 1997) (limiting punitive damages to the greater of two times economic harm plus the non-economic harm or $ 200,000, unless the defendant's conduct was particularly egregious).

n31 See, e.g., Crump, supra note 6, at 223-24 (arguing that caps might be irrational and that, if they are to be imposed, they should be set high enough to preserve the deterrence goal of punitive damages); Thomas M. Melsheimer & Steven H. Stodghill, Due Process and Punitive Damages: Providing Meaningful Guidance to the Jury, 47 SMU L. REV. 329, 347-48 (1994) (discussing various shortcomings of punitive damage caps); Partlett, supra note 5, at 824 (stating that imposing damage caps is contrary to the purpose of punitive damages); Sandra N. Hurd & Frances E. Zollers, State Punitive Damages Statutes: A Proposed Alternative, 20 J. LEGIS. 191, 199 (1994) (arguing that limiting punitive damages could undermine the deterrent purpose of punitive damages); Galanter & Luban, supra note 7, at 1432 (arguing that to achieve the goals of retribution, punitive damages should be scaled to the heinousness of the defendant's behavior rather than to the resulting harm).

n32 DAN B. DOBBS, LAW OF REMEDIES: DAMAGES--EQUITY--RESTITUTION § 3.11 (2d ed. 1993) (indicating that as a general rule punitive damages are set exclusively by juries and that judges only play a role in limiting damages).

n33 See, e.g., Cass Sunstein, Daniel Kahneman & David Schkade, Assessing Punitive Damages, 107 YALE L.J. 2071, 2076 (1998). These critics follow in the long line of commentators who have asserted that juries are often not competent to decide the complex issues raised in civil litigation. See, e.g., Joe S. Cecil, Valerie P. Hans & Elizabeth C. Wiggins, Citizen Comprehension of Difficult Issues: Lessons From Civil Jury Trials, 40 AM. U. L. REV. 727, 733-44 (1991) (discussing various attacks on jury competence but asserting that these attacks stand in contrast to the empirical research of legal scholars). Some have observed, for example, that while judges and juries often agree on punitive damage liability, they frequently differ with regard to the amount. Id. at 745-46.

REV_00262944

n34 See, e.g., Viscusi, infra note 79, at 589-90 (arguing that juries do not properly consider cost-benefit analyses and thus the responsibility of evaluating the reprehensibility of corporate behavior should be shifted to administrative agencies).

n35 Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 33, at 2120 (comparing their proposal to criminal sentencing in which the jury decides liability but the judge sets the punishment); see also Malcolm E. Wheeler, A Proposal for Further Common Law Development of the Use of Punitive Damages in Modern Product Liability Litigation, 40 ALA. L. REV. 919, 948 (1989) (arguing that the jury should determine the values relevant to the law and economics deterrence formula through use of a special verdict form, and the judge should then calculate an acceptable range of values for punitive damages from which the jury may choose a final dollar amount).

n36 Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 33, at 2108; see also David Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 MICH. L. REV. 1257, 1320 (1976).

n37 See Sunstein, Kahneman, & Schkade, supra note 33, at 2111-15 (arguing that judges taking the decision of the dollar value away from juries will minimize unpredictability in punitive awards, which the authors view as the major problem with punitive damages).

n38 CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 52-240b (1991) (stating that in products liability cases the court shall set punitive awards).

n39 Hurd & Zollers, supra note 31, at 201. There is some debate about whether to require clear and convincing evidence or proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Compare Dick Thornburgh, America's Civil Justice Dilemma: The Prospects for Reform, 55 MD. L. REV. 1074, 1086 (1996) (urging the use of a clear and convincing evidence standard) with COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 13-25-127 (2000) (requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt).

n40 Hurd & Zollers, supra note 31, at 201; see also Wheeler, supra note 35, at 953-54 (arguing that there should be a presumption that punitive damages greater than twice the compensatory awards are excessive and that judges should impose a clear and convincing evidence standard).

n41 Melsheimer & Stodghill, supra note 31, at 346-47.

n42 These states usually require that the facts justifying punitive damages be proven by clear and convincing evidence. See ALA. CODE § 6-11-20 (Supp. 2000); ALASKA STAT. § 09.17.020 (Supp. 1999); GA. CODE ANN. § 51-12-5.1 (1999); IND. CODE § 34-51-3-2 (Supp. 2000); KAN. STAT. ANN. § 60-3701(c) (Supp. 1999); KY. REV. STAT. ANN. § 411.184 (Michie Supp. 2000); MINN. STAT. § 549.20(1) (2000); MONT. CODE ANN. § 27-1-221 (1999); OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2315.21 (West 2000); UTAH CODE ANN. § 78-18-1 (Supp. 2000). Colorado, however, has gone so far as to require proof beyond a reasonable doubt. COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 13-25-127 (2000).

n43 See, e.g., Wheeler, supra note 35, at 947; Melsheimer & Stodghill, supra note 31, at 348-49.

n44 See Melsheimer & Stodghill, supra note 31, at 348-49 (arguing that bifurcation would eliminate the fear that the jury will consider the defendant's wealth in determining liability).

n45 Stephan Landsman et al., Be Careful What You Wish For: The Paradoxical Effects of Bifurcating Claims For Punitive Damages, 1998 WIS. L. REV. 297, 316 (reporting research results indicating that juries hearing evidence relevant to punitive damages during a combined trial are more likely to find a defendant liable).

REV_00262945

n46 Id. at 325.

n47 See Melsheimer & Stodghill, supra note 31, at 330. Other critics more skeptically assert that jury instructions are altogether ineffective. See, e.g., Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 33, at 2111; alan Calnan, Ending the Punitive Damage Debate, 45 DePAUL L. REV. 101, 102-03 (1995) (arguing that reformers often incorrectly claim that lack of guidance leads to exorbitant awards); Robert D. Cooter, Punitive Damages, Social Norms, and Economic Analysis, LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS., Summer 1997, at 73, 75-76.

n48 See, e.g., Wheeler, supra note 35, at 947-48 (arguing that juries should be instructed that the purpose of punitive damages is to deter wrongful conduct, and that the jury should only award sufficient punitive damages to provide deterrence).

n49 See supra notes 5-16 and accompanying text.

n50 See Wheeler, supra note 35, at 947-48 (arguing that juries should not be instructed that punitive damages are intended to punish because adding the punishment language will confuse the jury).

n51 See Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 33, at 2117 (arguing that a jury should be provided with comparison factual scenarios and asked to decide which case most closely matches the egregiousness of a defendant's actions).

n52 Id. at 2118-19.

n53 See Crump, supra note 6, at 217. There is evidence indicating that the wealth of a defendant will affect the dollar amount of punitive awards. See, e.g., Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 33, at 2105.

n54 See, e.g., Crump, supra note 6, at 217.

n55 See, e.g., Life Ins. Co. of Ga. v. Johnson, 684 So. 2d 685, 701-02 (Ala. 1996), vacated on other grounds, 117 S. Ct. 288 (1996); Wayte v. Rollins Int'l, Inc., 215 Cal. Rptr. 59, 72 (Cal. Ct. App. 1985); Lunsford v. Morris, 746 S.W.2d 471, 476 (Tex. 1988).

n56 For a sample of Professor Hay's contribution to the legal literature, see Bruce L. Hay, The Theory of Fee Regulation in Class Action Settlements, 46 AM. U. L. REV. 1429 (1997); Bruce Hay, Optimal Contingent Fees in a World of Settlement, 26 J. LEGAL STUD. 259 (1997).

n57 For a sample of Congressman Barr's contribution to the legal literature, see Bob Barr, High Crimes and Misdemeanors: The Clinton-Gore Scandals and the Question of Impeachment, 2 TEX. REV. L. & POL. 1 (1997).

n58 For a sample of Professor Chamallas's contribution to the legal literature on the tort system, see Martha Chamallas, The Disappearing Consumer, Cognitive Bias and Tort Law, 6 ROGER WILLIAMS U. L. REV. 9 (2000); Martha Chamallas, The Architecture of Bias: Deep Structures in Tort Law, 146 U. PA. L. REV. 463 (1998).

n59 For a sample of Professor Galanter's contribution to the literature on punitive damages, see Galanter & Luban, supra note 7; Marc Galanter, News from Nowhere: The Debased Debate on Civil Justice, 71 DENV. U. L. REV. 77 (1993); Marc Galanter, Shadow Play: The Fabled Menace of Punitive Damages, 1998 WIS. L. REV. 1.

REV_00262946

n60 For a sample of Professor Hanson's contribution to the literature on punitive damages, see Steven P. Croley & Jon D. Hanson, The Nonpecuniary Costs of Accidents: Pain-And-Suffering Damages in Tort Law, 108 HARV. L. REV. 1785 (1995); Steven P. Croley & Jon D. Hanson, What Liability Crisis? An Alternative Explanation for Recent Events in Products Liability, 8 YALE J. ON REG. 1 (1991).

n61 For a sample of Walter Olson's contribution to the legal literature see Walter Olson, Tortification of Contract Law: Displacing Consent and Agreement, 77 CORNELL L. REV. 1043 (1992).

n62 For a sample of Mr. Sobol's contribution to the literature on punitive damages, see Elizabeth J. Cabraser & Thomas M. Sobol, Equity for the Victims, Equity for the Transgressor: The Classwide Treatment of Punitive Damage Claims, 74 TUL. L. REV. 2005 (2000).

n63 For a sample of Dr. Tuerck's contribution to the legal literature, see DAVID TUERCK & IN-MEE BAEK, AN ECONOMIC MODEL OF MASSACHUSETTS TAX POLICY (1994); DAVID TUERCK & WILLIAM F. O'BRIEN, JR., THE COMPASSION TAX CREDIT: A FAMILY ADVOCATE PILOT PROGRAM (1996).

n64 This summary is based on the author's recollection of the panelists' presentations.

n65 In 1996, Congress passed the Commonsense Legal Reform Act, which included a $ 250,000 cap on punitive damage awards; President Clinton vetoed the bill. See Babcock & Pogarsky, supra note 26, at 344.

n66 During the discussion portion, Congressman Barr acknowledged that the clear and convincing evidence standard might not have an enormous effect upon juries, but he maintained that it would symbolize the country's distaste of punitive damages.

n67 For a fuller explication of the history of punitive damages see Alan Calnan, Ending the Punitive Damage Debate, 45 DePAUL L. REV. 101, 104-09 (1995) (discussing the historical roots of punitive damages in ancient cultures, the English common law, and early America); see also Partlett, supra note 5, at 783-87.

n68 Her explanation of the compensatory purpose of punitive damages is similar to that in Parlett, supra note 6, at 793-95. Interestingly, however, Partlett contends that non-pecuniary damages other than punitive damages might be sufficient. Id.

n69 For a fuller exposition of these points see Marc Galanter, Real World Torts: An Antidote to Anecdote, 55 MD. L. REV. 1093, 1126-40 (1996).

n70 This argument follows a line of literature focussing on the impropriety of using punitive damages to achieve the goal of punishment, which, it is argued, should be the exclusive domain of the criminal system. See, e.g., David L. Walther & Thomas A. Plein, Punitive Damages: A Critical Analysis: Kink v. Combs, 49 MARQ. L. REV. 369 (1965); Jeffery W. Grass, The Penal Dimensions of Punitive Damages, 12 HASTINGS CONST. L.Q. 241, 314 (1985) (asserting that punitive damages are penal in nature and thus the government should not be allowed to pass the role off onto civil plaintiffs); Comment, Criminal Safeguards and the Punitive Damages Defendant, 34 U. CHI. L. REV. 408, 412-30 (1967); see also Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 59 (1983) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting). But see Galanter & Luban, supra note 7, at 1456-60 (arguing that there is no need for defendants in actions for punitive damages to receive these protections, because the litigation is not between the state and an individual).

n71 See generally Cabraser & Sobol, supra note 62.

REV_00262947

n72 See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 6, at 887-90 (arguing that punitive damages are appropriate when there is less than a one hundred percent chance of liability).

n73 21 HARV. WOMEN'S L.J. 79 (1998).

n74 For a sample of Professor Bogus's contribution to the literature on punitive damages and the tort system, see Carl T. Bogus, War on the Common Law: The Struggle at the Center of Products Liability, 60 MO. L. REV. 1 (1995).

n75 For a sample of Dr. Calfee's contribution to the literature on punitive damages, see Paul H. Rubin, John E. Calfee & Mark F. Grady, BMW v. Gore: Mitigating the Punitive Economics of Punitive Damages, 5 SUP. CT. ECON. REV. 179 (1997).

n76 For a sample of Dr. Rose's contribution to the literature on the tort system, see Neil Vidmar, Felicia Gross & Mary Rose, Jury Awards for Medical Malpractice and Post-Verdict Adjustments of Those Awards, 48 DePAUL L. REV. 265 (1998).

n77 For a sample of Professor Schkade's contribution to the literature on punitive damages, see Schkade, Sunstein & Kahneman, supra note 4; Sunstein, Schkade, & Kahneman, supra note 6, and Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 33. Professor Schkade is also authoring an article that will appear in the next issue of the Harvard Journal on Legislation.

n78 For a sample of Professor Vidmar's contribution to the legal literature on torts and punitive damages, see Neil Vidmar, The Performance of the American Civil Jury: An Empirical Perspective, 40 ARIZ. L. REV. 849 (1998); Neil Vidmar, Pap and Circumstance: What Jury Verdict Statistics Can Tell Us About Jury Behavior and the Tort System, 28 SUFFOLK U. L. REV. 1205 (1994).

n79 For a sample of Professor Viscusi's contribution to the legal literature on punitive damages, see W. Kip Viscusi, Corporate Risk Analysis: A Reckless Act?, 52 STAN. L. REV. 547 (2000). Professor Viscusi is also authoring an article that will appear in the next issue of the Harvard Journal on Legislation.

n80 This summary is based on the author's recollection of the panelists' presentations.

n81 Neil Vidmar & Mary Rose, Punitive Damages by Juries in Florida: In Terrorum and in Reality, 38 HARV. J. LEGIS. 487 (2001).

n82 For a discussion of why uncertainty undermines the deterrence rationale for punitive damages, see Wheeler, supra note 35.

n83 All scholars do not agree with the assertion that punitive damages are erratic. One study, for example, found that punitive damages occur most frequently in cases "where breach of a legal duty suggests intentional or morally flawed behavior," and they are highly correlated with compensatory damage awards. Theodore Eisenberg et al., The Predictability of Punitive Damages, 26 J. LEGAL STUD. 623, 637 (1997); cf. Rustad, supra note 20, at 73 (arguing that punitive damages are generally awarded in cases where defendants knew of a product's risks and failed to remedy them or to warn consumers).

n84 Professor Schkade has made this proposal in previous articles. See, e.g., Cass Sunstein, Daniel Kahneman & David Schkade, supra note 33, at 2114-26.

n85 Cf. Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 33, at 2111 (indicating skepticism about the ability of jury instructions to produce damage awards based on principles of deterrence).

REV_00262948

n86 See also Galanter & Luban, supra note 7, at 1408-09.

n87 This conclusion is supported in the literature. See Rustad, supra note 20, at 51-59 (indicating that judges frequently decrease runaway punitive damage awards).

n88 For a brief history of the breast implant litigation, see In re Dow Corning Corp., 1995 WL 495978 (Bankr. E.D. Mich. Aug. 5, 1995).

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 12:05 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00262949

herself, for example, became a "rallying cry" for tort reformers. [3] In addition to disturbing many American citizens, these high punitive damage awards have led many legal commentators to call for reform. [4] In light of the controversy surrounding punitive damages, the Harvard Journal on Legislation held a symposium entitled "Reforming Punitive Damages," [*470] which included two panel discussions: "The Future of Punitive Damages" and "How Should We Decide Punitive Damages?"

BACKGROUND: THE PUNITIVE DAMAGE DEBATE

Punitive damages have led to disagreements at every level. First, scholars debate the theoretical purpose that punitive damages should serve. Second, scholars disagree about the empirical evidence regarding the pervasiveness of punitive damage awards. Finally, there is significant policy disagreement about whether punitive damage law should be reformed.

There are three prominent rationales for imposing punitive damages: deterrence, retribution, and compensation. [5] Deterrence is the most generally accepted theoretical justification for punitive damages. [6] According to this theory, punitive damages should be awarded in cases in which compensatory damages are insufficient to deter behavior that society deems illicit. [7] Compensatory damages alone may not sufficiently deter conduct for a number of reasons. First, because defendants are not always held liable for their actions, they are not required to internalize the costs of all the injuries they cause. [8] Additionally, certain legal rules inherently lead to less than complete recovery for plaintiffs. [9] As a result, punitive damages are necessary to force defendants to fully internalize the harms they cause. [10] Some proponents of punitive damages dispute the focus on deterrence, [*471] arguing instead that punitive damages serve a retributive purpose. [11] According to retributive theory, punitive damages should be imposed if a defendant's actions are particularly heinous. [12] The purpose of imposing punitive damages under this rationale is to "vent the indignation of the victimized." [13] Under this theory, punitive damages should be imposed to punish the defendant regardless of whether they serve a deterrence function. Other authors assert that punitive damages are necessary to fully compensate plaintiffs. [14] Punitive damages are called upon to make up for the limitations that legal rules place on recovery, [15] including intangible damages that otherwise would go uncompensated. [16]

In addition to the theoretical disagreement about the purpose of punitive damages, there is significant disagreement about the empirical evidence regarding their prevalence. In one study, the RAND Corporation Institute for Civil Justice found that there had been a dramatic increase in punitive damage awards between 1960 and 1984. [17] Similarly, many critics have claimed that juries award punitive damages erratically and that these awards have gotten out of control. [18] Proponents of the continued vitality of punitive damages point to data indicating that the majority of punitive damage awards are for small sums [19] and are strongly correlated to the compensatory awards granted in the cases. [20] Theodore Eisenberg and Martin T. Wells argue that "the available data suggest that businesses, [*472] insurance companies, and defense lawyers cannot support the claim that punitive awards are frequent, or that they follow a crazy pattern with little or no relation to compensatory awards. . . . The mass of punitive awards satisfy a surprisingly regular pattern." [21]

Finally, there is what might be termed "the policy debate" about whether punitive damages should be reformed. In many ways, the theoretical and empirical disagreements outlined above have fed into these policy discussions. The proposed reforms are most easily organized as those that would expand punitive damage awards and those that would contract these awards.

There is some support for the notion that punitive damages do not play a prominent enough role in American law. John A. Sebert, Jr., for example, argues that punitive damages should be expanded in contract cases because compensatory damages do not fully compensate plaintiffs for losses caused by contract breaches. [22] He asserts that the applicable legal rules lead to systematic under-compensation of plaintiffs in contract suits. [23] These rules include the requirements of certainty of damages, the refusal to require payment of interest, and the American rule for legal fees. [24] To overcome this problem, Sebert concludes that courts should extend the availability of punitive or super-compensatory damages in contract cases. [25]

REV_00262935

The more prominent view, however, appears to be that punitive damages need to be limited. Proponents of this view have suggested numerous reforms, including capping punitive damages, taking punitive damage decisions away from juries, imposing more stringent burdens of proof for punitive liability, bifurcating trials so that punitive damages are considered only after the jury finds the defendant liable, and giving juries more specific instructions to aid them in setting punitive damages.

Many critics advocate for caps upon punitive damage awards, [26] and such caps have become a prominent reform enacted by state legislatures. [*473] Some states have placed a dollar amount limitation upon punitive awards; [27] some states have limited punitive damages to a given multiple of compensatory damages; [28] some states have limited punitive damages to a percent of the defendant's profits; [29] and still other states have utilized a combination of these approaches. [30] These caps, however, have been criticized as irrational and contrary to the goals of punitive damages. [31]

Others have argued that punitive damage liability should be decided by judges rather than by juries. Traditionally, juries are charged with determining whether punitive damages will be imposed and with setting the level of those damages. [32] This system has come under attack, however, because of the alleged capricious nature of punitive damage awards. [33] Some critics argue that if punitive damages are to be awarded, they should be imposed by judges because juries are not competent to decide [*474] whether punitive damages are appropriate. [34] Others have more modestly proposed that juries should decide whether punitive damages are to be imposed and should give the judge an indication of the level of outrage engendered by the defendant's behavior, but that the judge should be charged with actually setting the dollar award. [35] These critics assert that allowing the judge to set the dollar value would lead to greater predictability in awards. [36] This increased certainty would in turn further the deterrence rationale for punitive damages. [37] At least one state has adopted this approach in some cases, requiring that judges--not juries--set the punitive award. [38]

Some critics would also alter how the decision-maker sets the punitive award. First, some argue that the burden of proof should be heightened for purposes of determining punitive damages. [39] These critics reason that because punitive damages are intended in some respect to punish wrongdoers, more proof of culpability is required. [40] Though some scholars criticize this approach as irrational, [41] several states have already adopted a heightened standard of review. [42]

[*475] Reformers have also proposed that trials involving punitive damage claims be bifurcated so that juries do not hear evidence regarding punitive damages until after they have found the defendant liable for the harm suffered. [43] These authors fear that evidence relevant only to determining punitive damages--such as a defendant's assets--will skew the jury findings of liability. [44] At least one empirical study confirms this fear. [45] At the same time, however, evidence indicates that bifurcating these trials might lead to higher average punitive damage awards. [46] Thus, bifurcation might come as a mixed blessing for defendants.

Other reformers suggest an alteration of punitive damage jury instructions. Some authors assert that juries are not given enough guidance for determining punitive damage awards. [47] They argue that juries are left with little understanding of the purposes of punitive damages, leading to awards that are nothing more than shots in the dark. [48] Given the disagreement about the purpose of punitive damages, [49] it is difficult to imagine what instructions should be given. [50] In addition, if punitive damages are meant to achieve all three goals discussed above, the legal system must determine how much weight each goal should be given. Ultimately, it is unclear what additional instructions, if any, judges could or should provide to juries.

REV_00262936

Finally, there is sharp disagreement over what evidence should be put before the decision-maker. Some critics assert that the fact finder should consider punitive damage awards from similar cases because it would lead to increased certainty in awards. [51] The current consensus [*476] among states, however, is that juries should not be allowed to consider past awards. [52] Critics also argue that juries should not be allowed to consider the wealth of the defendant, [53] because it is not relevant to the magnitude of award necessary to deter the conduct. [54] Many states do allow the admission of evidence of a defendant's wealth. [55]

The preceding pages have presented some of the major debates among scholars of punitive damages. These authors disagree at all levels: theoretical, empirical, and policy. The Symposium was held to provide a forum to examine these and other arguments.

PANEL ONE: THE FUTURE OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES

MODERATOR:

Bruce Hay is professor of law at Harvard Law School, where he teaches civil procedure, professional responsibility, corporations, and environmental law. His research interests include legal procedure, legal ethics, and the economics of litigation. He has published articles on various issues relating to litigation. [56] Professor Hay received his B.A. from the University of Wisconsin at Madison and his J.D. from Harvard Law School.

PANELISTS:

Congressman Robert Barr (R-Ga.) is the United States Representative for the Seventh District of Georgia and is Chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Commercial and Administrative Law. He also serves on the Government Reform Committee, on the Financial Services Committee, and as Assistant Majority Whip for the Republican Party. From 1986 to 1990 he was United States Attorney for the Northern District of Georgia. Congressman Barr received his B.A. from the University [*477] of Southern California, his M.A. from George Washington University, and his J.D. from Georgetown University. [57]

Martha Chamallas is professor of law at the University of Pittsburgh Law School, where she teaches torts, employment discrimination, and feminist legal theory. Her work on tort law has focused on emotional injuries and the effects of race and gender bias in computing damages. Professor Chamallas received her B.A. from Tufts University and her J.D. from Louisiana State University. [58]

Marc Galanter is the John and Rylla Bosshard Professor of Law and South Asian Studies at the University of Wisconsin at Madison and the LSE Centennial Professor at the London School of Economics. He serves as chairman of Wisconsin's Institute for Legal Studies, one of the leading centers for empirical study of the legal system, as well as director of the Institute's Dispute Processing Research Program. Professor Galanter received his B.A., M.A., and J.D. from the University of Chicago. [59]

Jon Hanson is professor of law at Harvard Law School, where he teaches courses in torts, corporations, products liability theory, and law and behavioralism. Professor Hanson has testified before Congress on the issue of tobacco regulation, and has served as an expert witness in several of the tobacco lawsuits brought by the state attorneys general. Professor Hanson received his B.A. from Rice University and his J.D. from Yale Law School. [60]

REV_00262937

Walter Olson is a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute. He has written extensively on reforming the American legal system, and his commentaries frequently appear in national publications such as the Wall Street Journal, the New York Times, and the National Review. In 1991, Mr. Olson authored The Litigation Explosion: What Happened When America Unleashed the Lawsuit, and in 1999 he launched the Web site Overlawyered.com. Mr. Olson received his B.A. from Yale University. [61]

[*478] Thomas M. Sobol is a partner with the law offices of Lieff, Cabraser, Heimann & Bernstein, LLP. His primary focus is on major class action litigation, and he is currently involved in class actions filed against the tobacco, gun, asbestos, healthcare, pharmaceutical, and industrial agriculture industries. He also assisted in antitrust litigation against Microsoft. Mr. Sobol received his B.A. from Clark University and his J.D. from Boston University School of Law. [62]

David Tuerck is the executive director of the Beacon Hill Institute at Suffolk University, where he also serves as chairman of the Department of Economics. His specialties include state tax policy, welfare reform, and the economics of regulation. Dr. Tuerck received his A.B. and A.M. from George Washington University, and his Ph.D. in economics from the University of Virginia. [63]

SUMMARY OF OPENING REMARKS: [64]

Congressman Robert Barr began the discussion by describing the current political climate toward punitive damages at the federal level. He argued that the election of President George W. Bush has greatly increased the chances of passing a comprehensive tort reform bill. [65] He indicated that he would favor a bill that included caps on punitive damage awards, and also suggested mandating that punitive damages be proven by clear and convincing evidence, rather than by a preponderance of the evidence. [66] Congressman Barr urged the passage of tort reform to limit the occurrence of punitive damage awards.

Professor Martha Chamallas advocated the continued use of punitive damages. Her argument began from the premise that general deterrence theory is not the only justification for punitive damages; punitive damages also serve a compensatory purpose. They were originally used in cases involving an affront to a person's honor. [67] In such cases, compensatory [*479] damages were presumed to be insufficient to fully compensate plaintiffs for their injuries. The contemporary analogue to such cases is discrimination. An individual denied the opportunity to rent an apartment because of her race, for example, is not likely to be made whole by compensatory damages. Punitive damages, then, may serve an important compensatory role in this type of case. [68]

Professor Marc Galanter followed Professor Chamallas by describing some of the emerging empirical data regarding punitive damages. He indicated that we are just now beginning to understand punitive damages. They are most common in cases involving financial damages resulting from intentional torts and are more common in the South. Professor Galanter remarked that although there is a "folklore" that punitive damages are common and are awarded casually, in fact they are awarded infrequently. Despite this data, he observed that corporate decision-makers continue to overestimate the likelihood of punitive damage awards. [69]

Professor Jon Hanson presented his opinion that the scholarship calling for reform is flawed. First, he argued that this literature is based upon conventional law and economics without reference to attribution theory, which posits that harmed individuals do care about a person's motives. Professor Hanson gave the example of a waiter spilling a glass of tea on a patron. That patron might ask for a wide range of compensation. He might simply ask for an apology, or he might ask that the restaurant pay for his dry-cleaning, or he might ask that the waiter be fired. Professor Hanson argued that in deciding what compensation to ask for, the patron would care about why the waiter spilled the tea on him. Was it because the patron was African American? Was it an accident? The patron might also care about whether the waiter had spilled tea on anyone else before. The literature discussing punitive damage awards treats all spilled tea the same without regard to the details. Professor Hanson argued that this is a major shortcoming. The second problem that he articulated is the effect of money on the law and economics literature, a factor that is not considered by the academic literature itself. Professor Hanson observed that many of these articles are funded either directly or indirectly by business interests, and recommended that commentators engage in a more critical inquiry into the effects that this money might have on the literature as a whole.

REV_00262938

Walter Olson next compared punitive damages to criminal sanctions. The distinction is that when the government attempts to impose criminal sanctions, it must provide certain procedural protections to the defendant. [*480] Defendants are not given such protections in civil actions when they are sued by plaintiffs seeking punitive damages. Mr. Olson argued that the most controversial punitive damage awards are generally those in which some of the protections that a criminal defendant would have received were notably absent and impacted the course of the trial. [70] These include cases in which there was forum-shopping, the law was not clearly defined in advance, or there was a threat that the defendant would have to pay for the same conduct more than once. Cases in which the procedural protections would not have aided the defendant do not generally raise the ire of the public.

Thomas Sobol then provided the perspective of a practicing plaintiffs' attorney. He started by observing that the increase in the dollar value of punitive damages over the last decade is not surprising given the exponential growth of business enterprises. He suggested that one of the main problems with punitive damages is that some future plaintiffs may not be able to recover compensatory awards if large punitive damages awarded to other plaintiffs have exhausted the defendant's funds. To alleviate these distributive concerns, Mr. Sobol suggested joining punitive damage cases into class actions. [71]

David Tuerck began by defending the law and economics literature. He asserted that the authors of the seminal law and economics literature--Richard Posner, Steven Shavell, and Learned Hand--are hardly "lackeys" of the business community. Shavell, for example, argues that there are cases in which punitive damages are appropriate. [72] Nonetheless, these authors do believe that punitive damages should not be imposed when they might lead to overly cautious behavior. The primary problem that Dr. Tuerck sees with punitive damages is that they lead to uncertainty, which disturbs the presumptions underlying the economic model.

[*481] PANEL TWO: HOW SHOULD WE DECIDE PUNITIVE DAMAGES?

MODERATOR:

Margo Schlanger is assistant professor at Harvard Law School, where she teaches constitutional law, torts, and civil rights law. Her research interests include constitutional torts and the reformation of government institutions through litigation. She is the author of Injured Women Before Common Law Courts, 1860-1930. [73] Professor Schlanger received her B.A. from Yale University and her J.D. from Yale Law School.

PANELISTS:

Carl T. Bogus is associate professor at the Roger Williams University School of Law, where he teaches courses in torts, products liability, administrative law, and evidence. He has written widely about products liability and tort reform, and his most recent work is Why Lawsuits are Good for America: Disciplined Democracy, Big Business and the Common Law, to be published in July of 2001. Professor Bogus received his B.A. and J.D. from Syracuse

REV_00262939

University. [74]

John E. Calfee is a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. He has served in the Bureau of Economics at the Federal Trade Commission, and has taught courses on marketing and consumer behavior at the business schools of the University of Maryland and Boston University. Dr. Calfee's research has focused on the economics of tort liability. Dr. Calfee received his B.A. from Rice University, his M.A. from the University of Chicago, and his Ph.D. in economics from the University of California at Berkeley. [75]

Mary Rose is a research fellow at the American Bar Foundation, an institute devoted to the study of law and social science. Her research has focused on jury selection, jury decision-making, and the effect of jury reforms. She also has studied popular views on fair procedures and fair outcomes in legal and non-legal settings. Dr. Rose received her B.A. from Stanford University and her Ph.D. in social psychology from Duke University. [76]

[*482] David A. Schkade is the Herbert D. Kelleher/MCorp Regents Professor of Business at the University of Texas at Austin, where he teaches negotiation, the psychology of decision-making, and research methods. His recent work has focussed on the psychology of well-being, environmental resource valuation, jury decision-making, and decision support systems. Professor Schkade received his B.A. and M.B.A. from the University of Texas at Austin and his M.S. and Ph.D. in organizational psychology from Carnegie Mellon University. [77]

Neil Vidmar is the Russell M. Robinson II Professor of Law at Duke Law School. He also holds an appointment in the Duke Psychology Department. His research interests include civil jury performance. He has testified, consulted, and drafted amicus briefs as an expert on jury behavior for trials in the United States and abroad. Professor Vidmar received his B.A. from MacMurray College, and his M.A. and Ph.D. in social psychology from the University of Illinois. [78]

W. Kip Viscusi is the John F. Cogan, Jr. Professor of Law and Economics and the director of the Program on Empirical Legal Studies at Harvard Law School. His research has focused on individual and societal responses to risk and uncertainty, and he has published seventeen books and over 200 articles. Professor Viscusi is also the founding editor of the Journal of Risk and Uncertainty and has served on the editorial boards of eleven other journals, including the American Economic Review and the Review of Economics and Statistics. Professor Viscusi received his B.A. from Harvard College and his M.A., M.P.P., and Ph.D. in economics from Harvard University. [79]

SUMMARY OF OPENING REMARKS: [80]

The panel began with Dr. Mary Rose presenting a paper she coauthored with Professor Neil Vidmar. [81] Professor Vidmar and Dr. Rose evaluated many empirical claims that are made about punitive damages [*483] by examining Florida cases reported in Westlaw's jury verdict database between 1988 and 2000. During the relevant time period there were, on average, twenty-two punitive damage awards per year in Florida. Excluding asbestos cases and the recent tobacco verdict, punitive damages were awarded in only one products liability case. Juries, the survey found, are unlikely to award punitive damages in premises liability cases. In non-products liability cases, punitive damages were most frequent in cases involving drunk driving, financial disputes, and assaults. The authors concluded that the Florida cases do not support the claim that there are significant problems with the current punitive damages system.

Professor David Schkade articulated what he considers the major shortcoming of punitive damages: their unpredictability. [82] Punitive damage awards are consistently erratic. [83] Jurors are given little guidance, largely because policymakers do not know what guidance to give.

REV_00262940

Professor Schkade indicated that one of the main causes of the unpredictability of jury awards is that different jurors use different "anchors." Anchors are the starting points that individual jurors use as their frames of reference. If, for example, two individuals are presented with identical facts but with two different anchors--one sees a plaintiff demand one million dollars in punitive damages while the other sees a plaintiff demand ten million dollars--the individuals come to different conclusions. Professor Schkade argued that in order to overcome the anchoring problem, the decision-maker should consider past cases in determining the punitive damage award. [84]

Professor Kip Viscusi discussed his recent research on jury competence. In one experiment, he tested jury responses to a defendant company's use of cost-benefit analysis. The use of cost-benefit analysis angered many of the jurors. When the hypothetical was changed by asserting that the company had placed a higher value on human life, this only increased the damage award. Professor Viscusi concluded that this was a result of the anchoring effect. He also tested the use of jury instructions based on the law and economics justification for punitive damages. The instructions and facts presented to the jurors provided a specific range of appropriate values for the punitive damage award. The jurors, however, generally failed to render judgments within the given ranges. This effect [*484] was exacerbated when the jurors were given anchors outside of the appropriate range. This led Professor Viscusi to the conclusion that juries are not necessarily competent to render punitive damages. [85]

Professor Carl Bogus presented a response to the criticism of juries. He started by pointing out that seventy-five to eighty percent of punitive damage awards are eliminated by judges. [86] This leads to two conclusions: (1) judges and jurors both play a role in determining punitive damages; [87] and (2) punitive damages are not as significant as a consideration of jury verdicts prior to remittitur might indicate. Professor Bogus also justified the failure of jurors to follow the instructions in experiments such as the one performed by Professor Viscusi. He asserted that jurors may understand that there is more to punitive damages than the factors contained in the jury instructions. For example, jurors may think that the focus of economists on the concept of the defendant's proper level of care is misapplied in cases in which the defendant holds other people's lives in its hands. Professor Bogus concluded that we should not remove the democratic element from punitive damage awards.

Dr. John Calfee joined other panelists in attacking the unpredictability of punitive damage awards. He offered the breast implant litigation as a paradigmatic example. [88] In that case, the defendant offered a four billion dollar settlement to all plaintiffs, from which thousands of plaintiffs opted out. Faced with the prospect of large jury verdicts, the company declared bankruptcy, despite the fact that some compensatory awards were later overturned. Dr. Calfee asserted that the defendant was fearful of punitive damages in the future. Because companies are unable to accurately assess either the risk of punitive damages or the likely magnitude of those damages, they are unable to make rational decisions. Dr. Calfee argued that supplying the decision-maker with a formula to determine punitive damages would avoid this unpredictability.

CONCLUSION

Overall, the Symposium provided a forum for scholars to debate the continued efficacy of punitive damages--a topic of particular significance given the recent criticism of punitive damages and accompanying pushes for reform. Critics have asserted that these super-compensatory awards are out of control and are not achieving the goals [*485] for which they were designed. The policy debate being fought in the legislatures and legal literature are symptoms of deeper empirical and theoretical disagreements. Until those disagreements are reconciled, the policy debate will likely continue.

FOOTNOTES:

REV_00262941

n1 David Luban, A Flawed Case Against Punitive Damages, 87 GEO. L.J. 359, 360 (1998); see also Marc Galanter, Shadow Play: The Fabled Menace of Punitive Damages, 1998 WIS. L. REV. 1, 2 (indicating that punitive damages are awarded in three percent of jury verdicts).

n2 See, e.g., Gregory Nathan Hoole, Note, In the Wake of Seemingly Exorbitant Punitive Damage Awards America Demands Caps on Punitive Damages--Are We Barking Up the Wrong Tree?, 22 J. CONTEMP. L. 459, 459-60 (1996). The large sum of punitive damage awards may feed into the reform movement as well. In 1992, for example, the seventy-five most populous counties in the United States awarded a total of $ 327,300,000 in punitive damages. Brian J. Ostrom, David B. Rottman & John A. Goerdt, A Step Above Anecdote: A Profile of the Civil Jury in the 1990s, 79 JUDICATURE 233, 239 (1996).

n3 This occurred even though the judge decreased the award significantly. Susanah Mead, Punitive Damages and the Spill Felt Round the World: A U.S. Perspective, 17 LOY. L.A. INT'L & COMP. L.J. 829, 830 (1995); see also Valerie P. Hans, The Contested Role of the Civil Jury in Business Litigation, 79 JUDICATURE 242, 242 (1996) (indicating that the McDonald's coffee verdict was the "natural vehicle" for the Republican Party to use in its tort reform efforts).

n4 See, e.g., David Schkade, Cass R. Sunstein & Daniel Kahneman, Deliberating About Dollars: The Severity Shift, 100 COLUM. L. REV. 1139, 1144 (2000); see also Jonathan Hadley Koenig, Note, Punitive Damage "Overkill" After TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources: The Need for a Congressional Solution, 36 WM. & MARY L. REV. 751, 751-52 (1995) (arguing that the "highly-publicized and seemingly unjust nature" of punitive damages made them an issue in the 1992 presidential elections). But see Luban, supra note 1, at 361-62 (arguing that punitive damages are generally modest and that only a few outlier juries award exorbitant sums).

n5 David F. Partlett, Punitive Damages: Legal Hot Zones, 56 LA. L. REV. 781, 792 (1996).

n6 See, e.g., RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 908(1) (1979); David Crump, Evidence, Economics, and Ethics: What Information Should Jurors Be Given to Determine the Amount of a Punitive-Damage Award?, 57 MD. L. REV. 174, 182 (1998); A. Mitchell Polinsky & Steven Shavell, Punitive Damages: An Economic Analysis, 111 HARV. L. REV. 869, 873-74 (1998); Cass R. Sunstein, David Schkade & Daniel Kahneman, Do People Want Optimal Deterrence?, 29 J. LEGAL STUD. 237, 237-38 (2000).

n7 Marc Galanter & David Luban, Poetic Justice: Punitive Damages and Legal Pluralism, 42 AM. U. L. REV. 1393, 1426-27 (1993) (indicating that the imposition of punitive damages can offset weak administrative remedies and alter corporate behavior).

n8 See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 6, at 874; Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 1, 52 (1982).

n9 The most important of these rules are the payment of attorney's fees by each party to its own counsel and the requirement in contract cases of certainty of damages before they are awarded. John A. Sebert, Jr., Punitive and Nonpecuniary Damages in Actions Based Upon Contract: Toward Achieving the Objective of Full Compensation, 33 UCLA L. REV. 1565, 1659-62 (1986). Although Sebert claims that he is concentrating upon full compensation as the justification for punitive damages, he also asserts that full compensation, including punitive damages, is necessary in order to ensure that parties only breach when it is efficient to do so. Id.

n10 Polinsky and Shavell present the classic economic model, arguing that when there is less than a 100% chance that defendants will be held liable, punitive damages should be used to offset the chance of non-detection. Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 6, at 887-90. It is

REV_00262942

American Insurance Association

FAX

TO:	Brett Kavanaugh	FROM:	Craig Berrington
COMPANY:	White House Counsel's Office	COMPANY:	American Insurance Association
FAX#:	202-456-5104	FAX#:	202-828-7117
PHONE#:		PHONE#:	202-828-7156
DATE:	October 3, 2002	PAGES:	03(Including cover)

Comments:

Brett, per your conversation with Leigh Ann, I am enclosing a slightly marked-up version of yesterday's offer. The first change is to merely have paragraphs (a)(1) and(a)(2) in accord with paragraph (a)(4). I made the change in (a)(1) and (a)(2) so their jurisdictional language would be identical to the language in (a)(4). The second change is to paragraph (a)(5), "Limits on Damages." That change would add another very narrowly tailored condition under which punitive damages could be had, specifically, where the defendant's act was in willful disregard of a statutory obligation and that willful act significantly contributed to the act of terrorism. This would be a very difficult standard to prove (especially using a "clear and convincing" evidentiary test), but if proved in a federal court (or to a federal judge selected by the multidistrict panel) would be a situation where a strong case could be made for punitives. I think it would also respond to the types of fact patterns that have been described to us by Senate Democratic staff. Hope this helps a bit. Please give me a call if you would like to discuss (202-828-7156). You can also email me at cberrington@aiadc.org. Thanks.

Craig Berrington Craig

If there are any problems with this fax transmission please call 202-828-7152

This facsimile may be confidential, may also be privileged, and is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the named recipient (or responsible for delivery of the facsimile to the named recipient), you may not disclose its contents to any other person, use it for any purpose, or store or copy it in any medium. If you have received this facsimile in error, we apologize for the inconvenience, but ask that you please destroy it and any copies.

1130 Connecticut Avenue, NW, Suite 1000 • Washington, DC 20036 • Phone: 202/828-7100 • Fax 202/293-1219 • www.aiadc.org

Sheila.Bair@do.treas.gov
11/02/2001 09:44:36 AM

Record Type: Record

To: See the distribution list at the bottom of this message

cc:
Subject: FW: draft bill

---

fyi
-----Original Message-----
From: Sarah_Kline@banking.senate.gov [mailto:Sarah_Kline@banking.senate.gov]
Sent: Friday, November 02, 2001 9:26 AM
To: Sheila.Bair@do.treas.gov; Martha.Ellett@do.treas.gov; Roberta.McInerney@do.treas.gov
Subject: draft bill

Attached is the most current version of the bill. The tort language is still being worked on, as you know, but I wanted to make sure everyone was working off
the same draft.

Thanks,

-Sarah

- AYO01_A30.pdf

Message Sent To:

D. Marcus Sumerlin/OPD/EOP
Kristen Silverberg/WHO/EOP
Randall S. Kroszner/CEA/EOP
Brett M. Kavanaugh/WHO/EOP
Matthew Kirk/WHO/EOP

107TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

S. _____

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

_____ introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on _____

A BILL

To promote the stabilization of the economy by encouraging financial institutions to continue to support economic development, including development in urban areas, through the provision of affordable insurance coverage against acts of terrorism, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

(b) CONDITIONS FOR FEDERAL PAYMENTS.—No payment may be made by the Secretary under subsection (c), unless—

(1) a policyholder that suffers an insured loss, or a person acting on behalf of that policyholder, files a claim with a participating insurance company;

(2) at the time of offer, purchase, and renewal of each policy covering an insured loss, the participating insurance company provides clear and conspicuous disclosure in the policy to the policyholder of the premium charged for insured losses covered by the Program and the Federal share of compensation for insured losses under the Program;

(3) the participating insurance company processes the claim for the insured loss in accordance with its standard business practices, and any procedures that the Secretary may reasonably prescribe; and

(4) the participating insurance company submits to the Secretary, in accordance with such procedures as the Secretary may establish—

(A) a claim for payment of the Federal share of compensation for insured losses under the Program;

(B) written verification and certification—

(i) of the underlying claim; and

(ii) of all payments made to policyholders for insured losses; and

(C) certification of its compliance with the provisions of this subsection.

(c) SHARED INSURANCE LOSS COVERAGE.—

(1) FEDERAL SHARE.—Subject to the limitations in paragraph (2), the Federal share of compensation under the Program, to be paid by the Secretary, shall be—

(A) for insured losses resulting from an act of terrorism occurring during the period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act and ending on December 31, 2002, 90 percent of the aggregate amount of all such losses in excess of $10,000,000,000;

(B) for insured losses resulting from an act of terrorism occurring during the period beginning on January 1, 2003 and ending on December 31, 2003, 90 percent of the aggregate amount of all such losses in excess of $10,000,000,000; and

(C) if the Program is extended in accordance with section 6, for insured losses resulting from an act of terrorism occurring during the period beginning on January 1, 2004 and ending on December 31, 2004, 90 percent of the aggregate amount of all such losses in excess of $20,000,000,000.

(2) CAP ON ANNUAL LIABILITY.—Notwithstanding paragraph (1), or any other provision of Federal or State law, if the aggregate insured losses exceed $100,000,000,000 during any period referred to in subparagraphs (A) and (B) of paragraph (1) (or the period referred to in subparagraph (C) of paragraph (1) if the Program is extended in accordance with section 6)—

(A) the Secretary shall not make any payment under this Act for any portion of the amount of such losses that exceeds $100,000,000,000; and

(B) participating insurance companies shall not be liable for the payment of any portion of the amount that exceeds $100,000,000,000.

(3) NOTICE TO CONGRESS.—The Secretary shall notify the Congress if estimated or actual aggregate insured losses exceed $100,000,000,000 in any period described in paragraph (1), and the Congress shall determine the procedures for and the source of any such excess payments.

(4) FINAL NETTING.—The Secretary shall have sole discretion to determine the time at which claims relating to any insured loss or act of terrorism shall become final.

(5) DETERMINATIONS FINAL.—Any determination of the Secretary under this subsection shall be final, and shall not be subject to judicial review.

(d) FUNDING.—

(1) PAYMENT AUTHORITY.—This Act constitutes payment authority in advance of appropriation Acts and represents the obligation of the Federal Government to provide for the Federal share of compensation for insured losses under the Program.

(2) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary such sums as may be necessary to pay the administrative expenses of the Program.

SEC. 5. GENERAL AUTHORITY AND ADMINISTRATION OF CLAIMS.

(a) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—The Secretary shall have the powers and authorities necessary to carry out the Program, including authority—

(1) to investigate and audit all claims under the Program; and

(2) to prescribe regulations and procedures to implement the Program.

(b) INTERIM RULES AND PROCEDURES.—The Secretary shall issue interim final rules or procedures specifying the manner in which—

(1) participating insurance companies may file, verify, and certify claims under the Program;

(2) the Secretary shall publish or otherwise publicly announce the applicable percentage of insured losses to be paid by participating insurance companies and the Federal share of compensation for insured losses under the Program;

(3) the Federal share of compensation for insured losses will be paid under the Program, including payments based on estimates of or actual aggregate insured losses;

(4) the Secretary may, at any time, seek repayment from or reimburse any participating insurance company, based on estimates of insured losses under the Program, to effectuate the insured loss sharing schedule and limitations contained in section 4;

(5) participating insurance companies that incur insured losses shall pay their pro rata share of insured losses in accordance with the schedule and limitations contained in section 4; and

(6) the Secretary will determine any final netting of payments for actual insured losses under the Program, including payments owed to the Federal Government from any participating insurance company and any Federal share of compensation for insured losses owed to any participating insurance company, to effectuate the insured loss sharing schedule and limitations contained in section 4.

(c) CONTRACTS FOR SERVICES.—The Secretary may employ persons or contract for services as may be necessary to implement the Program.

(d) CIVIL PENALTIES.—The Secretary may assess civil money penalties for violations of this Act or any rule, regulation, or order issued by the Secretary under this Act relating to the submission of false or misleading information for purposes of the Program, or any failure to repay any amount required to be reimbursed under regulations or procedures described in section 5(b)(5).

SEC. 6. TERMINATION OF PROGRAM; DISCRETIONARY EXTENSION.

(a) TERMINATION OF PROGRAM.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—This Act is repealed, and the Program shall terminate, on December 31, 2003, unless the Secretary—

(A) determines, after considering the report and finding required by this section, that the Program should be extended for one additional year, until December 31, 2004; and

(B) promptly notifies the Congress of such determination and the reasons therefore.

(2) DETERMINATION FINAL.—The determination of the Secretary under paragraph (1) shall be final, and shall not be subject to judicial review.

(3) TERMINATION AFTER EXTENSION.—If the Program is extended under paragraph (1), this Act is repealed, and the Program shall terminate, on December 31, 2004.

(b) REPORT TO CONGRESS.—Not later than 18 months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall submit a report to Congress—

(1) regarding—

(A) the availability of insurance coverage for acts of terrorism;

(B) the affordability of such coverage, including the effect of such coverage on premiums; and

(C) the capacity of the insurance industry to absorb future losses resulting from acts of terrorism, taking into account the profitability of the insurance industry; and

(2) that considers—

(A) the impact of the Program on each of the factors described in paragraph (1); and

(B) the probable impact on such factors and on the United States economy if the Program terminates on December 31, 2003.

(c) FINDING REQUIRED.—A determination under subsection (a) to extend the Program shall be based on a finding by the Secretary that—

(1) widespread market uncertainties continue to disrupt the ability of insurance companies to price insurance coverage for losses resulting from acts of terrorism, thereby resulting in the continuing unavailability of affordable insurance for consumers; and

(2) extending the Program for an additional year would likely encourage economic stabilization and facilitate a transition to a viable market for private terrorism risk insurance.

(d) CONTINUING AUTHORITY TO PAY OR ADJUST COMPENSATION.—Notwithstanding the date on which the Program terminates under subsection (a), the Secretary may take any actions necessary to ensure payment, reimbursement, or adjustment of compensation for insured losses arising out of any act of terrorism occurring during the period during which the Program is in effect under this Act.

(e) STUDY AND REPORT ON SCOPE OF THE PROGRAM.—

(1) STUDY.—The Secretary, after consultation with the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, representatives of the insurance industry, and other experts in the insurance field, shall conduct a study of the potential effects of acts of terrorism on the availability of life insurance and other lines of insurance coverage.

(2) REPORT.—Not later than 1 year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall submit a report to the Congress on the results of the study conducted under paragraph (1).

SEC. 7 PRESERVATION OF STATE LAW.

Nothing in this Act shall affect the jurisdiction or regulatory authority of the insurance commissioner (or any agency or office performing like functions) of any State over any participating insurance company or other person—

(1) except as specifically provided in this Act; and

(2) except that—

(A) the definition of the term "act of terrorism" in section 3 shall be the exclusive definition for purposes of compensation for insured losses under this Act, and shall preempt any provision of State law that is inconsistent with that definition, to the extent that such provision of law would otherwise apply to any insurance policy relating to terrorism risk in the United States; and

(B) during the period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act and ending on December 31, 2002, rates for terrorism risk insurance covered by this Act and filed with any State shall not be subject to prior approval or a waiting period, under any law of a State that would otherwise be applicable, provided that nothing in this Act affects the ability of any State to invalidate a rate as excessive, inadequate, or unfairly discriminatory.

SEC. 8. SENSE OF THE CONGRESS.

It is the sense of the Congress that the insurance industry should build capacity and aggregate risk to provide

SECTION. 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Terrorism Risk Insurance Act of 2001".

SEC. 2. CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) property and casualty insurance firms are important financial institutions, the products of which allow mutualization of risk and the efficient use of financial resources and enhance the ability of the economy to maintain stability, while responding to a variety of economic, political, environmental, and other risks with a minimum of disruption;

(2) the ability of businesses and individuals to obtain property and casualty insurance at reasonable and predictable prices, in order to spread the risk of both routine and catastrophic loss, is critical to economic growth, urban development, and the construction and maintenance of public and private housing, as well as to the promotion of United States exports and foreign trade in an increasingly interconnected world;

(3) the ability of the insurance industry to cover the unprecedented financial risks presented by potential acts of terrorism in the United States can be a major factor in the recovery from terrorist at-affordable property and casualty coverage for terrorism risk.

SEC. 9. PROCEDURES FOR CIVIL ACTIONS.

(a) FEDERAL CAUSE OF ACTION.—There shall exist a Federal cause of action for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism, which shall be the exclusive cause of action and remedy for claims for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism. All State causes of action of any kind for property damage, personal injury, or death otherwise available arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism, are hereby preempted, except as provided in subsection (f).

(b) GOVERNING LAW.—The substantive law for decision in an action for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism under this section shall be derived from the law, including applicable choice of law principles, of the [State, or States determined to be required by the district court assigned under subsection (c), unless such law is inconsistent with or otherwise preempted by Federal law.]

(c) FEDERAL JURISDICTION.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, not later than 90 days after the occurrence of an act of terrorism, the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall assign a single Federal district court to conduct pretrial and trial proceedings in all pending and future civil actions for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from that act of terrorism.

(2) SELECTION CRITERIA.—The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall select and assign the district court under paragraph (1) based on the convenience of the parties and the just and efficient conduct of the proceedings.

(3) JURISDICTION.—The district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction over all actions under paragraph (1). For purposes of personal jurisdiction, the district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall be deemed to sit in all judicial districts in the United States.

(4) TRANSFER OF CASES FILED IN OTHER FEDERAL COURTS.—Any civil action for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism that is filed in a Federal district court other than the Federal district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation under paragraph (1) shall be transferred to the Federal district court so assigned.

(5) REMOVAL OF CASES FILED IN STATE COURTS.—Any civil action for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism that is filed in a State court shall be removable to the Federal district court assigned by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation under paragraph (1).

[(d) APPROVAL OF SETTLEMENTS.—Any settlement between the parties of a civil action described in this section for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism shall be subject to prior approval by the Secretary.]

(e) LIMITATION ON DAMAGES.—Punitive or exemplary damages shall not be available in any civil action subject to this section.

(f) CLAIMS AGAINST TERRORISTS.—Nothing in this section shall in any way limit the ability of any plaintiff to seek any form of recovery from any person, government or other entity that was a participant in, or aider and abettor of, any act of terrorism.

(g) EFFECTIVE PERIOD.—This section shall apply only to actions for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from acts of terrorism that occur during the effective period of the Program, including, if applicable, any extension period under section 6.

REV_00262973

REV_00262974

tacks, while maintaining the stability of the economy;

(4) widespread financial market uncertainties have arisen following the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, including the absence of information from which financial institutions can make statistically valid estimates of the probability and size of future terrorist events, and therefore the size, funding, and allocation of the risk of loss caused by such acts of terrorism;

(5) a decision by property and casualty insurers to deal with such uncertainties, either by terminating property and casualty coverage for losses arising from terrorist events, or by radically escalating premium coverage to compensate for risks of loss that are not readily predictable, could seriously hamper ongoing and planned construction, property acquisition, and other business projects, generate a dramatic increase in rents, and otherwise suppress economic activity; and

(6) the United States Government should provide temporary financial assistance to insured parties, contributing to the stabilization of the United States economy in a time of national crisis, while the financial services industry develops the systems, mechanisms, products, and programs necessary to create a viable financial services market for private terrorism risk insurance.

(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to establish a temporary Federal program that provides for a transparent system of shared public and private compensation for insured losses resulting from acts of terrorism in order to—

(1) protect consumers by addressing market disruptions and ensure the continued widespread availability and affordability of property and casualty insurance for terrorism risk; and

(2) allow for a transitional period for the private markets to stabilize, resume pricing of such insurance, and build capacity to absorb any future losses, while preserving State insurance regulation and consumer protections.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

In this Act, the following definitions shall apply:

(1) ACT OF TERRORISM.—

(A) CERTIFICATION.—The term "act of terrorism" means any act that is certified by the Secretary, in concurrence with the Secretary of State, and the Attorney General of the United States—

(i) to be a violent act or an act that is dangerous to—

(I) human life;

(II) property; or

(III) infrastructure;

(ii) to have resulted in damage within the United States, or outside of the United States in the case of an air carrier described in paragraph (3)(A)(ii); and

(iii) to have been committed by an individual or individuals acting on behalf of any foreign person or foreign interest, as part of an effort to coerce the civilian population of the United States or to influence the policy or affect the conduct of the United States Government by coercion.

(B) LIMITATION.—No act or event shall be certified by the Secretary as an act of terrorism if—

(i) the act or event is committed in the course of a war declared by the Congress; or

(ii) losses resulting from the act or event, in the aggregate, do not exceed $5,000,000.

(C) DETERMINATIONS FINAL.—Any certification of, or determination not to certify, an act or event as an act of terrorism under this paragraph shall be final, and shall not be subject to judicial review.

(2) BUSINESS INTERRUPTION COVERAGE.—The term "business interruption coverage"—

(A) means coverage of losses for temporary relocation expenses and ongoing expenses, including ordinary wages, where—

(i) there is physical damage to the business premises of such magnitude that the business cannot open for business;

(ii) there is physical damage to other property that totally prevents customers or employees from gaining access to the business premises; or

(iii) the Federal, State, or local government shuts down an area due to physical or environmental damage, thereby preventing customers or employees from gaining access to the business premises; and

(B) does not include lost profits, other than in the case of a small business concern (as defined in section 3 of the Small Business Act (15 U.S.C. 632) and applicable regulations thereunder) in any case described in clause (i), (ii), or (iii) of subparagraph (A).

(3) INSURED LOSS.—The term "insured loss"—

(A) means any loss resulting from an act of terrorism that is covered by any type of commercial or personal property and casualty insurance policy or endorsement, including business interruption coverage, issued by a participating insurance company—

(i) if such loss occurs within the United States; and

(ii) to an air carrier (as defined in section 40102 of title 49, United States Code), regardless of where the loss occurs; and

(B) does not include any loss covered by any type of life or health insurance policy.

(4) PARTICIPATING INSURANCE COMPANY.—The term "participating insurance company" means any insurance company, including any subsidiary or affiliate thereof—

(A) that—

(i) is licensed or admitted to engage in the business of providing primary insurance in any State; or

(ii) is not so licensed or admitted, if it is an eligible surplus line carrier listed on the Quarterly Listing of Alien Insurers of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, or any successor thereto;

(B) that offers in all of its property and casualty insurance policies, coverage for insured losses;

(C) that offers property and casualty insurance coverage for insured losses that does not differ materially from the terms, amounts, and other coverage limitations applicable to losses arising from events other than acts of terrorism; and

(D) that meets any other criteria that the Secretary may reasonably prescribe.

(6) PERSON.—The term "person" means any individual, business, or nonprofit entity (including a partnership, limited liability company, corporation, or association), trust or estate, or a State or political subdivision of a State or other governmental unit.

(7) PROGRAM.—The term "Program" means the Terrorism Insured Loss Shared Compensation Program established by this Act.

(8) SECRETARY.—The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Treasury.

(9) STATE.—The term "State" means any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, American Samoa, Guam, and each of the United States Virgin Islands.

(10) UNITED STATES.—The term "United States" means all States of the United States.

SEC. 4. TERRORISM INSURED LOSS SHARED COMPENSATION PROGRAM.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—There is established in the Department of the Treasury the Terrorism Insured Loss Shared Compensation Program.

(2) AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY.—Notwithstanding any other provision of State or Federal law, the Secretary shall administer the Program, and shall pay the Federal share of compensation for insured losses in accordance with subsection (c).

REV_00262960

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

OFFICE OF THE COUNSEL TO THE PRESIDENT

Facsimile
Cover Sheet

Phone: (202) 456-7900
Fax: (202) 456-1647

Date: _____ Time: _____

To: Matt Kirk

Fax: _____

From: _____

Number of Pages: _____

Message:

_____

_____

_____

_____

_____

_____

Confidentiality Notice

The document accompanying this telecopy transmission contain confidential information belonging to the sender which is legally privileged. The information is intended only for the use of the individual or entity named above. If you are not the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any disclosure, copying, or distribution or the taking of any action in reliance on the contents of this telecopied information is strictly prohibited. If you have received this telecopy in error, please immediately notify us by telephone to arrange for return of the original documents to us.

Talking Points re Punitive Damages Language of H.R.1

Punitive Damages Language from H.R. 1

"Punitive damages may not be awarded against a teacher in an action brought for harm based on the act or omission of a teacher acting within the scope of the teacher's employment or responsibilities to a school or governmental entity unless the claimant establishes by clear and convincing evidence that the harm was proximately caused by an act or omission of such teacher that constitutes willful or criminal misconduct, or a conscious, flagrant indifference to the rights or safety of the individual harmed."

Problems with Language

Background

- If punitive damages were available, one award in one case could wipe out the resources of any liable defendants, leaving some plaintiffs without compensation. This will both prevent full and equitable compensation for the injured victims and deplete the assets of the business in question, harming victims, shareholders, and workers.

- The mere threat of punitive damages after a terrorist act will lead to far higher settlements, thereby leading legitimate businesses to seek bankruptcy protection so as to avoid predatory lawsuits. The ripple effects on the economy in the wake of a major terrorist attack could be enormous.

- On a forward-looking basis, the mere availability of punitive damages means that businesses will be uninsured against such damages and exposed to huge damages awards. This will make lenders less likely to lend to a company that cannot ensure repayment in the event of a terrorist attack.

Points

- The language in H.R. 1 is far too elastic and is the rough equivalent of recklessness. Any good plaintiff's lawyer can turn even simple negligence into a plausible case of recklessness, which is little protection at all. (What is more, the phrase "willful misconduct" is especially loose and could be interpreted as negligence.) As the courts and commentators have recognized, "terms such as willful, wanton, conscious indifference, reckless disregard, and recklessness are overlapping and to a substantial extent redundant [and are referenced as] the recklessness group." Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1 (1982).

- These standards "may denote a mental state accompanying a defendant's act, but that mental state is different from that of actual malice." Id.

- This is not the type of conduct that should subject a victim of terrorism to additional punitive damages. Such a standard leaves defendants exposed to the threat of an enormous, unfair award, causing all of the same problems noted above. Given the enormous stakes in the mass tort context, the standard must ensure that punitive damages are reserved for those who have engaged in serious wrongdoing – deliberate harm or intentional disregard for the safety of the victim.

To: K. Rove
M. Kirk
B. Conklin
K. Silverberg
K. Warsh
K. Hennessey
B. Kavanaugh
R. Krozner

From: Kirk

Re: Daschle letter to donors from June.

Thomas A. Daschle

I am pleased to report that yesterday, at long last, the Senate broke a filibuster of the terrorism reinsurance legislation led by Trent Lott and Phil Gramm and passed the bill. My conversations with you and others reinforced my view of the importance of enacting this bill as quickly as possible, and I am hopeful that this long overdue vote will pave the way for constructive negotiations with the House that will produce a consensus reinsurance bill.

As you know, we still face two significant differences with the House – on the formula for coverage and tort reform language. Under the Senate bill, the government will pay 80% of losses resulting from a terrorist attack up to $10 billion and 90% of losses after that. The House bill provides mainly for long-term low interest loans to help insurers cope with claims from a major attack. The White House, I should add, strongly supports the Senate approach.

I believe that a consensus package that will ensure that terrorism coverage is widely available at affordable prices, and that property owners who bear no blame for a terrorist attack will not be liable for punitive damages, can – indeed – must be reached. But, as we discussed, to get this accomplished quickly all parties must put aside secondary agendas and concentrate on these two primary objectives. We can debate our differences in other forums.

Senate Democrats have demonstrated their commitment to our overarching goal. Only one Democrat voted against breaking the filibuster, and no Democrat voted against final passage of the bill. In contrast, 30 Republicans voted for continuing the filibuster of this vital legislation, and 14 Republicans voted against the bill.

I report these facts not to score partisan points, but rather to emphasize the importance of setting aside other agendas and concentrating on our primary mission. Let's enact a workable terrorism reinsurance bill and fight out secondary issues in separate legislation. Any help you might offer in impressing this message on our Republican friends in Congress would be welcome.

Again, [redacted] I appreciate how strongly you feel about this issue and have benefited from your input on it. Please don't hesitate to give me a call if you have any questions or suggestions as the debate continues.

Sincerely,

Tom Daschle

TALKING POINTS IN RESPONSE

"The Senate bill protects the taxpayer from punitive damages because it provides that punitives are not 'insured losses' for purposes of this program."

- Even with the Senate provision, taxpayers will end up paying for punitive damages because many, if not most, of these cases will be resolved with settlements. If a plaintiff has sued for large amounts of punitive damages, the settlement will be higher because of the risk of a punitive award from the jury, but the settlement will not specify that it includes amounts for punitives. The settlement costs will be picked up by the taxpayer through this program.
- Further, the punitive provision is important for reasons other than protecting taxpayer funds. Punitive damages are not designed to compensate the plaintiff; the plaintiff is fully compensated through economic and non-economic damages. If punitives are available, one award can wipe out the resources of any liable defendants, leaving some plaintiffs without compensation.
- No one should profit off an act of terrorism by obtaining punitive damages (which, by definition, are beyond what is necessary to compensate the victims) against third parties who did not commit or aid the act of terrorism.
- In some states, punitives are available even for unintentional conduct (such as gross negligence or recklessness). This is not the type of conduct that should subject a victim of terrorism to additional damage. And even a high standard leaves defendants exposed to the threat of an enormous, unfair award, which makes them more liable to settle the case for a high amount even if the claim is meritless. So, a higher standard will not fix the problem unless it's connected to something concrete like a criminal conviction.

NOTE: They may float the idea of making punitives uninsurable under federal law. The arguments above apply. In addition:

- Pre-empting state law on the insurability of punitives is the worst case scenario because it saddles American companies with the full risk of any terrorist attack. This does nothing to provide predictability and stability for American businesses or to encourage lenders to participate in construction projects. This is a windfall for the insurance industry on the backs of American workers because, at the same industry retention level, part of their exposure is eliminated.

- Although some states explicitly prohibit insuring punitive damages and some states prohibit ensuring certain kinds of willful conduct, punitives may be insurable when they are assessed for less egregious conduct.

"Why shouldn't a tortfeasor who is grossly negligent be liable for punitive damages."

- Gross negligence is actually quite a low standard for punitives, which are designed for criminal-like conduct. Anyone can plead gross negligence for virtually any behavior and either make it to a jury or extort a high settlement.
- If there are American businesses who deserve punishment following an attack, the federal and state governments can fine or prosecute them. We shouldn't cripple the economy to preserve the right to collect damages that exceed the harm caused to the plaintiff.
- The one plaintiff who receives that punitive award may deprive other plaintiffs of any compensation.

"Federal courts rarely assess punitive damages"

- Even though both bills create a federal cause of action, the substantive rules are derived from state law in the state where the acts took place. The courts will award punitives if they are available under state law, which can be quite often.
- Federal courts do not award punitives frequently today because mass torts are typically tried in state court.

"Liability provisions are not essential to the real estate and insurance industries"

- Show letters from industry.
- They are reacting to their belief that even modest, time-limited liability rules may hold up the bill. They will compromise to get federal backstop.
- Other industries, such as transportation, are heavily burdened by third-party liability premiums and won't be helped without a liability fix.

- Although some states explicitly prohibit insuring punitive damages and some states prohibit ensuring certain kinds of willful conduct, punitives may be insurable when they are assessed for less egregious conduct.

"Why shouldn't a tortfeasor who is grossly negligent be liable for punitive damages."

- Gross negligence is actually quite a low standard for punitives, which are designed for criminal-like conduct. Anyone can plead gross negligence for virtually any behavior and either make it to a jury or extort a high settlement.
- If there are American businesses who deserve punishment following an attack, the federal and state governments can fine or prosecute them. We shouldn't cripple the economy to preserve the right to collect damages that exceed the harm caused to the plaintiff.
- The one plaintiff who receives that punitive award may deprive other plaintiffs of any compensation.

"Federal courts rarely assess punitive damages"

- Even though both bills create a federal cause of action, the substantive rules are derived from state law in the state where the acts took place. The courts will award punitives if they are available under state law, which can be quite often.
- Federal courts do not award punitives frequently today because mass torts are typically tried in state court.

"Liability provisions are not essential to the real estate and insurance industries"

- Show letters from industry.
- They are reacting to their belief that even modest, time-limited liability rules may hold up the bill. They will compromise to get federal backstop.
- Other industries, such as transportation, are heavily burdened by third-party liability premiums and won't be helped without a liability fix.

TALKING POINTS IN RESPONSE

"The Senate bill protects the taxpayer from punitive damages because it provides that punitives are not 'insured losses' for purposes of this program."

- Even with the Senate provision, taxpayers will end up paying for punitive damages because many, if not most, of these cases will be resolved with settlements. If a plaintiff has sued for large amounts of punitive damages, the settlement will be higher because of the risk of a punitive award from the jury, but the settlement will not specify that it includes amounts for punitives. The settlement costs will be picked up by the taxpayer through this program.
- Further, the punitive provision is important for reasons other than protecting taxpayer funds. Punitive damages are not designed to compensate the plaintiff; the plaintiff is fully compensated through economic and non-economic damages. If punitives are available, one award can wipe out the resources of any liable defendants, leaving some plaintiffs without compensation.
- No one should profit off an act of terrorism by obtaining punitive damages (which, by definition, are beyond what is necessary to compensate the victims) against third parties who did not commit or aid the act of terrorism.
- In some states, punitives are available even for unintentional conduct (such as gross negligence or recklessness). This is not the type of conduct that should subject a victim of terrorism to additional damage. And even a high standard leaves defendants exposed to the threat of an enormous, unfair award, which makes them more liable to settle the case for a high amount even if the claim is meritless. So, a higher standard will not fix the problem unless it's connected to something concrete like a criminal conviction.

NOTE: They may float the idea of making punitives uninsurable under federal law. The arguments above apply. In addition:

- Pre-empting state law on the insurability of punitives is the worst case scenario because it saddles American companies with the full risk of any terrorist attack. This does nothing to provide predictability and stability for American businesses or to encourage lenders to participate in construction projects. This is a windfall for the insurance industry on the backs of American workers because, at the same industry retention level, part of their exposure is eliminated.

VIA FACSIMILE

April 15, 2002

The Honorable Tom Daschle
Senate Majority Leader
5221 Capitol Building
Washington, DC 20510

The Honorable Dennis Hastert
Speaker of the House of Representatives
H232 Capitol Building
Washington, DC 20515

The Honorable Trent Lott Senate Republican Leader
S-230 Capitol Building
Washington, DC 20510

The Honorable Richard Gephardt House Democrat Leader
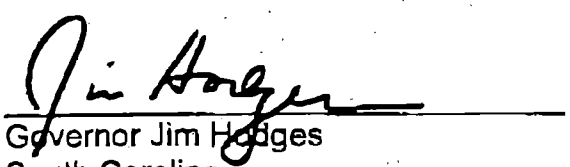
H-204 Capitol Building
Washington, DC 20515

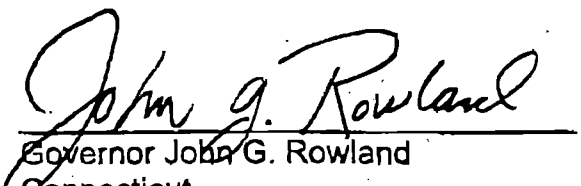
Dear Congressional Leaders:

As a result of the events of September 11th, the nation's property and casualty insurance companies have or will pay out losses that will exceed $35 billion dollars. Since the first of January, many insurance companies, self-insurers and states have been faced with a situation where they are unable to spread the risk that they insure because of the unavailability of reinsurance protection. In the event of another major attack, some companies or perhaps a segment of the industry would face insolvency. While most states have approved a limited exclusion for terrorism with a $25 million deductible, exclusions for workers' compensation coverage are not permitted by statute in any state. The present situation poses a grave risk to the solvency of the insurance industry, state insurance facilities, economic development initiatives, and the ability of our states to recover from impacts of the September 11th attacks.



In the months after the attack on our nation, legislation passed in the House and was introduced in the Senate to create a backstop for the insurance industry so they could continue to provide protection to their customers. The Administration has also supported this concept. Currently, there is broad bi-partisan agreement for providing an insurance backstop. Governors believe this is an important goal that should not be inhibited by other issues.

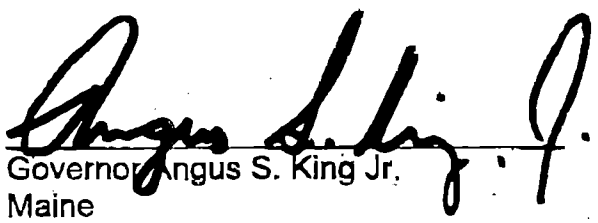
Since late December, the lack of a financial backstop has started to ripple through the economy and will continue to do so. This will further impact the ability of the economy to recover from the current recession.



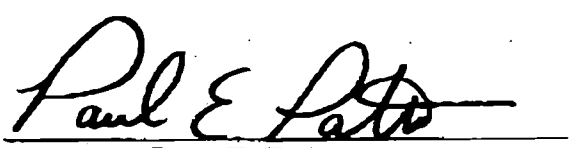
As Governors, we are facing many critical issues resulting from the September 11th crisis. The emerging problem in insurance coverage only serves to exacerbate our recovery efforts. In view of this, we, the undersigned Governors, respectfully urge the Congress to quickly complete its work on the terrorism reinsurance legislation in order to return stability to U.S. insurance markets.

Sincerely,

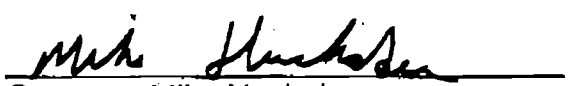
Sincerely,



Governor Jim Hodges
South Carolina



Governor John G. Rowland
Connecticut



Governor Mike Johanns
Nebraska

Governor Angus S. King Jr.
Maine

Governor Paul E. Patton Kentucky

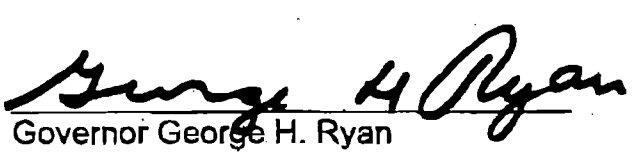
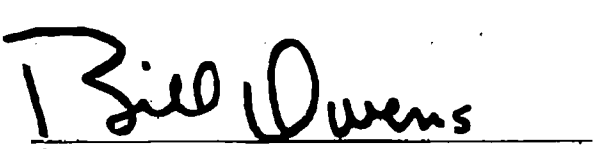
Governor Mike Huckabee
Arkansas



Governor Judy Martz
Montana

Governor Jim Geringer
Wyoming



Governor Don Siegelman
Alabama

Governor George H. Ryan Illinois

Governor Bob Holden Missouri

Governor Bill Owens
Colorado

Governor Mark R. Warner
Virginia

Governor Scott McCallum
Wisconsin

Governor Jeb Bush
Florida

Governor Jane Swift Massachusetts

Governor Frank O'Bannon
Indiana

Governor Bob Taft
Ohio

Matt Kirk

Dear Senator Dodd:

As you prepare to take up a terrorism insurance bill this session, I am writing to express the Administration's strong opposition to certain aspects of section 15 of the Terrorism Risk Protection Act (H.R. 3210), in particular, subsection 15(e).

Section 15 establishes a new federal cause of action for claims related to certified terrorist acts and limits damages and attorneys fees recoverable from defendants other than the perpetrators of the acts and their co-conspirators. Section 15(e) permits judgment holders to satisfy their judgments with the blocked assets of the responsible terrorist party, or an agency or instrumentality of that party.

To the extent that it relates to compensation for acts of international terrorism, section 15 impinges on Congress' recent directive to the Administration to submit "a legislative proposal to establish a comprehensive program to ensure fair, equitable, and prompt compensation for all United States victims of international terrorism." See Section 626 of the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State, the Judiciary and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 2002 (Pub. Law 107-77). The State Department, together with other agencies, is in the process of developing just such a program.

The Honorable
Christopher Dodd

By contrast, subsection 15(e) would stimulate a race to the courthouse among the attorneys for the victims who qualify, and since there are limited assets, only a handful of victims would be compensated under this system. It reflects an unfair and unseemly approach to compensation based on the unpredictability and vagaries of litigation rather than a systematic and equitable approach to providing relief to all victims of terrorism and their families, not just those who can pursue litigation.

Also, by making blocked assets of states available to fund terrorist victims' compensation, section 15(e) would impair the President's ability to use blocked assets to best meet U.S. foreign policy and national security interests. This is no abstract argument. For example, leverage from blocked Vietnamese assets was critical in getting Vietnam to address our concerns about MIA's and POW's and to take responsibility for over $200 million in outstanding U.S. claims. More recently, the return of the blocked assets of Afghanistan's central bank and the shoring up of Afghanistan's Interim Authority would not have been possible if those assets had instead been used to pay claims. These examples underscore the importance of maintaining blocked assets in order to support friendly successor governments that may emerge in formerly hostile states, and to reduce the amount of direct assistance that would otherwise be needed.

Moreover, section 15(e) permits the liquidation of all types of blocked assets of terrorist list states, including diplomatic and consular property. The provision's Presidential waiver, which would apply only to diplomatic and consular property, is insufficient to cover all property with respect to which the United States has obligations under the Vienna Conventions for Diplomatic and Consular Relations. This provision therefore would cause us to violate our international legal obligations. It also could set a precedent for foreign governments seizing U.S. government assets abroad.

In sum, as Congress directed in section 626 of Public Law 107-77, a comprehensive, fair, and rational system of compensation for victims of international terrorism is urgently needed. Parts of section 15 would overlap with the system that the Administration is in the process of developing, and subsection 15(e) would raise precisely the types of fairness and foreign policy concerns that the Administration is seeking to address.

Accordingly, we ask that you give us a chance to meet Congress' request to submit an appropriate compensation program in relation to acts of international terrorism. We look forward to working with you to ensure that such a program is enacted as soon as possible.

Sincerely,

Paul V. Kelly
Assistant Secretary
Legislative Affairs

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 96 Yale L.J. 1521,AT 1552

*96 Yale L.J. 1521, **

Copyright © 1987 Yale Law Journal Company.

Yale Law Journal

June, 1987

96 Yale L.J. 1521

LENGTH: 40193 words

ARTICLE: The Current Insurance Crisis and Modern Tort Law.

George L. Priest +

+ John M. Olin Professor of Law and Economics, Yale Law School. I am very grateful to Rachel Eisner, Elliot G. Freier, David Leifer and J. Hoult Verkerke for research assistance; to Kenneth S. Abraham, William H. Adams III, Armen Alchian, Susan J. Bennett, Owen M. Fiss, Victor P. Goldberg, Henry B. Hansmann, Howard Kunreuther, Burke Marshall, A. Mitchell Polinsky, Roberta Romano, Ralph Saul, Gary T. Schwartz, Peter H. Schuck, Kate Stith, Ralph A. Winter, and especially Michael J. Trebilcock, for comments on earlier drafts; and to the Program in Civil Liability, Yale Law School, for support. I have benefited from discussions of this Article with groups of executives at the CIGNA Corporation, with participants at the University of Houston Conference on Environmental Liability, and with members of faculty workshops at Yale and Vermont Law Schools. I am solely responsible for the contents.

SUMMARY:
... In still other cases -- intrauterine devices, wine tasting, and day care, -- insurers had refused to offer coverage at any premium, forcing these products and services to be withdrawn from the market. ... A third theory, most prominently espoused by the Justice Department, attributes the crisis to modern tort law's expansion of corporate liability exposure, which has necessitated insurance premium increases. ... In essence, the insurers are competing over the relatively low-risk insureds of any risk pool, who are likely to select that insurer most precisely able to price the risk the insured brings to the pool. ... An increase of 64% to 134% in the level of insurance coverage under tort law will not operate as a scalar, but will increase consumer risk pool variance and will lead to the unraveling of consumer risk pools. ... These exclusions maximize the availability of insurance because it is the cities that are without dump sites and the directors of firms not involved in tender offers that would drop out of the risk pool in order to self-insure if the insurance premium were increased to provide coverage for cities or directors exposed to these claims. ... The policy premium converges with the level of aggregate coverage, of course, because low-risk members have dropped out of the risk pool, despite the efforts of the insurer to narrow the range of risks. ...

TEXT:
[*1521] This paper is an effort to understand the source of the crisis in insurance that has

REV_00262990

Regardless of context, the accident prevention question is whether it was cost-effective for the provider or for the consumer to have made greater investments to prevent the loss. If the finder of fact determines that neither party could have prevented the loss in a cost-effective manner, then the resolution of the dispute in favor of the plaintiff or the defendant serves only to determine which party is to be the insurer for the loss, that is, where the loss should lie, given that the loss could not have been efficiently prevented.

Some courts and agencies appear to believe that increasing the obligation of providers to compensate victims will always increase these providers' investments in safety. Where damage measures are compensatory, however, there is a very definite ceiling to the accident prevention investments that any provider will make. [92] Providers will make investments to reduce the accident rate only to the extent that such investments are cost-effective -- that is, that the marginal costs of preventive investments are less than the marginal gain in expected accident cost reduction. Beyond that [*1538] point, it is less costly to pay damage claims or judgments than to prevent accidents from occurring. Thus, extending liability beyond that point will not affect the level of safety investments.

There are insurance implications, however, of every liability decision. If a liability standard were set only to require cost-effective preventive investments by a provider, some losses would still occur. [93] Victims would bear these losses, and thus would bear the obligation to obtain insurance for them through some first-party insurance mechanism. In contrast, if a provider were held liable for losses which the provider could not cost-effectively have prevented, the provider would bear the obligation to provide insurance. Either through self-insurance or some form of third-party insurance, the provider insures victims for losses that cannot efficiently be prevented.

The economic effects of steadily increasing provider liability thus are quite simple in structure. A liability rule can compel providers of products and services to make investments that reduce the accident rate up to the level of optimal (cost-effective) investments. [94] After providers have invested optimally in prevention, however, any further assignment of liability affects only the provision of insurance. More extensive provider liability will generate more extensive provider insurance and nothing more.

The expansion of liability under modern tort law has obviously increased the provision of provider insurance. Any standard beyond a bare cost-benefit test (often identified with negligence) [95] will provide an insurance effect. Courts, of course, have extended liability far beyond the simple cost-benefit standard. Thus, modern tort law compels a very substantial level of provider insurance.

More precisely, modern tort law has broadly shifted the insurance obligation from first-party insurance to third-party or self-insurance by providers. Even a bare-bones cost-benefit standard has insurance consequences: Such a standard creates an obligation of potential victims to obtain market insurance or to self-insure for unpreventable losses. Modern tort law has shifted that obligation to providers, requiring providers either to obtain third-party market insurance or to self-insure for the losses suffered by consumers of their products or services. The expansion of tort liability since the mid-1960's has expanded the range of contexts in which provider insurance must be offered. Courts understand this point [*1539] perfectly. Much of the modern extension of tort liability has been expressly justified by the salutary insurance consequences that are supposed to result. [96] Thus it is a paradox that the modern regime somehow has led to the reduction of insurance availability. The next Section examines more closely the operation of insurance markets in an attempt to resolve the paradox.

III. HOW INSURANCE OPERATES

This Section discusses some straightforward principles of the operation of insurance markets.

REV_00262999

It describes how insurance benefits consumers and thus what types of losses consumers will want to insure, the role of insurance companies in creating viable insurance pools, the determinants of insurance premiums, the different economic effects of differently defined risk pools, the limitations on the survivability of such pools, and the necessary conditions for expanding the availability of insurance within the society. The insurance principles discussed here are quite general. They apply to all insurance contexts and are not specific to the American economy. Nevertheless, they provide a basis for understanding the specific ways in which recent changes in American tort law have contributed to our current insurance crisis.

Insurance provides a method for individuals to equalize the amount of money available to them over diverse states of the world -- states in which losses occur and those in which there are no losses. Most commonly, it is a method of equalizing money available over time. The insured pays a premium, reducing his or her current wealth, in return for the insurer's agreement to pay some monetary amount to the insured should a loss occur. Insurance is different from savings because the amount paid out by the insurer is not (and may never be) absolutely equal to the amount paid in by the insured, obviously, for example, when the loss occurs in an early insurance period. [97]

The insurance function, instead, requires that the losses have some probabilistic character. If it were certain that a person would suffer a particular loss in some particular period, insurance would be without purpose; the problem would be one of either accumulating savings before the loss occurs or trying to restore the previous economic position after the loss is suffered. Insurance, in contrast, requires that the loss be probabilistic, [*1540] either as to whether or not it occurs at all (for example, whether one's house burns down) or as to when the loss occurs (for example, whether one dies before or after full life expectancy). The insurance premium is set equal to the value of the expected loss for the period, plus a share of the costs of administering the system, called loading costs.

The insurer's function is to aggregate uncorrelated (that is, independent) risks and segregate these risks into separate risk pools. The uncorrelated character of the risks distinguishes insurance from savings. Risks that are uncorrelated are risks of which the incidence of loss is spread out, either in terms of time or in terms of the individuals suffering the loss. As long as the risks of pool members are uncorrelated, that is, statistically independent, [98] the insurer can accumulate small premiums from each insured and still have funds sufficient in any period to pay those losses that actually occur. In contrast, if risks were highly correlated, there would be no advantage to aggregating them. Thus, losses from nuclear war are uninsurable.

The insurer's aggregation function derives from operation of the law of large numbers -- the empirical phenomenon according to which the probability density function of average loss tends to become concentrated around the mean as the sample number increases. [99] Applied to insurance, the law of large numbers means that as one increases the number of insured persons possessing independent and identically-valued risks, one increases the accuracy of prediction of expected loss for each individual. As should be obvious, increasing predictive accuracy reduces the effective risk faced by the insurer, since the level of aggregate risk is a function of the variance of expected outcomes. [100] Described more precisely, then, the role of the insurer is to identify risks that are independent (uncorrelated) and equally valued, and to aggregate them in order to reduce the total risk of the set. [101]

This general statement of the insurance purpose refers to risks being equally valued. Of course, no two individuals bring exactly the same risk level into an insurance pool. Nevertheless, it is crucial to the insurance enterprise to segregate uncorrelated risks, as much as possible, into separate, narrowly-defined risk pools in order to control adverse selection. Adverse [*1541] selection is commonly described as the tendency of persons with relatively greater exposure to risk to seek insurance protection. [102] But the problem is broader. Adverse selection is a problem central to every insurance context, and it dominates the insurance function. An insurer must collect into a risk pool individuals with a sufficiently narrow range of exposure to risk for the insurance to remain financially attractive to each member of the pool. The insurance premium for the pool must be set according to the average level of risk brought to the pool. The wider the range between high-risk and low-risk pool members, the greater the difference between the average risk and the risk of low-risk members. Low-risk members pay a premium that, because it is based on an average which includes high-risk members, is more than they would have to pay if they could be segregated into a risk pool of their own.

REV_00263000

If the disparity between the premium and the risks added by low-risk members becomes too substantial, low-risk members may drop out of the pool because they find alternative means of protection cheaper than market insurance. This is the most difficult problem faced by any insurance pool. Most individuals may be risk-averse; that is, they may be willing to pay an amount somewhat greater than their actual expected loss in order to avoid suffering the loss. But risk aversion is never infinite, and the costs of alternatives to market insurance, such as investments to reduce the likelihood of the loss or to reduce financial exposure to the loss, are never infinite. Obviously, as low-risk members drop out, a pool will consist more predominantly of high-risk members, requiring the premium to be raised and placing greater pressure on the remaining low-risk members of the pool.

Narrowing the range of risks within a pool increases the attractiveness of insurance to low-risk members. Obviously, as mentioned above, the less the average risk brought to the pool by other members exceeds the risk brought by a given insured, the less the premium for the pool will exceed the given insured's expected loss, and the more advantageous market insurance will appear to the insured.

The range of risks brought to an insurance pool also affects the premium for the pool in a second way, beyond its influence on average risk. Risk pools may differ in degrees of variance (coefficients of variation), even if the average risks of the pools are the same. [103] An insurer, however, [*1542] cannot be indifferent to the degree of variance of a risk pool. A pool incorporating greater variance of the risk distribution is a pool for which the potential range of aggregate losses is greater -- even if the average expected loss is the same.

Essentially, an insurer is an agent for the diversification of risks. [104] The insurer diversifies risks by accumulating insurance contracts for uncorrelated risks, and then by investing premiums in common stock or other assets whose investment risks are uncorrelated, or by reinsuring (hiring other insurers to perform the diversification function). Diversification investments are costly. As with more typical production functions, the greater the risks that must be diversified, the more costly the diversification investments become. Thus, as the variance of a risk pool increases, the cost of insuring the pool increases, and the premium increases. [105] Insurers are often accused, in obvious irony, of being extremely risk-averse; insurers as individuals are said frequently to hate taking risks. Even if accurately described, such personal characteristics are not clearly relevant to the problem. The point is that the costs of diversification to an insurer (or to anyone else) increase as the risks that must be diversified increase.

Thus, it is essential to the insurance function to define risk pools as narrowly as possible so that the premium for the pool is as close as possible to the expected loss of low-risk members of the pool. Narrowing risk pools reduces the adverse selection problem by reducing the incentives for low-risk members to drop out of insurance pools. If differences among the risk levels of pool members are too broad, the pool will unravel as low-risk members successively drop out. [106] The principal reason risks are uninsurable is that insurers are unable to narrow the assortment of risks within a pool.

One can now see the similarity in effect of the aggregation and segregation functions of the insurer: both reduce risk variance and thus serve to reduce the costs of insurance. By identifying independent risks and aggregating them into a risk pool, the insurer increases predictive accuracy by exploiting the law of large numbers. Increasing predictive accuracy reduces the risk level of the pool, even if it does not affect in any way the frequency of losses that actually occur. [107] In contrast, if the risks faced by [*1543] members of the pool are not independent, then the law of large numbers does not apply. Aggregating such risks would be unproductive because the reserves the insurer would have to maintain would equal or, perhaps, exceed the reserves individuals would have to maintain if uninsured. [108] Again, this is why society-wide calamities, such as nuclear war, are uninsurable.

REV_00263001

Segregation of risks into separate pools according to levels of expected risk serves a complementary function. Like the law of large numbers, segregation according to risk level concentrates a probability density function of loss around its mean. It improves an insurer's ability to predict expected loss, making possible greater predictive accuracy even with fewer insureds in the pool. Thus, segregation reduces both pool riskiness and insurance costs. In addition, segregation into narrow risk pools [109] reduces adverse selection, because it makes insurance more attractive to the low-risk members of the risk pool.

It is commonly believed that there is a tension between the advantages of segregating insureds into particularized risk categories and the advantages of spreading risks broadly over some set of the population. Many seem to think that the more individualized the risk calculation, the lower the extent of risk spreading. [110] This view, however, derives from an incomplete understanding of the concept of risk spreading. Putting aside distributional preferences, [111] risk spreading is achieved by the aggregation of independent risks. If risks are uncorrelated and probabilistic in nature (which is what is meant by their being independent), then their aggregation is all that is necessary to achieve spreading. Insureds gain from such transactions because aggregation of the risks lowers the effective risk to each member of the pool. Even if the premium charged to each member of the pool is slightly greater than true expected loss, it is still less than the cost of self-insurance, because self-insurance necessarily requires taking into account a greater range of possible outcomes. Risk-spreading efficiency should be defined in terms of reduction in the coefficient of variation of the probability density function of average loss. Thus, if risk pools have been carefully segregated, risks can be spread efficiently over very small numbers of the population.

[*1544] Much of the insurance business involves literally individual assessment and pricing of risks. The insurance I have described to this point is called "class underwriting." "Special risk underwriting," in contrast -- which is more predominant in some of the commercial casualty lines affected by the insurance crisis -- involves risk estimates by the insurer on an individual risk-by-risk basis, with the premium (rather than a rate) set with the particular characteristics of the insured in mind.

Special risk underwriting, however, is only a particular case of the aggregation and risk spreading described above. There is no insurance advantage to underwriting only a single special risk, or even a set of special risks which are highly correlated, because the insurer would have no comparative advantage to the insured. Instead, an insurer will achieve the risk spreading and predictive accuracy objectives by underwriting a group of special risks for which risks are mutually independent, or a group whose risks are independent of other risks underwritten by the insurer. The insurer will bring to bear information that it has gathered and its experience in estimating the expected loss of each special risk. This estimation, obviously, will incorporate some variance in outcomes which will require the premium to be set above the mean of the probability density function of loss. As long as the risks brought by the insureds are independent, however, the insurer can realize advantages from aggregation that resemble the advantage that the operation of the law of large numbers gives to class underwriting.

As an example, imagine an insurer asked to write a products liability policy for a single manufacturer of a unique product. Putting aside other insurer skills, the insurer has no comparative advantage to a single manufacturer in establishing reserves against future expected losses. [112] If the insurer, however, can also write products liability policies for other manufacturers of unique products, the insurer can create an effect similar to that of the law of large numbers. As long as the risks of the individual manufacturers are independent, the level of total risk will be less than the sum of the individual risks. Thus, the risk that all products will be designed defectively is less than the sum of the risks that any one product will be designed defectively. If the risks faced by the insurer, however, are highly correlated and not independent -- such as the "socio-legal risk" that the legal standard for proving defective design will be relaxed -- the benefits from aggregation are defeated. Total risk will equal the sum of the individual risks, [113] and the insurer has no comparative advantage to the insureds themselves.

REV_00263002

[*1545] It is a well-established implication of this approach that the more narrowly risk pools can be defined, the more broadly insurance can be offered in the society. [114] A legislature or court that wanted to maximize the availability of insurance within the society would adopt policies that facilitated the segregation of risks into the narrowest possible pools. Competition among insurers serves this objective. Insurers try to lure an insured away from competitors by offering membership in a pool for which the premium is closer to the insured's expected loss, because of the more discrete definition of the pool. In essence, the insurers are competing over the relatively low-risk insureds of any risk pool, who are likely to select that insurer most precisely able to price the risk the insured brings to the pool. Such competition increases total insurance availability. Unfortunately, much of modern insurance regulation is designed to thwart such efforts. [115] As we shall see, much of modern tort law (and, incidentally, much of the modern judicial approach toward the interpretation of insurance contracts) also impairs the ability of insurers to define narrow risk pools in order to extend insurance availability.

Most of us are familiar with a wide variety of methods insurers employ in first-party insurance contexts to narrow risk pools. Distinctions in casualty policies, for example, among homes with or without smoke alarms or homes closer to or farther from fire hydrants, reduce differences in risk among insureds within a pool. The different premiums that auto insurers charge to teen-age drivers or to owners of cars with collision-resistant bumpers relate, obviously, to the risk that each insured brings to the pool. All forms of experience rating serve the same end. Distinguishing in these various ways among insureds increases the availability of insurance because it makes market insurance more attractive to relatively low-risk individuals. [116]

An additional way that risk pools are segregated in virtually every first-party context is by the level of insurance protection desired. Insurers, obviously, charge different premiums to those who want larger amounts of life insurance coverage than to those who want smaller amounts. Similarly, the fire or casualty insurance premium is different for those that live in expensive houses than for those that live more modestly. It is clearer in [*1546] these contexts, perhaps, to see how narrowing risk pools increases the availability of insurance. If all homeowners were charged the same casualty premium regardless of home value, or if, say, all apartment dwellers were charged the same premium for contents coverage without regard to furniture value, the attractiveness of market insurance would decline. Those possessing less expensive homes or furniture -- the low-risk members of the pool -- would have to be exceptionally risk-averse to find the uniform premium worth its cost. Such individuals would be more likely to purchase market insurance if the casualty premium corresponded more closely to the level of risk they brought to the pool.

This example also shows how constraints on risk segregation redistribute wealth. A single uniform premium for apartment contents coverage, set equal to average expected loss of all apartment dwellers, will be lower than the expected losses of those who possess antiques, and higher than the expected losses of those who possess hand-me-downs. Similarly, a uniform premium for an employment disability policy will be lower than the expected loss to high-income workers, and higher than the expected loss to low-income workers. Where the risk level is related to wealth or income, a uniform premium compels those with less wealth or income to subsidize those with more. In such contexts, individuals with lower levels of wealth and income will prefer to drop out of the insurance market, if they are able to do so, in order to preserve the limited resources they have. [117]

REV_00263003

I mentioned earlier that insurance provides a method to equalize available amounts of money over states of the world. More specifically, insurance is a method of equalizing the utility gained from money over states of the world. [118] The purpose of insurance is tied to the use of money because insurers can provide us only with dollars should a loss occur. Individuals, as a consequence, do not voluntarily insure for non-pecuniary losses. Parents, for example, do not typically purchase insurance on the life of a minor child, [119] not because the parents would not suffer severely if the child were to die, but because the child's death will not affect the flow of money into the family. More precisely, there is no advantage to a family in suffering a financial sacrifice by paying insurance premiums while the child is alive in order to increase the family budget after the child dies. In [*1547] contrast, if instead of a minor, the child is an adult providing financial support to the parents, the concerns are reversed. It may very well make sense to reduce the monetary amounts available for use today (to the parents or to the child purchasing life or disability insurance on the child) in order to guarantee a steady flow of resources later if the child-provider were to die.

A similar reason might explain why we never observe individuals purchasing insurance for pain and suffering or other emotional losses. However severe the pain, a larger bank account is an imperfect anesthetic. As a consequence, there is no market for pain and suffering insurance in any society in the world. Indeed, if the pain is especially severe, individuals may prefer a form of reverse or anti-insurance: more assets available to enjoy before the accident than after. Of course, there are very limited situations in which anti-insurance of this nature can be arranged. [120]

The lack of consumer demand for insurance for pain and suffering losses is certainly also a consequence of adverse selection problems. Individuals may differ substantially in the level of pain and suffering that they experience or can tolerate. If so, offering coverage for pain and suffering will increase the variance of risks brought to an insurance pool. [121] As before, if the variance in expected risks is sufficiently great, the risks will be uninsurable because the low-risk members will successively drop out of the pool.

Pain and suffering may also involve moral hazard, although the problem of moral hazard extends far more broadly. Moral hazard refers to the effect of the existence of insurance itself on the level of insurance claims made by the insured. Moral hazard can occur either ex ante or ex post the occurrence of the loss. Ex ante moral hazard is the reduction in precautions taken by the insured to prevent the loss, because of the existence of insurance. Ex post moral hazard is the increase in claims against the insurance policy beyond the services the claimant would purchase if not insured. In the context of medical insurance, for example, ex post moral hazard includes excessive (at full-price) visits to doctors, longer hospital stays, and more elaborate and expensive methods of treatment. In this context, a person who might, ex ante, choose one level of care, may ex post, choose more care, because the costs of the care are paid by the insurer. Full insurance reduces the price of future purchases of medical care [*1548] to zero, and so a person is likely to choose a greater level of care than he or she would choose if charged for the care at marginal cost. [122]

Moral hazard, in part, is a particular source of the adverse selection problem. Where insureds, ex post, can affect the level of claimed losses, the variance in expected risks increases. Those individuals who are less likely to gain from exaggerated visits to doctors or from more extensive hospitalization will drop out of the pool if full coverage is offered. [123]

REV_00263004

For these reasons, market insurance universally incorporates deductibles and coinsurance where the extent of the loss can be influenced by insureds' ex ante or ex post decisions. A deductible is a condition in an insurance contract that requires an insured filing an insurance claim to pay a fixed sum unrelated to the magnitude of the claim. Coinsurance requires the insured to pay some fraction of the amount of each claim. [124] Deductibles and coinsurance reduce indifference to preventive investments, and they reduce the incentive to consume what, from an ex ante view, are excessive levels of the service for which insurance has been purchased. They reduce differences in risks brought to insurance pools.

The discussion to this point has addressed only first-party insurance. Tort law, of course, provides insurance through a third-party mechanism: the insurer pays money to the victim through the medium of the product or service provider who purchases the insurance policy. Although third-party institutional arrangements are somewhat more complex than first-party arrangements, the determinants of the insurance function are the same.

In third-party insurance, there are two sets of risk pools. Consumers of products or services comprise one set of risk pools. To consumers, the insurance policy and the premium are tied to the sale of the product. It is advantageous to define risk pools narrowly for consumers in third-party contexts for exactly the same reasons that it is advantageous to define risk pools narrowly in typical first-party insurance contexts. Defining consumer risk pools narrowly increases product sales, because the premium added to the price of the product more closely approximates the consumer's expected loss.

Manufacturers, for example, will attempt to segregate consumers into [*1549] risk pools by product design and by advertising and marketing techniques. A chain-saw manufacturer, for example, may design one model appropriate for industrial use and a second model appropriate for occasional gathering of firewood. Of course, such design differences may also be related to different consumer preferences for product features -- in this example, features related to safety. But the point is that, if the demand for chain saw injury insurance coverage differs between the professional and the weekender, both consumers and the manufacturer will gain if the manufacturer can design products that differentiate the two markets. In this example, market differentiation would reduce one very broad risk pool into two more narrow risk pools. Narrowing the pools allows the manufacturer to charge different insurance premiums to the two markets and to increase product sales.

Similarly, the accident insurance premium added to the price of an airline ticket from the United States to Europe will be greater on, say, the Concorde than on low-budget or charter lines. [125] The risk of an accident among the various airlines may be the same, but the accident payout risks brought into the pool by passengers on the Concorde are likely to be much greater than the risks brought by charter passengers, if only because of their greater expected future income. The third-party insurance premium must be adjusted in response. In this respect, the qualitative differences between the Concorde and the charters in terms of accident insurance are no different than qualitative differences in meals, time of transit, or other amenities. Indeed, much of the attraction of the charters derives exactly from the ability of these firms to narrow the pool of consumers of their product. Those passengers who travel on low-fare flights are those who prefer or are willing to tolerate lower levels of amenities in return for a lower ticket price.

The second set of risk pools within third-party insurance contexts includes the service and product providers themselves. Providers of products and services purchase market insurance for the same purposes as any first-party insured: to equalize monetary returns over time in the face of some probabilistic chance of loss. Providers will choose market insurance if its costs are lower than the costs of alternatives. [126]

[*1550] The costs a provider faces by deciding not to purchase insurance depend upon diversification within the provider firm or the provider's ability to diversify risk by other means. [127] As suggested above, marketing different models of a product is a form of diversification, if the risks of loss attending sales of the respective models are uncorrelated. Of course, organization in the conglomerate form or investing retained earnings in diversified assets are other ways in which providers can self-insure. [128]

REV_00263005

Insurance companies, however, can (and do) compete for the custom of providers by trying to define narrow risk pools that make market insurance more attractive than self-insurance alternatives. Insurers attempt to aggregate within a pool a set of providers whose risks are uncorrelated, and will set individual premiums for the firms according to the risk each brings to the pool. The insurer's diversification of risk, again, can be achieved either by aggregating a very disparate pool, by holding other assets whose riskiness is uncorrelated, or by reinsuring -- hiring another insurer to provide meta-diversification.

These simple insurance principles seem very general, but they provide an explanation for the insurance crisis we are currently observing. The next Section attempts to apply these principles to the changes in tort law discussed in Section II, in order to predict the effects of modern law on insurance availability.

IV. HOW CONTEMPORARY TORT LAW AFFECTS INSURANCE MARKETS

As discussed earlier, [129] over the past two decades, courts have expanded corporate liability in order to provide compensation insurance to injured persons through tort recoveries. This Section illustrates how the expansion of corporate liability has progressively undermined the insurance function by increasing the variance (coefficient of variation) of existing insurance risk pools. As described in the preceding Section, increasing the variance of a risk pool endangers the pool because it increases the likelihood that the pool will unravel as low-risk members drop out, either by self-insuring or by ceasing to engage in the potentially injury-related activity. This Section shows these effects in both consumer and provider risk pools. Thus, it shows that contemporary tort law has restricted rather than expanded insurance availability. The parties that have been most adversely [*1551] affected are the low-income and poor who, in terms of tort recoveries, are the low-risk members of the consuming population.

It is helpful at the outset to describe forms of expanding liability that will not affect insurance markets. The Justice Department has argued that the insurance crisis is the result of increases in the level of damage judgments over the past ten years, emphasizing increases in average tort judgments in medical malpractice and products liability cases, in particular. [130] Earlier, I challenged the Department's empirical substantiation of its claim (as have many others), [131] but a stronger criticism should be made. Other things equal, a scalar (proportionately equal) increase in the level of tort judgments and settlements will not affect the degree of insurability of any risk. A scalar increase in tort payouts, other things equal, does not affect the marginal benefit of insurance to any insured because it will not change the ratio of the premium to an insured's expected loss. [132] The premium set equal to the average risk brought to the pool will increase by exactly the same proportion as will the expected loss to the insured. [133]

Of course, modern tort law has changed in dimensions beyond the average damage judgment. I have described how modern tort law has expanded the range of plaintiffs to whom corporate enterprises are liable, the range of provider defendants against whom injured persons may bring suit, and the range of activities for which corporate enterprises have become subject to liability, [134] changes which, obviously, expand commercial liability risk pools. The Justice Department, in addition, has suggested that increases in tort filings and in million dollar judgments have contributed to the crisis. [135] I believe that these developments, in fact, have undermined commercial casualty insurance markets. But the exact mechanism that generates the effect is not immediately obvious. As a consequence, simple proposals, such as those of the Justice Department, to no more than retrench corporate liability are not immediately compelling. Increased corporate liability may surely increase corporate insurance costs, but why does it lead to a breakdown of the insurance function?

REV_00263006

The question is especially puzzling because of the curious empirical context of the recent crisis. Two phenomena, in particular, are important [*1552] here. First, to repeat, there is no evidence of increase in the rate or severity of accidents for the principal set of activities affected by the crisis. Of course, in recent years some products have been newly discovered to be harmful (for example, the Dalkon Shield), generating substantial liability. But the insurance crisis has not been dominated by products of this nature; there have been no claims of previously unknown toxic damage from diving boards or slides in public parks.

Moreover, the extension of tort liability on insurance grounds has not generated totally new insurance coverage. Today, the vast majority of Americans possess health, disability, and life insurance coverage, either through private first-party sources or through government supported Medicaid, Medicare, Veterans' Benefits, and the like. [136] Here, too, there are exceptions: chiefly occasional workers, such as migrant laborers, actors, artists; and the marginally poor, those who remain above the social service qualifying level while healthy and injured, but who are likely to qualify for social service "insurance" after they suffer an injury. [137] Yet, again, no one claims that the insurance crisis has been generated by tort recoveries of occasional workers and the marginally poor. These individuals consume less and thus are less likely to be involved in product- or service-related injuries. More importantly, because these individuals have low levels of both current and prospective income, the damage judgments they recover are typically insubstantial. It follows that both past increases in tort judgments and expected future increases in tort judgments derive, in the largest part, from the claims of individuals already possessing first-party insurance coverage.

These facts redefine the issue to be analyzed. If there has been no increase in the accident rate and if the largest majority of tort law claimants already possess first-party insurance, then the expansion of corporate legal liability has chiefly shifted coverage from (private and government) first-party sources to corporate defendant third-party sources. The question, then, is why the shift from first- to third-party insurance sources has led to a breakdown in insurance markets?

I believe that there are very clear insurance reasons why the shift towards third-party coverage has undermined the commercial casualty insurance industry, generating the crisis. In comparison to first-party insurance, third-party tort law insurance provides coverage in excessive amounts, in a manner that substantially restricts risk segregation, and at [*1553] costs that far exceed the costs of first-party insurance. For both consumer and provider risk pools, these differences will increase the correlation of risks within existing pools and, as a consequence, increase the extent of adverse selection, leading to the breakdown of the pools.

A. Why Consumer Risk Pools Have Unraveled

Provider tort law insurance coverage differs substantially from first-party insurance coverage. One of the objectives of the tort system is to create incentives for appropriate investments in preventing injury. To obtain optimal incentives for injury prevention, a party that has violated a legal standard must pay full losses to the victim, including both pecuniary and non-pecuniary losses.

The award of both pecuniary and non-pecuniary losses, however, is inappropriate for providing optimal insurance for unpreventable losses. The effort to extend insurance coverage through modern tort law represents a confusion of incentive objectives with insurance objectives. [138] Third-party insurance payments administered through the tort system differ from first-party insurance payments in two ways. First, as described in Section

REV_00263007

III, no first-party insurance market provides coverage of non-pecuniary losses. [139] Non-pecuniary losses do not affect the marginal value of wealth across states of the world. In addition, moral hazard and adverse selection problems make coverage of these losses exceedingly costly. Losses representing pain and suffering or other emotional effects of an injury, therefore, are never insured in first-party markets because it is not worthwhile for consumers to pay the premiums necessary to support coverage of them.

Secondly, deductibles and co-insurance are features of every first-party insurance contract. Third-party insurance through the tort system, in contrast, never incorporates deductibles or co-insurance to control victim moral hazard. Yet victim moral hazard is as serious a problem in a third-party context as in a first-party context. Preferences for extra visits to a doctor, prolonged hospitalization, or more advanced forms of medical treatment do not diminish because the source of the injury is a third-party defendant.

These two differences mean that, for the same injury, first-party insurance coverage -- which corresponds to what consumers are willing to purchase -- is substantially different in magnitude than the third-party insurance coverage provided through tort law. First, awards for pain and suffering and other non-pecuniary losses are known to comprise a large [*1554] portion of tort damages: the most commonly mentioned figure is 25% to 50%. [140] More detailed empirical studies of trial awards -- studies of awards in Cook County, Illinois -- show that non-pecuniary losses comprise 47.2% of total tort damages. [141] Thus, to approximate, out of the median products liability judgment of $ 187,000 in Cook County (1980-84), [142] $ 88,264 represents pain and suffering against which the typical consumer would not choose to insure.

The remaining portion of the average damage judgment represents compensation for pecuniary losses, chiefly lost income and medical expenses. Recoveries for these losses in an active first-party insurance market, however, are also likely to be significantly more modest than under third-party tort law insurance. For example, virtually all United States workers are covered by state workers' compensation plans that provide coverage for lost wages subject to a strict income ceiling. In Illinois, for example, the maximum weekly benefit is $ 376.33 [143] (for fifty-two weeks, $ 19,569), which corresponds to a $ 30,000 annual income. Even for workers with incomes equal to or below $ 30,000, the precise coinsurance level is difficult to determine since workers' compensation benefits (like the lost income component of tort judgments) are net of income taxes. Workers' compensation plans also provide for lump-sum payments for different forms of permanent disability. In sum, the best recent estimate is that net workers' compensation benefits provide .835 income replacement. [144] Lost income, on average, constitutes slightly over half of pecuniary damages. [145] The lost income component of the median Cook County product liability judgment, then, would be roughly $ 49,368 of which the victim, under workers' compensation, would receive $ 41,222 and suffer individually $ 8,146.

Similarly, with respect to medical expenses, the typical Blue Cross-Blue Shield policies provide an average deductible of $ 1000 (per member) and coverage of 80% of service costs. [146] Similarly, the typical Blue Cross major [*1555] medical plan covers only 80% of charges. Thus, under a typical first-party medical plan the victim would be reimbursed $ 38,694 of the approximate $ 49,368 medical expense component of the median Cook County product liability judgment and would pay $ 10,674. [147]

Even this crude estimate of the value of deductibles and co-insurance, however, fails to measure the effect of these payments on the level and character of medical care chosen by insureds. All first-party medical plans incorporate detailed limitations on the nature of available care and on the extent of specific forms of care. Blue Cross-Blue Shield plans, for example, limit coverage to semi-private room accommodations, limit coverage of hospitalization or of skilled nursing facility care to 120 days, and exclude coverage altogether of services such as "custodial care designed to assist an individual in meeting activities of recently disrupted product and service markets in the United States. From press accounts, the crisis seemed to peak in the early months of 1986, when reports became common of extraordinary changes in commercial casualty insurance markets. Insurers had increased premiums drastically for an unusual set of products, such as vaccines, [1] general aircraft, [2] and sports equipment, [3] and for an equally diverse set of services, such as obstetrics, [4] ski lifts, [5] and commercial trucking. [6] In still other cases -- intrauterine devices, [7] wine tasting, [8] and day care, [9] -- insurers had refused to offer coverage at any premium, forcing these products and services to be withdrawn from the market.

REV_00263008

The crisis extended beyond commercial enterprises. Municipalities and other governmental entities faced similarly extreme premium increases or the unavailability of market insurance coverage altogether. Some cities closed jails and suspended police patrols until insurance coverage was obtained. [10] [*1522] Parks and forest preserves were closed. [11] Fourth of July celebrations were cancelled because of concerns over uninsured liability. [12]

Over time, product manufacturers and service providers adjusted to these insurance difficulties. Recently, some commentators have interpreted the decline in the volume of complaints as evidence that the insurance crisis has subsided. [13] But this is an incomplete and unrealistic view of the problem. Although there has allegedly been some increase in insurance availability, the huge premium increases of early 1986 are largely intact, [14] necessitating sustained price increases and reducing demand for affected products and services. Moreover, many of the effects of the crisis have become permanent. A recent Conference Board study of liability problems of the country's largest corporations -- those whose size and self-insurance capability make them least vulnerable to changes in commercial insurance markets -- reports that twenty-five percent had removed products or withdrawn services from the market. [15] The effect on national income of increased prices and the withdrawal of products and services is obvious.

Similarly, there have been long-term effects of the insurance crisis on municipalities and government entities. Many municipalities have responded to the crisis by altering the array of public services, sometimes radically. Some cities have removed all playground equipment from their public parks. [16] Diving boards have been removed from school swimming pools. [17] Many municipalities denied market insurance (as well as some commercial entities) have continued operations after joining mutual insurance groups. [18] As we shall see, the actual insurance protection provided by industry-wide or municipal mutual insurance pools may largely be illusory, only postponing the effects of expected liability for some uncertain period. [19] At the least, the sudden growth in the frequency of mutual insurance is reflective of the extremely fragile character of today's commercial casualty insurance industry.

[*1523] Three sets of theories have been put forth to explain the insurance crisis and to propose its cure. The first set views the crisis as collusively engineered by insurance companies, either by explicit price-fixing or by financial manipulation of insurance reserve accounts. [20] A second set of theories explains the crisis with reference to the cyclical effect of changes in interest rates on investment returns and, thus, on insurance premiums. According to this theory, the crisis is the direct result of recent declines in interest rates which have forced insurance premiums to increase. [21] In a slightly different version, the crisis is attributed to an earlier period of high interest rates during which insurers, shortsightedly, underpriced risks to gain premiums for investment, risks which must be recalculated at higher premiums today. [22] The collusion and the insurance cycle theories both imply that these insurance problems will disappear in time, either through the breakdown of the cartel (or by antitrust enforcement or regulation), [23] through the cyclical return of higher interest rates, or through the more accurate evaluation of risks by chastened insurers.

A third theory, most prominently espoused by the Justice Department, attributes the crisis to modern tort law's expansion of corporate liability exposure, which has necessitated insurance premium increases. [24] According to the Justice Department, only wide-ranging tort law daily life." [148] Of course all consumers would prefer more coverage to less, but these limitations -- though they force consumers sometimes to make difficult decisions about medical treatment -- represent the best accommodation with the insurance premiums consumers are willing to pay. Because of moral hazard, additional medical services would require increases in insurance premiums beyond their value to consumers.

REV_00262991

In contrast, under third-party insurance provided through tort law, there is little reason for the beneficiary of the insurance -- the tort plaintiff -- to engage in difficult decisions about appropriate levels of medical treatment. Both because of the specific policy care limitations and because every first-party insurance claimant must pay a not-insubstantial portion of medical costs, he or she must consider very carefully which medical procedures will be most effective as well as whether, and the extent to which, extended care is needed. The tort plaintiff, on the other hand, loses nothing by requesting (or asserting as essential) all available advanced methods of medical treatment regardless of cost.

The shift from first-party to third-party insurance sources, thus, will prompt greater expenditures for advanced medical care, as well as more extended and elaborate hospitalization and subsequent care. For example, holding severity of injury constant, the frequency of claims for twenty-four hour nursing care is likely to be substantially higher under third-party tort law insurance than under first-party insurance. [149]

Though rough, these estimates show substantial differences between insurance [*1556] coverage in first-party markets and third-party insurance coverage provided through tort law. For the injury represented in the median Cook County judgment, the victim would have received first-party compensation of $ 41,222 for lost income and $ 38,694 for medical expenses. This coverage, $ 79,916, is the amount for which the victim ex ante was willing to pay. In contrast, third-party tort insurance provided $ 187,000 coverage which is 2.34 times greater than the first-party amount.

Tort law claimants do encounter costs not faced by first-party insurance claimants, though estimating their magnitude is difficult. Tort law claimants must pay attorneys' fees. In addition, in the vast majority of cases, tort claimants settle prior to trial for amounts less than the highest possible judgment. Regardless of settlement, some tort judgments are reduced under comparative negligence standards. There are analogues to these costs, however, under first-party insurance coverage. If the first-party insurer contests the claim, the first-party claimant must pay attorneys' fees. Similarly, many first-party claims involve negotiation and settlement at some figure less than the full amount demanded by the claimant.

To my knowledge, there are no studies attempting to measure differences between first-party and tort law insurance claims in these areas. Even if tort law insurance claims were reduced by 30% -- which is probably a high estimate (the standard contingent fee for a case expected to be litigated is 33%) -- the tort judgment in the Cook County example would still be 1.64 times the comparable first-party insurance award. Estimated conservatively, then, tort law insurance coverage levels are in the range of 64% to 134% greater than first-party coverage levels.

Some might regard the additional level of insurance coverage provided by tort law to be beneficial to consumers because it affords them greater compensation for the injuries they suffer. But this view misunderstands the consumer interest in insurance. Of course, after an injury has been suffered, the victim would prefer a greater to a lesser award. But the ex ante interest of the victim is an award tied to the victim's pecuniary losses, not an award greater than these losses. Where the victim is the product or service purchaser, the victim must pay for the insurance in advance. To compel insurance greater than the amount demanded by the purchaser reduces, rather than increases, his or her welfare. To illustrate: if my $ 100,000 home burns down, I of course would be happier if my insurer gave me $ 234,000 rather than the $ 100,000 of coverage I purchased. But, I would object strongly if I were compelled in advance of the fire to purchase $ 234,000 coverage since I could replace the home in its entirety for an amount in the range of $ 100,000. A similar concern for optimal insurance extends to contexts involving pure third-party injuries -- for example, when bystanders are harmed by the product or service use of [*1557] others. In modern society, all of us are at once product and service purchasers and bystanders of products and services used by others. Again, in terms solely of insurance, each of us ex ante prefers that the optimal level of insurance be provided by tort law, the level that optimizes insurance coverage subject to insurance costs. [150]

REV_00263009

The provision of insurance coverage through tort law in amounts greater than consumers would willingly purchase has additional effects that implicate the recent crisis. An increase of 64% to 134% in the level of insurance coverage under tort law will not operate as a scalar, but will increase consumer risk pool variance and will lead to the unraveling of consumer risk pools.

The increase in the level of insurance coverage from the shift to the third-party tort mechanism is not likely to be uniform over all cases. The empirical observation that pain and suffering awards constitute 47% of total damages is an average figure. Pain and suffering and other non-pecuniary amounts comprise a much higher proportion of large damage judgments. For this reason, risk pool variance is likely to be greater under third-party tort insurance than under first-party insurance. [151]

More importantly, segregating risks into narrow risk pools is substantially more difficult in third-party than in first-party insurance contexts. First-party insurers, by using insurance applications, can distinguish insureds by age, income, occupation, the level of coverage desired, and other personal characteristics related to levels of risk brought to the insurance pool. Moreover, the administration of first-party insurance allows the insurer to distinguish insureds by past loss experience. The collection of these data allows a first-party insurer to define risk pools of very narrow scope, increasing the likelihood that low-risk individuals will find insurance attractive. Narrow risk differentiation maximizes the availability of insurance.

Very little information about individual risks, however, is available to third-party insurers. A product manufacturer, for example, may design and market a product with reference to characteristics of discrete sets of average consumers. But the manufacturer must sell the product on equivalent terms to all who wish to buy it, and cannot distinguish among [*1558] consumers with respect to the insurance policy provided in the product price.

Some products, of course, will attract relatively homogeneous sets of consumers. A very wide range of products, however, are accessible to and are purchased by consumers of different income levels. Studies of consumers of individual products show that, for virtually all products, the income levels and personal characteristics of consumers of the product differ widely. [152]

The difficulty of segregating risk pools in third-party contexts means that third-party tort insurance pools are likely to be substantially broader than first-party pools even without the effects, described above, of levels of coverage. Compare, for example, the risks of non-preventable injuries from auto use. [153] The first-party insurer can create separate driver pools for teenagers and other age groups; it can segregate insureds by levels of driving, total mileage, distance from home to office, and car type; and it can rate the policies by accident experience and by moving violations within previous time periods. It can allow the insured to choose whether to purchase medical expense and disability coverage in the auto policy or to rely on separate medical and disability policy coverage set according to the deductible the insured prefers and according to the insured's income level. Each of these techniques helps keep premiums low for the low-risk drivers of the consuming population -- those who drive little, are very skilled or careful, or generate small claims because of low expected income losses.

REV_00263010

In contrast, the auto manufacturer -- that must buy third-party liability insurance for all those injured in its cars and pass on the premiums in vehicle prices -- can implement none of these distinctions. Some auto models may be more or less attractive to commuters, to teenagers, or to the very wealthy, but, except for these crude distinctions, the auto manufacturer must provide insurance to all who buy the model, high-risk and low-risk alike. Consequently, the variance in the insurance pool is vastly greater in the third-party context, and the premium is commensurately higher -- even if the same level of coverage is offered. Of course, given the greater amount of coverage provided under a third-party policy, the variance and the premium are higher yet.

One of the most seriously deleterious effects of lumping consumers into undifferentiated third-party risk pools is glaringly inconsistent with the judicial objective of aiding the poor. That is the regressive redistributional effect of third-party insurance. The largest items of damages in most [*1559] third-party personal injury contexts, especially those involving permanent disability, are lost income and pain and suffering, which are highly correlated with individuals' expected future income streams. As a consequence, these damage elements constitute the largest component of the third-party insurance premium tied to the sale of any product or service.

The third-party premium is set with reference to average expected loss. Thus, the high correlation of total awards with income means that premiums reflect the average income of the population of consumers. The implication of charging each consumer a premium related to average income is that consumers with high incomes are charged a premium lower than their expected loss, and consumers with low incomes are charged a premium higher than their expected loss. Third-party insurance thus requires low-income consumers to subsidize high-income consumers.

Moreover, third-party insurance requires low-income individuals to subsidize both pecuniary and non-pecuniary losses of high-income individuals. Compare the insurance premium that a low-income consumer would pay in a first-party auto, product, or disability policy to the premium tied to the product or service in a third-party provider policy that includes coverage to the high-income consumer. The auto or product manufacturer cannot charge the low-income consumer a lower price based on the lower dollar risk the consumer brings to the risk pool. The first-party casualty or disability carrier can do so, and thus can increase the availability of insurance.

As a consequence, the disadvantages of third-party insurance coverage are substantial. Courts justified third-party insurance coverage based on how easy it seemed to be for manufacturers or service providers to aggregate risks by adding an insurance premium to the price of the product or service. [154] Whatever comparative advantage providers enjoy in risk aggregation, however, is overwhelmed by the disadvantages of excessive coverage, the inability to segregate risks in third-party contexts, and regressive distributive effects.

How do the differences between first-party and third-party tort insurance mechanisms affect the behavior of consumers? The shift towards greater corporate-provided tort law insurance will lead low-risk consumers to reduce consumption of products whose prices incorporate high tort insurance premiums. For low-risk consumers, especially low-income consumers, the tort law insurance premium tied to the product or service price may be much greater than the benefit the insurance provides. As a [*1560] consequence, though the effect may be subtle, these consumers will drop out of the market. [155]

The delivery of insurance through tort law exacerbates this effect for a reason unrelated to the maintenance of insurance risk pools. The administrative costs of insurance delivered through tort law are vastly greater than the administrative costs of any first-party insurance regime. Blue Cross-Blue Shield first-party health insurance administrative costs are 10% of benefits; SSI disability insurance administrative costs are 8% of benefits; Workers' Compensation disability insurance administrative costs are (a much-criticized) 21% of benefits. [156] In contrast, tort law administrative costs are estimated to be 53% of net plaintiff benefits. [157]

REV_00263011

The relatively greater administrative costs of the tort system must be averaged over the sale of all products and services. [158] As a consequence, they operate in the manner of a sales tax on product and service delivery. Like a sales tax, their incidence has a regressive redistributional effect: They represent a greater proportion of the resources of the poor than of the moderate- or high-income population. Thus, low-income persons are harmed doubly by the delivery of compensation insurance through tort law: They pay premiums greater than their expected return, and they pay a fixed-rate levy that affects them more severely than those consumers possessing greater resources.

B. Why Provider Risk Pools Have Unraveled

The shift from first-party to third-party insurance coverage also influences market insurance consumption by providers of products and services. Provider risk pools unravel because providers are more likely to self-insure under a third-party than under a first-party tort insurance regime. This result stems from the process and determinants of corporate self-insurance.

It is not obvious why corporations buy market insurance in any form. Corporations are far more able than individuals to diversify their assets to reduce the risk of unfavorable outcomes. Moreover, corporate shareholders [*1561] can diversify cheaply. [159] What are the justifications for further diversification through market insurance?

In fact, a very large majority of corporations purchase commercial casualty insurance. A Fortune survey in 1973 showed that 86% of its top 500 industrial corporations purchased insurance against an aggregate 75% of their perceived loss exposure. [160] Some of this insurance undoubtedly represents the purchase of risk monitoring or claims administration services from commercial casualty insurers. [161] There are also tax advantages to market insurance. [162] Insurance purchased for these reasons, however, is not likely to be affected in the current insurance crisis. [163]

There are several reasons, however, for corporations to purchase commercial casualty insurance to protect against potential legal liability. [164] Market insurance reduces the risk of variance in the asset level of the firm. Insurance, thus, protects the position of corporate bondholders, and may be demanded in order to generate bond investment. Moreover, a corporation incurs very real costs when it must adjust its activities to dispose of assets in order to fulfill liability obligations. An extreme example is the risk of bankruptcy and the consequent change in the value of corporate assets upon reorganization. Corporations will purchase market insurance when market insurance premiums are less than the expected value of these real costs. In contrast, when market insurance premiums exceed these costs, firms will self-insure by maintaining reserves or by anticipating partial (or in the extreme case, total) liquidation of assets to meet liability claims.

How is the shift to third-party tort insurance likely to affect the corporate demand for commercial casualty insurance? As described earlier, the increase in corporate tort liability has increased the variance in risk pools comprising consumers of corporate products and services. This increased variance, of course, increases the individual riskiness of each corporate provider, requiring an increase in the corporate casualty premium. The value of a corporation's assets, however, is never infinite. At the limit, corporations will never purchase market insurance if the insurance premium is greater than the costs of liquidation, discounted by the likelihood [*1562] of its occurrence. As corporate liability exposure increases, the gap between market insurance premiums and discounted liquidation costs diminishes.

REV_00263012

The increase in corporate riskiness affects the commercial casualty insurance market in an additional way. The effect of the expansion of corporate liability varies for different companies, depending upon the risk characteristics both of a company's product or service and of its consumers. The shift to greater third-party tort insurance coverage increases these differences among firms.

If commercial casualty insurers are able to predict how firms differ in riskiness, then they can tailor an insurance premium appropriately for the risk that underwriting the particular corporation adds to the insurer's portfolio. The sale and purchase of commercial casualty insurance, however, requires a convergence of risk estimates by the insurer and the corporation. When the insurer believes that the risk level of a firm is greater than the firm believes it to be, the firm is likely to find self-insurance more attractive than market insurance. Obviously, when the insurer believes the risk level of a firm is lower than the firm believes it to be, the firm will prefer market insurance. If firms have better knowledge of their underlying level of riskiness than insurers, these differences in expectations will lead relatively low-risk firms to drop out of the insurance pool and relatively high-risk firms to stay in the insurance pool. This is adverse selection in the commercial casualty market.

The shift to corporate tort liability increases the extent of adverse selection. Individual firm riskiness and the variance of individual riskiness among firms both increase as the scope of liability expands. These increases in the range of potential liability outcomes across firms increase the likelihood of differences in insurer and corporate estimates of underlying corporate riskiness. As a consequence, adverse selection is likely to increase. Low-risk firms are increasingly likely to withdraw from the commercial casualty market, leading to an increase in premiums and an increase in the likelihood that the commercial casualty pool will unravel.

The increase in corporate liability exposure on the commercial casualty market will also affect insurance supply. As described earlier, the insurance function is achieved by the pooling of independent risks. Whether in the context of class underwriting or special risk underwriting, the efficiencies of insurance are obtained by the aggregation of independent risks in ways that reduce the underlying magnitude of each risk. It is crucial for this function, however, that the risks be independent. If the risks are correlated, then aggregating them may increase, rather than reduce, total riskiness.

All corporations offering products and services that might lead to personal [*1563] injury are subject to tort liability. The increase in corporate tort liability exposure, therefore, increases the correlation (the covariance) of these corporate risks. Increasing tort liability reduces the independence of risks within commercial casualty lines and imperils the insurance function. The reduction in independence of risks is the direct consequence of the shift to third-party tort insurance. Complaints, heard commonly, about the increased uncertainty of modern tort law and the difficulties this uncertainty places upon insurers can be best understood in these terms. [165]

The business of insurance is to deal with uncertainty. If the expansion of modern tort law had increased uncertainty in an unbiased fashion, it might have expanded, rather than contracted, commercial insurance markets. The increase in uncertainty, however, has not been unbiased: Uncertainty has increased only over the extent of worst-case tort outcomes, which is to say, the potential downside risks of corporate liability are far greater than they were two decades ago. And these downside risks are greater for most classes of corporate product and service providers. Thus, it is not uncertainty per se, but the increased correlation of corporate liability risks that has disrupted commercial casualty lines.

REV_00263013

Most important in my analysis, however, is the effect of the increase in the correlation of corporate liability risks on adverse selection. As explained earlier, [166] as risks become more correlated, premiums must increase, because the insurer's costs of diversification increase. The dramatic hikes in commercial casualty premiums, of course, reflect this effect, and it has been noted by other commentators. [167] Yet most commentators have ignored how the increasing correlation of risks exacerbates adverse selection. Increases in risk correlation alone do not explain why insurers have reduced levels of insurance coverage including the refusal to offer coverage at any premium in some commercial casualty lines. Similarly, increases in insurance premiums cannot fully explain why providers have removed products and services from the market. As we shall see in the next Section, adverse selection in both consumer and provider insurance pools does explain these and other phenomena of the insurance crisis.

V. THE INSURANCE CRISIS OBSERVED

This Section demonstrates how the shift to third-party tort insurance coverage and the consequent increase in risk pool variance has weakened existing insurance markets and led to the unraveling of existing insurance risk pools. The Section examines first how consumer pools and second [*1564] how provider pools have been affected by the expansion of corporate tort liability and the shift from first- to third-party insurance sources. It shows why providers have changed the nature of their product and service mix, including ceasing production altogether; why insurers have changed the terms of insurance policies to reduce coverage levels; why insurers have refused coverage on any terms in some commercial lines; and why still other providers have been forced to form industry-wide mutuals.

A. The Effect of Increased Variance on Consumer Risk Pools

The previous Section showed that the shift to third-party insurance sources increases the variance of consumer risk pools. An increase in risk pool variance obviously leads to an increase in real insurance costs. A firm subject to competition must add these costs to the product or service price.

Adverse selection in consumer risk pools occurs when some group of consumers chooses not to pay increased prices that include the higher level of third-party insurance. These consumers decline to purchase the product or service and, thus, drop out of the existing risk pool. The consumers most likely to drop out are the low-risk within the pool. In general, within any pool there will be two low-risk sets: those systematically less likely to suffer injuries at all and those whose injuries systematically generate lower real costs.

Consumers who systematically face a lower injury probability are likely to find the insurance provided with the product or service not worth its added premium. Many commentators have tended to view product- or service-related injuries as occurring randomly, [168] generating an equal injury probability to each consumer. Many product- and service-related injuries, however, are systematically associated with particular product uses. Most modern products can be employed in a wide range of diverse activities. Those consumers who use products in typically less, rather than more, risky ways are likely to drop out of the consumer pool if tort law requires the manufacturer to insure all consumer uses. These consumers will shift to alternative products or services that cannot be used in equally risky ways -- products which, as a consequence, will be cheaper because of the lower attendant insurance premiums.

A familiar modern example is consumers of four-wheel drive vehicles. In recent years, the liability of manufacturers of such vehicles has been expanded under design defect and warning law and, more generally, as courts have limited the defenses of contributory negligence, misuse, and [*1565] assumption of risk. [169] Manufacturers have been held liable, for example, for injuries suffered when these vehicles have rolled or flipped in contexts of extreme mountain driving on grounds that the manufacturer could either design the product to better protect the consumer or insure the consumer for the loss. [170]

REV_00263014

Manufacturers must respond to this increased liability either by changing product design to protect drivers in extreme conditions or by increasing insurance coverage for the consumer set as a whole. Whether the manufacturer changes the design or merely increases insurance coverage, product costs will increase and the product price will increase. The price increase, of course, may seem desirable for consumers who drive in extreme backroad conditions. But consumers who purchase four-wheel drive vehicles for other purposes -- say, easier driving on snowy or muddy roads -- may not find the increased price worthwhile. These consumers could be lured away if they were offered a four-wheel drive vehicle suitable for snow and mud, but not for extreme grades which, if only because of the lower attendant insurance premium, could be offered at a lower price. It is not surprising that many manufacturers have begun offering van and station wagon models with a four-wheel drive option.

This process is adverse selection in the product market. Prior to the expansion of manufacturer liability, the vehicle was sold without insurance for losses resulting from flips or rolls. Consumers who enjoyed backcountry travel insured themselves for such losses in first-party insurance markets. The expansion of manufacturer liability shifted the insurance source to the third-party mechanism. Because the manufacturer was prohibited by product liability law from making this additional insurance optional, [171] low-risk consumers within the pool -- those not intending to expose themselves to backcountry risks -- dropped out of the pool, either by shifting to domestic four-wheels, or by declining to buy the product at all. When low-risk consumers drop out, the insurance premium added to the price of backcountry four-wheels must be increased by an ever greater amount.

The second set of low-risk consumers affected by the expansion of provider liability are the low-income or poor, who bring low risks to a liability insurance pool because of the lower damages they will receive because of their lower income and poorer future employment prospects. As the insurance premiums tied to products and services increase, these consumers also drop out because the price they must pay is increasingly greater [*1566] than the value received. Such consumers will shift to substitute products for which the consumer set is more homogeneous in terms of income or for which the underlying risk level is lower. Of course, an income effect is also likely to be important here: Such consumers will discontinue buying products with large insurance premiums because, given their available resources, they cannot continue to afford them. Again, as this set of low-risk consumers drops out, the attendant insurance premiums must be commensurately increased.

Adverse selection in consumer risk pools explains why the increase in insurance premiums has been extreme for products and services in recent years. It also provides the only explanation of why increases in corporate tort liability compel providers to withdraw products and services from markets altogether. Again, if there were no adverse selection, increases in insurance premiums or self-insurance costs could largely be passed on to consumers. Sales may decline, as must be expected from any price increase, but there would be no reason to withdraw products from the market. There is a different effect, however, where a price increase derives from increasing risk pool variance. Increasing variance generates adverse selection by low-risk consumers who successively drop out of the pool. The pool, as a consequence, unravels. At some point, demand for the product sold with the necessary insurance premium simply disappears. There remains no set of identifiable consumers to whom the product or service is worth its price.

There is substantial evidence of these phenomena in the recent insurance crisis. Increases in insurance premiums, sometimes extraordinary increases, have been reported. [172] In many cases, providers have been able to pass on these premium increases to consumers. Some ski areas have increased lift tickets by $ 2 to $ 3 per day. [173] Insurance costs now add $ 80,000 to each Beech aircraft [174] and $ 75,000 to each Piper aircraft. [175]

REV_00263015

Many firms, however, have had difficulty passing on increases in premiums or self-insurance costs. Some firms have made greater investments in product or model differentiation in order to attempt to segregate low-risk from high-risk consumers, such as in the differentiation of domestic from backcountry four-wheel drive vehicles, described above. It is difficult for others than industry experts to distinguish insurance from consumer preference grounds for product differentiation, but there is some strong evidence of this trend at least with respect to more extreme risks. Some [*1567] bus companies, for example, are reported to have terminated charter transit to ski areas because of the relatively higher risks of icy roads. [176] In addition, as noted earlier, one New York vineyard has terminated or severely curtailed wine-tasting from fear of host liability for alcohol-related injuries. [177] Public parks that have removed playground equipment or school districts that have removed diving boards from swimming pools are other examples of the effect. [178] By excluding such services, these entities reduce the variance of risks related to the services they continue to provide.

The large number of products and services that have been totally withdrawn from markets demonstrate the severity of the effects of contemporary tort law's shift to the third-party insurance mechanism. Except for a few particularly notorious examples, product and service withdrawal tends to be effected silently, ignored as consumers shift to alternative sources that are higher priced or less convenient for their needs. It was recently reported, however, that vaccines and pharmaceuticals have been withdrawn, despite prior FDA approval. [179] Cessna Aircraft terminated several small plane models because insurance costs (estimated at $ 75,000 per plane) had pushed prices beyond the reach of its consumers. [180] Similarly, the G.D. Searle Co. recently terminated sales of intrauterine devices in U.S. markets. Searle's annual sales volume for the devices was $ 11 million, but it spent $ 375,000 defending each product liability action brought by users of the IUDs. [181] Litigation costs of this dimension are not likely to persist once the novel liability issues with respect to the product are resolved. But even a dramatic reduction in litigation costs per case may not make the intrauterine device price-competitive with other means of birth control.

Product and service withdrawal, however, has extended far beyond the limited examples reported in the press. Very recently, a Conference Board survey of the nation's 500 largest corporations showed that twenty-five percent had removed products or services from markets. [182] Oddly, this datum was reported amidst the author's conclusion that the deleterious impact of the insurance crisis was exaggerated because firms were still profiting from sales of products they had not been forced to withdraw. The author confuses the existence of corporate profits with consumer welfare. [*1568] Consumers do not benefit from having fewer products and service choices (any more, from a broader view, than do corporations), even if quarterly corporate earnings exceed zero. Of course, it is even more difficult to estimate the extent to which new products and services were never introduced because of the expansion of liability.

Other markets have suffered similar insurance-related dislocations. Many commentators, for example, have been puzzled by the large reduction in the availability of some medical and health care services, obstetrics in particular. A 1983 survey reported that 34.6% of doctors nationwide refused to accept certain types of cases because of increased liability. [183] Time reports that nearly one-eighth of American obstetricians have abandoned the specialty. [184] This is puzzling because, given the absence of available substitutes, the demand for obstetrical services is likely to remain relatively firm over time. It ought to be easy, therefore, for obstetricians to pass along malpractice premium increases to their patients. [185]

Blue Cross-Blue Shield and other medical insurers, however, in efforts to control costs to make health insurance more attractive to low-risk consumers, have imposed strict price restrictions on certain medical procedures, including child delivery. Recently, a group of doctors in Springfield, Massachusetts refused to perform deliveries for Blue Shield insureds because of low reimbursement rates. According to the report, Blue Shield will not pay more than $ 670 for a normal delivery in the area; Medicare pays $ 507. The doctors claimed that the average fee to private patients, a fee set partly with respect to rising malpractice premiums, was $ 1200. [186] The malpractice premium is extremely high for obstetricians because of the extraordinary variance that results from the attribution of subsequent physical or emotional ailments to problems at delivery. If the payments for obstetrical services by the first-party insurers discussed here are representative nationally, however, it is not surprising that obstetricians, despite investments in developing their special skills, have shifted to the practice of other medical specialties for which the returns on their investments will be greater.

REV_00263016

The conflict between containing costs to reduce health insurance premiums and sustaining an optimal level of services pervades the health care industry. [187] The conflict is especially severe when the malpractice-induced [*1569] injuries can become manifest after some long delay (the liability tail problem) and where the medical procedure is standardized (like a normal delivery) so a fixed reimbursement fee can be easily administered. Thus, physicians providing standardized medical procedures with long tail liability implications are more likely to shift to other medical specialties until the large health insurers change their reimbursement policies or courts learn that imposing liability on insurance grounds for losses of this nature is counterproductive. [188]

It is important to distinguish, at least analytically, between products and services withdrawn for insurance reasons and for deterrence or incentive reasons. Some products or services may simply generate so many injuries that continued production is infeasible. A legal standard that attached liability where the marginal expected injury costs exceeded the marginal costs of preventing the injury (here, the bare cost of production) would be sufficient to drive such products and services from the market and, thus, increase social welfare.

In contrast, the product and service withdrawal that harms consumers and reduces social welfare derives from the expansion of liability on insurance grounds, where the shift from first- to third-party insurance increases the variance or reduces the independence of risks enough to cause the risk pool to unravel. For example, many vaccines are known to be beneficial to large majorities who receive them, but to cause adverse reactions in some small number of individuals. If the adverse reactions truly cannot be prevented, and if the benefits of the vaccine exceed production and injury costs, then liability for adverse reactions is solely an insurance question. The important issue, however, is whether it is cheaper to insure for these reactions through either a first-party or third-party mechanism. As shown above, first-party mechanisms are typically superior in defining the level of insurance coverage and in segregating consumers according to levels of coverage appropriate to their income. The shift from first- to third-party insurance recovery can lead to the unraveling of the pool and the withdrawal of the vaccine from the market.

The point is that, for some products and services, insurance pools could be maintained on a first-party basis that could not be maintained on a third-party basis because of adverse selection. It is for these products and services that the expansion of tort liability on insurance grounds -- beyond that level set to create optimal safety incentives -- is most harmful. In contrast, [*1570] products too risky or injurious to produce at all could not support either first- or third-party insurance markets. Asbestos may be such a product. Obviously, asbestos production in the United States has stopped entirely because of the substantial third-party manufacturer liability. Quite possibly, asbestos-related injuries could not be insured in first-party markets either. Diseases without probabilistic features -- inevitable diseases -- are uninsurable because risks are not uncorrelated. It is difficult to believe that park slides, diving boards, vaccines, and other products and services recently withdrawn share this feature.

B. The Effect of Increased Variance on Provider Risk Pools

The increase in the variance of consumer risk pools from the shift toward greater third-party insurance delivery, of course, increases the risk of each individual provider. Section IV showed how this effect enhanced adverse selection and how the concomitant increase in correlation of corporate risks aggravated the problem. Adverse selection in provider risk pools consists of the relatively low-risk providers dropping out of the pool to self-insure. [189]

REV_00263017

What are the forms of self-insurance that low-risk providers have selected? There has been a massive shift in recent years toward self-insurance through the formation of captive insurance subsidiaries off-shore in the Caribbean. [190] Apparently, the subsidiary form assures deductibility of reserves; off-shore jurisdictions are attractive because of liberalized reserve requirements. [191] A slightly different form of self-insurance in response to the crisis has been the formation of industry-wide mutuals, such as by doctors and surgeons, who believe they are better able to judge their exposure (or control their exposure) than insurers believe. [192] Although the extent to which low-risk providers have recently shifted toward self-insurance is poorly documented, it is known that self-insurance rather than market-insurance constitutes a very substantial share of many specific commercial insurance lines. [193]

[*1571] The shift of the low-risk toward self-insurance, of course, places substantial pressure on the market insurance function: at the extreme, the pool unravels and the affected commercial risks become uninsurable. Insurers have strong interests in preventing this course of development. Since the early 1980's, insurers have been progressively changing the terms of the basic commercial insurance policy in order to make market insurance more attractive to low-risk providers in order to keep them in market insurance pools. These changes in basic levels of coverage have been accelerated since 1986.

Insurers have changed coverage terms in commercial policies in three separate ways: increasing deductible and coinsurance levels, lowering aggregate policy limits, and expanding coverage exclusions. As we shall see, each of these changes reflects an effort to make the commercial policy more attractive to the relatively low-risk within provider pools. In effect, these changes reduce the level of commercial coverage offered to providers. Yet, despite the effective reduction -- in many cases, the sharp reduction -- in the level of commercial insurance coverage, insurers have simultaneously been forced to raise commercial premiums substantially and in some markets ultimately to refuse to offer coverage altogether. Most commentators have focused on the increase in premiums and the refusal to offer coverage as characteristic of the crisis. [194] The premium increases and coverage withdrawals, however, are only more prominent than the other fundamental changes in commercial casualty policies; each is a symptom of the progressive unraveling of provider pools. Each reflects an effort by insurers to fight off modern tort law's stimulus of adverse selection in order to try to maintain a commercial insurance market.

Insurers have increased policy deductibles in a wide range of commercial markets. The insurance deductible for the city of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, for example, increased from $ 100,000 in 1984 to $ 500,000 in 1985. [195] The Kennestone Hospital in Marietta, Georgia faced an increase in deductible from $ 1 million to $ 2 million. [196] Deductibles, as described earlier, provide financial incentives to insureds to reduce the risk of loss. As changes in liability rules and the shift to third-party coverage increase risk levels, the marginal benefit from risk reduction also increases. Thus, it is not surprising that insurers have increased incentives to insureds to reduce risks.

Increasing deductible and coinsurance levels, however, serves an insurance purpose beyond heightened incentives. Deductibles and coinsurance [*1572] narrow the level of risks brought to an insurance pool by discriminating against high-risk in favor of low-risk members of a pool. The identical deductible will be less costly to an insured who can control the probability of loss than to an insured who cannot. The incentives created by deductibles and coinsurance transform those members who are relatively more able to control losses into low-risk insureds, and those members relatively less able, into high-risk insureds. Put slightly differently, the recent increases in deductible and coinsurance levels increase the effective reform can cure the crisis. Within the past eighteen months, on the basis of the Department's and other attributions of the crisis to tort law, forty-two states have enacted tort reform or insurance legislation. [25] Although there are differences among the states, the general similarity in approach and the sudden spontaneity of the response represent the most extraordinary state law development having national impact since the states' unanimous [*1524] adoption of the Uniform Commercial Code. [26] Indeed, the Justice Department now claims that this legislation -- though in effect only for scant months -- has largely cured the insurance problem. [27]

REV_00263018

None of these three theories, however, fully or adequately explains the phenomena of the recent insurance crisis. Virtually all commentators, in characterizing the crisis, have focused solely on the sudden increases in insurance premiums and the occasional withdrawal of insurance coverage during early 1986. The crisis, however, has been attended by a much broader group of related phenomena, which must be addressed by any comprehensive explanation. For example, long before 1986, there began to occur increasing shifts toward corporate self-insurance for expected tort liability. In addition, in recent months, while simultaneously increasing premiums, insurers have fundamentally redrafted the basic commercial insurance policy -- raising deductibles, lowering levels of aggregate coverage, and revising specific policy exclusions. A comprehensive theory of the crisis must account for all of these phenomena, and must explain their peculiar concentration within commercial casualty lines only, rather than across the broad range of insurance offerings. None of the three existing theories of the insurance crisis can do so.

This paper provides a different theory of the crisis. It attributes these changes in insurance coverage to modern tort law, but by a mechanism much different from that suggested by the Justice Department. In my view, it is simplistic to no more than assert a connection between expanding tort liability and the disruption of insurance coverage. The relationship between legal liability and the insurance function obviously is more complicated: The demand for commercial insurance coverage derives from tort liability. The expansion of tort liability might well create opportunity, rather than crisis, for the insurance industry.

This paper argues that the characteristic of contemporary tort law most crucial to understanding the current crisis is the judicial compulsion of greater and greater levels of provider third-party insurance for victims. The progressive shift to third-party corporate insurance coverage, since its beginnings in the mid-1960's, has systematically undermined insurance markets. The decline in interest rates within the past two years has led the most fragile of these markets -- those for which third-party coverage is least supportable -- to collapse. The collapse is signalled by the accelerating conversion to self-insurance. This conversion, in turn, forces insurers to exact drastic premium increases, as well as to restructure the terms of [*1525] the basic insurance policy, in order to salvage a market among remaining insureds. Where these salvage efforts have proven unsuccessful, insurers have refused to offer coverage altogether.

This explanation of the crisis uncovers what I believe to be a tragic paradox of our modern civil liability regime. The expansion of liability since the mid-1960's has been chiefly motivated by the concern of our courts to provide insurance to victims who have suffered personal injury. [28] The most fundamental of the conceptual foundations of our modern law is that the expansion of tort liability will lead to the provision of insurance along with the sale of the product or service itself, with a portion of the insurance premium passed along in the product or service price. Expanded tort liability, thus, is a method of providing insurance to individuals, especially the poor, who have not purchased or cannot purchase insurance themselves. This insurance rationale suffuses our modern civil law, and must be acknowledged as one of the great humanitarian expressions of our time.

The paradox exposed by my theory is that the expansion of tort liability has had exactly the opposite effect. The insurance crisis demonstrates graphicly that continued expansion of tort insurance costs paid by high-risk members (because they must pay the premium plus the increased deductible or retention) while constraining the effective insurance costs paid by the low-risk members. They are a way to keep low-risk members in an insurance pool. [197]

REV_00262992

Increasing deductibles, in fact, is only one of the techniques insurers have adopted recently to differentiate low-risk members of pools with respect to probability of loss. The day-care industry, for example, has been heavily affected by the insurance crisis, apparently because of the many recent incidents of child sexual abuse, which are certain to generate civil claims. Virtually all insurers have excluded coverage for sexual abuse liability from their policies. [198]

Those insurers still writing day-care policies, however, have taken still other measures. Day-care insurers reportedly now make unannounced inspections to monitor day-care centers' operations. [199] One large firm, Kinder-Care, has voluntarily installed large windows at its centers. [200] Each of these more specific responses, like a deductible or coinsurance, reduces the risk level brought by the firm to the insurance pool. Those day-care centers better able to control their employees (and thus, from the standpoint of the insurer, at relatively low risk of liability for sexual [*1573] abuse) can tolerate unannounced inspections and the installation of windows.

The second way insurers have responded to the threatened departure of low-risk carriers is the widespread lowering of aggregate insurance coverage. The city of Mississauga, Ontario, for example, recently suffered a doubling of its premium along with a reduction of its coverage from $ 15 million to $ 7 million. [201] Insurers recently cut coverage for the city of Hartford, Connecticut from $ 31 million to $ 4 million. [202] Other insurers have effectively lowered aggregate coverage by amending policies to charge legal expenses in defending claims against the policy limit. [203] Of course, more specific exclusions of coverage, discussed next, serve to reduce aggregate coverage as well.

Like increased deductibles, the reduction of aggregate policy coverage also narrows risk pools by making insurance more attractive to parties that bring lower aggregate risks to the pool. Lowering aggregate insurance limits resembles an increase in deductibles, although it serves to enhance insurance availability for a different set of low-risk members than the set affected by changes in deductibles. The reduction of a basic policy limit from $ 15 to $ 7 million, as above, makes the municipal insurance policy more attractive to cities that face a greater likelihood of losses in the range of $ 7 million, than to cities that face higher probable losses. [204] The charge of legal expenses against the aggregate limit, similarly, will be differentially attractive to firms or cities according to the level of legal expenses they expect to face.

Reducing aggregate policy limits is another way of segregating those insureds with low levels of exposure from those with high levels of exposure. The low exposure insureds are charged a premium appropriate to their risk level. The high exposure insureds obtain equivalent coverage, and then must go elsewhere -- into a different risk pool -- to obtain either excess insurance or to self-insure for their remaining risks. The reduction in aggregate insurance limits, therefore, resembles the "no frills" products and services that are differentially attractive to some sets of consumers. The reduction in aggregate limits, by differentiating among insureds, extends insurance availability to the low-risk of the insured population, who [*1574] may not have purchased market insurance had they not been segregated from the higher risks.

Charging legal expenses against the policy limit may also serve an incentive purpose, like the deductible or coinsurance. An insured that knows that its liability coverage will be reduced by the amount of the insurer's legal expenses may itself strive to reduce those expenses, by handling more case management tasks within the firm (much like the expansion of corporate counsel) or, of course, by reducing the incidence of litigation-generating activity. Again, firms or municipalities able to achieve such economies (and thus reduce the risks they bring to the pool) will find the new policy definition more attractive than firms unable to control legal expenses.

REV_00263019

The third principal modification in insurance coverage adopted to restrain adverse selection is the introduction of multiple specific coverage exclusions in insurance policies. Municipal liability policies, for example, have been redrafted to routinely exclude coverage for pollution [205] and for employment discrimination claims. [206] Directors' and officers' policies have been modified, variously, to exclude coverage of claims related to mergers, acquisitions and tender offers, illegal payments, joint ventures, outside directorships, professional errors and omissions, [207] and even for SEC liability. [208] Many directors' and officers' policies have been redrafted to exclude coverage of liability from pending or prior litigation, [209] an exclusion resembling the widespread adoption of claims-made policies across commercial insurance contexts. [210]

Each of these coverage exclusions represents an effort to narrow risk pools and make them attractive to low-risk members. Those members of the pool who are less vulnerable to the respective sources of loss face fewer incentives to drop out of the pool, because the premiums they pay will diverge less drastically from the risk they bring to the pool. The exclusion from municipality policies of claims relating to pollution narrows the risk pool to those cities whose managers have never authorized, regulated, or otherwise monitored hazardous waste sites or waste disposal. Similarly, the exclusion of coverage for claims relating to mergers, acquisitions and tender offers in a directors' and officers' policy narrows the risk pool to treat equally directors whose firms are and are not active in the market for corporate control. These exclusions maximize the availability of insurance [*1575] because it is the cities that are without dump sites and the directors of firms not involved in tender offers that would drop out of the risk pool in order to self-insure if the insurance premium were increased to provide coverage for cities or directors exposed to these claims.

Similarly, the adoption of a claims-made policy narrows the risk pool by excluding coverage of the long tails of liability exposure that are increasingly common in chemical, pharmaceutical, and hazardous waste industries. A claims-made provision limits coverage to claims filed during the policy term alone. Thus, the provision cuts off insurance for losses resulting from the current activities of the insured that become manifest at some later period, after the insurance policy has expired. The basic claims-made policy provides coverage for current claims from past activities of the insured, although it is often attended by a separate "retro-date" provision, which cuts off coverage of losses occurring prior to some specified date in the past. The retro-date provision is crucial to a claims-made policy in order to avoid the adverse selection incentives of firms that, knowing or suspecting claims to be imminent, purchase substantial amounts of claims-made coverage. [211]

The adoption of claims-made policies and retro-date provisions are responses, in part, to the substantial disagreement and continuing uncertainty among United States jurisdictions with respect to whether a provider's liability dates from the occurrence of the injury or its manifestation. In contexts of cumulative disease, the determination of the "occurrence" of the injury is inherently difficult, and has itself generated substantial litigation among insurers. Moreover, some courts have refused to choose between occurrence and manifestation theories in favor of holding insurers, however related to the loss, liable for coverage. [212] These various approaches all increase the variance of risk and severely threaten the survivability of risk pools. Several insurers, heavily involved in asbestos coverage, have been overwhelmed by the increase in risk and have been bankrupted.

The adoption of claims-made policies is a way to salvage some form of insurance availability in the face of extreme uncertainty over risks of this nature. [213] The insurance industry seems to be evolving three basic forms of claims-made policies -- called the "maxi," "midi," and "mini" -- which illustrate the struggle of insurers to search out some particular set of low-risk [*1576] insureds who can support a risk pool. [214] The "maxi-tail" claims-made policy guarantees supplemental five-year coverage for claims and occurrences after the end of the policy period. The "midi-tail" claims-made policy provides coverage if the occurrences (but not claims) are reported to the insurer within sixty days after policy termination. The "mini-tail" claims-made policy offers the supplemental sixty-day coverage only for claims, after which coverage terminates. [215] These various versions of the claims-made policy, like the more specific exclusions of insurance coverage, represent efforts to locate a set of insureds that will sustain a risk pool.

REV_00263020

Each of these major changes in insurance availability, then, is a method to narrow insurance risk pools in the face of the increasing legal risk generated by modern tort law. Specifically, these contractual devices reduce variance in risk for the purpose of making insurance available to low-risk parties in the population of insureds. They are efforts to reduce adverse selection, and thus to prevent the unraveling of insurance markets that would occur if low-risk members of insurance pools were to exit.

The unraveling process would consist of the lowest-risk members of the pool dropping out, which, in turn, would necessitate premium increases. The premium increases would be followed by a new set of lowest-risk members dropping out; then, further increases in premiums; and so on, in successive episodes of withdrawals and premium rises. Of course, as low-risk members withdraw, the constituency of the pool becomes further concentrated among high-risk members.

There is substantial evidence from the current crisis of the unraveling process at work. Reports from a variety of insurance markets show the progressive convergence of insurance premiums towards the level of aggregate insurance coverage offered by the policies. Professional malpractice premiums, for example, have increased from $ 44,000 for $ 1 million aggregate coverage (premium-to-coverage ratio of 0.044) to $ 50,000 for $ 500,000 coverage (premium-to-coverage ratio of 0.1). [216] W.H. Brine Co., a manufacturer of sports equipment, was offered a premium of $ 200,000 for $ 1 million coverage (premium-to-coverage ratio of 0.2), up from $ 8,000 for $ 25 million (premium-to-coverage ratio of 0.00032) a year earlier. [217] [*1577] Mississauga, Ontario is charged a premium of $ 1.6 million for its $ 7 million aggregate coverage (premium-to-coverage ratio of 0.23). [218] In some markets the premium-to-coverage ratio is even greater. The city of Hartford, Connecticut pays $ 1.8 million for $ 4 million aggregate coverage (premium-to-coverage ratio of 0.45). [219] Business Insurance reports that one municipality is paying a premium of $ 695,000 for $ 1 million coverage (premium-to-coverage ratio of 0.695). [220] Perhaps most incredibly, Specialty Systems, Inc., an asbestos removal firm, is charged a liability premium of $ 460,000 for $ 500,000 coverage (premium-to-coverage ratio of 0.92). [221]

A convergence of the policy premium to the policy coverage limit provides strong proof that low-risk members are departing from the insurance pool and that the pool is about to unravel completely. Indeed, in the case of Specialty Systems, the premium-to-coverage ratio of 0.92 indicates that the insurance function has essentially ceased altogether; the premium payment is a form of savings in which the insurer is promising eight percent interest for what both parties must believe is a certain loss. [222]

Yet even these barely viable risk pools do not include the highest-risk members of the population. The examples above represent premium-to-coverage ratios for insurance policies written after deductibles have been increased, aggregate limits lowered (as in the professional malpractice and municipal coverage examples above), [223] and specific coverage exclusions expanded. Thus, the largest number of high-risk members have already been excluded from these pools.

The policy premium converges with the level of aggregate coverage, of course, because low-risk members have dropped out of the risk pool, despite the efforts of the insurer to narrow the range of risks. The W.H. Brine Co., for example, refused to pay the $ 200,000 premium for the offered $ 1 million coverage, in favor of self-insurance. [224] Brine obviously believed that the premium it was charged was greater than the expected risk it was adding to the pool.

REV_00263021

Virtually all commentators have been puzzled by the extraordinary increases in insurance premiums that were instituted within a very few months in late 1985 and early 1986. These unusual premium increases [*1578] constitute the best evidence in favor of the (otherwise implausible) collusion and financial manipulation theories of the crisis. In addition, these premium increases are the most damaging evidence to the Justice Department's effort to link the crisis to tort law, since there is no conceivable correspondence between changes in past tort judgments (and little correspondence to plausible future judgments) and premium increases of multiples of four, ten, twenty and more.

Comparing percentage changes in premiums to percentage increases in past or in future expected claims, however, rests on an unsupportable empirical presumption. Percentage changes in premiums will correspond to percentage changes in past or future claims only if the set of insureds remains constant over the compared periods. If, instead, there is a reconstitution of the insurance risk pool, the premium will change even if past or future claims remain constant.

The extraordinary increases in premiums within an exceptionally short period are the best evidence of the effect of expanding tort law on the constitution of commercial casualty insurance pools. The most plausible explanation for these unusual increases is the rapid departure of low-risk insureds from commercial casualty pools. As the low-risk members drop out, the unraveling process begins. Premiums skyrocket.

At a point after some number of low-risk members have fled the risk pool, the pool cannot survive. The risks become uninsurable. The multiple recent instances of the withdrawal of insurance coverage altogether are examples of the effect. The refusal of some insurers to offer coverage at all for day care, municipal, and directors' and officers' liability, among others, is conclusive evidence of the breakdown of the insurance function. [225]

When market insurers refuse coverage, a provider is left with little choice: it can discontinue provision of the product or service -- as some providers have, described above [226] -- or it can continue self-insured. For a relatively high-risk provider, self-insurance is very costly: the costs include the (not heavily) discounted risk of bankruptcy. Yet it may still be sensible for providers to run these risks, especially where they have made substantial non-salvageable investments in human or other forms of capital.

Since 1986, in many commercial lines denied market coverage, providers have joined together to form industry-wide mutual insurance groups. The mutual groups of the relatively high-risk, which have been denied [*1579] market insurance coverage, are to be distinguished from mutuals formed by relatively low-risk insureds, described above, [227] who have dropped out of the commercial risk pools generating the initial unraveling. Low-risk mutual groups are formed because their members find being pooled with the high-risk more costly than it is worth. High-risk mutuals, in contrast, are formed as basically the last option prior to termination of the activity. High-risk mutuals have been formed in the drug, chemical, railroad, utility, hazardous waste, banking and thrift industries. [228] Mutual groups of this nature have been formed by municipalities and other governmental entities. [229] And they have been formed in several unique specialty occupations denied market insurance, such as nurse midwives, [230] and other high-risk specialties. [231]

Mutuals are insurance companies owned by the insureds themselves. The most prominent of scholarly descriptions of the mutual form derives from studies of the large life insurance mutuals, in which the insureds receive dividends according to the loss experience of the firm for the year, and thus share downside insurer risks to the extent of the premiums they pay. [232] The industry-wide mutuals formed recently in response to the denial of market insurance coverage share much greater downside risks. These mutuals, typically, incorporate assessment provisions according to which the insureds are obliged, in addition to premiums, to contribute towards the payment of subsequent claims for which the existing assets of the mutual are insufficient. Industry-wide mutuals thus are a way of distributing the risks of a single firm across the set of the firm's competitors. The mutual form provides that an adverse loss experience by a single firm is inflicted on the industry as a whole, but does not upset competitive balance within the industry. [233]

REV_00263022

In my view, the recent increase in adoption of the mutual form derives from the different way mutuals diversify risks, and illustrates again how modern tort law has impaired the insurance function. Recall that the aggregation [*1580] of uncorrelated risks exploits the law of large numbers to concentrate the probability density function of loss around its mean, reducing effective risk and permitting more accurate prediction of expected loss. Industry-wide mutuals also aggregate risks, but in an ex post fashion. Mutuals wait for losses actually to occur and then set an effective premium to cover them. If the risks brought by members of the mutual are uncorrelated, a similar aggregation function is achieved. The effective premiums paid by members of the mutual (after dividends or assessments) will equal the loss of each insured. As a general matter, therefore, the chief difference between common stock and mutual insurance companies is that common stock companies charge premiums according to expected loss and mutuals according to actual loss. [234] As long as the risks brought by insureds are uncorrelated, the premiums will be identical.

Why have so many industries adopted the mutual form in recent years? As tort liability has expanded, risks have become increasingly correlated both within and across industries. If the risks of firms within an industry become highly correlated, a market insurer has no comparative advantage in aggregating them. The level of aggregated risks will equal or may even exceed the sum of the individual risks. The insurer may still achieve some gains by aggregating risks of one industry with risks of another industry. But if risks become highly correlated across industries -- as they will where the legal liability of all corporate providers is expanded -- the market insurer has no comparative aggregation advantage at all. Members of the industry are just as well off self-insuring. Indeed, adoption of the mutual form allows firms to continue operation until judgments are rendered bankrupting the industry, instead of paying debilitating premiums ex ante set equal to expected loss.

Here again, the contrast between the insurance effects of first- and third-party sources is stark. Providing insurance through the third-party tort law mechanism, because it correlates risks, has the effect of threatening industries with bankruptcy. Bankruptcy results in the denial of insurance coverage to victims with claims. [235] If the insurance were provided through a first-party mechanism, however, the risks of the victims could easily be made uncorrelated. [236] The insurance function, as a consequence, could be maintained. The expansion of legal liability, thus, impairs the insurance function.

In commercial insurance lines, the shift toward the mutual form has [*1581] been concentrated in industries facing long tails of liability. Large numbers of government entities, however, have also joined together to form assessible mutuals. Municipalities in metropolitan Toronto have established a mutual self-insurance pool. [237] Sheriffs in five counties of Missouri recently were forced to close their jails for several weeks until a mutual self-insurance pool was established. [238] A group of municipal mutual pools in California has enrolled 350 of the state's 444 cities. [239]

An individual government entity, such as a city, operates in the mutual form in a way slightly different from a private corporation. Some commentators seem shocked that many municipal entities are "going bare:" providing public services without any form of market or overt mutual insurance. [240] But a governmental entity can use its taxing authority as a way to act as a mutual insurer over time. Many governmental entities can diversify risks seemingly more cheaply than can private corporations because they possess populations of taxpayers, more immobile than consumers, who can be levied to satisfy large liability judgments, either directly or through revenue bonds. The citizenry may well approve of this form of mutual insurance. Voters in Blue Island, Illinois, for example, recently turned down a proposed 30 percent increase in property taxes, levied to collect funds to pay market insurance premiums. [241] The defeat of the proposal represents the (presumably informed) decision of voters to self-insure in the mutual form. Of course, hinging a government entity's tax needs to the accident rate introduces greater risk to property ownership and thus increases its costs. The advantages of the mutual form described above, however, may make government self-insurance cheaper than market insurance. Obviously, entities with larger tax bases will find this form of self-insurance relatively more attractive. [242] Cities with relatively smaller tax bases are more likely to join the mutual pools described above.

REV_00263023

Many governmental entities have one further advantage over private corporations in coping with the increase in the variance of risk generated by modern tort law. Governmental entities seem more able to persuade legislatures to grant them exemptions from the effects of tort law, perhaps because the specific beneficiaries of limiting municipal liability -- city voters -- are more highly concentrated politically than consumers of any single product. Several state legislatures, for example, have recently enacted [*1582] statutes changing liability standards and damage measures for actions brought against public entities. [243]

There is no clear conceptual justification to judge against different standards torts committed by government versus private employees. Indeed, as suggested by the apparent greater frequence of adoption of the mutual form, governments seem more able to tolerate heavy liabilities through self-insurance than do companies. The point, rather, is that both corporate and governmental insurance liability are inferior to first-party insurance liability. Municipalities, because of their superior political influence, especially in times of independent political pressure to tighten budgets, are more able than corporate providers to obtain legislation shifting the insurance burdens of modern tort law back to first-party sources.

VI. THE INSURANCE CRISIS: ITS CAUSE AND CURE

A. Cause and Effects

By my count, the industries that have been most seriously affected by the current insurance crisis are those dealing with hazardous materials, including toxic wastes, asbestos, and chemicals; manufacturers of pharmaceuticals and related products; hospitals, physicians in certain specialties such as obstetrics and anesthetics, and related practitioners such as nurse midwives; municipalities and other governmental entities; assorted general and machine manufacturers; general aircraft manufacturers; ski lift operators; day care centers; corporate directors and officers; liquor establishments; and publishers. There are vast lines of insurance that have been totally untouched by the crisis. All first-party insurance lines -- auto, health, life, disability -- have been largely unaffected. Even some third-party liability lines, such as auto and workers' compensation have been unaffected. Can these different industry experiences be explained by the progressive shift from first-party toward third-party tort law insurance?

Obviously, the absence of crisis in first-party insurance lines is consistent with the theory. The other phenomena are also consistent. The industries most seriously affected by the crisis are those for which the risks have become essentially uninsurable. The risks of tort liability are uninsurable for two separate reasons. One set of firms affected by the crisis have been made subject to tort liability for claims that do not result from probabilistic causes. I have mentioned earlier that insurance is only feasible where a loss has a probabilistic character. Put simply, insurers have no comparative advantage in providing coverage for non-probabilistic losses; there are no efficiencies gained from aggregating that nature of claims. The inability [*1583] to insure tort claims against day care centers for injuries suffered from sex abuse has already been explained in these terms. Other industries in the list, however, suffer similar problems. The liability of liquor establishments for injuries from drunken behavior, in particular drunk driving, raises severe insurability problems. The frequency of harm-causing intoxication is most directly influenced by those to whom the insured taverns serve liquor. Although there may be some random component with respect to the extent of damage caused, the randomness may easily be swamped by the effect of the specific decisions of tavern clients. [244] Directors' and officers' insurance and publishers' defamation insurance is of the same nature. While there is some random component to such claims and to the vulnerability of the insured to such claims, there is also heavy influence of the intentional actions of the insured itself.

REV_00263024

The second principal reason that tort liability is uninsurable for the industries listed above is that the variance of risks has been so expanded by tort liability that the risk pools are unsupportable. Many of the industries most severely affected by the insurance crisis are those subject to tails of liability extending over long periods of time, thus incorporating an extraordinarily wide range of potential outcomes. The liability of asbestos manufacturers for injuries from asbestos ingestion exemplifies the problem. Obviously, no real insurance against asbestos tort liability is being written today. [245] Chemical manufacturers, pharmaceuticals, and the various medical specialties all face similar tails of liability. These industries, of course, have been the first into which the claims-made policy has been introduced, cutting off the liability tail. In contrast, there is no need for such policies in third-party auto, domestic casualty, or even workers' compensation insurance because there is no tail of liability following an auto collision, a slip and fall, or even most workplace injuries. [246]

Municipalities and governmental entities face closely related problems. Except for claims related to the supervision of hazardous waste disposal, there is no long tail of municipal liability extending over time. As liability for governmental supervisory behavior has been expanded, however, [*1584] something resembling a liability tail has been created. Governmental entities supervise, in one form or another, virtually all activities of the society. Insuring governmental entities requires the prediction of the range of potential plaintiffs who might successfully bring suit. The problem of prediction is made more acute where the combination of the doctrines of joint and several liability and pure comparative negligence expose the governmental entity to full liability though the entity's role in, say, the design of a road, the purchase of playground equipment, or the operation of its police force contributed in only a minor way to the injury.

To an insurer, the existence of a broad and indefinite range of potential plaintiffs is no different from a long tail of injuries extending over time. The expansion of governmental liability makes the range of potential outcomes extremely broad, requiring exaction of a very high premium. At some point, there is no advantage to a single municipality in paying this risk premium ex ante, in contrast to ex post self-insurance or operation with others in the mutual form. [247] Of course, those municipalities facing lower risks -- which may be those whose size allows them to serve the insurance function internally [248] -- will be the first to drop out of the market insurance pool, forcing premiums up and initiating the unraveling process.

The miscellaneous set of other industries -- machine manufacturers, ski lift operators, general aircraft -- are not subject to long tails of tort liability, but they are similarly subject to vastly expanded risk pools as a result of increased tort liability. Here another insurance effect is likely to be at work. Within these industries the smaller, rather than the larger, firms have been most seriously affected. It is more difficult for insurers to underwrite the risks of smaller than of larger firms, because the insured itself, given its small set of consumers, provides little of the pooling function. [249] As a consequence, the insurer must identify other firms or industries whose liability risks are uncorrelated in order to gain the pooling efficiencies of insurance. The expansion of modern tort law, as described earlier, greatly hampers this insurance effort because it affects all corporate operations and, thus, correlates (reduces the independence of) risks even within different industries.

REV_00263025

The example of the smaller firms and industries, however, suggests that the insurance crisis is a far broader phenomenon than might even be suspected from the reporting of the loudest complaints. Again, I measure the [*1585] "crisis" by those loss-generating activities which cannot be insured by means of third-party tort law insurance, but which could support first-party victim insurance. It is my view that commercial casualty markets in their entirety have been made fragile by the expansion of modern tort law. The firms most seriously affected in late 1985 and early 1986, as interest rates dipped slightly, were those whose activities generated long tails of liability or whose small size required a greater insurer role. If these explanations are accurate, however, the scope of the crisis can easily extend more broadly throughout commercial casualty fields. As interest rates dip further, or as corporate tort liability is further expanded, the crisis is likely to extend to firms of larger size or firms with shorter tails of liability.

Who has suffered most from these developments? It is clear in my mind that the greatest harm from the expansion of tort liability and the consequent shift from first- to third-party tort insurance coverage has been suffered by the poor and low-income within the consuming population. The increase in market insurance and self-insurance costs leads to increases in the price level of virtually all commodities. In some cases, these increases will effectively price low-income consumers out of the market for the product altogether. Increases in product prices shrink the purchasing dollar and, in proportionate terms, shrink it more severely for the poor.

The increase in insurance costs reduces the availability of products or services for the poor in still more ways. The unwillingness of obstetricians to perform normal deliveries for less than $ 1200, noted earlier, more severely affects those individuals for whose deliveries Medicare will pay $ 507 than those consumers able to pay the full cost by private negotiation with the doctor. Similarly, the termination of midwife services because of the absence of insurance is relatively less troublesome to those who can afford to substitute licensed physicians or full-priced obstetricians.

More generally, even if the low-income are able to continue to pay the insurance-enhanced prices of products, they are harmed. The poor and low-income are much more likely to be paying a premium that exceeds the risk they bring to the pool under third-party than under first-party insurance coverage, because of the difficulty providers face in segregating risk pools. No one today would seriously propose that all citizens pay an identical life insurance premium where some of the beneficiaries -- the high-income -- would receive greater total benefits. No one would urge that all individuals pay the same disability premium regardless of expected income. No one would seriously propose that all homeowners pay the same fire premium regardless of home value, or that all drivers pay the same auto premium regardless of car value. Yet this is exactly the regime of life and disability insurance provided by modern tort law. Modern [*1586] tort law forces all consumers to pay the same third-party insurance premium for product- and service-related coverage for losses leading to injury, disability and death.

Wealthy and high-income members of the consuming population are also harmed by the shift to third-party coverage. Admittedly, in individual instances, relatively high-income members may gain from paying a premium averaged for a pool containing some relatively low-income members. More generally, however, the broadening of risk pools characteristic of the shift to third-party coverage harms the high-risk of the insured population as well, because it reduces the availability of insurance in all contexts. The high-income do not benefit when jails and parks are closed or, for that matter, when relatively low-cost products and services, such as vaccines, are withdrawn from the product market.

Nevertheless, it is the poor who are most severely harmed. It is not surprising that the crisis has heavily disrupted the provision of municipal and other governmental services. Because such services are generally provided without charge, it is impossible directly to pass on to users the costs of increased insurance premiums. Yet it is also because municipal services are provided without charge that they are of particular importance to the lives of the poor.

REV_00263026

The motivation for the judicial expansion of third-party liability during the early 1960's was to protect the poor within the consuming population by providing them with a form of insurance that they might not otherwise obtain. [250] At the time of the first adoption of the strict liability standard, however, our society had not introduced the array of social insurance programs available today, and the courts may not have perceived the wide range of privately available first-party health and disability coverage. Today, the number failing to possess basic health coverage is very small. [251] Our society covers the poorest of the poor through Medicaid, Medicare for the aged, and General Assistance. Although it is estimated that 18 million individuals totally lack health care insurance, [252] it is unknown how many fail to qualify for Medicaid while healthy and able to maintain employment, but would qualify if, through injury or illness, their employment were to cease. This group is uninsured only formally: They are uninsured until they need health insurance, at which time they become insured. [253] A more precise 1982 telephone survey of families found only 1.5 [*1587] percent in which any family member had been denied health care for financial reasons. [254] Disability coverage in the U.S. appears more spotty, at least for non-job related injuries. But there are no studies indicating the number of individuals failing to possess private disability coverage who would not be covered by government disability programs. It is a crucially important empirical question exactly how many in our society remain unprotected for basic health and disability losses, although the number appears to be quite small and the definition of the set quite peculiar. [255] It is at the least unusual to believe that an effective and comprehensive way to provide care to such individuals is through tort system recoveries for injuries from products or services. [256]

B. Cure

Within the past eighteen months, forty-two state legislatures have enacted some form of tort reform legislation. A detailed discussion of this legislation is beyond the scope of this paper, although I will briefly review the effects of these reforms on insurance markets. The most significant changes in the law are (1) monetary caps on non-economic damages, [257] (2) caps or other limitations on punitive damages, [258] (3) abrogation of [*1588] joint and several liability, [259] (4) elimination of the collateral source rule, [260] and (5) amendments to substantive liability standards for specific activities such as municipal operations, dramshops, or non-profit organizations. [261] If the source of the crisis is the shift from first- to third-party tort law insurance sources, how effective will these reforms be?

The various tort reform statutes have been supported by a coalition of business and insurance interests, chiefly on the simple ground that modern tort liability is excessive and unfair. [262] Observers have not generally appreciated, however, that each of these reform provisions will affect insurance markets in a similar way: they reduce the variance in insurance risk pools. Obviously, caps on non-economic and punitive damages reduce the range of potential liability outcomes. Similarly, abrogation of the doctrine of joint and several liability in favor of strict comparative fault reduces the risk that any one of a group of joint defendants will ultimately be required to satisfy the entire judgment. Deducting first-party insurance benefits from tort judgments will also reduce risk pool variance. More generally, of course, altering liability standards to make recovery more difficult for plaintiffs will diminish expected liability. To the extent that variance in risk pools is reduced, third-party tort law insurance becomes more supportable.

These reforms, while helpful, constitute only partial contributions toward solution of the problems caused by modern tort law. The provision of insurance through tort law has undermined insurance markets. In my view, these markets will not be fully restored until these insurance issues are dealt with more systematically. The insurance function must be excised [*1589] from tort law altogether. None of the recent statutory reforms achieves that effect.

REV_00263027

A cap on non-economic damages, for example, does shift tort damage awards to more closely resemble levels of insurance purchased in first-party markets. In first-party markets, however, no one purchases any coverage of non-economic losses. Thus, even if non-economic damages in tort law are capped at $ 450,000 or $ 250,000, tort law continues to provide a very substantial level of excess insurance coverage.

Similarly, limitations on punitive damages may reduce risk pool variance to some extent. In my view, however, it is appropriate not only to restrain, but to prohibit, punitive damage awards in product liability and other tort contexts. Punitive damage awards can be justified only where there is some likelihood (1) that normal damage measures cannot measure loss accurately -- such as in defamation cases; [263] (2) where there is substantial difficulty in detecting the existence of the injury -- such as in fraud or, perhaps, some antitrust actions; or (3) where other incentives are needed to stimulate litigation. [264] For cases in which manufacturers or other providers have deliberately misrepresented product safety or effectiveness -- such as the MER-29 cases -- punitive damages should be awarded on grounds of the fraudulent behavior itself, not on grounds of the defective character of the product. There is no further need to award punitive damages in typical products and service liability contexts. In this respect, a legislative maximum on punitive damage awards or limitations on the conditions under which punitive awards may be made, constitutes only a partial solution.

The source of the insurability crisis is not the level of damages alone. Rather, the diffuse and indiscriminate expansion of substantive tort liability has led to the unraveling of insurance markets in an increasing number of contexts. This unraveling can be arrested only if substantive standards of liability are redefined to focus exclusively on the accident reduction goal. In my view, modern tort law provides inadequate controls on the accident rate and simultaneously creates a tort law insurance regime that disrupts insurance markets and harms the poor. The objectives of tort law reform are uncontroversial: to reduce the accident rate and to provide a more coherent and comprehensive regime of compensation insurance. These objectives cannot be achieved by tinkering with damage measures and by limited changes in liability standards for particularly [*1590] sympathetic sets of defendants, such as governmental entities, dramshops or non-profit organizations. Instead, modern tort law must be reformed systematically: by a complete redefinition of liability standards to better achieve accident reduction and insurance. [265] n1 Brody, When Products Turn into Liabilities, FORTUNE Mar. 3, 1986, at 20; Wall St. J., Jan. 21, 1986, at 31, col. 1.

FOOTNOTES:

n2 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, TIME, Mar. 24, 1986, at 18; Brody, supra note 1, at 20.

n3 N.Y. Times, Mar. 8, 1986, at 35, col. 3; Sorry Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 18.

n4 U.S. GEN. ACCOUNTING OFFICE, MEDICAL MALPRACTICE: INSURANCE COSTS INCREASED BUT VARIED AMONG PHYSICIANS AND HOSPITALS 27 (1986).

n5 N.Y. Times, Feb. 15, 1986, at 1, col. 1.

n6 Toronto Globe & Mail, Feb. 21, 1986, at B2, col. 1.

n7 N.Y. Times, Feb. 1, 1986, at 1, col. 5; Wall St. J., Feb. 3, 1986, at 5, col. 1.

REV_00263028

liability on insurance grounds leads to a reduction in total insurance coverage available to the society, rather than to an increase. The theory also shows that the parties most drastically affected by expanded liability and by the current insurance crisis are the low-income and poor, exactly the parties that courts had hoped most to aid.

Section I reviews the three existing theories and shows their inability to explain the insurance crisis. Sections II through V, then, present the theory of the paper itself. Section II demonstrates the economic effects, including the insurance effects, of tort rules. Section III describes the operation of private insurance markets. This Section shows why insurance exists, how insurance markets are defined, and how they must be maintained in order to survive. Section IV applies these insurance principles to explain the theoretical reasons that expanding liability is likely to affect private insurance markets. Section V examines the details of the recent insurance crisis in light of this theory. It explains why the insurance problems created by modern tort law have led particular providers, [29] especially municipalities, to cancel market insurance and to self-insure; how the shift to self-insurance has forced insurers to change the terms of insurance contracts or, in some cases, to refuse insurance coverage on any [*1526] terms; and why such changes in insurance markets harm principally the low-income and poor and, in many cases, benefit the high-income and wealthy. Finally, Section VI discusses why the crisis has affected the particular industries that it has and why the recent tort reform legislation in the various states is unlikely to solve the insurance problems our society faces.

This paper concludes that insurance markets can be stabilized only if courts recognize the adverse insurance consequences of expanded provider liability. Stabilizing current markets, however, is not equivalent to restoring their earlier vitality. Insurance markets can be widely restored in our society, and the scope of insurance expanded, only by a radical reconceptualization and redefinition of substantive tort law standards. The recently enacted tort reform legislation in the various states and even the more ambitious proposals of the Justice Department may serve as a temporary stop-gap, but they are unlikely to achieve stable reform because they do not challenge systematically the deeper source of the crisis: the failure of our courts to understand how legal rules affect the insurance function.

I. THREE CURRENT THEORIES AND THEIR EXPLANATORY FAILURES

In order to evaluate the collusion, insurance cycle, and the Justice Department's tort law theories, it is necessary to describe the history and manifestation of the insurance crisis in greater detail. Property/casualty insurance premiums have been increasing steadily since the early 1980's and probably before. [30] Simultaneously, an accelerating shift toward self-insurance has occurred in certain commercial casualty insurance lines. For example, over this period, growing numbers of doctors and other professionals have formed small mutual insurance groups instead of continuing to purchase malpractice insurance from market carriers. Some doctors, after shielding their assets, have continued to practice uninsured. [31] Similarly, increasing numbers of manufacturers have dropped market insurance in favor of the creation of captive offshore insurance subsidiaries. [32] At about the same time, in the early 1980's, insurers initiated efforts to restrict coverage levels in certain commercial lines by changing the terms of the basic policy from an occurrence to a claims-made basis. [33]

[*1527] The crisis of early 1986 consists only of a sharpening of these broader trends. As premiums increased, larger numbers of firms consciously decided to self-insure by establishing their own reserves. [34] The basic commercial insurance policy was revised more drastically: the claims-made policy was adopted almost universally, deductibles were raised, aggregate policy limits were lowered, and greater numbers of specific coverage exclusions were incorporated. [35] Despite these reductions in insurance coverage, premiums in many commercial casualty lines were increased by extraordinary amounts: in some cases by 400%, 1000%, 1500%, and more. [36] In some lines, such as coverage for nurse-midwives, municipalities, and day care centers, many insurers refused to offer coverage at any n8 N.Y. Times, Mar. 26, 1986, at C12, col. 4.

REV_00262993

n9 Wall St. J., supra note 1.

n10 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 17-18; N.Y. Times, Mar. 4, 1986, at A26, col. 1 (editorial).

n11 N.Y. Times, May 12, 1986, at 1, col. 1.

n12 N.Y. Times, June 15, 1986, § 23, at 1, col. 4; Wall St. J., June 6, 1986, at 27, col. 1; New Haven Register, May 15, 1986, at 1, col. 1.

n13 N.Y. Times, Feb. 19, 1987, at 1, col. 5.; Wash. Post, Jan. 15, 1987, at A20, col. 1 (editorial); Wash. Post, Jan. 5, 1987, at 18, col. 1-4.

n14 N. WEBER, PRODUCT LIABILITY: THE CORPORATE RESPONSE 4-7 (Conf. Bd. 1987) [hereinafter Conf. Bd.]; Glaberson, Liability Rates Flattening Out as Crisis Eases, N.Y. Times, Feb. 9, 1987, at 1, col. 5; Wall St. J., Jan. 6, 1987, at 64, col. 2 (malpractice insurance costs continue to rise despite tort reform); Wash. Post, Jan. 5, 1987, at 18, col. 1.

n15 Conf. Bd., supra note 14, at 15-16.

n16 Sorry, Your Policy Is Cancelled, supra note 2, at 24.

n17 GOVERNOR'S ADVISORY COMM'N ON LIABILITY INSURANCE, INSURING OUR FUTURE 15, 24 (1986) (New York City Schools) [hereinafter CUOMO COMM'N].

n18 See infra text accompanying notes 237-39 & note 239.

n19 See infra text accompanying notes 240-43.

n20 See Goldberg, Manufacturers Take Cover, A.B.A. J., July 1, 1986, at 52, 55 (quoting Jay Angoff, Nat'l Ins. Consumer Org.); The Liability Crisis: Who's To Blame?, 6 MANHATTAN REP. 1, 9 (1986) (discussant's comment); Statement of J. Robert Hunter, Medical Mut. Liab. Ins. Soc'y of Md. (July 1, 1985). For a discussion of this theory, see infra text accompanying notes 39-45.

n21 See F. Bellotti, J. Van de Kamp, L. Thornburg, J. Mattox, C. Brown & B. La Follette, An Analysis of the Causes of the Current Crisis of Unavailability and Unaffordability of Liability Insurance (Nat'l Ass'n of Attorneys Gen., Ad Hoc Comm. on Ins., May, 1986) (unpublished manuscript). This theory is discussed infra at text accompanying notes 46-58.

n22 See, e.g., Goldberg, supra note 20, at 55 (quoting Frank Nutter, President, Alliance of American Insurers). For a discussion of this theory, see infra text accompanying notes 47-58.

n23 Recently, Florida and Hawaii have instituted new rate regulation of commercial casualty insurance lines allegedly to constrain insurer profit gouging. Several other state legislatures are considering regulation of this nature.

n24 U.S. DEP'T OF JUSTICE, REPORT OF THE TORT POLICY WORKING GROUP ON THE CAUSES, EXTENT AND POLICY IMPLICATIONS OF THE CURRENT CRISIS IN INSURANCE AVAILABILITY AND AFFORDABILITY (1986) [hereinafter DOJ REPORT]. For a discussion of this theory, see infra text accompanying notes 59-71.

n25 For a summary, see NAT'L CONFERENCE OF STATE LEGISLATURES, SELECTED STATE

REV_00263029

LEGISLATIVE ACTION RE: AFFORDABILITY AND AVAILABILITY OF LIABILITY INSURANCE (Aug. 4, 1986).

n26 It should be remembered that the 42nd adoption of the U.C.C. occurred in 1965, 12 years after the first adoption in 1953.

n27 Noble, Liability Insurance Reported Easier To Get Than Year Ago, N.Y. Times, Mar. 27, 1987, at D18, col. 1 (quoting Justice Department press release).

n28 See Priest, The Invention of Enterprise Liability: A Critical History of the Intellectual Foundations of Modern Tort Law, 14 J. LEGAL STUD. 461 (1985) [hereinafter Enterprise Liability].

n29 The term provider refers to producers of goods (manufacturers) and services (other than insurers), including government entities.

n30 Conf. Bd., supra note 14, at 4 (Table 2); WYATT CO., 1985 DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS LIABILITY SURVEY 17 (1985).

n31 Patricia Danzon reports that, as of 1985, over 40% of medical malpractice insurance was written by small mutual or captive insurance firms. P. DANZON, MEDICAL MALPRACTICE 93 (1985). For estimates of doctors who practice uninsured, see Zuckerman, The Costs of Medical Malpractice, 3 HEALTH AFFAIRS 128, 132-133 (1984).

n32 See INSURANCE SERVICES OFFICE, INC., THE COMING CAPACITY SHORTAGE 11 (1985).

n33 See INSURANCE SERVICES OFFICE, INC., COMPREHENSIVE GENERAL LIABILITY POLICY (2d ed. 1985). See generally AMERICAN INSURANCE ASSOCIATION, PRODUCT LIABILITY INSURANCE 23 (1979) (describing claims-made policy).

n34 N.Y. Times, Mar. 8, 1986, at 35, col. 3; see Conf. Bd., supra note 14, at 3 (Table 1); Business Week reports that, "Before the crisis, . . . 'self-insurance' totaled no more than 25% of the market. Now, it's about 33% and growing." The Crisis Is Over but Insurance Will Never Be the Same, BUS. WEEK, May 25, 1987, at 122, col. 1, 3. Others have estimated the current extent of self-insurance as constituting 25% to 47% of the property/casualty market. See infra note 193.

n35 For specific examples of these changes, see infra text accompanying notes 194-215.

n36 Compare the recent changes in premium-to-coverage ratios, infra text accompanying notes 216-21.

n37 See infra text accompanying notes 225-31.

n38 T. SCHELLING, An Economist Looks at Risk and Liability, in RISK, COMPENSATION, AND LIABILITY: THE POLICY CHOICES 53-55 (1986).

n39 See, e.g., The Liability Crisis: Who's To Blame?, supra note 20, at 9 (discussant's comment).

n40 Schwartz & Wilde, Imperfect Information in Market for Contract Terms: The Examples of Warranties and Security Interests, 69 VA. L. REV. 1387, 1414 (1983). See generally Rosen, Hedonic Prices and Implicit Markets: Product Differentiation and Pure Competition, 82 J. POL. ECON. 34 (1974).

REV_00263030

n41 For the same reason, the regulation of prices and terms in the casualty insurance industry is likely to be ineffective. See Stewart, Remembering a Stable Future, address delivered at ISO-III Industry Conf., Jan. 14, 1987 (unpublished manuscript on file with author).

n42 See Goldberg, supra note 20, at 55 (quoting Jay Angoff, Nat'l Ins. Consumer Org.).

n43 See, e.g., U.S. Gen. Accounting Office, Statement of William J. Anderson, Director, Gen. Gov't Div. Before the Subcommittee on Oversight, Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives, on Profitability of the Property/Casualty Insurance Industry 8 (Mar. 13, 1986) (underwriting losses have bottomed out; industry will have substantial net gains over next five years); U.S. Gen. Accounting Office, Statement of Johnny C. Finch, Senior Associate Director, Gen. Gov't Div., Before the Subcommittee on Oversight, Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives, on Profitability of the Property/Casualty Insurance Industry 5 (Apr. 28, 1986) (industry profitable over long term).

n44 See AMERICAN INSURANCE ASSOCIATION, supra note 33, at 9, 44-47, 65-67, 72-73; R. MEHR & E. CAMMACK, PRINCIPLES OF INSURANCE 600-03 (6th ed. 1976).

n45 See Goldberg, supra note 20, at 55 (citing Jay Angoff's claim that rate increase is part of effort to convince legislators of "crisis in the courts").

n46 This is the principal explanation of the Cuomo Commission. See CUOMO COMM'N, supra note 17, at 10-11.

n47 See INSURANCE SERVICES OFFICE, INC., 1985: A CRITICAL YEAR 4 (1985); Goldberg, supra note 20, at 55 (quoting Frank Nutter, President of American Alliance of Insurers).

n48 A more implausible argument holds that premiums must be raised to make up for past losses. This account ignores the highly competitive character of the commercial casualty industry that would prevent recoupment.

n49 I am aware of no study that has attempted rigorously to demonstrate this relationship.

n50 For the aggregate portfolio of property/casualty insurers, see INSURANCE INFORMATION INST., 1986-87 PROPERTY/CASUALTY FACT BOOK 23 (1986). Industry investment income increased during 1985 by 10.5%. Id. at 20. Note also the simultaneous increases in payouts of self-insurers who maintain no reserve portfolio, such as New York City. See CUOMO COMM'N, supra note 17, at 35-36.

n51 INSURANCE INFORMATION INSTITUTE, supra note 50, at 49-50.

n52 This argument is relied upon heavily by the Cuomo Commission. See, e.g., CUOMO COMM'N, supra note 17, at 15.

n53 See R. RIEGEL, J. MILLER & C. WILLIAMS, INSURANCE PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICES 567-89 (6th ed. 1976); INSURANCE SERVICES OFFICE, INC., supra note 32, at 14. The premium-to-surplus ratio regulations are promulgated under insurance commissions' authority to ensure that insurers remain solvent. See, e.g., IOWA CODE § 505.8 (1983).

n54 See INSURANCE SERVICES OFFICE, INC., supra note 32, at 5, 14.

n55 CUOMO COMM'N, supra note 17, at 27-28.

n56 These ratios were obtained by dividing industrywide net premiums written in 1984 and 1985, INSURANCE INFORMATION INSTITUTE, 1986-87 PROPERTY/CASUALTY FACT BOOK 24

REV_00263031

(1986), by industry-wide policyholder's surplus at the end of the respective years, id. at 18. "Net premiums written" is defined as "premium income retained by insurance companies, direct or through reinsurance, less payments made for business reinsured"; "policyholder's surplus" is the "[s]um left after liabilities are deducted from assets . . .[,] the financial base that permits a company to sell insurance." Id. at 112.

n57 Of course, the premium-to-surplus ratio must be calculated at the firm level for individual insurance lines. It is within an insurer's judgment, however, to reallocate surplus and capacity from one line to another. In addition, even if some individual firms exceed the 3:1 or 4:1 ratio, the industry-wide figure shows that other firms have resources that could be allocated to these lines. For a description of the distribution of premium-to-surplus ratios across firms, see INSURANCE SERVICES OFFICE, INC., 1985: A CRITICAL YEAR 18-19 (1985).

n58 For an interesting, but to my mind, unproven theory of the premium cycle, based on the administrative costs of adjusting capacity levels, see R. WINTER, "CRISES" IN COMPETITIVE INSURANCE MARKETS (Hoover Institution Working Papers in Economics E-86-74 (Dec. 1986)).

n59 DOJ REPORT, supra note 24, at 45.

n60 Id. at 47.

n61 Id.

n62 Id. at 51.

n63 Id. at 60-75.

n64 Of course, there has been extensive industry lobbying for tort reform legislation. See, e.g., The Need for Legislative Reform of the Tort System: A Report on the Liability Crisis from Affected Organizations (1986) (lobbying memorandum of 140 trade associations and other organizations on file with author).

n65 NAT'L CENTER FOR STATE COURTS, A PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF THE AVAILABLE CIVIL AND CRIMINAL TREND DATA IN STATE TRIAL COURTS FOR 1978, 1981 AND 1984.

n66 Id. at 2.

n67 Id.

n68 See M. PETERSON & G. PRIEST, THE CIVIL JURY: TRENDS IN TRIALS AND VERDICTS, COOK COUNTY, ILLINOIS, 1960-1979, at 7, Figure 1 (Rand Corp. R-2881-ICJ 1982).

n69 DOJ REPORT, supra note 24, at 45.

n70 Id. at 46 (filings data from Admin. Office of U.S. Courts); id. at 38 (average products liability jury verdict data from Jury Verdict Research, Inc.). Note that it is unclear whether the data on average award is based on state cases, federal cases, or a sample of both. It is also worth noting that "the reported average annual verdicts are not used by the Working Group as an accurate statement (though they may very well be) of the average jury verdict in any particular year." Id. at 36 n.33. I am skeptical of the Jury Verdict Research data because they make no pretense of being representative.

n71 Id. at 45, 47. These figures appear to include suits in both federal and state courts.

REV_00263032

n72 M. Trebilcock, The Social Insurance-Deterrence Dilemma of Modern North American Tort Law, 3-4 (2d draft Jan. 1987) (unpublished manuscript on file with author); Epstein, Shooting the Insurance Messenger, Chicago Tribune, May 30, 1986, § 1, at 25, col. 1.

n73 See generally A. EHRENZWEIG, NEGLIGENCE WITHOUT FAULT (1951). For a discussion of the influence of this theory on modern tort law, see Enterprise Liability, supra note 28, at 519-27.

n74 See Landes & Posner, A Positive Economic Analysis of Products Liability, 14 J. LEGAL STUD. 535 (1985); Shavell, Strict Liability Versus Negligence, 9 J. LEGAL STUD. 1 (1980).

n75 See Enterprise Liability, supra note 28, at 462-64. For a more detailed recounting of the concern of courts with providing insurance to the poor, see Priest, Protecting the Poor Through Tort Law (unpublished manuscript on file with author).

n76 59 Cal. 2d 57, 377 P.2d 897, 27 Cal. Rptr. 697 (1963) (in bank). This case is discussed in Enterprise Liability, supra note 28, at 505-11.

n77 This paper cannot review these developments in detail. For a more thorough discussion, particularly of products liability law, see Enterprise Liability, supra note 28, at 496-519. See generally Escola v. Coca Cola Bottling Co., 24 Cal. 2d 453, 461, 150 P.2d 436, 440-42 (1944) (in bank) (Traynor, J., concurring) (now classic statement of enterprise liability rationale).

n78 See Luque v. McLean, 8 Cal. 3d 136, 145-46, 501 P.2d 1163, 1169-70, 104 Cal. Rptr. 443, 449-50 (1972); McCown v. International Harvester Co., 463 Pa. 13, 18-19, 342 A.2d 381, 383-84 (1975) (Pomeroy, J., concurring) (stressing risk-spreading rationale for holding that contributory negligence does not apply to products liability cases).

n79 Duncan v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 665 S.W.2d 414, 422-28 (Tex. 1984) (abandoning assumption of risk, product misuse and failing to avoid damages in favor of single "comparative causation" concept that will proportionately reduce, but not preclude, the plaintiff's judgment). But see McCown v. International Harvester Co., 463 Pa. 13, 19, 342 A.2d 381, 384 (1975) (Pomeroy, J., concurring) (risk-spreading justifies denying manufacturers contributory negligence defense, but is outweighed by countervailing policy reasons in support of assumption of risk defense).

n80 See Duncan, 665 S.W.2d 414. In addition, see the insurance effects of manufacturer liability for foreseeable consumer misuse, Hughes v. Magic Chef, Inc., 288 N.W.2d 542, 546 (Iowa 1980); General Motors Corp. v. Hopkins, 548 S.W.2d 344 (Tex. 1977), and despite intervening negligence, Huff v. White Motor Corp., 565 F.2d 104, 109-10 (7th Cir. 1977) (vehicle collision is foreseeable use).

n81 E.g., Rowland v. Christian, 69 Cal. 2d 108, 443 P.2d 561, 70 Cal. Rptr. 97 (1968). For a broader discussion of these developments, see PROSSER & KEETON ON THE LAW OF TORTS § 63 (W. Keeton 5th ed. 1984).

n82 The occurrence-manifestation disputes provide good examples. See, e.g., Keene Corp. v. Insurance Co. of N. Am., 667 F.2d 1034 (D.C. Cir. 1981) (in addition to general liability policies in effect at time of asbestos inhalation, policies in effect at time of residence of asbestos in lung, and manifestation of asbestos-related disease cover liability of asbestos manufacturer to injured worker), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 1007 (1982). See also the invocation of the insurance rationale to resolve evidentiary issues against manufacturers in Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Civ. Action No. 83-2864 (D.N.J. Sept. 25, 1986).

n83 See Enterprise Liability, supra note 28, at 496-519.

REV_00263033

n84 Barker v. Lull Eng'g Co., 20 Cal. 3d 413, 434, 573 P.2d 443, 457, 143 Cal. Rptr. 225 (1978) (fact that manufacturer took reasonable precautions to design safe product does not prevent imposition of strict liability upon hindsight judgment that product was unsafe); Beshada v. Johns-Manville Prods. Corp., 90 N.J. 191, 202-09, 447 A.2d 539, 545-49 (1982) (manufacturers liable for failure to warn of hazards unknowable at time of manufacture). But see Feldman v. Lederle Laboratories, 97 N.J. 429, 479 A.2d 374 (1984) (apparently limiting such liability to asbestos-like circumstances).

n85 Halphen v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 484 So. 2d 110 (La. 1986).

n86 See, e.g., Sindell v. Abbott Laboratories, 26 Cal. 3d 588, 607 P.2d 924, 163 Cal. Rptr. 132 (creating "market share" liability), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 912 (1980).

n87 E.g., Daly v. General Motors Corp., 20 Cal. 3d 725, 575 P.2d 1162, 144 Cal. Rptr. 380 (1978).

n88 See generally K. ABRAHAM, DISTRIBUTING RISK (1986); Keene, supra note 82, at 1041.

n89 See, e.g., Hargerty v. L & L Marine Servs., 788 F.2d 315, 317-18 (5th Cir. 1986) (damages for fear of cancer recoverable by seaman under Jones Act).

n90 Legal rules also affect the levels of injurer and victim activity. The economic dimension of such a shift, however, is only perceptible if information is available -- as it seldom, if ever, is -- about the shapes of injurer and victim utility functions, including demand and supply conditions for injurer and victim activities, respectively. In my view, few practical benefits can be obtained by considering the abstract effects of internalizing costs to affect activity levels. See G. Priest, Internalizing Costs (1987) (unpublished manuscript on file with author).

n91 See generally R. POSNER, ECONOMIC ANALYSIS OF LAW 147-52 (3d ed. 1986).

n92 Awards in excess of compensatory damages, such as punitive damages, can in theory lead to either an increase or a reduction in aggregate safety levels. See Priest, Punitive Damages and Enterprise Liability, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 123, 128-32 (1982); G. Priest & J. Donohue, The Determinants of the Accident Rate (1987) (unpublished manuscript on file with author).

n93 Injurers and victims are likely to make errors in choosing optimal forms of accident prevention and some accidents are not worth preventing.

n94 Again, this analysis puts aside considerations of greater than compensatory damages. See supra note 92.

n95 See Posner, A Theory of Negligence, 1 J. LEGAL STUD. 29 (1972). I am very skeptical that the negligence standard, as it is applied by courts and juries, closely resembles an economically efficient cost-benefit standard.

n96 See cases cited supra notes 76-89.

n97 As an example of the difference between savings and life insurance, a family that saves a certain amount each year for use after a wage earner's death can draw, after that event, on the accumulated savings amount (plus earned interest). In contrast, a family that purchases life insurance will receive much more in dollar benefits than it paid in premiums if the death occurs early relative to expected mortality, and much less in benefits than premiums paid if death occurs late.

REV_00263034

n98 Statistical independence is when the occurrence of one event does not alter the probability of the other. For example, repeated flips of a fair coin are statistically independent events; even if the last 100 flips have all come up heads, there is still a 50% chance of tossing heads next time.

n99 See Marshall, Insurance Theory: Reserves Versus Mutuality, 12 ECON. INQUIRY 476 (1974).

n100 For a definition of variance, see infra note 103.

n101 The insurer may also monitor the risks of the insured's activity to persuade the insured to reduce its level of risk and provide a claims adjustment service. The relative effectiveness of insurers serving these functions is not likely to be different before and after the recent crisis. Thus, I do not regard them as central to an explanation of the crisis, even though they may be very important benefits provided by market insurance.

n102 DENENBERG, EILERS, HOFFMAN, KLINE, MELONE & SNIDER, RISK AND INSURANCE 191-92 (1964); see also Epstein, Products Liability as an Insurance Market, 14 J. LEGAL STUD. 645, 650-52 (1985) (discussing adverse selection and the failure of modern products liability law to control it).

n103 The variance of a distribution is the square of the sum of the differences between each observation and the mean: variance = delta<2> = sigma(x[i] - mean-x)<2>, where mean-x = the mean of the distribution and x[i], each observation.

n104 Again, I do not mean to minimize the productive efficiencies achieved by insurer monitoring of risky activities or by claims adjustment. See supra note 101.

n105 For other formulations of this point, see Cummins, Insurer's Risk: A Restatement, 41 J. RISK & INS. 147 (1974); Venezian, Insurer Capital Needs Under Parameter Uncertainty, 42 J. RISK & INS. 19 (1975).

n106 Akerlof, The Market for "Lemons": Quality Uncertainty and the Market Mechanism, 84 Q.J. ECON. 488 (1970). The unraveling process is described more fully and illustrated infra at text accompanying notes 216-26.

n107 The mutuality principle for insurance, which departs in some ways from the pooling effects of the law of large numbers, must be distinguished. See infra text accompanying notes 232-34.

n108 Marshall, supra note 99, at 477; see infra note 111 and accompanying text. This is also the best explanation for the terms of the typical force majeure clause in contract law.

n109 I hope it is obvious that by "narrow" I mean with small variance or concentrated around the mean as opposed to small in number.

n110 See generally James, Accident Liability Reconsidered: The Impact of Liability Insurance, 57 YALE L.J. 549 (1948).

n111 The term "risk spreading" is sometimes used to describe shifting the costs of bearing risks away from parties that generate them as, for example, assigned risk pools that shift the costs generated by more risky drivers to the less risky. I am using the term, instead, to refer to spreading that serves to reduce effective risk.

REV_00263035

n112 Irrelevant to this point, for example, are insurer productive efficiencies in risk monitoring, claims servicing or portfolio selection.

n113 It may exceed the sum, especially, if the total risks threaten to swamp the total assets of the insurer and there is a deadweight loss to reorganization through bankruptcy.

n114 See Rothschild & Stiglitz, Equilibrium in Competitive Insurance Markets: An Essay on the Economics of Imperfect Information, 90 Q.J. ECON. 629 (1976).

n115 In this respect, the Justice Department Working Group's conclusion that state insurance regulation has not had much effect on the current insurance crisis, DOJ REPORT, supra note 24, at 59, 80, is likely to be a serious underestimation of the problem.

n116 For a discussion of methods of narrowing risk pools in the context of consumer product warranty insurance/repair contracts, see Priest, A Theory of the Consumer Product Warranty, 90 YALE L.J. 1297 (1981).

n117 Of course, there is always some level of redistribution in any risk pool from low-risk insureds to high-risk insureds because of the impossibility of perfect segregation. Insurance will still remain attractive to the low-risk insured if the extent of redistribution is less than the insured's relative risk aversion. Obviously, the more closely the premium for the risk pool approximates the risk brought by the low-risk insured, the more attractive market insurance becomes.

n118 See Zeckhauser, Coverage for Catastrophic Illness, 21 PUB. POL'Y 149 (1973), for interesting variations on this point.

n119 I am discussing here term insurance, rather than whole life insurance. Because whole life incorporates a predominant savings component, decisions about its purchase are different.

n120 Zeckhauser, supra note 118, at 157, suggests an old folks' home whose inhabitants are without descendants, and spend every resource they have while alive, but bequeath the assets they retained as necessary during life to the other inhabitants of the home for current enjoyment.

n121 Similar problems of measurement also explain why life insurance (unlike health or disability coverage) is never offered subject to subsequent valuation, but rather is offered in prespecified amounts.

n122 In fact, consumers as a group do pay ex ante for the excessive care demanded under a nodeductible policy, because the insurer exacts higher premiums to cover the higher amount of claims. Ex post, however, any individual insured faced with the choice of levels of medical care has much more to gain by using too much care than he or she loses in higher premiums. See Pauly, The Economics of Moral Hazard: Comment, 58 AM. ECON. REV. 531, 533-35 (1968).

n123 Controlling moral hazard, of course, is likely to also include some degree of hands-tying, its more typical explanation. See id. at 535.

n124 For example, Blue Cross-Blue Shield typically pays only 80% of major medical expenses. The insured coinsures the other 20%.

n125 I ignore here the effects of the Geneva and proposed Montreal Conventions limiting damages for international (but not United States originating) air travel. 47 Stat. 2021 (1929). These Conventions reduce differences in risk pools by limiting damages owed by the airlines to victims of air crashes.

REV_00263036

n126 The most common and best-known alternative to market insurance is self-insurance -- the maintenance of reserves adequate to meet expected losses and the threat of bankrupty if these reserves prove too low. See infra notes 190-93 and accompanying text. Self-insurance has been popularly called "going bare." A recently popular alternative to market insurance, that is something of a hybrid of going bare and buying standard insurance, is insuring through industry mutuals. See infra text accompanying notes 227-42.

n127 The purchase of market insurance by a firm, thus, is likely to involve more complicated questions of corporate finance. See Mayers & Smith, On the Corporate Demand for Insurance, 55 J. BUS. 281 (1982); see also infra text accompanying note 164.

n128 For a discussion of the corporate demand for insurance, see infra text accompanying notes 159-64.

n129 See supra Section II.

n130 DOJ REPORT, supra note 24, at 49, 52.

n131 See supra text accompanying notes 65-71.

n132 I am grateful to Ralph A. Winter, Armen Alchian, and Jack Carr for their comments on this point.

n133 Ralph A. Winter has shown that insureds with relative risk aversion indices greater than one will be more likely to stay in than drop out of risk pools. R. Winter, Note on the Effect of Scalar Changes on Adverse Selection (1986) (unpublished manuscript on file with author).

n134 See supra Section II.

n135 DOJ REPORT, supra note 24, at 35-42, 45-52.

n136 See G. PRIEST, COMPENSATION SYSTEMS AND TORT LAW: A PRELIMINARY COMPARATIVE APPROACH, (Program in Civil Liability Working Paper No. 50, Yale Law School, Oct. 1986), in RISK, COMPENSATION & LIABILITY: THE POLICY CHOICES (1986); see also SEN. SUBCOMM. ON THE AGED, 99TH CONG., 2D SESS. WORKING PAPER NO. 1: A PROFILE OF HEALTH BENEFITS AND THE UNINSURED (Subcomm. Print Oct. 17, 1986).

n137 SEN. SUBCOMM. ON THE AGED, supra note 136.

n138 This point is emphasized in M. Trebilcock, supra note 72, at 3.

